What the present Premier of Saskatchewan says in that regard I am quite sure can be substantiated by many members of this House. Let me also quote the statement of the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which, I believe, appeared in the newspapers either this morning or last evening. In that part of his speech dealing with freight rates, he says:

> It is the view of the directors, and it has been their view for some time, that the scaling downwards of freight rates should be begun with reductions on basic commodities, especially in those industries which have felt the general depression most severely. Notwithstanding the willingness of the companies to make sacrifices in their revenues in the hope that a lower scale of rates on basic commodities would give an impetus to business activity, they have been precluded from agreeing on a definite policy because of the approaching expiration on July 7 next of the provisions of the Railway Act allowing the Railway Commission to make rates irrespective of agreements, statutory or other.

Now, I take it from that statement that the Canadian Pacific Railway company will object, as an organization, to the reviving of the Crowsnest pass agreement. In view of the various statements made with regard to the resolution before the House, one perhaps finds himself in some difficulty in determining exactly what is the particular issue. It seems to me, however, regardless of how it may be put, that the question fundamentally is simply this: Are we going to appoint a committee to determine whether or not, after all the facts have been ascertained, the Crowsnest pass agreement shall be further suspended, shall be abrogated, or shall be revived in its present form? Let me say at the outset that I for one at least am in favour of the agreement being revived on July 7th next, and I am perfectly clear on that. I have no objection to an investigation into railway rates as they affect any other commodities not covered by the Crowsnest pass agreement, but as regards that agreement I believe without question that it should come into effect again on July 7th next.

Realising the necessity for a reduction in freight rates, let us for a moment consider the contract which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has with the Government in the agreement described as the Crowsnest pass agreement. It is unnecessary for me to point out that this is not the only contract which the government of Canada has made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; and I think that everyone will agree with me when I say that the people of Canada have scrupulously and faithfully carried out every provision of any contract that they ever entered into with that company. They have not asked for the abrogation or the suspension of any of those agreements many of which undoubtedly have borne very heavily on the country, and more especially on the people of western Canada. We have hewed to the line and carried out the terms of each and every contract which our governments have at various times made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Is it proposed now that this committee shall consider only the Crowsnest pass agreement because the Canadian Pacific Railway asks for the abrogation or the suspension of that agreement? Would it not be just as fair, considering this as a solemn agreement made in consideration of a cash subsidy of $3,630,000, for the Parliament of Canada to ask the Canadian Pacific Railway company to consider the suspension or the alteration of their charter regarding, for instance, tax exemption? I think that the Canadian Pacific Railway company, when they entered into this solemn and binding contract, must have realised the possibilities of the situation. They may not perhaps have realised them all, but in that regard they must take their chances just as the people of Canada took their chances when they entered into the agreement with the Canadian Pacific railway in the matter of their charter. Would the Canadian Pacific railway, in consideration of the abrogation or suspension of this particular agreement, undertake to return to the people of Canada the sum of $3,630,000 which was given them as a cash subsidy? Do they propose to give us any consideration for the privileges which we have accorded them? So far as I can observe, I presume they will not. The Crowsnest pass agreement of 1897 represents nothing less and nothing more than a charter so far as freight rates are concerned, and I think we should be very careful indeed before we consent to a further suspension or to an abrogation of that agreement. I may say frankly that I, for one, am not prepared to consent to anything of that kind.

Considering the agreement for a moment, I may point out that the bill incorporating the Crowsnest pass agreement itself was introduced by the then Minister of Railways, the Hon. A. G. Blair. Mr. Blair had apparently no misconception as to the value to the people of Canada of this particular provision regarding freight rates. He said:

> The committee will have noted that we have sought to ensure the country a large measure of relief from the rates which have obtained since the Canadian Pacific railway was started. We have imposed conditions upon the company which are very largely restrictive of their present powers. We have embraced in one of the sub-clauses of these resolutions, a considerable list of articles which go into very large consumption among the people of the western provinces and we have secured an agreement on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that very substantial reductions will be made upon existing rates.

Now, the commodities have already been referred to, a few items at a time, but I think, it will be found upon a close examination that so far as the westbound commodities are concerned they cover fruit, agricultural implements, building materials, household furniture, iron and wire, cordage and binder twine; those are substantially the commodities concerned in the westbound traffic referred to in this agreement. It is true that at that time these particular commodities did constitute the basic commodities of the West. It is also true, despite what the late Minister of Railways (Mr. Stewart) has stated, that with one or two possible exceptions—live stock, fruit and one or two other commodities—they still constitute the basic requirements of the western country. Looking at the eastbound traffic, we find two items, grain and flour. Surely no one will suggest that these articles do not still constitute the basic products of the West. But it seems to me that the members of the House in those days when considering these various commodities endeavoured to give favourable rates to eastern manufacturers so far as westbound freight was concerned, and favourable tolls to eastbound products of the western country.

It has been suggested, Mr. Speaker, that this agreement applies to the Canadian Pacific railway only as it then existed. But I would point out to the hon. gentleman responsible for that view that the Railway Commission, which is a judicial body, decided in December, 1917, and its decision has not been questioned, that the Crowsnest pass agreement:—

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What is the date of the decision?

Mr. SHAW: December 26, 1917. It deals with the 15 per cent increase then granted by the Railway Commission under the chairmanship of Sir Henry Drayton. In deciding the question as to whether or not the agreement applied to the Canadian Pacific Railway as it then existed, the chairman said in the operative part of his judgment:

> I am of opinion that the discrimination should be avoided, and that the effect of the Crowsnest pass agreement must be extended to the system of the company as now operated.

If that interpretation of the law is correct, the situation is simply this, that not only did the agreement apply to the Canadian Pacific Railway of that particular date and to the lines leased and operated by it, but it likewise applies to the Canadian Pacific Railway as it exists to-day.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The question I raised is purely a legal question and not a matter of rates. The quotation from Sir Henry Drayton's judgment does not purport to decide, as a matter of law, that the Crowsnest pass agreement extended beyond any lines other than those then existing. I am sure my hon. friend will agree with me in that.

Mr. SHAW: I do not wish to mislead any one, certainly not the hon. member for Pictou, but it does seem to me that that particular point is perfectly clear in the judgment of the Railway Commission as given by Sir Henry Drayton, and I quote it for what it is worth.

Hon. members may recollect that a case involving a somewhat similar point came before the Privy Council in connection with the application of a gas company in one of our western cities for a declaration that they were entitled to franchise rights in property which had not been included in the area of the municipality at the time the franchise was granted. The Privy Council held that the franchise rights extended beyond the original corporate limits of that particular city at the time, and covered the increased area subsequently taken into the municipality.

Another point referred to was as to whether or not the Crowsnest pass agreemen applied only to the Canadian Pacific Railway and not to other lines of railway —the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. Of course, in the agreement there is no reference to these two additional railways, they not being then in existence, but in the same judgment from which I have already quoted the chairman of the Railway Commission said:

> It is quite true that neither the Canadian Northern nor the Grand Trunk Pacific are bound by provisions of the Crowsnest pass agreement or act. On the other hand, while it would be open for the Board to permit an increase of 15 per cent in their rates over a very large part of the territory served by one or other of these systems, grain could undoubtedly be hauled to the Canadian Pacific. The result would be that both these companies in order to protect their traffic would reduce their rates at all points where their traffic would suffer from Canadian Pacific competition. The element of unequal rates would be again introduced into the western territory, and I am convinced that this is no better for the railways than it is for the districts.

So the chairman held that the agreement applies not only to the Canadian Pacific Railway, but in addition to the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railways.

Suppose the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has to abide by the provisions of the Crowsnest pass agreement, it will undoubtedly suffer considerable loss. The National Railways will substantially have to comply with the same provisions, and consequently they too will suffer considerable loss, the total of all losses being estimated at some $18,000,000. Now, would the Canadian Pacific Railway Company be permitted to raise existing rates on other commodities for the purpose of meeting this deficit? I suggest not, because of course it has got to meet the competition of the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk Pacific.

I have every respect for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It is a large and businesslike corporation. I have heard it suggested that it is the financial barometer of this country. It is true that during 1921 the company paid its dividend and had a substantial surplus, something like three-quartetrs of a million dollars, but if on last year's operation the Canadian Pacific Railway Company does constitute the financial barometer of this country, then I certainly am very much mistaken, because I fear that very few corporations indeed, unless specially favoured in some particular way, made anything like that showing. Therefore if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is a barometer of the financial condition of this country, it is not a true barometer of that condition during the past year. On that ground alone I have no hesitation in saying that barometers of that character are not going to fool anyone who is endeavouring to truly ascertain the financial credit of this country.

It is also urged against the coming into force of this agreement that the National Railways might suffer. Now, everyone knows that the National Railways, or a great part of them, were speculatively built; as suggested by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) they were colonization roads. I think, however, we have every reason to expect that with the aggressive attitude assumed by the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) in the co-ordination of these two now separate and distinct railway services, a great saving will be effected, and also, I think, a great increase in efficiency.

I suggest also that we at least on this side of the House are hopeful that the Minister of Railways will not be unmindful of the recommendation of the former chairman of the National Railway Board that the very large capitalization of the National Railways should be reduced in order that the earnings might represent a fair return on the capital involved.

Now, my suggestion, Mr. Speaker is this: that the Crowsnest pass agreement, which is simply a charter of our rights respecting freight charges, not only in this part of the country, but in western Canada as well—that the Crowsnest pass agreement should be given a try-out for such period of time as Parliament may decide. If after it has been tried out it is found that the railway companies have suffered unduly or that the efficiency of our transportation systems has been injured, it will then be time enough for Parliament to determine whether the Crowsnest pass agreement should be suspended for a further degree of time, or abrogated altogether. I do think that an opportunity should at least be given for such a trial as I have suggested.

If Parliament decides to have an investigation into transportation costs as asked for in the resolution, I think perhaps that might be desirable, so long as our rights reserved under the Crowsnest pass agreement are protected, and so long as it is definitely understood now that that agreement is to go into effect on the 7th of July, 1922.

I am sure it must be common ground in this House that an immediate reduction of railroad rates would go a long way toward remedying the business paralysis which now prevails everywhere. I think that we, assembled here as the representatives of the people, should be the last to interfere with the going into effect of the Crowsnest pass agreement, that solemn contract between the Government of Canada and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that even at this late hour it would be out of place for a member from British Columbia to say just a word on this extremely important question. I must say, as I have said on previous occasions, that hon. members on my left have a tendency to take a more or less sectional view with regard to some great national questions. It may be said that the Government is dilatory in its conduct, but so far as our friends on my left are concerned, they tell the House and the country that they want the Crowsnest pass agreement enforced because it means, primarily, cheaper rates on wheat. But I would ask hon. members to raise their vision from the tops of the wheat growing on the prairies to the tops of the forest growing on the hillsides of British Columbia and remember that when they return to the agreement and thus improve their own position, they deal a far worse blow to the lumber industry in British Columbia than it has ever before received. The rates on wheat would be out of proportion altogether to the rates on lumber, fruits and fish.

We in British Columbia have for years been working under a great handicap. The extremely high freight rates on lumber have closed many of our mills, with resulting unemployment and stagnation of industry, which includes the business of supplying lumber to the farmers who require it on the prairies. If in no other way, I suggest that the farmers of the prairies could profitably use that lumber to cover the immense quantities of agricultural machinery that we see scattered across the plains from the Rocky mountains to Fort William.

The point I rose particularly to make, Mr. Speaker, is that we expect from a party which calls himself Progressive a larger and broader outlook on great national questions of this kind. Hon. gentlemen come here and in many of their speeches emphasize the desirability of foresight and breadth of vision on the part of public men. During the debate on the Address we heard many splendid speeches, idealistic in their character, from my friends to my left. Now, here is an opportunity for my hon. friends to put those principles into practice, but instead of doing that they say to the people of Canada: No matter what happens to the industries of the rest of the country, we are going to have the restoration of that agreement; we are going to have cheap rates on our goods, and that finishes it so far as we are concerned.

But it may be that hon. members to my left are, as a whole, in accord with a general reduction of freight rates. I believe they are, Mr. Speaker, because the people of the country demand such a revision. The heads of the railway corporations have assented to it, and the Government have expressed their own concurrence in that view. Surely the speeches which we have heard from our friends of the Progressive party represent the views of only a portion of them; surely they would not take a course which would have the effect of deciding a great question like this without regard to the needs of the other provinces. British Columbia has laboured under greater difficulties in regard to freight rates and greater handicaps than any other province, particularly as regards the immense sawmills there, the great salmon canneries and other fishing industries, and the fruit industry. Those who have spoken from the ranks of the Progressive party have not said that when they get the rates reduced on wheat they will, in the national interest, extend their policy so that the various economic factors throughout the whole country, industry, commerce and agriculture, may receive fair and equitable treatment. I think the course proposed is one which is inimical to the best interests of the country.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put I desire to make a few remarks, not in relation to my own position on the question, which undoubtedly I made clear to all hon. members of the House when I spoke on the motion itself, but to say something by way of reply to assertions, if I cannot call them arguments, advanced on behalf of the Administration. I submit there has been very much introduced into the debate that has had a tendency to confuse the issue and to divert the minds of hon. members from what we really decide in voting yea or nay on the amendment and on the motion.

In the first place it is not a question of the justice or wisdom of the present scale of rates that is in issue. As the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Shaw) has stated, summing up the purport of the debate, there is only one opinion that has been expressed in the debate on that question. There is only one, I think, that can be expressed. I agree with him that any far-seeing, intelligent railway executive would concur with the purport of the discussion this afternoon, that it is in the interests of all concerned, the railways included, that substantial and, as nearly as may be, immediate reductions be made in the general level of freights in this country. I would not object even to the application of the term drastic. The time comes when big things of this kind must be grappled with, and grappled with resolutely, and hands forced on the question. Otherwise, one waits on the other and the other on the one, and the country waits on both. But that is not the question that is in issue at all.

Nor is the question of whether or not the Crowsnest pass agreement as such should be made permanent in issue. I can understand, however, the attitude of hon. members who say, "Inasmuch as I have already studied out this question, read the evidence, thoroughly informed myself on the question, and am irrevocably opposed to the renewal of the agreement, consequently, I cannot admit a yea vote on this question." I think that is quite consistent. If hon. members are able to firmly decide and turn their backs finally on the evidence, if they have read it all and come to a conclusion, then, of course, they are in a position to say "The matter does not admit of debate. I do not need any policy to be submitted to me. My mind is made up." That position is consistent.

I must say I was not able to comprehend the position of the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Hudson). He has reached the conclusion evidently of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). Well, if he has, why does he want to delay decision? Is his purpose to try to educate others? If so, let it be done in debate in this House. Why submit to a committee on what in his judgment is not debatable any longer?

Mr. CAHILL: Why was this submitted to a committee when parliamentary legislation was initiated in the first place?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This will be submitted to a committee again. The Government of that day came down with its policy, moved a resolution in this House, stated where it stood. The resolution was moved by the Minister of Railways.

Mr. CAHILL: No, exactly the opposite.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Undoubtedly it was. The Minister of Railways came before the House and moved a resolution. He stated that was the best judgment of the Railway Commission, that was the Government's policy, and that policy went to a committee of this House, the same as all Government policies do.

Mr. CAHILL: A special committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, a special committee dealing with the revision of the whole Railway Act, but the Government first came to the House with its policy. If the Government did not move that, who moved it? Does the hon. gentleman know?

Mr. CAHILL: It was moved in committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Exactly, in Committee of the Whole, moved by the Government, moved by the Hon. Dr. Reid, who at that time was Minister of Railways, and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. CAHILL: A special committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, this was moved by the Government in the House. Does that get into his head?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think I have been discourteous to the hon. member.

Mr. McMASTER: Not very polite.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not reflecting at all on the hon. member's head. I am reflecting on his obstinacy. Very well. The Government took its position.

Mr. CAHILL: Why did not the Government take its position on the floor of the House instead of through a committee?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government did.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the difference between one special committee and another?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government submitted the whole revision of the Railway Act to the committee. The Government did not submit this point at all. It was not up at that time. Immediately it came up the Government—

Mr. CAHILL: It was by Order in Council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let me finish my sentence. The Government got its information from the Railway Commission, got a memorandum, and on the basis of that submitted to the committee of the whole its opinion upon the question—

Mr. CAHILL: It did not come direct.

Mr. MEIGHEN:—and that will suit me if this Government will do that. Let the Government announce its course, announce it anywhere. Very well. The point my hon. friend sought to divert me from was this, that the question of the extension or non-extension of the suspension is not the question we are discussing, though it is quite true if hon. members have finally and conclusively and irrevocably made up their minds on that in the negative—in the negative, I repeat —then they are consistent on that ground in opposing the resolution. But I oppose the resolution on the grounds I stated before, and once more I submit to the House through you, Mr. Speaker, that it is in the interests of this House and in the interests of the proper conduct of affairs in this country that we take up our position on the grounds I submitted to this House before.

What is the resolution before us? The resolution before us is this, that a special committee of this House go into the whole question of transportation costs and hear especially witnesses on the subject of the wisdom of the extension of the Crowsnest pass suspension. That is a statement of it that I know will suit the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy). That is what we are asked to do. Now why are we asked to do it? What will be gained by doing it? The Prime Minister dilates at great length and in very loud voice on the wisdom of having all possible information. He is a preacher of the doctrine of information, and he says that those are not of his faith who would deny any information to this House.

The Government, he intimates, would be autocratic if it dared to come down to Parliament with its policy until all information had been adduced before a special committee, or some committee, of this House. Why, the government of this country day in and day out for years, all governments, this Government since it came into power has come into Parliament with its policy,—such as it was—invariably the policy it said it would not follow, but nevertheless its policy—without having anything submitted to a committee of this House. There are cases, of course, when the contrary course may be taken, cases such as I sought to explain when I was on my feet before. But to say that anybody who declines to vote for this resolution is against information is to talk what I submit, in all respect, is nonsense. Is the information not available now? If it is, why have the evidence all heard again? May I submit that to hon. members once more? If the evidence has been heard and is on record, if all that cost has been gone to, all the trouble and the time taken, why do it all over again? Let hon. members think of that question. Is it not true that the evidence has been taken, yea, all the evidence, that ten times the evidence has been taken, twenty times the evidence that can by any possibility be submitted to this committee? Is that not true? Is it not true that the Railway Commission has sat almost successively for a year and a half, that it has heard the evidence pro and con, from every angle and from every class and every industry of this Dominion, that it has weighed that evidence, that it has had the exhibits filed and studied, that it has had everything studied from the standpoint this committee has been charged to study it from? Has not that all been done, and is not the evidence so taken at the disposal of every member of this House? Is it not at the disposal of the Government? Why, it has been at their disposal for days, for weeks; and the men who heard it, who had the advantage of seeing the witnesses in front of them and weighing their testimony, those men who have heard similar evidence for seventeen years—at least for the years they have been in office—and their experts for seventeen years, those men stand in front of the Government ready to submit the evidence, ready to give their judgment on that evidence, and submit that judgment to the Government.

Now is not that true? Let me ask again what more do we want in the way of information? Is it solemnly suggested, seriously suggested, that this committee to be appointed by the House is to hear all the classes of evidence of various interests that have already been heard before the Railway Commission? If it is not who are to be eliminated? Who are those who have the right to be heard before the Railway Commission that will not have the right to be heard before this committee? Can any hon. member answer me that? Let me repeat: Is it seriously suggested that a committee of this House to whose membership not one member—or at least not more than one—can possibly be appointed that has ever studied, or given more than a day's consideration to this question—one of the most intricate that ever the mind of man addressed itself to—that such a committee of this House is to settle what the Railway Commission has sat for a year and a half almost continuously to consider, and considered for seventeen years before. Is it suggested that we go again to the expense that the commission has gone to; put the provinces and Canada to the same expense, put the various classes of industry in this country to a like expense; consume a like time, and that the decision of this issue is to wait until the committee brings in its report? If that is not the suggestion, what really is the suggestion? What is the purpose of this committee? What can it do that it can do well? I know of nothing whatsoever.

Now furthermore: When the Railway Commission considered the question that is to be submitted to this committee—without which consideration this committee can never make a report—when the Railway Commision considered the same question in the summer of 1920, the complaint arose from all corners of the Dominion because they had not pursued the usual course of making it easy for people to give testimony and present its case before it—that is to say, the course of going where the evidence was and could be conveniently brought before the commission. That was the main complaint, and bitter the complaints were. The commission cured that complaint. After the re-submission of the issue to them by the governments in the fall of 1920 they went to seven provinces of this Dominion; they went to British Columbia, to Alberta, to Saskatchewan, to Manitoba—they sat in every one of these provinces. They sat also in Ontario, in New Brunswick and in Nova Scotia. They sat in every province except two of this Dominion; they heard the evidence on the ground, and they viewed the problem from the viewpoint of these localities. Can this committee duplicate that performance? Is it suggested that it should duplicate it? If not, how can it come to a conclusion anything like as intelligent as the Railway Commision is in a position to present right to-day?

Consequently I say those that argue that we need to appoint this committee because we require more information are presenting an argument that upon serious, honest reflection I do not think any hon. member of this House can entertain. The information is all down; the information is all sifted; the evidence has been all given; the evidence is all printed. The information has been gathered and sifted before a body competent to gather it and competent to sift it. That information is there, that body is there. That body is there ready with its advice and its conclusion. This Government should go to that body, read the evidence, get the conclusion of that commission, reflect on it, and come to this Parliament and present its policy. Now is not that a good practice? Oh, but the Prime Minister says that we have appointed a committee already to consider the Wheat Board suggestion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never spoke of the Wheat Board.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think my hon. friend referred to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I never spoke of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sorry if I mistook his reference, but I must take the hon. member's word. It would be more appropriate if he had done so than anything else he has said relative to this issue.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the committee appointed by the late government to consider the National Railway operations?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is true that we did submit that question to a standing committee but does not the House see the difference? Had there been any body considering that question through these years? Had there been any body constituted to study that question and hear evidence upon it? None at all. That was a fit and proper question to submit to a special committee so that evidence could be heard and that evidence sifted; but in this case the evidence has been all heard, the evidence has all been sifted—there has been a special body appointed to do it. There it sits, there it has sat, there it is right ready with its advice. Last session we did refer this question to which allusion has been made to a committee. I moved for the appointment of that committee to consider a wholly new question as respects which there was no body in this Dominion in a position to advise the government of the day. We asked for a committee of this House to investigate this question: How far the daily operations of our National Railway system—how far, and when, those operations could be brought down and fully disclosed to Parliament without hindering the work of the Board of Directors itself. Now even though we did appoint a committee to do this, it was a question as to which the government had no body to resort to, and no evidence had been already compiled, and as respects which information could be adduced that at least had not been adduced before; but even though we did ask for that committee the government already had unmistakably declared its own opinion on the question and had followed that opinion consistently in the House. We did not seek to hide behind any commission—not at all. We were ready to have the whole thing studied and evidence adduced; but we were 11 p.m. not afraid to declare our own belief after the study we had been privileged to give it. So where is my hon. friend when he calls upon this reference able to make anything that has even the appearance of an argument? Nowhere at all. You do not get anywhere in discussing this issue merely by emphasis of sound. Let the Prime Minister say what there is that can be adduced before this committee that has not already been adduced and that any hon. member can read.

Now let me pass from that. On the other hand what is to be lost by the appointment of this committee? That is worth inquiring into. This committee if it sits day and night, and Sundays, will not have but a small fraction of the time required to study the subject that is committed to it by the terms of this resolution. But presuming that it has, it will require it all—it will require weeks. Then I do not think this report will be of much value. But look at the time that is lost, and where is the Government going to be then? Why it will be about the end of the session, and then the Prime Minister will be in that most frightful position that he will lament it himself in tears, as he did many a time in times gone by of bringing down important legislation in the dying days of the session. Would it not be humiliating for the Prime Minister to find himself in a position where he had to perpetrate such an awful mistake as that? Why he has been declaiming against such a course session after session. It should not be done but it is not always possible to avoid it—I know that. In this case we are going to lose weeks. We are going to get into the position where, I submit, the committee will have to say to Parliament, if it speaks its honest mind, that it has not had the opportunity or the time adequately to study this problem, and consequently where the Government will have the excuse, as I fear it, of coming to Parliament and saying "The whole issue is not finished out yet and we present this position to the House of Commons: We cannot get the judgment of this special committee, and it will probably be next session before we can. The special committee, to the extent it has gone, has not anything like traversed the whole ramifications that it must traverse, and consequently, we must ask Parliament for at least a temporary extension of the suspension." When I spoke first, I said that that was the cul-de-sac into which the Gvoernment was going to get. It looks, because I have not heard any reference to the matter, as if that is the cul-de-sac the Government seeks to get into. At all events, nothing but valuable time can be lost; nothing in the world can be gained; great expense can be heaped up, and all for the sake of the administration to avoid taking upon its back the responsibility which it for so many years, courted, but which now it does not seem able to discharge.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wondered, when I heard the amendment read, just what exactly was the intention and purpose in the mind of the hon. member (Sir Henry Drayton) who moved it. It is perfectly apparent now that the intention was to give the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) an opportunity to make a second speech and to go over the same ground he went over at great length this afternoon. Let me say to my right hon. friend that his case must be an extremely weak one, or he would not have taken an hour this afternoon and another hour to-night—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Twenty minutes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:—in a loud as well as at times a modulated voice, to cover the ground which he has found it necessary to cover in support of his case. I think the amendment only gives the House an added reason why it should support the original resolution. The first paragraph of the amendment reads:

> A general reduction in railway rates so essential to the welfare of Canadian production and trade cannot, as declared by the Government, be made until Parliament decides whether or not the suspension of the Crowsnest pass agreement which expires on July 6th, be renewed.

This clause is to the effect that Parliament must decide whether or not it is advisable for the Crowsnest pass agreement to be renewed. May I ask hon. members of the House—How are they to reach a wise and sound decision on this question unless they have ample opportunity of satisfying their minds as regards all the bearings of the situation? The purpose the Government has had in mind in suggesting this committee, is that every hon. member should have opportunity of getting such information as may be necessary or desirable to enable a decision, that will be in the national interest, to be reached. I contend it is impossible for hon. members, without any knowledge whatever of the arguments pro and con with respect to this agreement, to register in this House an intelligent and fair vote upon the matter.

May I draw attention to the next clause, and see what it implies?

> That it is the immediate duty of the Government—already too long deferred—to acquire the necessary information gathered and in their disposal at the hands of the Board of Railway Commissioners and to submit its policy to this House.

Is that not simply repeating what was said by my right hon. friend this afternoon, namely, that the Government should come into this House and suggest a certain course of action in connection with freight rates, based solely on information obtained from the Railway Commission or upon information received in conference, but, as I remarked this afternoon, in purely informal conference without any opportunity whatever of the Government ascertaining, by further inquiry, whether the representations that have been made are, to all intents and purposes, fair and accurate. In a matter of this importance, the Government would not be justified in taking, at their face value, the representations that have been made to them by the railway executives. They have heard only one side from the railway executives. They desire an opportunity of bringing the railway executives before a committee of this House and of enabling every hon. member to question the railway executives and to get true and accurate information in regard to the situation. The Government wants that for its own protection as well as for the protection of the people of this country. If we are going to decide this matter, it being of the magnitude it is, in a way that is unmistakably in the national interest, there should be opportunity for the fullest investigation. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) says: "Take the information you have already at its face value; take it from the railway executives and from no one else excepting the Railway Commission." What did my right hon. friend have to say about the Railway Commission this afternoon? As I pointed out, he said that, in the minds of the people of this country to-day, the Railway Commission is standing for the protection of the railways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that. The hon. gentleman had better look up Hansard. I stated that the duty of the Railway Commission, as it appeared from the outside for a time, owing to the natural conditions, was to stand between the railways and the people for the protection of the people, but owing to conditions brought about by the war, the reverse appeared now to be the case. But I expressed no reflection whatever upon the Railway Commission, and never have I, in any way in this debate, expressed the slightest lack of confidence in the Railway Commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not imputing to my right hon. friend any lack of confidence in the Railway Commission. I know he has every confidence in that commission; but I am taking the statement he has just made in saying that the reverse is now the case as regards the attitude the public takes towards the Railway Commission. If his words have any meaning, it is this, that, before the war, the Railway Commission was regarded as protecting the interests of the public where controversies arose between the public and the railways; that since the war, without his indicating whether the impression is just or unjust—I think my right hon. friend would say that the impression was unjust—the impression nevertheless exists, that the Railway Commission to-day is primarily protecting the interest of the railways. Yet he asks us, as a Government, to base our policy on information given by that body and that body only. All the information that the Railway Commission has in its possession will be at the disposal of the Committee which will be asked to investigate this matter. Hon. members of the House will then have the same information as the Government has. Are we taking a retrograde step when we seek to put into the possession of every hon. member the information that we ourselves have? Surely, if there ever was reason for a course of action such as is being taken that reason is present when the question being dealt with is that of railway rates and of the consequences that are involved in proposed changes.

Let me say, in conclusion, that the Government's motive in this, has been to inspire public confidence in whatever action is taken. We are led to believe that certain consequences will follow a failure to continue the suspension of the Crowsnest pass agreement. I am unable to say whether those consequences are well founded, whether the reasoning is sound or not. It may well be that, in the course of a thorough investigation, it will be discovered that there should not be placed on the possible consequences of a failure to continue the suspension of that agreement the emphasis that is being placed upon them in certain quarters at the present time. But what the Government feels is this, that, if certain consequences are likely to follow, the country has a right to know what they are. The people of this country will have to bear the effect of those consequences; the Government are the trustees of the people, trustees for them as taxpayers, as the owners of large railway systems. When hon. gentlemen opposite speak about giving public ownership a fair trial, they ought to be prepared to support whatever will work towards that end. Our contention is: While this agreement applies to the Canadian Pacific, it is well known that the effect of competition will occasion similar rates to be put into effect on the Government roads. We are not saying that that should not be done. All that we say is this. Government ownership is on trial at the present time; hon. gentlemen opposite want to give it a fair trial; we propose to give it a fair trial, and one of the ways in which we propose to do that, is to take the public into our confidence to the fullest extent possible. While it is important that the Government should have the confidence of its own following, and while it is desirable that they should have the confidence of hon. members of this House to as large an extent as possible, it is still more important that they should have the confidence of the people of this country whose trustees they are at the present time. It is looking to that larger confidence that we take the stand we do, when we say that before we plunge the country further into debt as a consequence of railway liabilities one way or the other, before we take any stand in the way of Government policy which may or may not prove injurious to large sections of the country, we intend to have the fullest possible publicity in order that the public may be completely informed in a matter that so vitally affects the public interest.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): I take the opportunity for a few moments only of speaking on the amendment. I am not going to do as my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has done, and as my hon. friend the leader of the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King) has also done, namely, make two speeches of precisely the same character and on the same material. I am going to oppose the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton), and I am going to oppose it for this reason: My hon. friend from West York argues, and the leader of the Opposition supports the argument, that the Government should consult the Railway Commission and those who possess information in respect of this matter and bring down a policy to Parliament in connection therewith. In respect to the amendment, I take the position I took this afternoon as regards the motion, and that is, that we have sufficient information before us now to enable this House to come to a judgment as to whether or not the suspension of the Crowsnest pass agreement should be further continued. We have had discussions before the Railway Commission for months. The public, I think, are pretty well informed as to the evidence that was submitted to that commission. The newspapers have contained very full reports of it, and we have had an opportunity of studying the subject, while members of the House have listened to the arguments upon the matter. I therefore cannot see why it is necessary to give the further consideration to the matter which my hon. friend the Prime Minister suggests; and for the reason which I have just stated I am going to oppose the amendment that has been submitted.

Now, the Prime Minister argues with a great deal of force that he desires to take the public and the House into his full confidence in this matter. I have no objection whatever to that principle. I do not support the view of the leader of the Opposition as enunciated this afternoon, that it is not the part of the Government, when it sees fit, to seek the views of Parliament by means of a special committee on questions of this kind. I do not take that view, although the Prime Minister, I am sure quite inadvertently, ascribed it to me in his earlier speech this evening. But we have the facts before us pretty well on this question. I take the ground that the reference of the matter to a committee will be inconclusive. It will get us nowhere, and consequently, recognizing the need of a reduction in freight rates in this country, and in view of the fact that we have a definite, set agreement in the matter of rates under the Crowsnest pass agreement, I can see no reason why the House should not now be able to make up its mind on the question. There is no doubt whatever, if I interpret rightly the speeches made by members of the Government, that the whole purpose in submitting the question to the committee is to ascertain whether or not this agreement should be further set aside. That is the essential part of the motion we are considering. I do not think it is necessary to consult a committee to determine that question; and holding that view I cannot consistently support the motion to refer the matter to a committee, nor can I support the amendment of my hon. friend from West York, that the Government seek further information that might result in bringing down a proposal to set the agreement further aside.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I have given as close attention as possible to the resolution and have endeavoured to arrive at the object of the Government in submitting it to the House. I have listened to the two addresses delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and I recall the fact that in the speech from the Throne reference was made to the matter; and nearly a month ago the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy), in dealing with the railway situation, stated that it was to be referred to a committee of the House. Some time before that it was intimated by the Railway Commission that a reduction in transportation rates was to take place. It has since been made known that the reason why no action was taken was because of the uncertainty as to the course the Government would pursue. It is a somewhat remarkable thing that nearly two months of the session have elapsed before we have reached the present stage when this resolution is submitted to the House with a view to appointing a committee to ascertain certain facts which the Prime Minister has just told us the Government have at their disposal and are already satisfied about. A special select committee is to be appointed, named by the Government, to carry out the Government's wishes. The Government will have a majority on that committee and we may rest assured that that majority will carry out the conclusions which they have arrived at. Did not the Prime Minister in his address on the main motion inform the House that, after numerous conferences with the executive of the railways, the executive had concluded to reduce the rates on basic commodities, but had deferred doing so pending the action of the Government with regard to the renewal of the Crowsnest pass agreement? I think the Prime Minister made that clear. Is it possible that the Government are a party to deferring a reduction in railway rates in this country? Is that the object they have in view in holding up the matter for months when every one knows that the business of the country is absolutely paralyzed owing to the excessive rates that are being charged at this time? As the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) points out, the demand is being made in western Canada that railway charges shall be prepaid for fear that the cargoes will not bear the expense to which they are subjected in the matter of railway rates. During the past few weeks I have experienced the truth of this myself. I ordered a carload of material from a centre about three hundred miles from home and when it was shipped I found that the railway charges amounted to practically $20 more than the cost of the goods. It was very important that this material should be placed on the markets of the country. I may mention that it was a consignment of cedar posts for fencing purposes. They came from a district which had been devastated by fire, and unless the wood was converted into marketable material and placed on the markets it was absolutely useless. Yet people who own such material and have to pay for the labour of making it marketable find that when they place it upon the market it is not equal to the transportation costs over a few hundred miles. That illustrates the condition of business in this country, and people are waiting, and waiting patiently, for a reduction in freight rates.

The Prime Minister has told us that the railway companies are prepared to make a reduction in freight rates, but are waiting to see what the Government will do with regard to renewing the suspension of the Crowsnest pass agreement. Notwithstanding that, the responsibility is now to be placed upon a committee of this House because apparently the Government have not the courage to declare what they intend to do. Surely these are not the men who last December were so emphatic in telling the country what they were going to do in regard to this and other matters.

As far as the Crowsnest pass agreement is concerned, I do not think it is a very serious matter whether it is renewed or not. I should like to give the matter further consideration before coming to a definite conclusion, but from the information which has been submitted, and from other information in my possession, I am not too sure but what it would be in the national interest that the agreement should not be renewed, and I was a little surprised when the Prime Minister, read a statement which was going to commit him definitely in this matter, so there would be no calling in question his attitude in regard to the renewal of the agreement. What was the first word he uttered? Unless—unless certain things happened the Government would do so and so. That was neither very emphatic nor very clear; it left everything in just the same indefinite position that I am inclined to think the Government desired it should be left in. In fact, I think the Government are not honest with the people in the attitude they are assuming. They should come out and declare their position clearly and unequivocally, as governments are supposed to do in any country enjoying responsible and representative institutions. Let them assume the responsibilities which the people placed upon them last December, and tell the House and the country what they intend to do. This should be quite easy, for the Prime Minister has intimated that the Government have the information and know what they intend to do. But apparently this committee is to be appointed to enable hon. members to secure the information which the Government already possess.

What is to happen? This question is to be submitted to a select special committee, which will report back to this House, and we shall then have to go over the whole matter again and take up just as much time as if we had dealt with it in the first instance. The Railway Commission apparently is to be ignored. We know there were just reasons for suspending the Crowsnest pass agreement during the war. Some slick gentlemen from the United States threatened to tie up our transportation systems, and as a result of their action the McAdoo award was adopted, involving an increase of $40,000,000 in our transportation charges. We could not afford to have our transportation systems tied up, and something had to be done. But conditions are different to-day, and the effects of the war have largely passed away. But the Government now asks the House to help them defer a reduction in the rates which the Prime Minister intimates the companies are already prepared to make if they only knew what the Government intended to do in this regard. Is this not a nice condition of affairs? In face of the stagnation which prevails owing to the impossibility of transporting the materials necessary to build up this country, why do the Government hold back? Are they playing into the hands of the railways to enable these excessive freight rates to be collected month after month from the people?

The Government ought to deal with this matter promptly, instead of resorting to this subterfuge and deferring their decision week after week, until finally, as the leader of the Opposition has pointed out, we will have to deal with it hurriedly in the last days of the session, and it is uncertain what the result will be. For my part, Mr.

Speaker, I object most emphatically to having this matter referred to any select special committee that may be named by the Government to carry out the Government's wishes, because they ought to know, and, from what the Prime Minister has already intimated, I believe they do know, how they intend to deal with it.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 12.17 a.m. Friday.

Friday, May 5, 1922.

The House met at three o'clock.

VACANCY—KAMOURASKA

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received notification of a vacancy having occurred in the representation of the Electoral District of Kamouraska consequent upon the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown by C. Adolphe Stein, Esquire, the sitting member therefor. I have accordingly issued my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer to make out a new writ for the election of a member to the said Electoral District.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to be permitted to lay on the table of the House certain information by way of reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie) with respect to Japanese immigration. I promised him that it would be brought down to-day.

(The questions and answers are as follows):

Questions:

1. Under what conditions and regulations are Japanese immigrants admitted into Canada?

2. In what way are the rights of Canadians in Japan limited as to ownership of land, franchise, mercantile pursuits, fishing, shipping (coastwise and foreign), mining, agriculture, and other pursuits such as are engaged in by Japanese in Canada?

3. What is the number of Japanese immigrants that have entered Canada yearly in each of the ten years ending March 31, 1922?

4. How many Japanese have left Canada for Japan each year, during the same period?

5. How many Japanese have returned to Canada from Japan each year during the same period?

Answers.

1. Under a confidential Agreement known as the Lemieux Agreement entered into between Canada and Japan in the beginning of 1908. Under this Agreement Japan voluntarily restricts the movement of Japanese to Canada to a comparatively small number each year.

2. In common with other foreigners, Canadians cannot as individuals own land in Japan. They can, however, if they form an association and become "juridical persons" under Japanese law. They further enjoy the rights of perpetual lease in respect of land in certain portions of the former foreign settlements in the open ports; and they may become holders of rights of "superficies" and "emphyteusis".

Foreigners have no franchise rights either in connection with elections to the Diet or to the prefectural, municipal, town, village or district assemblies.

Canadian vessels may not engage in the coasting trade between Japanese ports and Canadians may not become owners of ships flying the Japanese flag, though they may become members of "goshi-kwaisha" (partnership with limited and unlimited liability), "kabushiki-Kwaisha" (joint-stock companies), and "kabushiki-goshi-Kwaisha" (joint-stock partnerships with limited and unlimited liability) owning Japanese ships.

Canadians may not as individuals engage in mining, but a company formed under Japanese law by foreigners and registered as a juridical person may do so.

They may not become shareholders of the Bank of Japan, the Yokohama Specie Bank, the Bank of Korea, the South Manchuria Railway Company, the Oriental Development Company and certain other companies, or of shipping Companies in receipt of a Government subsidy. They may not become members or brokers of the various exchanges in Japan. They may not as individuals become members of Japanese Chambers of Commerce. They may not engage in the emigration business or hold shares in any company so engaged.

Foreign unskilled labourers may not pursue their callings in Japan outside the limits of the former foreign settlements or the "mixed residence" areas without the express permission of the administrative authorities. Labourers for this purpose are defined as being persons engaged in labouring pursuits in connection with farming, fishing, mining, public works, building, manufacturing, transport, hauling (of vehicles), stevedoring and other forms of manual labour, but not persons in domestic service or persons following the calling of cooks and waiters.

3.	Males	Females	Children	Totals
1913-14	354	447	55	856
1914-15	191	358	43	592
1915-16	148	233	20	401
1916-17	301	310	37	648
1917-18	459	370	54	883
1918-19	584	530	64	1,178
1919-20	280	389	42	711
1920-21	145	338	49	532
	2,650	3,698	443	6,991

In connection with the above table it may be pointed out that the first column gives the total immigration of males year by year for the period indicated. Of these males the following numbers are shown to belong to the skilled and unskilled labour classes.

1914-15..	138
1915-16..	96
1916-17..	212
1917-18..	355
1918-19..	444
1919-20..	201

The difference between the total number of males and the number of males of the skilled and unskilled labour classes is made up of traders, clerks, business and professional men. The difference between the total number of males and the total immigration is made up of wives and children under fourteen years of age joining Japanese regularly domiciled in Canada.

4. Statistics of persons leaving Canada are not collected by the Department of Immigration and Colonization. The only figures available are returns issued monthly by the Japanese Goverment showing Japanese passengers sailing to Canada and returning from Canada. From these returns the following table has been compiled.

Calendar year.	Males	Females	Totals
1912..	446	137	583
1913..	1,030	251	1,281
1914..	974	257	1,231
1915..	745	274	1,019
1916..	631	249	880
1917..	1,121	455	1,576
1918..	1,309	505	1,814
1919..	1,191	554	1,745
1921..	1,076	460	1,536

5. This information is not available, as prior to the 1st April, 1922, returning Japanese domiciled in Canada were included with persons of all other races and nationalities returning to Canada on the ground of domicile acquired in this country.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome) presented the first report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts as follows:

Your Committee recommend that the evidence being taken in connection with Overseas accounts be printed from day to day and that Rule 74 relating thereto be suspended.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (North Toronto) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 71 to amend the Railway Act, 1919.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: The object of the amendment is to restore the special rate that applied prior to the war in regard to tickets purchased on such special occasions as Thanksgiving Day and certain other holidays, and for the purpose of attendance at the fall fairs conventions and sporting events as are held throughout Canada. Before the war, single fares and a fare and a third was charged, instead of the full return fare, to persons attending various functions of this character on certain days and special occasions and conventions of different kinds held in the spring of the year by farmers' and other organizations. In connection with sporting events, such as soccer, lacrosse, football and hockey and other games, there was also a cut rate for week-ends. Now, I admit that during the war it was necessary, in the interest of economy, to curtail these concessions. But now that the war is over the people expect that after the country has spent some $900,000,000 directly and indirectly in aid of the railways of the country they shall be given some privileges in return besides the privilege of being always called upon to pay taxes. The United States have restored the old special rates that obtained for these events prior to the war with the result that there has been a large increase in the earnings of the railways from this class of traffic.

I might read two or three sentences from certain letters I have received in reference to this matter. Mr. J. Lockie Wilson, the Superintendent of the Ontario Department of Agriculture, who has the supervision of some 360 fairs in the province of Ontario, urges the restoration of the old rate in the interests of these fairs which have a distinct educational value and make for the general good of the country. Mr. John G. Kent, the Managing Director of the Canadian National Exhibition Association, writes:

The public are clamouring for a return to pre-war conditions, and we have been urged by letter and personal interview from all parts of the country to bring before the Government the necessity of reducing regular fares for these various occasions.

Mr. P. J. Mulqueen, president of the Royal Canadian Henley and chairman of the Ontario Athletic Commission, also writes urging a restoration of the old special rates to prevent unrest and encourage sport and recreation. And Mr. A. P. Westervelt, Secretary of the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair, urges that steps be taken to restore the old rates. There is—he says—a general and insistent demand in this matter, and I would move that the bill be given its first reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, I would also move that the bill be given its second reading to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Next sitting of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the House gives its unanimous consent the bill cannot be read the second time to-day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

GOVERNMENT ORDERS ON MONDAYS AND WEDNESDAYS

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday the 10th of May and Monday, the 15th of May, and all subsequent Mondays and Wednesdays to the end of the session, Government Notices of Motions and Government Orders shall have precedence over all business except Questions by Members and Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Before the motion is adopted I would suggest to my hon. friend that, as there are quite a number of important resolutions standing on the Order Paper, the Government might be inclined to consider extending for a few days the time at the disposal of private members. If the resolution carries in its present form the discussion of private members' resolutions will cease with Monday next. There is one resolution coming up on that day dealing with the question of oriental immigration. It will probably take up the whole sitting, and I suggest to the Prime Minister that we might be given the following Wednesday afternoon and the following Monday as well.

Mr. WOODS: Does that mean that there will be a night sitting on Wednesday next?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the Government were to meet the wish of my hon. friend (Mr. Crerar) to the extent of allowing Wednesday, May 10, to be retained as private members' day, probably that would enable such resolutions to be taken up as hon. members desire to discuss. I might remind hon. gentlemen that most of the motions on the Order Paper have been called two or three times. I believe they were all called on Monday last as well as on the previous private members' day. If the House is agreeable, I should be glad to amend the motion to read that after Wednesday, the 10th May, and on Monday, the 15th May, and all subsequent Mondays and Wednesdays to the end of the session, Government Notices of Motions and Government Orders shall have precedence.

Right Hon. ARTHUH MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I would be inclined to concur with the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). There are not many of the motions on the Order Paper in which this side of the House is specially interested, but there are some that I think it would be unfortunate if they are not discussed through private members' days being shut off. For instance, there is motion No. 14, in the name of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw), which although it has been down since the 10th of April has never yet been introduced. There is the motion introduced by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine)—I do not mention it specially except in this sense, that the discussion of it was adjourned at the instance of the Government awaiting the return of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). Then, of course, there is the motion set down by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) which is to be discussed on Monday; and there are other motions that I cannot but think the hon. members interested seriously intended to discuss. Every private members' day has been fully taken up so far except for a short time at the end of some days. I am not attributing the fault to the Government specially that we are not through more of these motions, because they have been called and the members responsible for them have not been ready to proceed; but unless those motions were put down merely to forestall and prevent discussion from another source, it would seem to me there ought to be opportunities for a short discussion of them anyway.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope that if the Government endeavours to meet the wishes of my right hon. friend he will not later on say that we are somewhat late with government business. I might point out to him that in the last session of the last parliament, at the end of seven weeks the government took Wednesdays; we have allowed eight weeks to pass already before doing so, and I think we have been generous in that regard. However, the Government has no wish to prevent private members from having ample opportunity to discuss the motions in which they are interested.

Mr. CRERAR: If I might offer another suggestion, Mr. Speaker, it would be that the Government take Wednesday of next week and leave Monday of the week following for private members, which will allow a full day for discussion. If we adopt my hon. friend's suggestion we will have only three hours in the afternoon to devote to these motions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the Government give Wednesday and Monday of the following week, that would be going as far as it seems wise to go at this stage. If there are important motions which it would be very desirable to take up, we might make special arrangements for their discussion. I would therefore move that the resolution be amended to read: "That after Wednesday, the 10th May, and Monday, the 15th May," and so on.

Mr. CRERAR: That would give two Mondays and one Wednesday?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The following Wednesday and the following Monday—two more days.

Mr. CHURCH: If this motion passes, will the Prime Minister afford an opportunity to wind up the debate on the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Waterways motion standing in my name? As the Government has made no declaration of policy in regard to the subject matter of this motion, I should like to have the discussion concluded and a vote taken on it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That motion has been up three times already. It will probably come up again in the natural order of business.

Motion agreed to.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): The motion standing in my name, Mr. Speaker, is incorrect, the date given being March 31st, 1922, whereas it should be March 31st, 1921. If there be no objection, I will amend the motion accordingly and move:

That the report of the Auditor General and the Public Accounts of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1921, be referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

PAIRED MEMBERS INADVERTENTLY VOTING

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of explanation. Last night I placed myself, or was placed, in a position which requires me to give a word of explanation to my fellow-members. I voted when I was paired with the hon. member for West Hastings (Mr. Porter). I did that because at that time I did not know I was so paired. Early in the session I asked our Whip to arrange a sessional pair for me. He did so. No doubt he remained under the impression that he had informed me of the fact; however, he had not done so, and that led me into registering a vote last night which I should not have done. It was a purely inadvertent action on my part, and I know that hon. members will forgive me for taking up the time of the House in making this explanation, which I think is due to them, to the Whip, and to myself.

Mr. GEORGE W. KYTE (Cape Breton South and Richmond): I desire to add a word of explanation to what the hon. member for Brome has said. As soon as my attention was called to the fact that he had voted in violation of the understood pair which he held, I had the pair with the hon. member for West Hastings transferred to the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Forrester), and he did not vote.

I also desire to offer an explanation in behalf of the hon. junior member for Halifax (Mr. Blackadder) and the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Laflamme). These two gentlemen were paired also. The junior member for Halifax voted on the amendment, and as soon as my attention was called to it I communicated with him, so he did not vote on the main motion. The same thing happened with the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska. The junior member for Halifax has not been in the House for some weeks owing to the unfortunate condition of his health. He entered the Chamber at the last moment yesterday evening and I had no opportunity to remind him of his pair. I was unable to substitute another pair in his place because at that time the vote was proceeding along the furthest end of the rear row.

I did not observe these hon. members were voting in violation of their pairs because my attention was absorbed in the business of checking off the vote as it was called; otherwise I would have prevented the unfortunate incident. But by way of extenuation I need only cite the fact that the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) also inadvertently voted. It is evident therefore that these errors may be committed even with the best intentions.

Mr. W. A. BOYS (South Simcoe): I do not know whether it is in order for me to add a word or two, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. BOYS: Last night no less than five votes were recorded by hon. gentlemen opposite who were paired. As has been mentioned, one of those votes was put right by the hon. member for South Perth not voting. It is true that the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) voted in error. It was noticed at once, and without hesitation I sent word across to my hon. friend (Mr. Kyte) and immediately arranged with an hon. member on this side not to vote, to put the matter right.

Now, I do not know that criticism of anybody will do much good, but it does seem to me that we must have some understanding if the system of pairing is to continue. We must avoid such occurrences in the future, and when these mistakes are made they should be rectified in some way, not merely explained. I am glad, of course, to get the explanation, and I must say at once that, so far as I am concerned it has been an ample one. But, unless the vote comes from some hon. member in the last row it is always possible, when a member who is paired records his vote, for a whip to act promptly and to secure some member on his side who will refrain from voting. When it comes to five votes in one night, on the most important division we have had in the House this session, it becomes a somewhat serious matter. I only trust that these mistakes will not occur again. I have taken care to have every single pair initialed by the Chief Government Whip and myself so that there might be no mistakes. As soon as pairs are notified to me I see that they are observed, and if by any chance they are not, steps are taken to have the error rectified before the vote is concluded.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have allowed this discussion to proceed because I feel that hon. members would like to have an explanation of what occurred last evening. But I may inform the House that according to British practice, the Speaker, as the spokesman of the House of Commons, ignores the pairs, looking upon it as a matter for arrangement by the parties themselves.

Mr. KYTE: If I may be permitted to say one further word by way of explanation, my hon. friend the Conservative whip (Mr. Boys) stated there were five votes which should not have been polled. I wish to explain that the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) voted on the motion, but he was checked by the member for South Perth who did not vote.

Mr. BOYS: But there are still five; for the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Laflamme) voted twice.

Mr. KYTE: The hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska voted twice. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Blackadder) voted once only, on the amendment; I checked him and prevented him from voting on the main motion. So really the majority of the Government on the amendment last night should have been fifteen instead of seventeen.

GENOA CONFERENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to draw attention to a matter which, I think, is of some little importance. I noticed in the newspaper a few days ago, in a report of the proceedings of the Genoa Conference, a statement that the Canadian Government, through its representative, had subscribed £1,000,000 to the consortium that was being established to deal with the re-establishment of business in Russia. I would like to ask the Government if they can give the House any information on the subject.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The report to which my hon. friend refers is not an accurate statement. The Government has not subscribed to anything. I understand there is being sent by mail from Genoa to the Government for consideration the proposal to which my hon. friend refers, but no decision will be reached by the Government until it has had an opportunity of examining it and ascertaining what it involves.

DATE OF THE BUDGET

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think it was last Monday, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Prime Minister said, in the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), that the date of the Budget would be announced at an early day. I wonder if the minister can give us any information today?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I am almost as anxious as my hon. friend himself to be able to fix the date, but I will have to confirm what the Prime Minister said—that an announcement will be made at an early day. I do not want to emphasize the word "early" too strongly, but I can assure my hon. friend that I am very anxious to bring the Budget down as soon as possible.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Next week?

Mr. FIELDING: I would not like to be too definite. If not next week, the date will be announced during the week, and then my hon. friend will know exactly when to expect it.

ALLEGED STATEMENT OF HIGH COMMISSIONER

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): About two weeks ago the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr.

Lewis) asked that the Government ascertain as to the correctness of a report attributing unfortunate language to the present Canadian High Commissioner in London. The Government promised to get the information by cable. May I ask for that reply, and also that the Government lay the correspondence—the telegraphic inquiry and reply—on the Table of the House?

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The Government did not have occasion to send a cable. Before there was opportunity to do so there was a message from the High Commissioner himself to the effect that he had made no such public statement. I shall have pleasure in laying his statement on the Table of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As I read the report, a public statement was not attributed to him. It was stated that he had said that to a certain member of the Government and this was given publicity. He might say he had not made a public statement, but that would not be a denial of the report.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): There are three bills on the Order Paper in my name, one relating to insurance, one to loan companies, and one to trust companies. When introducing these bills I suggested that the House would probably find it most convenient to consider them after they had been submitted for examination to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. If that be agreeable, I will make the motion that Bill No. 58 be now read the second time and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, and I will make a similar motion with regard to the two bills to follow.

On motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding, (Minister of Finance) Bill No. 58, to amend The Insurance Act, 1917, was read the second time and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT

On motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) Bill No. 59, to amend The Loan Companies Act, 1914, was read the second time and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT

On motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance), Bill No. 60, to amend The Trust Companies Act, 1914, was read the second time and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSION

On the motion of Hon Ernest Lapointe (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolutions, Mr. Gordon in the Chair:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may, from time to time, advance and pay to the Corporation of Quebec Harbour Commissioners, hereinafter called the Corporation, such sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars, as are required to enable the Corporation to carry on the construction of such terminal facilities as are necessary to properly equip the Port of Quebec.

2. Resolved, That during the period of construction of the terminal facilities mentioned in these Resolutions, the interest payable on the debentures receivable by the Minister of Finance in exchange for such advances, shall be deemed to be money required to construct and to be part of the cost of construction of the said terminal facilites, and such interest may be paid out of the said sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars.

3. Resolved, That the Corporation shall submit to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for approval, monthly applications for such advances, with statements showing total expenditure on different items in detail, and upon approval, authority for the payment of the amount applied for may be granted by the Governor in Council.

4. Resolved, That the Corporation shall, upon any advances being made, deposit with the Minister of Finance debentures of the Corporation equal in par value to the advance so made, repayable within twenty-four years from the date of issue, and bearing interest payable half-yearly at the rate of five per centum per annum.

5. Resolved, That the principal and interest of any sums advanced under any Act founded on these resolutions, shall be payable by the Corporation out of all its property, assets, tools, rates, dues, penalties and other sources of revenue and income whatsoever, and shall be a charge thereon next after, and have precedence in regard to payment next after, all debentures or bonds issued by the Corporation amounting to the sum of one million one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, under Chapter forty-eight of the Statutes of 1898, Chapter thirty-four of the Statutes of 1899, and Chapter thirty-six of the Statutes of 1907.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): I would like to ask the minister if in his judgment the present volume of business done at the port of Quebec would indicate that the corporation would be able to meet the interest charges on a capitalization of this amount?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not expect that the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec will be able to meet the interest charges in the near future, but judging by the increase in the revenue during the last few years, I think we may expect that they will be able to do so in a few years from now. In 1913, when advances were made by the former government to the present Harbour Commission the receipts were $226,000. The receipts have increased gradually up till last year, when they amounted to $387,323.91, almost one hundred per cent increase over 1913. The port of Quebec is the head of navigation for the big transatlantic liners, and as my hon. friend knows, the tendency of the shipping companies nowadays is to increase rather than reduce the size of their vessels. There is another consideration which we must not lose sight of, and it is that perhaps the finest portion of the harbour of Quebec is consecrated to the immigration purposes of the Canadian Government, for which the port receives not one cent from the Canadian Government. This comprises 800 feet of the finest part of the harbour, and the commissioners have to expend money to make the necessary repairs and to provide all the facilities required for immigration purposes. Of course, there is a bill standing in the books of the commission against the federal government on that account. This bill has never been paid, and I do not expect that it ever will be. It is quite clear that the expenditure to keep the harbour of Quebec in good condition must be met by the Government. The port of Quebec is in a position by itself, with the exception of Montreal and Vancouver, where improvements are made under the same conditions. In Toronto, the Government does not make advances to the Harbour Commission, but all the work is done by the Public Works Department. The money is not loaned and we do not expect any interest or anything of that kind. In Halifax, the harbour improvements are made by the Railways and Canals Department, and in St. John by the Public Works Department. On account of conditions at the port of Quebec, the port was administered by a corporation prior to Confederation, which was called the Trinity House. In 1875 the powers and the property of the Trinity House were transferred to a commission called the Quebec Harbour Commission, composed of nine members. Different public bodies were represented on that commission, which worked up until 1912, when the government of the day, wisely, I think, reduced the commission to three, the number in Montreal, and since that time Quebec harbour has been under the control and administration of a harbour commission composed of three members. If the same plan were followed with Quebec harbour as with other ports, there would simply be an appropriation in the estimates of the Public Works Department, and we would hear no more about it, but so far as Quebec is concerned we have to make advances to the commission, bearing interest, which will be paid back if the port pays its way in the future.

In Montreal, I am pleased to say, the harbour is paying its own way. There is a resolution on the Order Paper for an advance of $5,000,000 to the port of Montreal. In the case of both these ports the resolution does not mean that the amount specified will be expended in one or two or three or four years. It simply enables the Government to make advances as required, and every item of improvement has to be approved by the Governor in Council before the advance is made. As I said, Montreal harbour is paying its own way and earning sufficient revenue to meet all the interest charges. They have already entered into contracts with the shipping companies providing for the payment of interest on the advances which are going to be made under the resolution standing on the Order Paper. I hope that in a few years Quebec harbour will be in just as prosperous a condition as Montreal.

Mr. McDONALD (Timiskaming): Is it the intention of the Government to protect the workers who will be employed by the Quebec Harbour Commission, by insisting on a fair wage clause in all contracts entered into by the Commission?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am myself agreeable to having a fair wage clause in all government contracts, but I do not know that it would be wise to provide for that in this resolution. That will be a matter between the Government and the Harbour Commissioners.

Mr. McDONALD (Timiskaming): I put the question because heretofore in connection with money expended on the Ballantyne pier in Vancouver, and I believe in Montreal also, there has been trouble owing to the lack of such a clause in the contract.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have a great deal of sympathy with the very natural aspirations of the port of Quebec. They have a magnificent harbour, and splendid facilities. The trouble is they cannot get people to use them, not that they lack the harbour, the water, or the facilities. There is a great grain elevator in Quebec with a capacity of two million bushels—with an outward loading capacity of sixty thousand bushels per hour, and with an unloading capacity for vessels—and the loading capacity from the cars is probably greater--of thirty thousand bushels an hour. As I say, they have a good equipment there. The matter has come before me in more than one way; it has come before me in the past as chairman of the Railway Board when questions as to rates, facilities, and similar matters have been up for consideration, and I have also had to do with it as Minister of Finance. The great difficulty with Quebec has been this: Take for example the grain trade in particular. The shippers of grain like to hold their grain at points where they can get just as many markets as possible, and efforts have been made from time to time to induce the grain trade to make some right use of this first great facility that is open to them; but I confess that the efforts made—and I was a party to them—have been unsuccessful. Now if I thought that another million and a half would do any good to that grain business; if I thought another million and a half would be of any real use to the Quebec harbour, and to the commerce of this country, and would be effective in inducing people to ship there who do not now do so, why the matter would be open for further consideration. But, as I see it, that port is pretty well equipped to-day. Furthermore the port has been well looked after so far as capital expenditure is concerned. The country has advanced it over $11,000,000. There is to-day more than $11,000,000 owing, moneys advanced to the Quebec Harbour Commission. As the account has been running for some time there are arrears of interest due which now amount to $6,251,000, so that we have been going behind very steadily and very regularly in connection with this particular investment. It is perfectly true that part of these facilities are of use in other directions rather than directly in relation to government activities. My hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe) is perfectly right when he says that first rate facilities are given there for immigrants. There is no doubt about that and there is no doubt also that part of the harbour he mentions, eight hundred feet is being used. Neither is there any doubt about the contra accounts. There are contra accounts, but they fall very far short of giving us any satisfactory reason why further investments in this direction should be made at the present moment. The Department of Public Works rent this immigration building, and there are arrears of rent in connection with it, from the year 1913 to the year 1921, amounting altogether to $455,209.04.

Mr. MURPHY: Is that a cross account?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, a cross account. In the same way the Department of the Interior occupies ground belonging to the commissioners. Their arrears run back to the year 1892 and amount to $351,000. Besides that there are other small charges bringing up the total contra account to $813,365.23 as against the $6,251,000 of interest as to which the commissioners are in arrear to the Government.

My point, in the first instance, is that we ought to be very clear that we do some good by spending this money; and in the second instance that we should not spend it unless there is a real emergency requiring such expenditure at the present time, because this is not the happiest moment for incurring that large expenditure. In order to give the committee some idea of the small extent to which these large facilities are used, I would like to point out that the five grain berths of Quebec, which hon. gentlemen familiar with the port will know of, were used during the whole of last season—and last season as the minister tells us was improving; they were doing a little more business—for only four weeks out of the entire season. The trouble is not due to lack of facilities but lack of business; and if we are really to help the port of Quebec our efforts should be to see to it that business in some way or other is handled in such channels of trade and so made available as to give the port some use for the existing facilities. The mere installation of more facilities and adding to the amount of idle space is not going to help the harbour commissioners of Quebec but will only add to the tremendous load of overdue interest to which they are now subject.

I may say that the matter has stood for so long that two years ago when I went over the capital assets of the country, with a view to trying to get out something like a fair and honest balance sheet, I was forced to remove from the books of the country these Quebec debentures. They were non-interest producing debentures; the investment was an absolute uncollectable, non-revenue producing debt. They were taken off the active assets of the country and at the present time are in suspense. Further I do not know exactly why the resolution is worded in the way in which it is. I think that is probably due to an oversight.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. gentleman has mentioned a statement as to capital assets that he had prepared. Did he present that to the House, or has it been published?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, yes, that statement is to be found in the Public Accounts for the year 1920, and also in the same blue book for the year 1921. As I recollect it the statement was also mentioned in the budget speech in the session of 1919-20.

Mr. MURPHY: A complete statement?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, a complete statement; the whole thing was given. I do not exactly see why the resolution is drawn in the way it is. I mean that part of it where it says that the new bonds and debentures are to be a first charge upon the property and assets of the commission except, I think it is, $1,150,000. The fact is that so far as this country is concerned we now have advances running up to $11,000,000, and I do not know exactly why they should be made secondary to a subsequent advance. In all sincerity I submit to my hon. friend that this is not helping Quebec. It is merely providing for the expenditure of money for additional facilities where those already existing are not being used to-day; and I submit also that the country cannot afford a further experiment of this nature.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not wish to discuss this matter from a provincial but rather from a national standpoint. In my opinion the minister should give the committee further details as to this item. It is proposed to grant a million and a half dollars for terminal facilities for the harbour of Quebec. In addition, there is another resolution on the order paper calling for an advance of $5,000,000 for facilities for the harbour of Montreal. Regarding the first-named port I think the constitution of the harbour commission is all wrong; it has not been the success which it should have been. There should be a new charter, a non-political commission and co-ordination of control. They are not getting the results from the expenditure at Quebec that they should. The development of one harbour by the improvement of terminals should benefit all harbours, because they are all a link in a chain of communication of waterborne traffic. I had a return of the amount of money spent in various harbours in Canada, and I find nine and a half millions have been expended on the Quebec harbour since 1896. Adding that to the million and a half expenditure under consideration now, we have about eleven million, as the hon gentlemen from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) pointed out, and about six million are overdue for interest. I contend that, if the constitution of the board were a little different, if the port of Quebec were kept out of politics, and a permanent commission and permanent officers appointed to administer these affairs, it would be a great benefit to the country from the commercial aspect, and from the point of view of developing the port and the ocean traffic, inbound and outbound. It would be much better for the port of Quebec if Quebec city contributed something also and the port was developed by asking the commissioners to link the harbour up with the Quebec park system, with the Plains of Abraham Commission, another federal commission which is spending money, and the Immigration Department, and co-ordinate it all under one commission.

Part of the money is for facilities which the hon. minister points out. These terminal facilities may be badly needed, but they are not all what they should be, if the desire is to keep pace with the growth of the country.

There are some features of this proposition which I do not agree with. In the first place, the details are not given. What does "terminal facilities" mean; what does "equipment" mean in the resolution? In the second place, how is it that votes for Montreal and Quebec are being brought on now by special resolution, instead of being dealt with when the main estimates are before the House? There are other ocean ports. For instance, we have Vancouver and Victoria, where four and six million have been expended since 1896. Then we have Halifax and St. John. How is it they are not brought on by separate resolutions also? Then we have the ports of the cities of Toronto and Hamilton. The citizens of Toronto, with the government, are spending $26,000,000 or $28,000,000 to rebuild the port, and are only getting five or six millions from the government and are themselves spending about $21,000,000. Terminal facilities have been badly needed there. The city has an agreement signed by the harbour commission on one side and by the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk on the other, to rebulid the port, moving all the docks out into the bay a certain distance, and erect a station and viaduct, and provide terminals. The Government has been approached by the harbour commission and other bodies recently to ask the Grand Trunk Railway Company to carry out that agreement. Why is that port not dealt with by a separate resolution also? Is it because the province of Quebec is so hungry that they cannot wait for the main estimates? I would not like to say, and I do not say that that is the fact. I believe that all the harbours should be dealt with together, when the main estimates are brought down because I contend that what is good for the ports of Halifax, St. John and Montreal, is good for all the ports, and that those ports should be properly taken care of, with a view to expansion of business in the future, not only for ocean traffic, but for proper terminal facilities, to fit in with the National Railways and act as feeders for them.

It is in the public interest that the harbour of Quebec and other harbours should be kept out of politics, and that we should not remove the commissioners with every change of government. I have been on the harbour commission of Toronto since 1905—it was reorganized in 1911. It is a permanent commission. If we are to have proper development of a harbour, we must have continuity of management and control and a proper sale of bonds by tender. I say that the Minister of Finance should sell these bonds not by private sale, but by public tender. Toronto harbour sold two million by private sale and about fifteen million by tender. Instead of giving the bonds to one company, by private sale, tenders were openly granted. We opened up the door and we got about fifteen bids from Toronto, Philadelphia and New York. The public sale proved a good financial piece of business. We borrowed at from one-half of one to one and a half points better by public tender than by private sale. I submit the minister should call for tenders in reference to the bonds for Quebec harbour, and that the Government should annul all these commissions and co-ordinate the various expenditures of money on terminals in Quebec harbour and for the National railways, the Immigration Branch, the Public Works Department and other facilities. I think the Harbour Commission should negotiate with the city of Quebec if they cannot make such an arrangement. There is the work on the Battlefields' Commission, the Quebec Parks Commission, and the work of making Quebec a city with proper boulevards and driveways. This work would create an industrial area where industries could be located with proper arrangements for terminal facilities in the way of docks, etc., such as they have in New York. You would have a large revenue from the industrial and recreation areas which would go a long way to help pay the fixed charges on the bonds of Quebec harbour instead of their being a drag on the country, with the result that the interest and the sinking fund charges would be met. Some development of this kind should be made, and, if it were made, I believe that in time Quebec port would meet its fixed charges. We are going to meet these fixed charges in Toronto from our revenues and pay the fixed charges out of revenue on the $17,000,000 which has thus far been expended, by developing the industrial area in Ashbridge's bay and the amusement areas at Sunnyside.

I believe that if, instead of having politics in the Quebec Harbour Commission, they would change the principle and have a permanent non-political commission, they would meet with success. I represent a Conservative city, but on the harbour commission of that city, when it was formed, we had two Liberals out of five, and they were good. We have no politics there, and the harbour improvements, from revenues, are going to pay for themselves. These improvements will not, in time, cost the taxpayer a cent. What has been done in Toronto should be done in Quebec as well.

I think the minister should give us some explanation as to why the late commissioners and officials were removed. Were they not good men? Did they not do good work? What was the reason for the change of the commission? This is not the only vote before the committee. The next vote will be for Montreal. A motion is also on the Order Paper for a vote of a million dollars for terminals for Montreal, and the Government are asked for two hundred thousand for a world's fair, and five millions for a bridge—Quebec is getting hungry. No doubt they are hungry. I think the minister should give us some explanation as to the future policy of the port of Quebec—the terminals and inbound and outbound, the rates to be collected, as to the change of the commission, and the broadening out of the commission as aforesaid.

In addition to that vote $23,000,000 was spent by the Government of Canada in deepening the channels between Quebec and Montreal, to give a deepwater channel to Montreal. I say every vote along those lines should be linked up—Quebec, Montreal and the depeening of the channel, from there to the Great Lakes. These deepwater channels should be extended to the head of the Great Lakes. We should have a declaration of policy along these lines. We have very little explanation about the port of Quebec. The Deep Waterways' Commission in their report deal with the future of the port of Quebec and the way it should be co-ordinated with the St. Lawrence scheme and I should like to hear from the minister his views on that subject. We would like to have the Government's views about the deepening of the channels from Quebec to Montreal and to the head of the lakes as recommended by the Deep Waterways' Commission.

Mr. NEILL: I would submit to the Labour Department that if this clause goes through some provision should be inserted that any contract entered into under it should contain what is known as the "fair wage" clause. It has been found in other cities, where a provision of this kind has not been made, that contractors with the harbour commissioners disregard the ordinary fair wage clause, contending that they are not under contract with the Government but with the Commissioners. This happened in connection with the Vancouver harbour commission, and I therefore draw the attention of the Minister (Mr. Lapointe), while we are on this subject, to the necessity for incorporating a fair wage clause in any contract made under the expenditure of this money.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My attention has already been called to this matter, and I shall certainly see that the fair wage clause shall be respected by the harbour commissioners of Quebec. I believe that contracts in connection with all subsidized works should contain a fair wage clause.

Mr. CALDWELL: I should like some information from the minister with regard to a supplementary estimate brought down last year on the 4th day of June. The item then discussed read:

Amount required to pay the Park St. Charles Company, Limited, for land occupied by the Quebec Harbour Commission, as per verdict of arbitrator, which verdict was later sustained by the Superior Court, in favour of the plaintiff company, $60,000.

I would also quote a part of the discussion that took place on that occasion on this matter. The first speaker, after the item had been introduced, was the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), who said:

I object to the passing of this item. This is another land grab absolutely unjustifiable. It is a scandalous affair, and in the interest of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance I would ask him not to insist on the passing of this item. I remember the saying of an old cynic who was prominent in public life many years ago, that if at times he did purchase votes, at least he had the satisfaction of purchasing those votes with the people's money. This item is to make good the promises that were made during an election which has just taken place. The men who are interested in this land grab were most prominent in the election held in the county of Yamaska.

I shall not quote the whole of the hon. member's remarks, but I do wish to give his summing up of the matter. He proceeded:

I assert, Mr. Chairman, that this amount is not due. I know the value of land around that park, and it is an imposition on the good faith of the supporters of the Government to come before them with this demand in the dying hours of the session. The truth of the matter is that the country is being asked to pay the debts incurred in the Yamaska bye-election, because the men who are at the bottom of this land graft are the men who were sent into the constituency to interrupt my hon. friend from Quebec East and who canvassed the county in automobiles. Even if I have to stay here, I will not stand for this land graft, for it is a land graft. Ordinarily I support the city of Quebec, but as a taxpayer and as a representative of the people, I protest against any highway robbery from whatever quarter it comes.

The discussion was somewhat protracted, and further on the same hon. gentleman said:

When the next session comes—perhaps before—I will be in a position to establish to the right hon. gentleman and to Parliament that there has been fraud in this matter from beginning to end.

The then Prime Minister (Mr. Meighen) speaking on the question, is reported as follows:

We will expect the hon. gentleman to do it sooner than that. We would like to know, because if these people are entitled to their money they ought to have it. It is for him to establish by indisputable evidence before the department his charges of fraud and collusion in regard to this matter and we will provide the opportunity for him to do it.

Now, this was a pretty serious charge to make and if the Government had considered that there was no foundation for it they would not have withdrawn the item at that time. The Prime Minister of that day declared that a tribunal would be established to take evidence on the matter and ascertain whether or not the charge was true. We have had no indication since as to whether any action has been taken in the matter, and before we go further I should like the minister to say what has been done.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I understand that no steps have been taken with regard to the Park St. Charles matter. As my hon. friend knows, this was an appropriation in the supplementary estimates. It was not voted last year, and I do not know whether it will be voted this year. However, that is not strictly relevant to the matter immediately under consideration.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend's recollection is at fault. Action was taken. The then Prime Minister said that he would withdraw the item in view of the gravity of the charge, and a tribunal was set up to investigate the question. That tribunal was appointed and an investigator was named under the Inquiries Act. The hon. member who made the charge was invited to go before that investigation and submit his proof, but he took the stand that he did not approve of that kind of investigation. He thought that the matter should be investigated by a parliamentary committee.

Mr. BUREAU: He challenged the jurisdiction of the tribunal.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, he challenged the jurisdiction of the investigator.

Mr. BUREAU: And the Court upheld him.

The CHAIRMAN: It seems to me that the debate is going far beyond the scope of the resolution before the committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Possibly; but I have no doubt that the Chairman would like me to point out that all I am doing is answering statements made from the governmental benches on the invitation of my hon. friend to my left (Mr. Caldwell). If the whole discussion be ruled out, I do not mind.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I merely said that the Government had taken no steps in the direction of paying the amount.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. gentleman was referring to what had been done to implement the promise that an investigation would be held.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No; I was pointing out that we have not taken any steps.

Mr. BUREAU: He was speaking of this Government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I admit that this Government is doing nothing one way or the other. I do not know whether they will bring on the investigation.

Mr. GOOD: I think we should have some reply to the rather serious objections registered against the grant by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). Personally, I want to preserve an open mind in regard to the matter, but this is a time when we cannot afford to give away any money which we need for other purposes, and there are some facts in connection with this matter which, I think, need clearing up. At all events, I do not feel like supporting the resolution at the present time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: As my hon. friend knows, this resolution is only the first stage in this legislation. It was my intention to give full explanations later on, but if my hon. friend so desires, I am quite willing to answer any questions which he would like to ask me now. My hon. friend from West York is quite correct when he says that this has not so far been a paying investment. The hon. member should not call it an investment at all. It is, of course, an investment in that it is intended for the general advancement of the country in developing a national port which is essential to the business of the Dominion. But as regards its being a paying proposition in the way of returning interest, it has never been considered in the light of an investment, and should not be so considered. My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Church) is a nice fellow and I should not like to have any difficulty with him. He has invited me to go to his place and has promised me the time of my life.

Mr. BUREAU: Will he introduce you to Judge Cohen?

Mr. LAPOINTE: But I may tell him that Quebec would like to be in the same position as Toronto; it would also like to get money from the Government and give nothing in return. Such money is not considered in anyway whatever as being due either in the way of capital or of interest by the city of Toronto or the Harbour Commission of that city. Even this year there is an appropriation in the public works estimates for the Toronto harbour improvements, and it is not provided that the harbour commissioners shall pay one cent of interest on the money contributed by the country. The conditions are not the same in any way whatever, and I think my hon. friend was wrong in using such rather strong language and saying that we in Quebec are hungry. At least, as one of my hon. friends on the other side told me, if we are hungry we are not thirsty.

Last year for the first time five million bushels of wheat were shipped from Quebec I may inform my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton). We are in communication with the railway companies with a view to developing this export traffic, and the prospects are encouraging. But these advances are not for the purpose of developing or improving the grain facilities at the elevator there, except for a small amount of $20,000, necessary to complete the elevator. All the other items are either for the purpose of completing work already started or to make repairs which are absolutely necessary to preserve what has been already constructed.

The harbour commission of Quebec intended to build a cold storage warehouse, and they asked for $500,000 more than the Government has agreed to advance. We thought this was a new work that could very well wait, and we told them that their request would be reconsidered when the necessity for such a warehouse was more urgent than it appears to be at the present time. I have here a report of the movement of vessels in and out of the port of Quebec for 1919 and 1920; the report of the operations for 1920 and 1921 has not yet been received by the department. These are the figures for 1919 and 1920:

The movement of vessels inwards and outwards for 1920 as compared with 1919 shows an increase of 69 vessels, as follows:
Inwards: 1920, 460; 1919, 331.
Outwards: 1920, 214; 1919, 274.

I think these advances are necessary, Mr. Chairman; indeed, we would not ask parliament to sanction them if they were not absolutely necessary at the present time to preserve from destruction works already constructed, and to furnish the shipping accommodation required at this port.

My hon. friend from West York seems to think that no vessels are using the port of Quebec. What would the bigger liners do if they had not this port to use on the St. Lawrence route? Those liners do not go to Montreal, despite the money that has been spent, as my hon. friend complained, in deepening the channel between the two ports, because the underwriters do not think it would be safe for them to incur the risks involved. If any further explanations are required, I shall be happy to furnish them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. minister gave us his receipts for 1913 and 1921. Can he give the House a statement showing his receipts and disbursements so that we may have an idea of the volume of business transacted?

Receipts	$226,020 80
Expenditure	239,728 33
1921—
Receipts	$387,323 91

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): Mr. Chairman, anything I have to say on this resolution is more by way of securing information than argument for or against it. Part of the information I sought has already been supplied by the minister (Mr. Lapointe), supplemented by the remarks of the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). It was not clear in my mind whether the moneys mentioned in this resolution were capital expenditure on behalf of the Dominion Government, or a loan to the Quebec harbour commissioners, repayable with interest. I rather gather—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—that it is a loan to the Quebec harbour commissioners with very little prospect of repayment either of principal or interest. Consequently we may just as well take it for what it really is—capital expenditure by the people of Canada generally to develop this particular port.

Were its development at the present juncture sufficiently urgent and important to warrant that expenditure in my opinion, it would have my support; but I wonder if such is the case. We have been told repeatedly during the present session that the one thing we must keep constantly before our minds is economy in the expenditure of public moneys. A week ago, in company with other members, I visited the port of Quebec for the first time, and I am free to confess I was very much impressed with the ample shipping facilities the harbour commissioners have in their wonderful port, and the great opportunities for expansion. I know the hospitality of our friends from Quebec was too genuine an article to be sullied with any commercial or mercenary motives; any information furnished to us was received in the spirit in which it was tendered, and on my part at least I found it very valuable.

The harbour commissioners, as was pointed out, have remarkable facilities—and a grievance. But if I interpreted the representations aright, the grievance took more the character of it being impossible to secure the volume of business which the existing facilities were able to handle. I gathered that what would help the harbour more than anything else would be that traffic from the national roads should be so increased that the facilities would be used to capacity, which they are not now. When that stage comes it will be time enough in my opinion to consider the further expansion of those facilities. If that contention is right, it is so closely related to railway rates that we can scarcely consider the one without the other. I am not going to discuss railway rates as a concrete subject to-day; we had enough of that yesterday; but we who live in the interior and ship bulk products across the continent to the Atlantic ports, have been taught, and have come to belive, that all-rail routes, to the Atlantic seaboard points can never hope to compete with rail and water routes. Now, that principle may be subject to variation; but I wondered when this was brought to my attention whether, in that portion of the year when heavy commodities such as grain go by rail to the Atlantic seaboard, the port of Quebec could not be given the benefit of such freight rates on the National Transcontinental as would enable it to compete with other ports which are only a little closer to the interior than Quebec is, and not nearly so close to the European countries. I thought something might be done on behalf of the port of Quebec. Then, I had hoped to get some information as to the volume of traffic which is now offering. I did not wish to compare the various ports, but it was evident that the port of Quebec must always be our chief Canadian port in the summer season for passenger traffic, package freight, and shipments which must move hurriedly into the interior. Quebec has, it seems to me, adequate facilities for that kind of business.

[Mr. R. M. Johnson.]

Now, Montreal is, after all, the nearest point reached by rail from the interior to tidewater or to open ocean ports. Are the facilities at the port of Montreal—and I am asking simply for information, because I do not know—adequate to handle the business at present offering? The minister will perhaps answer that question later. I hope I would not be considered as taking a parochial view if I spoke of the relation of this subject to western problems, but after all, we cannot have the one without the other. What is the use of terminal facilities if you do not have adequate facilities at the initial points of shipment, and vice versa? I notice also, on page 35 of the estimates, that items which have been referred to by the member for North Toronto (Mr. Church), aggregating almost $2,000,000, for the improvement of various ports and harbour facilities, are chargeable to capital. And here is an item of $1,500,000 which, taking the information supplied by the minister a few minutes ago, I cannot look upon as other than a capital expenditure, in effect at least. So that we run up an item of $3,500,000 to furnish terminal facilities for the shipment of our products to European countries. In other words, we take care of the outlet for traffic originating in the interior, though we neglect—and I think I am speaking correctly, Mr. Chairman—we neglect the development of those facilities which are necessary to the gathering of that business. Many of us from western Canada have been most persistent in our representations to the Minister of Railways for branch line extensions, and we have been impressed by his argument that these works could not be undertaken owing to lack of money and to the necessity for economy. Well, we have taken him at his word; but it seems rather hopeless that we should be asked to vote large sums for the equipment and development of terminal facilities when we neglect the feeders which are so essential if the fullest use is to be made of the facilities which are already at our disposal. Much as I appreciate the situation as respects the harbour of Quebec, as well as other harbours mentioned in the estimates, and much as I would like to see them develop and made the best harbours in the world, I cannot see my way clear to support a vote for these improvements so long as, on the ground of economy, extensions and feeders back in the interior are left to wait for better times.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am most anxious to see Quebec become one of our great national ports. Perhaps there is some sentiment mixed up with my desire in that respect; I always look upon Quebec as the ancient capital of the land, and I believe that nature intended that it would become one of the great, if not the greatest, of our summer ports. But the statement which has been given to the committee this afternoon by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) almost staggers one when one attempts to consider the proposal now before the committee for the appropriation of another million and a half dollars. I can well remember the 4th of May in the year 1901, when a committee of the House was invited to go to the city of Quebec to examine the harbour, and I see hon. members in the House now who, with myself, went to Quebec on that occasion and had a most enjoyable day. History has been repeating itself, because I believe that a week or ten days ago another more limited committee went to Quebec with a view to looking over the harbour. Well, twenty years ago we started on fairly liberal expenditure in regard to the port of Quebec. We were very optimistic in those days as to the prospect for the future and felt very sure of the results which would be obtained. But, as I say, I was staggered this afternoon to hear the statement made by the member for West York as to the results which have been achieved after an experience of twenty odd years in connection with expenditures at that port. The hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Johnson) has, I think, properly put the matter before the committee; we must look upon this outlay as capital expenditure, not as a loan. An ex-Finance Minister of this country informs the House that our expenditures under this head in past years, amounting to about $11,000,000, have practically been written off as an asset. It is, then, a capital expenditure from which we have little hope of obtaining anything, either by way of principal or by way of interest. There is little doubt in my mind that if we spend another million and a half as proposed by this resolution we need not look for either the return of capital or the payment of interest. Now, the result in Montreal, I am informed, has been quite different. Montreal has developed into a very busy port. The bonds of the harbour commissioners there are saleable; the interest upon them is paid to the government; they are considered a fairly high-class investment. I am told also that the same thing applies to Vancouver, but for some reason or other it does not apply to Quebec. During the past two years I have visited the city of Quebec, particularly the military district there, on two or three occasions, and incidentally I have had interviews with some of the citizens in regard to the question of the harbour. I must say the impression I gained was just the impression given to the committee this afternoon by my hon. friend from Moosejaw. The complaint of the citizens of Quebec was not that the harbour facilities were inadequate; the impression left on my mind was that they had one of the best equipped harbours in the country or on the continent, but the regret was that there was no business to be done. The complaint was directed entirely to the fact that the business coming over the National Transcontinental Railway did not reach the city of Quebec.

The complaint was a complaint of freight rates. They complained of a rate which they said discriminated against the city of Quebec, and my information on those occasions was that if a proper adjustment of freight rates was made, the port of Quebec would be one of the busiest in the Dominion. Well, the freight rate question has not yet been adjusted. From information I gathered, and from anything I saw, I certainly formed the opinion that the facilities were there far in advance of the requirements. The facilities were there for a trade enormously in advance of any trade they are doing at the port of Quebec at the present time, or can hope to do within a reasonable period in the future. If that be so, would it not be idle for this House to advance another $1,500,000 at the present time?

I view the matter this way. I do not want by my voice or my my vote to interrupt the progress or development of that port. I want to see it go ahead, but at the same time would it be a wise thing to expend $1,500,000 under the conditions as we know them to-day in this House? Is not this a matter that can well wait for future consideration until we see what is going to be done about railway rates, railway schedules, and the like? If the conditions as they exist to-day are to continue in regard to railway traffic, there are more facilities at the port of Quebec now than will be used for many, many years. If a change takes place, the facilities there to-day will take care of a very largely increased business for a number of years to come. Then, cannot we allow this present proposal to stand until the trade figures warrant additional expenditure, until we can see some hope of getting something back, or at least of having an investment of some value to the Dominion of Canada.

Criticism has been made against the city of Toronto. It has been suggested that the harbour expenditures there have been in the nature of gifts to the city of Toronto. I think it is something to the credit of the city of Toronto, a proof of their progressive spirit, that while the Government has contributed, and contributed on a fairly liberal scale, to harbour improvements in that city, the citizens themselves have also contributed very much more liberally. For every dollar that this Government has spent on harbour improvements in Toronto, I am told that the citizens have spent five or six dollars of their own money. I do not believe the city of Quebec has ever made a contribution of any kind towards its harbour, not for many years, at all events. It may originally have done so, but in the last twenty or twenty-five years there has been no municipal expenditure on the part of Quebec. So long as we view that port solely as a national port, I do not know that the citizens of Quebec should be called to make any expenditure, but these improvements are undoubtedly a convenience and an asset to the city. They are a help to the citizens; the more trade that is done there, the better for the city of Quebec, but during the last twenty or twenty-five years, I believe I am correct in saying, the citizens of Quebec have not paid anything towards their harbour, while the citizens of Toronto have taxed themselves to the tune of something like $20,000,000 for harbour improvements there. If the money must be spent now, if the minister can make out a case for this expenditure at the present time, I shall not stand in the way of it, but I must say that in my judgment this expenditure might stand for one or two or three or five years, until we see some business in sight at that port which is not there at the present time.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I am really surprised to hear the hon. member state that the citizens of Quebec have never made any contribution towards their harbour, or any sacrifice to obtain what is due to them. Let me remind the hon. gentleman that on many occasions in this House I have had the honour to quote from the written agreement between the federal government and the city of Quebec, by which the Government bound themselves to make certain improvements and construct certain works at that port. I would remind the hon. gentleman that the attitude he has taken to-day with regard to this expenditure is not the attitude that his late chief, the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, and his colleagues took when they were entertained at a banquet at the Chateau Frontenac in the city of Quebec in 1913. On that occasion the Prime Minister of that day told the citizens of Quebec that there was nothing too good for them, and that the pledges of the government in respect to the port of Quebec would be fulfilled. I would also remind the hon. gentleman of the statements made by Sir Robert Borden when he came down to inaugurate the works at the port of Quebec. He stated then that moneys would be provided for the Quebec Harbour Commission, and that the proper equipment would be provided.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have provided all that.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Is the hon. gentleman really able to state what has been done by the Quebec Harbour Commission lately? The promises which the late government made of improvements to the port of Quebec have never been fulfilled. I do not know of any solid promise which was made by the late government and the government of Sir Robert Borden to the city of Quebec which has been fulfilled. Millions of dollars have been promised the city for docks, wharves, grain elevators, and all kinds of improvements.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They have got all that.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: We have got a grain elevator, but it is only a small one, and not of the capacity we should have in the city of Quebec. An elevator of the proper capacity in that city would be a benefit to the country as a whole. Our elevator has a capacity of 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 bushels.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A capacity of 2,000,000 bushels.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: We should have an elevator with a capacity of at least 10,000,000 bushels. That is what we were promised.

Mr. MILLAR: How much grain passed through that elevator last year?

Mr. LAPOINTE: About 5,000,000 bushels.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: If we had the proper facilities, and the proper freight rates, so that the grain from the West could be brought to the city of Quebec, if we had the tariff of twenty cents a bushel which was promised, the business done would be very much larger and several millions of dollars would be saved to the people of the West. The country as a whole would benefit from the application of such a tariff, but even if we had the traffic, we have not the port facilities to handle it at the present time. I am delighted to see that the Minister of Marine has placed a sum in the estimates to enable proper equipment to be provided for the harbour of Quebec. But even that amount is only a small contribution towards carrying out the promise made to the citizens of Quebec subsequent to 1911, a promise which has never been fulfilled.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to point out to the hon. member (Mr. Lavigueur) that he is making a mistake in saying that nothing has been done. I am afraid some people will think we did a great deal too much for Quebec. It was thought a great deal could be done for "the fair city of Quebec" and we did hope to do a great deal. I would remind my hon. friend that the carrying out of that intention resulted in an expenditure of three and a half millions on the Quebec harbour in 1913; an expenditure of $2,000,000 in 1914; and an expenditure of $1,491,600 in 1917.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: The statement I made was that nothing has been done to carry out the written contract entered into by the late government. My hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) a few minutes ago stated that Quebec had never contributed anything toward the contemplated improvements in that city. I would point out that the city of Quebec has given property worth over $2,000,000 in order to secure a proper equipment for the port. Quebec gave up the Champlain market which was a property valued at over $2,000,000, and what did it get in return for that surrender? The late government built a terminal station on that site which is a disgrace to the city, and worth at the utmost only some twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars. Under the Laurier régime the contract was awarded for the erection of a station on the Champlain market site to cost over $1,000,000. When the Borden government came in they cancelled that contract, and instead of giving us the magnificent edifice planned by Sir Wilfrid Laurier they erected a miserable building which they thought was good enough for the citizens of Quebec.

Mr. MILLAR: It seems to me that during the years of the war period, and during the years when prosperity reigned, we acquired habits of extravagance. It is not easy to escape from these habits, but I believe the time has come when instead of talking in terms of millions when contemplating expenditures we shall have to be more economical and speak in the language of thousands. While formerly we talked in language that is parochial, looking after our own interests in our own particular section, we are now compelled to look at matters from a national viewpoint. Much of the discussion that has taken place to-day would indicate that the gravity of the financial problem confronting the Government at the present time has not been fully realized. I am not going to devote much time in repeating what has been already said, and said in better terms than I can employ. I would say, however, in reply to my hon. friend from Quebec (Mr. Lavigueur) in regard to Sir Robert Borden's reported statement a short time ago "that nothing was too good for the city of Quebec," that we are now living in other days. Many great changes have taken place since the time to which my hon. friend has alluded; and that whether we want to or not we are compelled to-day to prune down our estimates. Many of us thought that drastic cuts in the public expenditure could be made. Now we begin to realize that trade would be so upset and the inconvenience would be so great in consequence that we cannot go to extremes in the matter. But there is no doubt that there must be a paring down of expenditures.

There is one phase of this matter I would like to deal with particularly. I believe that many members of this House and many people in the country, consider the economic depression—and I refer more particularly to the state of agriculture—is such that all that is necessary is to have a little patience and things will right themselves in a very short time. I believe the people who entertain that view are very much mistaken. Let me indulge in a little retrospect. Many of those hon. members who have farmed in the West can remember the days when land on the prairies ready for the plough was purchased at $6 an acre—yes $2.50 an acre, the very best land that lies out of doors. That land was absolutely free from weeds; all we had to do was to scratch the surface and it would yield a crop. In those days of prosperity we could stand a great many burdens, and we did support many and did not raise much complaint respecting them. We hardly counted the cost. We knew we were carrying great burdens, but we were living in times of prosperity and felt able to stand them. Now the time has come when that land is not so productive as it was. During the last twenty years it has decreased in production to the extent of six bushels per acre. My remarks, of course, apply to the prairie provinces. The cost of production has now become very high, and, in a very few words, I will give you my reason why there has been such an enhancement in cost and why we cannot get back to normal conditions without drastic efforts on the part of the federal government. The time came when competition was set aside by some of those engaged in manufacturing articles for our use, but at first we thought we could stand it. I will not say that the manufacturers of farming implements were the first to inaugurate this proceeding but I know they were among the first. Let me illustrate what took place by a concrete case. I said to a man who was a manufacturer and seller of sheaf loaders "That article should not cost $500; it should not cost more than $250." He replied "We do not figure the selling price according to the cost at all. We believe that the man who is threshing grain will regard it as worth his while to pay $500 rather than be without it. Therefore we charge him $500." Now that sort of thing has taken place all along the line. All the various interests have organized even down to labour. When labour organized and demanded a high wage, the time arrived when it was absolutely impossible for us to continue to pay that high wage any longer. During last fall, because of this economic depression, the loan companies took this action. They were not able to collect their loans or the interest. Of course matured loans must be renewed. They were renewed in many cases, not at 8 per cent, but 9 per cent.

THE CHAIRMAN: This discussion as to loan companies in the West can hardly be relevant to this particular issue. I observe the hon. member is drawing a comparison, but I think he is going a little beyond the length of address he is entitled to give in drawing that comparison.

[Mr. Millar]

Mr. MILLAR: I was only mentioning that as an incident, not dealing fully with it, but merely wishing to show that conditions surrounding agriculture are such that, unless economy is practised by the Government, so as to lessen the burden the country is carrying at the present time, no grain or other freight would go to the port of Quebec or any other port. An effort has been made to show that an expenditure on the port of Quebec would be wise if the railways could be persuaded to carry the freight east, instead of letting it go by water. This, it seems to me, is an effort to make water run uphill. The freight will go very much cheaper by water than by rail, and I see no good reason why any effort should be made to cause it to go by rail, in order that the port of Quebec may be built up. Considering that about $11,000,000 has already been spent on this port, and the amount of traffic passing through it has been very small, it certainly seems to me very unwise that another million and a half should be spent.

Reference has been made to the necessity for branch lines. A few days ago I received a letter from some gentlemen, who are interested in a branch line that has been partly built for some two or three years. Ties have been laid, and I believe a large quantity of rails is ready to be laid down, and these gentlemen said "If the Government is not ready to complete this railway at this time, we farmers of this district would like to complete it ourselves, and be paid for our work by way of freight on the produce, principally grain, that will be carried on the railway." At the present time one reason why this branch line should be built is because a great deal of the grain that would go to the Government railways is now going by the Canadian Pacific railway. When many districts require the expenditure of money that will bring good returns in order to help a basic industry like agriculture, I ask if it would be wise to consider spending another million and a half on the port of Quebec. It sems to me not.

You may think, Mr. Chairman, that I have wandered a little from the subject, but I have not spent very much of the time of this House in discussing any matter. If it costs $2,000 an hour, as some have figured, to talk to this House, I believe other members have been greater sinners than I have. Let me say to the cities of the province of Quebec, and to all other cities, that it is well that they should get together and consider this difficult problem in which Canada is placed, because the reaction has already set in. Manufacturing concerns and the railways are suffering; in fact, almost every industry in Canada is suffering. If hon. gentlemen stop to think for a little while, I think they will see why. You can lay such burdens on the basic industries of Canada that their purchasing power will be impaired, and that is what has taken place during the recent years and months. Those engaged in farming—and I suppose many others are similarly placed —are unable to purchase as they used to. They have to cut their purchases to the very bone, and when they cannot purchase, naturally those who are manufacturing have to close their shops. There is unemployment; the railways have not the traffic to carry and there is impoverishment all along the line. I think it would be well, for that reason, that those who think of spending money in Government work that could very well wait for a year or two, should take that fact into consideration. If they would wait a few years until the basic industries get on their feet again, and a certain degree of prosperity returns, then if the million, or two or three million, is required to improve the port of Quebec, or Montreal, or even Toronto—which, as a matter of fact, has been very persistent in its demands—I think you would find those who are engaged in agriculture would not be backward in supporting their demands. We are not looking at things in a narrow way, but rather in a broad way. We see that a reaction has taken place and that there is no chance of a return of prosperity in Canada until the basic industries receive the consideration to which they are entitled because of their importance. I ask the Government to give consideration to that point.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Who are the Quebec harbour commisioners at the present time?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Power, Mr. Gauvin and General Tremblay.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was the minister's idea in changing the harbour commissioners?

Mr. LAPOINTE: To form a new board, in order that there might be co-operation in the work of the commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What reason had the minister to think that with the old board there would not be co-operation?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend knows what the old harbour commission was, and he was anxious to have the documents of the House, and they have been laid on the table.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They give no reason.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am going to give reasons. I do not think anybody could accuse me of being a very bitter political partisan and, I think, if I have any reproach laid against me, it is quite the contrary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never heard the contrary reproach.

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. gentleman is not in the right camp to hear that report.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think political patronage must be eliminated, as far as possible. But what were the conditions there? The chairman of the harbour commission was a friend of mine personally. He was a gallant soldier and did his duty for his country. Unfortunately, he is dead now, and it is a delicate matter to speak of him in any way, but I am sure my right hon. friend will not consider that I am speaking disparagingly of him when I say that he was a strong partisan of my right hon. friend and of his party. That was right; I have no complaint whatever to make in that regard. But he was the owner, the publisher and the manager of a newspaper in the city of Quebec called The Quebec Chronicle, which is perhaps the strongest political journal in that province.

Mr. BUREAU: Tory.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The chairman of the harbour commission continued as publisher, manager and owner of that newspaper after the new cabinet had come into office, and almost every day there were editorials in that newspaper not only against the Government, but directed against the Minister of Marine in particular. I have nothing to complain about concerning any such criticisms coming from any citizen, but my right hon. friend will admit that this was a condition of things that could not be tolerated. The chairman of the harbour commission is not, perhaps, a civil servant. If he were he would have been instantly dismissed for offensive political partisanship, under the Civil Service Act. But he is more than a civil servant; he is even more than a deputy minister, because there is less control over him. He is the administrator of the harbour, and surely he must have some confidence in the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as the minister must likewise have confidence in his officer. There could be no co-operation if the two were distrustful of each other so far as political questions are concerned. That was the only reason for my having asked for his resignation; and I may say that everyone expected it. The matter was not criticised by the friends of my right hon. friend in Quebec. The new Harbour Board is considered by all the citizens of Quebec as a good business body. They were entertained last night by all the business men of the city, Conservatives as well as Liberals, and I think that my right hon. friend will concede that it was impossible to act otherwise under the circumstances. At all events, I thought I did the right thing. I could not do otherwise, and I offer no apology whatever in this matter. If there is anything wrong about what I did, I must confess that I am an unrepentant sinner and certainly deserve all that may be coming to me in consequence of my action.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was the offence of Mr. Gravel? Was he a criminal in the sense of being a Conservative too?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Three or four years ago, when Sir David Watson was appointed chairman of the Harbour Commission in Quebec, Mr. Pennington, who was a member of the board, did not resign. The former government, properly as I think, thought that when the board had to be reorganized and the chairman had severed his connection with it, it was necessary to appoint a new board altogether. My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) shakes his head, but I know that that is what was done three years ago, and it was done this year also. It was thought advisable to retain one of the three former commissioners, and General Tremblay was retained. There was no question about political partisanship on his part. He was not the owner of a newspaper carrying on an offensive campaign against the Government, and nothing concerning him deserves criticism.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are any of the present appointees related to the minister?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not in the slightest degree. My right hon. friend has been utterly misinformed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say I was informed at all. Now, I take a different view altogether from that of the minister of his conduct in this regard, and if I may interpret his own heart at this moment, I am not sure that he has fully confessed his own sense of his conduct.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I certainly have.

Mr. MEIGHEN: At the time Sir David Watson was appointed, one member of the board was asked to retire. As I understand, it has been the custom to have two French Canadians and one Protestant member on the board, and it was in order to maintain the two French Canadian members that the other one was asked to retire. That is what the late government did; it was not because of any political reason. On the contrary, so far as I know, the man who was asked to retire was a friend of the Government. But this government comes into office; it finds Sir David Watson with almost five years of service in Europe, service recognized by the appointment of him as Chairman of the Harbour Board. It finds him eminently successful in his office; it also finds Brigadier-General Tremblay in office, a man also of some length of service in the war. It finds him successful as well. It finds in office Mr. Gravel, who represented particularly the Levis side of the river on the board. And almost the first act of the minister is to write letters to these gentlemen and ask for their resignations. I have before me a copy of the letter which the minister wrote to Sir David Watson. Let me read it:

Dear Sir DAVID WATSON:

Since asuming the direction of the Marine and Fisheries Department, I have given consideration to the policies that should, in my judgment, be adopted by the Government with reference to the administration of the harbours of Montreal and Quebec. In order that the Government and myself should have a free hand in the creation of an administration in sympathy with those public policies, the former Commissioners from the harbour of Montreal voluntarily tendered their resignation.

I have not yet asked for the correspondence in that connection.

You will, I am sure, appreciate that the adoption of a similar policy respecting the harbour of Quebec is eminently desirable in the public interest. I have therefore to respectfully request you to forward to me your resignation as president of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, so that the Government may be enabled with as little delay as possible to organise an administration along the lines heretofore indicated. I am forwarding a similar request to the other members of the Commission.

The request goes to General Tremblay and to Mr. Gravel. I have the reply which Sir David Watson sent, as brought down by the minister. It will be noted that the reason given by the minister for requesting the resignation of these gentlemen is in order that the Government may be free to appoint men in sympathy with those public policies which the Government contemplates in respect of the harbour of Quebec, without the slightest information as to whether or not Sir David Watson was in sympathy with those public policies. That is what the minister said in his letter. Without any intimation to Sir David Watson as to what those public policies were—and I suppose we are getting them now—the minister assumed, that he was opposed to them, and on that ground demanded the resignation of as gallant an officer as ever served this or any other country. I shall read Sir David Watson's reply and leave it to the House as to where the honours of the argument lay after the minister had received it:

QUEBEC, February 10th, 1922.

Dear Sir,—This will acknowledge yours of the 7th instant, in which you request me to forward my resignation as President of the Quebec Harbour Commission, and also note that you are forwarding a similar request to the other members of the Commission.

You state that you have given consideration to the policies that should, in your judgment, be adopted by the Government with reference to the administration of the Harbours of Montreal and Quebec, and point out that in order that the Government and yourself should have a free hand in the creation of an administration in sympathy with those public policies, the former Commissioners for the Harbour of Montreal voluntarily tender their resignations.

But when you go on to say that I will, you are sure, appreciate that the adoption of a similar policy respecting the harbour of Quebec is eminently desirable in the public interest, I fail to follow you. Since you have never enlightened me as to what these policies are that should, in your judgment, be adopted by the Government with regard to the harbour of Quebec, and have made no attempt whatever to ascertain my views relative thereto, I am at a loss to know by what right you can assume in advance that my administration would not be fully sympathetic to the public policies to which you allude.

It will be a surprise, not only to myself but to the citizens of Quebec, if you have any other policy in view than that of securing a maximum of business for the harbour, without prejudice to the legitimate claims of other Canadian ports, and of administering its affairs in general with efficiency and economy. With such a policy I am and have always been in complete sympathy; as evidence of which I may point out that for a great number of years, prior to my appointment, the Quebec Commission was administered at a considerable loss annually, due to lack of business in the port. Since my administration as Chairman, however, this deficit has been converted into a surplus as per extract from Official Auditor's report, handed in last week as follows:

"The revenue statement shows a marked improvement on the previous period, the gross deficit of $65,221.96 of last year being converted this year into a surplus of $52,020.74 showing a betterment of $117,242.70.

"Operating expenditures have been reduced from $387,619 to $335,303, a gain of $52,316. All items show a reduction except the 'Elevators' which against an increase in operating expenses of $22,322, show an improvement of $71,120 in revenue."

I was appointed to the chairmanship of the Quebec Harbour Commission in 1920, not by reason of services rendered to the late government or of sympathy with its policies—so far as the harbour is concerned I never hesitated to urge its requirements and its rights—but for the same reason as my fellow-commissioner, Brigadier-General Tremblay: in recognition of five years of continuous war service in France, in the interest of the people of Canada.

In this connection, I assuredly cannot agree with your policy of treatment of returned men as illustrated by your request for the resignations of Brigadier-General Tremblay and myself, and I further disagree with your policy if it is not directed towards the same satisfactory results as I have already been able to obtain, and which appears in the official Auditor's report quoted herein.

But above all I have no desire, nor would it be possible for me to co-operate with an administration whose policies appear from your letter to be so utterly at variance with the most elementary principles of justice and honour, and my resignation is herewith tendered in accordance with your request, to take effect at the end of the month.

Yours truly,

D. WATSON,

Major-General, R.O., formerly commanding 4th Canadian Division.

Brigadier Tremblay tendered his resignation. I do not know what may have transpired between him and the minister, but the brigadier, being a consistent Liberal appointed by the late government, was reappointed by this Government. Mr. Gravel, who had been appointed to the port of Levis, was requested to hand in his resignation, which was accepted, and he also was effectually dismissed.

Sir David Watson's offence, according to my hon. friend, was that he was the owner of the Quebec Chronicle. It is true he was the owner of the majority stock of the Quebec Chronicle. It is true that the Quebec Chronicle supported the late government, and has always supported the Liberal-Conservative party. I want to know if the holding of majority stock or control of a newspaper supporting the late government is a bar to the holding of office as a harbour commissioner under this Government. Did the minister speak to me?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was telling my hon. friend for George Etienne Cartier (Mr.

Jacobs) that Sir David Watson was not only the owner of the majority stock, but he was general manager of the paper. The paper was published under his sole control.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Assuming he was general manager of the paper, did that interfere with the performance of his duties as harbour commissioner? It did not appear to. The duties of that office were performed more successfully by him than they had been performed by any one before.

Mr. JACOBS: His other duty was to attack this administration every morning for breakfast.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well. In the city of Quebec only one of the four or five papers is supporting the late government. A policy of purchase of antagonistic papers has been carried on by the friends of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. JACOBS: Name them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I take the name of a paper right beside us—L'Evenement. I did not have to go far, did I?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Let those speak who know.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But where the attempt to purchase fails the big stick is applied, and the owner of the majority stock in the one remaining Conservative paper of the great city of Quebec is exposed to summary dismissal at the hands of my hon. friend though he was commander of the 4th Canadian Division for four years in France, and one of the most gallant men that this or any other country ever sent to the front. What offence did Mr. Gravel commit? I did not hear. The only offence he committed that I know of was to hold the office that the hon. minister wanted to fill with one of his friends. Everything the minister has advanced to-day, yes, many times in much stronger form, would be applicable to every case of political patronage the grossest that the country could conceive of; he could defend every case of patronage with the language he has employed this afternoon. Yes, patronage is bad enough, and I know how the minister is hankering to get back to it in all its various forms, but patronage as applied against the holding of offices that have been filled successfully by returned men is the most indefensible form of patronage.

Nor is this the only case to which it has been applied; there are many such cases throughout the country, reference to which has been made in questions put upon the Order Paper. But this is the most conspicuous one—a demand for resignation on a ground that is so manifestly indefensible and untenable that I am surprised the minister would put it forward. He had not the least reason to expect that Sir David Watson would change the political allegiance of his journal—a journal whose circulation was naturally with those of sympathetic views to itself. Sir David Watson personally was not in any sense active in the management of the Quebec Chronicle. He attended to his duties as harbour commissioner just as assiduously as he attended to his duties as general of our 4th Division in France; that was his conduct in office. Sir David Watson by his services to this country merited better treatment, and might have expected better treatment, at the hands of a generous foe. I may say that in correspondence received by myself from one of his friends, I am informed that the treatment accorded Sir David Watson was very severely felt by himself as unjust, cruel and ungrateful. To quote the last sentence of the letter:

> I personally do not consider it too much to say that what the Huns failed to do the Liberals succeeded in accomplishing—killing him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Who is that written by?

Mr. MEIGHEN: A close friend of the late Sir David Watson.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is his name?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will give my hon. friend the name personally, if he wishes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my right hon. friend should give the name to the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will ask the writer of this letter for the privilege of giving the name. As soon as I get it I will give it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend should not read a letter in the House unless he is prepared to state the authorship of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not a minister of the Crown. If a minister of the Crown reads a letter in the House, he is bound to lay it on the Table in support of policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend is the leader of a party; that carries with it some responsibility.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman will show me the rule, I will adhere to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are some rules that apply to ordinary courtesy, and my hon. friend ought to know them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman had better hold his own followers to that rule.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have nothing to complain of concerning what my right hon. friend has done or said; it is like him, absolutely. He cannot induce me to say anything against the late Sir David Watson. The committee understands how delicate the subject is under the circumstances, so I will confine myself to stating again that I think no minister of the Crown, on whatever side of politics he may be, can, in his capacity as head of a department, co-operate with a deputy minister or the chairman of a board under his jurisdiction when these officials are assailing each other every morning in the newspapers, politically or otherwise. It would simply be stupidity to take any other course than was taken, and were I placed again in the same position I would act exactly as I did.

Now, my right hon. friend, in his very insinuating way, has said that he does not know about the commissioners of Montreal because he has not yet moved for the correspondence. Let me tell him that as soon as this Government took office the harbour commissioners of Montreal sent in their resignations. They did it in a very courteous way, and they were pleased to welcome the new commissioners who were appointed by this Government.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Did not the chairman of that board previously resign to become a candidate in St. Antoine?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The chairman had resigned to become a candidate for my right hon. friend in St. Antoine, and the two other commissioners resigned as soon as this Government took office. The Montreal Gazette, which is a respectable organ of my right hon. friend and has always been a Conservative newspaper, had something to say about that. The Gazette certainly does not share the opinion of my right hon. friend as to the co-operation which should exist between the Government or the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the harbour commission of any port. Here is what the Montreal Gazette said in an editorial in its issue of February 1, entitled "The Harbour Board," in which it welcomed the appointments made by the Government:

> The office of Harbor Commissioner has always been political in the sense that its occupants come and go with the changing governments at Ottawa, and in view of the intimate relation between the port and the Government there can be no objection to this procedure. Montreal is the national port of Canada. Physical conditions have made it such, and on the progressive development and capable administration of the port depends not a local but a Dominion-wide interest. For progressive development it is desirable that the Harbor Board should be persona grata to the ministry at Ottawa, a fact of which no one is more conscious than the recently resigned commissioners after a period of exceptional progress, and good service.

I would not go as far as the Montreal Gazette did.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Neither would I.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But I still maintain that when the chairman of a harbour commission is not only a strong political partizan, but takes an active part in political warfare; when he is the publisher of a newspaper which attacks the Government every morning, and when he assails the Minister of Marine and Fisheries under whom he is supposed to act—that is a condition of things which nobody in the House and nobody in the country would tolerate. I would not have been true to myself; I would not have been true to the position I occupy, had I been willing to permit such a condition to continue.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): I do not want to assail the present Harbour Commissioners of Quebec, but I think the right hon. leader of the Opposition might complain if he were in my position. The first appointment made by the new harbour board was that of Captain Ambroise Landry as harbour master of the port of Quebec. Captain Landry was the man who sought to be my opponent in Bonaventure county four years ago. He was actually in the running; his nomination papers had been prepared, but he was pulled off by the Quebec committee, and Mr. Philippe Furois put in his place. I think the new harbour board of Quebec must be pretty liberal in their views when they appoint as harbour master a man who had been willing to be a Conservative candidate in the constituency.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is not a commissioner.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): No, but he acts under these gentlemen who have been appointed by the present minister.

Mr. JACOBS: Probably he was appointed because they wanted the hon. member to have no opposition the next time.

Mr. CHURCH: Any questions asked from this side of the House are not by way of objection to items to provide for the development of our national ports. We are simply looking for information—because every member of the House was not invited to go to Quebec on that trip the other day. I myself was not invited. This resolution was placed on the Order Paper on the 24th of March. It was called almost every day, but was not gone on with until some members of the House had been invited to go and inspect these improvements. I am glad they did go there, because seeing is believing, and that applies to harbour works as well as to anything else. If you want to understand a harbour development, you have to see it. I do not blame the minister, as one of the representatives of the Quebec district, for his interest in Quebec harbour. He said that some were hungry who were not thirsty. I may say in answer that the minister is both hungry and thirsty to get this matter through in the form of a resolution rather than to take a chance with an item in the main estimates. The resolution is dated March 24, but it was not gone on with until the Progressives were invited to Quebec last Saturday. As I was not one of those invited, I may say to the minister that I do not know what it is to be either hungry or thirsty.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that there has been altogether too much politics in connection with the Quebec harbour since Confederation. I have a table here which was prepared the other day in answer to a question, giving certain figures and total expenditures with respect to the various ports in Canada. As I say, there has been too much politics and too little business in connection with the development of our national harbours, and the mixing up of politics with the matter, and the absence of business methods, has cost the country millions of dollars. It is true that terminal facilities are necessary at ports like Quebec and Montreal to take care of the increased business, but how is it that some of these ports are dealt with by resolution, while the others are left to shift for themselves in the main estimates?

Here is the port of Victoria, B.C., badly in need of a dry dock and terminals; what is going to be done there? What about Halifax, St. John, Toronto, Hamilton and other places which need adequate terminal facilities also and cannot get them? What I urge is that there be equality of treatment. I do not blame the minister for what has happened in the past; he has been in office only a few months. But I do not see any reason why there should be a change of officials and commissioners at the port of Quebec or the port of Montreal. If you want good government of a port and value for your money you must have continuity of officials, engineers, management, commissioners, and financing. Things must be done in a businesslike way. As it is now, the officials change with the Government, instead of the ports being administered by a permanent commission along business lines. A permanent commission would be in a far better position to decide as to how much dredging was to be done this year, how many immigration sheds and elevators, etc., should be provided, what would likely be the revenue from the port, and what increased business they could get.

Mr. MARTELL: Were not the harbour commissioners of Montreal and Quebec changed after 1911? Every Liberal that cropped up then was discharged.

Mr. CHURCH: I am not interested in the past or in politics in the way the hon. member is. He has politics for his breakfast, dinner and tea. I am not interested at all in that phase of the problem. Never mind what has happened in the past. Let us concern ourselves with the future. Let us get value for this money that the minister proposes to spend.

What does the minister mean by equipment of the port? I see by this statement and comparison of expenditures in harbours that only very small amounts were spent on Quebec harbour in the years when immigration was the greatest. In 1895-96 only $8,000 was spent, and there was a large immigration in that year. The next two years $6,000 was spent. In 1910-11 the amount was much greater, $392,000; in 1911-12, $529,000, and in 1914 $497,000. Of the entire expenditure of $11,000,000 on the Quebec harbour, $5,500,000 was spent between 1914 and 1918 while the war was on. During the war the port was able to take care of all the business, of all immigration navigation, including inward and outward bound traffic at no very great expense.

I should like to see equality of treatment as between harbours and ports of this country. If the minister is prepared to go and do likewise for other ports and harbours that are badly in need of equipment and facilities, all very well and good. There are many places that want terminal facilities, but they have to pay for them. It does not do them very much good if they are hungry and thirsty in a terminal facilities sense, as they must provide for their terminal facilities themselves. It is the same with expenditures for post office facilities. I have no objection to the minister equipping Quebec harbour to make it fit for the business that will be done to-morrow, not only in an immigration sense, but a transportation sense, so that he will be able to take care of the great increase in navigation and general trade which will develop at the port in the near future. If the Government would extend the same treatment to other ports in the country and give them equality of treatment, I think such action would commend itself to the wisdom and judgment of the country generally.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I say again to my hon. friend from Toronto that the only reason why this is being done by way of legislation is because it is the law. It would be much easier to have an appropriation in the Estimates, as is done for Toronto, than to bring down legislation which is closely scrutinized by the House. But the law requires this procedure, and that is the only reason why we are proceeding in this way.

Most of the discussion that has taken place has arisen through a misapprehension. I was very glad indeed to hear many hon. gentlemen speak of the magnificent harbour of Quebec and say that it possessed all the facilities that are required. For this to be said in the House of Commons of Canada is a good advertisement of the port, and I am glad for that reason. I must once again try to impress upon the members of the committee that these advances are not for the purpose of adding to the facilities which now exist at the port. They are not, as my hon. friend who spoke on the other side some time ago suggested, for the purpose of improving the harbour, but they are for the purpose of maintaining the present facilities. This money is required to keep in good order the present equipment. Perhaps I had better read some of the items on which it is proposed to expend the money which is the subject of the present resolution.

The first item is to cover the cost of operating the commissioners' bucket ladder dredge, for three seasons. The dredging to be done during the above period, will consist of widening out the entrance of the river St. Charles Basin, widening out the basin to uniform lines and grades, and removing materials that accumulate at the various berths, so as to maintain the standard depth of 35 feet at low tide.

An item of $25,000 is required to cover the cost of alterations and mechanical improvements for Grain Elevator No. 2, in order to render the operations more efficient. Last year when the grain was sent to Quebec it all came at the same time, and the men had to work day and night. It was realized that some alterations were necessary to facilitate the work and make the operations more efficient.

Then there is an item of $18,000 for a new floor at shed No. 26, as the present old floor from long use has become so worn as to render the work of trucking goods a difficult and costly operation.

An item of $20,598 is required to cover the cost of laying down a 2½ inch tongued and grooved flooring in shed 19, and surfacing the quay front and open wharf at east end of shed with concrete. This work is required as the present shed and wharf planking is worn out and requires to be renewed.

For breakwater facing $53,470 is required. This is to cover the cost of rebuilding the river face of the old breakwater, for a length of 880 feet. This work is rendered necessary owing to the fact that the wharf timbers from low water mark up to coping level have become decayed, and are no longer capable of retaining the filling materials in wharf.

Then $20,000 is required to cover the cost of certain alterations and additions to the foundations of shed 29 rendered necessary by the uneven settlement, due to the varying depths of the sand filling on which the shed has been erected.

An item of $30,000 is required to continue the work of reinstalling the long wharf at Indian Cove damaged by floods, and which work has already been approved to the extent of $53,900.

Six new floating fenders, amounting to $4,800, are required for the protection of vessels moored at pier No. 1.

Does my hon. friend want all the items?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would be just as well.

Mr. LAPOINTE: An item of $6,000 is required for painting the exposed iron works out of the dock front grain galleries which have not been painted since erection, and are now depreciating for want of painting.

An item of $5,000 is required to cover the cost of installing the machinery, electrical wiring, etc., in the travelling grain loader, structural steel work, which was completed last year and is now ready to receive machinery.

An item of $2,520 is required to cover the cost of laying down concrete paving, to replace the present decayed planking over the space between the landing sheds 18 and 26 along the dock front.

An item of $15,000 is required to cover the cost of laying down additional railway lines to serve the space at the western end of the embankment.

An item of $113,191 is required to cover the cost of constructing a fixed fender for a length of 300 feet along the river face of pier No. 1 at shed No. 26 berth. This fender will take the place of the present floating fenders at this part of the frontage and will keep vessels at this berth clear of the wharf, as do the present floating fenders, except in case of severe storms of easterly wind, when they may become misplaced or be carried away, thus allowing the vessel to come in contact with the wharf and be liable to injury. It is to avoid this contingency and to make this berth as secure as possible under all conditions, that it is considered advisable to replace the floating fenders by a fixed one for a length sufficient for one vessel's berth. Then:

Oil tank, $42,275.

The commissioners have entered into an agreement with a company for the erection of oil tank for the supply of fuel oil to vessels berth in Louise docks. This amount is to cover the cost of laying down the pipes, installing the valves and other appliances required to complete the installation.

The commissioners have already entered into a contract with that company, and the amount which they will get from that company will be more than sufficient to pay the interest and the expenditure on that account.

Coal tower foundation, $17,572.

This is to cover the cost of replacing foundations for coal towers on the area leased of the Canadian Import Co. on the St. Charles frontage, and there is a continuation of a contract by which the commissioners lay down similar foundations in the wet dock for the same purpose.

Piers at entrance of St. Charles river, $125,000.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

This item is to cover the cost of constructing guide piers at the entrance to the river St. Charles quay frontage in order to protect vessels from the bank on the northern side of the entrance works and to render the navigation into this part of the docks easy and secure.

Landing stage and overhead passage at sheds Nos. 25 and 26, $30,000.

I think my hon. friend will see that this expenditure is not to provide new facilities in the harbour, but to keep the harbour in good order and maintain works that are already in existence.

Mr. LADNER: I have a question to ask. I happen to be one of those fortunate people who received the hospitality of the city and Harbour Commissioners of Quebec. My only disappointment is that before this question of harbour improvements came up we in Vancouver did not have our friends from the East visit us because then there would have been two resolutions introduced instead of one. Now my question is this: I understand that considerable negotiations have taken place and many representations have been placed before the Government in respect to the harbour of Vancouver. I happen to be one of the members for that constituency and I can say there is a real need for dock accommodation, a great business need, which exists at the present time because the larger boats are compelled to go to Seattle to secure that accommodation. Is the Government willing to complete the dry dock which has been undertaken at Vancouver?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend will understand that I have no authority to speak on that subject. Perhaps the Minister of Public Works would know more about it than I do. All that I can tell my hon. friend is that works are going on in Vancouver harbour at the present time.

Mr. LADNER: I refer to the dry dock.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I refer to the works under the control of the Harbour Commission and undertaken on an advance made by this Parliament which has not yet been all expended. There still remains over two millions of that advance to be expended on the harbour of Vancouver and may I say this: Although some hon. member stated that Vancouver was paying interest on the advances made, the Government has not yet had the good fortune to receive any of that interest. I am sure, however, that Vancouver will pay its own way in the very near future on account of the very great facilities provided there.

Mr. LADNER: My question related particularly to the dry dock.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In regard to the dry dock I am not in a position to make any promise.

Mr. LADNER: For the minister's information I may say that I asked the same question of the Minister of Public Works and he had some reason which evaded the answer.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I see.

Mr. LADNER: I shall therefore await the next opportunity of trying to get an answer to my question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will endeavour to secure the information for my hon. friend.

Mr. CLARK: What work is to be done in Vancouver during the coming year with the $2,000,000 to which the minister has referred?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It will be necessary to complete the Ballantyne pier.

Mr. CLARK: Is it not the custom to consult the Harbour Commissioners for the port during the season each year regarding the work projected?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The work is entirely under the control of the Harbour Commissioners. Of course, they submit for approval by the Governor in Council the various schemes upon which they decide, but we are not directing this work—they are doing it themselves.

Mr. CLARK: Have they not submitted any proposals to the Governor in Council this year?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not for the works of the present year.

Mr. CLARK: In other words, there are no proposals at present before the Government that have not yet been dealt with?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No proposals for new work but, as I say, there is a balance of $2,000,000 to be expended there. Every advance must be approved by the Governor in Council, and any work to be done with that money must be approved by our engineers as well as by the Government.

Mr. CLARK: Have any new proposals been submitted to the minister or to the Government, with regard to the projected work on the terminal railway and connection with North Vancouver?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Some proposals to that effect were submitted years ago but none have been submitted this year.

Mr. CLARK: Have those proposals been dealt with by the Government?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. CLARK: Are they before the Government now?

Mr. LAPOINTE: They may still be in the department but they have not come under my consideration. I will be pleased to look into the matter if the hon. member desires it.

Mr. GOOD: What amount of this $1,500,000 does the minister think will be necessary this year—I mean for maintenance, not for new construction?

Mr. LAPOINTE: As I have already said, this money will not all be spent this year.

Mr. GOOD: How much of it will be expended this year?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think perhaps one-third. This legislation is to enable the Government to make advances from time to time to the Harbour Commissioners for work which they desire to have done. Such work will have to be approved by the Government but it may not be carried out for two, three, four or five years.

Mr. GOOD: Then why authorize such a large expenditure if it is not to be paid out this year?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend will understand that if we have to come every year and ask for legislation of this kind it will take up a great deal of the time of Parliament.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if the minister is really still of the opinion that this vote should be asked for? I would like to point out to him in the first instance that he is putting in some new work—not very much but still some. I would also like to point out to him that works of a commercial character have never been paid for by harbour commissions. Take for example the coal plant. The coal plant at Montreal, I am informed, was installed by the commissioners at their own cost, they making some money out of it. It is the same with the oil plant. There does not seem to me any reason why the Quebec Harbour Commission should have to make these capital investments. However, I would like to seriously ask my hon. friend: Does he think it good business for this Government to issue bonds for any such purpose as mentioned? The explanation given by my hon. friend simply adds so much more force to what has been stated before as to the position of the Quebec Harbour Commission. They are owing the country these millions of dollars interest in arrears. Of course it is an investment, as my hon. friend knows, because the money could only be advanced in that way. It is intended to be, and really is an investment. In fact, it is an investment in Montreal, and will be an investment in Vancouver. But over and above all those tremendous losses, we find now that the business of this port obtained by the board is so small that they cannot keep up their current painting. Surely, it is about time they stopped issuing bonds for any such purpose.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is the fair wage clause inserted in all contracts given by this corporation?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have already said that I shall see that the Harbour Commission inserts such a clause. I am in favour of such a clause in all contracts on subsidized work.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): When was the last appropriation made for this port?

Mr. LAPOINTE: In 1917, five years ago.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the hon. gentlemen is wrong about that. That was the date of the legislation. The hon. gentleman was not asking as to enabling legislation, but as to when the last appropriation was made.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The money has been paid from time to time since 1917. There is no more money now that can be advanced under the legislation.

Mr. CLARK: Did I understand the hon. minister to say there had been no appropriation made for the harbour from 1919 to 1921?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I did not say that. I said the last legislation granting advances to the harbour was passed in 1917.

Mr. CRERAR: No appropriations have been made since then.

Mr. CLARK: The appropriation of 1916-17 was $1,532,244.33; in 1917-18, $1,121,-413.40; in 1918-19, $875,503.72; in 1919-20, $258,276.09; in 1920-21, $181,877.89, making a total of $9,573,085.97, from 1896 to 1921, as compared with $5,151,867.65 for the port of Montreal, and $4,415,860.64 for Vancouver.

Mr. LAPOINTE: All these appropriations are part of the legislation.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 78, to provide for further advances to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

NIAGARA RIVER BRIDGE COMPANY

On the Order for the second reading of Bill No. 61, respecting Niagara River Bridge Company.—Sir Henry Drayton.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is a rather important bill and the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) is not in the House. I do not know anything about the matter and am not aware whether or not there is any objection to the bill, which has reference to an international bridge that is being constructed by a combination of two companies, one incorporated by the state of New York and the other by the province of Ontario, or possibly by the Dominion of Canada. This bill possibly might encroach on certain provincial powers, but as to that I do not know.

Mr. STEVENS: Should it not go to the Railway Committee? That is the proper forum.

Mr. GRAHAM: The principle of the bill is all right, and I am quite agreeable to its being referred to the Railway Committee, so long as it is understood that we do not acquiesce in its provisions, because as yet I do not fully understand them.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

On motion of Mr. Meighen the bill was referred to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT

On motion of Hon. Ernest Lapointe (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Gordon in the Chair:

That it is expedient to amend Section 477 of the Canada Shipping Act, chapter 113 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, by adding the provisions that ships of war and hospital ships belonging to such foreign nation or nations as may be specified by the Governor in Council; and ships registered in Canada engaged exclusively in fishing; shall be exempt from the payment of pilotage dues.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Under the Canada Shipping Act all vessels entering certain ports have to pay pilotage dues whether they employ a pilot or not. Certain exceptions are made in all other countries, of course, there are a few exceptions under our own act. We want to add the exceptions mentioned in the resolution. The first is with respect to war and hospital ships—of friendly countries, of course; that is why the matter is to be dealt with by the Governor in Council. As to fishing vessels registered in Canada, the custom has been to exempt them from pilotage dues, but the law does not permit that. This legislation is simply to enable the matter to be dealt with as it has been, but in a legal way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As I understand it, the act provides for the payment of pilotage dues by all vessels, with certain exceptions the minister has not mentioned. What are pilotage dues for? I must confess to a dismal ignorance of the subject. To whom are they payable?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The law makes it obligatory on all vessels to pay pilotage dues. They are not compelled to take a pilot if they think they can enter the port without one, but they have to pay the dues, just the same.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do they pay them to the Marine Department?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, to the pilots themselves. They are usually formed into a corporation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is, the ships are corporations of course.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No. I mean the pilots. In Quebec, for instance, they have a corporation of pilots; the same is true of Montreal. The dues are fixed by the Governor in Council. The money goes into a general pilotage fund.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If they employ no pilot, whom do they pay?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The money goes into the common fund of the pilots.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is, they pay the corporation?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are at peace with all countries now; why does the Government ask to have reserved to itself the power to select and make favourites of nations? Is not the minister afraid that might possibly lead to Order in Council government?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I hope it will never happen; on the other hand, there is no injury to anybody to leave the matter in the hands of the Governor in Council.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): In the interests of the pilots themselves it is not wise that all these restrictions should be taken away. These men devote their whole lives to the business of piloting vessels into port, and they obtain their livelihood through the collection of dues from vessels that come in. Foreign vessels should be required to pay, because the pilots have no other means of earning a living and their work must all be done in the summer when the harbours are navigable, The exemption, therefore, should not go too far.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But should Parliament not say how far it should go? As I understand the way it reads, the Governor in Council could exempt the ships of half a dozen nations and subject the vessels of all the others to the payment of the dues. Why does the Governor in Council want the power of choosing between nations? Why should it be a respecter of nations when we are on the same terms with all?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Certainly we are on the same terms with all nations, but in the event of some nations not granting a similar privilege to British vessels, it is only fair that we should not grant these privileges to theirs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That sounds reasonable. The purpose, then, is to grant them wherever corresponding privileges are granted to British vessels?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 79, to amend the Canada Shipping Act (Pilotage).

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION

On the motion of Hon. E. LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries), the House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Gordon in the chair:

Resolved, (1) That it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may, from time to time, advance and pay to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, hereinafter called "the Corporation," in addition to the moneys, if any, heretofore authorized to be advanced to the corporation by the Governor in Council by any act, and which have not at the date of the passing of any act founded upon these resolutions, been so advanced, such sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of five million dollars, as are required to enable the corporation to carry on the construction of terminal facilities in the harbour of Montreal, for which plans, specifications and estimates have been approved by the Governor in Council before the passing of the act founded upon these resolutions, and to construct such additional terminal facilities as are necessary to properly equip the said port.

(2) That no such advance shall be made in respect of the construction of terminal facilities, unless such detailed plans, specifications and estimates, for the works to be performed by the corporation and on which the money so to be advanced is to be expended, as are satisfactory to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, have been submitted to and approved by the Governor in Council before any work on the same has been commenced.

(3) That the corporation shall submit to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for approval, monthly applications for such advances, with statements showing total expenditure on different items, in detail, and upon approval, authority for the payment of the amount applied for may be granted by the Governor in Council.

(4) That the corporation shall upon any advances being made, deposit with the Minister of Finance debentures of the corporation equal in par value to the advance so made, repayable within twenty-five years from the date of issue and bearing interest payable half yearly, at the rate of five per cent per annum.

(5) That the principal and interest of any sums advanced under any act founded on these resolutions shall be payable out of the revenue of the Corporation mentioned in section 8, of chapter 10, of the Statutes of 1896 (First Session), and shall be a charge thereon as if the sums so advanced had been borrowed by the corporation under said chapter 10.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It will perhaps interest the committee to know what is the financial position of the harbour of Montreal. There has been expended by the Government for the harbour at Montreal, through the Public Works Department, $1,055,-725.08, and by the Harbour Commission $33,121,777.45, or a little over $34,000,000 altogether. The revenues of the port last year amounted to $2,891,274.42, or nearly $3,000,000, and the expenditure, including the interest paid on advances made by the Government, amounted to $2,724,-100.02. So as may be seen, the port of Montreal is a paying proposition. As my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said this afternoon, it is a good investment to make these advances to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal. The commission needs the further amount stated in the resolution for completion of their works, and I am informed that for every addition which is going to be made to the port facilities, arrangements or contracts have already been entered into assuring a fair revenue to the commission.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I agree with the minister that this is a proposition entirely different from the proposal this afternoon, when this committee was asked to grant $1,500,000 to the Harbour Commissioners of the city of Quebec. I agree that the Montreal Harbour Commissioners have performed a very useful work for the Dominion of Canada. They have managed their business as a business should be managed, and have been able at all times, I believe, to meet their obligations. It has been a great boon to the whole Dominion of Canada to have such a harbour as we have in the city of Montreal. I believe, of course, that Montreal has been specially favoured by Providence in as much as it is an ocean port about 170 miles farther inland than the port of Quebec, and has great physical advantages. I think Montreal will in all probability be able to maintain its supremacy as a shipping port unless it be that in the future the tonnage of our ocean-going ships so greatly increases that they will not be able to go up as far as Montreal by reason of the levels of the St. Lawrence. At the present time, undoubtedly, Montreal is the great summer port of Canada. It has been well managed in the past, and I assume it will be well managed in the future. The proposal here is in the nature of a loan which will be returned to this Government. We will accept the bonds of the Harbour Commissioners, and those bonds bear interest sufficient to pay the cost to this country of carrying the loan, but in the case of the Quebec Harbour Commission which we discussed this afternoon, the proposal was not in the nature of a loan at all, but a straight grant of money without the chance of obtaining any interest or even the principal for many, many years to come. Personally, I would approve this resolution without further discussion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The figures given by the minister disclose an investment that the country has in the port of Montreal of about $34,000,000. That is the aggregate of the various years right up from Confederation until now. The minister's figures also disclose a revenue last year that, if I figured it correctly in my mind as he read, amounted to about nine per cent. The commission pays, as I understand it, five per cent on its bonds. I do not think the whole investment is covered by bonds. Consequently, there will be more than four per cent of a surplus, or a surplus somewhere in the neighbourhood of $1,500,000. That surplus, of course, is not paid to the Dominion Treasury. It is held by the Harbour Commissioners. Is that surplus applied under the supervision of the Government towards improvements, towards extensions, towards facilities? If so, is this $5,000,000 in addition to the application of accrued surpluses by the commissioners, and what is the extent of the accrued surpluses that have been invested and are being invested this year?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Improvements made that have been paid from revenue income amount to $2,266,777.45.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Improvements from surplus income last year?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Last year?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, the figure I gave covers a number of years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The surplus received last year, according to the minister's figures was about $1,500,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understood the minister to read two million odd as the disbursements and $3,800,000 as the revenue.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No. The revenue last year was $2,891,274.42, and the expenditure $2,724,100.02.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not catch the figures the first time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Let me state that last year the total quantity of grain shipped through the port of Montreal amounted to 135,000,000 bushels, and of that quantity 55,000,000 bushels was United States grain shipped to Montreal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is, 135,000,000 bushels through the port of Montreal as against 5,000,000 through the port of Quebec?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 80 to grant further advances to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE AND FISHERIES

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Maintenance and repairs to Dominion Steamers and Icebreakers, $1,600,000.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. STEVENS: We are rather taken by surprise. We understood the Minister of Public Works was going on with his estimates to-night and we were all loaded for him; we did not expect that the estimates of the Department of Marine would be taken up. I may say that we are also deeply interested in the date when the Minister of Militia is going to try his hand again after his somewhat harsh experience the other night. He knows, of course, that he has a lot of good friends on this side and we are very anxious to once again demonstrate that friendship to him. In reference to the present item, if I am correct it is the intention of the Government to repurchase an icebreaker that was sold during the war, or perhaps they have already done so. Is that repurchase included in this item?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, it is not.

Mr. STEVENS: Then would the minister give us the details of what is included in this $1,600,000?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are twenty-seven ships whose operating expenses and repairs are chargeable to this particular appropriation. I may explain that the decrease of $150,000 in the vote is due to the reduction in the cost of fuel.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In what service are the ships whose repairs are chargeable to this item?

Mr. LAPOINTE: In the lighthouse and buoy service.

Mr. STEVENS: If I recall correctly, the Government had several lighthouse tenders chartered on the Pacific coast. Are there any chartered there now?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are not any chartered now.

Mr. MANION: Does not the contract for icebreaking at the head of the lakes come under this item?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, it does not. But there is such a contract, I am informed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have 27 lighthouse and buoy service vessels. The service has more meaning to other hon. members than it has to me but still I have some idea of its nature. And it takes $1,600,000 a year to keep these vessels in repair and maintenance?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, for their operation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the economy effected is owing to the lower price of fuel?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, and supplies generally, but it is especially owing to the reduction in the cost of fuel.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is all owing to reduced costs?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Examination of masters and mates, $20,000.

Mr. DUFF: Before this item carries I would ask the minister if this money is expended for the payment of salaries to the men who conduct navigation schools in different parts of the country—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think so.

Mr. DUFF:—and teach the sailors navigation?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, it is merely to pay the examiners of masters and mates.

Mr. DUFF: Who are they?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is a resident examiner at the following ports: North Sydney, Yarmouth, Halifax, Charlottetown, Montreal, Quebec, St. John, Collingwood, Port Arthur, Toronto, Vancouver, Victoria, Nelson, Edmonton, and Selkirk.

Mr. DUFF: I think I am right in the belief that Captain O'Hara, who is in charge of the school at Halifax, would come under this vote.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. DUFF: Captain O'Hara is an experienced ship master of a great many years standing. At the present time he is in charge of the service at Halifax and he is being paid by the federal authorities the munificent sum of $110 a month. That just shows what little knowledge the Griffenhagens, the Arthur Youngs, and the rest of the bunch who made up the classification in the Civil Service a few years ago knew of their business. Captain O'Hara is worth at least $200 a month. His services to the shipping industry of Canada are something which we in the province of New Brunswick are very proud of, and we feel that he is doing a great work. Captain O'Hara left his ship some years ago to take up these duties with the promise that he would get a fair remuneration. Instead of that all he gets, under the classification referred to, is $110 a month. If the minister cannot get any satisfaction from the Civil Service Commission, who do not know any more than Griffenhagen, he should take some steps to see that Captain O'Hara is paid properly for the services he performs for the country, and I would like some assurance from the minister that this man, who lives in Halifax, and has to look after his family and pay rent—and rent is very high in that city—is properly paid for his services. It is impossible for him to live on $110 a month. It is unfair that he should not be paid a better salary. He is a good man, and should be properly paid for the services he rendered his country.

Mr. MARTELL: I want to reiterate what the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) has said in regard to Captain O'Hara. He happens to be a personal friend of mine, though a political friend of the hon. gentleman opposite, and it is seldom that hon. gentlemen will find me advocating the claims of political opponents. He is a very excellent man. Large amounts of money are spent for the purpose of instructing people in other arts, and it is only fair that a reasonable amount of money should be expended in teaching the young Nova Scotians the art of navigation. The constituency that I have the honour to represent, in the old days of shipbuilding in the province of Nova Scotia, built the largest sailing ship ever produced in the country. I need not mention the name, and we have a great number of sea captains in my constituency whom I happen to know. Captain O'Hara is probably about my own age, and when he was a boy he began as a sailor before the mast, went through the various stages a sailor is required to go through and holds a master mariner's certificate. I believe if you were to ransack the whole Dominion of Canada you could not find a man more competent to discharge the duties of an instructor in navigation and seamanship than Captain O'Hara, and I would beseech for him a fair consideration at the hands of the minister. I suggest that in arriving at a decision the minister should take the advice of his departmental officers, and not the advice of Griffenhagen and Young.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This matter is engaging the attention of the department, having been placed before the department a few days ago. I shall certainly not forget the remarks of my hon. friend in regard to Captain O'Hara.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister purposes to have his department engaged in the individual cases of men who feel that they were not treated properly by the Civil Service Commission, there will be ample for him to do, without any of the real work of his department being done at all.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I admit that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So the minister's purpose is to deal with the unreal and not with the real. That is modern Liberalism, as I understand it. What I desire to call attention to is this: I am surprised that the minister did not state that Griffenhagen and Young and Company are not responsible for the classification. The responsibility for the classification rests with the Civil Service Commission. That commission had a Board of Hearing, before which all the officers could appear and make any case they cared to make, as respects any of their officials or clerks. That is where the classification question was decided. Griffenhagen arranged the mechanism under which the various officers would come, and what they did in that regard went again to the Civil Service Commission. We have had evidence of this already this session. One can never expect that the classification of anyone, when it comes to be arranged by the experts of the organization, will meet with the approval of all. Nevertheless, from the mouths of the Postmaster General, and as well from two or three other ministers, has come the frank confession that very large sums of money now left out of these estimates are left out just because of the work that Griffenhagen and Arthur Young performed.

Mr. KNOX: Did I understand the minister to say that we have an examiner at the port of Nelson?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There was one, but I see that the position is vacant.

Mr. KNOX: I hope the time will soon come when we will have an opportunity of making use of him in the district in Nelson. That is on Hudson bay.

Mr. TOLMIE: How often are these examinations held, and at what points in British Columbia?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think my hon. friend made a mistake. I was referring to Nelson, B.C.

Mr. KNOX: I did not understand that Nelson, B.C., was a seaport.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a lake port. I remember having left Nelson, B.C., two years ago in a boat, after having held a fine meeting the night before. In British Columbia there are examiners at Vancouver, Victoria and Nelson.

Mr. TOLMIE: How often are these examinations held?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Wherever there is a sufficient number of aspirants.

Item agreed to.

Investigation into wrecks, $12,300.

Mr. MARTELL: I presume that is the branch of the service presided over by Captain Demers?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. MARTELL: I understand Captain Demers, as the official investigator, conducts his court, and after he gives his decision there is no appellate court to which an appeal can be taken. He is known as the nautical assessor. What is the salary of Captain Demers?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was voted under the civil government estimates. I have not the documents before me, and I cannot say offhand.

Mr. MARTELL: I understand the salary is in the vicinty of $4,000. I believe that Captain Demers presides over more courts than any judge in the Dominion of Canada. I do not believe there is a judge, either of a county court, of a court of King's Bench, or of an appellate court in the Dominion of Canada, who has half as much work to do as the official wreck commissioner in his investigations into marine casualties. Millions of money are involved in his inquiries, and there is no appeal from his decision. I believe it would be in the best interests of the service if Captain Demers were given a salary commensurate with his services and with the duties and responsibilities of his office. Will the minister take that into consideration? A wage should be given to him in accordance with his ability and responsibility.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will take that into consideration when decreases are suggested, because we have been asked to decrease salaries instead of increasing them.

Mr. MARTELL: Decreases are very good, but where you have a good official and a person exercising great responsibility and performing good service for his country, we do not want to give him a starvation wage.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. LEWIS: Does he come under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. LEWIS: One of the unfortunate lambs my hon. friend is pleading for?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Navigation schools, $8,000.

Mr. MARTELL: Where are these schools conducted?

Mr. LAPOINTE: At Halifax there are two instructors. Captain O'Hara gives his whole time and receives a monthly salary of $110 besides the regular bonus. Captain E. N. Young, teacher in mathematics, at $100, also devotes his whole time to the work of the school. There is a school at Yarmouth with two instructors, Captain Hilton, with a salary of $66.66, and Dr. Crowell, who receives $50 a month, working part time. North Sydney there is one instructor, Captain Sutherland, who works about four months. He receives $90 a month. At St. John the instructor, Captain Pollock, gives his whole time and receives $125 a month. There is one instructor at Quebec, Captain Alphonse Halle. He also gets $90 a month, working four months. At Kingston the navigation school in Queen's University gets a grant of $500. At Collingwood Captain Coles is paid as examiner, and at Vancouver Captain Charles Eddie, who also lectures on navigation, is paid in the capacity of examiner.

Mr. STEVENS: Is Captain Eddie paid for lecturing on navigation?

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is paid as examiner.

Mr. STEVENS: Captain Eddie is examiner of masters and mates, and I believe that he has performed the duties in this respect very satisfactorily for many years. But in addition to that, altogether in his own time, he delivers lectures to seamen on navigation, and in times past he was paid specially for this. Now I understand that under some new ruling these lectures are to be regarded as part of his services as examiner of masters and mates, and that strikes me as hardly reasonable, because I do not think that the amount paid him as examiner is in any sense excessive. I am not arguing for an increase, but I object to the cutting of that additional amount of $250 per year which in the past was paid him for the lectures he delivered.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He received two salaries formerly, one as examiner and the other as lecturer. These salaries have now been consolidated, and he is receiving just as much as he did before.

Mr. STEVENS: If that is the case my complaint is of course unfounded, but I understood that one salary had been cut off. So long as what the minister says is correct, there is no ground for complaint.

Item agreed to.

Registration of shipping, $3,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much was spent under this item last year?

Mr. LAPOINTE: $2,719.50.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Less than half the vote.

Mr. LAPOINTE: About half the vote. We have reduced the vote this year by $1,000.

Item agreed to.

Removal of obstructions in navigable waters, $5,000.

Mr. MARTELL: Some time ago I called the attention of the department to the fact that there was a derelict off Horton Bluff in the marine channel leading to Windsor, Hants county, Nova Scotia. This was a schooner belonging to the Comeau Shipbuilding Company of Weymouth, Nova Scotia. It sank and now forms a serious menace to navigation, besides interfering with the fishermen who engage in drift net fishing. Last fall the department put a buoy over the obstruction to warn off mariners, and I understood this spring that instructions were given to have the derelict blow up so that navigation might no longer be impeded.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The department has noted the matter and something will be done before the opening of navigation.

Mr. MARTELL: While there is really no law in regard to fishing to compel the removal of this derelict, it is competent to have it removed under the Navigable Waters Act. This obstruction is a serious menace to fishermen, and the Act should be invoked and the derelict removed, the cost being charged to the owners of the vessel. If this were done two birds would be killed with the one stone, so to speak; navigation would be safe and at the same time the fishermen's gear would be freed from the present liability to destruction. I would urge the minister to have some steps taken in the matter at the earliest possible date.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much was spent under this item last year?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The amount was $15,252.77. Of course, it is almost impossible to foresee the expenditure for the year to come; it is always the result of some accident.

Mr. STEVENS: This is not the whole amount set aside for the removal of obstructions in navigable waters.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is.

Mr. STEVENS: What about the snag boat Sampson on the Fraser river? It is not maintained under this item.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It comes under the Department of Public Works.

Mr. STEVENS: Why should two departments look after the same work?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister does not explain why he puts only $5,000 in the estimate this year. If $15,000 was required last year, and the minister cannot control the expenditure for the coming year, since it depends on the number of accidents, what is the justification for the estimate of $5,000?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The usual amount asked for is $5,000. Many years we do not spend more than that. Of course, I have no objection to increasing it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was the special cause last year for the expenditure of $15,000? What were the accidents to which that expenditure was due?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was due to a serious obstruction at the mouth of the Welland canal at Port Dalhousie.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Due to an explosion?

Mr. LAPOINTE: A steamer was wrecked at that place last year.

Item agreed to.

To continue subsidies for wrecking plants—Quebec and British Columbia, $35,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was spent to the end of last year?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The whole amount. The work is under contract.

Item agreed to.

Unforeseen expenses, $5,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Several of our members from the maritime provinces who are absent to-night desire to discuss this item, and if the minister will let it stand over I shall be obliged.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have no objection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Members from the maritime provinces would like to discuss these estimates generally, and this item would afford them an opportunity.

Item stands.

Life Saving Service, including rewards for saving life, $90,000.

Mr. HUGHES: Is there a life-saving station at Souris, P.E.I.; and, if so, can the minister give us the names of the officers and crew?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is a life-saving station at Souris. I do not think I have the names of the officers and men employed there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister tell us now what was the total expenditure last year on ocean and river service of the $1,953,600 voted?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The expenditure to May 5th, 1922, was $1,491,211.35.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister means the expenditure chargeable against last year's vote only?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume the principal item not all expended would be the first?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I see I have given to my right hon. friend figures relating only to maintenance and repairs to government steamers, the first item. I do not think I have at hand the total of the other appropriations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There would not be a very large amount saved out of the other appropriations, I should think.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, that is the main amount.

Mr. MEIGHEN: With the diminished cost of coal, which would account for $150,000, one would think the minister would be able to get along on the first item—of course I know it is passed—with a million and a quarter instead of $1,600,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We have a decrease on the first amount of $150,000. I think that is a fair reduction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is only the difference in the cost of coal. But last year there was spent $300,000 less than the vote, so that would allow $400,000 as a fair diminution for this year.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend will realize that when we are operating twenty-seven vessels in a season we cannot foresee what may happen; there may be accidents.

Item agreed to.

River St. Lawrence Ship Channel—maintenance and operating dredging fleet, $613,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister give us particulars of that item?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is for maintenance and operating the dredging fleet engaged on the river St. Lawrence ship channel. The dredging fleet is employed in improving the ship channel between Montreal and Quebec, and Quebec and Father Point. The vote is the same as for last year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How much was spent last year?

Mr. LAPOINTE: A total of $588,055.88. There are four elevator dredges with tugs, one sea-going elevator dredge, two self-propelling barges, one self-propelling coal barge, two inspection and sweeping steamers, two stone elevators and one rock breaker; the greater part of the vote about $475,000, is allotted to them. There is also $135,000 for outfitting, docking and providing extra parts for the dredging fleet, including care of the fleet when not in operation, which includes fire boats.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the maintenance of the Sorel shipyard, comprising offices, shops and labourers, $90,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know the maritime province members desire to discuss this item, and I should like the minister to leave it in the same category as No. 231 previously reserved, especially as I observe there is an increase in the amount asked for.

Mr. LAPOINTE: All right.

Item stands.

Amount required for the completion of one self-propelling, sea-going elevator dredge for service in North Channel below Quebec, $90,055.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is this a new ship?

Mr. LAPOINTE: This ship has been under contract with the Vickers Company since 1914. The contract price was $833,-

700. The construction was suspended during the war but has since been resumed and the ship is now complete. This is to pay the final amount due to the contractors.

Mr. STEVENS: When was the vessel delivered?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Last fall.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister should give a statement of the amounts paid on the contract, when paid, and just how this item is made up. I notice there was no vote last year, nor has there been any for a number of years with respect to this contract.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Payments have been made to the extent of $743,645. The balance is being asked by this vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are no extras at all?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And no diminutions—that is to say, no set-offs?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am informed that the contractors are claiming extras, but we have not finally decided that such extras should be allowed and we are simply asking for the balance of the amount of the contract.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the department admit that the vessel is in accordance with contract, in every way perfectly satisfactory?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Absolutely, yes.

Item agreed to.

Amount required for the construction of one self-propelling hopper barge, $285,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Is this a new vessel?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is new to the extent that its construction has not yet been started. It is necessary in connection with the operation of the elevator dredge for which an amount has just been voted.

Mr. STEVENS: Has any contract been let?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not yet.

Mr. STEVENS: Have tenders been called for?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not yet.

Mr. STEVENS: Will tenders be called for?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely.

Mr. STEVENS: Will tenders be called for from the whole of Canada?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely.

Mr. KNOX: Is the work contemplated by this and the preceding item to be carried out on the St. Lawrence channel only?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is primarily for that purpose, but the dredge may be used elsewhere if it is needed.

Mr. KNOX: Is this work in the nature of permanent improvement?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. There is a very dangerous spot in the St. Lawrence river below Quebec called de Beaujeu Bank. It is proposed to deepen the channel on the northern side of the river so as to avoid de Beaujeu Bank. Of course, the work is asked for by the navigation companies and the public generally. It will have, among other effects, the result of reducing considerably the rate of maritime insurance and increasing the safety of navigation.

Item agreed to.

Lighthouse and coast service—agencies, rents and contingencies, $210,000.

Mr. LEGER: I would like on this item to put a few questions to the hon. minister with reference to the marine agencies in our part of the country. In the winter of 1918 the marine agencies in the maritime provinces, which since Confederation had been run on provincial lines, were changed, apparently by the Marine Department's officials, in a very arbitrary manner. The marine agency at St. John, which properly had control of all the aids to navigation in the province, had the whole of Baie des Chaleurs, Gulf of St. Lawrence and Northumberland Strait taken away from its jurisdiction; the latter district was transferred to the Prince Edward Island agency at Charlottetown and the Baie des Chaleurs agency was transferred to the Quebec district. I believe the change should not have been made; I would like to see each province have its own agencies. For instance, if anything happens in Kent county, or on the north shore district of New Brunswick, we have to get the agent from Charlottetown to come to that district. Now, some of the matters requiring attention are of a very trivial nature and a method of that kind is certainly not economical. I wish to read the following item bearing upon this matter which I took from a New Brunswick paper the other day:

W. H. Prowse, inspector of lighthouses, Charlottetown, crossed this week by the car ferry steamer en route to Buctouche and Richibucto.

That is in my county.

At the former place he held an examination of applicants for the position of lightkeeper, the former keeper having died some time ago.

The holding of an examination for the position of lightkeeper is not a very difficult thing to do; it should not be necessary to have an inspector of lighthouses make a trip of that kind to carry out so trifling a duty. Besides, the cost is considerable. The clipping goes on:

At Richibucto he will look into the matter of changing the Richibucto bar light, which change is necessary on account of the shifting of the channel.

This also, I am informed, is a trifling bit of work which almost any man around the district could do with satisfaction to the public. To my mind, the present system is an extravagance, and I would therefore ask the minister to look into this question with a view to providing each province with its own marine agency. It would give us a much better service. I hope the minister will bring back the old system that we had from Confederation down to a few years ago.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I understand that my hon. friend is advocating the autonomy of New Brunswick and her exemption from any control by Prince Edward Island. I sympathize with his position, but on the other hand the department came to its conclusion to change the system a few years ago on account of geographical rather than provincial considerations. However, I shall be pleased to look into the matter, and my hon. friend may rest assured that his representations will be carefully considered.

Mr. MICHAUD: I endorse what my hon. friend from Kent county has said in connection with this matter, and I hope the minister will look at the question not only from the point of view of geographical considerations, but will consider the needs of the province itself. We seem to have been neglected in the past few years so far as dredging and other maritime works are concerned, and I think it is high time that we should address ourselves to somebody who would take an interest in these matters.

Mr. MARTELL: I am sorry I cannot agree with the hon. member for Madawaska and the hon. member for Kent. My constituency, I believe, happens to be under the control of the agency in St. John, N.B. I think the department did the right thing when they placed these agencies where the agents could be got at most easily and from where the service could be best carried on. The counties all along the Bay of Fundy coast can be most economically and efficiently managed from the agency at St. John, and the western counties can be reached from Halifax. With all deference to my hon. friends, I submit that it is very much more easy for the agent at Charlottetown to have jurisdiction over the northern portions of New Brunswick than to put that territory under the jurisdiction of the agent at St. John, which would necessitate the inspection and supply boats all taking a roundabout way to get to the counties of my hon. friends. I think this change is one thing the department should be commended for. However, that was not my purpose in rising. I want to ask the minister how many subagencies there are in the province of Nova Scotia, and where they are located. I understand there is one at Sydney, and one at Pictou. Who is the agent at Sydney, and in what building is his office located?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The agent at Sydney is Mr. V. Mullins. His salary last year was $2,040. This year he gets an increase of $120, making his salary $2,160. The agent at Pictou is Mr. J. R. Davis. He is getting only $400.

Mr. MARTELL: Where is the office in Sydney, and what rent is paid for it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The office at Sydney is provided by the Public Works Department. I am not aware just where it is.

Mr. MARTELL: I think it is in the Sydney Post building.

Mr. STEVENS: What amount was spent last year out of this $216,500?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The amount spent last year was $190,927.45.

Mr. BANCROFT: Is there any provision made for pensions for lighthouse keepers when they become too old to remain in the service? I understand their salaries are very small, not sufficient to allow them to put anything by for their old age.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Calder Act applies to the lighthouse keepers. Under that act the pension is based on the number of years' service and the average yearly salary.

Item agreed to.

Salaries and allowances to lightkeepers, $650,000.

Mr. TOLMIE: There is a lighthouse at the entrance to Victoria harbour, and another at the entrance to Esquimalt harbour. What are the salaries of these lighthouse keepers?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will look that up.

Mr. JELLIFF: The lighthouses and lighthouse keepers is something I have always been interested in ever since I was a boy and learned to sing that old song, "Let the lower lights be burning, send a gleam across the waves." I have often thought of those poor lighthouse keepers away out on some lonely rock or point at the edge of the ocean, and of their isolated, almost heartbreaking existence. Could the minister tell us how many lighthouses we have in Canada, how many lighthouse keepers, and what amount they are paid yearly for the splendid service they are rendering in guiding vessels to safety from the perils and storms of the ocean?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend will understand it is rather difficult for me to give all the details to-night, because there are 3,000 lightkeepers in Canada. Their salaries vary from $50 to $1,500 a year. Some of them are granted allowances apart from their salary.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Is there any provision made for superannuation in old age?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Under what act?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Under the Calder Act.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): May I ask the minister whence the title came, "the Calder Act"?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think it is the name of a distinguished gentleman who was a member of a former administration in this country.

Mr. STEVENS: What was spent under this item last year? While on my feet I would like to make this observation in connection with the light service: Speaking from a considerable knowledge of the Pacific coast—I do not know so much of the Atlantic coast—the light service is of a very high order. It has been maintained at a high standard of efficiency, and I think compares very favourably with a similar service by any other nation in the world. I am not at all inclined to criticize justifiable expenditure for this purpose. Will the minister give us the amount expended last year?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The amount expended last year was $649,296.12. That is a few hundred dollars less than the amount voted.

Mr. STEVENS: That was a pretty clever and capable estimate on the part of the previous government was it not?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I must admit it, due to the good officers of the department.

Mr. SIMPSON: May I ask if the minister has received a report as yet from the district superintendent of my county—Algoma—with reference to the recent lamentable accident on lake Superior, when the government lighthouse boat Lambton is reported to have been lost with all on board, including some lighthouse keepers who were being taken up to their stations for the season's operations?

Mr. LAPOINTE: All the facts are being published in the press. We have no report except the one that came to the department that there is no trace of the vessel. It certainly is a case of complete loss of life and of property.

Mr. SIMPSON: Is it the intention of the department to have an investigation made?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was asking that question in the department but there does not appear to be much to investigate.

Mr. SIMPSON: May I ask whether it is correct that this vessel left the dock at which she was moored much earlier than customary; also whether it would not have been more prudent for such a small vessel to turn back and take shelter in port when much larger vessels were doing that?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The instructions to the commanding officer of the ship were to leave as soon as the conditions of navigation would permit him to do so. Great latitude is left to the captains of these vessels. It is necessary, of course, that the lighthouses shall be operated as early as possible in the season, but the date of the departure of these vessels is left altogether to the discretion of their commanding officers.

Mr. TOLMIE: Has my hon. friend any information yet in regard to the salaries of the lighthouse keepers?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not yet, but many persons are working at the task of getting that information for my hon. friend.

Item agreed to.

Maintenance and repairs to lighthouses, $850,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How much was spent last year on the service may I ask?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The expenditure last year was $800,411.62.

Mr. GUTHRIE: You propose an increase of $50,000?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. The money required under this appropriation is for the purpose of defraying the cost of maintenance of aids to navigation including the cost of supplies, fuel, illuminants, cleaning materials, delivering supplies, including freight and cartage, etc., also the cost of repairs to such aids to navigation including material and labour. I could give a statement in tabular form covering the last ten years, which would indicate, year by year, the growth of the service in principal aids to navigation and the cost of mainteance.

Item agreed to.

Construction of lights and aids to navigation, including regulation of traffic in the Detroit river and such other places as may be found necessary, $400,000.

Mr. LEWIS: Does this relate to the construction of lighthouses, and other aids to navigation? I notice the previous item has reference to lights, gas and signal buoys, etc.?

Mr. LAPOINTE: From this vote is provided all new aids to navigation, such as lighthouses, buoys, beacons, fog alarms and submarine signals, including apparatus and machinery, as well as large repairs to existing aids and the replacing of obsolete buildings and apparatus by equipment suitable for the protection of modern heavy draught vessels. It also includes the purchase of the plant necessary for the carrying on of the works as well as the purchase of lands, wharves, etc., the erection of such supplementary works as may be required, the chartering of any boats that may be found temporarily necessary to properly carry out these works, the regulation of traffic in the Detroit river and such other places as may be found necessary, and the administration and operation of the lighthouse depot at Prescott.

Mr. DUFF: Last year I called the attention of the then minister of Marine and Fisheries to the necessity of an aid to navigation off the Newfoundland coast. It was well known to this committee, of course, that Canada provides for the upkeep of certain lighthouses on the Newfoundland coast; and last year I asked that a powerful gas buoy or light ship be placed between Cape Pine and Cape Race. In this district, St. Mary's Bay, which is known as the graveyard of the Newfoundland coast, a great many steamers and sailing vessels belonging to Canadian ship owners, owing to the very strong current which runs along the south shore of Newfoundland are carried into this area and in the dead of night, or during heavy fogs, are cast ashore and wrecked with the loss not only of the ship but in a great many cases many valuable lives. That being the case it seems to me this is a very important matter and the Marine Department, in my opinion, should take steps to place there at a distance of about four or five miles off the land an aid to navigation in the shape of a gas buoy or light ship whereby vessels before they are drawn into the current will be able to hear the bell or the "droner," as it is sometimes called, before they get too close to the rocks. I repeat that this is a very important matter. Not only freighting vessels but fishing vessels pass up and down that coast, and from the conversations which I have had with the captains and crews of these ships—both steamers and sailing vessels—it is felt that the Canadian government would be doing the right thing by investigating this matter and placing some aid to navigation in this locality.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Do you want an answer?

Mr. DUFF: No.

Mr. MACLEAN (P. E. I.): I desire to bring a matter to the attention of the minister, although it is not so important as the question brought up by my hon. friend to my right (Mr. Duff). Down in our province we have a great deal of offshore fishing, and in two or three sections we have been asking that a small range light, as an aid to navigation, be furnished, to guide the fishermen coming in after night and to find the channel. Last year the matter was brought to the attention of the department and nothing was done. This year I have been endeavouring to persuade the hon. minister to give some attention to this small work. While it is not very important for our large seagoing ships, we have our humble fishermen who go to sea to earn their living, and why should we not give these men some assistance? It is only a very small item. In some of these places two or three hundred dollars would pay for a range light to assist these men, and still they are denied this privilege. I simply want to bring this matter to the attention of the minister, and I know it will receive his careful consideration. I desire to refer to the question of a buoy on the Tormentine reef, where the ferry crosses from Tormentine to Prince Edward Island. Perhaps it does not come under this item, but I may not have an opportunity to speak to it again. One of the most expensive ships owned by the Government is on that route and the Captain of that ship has been asking that a steel spar bouy that will not go under the ice be placed on the reef, and I trust that before another winter the department will give that matter consideration.

Item agreed to.

Marine Signal Service, $80,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The amount spent last year was $74,997.07.

Mr. STEVENS: The Government did so well last year under the previous estimates, will the minister explain the reason of the increase?

Mr. McCONICA: Will the minister tell us whether it is splendid guessing on the part of the man who makes the appropriation, or on the part of the man who spends it? It is susceptible to both explanations.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It must be attributable to both; both must have credit. The amount is needed for increases of salary.

Mr. MANION: I desire to ask a question which, perhaps, should come under the previous item, but it might also be dealt with under this item. I refer to some of the lights that have been petitioned for at various times on Rainy river, an international water in my constituency, running on the boundary between United States and Canada. It is a good sized river, but used a good deal by small craft, fishing boats or small pleasure boats, some freight boats and passenger boats. I have taken it up with the late government, but I have not yet taken it up with this Government.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. gentleman will fare better with this Government.

Mr. MANION: I might have better success with this Government. I think my hon. friend is probably familiar with it, and may give it kindly consideration some time when he is dealing with this question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: All the demands for aids to navigation are submitted to the lighthouse board. The Deputy Minister of Marine is the head of the board. The superintendent of lights, the chief engineer of the department, and some other officers, and the representative of shipping federation as well, are on this board. Although the minister is an expert on those things, he would like to be directed, to some extent, by that board.

Mr. MANION: I am sure the good officers of the minister would have a beneficial effect on the board.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They are at your disposal.

Item agreed to.

Administration of pilotage, $300,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What does this item mean?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is for the administration of pilotage. Under part 6 of the Canada Shipping Act, the Minister of Marine has control of 41 pilotage districts including Quebec, Montreal, St. John and Halifax, which are under the supervision of this department. We spent last year $187,720.46. The increase is due to the condition of the boat which is doing the service at Pointe au Pere. The old ship Eureka is in bad condition, and will be replaced by a tug or motor boat, which will cost a hundred thousand dollars.

10 p.m.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is that included in the $300,000?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes it is included. That is the reason of the increase.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand that the minister is the official head of the pilotage districts in Canada, and, in that capacity has to do, not only with granting licenses or certificates to the pilots, but regulating the whole business. My information is that, particularly on the river St. Lawrence, the pilots are rapidly growing wealthy. I have been informed that a pilot on the river St. Lawrence, in the course of a season of four or five months, makes as much as $6,000. At least, he receives as much as $6,000 for four or five months' work, and, during that four or five months, he does not make more than 18 or 20 trips. If my information is correct, will the minister tell us how these fees or payments to pilots are regulated? I have seen notices of it in the newspapers, and have also heard it in conversation. There seems to be some complaint that the pilots are certainly not overworked, and that they are very highly paid, particularly on the St. Lawrence river district.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I must tell my hon. friend that there are two sides to the story. Not long ago I received a delegation of pilots, who complained that they were not earning enough money. The case presented by my hon. friend is a special case. The average salary of the Montreal and Quebec pilot is under $3,000 and they have to pay their own expenses to go and take trips and come back home again. They have to pay their expenses and buy their regular tickets. The amount they earn by the end of the season is far less than the sum my hon. friend has mentioned. We must also recognize the danger with which they are faced at all times of losing their positions. They have to undergo a very severe examination of their sight every spring, and if they do not pass the examination they are dropped. They are made responsible for all accidents which may happen, and the regulations, as well as the law, are very strict; so that they are taking many chances and running many risks. On the whole, I am not prepared to say that the rates of pay to the pilots are too high.

Mr. LEWIS: The resolution which the minister introduced earlier in the day provided that war ships, hospital ships and all vessels engaged exclusively in fishing should be exempt from pilotage dues. Is this item to provide for the payment by the Government of pilots who are employed on such vessels?

Mr. LAPOINTE: When such ships employ pilots they will have to pay them the usual rates, but they are not compelled to employ pilots. That is what the resolution which has been before the House provides. Such vessels are exempt from pilotage dues; other vessels have to pay whether or not they employ pilots.

Mr. STEVENS: The matter of pilotage dues is one of the main questions affecting the trade and commerce of the country, and it is one of the important items that enter into the cost of shipping coming into our ports. The minister a moment ago spoke of the St. Lawrence charges and the earnings of the pilots there. I am not acquainted with the details so far as the St. Lawrence is concerned, but on the Pacific coast we had a similar situation a few years ago. There was a good deal of complaint from the shipping interests, who complained that the pilotage dues were too high, and it was pointed out, if I remember correctly, that the pilots were earning around $4,000 and over a year for services which did not seem commensurate with the amount they received. But in that case they worked the full year. There was no close season as there is on the St. Lawrence. Now, I do not say that pilots should not earn a substantial salary. Not at all; I do not wish to offer too much criticism in that regard. But there is a sense of proportion that should be observed in all these things. Shipping should be made as cheap as possible. Charges against shipping, whether wharfage, pilotage, harbour dues, or any other charges, should be within reason. We found the charges too high on the coast. There was considerable discussion and investigation for a couple of years which resulted in a remedy which I think might be adopted in other parts. The minister was constituted the pilotage authority of the port. He is, of course, the pilotage authority over all boards. But formerly we had a board which was abolished and the superintendent of pilotage was installed under the minister. So far as I know, the result has been very satisfactory, and I believe the salary of the pilots was fixed at $250 a month, with perhaps some moderate allowances for travelling. The minister mentioned the fact about sundry expenses, but I think it will be found in checking up his reports that in addition to this salary which the pilots secure by dividing the fees amongst them on the St. Lawrence, these charges are paid. The fees are pooled and the charges are paid out of the pool. After that the remaining amount is divided as salary amongst the various pilots. So that I believe my hon. friend is in error when he says that out of their salaries they have to pay sundry charges. In addition to that, I know that in some cases the pilot has little or no travelling costs, because he gets passes very readily on all shipping if he is not actually employed as a pilot. I know this is the case on the Pacific coast. They used to charge up cost for travelling which they did not expend. There are a great many little things of that kind, all of which add to the general cost of pilotage. I am entirely in accord with the idea that we want to make our harbours safe and our pilotage system the very best it can be made. But expenses should not be multiplied because of that fact. We should keep down the expenses to shipping by keeping the dues as low as possible, and I believe the country at large would benefit, commerce would benefit, and the port of Montreal would benefit if pilotage charges were less on the St. Lawrence. I think that the scheme followed on the Pacific coast might very well be tried in the pilotage districts referred to by my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie).

Mr. LAPOINTE: There have been so many conflicting representations made to me on this very question that I shall inquire very seriously into the matter this year. The pilots contend that their salaries are no higher than those paid elsewhere both in the United States and in other countries, while the shipping federation seems to be of another opinion. I shall have this matter fully considered, and my hon. friend may rest assured that I shall see that justice is done by both sides.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The information I had came from a member of the shipping federation, just about the time when a delegation of St. Lawrence pilots waited upon my hon. friend in Ottawa and pointed out to him that one of the great hindrances to successful shipping on the St. Lawrence was the matter of pilotage dues. I did not know how the matter was regulated. I thought the Government had some right to regulate the amount of dues, but his statement was that pilots who worked four to five months made as much as $6,000 on the St. Lawrence line, and he added that the shipping men found they could not compete.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The pilots say that this is the case of one pilot who has refused to become a member of the corporation. He is an independent pilot and the others claim that he is very friendly to the shipping federation and has been employed more than they have been; hence the salary he gets. Of course, his is a peculiar case and the amount he gets is not the average earned by pilots, which is under $3,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Does not what my hon. friend has just said emphasize the need of his taking actual control of the pilotage situation? Here, he says, is a pilot who because of some pull, if I may use the common phrase, with some shipping companies gets a sum far in excess of two or more times the amount the average pilot secures. That is wholly unfair and unsatisfactory, and we shall never have a contented, efficient and satisfactory pilotage system if there is to be preference of that kind allowed or even made possible. My hon. friend is facing now the very difficulties which the previous minister faced. The previous minister took all the arguments that had been presented to him and which have been referred to tonight. The same claims were made, the same arguments advanced, and action was taken.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not in the Montreal district.

Mr. STEVENS: No. Action was taken on the Pacific coast, with satisfactory results. I strongly urge my hon. friend to do it in the interests of the shipping of the country generally, rather than in the interests of the pilots.

Mr. GRAHAM: There was rather a suggestion from the Press Gallery that the House should close at ten o'clock, and if hon. members would let the few items on this page go through, we might call it eleven o'clock and adjourn. We have reserved two items on which discussion could take place next week.

Mr. STEVENS: Why not have an understanding that we may have a general discussion on the item already allowed to stand on the previous list, which is a large item?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes. We will allow these other items to go through and then adjourn.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are two items of the Marine Department on the next page that I should like to have passed tonight, items 250 and 251.

Scientific Institutions—Department of Marine —Meteorological Service, including Magnetic Observatory, grants of $500 each to Kingston and Montreal Observatories, and allowance of $400 to L. F. Gorman, Observer at Ottawa, $262,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know anything about that item.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is for salaries.

Mr. STEVENS: I think, Mr. Chairman, we have done pretty well for the minister, and as this is a somewhat important item it might stand over. I notice some matters here referred to that members not present would probably like to discuss.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They are all unimportant, but if my hon. friend thinks otherwise, I am quite agreeable to this and the other items standing over. I can assure him I have nothing to conceal there.

Item stands.

CATTLE EMBARGO

CABLEGRAM FROM THE HIGH COMMISSIONER

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) spoke to me at the opening of the House to-day with regard to a communication received from the High Commissioner in London respecting the cattle embargo, and I promised to lay his telegram on the table at the earliest opportunity. I should like to do so before the House adjourns tonight.

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the House the Prime Minister will lay the telegram on the table.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will my hon. friend read it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. The telegram is dated London, April 22, and addressed to, Prime Minister, Ottawa. It is as follows:

Am informed by Canadian Associated Press that Lewis asked in House if I had stated that unless cattle embargo removed it might imperil Canada's relations with Mother Country. I take earliest opportunity of informing you that whatever opinion I have held in private no public statement of the kind has been made by me.

LARKIN.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

Monday, May 8, 1922

The House met at three o'clock.

CROWSNEST PASS AGREEMENT

NOMINATION OF SELECT SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. W. C. KENNEDY (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved:

That rule eleven be suspended, and that pursuant to the resolution adopted by the House on May 5, the following members do compose the select special committee to make inquiry into the question of railway transportation costs and the effect upon the Canadian National Railways and other lines, as well as upon agricultural development and Canadian industry generally of the expiration of the suspension of the Crowsnest pass agreement on July 6 next: Messrs. Maclean (Halifax), Euler, Malcolm, German, Duff, Macdonald (Pictou), McMurray, Hudson, MacLean (Prince), Michaud, Mitchell, Archambault, Vien, Stork, Crerar, Forke, Johnston (Last Mountain), Fansher, Halbert, McConica, Shaw, Dickie, Jones, Drayton, Stewart (Lanark), Manion, Boys; with power to send for persons, papers and records, including the minutes and evidence taken before the committee of this House in previous sessions, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the attention of the House to rule 11, suspension of which is asked by the present motion. The rule reads as follows:

No special committee may, without leave of the House, consist of more than fifteen members, and the mover may submit the names to form the committee, unless objected to by five members; if objected to, the House may name the committee in the following manner:—each member to name one, and those who have most voices, with the mover, shall form the same; but it shall always be understood that no member who declares or decides against the principle or substance of a bill, resolution, or matter to be committed, can be nominated of such committee.

I notice in the list presented by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals the names of some hon. members who have either spoken or voted against the motion. But the House is supreme, and if it be the unanimous wish of the House this rule can be suspended; the hon. minister has in his motion very wisely declared that rule 11 be suspended. If the motion passes unanimously as framed, there is no objection, but I desire to call the attention of the House to the rule itself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved:

I think we should have more members on this committee, and I have left a blank for the insertion of their names. If the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr.

Meighen) will furnish us with the names of four hon. members, they can be added to the list.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I have no objection to the motion passing without the blank. Then if we desire to add further members as suggested, it can be done by subsequent motion to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE BONUS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. B. McGIVERIN (Ottawa): Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he has any information to give to the House with regard to the cost of living bonus to civil servants.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the supplementary estimates for the present year are brought down, the Government will make the following proposals respecting the distribution of the bonus to be allowed civil servants for the present year:

1. On salaries of $1,200 and under—(a) for members of the Service having one or more dependents, the bonus as existing in the fiscal year 1921-22 to be continued; (b) for members of the Service without any dependents, one-half the bonus as existing in the fiscal year 1921-22 to be paid.

2. On salaries over $1,200 and up to $1,800 (inclusive)—(a) for members of the Service having one or more dependents, two-thirds of the bonus as existing in the fiscal year 1921-22 to be paid; (b) for members of the Service without any dependents, the bonus to be discontinued.

3. On salaries over $1,800 and up to $2,400 (inclusive)—(a) for members of the Service having one or more dependents, one-third of the bonus as existing in the fiscal year 1921-22 to be paid; (b) for members of the Service without any dependents, the bonus to be discontinued.

4. On all salaries over $2,400—the bonus to be discontinued.

Provided: that in salaries of $1,200 or under, and in salaries of $1,800 or under, adjustments be made so that in no case shall a civil servant with a lower salary plus bonus receive more in compensation than a civil servant with a higher salary plus reduced bonus.

I may say that my hon. friend (Mr. McGiverin) informed me that he intended to ask this question, and I therefore had the reply prepared in this form.

DATE OF THE BUDGET

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York) I think this is the week in which the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) was going to tell us all about the Budget, Mr. Speaker. I know he wants to relieve our anxiety and to let us know the date as long as possible in advance.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I would remind my hon. friend that this is only the beginning of the week. I have the whole week before me within which to fulfil my promise.

PEAT PRODUCTION

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Are there any peat bogs in Canada?
2. If so, how many are there in each province?
3. Where are they located?
4. Are any being worked at present?
5. What is the capitalization of each of the companies who are operating said peat bogs?
6. Has the Government subsidized the above companies?
7. If so, to what extent, either in the form of grants or for experiments?
8. What results have been obtained?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):

1. Yes.
2. No record of total number.
3. The bogs investigated up to date are those considered of greatest potential value in view of their extent, and proximity to transportation facilities and probable markets.
4. One at Alfred, Ontario, and one at Ste-Therese de Blainville, Quebec.
5. The operations at Alfred are being conducted by the Peat Committee which was appointed by and financed jointly by the federal government and the government of the province of Ontario; and those at Ste-Therese by Le Combustible National Limitee, with an authorized capital of $500,000.
6. The federal government has provided funds to meet one half of the expenses of the Peat Committee since its creation in 1918.
7. The share of expenses of the Peat Committee paid by the federal Government from the inception of the work to April 30th, 1922, amounted to $149,358.44.
8. The Peat Committee was created in 1918 when the fuel situation was grave with a view to devising a process for the commercial utilization of a raw fuel possessed in abundance by Canada, and the results to date are considered far in advance of those secured elsewhere. The experiments are expected to be completed in 1922.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY:

1, 2, 3, and 4. No Order in Council was passed specifically rejecting or abolishing position of post office inspector at Sherbrooke, but a general Order in Council was passed by which all inspectors were abolished and their duties merged with other duties to make up the work of the proposed District Superintendents of Postal Service. Under this Order in Council the Griffenhagens abolished the post office inspectorate of Sherbrooke and established twelve district superintendents throughout the country leaving some inspectors under the name of Post Office Inspector as a branch of the District Superintendent's office at the more important points, and under this, Mr. Dastous, Post Office Inspector, was left in charge of the Sherbrooke division, and his staff removed to other points, and the staff was restored by order of Hon. Mr. Belley and the Sherbrooke office opened with its former status as an independent inspectorate.

TRANSFER OF NATURAL RESOURCES

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence passing between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, since 10th July, 1920, respecting the transfer of natural resources.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): There is no objection whatever to adopting the motion, but I would like to point out to my right hon. friend that the officers of the Department of External Affairs and the officials in my office state that there are letters, either in the Prime Minister's office or in the Department of External Affairs, from the Prime Minister of Canada to the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, other than those which have been addressed by myself, and replies thereto, which I am prepared to lay on the Table of the House now. The date referred to here is 10th July, 1920, which is, I think, the day my right hon. friend formed his administration. It may be that he is desirous of some correspondence being brought down to which he was a party. I would be glad to bring it down if he would tell me where it is, but I cannot locate it in the department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid my hon. friend in taking office has taken on too many new assistants and secretaries, and kept too few of the old. These letters were dictated by me in the usual course, are purely official letters, and the copies must be there. I myself have sent for the copies subsequently to their being written and have seen them. There should be no difficulty at all in finding them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So far from doing what my hon. friend suggests, I rather went out of my way to provide for his old secretaries.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not in your own department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, in my own department. I am only too anxious to bring the correspondence down, but I am unable to locate it. I have had inquiries made, and shall make further inquiries, but up to the present I have not been able to find the correspondence on any file.

Motion agreed to.

ORIENTAL ALIENS

RESOLUTION TO EXCLUDE FUTURE IMMIGRATION

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the immigration of oriental aliens and their rapid multiplication is becoming a serious menace to living conditions, particularly on the Pacific coast, and to the future of the country in general, and the Government should take immediate action with a view to securing the exclusion of future immigration of this type.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to propose this resolution, I do so with considerable diffidence. I realize the importance and the comprehensive extent of the subject. I appreciate my own limitations and my incapacity to place this matter in a satisfactory manner before the House. My one comfort, however, is that I am to be followed by hon. gentlemen, particularly those from British Columbia, who will be able to make up for any of my deficiencies. There is a huge mass of material before me, and it will be necessary for me to make a comprehensive statement, but I intend to be as brief as possible.

The resolution calls for the exclusion of the immigration of oriental aliens. It is hardly necessary for me to point out that this does not include British subjects such as, for instance, East Indians, who are popularly described as Hindus. The word "immigrant" is defined in the Immigration Act as follows:

"immigrant" means a person who enters Canada with the intention of acquiring Canadian domicile, and for the purposes of this Act every person entering Canada shall be presumed to be an immigrant unless belonging to one of the following classes of persons, hereinafter called "non-immigrant classes,"—

i. Canadian citizens; and persons who have Canadian domicile;

ii. diplomatic and consular officers, and all accredited representatives and officials of British and foreign governments, their suites, families and guests, coming to Canada to reside or to discharge any official duty or to pass through in transit;

iii. officers and men, with their wives and families, belonging to or connected with His Majesty's regular naval and military forces;

iv. tourists and travellers merely passing through Canada to another country;

v. students entering Canada for the purpose of attendance, and while in actual attendance, at any university or college authorized by statute or charter to confer degrees; or at any high school or collegiate institute recognized as such for the purpose of this Act by the Minister;

vi. members of dramatic, musical, artistic, athletic or spectacular organizations entering Canada temporarily for the purpose of giving public performances or exhibitions of an entertaining or instructive nature; and actors, artists, lecturers, musicians, priests and ministers of religion, professors of colleges or other educational institutions, and commercial travellers, entering Canada for the temporary exercise of their respective callings;

vii. holders of a permit to enter Canada, in force for the time being, in form A of schedule one to this Act, signed by the Minister or by some person duly authorized;

This definition should be borne in mind in considering the subject now before the House.

The resolution provides for the exclusion in the future of all alien orientals who may seek to enter Canada in any capacity for permanent residence. It is, to adopt the reasoning of the Californians, to prevent increase by direct immigration of an element in our population which, for the reasons hereafter mentioned, is not only undesirable but dangerous to Canadian interests. The method of bringing exclusion into effect and the working out of the details will be for the Government.

It might be of interest for us to consider for a moment the condition of the Canadian laws dealing with immigration to this country. In respect to the Chinese we have an open field. There is no treaty or arrangement of any kind between Great Britain and China dealing with this matter. The different governments which have been in power in Canada in the past years have however adopted a policy of restriction so far as Chinese immigration is concerned. A great deal of time and a great deal of consideration have been given to this question, and the regulations have been made as restrictive as possible. In 1885 a head tax of $50 was imposed. In 1901 that tax was doubled and made $100; and in 1904 it was increased to $500. It was thought at that time that the imposition of the higher tax would be prohibitive, and that we would not thereafter be troubled with immigration from the Chinese. However, the flow kept up. The Chinese, apparently, were quite willing to pay the $500, and they still came in in large numbers. In 1919 an Order in Council, known as P.C. 1202, was passed. This prohibited the entry into Canada at certain ports in British Columbia—all the ports of British Columbia I think—of skilled and unskilled labour, and that Order in Council applied to the Chinese as well as to other classes. Notwithstanding the passing of that Order in Council the Chinese still continued to come into the country. At first they came in as students. Apparently the Chinese who desired to come to Canada decided that it would be advisable for them to appear before the Canadians as students, and accordingly large numbers of so-called students entered the country. When that, to a certain extent, was stopped, and when the entry of students was confined to those who wished to attend universities conferring degrees, and could prove that they were going to do so, the wily Chinese adopted another plan. Those desirous of entering Canada became merchants, and last year 1,445 merchants came into the Dominion. It has been found that no matter how restrictive our regulations were, no matter how well they had been thought out and carefully planned, and no matter how stringently worded they were, the Chinese still kept coming into the country. In regard to the Japanese there is a treaty, known as the "Treaty of Commerce and Navigation", between the United Kingdom and Japan. This was signed at London, April 3, 1911, and the ratifications were exchanged at Tokio, May 5, 1911. That treaty provides, among other things, that:

The subjects of each of the High Contracting parties shall have full liberty to enter, travel, and reside in the territories of the other, and, conforming themselves to the laws of the country,—

Shall, in all that relates to travel and residence, be placed, in all respects on the same footing as native subjects.

They shall have the right, equally with native subjects, to carry on their commerce and manufacture, and to trade in all kinds of merchandise of lawful commerce, either in person or by agents, singly, or in partnerships with foreigners and or native subjects.

They shall in all that relates to the pursuit of their industries, callings, professions, and educational studies be placed in all respects on the same footing as the subjects or citizens of the most favoured nation.

That treaty was assented to by Canada in 1913, under the Japanese Treaty Act of that year. In ratifying the treaty so far as Canada is concerned we provided:

That nothing in the treaty, or in the Act, shall be deemed to repeal or affect any of the provisions of the Immigration Act.

That treaty came into operation on 17 July, 1911, and is to remain in force until 16 July, 1923, provided that:

In case neither of the High Contracting Parties shall have given notice to the other twelve months before the expiration of the said period, of its intention to terminate the Treaty, it shall continue operative until the expiration of one year from the date on which either of the High Contracting Parties shall have denounced it.

As regards the British dominions, colonies, possessions, and protectorates to which the present treaty may have been made applicable in virtue of article 26, however, either of the High Contracting Parties shall have the right to terminate it separately at any time on giving twelve months' notice to that effect.

Now that treaty may, or may not, preclude us from adopting a policy of exclusion in regard to the Japanese—that is a matter as to which I do not care at this moment to express an opinion. But it has other effects. It prevents the legislatures of the various provinces from enacting what may be termed discriminatory legislation. In British Columbia, at various times in the past, enactments which might be placed in this class have been passed, and irrespective altogether of the political complexion of the majority of the legislature at that time. Last year the present Government passed an order in council which provided that all leases and grants of timber lands should contain the condition that Chinese and Japanese should not be employed thereon. That order in council was afterwards ratified by act of the provincial legislature. In February of this year a decision was handed down by the Supreme Court of Canada to the effect that that order in council and that act were ultra vires of the legislature of British Columbia, because the subject of naturalization and aliens, under the British North America Act, is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament, and because the act and the order in council cil conflicted with the treaty to which I have just referred. Now I submit that a request should be made to the British government to give notice to Japan to terminate that treaty in July of next year. That notice can be given by Great Britain on behalf of Canada without reference to the other parts of the Empire involved in the treaty. There is also in effect what is known as a "Gentleman's Agreement". In 1907, and previous to that time, large numbers of Japanese came into British Columbia; I think in 1907 over 7,000 Japanese landed on our shores. There was a great deal of objection to that from the people of British Columbia, and in the city of Vancouver there were unfortunately race riots which resulted in considerable damage. Upon the matter being brought to the attention of the government, the present incumbent of the Speaker's Chair of this House was sent to Japan to see if some friendly arrangement could not be made to restrict immigration from Japan to this country. Some kind of an arrangement was entered into which is the "Gentleman's Agreement" referred to. The terms of that agreement have not been made public, we have not been able to ascertain what they are; and it is questionable to my mind whether it is a proper thing to have an agreement of that kind in force and to place in the hands of a foreign nation the right to say who shall come to our country. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that agreement should be cancelled.

Immigration laws of this country as they exist to-day are apparently objectionable to the Chinese. A despatch from Montreal, dated March 23, appeared in the Vancouver World on that date and reads as follows:

Canadian immigration laws as regards the Chinese are a disgrace and should be remedied without delay, declared Hon. C. Teur, Chinese consul-general to Canada, in the course of an address to members of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association here Wednesday.

"There is no reason why such discriminating laws should be in effect," he said. "Chinese labourers do not want to come to this country, but Chinese students do."

It is quite true that the Chinese have a right to complain, I think, that they are being badly treated, inasmuch as a head tax of $500 is imposed on any one of their subjects who desires to come to this country. I think, Mr. Speaker, it would be much better, indeed, in that regard if a change were made, and that, instead of having the $500 head tax, we should have exclusion altogether of Chinese immigration to this country.

The Japanese are very fond of protesting against discrimination by Canadians against their people. It might be very interesting to look at the situation so far as Canadians in Japan are concerned. In Hansard of May 5 of this year, on page 1514, I find answers to questions which were handed in that day by the Prime Minister in reply to the hon. member from Victoria (Mr. Tolmie). These answers show that, in common with other foreigners, Canadians cannot, as individuals, hold land in Japan, and may not become owners of ships flying the Japanese flag, and may not, as individuals engage in mining. The answers continue:

They may not become shareholders of the Bank of Japan, the Yokohama Specie Bank, the Bank of Korea, the South Manchuria Railway Company, the Oriental Development Company and certain other companies, or of shipping companies in receipt of a Government subsidy. They may not become members or brokers of the various exchanges in Japan. They may not as individuals become members of Japanese Chambers of Commerce. They may not engage in the emigration business or hold shares in any company so engaged.

Foreign unskilled labourers may not pursue their callings in Japan outside the limits of the former foreign settlements or the "mixed residence" areas without the express permission of the administrative authorities. Labourers for this purpose are defined as being persons engaged in labouring pursuits in connection with farming, fishing, mining, public works, building, manufacturing, transport, hauling (of vehicles), stevedoring and other forms of manual labour.

Hon. gentlemen will note that we have certain privileges over there and these restrictions do not apply to persons in domestic service or persons following the calling of cooks and waiters.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Can a Canadian lease land in Japan or engage in agriculture?

Mr. McQUARRIE: As far as I know a Canadian may not lease land in Japan and may not engage in agriculture for profit.

I have had a great deal of difficulty in ascertaining the present oriental population of Canada. I have been struck with the dearth of information which is possessed by our immigration and other government officials in this respect, but I have been able to make an estimate from various sources. I find that, according to the 1911 census there were in Canada at that time 19,568, and in the whole of Canada 27,774 Chinese. I also find that immigration to Canada since 1911 has been 29,359 Chinese. I am told that the births of Chinese about equal the deaths. We may assume that we have a total of about 57,133 Chinese in Canada at the present time, and of this number there would be approximately 38,000 in British Columbia. It is to be noted that the Chinese population of Canada has doubled in the last ten years. I find also, according to the same census, that in 1911 there were 8,587 Japanese in British Columbia, and in the whole of Canada 9,021 Japanese, and that Japanese immigration to Canada since 1911 has amounted to 7,290. The birth rate of the Japanese is such that, I think it is safe to say, we have at least 16,311 Japanese in the country at the present time most of whom are in British Columbia. I have in my hand a pamphlet which was published by the Canadian-Japanese Association, which was sent to me through the mail some time ago. In that pamphlet it is stated that the Japanese population in Canada at the end of 1920 was only 15,453. Now of this number 7,153 were stated to be males of 20 years and upwards, and their occupations are given—fishermen, farmers, domestic servants, dock labourers, businessmen, etc. —As to the first, the number is placed at 1,467. We know that more than 1,467 Japanese were engaged in the fishing industry of British Columbia in 1920. The official returns from the Marine and Fishery Department show that in that year there were issued to the Japanese 2,227 gill net licenses, and 519 trolling licenses, making a total of 2,746 licenses. If you take it on the basis of two men to a boat—and I think there are at least two men connected with each one of the licenses,—you will find there were in 1920 engaged in the fishing industry in British Columbia 5,492 Japanese as actual fishermen. There are other licenses as well, as the hon. gentleman from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) points out. We have purse seine fishing for instance. If you take it on the same basis, the same proportion,—and take it for granted that the Japanese made the same mistake in giving the figures for the total population of Canada —you would find there was in Canada in 1920 a Japanese population of approximately 50,000. There have been many charges of surreptitious entry, more particularly in regard to the Japanese. I am not in a position to say whether those charges are justified or not. I would point out that the Japanese birth rate in British Columbia indicates that, in that province, there are many more Japanese than we have had any idea of. The Japanese birth rate in British Columbia is very alarming. These figures, which I am about to quote, were compiled by the Asiatic Exclusion League of Canada:

Year	Total Births in British Columbia	Japanese Births	Proportion of Japanese to Whites
1910..	5,005	20	1 in 252
1911..	5,841	30	1 in 198
1912..	8,008	43	1 in 186
1913..	11,088	80	1 in 138
1914..	10,418	172	1 in 61
1915..	10,516	303	1 in 35
1916..	9,841	280	1 in 31
1917..	9,433	321	1 in 29
1918..	9,010	393	1 in 23
1919..	10,022	386	1 in 26
1920..	11,532	657	1 in 17

For the first six months of 1921 the number of Japanese births was 438, which would be equivalent, in a growing ratio, to a total of not less than 900 for the year or about one in 13.

To verify the correctness of our figures let me give the figures for the birth rate in California. I quote from the San Francisco Examiner of September 14, 1921, a cartoon which is headed "Crowding of the Cradle." This gives California's birth rate statistics, birth record by races:

	Birth rate per 1,000
Japanese	69.4
Chinese	19.2
Whites	18.1
Negroes	16.7
Indians	10.7
Other races	4.9

The oriental population of Canada is largely confined to the province of British Columbia, and it is most noticeable in the cities. The condition in Vancouver gives a fair indication of what exists in all the principal cities of British Columbia. The orientals have made an alarming advance in the last few years. In 1920, out of 486 grocery licenses issued in Vancouver, 171 were granted to orientals. There were 80 oriental laundries; 713 orientals were employed in restaurants, 50 per cent of which were owned and operated by orientals. There are 62 oriental barber shops in Vancouver. Sixty per cent of the merchant tailors in Vancouver are orientals. Ninety per cent of the garden truck sold in Vancouver is produced by orientals. The truck gardening industry of British Columbia is controlled by the Chinese. They own or lease practically every acre of land in the Ashcroft district; they monopolize the Ashcroft potato industry, the truck industry at Lulu island, and the celery and truck industry in the Okanagan valley. In British Columbia, there are 1,080 Japanese and Chinese farmers employing large numbers of Asiatic farm help. Orientals own or lease or cultivate 26,919 acres of most fertile truck and orchard lands in the province. There are sixty logging camps in British Columbia owned and operated by Japanese. The Japanese have practically a monopoly of the British Columbia coast fisheries. I went into that subject so exhaustively a few days ago that I do not intend to give any statistics in that connection. They are engaged in exploiting nearly all our natural resources. They are in the hotel, grocery, drygoods and other businesses, almost every industry coming under their influence.

This year, in the schools of Vancouver there are 1,045 oriental children who are seated side by side with white children in the class rooms. What will be the prospect five years hence when the heavy cradle roll swells that school population? Last year 1,448 Chinese merchants entered Canada to compete with the small traders in the commercial field. All British Columbia cities have their oriental sections, and some towns, notably Steveston at the mouth of the Fraser river, are almost exclusively composed of oriental establishments. The orientals have invaded the province of Alberta where they own or control many hotels, restaurants and laundries. They are also well established in the prairie provinces, and in eastern Canada. In Ontario, I understand, there are at the present time in the neighbourhood of 3,000 orientals.

The demand for exclusion is not a sectional one in any way; it is not limited to the province of British Columbia; but it is general and Dominion-wide. The legislature of British Columbia, following the policy of all previous governments, whether Liberal or Conservative, unanimously passed on November 1, 1921, these resolutions, and ordered copies to be sent to the Government, the leader of the Opposition, and the leader of the Progressive party.

1. That a respectful address be presented to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor praying him to convey to the Dominion Government through His Excellency the Governor General of Canada the respectful request of this House that the Dominion Government take the necessary steps under Article 27 of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation between His Majesty the King and His Majesty the Emperor of Japan to request His Majesty the King to give His Majesty the Emperor of Japan twelve months' notice of the intention of termination of this treaty as far as the British Dominion of Canada is concerned.

2. That a respectful address be presented to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor praying him to convey to tne Dominion Government through His Excellency the Governor General of Canada the respectful request of this House that the Dominion Government amend the Immigration Act of Canada so as nearly as possible to totally restrict the immigration of Asiatics into this province, keeping in view the wishes of the people of British Columbia that this province be reserved for people of the European race, and that the Dominion Government consult with the Provincial Government on the proposed amendments.

At the Dominion convention of Retail Merchants' Association of Canada, held at Kingston last year, a resolution was passed calling for the exclusion of oriental immigration. In connection with the Retail Merchants' Association, this is a copy of a letter which has been sent to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King):

Retail merchants throughout B.C. are watching the McQuarrie resolution in the federal House, calling for oriental exclusion, with intense interest.

To us it is not merely a question of competitive merchandising, aggravated by lower standards of living. It is in fact a struggle of far deeper significance in which home, family and citizenship considerations outweigh mercenary motives. We are solidly behind Mr. McQuarrie in his efforts to get federal action on this issue.

In view of this we urge that if, for any reason, it should not be possible to pass the resolution as it stands, your Government give the matter the serious consideration it urgently calls for.

As Canadian citizens first and retail merchants afterwards, we ask that this issue be constructively dealt with at this session of the federal House.

The situation of to-day is acute. The situation of to-morrow will be embittered. Can we with equanimity bequeath to the Canada of the future a race problem worse than the negro heritage in the southern States?

Many telegrams have been received from various branches of the association throughout the Dominion, endorsing the resolution.

The Great War Veterans Association at its Dominion convention held at Port Arthur in October last passed a resolution of this subject to the following effect:

Whereas, for many years past there has been an increasing influx of Chinese and Japanese into Canada, and especially British Columbia;

And whereas, the standard of living of such races makes it impossible to compete with them industrially, considering also that white men cannot buy land in Japan, and that the Chinese are the principal channels through which the drug habit is being spread in Canada;

And whereas, there is a great deal of unemployment among white men, and particularly returned soldiers in British Columbia;

And whereas, it is of the utmost importance that the present almost unbearable condition, due to the influx of the alien Asiatics into British Columbia, be dealt with without delay and in the interests of the people of this country;

Therefore be it resolved, that this convention go on record as being in favour of the exclusion hereafter of alien Asiatics;

And further, that legislation be enacted to prevent the sale and lease of land to said aliens either directly or indirectly;

And further, that the incoming Dominion executive be instructed to lay this resolution before the proper authorities and vigorously prosecute the same.

I may add that I have received telegrams respecting public meetings held in British Columbia which were specially called to press for the exclusion of orientals, one of these meetings having been held at Nanaimo and another at New Westminster quite recently.

I have also a telegram from Charles F. Macaulay, secretary of the Asiatic Exclusion League of Canada. That league, I am told, has a large and representative membership. The telegram is dated April 4, 1922, and is as follows:

[Mr. McQuarrie.]

Forty thousand British Columbians, members of Asiatic Exclusion League stand solidly behind you in your fight for a white Canada.

The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, with a membership of something like 225,000, at its last annual convention held in Winnipeg, on August 22, 1921, passed a resolution calling for the exclusion of oriental immigration, and I also have here a letter from the president, Mr. Tom Moore, dated April 7, 1922, in which he says:

Organized labour in Canada is to-day asking for the total exclusion of oriental immigration, and item 3 (b) of the legislative requests, presented to the Prime Minister and members of the Cabinet, asks for "Exclusion of Asiatics." This request is based upon the decision reached at our last convention held at Winnipeg, in August, 1921, when 694 delegates were assembled from all parts of Canada.

In past years the Trades and Labour Congress have actively supported measures for the restriction—

I would ask hon. members to pay particular attention to this part of the letter:

—of Asiatic immigration, but our experience has been that no effective restrictions have as yet been devised, as is illustrated by the present over-running of the province of British Columbia with orientals and the considerable extent to which the Chinese have spread through other parts of Canada, especially in the restaurant and laundry business.

The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada look upon this subject as one of national importance, and realizing the vast difference in the economic development of Canada and oriental countries, have become convinced that the only way in which Canada, especially the Pacific province, can be retained and developed in the interests of the white race, is by the immediate application of a policy of exclusion of further Asiatic immigration.

The United Farmers of British Columbia, at their last annual convention, held in Vancouver, on January 25th of this year, passed the following resolution:

Resolved that we are opposed to orientals owning or leasing land in the province of British Columbia.

That all oriental produce be marked as such.

That we go on record as against all leasing and selling of property to orientals.

That in future all oriental immigration be excluded from British Columbia.

Resolved, that this convention of the United Farmers of British Columbia suggest to the Government that a graduated tax, according to the numbers of orientals employed, be placed on all employers of orientals in the province. This to apply to all oriental employers as well as to white employers, and that all proceeds be placed to the credit of the hospitals of the rural districts of the province, and cities wherein collected.

Then we have the Army and Navy Veterans, Disabled Soldiers' Association; we have Farmers' Institutes; we have various trades unions; we have teachers' associations; we have city councils; we have boards of trade; we have the Native Sons of British Columbia, and other organizations, all demanding the exclusion of oriental immigration.

The question has excited Dominion-wide interest, articles having appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press, the Toronto Telegram, Macleans Magazine and other publications, and it is now no longer a question of purely provincial significance.

I submit that drastic action is necessary. Modern history affords notable examples of the danger of bringing into a country races which cannot be assimilated. Our great neighbour to the south has a serious race problem in the negro population of the southern states. Who could have foretold that so many millions of negroes would have descended from the comparatively small number of slaves imported from Africa? That problem is entirely internal, and apparently nothing can be done to solve it.

The United States also has another grave problem in the Japanese menace. Hawaii is overrun by the yellow race. The United States census gives the population of the Hawaiian islands at 255,000, the Japanese portion of which numbers 114,000.

The Japanese practically control the island, not only in a business sense but in the political sense. When I visited Honolulu a few years ago I learned the reason why the Hawaiian Islands had gone to the United States. It appears that the Hawaiians were afraid they would be taken over by the Japanese. They sent their king and queen to London and offered their islands to the British Empire. The statesmen over there, unfortunately, did not see fit to accept the gift; they thought the islands were valueless and that they would only be a burden to the Empire. Later on uncle Sam got his chance and took over the islands. They became a great national asset. Not only was there a large production of sugar in these islands, but they furnished a strategic naval base in the mid-Pacific. At the entrance to Honolulu harbour the Americans established a fortress in the crater of an extinct volcano, which is one of the greatest fortresses in the world. Now, the Japanese kept on going into the Hawaiian Islands, and I am afraid that the islands have turned out to be a liability rather than an asset to the United States.

Having accomplished his desire in Hawaii the enterprising Jap turned his attention to the mainland of the United States, invading the states of California, Oregon and Washington. To-day these states have their oriental problem, which is almost exclusively a Japanese problem. Last year a large meeting was held in Vancouver at which this subject was discussed. That meeting was addressed by Alderman Phillip Tindall, of Seattle, who referred to the conditions existing in the state of Washington as very alarming, and pointed out that nearly one-third of the grocery stores in Seattle were Japanese and nearly one-third of the hotels and lodging houses owned or leased by Japanese, though operated, possibly, by white managers. I quote from a report of that meeting:

> "It is a fight for life between the white and the brown race" said Mr. Tindall. "We must insist upon this being a white man's land". He predicted that if steps were not taken now to put a stop to the menace, the time was not far distant when bloody war must result, because the white man would assuredly not allow himself to be crowded out when he became aroused to the danger.

In California there is a Japanese population of approximately 100,000, and with the alarming birth rate to which I have already referred, the situation is very serious. The Californians have been taking active measures to exclude the Japanese from that state. I hold in my hand a brief prepared for the State Department at Washington on behalf of the Japanese Exclusion League of California, in support of the declaration of principles on the part of the league as approved by the California Legislature. That declaration is in part as follows:

> This is our country, and we are under no obligations to admit any foreigner; that we should tactfully but firmly let the world know that we claim the right to exclude any one we wish to exclude; that the life of this democracy depends upon the sort of immigrants admitted; that there is nothing discreditable to the Japanese in our attitude on this question; that we will not admit them because they do not and cannot assimilate and because in economic competition they drive our people to the wall; that we will not admit immigration freely under such conditions from any country no matter what the consideration offered or the consequences involved.

I submit that is a declaration which could be subscribed to by all Canadians, more particularly by British Columbians, who will I am convinced stand solidly behind our cousins in California in their demand for exclusion.

The question which naturally presents itself is, why should orientals be excluded? I have put down certain reasons in brief and concise form. I will read them to the House:

1. They cannot be assimilated. They will always exist as a foreign element in our midst. The real test of assimilation is intermarriage. The divergence of characteristics of the two races is so marked that intermarriage does not tend to perpetuate the good qualities of either race. The races are fundamentally different. Their morals are different, and language, heredity, religion and ideals will militate against and prevent even sociological assimilation of orientals. In this connection I refer to the California brief, page 42. So far as I am aware, intermarriage between the white and the oriental has always produced unsatisfactory results. Japan does not encourage intermarriage. In the Japanese pamphlet before referred to, the claim is made that the Japanese can be assimilated and can become good Canadians but it is not suggested that they should intermarry. To quote again from the California brief, page 38: "They (the Japanese) are undesirable as immigrants and permanent residents because they and their children form an unassimilable alien element which cannot be absorbed in the melting pot of this country." Exactly the same arguments will apply to the Chinese.

Now, I have here certain articles which have been written on this subject. I am not going to read them all to the House, but there is one from which I would like to read a short extract. It is an article by H. Glynn-Ward, published in the Vancouver World on March 14, 1921. It reads, in part:

> Between the Orient and the Occident there is more than a mere ocean, there is a great divide, intangible and insurmountable. The leopard cannot change his spots any more than a white man can be orientalized or an oriental be brought to live by the customs and laws of the European. The morals of the one are neither worse nor better than the other; but they are different. So different that an attempt to combine them can result in nothing but disaster.
> Marriage between orientals and whites has never been known to produce anything but degradation for both because it is an unnatural thing. Therefore, as the Japanese can never in a thousand years assimilate with whites to produce a race desirable as future Canadians, their influx into the country and the hold they are taking thereof is unwise and undiplomatic.

Now, the Japanese cannot object to the principle of exclusion, because they themselves have adopted it in regard to the Koreans and the Chinese. In this connection I would again refer to the California brief, which at page 37 says that the policy of exclusion so far as it applies to labour skilled and unskilled is that followed rigorously by the Japanese themselves under Imperial Ordinance 352 against Koreans and Chinese. The reason she assigns is that to permit entrance into Japan of such aliens whose standards of living are lower than the Japanese would submit their own people to disastrous competition. That is the argument that we ourselves make. The standards of living of the Japanese are certainly lower than ours. They live in a different way altogether, and in British Columbia they do not conform to our customs to any great extent. They are a foreign settlement in our midst, and they cannot be assimilated.

2. If their peaceful penetration is allowed to continue it will eventually lead to racial conflict and international unpleasantness.

In this connection I would again point to the Vancouver riots in 1907, and say that if some action is not taken by this Government, riots just as bad or worse are likely to happen.

3. Their standards of living are lower than those of our people.

4. Our people cannot compete with the Japanese and Chinese in certain lines.

5. Unemployment will be decreased.

6. They are responsible, to a certain extent, for the drug traffic.

7. They cannot become good Canadians because of their dual citizenship. Even if they become naturalized, they do not divest themselves of their allegiance to their own emperor.

8. It is desirable that we should have a white Canada and that we should not become a yellow or mongrel nation. This is a great national question and our future progress and prosperity are at stake.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the practical question: What should be done? My answer is threefold:

1. The Japanese Treaty should be abrogated, so far as Canada is concerned.

2. The "Gentlemen's Agreement" should be cancelled.

3. The Immigration Act should be amended so as to provide for exclusion. The details of this will have to be worked out by the Government.

Mr. ALFRED STORK (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, this is a question which very vitally affects the province of British Columbia, and as a member from that province I am very pleased to have the opportunity of rising in support of this resolution. We have in this House thirteen members from the province of British Columbia, and it is very pleasing to know that all thirteen are unanimous, so far as I can gather, in their opinion towards this resolution.

The oriental first came to the Pacific coast in 1849 at the time of the California gold rush, and the people of California were tremendously pleased with the orientals because they were of the opinion that the fame of their mines had challenged the attention of the whole world, and that the fact of men coming from China bore tribute to the fact that California was a big mining country. In the first Fourth of July parade ever held in San Francisco, orientals took part, lending to it an air of novelty and oriental splendour which was very pleasing to the people of California. But the joy of the Californians was very soon turned to dismay when they discovered the effect that the orientals were having on the social and economic life of the state of California. From California the orientals spread north into the province of British Columbia. The British Columbians had at their disposal the experience of the people of California, and those earlier settlers of the Pacific coast province did not view with a great deal of approbation the influx of the oriental, because they believed that as the number of orientals increased, the opportunities for the white race decreased, and so we find that in the first session of the first legislature conveyed in the province of British Columbia in the year 1872, a resolution was passed calling for a head tax of $50 on every Chinaman coming into the country. In the same session a resolution was passed prohibiting the employment of orientals on public works. In 1874 a resolution was introduced calling for a head tax on orientals. In 1876 there was a resolution asking for a tax of $10 per head on all males wearing long hair in the shape of a pig-tail or cue. In 1878 a resolution was passed that every Chinese person over twelve years of age should take out a license of $10, payable every three months in advance. In 1878 the oriental question was discussed for the first time in the federal parliament. In 1884 the member for Victoria in this House moved a resolution to exclude orientals altogether from the province of British Columbia—a resolution very similar to the one we are debating to-day. In 1885 a bill was passed imposing a tax of $50 per head on Chinese. In 1891 seventy petitions were received from the province of British Columbia by this Parliament praying for the total exclusion of orientals. In 1892 more petitions were received by this Parliament than had been received in 1891. In 1899 the head tax was increased to $100, and in 1902 it was again increased to $500. Last year the province of British Columbia enacted legislation to prohibit orientals from taking part in any work on government contracts. This legislation, we understand, has since been disallowed. I am not prepared to discuss the disallowance of that act of the British Columbia legislature, any more than to say this, that the very fact of the legislature of British Columbia deeming it wise and expedient to enact such legislation simply goes to prove the absolute and complete necessity of having something done to restrict the progress and the march of the oriental so far as British Columbia is concerned.

All of these proceedings that I have related were accompanied by much argument, by long speeches and lengthy talks in the various legislatures, and there were some very great prophecies as to what would happen if oriental immigration was not somewhat curtailed. We are to-day in the presence of prophecies matured, prophecies fulfilled. The seed has been sown, and the harvest is here. We find that these various acts and the different attempts that have been made to deal with this question have to a very large extent merely skirted around the question. There has never yet been a comprehensive dealing with the issue. We find legislation passed against men with long hair; we find that a head tax has been imposed from time to time, but these attempts have been altogether ineffectual to cope with the situation. We are now confronted with a fifty years' growth problem. There is an old saying, and a very true one, that possession is nine points of the law.

I believe that it is good policy to settle this oriental problem with the oriental while the white population is still in possession of the province of British Columbia, rather than to defer the settlement of the issue until the time when the oriental himself is in full and complete possession of that great province. One of the serious handicaps, Sir, that we suffer from, I think, is the handicap of indifference. There was a time when that great stretch of country now known as the states of Oregon and Washington was British territory—the Columbia river was supposed to be the international boundary.

When the question of boundaries arose and demanded settlement, tradition has it that one of the officials dealing with that question stated that the country was of no use for the reason that the salmon in the Columbia river would not rise to the fly. I am not prepared to say whether that story is true or not; but I believe that indifference had a great deal to do with the moving of the international boundary up to the forty-ninth parallel. Later on we had the Alaskan boundary award. If you will look at the map you will find that there is a very small, narrow strip of northern coast line of what used to be British Columbia but is now part of Alaska. This piece of coast line is not of any particular benefit to Alaska because they possess no hinterland. But it is a very vital land to the province of British Columbia because the location of the boundary line deprives us of over half of the coast line of our province, and we find ourselves to-day without sufficient ground upon it to erect even a wireless station. Take the Premier mine, the richest in British Columbia—I might even say the richest on the North American continent. That mine is in Canada within half a mile of the international boundary. The product is brought down to tide water by means of a tram line, extending for a distance of thirteen miles, and this tram line travels almost entirely through American territory. In covering the northern part of my constituency I have to travel through Alaska by way of Skaguay, the White pass and Yukon railway. The people of Canada regard this, I suppose, as a matter-of-fact proposition. They say no doubt "Well, that coast line belongs to Alaska" and they are very largely indifferent to it. But to the people who live on the northwest Pacific coast this is a very vital matter. To-day we are having daily reminders of the disabilities under which we suffer, and I may say that in the settlement of that question indifference on our part played a very large part.

So we find ourselves to-day confronted with the silent and the steady absorption of the province of British Columbia by the orientals. A few years ago the Japanese were regarded as a simple, childlike and interesting people; but experience has shown us that they are the very incarnation of commercial aggressiveness. In the year 1920 in the matter of the number of post office money orders sent out of Canada, the United States had the largest number, Great Britain was second, and Japan was third. We find in the same year that the total number of money orders sent to Japan from Canada was 28,807; and the number of money orders arriving in Canada from Japan was 434. These oriental people came to British Columbia willing and anxious to serve; but, Sir, they have no intention of remaining as servants. The Jap who pulled the oar in the fishing boat on the Skeena river is now in full possession of a gasoline launch operating on the Fraser river. He has performed menial tasks in the cannery and incidentially he has mastered the fishing business; and so we find that he is now in the fishing game on his own hook, so to speak. The humble cook who has done the work in the lumber camp has, at the same time, made himself conversant with the lumber industry; and we find throughout the province of British Columbia that a great deal of the lumbering business is carried on there by Japs who first took their post-graduate course through the cookhouse door. The chore boy who has done the chores on the farm is now the man who owns or leases the farm on which he was formerly employed as a servant, and the oncoming hordes which are operating in Canada are glad to do the menial work in connection with that province. So as master and servant we find them working in perfect unison; they are proceeding to roll up the map of western Canada so that one day we shall find that the summit of the Rocky mountains will be the western boundary for the white population of this Dominion. There is no lure on the plains and the prairies of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba for the oriental. It requires brain and muscle, intelligence and patience to farm successfully in that vigorous climate, and the oriental prefers the warm sunshine, the mild climate and the fertile valleys of British Columbia,—British Columbia with its wealth of fisheries, of timber, of agriculture; the California of Canada which fronts on the Pacific whose waves wash the coast of Canada as well as the shores of the Orient.

An unequal contest, Mr. Speaker, is going on in the province of British Columbia. The white man is handicapped by the responsibilities of civilization; the oriental is prepared to struggle for his solitary existence. Organized society has erected a fabric and an institution to which the oriental contributes nothing. He is not concerned in municipal, provincial or federal problems; he is filling a field that would solve the unemployment problem in western Canada. He is the human teredo so far as organized labour is concerned, because he has created an industrial stratum into which the white man cannot descend. If the final occupation and possession of British Columbia is to be determined by such an unequal contest, we from British Columbia decline to enter such a contest. This is our country and we regard this House as the proper tribunal in which to state our case. We ask this House to pass an act for the total and absolute exclusion of all orientals on the ground of pressing economic necessity. If in the considering of this problem the principle of sacrifice is involved, I have no hesitation in saying that I am opposed to the sacrificing of Canadians for the benefit of orientals, or the inhabitants of any other country. If the powers who settled the terms of peace in the Old Country had decided that British Columbia was to be given over to the oriental you would find the people of this country on their feet to a man disputing that proposition; you would find them once more pledging the last man and the last dollar in defence of British territory. Let me say that thirty-three years of knowledge of the conditions in British Columbia justifies me in expressing the belief that unless we deal with this matter we are parting with the province of British Columbia just as effectually as if we gave British Columbia away by signing a treaty.

Mr. CARROLL: I did not wish to interrupt the hon. member's argument while he was speaking but I would like now to ask him a question. Does he argue that we are incapable of contending in commercial life with the Japanese or Chinese? Is that my hon. friend's argument?

Mr. STORK: In reply to my hon. friend I would say that they have a standard of living so much lower than ours that they are gradually absorbing the province of British Columbia.

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Victoria, Alta.): As the seconder of this resolution I would like to say that while it was introduced by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie), and while perhaps the oriental question is more acute in the province of British Columbia at the present time than in any other province of the Dominion, yet I submit the question is one that vitally affects the Dominion as a whole. The hon. member for Prince Rupert (Mr. Stork) who has just taken his seat made the statement that this question did not affect the prairie provinces to the same extent as it did British Columbia. While that is true at present, yet the time is fast approaching when we on the prairies are going to be confronted with the keen competition of the oriental. Permit me to say at the outset that I do not wish to say anything detrimental to the members of the oriental races. But their standard of living is a lower standard than ours, and, therefore, we are not able to compete with them. I am speaking more from the point of view of the prairies and other parts of Canada, because I believe the hon. gentlemen from British Columbia will deal fully with the question as it affects their province. One of the reasons the orientals are not engaged in agriculture on the prairies to-day is that they are too wise to engage in an industry that is being conducted at a loss. I will give the House a few facts regarding the question in Alberta, in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. An oriental living in the town near my farm two years ago purchased a quarter section which contained as fine land as it is possible to obtain in the province. He engaged in mixed farming, that branch of the business which we were told would be a panacea for all our ills. After putting in two years he allowed his farm to go, accepted a loss of $2,000, and, in his own words, stated "It did me no good, no money in farming." If agriculture comes back to the stage where it belongs, to a condition of prosperity, they might take it up. The oriental came into British Columbia in the early days and engaged in the laundry business. We always connected an oriental with the laundry. He worked in the laundry business until to-day, in that province, we find that he has control of that business and of the fishing business; he is fast getting into the lumber business, and fruit farming. As he succeeds in one business he pushes on to other fields, and I do not think the climate will prevent him from coming to the prairies and other parts of Canada, as soon as he sees that he can make a success of it. Coming to Ontario, we find that in Toronto last year $1,820,000 was paid by the public to Chinese laundries. We come to the capital of the Dominion and we find 65 Chinese laundries, 4 grocery stores and 21 restaurants. Out of 21 restaurants 12 are not being conducted in such a way that they would be recognized as Chinese restaurants; they are being conducted under other names. They are called the Metropolitan, Hamilton, Kingston,

Chicago, British, Elgin, New York, Boston and other names. These are the restaurants. Of course the public do not know whom they are patronizing. Coming to Montreal, I find an item in the press of Friday last which reads:

> Found dying in her room at 367 St. Dominique street at ten o'clock last night, a girl, who is known as Anita, passed away before medical attention could be given. It is suspected that the girl died as the result of drug poisoning, and the police are looking for a Chinaman, who is an alleged drug peddler, and who was with the girl some time before she died.

This is a very vital question, Mr. Speaker. We find the Chinese engaged in this drug traffic which is demoralizing the standards of our people. One of the greatest problems before our government to-day is the immigration policy. The Government are trying to decide whom they will admit to this country, and I think we have a perfect right to decide that question. We should give very close consideration to the oriental, with his lower standard of living, and we should consider also the fact that he cannot assimilate with our people. We do not want any class of people in this country who cannot be assimilated and who will not in time make good Canadians. I should like to hear expressions from both sides of the House, because this is not a party question or a sectional or provincial question. We should deal with it in a truly national way. I have much pleasure in seconding the motion.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): I will not attempt to discuss the subject matter of this resolution in detail, but propose to address to the House a few general remarks, and present my own judgment and the conclusions that I have arrived at from experience and actual knowledge of the state of affairs. I do not need to be told by any one of the seriousness of this menace which faces us to--day. If members present are not fully informed on this question, they cannot do better than give an attentive hearing to the members who have come here prepared to discuss this subject from every angle, without partisanship and without a tinge of politics, but to discuss it as Canadians, in view of the effect that it is having and will continue to have on our national life, and to discuss it without any personal antagonism to the Asiatics, coming to Canada, because the more convinced one is of their undesirability in this country the more we must admire them for their good judgment in coming.

[Mr. Lucas.]

The House will not fail to become convinced of the sincerity of hon. members who address it on the subject, when it learns that actually the life blood of constituencies represented here is being sucked out by these orientals, and the commercial life of these constituencies is being undermined. Labour is being, not temporarily, but permanently, thrown out of employment. The standard of living in these constituencies is being reduced. Countless whites, young men and young women, are being mentally and physically ruined by the contact with these orientals.

For my part I need no convincing; I have personally encountered this menace and have seen it grow in volume. I have seen the white man retreat before the menace, as helpless to prevent it, or to hold it back, as he is to prevent the rising tide of the sea. The only thing for the white man to do is to retreat, back up, flee before that tide overwhelms him. Under present conditions it is impossible for him to do otherwise. If hon. members are not seized of this menacing condition of their own knowledge, they cannot fail to be convinced by other hon. gentlemen who to-day, with their fellow-citizens in the various constituencies, are engaged in a struggle for existence against the Asiatics. That fact shows the seriousness of the problem. Being convinced that defensive measures and action are now necessary, I am sure hon gentlemen will not be so remiss in their duty as to delay taking defensive action and taking it forthwith, by supporting the resolution before the House.

The remedy is simple; it is entirely in our hands, as a government, as a Parliament and as a people. Heretofore, the policy of governments in Canada in dealing with this question has been one of "hush, hush." It has been something to be spoken of in whispers, not in plain, understandable language. We were, in an unexplainable way, perhaps, given to understand that if governments did speak up and say what they felt, thought and wanted, some terrible calamity would happen to Canada. Just where this was going to come from was not quite clear; but, at any rate, we were told that we must speak the truth in whispers. In fact, an attempt was made to convince Canada that this was a cross that we must bear without murmuring. I think the time has come to stop this pussy-footing and to deal with this matter squarely, to make it understood by all Canadians, no matter what part of Canada they live in, and further than that, to make the position of Canada clear before the world. Let us take our stand and to maintain it.

It is said that, if orientals were excluded from Canada, a trade boycott would ensue. Well, better lose trade even to the extent of shutting out Chinese eggs than surrender the country. Hon. members may feel that the words "surrender the country" are extravagant. I do not think so. If you turn to British Columbia, you will find large portions of that province, which is a part of Canada, surrendered already to the oriental and completely and wholly under oriental control. Why does this happen in British Columbia? Simply because British Columbia is the outpost nearest to the invading army. If China and Japan were situated to the east of Canada and eastern Canada was nearer to Japan and China than the west and British Columbia, the eastern provinces would be the first to feel the force of the invading army which would spread from east to west instead of from west to east, as the movement is directed now. The invaders are consolidating their position in British Columbia; they have made their way into Alberta and Saskatchewan, and the advance guard is right here in Ottawa making its presence felt. Do not make any mistake about that. Soon, the people of eastern Canada, as the people of British Columbia to-day are, will be battling with these people for an existence. That is what this invasion amounts to. It will soon be too late to rid ourselves of this scourge—and it is nothing less—by any such simple methods as are open to the country to-day.

In my constituency, the Yukon, we have only, I am happy to say, an insignificant number of Japanese and no Chinamen. The Yukon is so situated that people coming into that country by any feasible route are obliged to come through the territory of Alaska, through territory governed by the United States, and the presence of a level-headed immigration officer at practically the only point of ingress gives him an opportunity to use very good judgment as to who shall cross that boundary and who shall not. Consequently, we are not troubled by this class of undesirables. Once upon a time it was reported that a large influx of Chinamen might be expected into the gold fields of the Klondyke. The miners of that district, who are a law-abiding class of people, considered this an event of such importance that it should receive special consideration from them. Consequently, a very large reception committee was appointed to meet those visitors, and it was definitely understood that the members of that committee would not leave behind them that innocent implement of their occupation, the very useful pick-handle. Somehow, the word went out to the Chinamen that they would be met with due ceremony, and for some reason the visitation was postponed and to this day we have not had a Chinaman in the Yukon.

Canada wants settlers; but she wants only settlers who will adopt Canadian and British ideals, people who will become Canadians. We want only races which will intermingle and which can intermarry with our people and become not only with us, but of us. The Asiatics are not of those races. With them, naturalization is nothing more or less than a farce. A naturalized Japanese remains a Jap and a naturalized Chinaman remains a Chink, no matter what forms they may go through in Canada. The Japanese government does not recognize naturalization of its citizens in this country, and they are never released from their allegiance to Japan. Why should we go further?

Some sentimentalist has referred to these people as our "little brown brothers". As a matter of fact, in case some hon. gentleman may think of these people as little, innocent, harmless brown men, let me tell the House that many of them are not little at all, but great, big, hulking giants. I have seen them and know them. But it has been said, with a good deal more practical force—"what about these people for brothers-in-law?" It is all very well to refer to them as brothers; but would any hon. gentleman of this House consider an alliance between a sister or a daughter of his and a Chinaman or a Japanese? Is there an hon. member to whom such an alliance would appeal? That is what will happen if we allow these people to invade our land, to colonize it and to breed as they are doing on our soil. We must face that sooner or later.

Personally, I am strongly in favour of the total exclusion of Asi-

5 p.m. atics, and I would go further; I would advocate expropriating the property of those who are now here and deporting them to the land whence they come. There are enough here now to constitute a serious menace, because they are the advance guard of the forces who are yet to come. Can anything be said in favour of surrendering Canada to the Asiatics?—because that is what our present policy ultimately means. Supposing a million or, perhaps, ten million of these people took it into their heads to come here at once as fast as ships could carry them, would any hon. member hesitate a moment to do everything in his power to stop that movement, to head off that invasion, even by the exercise of the last atom of power and force at his disposal? If so, then why hesitate now to put an end to this peaceful penetration which ultimately means millions and, in the end, surrender? This is a sort of painless method, but it results in the same thing after all. Can Kipling's words: "Daughter am I in my mother's house, but mistress in my own" be more applicable than in referring to Canada's ability to deal with this question herself?

I am convinced that there is no constitutional difficulty in the way, that there will be no rupture of diplomatic relations, and that the power to deal wisely, decisively and effectively with this question has been rightly reserved to Canada. This phase of the case will be made clearer to you by members who will follow me.

Now, admitting that we have the authority, let us be men, let us be Canadians, and let us not turn a deaf ear to that S.O.S. call for help from the people on the front line out there in British Columbia. For that is what it is. If their present plight does not move hon. gentlemen from eastern parts of Canada, let them remember that the condition of the people of the West to-day will be their condition to-morrow. That ought to appeal to them and dispel their apathy. Let them take action forthwith, commencing with the support of this resolution, towards making and keeping Canada a white man's country. It is our country. Should we have to show cause why we should keep it for ourselves and for those that we consider it wise to invite to join us in its development?

I submit that hon. members can do nothing more effective as patriotic Canadians, wishing to keep Canada a white man's country, than by supporting the resolution now before the House.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Burrard): There is an old saying that it is better to see once than to hear a hundred times, I can readily understand the apathy with which this question is received not only by this House, but by the people of Canada, and by the white world, because the great majority of the white world at any rate have not seen, and although they may have heard many times, I am afraid, the appeals fall on deaf or irresponsive ears.

I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a British Columbia question, it is not even a Canadian question, but it is a question which vitally affects the white world to-day. In my opinion the basic factor in the future of the white race is a racial type. That is the basic factor in the future of the Dominion, and if our race is to be mixed with that of an oriental country, we cannot have a racial type. We cannot assimilate the yellow races, nor, as a matter of fact, any colored races. You have only to go back to the earliest history of the white race in confirmation of that statement. We find the white race first in the west Central Asia, that is its cradle, and to-day west Central Asia is a colored country.

Take briefly the history of the white race for the past four hundred years. Going back to 1500 we find that the white race then occupied territorially about 2,000,000 square miles; to-day about 22,000,000—ten times as much; as compared with 31,00,000 occupied by the colored races. Take our own British Isles, in 1500 the population was 3,000,000; in 1900, 45,000,000. And take the growth of Europe, in 1500, 70,000,000; in 1800, 150,000,000; in 1900, 450,000,000—an increase in the 100 years of 400 per cent.

But it is very significant that although the white race increased so tremendously in that hundred year period, it composed only four-tenths of the total population of the world; and more significant still, of a total of 550,000,000 white people throughout the world in 1914, four-fifths occupied one-fifth of the white territorial area. In other words, one-fifth of the total white population occupied four-fifths of the total white area.

Now, there are very significant features connected with that white development during those four hundred years, and the first and most outstanding, I think, is the tremendous expansion politically in that period of the world's history. In 1914 nine-tenths of the total world area was controlled politically by the white race, as compared with one-twenty-fifth in 1500. The world trade had increased from $2,000,000,000 in 1800, to $22,000,000,000 in 1900, and to $40,000,000,000 in 1910.

Those are outstanding features of our development. But the transitory character of that imposing political control is shown by the world war. How many countries were upset politically during four short years of war? Let us look back at the history of Greece and Rome, and how short was the period it took to upset their political control of the world. The same possibilities exist to-day, and we have only to review the last twenty years of our history to show the seriousness of the present situation in regard to the white race.

I think the first and most outstanding feature is the declining birthrate. And unfortunately the most useful part of our stock is not propagating; it is the least useful that is increasing in numbers. The result can mean only one thing—race deterioration.

The second outstanding feature is the effect of the result of the Russo-Japanese war of 1904 upon the oriental mind, and I venture to say that it will prove to be one of the turning-points of world history. The effect upon the oriental mind is something that we have not yet comprehended. It showed the oriental that the white man, even in war, is not deteriorating. And then we had what we all call the Great War, but which might be called the white civil war, because as a result of it fifty million white persons laid down their lives. Think of the effect on future generations of having so many of our best men killed off and having thousands who lived so impaired in health as to be under a great disadvantage in life. Turning to the present day, you find the white races torn with domestic dissension. On the other hand, what do we find on the part of the oriental countries? There is no perceptible decline in the birth rate; on the contrary, we find that the population of Japan is increasing at the rate of 800,000 per annum. They must, therefore, have an outlet for their surplus population; and the same is true of China. Now, this is the question we must ask ourselves: What are the openings for immigration from those countries? There is the island to the north of Japan, Hokkaido; there is Formosa, Korea, Manchuria, Mongolia, Chinese Turkestan, North and South America, Australia, and the islands, peninsulas, and so on between China and Australia. For some generations at any rate, these countries will provide a field for Chinese immigrants, but not so with Japan, because all these countries, with the exception of the Americas and Australia, are subject to extremes of climate. Japan is a country which is temperate in climate, and so far the Japanese have not emigrated to countries or sections of countries with extreme climates. Their eyes, therefore, are turned to-day upon the United States, Canada—largely the Pacific Coast—and portions of South America and Australia. I submit we must take our stand on this question and take it at once. We must be firm; we must be clear and definite in our policy. If we do that we shall be respected; if we do not, we shall be treated contemptuously. If hon. members are interested in the ambitions of the oriental countries to-day I would refer them to a book which has been published this year, entitled "The Rising Tide of Colour," by Lothrop Stoddard. It contains a complete analysis of the subject, and deals with the ambitions of those races in a clear, interesting and illuminating manner.

When I refer, Mr. Speaker, to this menace that we are facing I do not look at it from a military point of view. It is not the conquest of our country by a coloured army that is to be feared so much as that enduring conquest which is bound to result from unlimited immigration into a white country. It is a matter for the white race, particularly the Canadian white race, to consider and deal with now before the menace becomes such that our whole country is more seriously threatened than it is to-day. I am in entire agreement with my fellow members from British Columbia, and I sincerely hope that this House will take the matter firmly in hand without delay.

Mr. C. H. DICKIE (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, earlier in the session I unburdened my soul to some extent with respect to the question of the exclusion of orientals as viewed by one who comes from the Pacific coast. During a residence of nearly forty years in that part of the country I have had numerous opportunities of observing the oriental and the effect which his immigration to the Pacific coast has had on our national life. Previous speakers have dealt fully with this matter and I associate myself with all that has been said, except, possibly, the suggestions which have been made as to the deportations of Japanese; it cannot be conceded that that is possible at the present time.

As to the Anglo-Japanese alliance, I never quite realized just what it meant until early in the war when the Pacific coast was in danger of invasion by the German warships Nuremberg and Scharnhorst. The people in Victoria, my home city, were alarmed for fear these warships would make a raid on the city. We had at that time an obsolete warship called the Rainbow, and two submarines, but we were not sanguine as to the result of an engagement, should one occur, between them and one of the up-to-date German warships. South of us there were warships belonging to our American cousins, but they were swinging indolently on their anchors and we began to think that the words—"blood is thicker than water" were meaningless. However, on the morning of the 23rd of August there came steaming into the harbour of Victoria the battleship Idzuma, an up-to-date armoured cruiser, swarming with little brown men, and we gave a mighty cheer for Japan when we saw that ship; we knew then that we should receive ample protection. Five days later the Newcastle came in, followed by two more ships of the Japanese navy and then, Sir, we in British Columbia realized the importance of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. This question is a very important one indeed; it must be dealt with diplomatically and not by demagogues, otherwise the danger will be great. We are not allowed privileges in Japan which we concede to the Japanese people in this country. Although the difficulties are great, I have no doubt that an arrangement could be entered into with Japan that would ameliorate our condition with respect to this invasion.

It is impossible for us to compete with the Japanese in British Columbia. People say: Why, you are of the white race; you are a virile people; can you not compete with the Japanese? We cannot compete with them for this reason: their standard of living is away below ours, and they work, men, women and children, all hours, and longer hours than our labouring men will work, longer than we would want them to work. They have a community of interest and of activities to themselves. They work together with one aim in view, and work incessantly. We cannot compete with them industrially, we cannot compete with them agriculturally. They are entering into every line of our business, and we of British Columbia who have lived there so long want to retain that country for the white man. I remember distinctly having to leave the province of Ontario many years ago. I left there because at that time the manufacturing interests in Ontario could not compete with our southern neighbours and many of us, indeed, the majority of the young men of Ontario and the maritime provinces, went into American territory because better opportunities awaited us there than were to be had in Canada, and six out of every ten of those people who went were of Scottish descent, and when a Scotchman has to leave a country there is something wrong with its economic conditions. I remember some longshoremen stood on the wharf at Victoria one day watching a ship go by. One of them said, "It is a Norwegian ship," another said "It looks like a German," but an Irishman said "It is a Scotch ship." They asked him why, and Pat said "It must be Scotch because there are no sea gulls following it."

I believe that an immigration policy can be enacted that will keep from obtaining a foothold in our country people with whose descendants our descendants cannot intermarry. We cannot conceive of a commingling of the blood of our Canadians with that of the Ethiopians; we cannot conceive of a commingling of our blood with that of Asiatics. The little Jap desires to keep his blood pure just as we Canadians do. I have spent some time in Japan and I know that the Eurasian, part European and part Japanese, is simply persona non grata among the educated classes; he is not even respected by the coolie classes. They wish to preserve their race pure and, as the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Black) told us, they will be Japanese for all generations. They come to our country, they have a right to come here, and I have a great admiration for these little people, but we cannot withstand their incursions. We or our descendants must either leave the country, or they must be prevented from coming in. Even though not another Japanese came to our country, we have still a stupendous problem on our hands in British Columbia. We have a tremendous birthrate among the Japanese that are there. It has been estimated that in nine years from now there will be as many Japanese children born in British Columbia as white children. You can realize what that means in a country such as we have, hemmed in with lofty mountains, with not too much arable land, and with the Japanese scattered along the coast. We can never have a dense population in British Columbia, and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that if we allowed the Japanese to come in unchecked for two years, they would simply drive every white man out of British Columbia with the exception of those engaged in transportation and matters of that kind. I never could see where it was possible for a white man to succeed in Japan except in some financial institution or with some transportation system.

I know the psychology of the Jap fairly well, I think, as well as most people know it. It is said by people who have sojourned in Japan that you go there for a week and write a book on the country; you remain a year, and you write a magazine article; and if you stay there indefinitely, you do not know what to write. Nobody understands the Japanese or the oriental mind except they themselves. They look at things differently from us. We can never look at things through their eyes, and they can never look at things through our eyes. There is one thing, however, that the Japanese do respect, and this is straightforward dealing. That is one reason why the Japanese are sincere admirers of Great Britain and her institutions, and I say that in dealing with these gentlemen we should play the game, lay our cards on the table face up, and tell them we cannot compete with them, that their entry is against the interests of our country. We cannot concede them privileges which they do not extend to us. We cannot let them come because they will inevitably displace our race. We can say to them "There are thousands of you engaged profitably in industry here to-day; we have thousands of idle white men walking up and down our streets looking for work, with their families at home in want. We cannot stand that. You would not stand these things." They will realize the sense of that position. No Chinaman who will work for less than a Jap would be allowed to work in Japan. The Japanese would not stand for twenty-four hours what we have stood from them. They are reasonable men, astute men, wise men of the East, who will understand this thing if it is put to them right. But do not let us put it to them through the mouth of a demagogue. Let some big man whom they respect—I know the type of men they do respect—go to them wide open and explain the case to them; tell them that because of their community of interest and of activities it is impossible for a cosmopolitan race such as we have in Canada to compete with them. Let him show them by figures that in ten years they would conquer British Columbia by peaceful invasion. There would be no trouble. Great Britain could not object, and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I do not believe for one moment the Japanese would object. In that little country of Japan, fifty years ago, they had 33,000,000 people; to-day, they have 57,000,000. For Japan's population to remain stationary, hundreds of thousands of people must leave the country each year, and they have been doing that. The island of Formosa has been densely populated by them during the last five years. The Hawaiian islands, which hoped a very few years ago to attain statehood with the United States, have given up all hope of that because the Japanese absolutely control their industrial and economic life, and it is said that in five years more the Japanese will own every sugar plantation in the Hawaiian islands. In the Philippine islands they also dominate the economic life. It is very doubtful indeed if the Philippine islands will ever be given their freedom, as was expected they would shortly after the United States took possession of that country. We have the Japanese in Chili, and in California to an alarming extent. We have them coming to our own country on the Pacific. They must spread, and they are spreading. They have taken Korea. They simply must spread, but we do not want to give them that most lovely part of the Canadian Dominion, Vancouver island and the southern portion of British Columbia. It is the choicest part of God's footstool to-day, a country of lovely valleys where, in Byron's words, "The mountains look on Marathon and Marathon looks on the sea"—that country laved by the waves of the Pacific redolent with memories of the tales of Robert Louis Stevenson and other great writers. There is a sub-tropic atmosphere around the southern portion of British Columbia that cannot be explained, and I can only described its effect in this way: I have never known a man or woman live there for ten years who would live anywhere else afterwards. I have known men from the Old Country and from India come to British Columbia and become dissatisfied with the economic conditions—they could not get cheap help in their houses to which they were accustomed—and return disgusted to India or England, but invariably they came back to southern British Columbia. That is a great tribute to our country.

We want to reserve that country for the poor as well as for the affluent of our race. We want to retain it for a white population. We want it as a breathing ground, a pleasant land to which our people can retire from the less congenial climate of the prairies if they care to do so. If they do come we will gladly welcome them to British Columbia. But I can assure you, Sir, that this question is a very serious one—more serious, I think, than is realized by the people of this country as a whole. I say it with all respect to these industrious, virile little people, the Japanese. I admire the Japanese and nobody can help but respect the Chinese for their unceasing industry. They attend to their business, they mind their own affairs, and invariably succeed. As I say, if we stop them we shall still have our troubles with a certain proportion of our white people. I yield to none in respect for the character of the white workingmen of British Columbia, with the exception of a few that are easily influenced and led astray by the specious arguments of soap box orators, and others, who are trying to instill into them an insidious and pernicious doctrine calculated to tear down the institutions of our country. But, Sir, the white people who cause us trouble are in a minority in that province. Nevertheless, before we allow the orientals to pour into that province we certainly should consider the great future of British Columbia, and take the necessary steps to preserve that valuable heritage for our people.

Mr. L. W. HUMPHREY (West Kootenay): I have the honour to represent a constituency in British Columbia which is close to the eastern border of that province, and would like to take time to explain the situation which has developed locally and the position in which the people of West Kootenay find themselves owing to the invasion of orientals into our province. Situated on the eastern border of the province we feel that we can speak with authority upon that invasion, more particularly as to the effect of the birth rate and the operations of the immigration law. First of all, we find that we in the eastern part of the province are now in the same position that our fellow-citizens on the coast were in a few years ago. We find that the orientals are crowding farther east and looking for more territory in which to expand. It was only a short time ago that we in eastern British Columbia felt that we were not very directly affected by the movement of orientals and not directly interested. The movement eastward of the orientals of recent years and their encroachment on territory within West Kootenay itself have been brought home to us with such force as to make us realize that it is not a local question, nor a provincial matter, but a national issue, with which the federal authorities must deal. I would like to speak particularly upon the question of the urgency of an exclusion policy. Is it not true that if Canada were in danger of being invaded by orientals, or by white races seeking to gain control of this Dominion to the great detriment of our population of eight and a quarter millions, that we should take immediate steps to put in force a policy of prohibition or exclusion? That is the situation, I believe, which threatens us to-day. That is the great issue we are confronted with in the future unless steps are speedily taken to offset the threatened movement. As previous speakers have explained measures will have to be taken to stop the immigration of oriental and the growth of that population within the country. Otherwise the time will not be long in coming when we shall cease to have a white Canada. I entirely agree with the terms of the resolution and endorse it most heartily. In my opinion the day has arrived when legislation along the lines indicated must be enacted if we wish to preserve this country for the white race. I believe the day is past when we can depend upon merely restrictive measures, or when we should have recourse to "Gentleman's Agreements" in handling this question. What we must decide upon is a policy of exclusion or prohibition.

Let me endeavour briefly to describe the local conditions in West Kootenay, and I believe that in the statements I have to make I shall be voicing the opinions of the white residents of that constituency. Speaking as a returned soldier, upon coming back to Canada after a service of four years service overseas, the inroads that the orientals had made during the great war at the expense of loyal Canadians heartily sympathetic to our cause were very noticeable to myself and my companions. When the great struggle in Europe began orientals were not present in excessive numbers in the eastern part of British Columbia. Returning when the war was over, we found they had appeared in great numbers and I as a returned man, voicing the sentiments of returned men, object to the condition in West Kootenay such as we find existing to-day. We find that orientals have secured greater control of our natural resources and have improved their position to such an extent that they are better off financially than the average citizen of British Columbia. They took advantage of the war period, when wages were high and labour scarce, to secure a footing in different industries to the extent that it is almost impossible to dislodge them to-day from places which should be occupied by returned men. From another angle we believe that it is a deplorable state in which to find our country, especially for those who sacrificed themselves during the war, looking that good might come, looking to protect our Dominion from invasion, from the democratic point of view, looking to make it a better Canada for Canadians. We believe it is not a healthy state that these conditions should exist in Canada to-day. We cannot believe that this is what our soldiers made sacrifices for,—that at the conclusion of the war the yellow races might benefit. These facts have been set out by the previous speakers to-day, and each fact can be substantiated. It is not a healthy condition or a healthy atmosphere from a national point of view. Unless legislation is enacted as soon as possible it will only be a short time when Canada will not be a white man's country, but the greater percentage of control will be, as in British Columbia at the present time, in the hands of the yellow race.

I desire to present for the benefit of hon. members the conditions in respect to the unemployment situation. I believe we can attribute the unemployment situation to a certain extent to the laxity of our laws in connection with the increase of population of Chinese and Japanese. The figures show that seventy per cent of the unemployed throughout the Dominion of Canada are returned soldiers. We find that in the province of British Columbia to-day that there are very few unemployed orientals, and the figures given by previous speakers show that the number of orientals in that province is very large. I hope the present Government will see their way clear to enact such legislation as will bring relief to us in British Columbia, for the benefit of the Dominion, because I believe it will be in the best interests of this country. If such legislation is enacted, it will overcome, not only one phase of the difficulty but a great many, and will remedy the economic conditions in regard to unemployment. It will create a greater market for our labourers, and will give us better control of farm and fruit lands, and will prevent the orientals getting control of our natural resources.

I wish to repeat that I agree with the resolution in its entirety and take great pleasure in supporting it.

Mr. E. J. McMURRAY (North Winnipeg): I am glad to say that I can support this resolution and yet not be obliged to resort to distasteful methods in condemnation of the oriental people. In common with the hon. member from Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) I can bear tribute to the many fine qualities of the Japanese and Chinese. The patriotism of the Japanese is marked. The integrity of the Chinaman is pronounced. But we must look at this question from the point of view of its great national importance to us. Canada is a young nation, and compared with other nations is merely in its infancy. The nations that succeed are those that have been built up slowly of one homogeneous people. The nations that have stood the test of the late war in Europe have been those that were composed of one stock, French, British and German. Those nations have stood the test, but the conglomerate and polyglot nations of Europe, such as Austria, composed of all sorts of elements, dwindled and smashed before the force of the war. It will take us hundreds and hundreds of years to develop our national resources. It will take us a far longer time to build up a distinctly Canadian type which must come in the process of time, and that type must be absolutely homogeneous. Without that it cannot survive. A rock washed by the waves, of the ocean, if it is not composed of one element, sooner or later will disintegrate. And so it is with the nations; if a nation is not built of one stock and woven together into a national fabricate, it will sooner or later crumble. As to the Japanese and Chinese, they have a great illustrious history. They have been great because they are of one stock; they are unconquerable as nations, because they are of that stock; but there is a vast chasm in every way between the oriental and the occidental. We have only to think of the western people, who, for instance, reside in India. We see the officials there longing for furlough home. We see the merchant there acquiring, at as rapid a rate as possible, his fortune, in order that he may leave the country and go home. We find the planter there overcoming the monotony of the time with his whiskey and his black cigar. We see the people there running frantically to all kinds of sport to wear away the dull edge of time, longing to get back to the western world. For three or four hundred years our people over there have never entered into the life of the nationality of the country. You will find that is the case in the occidental colonies in Yokohama, Hong Kong, Calcutta—everywhere throughout the eastern world. That vast chasm exists to-day in thought, in tongue, in physical form and colour. These people can never, or will never, intermingle and intermarry with our people. The descendants of Chinamen and Japanese coming to this country will be Chinamen and Japanese respectively in five hundred years from now; there will be no difference. The money that an oriental earns in this country goes back to his native land, and after his death his very bones are taken back to the sacred soil that gave him birth.

There has been no amalgamation of these people in any shape or form into our national fabric; there can never be any. At the present time, our complaint against them is probably on account of their industry, and that has been borne out here. But whatever attributes they may have that are essential, they are producing in this country at the present time, particularly on the west coast, a condition of affairs in which our people cannot compete at all. They are not, however, going to be limited to the west coast; they are already crossing over the mountains. If you go through any small town in western Canada, you will find those people more abundantly in evidence as the years go by.

Thus, there is the future to be considered. The China of to-day is not the China of twenty years ago. The China of to-day is looking out over the world. Twenty years ago, the Chinese soldier was armed with a quilted coat, a steel pot and a long pole. To-day, Chinese armies are battling around Peking, fully equipped armies, armed with machine guns and aeroplanes. There is no enmity between this country and Japan, or between this country and the oriental; but if these people come here, in years to come, there may be a difficult question to settle; and, just as good friends sometimes, at election times, keep away from visiting each other for fear troubles may come, it would be well that the oriental races and the occidental race represented by Canada should recognize that there may be a difficulty here some day; that it must almost inevitably come on account of the people of the Orient settling in this country. We must settle this question, and I think, if we put it fairly in a diplomatic and reasonable way to the people of the Orient, they will appreciate that the settlement of this question at as early a date as possible may relieve a very dangerous situation in the future, not long distant or long distant, who knows? But this question is a cause of irritation and a danger to us. Kipling has said:

> East is East and West is West,
> And never they twain shall meet.

The difficulty is that they may meet some day in the future. Whether they will meet or will not meet, it is certain they will not mix, and I think that is the view that Australia and New Zealand have, that you cannot build up a strong national people unless you build them of homeogeneous elements; that your immigrant coming into this country must have one absolute feature, that he can be welded into the national character and woven into the national fabric, politically, socially and in every other way.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, we have had various aspects of the Asiatic question dealt with in the course of this debate, and before it is concluded other speakers will deal with its economic and political aspects, as well as with certain of its social phases. My particular part in this debate relates to the sociological aspect of Asiatic immigration —the forces which influence and determine the organization and development of the social group.

I submit that perhaps no feature of this question is more important than that of assimilation. In the European countries you will find certain racial differences so far as origin is concerned. For instance, you will find in France that the northerner differs considerably from the southerner; in Switzerland you will find citizens of French, German and Italian origin, each group maintaining their mother tongue, but all capable of assimilation; you will find in Belgium the Walloons and the Flemings, each a distinct type, but all Belgian citizens with a common outlook on national affairs; even in Great Britain you have the English, the Scotch, the Welsh—and, I might still add, you have the Irish, although some people do not agree as to that.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You have the French also.

Mr. LADNER: In Great Britain?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. LADNER: Well, we have the French very near. They are a welcome race, no matter where we find them. Now, I submit that in order to have national harmony, the people must hold in common such great fundamentals of nationhood as, national ideals and aims, the Christian religion, race tradition—the colour and habits of the race, and, perhaps, most important of all from the standpoint of immigration, the practice of intermarriage. These are powerful sociological forces which make possible and bring about national harmony.

We read in Wells' "Outline of History" that most of these races trace their origin back to twelve thousand centuries ago, and they have been gradually differentiating until to-day we have the various races which now people the world. During the five thousand years of their recorded history we know that Japan and China have maintained their national characteristics, and although they have lived side by side they have not intermarried, nor has it been possible for them to assimilate with each other. If that is so with those two nations, how much more so is it as between Asiatic peoples on the one hand and those of Anglo-Saxon stock on the other? We need only look at the past, and, taking our lessons from history, adopt a sound and sane policy for the future, although it may be intertwined with certain international difficulties at the outset.

The Eurasian, produced by the union between the white and brown races, has no social standing on either side of the Pacific. We all respect Japan as a nation and the splendid qualities of her people, likewise we must respect the good qualities of the Chinese; but it is the coming into this country of a particular section of those peoples, of the Mongolians and the lower educated classes, which has produced the educational and other problems that we are faced with to-day.

In order to indicate the difficulties with which the West is confronted, and with which the whole of Canada will sooner or later be confronted if this question is not dealt with promptly and satisfactorily, I have decided to refer for a few minutes to the ramifications of the drug traffic throughout Canada as disclosed by investigations conducted by committees in various parts of the country. The lowest dives, harbouring the lowest moral depravity, are found in the Chinese quarters of our cities. The drug traffic is organized like any large business. At the head of it are trained and capable men, and they have their financiers, their importers, their wholesalers, their retailers, and even their street peddlers. Drugs in large quantities come to this country from China and Japan by our Pacific liners. In some cases the drug is secreted by members of the crew, who smuggle it on shore in small quantities. In other cases barrels of narcotics are dumped off the great liners as they pass south of Vancouver island. A speedy launch goes out, picks up the floating barrels, and takes them to some spot among the islands; in that way the drug is brought into the country. It is then given to men whose special and only business is to distribute it in large quantities. This business is mostly engaged in by Chinese and Japanese —not so much by the Japanese; I should not say that, but almost entirely by Chinese. The men engaged in the business, the men who sell the drugs, do not take it themselves, because they see the awful human wrecks which are the result of the use of narcotics. In a cold, calculating way, therefore, these men carry on this nefarious business, distributing the drugs throughout the community.

I would like to make it understood that these observations are not merely of a general character based on guesswork. The statements which I am about to make are founded upon official reports; upon information gathered by a citizens' committee appointed in the city of Vancouver, and upon information which I have collected from police authorities all the way from Vancouver to Halifax. Before giving some illustrations, let me explain, having touched upon the system of distribution, how the market is extended; how consumers are induced to take the drug; how they are inveigled into the practice until they become incapable of exercising their own will. What is known as "snow parties" are held. Chinamen of great wealth, engaged in this odious practice, and living in expensive, luxurious quarters, give parties at which white women, whom they employ, act as hostesses. Young girls are invited from about the city to take part in these so-called social functions—perhaps a dance, perhaps a card party; something of that kind. Interspersed among these young people are two or three addicts who are trained and whose business it is to inveigle other people into the use of narcotics. It is established beyond question that these parties take place periodically; that cocaine which is under strength is used to induce young people to acquire the habit. They are dared to take it, just as they would be dared to jump across a ditch, or some other such trifling thing. They are dared to smell this stuff—a small quantity of it on a knife or spoon, and in that way the first step is taken. Before my remarks are finished, I hope, with proper reluctance and due regard to the dignity of this House, to describe to you the depths to which addicts to the drug can go and to point out that one of the chief causes of this terrible traffic arises out of the intercourse between China and Canada and through the medium of the Chinese who are engaged in it.

I received a letter last week from the secretary of the Asiatic Exclusion League of Canada, the honorary president of which is Brigadier General A. D. McRae. In his concluding words referring to the illegal drug traffic, the secretary says:

> Here we have a disease, one of many directly traceable to the Asiatic. Do away with the Asiatic and you have more than saved the souls and bodies of thousands of young men and women who are yearly being sent to a living hell and to the grave though their presence in Canada.

We have received certain information through the police officials. In Okalla prison, the largest in British Columbia, during the spring of 1921 out of 320 inmates 110 were drug addicts As I mentioned a moment ago, the citizens' committee, at the head of which is one of the best known citizens of Vancouver, employed nurses and detectives in their investigations. One of the men who assisted them was a theatre owner, an actor by profession and a man philanthropically disposed, who took advantage of his talent and ability as an actor to disguise himself in the dress of a drug addict. He went about Vancouver and other cities as well, and in that way he gained the confidence of some of the men engaged in this traffic and discovered things that the police would not have found out in a thousand years. He found that within a block of his own theatre he could buy, in an illegal way, large quantities of narcotic drugs from Chinese who carried on the business in their laundries, tailor shops, jewelry shops and establishments of that kind.

The results of these findings are exceedingly interesting. It was found that much of the illegal drug importation comes from China and Japan and that the drug traffic was increasing all over Canada. The police reports that we have gathered corroborate that. The drugs are usually retailed in Chinese stores, laundry or tailor shops, and many other kinds of establishments. Now, in order that the House may be apprised of the extent to which this work is undertaken and the terrible condition of affairs brought about by it—and it applies not only to Vancouver; these drug addicts move all over the North American continent; we found the trade was carried on in all cities right through to Halifax—I will give you some actual cases. I will not, of course, give the names, but I will state the facts in the best manner that I can, considering the nature of the cases.

[Mr. Ladner.]

One girl of sixteen became a user of morphine and cocaine and was associated with Chinese, Japanese and Hindus. She appeared before the committee of investigation and on that very morning she had yielded to Chinese, Japanese and Hindus in order to gain $5.50 with which to purchase drugs. I have here a list of several pages of individual cases which were investigated, and the facts were not only testified to by the addicts themselves but confirmed by corroborative evidence. A girl of twenty-three, through the use of morphine and cocaine, had a child by a Chinaman named Pete Kong, a notorious Chinese drug peddler. She injected morphine into the infant with a hypo needle until it died—her mind being so distorted. I am only giving some of the cases from this list which it is possible to divulge under the circumstances. It was found that the traffic was indulged in not only by persons who might be designated as among the lower classes, the uninformed or uneducated classes, but through the machinations of this organization people from the very best families became addicts. Here is the case of a woman who was a clergyman's daughter, accomplished in music, well educated. She is a subject of morphine and cocaine; she is associated with Chinamen, and at present is serving a jail sentence. There is a large list of names here, but I will conclude with one case, that of a man who is related to one of the best known public men in Canada. He served with the Princess Pats overseas, was badly wounded, and on his return to Vancouver got into the Chinese quarter and became a dope fiend; now his business is going around and carrying out a function known as "filling orders". A telephone message comes in giving a certain order, and he goes out and fills it—administers a hypodermic injection for which he charges a dollar, or something of that kind. I have a case here of another woman who actually spends from $10 to $30 a day for drugs, and a Chinaman named J. J. Wing secured from $2,500 to $3,000 worth of jewelry and furs from her. This came out in evidence in a lawsuit instituted by the woman for the recovery of the stolen articles.

In another list which I have before me there is an account of thirty-one cases which were investigated. They were taken in order as they came before the court, and twenty-one of the thirty-one cases were Chinese, so hon. members will see the extent to which these people are engaged in the traffic. From the moral and sociological standpoint alone, if from no other, these immigrants are of such a class that we would be a thousand times better off without them irrespective of their effect on our economic, commercial and industrial life.

In conclusion, I shall read a letter which was written to the secretary of the Asiatic Exclusion League of Canada, and forwarded to me. It is from a Japanese in Vancouver, and I read it in order to show the mental attitude of these people towards our country. Hon. members will note the irony and invective which runs through this letter.

CHAS. L. MACAULEY,
306 Tower Bldg,
Vancouver, B.C.

Dear Sir,—I read with interest "Danger".

That is the small publication issued on behalf of the Asiatic Exclusion League. The letter goes on:

I paid 20 cent. One hundred Japanese read it, very cheap.

The first step very good. Getting his start very poor insult to our government and very insulting to the individual Japanese.

We Japanese are a nation like the English, the Scotch, or the Irish, but not like the latter altogether, we have abolished bigotry. If you like we are like the German, we are a nation, we love our country first and foremost. We love riches, and all that riches will bring, but we will not sell our country for money.

Hon. gentlemen will not find a case where a Japanese has been caught selling his country for money.

You never hear of a Japanese traitor. In Canada you have many traitors. In the United States there are many traitors because you are only people and have not nationhood.

That is the point. He goes on:

In China they allow all deceitful and crooked men to govern, so in Canada.

Mr. GRAHAM: The letter must be a very old one. What is the date?

Mr. LADNER: The 6th of December. He goes on:

We Japanese did not force our way to Canada. Your money changers ask us to come, we were cheap. O yes very cheap. In Japan our government is honourable. One member who does dishonour to his country must die by his own hand if possible, but he must die. In Canada your government is different, one member sells his people and he is soon great like our merchants trading in commerce, but our merchants do not sell Japan or the people, they sell merchandise. Japanese merchandise always, if possible. Your members sell their soul and their land, and the people, and when the election is over half the people cry with joy for one week and then they cry for four years. Is this not so, Mr. Macauley? We do not hate Canadians, the clown and the jester is never hated.

We Japanese living in the province and making an honourable living will watch your political pantomime with interest. When you become a real nation we will do good business with you still and you will admire us more.

Very truly,

SATO.

I can conceive of no stronger argument for the necessity of fortifying ourselves in the building up of our nation than the attitude disclosed by this Japanese living in British Columbia. If we are to become a nation, and have an outlook and a permanent place in history, we can well profit by the lessons of other nations who have built before us. It is not necessary for us to jump in the dark, because we have the light of history to guide us, showing how nations have developed in the past. I submit that the Government and all members of the House, irrespective of their political affiliations and looking only to the real interests of this country, can by adopting this resolution lay the foundation of a policy which will overcome the international obstacles and enable us to emerge twenty-five years hence a real Canadian nation, with a white country, instead of a mixture that we would not be very proud of.

Mr. T. G. McBRIDE (Cariboo): It is not my intention to take up very much time this evening, as many aspects of this question have already been dealt with. When I spoke in the debate on the Speech from the Throne I made the statement that one of the most important questions that could come before the House this session was the oriental question. I repeat that statement here to-night. I stated then that it was hard for the people in the East to realize fully what the people in the West were up against in this oriental problem. The people who have to live and associate and compete with the Orient are the people who know what a menace the oriental is to our country. People in the East speak of Vancouver as the gateway to the Orient: the Orient speaks of Vancouver as their gateway to Canada.

Ship captains who have sailed the seven seas speak of the port of Vancouver as the best harbour they have ever entered. Tourists speak of the sunny slopes of the Pacific as the land of sunshine, the California of Canada, a land loved by all who dwell there. Why should we, with a country like that on our Pacific coast turn it over to the Orient, and that is what will happen in the future if the laws of this country continue as they are at the present time. It seems to me that every person who has the vision of a greater Canada should try and keep British Columbia a land for the white race to dwell in, and not turn it over to the Orient. People who live in the West know from experience that if immigration of the Asiatic race is not checked and if the tide of immigration flows as it has in the past, the time will soon come when the white race will have to retreat across the Rocky mountains and British Columbia will be left in the hands of the Orient. The present state of affairs has only to continue for a short time for that day to come. I ask who will be responsible for that state of affairs? It will be the members sitting in this House to-night who will be responsible if they do not enact laws here that will stop oriental immigration to our shores. Why cannot that be done now, and done once for all?

The increasing tide of oriental immigration at the present time is striking at the very root of our civilization. It is tearing the foundations from beneath our home life, and home life reflects itself upon a nation; it always reflects itself upon the prosperity of a nation. We cannot have an A-1 country and a C-3 class of people. It is against all laws of economy to expect such a thing. Home life either makes children good citizens or a public nuisance; and I say that so long as the working man in this country is forced to compete with the oriental they cannot have in Canada the home life he ought to have. Our workingmen cannot even have the semblance of home life if they have to compete with Asiatics. Why should not the interests of the Canadian people come first? Why should we have to cater to the Asiatic? Why should we allow these people to land on our shores? Let us look for a moment at the manner in which the Japanese treat white men when they go to Japan and let me say in this connection that I am not going to make statements that cannot be verified. There was a man named Mr. C. J. Kirkpatrick, formerly of the Royal Naval Service but who for five years was employed as a civil engineer at Yokohama by the Japanese government. Let us hear what he says about what the white people are up against in Japan. This gentleman declares "There is absolutely no law for the white man in Japan." He goes on to make several other statements. He tells of a practice on the part of the Japanese rickshaw men of demanding a fee of 25 yen for carrying a European or an American whereas they only ask 5 yen for carrying a Japanese. Imagine what an outcry there would be if we were to extort 25 cents from the Japanese or the Chinese on our street cars, and only charge our own people 5 cents. That would be discriminating against the Asiatic race, they would tell us. Well, that is the kind of discrimination which is carried on in Japan against the whites.

A few months ago a Mrs. J. Gray, wife of an accountant in the Lane-Crawford Company, a large wholesale establishment in Yokohama, refused to pay what she considered an exorbitant fee demanded by the rickshaw men. What happened? One of the men caught hold of the lady, twisted her arm and abused her in a most shameful way, and because her husband interfered he was summoned before the courts. Notwithstanding the evidence, which was wholly against the rickshaw men Mr. Gray was convicted of a criminal offence, and only escaped a sentence of six months in a filthy Japanese prison by the whole white population of Yokohama going to the authorities and offering an apology.

Mr. Kirkpatrick has made the statement that at the time of the riots in Vancouver some of the citizens of Japan boasted that if they did not get the same rights in Canada as the white people, the Japanese in Vancouver would cut the water mains and set fire to the city. They further declared that if the military were called out they were well prepared to take care of themselves. I have no doubt of the accuracy in the main of the latter statement, bearing in mind that all the Japanese who come to Canada are trained, either in the navy or in the army, before they are allowed to leave the Empire.

At the present time the Japanese companies are making a determined effort to secure control of the Pacific shipping and the Japanese government is giving—or at least it was a year ago—a subsidy to help these companies to control the shipping. Now what are the orientals doing in Canada? On the Pacific coast they are driving the white men and women from the most fertile valleys we have, and at present they control over 27,000 acres of the best land in British Columbia. Some years ago Chinamen started in peddling vegetables from door to door in Vancouver and Victoria, underselling the white man in every case. Finally they drove the white man to the wall and to-day the people of these cities are paying more for vegetables than is paid in any other city on the Pacific coast. The reason of that is that the oriental is in control of the market. Out of nineteen firms classified as retail and wholesale vegetable dealers in the telephone directory of Vancouver eighteen of them are under oriental names. The orientals are also getting well advanced in many other lines. Take, for instance, the wholesale and retail merchants of the city of Vancouver. Over 300 of them are orientals, and this number does not include Asiatics trading under the names of white men. A number of these firms combine together and purchase at wholesale prices. Then they retail the products bought in this way to the oriental restaurants at the wholesale rate. This is gradually driving the white men who are trying to run restaurants out of business. It is a very effective way of killing opposition.

What are they doing in the case of the logging camps all along the coast in which employment was given to hundreds and thousands of men? Over forty logging camps on the Pacific coast are controlled and operated by the Japanese. How can white men compete with orientals who can board themselves for twenty-five or thirty cents a day and live in shacks not fit for human beings to dwell in? Surely the people of Canada do not want to allow into this country a class of immigration that will lower the standard of living for the workingman. Why should the laws of this country not be such that they would raise rather than lower the standard of living of the workingman. The workingmen and women of this country are the backbone of Canada. No country can long continue in the forefront whose people are not workers.

The white people in the West are waiting to see what the members of this House are going to do about this question. The fishermen on the Pacific coast are eagerly waiting to see the stand this House will take on the oriental question; and the farmer and his family, who realize that they will finally be run out of house and home by the oriental if the immigration laws of this country are not changed, are eagerly waiting to see whether this Government is or is not going to take some action. The lumbermen and the logger are eagerly waiting to see whether they will get a square deal at the hands of this Government. The laundrymen, who employ hundreds of our boys and girls, are eagerly looking for action on the part of this Government. The small merchant is also eagerly expectant of action. The young girl, who, through lack of employment, is forced to work in the restaurant with some of these orientals, is eagerly looking to see what the members of this House are going to do on this question. The mother of the little school girl—dear to her as life itself—is anxious to know if any relief is in sight, or if she will still have to continue sending her little one to school to sit in the same seat and associate with oriental boys twice her age. Yes, and the little girl herself who resents such company wants to see a change brought about. If this Government takes hold of this situation and passes legislation that will stop orientals entering this country they will have done more for Canada than any other government that was ever entrusted with the administration of public affairs in the Dominion.

Why should this Government not assume the responsibility and put an end to this at once? Why should it not assume the responsibility the people sent it here to assume? I will admit that you can educate the orientals, but it is simply like painting a pump to purify the water in the well. You can never change their disposition. The oriental is not a man who will develop the country. He will not go out and cultivate the country. He stays rather in the city, and takes the jobs from our women and young people. I read a statement in a paper the other day about this question, and I may say I do not believe in people coming into this House and spending hours reading the newspapers. When there are so many young women out of employment, the oriental problem becomes a serious affair. One young woman said "I have two bits left". I have lived for the last two weeks on two pints of milk and two doughnuts a day, and when I go to look for a job I mostly meet a Chinaman at the door and am told that I am not wanted." It is pretty hard for these young women that we have allowed into our country orientals to fill jobs that our own people should fill. Another young woman said "I am supposed to be good, I have got 75 cents left, I am two weeks behind in my rent. The landlady says I must pay the rent or she will take my clothes. I have to earn the money some way". And yet the Chinamen are taking the jobs that those women ought to have and want to fill. Is it not time to wake up to the situation, and stop sidetracking it, as has been done in the past? Is it not time that we realized our responsibility to the people of Canada, that this House took some action in the matter and stopped once and for all the immigration of orientals coming into our country?

Mr. J. A. MacKELVIE (Yale): There never has been a time, I think, during the somewhat extended period of 35 years during which I have been a resident of British Columbia, in which this subject of oriental immigration has not in some degree loomed up before the people of that province. I have seen it growing to very alarming proportions. I have seen it when it might be compared to a small cloud the size of a man's hand on the horizon, and have seen it develop into a menace that practically overshadowed the sky. I do not believe a question has ever been debated in this House to which more wholehearted support has been given by those who thoroughly understand it than this resolution. I believe that every member in this House who comes from British Columbia has time after time discussed this matter in his home constituency, and it is altogether probable that, either by way of pledges given in the campaign in response to questions, or by promises given of his own volition, he has announced in some way his intention of pursuing this subject on every opportunity which presented itself in this House. I do not believe that any member from the westernmost province of this Dominion who casts a vote in favour of the resolution will ever vote with more sincerity or cheerfulness on any resolution or motion which comes before the Parliament of Canada. Something was said by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) this afternoon which indicates the measure of affection with which the people privileged to live in British Columbia regard that province, and he did not depict in one whit too glowing terms the natural beauties and great endowments which have been lavished upon that country by a munificent nature. And is it not, Sir, a heritage worthy of preservation for ourselves and for succeeding generations of Canadians that may come after us? Is it not our duty to preserve intact, as far as possible, that magnificent heritage to the people of this country, and yet it is slowly but surely slipping away from us?

Various aspects of the question have been, I think, very well dealt with by the speakers who have preceded me in this debate. I purpose to speak very briefly on the aspect which relates to the occupation of lands by orientals. Coming, as I do, from one of the farming sections of British Columbia, the Okanagan valley, known pretty well throughout Canada and other parts of the continent as one of the great fruit-producing sections of the West, I can give testimony to the fact that a very grave danger indeed confronts the residents of that section. I am not speaking so particularly in regard to the fruit culture as in relation to the general business of farming in that country. The member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Munro), who, I think, intends to speak in this debate, will, no doubt, be able to inform the House how, on the lower Fraser, vast areas of land producing small fruits, strawberries, raspberries, loganberries and other fruit of that description have passed absolutely under the control of the orientals during the last few years.

To a smaller degree this obtains in the Okanagan, where they were employed rather extensively in orcharding work, during the war period, and I believe that if statistics could be furnished it would be shown that perhaps no section of this entire Dominion possesses such a magnificent war record as that Okanagan country. I believe it could be shown that about 22 per cent of the entire population voluntarily took up arms in support of the Empire when war was declared or shortly afterwards. Naturally, under those circumstances, a very sparse population was left to cultivate the land, and the Chinamen immediately took advantage of the situation which thus presented itself, and during the war, and in the years which have since intervened, I think it would be a conservative estimate to say that 80 per cent of the vegetables produced in that country were produced by the Chinese residents.

Can you imagine, Sir, with what feelings the returned soldiers viewed this state of affairs when they came back to the land which they had left, sought to resume their occupation on the farm, and found that their places had been filled with orientals? Indeed, I have frequently thought, in spite of the very bitter complaints made at their meetings, that the Great War Veterans and kindred associations maintained a very great degree of restraint indeed, when they did not proceed to further measures than those which they have taken in this connection.

I wish to draw attention to a very specific instance which will give some idea of the feeling entertained by the people of that locality regarding the Japanese invasion of the land. Possibly some of you know that situated close to Vernon, where I live, lies a prosperous fruit-growing district known as the Coldstream municipality, and very close to it the Coldstream ranch, established as a fruit-growing property by a former Governor General of this country. It contains, in one block of 800 acres, the largest commercial orchard in Canada. You can imagine the consternation which obtained in that district when it became known, a few years ago, that negotiations were being pursued by the Old Country owners to dispose of that property to a Japanese syndicate. The municipality of Coldstream is settled by a very superior class of people, largely, if not entirely, by people coming from the Old Country, cultured people, men of means, many of them retired army and navy officers, who have spent a great deal of money in providing themselves with fine homes in surroundings that, perhaps, cannot be equalled in this country. You can surmise with what feelings they heard that the great Coldstream ranch, round which were clustered their holdings, was to be passed into the possession of a Japanese syndicate. It can also be easily conceived that the people of the town of Vernon, contiguous to that municipality, were not slow to realise that, if the deal were put through, very soon their town would be degraded into the position of a little, mean village, and all the advantages of which they are so proud now would speedily be taken away from them. Under the circumstances it was not surprising that a very strenuous effort was made to block that deal. Deputations were sent to the provincial legislature and to Ottawa, and, in both cases, without much success. They were informed that difficulties stood in the way of preventing any sale of land to any person in this country who desired to acquire it. Finally, to make a long story short, the deal was stopped, because a measure of influence was brought to bear upon the owners of the property in the Old Country who withdrew the ranch from the market. This is a concrete instance of what might happen to any part of Canada under existing conditions. As I said a moment ago, those conditions already have been brought about to a very alarming degree on the lower Fraser where the small fruit lands of that section have passed under the domination of orientals.

As was outlined by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) this afternoon, legislation has been attempted on various occasions in our provincial legislature, and inevitably it has met with a check when it has come down to this House. Some years ago we passed and re-passed what was known in British Columbia as the Natal Act, called by that name because it pursued a course similar to that adopted by South Africa in the determination of the people of that country to keep out orientals. Briefly stated, that act provided that when an oriental or any immigrant of an undesirable class presented himself for entrance to this country, educational tests should be put to him; he should be asked by the immigration officer to read and write a certain number of sentences in any European language. Under those circumstances it was easy to shut out any oriental or other immigrant whose exclusion was desired. But that legislation was checked at Ottawa for reasons connected with the various treaties then existing between Great Britain and Japan. One of those treaties, known as the Anglo-Japanese Alliance has now been scrapped. Instead of it, we have the Four-Power Treaty which was recently consummated at Washington, and which, I have no hesitation in saying, should work out very much more satisfactorily than the previous agreement. Another treaty was mentioned this afternoon by the mover of this resolution, and I am free to confess that, in the four corners of that commercial treaty which he read, there appears to exist some difficulty which confronts such legislation as we are now seeking. It must be remembered that provision is also made in the treaty which apparently gives to the Parliament of Canada absolute jurisdiction regarding its own immigration law.

I do not think any speaker approaches this subject to-day without a clear conception of the responsibility which rests upon him in debating it. He must be seized with the idea that this is not a provincial affair entirely, nor a national affair entirely; that its scope is largely international; but I for one am convinced that no insuperable difficulties present themselves in that direction. I am fully convinced that if, as was argued by some of the speakers, the matter is put forward in a frank manner with all our cards on the table, and if we explain the situation fully to those people, we shall encounter no difficulty in implementing any legislation which this House may provide along the lines suggested in this resolution.

None of us who has watched history, can have failed to admire the wonderful progress made by Japan during the last fifty years. That little nation has rapidly forged ahead until it has taken a position well in the forefront amongst the great powers of the world, and along with that progress has naturally come a feeling of national pride. Accordingly, and quite rightly, they would maintain a position which would lead them to resent anything approaching an affront passed upon their national pride, and nobody in this House would, for a moment, suggest that a course should be followed that would give them the slightest cause to feel that they were being subjected to any slight or discrimination. But it has been pointed out with great force, I think, this after-9 p.m. noon how their own legislation affects us if we seek entrance to their country, and it is only a matter of reasonable quid pro quo that we should demand the same privileges which they are prepared to give to others, and nothing further. Australia has found a way to settle this difficulty; she has been hampered by no fear of international complications. In spite of the fact that the Japanese alliance with Britain was in effect, Australia, during the last few years, passed legislation which has the effect of absolutely excluding orientals from that island continent. The matter was one of self-preservation with them, and there is an old adage that "self-preservation is the first law of nature." This should apply to nations as well as to individuals, and we are asking this Parliament to place no more power in the hands of the people of this country than that which has been taken, without any objection from any source, by the people of Australia and the people of South Africa.

Mr. CRERAR: Might I ask a question purely for information, because I do not know? Can the hon. member inform the House as to the character of the legislation which Australia has passed and which produces that result?

Mr. MacKELVIE: It is exactly of the nature of that legislation of which I spoke a moment ago, which was passed by British Columbia some years ago, by way of educational tests. That subject and other constitutional points will be dealt with later on in the debate, I understand, by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), who has made a thorough and exhaustive study of all the constitutional aspects of this question. The speaker who opened the debate this evening (Mr. Ladner), dwelt, in a manner which must have engaged the earnest attention of this House, upon the moral degradation which has followed the introduction of the drug evil largely through oriental influence. I do not intend to dilate on that, nor to enlarge upon the tremendous evil which this has brought to our country. If any person desires to acquaint himself with how degraded human nature may, under certain circumstances become, all he has to do is to visit certain oriental quarters in British Columbia cities, where he will find a condition of filth and vice, vice which must be unmentionable before audiences such as this, which ought to convince him that the fewer of this class of people that any country has within its bounds, the better it will be for its people and for its civilization to progress upon really proper lines. Now, I have spoken very briefly upon the international aspect of this question. I realize that the administration naturally will have to give very serious consideration to it. But fully sensible of the gravity of my words and of the words of those who have preceded me, I venture to assure the Government that in my opinion, and in the opinion of every man in British Columbia who has given the question the attention which it demands, there is no remedy save that of absolute exclusion. We have tried restrictive measures for many years, and you can see where that policy has landed us. Now, we say: Cut right down to the root of this evil, cut right home to the very marrow of this disease, and apply the only effective remedy that will meet the situation—absolute and complete exclusion from this day forward of alien orientals entering this country.

We urge therefore that the commercial treaty between Great Britain and Japan, which expires in July, 1923, unless notice be given a year previously, be denounced without delay as far as Canada's part therein is concerned. We also think we are right in asking that what is known as the Lemieux agreement, a more or less secret arrangement regarding immigration from Japan to this country, be denounced as well. We believe that an open, above-board agreement excluding absolutely from our shores all the labouring classes from that country is the only remedy that can be satisfactorily applied. That is the spirit and the intention of this resolution.

No one who has given any attention to it can begin to speak about this subject at all without a thousand different aspects of it surging into his mind, and if he gave free rein to his thoughts he could discourse upon it to an almost unlimited extent. But recognizing that many speakers have preceded me and that many are still to follow, I have no intention of speaking at any further length. I can only add that in my humble judgment it is not too much to say that the future of this country depends to a very large degree upon the fate of this resolution to-night.

Mr. E. A. MUNRO (Fraser Valley): Like other members who have spoken on this subject, I also consider it the most important that has engaged the attention of this House so far this session or that may engage it in the future.

The question involved means to the people of British Columbia in particular, and to the people of Canada in general, their right to develop the highest type of manhood and womanhood with a great national destiny after the best traditions of the British race in their own country. These rights, Mr. Speaker, no one will dare to challenge, nor will a Briton ever dare to forfeit.

It has often been said that Great Britain is generous to a fault. Modern history furnishes us with some examples in our own country where this generosity has worked a hardship on some of the members of this great confederacy. We have performed the filial duty of self-abnegation with more or less grace for the good of the Mother Country. When one considers the length, strength and alacrity of the British arm of justice in succouring even a single British subject from danger or distress, or demanding full restitution for foul play, we must confess after all that the seeming injustices done have been accompanied with the best intentions, and have grown out of her multiplicity of cares and her non-acquaintance with the peculiarities of the case rather than of maternal neglect.

The position in which we find ourselves in British Columbia with respect to orientals has grown out of lack of knowledge of the real conditions there on the part of the Mother Country, and also on the part of Canadians generally. No sane Canadian knowing, as we British Columbia men know, by actual observation and experience, could be cold or indifferent, as we see day by day, year by year, one industry after another, one farm after another, one locality after another, change ownership, character and colour from white to yellow.

A councillor in our country told me last fall how the Japanese acquire land and cultivate it. He said that if a Japanese is able to buy five acres of land, he can send to Japan and get a man to come over to this country under contract for two years at a wage of only fifteen or eighteen dollars per month—I have forgotten the exact amount. Each man is employed during those two years on a berry farm. A great many Japanese run small fruit farms in the province, and during the summer months their men under contract work on these farms, and in the fall they go into the mills and take away the jobs of white men, drawing down good pay. Next summer those contract men are back on the berry ranch again, and at the end of two years they have learned the berry industry and are in very good shape to start themselves. If a Japanese owns ten acres he gets two men under similar terms.

It is not necessary for me to repeat the reasons why we will not and cannot meet oriental competition, or why we cannot assimilate the oriental, more than to say that it is largely a matter of rights and standards. Rights are measured by certain standards, and the higher the civilization the higher the standards. We in this country recognize a standard of decent living conditions; we recognize a standard working day of so many hours for so much pay; we recognize a standard of individual obligation to the community and the state; we recognize a standard of education; we recognize a standard of morality based on the Ten Commandments. How many of these standards do the orientals we get conform to? Not one. Where are the men and women in Canada who are prepared to live and raise their children under any other standards? These standards cannot be maintained and are not being maintained where orientals dwell in sufficient numbers.

This Parliament is on a hill almost three thousand miles away from British Columbia where the tragedy is being enacted. Perhaps not ten per cent of the members of this House have resided in British Columbia in recent years for a sufficiently long period to see and know by personal observation the insidious and deadly encroachments of orientals in almost every field of operation to which our province lends itself. Yet for almost a quarter of a century this Parliament has complacently disallowed and killed the oriental exclusion legislation that the legislature of British Columbia has passed for the protection of her own people.

It is always dangerous firing at long range where the visibility is poor. In every instance you have been wounding and maiming your own friends while the enemy went unharmed. Yes, this Parliament is on a hill, and although not very steep it would sometimes seem as though Knowledge and Truth, like some poor wayfaring men, had not always made the grade.

British Columbia, like the Psalmist of old, has been looking to this hill and saying: I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills whence cometh my help. But no help cometh, though our eyes be blinded with supplication, though our hearts be pierced with a cruel apathy and our sacrifice is replete with degradation and despair. Evidently the hills failed the Psalmist too, for he goes on: My help cometh from the Lord who made heaven and earth. Must we in our martyrdom exclaim,like Cardinal Wolsey in those immortal words: If we had served our God as faithfully as we have served our King, he would not have given us over in our gray hairs.

"Hope springs eternal in the human breast." Once more we come to seek redress in this House.

> Like dying embers on the hearth
> We light the beacon in the night
> To guide the mariner aright.

Our country raises monuments in honour of those men who discovered and explored new territories and planted the British flag thereon. We have such monuments in British Columbia and we are very proud of them. We have some other monuments,—joss houses and totem poles. We are proud of our totem poles, but we are doubtful if the spirits of the great navigators and explorers who gave to us that vast heritage would be proud of us if they could see the heritage they left us in the grasp of an alien, yellow race. The red men of this country are the wards of the white men; do the white men of this country want to become the wards of the yellow men? Like brave men we talk; like cowards we retreat, sacrificing our country as a peace offering to a heathen people with their strange manners and their strange gods, whom we have not offended and of whom we wish no evil. We have always been ready, in peace or war, to rally round that flag "that for a thousand years has braved the battle and the breeze"; the flag that stands for protection and freedom. But we are not protected; we are invaded by the deadliest foe. We are not free, because we are not masters in our own house. What is the price of the peace we are asked to keep? A lost manhood, a lost province, the brightest gem in the Canadian confederacy,—the province of British Columbia. "There is a green hill far away" beyond a city wall, a land flowing with milk and honey, her mighty rivers filled with fish, her fertile valleys that produce thirty, sixty and one hundredfold, her harbours and her emerald lakes nestling in the bosom of the everlasting hills; her snow-capped mountains filled with precious minerals; skirted with giant cedars and Douglas pine; her varied climate from the forty-ninth parallel to the Arctic circle, her golden sunsets and her midnight suns—

> Breathes there a man, with soul so dead,
> Who never to himself hath said,
> This is my own, my native land!
> Whose heart hath ne'er within him burned
> As home his footsteps he hath turned > From wandering on a foreign strand?

Mr. Speaker, I wish to read a proposed amendment. I do not intend to move it, because that would only block or spread-eagle this debate, and we do not want the discussion to take that form, but I want the House to listen to it in order that there may be an understanding of what is going to happen if something is not done to remedy the conditions which exist in British Columbia. This is the proposed amendment; that the following words be added to the resolution:

> And; if for imperial or other reasons it is considered unwise to stop all future immigration of this kind to Canada, our immigration laws be so amended whereby all oriental aliens coming to Canada after such amendment, shall be taken in bond to the province of Ontario where they and their offspring shall permanently reside, under a registration system, so long as they remain in Canada or until such time as the oriental population of Ontario stands in the same ratio to the white population of Ontario as prevails in the province of British Columbia, after which another province may be substituted for that of Ontario.

I do not want the province of Quebec to be jealous or any other province. The object, Mr. Chairman, of this proposed amendment is to find out if the people of Ontario and the other provinces are prepared to pay as high a price for imperial considerations as the people of British Columbia have paid. We offer you a draught from the bottle that for long years you have been pressing to our lips —formulated by your own physicians, mixed in your own laboratory. I doubt if an hon. member in this House would be willing to advocate that British Columbia should receive any more orientals. Assuming this to be correct, we have but two positions left: the one is in line with the resolution, total exclusion which we British Columbians demand so far at least, as our province is concerned and which we recommend generally. The second and last position is that we cannot stop all oriental alien immigration to this country for various reasons, therefore, these Asiatics must be settled outside of British Columbia. If it is all right for British Columbia to be loaded to the gunwale with orientals it is all right for the province of Ontario. If it is a good thing for the province of Ontario to be like British Columbia, vote for the amendment. But if it is a bad thing for the province of Ontario to be like British Columbia, why, vote for the resolution.

We will take it as an evidence of British fair play and of good faith towards the province of British Columbia if you shall rid British Columbia and Canada of this octopus by this resolution or take the pressure off British Columbia by the amendment.

It may be said that Canada never forced the orientals to settle in the province of British Columbia. Quite true, but Canada forced us to accept them by her disallowances, which brought the same result. Freely we have received; freely we have given unto you. There is an old saying that what is good for the goose is good for the gander. We have been the goose long enough. Now we are looking for the gander.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution and proposed amendment are dead in line and ready for action if something is not soon done to arrest the blighting and withering effect of oriental occupation of the province of British Columbia.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the phase of the question which I intended to deal with to-night was not that with respect to the situation in British Columbia. I had left to other members from British Columbia the task of dealing with the conditions as particularly affecting that province. But in California you have the handwriting on the wall; you have an indication of where British Columbia will be in a very few years if something is not done. In California they are five or ten years ahead of us. Not very many years ago, in one of those old moss and ivy covered Scotch churchyards which date back to the thirteenth century, a place where really you almost like to die and rest—on one of the tombstones there I read an inscription supposed to be addressed from the man in the grave to the casual passer-by. I forget the first lines of it, but the latter part went something like this:

> As you are now, so once was I;
> As I am now, so will you be,
> Therefore prepare to follow me.

So with the situation in California to-day; from the grave of agricultural and industrial conditions, from the grave of Asiatic domination, they are saying to us in British Columbia: "As we are now, so will you be". It is for us to take warning from the writing on the wall. If I said such and such a thing would happen, you might or might not believe me, but when I point to you an actual condition of things now in existence, we may well take warning.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and that of the House, I would like to be allowed to place on Hansard a couple of documents; they are too lengthy to read, but they contain valuable information. One of them contains the evidence given before the House Immigration Committee at Washington quite recently on February 9 of this year, by a man named Mr. McClatchey who prepared the brief, that was alluded to this afternoon, of the state of California on the Asiatic question. The other is a letter by him to Viscount E. Shibusawa dated January 3, which gives a wonderfully clear and concise compendium of the situation. Instead of reading these documents I would like, with the permission of the House, to lay them on the Table for insertion in Hansard.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to hand in the two documents to which he has referred for insertion in Hansard?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was waiting for the leader of the Government to rise. I have no knowledge at all of the contents of the documents or of their nature, but I do think that it is creating a very serious precedent to permit the indiscriminate reading into Hansard of documents. It is a practice we have not followed in this House save in the case of the Budget or of detailed statistics, or, in other special instances. It is not my business particularly to object, but I do think it would be in the best interests of the House not to indulge the precedent.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might say that I agree with what my right hon. friend has said. I did not take any exception at the time because I happened to see in my hon. friend's hand the document he proposed to insert and it did not appear to be one of very considerable length, and this debate is on a question so all-important that I felt I would not be justified in raising the point at this time. I should like, however, to associate with what the leader of the Opposition has said and to ask the House not to consider it as establishing a precedent in any way if it permits this document to be inserted.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that, in this instance, the hon. gentleman shall have the right to insert the document unread in Hansard?

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Will you allow me, Mr. Speaker, as an old member of the House to express my approval of what has been said by the leaders on both sides of the House, and to point out that in the old days a request of this sort was absolutely refused except in the case of government statistics and tables of figures in government speeches on the Budget, and so on. If this is allowed in this instance, the House, not having heard the document read, will not be in a position to vote intelligently to-night as we shall not be able to read the statement until we get to-morrow's Hansard. Therefore, I do not think it would be proper for the hon. gentleman to insert the document.

Mr. NEILL: Might I suggest that it be referred to the Speaker, the leader of the Government, or the leader of the Opposition while I continue my remarks, for an opinion as to whether it might properly be inserted.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It is purely a question for the unanimous decision of the House.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): The document which the hon. gentleman asks leave to insert in Hansard may be very informative and very interesting. I do not know, of course, but I assume the hon. gentleman would not ask leave of the House for its insertion unless it was relevant and important. Nevertheless, this is the first instance that I can recall in which any hon. gentleman has asked leave at this stage to insert a document in Hansard when it is of a character merely supplementary to his remarks. It is quite another thing for a member of the Government to ask leave to insert statistical tables or information of that kind, but I think it would be a great misfortune for the House if we were to institute the practice which is suggested this evening.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): I associate myself, I think entirely with what has fallen from the lips of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean). If we adopt the practice in this House of permitting extracts to be inserted in Hansard, it will be very difficult to draw the line, and I can conjure up a vision of Hansard growing to two or three times its present size. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he either quote extracts from the article in question bearing on the matter, or that he read the document in its entirely. If the document has any bearing on the subject I think it should be placed before the House so that we can more intelligently vote on the question when we come to do so.

Mr. NEILL: I would have no hesitation in reading the article in its entirety; I am a comparatively young man, but as other speakers are to follow me to-night, it would not be fair. We have agreed on a schedule of speakers, and it is not fair to take up the time of the House in reading this document, but if any hon. gentleman would care to see it, I shall have much pleasure in showing it to him privately.

Dealing with this California question, in April, 1921, just last year, the Senate and legislative assembly of the state of California passed by unanimous vote a joint resolution in connection with this subject, called the Declaration of Principles. It consisted of four paragraphs, some of which I should like to allude to. In order to save time, I shall allude to them as briefly as possible.

The first declaration demanded absolutely the exclusion of Asiatics from the United States. I may say that this Declarations of Principles was sent on as a state message from the state of California to be submitted to the federal government at Washington. They asked for rigid exclusion. It is curious how absolutely we are in agreement on a great many points. Our conditions are very similar. We also in British Columbia want rigid exclusion. We also want something else which hon. members who have spoken so far in the debate have not touched on, and that is that to make rigid exclusion worth anything we must have some system of registration because there are more orientals coming into British Columbia by the underground route than through the open door. It is no use shutting the lid on the top if you leave the underground passage open, and some system of registration such as we had in the war must be put into force, or we need not bother about putting restrictions on at the other end. I will show later the numbers that are coming in by the underground passage, and the only remedy for this is to have some system of registration.

Accompanying that Declaration of Principle the state of California submitted to Washington what they called a brief. It is a statement very carefully and very skilfully drawn up amplifying the Declaration of Principles and expressing the attitude of California. Yesterday I laid on the desk of hon. members copies, as many as I had, at any rate, of this small booklet. There is a certain amount of pathetic interest attaching to these little pamphlets. They were sent to me by a man in the Shaughnessy military hospital at Vancouver, which is practically a hospital for those who are going to die, for those who are so badly injured that the best thing for them is to allow them to die quietly and peaceably. The man who wrote me said that he had collected there the money to buy a hundred or a hundred and fifty of these pamphlets, and he sent them on to me in the hope that I would distribute them, so anxious were these men to try and get the true conditions in British Columbia before this House, and as the man who wrote the letter said, "Since I began this letter one more of our number has passed away—a man who only last week was fully and heartily engrossed in the presentation of this subject." It is pitiful to think of these young men taking such an interest in this question, and I hope hon. members will find the opportunity to read this little pamphlet and the proofs contained in it. One might almost call it a message to hon. members from the grave.

As regards the preamble of this brief, I shall quote only a very few words. They say that "the facts presented offer conclusive evidence of a grave and imminent danger, not only to California and the Pacific states, but to the nation itself." That is the considered judgment of the state of California.

The second clause deals with the desire of the state of California to govern that rigid exclusion themselves, and not by the state of Japan. Under the Gentleman's Agreement, Japan decides who shall come in and who shall stay out. The state of California wishes the Gentleman's Agreement denounced and says: "In future let us decide who shall come in and who shall not." I might say that that also applies to British Columbia.

The third clause refers to a sort of protest against any possible action on behalf of the federal government interfering with the Alien Land Act of California, which prevents aliens from owning or leasing agricultural lands, the same as in Japan. This protest urges the federal government not to give way to any representations on the part of the Japanese government to alter or over-ride that act, or to change the act which says that aliens in the States cannot be naturalized.

The fourth clause which I need not quote asks—it makes it one of the principles of their platform—that justice and freedom shall be given to the Japanese already in California. They put that squarely and unmistakably, and the only exception they make is that aliens must not be allowed to lease or own land, and they quote for their reason the treaty between Japan and the United States, in which that provision is absolutely laid down. In neither of the contracting countries are the subjects of the other allowed to own or lease land for agricultural purposes, and the state of California asks that that be adhered to.

I might explain the difference between the law in the States and our own law in that regard. In the States they have a law which forbids the naturalization of any aliens of brown or yellow race. I need not go into the details—that is a fact to-day—and they put the law in three words: This act shall apply only to free white people. There is also a provision for letting in the Filipinos and negroes but it excludes orientals absolutely. No oriental if he lived a thousand years in the States could be naturalized.

I wish to Heaven we had the same provision in British Columbia. In Canada, as you know, we do allow them to be naturalized to our everlasting regret; and on looking up some old books I found that as far back as 1898 there was a scandal on account of Japs being naturalized after they had only been four and a half months in British Columbia. It was discovered after investigation—you will find it all recorded in the sessional papers of British Columbia—that Japs over from Japan and only a day, in some case two days, in Vancouver, were posted up to the Skeena river and given naturalization papers, certifying that they were naturalized British subjects. They were naturalized in batches, and where there was a rush to get them to the canneries they did not even stop to naturalize them—they rushed them right up and got a notary public afterwards to make out naturalization papers and sent the tickets up to these men. That is all to be found in the evidence in the sessional papers referred to. That is how we in British Columbia naturalized Japanese who were supposed to have been in the country four or five years whereas, as I say, some of them had only been four and a half months. It is in the light of these experiences that we are asking to-day that you shall not naturalize oriental aliens.

In the States, however, there is also another different condition. If a man is born in the States, no matter what his parentage is, he is a United States citizen and has all the privileges connected therewith. He becomes a United States citizen, even though he is the child of an alien, since he has been born in the States. We, of course, have the opposite attitude here. We refuse the franchise to even the children of a naturalized alien born here; but we only do so by a provincial law and we never know the moment that law may be attacked and perhaps successfully attacked. There was a very clever pamphlet got up a few months ago appealing to every sentiment of the British ideal fair play. It spoke of "Taxation without Representation" and was a very cleverly gotten up thing, demanding and begging that the Japanese in Canada should be given a vote. We have refused them as yet under our provincial law but the subject will be more complex when the children born in British Columbia become twenty-one years of age. Therefore we too are asking that oriental aliens, as in the States, should never be naturalized. I see that in the States also they are asking that they should not give to aliens born in that country any privileges as citizens. In other words we require what they have and what we lack, and they are asking to be given what we have and what they lack. It shows how close together our wants come in that regard.

As regards this rigid exclusion I want to ask the House this question: Is rigid exclusion unfair? Japan says it is but let us seek for the answer to that in the acts rather than in the words of Japan. This is what Japan does herself:

> The policy of exclusion is that followed rigorously by Japan herself by section of the Imperial Ordinance No. 353 against Koreans and Chinese. The reason she gives is that to permit the entrance into Japan of such aliens whose standards of living are lower than the Japanese would submit their own people to disastrous competition.

Substitute the word "Canadians" for "Japanese" and you have exactly our sentiments in British Columbia to-day. Surely precedent is better than argument. That is what Japan does, not what she says, and that is what we are asking to have done—only to follow the example of the Japanese themselves.

Now the second clause asks that the control of this immigration shall be put into the hands of the United States instead of left in the hands of Japan. Roosevelt, who arranged this Gentleman's Agreement, added a clause to it that if it was not effective the States would immediately pass an exclusion law. Unfortunately he left office and Taft who succeeded him allowed that clause to be taken out so that the United States surrendered every atom of control over the situation. The Gentleman's Agreement of the States was more rigid than our agreement. It did not permit, as we do, the entrance of 400 labourers a year; it called for the exclusion of labourers entirely; but it said that when a man came along from Japan with a Japanese license or immigration certificate he would be admitted, that being proof he was not a labourer; and the labourers flowed in by the thousand. They had tickets from Japan which said "This man is not a labourer" and in he had to come even though the officials knew he was a labourer. So they kept coming in by the thousands. That is the result of handing over, or surrendering, the rights of any nation to deal with their own immigration. Roosevelt truly says that never in the history of the world except under dire compulsion did a nation surrender her rights in that way. Accordingly in the States they are asking, and asking very strenuously, that that be done away with. We ourselves have suffered in the same way. We have an arrangement that not more than so many will come in. Notwithstanding that, they enter the country by dozens, they come in armed with Japanese passports.

Now what is to be done about it? In addition to that of course there is a secret immigration which helps very largely indeed. As this brief very truly says the agreement should be cancelled. What is the good of talking about a Gentleman's Agreement because even assuming—and I say it is a big assumption—that Japan has lived up to it in good faith, it has failed utterly to accomplish the purpose for which it was avowedly entered into. Then it gives examples—I have found hundreds of them here but I shall only cite one. In California they have a Chinese Exclusion Act which means what it says and says what it means. In California the Chinese Exclusion Act has decreased the Chinese population fifty per cent in a given period while the Gentleman's Agreement has enabled the Japs to increase fourfold since 1906. Making necessary allowance for births 47,000 Japanese came in during that period, nearly all labourers, not one supposed to come in under the so-called Gentleman's Agreement. There were 20,000 Japanese in Mexico when the Gentleman's Agreement was first made but there are only 2,500 there now. Where have the rest gone to? Do you think they have gone to Japan or to Heaven? Anyway you will find them in California to-day, and, Sir, it is far easier to evade laws in British Columbia to-day in that regard than it is in California. We not only have the long international boundary line but we have an enormous and very sparsely populated coast line.

The Japanese line of steamers, manned in every case by Japanese—they carry no white crew and no white passengers—pass, at regular intervals, within ten miles of the west coast of Vancouver island where there are numerous fishing settlements with hundreds of Japanese fishermen. What is there to prevent boats with one or two Japanese on board from going out at night and coming back next morning with two more Japanese added to the number? And this could go on uninterruptedly. Off the west coast of Queen Charlotte island the settlements are composed of Japanese to the extent of ninety per cent. They send their schooners over from Japan to get lumber and shingles. What is to prevent them bringing with them hundreds of Japanese and landing them at night? Once ashore they are free. Who is to know how much of that underground system has been going on in spite of the existing agreement and the so-called Gentleman's Agreement. We are like the man in the Bible who said "All I know is, whereas before I was blind now I see." We in British Columbia will say "Before, we saw one Jap and now we see ten." We cannot argue about documents and treaties, but we know the Japs used not to be there, and we know too surely that they are there now.

There is another way in which the Japanse ingenuity comes in. The Gentleman's Agreement says they must not exceed 400, but that means in one year. That means 400 coming direct from Japan. Japan professes to have no control over her nationals outside Japan, and, therefore, she takes care to send 400 direct from Japan, but that does not mean that any amount of Japanese may not come from Mexico, Honolulu, or any other place. All they need is to break their journey for a couple of days, and then come in. In that case they are not coming direct from Japan, and they are allowed to enter. An Order in Council of this Government provides that no labourers are allowed to come in, but that is a temporary thing for disastrous times, and by and by that will be taken off, and the treaty with Japan will continue to go on as before.

The Japanese are experts at evading the law. As soon as a law looms up in California, they start to evade it. I never saw any nation more successful in evading the law than Japan, and if they cannot evade it, they get around it. They are a most intelligent race, and they can always devise a means of getting the Japs in. They saw there was likely to be trouble, and what did they do? They realized that a man born in the United States was an American citizen. They said, "Let us get together and get in a population and breed Japanese-American voters, and in pursuit of that policy they began what is called the picture-bride proposition. Under the Gentleman's Agreement the wives of men then in California—mark that—were to be allowed in. There were hardly any wives then in California. But they started this mail-order proposition, by which you took a book of pictures and picked out your wife, and sent to Japan for her. That was called the picture-bride system and they boasted of the success with which they had evaded the act, the very spirit of the so-called Gentleman's Agreement. They brought them in by the thousands. The people soon began to get interested, and the Japanese saw the trend of it before it went too far, and they said to the officials of the United States, "We have started the picture-bride business, but we see you don't like it." The picture-bride business brought the birthrate of the Japanese so high that it amounted to 69 per thousand as against 19 per thousand for the white race.

What was the next thing? With their usual alertness, they found another loophole. In Seattle the authorities discovered that almost more Japanese children were being born than there were Japanese women, and they thought that, even for a Jap, that was something remarkable. They investigated the matter. They had reason to believe there was something wrong, that there was collusion between the Japanese doctors and the midwives, and false returns were being made. Then it was arranged to obtain birth certificates, and a Japanese boy was sent over from Japan on that certificate which had been obtained, and when he got to the States he was an American subject. The authorities in the States are now proposing to take the finger prints, the foot prints and the description of every child born.

When the agitation to stop the picture-bride business began the Japs said, "Sure, we are always ready to meet you." The hon. gentleman from Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) said he was sure the Japanese would understand. Yes, they understand before we do. They then started a system called "kandokan" or excursion-bride. The relation between the excursion-bride and the picture-bride is much the same as the relation between Eaton's and Simpson's catalogues, in other words it is exactly the same, only it is more so. Under the excursion-bride or kandokan-bride system perhaps three and a half more women were brought in than under the picture-bride system. So that we are only hoping that there will not be an agitation to stop the excursion bride, or the last state will be worse than the first. I am reminded in that connection of Lloyd George. It is said he went on triumphantly from one defeat to another. These Japs go from one defeat to another, and each time they are more successful than before.

I am trying to drive home one argument, and that is that there is only one remedy. That remedy is rigid exclusion and a system of registration. They are much too smart for us under any other arrangement. We hear talk from some people: "Oh, they are naturalized British subjects, what are you going to do about it"? There are 90,000 Japanese subjects in the United States to-day,—born and registered in the United States, and of these 90,000 only 73 have applied to be expatriated from Japan. If it were 73,000 out of 90,000 there might be some comparison, but it is only 73 out of 90,000, who have applied to Japan to be expatriated, which means to give up their rights as Japanese citizens, and of that 73 only 63 have been granted papers. So that out of 90,000 Japanese subjects in the United States, with their loyalty pledged to Japan, only 63 have been American citizens. And then we hear the prattle about treating them as naturalized citizens. There is no naturalization of a Jap any more than of a German, and they have their training just exactly as the Germans have it. There are to-day between ten and fifteen thousand native born Japs back in Japan getting educated in the traditions of their fatherland. They send them back at eight or ten and then send them back here again, at eighteen or nineteen years of age. Will they be American subjects after that, or will they be true to their country?

I will not deal with the land question, except to say that there was a treaty made in 1911 or in 1913 between Japan and the United States, which said that no subject should own land or lease it for agricultural purposes. They keep the treaty as regards Britain, but break it in California, and California passed a law making it more prohibitive. In two years they passed another law making it still more prohibitive. They passed another law in 1920 to try and make it still more prohibitive. The Jap gets around all that. How? He gets his kid of six days old and buys property or land in his name and manages it in his name. The native born Jap can own land and the alien cannot. And we talk about allowing immigration of people who are so adroit as that.

I wish to congratulate the hon. gentleman from Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) on his excellent speech, and I agree with almost everything he said, excepting, when he said that he was sure the matter could be arranged with the Japanese. You can arrange nothing with them unless it is to their advantage. I recollect the fact that 24 years ago the hon. member and I sat in the British Columbia legislature struggling with the same question. The width of the House separated us then. Time has brought us nearer together, and perhaps experience has brought us nearer together in thought and view. It is 24 years ago that we sat in the legislature and the subject is but little more advanced now. I suppose in 24 years from now he and I will be wandering up to the pearly gates, and I suppose from force of habit we will be asking Saint Peter "How are you on Asiatic exclusion here?" I do not like these cycles of 24 years. They do not happen often enough. We are told the Japanese will not like this proposition, that owing to their services in the late war we should not take this action, and that we must not remember that service. The member for part of my district, Alberni, Major Burde, and a man with a good war record, spoke in the local House on the same subject, and the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) will remember that he said "Yes, Japan makes a treaty with Great Britain and British Columbia pays the price".

Are we not, as the hon. member for the Fraser Valley (Mr. Munro) said, tired of paying the price, and is it fair that we alone should pay all the price? Our Canadian soldiers went to fight against Germany, in order to support the mother country; if Britain was defeated, Canada might have been turned over to Germany as a colony. Did our soldiers fight against Germany, in order that British Columbia now, and Canada as a whole afterwards, should be turned over to Japan to be a Japanese colony? Heaven preserve us from such a consummation. We did not fight the Germans in order to be handed over to the Japanese. Some weak-spirited people go so far as to say that we must be careful of offending Japan; that Japan might fight on that issue. What is the issue?—Japan will be fighting in these days when war is so unpopular and when you must have some national opinion behind you when you go to war, to compel us to give her rights that she denies to other nations. Is it likely that Japan would go to war for that reason? I hardly think there is much danger. Since when has it become a part of British policy or Canadian policy to say that we will give up our just and lawful rights for fear somebody will fight? That is not the principle on which the British empire was founded. If we are to fight—let us carry the argument to its absurd—for it is absurd—conclusion, and say that we must fight. Is it better to fight now when Japan controls only one half of British Columbia or to leave the fighting until ten years hence when she will, by peaceful conquest, have absorbed the whole of British Columbia and have thousands of her trained troops scattered throughout British Columbia and the other provinces beyond the Rocky mountains. If the matter has to come to a fight, it will be better to have it settled once and for all, but this has only to be mentioned for one to realize the absurdity of it.

I should like to have gone into the question of imperial jurisdiction, but that will be dealt with by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens). The question really resolves itself in final analysis into this. Have we in Canada jurisdiction over our immigration or have we not. I have here an Order in Council issued by this Government or by the late government before it ceased to hold office, which Order in Council states that immigration of labourers of any kind into certain parts of British Columbia is prohibited, owing, of course, to lack of employment. That applies as well to the Britisher as to the oriental or any other immigrant. It applies to the Britisher, but it does not apply in its entirety to the Japanese. It applies to the Japanese who would come from Honolulu or 'Frisco but not to the Japan-

10 p.m. ese who comes to the country as one of the gallant four hundred whom we are compelled to bring over annually. I have this on the best authority. The Immigration Department states:

> All Japanese entering Canada are subject to all the provisions of the Immigration Act—

And that means this Order in Council as well.

> —with the exception of such provisions as would conflict with the Lemieux agreement.

Therefore as regards the four hundred people we cannot exclude them while we are at the present moment restricting immigration of British subjects.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the date of that Order in Council?

Mr. NEILL: One is dated the 9th June, 1919, and the other the 13th December 1920. I think those are the two. I thought this was last year; it was the year before. The principle is this, that we absolutely prohibit British immigration and then we say that we cannot prohibit Japanese immigration. One hon. member who spoke this afternoon quoted Kipling's words about Canada being daughter in her mother's home and mistress in her own. Are we mistress in our home or are we not? Kipling said we were daughter in our mother's home; he did not say "illegitimate product" or "hired girl"; he said "daughter". Canada has all the privileges of a daughter. Will the fond mother—and Britain has ever shown herself to be a fond, lavish mother to her children—refuse to her well-beloved eldest born child, Canada, the privileges and rights that she has granted to her other children, Natal, New Zealand and Australia? Is it likely that she would, and at whose dictation would it be? An alien, yellow Germany. I can add another word; I can say a yellow, alien, heathen Germany.

I know it is unpopular in this day and generation, and considered old fashioned, to introduce any question of our relation to our God in a matter of public or even private affairs; but perhaps we might for one minute turn aside from the pursuits of the material and ask ourselves: Do we, can we, should we, expect Providence to bless this nation in its undertakings when we deliberately open our doors to an influx of an alien, heathen population in ever-increasing numbers? Japan is in the peculiar situation. Japan is not a nation living in ignorance or for lack of opportunity concerning the gospel message at all. Japan is heathen to-day by solemn and deliberate choice. Quite a number of years ago the Japanese appointed what I suppose in this country would be called a royal commission to settle two questions: Would it be for the benefit of Japan as a nation to change its religion, and if so what religion would they adopt? They were quite impartial; any religion that was good and practical would have received their sanction. After due deliberation they decided to remain heathen, and heathen they are likely to continue. A few missionaries will catch a few converts. A Japanese will turn Christian to-morrow if he thinks it will promote his interests in this country or in the United States, but at heart he remains a Japanese and a heathen. To-night when we are voting on this resolution we must remember that we are voting in accordance with the interests of our constituents and our country, but we must also remember that we owe some responsibility to the God whom we at least profess to follow in our religious experiences.

I submit that this House and this Government must alone assume the responsibility if this legislation is not enacted. We were told again that the Japanese are a proud race and that we must not hurt them; that they will fight. Yes! The pride of a race that makes a gentleman's agreement with the United States of America, that makes a gentleman's agreement with the Dominion of Canada and before the ink of the paper on which the agreement is inscribed is dry, that starts to break that agreement and evade its promises! If it is not in their official declarations—and I can show it in one instance at least—it is in their public press: you will see it openly boasted how they have broken their promises. The Gentleman's Agreement! the very fundamental basis of the existence of which is in the good faith of the contracting parties!

So much for the good faith of Japan; so much for its national pride. They are much more sensitive in their national pride than in their sense of honour. But if we must soothe and assuage that national pride, let me say we do not claim that they are to be excluded because they are an inferior race. They are far from that; I must admit; we must all admit that in many respects the Japanese can outbeat us in the field of industry. For instance, we must admire their thrift, their industry, their large families. Their unity as a nation is a remarkable feature. The family is behind the individual, the company behind the family and the nation behind them all. They are absolutely a unit in working out any industrial or economic pursuit. I for one am not ashamed to say that Canada will not survive in competition for economic advantage or racial supremacy under present conditions of Asiatic competition. That is an humiliating statement to make, but it is true, as every man in British Columbia knows. I said, under competing conditions. On equal grounds, we can meet them, but we cannot meet them under competing conditions. We might imitate their habits of thrift or industry or even as regards their large families, especially in these days when race suicide is coming to the fore; but we do not want to imitate them in their low standard of living or in the way they work, their lack of recreation, lack of comforts and lack of culture.

We do not want our women working long hours in the fields and factories, regardless of the fact whether they are mothers or expectant mothers. In a word, we do not want to bring our white race down to the level of Asiatics, and for that reason, and that reason alone, we cannot compete with them. But the greater the disparity between the two systems of living, the greater the necessity to afford us in British Columbia that much-needed relief.

Now, Sir, we are come to the parting of the ways. Never before has the way appeared to be so clear, never again perhaps will the time be so opportune. We are told of difficulties. Of course, there are difficulties. Nothing is attained in this world without difficulty, struggle and sacrifice. But let us meet those difficulties with a bold spirit, and there is no doubt that we will succeed. The poet says:

> Still the bold, brave man is fortunate.
> He keeps his object ever full in sight,
> And that assurance keeps him firm and right.
> True, 'tis a narrow way that leads to bliss,
> But right before there is no precipice.
> Fear makes men look aside and so their footing miss.

Paul says: Let us be strong and of good faith; let us take our courage in our hands. If we follow his advice I am confident that a way can be found and legislation can be enacted.

If this House accepts the resolution, and the Government enacts, not only the necessary legislation indicated in the resolution, but also the registration scheme I have already indicated, I believe we will to-night do a great thing for British Columbia, a great thing for Canada, and a still greater thing for posterity. For I have a vision, Sir, of a greater Canada, of a Canada, far greater than that which our narrow vision and our limited ambitions to-day can realize. I wiil not live to see it, but it will come, a Canada spreading from ocean to ocean, with a teeming, contented population, numbering millions where we now see thousands, and thousands where we now count hundreds. From the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean I see that great Canada peopled with one great white race, the worthy descendants of the two races that now occupy Canada; I see one race, speaking perhaps the two languages still, but one race in everything that counts, one race in their unity as a nation, one race in their allegiance to the flag they follow, one race in their adherence to the God they worship.

That is a dream that will come true some day, and for my part when the time arrives, as it must for us all sooner or later, whether very little sooner or very little later makes little difference, when we must prepare to pass, or perchance pass without preparation, through that veil that hides the Great Beyond—for my part I can think of no higher eulogy of our political record, I ask for no loftier requiem to be sung over our ashes, than that it may be said that, in our humble way, we served faithfully our day and generation, and at this stage by wise and far-sighted legislation made it certain, or at least possible, that for all time to come this nation, this great Canada to be, shall be consecrated to the use of a white race and of a Christian people.

Hon. JAMES HORACE KING (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the subject of this resolution is not new in this House, but I think we are warranted in bringing it before Parliament at this time in view of our further experience of these Asiatic people who have been located in western Canada of recent years, more particularly in British Columbia.

It has been my privilege to take part in debates on this question in our provincial legislature, and it cannot be said that the British Columbia House has been remiss in regard to this matter. For many years back resolutions have been passed suggesting and urging action by the central government in order that this menace—and I think that term is accepted by hon. members to-day, because if one has followed the conditions that now exist in the West he will realize that this oriental immigration is indeed a menace—might be dealt with. Our legislature in that province has by means of an education test endeavoured to exclude these immigrants, but without success, such legislation having been disallowed by the Dominion government.

To-day we have arrived at the stage where we must appeal to the people's representatives in this House to give this question their very serious consideration. We have not only our own experience but we have that of the states on the Pacific coast, more particularly that of California, as to the great danger involved in the continuance of this immigration into our province.

Years ago the representations made as to the gravity of the condition came largely from our labour organizations, and so much was this the case that both parties at one time treated the question as a political football. That day has passed, and to-day all parties are united in their efforts to deal effectively with this menace to our national well-being. Indeed, throughout this debate there has not been the slightest effort to make this a political question.

It is true that on the public platform in British Columbia to-day you will not hear a debate carried on as in former years in reference to the entrance of the Japanese, because British Columbians realize that in the Japanese they had a loyal ally during the war. But that change of tone is not to be taken as indicating any weakening in the attitude of the people of British Columbia in regard to Asiatic immigration. On the contrary, the question has assumed a graver aspect, and it is generally recognized that unless this immigration be strictly controlled, it will probably become a question of increasing difficulty between the two countries. Therefore it is of vital importance that the question be taken up between the two nations and brought to a satisfactory conclusion without further delay. As a resident of British Columbia, there is no doubt in my own mind that not only is this Asiatic immigration a serious menace to the people of that province, but that the people of eastern Canada are also involved and must face the seriousness of the situation.

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to prolong the debate. The ground has been well covered on other occasions, and it has been very well covered this afternoon, the various treaties having been discussed and their operation fully dealt with; but I wish to assure the House that it is the desire of the people of British Columbia that action should be at once taken in regard to this matter in order that we in that province may have a better condition of affairs than at present obtains as a result of the continued immigration of Asiatics.

In conclusion, I may say that in order to counteract the effects of the presence in the province of persons of that class, in order that we may take care even of the present situation, it is essential that we bring in many good Britishers and thus regain predominance so far as the proportion of the different classes of the population is concerned.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate at this late hour to delay the House in the further discussion of this problem and would not do so were I not convinced that the matter is one of paramount importance, and that if we fail to give it complete consideration to-night there will be difficulty in our doing so at any later period in the session. If, therefore, I touch in some measure on points that have already been dealt with I ask the indulgence of the House and assert that I do so with but one desire, that of driving these points home and convincing my fellow members of the House, just as we on the Pacific coast are convinced, of the seriousness of the problem.

This is not, Sir, a racial question; I desire to lay that down at the very outset of my remarks. In approaching the question, I treat it, as I think all do who understand it thoroughly, as a sociological, an ethical and essentially an economic problem. There is very much in the oriental philosophy, their history and their religious beliefs, etc., that is attractive and that forms a most pleasing study for the scholar. But, Sir, we must realize this, and Parliament and the Dominion of Canada must realize it, that the two races are distinct in type, in tradition, in ideas, in their whole outlook on life. They are distinct branches of civilization. It matters not how highly we value the attractive features of oriental civilization, the question before us to-night is this: which shall prevail, ours, or theirs? It is from that angle that I desire to approach the discussion of this subject.

The first reason which I offer in opposition to further immigration from the Orient is based on a very keen appreciation of the magnitude of the source. Let me say to the House that there are 800,000,000 orientals facing us on the Pacific slopes of this country—60,000,000 in Japan; 340,000,000 in India; 400,000,000 in China; many millions of others in smaller spheres. Just visualize, Sir, for a moment what it would mean if there was even a tremour of immigration, unrestricted, from such a prolific source of supply as a population of 800,000,000 to a country the total population of which is 8,000,000. We in Canada cannot absorb any considerable movement of immigration from such a source as that.

Then, Sir, in looking at this question from the economic point of view, I find myself in most excellent company. Many hon. members may hold the view that the position taken by British Columbians and western Canadians is a narrow and prejudiced one. But when I read to the House very briefly a statement by Lord Milner I think I offer a reference, if I may so term it, which warrants my taking a position similar to that which he took in years gone by. As representative of the British Crown in South Africa he gave this question intimate study under the most trying circumstances, and he has this to say:

If we are to resist the influx of Asiatics into this country let us take the strong, unassailable grounds of social and economic reasons.

And it is upon these grounds, Sir, that we are appealing to the House at this time.

May I say to the House also this—and I submit it is important: there have been since the dawn of history movements of people from one country to another. I shall not go into detail; I shall simply state the fact so that the House may get the proper perspective. There have been movements of people from place to place, and it is on record that frequently the peoples originally established in a state have been literally thrust out by the incoming or migrating races. The pages of history are replete with cases of that kind. But let the House remember this: until very recently large migrations have been difficult; the lack of available space and the lack of transportation facilities offered a fair protection. But this protection to-day is gone. With our splendid transportation facilities—which in one case enabled us in the space of a few weeks to move literally millions of men across the Atlantic—with the consequent rapid movement of people from one part of the world to another, the presence of these 800,000,000 people as a source of immigration becomes a very serious problem.

Now, I shall deal briefly with one or two economic reasons which are irresistible to those of us who have witnessed their actual operation in this country. Where there is a large portion of the population consisting of orientals the effect of their economic pressure upon the community is startling—indeed terrifying. It inevitably means this—and it is proved by the experience of all the Pacific states and of British Columbia—that wherever the white man is brought into competiiton with the Asiatic, the standard of living must be reduced or there is no possibility of successful competition. It is a law that you cannot escape any more than you can escape the great laws of nature. It is there; the effect is before our eyes, and we witness it—nay, we experience it day by day and year by year.

An hon. member asked this afternoon why we could not compete. We cannot compete, Sir, for two reasons. First, in regard to the Chinese, we have in Canada to-day and have had for the last thirty years, to my personal knowledge, a veritable slave system. Chinese syndicates bring into Canada large numbers of individuals, pay their $500 head tax, their passage, their expenses. These Chinamen so brought into Canada remain the bondmen of that syndicate until they have paid off not only every dollar of that expense money, but usurious interest as well. Sometimes for fifteen or twenty years they remain the bondmen of the heads of those syndicates. When you want to hire Chinamen in British Columbia you do not go to an individual Chinaman and ask him if he wants a job: you go to the head office of some syndicate and there you hire one or a dozen as the case may be. They send them to the job; they collect their wages; they give them their keep. So we are perpetuating in Canada, under cover, it is true, a system of veritable slavery. So we ask the House, those of us representing that province: is Canada to be a nation of bondmen, or is it to be a nation of free men? We stand for Canadianism as we understand it, with all its weaknesses, with all its faults, realizing that in many cases, perhaps, there are difficulties and there are delinquencies. But we say this: We prefer Canadianism, as we understand it, to the asiatic or oriental bondservant system.

Another economic effect which I shall briefly refer to before coming to my main argument is this: for manufactured goods and the produce of the farm the home market is always recognized as the best market. Now in any community in which a large section consists of orientals it is noticeable that that community is a mighty poor market for the manufactured goods and for the white man's food from other sections of the country. All that you have to do is to realize this: that a Chinaman, and to a lesser degree the same is true of other orientals, will live upon a handful of rice day in and day out, mixed perhaps with a little fish. Where does the consumption of Canadian food come in? In regard to manufactured goods, he lives under conditions that no white man will live under, under conditions we positively refuse to ask our white people to live under, and so, I say, you destroy the home market for the supply of the goods of the country.

Let me say a word in regard to revenue. I have not the figures for Canada, but an exhaustive investigation was made in South Africa over a period of ten years, and it was found in Natal that the average annual per capita contribution to the revenue of the country was as follows—and I ask the House to get this in this day when we are looking for revenue and the distribution of taxes over a larger number. Here are the facts: The whites paid £30 11s. 4d., and the Asiatics paid £1 6s. 4d. In other words, over a period of ten years, on careful investigation by the British government, it was found that the white man paid into the public treasury $22 for every $1 paid in by the Asiatic. That is something we should think about when we talk about filling up this country and the distribution of taxes. Let us keep these figures in mind when we speak of bringing in immigrants for the purpose of sharing the burden of taxation.

There are those who suggest the importation of Asiatic labour in the form of indentured or contract labour. I wish to register very briefly, because I have not time to discuss it, my absolute and unqualified opposition to that. There is not a country in the world where indentured labour has been tried, where it has not been found that the labour that was indentured formed a very difficult problem in the country after the expiration of the indenture. I am not going to discuss that. All I wish to say is this: Canada, above all others, is not a suitable country for indentured labour. This is a country for Canadianism, for democracy, for men and women to build homes in, where we may have a standard of living at least commensurate with the ideals of the white race, and in such a country as ours indentured labour, which on its face is branded as of an inferior type, should have no place.

I wish to deal as briefly as I can at this late hour with perhaps the most important point in this whole discussion and one which I apprehend may be thrown into the arena in this debate by the Government itself, because the Government must take cognizance of it. I want to say to the Prime Minister that in approaching this part of my remarks, I do so, as far as I possibly can, free from any prejudice or from any desire to offer embarrassment to his Government or to the Imperial authorities. I think if he will follow me closely, I can show to the Government and to the satisfaction of this House, that the argument against our position because of Imperial reasons is not a well-founded argument.

In regard to that particular phase of the question, I hold in the first place that it is the inherent right of Canada, in common with all other countries, to determine the conditions upon which any one may be admitted within the bounds of the state. I lay that down as a primary and fundamental right, referred to indirectly by other speakers. Let me repeat it; that it is the inherent right of Canada, in common with all other countries, to determine the conditions upon which any person from any other state may enter its jurisdiction. Am I stating that too strongly, or am I in any sense violating what is known as international or recognized statutory law? Let me refer the House to this fact: that that principle, that doctrine, is recognized in the statutes of Canada, and has been for years. I hold in my hand the Immigration Act. I shall not read any lengthy portions of it, but just very briefly cite what is to my mind a vindication of my position and of that doctrine. In clause 38 of the Immigration Act under which we are operating, and have operated for years, it is provided that:

> The Governor in Council may, by proclamation or order whenever he deems it necessary or expedient—

Do what?. Several things I shall not refer to, and then comes this:

> —prohibit or limit in number for a stated period or permanently the landing in Canada of immigrants belonging to any—

What?

> —to any nationality or race or of immigrants of any class or occupation by reason of—

What?

> —by reason of any economic, industrial or other condition temporarily existing in Canada or because such immigrants are deemed unsuitable having regard to the climatic, industrial, social, educational, labour or other conditions or requirements of Canada or because such immigrants are deemed undesirable owing to their peculiar customs, habits, modes of life, and methods of holding property,—

And so forth. Could any one ask for a clearer declaration of the principle to which I have given utterance than is embalmed in our own statutes? I am not however, limited to that. I have in my hand the Sessional Papers of 1907-1908 where I find that this Parliament laid on the Table the correspondence between the government of the day and the Imperial government. I want the House to get this point because it seems to me if they do, we meet absolutely and without any difficulty the problems of Imperial complications. I find here certain correspondence of which I shall only read brief extracts, and anyone who desires to peruse the correspondence will find it in Sessional Paper 74B, in the session of 1907-1908. Lord Lyttleton who at that time was Secretary of State for the Colonies, I believe, wrote to the government of the day in Canada pointing out to them that they might now (in 1905) become a party to the Japanese treaty, and in doing so he made this statement, which is I think significant:

> Do the Government of the day desire to enter the convention under the same terms and conditions as Queensland?

What were the terms and conditions in Queensland?

> (1) that stipulations contained in first and third articles of treaty shall not in any way affect laws, ordinances and regulations with regard to trade, immigration of labourers, artisans, police—

And so forth. In other words, the Imperial authorities, through the Secretary of State, notifies the government of Canada in 1905 that it is their privilege to adhere to the treaty with this reservation, which was granted to Queensland and the other dominions. Now the government of the day did not accept the reservation, and I want the Prime Minister not to misinterpret my position here—I am not criticizing the then government for that; that is their business. What I want to do is to bring to your attention a certain telegram from the same gentleman, Mr. Lyttleton to the government here, in which he says this:

> In reply to your telegram received to-day, please inform your Prime Minister that before taking steps as regards the adhesion of your government to Commercial Treaty with Japan, His Majesty's government awaiting reply to telegram of July 14.

That was regarding this reservation. A second telegram was sent in which the government said they would adhere without reservation. Now my point here is this—I am not offering any criticism for their having done so, not at all because it was rectified later—but the point is the British government offered to the government of Canada this reservation. That is that we should retain control of our immigration, that we should have the right to say to the Japanese in this case, or to any other people "As far as you are concerned we do not desire to admit your people as permanent residents in Canada —that is as settlers, as immigrants if you like." But that is not all. I find in another copy of the sessional papers a despatch from Mr. Chamberlain, who was the Secretary of State in another government, in July 1898. Now this despatch from Mr. Chamberlain representing the Imperial government was in regard to certain correspondence disallowing some acts of British Columbia—the act referred to by my hon. friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie). That is the British Columbia legislature passed an act similar to the Natal Act whereby they imposed the educational test. This act was disallowed but Mr. Chamberlain says in a despatch addressed to the Earl of Aberdeen, Governor General of Canada, and date 20th July, 1898:

> In the meantime I have to request that you will impress upon your ministers that restrictive legislation of the type of which this legislation in question appears to be is extremely repugnant.

Then he goes on.

> And you should not fail to impress upon them the importance if there is any real prospect of a large influx of Japanese labourers into Canada, of dealing with it by legislation of the Dominion Parliament on the line of the accompanying Natal Act, which is likely to be generally adopted in Australia.

And he sent a copy of the act to the Dominion of Canada telling us—this Imperial minister who was doing the negotiating on behalf of the Imperial government and the government of Japan—telling us "Here is an act; pass this act". Now I have a copy of the act. I take another step. Do not forget this—that Mr. Lyttleton and Mr. Chamberlain, both of them representing the Imperial government, both of them at the time considering the very problem we are considering to-night offered or suggested—indeed they said to impress upon the Canadian ministers the desirability of adopting—this Natal Act. Now this Natal Act was adopted by South Africa, by New Zealand and by Australia, and the one clause to which particular reference was made is as follows:

> Immigration . . . . is prohibited of any person who fails to pass the dictation test, that is to say who, when an officer dictates to him not less than fifty words in any prescribed language, fails to read them out in that language in the presence of the officer.

Now I am not here to say that is the best or that it is the correct method; but I am here to say that when the suggestion or argument is advanced that we must not deal with this question because of Imperial difficulties, the Imperial government is officially on record twice in urging us to adopt the Natal Act. I am here to tell the House that the Natal Act has been in force in Natal and in the other portions of what is now the Dominion of South Africa, in Australia, and in New Zealand. Not only is it in force in these countries but it has been taken advantage of to restrict oriental immigration. Not only is that the case, but I find that this Parliament, as recently as 1913, again asserted this doctrine to which I am giving utterance, to which I cling tenaciously, and upon which I believe, Sir, this question may be decided one way or the other. If you admit we clearly have this right to restrict—yes, Sir, to refuse admission to Canada—all persons we consider not to be desirable, if we once admit that right, if we once realize that that right has been asserted by the British government and by the Overseas Dominions, surely we place ourselves in a position where we no longer fear the argument. But we have it again in the Statutes of Canada, 111-IV George V, 1913, referred to this afternoon by the mover of this resolution. Let me just put on record what is definitely stated in the statutes:

> Nothing in the said treaty or in this act shall be deemed to repeal or affect any of the provisions of the Immigration Act.

Now I have read the provisions of the Immigration Act as they are and as they have been on the statute books for many years. I have read this treaty with Japan. In other words the Japanese government in 1896, in 1905, and in 1913 admitted and embalmed in these treaties our right to restrict their immigration if we so chose. The Imperial government has urged us to so restrict it. Now, Sir, what remains to be done? Simply that we exercise this inalienable right in the interest of the Dominion of Canada as a whole.

Now let me turn to another point in this matter, let me refer to the Washington Conference. It has been said that owing to the peculiar manner in which the British Empire was closely, and intimately one could say, allied with Japan that nothing should be done by Canada that might in any way disturb the kindly relations between the two. With that I am wholly in accord but, Sir, only a few months ago in Washington this dual responsibility was ended, and the burden of the solving of the problems of the Pacific was placed upon the shoulders of four great nations—Great Britain, France, the United States and Japan. These four great nations entered into a treaty that, whenever questions arose of a perplexing or threatening character, a conference would be held and a solution would be found. I want to say to the House that that pact at Washington removed from Great Britain a very serious anxiety and perplexity indeed. Now, Sir, I wish to take a step further. Leaving that Imperial question, leaving the international question which I think I have shown—

Mr. McKENZIE: Before my hon. friend leaves that point with which he has been splendidly dealing, does he notice the distinction which the mover of the resolution makes between "restriction" and "exclusion." The two things are very different indeed. Which of the two does my hon. friend favour?

Mr. STEVENS: I take, without reservation, the position of exclusion. I am grateful to my hon. friend for raising the point. It was that there is a finely drawn distinction between what was an adequate restriction on the one hand and exclusion on the other, and that brought about these very conferences and the correspondence to which I have referred, and which resulted in the Natal Act being adopted by the other Dominions, Australia, South Africa and New Zealand. While, perhaps, the act does not state frankly that they are going to exclude, yet in effect it does exclude, and it was to obtain that result that this act was passed. This is not a restrictive act; it is an exclusion act. I said a moment ago that I was not here to say that this is the best method, but I do say that it is an effective method, and if we are to go by precedents, if it has been adopted, as it has, and been in operation for many years by the other Dominions, we are justified, at least, in taking a step to that extent.

"Canada a white man's country" is not merely an empty phrase. I want to say to the House that this is an essential doctrine. The time has come that we must determine in Canada whether we are going to preserve this country as peculiarly and essentially a white man's country, or whether we are going to share its resources, its national, social and economical life, with other races, whose type of civilization, however good, is distinct wholly from ours. The other Dominions have had this problem before them for many years in a very active and vital form, but you will notice that in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa there are large areas that are semi-tropical, in which, perhaps, there is some excuse for saying that those areas are not a white man's country, but no man on earth can say that Canada is not essentially, climatically and in every other way a white man's country. It is necessary for us to take cognizance of this point, that we must determine whether or not Canada is going to be preserved as a white man's country. We may make blunders in taxing or in penal laws, but we can rectify those blunders at the next session of Parliament, or in the next generation, but if we make a blunder in this regard and allow the entry into Canada of a very large number of persons who are wholly incongruous in conditions and life, who are incompatible to the race here, no action on our part can remedy it in the next generation. It will be gone forever, and Canada's purity of national type will be gone forever, and that is, sir, a situation which I look upon and look towards with a great deal of fear.

Indeed, Sir, the problem facing us is this: a conflict between theoretical international justice and stubborn internal, economic and sociological facts. That is the problem this House is called upon now, and it has been called upon in the past, but never with the insistence that it is at this hour, to determine as between these two points, whether any fine-spun theory regarding the conventional rights of an individual to move untrammelled wherever he desires is to prevail as against stubborn economic and sociological facts. I know in addressing the Prime Minister, I am appealing to one who has given considerable thought to social and economic problems, and I think he will appreciate my arguments when I once again remind him that Canada cannot admit of a dual standard of living. We cannot admit of a standard of living under conditions that the white population will not tolerate, while there is an upper strata, supposedly ruling the country—and he knows this, and I appeal to him as one who does know and others who have studied it will agree with me—that sooner or later that under strata will draw the so-called upper strata down to its level and very rarely is there any record in the pages of history where a large numerical growth has been elevated from a lower to a higher standard, that is, where there is a distinction in type and in racial construction. I desire to emphasize the point that procrastination in this matter will do no good. Not only will it do no good, but it will just serve to intensify the perplexity and to increase the force and the number of the difficulties with which we are confronted. There never will be a time when we can solve this problem as easily, as expeditiously and as successfully as we can do it now. But the longer we let it stand the greater will be the difficulty and the more intense will be our trouble.

I am going to state briefly where I stand on this problem; I do so after 25 years of close observation in Canada and in the Orient, and I do it after the most intense study of the problem to the best of my ability and with full acquaintance with the facts. I stand for the exclusion of the Asiatics as permanent residents of Canada. I pause here to say that perhaps that may shock some, but it need not. I am not saying that we shall not deal with, trade with, and admit bona fide traders or tourists or students to the country, but let them be bona fide and not come into this country ostensibly as traders and then become labourers in competition with our labourers. Let them come in here as bona fide students, and not under the colour of being students, and then turn out to be cooks or workers in our mills. That is the experience we have had in recent years.

We have had thousands of Chinese come in as bona fide students, and I think the immigration authorities did their best to examine and restrict them strictly to that class. We find thousands of them coming in as students, and then being distributed over the country as common labourers. In the fall of 1920, there came in as merchants, 1,400, whereas in months previous they had come in over many years at the rate of two or three a month. At that rate we could easily absorb them. There would be no great difficulty, but when suddenly the immigration rose to two, three, or four hundred per month, so that in four months 1,400 came in, it was time for us to take cognizance of it, and with the result that we found a regular scheme or system inaugurated in Canton by persons who had no other object but to gain money for themselves. They were entering Canada under these false colours. Now, Sir, there is plenty of room for regulations or, within regulations, for the promotion of trade and commerce and for communications of the character to which I have referred.

I wish to emphasize the fact that we in British Columbia, where we have been faced with this problem intimately for years, stand on the ground of total exclusion of oriental settlers. Let us take that question of persons who come into Canada to settle and remain. We stand in absolute opposition to any system of indenture or contract labour, and we also stand for a fair and just deal for all who are legally in the country. We want no oppression now, but straight British fair play for those who are in the country. I have a word to say in regard to indenture labour—the indenture labour referred to so frequently by individuals as a method of helping Canada to develop her natural resources and to settle her western lands. Another answer, which I should have given a moment ago, which I desire to lay before the House now, is this—and hon. members will at once see the force of it.

You cannot show me any instance where the oriental has pioneered in Canada. Can you? They do not pioneer. How have our prairies been settled? They have been settled by the hardiest white men in Canada. Who were the pioneers in Quebec, the maritime provinces, northern Ontario, the wilds of British Columbia, the mining districts? White men, the best of white men. But your oriental, where is he? He is in the heart of the cities. Where is he in the Okanagan? He comes in there after the white man, struggling, experimenting and suffering disappointment and perplexity, has developed the country. After the white man has done the pioneering work in developing the markets, along comes the oriental and picks the plum. Where is he in the cities? He is to be found in the very heart of our cities, living under conditions which are anything but satisfactory. I want to emphasize that point. The oriental does not pioneer; he contributes nothing towards the opening up and development of the new country; he does, however, come along behind the pioneer and pick the plum.

In conclusion, let me ask this. Shall Canada remain white, or shall Canada become parti-coloured? Shall British institutions, traditions, ethics, and social standards prevail; or shall they, by blind neglect and purposeless procrastination, submit to a peaceful conquest by the forerunners of the hordes of Asia? Shall Canadianism, which we are always proud to picture as the perfection of British democracy, prevail; or shall it recede before the races that, as I have already said, are incongruous and incompatible with our mode of life? This is the problem before the House; this is the danger that we call upon the Parliament of Canada to avert, and this is the menace which we who know the difficulties, who understand the problem, are absolutely determined to resist to the uttermost extremity.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the mover of this resolution, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie), has said, and others who have spoken in the debate have agreed with him, that this is not a local, nor a provincial, nor, for that matter, a national question; that it is larger than a national question, it is a question of great concern to all parts of the British Empire; it is a great international and world problem, and it is from that point of view that I think we must all consider the arguments that have been presented this afternoon and evening. The House is to be congratulated on the tone of the debate from the moment it commenced. There has been an effort on the part of hon. members to approach this subject from the point of view of national interest, and to keep away from anything in the nature of party controversy. I need scarcely say that, in this regard, I am most anxious to follow all who have spoken before me in the course of this debate. The question should not be considered as a party question; it is a great national question, a great imperial question, a great international question, and we should all deal with it from the point of view of the responsibility which a question of such magnitude brings. If I refrain from going into the figures which have been quoted in the course of the debate this afternoon; if I refrain from making any mention of the statistics of the number of Japanese or Chinese who have come to this country during the last few years, I do so simply to avoid introducing any element of party controversy into the discussion, for hon. members will see at a glance that there is nothing that has happened since the 6th of December which could make this question so burning at the present moment. The argument that has been presented to-day all refers to immigration from the Orient during recent years, during the period of the administration which preceded the present one. For that reason and that alone, I shall refrain from saying anything about the statistics which have been quoted in the course of the debate.

Respecting the problem itself, may I say that I agree entirely with the view of the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), as to this being fundamentally a great economic problem? In stating that it is an economic problem, he simply reiterated what has been said by most of the speakers who have addressed the House on the subject this afternoon. It is partly a racial question, partly a great political question; but it is primarily an economic question, a question of competing industrial and social standards. I have given a little thought to this problem during recent years, having had occasion several years ago to investigate the causes of immigration from the Orient, and ever since, having seen with increasing clearness, the vast significance of the problem to our country and other countries.

May I illustrate the point I should like to make by citing an example which affords a striking parallel? In the reign of Queen Elizabeth, an officer of the Crown of that day discovered what he claimed to be a law governing the precious metals, where metals of different qualities or quantities of fineness were put into circulation as coinage in competition with each other. That law has come to be known as Gresham's law of the precious metals. What Gresham discovered was that, where two kinds of metals were in circulation as coinage, if one was of finer quality than the other, the baser metal tended to drive the finer metal out of circulation. The latter came to be either hoarded or melted down and sold as bullion, or used in the international exchange; and that, in the course of a very short time, the only metal that remained in circulation was the metal of less fine quality of the two. That was but an illustration of the law of competition applied particularly to the precious metals. I believe that economic science will yet come to assert that a similar law obtains as between competing industrial and social standards where such exist. And in this great problem of immigration, of peoples of different races, different habits and different modes of thought and life being brought into competition with each other, I think we view the matter aright when we assert that, sooner or later, the particular civilization that has a lower standard will, if it is permitted to compete with a civilization of a higher standard, bring the higher standard down to its level. It is for that reason that I regard this subject as of so great importance to our Dominion. In speaking of the oriental standard as different from our own, I do not wish to imply that orientals are in any way a less splendid people than peoples of European races. When oriental labour in this country comes into competition with white labour in this country, it does so under conditions vastly different as between the two. White labour, with the associations that are attached to family life as it exists amongst those of our own families, carries with it obligations of a character which do not adhere to the family life of those who come to us from the Orient and who enter into competition with our labour. I need only mention that all white labour in this country has obligations of a character which are related to the social life of our country, with regard to which the labour that comes from the Orient does not have a like relationship, for example, the observance of one day in seven, the obligations attaching to the education of children, the membership in labour organizations, the affiliations with clubs and churches and the like,—all these and very many other associations that I might mention go to make up the social standard of living of our people. The people from the Orient when they come to our shores do not have like standards to maintain. The result is that unless our labour is protected against this competition, sooner or later it is brought down to the economic level of the race that is competing against it. I think that has been demonstrated very clearly in a number of our industries. There is no doubt that in many parts of Canada where competition of the Orient with our own labour has been great, our own labour has been driven completely out of the field of effective effort. From this point of view we are justified in regarding this question in all seriousness, for what has been going on on a limited scale to-day may in course of time proceed on an international scale.

North America is peculiarly situated as respects this problem because on this continent European civilization is brought into competition with oriental civilization. It is here that these two civilizations are brought into competition with each other. This continent has already for the most part been peopled by the white races of Europe; they have established their standards here. Of recent years the peoples of the Orient have been coming in increasing numbers, and their civilization with its lower economic standards is being brought into competition with our own. Consequently the great problem to be decided is, which of these two civilizations is to prevail. If I am correct—and I believe I am—in the assertion that it is a great economic law that the lower civilization will, if permitted to compete with the higher, tend to drive the higher out of existence, or drag it down to the lower level, then we see the magnitude of the question viewed as a great national problem.

There is not only that aspect to be considered. There is another important national aspect that claims our attention—the desirability of a country having a homogeneous people. It must be admitted that every country should have the right to control the composition of its own population. That is a fundamental right which I think we are in duty bound to assert. As has been said over and over again in this debate, it is impossible ever to hope to assimilate a white population with the races of the Orient; the two will not assimilate. We wisely recognize that, we realize that if the question of oriental immigration ever became one of any considerable magnitude, we would be face to face at once with the loss of that homogeneity which ought to characterize the people of this country if we are to be a great nation. From that point of view we have to assume responsibility in this matter.

There is one other aspect which I think we cannot consider too seriously, and that is the obligation that exists at all times to avoid as far as possible the danger of social and industrial unrest, to say nothing of the vaster possibility of international strife. It is futile to contend that that danger is not pregnant where the oriental races are brought into competition to any great extent with the white races. Some fourteen or fifteen years ago I had the privilege of investigating the causes of Asiatic riots on our Pacific coast, and in the light of what I learned at that time, it would be impossible for me to do other than assert that that danger is existent wherever these two different competing industrial standards make their effect felt the one upon the other.

So, Mr. Speaker, from the point of view of the maintenance of our social and industrial standards, from the point of view of the desirability of maintaining a homogeneous population, and from the point of view of avoiding social and industrial unrest and the possibility of international strife, I feel very strongly that this matter of the restriction of immigration from the Orient must be dealt with, and dealt with effectively. I believe strongly in the restriction of oriental immigration, and I think it is the duty of the Government to do all in its power to make that restriction as effective as it can be made, maintaining the good-will as far as it can be maintained of all the peoples that go to make up the vast human family.

Now, let me say a word in regard to two classes of oriental immigration which have been referred to this afternoon. I think the mover of the resolution has very wisely made no mention of the immigration from India, because there are special reasons which should incline us to take up that problem with the greatest possible care. But in the last analysis we must remember that the arguments which apply in the case of immigration from China and from Japan are applicable also, when it comes to matters of industrial competition, to the population from India; and for that reason I think any position which we take on this question with respect to Japan and China should be regarded as being equally applicable to peoples from other parts of the Orient because we will have that question as well again to deal with sooner or later.

In regard to the Chinese, it has been mentioned this afternoon that the restriction sought in that connection was effected by the imposition of a head tax, at first fixed at $50, then at $100, and now and for some time past at $500. That that has been insufficient and ineffective is perfectly plain. The figures speak for themselves. The numbers of Chinese coming into this country despite the $500 head tax are very considerable. I think we might well say that the imposition upon the peoples of another country of a head tax by a nation professing a christian civilization is somewhat of a contradiction in terms. Something has been said tonight about the heathen and the pagan. Certainly the heathen and the pagan mind must find itself somewhat confused when it seeks to appreciate the Christian ethics that lead a Christian people to make money for their country out of a tax imposed upon persons coming from another country to follow a livelihood in the country which is to profit by them. I would favour the elimination of this head tax altogether and the substitution of a method that would be not only less objectionable but also more effective.

Some years ago the Liberal government of the day sought to bring about just such a change in the method of restricting immigration from China. In 1908 I had the honour of representing this country at an international conference at Shanghai. Before going to the conference, Sir Wilfrid Laurier mentioned to me that it was his desire to do away with the head tax, if possible, and bring about an arrangement with China whereby immigration from that country to Canada thereafter would be restricted by the adoption of a system of passports over the numbers of which our government would have control. He asked me, while in China to take up this matter with the Chinese government. I did so, and as a result of the negotiations an agreement was drafted between the Government of Canada and the Government of China, doing away with the head tax and substituting therefor a passport system, with the restriction of numbers in the hands of the Canadian Government. At the time that this matter was under consideration with the then government the question of the reciprocity agreement with the United States came up, and it was decided to leave over the matter of oriental immigration until the reciprocity issue was determined. As hon. members well recall, the government of the day was defeated after the reciprocity campaign, and subsequently the government of China, which had been the other party to this preliminary negotiation, was also changed as a consequence of a revolution, so the negotiations fell through about as effectively as any negotiations could. But I would like to say to-night on behalf of the Government that we have already taken steps to resume negotiations looking to the restriction of Chinese immigration by a system of passports, the numbers of which this Government will control. That, we believe, can be made a system of effective restriction so far as that class of immigration is concerned.

One further word in regard to this question of Chinese immigration. Very little has been said this afternoon about the admission of Chinese students to this country except that in some cases Chinese have come in, supposedly as students, but in reality as labourers. I think we should make an effort to encourage Chinese students to come to our universities. In that view I believe we have the support not only of those who are interested in trade and commerce, but, I believe, of practically all classes in this country. When the deputation of the Trades and Labour Congress was before the Government I spoke to its members on this point, and the delegation expressed no objection to the admission of Chinese students to our universities, provided that the Government could make sure that this particular class came in with proper safeguards.

There are several reasons why Chinese students should be admitted to our universities. In the first place, if this country is to develop a trade with the Orient—and I take it that all people in the country would like to see trade develop between Canada and the Orient—it is wholly to our advantage that Chinese students should come to our country, that they should know something of Canadian conditions and after returning to their country help to make our conditions known in China. The American Government after the Boxer trouble in China, when a considerable indemnity was to be paid by China to the United States, believing that it was in the interests of trade to encourage Chinese students to come to their universities, agreed to allow that indemnity to be applied towards the paying of the expenses of Chinese students in American universities. The result is that hundreds of students have come from China to American colleges and have gone back to their country, and with their knowledge of American conditions have done what they could to stimulate trade between China and the United States. Spending some time in travelling in China on the occasion to which I have referred, I was impressed with the extent to which the Americans had invaded the markets of the Orient. On practically all trains on which one travelled, the cutlery, a great part of the canned food, many of the articles in use on the dining tables, were from the United States. In the City of Peking there was a store every article in which was labelled as having been made in America. In different parts of China and Japan it was very noticeable that the contact which educated orientals had had with the United States had gone a long way toward furthering trade in that country.

But there is another argument which, I think, is also important from a national point of view. If this continent is ever to meet the competition of the Orient, which will be an increased competition as years go by, it must make a contribution to the Orient which alone can save the situation. The Orient must become acquainted with our higher standards, as we call them—our higher social and industrial standards—see the wisdom of them and gradually come to adopt them. We may send all the missionaries in the world to China to preach the gospel of a larger humanitarianism, but that will never begin to effect what a few men who have studied in our universities, who have become accustomed to our civilization, will be able to effect when they return to their country and, in their own effective way, impress the benefits of that higher civilization upon their countrymen. I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to take up too much time on this subject, so I will hasten on and refer to the question of the Japanese, the other class alluded to in this resolution.

Mention has been made of the existing trade treaty with Japan, and it has been suggested that the Government should give notice that twelve months hence the treaty will be abolished. It may be that such is a wise and desirable course, but I think, Mr. Speaker, before it is taken the Government should consider very carefully the advantages which might thereby be lost, and whether it is really necessary to sacrifice those advantages in order to attain the object which hon. gentlemen who have spoken have in view. We are asked to make appropriations for facilities of trade with the Orient for the ports of Vancouver, Victoria and Prince Rupert. We are asked to do a great deal for the cities on our western coasts. For what reason? Because they claim that the trade with the Orient is a growing trade, and they hope to see it expand even more and more. Is it advisable, if it can be avoided, that the Government should take any step which may prove a barrier to the development of trade between Canada and the Orient? I submit that Parliament should consider very carefully the effect upon the possible development or commercial relations between this country and the Orient, of every act that it may enact or propose.

In the present treaty I find the following clause, which has already been mentioned by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens):

> Nothing in the said treaty or in this Act shall be deemed to repeal or affect any of the provisions of the Immigration Act.

Now, that may refer to the Immigration Act as amended up to date, or it may refer only to the Immigration Act as it existed at the time this agreement was adhered to on behalf of Canada in 1913. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that by negotiation with the Japanese government it will be possible to ascertain whether the Japanese government have any objection to that clause being construed as applicable to the immigration laws of this country as they may be amended at any time. I am inclined to think they will take that view, but if they should not do so, then I think it would be time to consider whether in the national interest that treaty should be abrogated.

But the further step that is suggested is that we should abolish what is called the Gentleman's Agreement now existing between Japan and this country. I am somewhat surprised at the statements which have fallen from the lips of some of the speakers this afternoon to the effect that the Japanese government have not lived up to that agreement. In this matter we have to consider very carefully the source from which the Japanese immigration into British Columbia has come, and to what extent the prevention of further immigration is likely to be effectively brought about through the abolition of an agreement to which at the present time the Japanese government is a party, and which I believe the Japanese government have adhered to loyally.

One hon. member mentioned that a few years ago there were a very large number of Japanese in Mexico and that today they had dwindled down to a very few. He asked where they had gone, and the assumption was that they had gone into the United States. If that be true, it cannot be suggested that these Japanese went into the United States in violation of any agreement existing between that country and Japan for which the Japanese government were responsible. They got in through evasions of the immigration laws, apart altogether from the agreement between the United States and Japan. May it not be equally true in regard to British Columbia that the Japanese have been coming in there from the United States, apart altogether from any attempt on the part of the Japanese government to stimulate immigration to this country from Japan?

When I investigated the causes of immigration from the Orient some years ago, under royal commission, I found that practically all the immigration that had come to Canada from Japan had been at the instance of private companies, apart altogether from any action on the part of the Japanese government. I think we should be careful in a discussion of this kind and of this importance to discriminate between immigration that may owe its origin to evasions, which would not be affected at all by any change in an existing agreement, and to immigration that can be put down to some deliberate effort on the part of the Japanese government to ignore an agreement to which it is a party. I wish to say that I think the Japanese government has been wholly honourable in the manner in which it has carried out the terms of that agreement, and I do not think unless we are very, very sure of our ground, that we will help to solve this question by attributing any false step or imputing any wrong motive to the government of another country, particularly a country which has been our ally for years, and which, as was mentioned by one or two of the speakers this afternoon, rendered our country vast service at a very critical moment in the course of the last few years. We will gain more in the long run by recognizing the difficulties and endeavours of other governments to deal with these very problems, as well as the difficulties of our own government. This question is not an easy one to be dealt with by the Japanese government itself. They have their problems, as well as we have ours, and if it is to be effectively solved, I believe this will only be by the governments of the two countries working together with the one motive. I believe they can work together with the one motive, of bringing about an effective solution.

In regard to the attitude of the Japanese government, may I refer the House to a statement which appears in Hansard of April 29, 1919. In a debate on that day the Hon. Mr. Calder, who at that time was Minister of Immigration, had this to say in regard to the manner in which he thought the Japanese government had been living up to their agreement:

> The House is aware of the fact that some years ago an arrangement was made whereby a limited number of Japanese would be permitted to enter Canada. I have gone into the situation very carefully, and I can tell the House that the agreement has been lived up to by the Japanese government to the letter. As a matter of fact, taking the figures for the last four or five years, there are in the neighbourhood of 400 or 500 fewer Japanese in Canada to-day than three were in 1914.

That was the statement made by the Minister of the Interior in the Government of Sir Robert Borden, and of my right hon. friend, with respect to the manner in which the Japanese government had lived up to the terms of their agreement up to that time 1919 and I know of no reason to believe that the Japanese government have not ever since been equally vigilant in living up to the terms of the agreement.

To hurry to a conclusion may I say just a word about the difference between the use of the word "exclusion" and the use of the word "restriction", because that point has come up in the present debate. Just because this question is of the magnitude it is this House cannot be too careful in the impression which may be created abroad as a consequence of any phrase or word which may be used in debate or in resolution. The word "exclusion" in regard to these matters of immigration has come to have a meaning that to the peoples of the Orient is most offensive. If you read the debates that have taken place in the different Imperial Conferences, in the Peace Conference at Versailles, in the Conference at Washington, and in conferences which my right hon. friend attended of the premiers of the different countries, you will discover that wherever the different nations have come together to deal with this question in any of its forms, they have been careful to avoid in any formal resolution the use of the word exclusion, and I say without fear of contradiction that there is not to-day as regards any part of the British Empire—South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, or any other part—any exclusion act so termed, nor do I know of any exclusion act on the part of any nation in the world. That is not a matter of chance happening. That has been the result of very careful thought and deliberation upon the consequences of using particular words where those words are known to have an offensive meaning in the minds of other people upon whom they may appear to reflect. My hon. friend has spoken of the Natal Act. He said that it was to all intents and purposes an exclusion act. Well, I agree with him that it is so to all intents and purposes, but it is not an exclusion act. Australia has enacted what is to all intents and purposes exclusion against Japan, but Australia has enacted no exclusion act.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is perhaps overlooking the fact that the United States have an exclusion act against the Chinese though not perhaps against Japanese.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am speaking of the Japanese. I am glad my hon. friend has mentioned that. The reason why the enactment was in the nature of an exclusion against China and not against Japan was that China was regarded as a second-rate power, not a first class power.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend will again permit me. He used the phrase that there was no such thing as an exclusion act in the world. That is the reason I rose to correct him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must thank my hon. friend. I was talking of the relations between Japan and this country, and I was thinking of no exclusion act against Japan.

I might point out that in 1901 when Australia adopted what was termed the Natal Act, she applied an educational test, and the educational test as fixed in 1901 by Australia was that any immigrant coming to the country would have to be able to write down a sentence of some fifty words, at the dictation of an officer, in any European language. Four years later, in 1905, the words "in any European language" were changed to read "in any language", and the change was made in order that there might be no offence to the Japanese. At the same time the government of Australia agreed to admit by passport into that country tourists, merchants, students and other classes, the Minister of External Affairs of the Commonwealth undertaking to control the number of passports that were being issued. Now that was not exclusion; that was effective restriction. The same thing is true of New Zealand and South Africa; and I contend, Mr. Speaker, that this House would make a great mistake if it took a course which, after great care and thought, no other part of the Empire has thus far taken. Let me say that I am in entire sympathy with the motive and the purpose of the mover of this resolution. I think if the resolution is to serve the avowed purpose he has in mind it is all important that it should pass this House as an unanimous resolution. I do not think we will help the cause of effective restriction of oriental immigration if there is any division of opinion in this House as to the resolution which should govern in the matter. If my hon. friend is prepared to substitute the words "effective restriction" for the word "exclusion" in his resolution I will, on behalf of the Government, agree to accept his resolution; but if he is unwilling to do that, I should feel that the reasons I have mentioned are sufficiently grave as to constitute a justification for the Government not accepting the resolution in the form in which it has been moved.

Now I wish to address one word in the nature of an appeal to my right hon. friend who sits opposite. When he was in the place which I now have the privilege of occupying, he spoke to me about the advisability, in these matters of foreign policy and larger questions of international purport, of the House rising above any question of party, and considering such measures when before the House solely from the point of view of the national interest—in other words considering what would best serve the interest of Canada, the interest of the Empire and the international obligations of which we might be seeking to take account. I make that appeal to him to-night. I would like this House to rise above any consideration of party one way or the other. I would like its members to view this question in the light of the responsibility which we have, not only as citizens of our own country, but to all parts of the British Empire, and also our obligations to the other countries of the world. Let us adopt a resolution which this House can agree upon unanimously, and avoid attempting to pass any motion which is certain to be misunderstood by the other party to the arrangement. There are two methods of dealing with these grave international questions. You can attempt to deal with them by law, by enacting legislation which in all probability will prove ineffective and serve only to antagonize and arouse bitterness and misunderstanding on the part of others; or they can be dealt with by negotiation between the governments of the different countries concerned in a spirit of good will, a spirit of friendly relationship with a great object in view. I contend that we are now dealing with one question which should only be dealt with from the latter point of view. We must seek to-day, above all times, to further good-will and to eliminate anything that is going to make for ill-will as between the nations of the world. There have been conferences for the purpose of establishing a League of Nations; there have been conferences for the purpose of doing away with the possibility of future war; conferences to bring about peaceful relations between the different countries of the world. We have a chance in this House of Commons to-night to help forward that new movement of good-will as between the different nations, or we can set it back and create an entirely new and very serious international problem. To-day, as this matter stands, we are in the position of appearing to have a grievance as against the orientals because of their coming in, in too large numbers, into our country. Let us enact an exclusion law, let us pass a resolution which will be understood by the oriental as meaning exclusion, and the grievance immediately becomes one on the part of the Orient as against us. Now I contend, Mr. Speaker, that we shall not help to solve the situation that has arisen in that way, and I plead with hon. gentlemen opposite not to embarrass the Government in its efforts to deal with this great problem, but in a cordial and wholehearted way to lend their assistance to the administration in its endeavour to elevate this question beyond the plane of party considerations to a realm which will help to further international good-will, friendly relations, and at the same time effectively deal with the problem to which my hon. friend's resolution refers.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the wording of the resolution moved by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie) is as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the immigration of oriental aliens and their rapid multiplication is becoming a serious menace to living conditions, particularly on the Pacific coast, and to the future of the country in general, and the Government should take immediate action with a view to securing the exclusion of future immigration of this type.

I read the resolution in order to emphasize its limitations rather than its extent. The resolution contemplates the exclusion of immigrants of a certain class —the limitation of immigration. Immigration has a well-known meaning, it has a defined meaning in our statutes. Within the confines of that definition there would not be included many of those referred to by the Prime Minister, in the address that he has just finished, as of the class who should not, in the common interest, and in the common international interest particularly, be forbidden from our shores The resolution does throw into the arena of this House the question of restriction as against the question of exclusion, and the House must decide between the two. I am not here to argue for a moment that a question of this sort should be a matter of party controversy. The Government of which I was the head maintained a policy of restriction. That has been the policy of Canada up till now—that is to say it has been as respects the Japanese. At the same time we had, in the development of our nation, reached the stage when we must come to a conclusion as to whether we are going to have the exclusion as permanent residents of oriental aliens or not. We have to decide it. If we are going to pass a resolution in favour of effective restriction we really pass a resolution in favour of just what we are asked to do. We pass a resolution against taking further steps, by such means as the Government may devise, of going farther and stopping immigration, as such, from oriental alien lands.

Now I know it is a serious step to take; it would have been taken years ago had it not been a serious step. If this House decides that there has transpired in these years sufficient to convince us that we must in our own defence take this action then it is for the House of Commons to say so —not in terms of offence to any land but in terms of firmness and terms of decision. I propose to inquire very briefly whether we have reached that stage or not, and I propose to state m views in language that will be, I think, clear, in language that certainly will not be offensive, and I hope in language that will be very brief. In discussing this question it is needless to affirm that we must use the utmost care that no language be adopted that is unjust, and that offends the susceptibilities of any nation or any people in the world.

The resolution has to do with the relations between the British Empire and two great nations, China and Japan. There is a special reason as to both of them why we must be careful that the good relations now existing may continue. As to China because we have been parties at the recent disarmament conferences, to action there looking to the rehabilitation of that country, and its elevation again to the front rank of nations. Canada has taken a leading part in that work. Our relations with China have always been friendly. We pray that they may always be so.

As to Japan, there is perhaps still greater reason, not at all because she is a stronger power, but because the intimacy between the Empire of which we are a part and the Empire of Japan has been greater than it has been between that Empire and China. We have been historically—that is looking back over two or three decades—allies of Japan. We were allies under the Anglo-Japanese treaty until the winter that we have just passed through, and under the ægis of that alliance we joined hands together in the greatest war in history. Under the terms of that alliance, Japan stood at a great price true to her obligation and assisted magnificently our own Empire and all the allies in the struggle. Japan particularly took part in that measure of defence that had to do most directly with our own safety as a dominion here. Japan lived true and stood square with all the burdens of the Anglo-Japanese alliance: that is to say, in so far as they particularly related to our country, at least.

Nor have I any complaint to make at all as to the manner in which Japan has conducted herself as bearing on what is known as the Gentleman's Agreement conducted by yourself or rather arranged by yourself, Mr. Speaker, back in the year 1907. I had not heard before that there was any cause of complaint over Japan's fidelity to that treaty. I believe with the Prime Minister that Japan stood true to the obligation she entered into with us there, consequently we must take care that whatever we say will be such that this country could take no umbrage if corresponding language were uttered in the Diet of Japan, and that we must take no action as such that, if the converse action were taken by the Diet of Japan, there would be objection taken in our Dominion.

Now what are the facts? We have had for some years, dating back, I think, to about 1886, some immigration from Japan and considerable immigration from China. I have the figures before me, extending back to 1905. Within that time I find that 42,085 have come to our shores as per the immigration figures from China, and that, in the same period, 20,883 by the same figures have come from Japan. It is claimed that we have at present, though perhaps the census may not disclose it, approximately 20,000 Japanese in our provinces of whom about 15,000 would be residents of the province of British Columbia. That number of itself is not relatively large having reference to our population. Across the border in the state of California there are said to be 100,000 Japanese, and in the other states of the Union about 50,000, a total of 150,000, as against a grand total of about 108,000,000 in the republic. The numbers there of Japanese would also appear not to be alarming, judging by the figures alone, relative to the whole population of the states.

But nevertheless we know—we cannot help but know, and we all know—that both in the United States and in Canada the numbers, by reason of the occupation and the modes of life, the habits of the people, are alarming, in view of the increase. No one can go to British Columbia, even for a visit, or to the further parts of Alberta, and not come back convinced of the sincere state of alarm in which virtually the whole population of the mountain province is found now because of the extent of Japanese aggression within that province, and of Chinese aggression too. The very same condition exactly obtains in the states to the south. The reasons have been disclosed in the arguments this afternoon. I do not intend to repeat them now. They are based on the fact that both the Chinese and Japanese people are accustomed through generations, through centuries, through ages to a standard of living far below, or, if it is better so to express it, far different from ours, so much so that there is no possibility of competition in industrial life between those of our race and theirs—based on the fact as well that their temperaments, their habits and their very natures are such that assimilation with our people is an impossibility.

Assimilation is always an impossibility where marriage itself is forbidden by the very essence of the fact. Marriage is forbidden between the Japanese and the Chinese on their part and the whites on the other—not forbidden by any special law, but it is proved through the ages not to be a habit, will not become a habit, and when it cannot become a habit a state of non-assimilation exists and we have to face the facts. The rate of propagation is such that in our own province it appears probable, judging by figures also before me, that the years will not be many before the births from those of Japanese origin in British Columbia will equal the births of the whites. How many those years will be no one can figure exactly, but when I notice that the births stood at 252 to 1 only in 1910—252 whites born to one Japanese—and when I see now not 252 to one, but last year 17 to one, then one is, at least, within the mark in saying that we are approaching the time, and it is not very far distant, when the rate of birth of the one will equal the rate of the other.

All this is equally feared in the country to the south. The process going on here has been parallelled there, and the state of alarm existing in the western states is at as high a peak as that which exists in our own province; consequently though we who are living in the more western and central provinces of Canada are not disposed so readily to measure the menace in the strong terms that it is measured in by our brothers in British Columbia, still we know that, however one may feel when he lives here, just have that man go out and live for a month, six months or a year in the Pacific coast provinces, and he comes back with his opinion just the same as the opinion of the rest of the population of that province. Now when that is a fact and has become a fact, this tremendous progression of all these races made there under the conditions that have obtained, under the laws that have obtained, under the traditions and in compliance with the treaties that have governed us through these years, surely it is not illogical to conclude that those laws, that province, those traditions and those understandings have not been sufficient to meet the situation.

Is there anything else we can do besides deciding upon exclusion of immigrants? By immigrants, of course, we mean those coming here for permanent residence, to make this country there home. Is there anything we can do without going to the extent of the exclusion of that class? I really do not see that there is. I do not know what we can do but go to that length. The point then is to inquire what are the perils about going to that length. What is there that is offensive, that is wrong, about such a course? I do not think there is any disposition on the part of any nation to take umbrage at a law that excludes their people from the borders of another country. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) may have read reports of conferences at which I was not present but I cannot recall the question of exclusion coming up, or yet its being emphasized, in any way at conferences at which I was present, that there was aversion to that term on the part of other countries. I do recall a resolution which will appear in a document which has been laid on the Table of this House, which was passed at a conference which I attended last summer, and in which it was distinctly affirmed that full and unrestricted control of immigration rested in each dominion of the Empire, even as against the inhabitants of another dominion or of India, and I do not think a stronger resolution on that subject or a stronger expression of opinion could be possible. It has been said that exclusion is a term not used. The Prime Minister went rather far in that assertion. It is, of course, much too far to go to assert that laws have not been passed in countries excluding from their borders those of a certain race or those of different classes of races. That has been done more than once. It is the law of the United States to-day as respects China. None of us disputes that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it the law as respects Japan?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. There is effective exclusion in the United States of Chinese. There is effective exclusion in Australia. We may have exclusion without using the word exclusion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the same arrangement as we have.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As regards Japan?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought my hon. friend referred to Australia. I will not state to the House what is allowed under the understanding with Canada as I have always been under the impression that those figures were not to be made public, but in the United States they have some similar understanding. What their figures are I do not know. But there is effective exclusion in Australia, and as I understand the matter, effective exclusion in New Zealand. Exclusion can be effective even though, in the statute upon that subject, the word "'exclusion" may not be used.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When my right hon. friend speaks about effective exclusion, do I understand that he means that no one is permitted to come in?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If he does not mean that, if he means "effective restriction," there is no disagreement between us.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I mean what I said, and I tried to be clear. I mean effective exclusion as regards immigrants as defined by our law, and that is as far as the resolution goes—exclusion of immigrants, not exclusion of students. Students are excepted under the terms of our definition; students are, in practice, excepted; tourists, clergymen are excepted. There are six or seven cases excepted within the definition of our law, if my memory serves me aright; and as long as the spirit of the term is used, that is as long as the restrictions as regards only those coming to reside are kept up, it would be quite consistent with the terms of that resolution that those exceptions might be modified.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my right hon. friend not recognize, in using such a word in a State document, if I may so describe it, or resolution, a danger that is very grave in these international transactions? May not the use of the word "exclusion", even in this resolution imply, when the cable reaches Japan to-morrow, that this Parliament has enacted a resolution in favour of the exclusion of Japanese? It is that danger that the Government is seeking to avoid.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There could not be justly a cable sent except one that was faithful to the resolution passed. I will proceed to argument that we ought to be able to say, without offence, that the time has come for effective exclusion of that class of people from our shores as residents here. That is all we intend to say by this. Let us proceed to argument. I stated first that there had been effective exclusion of the inhabitants of China in the United States.

My hon. friend says: "Oh, yes, but China is not a first class power." Are we to modify our language according to the number of troops that there may be in the nation to which that language refers? I do not think Japan would expect us to do that; I do not think China would be flattered to know that that is the reason she is excluded. The United States has for years excluded the Chinese. I do not know whether Canada once excluded them or not; I am included to think she did. I quote this from a speech delivered by Sir Wilfrid Laurier on the 2nd day of April, 1913, in this House. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was speaking at that time on a motion by Sir Robert Borden for the second reading of a bill ratifying, on behalf of Canada, the Immigration and Trade Treaty between Japan and Great Britain. Sir Wilfrid Laurier supported the ratification and he used this language:

> We did not hesitate some years ago to exclude by statute Chinese people from coming to this country, but when consideration had to be given to the question of excluding the Japanese by hostile legislation the late government—> —would not do so, for the simple reason that the Japanese were our allies, and we did not care to submit them to that indignity.

That is, his own government.

If that is correct, we did formerly exclude Chinese, and we did not maintain wholly the exclusion, but subsequently came to a policy of restriction by means of a head tax. There is effective exclusion, though the term may not be used, in the legislation in Australia as regards both Chinese and Japanese. There is effective exclusion in New Zealand of both. There is effective exclusion in the United States of Chinese now; and if Sir Wilfrid Laurier was right, we once had effective exclusion of Chinese. Why should this be offensive to any country. We do not ask for the exclusion of any people unless we are prepared to accept at their hands the very same treatment. There are reasons existing to-day why we are denied in Japan certain things that the Japanese are not denied in this country. I make no complaint of that. That suits their policy. There may be reasons why we should deny the Japanese certain rights in Canada which they would not feel like legislating as against us. But if they feel like doing that, certainly we can take no offence. We suggest, we ask for the exclusion, not out of any disrespect for the Japanese empire or the Chinese empire. We ask for it because it is for the permanent interest of the people of both those countries, that we maintain here our racial purity, just as they have considered it in their permanent interest to maintain their racial purity. It is not that we consider them an inferior race. Who can consider the Japanese people an inferior race? They have different standards of living from ours, standards of living that we describe as lower; but the Japanese nation in the last thirty years has, perhaps, made the greatest progress of any people of the world. It has made great progress in the advancement, not only of their military standards, but of their science, in the development of their arts and literature. In all that goes to make the highest type of a civilized nation the Japanese have gone ahead in the last thirty years faster than has any other great nation in the world. It is simply because they as a people so differ from us that the two races will not assimilate. They cannot work together industrially. Therefore it is for the peace and concord of both that we wish to say to them frankly: You can keep us from your country if you desire; we must keep your people from becoming residents in our country; and we will be better friends if we adopt that policy.

Suppose we take that stand, suppose this resolution passes, it is quite open to the Government to bring about the result in the method adopted by Australia. But that is not effective restriction, that is effective exclusion. Change this resolution to read, "effective restriction", and at once there is no authorization to the Government to change the present law at all, it would simply leave things the way they are. If the Government do not care to do it that way, they can do it the way it is done in other countries for there are other ways of bringing this about. I do not see why it is less offensive to say to Japan: "We won't let your people in unless they can speak French", when we know there is not one of them can do so, than to say: "We will not let them in, and frankly the reason why is because they won't assimiliate with us." I prefer to take the second course, but the first is open to the Government.

So long as there is effective exclusion of people coming here to live as defined by our law, then the terms of this resolution are sufficient; but if this resolution can be modified so that it will mean exclusion without saying so, then I have no objection at all to the modification. But I do not want to accept a modification that really does not call for any change in the present law at all, that won't get us where we frankly want to get, namely, to the point of exclusion, because after we have exclusion there is going to be a sufficient multiplication of these races in this country to constitute all the race problem that we want to have for many years to come.

We want to get to the point that is at all events mentioned. I know it is the almost unanimous opinion of British Columbia, and I find that opinion moving eastward pretty rapidly. There is no doubt in the world that before very long opinion in Alberta will be just as pronounced as is opinion now in British Columbia, and at the rate this immigration is going on that opinion will in time be as pronounced in provinces further east. Let us therefore take occasion by the hand now at a time when it is less difficult, because the more Asiatics you get here the more difficult the problem is going to be. Permit those races to be multiplied twice, three times, four times over, whether by procreation, immigration or by some other process, and then put your exclusion up and you will be faced with an infinitely more difficult problem than confronts you to-day.

Therefore I think we must go to the length of saying to the Government that the will of this House is that we have effective exclusion of the oriental type of immigrants. Let us go that length. By what language you achieve that goal I care not. The language suggested by the Prime Minister would not reach that goal at all, and for that reason I cannot accept it.

Let it be understood that so far as I am concerned I favour exclusion. I think we must have it. I do not care how it is brought about, but I do think it has got to be brought about. Restriction will not do, It must be restriction of such an absolute character that it excludes. That is the position I take on this motion, and I appeal to the Government to help us reach a wording that will leave no doubt in the minds of the people of Canada or in the minds of the people of Japan as to just what the will of this Parlament is.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with close attention to this debate, for naturally as the minister in charge of immigration I am intensely interested in this question. I am interested, too, because it has become a question we must take notice of in the province from which I come. I know something, although not a very great deal, of the conditions existing in the province of British Columbia, where the question has become so acute.

I am not going to enter upon a further discussion of this question to-night, because I think everything has been said about it that could usefully be said. All I want to add is that there appear to be two or three salient facts. I think my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen), knowing full well as I do the care which he exercises with respect to matters of this kind, slightly overstepped the mark in the position he has taken to-night. I agree with what my hon. friend from Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) has said. Indeed, I agree with practically everything that has been said, except in respect to this one word in the resolution which everyone who has spoken this afternoon has asked for—that the Government "exclude" the immigration of orientals into Canada. That is what is being asked for.

You admit in the same breath that there is an agreement between Canada and Japan which you are not very clear upon, and that that agreement has been lived up to. If I followed the speeches correctly this afternoon, nearly all the speakers referred to what is known as the Lemieux arrangement.

Mr. STEVENS: Although I know the minister would not do so intentionally, still I would not like to have our position misstated. We do not ask for exclusion and for the continuance or recognition of that agreement. We say that the agreement and the existing methods have been ineffective and disastrous, and we ask for the abrogation of that agreement and the substitution of exclusion.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Exactly; I had not misunderstood my hon. friends. There is an agreement in effect. I am not arguing whether it has been lived up to or not, I do not know, but in my short experience in public life I have learned upon more than one occasion that an agreement is a sacred thing and an agreement with Japan is just as sacred to the people of Canada, at least to those of British stock, as an agreement with any other nationality. Therefore that must be taken into account when you are dealing with this matter in a resolution of this character.

Mr. CLARK: Does the hon. minister suggest that the agreement with Japan was made for all time?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No. If my hon. friend will give me a chance, I think I shall reach the point I am trying to make. I am not suggesting anything like that. I am just as anxious as are my hon. friends opposite that we reach a basis that will be satisfactory to the people of western Canada, because I take it I am as much interested in this question as any hon. member sitting opposite. I said that I accepted everything that had been said about this question. I accept the description of the menace as presented by hon. gentlemen opposite, but we are trying to get to the point where the Government can take this matter up and deal with it effectively. What the Prime Minister said was that he did not think you were putting the Government in a fair light if you adopted the resolution as it stands upon the Order Paper now. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre did not say that in the case of Natal, Australia, or New Zealand the words "effective restriction" were used; it has been shown that by means of an educational test exclusion was practically effected. An hon. gentleman asked me a moment ago whether we could not make a new arrangement with the countries concerned looking to restriction of immigration. Well, the Prime Minister has just stated that already he has taken steps with that purpose in view; but I cannot agree with the leader of the Opposition when he suggests that before we begin negotiations we state by resolution of Parliament that we demand exclusion. I want to say to every hon member who has spoken on this question that so long as I remain in my present position I will make every effort to bring about the condition they are so desirous of establishing, but I do not believe it can be brought about in this way. I do not think we are going about it in the right way if we seek to begin negotiations on any such premises.

My hon. friends say that we have dallied with this question. Well, for years I have read of it in Alberta; I have read of discussions taking place in this House and being participated in by representatives from British Columbia,—but apparently no action was taken. So far as I am concerned, and so far as my influence in the Government is concerned, I am ready to back up the Prime Minister in settling this question in a satisfactory way. I realize fully the menace, I realize that the question is one that must be dealt with. But in view of the suggestion that negotiations should be entered into, I do not think we should set out by stating definitely that we cannot make an arrangement on any other basis than that of exclusion. I think my rgiht hon. friend the leader of the Opposition would not want to approach the question from that point of view if we were to negotiate upon it. I do not think that we will reach any satisfactory conclusion; I do not think we will obtain the desired end, if we start out on such premises.

My hon. friends, with the best intentions in the world, have said some very hard things about the Japanese people. I do not know whether or not they are true; I have no information on that point. I do know the menace; I do know that I am ready and willing to go the full length in meeting them. We have the absolute right to say whom we shall have in Canada; there can be no question about that. All I am questioning is the desirability, in the face of an agreement already in effect, of proceeding by using the words set forth in the resolution.

Mr. LAFLAMME: Will the minister allow me a question? A distinction seems to be made between absolute or rigid exclusion on the one hand and effective exclusion on the other. I have not been able to understand that distinction.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am sorry, but I do not catch my hon. friend's question.

Mr. LAFLAMME: I understood the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) to urge a rigid or absolute exclusion, and if I followed the remark of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), he seems to incline toward what he calls effective exclusion. I cannot see the difference between the two—"effective" on the one hand, and "absolute" on the other.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, I have not had a legal training and do not get these fine distinctions. All that I know is this: we are all endeavouring to get to the one place. I do agree with everything my hon. friends have said about this matter; I am entirely in sympathy with the object of the resolution, but if that object is to be obtained, we must be careful about the methods we employ. As I have already suggested, not one of my hon. friends has pointed to the use of the words "absolute exclusion" in the case of Australia, New Zealand, and Natal, yet there is effective exclusion from those countries of the people whom they do not wish to have. The Government have already gone into this matter; would it not be better, in the interests of all parties concerned, to bring about the object aimed at without arousing the antagonism of the Japanese by the use of a word that undoubtedly must be offensive?

I hold in my hand a resolution passed by the British Columbia legislature on the first of November, 1921. It reads as follows:

> That a respectful address be presented to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor, praying him to convey to the Dominion Government, through His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, the respectful request of this House that the Dominion Government amend the Immigration Act of Canada so, as near as possible, to totally restrict the immigration of Asiatics into this province, keeping in view the wishes of the people of British Columbia that this province be reserved for people of the European race, and that the Dominion Government consult with the provincial Government in the proposed amendments.
> Be it further resolved, that His Honour the Lieutenant Governor be requested to forward a copy of this resolution to the Honourable the Secretary of State at Ottawa, the Hon. the Premier of Canada, the Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, and Hon. Mr. Crerar.

I do not intend to follow the argument any further. I presume I shall have some small part to play in this matter, and I shall do what I can to further the objects sought to be attained. But I do think you will put us in a much better position if you agree to the elimination of the word "exclusion" in the fifth line of the resolution. I therefore move, Mr. Speaker:

> That the word "exclusion" in the fifth line of the resolution be struck out and the words "effective restriction" be substituted therefor.

Mr. MEIGHEN: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and the permission of the Prime Minister, I might make this suggestion. In the act passed in 1910 the following language appears:

> Prohibit for a stated period, or permanently, the landing in Canada, or the landing at any specified port of entry in Canada, of immigrants belonging to any race deemed unsuited to the climate or requirements of Canada, or of immigrants of any specified class, occupation or character.

That is an act which gave power to exclude any race, but the word "prohibit" is used. I would suggest, if the word "exclusion" has any historic meaning carrying with it offence, that the word "prohibition" be used instead, and that to make it clear after "immigration" the words "for residence purposes" be added.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria City): While this oriental question has been brought before the federal House of Commons on many occasions it is very doubtful if it has ever before received the reception that it has on this occasion. For many years this has been a problem peculiar to British Columbia, but as the orientals have scattered over Canada towards the east, we find that it is becoming an eastern question as well as a western question and that our eastern friends now lend a more receptive ear to our warnings of the dangers of this oriental invasion.

Having been born and brought up in British Columbia, I have had an opportunity to observe the development of these Asiatics. I remember the day when there was but one Chinese store in the city of Victoria, and at that time the present site of the city of Vancouver was a timber limit. I have watched their development in agriculture. I have seen them absorb completely the truck-farming business. I have seen excellent Old Country gardeners come out and attempt to compete with them and be wiped out of existence, first, because the Chinamen would work much longer hours and work on Sundays, and secondly, because the Chinaman met a Chinese cook at the door when he went to sell his vegetables who stood in with him and bought his vegetables from him in preference to the white man.

I have seen them take hold of the small fruits industry also. At first they were received with open arms in some portions where fruit farming was carried on. The fruit growers welcomed them because they expected to produce their fruit at a lower figure on account of the cheap labour, but they soon found out that their employee of yesterday was their competitor of to-day and to-morrow and right along. The Chinaman and the Japanese went into these farming districts and worked for wages first. After that they insisted on working on shares, and later they would lease the land and finally purchase it, if possible, and put up a very strong competition with the white grower.

As has been pointed out this afternoon, our fisheries are largely now in the hands of the Japanese. It was pointed out that we have no less than sixty logging camps on the coast operated by Japanese. Only a few weeks ago I saw that the Japanese were negotiating for some of the largest timber holdings in the province of British Columbia.

There is hardly a steamer leaving the Pacific coast that does not carry tens of thousands of dollars shipped by these orientals to their home land; so the man who spends his money with an oriental in British Columbia or any other part of Canada is building up a home in Canton or Yokohama or some other eastern place, at the expense of the country where the money was earned.

With the Chinaman came the opium den, followed by the usual demoralization of the white race. We have found the orientals handling narcotics to a great extent, so they certainly have not raised the morals of the Canadian people by their coming. We find that the Japanese are much more aggressive than the Chinamen and you will probably have noticed the tremendous progress orientals have made in the last ten or twenty years as compared with previous years. It is largely attributable to the fact that they are now worth more money, and having that capital on hand, they are in a position to make much greater progress than they were before.

It has been clearly pointed out this afternoon that we cannot assimilate with these people. Therefore, they are a bad class of immigrant to allow into this country, which is a white man's country. We have had pointed out to us the conditions in California and the Hawaiian islands. Are we to stand idly by until we reach that point, or shall we be up and doing and protect ourselves against this Asiatic invasion? We have in our hands a very heavy responsibility, the responsibility to preserve this country for the white generations to come after us. It is simply a case of this kind: We have either to keep out these Asiatics or get down to their level to compete with them. We have noticed great improvements in late years in our methods of living, in education and so on. This is very desirable and should be encouraged in every way, but the Asiatic is going to prove a very great barrier to any improvement along these lines.

Why do we hold out for this word exclusion? That word was placed in there simpl because the restrictions of the past did not satisfactorily restrict. They have not given us results, and we feel, those of us who have been living in British Columbia for a number of years right up against these Asiatics, that the methods used in the past have not been suitable and therefore it is necessary to adopt even more drastic measures in the future.

I do not think that the exclusion of these few immigrants coming from these countries where there are hundreds of millions of people will interfere very seriously with trade, particularly when we take into consideration the fact that these countries have restrictions against us. I feel that if we can sell our raw products at a satisfactory price both the Chinese and the Japanese will buy them, whether we allow their immigrants here or not.

I fully realize too that the relations of the British Government with Japan make it rather more delicate for us to pass any legislation of this kind through this Parliament. Still, at the same time, I believe that when it comes to a show-down the British government will pay a great deal more attention to the welfare of one of her important Dominions than she will to her relations with any of these countries. Therefore, I strongly support the resolution as presented by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. McQuarrie).

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not my intention to take up very much of the time of the House at this late hour. That this question is a very important one is evidenced by the fact that we have been debating it since three o'clock this afternoon, and I doubt very much if anything new in the way of argument can now be said upon the matter.

I agree with the observation that has fallen from the lips of some hon. members that the question of immigration, particularly in a new and developing country like Canada, is of the greatest importance. In providing for immigration to Canada, and laying the foundation of the future nation to inhabit this Dominion, we have seen to it in the past, that that foundation has been laid in the stocks of the peoples of Europe. It is true that there has been diversity among those people who have come to our shores; it is true that among those we have welcomed to Canada there have been differences in language, differences in religion, differences to quite a considerable degree in social standards and social ideals; but nevertheless these peoples that we have brought from Europe to Canada are such that we can look with confidence to the future, to find them coming together and evolving a distinctive Canadian type. I have a great deal of sympathy with my hon. friends from British Columbia in the position they have taken. Without saying anything in derogation of the Japanese or the Chinese, both great peoples, we are nevertheless conscious of, and must realize the fact, that ethnically these peoples are different and we cannot expect to successfully assimilate them. The question then arises: How shall this problem be handled? We have heard this afternoon—particularly from hon. members from British Columbia who are close to the conditions which they describe and who I am sure speak with certainty of knowledge—that economically the oriental alien, against whom this resolution is directed, is supplanting, and will supplant, the white or Caucasian races in the economic sphere. That in itself is not the most serious matter to my mind however; it is not so serious as the other objection that I referred to a moment ago—the ethnical fact that these peoples will not unite in the future. I think it is no reflection upon either the Japanese or the Chinese to make that statement. They are different peoples from us. They are great peoples. I would say that there is nothing in the realm of science, of art, or of literature that the Japanese could not do, probably with as great, possibly with even greater distinction than the European races. Consequently I offer that observation without the slightest hint or suggestion that there is any inferiority in these races—I base the observation on larger and broader grounds than that.

We come then to the consideration of how this question shall be treated, and I must take issue with my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition in the argument he has advanced in respect to the resolution. Let me read it. It is:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the immigration of oriental aliens and their rapid multiplication is becoming a serious menace to living conditions, particularly on the Pacific coast, and to the future of the country in general, and the Government should take immediate action with a view to securing the exclusion of future immigration of this type.

The criticism of my right hon. friend, I think, is that unless the resolution were couched in this precise language it would fail to carry the full meaning that would necessarily obligate the Government to make a change in policy. In that respect I differ with him. I propose to support the amendment that has been offered by my hon. friend from Argenteuil (Mr. Stewart) and I propose to do so for this reason. We must in these international matters—and this is a question of international concern—observe with the most scrupulous care the necessity of giving no offence whatever to a great and friendly power I think that is absolutely essential. After all, Japan has lately been the ally of Great Britain, and probably would be the ally of Great Britain to-day had it not been for the fact of the Washington Conference, and the change in the international situation that that conference brought about. But even to-day Canada is a signatory with Japan to the treaties that were negotiated at Washington only a few months ago, and this House will shortly be asked to ratify those treaties. We are also aware of the fact that Canada, along with Japan and China, is a signatory to the Peace Treaty that was negotiated at Versailles in 1919 and that all three countries sit in the League of Nations as equals. Consequently these facts require this House to observe the greatest possible care in its treatment of this quesiton.

The resolution as it stands at the present moment is open to this objection—that no matter what the views of the hon. members who have discussed it may be, pass this resolution as it stands on the Order Paper and it will go out not only through the papers of Canada and the papers of the United States but over the cables to Japan that the Parliament of Canada has voted to exclude the Japanese from this Dominion—you cannot put any other construction upon it. And yet, if I understood aright the argument advanced by my hon. friends from British Columbia this afternoon, they do not propose to go even so far as that—they propose still to admit to this Dominion those who may be of the student class, those who may be of the tourist class, those who may be of the merchants class coming here temporarily for the purposes of trade

I think the amendment offered by the Minister of the Interior is one that should be accepted by the House; and in all sincerity, and with a single desire to further the cause that my hon. friends from British Columbia have at heart , I would suggest to them that they should accept this amendment. What does it mean? It means, in the first place, that there goes from this House a unanimous expression of opinion on this question, and if you read the resolution that emanated from the Minister of Interior it can carry no other meaning than this: It is a declaration from this House that there is to be a change of policy in respect to this matter, if you like, perhaps not a change of policy but at any rate an absolute and complete enforcement of the idea that stands behind the resolution. That,

I take it, from the statement of the Prime Minister, is the intention of the Government; and I have no hesitation in stating that in my opinion it is the policy that should be followed by the Government. We do not wish to ban from oriental countries, those who wish to come here for the purposes of trade, who wish to come here as tourists, who wish to come here for the advantages of the educational facilities that Canada possesses—we should welcome all of these. The great hope for the future lies in disseminating the best ideas of education and giving these people all that is valuable in our culture and if possible getting for ourselves all that is valuable in their culture.

I submit, Sir, that end will be obtained if the amendement which has been moved by the Minister of Interior is accepted. Under that amendment, I think, it would be quite possible for the Government by friendly negotiations, by friendly means, to secure almost precisely the same position that exists in South Africa, that exists in New Zealand, and that exists in Australia today. And that can be done without, in a public way, by declaration of this Parliament, offending the sensibilities of a proud people in a manner which I am sure hon. members from British Columbia and other members of this House do not wish to do. My hon. friend from British Columbia would be well advised, in my opinion, and would further the very cause they have at heart, if they accepted the amendment offered by the Government. If that is done, and the Government are given an opportunity, they can be held to account in this House if they did not seek earnestly and seriously to give effect to the sentiments that have fallen from hon. gentlemen's lips in this House on both sides in respect to this very important question.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg Centre): There are a few things which should be said in regard to this question.

An hon. MEMBER: At this time of the night?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, at this hour of the night. A good deal has been said with regard to the maintenance of our Canadian standards, and especially with regard to the necessity of seeing that the standards of labour should not be lowered. I agree that, under existing circumstances, with as much unemployment as we have at the present time, it becomes very essential that we should restrict immigration. That is a temporary expedient, but I should like to have it clearly put before this House that it is, at best, but a temporary expedient. It is no solution of this great problem which we face. A great deal has been said with regard to the orientals coming into this country and forcing themselves upon us. I should like to know who brought them into this country. For years labour has been pleading that something should be done to prevent unfair competition. The great corporations went over to China and Japan and brought coolie labour into this country. Why? Simply for two reasons, in the first place because it was cheap labour, and in the second place because it could be more readily handled. That is undoubted, and we can go all over the coast, and we have been able to do so for a good many years, and find great corporations who are doing this. In the first place the Canadian Pacific Railway brought the orientals in to work on construction on the docks and later on at other kinds of work. Other large corporations brought in these orientals because it was cheap labour and easily handled. Some of the orientals who have been brought in during these years are beginning to acquire a little money and going into business, and now, for the first time in all these years, we hear the cry going up from some business men, the retailers' association, and some of the financiers, that something must be done, as these orientals are beating us at our own game. I think it is well on this occasion that we should review the past and recognize very clearly that it is these big corporations and financial organizations that have been responsible for the oriental immigration to this country. I desire to suggest here that, even if we passed exclusion laws at this time, we would not begin to solve the problem. Why? Simply because we are beginning to get cheap labour done over on the other side of the Pacific. We have our transportation facilities now, our ships and so on. I remember two or three years ago while working on the docks in Vancouver, handling a cargo of crude tobacco from the southern states that came over the Great Northern. It was sent to China. I cannot say that the very self-same firm to which it was consigned afterwards sent back the return cargo, but I know there was a return cargo of manufactured cigars and cigarettes. If some of the big firms cannot get the cheap labour here they are going to get it over there. It is only about a year ago we read in the financial papers that some of the big steel companies were finding that steel manufactured in China could be laid down more cheaply in San Francisco than steel manufactured in Pittsburg, and from that time steel plate was to be brought from the Orient, rather than to be manufactured on the American side of the water. As long as we permit competition of the kind we now have we will not solve our problems by saying that we are not going to have cheap labour on this side of the ocean. We will have it on the other side.

A good deal has been said that showed racial prejudice and an appeal made to racial bigotry. I want to protest that the civilization of China and Japan is not what we have sometimes called "heathen" and that it is not a low type of civilization. We must remember that we face a much bigger problem than has been suggested. It has taken several thousand years for the white race to travel, first by slow stages across Europe and then after crossing the Atlantic, to cross in the course of the last hundred years the North American continent. We are to-day faced with a world problem. The west has met the east. We have gone completely around; the circle is complete, and to-day the west looks out to the east.

I do not believe for a moment that the 800,000,000 of people in the Orient are expecting to come over and invade our coast. The picture was overdrawn. I do not know that Japan is very anxious to take Canada as a field for exploitation, but I recognize that we face a serious national and international problem. That being the case, it is all the more necessary that we do nothing to alienate any of these oriental nations, that we recognize the seriousness of the question and proceed in such a way as will promote, as the Premier has well said, a feeling of good will. It has been suggested that we have a much higher type of education here and that these people are illiterate. With regard to the Chinese, I desire to say that after their children have finished the regular day's school in Vancouver they proceed to their own Chinese school, as some of the Jewish people do in Winnipeg and Montreal, in order that they may further their education.

One of the troubles with us, as has been admitted on the floor of this House, is that a great many of these people are more competent than we are, and unless we look to our educational system in this country, we are going to be outdone either in this country or by competition from other countries. I had a few years ago the duty of making some investigation as to educational conditions in the western provinces. Among very large groups of our immigrants I found one-third of the children not attending any school whatever. If I remember the figures aright—and I have been somewhat in touch with the question of education in Japan—96 per cent of the Japanese children between the ages of 6 and 16 are attending school. Unless we are more careful than we have been in caring for the people in this country, and seeing that they are not unfairly dealt with, we are going to have to face this problem unprepared and confessedly be unable to meet the competition.

A great deal has been said of the way in which these Japanese and Chinese are increasing. For the past two or three years I have had a good deal to do with the loggers on the Pacific coast. I may say that of some 20,000 loggers in the union, as I am informed by the men who know best the personnel of that union, 75 per cent are unmarried. Under the conditions under which logging is now carried on, these men can never hope to have homes of their own. I would venture to say that you may bring in all the exclusion laws you please but so long as you force our own white people to live so that they cannot afford to have wives and children, you are not going to keep Canada a great empty country with the orientals locked out. These are matters which should be studied in connection with a debate of this kind.

What is the solution? One or two things I should like to mention. The first perhaps a temporary restriction of immigration, such as has been suggested. Certainly I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has taken the right position when he says that we have a right to stand guard over our doors and to say who is to be admitted to this country. We have a right to say, under what conditions, this great experiment of building up a nation is to be carried forward. It would seem to me however that we would be attacking the problem on a great deal safer ground if we decided that we would maintain in this country certain minimum standards. Why is it that, as we were told to-day, girls go into Chinese restaurants? Simply because they are driven into doing so, because they cannot get decent wages. Why is it that Japanese women work long hours? I have seen them working in the canneries at Steveston. Who is employing them? They are employed by white corporations that refuse to pay the wages that will keep our people there. That is where the trouble lies, and that is something that ought to be said. We would be going, perhaps, along saner lines if we said that we would make it a crime for any individual or corporation to pay any man or woman less than a living wage. As Paul Kellogg years ago said in his Study of Oriental Immigration in the United States, if we had minimum standards, we would erect an immigration tariff that would be more effective than any other kind of tariff we could possibly have.

We say that these orientals can get on better because they are united. Let me say that they have strong unions of their own. Although for many years labour has been bitterly opposed to oriental immigration, some labour unions—not many, I confess, are beginning to see the necessity for organizing the orientals who are already in this country. Speakers have said to-day that the orientals have succeeded because they have a strong organization. Yet there has been and there still is in existence, across this country from coast to coast, a policy that would tend to crush the unions that are the only safeguards that hitherto the labour people have had. I can take you to the coast, where my home has been for some years and still is and show you at the mines how, in the last few years, again and again the labour people have endeavoured to keep the oriental out of the mines. It is with the greatest difficulty that they have accomplished this. Indeed there are certain mines in British Columbia where the orientals, despite what the labour people have been able to do, are working not only above ground but underground. I can take you among the loggers. I know the Japanese have captured the shingle-bolt industry up the coast, and why? For the self-same reason, that they were willing to work long hours and under conditions which a white man would not tolerate. As one large employer said to me one day: "Why do we take these orientals? We want them because they will work cheaper and because they are a great deal easier to handle." He thought he could deal with them individually, put them to work longer hours at less agreeable types of work and all that kind of thing. That was the reason why to-night, even at this hour, I could not let the opportunity pass, in connection with this debate, without saying that we are not going to solve this problem short of a definite effort to maintain in this country certain minimum standards for our people.

Sometimes we have failed to recognize how the world is unified to-day. I for one contend that we cannot maintain this idea of positive exclusion of one race from this country, and hope that that will be the solution for any of our problems. The world is too much unified to-day for anything of that sort. We remember that Japan remained a hermit nation for years, and Japan stagnated because of that; we remember that it is centuries since China tried to put a wall around herself and exclude other nations, and China remained static for many centuries. We would suffer the same penalty if we could keep ourselves away from the rest of the world. I maintain it is impossible in this day to do anything of that kind. We are trading in all parts of the world; goods from the Orient as well as from other parts of the world are coming into Canada; and if we maintain our trading and financial interests with other parts of the world, I cannot see how we are to adopt a rigid policy of exclusion of the people who are coming here. Some people say that this ought to be a white man's country. What about South Africa or India to-day? We claim the right to go in and dominate India, and yet at the very same time refuse to let the races of India come into Canada in any numbers at all. I am not pleading for permission for them to enter this country, but we must have regard to the larger international issues. May I be permitted to read just a word or two with regard to our rather arrogant position from a recent work by Stoddard on "The Rising Tide of Colour?" He says:

> I showed that the white stocks together constitute the most numerous single branch of the human species, nearly one-third of all the human souls being whites. I also showed that white men racially occupy four-tenths of the entire habitable land area of the globe; while nearly nine-tenths of this area is under white political control. Such a situation is unprecedented. Never before has a race acquired such a combined preponderance of numbers and dominion.

I have no desire to extend this debate at this hour; but we would be dealing wisely with this question if we realized these larger international questions which, especially since the world war, have been borne in upon us, and recognized that we cannot solve this particular question in a negative sort of way by mere rigid exclusion, without having regard to those larger international problems that face us on every side. Even should we exclude the orientals, we cannot thereby succeed in maintaining those standards of living which apparently has been the main purpose of the mover of this resolution.

Mr. NEILL: Can the leader of the Government give us an assurance that, in his mind, the words "effective restriction" in the amendment convey such a measure of restriction as is, at least, equal to the present Immigration Act in force in Australia to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have in mind the same object exactly as the people of the country, to which my hon. friend has referred, had in mind when they enacted their legislation, namely, to have a restriction that will be effective. If there is any meaning to the English language at all, the term "effective restriction" comes as near as anything that I can think of to describing what has been aimed at where it has been sought to bring about an effective restriction of any character. I cannot find words to describe anything short of exclusion other than the words "effective restriction".

Mr. MANION: Could not "effective restriction" be variously interpreted by various people?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think there can be a doubt as regards the intention of the Government in the mind of any one who reads the debate after what I have said this evening and after what the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) has said. I think it must be perfectly clear both in our use of words and in the phrases and every expression we have used.

Mr. CLARK: Does the hon. member not suggest that the present restriction is not effective?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Most decidedly so. I think the present restriction is not effective; the Government is prepared to seek to make it effective. That is what we wish to do.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to make my position clear on the amendment.

An hon. MEMBER: No more speeches.

Mr. STEVENS: I am doing this out of courtesy to the Government. I have as much right to speak as has the hon. gentleman who interjects his observation.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. member has a right to speak on the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot support the amendment. If time would permit I should like to go into some argument on it, but I shall not do so. If I put my position bluntly, I trust the Government and the Prime Minister will not misunderstand my motives. I think I can speak for a large section of British Columbia in any case when I say that we feel that this is exactly the kind of attitude with which our demands have been met by the rest of Canada. I do not want to appear to draw a distinction; but there must be one, because it has been emphasized by those who have spoken against or in question of the resolution that it is peculiarly a British Columbia question. We feel that that would just simply be doing what has been done in the past, putting the question off. My hon. friend the minister (Mr. Stewart) warranted me, I think, in taking that view when he said he objected to "exclusion" because it meant stating your position before you negotiate. What are you going to negotiate? We are opposed to further negotiations regarding how many orientals shall come in; we want immigration from the Orient stopped. We are not prepared to negotiate on the question as in the past of a limited number, and if time would permit I think it would be quite possible for me to convince my hon. friend and others opposite, with due regard to the intentions of the Government of Japan to observe the Gentleman's Agreement, that in fact that agreement has not been observed. I do not say that the individuals who evaded the agreement, who came in spite of it, were doing so at the instigation of the government of Japan, but I say that so far as Canada is concerned we suffered because of the evasion of that Gentleman's Agreement.

For that reason I would only add that so far as I am concerned I cannot support the Government. We offered a change in working to "prohibition", we are prepared to offer the Government other phraseology, but the Prime Minister does not seem to be willing to accept that offer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: Some hon. members laugh at the word "prohibition" but it is used in the Immigration Act. For instance, "The Governor-in-Council may, by proclamation or order", and so forth, "prohibit the landing," and so on. The word is used half a dozen times.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): You have it in one Order-in-Council practically bearing upon all immigration into Canada, with the single exception of immigration from the one nation with who you have an agreement. My hon. friend's interpretation does not quite bear out what I said. All I am asking is that you insert nothing offensive to the government of Japan while that agreement is in effect. I think it is sufficient to say that this Government is already negotiating with Japan for the very purpose which your resolution sets out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want to make perfectly clear to hon. gentlemen opposite the position of the Government in this matter. If they are sincere in desiring exclusion of oriental immigration they will not insist upon a resolution which includes that word.

Mr. STEVENS: We offered in substitution the word "prohibition", which is recognized in the Immigration Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think we have had enough of prohibition.

An hon. MEMBER: British Columbia prohibition is not effective.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might point out to my hon. friend that last November the legislature of British Columbia passed a resolution on this very subject, but it did not use the word "exclusion". It was left out advisedly. They used the phrase, "restriction as nearly as may be possible." I am quite agreeable to that. I do not see any reason why we should be called upon to go further than the legislature of British Columbia itself has requested us to go in a communication addressed at the time to my right hon. friend opposite.

In order that hon. members may see the possible consequence of passing a resolution such as that moved, let me ask them to consider for a moment what feeling would come over this country if we read to-morrow morning that the parliament of Japan had voted a resolution in the nature of exclusion against Canadians entering Japan.

An hon. MEMBER: Exclusion of immigrants?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend asks, "exclusion of immigrants." He knows as well as I do that among the great body of people reading the press of the country there is not that careful discrimination or discernment in the use of words that is to be expected among members of the legal profession, and if to-night the parliament of Japan were to pass a resolution in the terms of the resolution before this House, the impression of the Canadian people to-morrow on reading the cabled despatches would be that the Japanese were excluding Canadians from their country. A similar effect would be created in Japan to-morrow by any resolution we might adopt in this form. If this country wished to create a grave problem for the whole British Empire, we could not do it more effectively. I plead with hon. gentlemen opposite to consider not only their duty as Canadians, but their duty as citizens of the British Empire, and to try to uphold the position that the Empire has sought to assume in its relations with oriental peoples.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was present at the conference of premiers in England last year, and I can point him to the proceedings of that conference where oriental immigration was discussed and the greatest care was expressed on the part of those present to avoid the use of the word "exclusion" in touching formally upon matters of this character. I took care before speaking on this resolution to read the proceedings of the conference at Paris, and I found that there over and over again the discussion turned on the question of whether the word "exclusion" might or might not be used, and that conference, composed of the nations of the world, decided that it would be inadvisable to use the word in any single resolution that was to be adopted. Are we in this Parliament going to create an international problem not only affecting the British Empire but other countries, simply that hon. gentlemen opposite may be able to point to the word "exclusion" when they go before their constituents in the province of British Columbia? Let us be honest.

Mr. STEVENS: I want to raise a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. My hon. friend is wholly unfair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, he is not.

Mr. STEVENS: I am speaking to a point of privilege. I took the initiative in bringing the British Columbia members together, and we have presented this resolution to the House without the slightest tinge of partisanship. My hon. friend is doing us gross injustice when he seeks to place that construction on our attitude.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to do anyone injustice, but I do wish the House and the country to know exactly what took place. A few days ago I spoke to the mover of this resolution (Mr. McQuarrie) about the serious international consequences involved in the use of the word "exclusion," and I told him we would gladly accept his resolution if he used language acceptable to the different countries comprising the British Empire. He came to me a day or two ago and told me he regretted that that step could not be taken because the British Columbia members attached so much importance to the word "exclusion."

Mr. STEVENS: Our action was non-political; the supporters of my hon. friend and the supporters of the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) were included in a joint meeting—the whole of the members from British Columbia, of whom we here number seven and the others six.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then I accept my hon. friend's interpretation that it was non-political; I will appeal to him now on the ground of national interest as against sectional interest. A few days ago, I made an appeal to our western friends to consider the interests of the Dominion of Canada as a whole in regard to a measure that was before this House. I appeal now to hon. gentlemen directly opposite in the interests of this country as a whole, and as a part of the British Empire, not to insist upon a resolution the adoption of which is certain to embarrass not only our own country but all parts of the British Empire. Let me say this further and make it perfectly clear, speaking with a full sense of the responsibility that is mine: If this Government to-morrow tried to bring about an effective restriction with Japan and had to meet the Japanese with a resolution to the effect that this Parliament stood for exclusion of Japanese, the Japanese Government would refuse to treat with us. Where would we be? Where would the hon. gentleman go? Whom would he look to in the matter of carrying out a resolution of this kind? How are we going to carry it out?

Mr. STEVENS: Have we no powers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What powers have we to pass a law that is offensive to another nation, in terms that are offensive and which will not bring about the desired results?

Mr. STEVENS: Does my hon. friend suggest we have not the power or the right to pass any law with regard to the exclusion or prohibition to land in Canada of any immigrant from any part of the world that we choose?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I made it plain that every country should have the right to control the composition of its own population.

Mr. STEVENS: Then why negotiate it in Tokio?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not negotiated in Tokio.

Mr. STEVENS: That is what my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest nothing of the kind, and my hon. friend knows that perfectly well. He may be attempting to ascribe to me a motive and a position that are absolutely false. But I want to put the position of the Government plainly before him. The Government are anxious to bring about an effective restriction of this oriental immigration in a manner serviceable to all parts of this Dominion. We believe that we cannot do that if a resolution passes this House using the word "exclusion." We believe that we can do it by negotiation, by seeking to foster good-will between the different countries and to keep down ill-will. It is for that reason and that reason only that the amendment has been moved.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I submit that the Prime Minister has used language much stronger than the circumstances warranted. In my judgment he was not justified in going the length he did as respects what would be the attitude of any other nation or as respects just what is going to happen if we do this or do that. I do not myself know how he knows; furthermore, I do not think he does know. We presented this resolution—or, rather, it was presented by an hon. member on this side and another hon. member to the left—with the desire to get an expression of the will of this Parliament upon the real question. There was no desire to offend any nation; indeed, we were not aware of the fact that there was some special offence hovering around the word "exclusion," but if it was thought that there was, we were prepared to substitute for it another word. Now, how are we met? We are met, in the first place, by an amendment which says that it is the duty of Canada to put in operation a policy of effective restriction. If that had the same meaning as what we desired to have Parliament express, that would be quite as good to us; but "effective restriction" is one thing and "effective exclusion" is another. Restriction means letting in certain—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend a question, please?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the difference between the expression "effective exclusion" and "exclusion"?

Mr. MEIGHEN: None at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not pretend there was. But effective restriction means that we should adopt a policy of letting some more into this country and keeping some others out—letting some in and keeping some out. That is what effective restriction means.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is it that is murmuring? Am I not making myself clear?

Mr. DUFF: Do not look at me, please.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For myself, I do not want to be a party to a resolution which affirms it to be the will of this Parliament that we should adopt a policy of letting some more into the country. I do not approve of that course, even if it is accompanied by a policy of "effective restriction." Now, my hon. friend says that we can have exclusion all right if we do not use the word. Well, I have tried to meet him in that respect, and I will try again. But I want him to understand now—and I say this without the slightest offence—that I am not prepared, for my part, to agree to a resolution which means something that I do not believe should be the future policy of this country, even though to say that may help him to make something else the policy. I do not think that is the right way of getting any policy. If we want a certain policy, let us express our desire for it, not in language that is offensive; let us choose language that can carry with it no offence at all. I do not know why "exclusion" has become a word to be shunned, but if it has, let us use something else. I used the word "prohibition," and also I suggested that after the word "immigration," in order that there could be no room for misunderstanding at all, the words "for residence purposes" be inserted. My hon. friend does not discuss the merits or demerits of the word "prohibition." I adopt it only because it is the word that had been adopted before in the language of the act of 1910. Now, I suggest this—and I ask the Government to consider it; if they do not, then it appears to me there is no use of our trying further to come to common ground—that instead of the words "securing the exclusion of future immigration of this type" we use this phrase: "bringing to an end further such immigration for residence purposes."

Some hon. MEMBERS: What is that, again?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will read the whole resolution with that inserted instead of the words it would replace. I am not moving it by way of amendment for the moment, but I should be glad to have that done if it meets with the approval of the Government:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the immigration of oriental aliens and their rapid multiplication is becoming a serious menace to living conditions, particularly on the Pacific coast, and to the future of the country in general, and the Government should take immediate action with a view to bringing to an end further such immigration for residence purposes.

The House divided on the amendment of Mr. Stewart (Argenteuil) which was carried on the following division:

PAIRS

Messrs.

For the amendment Against the amendment
Macdonald (Pictou), Ryckman.

Motion as amended agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 1.45 a.m. Tuesday.

Tuesday, May 9, 1922

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Annual report of the Air Board for the year 1921.—Hon. Mr. Graham.

COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac) moved:

That the fees and charges paid on Bill No. 22, and act respecting Montreal, Joliette and Transcontinental Junction Railway Company, be refunded, less the cost of printing and translating the same, in accordance with the recommendations contained in the fourth report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph lines.

Mr. STEVENS: Would it be possible to amend that motion to include a similar case, that of the bill respecting the Fraser Valley and Southern Railway Company, which was thrown out by the committee? I think the same treatment should be extended in this case, but I am not a member of the Railway Committee, and even as the one in whose name the bill rested, I have not the privilege of so moving in committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: In that case a recommendation would be necessary in the form of a report from the committee, and if the hon. gentleman will take the necessary steps to have that recommendation made, the fees will be refunded in accordance with the usual practice. As it is, there is only one recommendation from the committee and it is with respect to the Montreal, Joliette and Transcontinental Junction Railway Company. Of course, it is only a matter of procedure.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House do to-morrow go into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain proposed resolution in favour of amending Part XII of the Canada Shipping Act, relating to Harbours and Harbour Masters.

Motion agreed to.

POTLATCH INSTITUTION

NUMBER OF INDIANS SERVING GAOL SENTENCES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. W. FINDLAY (South Bruce): Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the Government to a matter which, I feel, requires some explanation. On Wednesday, May 3, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), in reply to a series of questions placed on the Order Paper by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner), gave certain information. Question No. 6 reads as follows:

> Are there at the present time twenty-three Indians serving jail terms for having taken part in potlatches?

The reply to that by the minister is:

> No; four are serving sentence, the parole of three of whom is under consideration by the Department of Justice.

I hold in my hand a telegram from a resident of Vancouver dated May 8, which reads as follows:

> Stewart stated last week in reply to Ladner's question that all Indians except four had been released. All are yet in jail. Demand explanation on floor of House immediately.

That message is signed by a gentleman in whose honesty, veracity, and caution in making statements of this kind I have the greatest confidence. I would like the minister to make some explanation.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sorry to say that I was not able to hear more than half a dozen words of what my hon. friend said. However, I gathered that it related to some matter affecting a reply made by the Minister of the Interior with regard to Indians. If so I will confer with the minister and with my hon. friend and will try to let him have an answer from the minister before the day's proceedings are over.

SUPPLY

MILITIA AND DEFENCE

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

[Mr Speaker.]

Militia and Defence—annual drill, $1,400,000.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Power had moved by way of amendment that item No. 90 be reduced by the sum of $1,100,000. Shall the amendment carry?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Militia and Defence): I do not see the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment, but he probably will be here. The only way we can proceed, I suppose, would be either to declare the amendment lost or carried, or to move a further amendment.

I wish to make a short statement to the House before proceeding with this item. It is the desire of the Government, of course, to meet the wishes of Parliament, for Parliament is supreme. After hearing the discussion the other day I conferred with my officers again, and while they maintain that the original estimates are the proper ones, and the ones that should have been put through the House for the efficient carrying on of the work, they have given me a schedule of proposed reductions, and they tell me that if these reductions are made, the balance will provide for the training of a proportionate part of the force. The training last year was not complete, but it was approximately so. This year, I am informed, if the reduction which I am going to suggest is made, the artillery can be trained, city corps, and possibly a portion of the country units, for it must be remembered that a number of the city corps go into camp. The amount remaining after the reduction is made will provide for this drill as usual, the number of days being nine. It will, of course, reduce the percentage of strength of the various units, but my officers assure me that it will not altogether destroy the training or drill. I wished to make this statement before we proceed, because if the amendment be adhered to, I shall move a sub-amendment.

The reductions proposed by the officers of the department are as follows: Annual drill $400,000; cadet services $100,000; clothing and necessaries $21,000; Dominion arsenals $50,000; engineers' services and works $50,000; ordnance arms, lands, etc. $9,000; pay of staff $10,000; schools of instruction $50,000; and Royal Military College $10,000; making a total reduction of $700,000. That is a pretty drastic cut, when it is remembered that there was a marked reduction already in the estimates as compared with last year. I might add, however, that last year there was about $1,000,000 that was not expended. I now beg to move in amendment to the amendment that the figures $1,100,000 be stricken out and the figures $400,000 be substituted therefor.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would call the attention of the Chairman to a point of order. The minister is the mover of the original resolution.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the Minister of Finance the mover of all these resolutions in Supply?

The CHAIRMAN: It is not a resolution that he moved. The committee went into Supply on the calling of the Orders of the Day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it your ruling, Mr. Chairman, that the Minister of Finance is the mover of all motions in Supply? The resolution is undoubtedly a resolution moved by some member of the Committee of Supply. Who is the mover?

The CHAIRMAN: As the particular resolution before the committee was moved by the Minister of Militia the amendment to the amendment should, in my opinion, be moved by a member other than him.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am willing to move the amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) is that the figures $1,100,000 contained in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) be stricken out and the figures $400,000 be substituted therefor. That represents a reduction, I understand, of $400,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I desire to raise a further point of order. Can there be an amendment to an amendment to a resolution in Supply?

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion there can be. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MEWBURN: I should like to say a word or two before the motion is put. When we reported progress on these estimates the other night, we were dealing with an item of $1,400,000 for annual drill, and we had a most extraordinary spectacle in this House on that occasion. After the minister of a department, who had prepared his estimates after consultation with his technical officers, and had had those estimates considered by the Privy Council and approved by them, presented them to the House and moved their adoption, we witnessed the extraordinary spectacle of the estimates being attacked by one of the minister's own supporters, and being supported by the Opposition. In my judgment the support of the Opposition was justified, because in the view of this side of the House to which I now have the honour to belong, the matter that is involved here is a question of principle, a matter of national importance, and not merely a political question. I very much regret that after the mangnificent statement made by the Minister of Militia when these estimates were last before the House, on the 25th of April, these estimates did not go through as presented. I thought that the statement he made could not but meet with the heartfelt approval of every hon. member. I am just as anxious as any hon. member to see economy in every department of the Government, but I think in this department we can go a step too far and cut down the estimates to a point that we shall regret sooner or later. If I may offer a suggestion to the minister—it is probably a dangerous thing for anybody to give advice, particularly to a minister of the Crown; when I was a lawyer I always felt that it was inadvisable to give advice unless, first, you were paid for it, and secondly, unless you thought it would be accepted; but I am going to risk making this suggestion; I have every confidence in the desire and ability of the minister to effect economy in the departments over which he now presides. Some weeks ago he brought down a bill for the purpose of bringing together under one head the Militia Department, Naval Service, and Air Board. I do not know what he is going to do about the estimates of the other two departments, but I have every confidence that had the estimates before us carried, the minister during the course of his administration might have found ways and means of not expending the total amount voted for the year, but would probably have been able to come to Parliament next year and show that he had saved some money.

But I regret exceedingly to see that the minister has taken anything off the item of "training," for the reason that I suggested in the House the other day. I draw his attention to one item wherein I think he could possibly effect economy, and that is regarding the permanent force vote of some $5,500,000. In Canada we have not got what is known as a standing army. The permanent force was organized many years ago for a particular object—for instructional purposes for the militia of Canada. During the war a great deal of criticism was levelled against the permanent force, I think unjustly because they have justified their existence. Nevertheless I believe the permanent force could be utilized to greater advantage, and in certain military districts in Canada a very considerable saving could be made. We have to-day in Canada the following military districts: No. 1, London; No. 2, Toronto; No. 3, Kingston; No. 4, Montreal; No. 5, Quebec; No. 6, Halifax; No. 7, New Brunswick; No. 10, Manitoba; No. 11, Victoria, B.C.; No. 12, Regina; and No. 13, Alberta. It seems to me that great economy could be effected in connection with these districts. I know this will not be popular, but I believe the minister is anxious first of all to decide, if we are going to have any militia in Canada, that it should be as efficient as possible, commensurate with the expenditure we are going to make on it. Now, I believe that great economy could be made by wiping out district No. 1, at London, and putting it under the command of Toronto. Years ago it was under what was known as the Western Ontario command with headquarters at Toronto. I am not quite sure, but I am inclined to think that great economy could also be effected in military district No. 3, in Kingston. A good deal of the administrative work there could go under the headquarters at Ottawa, leaving an officer at Kingston in charge of the artillery there who could carry on the staff work in that district. In portions of district No. 5, Quebec, there is evidently no desire to do any training. I would advocate doing away with military district No. 5 and putting that under Montreal. Doing away with military district No. 7 in New Brunswick would not, I know, be popular. Years ago that was under the Halifax district. At Halifax was centred the administration of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and I believe that could be done again. No. 12 district, Saskatchewan, I think, could be eliminated. Thus you would save a large amount of money in connection with the administration of these various districts.

I would strongly urge that the permanent corps should be concentrated, at least once a year, in camp for training purposes, preferably in one of the best camps on the North American continent, Petawawa. You could bring the permanent corps there for two months' training, and also bring here during the summer months your technical militia units which do require, it must be admitted by any military officer, training in camp. When I speak of technical units I refer to the artillery, the machine gunners, the signallers, and the engineers. They could be brought into camp and could take their instruction while the permanent force is assembled there. After the camp is over—I would strongly urge the minister to consider this suggestion—the permanent force, instead of going back to the various military districts where they are not very actively employed, should be continued in a more efficient state for instructional purposes for which they were originally organized. Without any extra expense, and to relieve many of the city corps of the burden they are under in paying out of their own pockets for sergeant-major instructors and others, you could very easily detail an officer and non-commissioned officer from the permanent corps to the city units for instructional purposes. The condition to which I have referred has existed for years and it could be met in the way I have indicated.

Then comes the question of barracks. We have hardly any permanent barracks in this country. Some people may say we do not need them, but I do not agree with that view. In Halifax there is practically nothing of the kind to-day. After the catastrophe which occurred there, the old barracks was practically destroyed; and, may I say in passing for the minister's information regarding Halifax, that all that military property there was taken over by the Dominion government from the Imperial government on the understanding that that property would be maintained for military purposes. The arrangement, as I understand it, was in the nature of a trust deed—that the property, or a portion of it, could only be sold with the consent of the War office and in the event of any sale the profits resulting therefrom should be returned to the War office. That matter came up during my administration of the Militia department, and after the Halifax catastrophe we took the matter up with the British War office in 1918, when I was privileged to be over there, to see if we could not get the arrangement modified. I contend that in view of Canada's effort in the war, the British government could very well hand over the whole of the Halifax property to us to do as we saw fit with, because it was admitted that it would be useless to spend money in trying to rebuild any of these fortifications in Halifax. An officer was sent out from the War office, General Jackson, who took up the whole question of the defence of Halifax, and also the fortifications in British Columbia, because the Esquimalt property also owned by the Imperial government was in the same position. After many negotiations the idea I had proposed was carried into effect. But what I am getting at is this: The Militia Department, or the government acting through the department, could very well sell a large portion of that property in Halifax, which was valued by the Imperial government at $5,000,000, and that money should not go back into the general coffers of the Government, because it was handed over to Canada with the idea that it would be used for military purposes. My contention is that that money could be utilized for building permanent barracks in Halifax, in Montreal, in Toronto and if necessary in Winnipeg. We have other property in the Dominion belonging to the Militia Department that could very well be sold. We have a large amount of militia property in the city of Quebec which is absolutely useless for militia purposes. True it is now being rented at a nominal rental; but why should not the Militia Department sell that proproperty? The proceeds thereof could go to build proper permanent barracks, to properly house the permanent force of Canada and make it, if we are going to have any force at all, the proper official corps for instructional purposes and available in the event of any trouble arising. Some provision of this kind should be made, because we have given away a lot of the property in which the permanent corps were formerly housed. In Toronto we gave Stanley barracks to the city, and in Winnipeg we gave Osborne barracks to the province of Manitoba. We have practically no barracks in Canada for the permanent corps. My contention is that if the department would energetically go into these matters, enough money could be raised to properly house the small permanent force without causing, I think, one dollar of expense to the taxpayers of this country.

Now as to the question of cutting down the militia: I spoke the other day in regard to the city corps. Since the war the city corps throughout Canada have done tremendous work. I think it is admitted by everybody that their maintenance prior to the war was justified. During the recent great struggle in Europe they gave the best in them. I made the statement in the House that I thought the first Canadian contingent consisted to the extent of 98 per cent of trained militia men. The minister brought down a return to the House in which the number is stated to be over 92 per cent; but they could not figure on the balance on account of the state of the record, I do not think I was far wrong when I said that 98 per cent of the first Canadian contingent consisted of men who passed through the Canadian militia in some capacity or other. Also the officers who went overseas—not only in the first contingent but in subsequent contingents—who rose to high command in the army, were officers who derived their training in the militia in the early days. My contention is, Sir, that to-day you should not cut down this vote for training purposes. As I said before, bring your permanent corps into camp; train your technical units in camp; let your city units train at local headquarters giving them an instructional officer, and a non-commissioned officer who can act as sergeant major for the purpose of carrying on courses of instruction in training throughout the year. The officers composing the city corps to-day, and I think the large bulk of the non-commissioned officers, who served with distinction overseas and are heartily sick and tired of war, have linked up with the city battalions, and batteries, machine gunners, signal corps, and other units, for the purpose of spending one, two or three years to give the new men that are within these units the benefit of their experience. As I said the other night in the House, I do not think there is a city corps in Canada, in which there is an officer, non-commissioned officer or man, who draws one cent of pay that goes towards his annual drill at local headquarters. That money is all funded back for the purposes of the unit. The peace establishment of an infantry battalion is something like 460. Nearly all the city battalions are raised up to something like five or six hundred men. The extra uniform and equipment is paid for out of the fund that goes back to the regiment from the pay and not by the government. When a man applies for a commission he has to qualify in the school of instruction. When qualified he gets his commission, and has to supply his uniform and equipment out of his own pocket, and it costs the government nothing. The various units of the militia corps—bands, sergeant-majors and so on —are paid for out of the moneys of that unit. I think, therefore, the money that is expended in training the city corps at militia headquarters is money well spent, and a great assurance for the country in time of need. We do not have to go far across the borders to find what they are doing. They have a standing army in the United States. True they are paring it down, but they are building up in a tremendous way throughout every state what is known as their national guards, similar to our militia. Every national guard unit throughout the United States to-day is being built up stronger than before the war. The war proved to them how weak they were, and they will take no chances again, and I venture to say you hardly ever pick up a paper from some parts of the United States where you do not find an item that the local guard has been equipped to preserve law and order. Thank goodness, we do not require that in this country, but we do not know when the day will come when we may require trained men within our borders for our own purposes, as well as for defence. Therefore, I think this Parliament would be criminally neglectful if it decided to pare this militia to a point where its usefulness would be absolutely nullified. Let us take advantage of the fact that we have the splendid men who served overseas with credit to Canada, and who would be prepared to serve in the future. Surely the inculcation of patriotism and the spirit of comradeship is worth while. I would like to see some of the estimates referred to a committee of the House—I do not suppose it will be done—especially the militia estimates where the technical officers could come before the committee and justify the expenditure brought in by the minister. In that way we would get technical knowledge which, probably, some of us do not possess at the present time. I am in favour of the proper training of the militia.

Mr. MURPHY: The hon. member has proposed that, instead of the present estimate, extensive reductions should be made in the vote for the permanent force. He has referred to districts 1, 3, 5, 7 and 12. Can he tell the committee what these reductions would amount to in money?

[Mr. Mewburn.]

Mr. MEWBURN: I am afraid I cannot tell the reduction in money, but I think in military district No. 5 they have had a general officer commanding, general staff officer, district intelligence officer, district signal officer, and assistant adjutant general in charge of administration, deputy assistant adjutant and quartermaster general, and technical departments and services, transport, medical service, pay services, and so on. My contention is that in that district the administrative staff should be cut down, and the administration could be performed under the supervision of the general officer commanding. And the same is true of Toronto and London. We have officers in command of the permanent force stationed in Quebec. There is a garrison there, and a senior officer in charge. All that could be done by the O. C. in the district with headquarters in Montreal.

Mr. MURPHY: You have read the list of officers relating to district 5.

Mr. MEWBURN: They are all the same.

Mr. MURPHY: I understood the original suggestion was that No. 5 might be wiped out, also district No. 1, and possibly one or two others. It would be of value to the committee if my hon. friend, with the extensive experience he has had, could tell the committee what the saving would be in money.

Mr. MEWBURN: I think the minister has his deputy there and the deputy could tell; I could not tell in dollars and cents. I suggest that No. 1, London, should be merged into Toronto. You would have an officer there. I do not know how far the minister could cut down, but I have absolute confidence in the minister, and I think that in his reorganization he could take those matters into consideration, and the whole of this vote ought to stand. He would have two or three months to work it out. I do not think he could tell now, but in a year he would be able to ascertain. I honestly feel that the members of this House have enough confidence in the minister to feel that he will do his best, in justice to the militia. I think he could do it within the year, but not offhand just now.

Mr. WOODS: I listened with interest to the discussion in connection with the military estimates. As has been stated by hon. gentlemen, we believe that the people of this country are tired of war, and we also believe that it is absolutely necessary to cut down the expenditure of this country to a minimum. We believe there is no expenditure of government that a great many hon. members of this House, as well as the people in the country, would rather see cut down to a minimum than the military expenditure. Reference has been made by hon. gentlemen to the fact of men giving their services without remuneration, or very little remuneration. That is one of the common things that go with war. We know that the boys who went to France enlisted in the service, went over, and went into the trenches, suffered hardships and privations, and many of them laid down their lives. They went over there without the promise of any remuneration which would have any tendency to draw them in that direction. They received $1.10 per day, while foreigners in this country were making as high as eight and ten and twelve dollars a day working here. So that, so far as the remuneration of the officers and men was concerned, there is very little argument on that side of the question. As I view it, the annual drill is one item that the department might pare down as readily as any other, and yet practically lose nothing from a military point of view. I am not familiar with the annual drill, particularly of late years, but when I was a young man, many years ago, I took some part in the annual drill as a volunteer in the service, and I know that many of us young men went to annual drill to the camp at London. We rather took it as a little outing and a good time. We did not go for the money that was in it by any means, but we went there and rather enjoyed a little outing for a time. In my experience, and in the locality in which I live, the young men who enlisted and signed up for three years' annual drill, usually dropped out at the expiration of their three years' service. I do not know whether that was a general thing or not; but in my locality it was quite common and it was the case with myself. At that time the period of annual drill was two weeks, although at present I believe it is nine days in each of three years, and, so far as my experience went, the drill amounted to practically nothing as regards training for active service.

Another feature that I should like to mention in this connection is that, undoubtedly, quite a percentage of those men who enlist as volunteers would, if they were called on active service, be found to be physically unfit, because there are boys who look fairly well, who will enlist for annual drill without undergoing medical examination, but who would be physically unfit to go on active service. Let me illustrate that in this way. I have two boys who both look equally vigorous and strong and who are apparently equally capable of becoming soldiers. One, who enlisted as a flier, passed his examination and went through his training, physically strong and all right. The other one, who appeared to me, his father, to be equally strong and to look just as well as a soldier, was turned down as physically unfit when he offered himself for military service and was put under medical examination. The boy who was turned down as being physically unfit would have made an ideal volunteer to go out for annual drill. I am, therefore, convinced that a great number of the boys who sign up for annual drill would be found to be physically unfit to go on active service, and that the time and money spent in drilling them would be wasted.

Mr. VIEN: Does my hon. friend know that the regulation which is in force to determine who shall attend a camp of instruction is absolutely the same, as respects fitness, as the one in regard to who should enter the Canadian Expeditionary Force?

Mr. WOODS: I beg the hon. member's pardon. I did not know that; but I know that years ago, when I enlisted as a volunteer, I was put under no medical examination whatever, nor were any of the boys in the locality in which I lived.

Mr. VIEN: There has been a change since then.

Mr. WOODS: We were asked to enlist as volunteers, and we were enlisted whether we were physically fit or not. If we looked fairly well, we were enlisted and we served our three years as volunteers.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not the case now.

Mr. WOODS: Another feature that I should like to mention is this. When the great war was in progress and everything looked as though we were up against it very hard, a draft was called up, I think in 1917, of boys from 19 to 23 years of age. Had the age limit of that draft been extended to 35, possibly some of them might have had former training as volunteers; but I cannot imagine that many boys between 19 and 23 years of age could have had any such previous military training.

I do not wish to take up the time of the House in discussing this question, but I should like to bring this further matter to the attention of hon. members. It was stated by hon. gentlemen the other evening that the military spirit of the young men of this country would be smothered out or killed on account of lack of annual drill. What was it that plunged this country and Europe into that terrible war, one of the worst, if not the worst, war that ever took place in modern history? Was it not that very thing, namely, the military spirit that was built up in Germany by training the boys and young men of that country to be soldiers? That military spirit, which existed in Germany, got such a grip on the people of that nation that they plunged the world into the great European war.

In my opinion, we want to build up good, straight, honest, citizens in this country, to train them on christian principles and not to instill in them the spirit of militarism in order that great armies may be established to go out and fight people of other countries. If the purpose of this appropriation is to build up a military spirit amongst the boys and young men of this country, I would oppose annual drill for that if for no other reason. That is all I am going to say on this question, but I am glad the minister has seen fit to cut down his estimates, especially as regards annual drill.

Mr. HOCKEN: Has the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Woods) any fear, or does he anticipate, that by this annual drill a militaristic spirit shall be produced in Canada equal to that which existed in Germany? Does he think there is any danger of that?

Mr. WOODS: Military drill was never carried on to the same extent in Canada as in Germany; but, possibly, if it was carried on to the same extent in Canada, it might have exactly the same result.

Mr. RINFRET: When these estimates were last considered by the committee, I congratulated the minister on having offered, in the general estimates of his department, a reduction amounting to over $1,000,000 for this year, and I also took consideration of the fact that he had to meet, in some branch of his department, an additional amount of some $500,000 on account of statutory increases in salaries, which increases were not actually shown in the estimates before the committee. I also took the stand that in no other department of the public service could economy be practised to the better liking of the Canadian people than in the Department of Militia or the Department of the Naval Service, and I asked the Government to consider if it were not possible to grant a further reduction in the item that was before the committee. A similar demand has been made by other members of the committee either on this side or in the Progressive wing, but it has been very strongly opposed by members of the official Opposition. May I admit frankly that the fact of that opposition only strengthened my purpose in asking that the reduction be granted? I may be permitted, perhaps, to take exception to some of the comments that were offered in the press of the country on that demand for a reduction which was made by certain members of the Liberal and Progressive wings in this House; and as there is an amendment to the amendment, I shall possibly be pardoned if I also devote a few moments to the consideration of those comments that have appeared in the newspapers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a remarkable fact that the newspapers that assert that Parliament lacks independence are the very newspapers that always fail to pay tribute to independence when it is shown in Parliament, and, instead, always look for some ulterior motive that may prompt the action of those who take an independent stand on these occasions. The day after that suggestion was made in the House we were astonished to read in the Montreal Star that a real revolution had taken place in this country. On April 26 the Parliamentary letter published in that newspaper bore this caption:

Radicals Make Attack On Canada's Defenders In Debate On Militia

The letter recalled the fact that some five years ago the Canadian army had recaptured Messines Ridge in Flanders, and had performed other military achievements around the channel ports; and the writer went on to draw the parallel between those glorious achievements,—to which undoubtedly we were all happy to pay tribute—and the attitude which some hon. members had taken in this House. There was also an editorial published on the same day entitled: "Have We Forgotten Our Dead in Four Years?" That is a very serious question; and the editorial, occupying two full colums, concluded:

> The country might learn from the present exhibition of levity or ignorance that it is exceedingly dangerous to send to Parliament men of such limited knowledge of world affairs as those who have known no better than to imagine the present time to be a fitting moment in which to slander our soldiers and seek to strike from their hands such arms as they bear.

If I were disposed to seek an answer to that editorial, which ascribes levity and ignorance to some of us on this side, as well as to hon. members across the way, who must share with us the imputation conveyed, I should need but turn to the same newspaper of the very next day, April 27, in which there was published another editorial under the heading: "We had a War". When I read that title, I must confess that I was under the impression that it would introduce me to another column or so of comments similar to those that had been published in the previous day's issue. But not at all. Only the day following the publication of that editorial that implied that we were forgetting our dead, the Star wanted to convey—you can hardly imagine it—that the people of this country were overlooking the 4 p.m. fact that we had had a war as a result of which we had a national debt of $2,384,996,391; an interest obligation for last year of $130,912,905; and a railway burden which was running the country behind annually to the tune of $100,000,000. These are the things which, says the Star, the people of Canada are forgetting. It says:

> Somebody should take certain selected leaders—

Selected leaders, which, of course, cannot mean men who display levity and ignorance.

> Somebody should take certain selected—and largely self-appointed—leaders of opinion in this country to one side, and whisper quietly but distinctly in their ears a piece of news which they do not seem to have heard, viz: "There has been a war".

Further on there is the following:

> We are living off the money-lenders. We have just borrowed a hundred million in New York at a cost to this country of two and a half millions commission . . . . In the meantime, the Canadians who are here must pay, pay, pay; and yet run deeper into debt every day.

That is what the Star had to say in regard to the national debt of the country and the necessity for retrenchment, taking their argument from the very war and the burdens which it had imposed upon the people. The very next day after they had charged certain hon. members of this House with having shown levity and ignorance, because we had asked that there should be a little more economy in militia estimates, this journal could turn round and point out the enormous responsibility which the war has placed upon us. Another newspaper, the Ottawa Journal, took another stand. It said that the members who urged economy were not anxious at all to have the militia estimates reduced; they only wanted to get back their patronage—they did not care about the militia estimates if the Government would properly deal with the Civil Service Commission or otherwise satisfy them. If that were done they would let the estimates through. Let me quote from that newspaper:

> It is understood that this is offered to pacify the Quebec members who are opposing the militia estimates, in the hope that it will result in a saw-off—the militia estimates being allowed to go through, and Quebec members being given freedom in the matter of patronage.

As the only Quebec members who took a stand on the question are my hon. friend from Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Lanctot), the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), and myself, I think I should attribute to myself, at least, one-third of the comments that are offered by this newspaper. Personally, not referring to the other two hon. gentlemen in the matter, I believe that to the extent that we are free from patronage we can give to the consideration of matters of legislation or of estimates in this House the better care and attention. But as it seems that the saw-off has gone the other way; since the minister has decided, together with the Government, further to reduce the militia estimates, I presume that my hon. friends will have to abandon their patronage hopes, if the Journal is correct.

There were other comments by other newspapers. I take it that they must have been Toronto papers. They said that our only object in the matter was to raise prejudice—the old prejudice in Quebec in regard to militia and naval affairs. Let me say frankly that I believe it to be the duty of every member in this House to express as sincerely and as clearly as he can the feelings of the people whom he represents. I do know that the people who elected me are in favour of a reduction in militia estimates; and I know, as well, that they are not prejudiced, I can say that they are quite willing to yield to the sentiment of the majority. But what makes our claim very strong to-day is the feeling that not only in a certain part of the country, but throughout the Dominion, there is a steady and increasing demand for a reduction in militia expenditures. If a vote were taken a few hours hence and it showed that the representatives of the people, by a majority, reflected the desire of their constituents that there should be no decrease in the estimates, then I would trust myself to go before my people and tell them that the majority in this country stood for those expenditures. But I do not believe that such is the general desire; and so far as I am personally concerned, I conceive it to be my clear and bounden duty, apart altogether from any question of prejudice, of which I hold none, to state on the floor of the House, with frankness and sincerity, the wish of the people whom I represent.

In expressing that wish I am by no means voicing any want of confidence in the Government; certainly not in the minister. I may say without the slightest fear of contradiction that there is no member on this side of the House who has not the utmost confidence in the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Graham). And may I be permitted to add that in so far as the minister, in dealing with the matters of his department, is inspired by his personal recollections and associations in the war, which were of the loftiest and noblest character, there is not a member who would not admit that any statement he might make would command at once the respect and confidence of all. But I repeat, Mr. Chairman, this is not a matter of want of confidence. We are sitting in committee on these estimates. We have had during this very session the rejection by the House of a report from the Committee on Agriculture; yet the Government did not feel that the House had lost confidence in its policy. We have seen a bill recommended to the House by the Railway Committee meet with an adverse vote on the part of the Prime Minister as well as on the part of the chairman of that committee; yet it was not pretended that the House had lost confidence in the Government so far as that committee was concerned. The other day the Prime Minister made it very clear that the Government did not wish to impose its policy on Parliament, but rather was coming to Parliament to consult it and to be advised as to what its policy should be. I quote the words of the Prime Minister as found on page 1490 of unrevised Hansard of this year:

> Now, I desire to say, and to say more particularly to my western friends,—who have been saying a good deal in their public speeches, that in my view of responsible government, the House of Commons, the rights of members of Parliament and the rights of the people should be regarded as all-important, and that the Cabinet should consider itself as a committee of Parliament and not as a body of supermen—I have taken the position that this Government would so regard itself, and that on these controversial questions, so far as it was possible to do so, the Government would seek to ascertain the will and wish of Parliament in a reasonable way and give expression to it in legislation.

If that does apply, Mr. Chairman, to legislation, certainly it applies to the estimates. I will take no notice of comments such as appeared in the Montreal Gazette, for instance, of April 27, which ventured the kind opinion that "the member for St. James should have been disciplined .. . ." or the comment of the Star of a later date, April 29, recommending > —the rule with an iron hand and more or less of the big stick. If Mr. King were able to hand a few wallops to the refractory. . . . his position and that of the Government would be stronger.

Let me say that the "wallop" and the "big stick" have never been part of the Liberal programme, and that they are not to-day. I am only too glad that, not by way of reply to these suggestions, but rather as a general declaration of policy, the Prime Minister has enunciated the principle that we are not sent here as mere mannikins to lift our hands when required to do so, but we are sent here to discuss the estimates which are put before the House and to offer suggestions on our earnest conviction and that of our constituents. The Government is moving over three hundred items of estimates this year in the departments; will any one take the position that because we sit on ministerial benches we may not even be allowed to stand up and say what we think of them? I am pleased to say that while the Liberal papers—and they felt very sensitive on the matter—while some Liberal papers actually approved of our conduct, it was the good old Tory papers like the Gazette and the Star which suggested the "wallop" and the "big stick." If you are looking for the wallop or the big stick you are always sure to find it where a Tory paper is printed. It may be objected that it is not according to tradition or to parliamentary authorities that we should discuss the estimates, and that in placing an amendment before the committee we are actually expressing want of confidence in the Government. If that has been the rule in the past, I do suggest that it is time to change it. I know that we must, in a way, be guided by tradition, but I do not think that tradition should become a chain to impede our least action.

We revere the memory of Bourinot and all those parliamentary authors who died a long time ago, but representing, as I do, twenty thousand living people, I shall never allow myself to be governed in this House by the spirit of a dead book.

No, Mr. Chairman; none of the motives that have been imputed to us have any existence. Only one reason moved us in the action we took, and it is a most logical and simple one: we asked for a reduction in the militia estimates because we wanted a reduction in the militia estimates. That is very plain and understandable. I have figures before me, but I do not think I need place them on Hansard—they have been placed there before—showing that the militia expenditure was at a certain figure in 1911; that it increased wonderfully in the days of the "big stick" and "walloping" under Tory rule, and that it had been practically abandoned after the war when we were busy with demobilization. The question confronting the country now is whether we should revert to Tory rule in the matter of militia expenditure and spend some $11,000,000 or $12,000,000 a year, or whether we should go back to Liberal tradition and cut down those estimates. I give to the minister and to the Government credit for reducing these estimates by a large amount, particularly in view of the fact that they found an established state of affairs existing when they came into power and had only a few months to work on the estimates. I feel very grateful indeed, and most of the members behind me—certainly a great number of those facing me, and, what is more important, the country at large,—feel grateful to hear that the minister, broad-minded as he is, is able to tell the committee to-day that he will pledge himself further to reduce the estimates; in fact, he proposes to reduce this item by $400,000 and the rest of the items by an additional $300,000. It may be a little less than what was asked, though personally I never committed myself to an amount. I did, however, commit myself to the principle that we could discuss the estimates in this committee, and I held the view that they should be further reduced. As they have been reduced by this further amount I think that we should feel gratified; it is ample proof that the Government are in favour of the principle of decreasing these estimates. As a matter of fact, they are decreasing them in the whole Department of Militia and Defence by nearly $4,000,000, in round figures, this year. I will not commit myself for next year—I will again come and represent the same twenty thousand living people who think that we should not spend too much on militia. But it is only fair to acknowledge that the Government has done its very best to meet that desire this year, and I will certainly support the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Mr. Chairman, during this session I have enjoyed myself chiefly in listening to the debates going on in the House. I have been rather interested in these estimates because some days ago we were informd that they had been whittled down to the finest possible point and that any further reductions would interfere with training throughout the country. Now, I am not going to criticise any portion of the people, but I will endeavour to show that military training is, to a certain extent, necessary and that militarism is not part of our ordinary military training. In the first place, history shows that since 1759, which is not a very long period of history, this country has on nine occasions stood shoulder to shoulder with the troops of the Motherland in the defence of this and other parts of the British Empire. That is an average interval of only eighteen years between the periods of calling out the militia for service.

Following the advice of the minister the other night, that we should take our place in the Empire and comparing our expenditure with that of other parts of the British Empire, I find the facts obtainable very interesting. Australia and Canada are two of the strongest links in the Empire, and in looking over the debates in Australia I was struck with their similarity to the debates in this House. There was one member, Mr. Blackeby, calling out "Brass hats, brass hats." Another member derided "Form fours," and said the soldiers had never formed fours in the trenches. Another hon. member said that the boys had gone into training on the old white mare that had been in camp for years. All these things are very interesting and show how similar is the discussion over there to that which takes place in this country. As one who each year since 1889 has been in one camp or another in this country, I may say that I never saw a brass hat at any of these camps. I may have seen boys riding on "the old white mare," but I knew these horses would never go into active service. I knew that that boy was simply being trained to handle a horse and to move in unison with the rest of the unit. I knew from my experience in two wars that the soldiers would not form fours in the trenches, or in the front line, because it was absolutely unnecessary, this being only part of the initial training of the men in obeying orders, in moving in unison and arriving at a point in the shortest space of time and with the best possible results.

What has Australia been doing before the war and since? I find that Australia is expending both on military and naval training some £5,000,000, approximately $24,000,000, while Canada with almost double the population is expending only $13,490,000. What is South Africa doing? Is that country that was conquered only a few years ago, and against which many of us fought, turning to the point of view that military training is unnecessary and a useless expense? I find that such is not the case. South Africa has her own unique system of defence. She has the first, second and third lines of defence, and upon them she is expending the amount of £1,500,000, almost equal to what we are expending at the present time. Therefore, a comparison with these other parts of the Empire shows that their viewpoint is not any different from ours in regard to military training.

What is the objection in this House to military training? I have tried to note down the objections as the discussion has proceeded and I find—I am not making any personal criticisms, but only trying to make my point clear; I have served from a private up to my present rank and have secured all my promotions on active service, not in the militia—I find that: first, the man who has an abhorrence of military training. He sees something to be avoided in what he calls the "brass hat" and "trimmings." None of that annoys us who take up the training. Then there is the uplifter, the man who leans to the idea of the brotherhood of man and forgets that even brothers fall out and fight. Then there are those who talk of what is called the "melting pot," who think we can bring into this country immigrants of all colours and creeds and classes, and put them into a melting pot that will make all men equal. You cannot do that any more than you could take a cart horse, as Stoddart says, and make him a hunter by putting him in a little better stable. Then there are those who see signs of peace and point to the Washington conference and say there will be no more war.

There are also those who say that the first contingent consisted of untrained men.

[Mr. A. E. Ross.]

One has only to turn up the list of officers who commanded the units of the first contingent, beginning with the First battalion and going through the list, to find such names as Colonel Rennie, Colonel Watson, Colonel Hill, Colonel Burchell, Colonel Boyle, Colonel Lipsett, Hart McHarg, Loomis, Meighen, Currie, Leckie and other such names. Where did we get these men? These men were selected from the militia on account of their training. All the officers of the first contingent, which I was with from the first day to the last, were trained men from our militia, which just illustrates the benefit of training. So all these objections that are made are really very slight.

What have we gained, or rather, what have we lost, through men taking the position we find taken by some in this House? History shows that after all great wars this same spirit of antagonism to training has prevailed. After every war there have been men who have endeavoured to lull the people to sleep by saying "We have had the last great war; never again will there be another." I can speak best of the effects which this attitude has had on the medical service. Take, for instance, the Crimean war, from 1854 on. We have all read of the terrible conditions prevailing in the hospitals and in the transports that carried the sick and the wounded. A great cry was raised that this was cruelty and conditions were changed for the better. Following that war, men said: "There will never be another, and therefore we can disband all these units." But the South African war came on, and again our medical service fell down through lack of training and experience, and the toll of deaths from typhoid fever in that war was something tremendous. After that war too, it was said: "There will never be another big war, and therefore you can quit training and lose all that you have gained by experience." Had it not been for one of the kindest men who ever commanded an army, Lord Roberts, we would have again experienced the same conditions in the last great war. But thanks to this kindly man, who never thought of killing, who never wanted disturbance, we were prepared to a certain extent, and so we avoided the lull that resulted after the other great wars.

What does training accomplish? In any walk of life you will find that training is absolutely necessary; and perhaps it may touch the hearts of some men here when I say that training is necessary even in the case of your favorite horse winning a race—no man puts an untrained horse out on the track. Training is necessary to our boys in their baseball matches, their tugs of war, their rowing matches, and their football competitions. Training is absolutely necessary in all these games, and it is imperative in all emergencies. Military training is useful in case of fires, it is useful to men who have to handle disastrous accidents—in all these cases military training benefits the man who has taken part in it. People have sneered at all the things connected with this military training. But we have reason to take pride in the fact that we have derived great benefit from it. I well remember the letter I received in France from a very good friend, a very well known lawyer, who, during nearly all his life, laughed and jeered at those of us who went to camp. He would ask "What good will this do you? What are you going to derive from it?" and he would say "You are a little off in the upper story spending your time on such things." That letter I have retained because his words are these:

> I have never regretted so much any words in my past life as I do to-day that I sneered at the men who went to camp. And here am I now in my age, when I am past the time when I can take training and be of service at this critical time, and my only service is this—to provide and give my money to those who have taken the training and made themselves useful in this great crisis.

Now, what was gained in this war by training? I pointed out the losses in the other great wars by lack of training. What did we gain in this war—and again I must speak of the medical service because I can give you some instances indicating competent work performed because of, and successful results derived from it. And I would like just here to say that the training in the camps before the great war was very different from the training which went on in the camps referred to by my friend from Dufferin. In camps, just before the war, the men were examined by a medical officer who had to give a certificate as to their condition. If one man was unfit he was the man who fell down in the training. Now what did we gain in this war by our medical training? We went into our trenches and we struck a disease that was very little known, in fact had previously never been heard of, namely, trench feet. No man other than those who have suffered from trench feet, or who have seen those who have suffered from it, can tell anything about it. But let me relate this experience: On one small march made by our militia in the month of February in Canada I accepted the position of medical officer. The month of February was chosen in order to demonstrate that you could train men and do some work with them in this country in the winter. During that time, for about a week, we had experience with the men's feet; and it was from that small training, a week's training in that winter campaign, that I was able to put on a routine in France which practically wiped out trench feet in the first division of the Canadian forces. After the first year we went out practically without a case in the first division. Some person may say that might be due to occupying different trenches, or better trenches. Well, I will give one comparison which will illustrate my contention. In the winter of 1916-17 we relieved one division which had had 950 cases of trench feet a week. The first Canadian division went into the very same trenches, and under the very same conditions, but by steadfast adherence to our routine we came out in June without one case of trench feet. I might again refer to the benefit of training as regards typhoid fever. During the Boer War 250,000 men landed on the shores of South Africa, and there were left behind in that country 53,000 men who had died from typhoid fever. During the great war the Canadian medical service ministered to 250,000 Canadian troops on our front alone, and not one white cross was erected in France or Flanders to mark the grave of a man of that number who had died from typhoid fever. So you see in these cases the result of training.

In the same way the benefit comes to the men who are doing the actual work. There is a benefit, and no person can say what the value of it is. We owe something to the men who have trained and have served this country; let us not make a mistake and lose the benefit of their services. Throughout the whole history of the world you will find that countries have been saved by small bodies of trained men. You can go back in history as far as you like. Take the Grecian wars and you have the stand of Leonidas and his 300 men in the Pass of Thermopylae; you have Miltiades and his 4,000 Greeks against the large force of Persians; you have small bodies of the trained Roman legions contending against the forces of Hannibal on the one hand and Attila on the other; you have Charlemagne with his small force contending against the Saracens and the Huns, and the Goths from the North. In our own country you have had the example of achievements of small bodies of men trained locally—the men under Sir Isaac Brock at Niagara, and the men who fought at Chateauguay in Quebec. These were small bodies of trained men. They did their work and they did it nobly, and they showed the result of military training.

Look at the map of the world to-day and we shall see no sign of peace. The nations of Europe are broken up into small states, offering rich possibilities to amalgamations and combinations which must lead to jealousies and, I fear, to war. We had a discussion in this House only yesterday showing the menace to our white population from the yellow races. Asia to-day is overpopulated and the tide is bursting through in some places. Although the dykes are up against the inundation they are not efficient and they are not unbreakable. These are facts pointing to the conclusion that peace is not at all as assured as some people believe it is. There is also a report which has just lately been published in regard to an agreement between Germany and Russia. Perhaps very few have thought of it, but yet it is a fact. The report stated that a Russian-German military agreement had been signed at Berlin recently which provided that the Soviet government should give Germany 20 warships and maintain a certain number of troops opposite the Polish frontier. Germany was to deliver to Russia arms, munitions, equipment, aeroplanes, wireless equipment, and so on. In addition to that there was another report side by side with it, which stated that it had been learned from reliable sources that France was preparing for the immediate mobilization of the 1918 army, and reserves, numbering about 150,000 men, and this was with a view of enforcing payment of the reparations. These are two very important statements which have appeared in your press and they should cause us to think. I have pointed out to you, Mr. Chairman, the benefit of training. Wipe out military training, cadet training and training of all kinds, and what will be the effect on our boys? We will produce a class of sissy boys. We will produce a class of fanatics and dancers, and will not produce the good old athletic boys who have made this British Empire what it is.

Mr. SHAW: I say at the outset that I yield to no man in my pride in the achievements of the Canadian corps overseas. I also say to my fellow members from Quebec that, of all the units in that grand army which represented Canada overseas, in my humble judgment there was none which surpassed in its record of achievement that famous regiment from Quebec, the 22nd battalion. May I say further, Mr. Chairman, that I yield to no man in what I conceive to be my patriotic duty to the country of my birth. But I think that, forgetting these considerations, and looking at this question in the light of real facts, and in the light of reason, we can determine for ourselves whether or not in this particular vote the recommendation proposed by the minister shall be given effect to by this committee. According to my way of thinking, the militia has two services to perform. First, it may be called upon to preserve order in this country, a function which, I am happy to say—and I think most hon. members will agree with me—the militia has seldom been called upon to perform; in fact, I know of very few instances indeed in which it has performed that duty. And, second, it may serve as a training preparation for war. There are, of course, two varieties of training the militia may furnish for war purposes, and I would like to examine just momentarily these two varieties, in order that we may ascertain whether or not the militia functions for either purpose. There is, first, the physical training, which it is suggested one gets from the militia training and, second, what one might call the training in the tactics of war. I accept without reservation the statement made by the former Minister of Militia that it took six months, to train a man for overseas service in France. I accept without reservation his statement that over 90 per cent of the men of the first division were members of the militia units prior to their enlistment. I take it—and it cannot be questioned—that a very large percentage of the men who served in the subsequent units which went overseas were not previously members of the militia at all. Let us deal with that. The first Canadian division landed in France on the 15th day of February, 1915, substantially six months from the time that unit was enlisted in this country. With a possible exception of the Princess Patricia Light Infantry, which, I believe, went into the trenches on Christmas day, 1914, not a single unit in the first Canadian division was even in a position to perform active service within a period of six months. That, to my mind, indicates very clearly that, perhaps, the militia training did not serve effectually and effectively for the purposes which it is alleged here to-day it did serve, because, as a matter of fact, the men in the first Canadian division did not see active service in a shorter period from the time of their enlistment than did the men who had no militia experience at all. One must realize that the primal necessity in training is the physical training in order to prepare the man to withstand the hardships and privations incident to war service. Surely no man is going to suggest that by yearly militia training of, at most, sixteen days a man can be fitted for war services. The situation is simply this: that the six months' experience is largely, if not entirely, needed for putting a man into physical condition, in order that he may endure the conditions he will have to undergo. As a matter of fact, in addition, the training in tactics may be done in a comparatively short period of time. I saw the statement—and I think perhaps there may be considerable of truth in it—that three weeks of intensive training will train a man sufficiently to enable him to take his place in the ranks. I do not know whether that is absolutely correct or not, but I am quite satisfied in my own mind that so far as training in tactics is concerned, a period of much less than six months is required.

It is frequently urged, and has been urged, that we should support and develop the militia in preparedness for possible war service. I am frank to say that I, for one, feel greatly disappointed in the view which has been taken in connection with that matter. We all realize, we know now, if we never knew before, that the theory about preserving peace by preparing for war is one of the most fallacious arguments which has ever been presented. All I have to suggest to this committee is that no nation was more prepared for war than Germany and the Austro-Hungarian empire, and yet to-day Germany and Austro-Hungary are in ruins, as a result of their preparations for war; and not only that, but they lost the war despite their previous preparations. I say to you, without the slightest hesitation, that history has proven that war is a gigantic and dismal failure, and that the Armageddon of the nations which, happily is now past, has simply had the result of leaving the world in ruin, and in despair. I will quote from an article which appeared in the Free Press of Winnipeg a short time ago—and I think this House can endorse every word it uttered:

> There is no profit in war; the loser loses, the victor loses, the neutral loses, everybody loses. The last war exposed and exploded all the arguments urged on behalf of war—they were all seen to be false. Nobody gained, everybody suffered, vast numbers are suffering still; war was failure, total and ghastly; it was left without argument or apology, something which was demonstrably a total loss to the human species.

With every word of that statement I agree. There is only one other thought that I have to utter. I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks made the other day by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark), a gentleman who, I am told, served his country faithfully overseas. I quote a portion of his remarks on that occasion. He said:

> The people who talk most to-day about being sick of war are those who are sick of their shame at not having done their duty in the past.

I confess that I for one am heartily sick of war, and if the rest necessarily follows, then I must plead guilty to the indictment of the hon. member for Burrard. But I want to suggest to that hon. member that, while it is true that a comparatively large number of men served their country overseas faithfully and well, and nobody gives them credit more than I do, we must not forget that, on this side of the Atlantic, there were thousands, yea, there were hundreds of thousands who served their country just as faithfully and well. Perhaps they did not endure the physical suffering and agony which may be incident to active service; but they endured what, to my mind, in many instances at least, was a far greater and more difficult trial and sacrifice. During the last campaign, although it was my fortune to be opposed by a gentleman representing the Liberal side of this House, I had occasion, in answer to a criticism made by a representative of hon. gentlemen to my right in connection with the war service of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) of this country, to say that, in my humble opinion, the present Prime Minister of this country had served Canada faithfully and well during the war period, and not only that, but that he had served Canada more faithfully and more effectively than he possibly could have served her if he had gone overseas in any capacity whatsoever. I have no hesitation in stating also that I am convinced that it would have been nothing short of a public calamity if the present leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) had, at that time, thrown down the reins of office and gone over to France to serve in any capacity whatsoever. Furthermore, what is true of those distinguished gentlemen is true of the men who worked in every capacity, the workers, the people engaged in transportation service, and the men engaged in working in the mines or in the forests. All these men contributed in great measure to the victory which could not have been achieved except for their splendid service. And I for one, having served overseas, am prepared to pay tribute to the people who stayed in Canada and did their duty here so faithfully and so well.

Canada is a young country, and so far as we know, we have no fear for either the immediate or the distant future. We are very fortunate, situated as we are on the northern half of this continent, in having, as our only immediate neighbour, a country with which we have lived in peace for a hundred years. I think it would be a very becoming and splendid thing if this young country, inspired by new ideals and a desire to set a standard to the rest of the world, could say that we, at least, are prepared to disarm to the uttermost. If we did that, I am satisfied that our action would constitute not only a challenge but an inspiration to peoples in other parts of the world, less fortunately situated than ourselves.

I do not propose to say anything further than this, that I had hoped that the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Graham) would, have reduced his estimates considerably more than he has. I have every confidence in the minister; I am satisfied that he is not a militarist and never can be one, because he is not constitutionally made that way. While I regret that he has not seen fit to reduce his estimates more, I desire to say that, in view of the fact that he had but slight opportunity to go into the matter, I shall not object to the reduction which he proposed this year. But, unless some more substantial reduction is made next year, I shall certainly feel then that it is my duty, not only to my constituents and to the country generally, but to myself, to submit to this tribunal of the people that he has failed to measure up to the responsibility which is his.

Mr. CLARK: Did the hon. member actually attend any of the training camps prior to the outbreak of war, and if so, in what years?

[Mr. Shaw.]

Mr. SHAW: I am frank to tell the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) that I am proud to call myself one of the citizen soldiers. I never had any service in any camp prior to the outbreak of war, and, prior to that time I had no connection with the militia.

Mr. CLARK: Or since the war? I quite understand the hon. member was overseas and that he has a very good record.

Mr. SHAW: I understand the hon. member to ask whether or not I have any connection at this time with the militia. I am frank to tell the hon. member that I really do not know. I do not know whether an officer or a person who has been discharged as an officer has severed his connection completely with the militia. I understand there is some system by which he is retained on the force, somehow or another.

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member is on my reserve of officers, I think.

Mr. CLARK: In what capacity did the hon. member serve when overseas?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CLARK: I know I am out of order, but I wish to put myself in a position to be able to deal with the arguments which have been advanced.

Mr. SPENCE: I did not intend to take any active part in this debate, but I cannot let this opportunity go without saying a word or two. It is regrettable that so much time has been taken up in this House in criticising a body of men who have rendered so much service to this country before war, during war and since war. It is regrettable also that some hon. gentlemen see fit to criticise such a body and to forget it so soon after the war. I had hoped that the estimates of the minister would go through when the committee sat on the 25th of last month, without any criticism. I was so pleased with the minister's presentation of his estimates that I felt it incumbent upon me to congratulate him. I am sorry he has come back now, evidently because of having pledged himself to a compromise to appease a certain element in his own party or possibly in the Progressive body. I have no wish to be over-critical, but I feel that the militia has not in the past been given the consideration which it ought to have had; and with the present cheeseparing policy it certainly cannot hope to be efficient. The minister the other night was asked whether, with the reduction of $100,000 or, for that matter, of less, there could be efficiency, and he answered positively, no. I regret that he has seen fit to change his mind. If he was right then, he must be wrong now.

I want to correct some statements made by my hon. friend. I am interested in militia matters myself, and I do not want any misapprehension to exist in any respect regarding the militia. The hon. member made the statement that very few men were available for overseas service out of the old militia. Let me tell him that in the city of Toronto 75 per cent of the militia composed a force of 36,000 that went overseas, and those who were unable to go overseas were prepared to take their share of responsibility in training the younger element. It was because of the existence of the militia that the first contingent was able to go overseas so expeditiously. Many hon. gentlemen talk of the badges and frills in connection with the militia. Well, to any extent that there are badges and frills, the cost is borne by the officers and not by the country. Many thousands of dollars have been contributed by the officers, in the city of Toronto and throughout the country, towards the upkeep of the militia, and it is not for anybody to criticise any of the red tape or "brass hats" or anything else of that kind, because the only thing that the Government pays for is the pure khaki. I noticed that when a few badges and frills were introduced into the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture the other evening, when there was an increase of $45,000 made for the purpose of killing pests and bugs, there was not an hon. member opposed to the expenditure. But anything appertaining to the militia and law and order finds opposition. I am sorry that conditions are as they exist today in connection with the militia, and I hope that the minister will see to it that he gets every dollar he asks for, and that he will give to the militia the fair consideration and treatment which it has not had and which, I fear, if one is to judge by the expressions of opinion that have fallen from hon. members, it will not be given at the present time.

Mr. CRERAR: Notwithstanding the rather warlike speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Spence), I rise to support the reduction made by the minister in the item under consideration. I have no hesitation in saying that I should have been gratified if the reduction were greater than it is. If we compare the amount we are spending on military training in Canada to-day with what it was ten years ago, we find that there has been a very great increase indeed. I rather object to the criticism that is indulged in by some hon. gentlemen in this House, of those who wish to reduce expenses, that they are animated solely by antagonism to the militia and have no respect whatever for it. That is not the case. We can surely consider the estimates and discuss the question of reducing them without having levelled at us these suggestions in the way of criticism. So far as this particular item is concerned, let me repeat, I support very heartily the suggestion made by the minister to reduce the amount by $400,000, and my only regret is that he was unable to go a little further. Before I resume my seat I want to say a word in respect to the remark offered by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) with reference to my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Shaw). My hon. friend from West Calgary made, I think, a very excellent speech this afternoon. He is a modest gentleman, and in order to remove any wrong impression that may exist in the mind of my hon. friend from Burrard, who also saw distinguished service overseas, let me tell the committee that the hon. member for West Calgary served for over two years in France with such distinction that he was awarded the military cross.

Mr. d'ANJOU (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I would like to add a few words before these estimates are voted, so as to properly explain my position. Ever since I have had the honour to occupy a seat in this House, I have at each session joined with the members of the Opposition of the time in requesting that the Government reduce the militia estimates as much as possible. I have not changed my views, neither have I altered my principles, because of the fact that I now occupy a seat on the government side of the House; yet, I must say that I am pleased with the decision taken by the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) to further reduce his appropriations this year. At the beginning of the session, when I spoke on the address in reply to the speech from the Throne, I congratulated the Government on having decided to make a considerable reduction in the militia estimates. I would surely like this reduction to be greater still, and I hope that next year when my hon. friend the minister comes again before this Parliament, we shall have a far more substantial reduction. As I stated, this is for me a question of principle, not a question of figures. I may state that I am entirely satisfied with the reduction now made by the hon. minister. If we add the reductions which he intends to make, we find that the militia estimates alone are less by about two million dollars, and we are also aware that the Government intends to reduce the estimates of the "fighting navy" if I may use that expression, by more than a million dollars which brings the total reduction close to three million dollars divided between the Militia and Naval Service Departments. I sincerely congratulate the Government and I express the hope that if they do not decide to sink the five old tubs, a gift of the British Government, they will at least decide to put them up for auction within the shortest delay possible.

Both in and out of this House, I have always proclaimed myself energetically an anti-militarist and against this imperialistic policy, and I have not changed my views on the subject. The more we reduce these militia estimates, the sooner we sink the navy, the less we become imperialists and militarists.

I am aware of the difficulty that the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) may have had this year in further reducing these estimates. The Government which at present directs the affairs of this country has hardly been in office four months. It stands to reason that all the ministers have not had time to become well acquainted with their departments and master all the details. Consequently, it seems to me that one may be an anti-imperialist, stick to his principles and support the Government in such circumstances. As it was said during the course of this debate, not only a part but the whole country is tired of militarism, tired of listening to war talk. Everywhere disarmament is advocated, considerable expenditure is incurred for that purpose, our own Government has been called upon to expend quite large amounts to take part in these conferences on disarmament. Certainly it would not be putting into practice what has been decided in these conferences if we were bent on increasing the militia estimates in Canada.

The Government has done the proper thing, it has taken the right means and I trust that it will continue doing so. The late war was sent to abolish militarism in this world, to destroy this infernal German machine, and it strikes me that it is time we should return to common sense. A wave of unrest overran this country during the war; it is time that people should understand that we must come back to peace conditions, if we wish our country to return to its past prosperity. In the course of the present session, when the estimates on agriculture came up, we spoke of reducing the grants to agricultural fairs. I believe that the reductions which we are making to the militia estimates should go to increase the agricultural budget, or else, for instance, to endow with pensions the widows and children of those who were killed overseas.

Mr. Chairman, we have in this House listened to members advocating militarism; they would like to see the whole of Canada turned into a military camp. Most of these gentlemen are so-called drawing room officers, peacocks that have paraded here during the war, paraded the streets of Montreal, Ottawa and elsewhere, while the sons of farmers and workmen were being killed in Flanders. We are not to be lectured by them. I represent a county which is absolutely against militarism and I hold the same views, even though I now sit on the Government benches.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The item under discussion is the item for annual drill which was presented by the Minister of Militia and by the Government to the House and which stood at the figure of $1,400,000 when the item was under discussion just about two weeks ago to-day. The proposal of the minister or of his colleague the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe), now is that the amount of $1,400,000 for annual drill shall be reduced by $400,000. Some wonderful transformation has taken place in the intervening two weeks. As I recall the scene in this House about ten o'clock on the evening of the 25th of April, the minister was in a fairly safe as well as triumphant position. It is true that one of the supporters of the Government had moved to reduce the item by some $1,100,000, but the minister certainly rose to the occasion. In answer to the motion of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) for a substantial reduction in this vote, the minister demonstrated to the intelligence of the House that he was on solid ground. He had the support of the vast majority on one side of the House; he had the unanimous support of the fifty members sitting in the group of Oppositionists in this corner of the House. That, surely, was his moment for action; that was the moment he should not have let pass. That is when he should have tested the feeling of the House. He was on firm ground. He and his Government had considered the matter carefully before submitting it to the House; they believed they were right, and the majority of the House of Commons believed it also. But for some reason best known to himself, he let the moment pass, and then some of his own supporters began the process of belabouring and using the big stick. The hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) complains that the newspapers in some parts of Canada have expressed the view that his leader should belabour them and use the big stick on them. But he has no reason to complain; why, he and his friends have used the big stick on the minister in the interval. They have taken him by the throat, practically; they have dragged him into the caucus; they have told him that he either had to cut down, to trim, or they would put him out.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And to-day, in spite of the laughter that comes from the other side, we have evidence of the truth of what I state when the minister comes to Parliament and puts himself in the humiliating position of saying: My own followers will not support me; I will have to ask the House to reduce our appropriation for annual drill by $400,000.

Mr. CARROLL: That is democracy.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend says that is democracy; I say it is the result of the use of the big stick, of the belabouring methods which have been employed by certain hon. members from the Quebec section of this House. That is the result; it is humiliating; it cannot be a pleasant thing for the minister himself. How are estimates laid before this House? The minister is advised by his staff as to the requirements of the department. Very capable men surround him for that purpose; he himself has paid high and well deserved tribute to these men during the present session. They are competent men to advise him, men of very great experience. On the basis of this information he prepares his statement and presents it to his colleagues in council as the requirements for annual drill for this year. He has to convince his colleagues that he is right. They agree. The matter then goes before His Excellency the Governor General. He, in turn, agrees. Then, it is brought before Parliament as the considered opinion of the Government and of the minister. In introducing the militia estimates, the minister said, page 1177 of unrevised Hansard:

> The militia estimates, I might say, have been pared down to a point as low as is compatible with national safety.

That is a very strong declaration; a very significant statement. The estimates were not brought together in haphazard fashion. They are not ill-considered. They were gone over carefully. And they were, according to the minister's statement, pared down to the lowest point consistent with safety. The House, of course, took the minister at his word when he made that statement, and a great many hon. members of the House knew to be absolutely correct. The minister meant it; this Government meant it; it was based upon fact and founded on the advice of the men whom this country pays to advise him. But, alas, the debate had not proceeded very far when certain elements among his own supporters began to show what they could do with estimates and proposals by the Government. My hon. friend from St. James seems to overlook this in his argument. Under the parliamentary practice of this country and of the Motherland, under the constitution of this country, no private member can come here and propose a money vote. All financial proposals must be made by the government itself and must first be submitted to and have the approval of His Excellency the Governor General. It is the government that is specially charged with financial administration; no matter how brilliant may be the private member of this House, he cannot introduce a money bill. Consequently, it has always been considered good parliamentary practice—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Cannot he propose a reduction?

Mr. GUTHRIE: A reduction can be proposed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is what we did.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am talking of the original proposal. It has always been considered good parliamentary practice that when a government solemnly brings forward a financial proposal—and it is the only party that can bring it forward—it stands or falls by the fate of that proposal. I do not know that there is any positive written law to say that a government must fall if its proposal falls. I know there have been instances in history where governments have withdrawn financial proposals after they have been fully considered in the House, but I do not think there has been a single case where a government has been belaboured by its own followers into the reduction of a proposal, to its own humiliation, and has still said: We will retain office and accept the belabouring which our supporters have given us. That is the position of the minister to-day. Upon the original estimate the minister was on sound ground, as I said, but he is not on as sound ground to-day as he was two weeks ago.

I listened with the greatest interest and attention to the remarks of the hon. member for West Calgary. He has a very clear and convincing way of presenting a matter to this House. I listened with the greatest respect to what he had to say to-day, but I noticed at the end of his remarks he said: I am prepared to support this reduction, but I will not be satisfied with this item next year; I shall want a bigger reduction than $400,000 in this vote then.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: "Hear, hear," resounds from a large portion of the Government benches. If it is the attitude of hon. gentlemen, that more should be cut from this vote next year, why not make a job of it to-day? There is no question as to what hon. members want who shouted "Hear, hear," just now. They want to cut annual drill to the vanishing point. In my humble judgment, Mr. Chairman, we have it practically to the vanishing point now, if we mean annual drill that is to be of any real service, and I know that is the opinion of the minister himself. You can cut down your vote for annual drill to a certain point, but there comes a point to go below which is a pure waste of money. Have we reached that point now? I fear we have. The vote was for only $1,400,000 in the first place. It is now proposed to reduce it by $400,000, about thirty per cent of the whole. It could only have provided for partial training of a number of the units for a limited number of days in any event; it is now to be cut down by thirty per cent. It is a serious question whether the training that can be given on the balance will be of any practical advantage to the Dominion. My hon. friend from West Calgary has warned the minister that the vote must be cut still further next year, and his warning was heartily applauded by hon. members from the province of Quebec sitting opposite.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why should my hon. friend always refer to the members from the province of Quebec? There are members from other provinces on this side of the House.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I referred to hon. members whom I saw applauding.

Mr. GAUVREAU: You have not very good eyesight.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think it is fairly good. I made my remark in consequence of what I saw—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sick of that.

Mr. GUTHRIE:—whether my hon. friend is sick of it or not. I notice he was the minister selected to move this reduction of $400,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: I tried to do it myself.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If the matter were to stop here, although the vote as it is proposed to reduce it is far too low, it might go through, but when warning is served from an important section of this House this this reduction is only a makeshift for the present year and that next year the vote must be still further reduced, it becomes a question whether you should not do it this year rather than waste the money in the interval. What I propose to do, and what I believe a considerable portion of this House is going to do, is to stand by the position which the minister took two weeks ago. He was right then, and the Government knows he was right, and a majority of the members of this House know he was right, and I believe they will stand by him. This is a case where we are going to save the minister from himself, or, rather, I should have said, save him from his friends, and not permit him to be humiliated or "belaboured," or "big-sticked," or whatever you like to call it. When you know you are on solid ground, when you know the proposal is right, when you know the expenditure is warranted and cannot safely be reduced, when the Government has committed itself upon the question, my judgment is that you should support the proposal made by the minister at first, and I certainly intend in my humble way to support it.

My hon. friend and colleague, the member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn), a member who has very much greater experience in military matters than almost any man in this House, in his speech this afternoon pointed out certain ways in which money could be saved, not in actual training, but in administration, and it is possible there was a great deal in what he had to say. He based his argument upon this: Go ahead with your proposal as it stood two weeks ago; do not reduce it; persevere; go ahead; we will support you; you will find places in these estimates this year where, by reorganization and a change in administration, you can save large amounts of money, which you now propose to save by reducing the estimates before us by $700,000. In my humble judgment, and I speak only from what I have learned after two years in the department, it is far more important to pass this vote for annual training and annual drill than it is to maintain the Dominion arsenals at this particular moment. Looking over the estimates I find that the Government is practically closing up the Ontario arsenal this year, asking for only $25,000, which practically means only looking after the material and keeping the staff there; but $425,000 is being appropriated for the Quebec arsenal. Here is a suggestion for the minister: Close the Quebec arsenal; reduce the vote to $25,000, the same as for the Ontario arsenal, and thereby save $400,000. Then you would be able to have your annual training, which is a matter of the utmost consequence, and we would take a chance on the arsenal supplies for the future. I know the supply at Lindsay arsenal is away below the required reserve. Still, the minister does not hesitate to close that arsenal. I believe the arsenal at Quebec could be closed just as well, and $400,000 saved this year, provided the minister will apply that saving to the annual drill and training. Then the saving sought by the minister in moving to reduce this item for annual drill will be achieved, and if war does not take place I suppose no great injury will be done. We will have carried at least this point, that the men will receive the normal amount of training this present summer.

Mr. HALBERT: I had not intended speaking on this question to-day, as I spoke when these estimates were up a week or so ago. I think I had better tell the committee at once that I am from Ontario, not from Quebec. I congratulate the minister upon his proposed reduction of these estimates, and I want to tell him that I believe ninety per cent of the people of Ontario will be pleased with his reduction. The people of Quebec are not alone in demanding that these estimates be reduced; I think the rank and file of the people of the Dominion are looking for a reduction in the militia estimates. The military sentiment is still alive in this country. I well remember—and other members who were here last session or the session before will recall—that Mr. Mowat of Toronto, a supporter of the late government, introduced a resolution here asking practically for the compulsory military training of all young men in Canada between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five. They were all to be compelled to devote four weeks a year, for seven years, to military or physical training, the latter to all intents and purposes being the same as military drill. Now, military training did not raise the standard of morality in Europe, and it will not do so in Canada. A stream will rise no higher than its source, a nation is no stronger than its national homes; and one of the greatest assets in Canada to-day is the free and loyal patriotism to be found in every Canadian home. That was demonstrated during the war. A great deal has been said, and rightly said, in the way of compliment to the men of the militia who went overseas; but I want to assert that a great deal of commendation is due to those men who went overseas who never were in the militia at all. The long military training did not make the Germans more efficient on the battlefield. Our boys with their short military training proved themselves to be more than the equal of the Germans, and I am absolutely within the mark when I say this.

Now it has been insinuated that we who are in favour of this reduction of the estimates are not loyal people, that we want to do away with the militia. So far as I am concerned—and I think I can speak also for most of those who sit around me in this group—I assert that we are just as loyal as any other members in the House. But I have this to say further: We have more than the trained military men to be loyal to. We have a body of men who went overseas, did their bit in the trenches, came back home and went back to the farm and into other occupations. They require to be considered to-day. We must not forget also the women who sat up at night and worked just as loyally and faithfully in the interest of winning the war as the men who went overseas. These classes, whose interest I am afraid we are forgetting at the present time, need to have their interests looked after just as much as the men who served in the militia.

It has been said that the arsenal at Lindsay has been closed. I am informed, and I think the statement is right, that no munitions were ever shipped from that institution although we have always voted money for it as long as I have been sitting here. I think therefore it is right to get rid of this building and not incur the expense of paying somebody to take care of it. I rose simply to endorse the action of the minister and to tell him that he has my hearty support in reducing this estimate. I also believe he will have the support of the loyal people of Ontario and as well, perhaps, the support of the people of Quebec.

Mr. PUTNAM: Did my hon. friend use a big stick on the minister?

Mr. HALBERT: There must have been a lot of big sticks left on that side when the Government moved over this way. I did not see any big sticks, and I did not use any—I am not that type of man.

Mr. MANION: I regret that in the discussion of this question—in which I have taken no part previously—there has been too much of a tendency, as there usually is when we differ from the government, to cry from the ministerial side "Tory, tory," and from the Progressive side—as my hon. friend from North Ontario (Mr. Halbert) has just illustrated—to shout "Militarism, militarism." Matters seem to have reached the stage in this House that if any hon. gentlemen sitting in this corner differ with either of the other parties they are denounced as a "Tory group" and in cases like the present as "a group of militarists."

Mr. LAPOINTE: And on this side from Quebec.

Mr. MANION: Well my hon. friend will not accuse me of ever saying anything against Quebec—

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I admit that.

Mr. MANION: —but as a matter of fact my hon. friend will admit that on this occasion it was the members from Quebec, sitting opposite, who opposed this vote.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; members from all the provinces spoke.

Mr. MANION: I admit that, but it was the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) who moved to cut down the vote and he was supported by the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), the member for Laprairie, and various others; and to mention that the hon. members from Quebec are opposing this vote is not necessarily to be regarded as saying anything derogatory towards the people of Quebec.

Mr. VIEN: Does my hon. friend object to calling the members sitting around him Tories?

Mr. MANION: Well, personally I object to being called a Tory—

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Why do you remain there then?

Mr. MANION: Because, Mr. Chairman, I am not in a Tory party.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: That is why I remain here. I do not wish to go off into history but there was a time, a hundred years ago, when there were Tories; there are very few members of this House who accuse themselves of being Tories to-day. And if there are a few who do so that is their privilege; I do not say that myself; I repeat, I am not a Tory. And I say further, as regards the hon. members sitting around me, I do not consider that very many, if any, of them are Tories.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Name them.

Mr. MANION: To get back to the question I was discussing, which was militarism and the item before the committee. Because some of us in this corner have taken the position that this vote should go through, we are accused of being militarists by my hon. friend who has just resumed his seat and of being Tories by my hon. friend from St. James and his colleagues. Well, we are in the same position as the Minister of Militia who brought in these estimates, and he as my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) has said, made a very fine speech in defence of his estimates the other night. I can say very frankly that it is the best speech by long odds that I have heard him make in this House.

But when my hon. friend from St. James makes the statement that he is voicing the views of the whole of Canada I think he is making rather a large statement; and when my hon. friend from North Ontario states that he is speaking for ninety per cent of the people of this country I think he is making a statement at least eighty per cent too large. He was elected to represent one constituency and probably has a perfect right to speak for himself and for the people of that constituency; but I doubt whether he has any right to speak for my constituents on a question such as this. Now I am not a militarist and I never have been one. In many ways I agree with the people who do not wish to spend too much money on militarism in this country, and personally I have always taken that attitude. However, in looking up the estimates which are before the committee I find in reply to a question by my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Church) that the expenditures in 1912-13 reached practically the same amount as the estimates which the Minister of Militia brought in for this year. Therefore if you consider that the value of a dollar to-day is worth perhaps sixty per cent of what it was in 1912, the estimates of the Minister of Militia to-day are really about forty per cent less in total than the estimates of the Militia Department in 1912.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): But is the financial condition of the country to-day the same as it was in 1912?

Mr. MANION: No, I will admit the financial position of the country to-day is not the same as it was in 1912-13. But I would like to ask my hon. friend if the peace conditions of the world to-day are the same as they were in 1912-13. I have recently read—and I am sure my hon. friend has read it also—the statement made by Mr. J. H. Thomas, the Labour leader in England whom we all know, in which he says that we are as much upon the verge of war to-day in Europe as we were in the early days of 1914.

Mr. RINFRET: Does he not say in that statement that if there were a war England should not participate?

Mr. MANION: Yes, he does, but a labour leader, John Burns, resigned from the cabinet in England in 1914, on the ground that England should not participate in the war, but she did participate; and I venture to say that the hon. gentleman from St. James (Mr. Rinfret), who is a very intelligent member of this House, will agree with me when I say that, in a war to-day, carried on in any part of this world, no one knows who will or will not participate until the war is over. The world is so close together, the transportation systems of the world are so well developed, the several nationalities of the world are so highly developed to-day and so closely associated, that no one can tell who is going to take part in any war, and certainly the position of the Mother Country, and of the ancestors of my hon. friend in France, the mother country of most of the members from Quebec—

Mr. RINFRET: Every one of them.

Mr. MANION: No, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) would hardly say that. It is true that France has taken a militaristic attitude, and I am not criticizing her for so doing, because she suffered severely in this war. In this country we do not know what is going to happen, if a war occurs. I sincerely hope, as everybody in this House hopes, that we will not have a war in the near future in which Canada will have to take part, but, while I deny absolutely the cry of militarism as applied to any of the members in this corner of the Chamber—and I deny it as regards myself because I am opposed to militarism—yet I do not believe in being so much of a peace-lover that I turn the other cheek to everybody who chooses to assail me. In the world to-day we do not know when we may require men who are trained in military affairs. It has been mentioned by hon. members on both sides of the House that many good soldiers who went overseas and made good records, including my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Shaw), were not in the militia. That is true, but I desire to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that the thing which saved Paris from German invasion in 1914, and the thing which saved the allied ports about that time, was the fact that there was in England a certain standing army, and because there was in France a very large standing army of trained men. If England and France had taken the attitude which is being taken to-day by a large number of members of this House, that we should have practically no military training at all in this country—because that is the attitude most of them take, judging by their applause to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie)—if they had taken that attitude back in 1912 and 1913, and thereabouts, there would have been nothing in the world to prevent Germany capturing Paris and conquering the world. I do not agree with the peace at any price attitude which our friend the former President of the United States assumed, which was a very noble idea, but he was not supported in his own country at the next election, and he was not able to live up to that ideal throughout the war, because the United States found ultimately they had to take part in the war to help save civilization against the Germans.

I rose to make a few remarks against the cry of Toryism and militarism by men who happen to differ with other hon. members in this House. I am not a militarist, and yet when the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) brought in his original estimates, we agreed with him, and I think he should have stood by them. I do not like to tell an old trained politician what he should do, but it seems to me, if I were a minister, and brought in my estimates and made a strong speech, as the hon. gentleman did, in favour of them, and then was turned down by my own party I should feel it my duty to resign.

Mr. FOURNIER: He did not have to resign.

Mr. MANION: No, he retired. There are trained men in the leadership of the militia of every country who come to the front when war calls them to the front to fight; and, while it is true that a large proportion of the men who went from Canada were untrained men, the men who led them, in the large proportion of cases, were in the militia of Canada previously. I say that, although I served in France, and was never in the militia of Canada. The men who led the Canadian army, from Sir Arthur Currie down, were men who had served in the militia of Canada and had taken part in these camps. And my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Ross), who made such an eloquent speech this afternoon, was one of them. I have no reason for quarreling with the Minister of Militia for retiring from his position, but I think he took the proper position the other day, and I should have had a strong admiration for him if he had stood by his guns, instead of making a noble retreat as one of my hon. friends on the other side termed it.

Mr. GOULD: I do not think it is necessary to take up much of the time of the House in arguing in favour of the amendment to the amendment, simply because it seems to me the consensus of opinion of the House at the present time is very nearly unanimous in favour of it. I desire to make one or two comments on the statements made by the two hon. gentlemen who spoke this afternoon, and particularly on the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Fort William (Mr. Manion). It seems to me that the hon. gentleman can scarcely define what the name of his party should be, or at least, he objects to the party being termed Tory. The thought occurs to me that we might term it the prehistoric party of Canada. That might apply to it all right. Of course, if that is not acceptable, they do not have to accept it.

Mr. RINFRET: The antediluvian party.

Mr. GOULD: I will refer to a few of the remarks made by the hon. ex-minister of militia (Mr. Guthrie). It seems to me, in watching the debates in this House, that when the question of the militia estimates comes up, the real solid support for the retention of the maximum vote that can be put through this House comes from the party down in the corner. The hon. ex-minister of militia last year, and the year before, made positive assertion that the minimum amount of expenditure had been reached in the estimates that he had submitted to this House. To-day again he stresses the point that, if these material reductions have been made by the present Minister of Militia and Defence, we have now reached the danger point and dare not go lower. I have tried to make myself give credit to the hon. ex-minister of militia, while he was Minister of Militia and Defence, in that he did and should know more of the circumstances attending the militia of Canada than I could possibly know, but when I see him, as an individual, waver, as is shown by the recital I have given the House, likewise my faith in him must waver. It seems to me we have to form our own conclusions, and, in doing so, to bear in mind that we are here to do the will and the bidding of the people who sent us here. It seems to me that the militarist, if there be such a thing in Canada today—and I do not wish to make a specific charge that there are such people, although evidence has been submitted as to their existence in Canada—the militarist, as such, has had his day. Surely in the last five or six years his appetite for militarism should be satiated, and at the present time the lovers of peace throughout the country should have a little to say. The peace-loving people of Canada have not had an opportunity of expressing their opinion; they have not had an opportunity of showing to Canada and to the rest of the world what peace can do in the world, and I honestly believe the time has arrived when they, at least, should be heard in the councils of the nation, and an attempt be made to give effect to the wishes of those people back home who find the sinews of war, the money with which to keep the machine going.

We will all admit the need of militia from time to time. For the benefit of the newspapers of Canada which have repeatedly attacked and denounced hon. members of the Progressive group who, conscientiously and with honest intent, have asked for reductions in these estimates, we should explain to this House and to the press of the country that, during the last three years not one sentiment has been expressed from this Progressive group that gives them cause to believe that we do not approve of militia. We have repeatedly stated throughout Canada that we do not believe in extravagant expenditures, and during the past three years that I have been in this House positive proof has, on many occasions, been given in this Chamber of instances in which moneys have not been dispensed equitably, justly or for the purpose of militia and defence. One of the great factors that remain in the minds of the people is that moneys that we are supposed to be voting for militia and defence are being used, not for militia and defence, but just to maintain an aristocracy in this country.

As the House seems to be in favour of the proposed reduction, it is unnecessary to place upon Hansard the figures which I have compiled; but I desire to refer to a statement made by the ex-Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) with regard to the course that the minister takes before he presents his estimates to the House. He said that the minister's advisers will come and tell him what amount of money is required; that his advisers are capable men. We admit that they are capable men; but again I ask this pertinent question: Have the advisers to the minister, not alone in the Department of Militia, but in every other department, had an eye single as well to the individual who finds the money, who has to pay these obligations, as to the ways of expending that money? Are they as scientific in the matter of finding the money as they are in the methods of expending it? That is a thought that should remain in the minds of all ministers of the Crown. The ex-minister stated that the minister will be advised by his officials; that then he will submit his estimates to the Governor General, and that he will come back to this House with the figures. When the ex-minister was making that statement, the thought occurred to me that, right at the moment when the minister presented his estimates to this House, somebody should rise and speak on behalf of the people because, in no instance in the remarks made by the ex-Minister of Militia, did he mention the cause of the people back home who provide the money. I am speaking for the people, and I am prepared to support the sentiment, as expressed by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Halbert), that ninety per cent of the people of Canada disapprove the huge expenditures that have taken place in Canada in the Department of Militia and Defence.

I have compiled a list of figures which shows that the officers in certain districts are in the proportion of one officer for every 2.3 men. I have talked with officers right in the city of Ottawa; I have met them in this very Chamber, and I have been told by honourable and gallant members of this House that they are supporting this reduction in the estimates; likewise, by gallant men in the city of Ottawa and throughout Canada that they approve our request for a reduction, as they say at once that the money is not being equitably expended; that it is being used to pay officers' salaries; that we are over-staffed and under-manned; that in these vast areas it will take three days to bring the men in and to give them their equipment so that they may undergo training, and it takes the same time to take them home again. Is that militia? No, it is not militia, and I can show where, in a certain district of Canada, the officers themselves received between $6,000 and $7,000 more in salaries and allowances than the total expenditure on men, equipment, travelling expenses and everything else. It is that to which the people of Canada object and not to the false interpretation that is placed on our attitude here that we object to militia.

When the sentiment is expressed that we object to militia, attached to that is the sentiment that we are unpatriotic. That is not the case; but we have been taught to know the value of 100 cents, and that is what we have come here to plead for. We want those who receive the money to understand the value of 100 cents to-day. That is what I am pleading for, and that is why I ask for equitable treatment and equitable expenditure, not to cultivate any spirit of antagonism to national defence or to create the impression that we want to defeat any defence party in Canada. When we have, in any district, officers in the ratio of one officer to 2.3 men whom the officers are supposed to train, we are not getting what we are supposed to have appropriated this money for. I ask some hon. members if the same thing was true in other districts and I was given to understand that the same condition obtained. I have another little complaint to make. I wish to state that the militaristic spirit seems to actuate the minds of some of those who get into authority. They have the conception that military law over-rides civil law, and it is the spirit of the Hun that prompts them to think and to speak in these terms and in this manner. It is only a matter of about two weeks ago that we had such an occurrence in Ontario. Liquor was supposed to be seized in a canteen and one of the excuses offered was that military law over-rides civil law. Let us come down to plain facts and be men, side by side, and I am sure the people of Canada will approve whatever we do in equity.

In conclusion, I wish to refer to some matters in connection with Military District No. 12, in which we have a certain condition that apparently does not obtain in any other military district in Canada.

Mr. GRAHAM: What is the headquarters?

Mr. GOULD: Regina. I notice, in the Auditor General's report, an item in connection with Military District No. 12, which, in my humble opinion, indicates that those who participate in these things seem to have very little regard for the people generally. I see an item here called "staff rides", and it is only in Military District No. 12 that this seems to be provided for. I notice that they have rented a hall at $5, and that they charge the Government up with $32 worth of theatre tickets. That is another conception of mind of the militarist, and I cannot understand why these people in that young military district should conceive the idea that they have a right to charge this country up with theatre tickets, while they are racing around the country. If one considers the amount of money that is set opposite each individual name, surely they can afford to purchase their theatre tickets. And the poor individual who has provided a hall receives a paltry $5 for his investment. As I think it is in the interests of a proper consideration of the estimates. I shall read these items in order to place them on Hansard. They are:

Staff Rides: Prince Albert, Sept. 10, auto hire, $90, hotel expenses, $4.50; Saskatoon, Sept. 22-23, auto hire, $29; hotel expenses, $85.10; theatre tickets, $32; Regina, Sept. 29-30, auto hire, $119.50; hotel expenses, $79.15; rent of hall $5; North Battleford, Oct. 13-14, auto hire, $34.60; hotel expenses $27.75; Estevan, Oct. 26, hotel expenses, $13.40; auto hire, $3.50.

And by the way, $17 or $18 is the only money that has been spent in Assiniboia, although we furnished the money and in all ways taxed them. That is all the return we have for the huge amount of money taken from us in the way of appropriation. To proceed:

Moosomin, Oct. 28, hotel expenses, $20, auto hire, $42; blue prints, etc., for rides, $24.69.

These are items which, I think, cannot be justified at all, and as I pointed out before, it appears that we have generals and staffs going around the country with presumption enough to charge these things against the country, when, from the sums of money placed opposite their names, we have at least the right to think they have been lavishly provided with funds of the people.

At six o'clock the House resumed and then took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

ESQUIMALT AND NANAIMO RAILWAY COMPANY

House again in committee on Bill No. 6, respecting the Esquimalt & Nanaimo Railway Company.—(Mr. Tolmie)—Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: An amendment has been moved by Mr. Neill, that clause 1 of the said bill be amended by striking out all the words after the word "railway" in line 17 thereof. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. NEILL: I may remind the committee that the explanation of this amendment is that it brings this bill under the operation of the Railway Act of Canada. That is the whole sum and substance of it. An hon. member said the other night it was hardly necessary to do this because the company was on a different footing from that of any other company. But that is not so; this company is to be treated by this legislature, I hope, as any other railway company would be treated, and I have a precedent for that. In 1914 this charter was renewed for, I think, the fourth time; this is the seventh time renewal has been sought. But in the act of 1914 this sentence occurs:

—and shall within the two years expend thereof an amount equal to fifteen per cent of the capital stock.

That is precisely the clause that will operate under the Railway Act if my amendment passes; so that we have actually a precedent, not only as regards other railways, but as regards this railway, for the insertion of such a clause. All I am asking is that now, eight years after that was put in, the clause be once more inserted.

Mr. DICKIE: I come from the country affected by this railway. I have my good neighbour from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) on the north and the member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) on the south, and naturally I wish to remain on good terms with both. However, as we look down towards the south, following the laws of gravity, I naturally incline towards the hon. member for Victoria City on this subject. I know the country very well indeed through which this railway goes. Now, my good friend from Comox-Alberni has a faculty for painting word pictures which appeal to people—pictures to suit his own imagination, to a great extent. In this instance he is painting what to me is a cubist picture which I cannot understand. He has told the House at length that even if this bill is passed the Canadian Pacific will not build this line—even if they have one year or two years within which to commence. I quite agree that such may be the case. My hon. friend has told us of immense water-powers.

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is out of order. We are not discussing the length of time, or the building or the not building; we are discussing an amendment which provides that the company shall spend fifteen per cent of the cost of construction within the time authorized.

Mr. DICKIE: If I am out of order, Mr. Chairman, I will bow to your decision. I have not taken up much time with respect to this matter. I am dealing with the principle of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is discussing the first clause of the bill. In my opinion he is in order.

Mr. DICKIE: As I say, I know this country, and to show you that my hon. friend is painting a cubist picture I would point out that he said the other night that this question had a bearing upon the immigration problem of Canada. The district through which this road will eventually go is a small valley and we have plenty of people in our country to occupy that valley should we desire to do so. The valley has been logged over and agricultural possibilities are not quite as we would wish them, but there will be settlement in that district. To-day it would not pay the Canadian Pacific to build a road in there; it would not pay any company to do it. If that were not the case I would quite understand the reasonableness of bringing some pressure to bear on the Canadian Pacific to build the line.

Now, although we on this side have little reason for having any great affection for the Canadian Pacific, I do think that when it can be shown that the building of this road will be a profitable undertaking the Canadian Pacific will extend a line into that country.

The member for Comox-Alberni has said that there are radium mines in there. We all know what radium is; there are about eight ounces of it in the world, so that it would not furnish much tonnage. I have made some investigations on an island known as Valley island looking for other minerals, and I know it is claimed by prospectors to contain rock which shows radio-activity, which means that there is some radium in it. The member for Comox-Alberni told us the other night that this was the only radium mine in America. I may say that Gilpin County, Colorado, has contributed very materially towards the radium product of the world to-day, the ore being in the form of pitchblende or carnotite which furnishes the radium. The radium field, if there is one there, would not be affected in any way by this railroad. There is a first class road on Vancouver island which is traversed by hundreds in automobiles, a method of travelling much more pleasant than by train. This highway goes to a point just south of the mouth of the Campbell river, and this railway would pretty well parallel it. At present there is no great demand for a railway there to take timber from that country; the road so nearly conforms to the contour of the coast line that the timber naturally goes down into the salt water. Duncan's bay, to which this road is going to run, is just at the end of this magnificent automobile road on Vancouver island.

There are some settlers, very good men, engaged on little farms, but we all know that it takes more than a few scattered settlers to justify the building of a railway. If any other railway company in Canada was prepared to build in that territory, or if the road could be hastened in any way, I would not be on my feet to-night, but such is not the case. There are immense water-powers there. It is estimated in official reports that 200,000 horse power could be developed. There is also in that country a large iron deposit, which I have visited. It is a very promising deposit, but it requires considerably more work to demonstrate whether it is commercially valuable or not. When they start to develop these water-powers and this large iron deposit, we may expect this road to be extended, but at present, as an hon. gentleman said earlier in the session, it seems to me that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is making "much ado about nothing."

Mr. TOLMIE: The amendment which is proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) will, as he has stated, have the effect of bringing this railway under the Railway Act, clause 161. Now the intention of that particular clause was to prevent charter-mongering by irresponsible railway companies. I think that neither the Canadian Pacific nor the Canadian National roads can be included in that category, and therefore these restrictions are not necessary under the circumstances.

In the act passed in 1919, I think, incorporating the Canadian National Railways, a provision was inserted extending the charter powers of a number of railways included in that system, which had been previously authorized both by the federal government and provincial legislatures. In this connection certain privileges were granted to these roads. The provision in the act was as follows:

> The times for the commencement and completion of the construction of the lines of railway specified in the second schedule to this act, which certain of the companies comprised in the Canadian Northern system were authorized to construct, are hereby extended for two years and five years after the passing of this act.

In the following year the Canadian Pacific Railway introduced a number of bills covering new branches and extensions of its lines, and the question was raised in the Railway Committee as to whether clause 161 of the Railway Act should be applied to these roads. It was pointed out to the committee, however, that the Canadian Pacific was entitled to the same treatment in this matter as the Canadian National Railways had received the year before. The committee agreed with this view and granted the request of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Strange to say, included amongst these bills was one relating to this very line of railway under discussion to-night. There was no difficulty over the acts passed in reference to the Canadian Pacific in the following year, 1921. The same privileges were extended. In this particular case I can see no reason why an exception should be made, particularly as this bill has been submitted to the Railway Committee and has been accepted by them.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni the other evening referred to the Canadian Pacific securing an extension of their charter, and thereby possibly preventing other railways from constructing in that territory. I think that can hardly be the case because from 1916 down to 1920 the Canadian Pacific allowed their charter for this particular road to lapse and not a single railway company applied to build that piece of railway. In fact, located as it is, it is simply an extension of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo railway, and with no other railway on that end of Vancouver island no other company would build in that territory because they would have no road to link up with.

When the extension was applied for before the Railway Committee in 1920, Mr. McLeod, who is connected with the Canadian National Railways, was in attendance in connection with some Canadian National business, and he was asked by the committee if he had any desire to build a line of railway on the route laid out by the Canadian Pacific to Duncan's bay, and he informed the committee that he had no desire to build any railway or extend the Canadian National railway system to that section of British Columbia.

It has also been stated that it would be a great hardship to settlers if this railway was not built. As I have pointed out on a previous occasion, this railway runs almost parallel to the east coast of Vancouver island, and is located at no great distance from that coast, which is well supplied with a good steamer service. Moreover, the roads in that section, and in fact all over Vancouver island, are a very high class, so the farmer will suffer very little interference by deferring the construction of this railway.

I have pointed out already that to have the time for commencement and completion cut down to one year and three years, instead of two years and five years respectively, would be out of harmony with the rule adopted for the Canadian National Railways. As you are aware, Mr. Chairman, it will require a good deal of time to make arrangements to get the road under way, and if only one year was granted within which to commence construction, practically the whole of that year would be taken up in getting ready, and the railway company would probably have to apply for an extension of their charter inside of twelve months.

Under the present uncertain financial conditions, new railways can only be built after a very careful survey of the situation has been made, and there is reason to expect good results from the money expended. It is the hope and desire of this company to extend this road just as soon as their financial experts think there is a possibility of getting a reasonable return. Surveys have been already made and plans prepared.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni referred the other evening to the building of logging roads in that section of British Columbia. That was hardly a fair comparison, because it is well known that these logging railways are not built in such a way that they would be accepted by the Railway Commission for either passenger or freight service.

In connection with the failure to renew bonding privileges, I may say that the committee's attention was called to the fact by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that this course was adopted for the reason that the railway company had no intention of building the road. In the 1920 act, this privilege was secured to the company, and therefore it is unnecessary to renew bonding privileges. It is quite true that the Canadian Pacific Bill No. 5, which is also before the committee at the present time, does make provision for bonding powers, but I am informed that the reason for that is that for one of these lines the charter has lapsed, and it became necessary on that ground to renew the bonding privilege. Railway construction costs at the present time are about fifty per cent higher than in 1913. Many of the materials entering into railway construction are about double in price or a little higher; rails are double what they were in 1913, ties are thirty to forty per cent higher. Taking materials generally, they cost much more than in 1913, and most likely very much higher than they will in a short time. I think that under these conditions, taking into consideration the fact that this is the largest railway corporation in the world and one that has done a great deal for the development of this country, it is only fair to grant to that company the same privilege that has been granted to other railways in Canada and trust in the bona fides of the company to build this road as soon as conditions justify them in doing so. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the bill should be allowed to pass the committee; I do not see that the objections raised to it are of a very serious nature.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) was entirely out of order throughout his remarks and therefore I need not waste much time in dealing with them. The amendment before the committee is one relating to bringing this railway under the Railway Act, so that the company will have to spend fifteen per cent of the cost of construction. Has that anything whatever to do with the remarks of the hon. member for Nanaimo which dealt with the merits of the question of building or not building the railway? He drew attention to some of the remarks that I had made in that connection on a previous occasion and endeavoured to dissipate the effect of them. But I notice that in spite of all his attempts to do so he admitted the following facts: First, that there was a radium mine in the vicinity of the proposed railway; secondly, that there was water-power capable of producing 200,000 horse-power and, third, that there was a large iron deposit in the neighbourhood. Did I mention the iron deposit? No, I did not. But the hon. member has reminded me of it. So that the facts are that there is a water-power capable of producing 200,000 horse-power which can be easily harnessed; there is an iron deposit of the magnitude that he has indicated; and radium is present in the vicinity.

I think these are good enough reasons to require the completion of the railway; but as I do not want to be out of order, and as we are not dealing with these questions at the present time, I shall not refer further to the hon. member's remarks but go on and deal with the observations of the member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie). The latter dealt with the subject of the amendment in the early part of his remarks but wandered off the subject like my hon. friend from Nanaimo later on. He said that the construction referred to in the Railway Act as regards the expenditure of fifteen per cent was not intended to apply to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. If that is the case why was it not so stated in the Railway Act, and then there would have been no trouble at all? If it was not intended to make the Railway Act apply to one railway in particular, it should have been so stated in the act and then there would have been no confusion.

My hon. friend had to fall back on time honoured precedent and say that it had been done before. Well, one precedent is as good as another. I have quoted to you one precedent of the year 1914 when that identical clause was put into the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill. My hon. friend cited a case later on when it was not put in. We therefore have a choice between a precedent in one way, and another precedent in the other direction. But in view of the conflicting precedents let us go back again to the Railway Act of Canada which says this provision shall be observed. As regards the logging road he talked about, while I am out of order in referring to it I think I should be allowed the same latitude that was allowed my hon. friend. I have travelled over the logging road in question. It is forty miles long, is well ballasted, and the curves are good. The company who built it did not receive a subsidy of $6,000 a mile to construct it, nor did they hold the project back for twenty-two years by means of extensions of the charter.

Amendment (Mr. Neill) negatived; Yeas 39, Nays 76.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: There is another amendment of which Mr. Neill has given notice.

Mr. NEILL: That amendment would have no force seeing that the previous one has been lost. I would therefore ask leave to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN: Dropped.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY

House in committee on Bill No. 5, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Knox.

On section 1—Extension of time for construction:

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I served notice of an amendment to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved in amendment by Mr. Carmichael to strike out in clause 1 all the words after the word "railway" in line 22, page 2, of the said bill.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: It looks almost futile to say anything in regard to this amendment, after the decision of the House on the amendment proposed to Bill No. 6, because this amendment is similar. It appears to me that this is a matter between a wealthy corporation and the supporters which it has, and the common people of Canada and the supporters which they have. I have no antagonism against the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it is not with any feeling of hostility that I move this amendment. I have every respect for that great corporation that, 37 years ago, commenced operations in Canada and to-day holds the position it does financially and as a service to the public. But, Mr. Chairman, when it comes to making a choice between a wealthy corporation and the common people of Canada, I am on the side of the common people of Canada.

I am particularly interested in subsections (c) and (d) of this clause, because the extensions proposed in those two subsections run through the constituency which I represent. Some time ago the Canadian Pacific Railway got a charter to build two extensions through this portion of the constituency. It may be in the minds of some hon. gentlemen that my constituency is in very bad shape, and has not any need of any railway extension, but I wish to remind the House that the constituency is a very large one. It extends about 150 miles east and west, and between 75 and 80 miles north and south. While the southern portion of the constituency is hard hit financially, the northern portion is in good shape. The farmers are doing fairly well, the district is well settled, and the settlers have been in there for some 15 years. The land is productive, and has been producing for a number of years large quantities of grain. This district which is supposed to be served by these railway extensions is about 50 miles east and west, by about 35 miles north and south. You will readily understand that some of these settlers are from 20 to 25 miles from a railway point, and any person who has been raised on a farm can understand what that means in the hauling of grain. The large quantities of grain produced in this district have to be hauled a great distance, which goes a long way in reducing the profits which should go to the farmers. I have not proposed any amendment in regard to the time for building these extensions. This bill provides two years for commencing and five years for completing the work. I do not propose to make any change in the time. The amendment provides for the deletion of the words in the latter part of clause 1, which reads:

> And if within the said periods respectively the said lines are not commenced, or are not completed, and put into operation, the powers of construction conferred upon the company by parliament shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the said line as shall then remain uncompleted.

On a cursory examination it would appear that it did not make much difference whether these words were in the bill or out of it, but, while I am not a lawyer, and never expect to be one, yet in my opinion the fact of these words being in the bill makes a great difference in the operation of it, because when these words are in the bill, construction on these branch lines comes under the provision of this bill and is outside the provisions of the Railway Act of Canada, but when these words are eliminated from the bill, the construction of these branch lines comes under the provisions of the Railway Act of Canada. In section 3 of the Railway Act I find subsection (b), which reads:

> Where the provisions of this act and of any special act passed by the parliament of Canada relate to the same subject matter the provisions of the special act shall, in so far as is necessary to give effect to such special act, be taken to over-ride the provisions of this act.

That is exactly the provision which the Canadian Pacific Railway gets the advantage of if these words are included in this special act. The object of the amendment is to delete these words and bring the construction under the Railway Act of Canada.

Section 161 of the Railway Act reads:

> If the construction of the railway is not commenced and fifteen per centum of the amount of the capital stock is not expended thereon in survey, purchase of right of way, and actual construction work, or, in the case of a branch or extension of the railway, if fifteen per centum of the bond issue authorized therefor is not expended thereon in actual construction work, within two years after the passing of the act authorizing the construction of such railway, branch, or extension, as the case may be, or, where the Parliament of Canada grants an extension of the time for commencing such construction, within the time so granted; or, if the railway or branch, or extension, as the case may be, is not completed and put in operation within five years from the passing of such act, or, where the Parliament of Canada grants an extension of time for completion, within the time so granted; then the powers granted by such act or by this act shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the railway or branch or extension, as the case may be, as then remains uncompleted.

You will notice section 161 makes special provision for the expenditure of 15 per cent of the bond issue within the first two years, in order to enable the railway company to say they have commenced construction. That means something in Bill No. 5, because it is intended to build those two lines. The hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie), in speaking to Bill No. 6, stated that it was not necessary to have restriction for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, because they did not intend to build the line anyway, and he further stated that there was no provision for bonds in Bill No. 6. In Bill No. 5 provision is made for the issue of bonds or debentures to the extent of $40,000 per mile. If the construction of these branch lines is brought under the Railway Act of Canada, the railway company is compelled to expend 15 per cent of their $40,000 per mile within the first two years, in order to show that they intend to build these lines. That is just a mere matter of $6,000 per mile to be expended within the first two years, to show their good faith. Otherwise, if this provision of the Railway Act is not adhered to, the railway company might send a man out with a spade and throw up a little mound of earth within the first two years, and they would be clear, under the provisions of their own bill. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I submit that this amendment is a very vital one and deeply concerns the people whom I represent.

With regard to a company which is able to make such immense earnings, as the Canadian Pacific Railway has done in spite of hard times, financial distress amongst the farmers and business depression amongst our companies, a company that is able to pile up the large profits that the Canadian Pacific has done, that has been able in the past year to declare a 10 per cent dividend, and the bulk of whose stock is held outside Canada, so that the large proportion of its earnings is going outside of Canada, it seems to me it is not unreasonable to ask that such a corporation shall expend at least some of that money amongst the people who have helped to contribute towards those dividends which the Canadian Pacific has declared. Therefore, I have pleasure in moving this amendment.

Mr. EVANS: I have pleasure in seconding the amendment; and while I am particularly interested in sub-clause (b), I should like to bring to the attention of the committee the wishes of the people of my part of the country for a railroad. This railroad was first proposed some years ago, and it should have been built, perhaps, before the war. The first survey through this part of the country was run by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, and the bonds were at that time guaranteed by the Saskatchewan government. Through stress of the times, however, the charter was allowed to lapse until about two years ago when the Canadian Pacific obtained a charter for this road. No work has ever been done on it; and although people went into that part of the country from twelve to thirteen years ago with the expectation that the railroad would be built immediately, they are in dire need now for transportation facilities in order to market their produce.

This is not at all a line to be built with the prospect of the country being settled in the near or distant future; the country is settled all the way through from one end to the other. I know for a fact that, as regards some of the townships in that district, three-quarters of them are under cultivation, and the farms are as well established as in any other part of the country. The settlers who went in there first were mostly Ontario men and women, and besides raising grain, they have now herds of cattle. The position of the settlers in this district, although they are not as far from a railway as some people throughout the West are to-day, is a very difficult one. To the south of them it is impossible to reach the present Canadian Pacific line, the Pheasant hills branch, owing to the crossing of the Eagle hills. They are compelled to go north to the main line of the Canadian National Railways in order to market their crops. To do this they have to cross the river, and this is where the great problem comes in. When I was crossing there myself two years ago with a light rig, we first of all got on to one of the ferries which took us out into the middle of the bed of the river, and there we landed on a sand bank. After shifting up and down on that sand bank and getting into line with the cables, we got upon another ferry which landed us further out on another sand bank, from which we had to make the best of our way to the shore. That day I met men with teams drawing about thirty bushels of wheat, and I wondered why they did not load their wagons. But the fact of the matter was that, if they could keep going over the bed of the river on these sand banks, they might get through; but if they once got down there was nothing for them to do but to unload. In the winter time it is impossible to go south owing to the Eagle hills which extend over a great deal of that country. Then to go north, several of them have to go together and put all the teams possible on to one load in order to get up out of the river bed. The shifting sand bars in the river, in the summer time or in the early fall, make ferry service very difficult, and sometimes these people have been even a whole month at a time without getting their mail from the post offices.

The marketing of their produce is the great handicap. When I went through there during the campaign of last fall, I found that most of these people were living in log houses; they were all postponing the building of better houses until the railway was in sight. They informed me that if the railway were at all in sight during the next year or so, they would settle down and make permanent homes; otherwise they would go back to where they came from and abandon the country. This is a well-settled district which is calculated to pay dividends on any railway that may be built at any time, and the Canadian Pacific is quite able at the present time to build this line. The Canadian Pacific has had for some years now a short spur out from Asquith to what is known as the gravel pit. If another twenty-five miles were constructed from the end of that line, such a railway would serve that country, and perhaps, it would relieve those settlers of many of the difficulties they are now under. The country is settled all the way through from Saskatoon to Cloan, and I think this Parliament should give these settlers, isolated as they are, the greatest consideration.

Mr. SPENCER: I wish to speak for a few minutes in support of the amendment. This suggested railway runs through a part of my constituency, and the people living along the route that the rails will follow have sent quantities of letters to me asking me to work against any further postponement of the building of this railway. Hundreds of these people are hauling their grain from twenty to twenty-five miles, and no one who has not hauled produce for twenty to twenty-five miles over a rough trail can have any appreciation of what sort of a task that is. It means not only a great waste of time in the summer when farmers should be spending all the time they have on field work, but a great hardship, particularly so in the winter time when most of their grain is hauled. These people have been in that part of the country for a good many years; they went there on the promise of the railway being built, and if that promise had not been made, the country would not have been settled. It is because promises have been made that railways would be built in so many parts of western Canada that we have to-day settlers living such distances from present-day railways, and this is unfair to these people.

We have heard a great deal about the necessity for bringing a large number of immigrants into the country, but I for one think it would pay us more to emphasize the need of providing the means by which to keep the present settlers that we already have. Because of promises that have been made in the past and not fulfilled, because of assurances in years gone by that railways would be built in this place and the other, while no attempt was made to carry out these undertakings, we are now losing our population. It does not matter how many settlers we bring into the country, or where they come from, when they live fifteen, twenty, twenty-five and thirty miles from a railway, they will not remain on the land. If settlers come into the country with the idea of building homes and being successful within a short number of years, we cannot hope at all to keep them if we do not carry out the promises we make. It is well known that in Alberta, where they do not get a crop every year, it requires on an average one crop in every three to pay for landing the produce at the seaboard. So that if you do not provide transportation facilities to farmers who are now living between twenty and thirty miles from a railway, you are only adding to the expense of growing grain; and besides that you are increasing the discontent of those who are already dissatisfied. No matter how much advertising you may do through Government agencies, so long as we have dissatisfied people at home who cannot make a success of their business because of the lack of transportation facilities, we cannot hope to secure new settlers, because those who are already on the land here will do their level best to keep their friends, their relations and their acquaintances in different parts of the world from coming and settling in this country.

A questionnaire is in circulation in the neighbourhood through which this railway is supposed to be built, and in it questions are asked as to how many years ago a railway was promised, what was the amount of produce and stock raised in that part of the country, the number of miles people have to travel to get to the railway, and the cost per bushel for hauling produce that distance. And one rather interesting question is as to the number of people who have left in the last ten years because the railway had not been built through this part of the country. I would call that last question particularly to the attention of hon. members, because it is one that should be seriously considered. If we are going to give the railway company the right to postpone indefinitely the building of this railway, then we are simply deferring the time when we shall be able to induce present settlers to stay on their farms. If we do not guarantee them transportation, and that within a reasonable time, we can expect to see settlers in the next ten years leaving in greater numbers than they have left in the past decade.

Mr. McCONICA: The amendment pending affects the extension of the charters of two roads in the constituency I have the honour to represent—charters that have been in existence for some time. A considerable portion of one of these roads has been constructed, and beyond the construction in both cases there are people who have long been in need of a railway for which they are still anxiously waiting. I have much sympathy with some things that have been said about the railway situation in Canada; but I am of those who are convinced that the railways in this country are worth to-day far more than they cost. These railways have served the country in time of great need and have vindicated themselves, and they are well worth a place in the history of the country. They did much during the Great War to carry to the front those things without which we could not have accomplished what we did; and I for one do not think that Canada has come to the time when we should quit and declare that we are bankrupt and shall go no further. I do not think it is time yet for us to say that we are "broke", and that we are going to lie down and wait for the sheriff.

This is going to be a great country, and the sooner we realize that and begin to get busy and start the wheels of industry the sooner we shall accomplish something. We need branch lines in order that we may feed and bring tonnage to the trunk lines that we have constructed. When we get those branch lines we shall increase business and population as well, and take care of those immigrants whom we say we ought to secure. Now here is a proposition to extend certain charters. Under the terms of the proposal that is presented to us we say we will extend them for five years if these people throw a shovelful or two of dirt on each road within two years. I think that the amendment proposed is a reasonable one. It requires that within two years substantial progress shall be made and within five years these lines shall be completed. I hope hon. gentlemen will see the reasonableness of that proposition. The railways should mean something when they ask for an extension for five years; otherwise—

MILITIA AND DEFENCE

Militia and Defence—annual drill, $1,400,000.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose this item was under consideration, with an amendment by Mr. Power and an amendment to the amendment by Mr. Lapointe.

Mr. GOULD: When the committee rose at six o'clock I was pointing out that we of the Progressive party were not opposed to a militia in Canada, though that erroneous impression had been sent broadcast throughout the country. We feel, however, that we are justified in the attitude we have taken, not only this year but in past years; and that the persistent fight which is being carried on in support of that attitude will ultimately result in some recognition of it. We believe we are fighting the battle of the plain people. Perhaps we may all take that credit to ourselves, each from a different point of view, but it seems to me that some hon. members who have been in this House have not always had a single eye for the interests of the plain people.

[Mr. McConica.]

I was also endeavouring to show that the spending of money is not a necessary condition of loyalty; that a large vote for militia and defence does not in itself constitute loyalty to our country,—does not mean that those who propose it are any more loyal than those who seek to have it reduced. If we have established that—and I believe we have; if not in the minds of all members of the House, at any rate in the minds of the people who read the press—then I think we have performed a great mission here. We believe in the equitable spending of money, but evidence enough has been produced on the floor of the House to prove that a portion of the moneys voted in the past—and this may apply to some of the moneys now asked to be voted—have not been spent as they should have been. That is the sore spot in the minds of the people of Canada. It is not that they object to a militia or that they object to defence; it is that under the guise of defence we have been paying for some things we have not been receiving.

A few nights ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) pointed out that 56,000,000 pounds of butter had been sent to Belgium, a large exporting country of butter and dairy products. It was stated that Belgium was to have twenty years within which to pay for this 56,000,000 pounds of butter which it became necessary for her to import as the result of the ravages of war. Can you wonder, therefore, that agriculture throughout Canada and other countries protests so strongly against all the things which lead to war? In that respect we are not alone; other parliaments and other governments are taking the same attitude. I have before me a clipping with reference to the Diet of Japan which I will read for the benefit of the committee. It says:

> As Prince Yamagata lay dying, the elected house of the Imperial Diet was the scene of an agitation for the reduction by 50 per cent of the army which gave Yamagata his career and which his powerful leadership made the most masterful element in the Japanese state. The contrast is symbolical, for though the Diet agitation will fail, it is the sign of a movement which has time on its side. The old age is dying and the new is knocking at the door.

I think there is a lesson in that last sentence for hon. members of this House: "The old age is dying, and the new is knocking at the door." It is demanding admission and an opportunity of demonstrating whether the theories advocated with sincerity now as in years past are not better than those followed by administrators more or less up to the present time. I have on former occasions in this House directed the attention of hon. members to these circumstances: Should a war again occur—and that is problematical, of course; we all admit that—your trained militia would not be effective. The next war will be fought in the air. The next war will be fought in such a way that the civilian will be in the heart of the warfare. It is my prediction, and it is the prediction of men and women who are paying attention to this question, that the civilian thousands of miles from the scene of action will be the recipient of blows and subjected to the dangers incidental to warfare. Science will make such progress that even crops far from the theatre of war will be destroyed and civilians will suffer as many hardships as the men who fight at the front. In view of these facts, therefore, it is all folly for us at the present time to proceed on the basis of a poor, narrow conception that the militia is the defence to which we shall resort in the case of war occurring again. It is a conception of the past; he is a reactionary who thinks that this will be our chief method of defending ourselves in future warfare.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I wish to pay a compliment to the Minister of Militia. I have more than ordinary respect for his attitude. I appreciate the high altitude to which he rose when the estimates were last before the House. As to the strong plea he made on that occasion with respect to the estimates brought down, no one would on that account accuse the minister of being militaristic in his views. Our endorsing his proposals would not have been an intimation on our part that we considered him militaristic while we were not. But the minister will appreciate that in the course which we have taken in all sincerity we are trying to carry out the wishes of the people who sent us here; and as I have said many times before, that is something which many hon. members forget to do when they reach this Chamber.

Mr. POWER: Since this discussion began some two weeks ago I submit we have wandered far from the original subject. This afternoon we heard from all sides of the House accusations that one party was militaristic and that another was Tory; we have heard it stated that still another was the party of the plain people. Some hon. members expressed themselves as willing to cut out the arsenals; others wished to abolish the staff; some wished to cut the militia estimates as a whole, and throughout the whole discussion we wandered from the subject generally. But the question before the committee is simply this: the estimate brought down originally by the Government was for $1,400,000 for annual drill. A certain number on this side favoured the elimination altogether of the annual training and with the idea of bringing this about it was moved that the item be reduced by $1,100,000. Now, I understand —I was not in the House at the time— that it has been moved by a member of the Government that the item be reduced by $400,000 only. The minister has declared, in effect, that if we reduce his estimate by $400,000 we are doing away with annual camps. Because $1,400,000 is too much, he asks that we cut out $400,000 from the annual training and cut out certain other items. The argument, then, is that annual drill is not as good as it was two weeks ago, but it will be quite good if we cut off a million from something else. The point before the House is whether or not annual training is what we wish to have in this country at the present time. To reduce this vote by $400,000 simply means this, that we lose a great part of the efficiency of these camps, if they even were efficient, and we do not help in any way the militia of Canada.

Since this question was brought before the House those of us who do not agree with the minister have had attributed to us various motives. Some of our friends, and some of those who are not our friends, have suggested that certain members on this side of the House were actuated by ambition, others that we were prompted by jealousy, and still others that we were moving for reductions purely for the sake of petulant criticism. May I say that so far as I am concerned, and I think so far as the few on this side of the House who will vote with me are concerned, we have no other motive except that of attempting to be consistent with ourselves on matters of public policy. Last year the Liberal opposition moved that the annual training vote be reduced by $750,000. May I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that this year when we have a Liberal party in power, a party elected in a large measure on an anti-militarist platform, and pledged to retrenchment and reform, they move to reduce the vote by only $400,000. I think we ought at least to be consistent with ourselves and move for a reduction of this vote by $750,000. My idea two weeks ago was that annual training was the easiest thing for us to do away with at this stage of our country's finances. I have not changed since then. I believe still that we can easily do away with annual training, that it is not necessary, and that it is costly.

I have listened to hon. members giving us in a more or less amiable tone of voice their reasons in favour of annual training, or rather, in favour of this estimate. We have been told that if we were to take a military holiday and do away with annual training camps this year, it would be disastrous to the country generally, and that it would be no longer possible to have any such camps for the rest of the Dominion's existence. I submit that a great many of us believe that perhaps these camps never were any good, and never will be any good. More of us are of the opinion that if for this year the troops do not go to these country camps, no great harm could come to the country. Others have stated that if we do not have these annual training camps we shall cease to develop a military spirit in this country. I do not know whether this military spirit will cease to exist, but should that be so, I for one would be delighted and think that this country had made a long step towards progress and prosperity.

It has been stated by hon. members who are opposed to this estimate that it was unnecessary because we had in Canada at the present moment 400,000 of the best trained troops in any country in the world, that these troops would be prepared at any time to join the colours and to go through the same four years of hell, as was adequately said by one hon. gentleman opposite, that they have already been through. To that argument let me answer this: I am firmly convinced that if war should break out, these same men will be willing at any moment to rejoin the colours. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that we should not ask them to rejoin the colours, but whether we like it or not, the first to join the colours in the event of war would be those who have already served. You would find it easier for them to join the colours if the governments both past and present had treated them as they should have been treated in the past, and treat them as they should be treated now. If you treat the returned soldiers decently and properly, you will find them the most reputable and hard-working citizens of this country. They, I think, feel that before you start preparing for another war you should repair the wounds of the last war. I am speaking only for myself when I make this statement.

I have within the last few days consulted some men whom I respect highly, two of them Tories and one a Liberal. All three served with great distinction during the war, and all three became generals. I would be only too glad to give their names in confidence to any member of the House, but for reasons which all will respect I think it is perhaps better to withhold their names at the present moment. These three, all of whom had served in the militia and had served with distinction overseas, stated that a reduction in the vote for annual training at this time would be just what was needed in this country, that it would save the country considerable money where it could be saved most easily, and would in no way impair the efficiency of the Canadian forces.

I had intended—perhaps I may as well say it—to criticise the attitude of some hon. gentlemen who stated that at Valcartier, ninety per cent of the troops were old militia men. That may be true, but I would like to know where they got their figures, and would like to be allowed to criticise them. I do know this, that in 1918 when the troops were coming back from the front, we repeatedly asked questions from the Minister of Militia, now the hon. member for East Hamilton, as to what was the war service of every member of the militia headquarters' staffs in Canada. In so far as one staff was concerned, seventy-five per cent of the pay was being given to troops who had served in the militia with high rank, but had never served overseas, whilst at the very same time a large number of returned soldiers were walking the streets looking for a job.

Before concluding, may I say this? It is with very deep regret that owing to force of circumstances I shall to-night be in the unfortunate position of voting with the Tory party—if the hon. gentleman who spoke about the Tory party this afternoon will pardon my calling him a Tory. I have been a Liberal all my life, a Liberal by birth, education, and conviction, and I still intend to remain a Liberal. Owing to circumstances here to-night, owing to the fact that a certain number of hon. gentlemen opposite oppose the Government for reasons widely different from ours, I shall probably be in the most embarrassing position of having to vote with them. Nevertheless, I intend to remain true to the principles I have advocated, and I intend not to withdraw my motion. It is with great regret that I do so. I have every respect for the Minister of Militia and for the leaders of the Liberal party, but respect must end when we come to conviction.

Mr. CHURCH: I am sorry I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power), who is a good soldier and a good citizen. Since these estimates were last before the House I have had the opportunity of consulting many leading military men in Ontario. I saw a number of the most eminent Canadian generals during the last week, and some of the ablest non-commissioned officers and men of the permanent force and militia of Ontario and they did not agree with the views expressed by my hon. friend from Quebec. I conferred with these officers and men during the last week end in the city of Toronto which sent 60,000 men to the war. Other parts of Canada, of course, did equally well in that regard; I am not speaking about what Toronto did because all parts of Canada did well in the furnishing of troops. But I assert here to-night that we always had a militia in Canada from the days of General Wolfe. As the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) said to-day, we have had to engage in war almost every eighteen years since Wolfe conquered Quebec. At frequent intervals during that period we have participated in wars of one kind or another, and our militia have constantly been called upon to defend our land in many quarters of Canada.

I say God forbid that the time should ever come in Canada when we shall not have a militia, because not only in the late war, but also in the days of General Brock, if we had not had a militia the British flag would not be flying over this country to-day. In the war of 1812 General Brock had to face the same criticism by the legislature sitting in the town of Newark, now Niagara. The legislature in 1810-11 would not give him the money needed to maintain the necessary defence force. There were many farmers and others, many prominent men, who said "We will not give you the money, we cannot afford it; there is no emergency." That was the attitude adopted by a great many men in the legislature in 1810 and 1811, and General Brock was greatly disturbed in consequence. He almost asked to be recalled; but he decided to stay and the war was won, and Canada was saved by the successful battle waged in the Niagara district as a result of having a brave militia force. Under General Brock were the York volunteers from the constituency of the Prime Minister, and other noble regiments. These men saved the province of Ontario from invasion at Niagara and at other points.

The same thing occurred in the Rebellion of 1837, in the Fenian Raid of 1867, in the Northwest rebellion of 1885, also in the South African war, and in the recent great struggle. Does anyone contend for a moment that if the militia of Canada had not had training this Dominion would have been able in the great war to make the showing it did?

My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) spoke the other day about a "belted aristocracy." I was sorry to hear such a term applied to our officers. I do not believe that our military officers can be so characterized. I also heard the same hon. member express his belief that the men who composed the Canadian contingents despatched overseas did not have military training. Well, I asked for a return showing the composition of the first Canadian contingent the other day and this return when brought down by the Minister of Militia disclosed that of the 30,000 troops who composed that force, ninety-two per cent had military training. Take the 6,000 men of the first Canadian contingent who went from the city of Toronto; I refer to the third battalion, the 15th battalion, the engineers, the medical corps, and the rest of the units. Ninety-nine per cent of these men had received military training in the militia. I think the same thing is true of the men in the rest of the contingents. I contend that if it had not been for their military training the men from Canada would not have been able to make the showing they did overseas.

My hon. friends opposite were wont to boast in olden days—I refer to the period from 1896 to 1911—that their party had made Canada a nation. I am not going to express any opinion on that point further than to say that Canada had in striking manner demonstrated its virility and its military prowess long before that. If we are a nation why not have a militia and a proper one and not go back 150 years to become a Crown colony and depend on the army of the Mother Country to defend Canada?

The other day the Minister of Militia quoted General MacBrien, and other experts, to show that further reductions should not be made in the militia estimates. General MacBrien said in effect: Reduce these estimates for military camps, reduce the grants to cadet corps, and you apply the axe to the militia tree in Canada and impair the high efficiency of our militia. I concur in his views as to the probable effect of such action upon the militia and upon the cadet corps. I regard the cadet corps as the back-bone of the militia to-day. The units which came from the county of York belonged originally to cadet corps. The cadet movement in the separate and public schools and the high schools of that county serves to keep up the strength and efficiency of the militia. When General MacBrien declared that a further reduction in the militia estimates would greatly impair the efficiency of the militia I believe he spoke in a very sensible manner. The people of Canada have been sponging on the Mother Country long enough for maritime defence purposes. Had it not been for the British fleet the old city of Quebec would have witnessed the horrors of war, and even the cities of Montreal, Toronto, and Hamilton would not have been spared from the German peril and visitation. We have been sponging long enough on the hard-pressed taxpayer of the Motherland. To-day bread and tea, and other necessaries of life, are taxed in England to provide a fleet to protect our shores. We have been sponging long enough in a maritime sense without doing further sponging for a military force on land as well to protect Canada's soil. If we go on in this way, instead of Canada becoming a nation we will be back to where we were in the American war of the Revolution when we had to depend upon Imperial forces to fight our battles. Does Canada want to go back to the old Crown colony days?

Compare the militia estimates with what they were in 1896 and you will see very little increase in them. When the Liberals left office in 1911 pretty nearly $8,000,000 was spent for this purpose. In those days there were debates in the House on militia expenditure and Sir Frederick Borden took very strong ground in favour of its maintenance. The proposition was made to increase the pay of the militia who went to camp from 50 cents to $1 per day. That increase was granted after the war, and it accounts very largely for the growth of the expenditure. If you will look over the various items in the militia estimates to-day you will see they have been cut down to such an extent that very little further reduction is possible.

This afternoon the hon. member from Kingston (Mr. Ross) explained what had taken place in Australia in regard to this matter. The debate to-day is very largely a repetition of what happened there in the Commonwealth parliament. There the opposition to the militia estimates was raised by what is called the "Country Party". They were very vigorously resisted by the Prime Minister Rt. Hon. W. M. Hughes, and let me say that I am very sorry our Minister of Militia did not adhere to his original attitude. I believe had he persisted he would have received sufficient support in this House on his militia estimates from this side—many Liberals and Progressives as to have carried the day.

When I read the debate which took place in the Australian parliament it seems almost a repetition of what happened here the other day and this afternoon. Mr. Hughes, the Australian premier, took very strong ground against reduction: He said the government of the day was responsible for the militia. He declared that the government was responsible for the defense of the country and if there was any reduction he declined to be responsible —the "Country Party" would have to be responsible for it. Mr. Hughes declared that although the war was over an emergency still existed; that while he was, and always had been, in favour of peace and would like to see the Empire have peace for the balance of its days, still there was yet an emergency. There were battles and wars in the days of our Lord and there would be battles as long as time lasted. That was the gist of his argument. The Country Party put up a strong fight but the Prime Minister of Australia stood by his guns, and the Commonwealth parliament backed the Hughes government up—they having like Canada done some pruning—they were prepared to wait until such time as it should be made manifest where Australia was by reason of the conference at Washington, the conference at Genoa, and other gatherings seeking to inaugurate a permanent peace. I admit that economy is a very good thing in its way. The working man has to live with rigid economy and we in this Parliament should practise economy in the conduct of the country's business. Parliament is the nation's housekeeper; we should observe economy and the oftener the better. At the same time I have been very much surprised at the Liberals and Progressive parties allowing large appropriations to pass in other departments without protest in the last few days, whereas they now call very strongly for a reduction of several hundred thousand of dollars in the militia estimates.

How is it this is the only department singled out, to be made the goat, to use a phrase of the street? How is it that this is the only department the public services singled out for attack? Why is it they attack the cadet camps? Is this the only department where no economy has been exercised? This department has been cut down in many ways. There are no capital charges in this department. Maintenance charges have been reduced all along the line, as the hon. gentleman from Kingston (Mr. Ross) has said. Australia, a country of five and a half million, is spending $25,000,000 in 1921-22 for naval and land defence, and Canada, with nearly double the population, is asked to spend not quite $11,000,000, and if the $700,000 is cut off it will be still less.

The minister has effected great economy. At the present time transportation is dearer, food and camp expenses are away up, and the pay of the men is increased from 50 cents to one dollar. They have cadet camps now, whereas in 1910-11 they had no such camps. The cadet movement was the backbone of the militia in the war, and is still the backbone of the militia to-day. There was a cry in Ontario to close the bar and save the boy, but when they closed the bar they forgot all about the boy. Parliament voted a million and a half the other night for live stock—cattle, cows, pigs, etc.—which is a necessary industry, which everybody will support. Then the Minister of Health (Mr. Béland) brought down his estimates. I looked over them, and I understand there was a recommendation that something should be expended to save the boy. I may say that the scout movement is purely a cadet movement. I visited the cadet camp some time ago. We have nearly 100,000 children in public schools in Toronto and 15,000 in separate schools. Premier Hughes, of Australia, and former President Roosevelt, have said that they do not know any agency in the country which stimulates patriotism, develops youth, or makes for better citizenship than the cadet movement.

The hon. member for Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Mewburn) made a similar statement the other day. We should do something to build up the rising generation. The cadet movement cannot get along with the $100,000 reduction. I saw a number of these cadet units at the Niagara Camp. They were doing splendid work. Many of them came from the poorer districts of the city and were brought to camp. I call it an act of religion on the part of the Minister of Militia to support such work as the cadet movement, which was started by General Mewburn a few years ago. I look on the cadet and scout movement work as an act of religion for the good it does the youth of the land in many ways. A great many of these cadet units came from the rural schools of Ontario, and they did splendid work, not only in the Niagara camp, but at London and Kingston.

I am very much surprised to hear the criticism to-night. It is all very well to talk about economy, but the Militia Department experts say it is not economy at all. You may whittle the estimates down by $700,000 to-night, but in three or four years from now you may pay in millions for what you are striking out to-night. You will disorganize the whole militia of Canada. I have here a return, brought in by the minister, of the units that went from the province of Ontario in 1921 to the militia training camps, and 90 per cent of them are rural units. I heard the hon. gentleman from North Ontario (Mr. Halbert) speaking to-day. I venture to say that if he had taken the platform in the capital town of his riding, Beaverton, in the last election, and made the same speech which he has made in this Chamber to-day, he would not be in Parliament now. That constituency sent a great many men to the war, and sent one of the best units to the Niagara camp last summer. I saw the old 34th battalion in camp, and it is one of the pioneer corps of Ontario. The hon. member said he represented 90 per cent of the people of Ontario in his opposition to this vote. He does not represent 90 per cent of his own riding or of the county of Ontario, let alone the province.

Since the late war, Toronto, McGill and other universities in Canada, have been taking up the question of physical drill. An ordinance has been passed by the large universities in the United States, as a result of the war, to enforce compulsory military training in all those universities. That is the law of the large universities in the States to-day. It has spread to this country, and the University of Toronto has passed a law by which every student who goes to that university must take some form of physical exercise and drill and before long it will be the law of all the large universities.

The Government is responsible for the defence of Canada. If this reduction is made, on the shoulders of the Prime Minister and the Government will lie the responsibility to see that nothing shall be done to injure the defence forces of Canada. I say it is a responsibility and the responsibility is theirs as long as they are there.

It is all very well to talk about the League of Nations. In the United States President Harding was opposed to the League of Nations. He did not believe in it, and he and the Republican party fought against it, but when he came into office public opinion forced him to call a meeting, and the meeting was called. The Washington Conference did their work, but I have my doubts as to the results of their work, in view of the conference which is being held in Europe at Genoa at the present time. There will be wars as long as the world lasts.

I heard some criticism in this House, and I read some criticism in Hansard to-day of the militia. Away back in 1910 there was some carping criticism about the summer camps and drill and many other items on the programme of the Militia Department. I looked over the 1913 Hansard, and I found some members in the House said there was no emergency, that there was not going to be a war, and they raised similar objections to those which my hon. friends opposite have raised to-night.

This motion strikes at the very back bone and root of the militia. If this amendment carries, it is going to be "good-day" to the militia of Canada, and the Militia Department might as well put up the shutters. I have consulted men who have been in charge of Niagara and other camps, and I say advisedly that when you cut down the items in this way you cannot have efficiency, and the balance of the money might as well be thrown into the Ottawa river. You cannot obtain efficiency with the amount of money which will be left, and you are going to tie the hands of the department forever.

I was talking to a recruiting officer of the old 12th York battalion and he told me he found a great deal of difficulty in getting men and in training his battalion, and why? The Government would not give them a permanent home. They have no drill hall in Toronto for this unit. The city of Toronto had to come along and give them assistance and an armoury free. He said he was not allowed enough money to provide for recruiting, stores and equipment. It was necessary to employ stenographers and send out letters, and he had to pay for it out of his own pocket. Every unit has to pass around the hat to-day. I was asked about it, and we had to try and get the city to help them out. Then in the case of the 36th battalion in Peel county, the city had to come along and give them armoury accommodation and a grant also. They are without a home, and the city gave this unit an armounry in the Junction, and another unit, the 110th, in St. Lawrence market. These armouries are now heated, lighted and a caretaker provided by the city. If the Government are so hard up that they cannot assist these battalions, they should abolish the Militia Department altogether. They should have a proper official militia, or we do not want a militia department at all.

If the same state of affairs had existed in Canada in 1912 and 1913, we would not have been able to take the part in the Great War which we did. What are these experts in the Department of Militia for? They mobilized the first contingent at Valcartier, and the various other contingents. We took their advice during the war, so why should we not do so now? They say that if this appropriation is reduced, it will sound the death knell of the militia, and I believe General MacBrien is speaking the truth when he makes that statement.

I do not wish to detain the House very much longer. You have the experience of Australia, and the experience of South Africa. General Smuts, who is not a militarist by any means, said the other day:

> Warfare has become so horrible because of the advance in chemical science—that this very advance will bring it to an end. All long for the day that nations and men achieve a standard of reason and common sense that war shall be no more—but it is a long way off yet I fear.

That is all very well in its way, but people had the same ideas in the days of our Lord and in the days of the Romans and Persians. They had a league of nations then; we have a league of nations now; but the only league of nations that I have ever known that has protected civilization is the British fleet. If the British fleet is dismantled, good-bye to the League of Nations. If there is ever formed a league of nations that can make as good a showing during the next four centuries on the land as the British fleet has made on the seas in the last four centuries during the days of Philip of Spain, Louis XIV, Napoleon and the Kaiser, it will be doing a good work for civilization and there will be some need of a league of nations.

This proposed reduction in the militia estimates is false economy; I do not believe it is economy at all. As General MacBrien has said, "Later on you will suffer for it." We have a pretty state of affairs in this country. We should have responsible government, but I am beginning to doubt whether we have that or not. This is the first time that we have had the group system in this House, and I do not believe it is responsible government for a government to submit, to a party caucus, the country's estimates of expenditure, a matter which should be run on a business basis. This is a national matter, a defence matter, a patriotic matter for the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Graham) and it is one in regard to which the people in all the provinces will stand by the minister. If the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Halbert) would resign his seat and appeal to his constituents on the speech which he made in this House this afternoon, I believe he would be defeated.

I do not believe any one wants war again, but it is a pretty hard thing to prevent war. I have consulted many people about this question; I have consulted many financial men, men who have great stakes in the country, men who pay heavy taxes; I have consulted labour men, military men, municipal officers, and they all believe that no reduction should be made in these estimates. In conclusion, therefore, I hope that this amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. HALBERT: I should just like to answer the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church). I used those words on almost every platform in the riding which I represent.

Mr. IRVINE: We have an amendment, and an amendment to the amendment, both providing for substantial reductions in the estimates. The amendment, if I am correct, calls for a reduction of $1,100,000. The amendment to the amendment calls for a reduction of $400,000 on one item, and $700,000 on the estimate as a whole. Inasmuch as they both call for a reduction, it is necessary for me to explain that I shall vote against the smaller reduction in order to have an opportunity of voting for the larger reduction.

This discussion has disclosed a rather singular situation. We have witnessed the Opposition not only defending the estimates of the Government, but pleading that their estimates might be increased. That is not, I believe, the ordinary practice; they usually criticise because the estimates are supposed to be too high. I do not know, however, if this situation is a dangerous one, or if it augurs badly for the future. Perhaps it is an evidence of that democracy which we have heard talked about so much of late.

It has been suggested, however, in connection with this estimate that simply because the Minister of Militia saw fit to change his mind with regard to his original estimate, he should resign. As a matter of fact, I think it will be proved from any angle whatsoever that the fact of his change of mind on this item will simply establish his fitness for the position. It has made clear this point at least, that some measure of parliamentary power is being allowed by the Government, instead of our having the old machine government which we have known so much about in Canada. I believe the spirit of the Prime Minister's campaign during the recent election was to let the people rule, to give Parliament back the power which it originally had, and I am rather surprised that the Opposition, which sought a vote of censure a short time ago because this Government had forgotten about its promises, should be so anxious to criticise that Government now for having carried out the spirit of its promises in consulting Parliament as well as its own supporters before passing estimates.

It has been shown, I think, conclusively by those who have already spoken on this issue, that the reduction of the estimates proposed, or, better still, the reduction that is moved in the amendment, is warranted, first because of the urgent necessity for financial retrenchment. That has been sufficiently dealt with during the debate, and I merely refer to it in recapitulating the outstanding points which have been made in the discussion. Second, it has been shown that training, in the manner in which it is provided under our militia regulations, is futile. I refer you, in connection with that point, to the excellent argument put forward by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) this afternoon, and it would be presumptuous for me to attempt to improve upon that.

I want, however, to mention one or two other matters, in order to express the point of view of the Labour group which I have the honour to represent. We need this money urgently, to re-establish our soldiers who have already done some fighting. We have widespread demands throughout Canada to-day for some measure of a soldier's bonus. Some of our returned men are asking to be better re-established on the land, while others who have no intention of going on the land want to have some aid in being re-established in other walks of life. While the $11,000,000, if we should give the whole of it to the re-establishment of our returned soldiers, would not be sufficient, yet that would be a better investment of the money than that in which we are going to invest it. Not only so, but we would discover that an investment along that line, if it is going to be necessary to continue war, would be of greater value than an investment in the kind of training in which we are going to invest our money.

The spirit of an army is equal at least to the training of that army; and when we look around us and see how the men who have fought have been treated for their fighting, there is no great incentive for men to join the army if we were to have a war immediately. In fact, the treatment of the men would discourage very materially any re-enlisting; whereas, if we had treated the soldiers better, the rising generation would be more ready to shoulder arms, if we were thrown into another war. As it is, under present circumstances, even if young men could feel assured that they were not going to give up their lives on the battlefield, they would hesitate before going into the army in view of our poor treatment of those who have already been there.

I should like to spend the entire estimate for the next ten years in the re-establishment of returned soldiers. But that, perhaps, might be considered a little too drastic, and so I shall not move an amendment to the amendment to the amendment. I shall rather speak on the amendment. I am not so particular about the actual amount of the reduction as I am about the principle involved. We are really making a choice of principle that will shape the national character of this country for the future.

Two tendencies have been evident since the Great War. One of these is the tendency towards the re-birth of German militarism in the countries that have been called victors; the second is the tendency to challenge the whole barbaric system of human murder which has been adopted even by civilisation as a means of settling international disputes. I should like to see manifested, even in the discussion of these estimates and in the decision thereon, Canada's attitude towards the future in this regard; and I should like to see her take a position strongly upon the latter principle, that she is going to discard the military means of settling disputes between nations and find some other method more satisfactory and more in keeping with the intelligence of the times in which we are living.

This is indeed Canada's opportunity; Canada can do it perhaps better than any other nation. First of all, as has already been pointed out in the debate, Canada is a young nation which has not yet been bound by the military fetters that bind other countries. She has no military traditions to live down; she is practically starting afresh. Moreover, her population is drawn from many nations; and she has succeeded so far, and I trust that in the future she will be even more successful, in welding these peoples from many nations into one national unity. If therefore she has succeeded in forming a unity out of these various elements, it is only natural that she should take the leadership in seeking to weld together, at least in the principle of co-operation, these nations from which her own population has been derived. So that we are looking to Canada to take the initiative on this new principle. We expect her to lead the way from militarism towards justice and humanity.

The desire to seek safety in military preparation is a static desire; that is, it deals only with effects. It makes no attempt whatever to deal with the causes of war, and we cannot expect to have anything else but war if we permit the causes to run rampant. Now I admit that we should still be dealing with the effects merely if we attempted to stop entirely at disarmament. We ought to be able to give some real constructive, dynamic lead and follow that lead, with our own confidence, by disarming. Wars have economic causes, that is the philosophy of the labor movement; and if wars are caused chiefly by economic conditions, they can be stopped only by economic solutions. And so, if we are really desirous of promoting the safety of Canada, against the attack of nations, we would be much more to the point in spending $11,000,000 in trying to set before the world a better method of economics than in merely training a few men or giving them a holiday for a couple of weeks every year and spending money on rifles, and so forth.

Moreover, it has been well established that the great war from which we have just emerged, as well as other great wars in history, have been caused largely through the competition of the nations of the world for the limited markets at their disposal in which to sell their supposed surplus goods; and if we are anxious to remove ourselves from the danger of conflict with other nations we should begin by adopting a sane system within our own country, so that we might be able to develop our own home markets, and not scramble with other people for a market that does not belong to us. I do not mean at all that we should isolate ourselves in the fair and necessary exchange of trade, but I do mean to say, as I pointed out before, that as we are now producing more than we are allowed to consume, if we can find some means of permitting our people to consume what they produce, it is possible we shall not want to fight with any foreigners for markets for our goods.

War is the world's most dismal failure. Politics may be a failure, if you like; and party government has no doubt dismally failed, at least in the past few years. But I do not know of any more dismal failure in the world's history than war, the very thing we are going to spend over $10,000,000 of Canada's money at this time to keep alive. If war, then, is the greatest failure, would it not be well to look for some other way of settling international disputes? The last war was the greatest of all failures; it proved, more conclusively than any other war has done, that resort to arms is an utter futility as a means of settling anything. Its greatest demonstration of this truth lies in the fact that the victor has become the vanquished. We have not been able to defeat the German sentiment for we see it bubbling around us every day. The sentiment of military preparedness, as I said at the outset, has been re-born in many great nations, and we have had this sentiment echoed on the floor of this House to-day. We have not therefore killed the sentiment nor the philosophy of war. Nor have we been able to conquer Germany in the sense of having made her pay for the war. If we made her pay for the war, even supposing that she were financially able to do so, we would ruin the industrial institutions of Great Britain, France and the United States. So that having won the war, and having attained the position of being able to compel Germany to pay for it, we dare not exercise that compulsion because we would destroy our own country thereby.

That is the fiasco of the Great War. War is a complete failure from the point of view of a settlement of disputes as between different nations. It is philosophically false; it is inhuman; it is un-economic; and worse than all, the peace based on that colossal failure is going to be the basis of subsequent wars. I presume that is why some of our people are so anxious to have more preparation.

Carrying out this tendency to get away from war as a colossal failure in settling human affairs, we have had such things as the League of Nations and the Disarmament Conference. In view therefore of the fact that war is indeed a dismal failure and that it is necessary that there should be some better method of settling disputes; and in view of our hope that Canada will take the lead in finding that better method I think it will be agreed that we cannot afford to spend this money at this time on further preparation for war. Even if we could afford to spend this amount it could be better devoted to rehabilitating returned men and also taking care of many of our unemployed and trying to find better means of employing those who are unemployed, as well as in building better homes in Canada in order to make the country a better place to live in. This kind of military training is futile, not only because of its inefficiency, but because of the fact that war is just as progressive as human ingenuity is: when you have trained your men in what are supposed to be modern tactics of warfare, you very soon find out they are not modern at all; you have to train your men on the spot in order to keep pace with the development of modern warfare.

For these reasons, and also for the reason that economics are at the base of world politics and that if we are to tackle this problem seriously we must tackle it on the economic ground, I am opposed to this estimate. I am in sympathy with the expressed opinion of organized labour, not only in this country, but in the United Kingdom, when I say that we look forward to complete disarmament and will take every step possible to achieve that end. Whenever I have an opportunity as a representative of labour to vote for the reduction of armaments, I must vote for the largest possible reduction; therefore I shall vote for the amendment in this case. I am glad, however, to notice that the present Government has made some reduction; I hope it will be greater next year. I am glad for that larger measure of democracy which the Government has exhibited, and I am only sorry that I have to vote against the reduction which it proposes in order that I may be able to vote for the amendment which would reduce the estimate by the larger amount.

I conclude with the hope, Mr. Chairman, that our action on this issue will be Canada's first step toward a great, new social order that is approaching; that Canada's action will be a first example and a lead to the nations of the world in the discovery of a new method and a new principle of settling national disputes; that we will thus give out to the world the intimation that in spirit and in sentiment we stand for the enthronement of human rights as the dominating principle in world politics.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, I am not able to give the committee any opinion of real value as to what is the best military organization or how best to spend a given amount of money for the maximum military effect. Nor can I say anything as to how future wars are to be fought—nothing, at least, that the committee would be justified in listening to. I have not had the actual war experience of other hon. members in this House, including the hon. member from Quebec (Mr. Power), sufficient to enable me to measure just what is the value of annual military training for purposes of war. And I have no vision of the future, no such prophetic power as, evidently, is possessed by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) and some others to enable me to define just in what portion of the great universe on earth in air or sea the future conflicts of mankind are to take place. I would like to say something, though, as to what appear from the story of the past, from the ordinary layman's reading of history, as being sound principles that a country like this should follow in determining what should be the measure, of its military organization.

If I held to the principles just enunciated by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Irvine) and, indeed, also by the member for Assiniboia, if the line of argument followed by the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Woods) appealed to me in the least degree—that is to say, if I felt it good as demanding the reduction by a single dollar of these estimates—I would consider it absolutely good, and, indeed, inescapable, for the wiping out of the whole appropriation. If we are going to march toward what my hon. friend calls a "great, new social order" merely by cutting out our defence; if we are going, as he says, to put Canada in the lead at this great climacteric in our history—put Canada in the lead in ushering in a new and better order in this world by the easy process of dropping the military estimates—why, then, I would want to drop them all; I would not tolerate a dollar. But I have not observed that, in the past or to-day, nations that did not gird on their armour and play the part of men in the world, but rather lolled back in self-indulgence, have been leaders either toward a new social order or toward any other order.

I do not know in what sense the word "militarist" has been used so often in the course of this debate. I would say that a militarist nation is a nation that hopes to gain by conquest, either for purposes of revenge or for mere purposes of acquisition; and that a citizen of a nation who believes in that course would be a militarist. But surely it is an abuse of words to say that a citizen of a nation whose purpose is only to be in a position to defend itself, to get reasonably ready for defence in case some militarist nation takes it into its head to act aggressively toward it, is a militarist. If that is the case, the whole world has been militaristic since the birth of creation; and though I do not like to speak of the future, I am afraid it is going to be militaristic forever. A nation, if it is to be a nation at all, must just the same as an individual be in a position to take care of itself—both internally against disorder and revolutionary insolence and externally against aggression. I do not say that it can insure itself against all possibility of harm, but, that it should under all circumstances that surround it, become reasonably ready to guard against being wiped out of existence or losing its hold on its own properties before the assistance of an awakened and enlightened world can come to its defence. Now, if by having a military organization we are only getting ready for war; if we are only taking a step to precipitate another conflict such as the war from which we have emerged, then let us stand for none at all; let us have nothing whatsoever. But while every one hopes—at least every one would like, though he may not dare to hope—that there would be no more great wars, I do not think the sensible people of the world are of opinion that the British Empire and other nations of like character are going to hasten that time merely by themselves disarming, throwing away all means of self-defence.

Surely it has been made manifest in recent years that some at least of the greater nations of the world, and undoubtedly the leading statesmen of those nations, have exerted—yes, exhausted—every imaginable effort to ensure, so far as they can ensure, that great conflicts are past. I do not know anything that Great Britain has failed to do that could have been done. I believe that the United States, using its best judgment, though we may differ from that judgment, has exerted itself to the same end.

If we are to get past the time of war, to my mind there is only one path we can tread that is likely to get us there. It is for those nations that undoubtedly have no militaristic purposes, that undoubtedly are not animated by sentiments of revenge or by ambitions of conquest, to stand together, stand together in a world policy, endeavour to bring other nations into line with themselves, and all as one group be in a position to make their policy and their pacific purposes reign. That is what they are trying to do now. I do not need to name the nations that are of that temperament, that call themselves peace-loving people, that undoubtedly are peace-loving people, but I have not the least hesitation in naming two, and I name the United States of America, and the British Empire, inclusive of all its dominions. Those are to the extent they are able to hold together—and I would not for one minute exclude others, but I am undoubtedly within the unanimous opinion of this assembly when I bring those two into that category—to the extent they are able to stand together, to the extent they are able to support their opinion by that reserve of force which alone in world politics creates influence and supports opinions, they are the real contributors to the peace of nations.

There is nobody in the British Empire, there is nobody in the United States, there is no considerable, respectable body of opinion in either of these great countries which believes for one minute that even though they stand together, they can get anywhere unless they have very considerable forces behind their opinion. The British Empire has to have such force. Who is there who has any feeling for that Empire at all who would dare to suggest at this hour that Great Britain throw down her arms and place herself in the position where her word in the councils of Europe and in the councils of the world would mean nothing at all? Who is there who would suggest that the United States do the same thing? We know they cannot do it. Much as they love peace, however devotedly, however unitedly all their efforts are concentrated to secure peace, we know they cannot adopt such a policy as that. Such being the case surely it follows that we, as an integral part of the British Empire, must maintain a fair share and proportion of that means of defence which all the Empire must sustain. Surely that follows. Surely that is incumbent upon us out of regard for our self respect, out of regard for the very manhood of our people.

Then the question is, how far can you go? Where should you stop and be sure that you have not gone too far, but that you have reached, the right line? Well, it is a difficult matter; it is a very difficult matter to decide. Opinions differ as to the state of the world; opinions differ as to the share incumbent on the different peace-seeking countries of the world; opinions differ as to the share of the various nations of the Empire. Some say that the late war so exhausted humanity that even if it would, through the perversity of human nature, it cannot wage a conflict for many years to come. I fear, though, that the state of the nations to-day affords not quite so good ground for the optimism of that class of people as it did even a few months ago. I do not think we can look to the horizon in the direction of Europe and be quite so sanguine, so certain, that the world is very far from war. I am not an alarmist by any means. I am sure that recent events have taught us this, that though the heart of one great nation, is doubtless more determinedly bent on peace, more poignantly so than it ever was, that great nation is certainly not more hopeful than it was two years ago. In Europe at this hour there is strain and stress, there is cloud and sign of storm in every direction. One nation struggles to have its way; another battles for a more excellent way—antagonism and schism result. One seems animated by revenge. Another seems to harbour perilous hopes but to cry for help against revenge. Another appears to have no purpose save to make it impossible for those nations that it describes as of the old order to live in peace at all. In a word, there is just about the antithesis of harmony in the whole European atmosphere at this hour. Very well, that is the condition, deplore it as we will, struggle against it as we will—and I am sure the Empire of which we are part does not despair—struggle against it as we will, nevertheless, that is the condition that confronts us.

There are those who say—or think if they do not say: "Ah, we are here on the North American continent; we are far from any eastern menace, we are far from any western menace, if menace there is east or west; we are along the boundary of the great United States; the Monroe doctrine has sheltered this continent for nigh a hundred years." Let me express my sentiments:—In the fold of this Empire we have more safety than in any shelter of geography or in any doctrine of a foreign land. But let us never forget that if any portion of the Empire of which we are part is in peril, it cannot be long before that peril is equally real right here in Canada. Surely the Great War, if it taught us anything, taught us this, that any considerable war of the future will be such that no nation knows whether it will be possible for it to withhold its hand and its part in that war. Surely it taught us, if it taught us anything, that the British Empire can be maintained only to the extent it stands united, and that we are secure here as a part of that Empire only to the extent that the whole Empire is secure. If any one doubts that, let him get up and say so. For myself, my reason cannot bring me to the conviction that there is any security at all for us save in the security of the Empire of Britain.

We are asked, where is the foe? Where is the enemy that is going to attack us? Let me put the answer this way. Was there ever a time, no matter how close war actually turned out to be, when any government of a civilized country if asked across the floor of its parliament where the enemy was that was going to attack, would be in a position to rise and point out the enemy? That cannot be done. First, we do not know; next, if we did know, it would be impossible public policy, unspeakable public policy, to make the declaration. We are told we have no foe. Had Canada any foe in 1913? But foes came. The world is smaller to-day than it was two or three hundred years ago, and as time goes on the relations of continents and nations become closer, the dependence becomes closer, and the security of the one depends more and more on the security of the other; the peace of each depends more and more upon the peace of all.

We are told: We are here on the North American continent; the United States of America is a great and powerful republic, and any attack on our shores would be resisted by them. Well, if we really rest in that belief, if we really lull ourselves into a measure of indulgence because of that consideration surely it behooves us to take the same part of the burden of such security proportionate to our numbers, proportionate to our wealth and resources, that the United States takes. But we are not taking that part to-day. The United States of America to-day is devoting 19.1 per cent of its entire expenditure to the purposes of defence; we are spending about 3¼ per cent of ours for the purpose of defence. Theirs amounts to about $13.13 per head of their people. Ours amounts to about $1.69 per head of our people. I could compare similarly with Australia, with New Zealand, with Great Britain, with other parts of our Empire. Relatively to them all we are by far the lowest, and relatively to every other nation in the world we are the lowest. So from the argument of comparison it cannot be said that we have been led by militarists and by brass caps in this country. Our governments have rather sought to keep our expenditure on defence as low as it could be kept, consistent with national self respect and a reasonable degree of security.

Now the question comes: These estimates that are brought down, do they do more than meet that requirement? For myself, no one is more anxious, I think, than I am to hold expenditure on defence down to the lowest point consistent with national self-respect, consistent with reasonable security. We are told the militia is a non-productive body and that we have a large debt to-day; that we have a tremendous interest burden to carry year after year, and that consequently we should cut down the militia. That argument proceeds upon the hypothesis that the militia, the defence force, is a mere luxury—that the reason it is maintained by a nation is because that nation has some money to throw away. The militia organization is maintained not for luxury, not in any sense merely to appease the parading ambitions of any class of people. It is maintained by a nation first to preserve law and order within the country; and second, to be a nucleus around which the national forces can gather if danger comes from without. Those who preach that we ought to cut down because our debt has grown have a wrong conception of what the militia is for. We ought to maintain—and I admit it is very difficult to tell just where the line should be drawn—we ought to maintain a militia not proportionate inversely to our debt, but proportionate directly to the need for the militia itself, proportionate to the size of the purposes the militia is to meet.

Now, then, I come to inquire whether or not the estimates that are before us in the form presented are more than sufficient for that need. First, I find that these estimates, as originally presented, are about $1,100,000 less than last year's estimates. Last year's estimates were designed and prepared to meet the requirements that I defined a few minutes ago, the purposes the Minister of Militia defined in his address of April 25, and to do no more than meet those purposes. The present estimates were designed to the same ends and to no other; and the minister's statement to this House was such as to show that, in his judgment, they were no more than sufficient to meet the needs of law and order, to meet any contingency that might arise out of a breaking of law and order at home, and also to be the nucleus of an organization of trained men who, at least, could offer some show of resistance at first in the event of war, and who would constitute the personnel to train in time of peril the other young men of our country. They would be the advance guard that the others could follow and thereby, if trouble comes, make some sort of a showing on behalf of this nation. Are they more than sufficient for that purpose? They are $1,100,000 less than last year. I do not think this is any more than could reasonably be expected to be saved because of reductions of costs. I do not think it is claimed by the minister that it is more than that. Certainly in respect of this item the minister made no other claim than that the amount taken off was about sufficient to take care of reductions of costs of supplies and the like that could be made this year as against last year. Very well then, the minister's duty was to ascertain whether or not last year we went too far. After investigation the minister came to the conclusion we did not; that we only apportioned such an amount as was required for the purpose of this military training.

There are those who say "Yes, we should have a military organization"—I am referring particularly to the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power)—"but we do not need any military training." My hon. friend ought to be a better judge of that than I am, but may I appeal to the hon. member—

Mr. POWER: If the hon. member will pardon me I said "yes, we should have militia but we should not have annual training for a militia camp". We should have permanent militia and in that I agree with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I intended to represent my hon. friend as saying: We should have militia but we do not require this annual training.

Mr. POWER: We should have a permanent militia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A permanent militia but no annual camp training. If it was merely a case of deciding between my opinion on this subject and that of the hon. member for Quebec South his opinion would certainly be better than mine—he has had something to do with the militia, I have not. But I am here representing the people of Canada, representing a constituency of this country. Am I to take the judgment of the hon. member for Quebec South? If so what reason should I have for not taking it as against his judgment, the judgment of the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) that of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross), that of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) or of others over here who have had equal military experience with my hon. friend's. They one and all are opposed to the view of my friend from Quebec. Then, what is the course I should pursue? First of all I look to other countries; I look to the Mother Country, I look to the other Dominions. If to do so does not suit the hon. member—I am not at all intimating that it would not—then I look to France, I look to the United States of America. I find that in all these countries they consider annual military training of this character to be essential for the upkeep and for the continuance of the organization and the spirit of their militias. That appears to me to be a stronger reason than the mere opinion of any hon. member however respectable that opinion is. But furthermore I come to our own country and I find that there has grown up here within this Dominion a militia organization composed of men who are chosen because of their capacity to advise Parliament and to advise the minister in this matter, who have shown their capacity under the severest tests, whose methods have been shown to stand the strain of the severest trials the world has ever witnessed, and we have their unanimous opinion that annual military training is essential. I find that he especially upon whom the minister most relies for advice, considers that to abandon such training would be disastrous to the militia of this country. In the face of that judgment —that united judgment supported by the judgment of the minister, supported by the judgment of every previous minister who ever sat in office in Canada—supported by the experience of centuries and the universal practice of to-day—I feel that I cannot give reliance to the opinion of the hon. member for Quebec South. Consequently I come to the conclusion that annual military training is an essential part of our militia organization. Very well, if it is, the sum of $1,400,000 is required and the hon. member for Quebec South agrees. In the face of that opinion of the hon. member that if we have annual drill this money is required, it seems to me it is the duty of hon. members to support the vote as it stood—that vote which in the opinion of my hon. friend himself is essential if annual training is to be continued and to be of any use at all. But, I have a better opinion—I should not say better,—I have another opinion besides that of the hon. gentleman from Quebec South (Mr. Power), besides that of the officers of this Government, besides that of previous ministers of militia and the officers of previous governments, I have the opinion of the hon. Minister of Militia who sits in this House, expressed in the most unequivocal terms. Upon such opinion I relied two weeks ago. Upon such opinion I rely to-night. We want reductions of estimates wherever reductions can be made compatibly with the purpose for which the estimates are introduced; wherever we can see that some money can be taken off without the sacrifice of efficiency for essential purposes, let us do it. But we do not on this side of the House at all events, and I do not think anywhere, at least openly, stand up and say that we want estimates cut down at the expense of efficiency and of essential services. In approaching this matter let me say that there is a very great distinction between a mere reduction in a matter of administration, the lopping off of officials whose duties in the course of time, prove unnecessary, reductions by virtue of an improved organization such as suggested by the hon. gentleman from Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn), there is a very great difference between reductions of that kind and reductions that go to the root of policy, reductions that go to the root of essential purposes for which the expenditure is undertaken. A government usually considers its estimates, finds out if there cannot be betterments in organization and in administration, and brings into Parliament what it believes is the minimum. This Government it is true has not done so this session. On numerous occasions it has admitted that it could get on with less. That may be evidence of some neglect. I do not say it is a very serious matter—not at all. That, however, is one thing, but for a government to determine that a certain scale of organization and expenditure is and that certain services are essential for the vital purposes for which the department exists, and then to recede from the inevitable consequences of that decision, is another thing, and that is what we have witnessed in this House to-night. What have we witnessed? In order to make myself clear, let me quote from the address delivered by the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Graham) on the 25th April last, when these estimates were brought down by the Government, and sponsored by himself. At page 1178 of Hansard he says:

> But at the present time our permanent force is not of sufficient strength to preserve internal order. That is an absolute fact.

Again he says:

> Could we, Mr. Chairman, let it be known throughout the entire world that Canada is a country where the militia is ineffective, where the mounted police is to be reduced almost to the vanishing point, where the naval service is to be of little account, and where the flying force is not to function? We would become the mecca of a class of people that would not be desirable in the best interests of the country. It is our duty, even though the militia be not productive, to maintain it at sufficient strength to preserve order and good government within the Dominion.

Further on he says:

> We have not only a tradition to carry on, we have a duty to ourselves to perform, and the militia must be maintained at a point where it will be able to protect us from internal disorder, as well as from external aggression.

And again he drew attention to the comparison between the estimates of to-day and the estimates of years ago, and I quote his words in two or three places on that subject. At page 1179 he compared our estimates with the estimates of 1911-1912. I submit in all respect to the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) whose righteous wrath at the newspapers of Montreal got sufficient vent I hope this afternoon, that these estimates the minister was comparing with the present estimates were not that awful thing—so hideous to him—Tory estimates. They were estimates of a Liberal government—of a Liberal government that was declaring in the same breath that there was not a cloud in the sky, nothing but peace ahead, that the talk of an emergency was all moonshine, the vapourings of March hares and April fools. The minister said this:

> If you take into account the present purchasing power of the dollar as compared with 1911-1912 I submit the estimates presented to-day are less than they were that year.

Was Toryism in the saddle then under the guise of Liberalism? Is that the opinion of the hon. gentleman from St. James (Mr. Rinfret)? But that was not all he said on this subject. He said later on, at page 1193 on question by the hon. gentleman from Laprairie (Mr. Lanctôt)—

> What were the estimates in 1910, when there was a Liberal party in power with a good government?

The hon. minister answered:

> The last I have are the estimates for 1910-11, but I may point out that, although brought down by the succeeding government, they were the estimates of their predecessors.

The minister was wrong there. They were both the estimates of the predecessor and brought down by the predecessor, the estimates of 1910-11.

Mr. GRAHAM: The estimates I referred to are those of 1912-13.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the hon minister referred to the estimates of 1910-11, which were the estimates of the previous government.

Mr. GRAHAM: I must have mis-spoken myself or been mis-reported.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. minister was thinking of the estimates of 1912-13, but he was talking of the estimates of 1910-11. He said:

> The expenditure of 1910-11 was $7,067,000.

That is the expenditure. The estimate was more. He continues:

> That was practically equal to the estimates of to-day,—

The expenditure of 1910-11 was practically equal to the estimates of to-day. He continues:

> —if indeed it was not more, considering what the dollar could buy then as compared with now. Clothing for the troops now costs 50 per cent, 75 per cent and sometimes 100 per cent more, and so does maintenance. The salaries paid to all officers since the war have been higher because of the increase in cost of living as recognized by every business man in the country.

Then he goes on to explain the higher salaries, stating definitely to the House that the estimate for the year was less or at least no more than equal to the actual expenditure for the year 1910-11. In the year 1910-11 we had a population of less than seven and a quarter million. To-day we have a population of more than eight and three quarter millions. The government that brought down the estimates in that year brought them down on the avowed principle that they expressed the minimum necessary to maintain that force, essential to the preservation of law and order at home and to form the nucleus of defence, the advance guard of defence, and all at a time when, in the undoubted opinion of that government, there was no visible danger from without, no cloud in the sky, no sign of aggression, no special cause of alarm. Such was the attitude the minister took. But that was not all. The minister said more; he said at page 1221:

> I venture the assertion that there has been more economy in the cutting of these estimates than has been exercised by any business man in the House in connection with his annual expenditure during the past year.

And on the next page he said:

> Other countries are disarming—

I ask the committee to give particular attention to this quotation:

> Other countries are disarming to a certain extent, but not any more in proportion than we in Canada are, not any more than we are doing in these estimates.

Other countries are disarming, but not any more proportionately than we are doing in respect of the estimates that the minister then brought down. We in Canada, before he brought down those estimates, had by far the smallest military organization per capita of any country in the world, and there was then he said a reduction as much as or more in proportion than that of any other country in the world. In this connection, though the reference is not just appropriate, let it be recalled that, although the influence of many great men and great nations was centred in the recent Disarmament Conference to secure a reduction of armaments by land and sea, they were able, by the greatest effort, only to effect an arrangement for a reduction on sea; they were not able to make any arrangement whatever for reduction on land. I am going to quote just one sentence more from the minister's address. At page 1177, he used this language, evidently language deliberated long, because it was the language with which he opened his address:

The Militia Estimates, I might say, have been pared down to a point as low as is compatible with national safety.

There could not be a more unequivocal, nor a more relevant sentence, a sentence more directly bearing upon the very heart of the issue that is before the committee in this discussion. In the judgment of the minister, the militia estimates had been pared down to a point as low as was compatible with national safety. This was the judgment of the minister after taking the advice of the trained and experienced men of his department. And let it be remembered, this was not the judgment of a minister who came into his department anxious to maintain the militia estimates on the level they had been on before or on anything like that level, but anxious if he dared, to go below those estimates, the judgment of a government and of a minister who believed that they had political advantage to gain, by slashing the estimates for defence, by bringing those estimates down to the point of peril itself, to the point of demoralization and disorganization of the militia. That was the tendency of ministers, I affirm, when they came into office. In the face of that and resisting that, and rightly so, they came to this parliament and said "Thus far can we go and no farther, compatibly with the safety of this nation."

But where are we to-night? We are now asked to take $400,000 off the appropriation for annual drill, to reduce it by 30 per cent and to take corresponding amounts off various other essential services, services deemed essential, not only by the expert advisers of this country, but by the Minister of Militia, by the Government itself. We are asked to take $400,000 off a vote which the minister declared was indispensable to the safety of this country, which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe), seated at the council table, agreed was the very lowest that the Government could reach compatibly with the safety of our people, which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) agreed was the lowest that they could justify the presentation of to Parliament. Remember this is not a matter merely of organization, nor a matter merely of saving a few dollars in administration; this is a matter of the fundamental defence services of this country, services which, the minister declared and believes to-day vital to the security of the nation of which he and the Government are trustees. They are cutting those services down to 66 or 70 per cent of the figure which they asserted was the point of safety. That is the position which the Government has taken to-night. Why has it taken that position? Because there was disagreement behind; partly that, partly because there was agreement here. I wonder which it really was. The hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) says that he is all the more determined to cut these estimates down because we support them. Fine public spirit! He attacks us as Tories trying to hold to the old Tory policy. A bitter, long deliberated virulent attack he made on us this afternoon, and all for what? Pray, what was our offence? Our offence was supporting the minister whom he was elected to support. And as usual he feels that he has clinched his argument when he denominates us Tories. That appellation ends the discussion in the mind of the hon. member. I never put very much store by names; I put far more store by deeds and records, and I would rather belong to a party under any name on earth, a party that stands to its principles through storm and through sunshine, through adversity and through prosperity, in power and out of power, and that applies those principles in progressive legislation to meet the needs of the hour as the hours advance, than belong to a party which, though called in honour of the angels of heaven, cannot describe its principles for the life of it, can only sermonize in language of evasion and of mystery and cannot adhere to any policy for a single session or even from week to week.

The minister advised us that these were the minimum estimates that he could get on with, consistent with the public safety. What has transpired? There was a threat from the hon. member for St. James; there was rebellion in the heart and on the lips of the hon. member for South Quebec (Mr. Power), supported by the determined and dogmatic pacifism of the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Lanctôt)—and now he nods assent. Apparently there is mutiny still in his heart to-night. Consequently, these estimates were postponed in order to give the Government sufficient time to change its policy and its principles. They did not need to be postponed very long. All were gathered into the composing room and the operation proceeded. The hon. member for South Quebec, and the hon. members for St. James and for Laprairie and Napierville came out more than conquerors, because they forced and coerced the Government into reducing the estimates below the line that it had declared to this House to be the line of safety for the country. We have heard of government by conviction; we ought really to have government by conviction; but what have we now? We have government by listening. The Prime Minister bereft of opinions himself listens sometimes at an angle of 45 degrees, sometimes at an angle of 90 degrees, listens for the whispers of the corridor, listens for the threats and the growls around, and then all these noises are gathered together, fused into one and the conglomerate emission becomes the tune that he calls the Government policy. Why did the minister not come back with his estimates intact? He might have reduced where it was merely a matter of administration; but he has reduced them at what he himself has declared to be the very root and heart of policy. If there is one function of a government that is primary, that is major, that is first and above all others, it is to take care properly of the national defence. The similar obligation is the first duty of an individual. It is the first law of nature; it is the first trust of government. How has this Government discharged that trust? It has done so by coming to Parliament and saying: "So much is necessary for self-preservation; so much is necessary for national defence; so much is necessary for the general safety: but we ask you to vote a great deal less because of the importunities of our followers". Such is the administration that is in office now; and that sort of conduct forsooth, is described as "democracy". Some hon. member—I forget who he was, but I believe he was an hon. gentleman to the left—gave the Government credit for living true to one of its preachings in the late campaign, —namely that the Government was going to be a committee of Parliament; the Government was going to find out the will of Parliament and then put it into effect. Well, if the Government is merely going to come to Parliament and ask Parliament what shall be the policy of Canada, if Parliament is to take the initiative and dictate a programme item by item to the Government, then in all respect, I do suggest, to hon. ministers, that they might reduce their salaries. What is there for them to do? The deputies gathered together could do their work. We could get men off the street at $1,000 a year, and perhaps a little war bonus occasionally, to go to the deputies and carry the instructions of Parliament and ask them to implement the policies initiated here. Is that responsible government? Is that the character of government that commands the respect of this country? Is that the sort of government that they have or have ever had in Great Britain? Is that traditional British government? If it is, then I do not know what British government is. It is not "democracy", surely not, to come here with a policy and, upon hearing someone rebuke from behind, get up and say, "very well, this is the course we decided on, but if you don't like it we will go back and fix up something else". This is a guess-work government. They canvass how many votes they can get by one line of action, and if they find by a counting process that they are wrong, they go back and guess again; and if they discover that they are still wrong they withdraw for cogitation and for caucus and then make another attempt.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Some hon. member says that is out of order. Well, it is certainly out of order in other British countries. No! wobbling of that kind is not "democracy," Do not let us besmirch the name of "democracy" by describing that sort of thing as democracy. It is impotency; it is helplessness; it is drift, sterility and inefficiency.

How should hon. members vote? The minister comes before Parliament now, and no one can doubt what was really in his mind and heart when he introduced these new estimates this afternoon. It was written all over his countenance, sounded in every word he uttered, that he himself did not believe that these figures were the proper estimates that should be submitted to this committee. He said: "I am told that this cut can be made and not destroy the whole militia." Those, in effect, were his words. And consequently, because this reduction can be made and not utterly destroy the militia, he comes to Parliament and commends it. I think the minister really believes at this moment that he would be doing better by the country as Minister of Militia to stand by the estimates he first proposed. I believe he wants to do right by the country—if he had the strength essential to his office. But he should have courage as strong as his desire is pure. Instead, he now returns coerced by his followers, driven and bludgeoned by them; for nothing else can explain his course. For my part I prefer to take the judgment of the minister, pronounced in the clear light of his conscience and of his knowledge of the actual necessities as revealed to him in office, I prefer to rest on his opinion, uncoerced, unbelaboured, unbludgeoned as expressed to us only a fortnight ago—I prefer that course to accepting as the basis of my conduct a line of action forced on the Government by the exigencies of politics and the mutinous threats of caucus. I stand by the estimates as they are.

Mr. McMASTER: The leader of the official Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has had bestowed on him by nature a fine vituperative style. Art has developed it, and constant practice brought it to a high state of perfection. He is the master of flouts and jeers and gibes. If flouts could have settled our tariff question it would long since have been settled; had jeers been able to settle our immigration policy that too would have been settled to the satisfaction of all; and his gibes would no doubt have settled our transportation problems and cheap freight rates would now be enjoyed by all.

I might divide his remarks into two parts: First, the observations of a statesman; and the last the nightly exercise of one who cannot seek well-merited repose without having endeavoured to hold this Government up to ridicule. Why is the Government held up to ridicule? Because forsooth it has listened to the voice of the people's representatives. Because counsel has been given to the minister from his own side, those who gave that counsel are qualified as rebels. Why, the Liberal party, when they have stood for the rights of the people for the last hundred years, have always been denounced as rebels, from the time of Louis Joseph Papineau and his colleagues in Ontario until now. The right hon. gentleman has told us that this is a listening government, because they have listened to those situated at an angle of 45 degrees opposite.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Better than zero.

Mr. McMASTER: Personally, I have no objection if the Government listen often to advice from that direction; but I will protest if they bend forward both ears in a direction exactly opposite. Now, the first part of the address of my hon. friend was that of a statesman. He approached in a serious mood the fundamentals that lie at the basis of this great question. The question of military expenditures is one of the most difficult with which civilized nations are faced. Civilized nations do not wish to bank too much on the millenium. But then, if they develop military and naval forces they find, alas! that those very forces created to preserve peace are so often the real provocators of war. That is the difficulty of the question. Now let me just briefly endeavour to answer some of the arguments and the assertions made by the leader of the Opposition.

First of all, he tries to define militarism; Bernard Shaw, I think, has given us the best definition of a militarist that we can find in modern literature. He says: "A militarist is one that believes that the only force is military force and that God is always with the big battalions." It is the Napoleonic idea; it is the idea which has been responsible for more tears and more blood and more suffering on the part of humanity than possibly any other idea that mankind ever cherished. The hon. gentleman says that world peace depends upon those nations which are not militaristic gathering themselves together. Well, what nations ever admitted that they were militaristic? Why, the whole claim of those who have been responsible for military expenditure in all countries has been this: military forces are merely preservers of peace, a sort of insurance "Give us," said the German generals to the German people, before the great war; "give us another army corps and the Fatherland will be safe." "Give us eight dreadnoughts," said the British naval people, "and the seas will be free from all danger." But was the result of that policy peace, or was it war? I know how difficult it is, when one nation sets the pace, for other nations not to keep more or less in step. But thank God, that nation that did set the pace toward military expenditure is in the dust and those nations who said that they fought the great war to end war are the victors. Let not the victors lose the result of victory by adopting the sentiments and the policies of the vanquished.

My right hon. friend says that peace or war depends on a defensive alliance between the United Kingdom and the United States. These are not his exact words, but that I think, was the thought that underlay them. But he goes on to say that these two great nations must have very considerable forces behind this policy if it is to be of any avail. Now, it does strike me, Mr. Chairman, that if Great Britain and the United States, more especially the former, would abandon militaristic adventures here and there and everywhere all over the world, the amount of force which they would be obliged to maintain would be very much less than it is now. I was profoundly saddened by the statement made by the leader of the Opposition that in Europe things looked as if they were not very far from war; that war was not as far away as we would like. I give him full credit for desiring peace as I desire it myself. But he painted a gloomy picture of Europe. He said the outlook was not as hopeful as it was two years ago. Now, I disagree with him. His knowledge of European politics may be much greater than mine, but I say that there is one great outstanding feature in the present European situation which bids us hope, and that is, that those two great nations which have been ostracised from European society ever since the war now have their representatives at the council table at Genoa, because there could be no real European accommodation and, therefore, no real world accommodation as long as Germany and Russia were kept out of the society of nations. They have returned, and we watch the conference at Genoa with hope. Let us hope and trust that Providence will look down on the suffering children of men and that good will come out of this conference.

Then, the world situation is better than it was two years ago, because at that time there was a danger of naval competition between the United States and Great Britain. That is a thing of the past, and I wish to give full meed of credit to the leader of the Opposition for the part he played in bringing about the understanding which was arrived at between Great Britain and the United States. That, I believe, we have the right to hope.

Now, the late Prime Minister—I should say the former Prime Minister, because "late" should only be used in referring to those who have ceased to live, and I know that the leader of the Opposition is fully alive yet and will be for many years to come—he says that Canada is in a happy position. So we are: geographically we are in a happy position. We fear no enemy from the north; we fear no enemy from the south, because by prudence and wisdom we and the inhabitants of the great republic have organized what is really the first international court which has been functioning for years to the satisfaction of the litigants before it, that is, the International Joint Commission. That body has the right to decide not only all questions pertaining to international boundary waters on its own motion, but has the right to sit as a court to consider all questions which may arise between the United States and ourselves. We have the right, I say, to take full advantage of our geographical position and our happy political position. It is due to Providence to a certain extent but also to the wisdom of ourselves and our forefathers.

But, says the leader of the Opposition, some other part of the Empire may get into trouble and that may bring trouble home to us. Now, I disagree most heartily with that interpretation of the responsibilities of Canada. The leader of the Opposition at the conference in London apparently committed this country, to a certain extent at least, to a different attitude, but so far as he did so he departed from the traditional attitude which Sir Wilfrid Laurier led this country to adopt, namely, that as long as we fly the flag we are liable to attack, but that so far as participation in war is concerned, that is a matter for the Canadian people to decide through their elected representatives.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman will permit me I must ask him when he attributes to me any stand at the Imperial Conference, to support it by quotation from the document filed. So far as I am concerned, any other document relating to that conference can be filed, but while this is the only one on file it is a duty of hon. members to confine themselves to it and it alone.

Mr. McMASTER: Here is a resolution which was passed at the Imperial Conference of 1921:

> Having regard to the constitutional development since 1917, no advantage is to be gained by holding a constitutional conference;

Mr. Lloyd George, in the course of his speech in the House of Commons on the 14th of December, 1921, referring to the dominions, spoke as follows—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Chairman, my suggestion to the hon. member was this, and I appeal to his fairness. In attributing to me anything, he has no right to quote from what any member of the Conference said elsewhere. If it is not embodied in the report filed in this House and the British House, the hon. member has no right to quote it. If there is any fuller report, then so far as I am concerned I would like to see it tabled. If Mr. Lloyd George is to make reports of his own, a similar right pertains to all concerned to make reports of their own, and the whole confidential character of the Conference is gone.

Mr. McMASTER: I think my hon. friend will admit I would have no desire to be unfair to him in any way, but—

Mr. STEVENS: What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. McMASTER: I am reading from the report of a speech delivered by Mr. Lloyd George in the House of Commons of Great Britain on the 14th of December, 1921.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it a newspaper report of his speech?

Mr. McMASTER: It is a report of his speech which I think is to be found in the printed memorandum which was circulated among members of this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: From the way it started, I think it is not. If the hon. member will read from that printed memorandum, I will make no complaint at all. Read from the memorandum.

Mr. McMASTER: I am in the hands of the Chair. I do not wish to be unfair in any way to my hon. friend, but I would submit to all hon. members here that after an Imperial conference sits and the Prime Minister of Great Britain gives in a speech in the House of Commons at Westminster an account of what happened at that Imperial conference and the results of its deliberations, surely no one should object unless he is prepared to take the ground that the words of the Prime Minister of Great Britain incorrectly represent what happened there. Under these circumstances, I trust that my right hon. friend will allow me to continue to read what Mr. Lloyd George said as to what was the result of the Conference in which my right hon. friend took a leading part.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would suggest just one thing to my hon. friend. I cannot, of course, hinder him reading anything he likes from Mr. Lloyd George; I do not suggest I can. I have only suggested to him that it is unfair to attribute to me something not contained in the official report which Mr. Lloyd George filed and which has been laid on the Table of this House. That is the only report that any member of the Conference had the right to make with the consent of the Conference.

Mr. McMASTER: I think I will proceed in this fashion, which will be eminently fair to my hon. friend. I will read what Mr. Lloyd George says, and then if it is not a correct representation of the facts, my hon. friend will say that it is not. The point I wish to make is that according to what Mr. Lloyd George says, there grew out of this Imperial Conference a solidarity of responsibility which before that time had not been admitted. Let me read the report, and I think hon. members will agree with me after they have listened to it, that my interpretation is correct. Referring to the Dominions he spoke as follows:

> They said: "You are putting us in this position—either we have to support you in a policy which we might or might not approve, or we have to desert the old country in the time of trouble. That is a dilemma in which you ought never to put us. Therefore in future you must consult us before the event." That was right; that was just. That was advantageous to both parties. We acceded to it gladly.
> The machinery is the machinery of the British Government—the Foreign Office, the Ambassadors. The machinery must remain here. It is impossible that it could be otherwise, unless you had a Council of Empire, with representatives elected for the purpose. Apart from that, you must act through one instrument. The instrument of the foreign policy of the Empire is the British Foreign Office. That has been accepted by all the Dominions as inevitable. But they claim a voice in determining the lines of our future policy. At the last Imperial Conference they were there discussing our policy in Germany, our policy in Egypt, our policy in America, our policy all over the world, and we are now acting upon the mature, general decisions arrived at with the common consent of the whole Empire. The sole control of Britain over foreign policy is now vested in the Empire as a whole. That is a new fact, and I would point out what bearing it has upon the Irish controversy.
> The advantage to us is that joint control means joint responsibility, when the burden of Empire has become so vast it is well that we should have the shoulders of these young giants under the burden to help us along.

Now is there anything unfair in my deduction from that, that if a part of the Empire would get into war, under this joint responsibility the other parts would have to come to their assistance. I think that is a fair deduction, and I think it is a very unwise and dangerous policy for Canada to follow.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member suggest that at previous conferences, under Liberal governments, there were no joint councils and discussions on matters of foreign policy of the Empire?

Mr. McMASTER: I say there was not. I say that Sir Wilfrid Laurier took the position that he would not be informed as to the foreign policy of Great Britain, because if he was given information there might be an implication of honour that having received the information, and not having protested, he would be liable to support the foreign policy which might eventuate from those facts.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member suggest that Sir Wilfrid Laurier did not take part in the discusions leading to the Anglo-Japanese alliance and actually agreed to the alliance?

Mr. McMASTER: I am not prepared to say that. I am not denying that specific fact, but I believe I am perfectly right when I state that the general policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was to decline consultation lest consultation involve responsibility.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member would have a hard time supporting that.

Mr. McMASTER: That is the policy which I believe Sir Wilfrid Laurier followed, and may I say this, that if premiers of this country present and to come will follow in the footsteps of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, they will follow a safe course for this beloved country of ours.

I am not going to attack the estimates as grossly swollen. I admit frankly that in this country we have been as free as most countries, and freer than some, from swollen military and naval estimates, but what I say is that we are particularly fortunate in our situation and we should take full advantage of our good fortune and set an example of reduction in expenditures wherever possible.

I am going to support the amendment moved by the Minister of Militia, not because I am altogether out of sympathy with what has been said by those who wish to go further, but because I believe that the direction in which a party is going is a matter of principle, but the speed with which the party goes in a given direction is a matter of expediency, and I am prepared to take the attitude assumed by the Minister of Militia, who says that he believes he can make substantial reductions in his estimates. I prefer to see the pruning knife used all along the line more or less, rather than to have one slash at a particular item. There is no question about it: I believe we can effect very substantial reductions in the militia estimates without impairing the service. To give just one instance, there are 4,125 men in our permanent force, and of these 1,406, if I mistake not, are non-combatants. I think we have 105 doctors, and knowing the health of the young Canadian manhood who form our militia I believe some of these doctors must be holding sinecures. The estimates must be cut down. We cannot get on in this country, we cannot have efficiency in government anywhere along the line, unless we come down to the old fashioned adage of making both ends meet, and we have got to cut our coat according to our cloth.

Mr. MILLAR: I had wished to speak on this matter but considering that we were up last night until such a late hour this discussion now ought to come to a close. If we can do that and take an immediate vote, I am willing to refrain from speaking; if we are to continue I have some observations to make.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Vote.

The CHAIRMAN: The vote is on the amendment to the amendment moved by Mr. Lapointe.

Amendment to the amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: The vote now is on the amendment of Mr. Power as amended.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am not in favour of the motion as amended, or the amendment as amended.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not debatable. The amendment of Mr. Power has been amended upon the motion of Mr. Lapointe which was carried. That amendment provides for the reduction of the annual drill item of $1,400,000 by the sum of $400,000.

Amendment as amended agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the motion as amended carry?

Motion as amended agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

The total area mapped by the Militia Department to date is as follows: Ontario, about 25,000 square miles; Quebec, 11,395 square miles; Nova Scotia, 860 square miles; Manitoba, 160 square miles; Total area mapped to date, 37,415 square miles. 3. Yes, as funds are available.

Department of Mines—

3. Yes, if geological work in any of these areas is decided upon for which a topographical map is a necessity.

POPULATION BY AGES

Mr. McDONALD (Timiskaming):

How many people are there in Canada of the ages of fifty-five, sixty and sixty-five years?

Hon. Mr. ROBB: According to the census of 1911 (latest census year for which the information for all of Canada is available) there were in Canada 52,945 persons of the age of fifty-five, 52,433 of the age of sixty, and 33,910 of the age of sixty-five years.

LIGNITE COAL

Mr. GOULD:

1. What is the present estimated cost of briquet coal per ton at the Bienfait mines?

2. What heat units per pound does the lignite briquet, at Bienfait, show?

3. In the process of investigation, is the board tied down to the process of briquetting only?

4. Is the briquetting of the aforementioned coal the only feasible means of efficient mechanical treatment?

5. Has the board taken into consideration the burning of lignite coal in pulverized form?

6. If not, why?

7. What was the initial estimated cost of completing the experiment?

8. What amounts have been expended by, (a) The Dominion Government; (b) The Manitoba government; and (c) The Saskatchewan government, in relation to the whole work carried on at Bienfait?

9. What prospects are there of any valuable by-products as a result of the investigation that is taking place?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil):

1. The Lignite Utilization Board at present estimates the cost of briquettes at $12.25 per ton f.o.b. plant at Bienfait, Saskatchewan.

2. About 11,500 B.T.U. per pound.

3. The immediate objective of the Lignite Utilization Board is to demonstrate a process of producing a carbonized lignite briquette for domestic consumption.

4. The process of briquetting carbonized lignite is the only method known to-day likely to be successful in preparing a suitable fuel for domestic consumption from low grade lignites.

5. Yes; but such method is not suitable for domestic heating.

6. Answered by No. 5.

7. Four hundred thousand dollars was the cost estimated by a committee of the Research Council in 1917. (Preliminary investigations delayed the commencement construction of the plant at Bienfait until 1920.)

8. The Dominion Government has expended $445,000, which sum will be decreased by an amount of $35,000 due from the province of Manitoba; the Saskatchewan government has expended $205,000, and the Manitoba government $170,000.

9. The question of by-products is, in the main, one of markets, not one of technical possibility. There is no question that by-products can be produced.

In connection with the work at Bienfait, it must be borne in mind that, as the objective of the whole undertaking is to produce a domestic fuel, the process is designed to permit the greatest possible number of B.T.U.'s to be left in the lignite residue. If the objective were the removal of the maximum amount of by-products a much poorer residue would be the result. The recovery plant installed at Bienfait is, therefore, only for the purpose of removing the lignitic tars and pitches from the gas, in order that the pipes, flues and other passages may not become clogged up.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—RIGHT OF WAY AGENT

Mr. SAVARD:

1. Does the Right of Way Agent of the Department of Railways and Canals do any work in connection with the Canadian National Railways?

2. If so, of what nature?

3. Does he receive any remuneration from the Canadian National Railways over and above his departmental salary?

4. If so, what amount, and is the Civil Service Commission aware of the fact?

Hon. Mr. KENNEDY:

1. The Right-of-Way and Lease Agent of the Department of Railways and Canals has always looked after such matters in connection with government railways and canals. When the Canadian Northern was taken over, the position of Right-of-Way Agent of that road was vacant through death. It was considered an economy to have the departmental Right-of-Way and Lease Agent take over that work in addition to his previous duties.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Yes.

4. $1,000. Civil Service Commission is aware of the fact.

AUTOMOBILES IMPORTED

1. How many automobiles were imported into Canada, what was the value of same and what was the amount of customs duty collected thereon, during each of the last five years?

2. How many of said automobiles were valued at less than $1,000, and how many over that amount?

3. What was the value of automobile parts or accessories imported, and the amount of customs duty collected thereon during each of the said years?

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant) moved:

Whereas the Special Committee on Proportional Representation appointed at the last session of the late parliament, reported in favour of the adoption of the Alternative Vote method of election in all single member constituencies where more than two candidates were running for election, and also found much merit in the system of true Proportional Representation,

And whereas the recent general election has fully demonstrated the many serious anomalies of the existing electoral system,

Therefore, be it resolved:

That, in the opinion of this House the Alternative Vote method should be adopted for use in future elections for this House in all single member constituencies where more than two candidates are running for election,

Also that, in the opinion of this House, for the purpose of demonstrating the working and effect of the true Proportional Representation system, one or more multi-member constituencies should be constituted as early as possible in which that system should be applied at the next general election.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the remarks which I venture to address to the House to-day can make little or no appeal to those who do not believe in democracy. That there are many such in Canada, I am well aware; that there may be some in this House, I can well believe; but I have confidence that the majority of Canadians, both in and out of this House, do believe in democracy, in spite of its many weaknesses and bunglings. Democracy, indeed, is yet but an infant painfully learning, first to creep, and then to walk, and suffering many a tumble while growing in strength and stature. Some day democracy will grow up, and it is to those who look with faith towards that day that I make my appeal.

This is not the first time this question has been before this House, but inasmuch as there are many here to-day who have not been here in previous years, I think it well at the outset to make a brief statement of what consideration has been given to this question by previous parliaments.

Beginning then on the 15th March, 1909, the late Hon. F. D. Monk moved a resolution calling, among other things, for a select committee to investigate proportional representation. In his speech, which occupies about thirteen pages of Hansard, there is a vast amount of evidence given in favour of this new electoral method. There was considerable debate on that occasion, and finally the hon. Mr. Fielding moved a slight amendment to the resolution, and in that amended form the resolution carried unanimously. However, the matter was left over, it being then fairly late in the session and nothing further was done at that time. At the next session, on November 17, 1909, the late Mr. Monk again brought the matter up, and after a short discussion the House again endorsed the motion unanimously. On the 25th November, a committee was named composed of the following gentlemen, Messrs. W. L. Mackenzie King, Monk, Turcotte, Burrell, Magrath, Wilson and Kyte. This committee did not meet that session, but were reappointed on February 8, 1911, on the motion, I think, of the same Mr. Monk. I find no record of the activities of that committee. However, on April 30, 1917, Mr. J. C. Turriff, now in the Senate, moved a resolution in favour of proportional representation, and in the course of the debate, Mr. Kyte, who was a member of the committee, stated that the committee had met once, but that owing to the illness of Mr. Monk, the chairman, nothing further was done. Mr. Turriff's resolution was not brought to a vote, the debate being adjourned. Early in 1919 a Royal Commission on Industrial Relations was appointed and reported in favour of proportional representation. On July 5, 1919, in reply to a question in this House, Sir Robert Borden said:

> I should be very glad indeed to have a Speaker's Conference established for the purpose of considering the important question—
> Namely proportional representation.
> —to which my hon. friend has directed my attention * * * * I recognize its importance and I will be prepared to have a Speaker's Conference appointed at the next session of Parliament.

This promise on the part of Sir Robert Borden was not carried out. I do not know why; and we find that on April 4, 1921, Mr. J. A. Sexsmith, the Conservative member for East Peterborough, moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, in order to give each voter an equal share in the representation, some system of proportional representation should be adopted, and that a special committee of this House should be forthwith appointed, charged with an inquiry into the different systems of proportional representation, with a view to recommend one of these for adoption.

Mr. Sexsmith supported his resolution with a very large volume of evidence and argument, and the debate was engaged in by the following members of the then House: Mr. Levi Thomson, Mr. J. W. Edwards, Mr. Andrews (Centre Winnipeg), Hon. Mr. Calder and Messrs. Denis, Harold, Crerar, Cockshutt, McMaster, Steele (South Perth), Mackenzie King and Thompson (Yukon). I may say in passing that when Mr. Calder spoke he suggested an amendment to the resolution moved by Mr. Sexsmith, and finally, after a debate of four hours, the amendment suggested by Mr. Calder was unanimously adopted. Now I want to place upon Hansard in this connection the statement made in that debate by the present Prime Minister, Mr. Mackenzie King. He said, as reported on page 1553 of Hansard of the year 1921:

> Proportional representation, so far as I can see, is a juster system than any we have at the present time, in that it gives the electors, whether of a minority or a majority, their fair share of representation in Parliament, where their views can be aired; and it seems to me that it also gives greater freedom in that it allows the greatest possible latitude to every citizen in expressing his choice of who shall represent him in parliament, because proportional representation is founded on the true democratic principles of justice and freedom, and as it gives better expression to those principles in our electoral machinery, I, for one, strongly favour its adoption.

The committee which was then formed in response to the resolution which was carried unanimously was composed of the following members of the House: Messrs. Blain, Calder, Crowe, Currie, Davidson, Denis, Harold, Manion, McMaster, Molloy, Pardee, Sexsmith, Simpson, Sinclair, Thomson and Whidden. This special committee thus appointed met on the following dates: April 8, 14, 22, and May 12, 21 and 28th. It had submitted to it a large amount of evidence from Mr. Ronald H. Hooper, honourary secretary of the Proportional Representation Society of Canada; Mr. J. R. McNichol, Toronto; Mr. J. A. P. Haydon, speaking for Mr. Tom Moore, of the Trades and Labour Congress, and Mr. C. G. MacNeil, speaking for the Great War Veterans' Association. The committee reported on May 30, 1921, and I may say in passing that I have here the evidence submitted to them during those sittings. It is embodied in four pamphlets which contain a large quantity of very valuable evidence on this subject. The instructions given to that committee were as follows, in the amendment which Mr. Calder introduced to the original motion:

> That in the opinion of this House a special committee of this House should be appointed to consider the subject of proportional representation and the subject of the single transferable or preferential vote, and the desirability of the application of one or the other, or both, to elections to the House of Commons of Canada, and to report thereon to the House, and that such committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses under oath.

This committee reported on May 30, 1921, in part, as follows:

> Your committee has come to the conclusion that at this time it is not prepared to recommend the application of proportional representation in the next general election as a method of electing members to the House of Commons.

Permit me, in passing, to comment on that paragraph in the report.

It is somewhat vague and does not indicate whether or not the committee was prepared to recommend a partial application of proportional representation in the next election, or whether it was not prepared to recommend the universal application of the system to all constituencies in Canada. Continuing, the report says:

> The committee, however, was impressed with many of the arguments advanced by the advocates of this system, and believes that the system merits further study and investigation by the Canadian people.
> Your committee believes that in constituencies where more than two candidates present themselves the adoption of the alternative vote offers a solution of the difficulty inasmuch as by such method the candidate finally declared elected would represent the choice of the majority of the electors.
> Your committee is of the opinion that this system will give a truer reflection of the desires of the voters in the various constituencies than will be obtained where more than two candidates run under our present method of counting the votes.

That was the situation last year. The committee reported in substance as I have just read, but Parliament did not, for some reason or other, take the matter up again. I presume that it was late in the session, other business was pressing, and probably the matter was set aside. We come now to the present year and to the resolution which I have asked the privilege of moving to-day. This resolution asks for two things: first the adoption of the alternative, or transferable, or preferential, or contingent vote—all of these names are applied to it—where three or more candidates are running in a single member constituency, and in that respect it would meet with the support and endorsation of the committee last year. It goes no farther, but it goes just as far. Secondly, this resolution calls for the application of proportional representation in a small way in certain constituencies. I am not asking the House on the present occasion to give an unqualified endorsation to the principle of proportional representation, or to authorize its application in any definite number of places, or in any particular constituencies in this country, but I am asking the House to authorize the trying out of proportional representation in certain constituencies.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Toronto would be a good place for that.

Mr. GOOD: It has already been tried with great success in Winnipeg, and, as the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) suggested, Toronto, I think, is another place where it could be tried out to great advantage.

I propose to examine the two parts of the resolution separately, the alternative vote, in the first place, and proportional representation in the second place. What, then, is the need for the alternative vote? I have before me a table giving an analysis of the returns of the Canadian general election last fall, and I would like permission to have this table inserted in Hansard. It is not very long, and it might convey in a very concise form the information which I wish to present to the House. I will read the table and give the House the particulars, and then suggest, if the House is agreeable, that the information be printed in tabular form, rather than as I read it. This is a statement by provinces of the three, four and five cornered contests, with a record, by parties, of the members elected by a minority vote of their constituents. I find that in the various provinces which I shall name there were the following three, four and five cornered contests:

Ontario	60
Quebec	25
New Brunswick	4
Prince Edward Island	3
Nova Scotia	8
British Columbia	8
Manitoba	10
Saskatchewan	10
Alberta	12

Making a total of 140 constituencies in which more than two candidates ran. Now out of that 140 the following numbers were elected on a minority vote:

Ontario	48
Quebec	1
New Brunswick	1
Prince Edward Island	3
Nova Scotia	3
British Columbia	5
Manitoba	5
Saskatchewan	3
Alberta	5

Making a total of 74 constituencies where the present representatives sit in this House as minority representatives. I do not wish to imply that these representatives have no right to sit in this House. It is quite possible that, under a better system of election, they would still be here, but we do not know about that. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it would be very much better for themselves, for this House and this country, if we knew that these gentlemen who have been elected under the system that we have had in existence for many years, were entitled by virtue of being supported by a majority of their constituents who voted at the election, to a seat in this House. The distribution of these 74 minority representatives among the different parties appears in a statement I have before me. I will not give it for the various provinces, but will give the totals, to save time. They are as follows:

	Representatives elected by minority vote
Liberal party	22
Conservative party	28
Progressive party	21
Labour and Independent party	3

I may say that, in a few instances, members were elected who received barely, or not much more than, one-third of the total vote.

In the Ontario election of 1919, if my information is correct, 74 out of 111 constituencies had three, four, or five cornered contests. I wish to submit to the House, arising out of that situation, a section of the report of the committee of the Ontario legislature appointed about two years ago to consider this whole matter. I wish to state that in the report of that committee there is an unqualified endorsation of the alternative vote where more than two candidates are running, and I wish to state further that a bill is, I understand, being introduced into the Ontario legislature this year to give effect to that recommendation. I do not know whether the bill has yet received its first reading, but when I was in Toronto a little over a week ago I read the draft of the bill which had been prepared, so that there is no doubt this matter will receive very shortly the consideration of the legislature of Ontario, and I feel quite confident that either this session or next session, at all events before another provincial election is held in Ontario, the alternative vote will be adopted.

I do not know that it would be wise or necessary to take up the time in explaining to the members here the method whereby this particular system of voting can be applied. As, however, there may be in this House possibly some members, although I think very few, who do not understand the method of applying the system, I will endeavour to explain it very briefly. The ballot papers are just the same as they are at the present time. The names of the candidates running are arranged on the left hand side of the ballot paper in alphabetical order, and the blank spaces to the right are just the same as they are now. But the instructions to the voters are different; the voters are instructed to place the figure "1", or the common "x" mark, after the name of the candidate whom they choose first, the figure "2" after the name of the candidate who is their second choice, the figure "3" after the name of the candidate who is their third choice, and so on to any extent which they wish. This gives the voter an opportunity of transferring his vote from a candidate who has no chance of being elected to his second or third choice. Under our present system, every voter in a three, four or five cornered contest is placed in a most embarrasing and unfair position, and a grave injustice is done to him. Hon. members must know of many instances where voters have been placed in this unfair and embarrassing position. In the election of 1917, there were three men running in our constituency, and I remember being greatly puzzled and troubled as to how I should register my vote, because I had to consider which one of the two candidates whom I preferred above the third had the better chance of being elected. No voter ought to be compelled, by an electoral system, to consider a matter of that sort, a matter which, in the nature of the case, is utterly irrelevant; and it is unnecessary to embarrass and perplex and worry an elector with such a situation. If, on that occasion, I had been allowed to express my preference as between two of the candidates, to put my first preference down as No. 1, and my second choice as No. 2, I would have had no hesitation at all, and my wishes would have been respected. I remember, on that occasion, hearing of a man who confessed that he had voted, not for his first choice, but for his second choice, because he thought his second choice had the better chance of being elected, and he wanted to defeat the third man. I submit to all hon. gentlemen in this House, who have any regard for fairness and justice, that no elector should be placed in that position, and that if a system, which can be changed, places electors in a position like that, it is our duty to change the system in order to give the electors a fair show and a square deal.

Furthermore, not only is this embarrassing to the elector; it is unfair to the total electorate and to the country. It is discreditable to this Parliament to allow a situation like that to continue, particularly when we have so many three, four and five cornered contests as we have had recently, and as we are likely to have in the near future.

If we have any regard for the principle of democracy, we must surely go to this extent, at all events, that the representatives of the electorate in the House should be returned here by a majority of their constituents. We can do more; but that is the least we can do. And when we find, at the present time and in the present House, 74 members who sit here on a minority vote, such a condition of affairs is discreditable to this House, and we are not doing our duty to this country and to the electorate, if we allow such a condition to continue any longer. Therefore, with respect to the alternative or transferable vote, quite regardless of any system of proportional representation and having reference only to our present electoral system of single member constituencies, we ought to provide that, where more than two candidates are running, every elector should have the privilege of recording his second or third choice, as the case may be, so that, in the event of his first choice not having any chance of being elected, he should not lose his vote, but should be privileged to record his vote and to have it counted in the final result. If we do that, then we shall guarantee that, on every occasion, a member who sits in this House sits here as the representative of the majority of the electors in his constituency.

Now, why should we not stop there and say: That is sufficient? I will answer the question—because even if you go that far, inevitable inaccuracies will occur under the single member constituency system. The alternative vote will bring us back again only to the situation which we had before there were more than two parties; to the situation where a representative sat in this House by reason of the fact that he was elected by a majority. We shall get only that far, and I am going to submit to this House some evidence to show that that is not enough; that that will not get us where we ought to go and ought to be. I wish to cite some figures in connection with various elections to show the extraordinary inaccuracies and injustices that are bound to prevail to a greater or less degree under the system of single member constituencies, no matter whether we have the alternative vote or not. Let us take first the British Columbia provincial elections of 1912. I find that the Conservative party on that occasion—and in order to save time, I will give the figures in round numbers—polled a vote of about 51,000 and got 31 representatives and also an additional nine by acclamation. The Liberal party polled about 21,000 votes, and they did not secure a single representative in that legislature. The Socialist and Independent party, with a total vote of about 12,000, secured two representatives. Therefore, in that particular case, 21,000 Liberal voters in British Columbia were totally unrepresented in the provincial legislature. Let us take the federal elections of 1904 in Nova Scotia. The Liberals polled about 56,000 votes and secured 18 representatives; the Conservatives polled 46,000 votes and did not secure a single one. Take the federal elections in British Columbia in 1911: the Conservative party polled a vote of 25,000 odd, and secured seven representatives; the Liberal party polled a vote of 16,000, and did not secure a single representative. So there you have the reverse situation from that which existed in Nova Scotia in 1904.

Here are the results, for the whole country, of the federal elections in 1896. The Conservative party at that time polled a vote of 416,000—I am giving only round numbers—and secured 88 representatives; the Liberal party polled a vote of 405,000 and secured 118 representatives. So that you have in that election a minority of the total vote securing a very considerable majority of the representatives. Independents at that time polled a vote of 76,000 and secured 7 representatives.

The Manitoba provincial elections of July, 1914, give this result: Liberal vote, 74,000, representation 21; Conservative votes, 68,000,—less, mark you—and representation, 25, along with 3 other representatives who were elected by acclamation. The Independent party, with a vote of nearly 8,000, secured no representation at all.

Take the Canadian federal elections of 1908: the Liberal party secured a vote of 594,000, getting a representation in this House of 135; the Conservatives, with a vote of 552,000, secured a representation of 86, so that the representation of Conservatives at that time was disproportionately decreased. In the federal elections of 1911 the Conservative vote was 669,000 and the representation 134; the Liberal vote was 625,000, almost as great, and the representation only 87,—a reversal of the situation in 1908.

Let us now come to the situation in Great Britain. The returns for the general elections in Great Britain of December, 1918, give the following results—the last column indicates the number to which the party is entitled by the vote registered:

Coalition groups	Votes polled	Seats obtained	Seats in Proportion to votes
Coalition-Liberal..	1,500,000	103	73
Coalition-Unionist.	3,500,000	285	184
Coalition-Labour..	48,000	3	3

In the last case you have an accidental equality, and the same thing occurred in the case of the National-Democratic party, which was entitled to 12 seats, having regard to the vote polled, and obtained 12. In the case of the Independent-Unionists, however, the seats obtained were 25, whereas they were entitled to only 20. The total vote was 5,500,000; seats obtained, 428; number of seats in proper proportion to vote polled, 292. I shall not give the details as to the vote polled by the non-Coalition groups, composed of Liberal, Labour, Socialist and Farmers, Co-operatives, National party and Nationalists, and Independents, but the total was slightly over 4,000,000 and the representation secured was 81, although they were entitled to 217. You see, therefore, that in that particular election the Coalition with its allied groups was disproportionately represented, whereas the non-Coalition groups did not secure their fair share of representation.

The Transvaal provincial elections of April 1914, show the following result:

Party	Vote polled	Seats obtained	Seats in proportion to vote
Labour..	26,000	23	16
Unionist..	12,000	2	7
South African parties.. ..	6,000	1	3

In the Ontario elections of 1919 a Conservative vote of 386,000 won 25 seats; a Liberal vote of 336,000 won 29 seats; a Farmer vote of 256,000, considerably less than either of the other groups, won 45 seats; a Labour and Independent vote of 173,000 won 12 seats. In the Alberta elections of 1921, 97,00 Liberal votes elected 15 representatives; 81,000 Farmer votes elected 39 representatives; 32,000 Conservative votes did not elect a single man; and 30,000 Labour votes elected 3.

May I refer also, amidst a great mass of similar evidence, to the situation in the New York aldermanic elections in November of last year. About 250,000 Democratic voters elected 33 aldermen; 258,000 Republican voters did not elect a single representative. I have here some other results of elections in the United States, but possibly I had better forbear reading them. The figures are even more astounding than in the case of the Canadian and other elections to which I have referred, showing that under the single member district system you sometimes get the most extraordinary results. I have in mind an election in Indiana. I have not the facts before me, but speaking from memory I think it was about the year 1912. At all events, in this particular election the Republican party was split into the Progressives and the Stand-pat Republicans, and the vote was so split in the various constituencies that the Republican party did not secure a single representative in the state legislature; the Democratic party, with a minority of the total vote, secured the total representation. In the next election, when the two factions in the Republican party had become reunited, the Republicans secured every one of the representatives. Now there is a situation, Mr. Speaker, that I think we ought to face very frankly. It does not always happen, but if it does not happen it is only by accident. It may happen at any time that you have the pendulum swinging from one extreme to the other, and I submit that it is a very unwise thing, it is a very harmful thing, for any such condition of affairs to exist.

I come next to the Canadian elections of last fall. I have prepared here a very exhaustive analysis of the results of the late Canadian general elections. The figures are given according to provinces; I will just explain briefly the information which this set of tables contains. In the left hand column I have the constituencies; following I have the various parties—Progressive, Liberal, Conservative, Labour, Independent and miscellaneous, and under each heading I have the name of the candidate and the vote which he secured. On the right-hand side I have three other columns giving the number of votes counted, the number of names on the list, and the percentage of the votes polled to the total vote. I think this may be useful for other purposes than that which I am using it for on this occasion. At the bottom I have the following information for each province: the number of candidates running for each party, the total vote for each party's candidates, the percentage of the total vote obtained by each party, the number of candidates actually elected, and the number who should have been elected according to the votes polled.

I now leave that rather extensive set of tables and turn to a condensation of them. On the first page I have stated the votes polled for the various parties by provinces, and I have added those votes together to determine the representation, on the basis of the total votes polled in the whole Dominion which each of the parties should have got in the last federal election. I find that representation should be as follows: Liberals, 96 members; Conservatives, 73 members; Progressives, 55 members; Labour, 4 members; Independents, 7 members.

On the next page I have an analysis of these figures by provinces. I think this page might well be inserted in Hansard because the information is conveyed in very concise form, but if this is not permissible I shall have to read out the figures. I have shown here the seats actually obtained by the various parties, with the number of seats which they were entitled to by reason of the total vote polled.

In Ontario the Liberals secured 21 seats, they were entitled to 45; the Conservatives secured 37 seats; they were entitled to 32;

Mr. McMASTER: Do those figures refer to the last general election?

Mr. GOOD: Yes. The Progressives secured 24 seats, they were entitled to 23; the Labour and Independent parties did not secure any representatives; they were entitled to two.

In Quebec the Liberals secured 65 seats, they were entitled to 45; the Conservatives failed to secure any, they were entitled to 13 seats; the Progressives were similarly unsuccessful, they were entitled to 3 seats; the Labour and Independent parties fared no better than the Conservatives and Progressives, they were entitled to 4 seats.

In New Brunswick the Liberals secured 5 seats, they were entitled to 6; the Conservatives secured 5 seats, they were entitled to 4; the Progressives secured one seat, they were entitled to one.

In Nova Scotia the Liberals secured 16 seats, they were entitled to 8; the Conservatives did not secure any, whereas they were entitled to 5; the Progressives also failed to get any representation, while they were entitled to 2; and finally Independent and Labour parties failed to get representation though entitled to one member.

In Prince Edward Island the Liberals secured 4 seats, they were entitled to 2; the Conservative representation was zero, they were entitled to 2 seats; the Progressive, Labour and Independent parties did not secure a single seat; nor were they entitled to any—they might have been entitled to a fraction of a representative, that is all.

In British Columbia the Liberals secured 3 seats, they were entitled to 4; the Conservatives secured 7 seats, they were entitled to 3; the Progressives secured 3 seats; they were entitled to 2; the Labour and Independent parties failed to win a single seat, they were entitled to 1.

In Manitoba the Liberals secured 2 representatives, including one who styled himself an Independent Liberal; they were entitled to two; the Conservatives did not secure a single seat, they were entitled to 4; the Progressives secured 12 seats; they were entitled to 7; the Independents and Labourites secured 1 seat; they were entitled to 2.

In Saskatchewan the Liberals secured 1 seat, they were entitled to 3; the Conservatives did not secure a single seat, they were entitled to 3; the Progressives secured 15 seats, they were entitled to 10.

In Alberta the Liberals did not secure any representation, they were entitled to 2 seats; the Conservatives were equally unfortunate, they were entitled to 3 seats; the Progressives secured 10 seats; they were entitled to 6; the Independents and Labourites secured 2 seats; they were entitled to 1.

4 p.m.

In the Yukon there is just one representative, a Conservative. The vote there was very small.

I have a supplementary table, Mr. Speaker, giving an analysis of the vote in the island of Montreal and in the city of Toronto which may be of interest to hon. members.

In Montreal the Conservatives polled about 44,000 votes, they did not elect a single representative; the Liberals polled 166,000 votes, they elected 12 representatives; the Labourites and Independents polled 22,000 votes, they did not elect any representatives.

The representatives which these parties were entitled to are respectively: 2 Conservatives, 9 Liberals, 1 Labourite or Independent.

[Mr. Good.]

In the city of Toronto the figures are: Conservative vote, about 44,000, seats obtained 6, seats entitled to 3; Liberal vote 26,000, no seats obtained, seats entitled to 2; Labour and Independent vote 14,000, no representation, entitled to 1 seat.

Now, Sir, I should like to draw attention to this point. The Liberal party in this House is, under our present system, disproportionately represented. I am not attaching any blame to them at all on that account; it is not their fault.

Mr. McMASTER: It was the electors' fault.

Mr. GOOD: Whether that be so or not, I cannot say, but at all events they are disproportionately represented. There is a disposition on the part of any party that has more than its fair share of power to be rather well satisfied with the situation for the time being. But I would submit to the Government and to the Liberal party that there is another side, and a very important one, to that question. All elections under our system show that the swing of the pendulum is very severe at times. In Australia a few years ago there were two main parties in a general election, the Labour party and the Anti-Labour party. If my memory serves me right, the Anti-Labour party secured a disproportionate amount of representation. The Labour party were sore and disappointed and they protested, but the other party snapped its fingers at them; it was well satisfied with the results on that particular occasion. But the next election reversed the situation with a vengeance, and the Labour party was able to snap its fingers at the defeated Anti-Labour party. This is unfortunate.

Let me submit to the House some figures from two of our federal elections, those of 1908 and 1911, to illustrate this danger. In 1908 the Liberals polled 594,000 votes, and secured 135 representatives; the Conservatives polled 552,000 votes, and secured 86 representatives. The Liberal party had a majority of 49, but the majority they were entitled to according to the popular vote was 7. In 1911 the Conservatives polled, in round figures, 669,000 votes, and obtained 134 representatives, while the Liberals polled 625,000 votes and obtained 87 representatives. The majority for the Conservatives was 47, almost as great a majority as the Liberals had obtained in the previous election, while, according to the popular vote the Conservatives were entitled to a majority of only

9. I wish to point out in that connection this fact: that the Liberal party in the election of 1908 won their majority of 49 by majorities in 49 constituencies amounting in the aggregate to only a little over 6,000 votes. A change of somewhat over half of that vote, had it been properly distributed, would have wiped out their majority. In the 1911 election a similar situation existed with respect to the Conservative party, that is they won their 47 majority by combined majorities of only a little over 5,000 votes, and if a little over one-half of that had switched, it would have wiped out the total majority in the House. So I think all hon. gentlemen will see that under our present system all kinds of extraordinary results may follow an election. You cannot tell what is going to happen. If we are to regard our political life as a sort of game or interesting gamble, that may be all right, but if our viewpoint ought to be, and I think it will be, more and more, that we are gathered here to represent the various parties and opinions and elements in this country and to legislate for the benefit of the whole, I say it is wrong for us to allow any system to remain in existence which may cause such extraordinary and unfair results. It seems to me, therefore, that the Liberal party on the present occasion, or any party which may be over represented in any parliament or legislature, ought to recognize that the present method is a very unsafe foundation upon which to base any policy. The simple fact that a party has a majority in the House is not a satisfactory foundation.

I have pointed out some of the very extraordinary and very bad results that occur under the present system in single member constituencies, and I wish now to contrast with that some of the results that follow under proportional representation.

I wish to read a few figures to show the extraordinary accuracy with which proportional representation reflects the public will as expressed by the vote.

In the Tasmanian House of Assembly in the years 1909, 1912, 1916, and 1919, there were two parties running, Labour and anti-Labour. In 1909 Labour was entitled to 11.69 representatives, and secured 12; anti-Labour was entitled to 18.31, and secured 18. I shall not take the time of the House to read the figures for the other years, but the results were practically as accurate. In the Belgian parliament, in the elections of 1908, we find that the Catholics secured 3 seats, and were entitled to 36; the Liberals and Socialists secured 43, and were entitled to 44; the Christian Democrats, secured 1, the number to which they were entitled. In the parliamentary elections in Finland in 1909, the Social-Democratic party obtained 84 seats, and was entitled to 80; the old Finn party secured 48, and was entitled to 47; the young Finn party secured 28 seats, and was entitled to 29, and so with the three other parties that were running. I have also the figures for the New South Wales election of 1920, but I shall not read them for time is passing. The figures I have already given show that under this better and more scientific system of elections, the various groups of thought and parties in a country secure fair representation. In conclusion, I may point to the Winnipeg election of June, 1920, which was another admirable example of the accuracy which is obtainable under this new system.

Some men in Canada regard proportional representation as a fad. I was very much amused, in reading the evidence submitted before the committee last year, to find one gentleman, who does not happen to be in the House this year, making an assault upon one of the witnesses, charging him with all kinds of horrible things, and denouncing proportional representation as a "new fad," and I know not what. In answer to that objection, if I may so call it, I wish to state that proportional representation is not a fad. It has been seriously considered by, I think, most of the civilized countries in the world and has been adopted by a great many of them. I have here some figures in that connection which I should like to place before the House in as brief a form as possible. They are taken from the Journal of Comparative Legislation and International Law of January, 1921. I will first enumerate the various countries of Australasia where the system is in force and I will give the data in somewhat scrappy form so as to save time.

In New South Wales, First attempt made in 1862. Proportional representation enacted for election of Legislative Assembly in 1918. Used in 1920.

Queensland and Victoria. Use the transferable or alternative vote at the present time.

Tasmania. Proportional representation adopted in Tasmania in towns of Hobart and Launceston in 1896. Used in elections of 1897 and 1900. Repealed in 1901 owing to its limited application.

That is the application to just these two towns.

Adopted again in 1907 for whole island and used there in the years 1909, 1912, 1913, 1916, and 1919.

I may say that in 1917 there was an amendment to the law which provided for the holding of by-elections, a matter which I shall take up a little later.

New Zealand: Attempts first made in 1878. First established 1914 for election of the Legislative Council. Suspended during the war. It is to be used this year, 1922.

I have no information as to whether it has been used or not this year.

In 1914 it was made permissible for municipalities and used by the city of Christ Church and the borough of Woolston in 1917.

South Africa. Established by the South Africa Act of the British Parliament in 1909 to be applied to the Senate and the Executive Council, and to the Executive Committee of the Provincial Councils.

In the United Kingdom—

And I would like hon. members to note this.

In England proportional representation adopted for certain constituencies in 1918, also used for the election of the House of Laity in the Church of England, National Assembly 1920; and a Bill for the municipal use of proportional representation passed the House of Lords in 1920.

Scotland. The Education Act of 1918 provided proportional representation for school board elections, held in 1919.

I may say that I have—but it is not in my possession at present,—I left it with another member—a large sheet showing the detailed results of the last proportional representation elections for the Glasgow School Board.

Ireland. Government of Ireland Act, 1914, established proportional representation for election of the Irish Senate.

I will not read all the details for I wish to hurry on.

The Local Government Act in Ireland, 1919 established proportional representation for all local elections; the Home Rule Act in 1920.

India. The Government of India Act, 1919, provided for the use of the single transferable vote in several different elections in several of the provinces.

United States. Proportional representation has only been adopted so far in a number of cities.

Continent of Europe.

Switzerland. Proportional representation was introduced into Canton of Ticino in 1891 and adopted, in 1919, after having spread gradually through that country, by the Swiss Confederation for their federal elections.

Belgium. P.R. was introduced in 1895. Used for parliamentary elections 1899 and used ever since then. In use at the present time.

Bulgaria has used it since 1914.

Denmark since 1909 for municipal representation; since 1915 for parliamentary elections.

Holland since 1918.

Sweden since 1909.

Finland since 1906.

Norway for municipal purposes (optional) since 1896.

Germany since 1918-1919.

Austria since 1919.

Luxembourg since 1919.

Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, Italy, and France in part, have recently adopted proportional representation.

In the South American countries there has been some considerable adoption of this new system of election;

I might mention the following Canadian cities as having adopted proportional representation recently. I will not give the dates although I have them here: Winnipeg, Vancouver, Calgary, Regina, Saskatoon, Moosejaw, North Battleford, Port Coquitlam, B.C., and West Vancouver. As to Canada apart from that—and we are more particularly interested in Canada—I submit the following facts:

Toronto District Labour Council has used proportional representation since 1898, and later other organizations followed suit.

In 1916 the city of Ottawa petitioned the Provincial government for permission to use proportional representation.

In 1916 the Alberta Legislature passed permissive legislation for Calgary and Edmonton. In 1917, 1918, 1919 Calgary used the method.

And there are further details, which I have not time now to read, as respects British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario.

I may say that I have here the report of the Ontario committee which was appointed about two years ago to investigate this matter. It contains a lot of evidence and the recommendation for the adoption not only of the alternative vote but of proportional representation in four different grouped constituencies in the next provincial election.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have before me here in very concise form the aims of proportional representation, as outlined in the organ of the British Proportional Representation League, which I would like to place on record. They are as follows:

Our aims.

1. To reproduce the opinions of the electors in Parliament and other public bodies in their true proportions.

2. To secure that the majority of electors shall rule and all considerably minorities shall be heard.

3. To give electors a wider freedom in the choice of representatives.

4. To give representatives greater independence from the financial and other pressure of small sections of constituents.

5. To ensure to parties representation by their ablest and most trusted members.

Now, in regard to the method of application of proportional representation, I doubt whether at this hour, in view of the fact that there are a number of other speakers to be heard, I should take any time in explaining that method; but I would like to read in that connection from the evidence submitted last year to the Parliamentary Committee which I think puts it in a very pleasing, clear and definite way. I will read from the report of the committee of last year as follows:

Hon. Mr. Calder: Why do you speak of three groups of Conservatives and two groups of Liberals of 10,000 each?

Mr. Hooper: I will try to visualize it for you in a general way.

Hon. Mr. Calder: You propose one constituency for the city of Toronto?

Mr. Hooper: Yes, and the members would be elected in this way: Imagine the candidates to be spaced out at intervals on some large open space, and imagine each elector, as he arrives, walking up to, and standing beside, the candidate he most prefers. Now it is comparatively certain that one candidate—

Possibly more than one I may interject—

—will be outstandingly popular and that a large number of supporters will soon be gathered around him. It will be seen that he has a sufficient number of supporters to secure his election, and therefore other electors who might still desire to vote for him, will be asked, not to waste their votes upon one already elected, but to select a second choice from among the other candidates still in the field. In this way then, we will ultimately have all the electors grouped around the various candidates of their choice. But so far we have only elected one—

Possibly two I may interject.

—we desire to elect five. The next step then, will be to declare defeated the candidate who has the fewest number of supporters. The voters gathered around such defeated candidate will be asked not to lose interest in the election and go home defeated and sullen, but to make a second choice among the other candidates available. In this way the lowest candidates will be eliminated one after another, and their supporters will be asked to make other choices until, finally, five candidates only will remain, each of whom will have a quota of supporters standing beside him. In this way five groups would be formed of the electorate of Toronto each of whom would obtain a representative in Parliament.

In the second paragraph, which I will not read, the witness goes on to explain how, by the use of the single transferable vote and the methods of proportional representation, the same freedom of choice of the electors will be secured under our ordinary balloting system.

I have now come to the last section of my argument, and that is a consideration of the advantages of, and the objections to, proportional representation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think the hon. member has not explained the method by which the alternative vote is used.

Mr. GOOD: I think I explained the use of the alternative vote in a single-member constituency, where the voter has the privilege of expressing his choice and thus giving instructions to the returning officer to use his ballot for the second or third man, in case his first choice should not have any chance of succeeding in the election. That had reference to the election of members in single-member constituencies, and if the hon. minister who has just asked the question will pardon me from going further into it, and will read Hansard to-morrow, I think he will understand that part of it. I do not wish to take up time repeating what I have said, but the same system of voting is used in proportional representation, but applied slightly differently. To explain briefly: the surplus votes of those who get more than the quota are distributed according to the second, third, or fourth choices as expressed on them, and after the surplus votes are distributed, the returning officer starts at the bottom of the list and distributes first the votes of the man who is at the bottom of the poll, according to the expressed wish of the electors themselves, and so on upwards, until there finally remain the required number of candidates elected.

Returning to the advantages and disadvantages (or objections), I call attention first to a rather singular letter which appeared in the Citizen not long ago signed by T. W. Quayle, of Ottawa. I do not know the gentleman at all, but it is a very extraordinary letter, and it is practically, so far as I can understand it, a defence of majority representation, which, of course, we get under the old-fashioned system. If there are any hon. members who will defend majority representation as a proper system, it seems to me we might just as well poll our party votes in a lump, and give instructions to the party leaders to select committees to help them out in whatever way they liked. That would be the logical outcome of a system of majority representation. Nay more, it might be worse than that, because it might result in this—in fact, that is the logical result—that the leader of the majority party would be given carte blanche to govern the country. That, I think, is the ultimate logical outcome of the theory of majority representation. I would like to call the attention of the House, in reply to this objection, to the very necessary distinction between majority rule and majority representation: majority rule we must have, but majority representation we need not and should not have.

In the second place, proportional representation provides for a reasonable security of tenure of office in the case of outstanding men. That is not so under the old system, and I call attention to the fact that in 1895 John Morley, one of the most celebrated of English statesmen, was defeated in his constituency and removed from the arena of political life for a number of years, to the great disadvantage of the public life of his country. I point also to certain instances in Canada in recent years. In the election of 1919 we saw the defeat of Sir William Hearst, former Premier of the province of Ontario. I think I may express the opinion, without endorsing Mr. Hearst's policies that it was not a good thing for the province of Ontario that Mr. Hearst was removed from the public life of Ontario; and under another system, no doubt, he would have been permitted to remain in public life. I call attention also to the defeat of the right hon. member who leads the Conservative party in this House (Mr. Meighen) in the last election in Portage la Prairie, and to the difficulties which occurred after that in finding a seat for that right hon. member. I may say also that there are not very many, although there may be some, who would wish that the right hon. member from Grenville should have been deprived of the opportunity to participate in the public life of this country, and I am not one of those. I regard the right hon. gentleman as a very useful member of the House, and if he could only get rid of his partizanship he would be an extremely useful man in this Chamber. I may also point out that the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), a man of undoubted ability and integrity, who has had long experience in public life in the West, had all kinds of difficulties in finding a seat in this House. These are some of the things that are inevitable under the old system, but under the other system, with the multi-membered constituency, it would be relatively easy for men of outstanding ability to secure election, and the membership in our parliamentary bodies would be more continuous, and not so spasmodic or so excessively fluctuating as at the present time.

In the third place, I wish to answer the objection which has been registered against proportional representation, that it will lead to small government majorities, and that small government majorities are a misfortune. I submit that the allegation cannot be substantiated. What is the situation at the present time? What is the situation in Ontario, where under the old system the government has a bare majority of one or two? What is the situation at Ottawa where the Government has no majority at all? Consider the last British Columbia provincial election, when a minority vote gave the government a majority of two seats under the old system. In New South Wales, in 1910, Labour secured a majority of two and had to carry on with that majority. The government of the Australian Commonwealth, in the years 1913 and 1919, secured a majority of only one. In New Zealand, in 1915, under the old system, the government secured a majority of one. I submit, the facts do not at all substantiate this charge, indeed proportional representation will yield a small government majority only when the parties are evenly divided. And now, as we have more than two parties, we have an entirely new situation. You are practically never, not, at least, in the near future, going to get a situation, so far as we can see, where we have only two parties in this House and those pretty evenly divided. I submit further, that proportional representation will increase the strength and stability of governments in two ways: first, by improving the personnel—and I have some evidence to submit in that connection—second, by enabling a government to conform to the will of the people. I may just interject at this point that I am very glad to observe the disposition on the part of the Government to modify their policy in accordance with the opinions and wishes prevailing in this House. I wish to endorse what was said yesterday in that respect. In this connection, I desire to quote from a speech delivered by M. Georges Lorand, a Belgian, in London in 1914. He said in part:

> The various political parties were represented—

That is since 1900, when proportional representation began to be used.

> —by their ablest men and leaders whilst under the former majority system prominent men passed half their political lives outside the House.

I mentioned a few minutes ago the case of Mr. John Morley, who was ousted from public life in Great Britain because of the old system.

The Belgian government, prior to the war, remained in office for thirteen years, and at one time it had a majority of only 6 out of 166 members. Why did it stay there? Because it correctly gauged public opinion. A government is more stable, even with a small majority accurately obtained under proportional representation, than with a very large majority inaccurately obtained. In fact, under the old system, political elections are pretty much of a gamble, and at any time a party, not controlled by the highest and most patriotic motives, might be tempted to try its luck in an election. I could submit also some testimony from Tasmania in that connection, and testimony by Mr. Asquith and Lord Robert Cecil; but as the time is passing, I refrain. Perhaps, I may submit just one of these testimonies. In a speech delivered by the Prime Minister of Australia on February 12, 1914, at a time when they were under the old system, he said:

> The present position of affairs is impossible . . . . There are tremendous financial and business problems requiring treatment and when we attempt to deal with them, we find ourselves "burked" and "scotched" by our opponents.

There you have the situation as it exists under the old system. I may say, by way of comment, that as anything may happen in an election under the old system a party may, if it is unscrupulous, try its luck in order to snatch an advantage, and the public interests will be thereby sacrificed. I have quotations from Mr. Asquith who has had a very long experience in British politics, and also a quotation from Lord Robert Cecil, but I shall not take time to read them on account of the lateness of the hour.

In conclusion, I should like to repeat that the allegation that proportional representation encourages small government majorities, and is therefore, not to be desired, cannot possibly be sustained. The evidence is wholly to the contrary.

Mr. LEWIS: While the hon. member is on this point, I should like to ask him a question. He said that the allegation as regards proportional representation encouraging small government majorities cannot be sustained. Will he kindly tell the House how he would deal, if proportional representation had been in effect in Canada during the last election with a House composed of 96 Liberals, 55 Progressives, 73 Conservatives, 7 Independents and 4 Labour members? There would have been no majority of any party unless we had some different form of coalition between two parties to form a majority at all. Will the hon. member kindly explain that?

Mr. GOOD: The situation would be different only in degree, not in essence, from the situation which exists at the present time, and the difficulties that we would have faced then would have been absolutely the same as the difficulties which we face now. In my judgment, while this is not altogether relevant to the question, I consider that we should turn our attention to some new constitutional methods of getting the best results out of a House like this where there are a number of parties. Perhaps, without taking further time to reply, that might suffice.

I come next to a charge which has been made against proportional representation, and in my observation—and I have had a good deal of experience in discussing this matter for a number of years—this is the greatest objection which has been levelled against proportional representation, namely, that it encourages the formation of groups and that, as groups are,—I will not say undesirable, but rather disagreeable to those people who wish the two party system to be maintained, therefore, proportional representation is undesirable. In that respect, I wish to submit the considered opinion of a committee appointed in 1909 or 1910 by the British Parliament in connection with this matter. Let me read just a sentence from this report which is well worthy of consideration. The committee states:

> We are inclined to think that the multiplication of small parties feared by opponents, and the encouragement of the independent member hoped for by advocates, are alike exaggerated in the evidence given before us.

Just as in the previous case, I desire to point out that groups have arisen and are bound to arise under the old system, and we are not getting away from the difficulty that is raised by the formation or extension of groups, by sticking to the old system of election. In England, the Parliamentary Companion of November, 1920, gives twelve groups as composing the British House of Commons. In France, under the old system of election—and I would like to mention that there are some people who point to France as a horrible example of proportional representation—groups existed, and the attempt which was made at proportional representation three years ago, was made in an endeavour to overcome difficulties created by the great multiplicity of groups. In Belgium too, we have some testimony, part of which I should like to read. This is from a book entitled "How the World Votes" by two professors of Yale University:

> Proportional representation in Belgium has not increased the number of small parties, as was feared before its adoption . . . . Its desirability is no longer open to serious question. The leaders of all the chief political parties, and the bulk of the voters seek, not to abolish proportional representation, but to make it more perfect.

I have two other quotations along the same lines, one from Mr. J. Fischer Williams, an English writer on political subjects in a book entitled, "The Reform of Political Representation," and testimony also from M. Georges Lorand, Liberal leader in the Belgium House of Representatives. I will not read this because time is passing rapidly; but all this is testimony from people who have had actual experience, and it goes to show that proportional representation does not encourage the formation of groups, but only enables groups to be properly represented. In fact, M. Lorand, says that instead of encouraging the multiplication of groups it rather encourages the consolidation of various sections or groups into larger groups, at the same time permitting the greatest freedom within them. I submit also that in Canada at the present time groups are a condition, not a theory, and that we have to face the situation; we have to provide such electoral and constitutional machinery as will give us the best possible results under existing conditions. As an example of this, and in proof of my statement, I simply refer again to what I have already pointed out, that in the last Dominion elections 140 constituencies had three, four or five-cornered contests.

Let me for a few moments refer to the connection between proportional representation and the spoils system. I think there is an obvious advantage in having a constituency represented by a number of members from various political groups. Let me submit in that connection this testimony from the treasurer of Tasmania, who speaks after some years of experience:

> Districts still demand assistance from the government, but every electoral district—they are large—returns mixed representation, some supporters of the government and some supporters of the opposition. Under such a system there can be no discrimination between electoral district and electoral district in the appropriation of moneys.

We who have studied or watched Canadian politics for the last twenty or thirty years know how much evil has been done through the distribution of patronage in the various constituencies. Proportional Representation, I submit, is a measure which is calculated to make that distribution of patronage very difficult, if not impossible.

Again it is alleged that proportional representation is un-British. Now, that is a ridiculous, an absurd statement. I have here—I will not take time to read it—a quotation which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of January 7 of this year, containing an extract from a document prepared by a number of very prominent Britishers in which the principle of proportional representation was heartily endorsed. We have also the British report to which I have referred, indicating that the British Parliament and people are considering the matter. We have another report of the Speaker's conference held in 1917, which I understand the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) has here and may make some reference to. The subject, therefore, is being considered and regarded favourably by the British people.

I pass on to consider another objection, namely, that by-elections would be difficult, if not impossible, under proportional representation. Some people are staggered at the prospect of holding by-elections in multi-member constituencies. But there are ways of getting around the difficulty. In every new thing difficulties are involved; we ought to face them and solve them as far as possible. In the first place, then, in order to provide for by-elections we may do as, I think, is done in Winnipeg: each member elected may choose his own district in the order of his election, and in the event of his vacating his seat the vote would be polled only in that particular district; it would not be necessary to poll the whole constituency. That is a possible way out of it; it puts us back under the old system for the time being, for the purposes of by-elections. There is another system in vogue, in Tasmania, I think, and possibly elsewhere, under which a re-examination is made of the ballots used for the election of the member dying or vacating his seat, and the man next in order takes his place. I may say also that in Belgium a number of supplementary candidates are voted on at the principal election and on the same ballot paper, for the purpose of filling vacancies. It is also possible to co-opt a member for the time being, just as a board of directors in the case of a vacancy will elect somebody to fill the vacancy until the next meeting of the shareholders is held. Finally, something that we can always resort to if other measures fail, or are regarded as undesirable, is this: we can poll the whole constituency. Although it may be a little expensive, it would not in some cases be a bad thing to reconsult the people.

Then again the statement has been made that a tremendous amount of labour would be involved under proportional representation in canvassing a large constituency. At first sight that seems to be a great difficulty, and it has been brought up time and time again. I submit, however, that the difficulty is imaginary rather than real. For example, in a single member district with 100 voters the candidate must get at least 51 of those votes to be elected; he must canvass or speak to the electors or in some way secure that percentage of the votes. But if you take a ten-member constituency with 1,000 voters, a candidate in order to be elected needs to poll a minimum of only 92 votes. It can readily be seen, therefore, that the difficulty has been grossly exaggerated. I would like to point out also that the practice of going round and shaking hands with every elector and otherwise personally communicating with him is disappearing; electors are voting now for candidates on their records as men who know something about public affairs, and on their integrity; also on the platforms of their parties. I think that the conditions are becoming such that this difficulty will be greatly minimized in the future.

I would point out also that under our present system, the small floating or purchasable vote in every constituency has a tremendously exaggerated influence, and a candidate may feel it necessary or desirable to cater to the desires of this class of voter. That is a most unfortunate and deplorable thing in our public life. I may say, too, that elections are likely to be cheaper under proportional representation; experience has shown that to be a fact. Where you have joint candidates running as representing any party, as happened in Winnipeg, the labour of canvassing and speaking at the various meetings may be divided between the various speakers. Literature may also be got out jointly. I recall that in the city of Ottawa last December two Progressive candidates—I do not know about the others—got out their campaign literature jointly. That shows the advantage of this system from the point of view of expense of either canvassing or otherwise conducting a campaign. I have some evidence in that respect from Winnipeg, but I prefer at this hour not to submit it.

The last point I wish to deal with is the charge that proportional representation would be difficult, if not impossible, to carry out in large sparsely-populated areas. I am not asking the House to apply proportional representation at this time to our large and sparsely-settled constituencies. But I would like to point out that the difficulty existing in a five or six-member constituency in my section of Ontario would be no greater than that which now exists in many constituencies in our newer country in the West—in Alberta or British Columbia. In fact, we can form group constituencies in lower Ontario which are very much smaller, and which can be covered very much more easily by candidates, than was the case in the last election in our north country. I venture to state that there are hon. members here who can give personal testimony to that effect.

Let me also submit to the House that the island of Tasmania, about the size of New Brunswick, is divided into five constituencies, six members being elected from each constituency. They have no particular difficulty there in applying this system. In Australia the senate is elected by proportional representation, each state being polled as a single constituency, and neither have they any particular difficulty there with the system.

Now I turn to Sweden. I quote the leader of the Liberal party in the First Chamber of the Riksdag, who stated in the course of a speech in London:

> Although I was in favour of proportional voting, I nevertheless hesitated about the advisability of adopting it in Sweden, in view of the vast extent and sparse population of the country. The experience gained up to now of the method in actual use does not, however, lend support to the misgivings that I cherished. My anxiety lest the then prevalent keen interest in the conduct of public affairs might wane and grow slack has not turned out to be well founded; the various schools of political thought have been represented in right and due proportion, and as a rule by those men whom they severally most favoured. A return to the majority voting cannot be looked upon any longer as a business proposition.

I have in my hand a letter received a short time ago from Mr. Alfred J. Gray, of the British Proportional Representation Society, with reference to elections in Australia under this system. I shall not read the letter, but its testimony is along the same lines.

I submit, therefore, that although there are difficulties in connection with the adoption of this system in large areas, we do not need to consider those difficulties because we are not suggesting its adoption over the whole country at the outset. The second part of my resolution, as hon. members have no doubt noticed, calls only for the formation of certain trial constituencies—some cities have already adopted the system, for instance, the city of Winnipeg—and in that way we shall, without committing ourselves to any wholesale endorsation of the principle, start in a careful and cautious way, testing it out as we go along.

In the past this question has been discussed in this House without reference to party. I appeal to the House that it shall continue to be so treated. It is too important to be dealt with as a party question; on the contrary, it should be considered as a great fundamental question affecting the composition of this House—the representatives of the nation who have to decide all national issues. Therefore, I hope that this resolution will receive the unqualified and unanimous endorsation of this House, and that when the next redistribution bill is brought down steps will be taken to put it into effect.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members are under a deep debt of gratitude to the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) for the carefully prepared and exhaustive discourse with which he has favoured the House this afternoon on this very important question. His speech shows deep research, and he has travelled more or less over the known globe in bringing to our attention places where the system which he advocates has been in successful operation.

I would invite the attention of the House to the moderation of the suggestions made by the hon. member. He directs our attention first of all to the fact that last year a committee of this House investigated the question of the alternative vote and proportional representation. I was a member of that committee, and I recall that we heard numerous witnesses and deliberated for some time upon the question. We came to the conclusion, unanimously if I do not forget, that we should adopt the alternative vote in connection with single-seated constituencies in which more than two candidates presented themselves for election; we offered no definite statement as to the wisdom or unwisdom of proportional representation—that is, true proportional representation.

The hon. member for Brant now proposes that we should adopt the findings of the committee in regard to the alternative vote, and that we should make an experiment in regard to proportional representation in two or more great city areas, dividing them up and electing a sufficiently large number of members to give proportional representation a fair trial.

Now, the hon. member resembles to a certain extent that great leader of the Liberal party, Edward Blake, for it was said of him that after treating a question there was very little left to be said by any one else, and that is the condition which I am happy to say I find myself in on this occasion. But there are one or two matters to which I would like to draw the attention of the House.

First of all, just how does this proposed alternative vote work? Let me take the typical case of a constituency in which three candidates present themselves, one, we will say, belonging to the National Liberal and Conservative party—I perhaps made a mistake; I think the name "National" has been dropped, and that it is now merely the Liberal-Conservative party, at any rate, that party which sits next the Speaker on the left-hand side of the Chamber—a representative of that party presents himself; a member of the Liberal party, without prefixes or suffixes, also presents himself; and then the third candidate presenting himself—or herself—will be on behalf of the Progressive party. We will call those three candidates, A, B and C, the names appearing in alphabetical order. Instead of being asked to make the usual cross, the voter will be directed to merely indicate on the ballot paper the order of his or her preference, 1, 2, 3. The votes will be counted, and the first thing those who count them will have to do will be to make three piles of those ballot papers which have the figure 1 put opposite the name of one or other of the three candidates.

Let us follow that operation. On the first count, candidate A has four thousand first choices, and we make a little pile of the four thousand ballots. Candidate B has three thousand first choices, and we make a pile a little smaller. Candidate C has two thousand votes. What is the result? Under the ordinary system A would be elected by a handsome majority, but he would not have had any majority at all. That is to say, out of nine thousand votes he would have had only four thousand. So what is done? C is regarded as being out of the race and his ballot papers are counted and transferred in accordance with the second choices appearing thereon. Suppose C's supporters were evenly divided in their second choices between A and B, we would transfer one thousand of C's to A, and the other one thousand of C's to B. In this way A would have four thousand on the first count, plus one thousand added to him on the second count, or five thousand. B would have three thousand on the first count plus one thousand given him on the second count, or four thousand. A would therefore be elected by a majority of one thousand. If, on the contrary, it was a constituency in which the representative of the Liberal-Conservative party had by some strange happening got 4,000 on the first vote, and the Progressive, indicated by C, had come third, naturally all the Progressives would have given their second choice to the Liberal, and in that case B would receive the whole 2,000 second choices of the Progressives and would be elected over A, the Liberal-Conservative.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It seems a fine system.

Mr. McMASTER: It is a good system because it allows those persons who fundamentally hold the same doctrines, the same beliefs, the same aspirations, and the same desires, to give their first choice to those who may perhaps be personally more attractive to them, and their second choice to those with whom they are in closer union than the representative of the third party. That is the advantage of the alternative vote.

Mr. CRERAR: In that event, when C is dropped, the second choices really become the first choices of those voters for the other candidate.

Mr. McMASTER: Exactly. It is just like this. Suppose I was a voter in that constituency. I would then have presented to me this problem. There are three candidates. One is a Tory, to use the short word, sometimes objected to but often used, one a Liberal, and the third a Progressive. Now, of course, my desire would be to vote first with the party with which I have been associated for many years, and my second choice would, of course, be for the Progressive candidate, so if the Liberal came at the foot of the poll my vote would not be lost but would go to my second choice, who was, after all, my alternative choice. It is the alternative vote. I say I want the Liberal elected, but in the unfortunate event of the Liberal being at the foot of the poll, I want the Progressive to have my vote. It is perfectly simple, and should work out satisfactorily, as I trust and believe it will.

It was Burke who said that the virtue, the spirit, and the essence of the House of Commons consists in its being the express image of the nation, and we want to get a House of Commons which will accurately reflect every important strain of public opinion in the country. That is practically what Mr. Asquith also said. There should not be, he said, an important strain of public opinion in the country unrepresented in the House of Commons. The alternative vote will help to a certain extent, but proportional representation, I believe, will help even further. We had an election in Montreal last April, if I mistake not, in which two city charters were submitted by referendum to the electors, and I was surprised to find that even some members of the legal profession seemed to regard proportional representation almost as the name of some newly discovered breakfast food. They did not seem to understand it at all.

The mover of this resolution has not attempted to describe to any extent the mechanism of the counting of the voting given under proportional representation. Perhaps he was wise in not attempting before a large committee to describe exactly how the votes were counted, but let me just say this: In order to get the full benefit of the results of proportional representation, you should have a constituency electing at least five members; it should be large enough to elect that many. I do not think it needs to be any larger. I am inclined to think that when Winnipeg in the provincial election was created a single constituency electing ten members, that was going rather far, and perhaps it would have been better to have created two constituencies electing five members each. The work of the voter is simplicity itself. He has only to indicate on his ballot paper by the figures 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, as the case may be, the order of his preferences among the candidates, and the counting of the votes merely consists in giving effect to what is really in the voter's mind. I put the figures 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 down on the ballot paper. What do I intend to convey by that act? I intend to convey first, that if my first choice has got more votes than are necessary to elect him, you are to transfer my vote to my second choice. If my second choice has got more votes on the count than are necessary to elect him, you are to transfer my vote to my third choice, and so on; and inversely, if my first choice on the first count has so few votes that he is hopelessly out of the race, I want you to transfer my vote to my second choice. If my second choice on the second count is hopelessly out of the race, I want you to transfer my vote for my second choice to my third choice. The theory is simplicity itself. The actual counting of the ballots requires a certain amount of what the Oxford under-graduate denominated as "that low cunning which enables one to understand figures," but after all, men can be got who understand figures; that matter can be very easily arranged. It may take a little longer to count the votes, but that is a matter of no very great importance. The important thing is that wherever the system has been tried, it has been found to give an accurate representation or reflection of the different strains of public opinion in the constituency.

What are the results of the present system? The present system has had some good results, Mr. Speaker, because by reason of it we are found here, but it also has had, in the past, let us say, some bad results. It has often given incorrect verdicts. I think the most strikingly incorrect verdict that came from the people was in the election in Great Britain in 1886. Gladstone was supposed to have suffered an overwhelming defeat when he went before the people with his Home Rule proposals in 1886, but, as a matter of fact, he had a popular majority of over fifty thousand. If that popular majority had been reflected in the representation of the House of Commons of that day, it is quite possible that the last half century almost, forty years at least, of strain and struggle and bloodshed in Ireland might have been avoided. That is one of the most striking instances, I believe, of the incorrectness of our present system. Under our present system it does not depend on how many votes you get; it is where you put them. Sir John A. Macdonald, that great politician, not only in the larger sense but in the lesser sense, understood the situation and arranged the Ontario constituencies so as to hive the Grits; that is, in those districts where the Grits were in the majority he put them all together so that the Liberal-Conservatives could have a greater effect upon the elections with their votes. You might have two cities with precisely the same number of Liberals and Conservatives in each, and you might so arrange the constituencies that one of them would be overwhelmingly Tory and the other overwhelmingly Grit. It is not a question of just how many votes you have got: it is how you sprinkle the majorities over the constituencies.

I am inclined to believe that in this country, as in Belgium before they had proportional representation, our present system serves to accentuate sectional, religious and racial differences. With all respect the Liberal party may be somewhat over represented according to the votes in this House. But so is the Progressive party, and what is the reason for it? Because they represent, and over-represent and exaggerate, the sectional feeling obtaining in those parts of the country where the greatest majority was obtained. That, I think, is true. Just the same, to some extent, as far as Quebec is concerned, the Liberal party in the House over-represents the Liberal feeling in the province of Quebec. There are Liberals in the West whose voices are not heard and cannot be heard in this House—they are unrepresented. There are Conservatives in Quebec whose voices are not heard and cannot be heard in this House because they are unrepresented. Toronto for years and years, has not elected under the present system a single representative to support the Liberal party, although I do not think I am far wrong when I say that forty per cent of the people who live in that city are very faithful followers of the Liberal party. It is a mistake, from the national standpoint, that the citizens of any section of the country, because of their geographical position, should find themselves cut out from active, efficient and effectual participation in the affairs of the country. These are thoughts which strike me as worthy of emphasis. However, the matter has been so amply dealt with that I hesitate to delay the House longer. What is asked for is the acceptance of a principle which, I think, will recommend itself to every one—the principle of the alternative vote in single-member constituencies, and merely to give a trial to the system of proportional representation in one or two, or more of our large urban areas.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I happen to be deeply interested in this question of proportional representation. Had I been aware that it would actually come up to-day I would have been better prepared than I am. Proportional representation is splendid in theory, but it must be regarded with respect of its practical application to the form of government under which we live. And my contention is that it is not adaptable or suitable to the British system of responsible government. I see some hon. members smiling; they will perhaps agree with me before I am through. You can use proportional representation in the case of the French and American systems of government where the system is a representative one; but under our system of government —which is essentially a responsible system of government, where the Cabinet is responsible to the House, and the members are responsible to the people, giving thereby an elasticity which is not equalled by any other system of government—proportional representation will accentuate difficulties and will not aid the people in the solution of public problems. As to proportional representation in municipal affairs, I am thoroughly in support of it. In provincial and municipal affairs it may be proper; but in the case of the federal constitution of this country it certainly is not sound. The idea of the system is to give representation to groups of people. One man may be a prohibitionist, another may live in some section where the racial sentiment is strong; there may be another section of the community where the religious element is emphasized; and another where the people are in favour of public ownership; and so there are different groups of people who, from economic or other motives, or by reason of political affiliations, may be influenced by the idea of differentiating one vote from another. Proportional representation will send into Parliament a certain proportion from each of these groups according to their numbers in the country. But when they get into Parliament how are they going to form a government that will be able to control the majority of the House, and carry out the system of responsible government as it has been developed under the British constitution primarily since the time of Charles I? Suppose we had five different groups in this House. Let me take the instance of France where they have seven or eight different groups, each one basing its political existence upon certain definite ideas with which the others do not agree. Now a matter comes up in the chamber for decision,

Mr. GOOD: Was my hon. friend in the House when I explained what had happened in France during the last fifteen or twenty years with respect to the formation of groups?

Mr. LADNER: Unfortunately, I did not hear the hon. member. But I have had the advantage of reading Lord Bryce's "Modern Democracies" in which that aspect of the question is very ably dealt with. My hon. friend's position, however, does not interfere with my contention at all, because France has an entirely different form of government from ours. You could defeat the French government in the Chambre des Deputés and a new cabinet could be formed there without having to hold a new election. Under the British system, where there is a vote adverse to the government it is bound to appeal to the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. LADNER: Well, that is substantially the accepted view although some provinces do not carry out that principle; they are changing the British system but they may be changing it for the worse. Anybody who has taken the trouble of studying historically our Constitution will realize that it has been built up, step by step, on solid foundations, not on theories but to meet the practical exigencies of the case during the period of some nine hundred years. And so a system has been established which makes the government amenable to the popular demand. Take the United States, and what do we find there? During the course of the great war, President Wilson carried out an unpopular policy but it could not be changed because he was in office for a fixed period of time. His policy was afterwards shown to be absolutely contrary to the prevailing public opinion in the Republic, and he was thrown out of power. But what happened in the meantime? There was confusion in their legislation and confusion in their policies with respect to international policies. The government could not act and be sure of its decision in dealing with foreign powers; it was compelled to wait until the four-year term of the then President had expired. But a change came and there was given to the world the real national policy such as the Republican party has now established.

Now, in this Parliament we might have five or six groups as I was going to argue a moment ago. We will suppose that one group is prohibitionist, another is in favour of government control, a third is indifferent to both these things but is in favour of paving streets all over the country, or some such policy as that. By political manipulation it is possible for a man to put a resolution on the Order Paper which would test the position of the ministry. But the representative in the cabinet of a group whose interest as a group was affected could not approach the consideration of the question from the standpoint of the public welfare, as a minister could who was sharing responsibility with the rest of the cabinet. In order to save his political existence he must adopt an entirely different policy, knowing that the group that placed him in parliament will take him away if he does not conform to their sectional and narrow view. Now, that is the practical application of the theory of proportional representation.

Mr. GOOD: My hon. friend said he did not hear me discuss the question of groups. I want to ask him whether he heard anything of what I said?

Mr. LADNER: If the hon. gentleman puts it that way, I may tell him that I heard very little of what he said, and if I had heard it, I do not think my view would be changed by the hon. gentleman's argument, having read the words of Lord Bryce and a number of other constitutional authorities for the past fifteen years. I do not speak without having previous information; I come here with some elementary knowledge of this subject, and hon. members in this House are equally well informed, and can deal with this matter on its merits. But there is one point and it is a simple one, namely, that we have a responsible system of government, with a joint responsibility of each member of the Cabinet for the whole. When you divide your House up into groups, and then form a government, what is the result? They will get men from these different groups, just as they do in France. In that country they get the groups together. Strong outstanding personalities are gathered together by a leader, and they form a government. How does this method work? They change governments once a month; they cannot have a strong government. They have a system of representative government, and when there is a division among them, they are not sent back for re-election. But what would be the result in our country? You have a Cabinet of seventeen ministers. Supposing you had eight groups, and each member of a group came here by reason of his allegiance to a particular idea—prohibition or whatever it might be, but his outstanding ability makes it necessary for him to join the Cabinet. Then his responsibility extends beyond his sectional idea, and his responsibility is to the whole country. Suddenly he is confronted with a resolution perhaps pertaining to the question that affects his group particularly, but the rest of the group decide that such a resolution is not in the best interests of the country, and, upon due consideration, he rather has that idea himself. He is then placed in the position that he must either stand by the joint responsibility of the government or must commit political suicide by going against the group which put him in power. Therefore, when you have the group system you destroy the bulwark of the system of democracy under which we have been operating; that is the principle of responsible government. The majority control the House, and the government is in a position to carry out its policy.

Mr. EULER: Have we not the group system under present conditions?

Mr. LADNER: We have observed that where group systems are developing, strong governments are going down. They do not act together.

Mr. EULER: Is there anything at all in the present system that prevents the formation of groups of any indefinite number?

Mr. LADNER: There is nothing to stop any number of groups getting into Parliament and any government being formed on the group system, but what will happen is this: that some wise ingenious fellow will insert, in between the ideas of his groups, a resolution with a direct purpose of testing the strength of character of the ministers, and making a minister say whether he will stand by his country in a broad way, or whether he will preserve his political existence by standing by the particular group with the particular idea on which he was elected.

Mr. EULER: What is there to prevent the same thing now under present conditions?

Mr. LADNER: I think that now, for the first time since Confederation, we have seen the operation of a group system such as would often occur under proportional representation, and, considering the consequences as we have them to-day, and as we witnessed them in the militia estimates the other day, who would say that that group system is in the public interest?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): We have had a very excellent presentation of the merits of proportional representation, and particularly the value of the transferable vote in single member constituencies, from my hon. friend from Brant, (Mr. Good) who evidently has given the question a great deal of study, and I think the House is indebted to him for the information that he has placed before us, even if we fail to agree with him. My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) has also, in seconding the motion, given to hon. members a very clear exposition of the manner in which this reform is carried out in actual practice. It is, I think, a fact that legislative reforms, in the history of British parliamentary government, have usually been of slow growth. If we study the development that has taken place in the British form of government—which, after all, Mr. Speaker, is, I think, by general consent recognized throughout the world as perhaps on the whole the best form of government in existence—we find that the changes that have taken place, from time to time, have developed and been brought to fruition as the result usually of much discussion and agitation. It is a testimony to the characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon race in matters of government that they desire to be certain of the value of the changes that are sought to be brought about, before absolute effect is given to those changes. The British form of government, which we have adopted in Canada, rests upon a very definite principle—the right of the people to rule themselves. That principle was established in England, long before it was established in any other part of the world, with the exception of the Netherlands. My recollection is just indefinite enough at the moment, that I cannot give the precise dates upon which responsible representative government, as we have it in Britain and in Canada, came into practice in the Netherlands, but at any rate, as far as the great powers of the world are concerned, this form of government first came into effect in Great Britain. Our experience and practice of it has brought home very clearly this conclusion, that we get the best results from it, when we have the machinery that most exactly expresses the will of the people, and that is absolutely necessary, resting, as it does, on the right of the people to rule themselves. We get, let me repeat, the best results in actual practice when we secure the most complete and exact representation of the people's will in the matter. I know there are those who think differently. In that respect I would include by hon. friend who preceded me (Mr. Ladner), but, nevertheless, to the students of our form of government the statement that I have just made is a fair and correct statement. My hon. friend from Brome quoted Burke. Burke was one of the greatest statesmen of his day, and he, perhaps, more clearly than anyone else of his time, recognized the soundness of the principle I have just stated. What does proportional representation seek to do? It seeks to advance one step further in carrying out this idea of getting as exact a representation of the people's will in the matter of government as it is possible to do. That is the whole purpose of proportional representation. That is the whole purpose and effect of the application of the alternative system of voting, or, as it is often termed, the transferable vote in single member constituencies. This method, this principle, as applied to democratic forms of government is not a new thing; it has been in effect, it has been tested, in many countries of the world; it is being tested even in Anglo-Saxon countries. As the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) has shown,—and I commend his speech to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner), who apparently was not in the House when that speech was delivered—proportional representation is not only not incompatible with democracy, but entirely compatible with it, and I maintain that it is essential to the fullest functioning of democracy. It has been adopted by Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Sweden and Switzerland in Europe, to speak only of European countries which have had it in practice for a number of years.

Mr. LADNER: Does my hon. friend not recognize the difference in the forms of constitutions of those countries from that of this country; and does he not think that to adopt proportional representation here involves a change in our constitution so as to make it similar to that of the French where the term of office of the chief executive is for a fixed definite period?

Mr. CRERAR: No, I think nothing of the kind, and before I am through, I hope to convince my hon. friend that he is wrong. Proportional representation has been in effect in those countries. It is true their form of governmental machinery may differ slightly from ours; but in those countries their form of government rests upon the principle of the right of the people to rule themselves, and if the machinery in existence to give effect to that differs slightly from ours, that does not affect the principle of the reform which I am discussing. I would draw the attention of the House also to this fact that while those particular countries have had this method in effect for many years, you have less disturbance, and the fullest and freest functioning of democracy as regards the rights of the people in their government.

My hon. friend from Vancouver South asserted quite vehemently that proportional representation is not adapted to the British form of government. I think he will agree with me that the overseas Dominions of the British Commonwealth have, in effect and in practice, the British form of Government which he was discussing, and this principle has been applied in some of those states. It has been applied in municipal elections in Great Britain, and with very great success. Not only that, I find that my hon. friend from Vancouver South is not in very good company when he takes the position that he has taken. I have in my hand a leaflet of the Proportional Representation Society of Great Britain, a society formed a number of years ago for the purpose of educating public opinion in that land to the need and the value of this reform. And whose names do I find associated with that society? I find the outstanding names in all the political parties in Great Britain. At that time—and this was in 1920—the president was Earl Grey; the vice-presidents were the Right Hon. Lord Balfour of Burleigh, the Right Hon. G. M. Barnes, the Right Hon. Lord Birkenhead—my hon. friend from Vancouver South would certainly not call Lord Birkenhead a Liberal, at that particular time at any rate—Viscount Burnham, the Right Hon. Lord Robert Cecil, who was one of the pillars of the Tory party in Great Britain; the Right Hon. Sir Donald Maclean; the Right Hon. the Marquis of Lansdowne, who has been an outstanding statesman in Great Britain, and who belongs to the particular political faith to which my hon. friend from Vancouver South is apparently glad to give his adherence; the Right Hon. Viscount Milner, another political associate, if I might so term it, of my hon. friend—all down the list, the outstanding men in all political parties in Great Britain have given their adherence and support to the furtherance of this reform.

I might be permitted to quote Mr. Asquith, who, I think, will be generally recognized as an outstanding British statesman. Shortly before he resigned as Prime Minister in Great Britain, speaking on the proposal that this reform should be investigated, Mr. Asquith used these words:

> With regard to the Parliament which is going to undertake the work of reconstruction after the war, it is eminently desirable that you should provide an electoral basis which will make that Parliament reflective and representative of the general opinion of the country, and give to its decisions a moral authority which you cannot obtain from what I may call a scratch, improvised, and makeshift electorate. Let us by all means use the time—those of us who are not absolutely absorbed in the conduct of the war—in those months to see if we cannot work out by general agreement some scheme under which, both as regards the electorate and the distribution of electoral power, a Parliament can be created at the end of the war capable and adequate for discharging these tasks, and commanding the confidence of the country.

A Speaker's Conference was formed in Great Britain in the year 1916. I find in that Speaker's Conference the outstanding men of the British House of Commons, men drawn from all political parties. And that conference, in the various suggestions of electoral reform which it brought down to the British House of Commons, recommended precisely the reforms which my hon. friend the member for Brant has submitted to this House this afternoon namely, that proportional representation could with profit be applied, and that, in single member constituencies, the transferable vote could also, with profit and use to the development of the British governmental system be applied in Great Britain.

Some hon. members probably imagine that this reform has had no application in Canada. It has had; in the province of Manitoba, proportional representation was applied to the city of Winnipeg in the last changes which were made in the election law. In the last provincial election of Manitoba, in 1920, the city of Winnipeg was one large constituency electing ten members. I am not going to detain the House with any statement as to the effect of that change and regard in which it was held by the people of that city. I will quote simply the opinions of the leaders in the Manitoba Legislature upon the result of that principle as applied in Winnipeg in the last provincial election. Mr. Thomas Johnson, who was then Attorney General of Manitoba, made this statement:

> I feel that I can truthfully say that I have not now and never have had a single regret for the efforts made by me personally in connection with the introduction of this reform into our election laws. The proportional representation system gives a more truly representative legislation than the system of single-member constituencies. The electors of Winnipeg had no more difficulties than usual, and the counting, notwithstanding the great number of candidates, 41 in all, came off without a hitch of any kind.

Mr. Dixon, leader of the Liberal group in the legislature, also commended the system, and I want, particularly for the information of the hon. member for South Vancouver (Mr. Ladner), to quote the opinion of Mr. W. J. Tupper, one of the Conservative members elected in Winnipeg and a son of the late Sir Charles Tupper. Mr. Tupper uses the following language:

> In my opinion the test that proportional representation underwent in this city during the late provincial election was successful.
> As I understand the system, it is intended to give representation to all parties in proportion to their numerical strength. The result of the late election showed that the minority parties in the city of Winnipeg received representation in accordance with their voting strength. It, however, did not favour independent candidates, as you will have observed.
> I might say that the success of the system seems to me to depend upon the efficiency of those in control of the counting. We were fortunate in this province to have exceptionally able men in charge and the result is no doubt in a great measure due to them.

Mr. J. T. Haig, who was for several years the leader of the Conservative party in the Manitoba legislature, had this to say about it:

> I feel in talking to my supporters generally that they are entirely satisfied with the working of the system. . . . Taken as a whole, I believe the members elected truly represent the proportional vote of the community as it was at that time. . . . As you know we have had a difficult situation in Winnipeg since the strike last year, and anything that will give all the elements in the community a chance to voice their opinions in Parliament appears to me to be a good thing for the whole community. . . . If we had had the old system in Winnipeg I doubt if a single Conservative would have been elected, and I have no doubt the Government would have had a larger representation in the House at the expense of the Conservative and Labour parties because they would have had the machinery of distributing the seats, and as Governments usually do, would have distributed them with an eye to the result being to their advantage. Under this system no such thing can happen.

He goes on and makes some further observations, which I do not need to read to the House, commending proportional representation to the people of Manitoba. These, Mr. Speaker, are the opinions of men in Manitoba drawn from the various political parties in that province, and while the persons who give expression to these views differ upon almost everything else under the sun, it is a significant fact that they are in agreement with regard to the merits of proportional representation as applied in the city of Winnipeg.

The resolution proposed by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) seeks rather to draw attention to the matter; he specifically suggests that it be applied to single member constituencies under the alternative vote and that it be tested out in a few urban constituencies in the next election. I think it is a reasonable proposal. The principle underlying it is sound, and I trust that it will have the support of the House and that effect will be given to it at the next general election.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be to the advantage of the House if this resolution could be disposed of this afternoon, and that is my reason for saying just a word or two at the moment.

First of all, may I congratulate the mover of the resolution (Mr. Good) on the exceedingly able speech he has made and the very lucid exposition he has given to the House of this important question?

In a word, Mr. Speaker, I find myself in entire sympathy with the resolution, and, so far as an individual member has voice in the House, would like to express myself as supporting it as it stands. In this matter the Government would wish to be governed by the opinion of the House, and if the House approves the resolution the Government will do all in its power to give effect to it as opportunity affords.

Let me say, in regard to the discussion that has taken place and the effect that this resolution, if carried, might have upon responsible government, that I failed to follow altogether the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner). Responsible government is based primarily upon a representative parliament, and any measure that will help to make Parliament more truly representative of the public will must necessarily be furthering responsible government rather than in any way limiting it.

Mr. LADNER: But the cabinet would not be responsible to Parliament. Surely you would have to change the responsibilities and functions of the cabinet so that an adverse vote would not compel the administration to go to the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think my hon. friend quite sees the significance of the resolution. The government would be formed in precisely the same way under this system as it is at present—out of a body of representatives of the people who could command the confidence of the House. I confess that as I study the question more and more, it is my view that instead of adding to the number of groups in the House, the adoption of what is proposed here might tend to limit the groups. My. hon. friend assumes that every man who runs on a given ticket will be elected on that ticket, but that is not going to be the effect of this system. You might have any number of persons seeking to represent certain sections of the people in Parliament, but it does not follow that they would all be elected. My view is that instead of a man being returned to Parliament on a minority vote of the constituents, if this system is adopted the only representatives who will find seats in the House will be those who command a majority of the votes cast. It is to ensure representation based upon a majority that the proposal has been made and that this reform is so much needed.

There have been quotations from Burke, and from illustrious political reformers. May I add just one to the number, from Pym, who in the time of Charles I, said:

> That form of government is best which doth actuate and dispose every part and member of the state to the common good.

I do not think it is possible to surpass that as a maxim of government; and a system of representation which will give freer and fuller and truer expression to the popular will on the part of all classes in the country is helping to bring about that form of government. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am only too glad to have this opportunity of helping to further an electoral reform of this character.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I admit that many good things have been said this afternoon in favour of proportional representation. I heard all these arguments thirteen years ago in this House when the matter was brought forward by the late member for Jacques Cartier, the Hon. Mr. Monk. We were told then that this system had worked well in Belgium, Denmark, and the Netherlands; that it had been tried in various European countries, and so on. But the House did not take to the idea, and the suggestion of the member for Jacques Cartier fell on deaf ears. The proposal has remained dormant ever since that time.

There is one point I should like the House not to overlook. Canada is a confederation; this Parliament represents people who entered confederation on the basis of certain fixed ideas, a certain definite understanding. It was stipulated that the representation of the province of Quebec would be fixed at a certain number and that that was to be the basis for the representation of all the other parts of the Dominion. Now the idea is prevalent in the province of Quebec that the views of other provinces are being imposed upon Quebec without its people being given a chance to express their opinion thereon. In the last election my majority was almost 5,000, though I left the riding fifteen days before the voting took place. But out of 13,000 voters on the list, 6,000 did not vote. The women abstained from voting, and they did so on advice given from the highest quarters. The stand has been taken by the most prominent members of the church in the province of Quebec that there is grave doubt whether female suffrage is in the interests of the state. The province has refused to allow female suffrage in provincial affairs. Last year the city of Montreal, voting on the choice of a municipal system, declared against proportional representation by an overwhelming majority. I submit very respectfully that notwithstanding all that may be said in favour of proportional representation in the cities —it has no application in the rural districts —nothing should be done—and I would have to vote against the motion if it was voted on—that would bind this House to the principle of it until the matter had been fully considered and the people of the province of Quebec given an opportunity, through their legislature or otherwise, of accepting it.

We have adopted that method in connection with other important measures which have come before this House, for instance, the Lord's Day Act. This legislation was largely advocated by Ontario and the West. The observance of the Sabbath is viewed in those sections and in the maritime provinces differently from the way in which it is viewed in the province of Quebec. The bill was amended in the Senate—that being the understanding arrived at—so as to provide that it could not be put into effect in the province of Quebec without the assent of the attorney-general of the province. That is, the people of Quebec entered confederation under certain fixed principles, and they felt they had a right to be consulted in regard to any legislation which affected those principles. I certainly take objection to a change in the franchise law of the province of Quebec through the introduction of proportional representation until it has been made an issue in the province and adopted by the legislature.

Mr. GOOD: Is the hon. member aware that the resolution which I have moved does not call for endorsation of the principle of proportional representation by this House, but only for the creation of one or more multi-member constituencies to demonstrate its working?

Mr. MARCIL: There is another point to which I desire to call the attention of the House. The city of Toronto is often mentioned in this House, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier good-humouredly referred to it on one occasion as the city which cheered and honoured him but never gave him a vote. If proportional representation were adopted in Toronto it might work all right, because there and in Winnipeg—the latter city has already adopted the system—the people are largely homogeneous in a political sense. But in the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec we have, broadly speaking, two classes. When the voters' list is made up and taxation for schools is imposed, and so on, we have arrayed on one side the English-speaking people, that is, every one who does not speak French, or, in other words, a combination against French Canadians. I am confident that the French Canadians of Montreal would be a unit against proportional representation. I am afraid that in such a cosmopolitan city as Montreal is getting to be, if we had this system we would see every nationality, wanting representation, and we would have "racial" candidates running, which would not be an improvement on our present system, but rather the reverse. For that reason I am opposed to the principle of proportional representation.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MARCIL: I have still something to add, and I therefore claim the privilege of moving the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, May 11, 1922

The House met at three o'clock.

COMMITTEE ON RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax) presented the first report of the Special Committee appointed to consider railway transportation, recommending that the committee be empowered to sit while the House is in session, and that such evidence as it may take be printed from day to day, and that rule 74 relating thereto be suspended.

OTTAWA GAS COMPANY

Mr. H. B. McGIVERIN (Ottawa) moved that Bill No. 8 respecting the Ottawa Gas Company be withdrawn, and that the fee and charges paid thereon be refunded, less the cost of printing and translation, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the third report of the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion can only be entertained by unanimous consent. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

14. If so, under what authority?

15. Have any other methods of accommodation to tax payers been adopted other than acceptance of notes in payment for assessments levied? If so, what methods?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING: The Minister of Finance is advised that the supplying of all the information asked for would require quite a long time and a large expenditure for clerical work, which he thinks the honourable member would not desire to have incurred. The minister suggests that if it would be convenient to the honourable member he might call on the Commissioner of Taxation, Mr. R. W. Breadner, at the Finance Department, and discuss the matter with him, with a view to reducing the scope of the inquiry into such limits as might enable the Department to supply such information as the honourable member deems most important.

Mr. FONTAINE:

2. Salary, $1,000. Bonus, $166.50 for year 1921-22; no bonus paid this year.

3. No. The Civil Service Commission has on several occasions recommended to the Government the desirability of framing regulations which would remove from the Service married women whose husbands are able to support them; to require female employees to retire upon their marriage; and to prohibit the appointment of married women, save under certain exceptional and specified conditions. As a result an Order in Council was passed on the 18th June, 1920 (P.C. 1393), approving the following regulations:

[Mr. Good.]

Hereafter no married woman, whose husband is living, shall be eligible for appointment in the public service.

Provided that, when the commission reports that the supply of experienced help for any particular kind of work is not sufficient to meet the demands of the public service, a married woman may be certified for temporary employment.

Provided further, that where it can be established by a married woman that her husband is unable, through illness or other cause, to contribute to her support, such married woman may be certified for permanent or temporary employment.

Provided further, that where, in the opinion of the commission, it would be desirable or necessary, and in the best interests of the public service to employ a married woman or to employ husband and wife together, such married woman may be certified to by the commission for permanent or temporary employment.

Any female employee in the public service shall, upon the occasion of her marriage, be required to resign her position.

LIQUOR IN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. MILLAR:

Is it in accord with the Dominion statutes for any person, persons or corporation to engage in the business of operating in the Province of Saskatchewan, what is commonly known as an export liquor house, the business of which consists, in part, or entirely, of importing alcoholic liquors and exporting same to other provinces of the Dominion of Canada or to the United States of America?

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN: This is a question to be answered by the judicial tribunals, depending upon interpretation of the British North America Acts.

TORONTO—RAILWAY VIADUCT

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the Government taken any action in reference to the requests of a deputation of various public boards, from Toronto, composed of the City Council, the Harbour Commissioners, the Board of Trade, the Trades and Labour Council, and others, which waited on the Government a few weeks ago, asking for the construction of a railway viaduct on the waterfront at Toronto, and for specific performance of The Viaduct Agreement, 1913, which provides for said grade separation there?

2. If so, what action?

3. In view of the way the public are suffering from the lack of proper terminal and station facilities, and from level crossings there, what action does the Government propose to take in the matter?

Hon. Mr. KENNEDY:

1. The representations made by the boards are under consideration.

2 and 3. Answered by the answer to No. 1.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES

Mr. McQUARRIE:

1. How many Civil Servants in Canada are receiving salaries of eight hundred dollars and less per annum?

2. How many are receiving nine hundred and sixty dollars or less?

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Stands as an Order for Return.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I think the rule as to questions standing as Orders for Returns covers questions the answers to which would be lengthy, and consequently would be expensive to print. In regard to this question, the answer to the first question would be a certain figure, and the answer to the second question another figure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would draw the attention of my right hon. friend to the second question asking how many civil servants in Canada are receiving $960 or less. This covers almost the entire civil service of the whole Dominion. If the question is allowed to stand on the Order Paper until we get that information it may be standing there for weeks. It is perfectly true, as my right hon. friend says, that the reply may not be very lengthy, but it will take a long time to obtain the desired information and in the meantime the question should not be allowed to remain on the Order Paper.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not to avoid the question standing on the Order Paper that the rule applies at all but only on account of the length of the answer. This is a very short question, and it would not matter if it stood all session.

Mr. FIELDING: It might be short, but the time required to obtain the information might be considerable. I think that is the real ground of the objection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the ground There is a rule, it was deliberated on this session, and I think a resolution passed by the committee. My recollection of it—and I am quite sure I am correct—is that it bears only on one point, the length of the answer, not the time to obtain it—the length of the answer and the consequent wisdom of putting it in Hansard.

Mr. FIELDING: My recollection is that it is not a change of rule, but it had reference to the printing of long answers in Hansard. I think the proper procedure to be taken is that if the question can be answered quickly it should be answered, but if it requires the collection of information throughout the Dominion, it may require a very considerable time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The rule says that it is for the Speaker to decide whether the question should be changed into an order for return.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would say that the reasons given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) would indicate that this question should stand as an order for return, because I take it for granted that the question "How many civil servants in Canada are receiving salaries of $800 and less per annum" would require a great deal of work. It seems to me it covers a very wide range.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suggest that the question should stand till your Honour could look up the rules to see whether anything else is involved in this decision except the matter of the length of the answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I refer my hon. friend to rule 37, paragraph 4, which reads:

If a question is of such a nature that in the opinion of the minister who is to furnish the reply, such reply should be in the form of a return, and the minister states that he has no objection to laying such return upon the table of the House his statement shall unless otherwise ordered by the House be deemed an order of the House to that effect and the same shall be entered in the Votes and Proceedings as such.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No doubt about that. The question is as to when the discretion should be exercised. I submit it is only in relation to one matter.

Mr. FIELDING: The minister is not bound to answer the question when he has not the information. Suppose the minister replied "the information called for would require considerable time, and, therefore we are not able to answer the question" that would get it off the Order Paper, but would hardly be courteous to the member who asked the information.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think we will let this question, No. 13, stand until to-morrow.

PROVINCIAL HIGHWAY

5. Were any quarries purchased on this section of the above highway?
6. If so, who purchased same, and for what amount in each case?
7. From whom were quarries purchased, and what are the locations?

Hon. Mr. KENNEDY:

No project covering the road in question has been filed with the Federal Highways Commission, nor has any agreement respecting it been entered into by the province of Ontario under the Canada Highways Act. Consequently, the Department of Railways and Canals has no information.

PUBLIC SERVICE RETIREMENT ACT

Hon. A. B. COPP (Secretary of State) moved that the House do to-morrow go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to extend for one year the operation of the Public Service Retirement Act, chapter 67 of the statutes of 1920, as amended by chapter 49 of the statutes of 1921.

He said: The Governor General having been informed of the subject matter of the resolution, has recommended it to the consideration of this House.

Motion agreed to.

GENERAL MacBRIEN'S REPORTED UTTERANCE

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. ANDREW McMASTER (Brome): Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to draw to the attention of the Government, and more particularly to the attention of the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) a matter of real primary public importance. My attention has been directed to an article appearing in the Ottawa Journal this morning, with the following heading:

Some members show ignorance militia debate.

In this article Major-General MacBrien is reported as having said:

There have been debates in regard to the estimates recently as to the necessity for training for our men. Those who say training is not necessary simply display their ignorance.

The general is reported very much in the same terms in the Citizen. I know how easily it is for men to be improperly reported, but I would direct the attention of the Minister of Militia to this matter in order that he may make inquiries of the gentleman in question as to whether he made any such remark. Because, I submit to this House, for the general of our staff, who is the head of the staff, to make remarks about the discussion going on in this Chamber would be just as improper as if the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals gave his opinion publicly as to the advisability or nonadvisability of completing the Hudson Bay railway.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Militia and Defence): I have not seen the article, nor has my attention been called to it. I agree with what the hon. member from Brome (Mr. McMaster) has said in reference to the words of General MacBrien, if the general used those words. The general is a pretty cautious man, and I would rather be inclined to think that he was discussing it on broader lines, and rather along the line that possibly the matter of training had not been given much attention by members of Parliament, and that they would not be in the same position to judge of the matter as experts. However, I will inquire of the general and get his explanation of what was said.

[Mr. Copp.]

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would ask the House to proceed to Order No. 32, second reading of Bill No. 56, to amend the Bankruptcy Act. It is the intention to have this bill referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, if there is no objection. I move that this House proceed to Public Bills and Orders.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Laval-Two Mountains) moved that Bill No. 56, to amend the Bankruptcy Act, be read the second time.

He said: The purport of this bill is to amend the Bankruptcy Act as regards a particular point, namely, to strike out the word "locality" in paragraph 4 of section 4 of the act, and to substitute therefor the words "judicial district." As two other bills to amend the Bankruptcy Act have already been introduced in this House, and as those bills have been referred by the House to the Banking and Commerce Committee, I thought it would be preferable, before discussing the merits of this bill, that it should be referred to that committee in order that it might be considered with the others. The Banking and Commerce Committee, I understand, has not sat since the other two bills have been referred to it, and thus, as the three bills can be considered together, the time of the House will be saved. For that reason, after this bill is read a second time, I will move that it be referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

On the motion of Mr. Ethier, the bill was thereupon referred to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

On the motion of Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Prime Minister) the House reverted to the Orders of the Day.

SUPPLY

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair:

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I suggest that we take up the Supplementary Estimates for the fiscal year ended 31st March, 1922. There are a number of items scattered over the various departments, and we might take them all up in their order.

Printing, advertising, inspection, express, etc.—further amount required	$25,000
Brokerage on purchase of sinking funds—further amount required	$3,900

The item regarding the sinking funds arises from an increased investment in that direction. The larger item is chiefly caused by charges for express in handling gold between Ottawa and New York. The appropriation last year for printing, advertising, inspection, express, etc., was $100,000, and the expenditure to the 9th May was $123,000. As hon. gentlemen will remember, I explained the matter on the corresponding item in the Main Estimates.

Item agreed to.

Department of Finance—
To provide for the salary of one private secretary from January 26 to March 31, 1922, at $3,360 per annum.	$ 614.19
To provide for the appointment of a Commissioner of Tariff from January 23, 1922, at $6,000 per annum, without reference to and notwithstanding the provisions of the Civil Service Act	1,129.03

Mr. FIELDING: The item regarding the private secretary is the same as those which have appeared in all the departments to make provision for private secretaries for the balance of the year. As regards the other item, the circumstances are these. A gentleman who had been forty-five years in the public service, chiefly in the Customs Department or in the Finance Department dealing with customs matters, had retired from the public service on superannuation. He was an officer whose services were regarded as being of the highest importance, and at my request he abandoned his superannuation and returned to the Finance Department, I am afraid not for a very long time. I am proposing that he shall be designated Commissioner of Tariff at a salary of $6,000 per annum.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who was the corresponding officer, if any, prior to his return?

Mr. FIELDING: There was nobody appointed to do the particular service that he was appointed to do. He had retired, and I discovered him in California. He is a gentleman whose services are regarded as being very valuable.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand this is Mr. Russell?

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So this is really a new appointment?

Mr. FIELDING: In a measure, it is. He is recalled to the Service, and we give him a new title and an increase in salary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How does the minister justify getting around the Civil Service Act by what is practically a special Act of Parliament?

Mr. FIELDING: My predecessor and his predecessor in office both found it necessary to get around the Civil Service Act, and I am obliged to resort to the same method.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not aware of the instance which the minister has in mind. Was he afraid that, if applications were called for in the usual way, Mr. Russell could not succeed?

Mr. FIELDING: I think it is quite possible that if applications were to be called for in the usual way and a competition to take place, the wrong man might get the office. I do not hesitate to say that. Mr. Russell is qualified by forty-five years' experience, and it is possible that some man might come in and, on account of being better able to tell the colour of Julius Caesar's hair, he might get the job. At all events, both my predecessor and his predecessor found it necessary to make similar appointments to the public service, notwithstanding the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the minister is quite correct. The Civil Service Act never applied to the Income Tax Department, but it did apply to the Finance Department, and the Civil Service Act was followed. If what the minister says is right, that would be an argument in favour of repealing the whole act and of going back to patronage quite unrestrained.

Mr. FIELDING: I would not like to discuss that point at the present time with my right hon. friend. The Income Tax Department would have been under the Civil Service Act unless a special provision had been made to exempt it, just as I propose to take the office of this particular gentleman out of the scope of the commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is not quite correct. I do not think that the Income Tax Department was ever under the Civil Service Act. It was in process of formation, and I do not know whether my hon. friend thinks that the process is yet finally completed. It was considered, as in the case of many other new departments, that during that process of organization it ought not to be under the act. I do not think that it ever was under the Civil Service Act, although the Finance Department generally was under the Commission.

Mr. FIELDING: The Income Tax Department never came under the act for the simple reason that my predecessor took good care that it should not, because in the appropriation for that service he provided that the Civil Service Act should not apply to the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The whole of the Finance Department generally is under the act, but in this instance my hon. friend is making an exception, having regard to one particular appointment.

Mr. FIELDING: The appointment of every official at Ottawa will be under the Civil Service Act, unless an exception is made by vote of Parliament. I am making an exception now, just as has been made in previous cases.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all. The minister may justify what he is doing now, but he cannot justify it in that way. The Civil Service Act went a certain length. It included virtually all the services; certain services did not come under it, for definite reasons given. Now, we went that distance and stopped there. But the minister is asking Parliament to retrace a part of the step that has been taken. He desires to remove something from the operation of the act by special statute, because he is afraid that otherwise the right man might not be appointed. To a certain length and stop is very different from what the minister proposes. Having got a certain distance, he wants us to retrace our steps and to that extent repeal the act.

Mr. FIELDING: The Civil Service Act was passed before the Income Tax Act. When the latter act was passed every official appointed under it would have come under the operation of the Civil Service Act unless special exception had been made by vote of Parliament. The Civil Service Act never applied in this respect, because my hon. friends excluded this department from its operation. I am making an exception to-day in one case, whereas my hon. friends did so in hundreds of cases.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not a fair statement at all. It is true that the Income Tax Department never came under the Civil Service Act; neither did the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment.

Mr. FIELDING: It would have come under the act but for the fact that it was excepted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was never put under the act. These two departments were never put under the act for the reason that the appointments made in connection therewith were in their nature temporary appointments. They did not prove to be as temporary as had been expected, but they were services that were not regarded as of a permanent character. For this reason they never came under the Civil Service Act at all. But what the minister proposes to do now is to take a distinctly reactionary step. He may have special reasons for doing so, but the reason he has so far given would be a reason for repealing the whole Civil Service Act. Has he any special reason to justify the step he is taking in this particular instance?

Mr. FIELDING: The special reason is that this gentleman has had forty-five years' experience in the public service and is exceptionally well qualified for the duty which I require him to perform. I would ask the House to accept that as reason enough. But I again state that if any department of the public service is not under the operation of the Civil Service Act it is because it has been excepted by just such a motion as I am making on this occasion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend is entirely wrong. However, if we agree on the conclusion, I will not quarrel with him as regards the road we take to get there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We may agree that there is a great difference between never having brought certain services under the act, and seeking to make an exception of certain services that are already under it. The minister says that the exception here is justified on the ground that Mr. Russell has long experience and is, in his judgment, a man eminently qualified for the duties to which he is to be assigned. I am not disputing the minster's judgment. I know Mr. Russell, but I am not aware of his special qualifications. Assuming that the minister's judgment is correct, does he think that the same fact would not appeal to the Civil Service Commission? Would Mr. Russell's long experience not appeal to them as eminently qualifying him?

Mr. FIELDING: They would have no right to consider it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No right to consider his experience?

Mr. FIELDING: Not in competition with another man.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister say that the Civil Service Commission cannot consider the experience of an applicant in estimating his qualifications?

Mr. FIELDING: Not in competition with other applicants.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly; in competition with others the applicant's experience in this case would help him in the race, just as it would help anybody else. The Civil Service Commission takes an applicant's experience into consideration, in fact, they do so in regard to every application. So that what the minister is doing is tantamount to saying that what really qualifies an applicant is something which the Civil Service Commission should not consider at all. If that is the case, then we should have no Civil Service Commission.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friends say "hear, hear." How many of them are there, though, who did not say just the opposite during the last three sessions?

Mr. DUFF: Oh, no; we are quite consistent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Civil Service Act had all sorts of champions in this House, on this side of the Chamber, during the past three sessions. Even if we sought to refer to a committee the question whether or not it would be wise to make any exceptions, hon. gentlemen rose up in arms, indignant that anything should be done in the way of going back to patronage. But now they are enthusiastic advocates of such a course, because they think they will reap the rewards.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend is entirely wrong in the basis of his argument. This is not a motion under which we are seeking to appoint a man. Mr. Russell was in the Civil Service. The superannuation order had been passed but had not taken effect. We did not need the Civil Service Commission to bring Mr. Russell into the service, because he was already a civil servant. All that we seek to do here, in the way of a departure from the act, is to give him a larger salary than he would have obtained under the Civil Service Act. He does not need the approval of the Civil Service Commission, because he was in the civil service. Superannuation had been ordered, but had not taken effect.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In his return the Civil Service Commission does not need to pass on his qualifications. It never did pass on them, as a matter of fact, because he was already in the service. That seems reasonable. But why should their jurisdiction in the matter of salary not apply?

Mr. FIELDING: Speaking generally, I suppose we have to accept a common principle. But I am going to submit that in the matter of salaries this House is a better judge than the Civil Service Commission; and on that ground, believing this to be a good appointment, I shall ask the House to give me authority to pay the increased salary. On that question I believe that this House is as good a judge as, if not better than, the Civil Service Commission, much as I respect their judgment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sorry I cannot agree with the minister in that respect. If that judgment is correct, then the minister has no ground at all for remaining another hour under the jurisdiction of the commission. If we in this House are better judges of what a fair salary is for work done than is the Civil Service Commission, then the act has no just foundation, neither as respects the inside service nor the outside. I do not think the minister's reason is sound.

Mr. SHAW: The minister has suggested a Commissioner of Taxation, and apparently the remarks of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) have reference to such an official. I notice, however, that the Supplementary Estimates refer to a Commissioner of Tariff.

Mr. FIELDING: If I said "Commissioner of Taxation," that is an error; "Commissioner of Tariff" is the proper term.

Mr. SHAW: What are the duties of the Commissioner of Tariff?

Mr. FIELDING: To assist the minister in all inquiries into the tariff question. From beginning to end this matter is entrusted to the Finance Department. But the minister, with a fairly good impression of his own abilities, does not think he knows it all, and is anxious to procure assistance. He thinks that this gentleman is particularly capable and can help him in this service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was not in the House when the matter was first brought up, but my recollection is that Mr. Russell's former salary was $3,900.

Mr. FIELDING: I think that is correct.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My recollection, further, is that Mr. Russell, on the ground of advancing years and the necessity for rest, applied for superannuation, and on his insisting upon superannuation he was granted the sum of $2,700 a year. I should like to ask the minister whether the recalling of this superannuated gentleman—superannuated at his own request—will mean that the superannuation of $2,730 will be increased to what it would be on the basis of a salary of $6,000; or whether the appointment is looked upon by my hon. friend as of an entirely temporary nature, and that it is not intended to increase the superannuation allowance of $2,730.

Mr. FIELDING: The superannuation of an official is hardly under the control of a minister; it is fixed by law. My hon. friend says that this gentleman was retired at his own request. I hope that is so. But he is still in very good health and has come back into the department at my particular request, for I regard him as a very valuable officer—a better one than I could get from among younger men I shall be glad if he stays in the department longer than he intended, but when the time comes for superannuation he will have to be retired under the terms of the Superannuation Act, that is, having regard to his average salary for the last three years. Undoubtedly if he continues in the department this will give him a larger superannuation than if he had remained out.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Approximately $4,300.

Mr. FIELDING: I cannot say.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As against a superannuation of $2,730?

Mr. FIELDING: Quite so.

[Mr. Shaw.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It seems to me that under the exceptional circumstances this ought to be looked upon as a special appointment at the minister's request, without extending the gentleman's superannuation rates.

Mr. FIELDING: That would imply a change in the Superannuation Act, and for the present I do not contemplate such a change.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not pretend to have made any examination of the act, but I would think that on the recall of a superannuated officer his old superannuation would automatically apply upon his being released. If that is not the case, and if his being recalled for a temporary period has the effect of very substantially increasing his superannuation on account of an increased salary, I would think that a very serious objection to the proposal.

Mr. FIELDING: The Superannuation Act will govern. If the operation of the act is such as my right hon. friend suggests, I have not any intention of changing it. I think he is mistaken. If that is the operation of the law, Mr. Russell will have to act accordingly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are at cross purposes. I think both my hon. friends are right. The cases put by the leader of the Opposition is the case of a man whose superannuation has taken effect and who is recalled. The case advanced by my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, is that of a man who is still in the service, and while superannuation has been applied for by him it has not yet taken effect; he is still being paid a salary. Under the circumstances I am afraid there is some chance of that happening which the minister says will happen—a very largely increased superannuation may be obtained.

Mr. FIELDING: If Mr. Russell remains in the service—and I hope he will—I hope he will get the benefit of the average of his salary for the last three years, whatever it may be, and I do not think my hon. friend on reflection would wish it otherwise.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Knowing the great responsibilities that rest upon the Minister of Finance, do not hon. friends opposite feel that he is entitled to come to Parliament and ask for an appropriation for an officer in whom he has great confidence, and to expect to have such appropriation granted?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That applies to every minister. The point is that we do not know what obligation we are putting on the country by passing this vote. If it is a fact that by merely bringing Mr. Russell back for a temporary period it is going to have the effect of increasing his superannuation by $1,600 for all the rest of his life, that is one thing; if it is merely going to have the effect of giving him $6,000 for the temporary period, that is another thing. I would be under the impression that it would not have the more serious effect. But I think the committee should know what obligation will be incurred.

Mr. FIELDING: My right hon. friend is a legal gentleman and should be able to interpret the Superannuation Act better than I can be expected to. If Mr. Russell remains in the service two years longer —and I hope he will—I think he will be entitled to the full benefit of the Superannuation Act; if not, he will have to be content with my right hon. friend's interpretation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is a great deal older than I am, and his judgment ought to be better than mine in regard to this point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You would not think so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know the Prime Minister never had a very high opinion of my judgment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The opinion seems to be reciprocal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Superannuation Act contemplates a man coming into the service, continuing for a considerable length of time, and paying in a certain amount towards superannuation; then upon his retirement he would get superannuation based upon the average salary of the last three years. That would never contemplate a case like this. Mr. Russell came into the service forty years ago at a small salary, worked up until he reached $4,000, and then applied for and was entitled to superannuation on the basis of his salary the last three years, or $2,700. Now the minister proposes to fix a special salary by statute, and thereby entitle Mr. Russell to superannuation, based on that special salary for the rest of his life, even though he is only in the service for three years. Surely the minister does not suggest that that was ever contemplated by the Superannuation Act?

Mr. FIELDING: The act will speak for itself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This may mean thousands and thousands of dollars to Mr. Russell. Does the minister say that that was the original intention of the act? I am told it will mean $4,300 a year as against $2,700 a year, and Mr. Russell will get that all the rest of his life. If we are incurring that obligation we want to do it in the open; but the minister cannot say that that was ever the intention of the Superannuation Act.

Mr. FIELDING: The act says that superannuation applies on a man's retirement with due reference to his period of service, based on the average salary of the last three years. That is what the act says, that is our understanding in the case of Mr. Russell, and I cannot think the act contemplated anything else.

Item agreed to.

To provide for balance of legal expense in connection with the Canadian Northern Guarantee Bill, 1914, and the Grand Trunk Railway mortgage trust deed and lease of Eastern Division of National Transcontinental Railway, $13,154.03.

Mr. FIELDING: We are advised that these legal expenses were incurred in connection with railway matters under the late government. The Department of Justice has reported that they are all right, and we ask for an appropriation accordingly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not quite sure that my hon. friend is right. I think this is a very old claim which was not recognized by the last government. It seems to me it has to do with legislation of 1914.

Mr. FIELDING: If my hon. friend claims that the late government did not recognize the item, I will withdraw it without delay. The information I have is that these are amounts for services in connection with the Canadian Northern Guarantee Bill, 1914.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who are to receive the money?

Mr. FIELDING: The estate of the late James Bicknell will get $11,404.73, less what has been paid on account, $6,200, balance $5,204.73; Messrs. Lewis and Smel-lie, in connection with the Canadian Northern Guarantee Bill of 1914, $5,039, less already paid $2,107, balance $2,932; Messrs. Lewis and Smellie again, in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific railway mortgage trust deed, $5,017.30. Now, as these transactions occurred in 1914 they could hardly have been incurred by the present Government or even by the late Liberal government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I happened to have some familiarity with this matter as it is now described by the minister. The firms he refers to were engaged in 1914 to perform certain legal services in the preparation of the trust mortgages connected with the Canadian Northern legislation and guarantee of that year. Bills were put in by these firms in the usual way—by the firm of Bain, Bicknell and Company, of Toronto, and by Lewis and Smellie, of Ottawa. These bills were taxed by the Justice Department in the usual way and the amount taxed was paid to each firm. Both firms, nevertheless, came back and insisted that they did not get enough and asserted that they would not submit to the taxation of the Justice Department. The government of that day, and every government since, insisted that the rule had to obtain and that the firms in question would have to abide by that taxation. If they could show anything that had not been taxed; if they could show any services that had been rendered for which they did not submit a bill, all right; but we told them definitely that by the judgment of the taxing officer of the Justice Department the government was going to abide. That was the stand the late government took; the present Government takes a different stand and yields to their claims.

Mr. FIELDING: No, the present Government does not take that stand. I shall drop the item without a moment's hesitation.

Mr. GRAHAM: I move that the item be withdrawn.

Item withdrawn.

To cover unprovided items, 1920-21, as per Auditor General's report, part B, page 3, 1920-21, $544,009.25.

Mr. FIELDING: The various departments receive letters of credit under which they operate. They are kept within the limits of the totals of these, but sometimes they exceed the appropriation for some particular branch. At the end of the year the Auditor General calls attention to this in his report and asks for a vote of Parliament by way of confirmation. The details are all set forth in the Auditor General's report. I must say that this item has always been one that I regret, because if the departments would look after the matter more closely, they would keep strictly within not only their letters of credit, but also the appropriations for each particular item. But so long as they do not exceed the total of their letters of credit they seem to feel that some excess in a particular branch of their business will be condoned by Parliament.

4 p.m.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I entirely agree with my hon. friend. It is a matter that I have referred to more than once in the House. It goes to show the uselessness of a past audit instead of a pre-audit, and also the futility of expecting some people to keep within the orders of this House and the amounts voted them by this House. As the matter stands, however, my hon. friend is quite right; there is nothing to do but to put it through.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Civil government—Department of Justice—to provide for one assistant private secretary from December 29th, 1921, to March 31st, 1922, at $1,600 per annum..	$ 412 90
Contingencies—further amount required (Governor General's Warrant, December 1st, 1921).. ..	10,000 00
	$10,412 90

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): Does this indicate a new appointment? It would seem to, taking the dates into consideration.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: There were two secretaries in my department; one has been transferred to another branch and replaced by an assistant secretary. The expenditure is less by some $1,500.

Mr. CRERAR: Would the minister give some explanation of the Governor General's warrant of $10,000 in this item?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: This amount is required on account of the increase of work and the increase of prices. Our appropriation for some years has been insufficient and has had to be increased by supplementary votes. The chief increases are due to temporary employees, travelling expenses of officials, and printing.

Mr. HANSON: That means, if I understand the minister aright, that what the House says is sufficient for contingencies is exceeded by officials of the department, who over-expend from year to year. I do not think that is a proper state of affairs, or that the House should approve of it by simply passing this $10,000 item in this way.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I must say that most of this was spent before I took office. I will do my best in future to restrict the expenditure within the limit of the vote.

Mr. GOOD: As I understand it, then, this money has been spent?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My recollection is that a warrant was put through in this connection, and the explanation given by the department at the time was that we had to spend a good deal more than had been expected owing to an injunction proceeding in which my hon. friend the leader to my left was one of the complainants, and which he lost.

Mr. CRERAR: I would be glad if my hon. friend would explain that again. I caught only the latter part of his remarks, and they sounded interesting.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Is there any standard scale of salary for assistant private secretary? In the previous item the salary of the assistant private secretary in the Privy Council office is $3,000; in this case it is $1,600. Does the salary depend upon the wish of the minister, or is there some set standard?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: It is based on the experience of the official.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: But in the one case the salary is $3,000 and in the other it is $1,600.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the case of the previous item referred to, the assistant is required to have a knowledge of French as well as English. The length of his service, combined with the fact that he is qualified to take dictation and to read letters in French as well as English, justifies the difference in salary.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: It pays to learn French.

Item agreed to.

Department of Justice—miscellaneous expenditure, further amount required, $6,000.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: This is necessitated by the expenses incurred by the arrest, trial, at Fort Providence, N.W.T., and execution, of the Indian Lebeaux, convicted of murder. The judge and officials were brought from Alberta and maintained at Fort Providence during the trial. The total cost will approximate $10,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is this charged against last year's expenditure?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Because the expenditure was incurred last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But I understood the minister to say it would be paid in the future.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: It was spent last year, and we are holding the accounts.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are not paid yet?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Not paid yet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why then is this charged against last year?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Because the trial took place last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Even though the trial took place last year amounts being paid this year should not be charged to this year's estimates? For example money voted last year is applicable very frequently to services rendered this year, though it is not payable this year. Should not the reverse be the case?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I am told that is not the custom. The trial took place last year and the expenditure has to be paid out of last year's budget.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The costs seem to be very heavy. I am afraid last year's expenditure is going to be enhanced by the extravagance of the three months at the end?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: There has been no extravagance in the three months referred to. This trial took place last summer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When were the figures submitted and agreed to as being right and fair?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Most of these accounts are from the Mounted Police Department. They were settled not very long ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I thought.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: But the trial took place last summer.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We have to pay for former extravagance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I am complaining of is the ease with which the Government consents to almost any charge at all.

Item agreed to.

Penitentiaries—further amount required (Governor General's Warrant, February 22, 1922), $150,000.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The explanation with which I have been furnished with reference to this item is as follows:

Up to the 22nd instant, approximately $50,000 of this amount has been expended
The warrant was necessary owing to the following:

Amount deducted from Supplementary Estimates, May, 1921..	$ 54,000 00
Accounts received from Purchasing Agent, June 1st, 1921, chargeable to year 1920-21, and which had not been reported by him or estimated for..	11,971 41
Total carried over into present year..	$ 65,971 41
Expenditure for temporary cells, etc., due to increased population, which amounts to over 500 since the 1st of April, 1921..	37,000 00
Balance required to provide for maintenance and guarding extra population ($30,000 of which is required to pay for extra officers employed but not provided for in main estimates of current year)..	47,028 59
	$150,000 00

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is this expenditure all due to the increase of prison population?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Partly to the increase of prison population and partly to having to provide temporary cells, and the appointment of additional officers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The other items would be due to the increased population also?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When were these officers appointed?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I can get the dates of the appointments if my hon. friend wishes it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would like to get the periods. In this case I see the warrant was passed 22nd February this year. Are the cheques so governed that only payment for services up to 31st March is charged against this warrant, or is the money applicable even beyond that date?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Only to 31st March.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it really a fact that Mr. J. D. Adamson has been made King's Bench Judge of Manitoba?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: He has been appointed.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of War Claims, further amount required, $1,000.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The vote of $6,000 in the main estimates has been exhausted, and a few outstanding accounts still require attention.

Item agreed to.

SECRETARY OF STATE

Department of the Secretary of State—to provide for the salary of a Private Secretary to the Secretary of State, from the 21st September, 1921, to the 21st November, 1921, at $3,500 per annum, and from the 22nd November, 1921, to the 28th December, 1921, at the difference between $2,460 and $3,500 per annum, $697.31.
Contingencies — further amount required, $5,495.

Mr. CRERAR: Might we have some explanation of this item? It seems to vary from the preceding items of this character.

Mr. COPP: The $697 was the difference between the salaries provided for the secretary of the Secretary of State, prior to the 31st day of September, 1921. When the new Secretary of State took office he engaged another secretary, at a higher salary, $3.500, and this amount is the difference between the salary of the former secretary and the salary of the secretary employed by my predecessor during the time that secretary was engaged. One was engaged at $2,400 and the other at $3,500.

Mr. CRERAR: Were there two secretaries?

Mr. DUFF: Who was the Secretary of State?

Mr. COPP: Mr. Monty. When he came into office he engaged a secretary at $3,500 a year. The amount provided for a secretary was $2,400, and the $697.31 is to provide for the difference in the salaries between the $2,400 which the former secretary received and the salary of the new secretary, Mr. Mercure, $3.500.

Mr. GOOD: I would like to get some explanation of the second part of the item.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume the minister knows that Mr. Monty would require a secretary who understood and wrote both French and English, and that is the real explanation.

Mr. COPP: The expenditure for 1921-22 was as follows: Clerical assistance, $6,429.94; printing and stationery, $11,800.00; Companies Act, $12,800.00; sundries, $5,220.08; total, $36,250.02. Owing to a misunderstanding as to the number of copies of the report of the Secretary of State required for the use of Parliament, no extra provision was made in the Main Estimates for 1921-22 to cover cost of printing the same. The cost of printing the report is slightly under $2,800. Then there was a special item of a little over $2,000 for counsel fees in the appeal to the Privy Council of the Companies Act, which was not provided for in the Main Estimates, and that makes up the extra amount for contingencies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the date of the appeal?

Mr. COPP: Judgment was given on the 25th February, 1921, and the appeal was heard before that.

Item agreed to.

Expenses under Naturalization Acts, 1914, and 1920—further amount required, $22,715.

Mr. CRERAR: Will the hon. minister explain this item?

Mr. COPP: The Royal Canadian Northwest Mounted Police conducted investigations from May, 1920, to October, 1921, amounting to $24,823.13, and that is provided for in this item.

Mr. CRERAR: What was the nature of the investigation they carried on?

Mr. COPP: Before naturalization certificates were issued to any applicant, they were referred to the Mounted Police for investigation and the investigations were made by that body and reported back to the department, and on their reports the certificates are granted or refused.

Mr. CRERAR: Is that done in all cases where there is application for naturalization certificate?

Mr. COPP: It is only when the department thinks it is necessary. When it is considered unnecessary, the certificates are issued without investigation.

Mr. PARENT: In what part of the country has this taken place in the past?

Mr. COPP: They have carried on in all parts of Canada. When any question arises in the minds of the officials of the department, and it is thought an investigation is necessary in any part of Canada, the investigations are carried on by that organization.

Mr. PARENT: I could not readily understand the answer of the minister, but apparently he has the report from his deputy, stating where this has been done in the past. We would like to know about it.

Mr. COPP: I may say that unfortunately we have not the details of every individual case, because each report in the particular file pertains to a particular man. There are something like fifteen or twenty thousand cases which have been investigated, but they are in individual files, and it is impossible to have them here to give my hon. friend the details of each individual case and where it is located.

Mr. CRERAR: You do not mean to state that this expenditure covers fifteen or twenty thousand individual cases.

Mr. COPP: The average expense in each case is 97 cents.

Mr. CRERAR: Cheap naturalization.

Mr. GOOD: On what ground does the department send the inspectors to make these investigations?

Mr. COPP: We cannot lay down any definite rule as to what they act upon. When the officials of the department consider an investigation should be held before a certificate is granted or refused, an investigation is held and a report obtained from the officials, and it is reported back to the department.

Mr. CAMPBELL: A good deal of the work has been done in the prairie provinces, and I have come in contact with a good deal of it myself. I see no particular fault to find with the system. The Mounted Police are very efficient; they travel out to these people's homes, inspect their houses, find out if their children are going to school, do other necessary work like that, and make a recommendation, based on the facts which they have ascertained, whether they consider these people are desirable citizens or not.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of war claims—Secretary of State —further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. CRERAR: Will the minister kindly explain this item?

Mr. COPP: This appropriation is required for the expenses of the clearing office in connection with alien enemy property. This clearing office was transferred to the Department of the Secretary of State. The amount of $50,000 that was appropriated last year was insufficient to carry on the work. The estimate last year was largely a guess, because it was impossible to get a correct idea of what this work would cost.

Mr. CRERAR: What is the total amount of alien enemy property in the custody in the department?

Mr. COPP: It would be impossible to tell that accurately, because it would depend upon what the property might be valued at and what it might be sold at. We have on hand a great deal of property that has not yet been valued or sold.

Mr. CRERAR: Do I understand that no estimate has so far been made of the value of the whole property?

Mr. COPP: As I say, it would be a mere estimate. I do not know whether an estimate has been made of the value of the whole property or not, but we have an estimate of a considerable portion of the property. I am informed that, originally, the estimate amounted to about $30,000,000; but on a revaluation, as after careful investigation, releases have had to be given of some property claimed, the estimate is now $20,000,000.

Mr. CRERAR: Is any charge made against this property for the administration of it?

Mr. COPP: The cost of administering this property is eventually taken from the property, with the exception that the cost of the clearing office is paid for out of the ordinary revenue of the country.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Were any shares of the Canadian Pacific railway seized, and, if so, to what extent?

Mr. COPP: Shares of Canadian Pacific stock to the number of 140,000 are now vested with the custodian.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What is the intention of the Government in regard to that? Is it a matter of trial, or for determination by some law officer, whether the property is to remain in the hands of the custodian or go back to some one?

Mr. COPP: That matter is under consideration, and it will take some time to settle the question so as to enable me to give my hon. friend a direct answer.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Would it not be better for the committee to have the details, especially as to property connected with a great enterprise like the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. COPP: We are willing to give all the details. My hon. friend has perfect freedom to go through the department and get all the information regarding this matter, or I will gladly bring down in the House any information that he desires. We are only handling the property as custodians for future determination as to who owns it.

Mr. CRERAR: Is this property not held against the reparation claims made under the peace treaty against our late enemies?

Mr. COPP: It may be under the treaty, but it has not been decided yet that it will be.

Mr. CRERAR: With whom lies the decision in the matter?

Mr. COPP: I presume it will be the policy of the governments of different nations which have taken part and which are interested. The question has not yet been decided. The Government, I believe, asked that claims be filed in regard to the matter; but the question as to what will be done as regards claims that have been made has not yet been decided.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): What, roughly, is the amount of claims that have been filed by citizens of Canada against aliens? And will Canadian creditors be protected by this fund?

Mr. COPP: I am informed that claims amounting to about $23,500,000 have been filed by Canadian citizens.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Has any settlement been made with Canadian creditors out of moneys in the custody of the Government?

Mr. COPP: No settlements have been made with regard to reparations.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): They may not be reparations. Canadian creditors of aliens have these claims, and the Government has this property in its custody. Has any effort been made to protect Canadian creditors by selling or using this alien property for the discharge of these claims?

Mr. COPP: Creditors are paid as soon as settlements are effected between the clearing offices in the two countries. Certainly a number of claims have already been settled and paid, and others will be as soon as settlements are effected between the clearing offices.

Mr. ANDERSON: Have any claims against Russia been dealt with?

Mr. COPP: They have not.

Item agreed to.

Department of Public Archives—contingencies, further amount required, $8,070.67.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the explanation of this item?

Mr. COPP: This is largely for printing required by the Archives branch during the past year.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous — Public Archives — further amount required, $7,600.

Mr. CRERAR: What is that for?

Mr. COPP: This was for the purchase of certain documents in England, authorized about a year ago by the Prime Minister. The sum of $20,000 was authorized for the purpose of purchasing what are known as the Monckton papers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The explanation does not recall anything to my mind.

Mr. COPP: An amount of $20,000 was authorized but was not all used.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was it not included in the vote of a year ago?

Mr. COPP: The authority was given after the close of the session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much was spent?

Mr. COPP: About $3,000.

Mr. CRERAR: What is the nature of the documents?

Mr. COPP: They are very valuable historical documents relating to General Robert Monckton, at one time governor of the province of Nova Scotia. The rest of the money was used for the purchase of other manuscripts and books in England which are now in the archives. Hon. members may refer to them at any time.

Item agreed to.

Paper Control Inquiry—amount required to pay a balance of $200, to each of the three Commissioners, $600.

Mr. FIELDING: This is to pay $200 to each of three judges, whose names I do not know, for services in connection with the Paper Control Inquiry.

Mr. CRERAR: This is an item that has been outstanding for some time past.

Mr. FIELDING: It was authorized by Order in Council of October 26, 1920.

Mr. CRERAR: And the money has not so far been paid?

Mr. FIELDING: I assume it has not yet been paid. At any rate, it should not be paid until parliamentary authority has been given.

Item agreed to.

Grant towards expenses of Imperial Convention of Teachers in Toronto, Summer of 1921, $1,500.

Mr. FIELDING: Dr. James L. Hughes, of Toronto, on behalf of the Teacher's Association, represented to us that the right hon. the late Prime Minister had given him assurance of this aid, and to honour the engagement of the right hon. gentleman we put in this item.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think there is a slight over-statement in the matter. I do recall a conversation with Dr. Hughes in which I stated that up to a certain amount consideration would be given, and that I would lay the matter before my colleagues. I make no objection to the appropriation, but I made no binding engagement of any kind. It is only right, however, that the grant should be given.

Mr. FIELDING: Desirous of having things done in good form, I asked for evidence and my right hon. friend's letter was produced, wherein he gave the assurance—at least I would call it an assurance—that aid to the extent of $1,500 would be given. Accordingly, taking it for granted that the representation was correct, we included this item in the estimates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The letter I wrote is an exact reflection of what I have stated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I might read the letter:

OTTAWA, ONTARIO, August 30th, 1921.

Dear Doctor HUGHES,

I regret very much that your letter of August 11th got mislaid. As explained in previous letters, it is not usual and, indeed, might be said to be unprecedented, to make grants for purposes of educational conventions. However, the circumstances of yours are somewhat exceptional. We could not make any grant now, but I will submit for the Estimates next session a figure, and, while I cannot undertake that it pass and be submitted to Parliament,—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

—I feel that I will be able to recommend it conscientiously to my colleagues. I would not like recommending more than $1,500 at the outside.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would ask that that be compared with what I said a few moments ago from memory, and I think there will not be found to be the slightest difference.

Mr. FIELDING: My right hon. friend said just now that he had made no engagement. I would consider a letter of that kind as an engagement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not undertake that anything would be paid; I said that I would submit the matter to my colleagues.

Mr. BUREAU: It might be called a diplomatic engagement.

Mr. FIELDING: I am not complaining at all that my right hon. friend made such an engagement, and we are only too glad to honour it.

Item agreed to.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

Department of Customs and Excise—to provide for the salary of one Private Secretary from January 1, to March 31, 1922, at $3,360 per annum, $840.

Mr. CRERAR: Explain.

Mr. BUREAU: The estimate explains itself. I did not suppose my hon. friend would have me think that he could not understand it, and that is why I did not volunteer an explanation.

Item agreed to.

Customs and Excise—Miscellaneous—Printing, stationery and publications for Inland Revenue Service for fiscal year 1920-21, $51,017.26—Gratuity to James Connor, formerly Customs Officer at Snow Flake, Manitoba, $125.

Mr. PARENT: Where was this printing done, and to what company or private individuals was it given?

Mr. BUREAU: I am unable to give the information. These bills were left at the time of the reorganization of the Department of Customs and Excise was carried out. The assignment of the various officers from one department to the other did not take place soon enough. The money was voted last year, but the fiscal year expired before these bills were checked and approved, and consequently we had to ask for a re-vote of the money. I think the printing must have been done at the government printing bureau.

Mr. BROWN: What is the gratuity to James Connor?

Mr. BUREAU: He was notified of his dismissal three days after he was dismissed; that was on the 1st of October, 1918, I understand.

Mr. McMASTER: Why did he not go if he knew he was going?

Mr. BUREAU: He only knew he was going away three days after he was gone.

Mr. BROWN: How long was Connor in the service, and what were the circumstances of his dismissal?

Mr. BUREAU: He was at Snow Flake, and his services were dispensed with on 1st October, 1918, but he did not receive notice until three days later, and he therefore made a claim for compensation. This matter was brought to the attention of the House by Mr. Richardson in 1920, as will be found at page 2590 of Hansard for that year, and it was decided that his dismissal should be investigated. The investigation was conducted by Mr. Stevenson, chief inspector of the Crown Timber Office, Department of the Interior, who recommended that in view of Mr. Connor's long and faithful service he be given a gratuity of two months' wages, amounting to $125. This recommendation was approved by the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue at the time.

Mr. BROWN: Is there nothing in the correspondence to indicate the cause of his dismissal?

Mr. BUREAU: There may be, but I have not the correspondence here. If the hon. gentleman wants to see the correspondence he can put a question on the Order Paper and I will see that it is brought down.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have different reasons advanced from time to time why items are included in these supplementary estimates. My hon. friend, the Minister of Customs, has given us a particular reason in this case. He points out that there were delays in the reorganization of the department, that there was a proper vote from which these payments could be made, but that they were not made because the accounts had not been checked and approved before the end of the last fiscal year. I understand that the purpose of these estimates is not to make good departmental faults, neglects or delays, but to provide for payments which have not been provided for in the main estimates of the year and have since become necessary. It seems to be quite obvious that this is not a vote of that character, and ought not to be included in these supplementary estimates. The Minister of Finance will appreciate that point.

Mr. BUREAU: I think that expenditure incurred last year, and not paid, ought not to be in the main estimates this year, but in the supplementary. In this case, instead of being short of funds, this item is due to the fact, as explained by the officers of the department, that the reorganization was not carried through in sufficient time for these accounts to be checked up and approved before the expiration of the fiscal year, 1920-21. Therefore it was necessary to have this amount voted before payment could be made. I think that is a proper item to come under the supplementary estimates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is pretty hard to say where the main estimates end and the supplementary estimates begin, and I suppose it is quite fair to give due appreciation to the position of my hon. friends. They seem to be cleaning up everything that has gone behind; they are making quite sure that everything that can be charged up will be charged up here.

Mr. FIELDING: Would not that be quite correct?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It may be quite right generally, but on some particular items it is not. I should like to know really what principle we are going on. As I say, I thought the general main principle of these Supplementary Estimates for the year that has passed was to provide for items unprovided for by Parliament in the main estimates. In this particular case we know that Parliament actually provided for payment of the items involved. If my hon. friends want to take this course, I wonder if they are going to say that the time when the work is done shall determine what is to be charged. I notice they do not bind themselves in any way; for instance, in connection with the grant for the Genoa conference, which, if I recall rightly, only started after the 31st March, they charge the whole amount up to last year's estimates. Surely there must be some rule other than the mere whim of the Government as to what is to be charged to last year and what is not.

Mr. BUREAU: Does my hon. friend take exception to this particular item?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. BUREAU: In what way would he pay it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Through this year's main estimates.

Mr. BUREAU: For expenditure incurred and bills rendered last year?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You allowed the vote to go.

Mr. BUREAU: Then, what is the use of supplementary estimates?

Mr. CRERAR: I don't agree with my hon. friend the late Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) in the position he is taking on this vote. I think that expenditures incurred in the past year should be distinctly set out by themselves, and not included in the main estimates for the current year. It would be a rather dangerous practice to follow the course he suggests.

Mr. FIELDING: It is certainly very desirable that the expenditures of the year should be covered by the estimates for that year; but still if there is an unpaid account, what are you to do with it? The only thing to do is to bring it forward in the next estimates you are presenting. If the account is not paid it is better to provide for its payment than to let it wait another year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Suppose we apply that rule to the item of $25,000 for the Genoa conference, it would drop.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not know what money has been drawn in connection with that item. The gentlemen may have taken the money with them, they may have needed it. I would have to inquire as to what amount was drawn. If you want to be strictly accurate you could cut it in two pieces and say that part shall come in one year and part in another year, but it is better not to take two bites at a cherry.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not at all, if you can load the "cherry" in one direction, as it has been loaded. My point is perfectly clear. The minister is correct when he says: This must be charged in this particular account, notwithstanding the fact that a proper appropriation was made by Parliament for that purpose which my officials have overlooked, simply because the work was done that year. I am pointing out that in the same estimates you have an item—there may be others—which rests entirely on work to be done in the next fiscal year. Both principles cannot be right.

Mr. FIELDING: I think part of that appropriation would be used during the current year. I am not sure but what it might have been wise to divide in into two sums, but at the time the Governor General's warrant was granted it was made in one sum. Whether we should divide it in two and apply part to this year and part to next year would be a fair matter for consideration. After all, these are not accounts that we are presenting; they are appropriations, and in this case it is an appropriation to cover the whole service.

Mr. LEWIS: The minister has said that owing to the long and faithful service of this man and his summary dismissal, it was decided to give him the sum of $125. In 1905, when I was in Snow Flake, that gentleman was in that same position, and I understood then that he had been fulfilling those duties for quite a number of years. It is evident, therefore, that when he was dismissed he had occupied the position for nearly twenty years. I do not know whether or not he would have been entitled to pension if he had completed twenty years of service, but it does seem to me that $125, amounting to practically two months' salary, is not sufficient to give to a man under circumstances such as these. I do not know why he was dismissed—whether it was to make room for a political appointment or not. But when a man has given faithful service for so long a time, and when after investigation it has been decided that he should be given a gratuity, $125 does not seem to be an adequate amount to give him upon his summary dismissal.

Item agreed to.

MARINE AND FISHERIES

Department of Marine and Fisheries—to provide for one private secretary from January 1st, to March 31st, 1922, at $3,360 per annum..	$ 840
To provide for one secretary to executive at $1,860 per annum..	310
Contingencies — further amount required..	5,000
	$6,150

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the "Executive" to which the second secretary named here is appointed?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): "Secretary to Executive" is the title adopted by the Civil Service Commission in the classification. The duties are those of assistant secretary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are the contingencies?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The appropriation of 1920-21 was overdrawn by about $3,000, and it will require $2,000 more to cover the balance of expenditure for 1921-22. The department explains that the sum of $6,500, which was over-expended in 1920-21, was carried over to the fiscal year 1921-22, thus reducing the actual appropriation for 1921-22. This amount was spent last year.

Item agreed to.

Ocean and river service—to provide for the temporary relief of distressed seamen and to cover expenses of shipping forms, further amount required, $11,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Large numbers of destitute Canadian seamen in the United Kingdom have been repatriated to Canada by the British Board of Trade. The expenses thus incurred have been unusually large. There will be no necessity for further large expenditures of this kind, the abnormal conditions of shipping since the war, which have been responsible for there being so many destitute Canadian seamen in the United Kingdom, having now passed.

Mr. CRERAR: There was no item in the main estimates last year to cover this?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I understand this item covers the expenses incurred by the British Board of Trade over a period of three or four years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was an obligation entered into to pay this amount, and if so, when?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It has always been done, as my right hon. friend will understand. There is an agreement—at least, it is a custom—that the British Board of Trade takes charge of distressed Canadian seamen and the Canadian Government pays for the services thus rendered.

Mr. DUFF: Is it not a fact that the owners of the ships repay the department for the moneys expended on this account?

Mr. LAPOINTE: They do, when it is possible to claim the amounts from them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The money, then, will come back?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps in this case, the conditions being due to the war, it may be more difficult than usual to claim the repayment of the money.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But if it does come back it will come under the hon. gentleman's receipts, though when it goes out it is charged against the late government's disbursements.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I shall be glad to give my right hon. friend credit for it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister will not have the power, no matter how glad he will be, in his way of being glad.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, but it is a good thing to be glad in life.

Item agreed to.

Lighthouse and coast service—to provide for breaking ice in Thunder bay, Lake Superior and other points deemed advisable for the good of navigation, further amount required, $16,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This further amount is required to meet the claim made by the Canadian Towing and Wrecking Company, Limited, of Port Arthur, Ontario, for services of the ice-breaker James Whalen during the spring of 1918. This company was instructed by the department to proceed with ice-breaking work in the spring of 1918 on a basis of cost. A claim for $50,000 was made and the department paid $18,750. The 5 p.m. company refused to accept this amount in full of account. It was claimed that no provision was made for cost repairs to the ice-breaker due to extremely heavy ice, and that the company suffered considerable financial loss, as owing to her being retained on this work a very favourable offer for the boat had to be refused. After discussion, the company offered to accept $16,000 in full of their claim for the balance of $31,250, without prejudice, and the Department of Marine is of the opinion that payment should be made on this basis, in view of the facts. I may add that this arrangement was made September or October last. I have no doubt that the settlement is good.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When was the settlement made for the payment of $16,000 in full?

Mr. LAPOINTE: In September or October last.

Mr. CRERAR: How long had the claim been outstanding?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Since 1918. Part of the claim had been paid, but there was a further claim for $31,250. The company agreed to accept $16,000 in full, and the department agreed to pay that amount.

Mr. McCONICA: Would the minister tell us if this is to be in full settlement of all claims? I understood him to say it was accepted without prejudice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Offered without prejudice.

Mr. McCONICA: Oh, offered without prejudice? Is it to be accepted in full settlement?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. In full of their claim.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of War Claims. Marine and Fisheries (Governor General's Warrants November 9, 1921, and March 8, 1921), $70,837.90.

Mr. CRERAR: What is the explanation of this?

Mr. LAPOINTE: This amount was expended for legal costs, expert accountants, etc., in connection with the claim of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company for damages resulting from the cancellation of the contract between the department and the company by which the latter agreed to furnish 50,000 to 75,000 tons of steel plates per annum for a period of five years. The company started furnishing in March, 1920, and the contract was cancelled by Order in Council on 18th February, 1921.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Were the legal accounts taxed by the officers of the Justice Department, and if so are these details in accordance with the amounts so taxed?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, I surmise they were taxed. All the Department of Marine and Fisheries had to do was to pay the amount as sent to it by the Department of Justice.

Mr. DUFF: Could the minister tell us what the amount of damages paid to the Iron and Steel Company was?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The case, I understand, is still pending. An amount of $3,000,000 has been paid to the Dominion Iron and Steel Company in virtue of an agreement. The agreement would be final if the Government were paying a further amount of, I think, $1,600,000. This amount has not been paid and the case is pending.

Mr. DUFF: When was the $3,000,000 paid, does the minister know?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I cannot say the exact date. I think it was some time in December last.

Mr. CRERAR: Was the $3,000,000 paid by way of damages?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, by way of damages.

Mr. CRERAR: What value did the Government get for it?

Mr. DUFF: None.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, it is a long story. The case, as I say, is still pending. Of course, if an amount of less than $3,000,000 was granted by the court the Government would have a claim against the company for reimbursement for part of that sum.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister might add that the amount was paid on the strong recommendation of the Justice Department, of the officers of the department who were engaged in the litigation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I agree that the attorney for the Department of Justice in the case, I think, Mr. Meredith of Montreal, recommended the settlement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the Deputy Minister of Justice.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think so.

Mr. DUFF: Was this $3,000,000 paid under the present administration or under the previous government?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The previous government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the balance will be paid by the present administration.

Mr. FIELDING: If the court says so.

Mr. McCONICA: Would the minister tell us what the status of the Government will be if this amount is paid? Does this wind the business up?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh, no.

Mr. McCONICA: What is the idea of making two bites of a cherry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not a cherry but a peach.

Mr. McMASTER: It is a bitter pill.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I understand the solicitors for the Department of Justice had to employ engineers and expert accountants both Canadian and American. They have to be paid as soon as their work is completed.

Mr. LANCTOT: Who were the lawyers that defended the case for the Government?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. F. E. Meredith, K.C. of Montreal.

Mr. LANCTOT: The Department of Justice has ten or twelve lawyers on its staff, why should it employ outside lawyers to plead for the government? I would like to see an end to that practice. We are paying enough money to lawyers in the department without having recourse to outside help?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am not supposed to speak for the Department of Justice, but my hon. friend will understand that the lawyers who are employed there attend to the internal work of the department—they do not usually plead before the courts on behalf of the department.

Mr. DUFF: I would ask the minister if this matter is still unsettled, and whether this $3,000,000 was paid to the company before the litigation was decided?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is still unsettled.

Mr. DUFF: And this $3,000,000 was paid before the litigation was decided?

Mr. LAPOINTE: As I explained to my hon. friend, an agreement was entered into between the government and the company by which the company accepted, I think, $4,600,000 as a settlement. The government had to give its final answer accepting that agreement one month after the first $3,000,000 was paid—they were paid on account at the price set out in the agreement. If after one month the balance was not paid the agreement was cancelled altogether, and that is what has happened. The case is still before the courts.

Mr. DUFF: It seems to me a rather strange procedure for the late government to pay $3,000,000 to any company in Canada for damages while the suit was still in course of settlement?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Referring to the remarks of the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Lanctôt) as to the engagement of outside counsel I quite agree with the minister that it is necessary to go outside very often for counsel; but I would recommend to the hon. member that he continue his pressure regularly, insistently, and increasingly because it will probably be needed.

Mr. LANCTOT: I will.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As to the remarks of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), if he will refer back some years—many years in fact, particularly between 1896 and 1911—he will find many cases of settlement in that period. This, however, was not a case of settlement. The company offered to settle at a certain amount which counsel for the government and the officers of the Justice Department recommended. I think the amount was what the minister says, $4,600,000, and their claim was in the neighbourhood of $10,000,000,—I cannot recall the exact amount. There was no question in the judgment of ourselves, or in the judgment of anyone engaged in the case, that the company had suffered very considerably but it was essential, it could not be helped. They were out of the money and as a consequence there was a very considerable lack of proceeding in their work, and although we were recommended, and strongly recommended, by our own officers to settle for $4,600,000 we took this step: We paid the $3,000,000 to enable them to go on with their work without which they would not have been able to go on, and we left it to the incoming government to decide whether they would accept the settlement by paying the balance, or whether they would go on with the litigation. As to which course they should pursue I have nothing to say. They have decided to go on with the litigation and the court will decide whether there is any balance and, if so, what it is. I submit the proceeding was right, particularly in the interest of the territory affected and in the interest of all concerned.

Mr. DUFF: The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) desires me to run backwards to 1896. This is the year of our Lord, 1922. I do not intend to run forward and backward. We should settle this matter on its merits this year. If the Dominion Iron and Steel Company had a claim against this Government, no money should have been paid until that claim was settled by litigation, or compromise, or some other way. If the Government owed the Dominion Iron and Steel Company this money, they should have had the courage of their convictions, and should have paid, not $3,000,000, but $4,600,000. That would have been the business way. But, as in everything else they did, they compromised the matter, and paid the Dominion Iron and Steel on November 25, 1921, just three weeks before the election, the sum of $3,000,000; and then, knowing that they were not going to be elected, left the balance to be settled by the new government.

Mr. LANCTOT: I want to come back to the lawyers. The Department of Justice has about ten lawyers at least, and my right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), told the House that sometimes we have to go outside for lawyers. I am a farmer as hon. members know, and if I have ten employees, and have some work to do outside my farm, I take a few of my employees outside to do the work. I understand in this case the hearing was in Ottawa and the court sat in Ottawa. Why could they not take a couple of lawyers from the Department of Justice to defend the action? Why go outside and pay $70,000 for counsel? Someone refers to the fact that it was just before the election, and that the $3,000,000 was paid during the election campaign. Why not wait until after the election? That is the part of it that I do not understand. When my hon. friend advises me to watch this Government, my answer is that I will do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I must say, for the poor, much assailed lawyer, that this item is not for legal fees, except to a small extent. I would presume, from what I have read in regard to the Grand Trunk Arbitration case, that a great part of this item would be engineers' fees, disbursements for engineers, actuaries and so on, and I would recommend to the hon. member that, if it is money he is seeking in life, he should take one of those professions.

Mr. LANCTOT: I am not seeking for money at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If he intends to get into the government employ—

Mr. LANCTOT: I do not care for money.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is the late government who are responsible for whatever selections were made of counsel in that action. I only address this remark to the hon. gentleman: this was an action for a tremendous sum of money. The government encounters such actions and will do so, because government is a big enterprise. If the government is to keep in the Justice Department sufficient counsel of capacity to do justice to actions of this sort, they will pay salaries to which the hon. member for Laprairie and Napierville (Mr. Lanctot) will raise considerable objection under the civil government estimates.

Mr. LANCTOT: I think they have too many now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not a case of too many. It is a case of the calibre, the capacity of men that will be required for this character of action. I do not reflect for one moment on the officers of the Justice Department; so far as I have come in contact with them, I say that they are hard working and competent. There are, doubtless, one or two capable of taking charge of almost any action; certainly the deputy minister is; but no deputy minister living, and, to my mind, no two or three of them, could ever take care of the amount of large and important litigation that inevitably falls on the Justice Department.

Mr. LANCTOT: I do not complain of the capacity of the deputy minister, but if there are too many who are incapable, why not employ a good one who is capable of defending all cases?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is against lawyers on general principles.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): On what does the Dominion Iron and Steel Company base its claim?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Dominion Iron and Steel Company had a contract with the government. The government agreed to buy a quantity of steel, about 50,000 tons a year, during five years, and, in consideration of that undertaking by the government, the company built a special manufacturing plant, at a cost of $5,000,000. Of course, the government bought steel during the first year of the agreement, but the war came to an end, and it was considered by the late government that no further quantity was required, and they cancelled the contract. On the other hand, the company had incurred a big expenditure in the building of that manufacturing plant, and they filed a claim for damages of that amount.

Item agreed to.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT

Department of Interior—contingencies—further amount required, $32,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is this?

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The sum of $45,000 was provided in the Estimates for the fiscal year 1921-22 for the payment of printing and stationery accounts, but the amount required is estimated to be $77,000 for that service, leaving an amount of $32,000 to be voted. The estimate is madeup as follows:

Accounts for April and May 1921..	$11,022 66
" " June 1921..	8,646 04
" " July 1921..	7,216 35
" " August 1921..	6,312 39
" " September 1921	8,759 89
" " October 1921..	7,118 81
" " November 1921	3,632 30
" " December 1921	4,886 15
" " January 1922	5,488 53
Estimated amount required for February and March, 1922..	13,916 88
Total..	$77,000 00
Less—amount already voted in estimates..	45,000 00
Amount to be voted..	$32,000 00

Mr. CRERAR: This seems to be a very large expenditure for stationery and printing in one department of the government. I am not objecting to the vote, but merely drawing attention to the fact. It seems to me that an expenditure of $77,000 in 12 months for printing and stationery is one that can be properly looked into, with a view to bringing about reduction in another year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The money is needed to pay for books of various descriptions, such as index books for the registration branch, land patent record books, etc., for file backs, special paper for patents, printed forms, the purchase of typewriters and stationery required for the general use of the inside service at Ottawa. There are over 250 typewriters constantly in use in the inside service, and the cost of repairs and supplies connected with the same amounts to a very large figure each year. It may be added that it is a most difficult problem to estimate fifteen months ahead, with any degree of accuracy, what the requirements for this item will be for an organization such as the Department of the Interior.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I agree wholly with the hon. gentleman from Marquette (Mr. Crerar). I am not making any criticism of the Government or the Prime Minister in advancing this request. I really do not think there is just excuse at all for the department putting in an estimate for a specific item like that $45,000, and then actually spending $77,000. No doubt the proportion spent under the late government is just as great as the proportion spent under this Government, but it seems to me the minister should bring to the attention of his office the fact that an estimate is an estimate, and that they have no right to go beyond it, without the written authority of the minister of the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with my hon. friend. The item all relates to the last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, I did not try to make a point against the Government. The Prime Minister's Government was in office three months of the last year. I stated that there was just as large a proportion before as after; it applies equally to both governments. I think it is the officer of the department who is at fault.

Item agreed to.

Government of the Yukon Territory—to pay salaries and expenses connected with the administration of the territory, further amount required (Governor General's warrant, December 1, 1921), $25,000.

Mr. LANCTOT: Will the Prime Minister kindly explain this item?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The amount voted for this service was $35,000, being only one-half of the amount appropriated for 1920-21. This reduction was decided upon in anticipation of certain retrenchments which are being carried out. A number of changes in the personnel has already been dealt with, but as the officials who are being retired will have to be paid the amount of their accumulated leave which will mean the carrying of their names on the pay-list up to very near the end of the fiscal year, the situation will not be very materially affected. As there was no money left to pay salaries, etc., an Order in Council was passed on the 1st December, P.C. No. 4462, recommending that authority be granted for the issue of a Governor General's warrant.

Mr. LANCTOT: I understand there is a reduction for this year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The reorganization or rearrangement made effects economies that will result in the year 1922-23. I would have expected a word of gratitude from the Prime Minister that we took in hand that work and arranged for economies of which he will derive the benefit.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): How much economy does the right hon. gentleman expect to result from the rearrangement he made?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The economy he expected was $25,000 in this respect alone; but there were many others in the Interior Department than that in this special item.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I recall, about four years ago, when I was last in the House of Commons, endeavouring to arrive at some statement as to how much of the money of the rest of the people of Canada was being spent in this far-away corner of Canada. I think the population consists of eight or nine thousand people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Four thousand.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The amount spent at that time was away over $1,000,000 for all purposes. When one reflects that, in any part of this country, $1,000,000 of the money of the Canadian people is being spent to maintain law and order amongst a population of 4,000, it seems to me the time for drastic economy should arise. There is no sense in keeping up a panoply of government, a commissioner, courts and all these officials in a district to look after 4,000 people. Such a state of affairs seem absurd and ridiculous. It may be said that we ought to provide for future conditions in that territory; but when the time arrives, if we have a large population, we can then expend the money. But when you have a subsidy of $250 apiece for the 4,000 people in the country, it seems to me the matter might well be inquired into.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Lands and Parks,—

Canadian National parks, further amount required (Governor General's warrants, August 13, 1921, October 17, 1921 and November 12, 1921), $166,500.

To pay the corporation of the city of Ottawa for local improvements on streets fronting on ordnance lands, $2,629.24.

To pay the Clarke Trading Company for transportation of supplies to the inhabitants of the North Shore, Quebec province, $1,500.

Mr. DUFF: What is this large amount? In the general estimates we have a very large amount for Dominion parks, and this is a very large amount in the Supplementary Estimates. I notice that this amount was spent last year by Governor General's warrant. What is the reason?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: An amount of $115,000 was provided in the Estimates for the fiscal years 1921-22 in connection with work on the Banff-Windermere highway in Kootenay park, British Columbia. About the middle of August this amount was exhausted and as the minister considered it desirable to carry on operations until late in the fall rather than close down the work and force approximately 140 men out of employment, an Order in Council was passed on the 13th August, 1921, P.C. 2917, recommending that a Governor General's warrant should issue for the sum of $50,000. With this extra amount, an additional twelve miles of road was constructed and nine miles of clearing of the right of way was completed.

By an agreement with the British Columbia government executed in 1919, the Dominion government agreed to complete this road by January, 1924, and to ensure the fufilment of this agreement, it was considered advisable in the month of October to continue operations as long as winter conditions would permit, and an Order in Council was passed on the 17th October, 1921, P.C. 3892, recommending that a Governor General's warrant should issue for a further sum of $16,500. With the additional work done, there is every possibility that the roads will be completed in 1922, and that Canada will begin to derive benefits from the increased tourist revenue in the season of 1922-23, as this is the only uncompleted section of what is probably the most spectacular automobile route in the world, namely: an international circuit highway connecting the Pacific coast, the Grand Canyon of Colorado, Yellowstone and Glacier parks of the United States and all the various cities of the southwestern states with Banff and the Canadian National parks. It is estimated that the first year that this highway is open will increase Canada's tourist revenue by some three million dollars.

In view of the unemployment which existed in the West during the late fall and the possibility of its continuing throughout the winter months, the question of providing employment on necessary construction works in the different parks was carefully considered, and as the working organizations in the various parks, and as the field engineering forces were such that the different works could be economically carried on, an Order in Council was passed on the 12th November, 1921, P.C. No. 4319, recommending that a Governor General's warrant should issue for the sum of $100,000. This provided work for approximately 215 men for a period of four months during a time when such employment was necessary to relieve possible distress.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. LANCTOT: To keep the men busy during the last campaign.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The suspicious member will note that the decision was arrived at long before there was any decision for a campaign. He is a little off the mark. This is something for which we take full responsibility, and the explanation given by the Prime Minister is precisely the explanation that actuated the late government in its decision. We intended to perform a certain amount of work last year and we provided the money for the purpose. Owing to two considerations, the primary one being the need of providing employment in that district and particularly from Calgary where the need was very great—and I am sure, had the hon. member (Mr. Lanctôt) seen the petitions that we received and learned the facts that we learned, he would have done everything he could to have relieved the conditions—we decided to go on further. It was a work that had to be done and one that would provide a revenue as soon as, or sooner than, any other work that we could have performed. It was work in which practically all of the money was going to the labouring man; it was work on this highway that had been going on during the summer. As the Prime Minister says, the anticipated revenue to the people of Canada from that road when completed is expected in the first year to be $3,000,000. It surely was the part of wisdom to utilize the occasion and give the work when it was most needed, in view of the fact that the revenue would come so soon. I hope, in the course we took, we shall have the support of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) because, if there is anything he should be interested in, it is this. This is a case where unemployment was relieved, and not where it was promised and left unrelieved.

Mr. DUFF: I notice by the main estimates that in 1921-22 the sum of $800,000 was voted for Canadian National parks. For the same purpose we are asked to vote, if I remember the Prime Minister's statement rightly, $150,000 for extra moneys spent by the late government. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) gives, as the reason for an expenditure of almost a million dollars, the fact that it gave employment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no. My hon. friend has mistaken the figures. I forget what the Prime Minister gave as the amount of the appropriation, but the hon. member is astray.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: $115,000.

Mr. DUFF: Yes; that makes $915,000 altogether, practically a million dollars.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where does my hon. friend get the balance of the million dollars? There is $115,000 and $166,000 odd. The hon. gentleman's arithmetic is a little weak this afternoon.

Mr. DUFF: No, it is not; in fact, it is not nearly so weak as my right hon. friend's has been during the last few years. His arithmetic has been very weak, otherwise the country would not be in its present financial position. The right hon. gentleman is more to blame for the present financial position of the country than any other man.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the Government says that the country's financial condition is good.

Mr. DUFF: Well, the Government are wrong when they say that.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is prophetic.

Mr. DUFF: If the leader of the Opposition will turn to page 57 of the Main Estimates he will see that in 1921-22 $800,000 was voted. We shall see whose arithmetic is wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Part of that $800,000 was for salaries and part for administration, and the $115,000 I have already mentioned was for the roads themselves.

Mr. DUFF: Does the Prime Minister mean to say that there was some $685,000 spent for salaries and administration?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amount spent on this road for everything is $115,000. The hon. member is referring to the Banff-Windermere road, and the amount in last year's estimates for this work was as the Prime Minister has stated. This is an extra amount spent; the balance has nothing to do with that road at all.

Mr. DUFF: I am referring to the amount spent on Canadian National parks, and I presume that this $115,000 is part of the total of $915,000 spent on that work last year. While, of course, it is a very good thing to try to make good roads all over the country and in this way incidentally relieve unemployment, of which we had so much last year, I do not see any more reason why we should spend this money on the Canadian National parks than anywhere else. The leader of the Opposition says that in three or four years' time we shall have a revenue of a few million dollars from the roads in this particular part of the country. Well, the same thing might be said in regard to the roads in any other part of Canada. If the Government spent a million dollars in Nova Scotia we should have thousands of tourists there who would spend a large amount of money. The same thing might be said of New Brunswick or of Quebec, particularly the latter province, into which there would be a large influx of tourists. But that, I contend, is no good reason why $915,000 should be spent in one particular part of the country; nor is it a good reason, even, that the expenditure of this money would relieve unemployment. Other provinces in the Dominion have had a good deal of unemployment, but they did not come to the Government with a request that money should be spent on the roads to relieve that unemployment. The provincial governments took charge of that problem, and to a certain extent the citizens themselves have endeavoured to find a way out of the difficulty. Those who could not find employment in their own particular vocations sought work in other lines. I see no good reason why, on the eve of an election, this large amount of money should have been voted by the late government and spent in this way. The late government, in my opinion, deserves in this respect the censure not only of this House but of the country at large.

Mr. SHAW: I entirely disagree with the remarks of the member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). I think the late government are to be complimented on having pushed this work on during the last fall and winter, having practically completed it with the exception of a few miles. And I desire to compliment the present Government, as well, upon their foresight in realizing the necessity of completing this particular work at the earliest possible date, because I have every confidence that what the Prime Minister says is absolutely correct, that the finishing of this road, completing as it does, what is known as the Grand Circle Tour, will mean millions of money to this country and will repay very amply indeed the investment which this Government makes. Now, it is quite true that you might expend money in Nova Scotia with the result of bringing a number of tourists to that part of our country. But I think there are few who will question the fact that the expenditure of this sum of money—spent, mind you, by virtue of an agreement with the province of British Columbia—is certainly a far better investment, from the tourist point of view, than any expenditure of a similar amount that might be made in Nova Scotia. I compliment the past government on their energy in carrying on this work; and the present Government, in providing for it this year, is doing a great service indeed, not only in meeting the difficult unemployment conditions that exist in that part of Canada, but also in completing the work in order that returns may be secured from the investment at the earliest possible date.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): While the estimates in connection with the Parks branch of the Interior Department were under consideration I did not happen to be in my seat, and if I am in order at the present time I should like, with the permission of the committee, to revert to the former item in order to discuss a question with reference to migratory birds. This question comes under the Parks branch, I believe, and with the consent of the committee I would like to refer to certain resolutions that have been forwarded to me, and no doubt to other hon. gentlemen from the maritime provinces who are interested in this matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. member would be quite in order in dealing with the matter under this item. The question of migratory birds comes under National parks.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): When the Migratory Birds Act was put into operation it seems to have worked beneficially to all the provinces except Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick. In the two latter provinces it has created a great deal of dissatisfaction. The close season starts, I think, on the first of March, and that is about the time the birds migrate northward. This is the only time of the year that the people in the province of Prince Edward Island have an opportunity to get any birds in their migration north. Fishermen and sportsmen are allowed to shoot the birds only on their return in the fall, and it is practically impossible for them to get any birds at that time of the year. The matter has been taken up by the legislatures of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and resolutions passed by these two bodies have been forwarded to me. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee reading them, but the resolution from Prince Edward Island, after setting forth the various reasons for the opinion it expresses, concludes as follows:

> Be it therefore resolved that in the opinion of this assembly the shooting of geese and brant in this province is only practicable in the spring and then only for a very short period and that the prohibition in this province of the spring shooting of these birds is not only wholly unnecessary for their protection but on the other hand operates as a discrimination against this province in that it amounts to practically a total prohibition of the shooting of these birds at any time, and this assembly is strongly of the opinion that this province should be excepted from the operations of the said act in so far as the season of shooting of geese and brant is concerned but that the present provincial game laws or similar regulations regarding the shooting of migratory birds should be adequately enforced and that this would afford ample protection to the birds and would sufficiently conform to the spirit of the said federal act and the treaty upon which it is based.
> And that the act 7-8 George V, chapter 18, should be so amended as to permit the spring shooting of brant and geese in this province.

A similar resolution was passed by the government of Nova Scotia at the instance of Mr. Kinley, member for Lunenburg. It is as follows:

> Whereas the federal Government, by virtue of the Migratory Bird Treaty, has acquired and assumed jurisdiction over migratory birds in the province of Nova Scotia.
> Therefore resolved that the provisions of the Fish and Game Act relating to the protection of such birds should be repealed.
> A committee of the House be appointed to review the regulation made by the Dominion Government under said treaty, for the purpose of recommending such changes as the conditions in Nova Scotia may require.

Possibly it is beyond the power of this House to deal with the matter, as an international treaty is involved, but I wish to point out that this treaty works an injustice to the people of that province. A few days ago some five or six men who happened to be out with their fire arms were arrested, although they had not shot a bird, and were taken before a magistrate twenty-five miles away, who fined them $25 each. This was rather harsh treatment. We are not in favour of slaughtering these birds for market purposes; but fishermen and sportsmen claim that they should have the privilege of shooting a few in the only season of the year that they can get near them during their migratory flight to the north. Only a few days ago I noticed an item in the newspapers describing the destruction of fishermen's nets by brant, gulls and other birds. In order to get at the fish in the nets these birds tear the nets to such an extent that they become almost useless, yet the fishermen are not allowed to fire a shot to scare the birds away. These men are only asking that they be allowed to take a few birds in their flight north, which is the only time that they have any chance of bagging them.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We complain of the Americans shooting migratory birds in the spring just before they come north to breed. How can we justify the shooting of these same birds after they have left the South?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Do they not shoot those birds up to the first of March?

Mr. CHAPLIN: No, they do not; the spring shooting is done away with under the new agreement.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): When was that amendment made?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Last year. If you will look up our own game laws, you will find that to be the case.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): The complaint our people had was that the Americans could shoot those birds from March first, whereas on the 2nd of March in our country we were not allowed to take a single bird.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That was true up to last year.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): That was where it was so unfair.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It was unfair.

Mr. HANSON: Is there not a season in the fall when our people can shoot these migratory birds? I have heard no complaint in my part of the country against the close season in the spring of the year. It does seem to me that my hon. friend is complaining because two of his friends have been "pinched".

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): No, they did not happen to be my friends. They were from another county. There is no complaint from my friends; they obey the law. In the fall of the year they claim it is impossible to shoot any of those birds on their return south because they stay far out to sea, very few of them frequenting the estuaries of our rivers. Their feeding place is out at sea where they are beyond the reach of our sportsmen.

Mr. LEGER: I desire to support my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. MacLean). I have heard many complaints in my own county against this law. As far back as a hundred years ago I understand there was no closed season for migratory birds, and to-day they are just as numerous as they were at that time, so I do not think there is any fear of their extermination by allowing our people to shoot a few in the spring season.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) said that perhaps the reason why the member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) brought this subject to the attention of the committee was that some of his friends had been fined for violating the provisions of the Migratory Birds Act. I am glad to know that this Government deals differently with offenders against the law to what the late government did. I had a case in my county last fall where two young men, contrary to the provisions of the act, shot some of those birds. They were haled before a magistrate, the Department of Justice retained a solicitor to prosecute them, and were found guilty and each fined $30 and costs. Some good friend of the late government telegraphed to Ottawa, with the result that the present leader of the Opposition passed one of his famous Orders in Council, remitting to these young men the fines which the magistrate had imposed. This happened three or four days before the general election last December. That is the way the late government carried out the provisions of the Migratory Birds Act.

Mr. KYTE: I desire to add a word or two to the observations made by the hon. member for Prince, P.E.I. The people of Nova Scotia object that while they are prohibited from shooting these birds in the spring, when they return from the northern latitudes in the fall, nice and plump and fat, the American sportsmen get at them. It is quite impossible for our sportsmen to shoot these birds after the spring, as they remain for a short time only along the coast of the maritime provinces, and then proceed to the north and stay there until fall. On their return, as the hon. member for Prince has said, they do not land in the estuaries of our rivers, but feed out at sea and then proceed south. That is the time that the American sportsmen, having no close season, can shoot them as they return plump and palatable after feeding upon the fertile pastures of the northern latitudes. This Migratory Birds'

Treaty is an entirely one-sided, jug-handled agreement. It is unfair to the people of the maritime provinces. I am not speaking for the so-called "sportsmen." I have no sympathy with men who go out and shoot these birds purely for "sport"; but I have sympathy for the men living along the coast of the maritime provinces who shoot these birds only because they regard them as a prime necessity. While under the terms of the present Migratory Birds Act they are deprived of that privilege at the only season of the year when it can be of any use to them, sportsmen across the boundary have the full benefit and advantage of shooting these birds without any limitation whatever.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I hope that the remarks which have been addressed to the committee by some hon. members against the provisions of the Migratory Birds Treaty Act and the convention between Canada and the United States in that regard will not have the effect of lessening in any way the restrictions applied under that act and agreement. You may find in isolated districts complaints coming from, I may say, selfish people who want to continue to kill these migratory birds in the spring of the year when they should be protected from sportsmen and people who pretend they depend on their flesh for food. Who ever heard of people living in Canada who depended on the flesh of wild geese in the spring for their food? These birds that have been spoken of—the brant and the duck—are scarcely fit to eat; they are thin and emaciated. My hon. friend spoke of the brant breaking up the fishermen's nets in an effort to get fish; apparently he does not know that the brant is not a fish-eating bird—not a diver, even. When the provisions of the convention between the United States and Canada were first put into force in Canada, there was an inclination—and I may say that I was somewhat affected that way myself—to complain against these restrictions which prevented the very fine spring shooting we used to get. In the case of the Yukon Territory these restrictions involve more hardship, perhaps, than in any other part of Canada; the fall comes so early there that the main flight of the birds is gone even before the open season commences, and in the spring there is as good shooting as can be had any where in the world. The birds come there in millions, on their way to the breeding grounds a short distance further north; you could shoot any amount of them. I am bound to admit that since the Migratory Birds Convention Act was put into force the fall shooting has been very much improved, and I think that applies all over Canada. If these provisions are observed by the people of the United States and Canada, the number of birds which can be hunted in the fall in both countries will very soon be materially increased.

Mr. KYTE: The hon. member for Yukon expresses surprise that there are any people in Canada who would really use these birds for food. I say they are very much more palatable than the dog-meat that is sometimes, of necessity, eaten by the people in other parts of Canada. Circumstances may arise which make it necessary for people to go out and shoot these birds for food, just as circumstances may arise in the northern country under which people go out and obtain dog-meat for food.

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Department of Railways and Canals—contingencies—further amount required, $6,400.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Will the minister kindly explain the item?

Hon. W. C. KENNEDY (Minister of Railways and Canals): The information I have is this: In the civil government estimates for 1921-22 the department provided for certain clerks who were eligible under "blanketing in" anticipating that such "blanketing in" would be accomplished and effective from April 1, 1921. As such was not the case these salaries had to be taken care of from the contingencies vote, as follows:

A. J. McDermid, Clerk-Stenographer	$ 900
L. Walters, Typist	600
I. McBursey, Clerk-Stenographer	1,080
		$2,580
The travelling expenses of the officials of the department were about $3,800 higher than estimated, the increase being due, principally, to the large amount of work relative to the Canada Highways Act		3,800
		$6,380

Welland Canal: Port Colborne elevator—to pay balance of claim of J. A. Jamieson, $7,000.

Mr. CRERAR: What is this for?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): This amount is required to settle in full for services rendered by Mr. J. A. Jamieson as engineer in charge of the construction of the Port Colborne elevator, including its enlargement from a capacity of 850,000 bushels to a capacity of 2,000,000 bushels. The original contract entered into with Mr. Jamieson in 1905 stipulated terms of payment by percentages of costs for services in the design and supervision of construction of a 2,000,000 bushel elevator. The project was modified and the elevator was built with a capacity of 850,000 bushels. Later it was decided to enlarge this elevator to the capacity originally intended of 2,000,000 bushels. The enlargement was an excedingly difficult problem owing to the fact that the work was necesarily carried on while the elevator was in active operation. The above circumstances gave rise to differences of opinion as to the application of the terms of the original contract for services. Payments on account were made during the currency of the work. Mr. Jamieson claims a balance still due of $20,770. After negotiations with officers of the department an agreement was arrived at for settlement at $7,000.

Welland ship canal: construction—additional amount required (Governor General's warrant, February 23, 1922), $435,000.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Will the minister please give us an explanation of this item?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I have this explanation:

The program of the season's work was laid out upon the assumption that the funds to be derived from the sale of the plant on the work, to contractors, would be available for the purpose of the work, in addition to the parliamentary appropriation. When the ruling was made that this credit was not available, the Chief Engineer pointed out that to keep within the parliamentary appropriation it would be necessary to close down the work before the end of the fiscal year. As such a course would be to the serious detriment of the work, and would aggravate the unemployment difficulties the work was continued under a Governor General's warrant.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not rise to object to this item because I have every confidence in the minister, but it is the first opportunity we have had of discussing this very important item.

The CHAIRMAN: That discussion can take place on the Main Estimates.

Mr. CHURCH: But this item has relation to the policy of the Government with respect to the Welland Ship Canal.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): When we take up the Main Estimates a discussion can take place on the whole canal question.

Mr. CHURCH: This involves a matter of policy and the item is a very large one. I wish to offer some observations in respect to it, but I promise not to be very long. In my opinion this project has not been handled in the way it should have been handled. We had a statement from the minister the other day that the Welland ship canal will not be ready to be opened until 1927. Now this canal is a most important link in the whole route for water borne traffic from the city of Montreal to the head of the lakes. Until it is completed the larger boats on the upper lakes will be unable to come down to lakes Erie and Ontario. At present a barge carrying 500,000 bushels of grain, when it reaches Port Colborne, has to have its cargo transshipped to two or three smaller barges and conveyed to the city of Montreal at an additional cost of four or five cents per bushel. This transhipment diverts a large part of the grain intended for Montreal into other channels. According to a report brought down at an earlier date by the International Joint Commission, a great part of this grain now goes to Buffalo. I do not say that the minister is responsible for this state of affairs, but it is exceedingly unfortunate. The Erie canal which was started about the same time as the Welland canal, or shortly afterwards, has been completed and is now open, with the result that the former is getting a large bulk of the business which should pass through Canadian channels. If the same vigour had been displayed in prosecuting this particular work that was shown in the deepening of the Queenston and Chippawa canal, the Welland should be ready to be opened in about two years. Until this work is finished we shall not derive the value that we ought to receive from the large expenditure which the people of Canada have made upon this canal system. Consequently the ports on lake Huron and the Georgian bay, and on lake Erie and lake Ontario, as well as those on the St. Lawrence route are going to suffer. Now, according to information disclosed to the House, $30,000,000 have been spent on this project already and nobody knows when it is going to be finished; it is an eye-sore in the Niagara district to-day. If the work on the Welland canal was vigorously prosecuted it could be completed in a year or two and the large boats on the upper lakes would be able to reach lake Erie and lake Ontario. The result would be that we should have some regulation of the rates for five or six months in the year as between the railways and the water routes. The importance of getting this canal finished is fully set out in the report of the International Joint Commission. I know the minister has given consideration to the important factor which the immediate completion of the Welland canal will prove in lessening the rates on wheat from the great West. I do not wish to detain the House to-night with any further remarks. I hope, however, that when we take up the Main Estimates the Government will disclose the fact that they are so seized with the importance of the subject that they will give effect to the recommendations of the International Joint Commission who investigated this problem. We are away behind the times in our handling of this great project. The Erie canal will have been in operation, I think, this year, for the third summer, and the people of the United States are deriving great benefit from the use of this channel of communication. And it was a most important factor, as Mr. Hoover said the other day. Of course Mr. Hoover is a very high authority and is doing good work in lowering the high cost of living in the United States. He said that when the Welland canal was finished we would get the results in cut rates that this great canal would force. While I have every confidence in the minister, I hope when the Main Estimates are brought down he will give the House and the committee some idea as to when the canal is going to be finished.

Mr. LEWIS: I understand that in the Main Estimates last year $5,000,000 was appropriated for the work of this canal, and I want to know who authorized further expenditure of nearly half a million dollars for the extension of this work. We understand that when $5,000,000 is voted the people who are responsible for continuing this work will keep within that amount; otherwise we will have no say in the matter as to how far it shall be exceeded until the work is done, and we are asked to vote a supplementary estimate. I do not wish to go into the matter of the Welland canal at this particular period, but it seems to me that that canal will become a competing factor with the two transcontinental railways. At the present time the railways do not pay, and before the Welland canal can be completed and put on a paying basis, it would be of great interest to this country to continue the branch line service to the farmers, in order that they might be able to get their products to the trunk lines and transcontinental lines and give the men some work to do. For that reason, instead of continuing to expend $5,000,000 and a supplementary estimate of nearly $500,000, I think it would be to the interest of the country at large, and would also put the two transcontinentals on a paying basis, if this money, providing there is any to be spared, should be spent in extending the branch lines to the real sources of the products that will be carried over them.

Governor General's Cars—attendance, repairs and alterations—further amount required, $6,600.

Mr. CRERAR: What is the purpose of this?

Mr. GOOD: It seems to me it will soon be time to call a halt in regard to those particular expenditures. We were asked to vote some $20,000 this afternoon in connection with this same matter. I wish to protest against any enlargement of expenditure in this particular direction.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): The amount was spent, as is customary when there is a change of Governor General, and the cars were overhauled and other necessary repairs made. There were two cars and the cost was $6,600.

Mr. CRERAR: Were these repairs absolutely necessary? Were the cars in a dilapidated condition, or does the Government take occasion whenever there is a change of Governor General to overhaul all cars at additional expense?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I do not understand that it is the custom or practice that there shall be money expended when a change of Governor General takes place. It did so happen in this case that the cars were not in good shape. They were sent to the shop and overhauled and it was found necessary to expend the amount mentioned.

To provide for expenditure for rails accessories and repairs to equipment to December 31st, 1921 (Governor General's warrant December 31st, 1921), $735,000.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Orders placed by the Canadian National Railway for rails under the general authority of Order in Council No. 3800, October 6, 1921, in connection with measures for the relief of the unemployment situation, necessitated a payment amounting approximately to $735,000, about December 31, 1921, and by Order in Council No. 4652 payment was provided for by authority of Governor General's warrant. Later arrangements rendered it advisable that the amounts so paid be included in the railway loan, the charge was accordingly transferred, and this warrant will not be utilized. Notwithstanding that this warrant will not be drawn on, it has been considered necessary, in accordance with the customary practice relative to Governor General's warrants, to print it in the Supplementary Estimates. As a matter of fact, the loan of $50,000,000 was passed this year and made provision for this $735,000, and this amount will not be called on. It is simply a bookkeeping item.

Mr. CRERAR: Those contracts were let in October.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): By Order in Council of the 6th October authority was given for the making of repairs on 2,000 cars of the Canadian National Railways, for the purpose of relieving unemployment.

Mr. CRERAR: Where were the repairs made?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Five hundred in New Glasgow, five hundred in Amherst, five hundred in Montreal and five hundred in Hamilton.

Mr. CRERAR: Does this whole item cover repairs to cars?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): And rails were also included in the Order in Council at that time. I have a statement of it, if the hon. member would like to hear it.

Mr. CRERAR: I would like to get the particulars.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): By Order in Council of the 6th October, 1921, authority was given for the making of heavy repairs to 2,000 cars of the National Railways for the purpose of relieving the unemployment situation and also for ordering for the Canadian National Railways and the Grand Trunk Railway system 75,000 tons of rails for the same purpose. These orders anticipated the requirements of the railways for the new year.

Five hundred and forty cars were completed before 31st March, 1922, at an average cost of $927.34 or a total of $500,763. Since March 31, 950 cars had been repaired, leaving a balance of 510 not yet repaired.

Of the rails authorized, 40,000 tons were purchased by the Canadian National Railways and paid for out of the appropriations for the past fiscal year:

Dominion Iron & Steel, 19,380 1st's at $49 ton. f.o.b. mill.
Dominion Iron & Steel, 619 2nd's at $46.55 ton f.o.b. mill.
Algoma, 19,000 1st's at $50 ton f.o.b. mill.
Algoma, 1,000 2nd's at $47.50 ton f.o.b. mill.

The Grand Trunk Railway placed orders for 29,000 tons.

Dominion Iron & Steel, 15,243 at $49 ton f.o.b. mill.
Algoma, 13,828 at $49 ton f.o.b. mill.

Orders were for delivery in April and May, payment to be made in May and June. No payments have yet been made. The balance, 6,000 tons, was not ordered.

Mr. CRERAR: At what price were these orders placed? What was the cost of the service?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): Dominion Iron and Steel Company $49 per ton f.o.b. the mills. That was for firsts, and for seconds $46.55 per ton f.o.b. the mill. The Algoma price was $50 per ton f.o.b. the mill for firsts, and $47.50 f.o.b. the mill for seconds. Of the orders placed by the Grand Trunk Railway, the one with the Dominion Iron and Steel company of 15,243 tons was placed at $49 per ton f.o.b. the mill, and the one with the Algoma Steel Company of 13,828 tons, at $49 a ton f.o.b. the mill.

Mr. CRERAR: What are the current prices for rails?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): We have not been on the market for rails since then, and I am not in a position to give the hon. member the information.

Mr. LEWIS: Are these rails being utilised, or are they still on hand?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): They are being distributed and used for replacement purposes.

Mr. LEWIS: I understood the minister to say in his speech, that there were to be no extensions of lines this year. It would be a good plan to use the rails on branch lines.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): They are being used for replacement purposes.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): In connection with this item, I should like to explain to the committee that, in the closing months of 1921, very strong representations were made, not only to the Department of Railways and Canals and the government, but to the boards in charge of the operation of Canadian-owned railways, that the unemployment situation in large centres of industrial activity throughout Canada was such that a very great hardship was likely to result to the working people during the winter season of 1921-22. It was urged, not only upon the boards of management of the two systems, but upon the government, and urged by representatives of municipalities, by boards of trade, by labour organizations, by, in fact, all interests, that the railways should, as far as possible, anticipate their requirements; that orders likely to be placed for the season of 1922, should be so placed that the industries could be operated during the winter season. That is exactly what was done. The government conferred with the Canadian Northern board and the Grand Trunk board and suggested to them that it would be well that, having regard to the unemployment situation, they should take into consideration the advisability of placing these orders. It was decided that the two boards, having determined what the possible requirements for this season would be in the way of rails and having taken stock of the cars that were in hand and would be required to be replaced or repaired for the season's operations, should place orders for repair and reconstruction of cars and orders for rails for replacement purposes, and the action of the government was confined to providing in anticipation the funds. It was in pursuance of this policy that the government, in carrying out the Order in Council referred to by the minister, authorised the boards and undertook to provide the funds.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I am a little surprised to hear the ex-minister (Mr. Stewart) say that those contracts were given out just to relieve unemployment in some parts of the country. Does he not know that all this work of repairing cars could have been given to the shops of the railways in the province of Quebec or elsewhere? From the very fact that the ex-minister gave that work out to some private corporations he reduced the number of men in the railway shops. They were turned out and added to the ranks of the unemployed in other parts of the country just for the sake of those private corporations of which the government that was in power at that time was so fond. I was greatly distressed to see hundreds of men turned out in the cold of winter just because private corporations wanted to have those contracts notwithstanding the hardship inflicted upon the men who were working in the shops at Rivière du Loup. I am surprised at my hon. friend coming boldly before such a House as this and supporting the firing out of these men into the cold just for the sake of some private corporations.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): In reply to the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau), I should like to explain to the committee that neither the late government nor the Department of Railways and Canals had any part to play in placing the orders. I am sure the boards in control of the shops to which my hon. friend refers, would place those orders, having due regard to the requirements of their staffs. The orders for rails were distributed amongst the companies which were engaged in the manufacture of rails. Some of the orders went to the Algoma Steel Company and the balance to Nova Scotia. In the repair and reconstruction of cars as also, for that matter, in connection with placing orders for rails, regard was had to the question of unemployment, and the Order in Council which authorized the orders which were placed, provided that, in the placing of those orders, conference should be had with the Department of Labour in order that the work should go to relieve unemployment, and not as my hon. friend (Mr. Gauvreau) states, to private corporations for any considerations outside of that of unemployment, because no order could be placed until after conference with the Minister of Labour and until after the situation in the locality where an order was placed had been canvassed and surveyed, regard being had to the question of employment at the time and also to the question of possible employment during the winter season.

Mr. CRERAR: Do I understand that the Minister of Labour decided where those orders would be placed?

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I hope the committee did not understand me as apparently the hon. member for Marquette did. I said that the orders were anticipated in order, as far as was consistent with good business and management, to relieve the unemployment situation. The government having that in view, it was decided that, in the placing of orders, the boards should appreciate exactly what the unemployment situation was, and the records in the Department of Labour gave that information to an extent that it would have been impossible to get it in any other way. The hon. gentleman hardly states the situation as it existed. Unemployment was at the basis of the whole policy, and the late government was very careful to impress upon the two boards that, in anticipating the requirements upon which those orders would be based, due regard should be had to what was to be required this year. And it was provided that while these companies were to go on and manufacture, payment was not to be made until delivery. They could go on and make rails and pile them up, but payment by the board was to be made at the time that delivery was taken; and delivery would be taken when the requirement arose.

Mr. KYTE: While this item is under consideration I would draw to the attention of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) the conditions of unemployment that exist in the city of Sydney at the present time, and have existed for some months past. The city of Sydney has been built up around the steel industry which was established there many years ago. It is one of our best markets—in fact it is the best market that we have locally—for the consumption of the coal which is produced in the island of Cape Breton. As the member for Lanark (Mr. Stewart) stated, an order was given last year in anticipation of the requirements of the government railways, and that order had a very considerable effect in relieving the unemployment situation as it existed in that centre of population some months ago. Unfortunately, however, owing to the depression that prevails throughout all the avenues of trade in the maritime provinces and in Canada generally, no general orders for the manufacture of steel have been secured by steel companies.

The plant in Sydney a year ago employed some 4,000 persons who, with their families, constitute the largest proportion of the population of the city. But the number of employees was reduced some months ago to 800. There are to-day, and have been for some months, 3,200 steel workers in idleness in that city. The city has been unable to collect taxes from these people for the simple reason that they have no money wherewith to pay them; and as a consequence the civic officers have not been paid their salaries for more than a month. That is a condition that ought not to exist in any part of this country if it can possibly be obviated.

The late government did very well in placing the orders which they gave in anticipation of the requirements of the government railways but I do think that the present Minister of Railways, in further anticipation of the needs of the Government railways in the matter of rails, should give an order to the steel company at Sydney for, say, 25,000 tons, so that the steel plant there might start again and provide much needed employment to the steel workers of that community.

Now, Sydney is unfortunately situated with respect to the receiving of orders from other railway corporations in Canada. Up to the present time the steel company at Sydney has never received an order for steel rails from the Canadian Pacific Railway, for the reason that the Canadian Pacific railway line does not extend to the city of Sydney, and that company are averse to paying freight on the rails to another railway corporation. Therefore, so far as the purchase of rails in Canada goes, the Canadian Pacific Railway places its orders with the rival plant at Sault Ste. Marie in the province of Ontario. The same has been true with respect to rails purchased by the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk Railway Company. They have placed their orders for steel rails entirely with the steel plant in Ontario.

The Dominion Government has owned a railway in the maritime provinces for many years. That railway is now linked up with the Canadian National Railway System, and I submit that in the very near future there must be a necessity for very large orders of rails for this government system. Even though the Minister of Railways may have on hand a sufficient quantity of rails for the present year, I do not think that, taking into consideration the conditions as they exist in Sydney to-day, and having regard to the desire of all classes in Canada to relieve as far as possible the unemployment situation throughout the country, the Government would be justified in placing another order with the steel company at Sydney for the purpose of relieving unemployment. I am told by gentlemen who are experts in the matter of the value of steel rails, that steel rails are the one commodity which do not deteriorate while not in use. On the contrary, they increase in value and usefulness with age, and I am informed that the Government would not be losing anything even if they were to pay interest on money borrowed for the purpose of placing another order with the steel company at Sydney, because the value of the rails, as regards durability, would have increased so much by being kept in storage for a year or two, that the additional cost would be more than compensated for.

I trust that the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who after all is the one member of the Government that has to provide the wherewithal to meet the demands that would be made in connection with these additional orders, will be able to find the means whereby an order can be placed in Sydney. I do not think it would be fair to place the cost of these rails against the operating account of the railways for the present year, because the rails would not be used until probably 1923. I think it would be worth while for the Government to consider the proposal to borrow a certain sum of money to defray the cost of the rails; but the cost should not appear in the accounts for the operation of the Railway Department for 1922 or 1923. Now, this is a most serious matter, and besides bringing it up before this committee to-night, my colleague (Mr. Carroll) who is at present engaged on a committee in another part of the building and myself have taken it up with the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Finance, and I give notice now that at a very early date we hope to renew the application for this order. I trust therefore that the Government may find some way, in view of the conditions that prevail to-day, to accede to the request and get the steel rail mills going once more in the city of Sydney.

Mr. CRERAR: I occasionally find myself in agreement with the sentiments expressed by the genial Whip on the Government side (Mr. Kyte). But I must, in the strongest manner possible, dissent from the strange and remarkable doctrine which he has just propounded to the House. I sympathize very deeply indeed with the position of the steel workers in the town of Sydney; but I take this opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to draw the attention of this House to the fact that the condition that exists in Sydney to-day is indeed a striking commentary on the whole public policy that has been followed in the past in respect of the steel industry in Canada. The official records will disclose the fact that in the past this Dominion has subsidized the steel industry of Canada to the tune of between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000. I cannot speak with exact knowledge of the precise amount; but I know it is somewhere between the figures I have mentioned. Now, what have we got? We have given out in cold cash to the steel companies in this Dominion somewhere between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000 in the way of actual bonus to build up their business for the purpose of creating these industries in Canada and giving employment to Canadian labour. And after having done all that, we are faced now with the remarkable doctrine that we must further subsidize this particular industry by placing government orders with it in order that the workmen who have been gathered around it may be enabled to live. If that is a wise, sane and sound method of developing the country, then I certainly have a great deal to learn. I will make that confession very fully and very frankly.

The Minister of Railways will be ill-advised indeed as far as the Government is concerned if he is governed by any other than the soundest business principles in the placing of orders for the National Railways. One of the criticisms I have to make against the late government in respect to these particular orders that we are now discussing, is, that in my judgment they were not placed according to sound business principles. I am not going to draw further attention to the significant fact that they were placed a few months prior to the election. My hon. friend, the late Minister of Railways (Mr. Stewart) states that this was done to relieve unemployment.

Mr. GAUVREAU: And good Liberals were dismissed from the shops.

Mr. CRERAR: I accept his assurance in that respect, but the significance of the time at which the orders were placed is not lost. We find that orders for rails were placed at $50 a ton. I am not aware at what price rails could be purchased to-day, but I think I am well within the mark when I say that they could be purchased at very considerably less than that figure. That illustrates one of the business practices that should be followed in the operation of the Canadian National Railways,—that rails, cars, and all other equipment and rolling stock required for their operation should be purchased at the lowest prices. It is not a sound business policy for the Government—for the late government or for this Government—to place orders for rails or any other materials or equipment required for these railways in order to relieve unemployment, if that means that higher prices have to be paid and charged against the railways. And I serve fair warning now upon the Minister of Railways that I reserve the right to criticise in the freest possible manner that method of conducting the business of our National Railways.

I have always maintained in this House and in the country that the operation of our National Railways should be placed on a sound business basis. I believe it can be done. But it cannot be done if unsound business practice is allowed to govern. It should be left entirely with the management and the directors to decide where these purchases shall be made, and when. The Government and the Minister of Railways occupy a very influential position, and it is the most natural thing in the world that even the management or the board of directors of the National Railways would pay attention to suggestions made by the minister as to where and when orders should be placed. Therefore it lies with the Minister of Railways and with the Government more than with any one else to absolutely dissociate the administration of these railways from considerations of this nature.

I inquired a little while ago from the minister what these rails would cost if they were purchased now, and I am sorry that he could not give me the information. I trust that before the main estimates of the Railway Department come down the minister will be able to furnish it. I was told—I do not know with what truth—that when these orders were placed last October they could have been placed at a cheaper rate. As I say, I do not know if my information is accurate. But before I take my seat I repeat once more that this is the only consideration that should govern in the administration of these National Railways, that the things necessary for their operation, the repair of cars and other rolling stock, the purchase of equipment, rails, ties and everything else, should be purchased on strict business methods by buying always where they can buy to the best advantage.

Mr. KYTE: I would assure my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar), that I do not think the conditions existing in Sydney differ very much from the conditions existing among the wheat-growers in the western provinces. Some years ago they were very prosperous, they were receiving good prices for their wheat; and in the same way the steel workers were prosperous because the steel mills were busy and they were receiving good wages. We have an application before Parliament now for the establishment of a wheat board. I have no fault to find with that application; the western farmers have a perfect right to ask for it. But is that for the purpose of reducing the price of wheat to the growers of western Canada, or for the purpose of securing to them larger returns? If for the latter purpose, then surely the increased profit will have to come from those who consume the flour which is manufactured out of that western wheat.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. KYTE: My hon. friends opposite say "no." I confess that I am not sufficiently familiar with the process by which they expect to get larger profits, but it always follows that if the producer of an article designs to get a higher price for it, then the consumer must pay more for the commodity.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. KYTE: A wheat board was established a couple of years ago and the government financed its operations. I do not know if that is desired at the present time by the western provinces, but as I gathered from the discussion in this House some weeks ago it was the desire of our friends from the West to have a wheat board established whose operations would be financed out of the Treasury.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. KYTE: The Government, of course, would not lose by doing so, because, as in the past, they would be recouped any moneys advanced. At all events, whether the particular details I refer to be correct or not, the fact is that conditions have arisen in western Canada which appear to make it necessary for our friends from the prairie provinces to take some further steps to secure better returns for the products of the wheat-growers. I did hear one hon. gentleman after another state in this House during the present session that wheat growing was most unprofitable for them owing to the small prices they received last year. That is perfectly true, and for my part I am prepared to support any reasonable proposal that my hon. friends from the western provinces may present to this House for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of their constituents. Therefore I say it is unkind at least for my hon. friend from Marquette to object to a similar proposal, although in another form, which I am making in behalf of my constituents in the city of Sydney.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): The member for Marquette has questioned the soundness of the business methods adopted by the late government last October. I am quite willing to take issue with him upon what was done from a business standpoint, and to permit the House to judge whether the business methods then adopted were sound or unsound. What was fundamental in the action of the government, and what that action was predicated upon, I submit was good business practice that was not uncommon during the past winter among private concerns.

First of all, we had a very serious unemployment situation. In the steel centres particularly where the car construction works were located it was the opinion not only of those in charge of the industry itself but of the municipalities that in no recent years were the prospects so serious for the working classes, and the government was petitioned time and again, and deputations from the municipal councils of those localities waited upon us to emphasize the seriousness of the situation.

Now, what did the government do? After conferring with the Department of Labour the government convinced itself that the conditions in the different localities, as represented by the municipal authorities, were very serious indeed and that the prospects for the winter season were absolutely hopeless for the working people. What the government did do was to confer with the representatives of the two boards in charge of the government lines as to the wisdom of placing orders for such supplies as would be used this spring and this season. Now, aside from the possible question of price, which has not been raised, I submit there is no bad business about that. The government ordered such rails as in the opinion of the boards would be required this season, and it was part of the arrangement that no payment was to be made until delivery was taken, and there was no obligation to take delivery before the rails were actually required. If it was bad business in the fall of 1921 to provide that these industries should operate during the winter season when it was most desirable, in the interests of the employees as well as of the country generally, that there should be employment, then I am quite willing to admit that my hon. friend from Marquette is right. But we acted as we deemed best; we took the responsibility then, and we stand by our action now. Why, it was not uncommon during the past season for those engaged in private industry, in manufacturing in many lines throughout Canada, to ask their customers to anticipate their requirements in order that the factories might be kept busy during the winter months when the really serious unemployment situation existed. If that was good business on the part of those engaged in private enterprise, surely no question can be raised as to the action of the government with regard to the orders that were placed.

9 p.m.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Will my hon. friend allow me a question I want to put to him with regard to the contracts for the repairs of cars? He says he wanted to relieve unemployment, but he took action which threw out a good many men in Truro, Halifax and Quebec, thus adding to the unemployment in our towns and cities.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): The situation with reference to the repairing and rebuilding of cars rested on precisely the same basis as the placing of orders for rails.

Mr. GAUVREAU: You were wrong in both, then.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): In the placing of orders for rails and other supplies and for repairs to cars, the Government and the Department of Railways played no part at all.

Mr. MITCHELL: I understood the hon. gentleman to say a few moments ago that neither the Government nor the railway management had anything to do with the placing of these contracts.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): No, I said the Department of Railways.

Mr. MITCHELL: And that the Minister of Labour had something to do with it.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): The Minister of Labour was asked to confer with the boards of the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk in order that in placing the work regard should be had to the condition of unemployment. There were also conferences between the executive heads of the two national systems and the Canadian Pacific, because in taking care of the unemployment situation it was necessary that the Canadian National board should know what the Canadian Pacific was doing in the matter of its commitments in respect of rails and cars. There were conferences, I say, not only between the Department of Labour and the two boards of the National system, but between these two boards and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. My hon. friend referred to the placing of the cars and its effect upon the car works of the National system and of the Grand Trunk system. Well, that matter was fully considered by the boards; whether or not their judgment was correct is something that hon. members will themselves have to form an opinion upon. But the question of unemployment, in private industry as well as in the works of the companies themselves, was all canvassed. Whether or not the final decision was wise is something—

Mr. BOIVIN: Will the ex-minister please make it quite clear whether it was the Government that was advising the railway board or the railway board that was advising the Government?

Mr STEWART (Lanark): It was a matter upon which advice was unnecessary and was not given, so far as I know. If there was to be anticipation of the requirements of the road, it was necessary for the Government to make provision for the funds, and, in the Order in Council to which reference has been made, authority was given to the boards to anticipate the requirements that would result from the course that was to be taken.

Mr. VIEN: When was that done?

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Early in October.

Mr. VIEN: After dissolution?

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): After dissolution, yes. My hon. friend from Marquette has suggested that the transaction had some political significance.

Mr. VIEN: Will the hon. gentleman deny that it had any political significance?

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Absolutely and positively. The fact that the dates synchronize does not involve that conclusion. My hon. friend who has just asked the question will not deny that the condition of unemployment existed. Surely he will not accuse the late government of having brought about that condition because there was an election coming on and it might be considered expedient from a political point of view to give the orders. If he does not go that far; if he admits that there was unemployment and that it was good business to give the orders, then his suggestion falls to the ground.

Mr. VIEN: I do not admit anything.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I would not expect my hon. friend to do so.

Mr. WARD: I would like to ask the ex-Minister of Railways if he was aware that last fall, between the middle of October and the first of November, a train-load of new rails was shipped to the little town of Ste. Rose, presumably, I would say, to purchase a part of the Dauphin constituency for the government candidate.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I would presume that my hon. friend would know sufficient about the policy under which our national roads are managed to find it unnecessary to ask the question, but as, apparently, it is necessary to make an explanation, let me say this: Under the law as it stands now, and as it stood in October of last year, neither the government, nor any department of the government, has anything to do with the very condition which he states exists; and unless he suggests that the board of management of the road was operating the system and depositing the rails for political purposes his argument falls to the ground. Under the law as it stands, the government has absolutely nothing to do with the administration in the respect of which he has made this reference. Therefore I say that unless hon. gentlemen go the length of arguing that it was unsound business to attempt to take care of the unemployment situation, the action of the late government cannot be questioned. It did not require the expenditure of a single dollar prior to the time that it became necessary to take over these supplies for the purposes of the road. The car repairs were placed in such centres as was deemed wise. They were placed by the board of management of the road, not by the government, and they were placed all over this country. Certain regard had to be paid to the question of the location of the industry concerned. That is, it would be impossible from a business point of view to take cars from western Canada to Nova Scotia to repair them. It would not be considered good business to haul rails from Nova Scotia to the western provinces when those rails could be as well purchased at the Soo from the Algoma Steel company. All these were considerations which were dealt with by the board of management and in connection with which the government itself took no part directly or indirectly. That is the point I desire to stress—that the government had nothing in any way to do with these contracts, aside from supplying, or undertaking to supply, the money that would be necessary to anticipate these orders after the close of the fiscal year. Now that is the condition. As I stated before, if that is a matter as to which the late government should be censured then I assure you they are quite willing to take the censure.

Mr. MURDOCK: I have been very much surprised, as well as pleased, to hear the explanation given by the former Minister of Railways as to the letting of the car repairing contracts last fall, because this statement shows conclusively that I have been altogether misinformed on this question since I became Minister of Labour. For the first two or three months of this year I gave interviews to gentlemen, several of them, who forcibly indicated to me that all that was necessary to place an order for the repairing of cars of the National Railways, including the Grand Trunk, with their concern, was simply to make the necessary recommendation to my colleague the Minister of Railways. He, in turn would convey the view of the Minister of Labour to the operating officers of the railroads that such order was necessary to relieve unemployment in this centre or that centre and that any car repair order should go forward. I was given to understand that distinctly, and that is why I could not refrain from rising to say how pleased I am to receive the statement of the former Minister of Railways that these gentlemen who were coming to me for the first three months of this year were giving me entirely inaccurate information. Further, I understood the former Minister of Railways to suggest that it would not be good business to draw cars for repair from western Canada to eastern Canada. My information is—and I would like to be corrected if it is wrong—that Grand Trunk cars were hauled from a point west of Montreal to New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, a distance of about eight hundred miles, repaired and hauled back again. If that was not done I would like to have that inaccurate statement also corrected by the former Minister of Railways.

Some hon. MEMBERS: You are right.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am very glad indeed to have had the explanation that has been given in regard to the letting of these car repairing contracts, because, I repeat, I was told it was done on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, through the Minister of Railways, to the operating officers of the railroad.

Mr. MANION: I should like to say a few words in regard to the relief of unemployment that was assisted by the late government. I happen to be somewhat familiar with one section of this country anyway, that is the northern Ontario section, and I can say that the late government in that part of the province—the section in the neighbourhood Sault Ste. Marie and the section at the head of the lakes—did very much to relieve the unemployment just through such contracts as my hon. friend the late Minister of Railways has mentioned. I have no doubt at all that the present Minister of Labour has had many people call upon him for unemployment doles: I do not think that he has had any request from the head of the lakes for any assistance financially. There has been a certain amount of unemployment at the head of the lakes, but there has been very little in comparison with what there would have been had the late government not given instructions for the repair of government railway cars in that district. That is also true of Sault Ste. Marie because of the rail contracts that were given there.

Now, in regard to hauling cars eight hundred miles for repairs, I do not pretend to know anything about railway matters at all; but I do know that cars are often hauled eight hundred miles for that purpose. Many of the cars which are repaired by the Canada Car Company at the head of the lakes are hauled eight hundred miles from the prairie provinces, and a great many more than that distance. They come down loaded with wheat. Even though they do require repairs, their injuries, I take it, are not so great as to prevent them still remaining in use as rolling stock. They come down a great deal farther than eight hundred miles and are repaired, as I say, in the Canada Car Works; and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company does the same thing with its cars.

As a matter of fact the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—which we very often boast about as the greatest and most efficient corporation in the country—often gives contracts to the Canada Car Company, and the cars are of the same type—cars which have been used for carrying wheat from the prairie provinces, and many of them travelling much more than eight hundred miles to be repaired. So far as I am concerned—and I had something to do with the policy and saw something of it—I believe that the late government deserves a great deal of credit for the contracts they gave. If those contracts happened to be awarded before the election, was that any reason why the late government should ignore the unemployment conditions and not give them. Certainly not, to my mind.

Mr. VIEN: Will my hon. friend tell me how many cars were repaired at Fort William?

Mr. MANION: I do not happen to have the figures, but I know there are still about five hundred men working in the car plant turning out that order, and that it is helping to relieve the unemployment conditions there.

Mr. FIELDING: Has not the late Minister of Railways just stated that the Government did not give these contracts?

Mr. MANION: I do not care anything about who gave the contracts. We are speaking about contracts given either by the Government, or by the government railways, for the repair of cars. I do not know who gave the contracts. I had nothing to do with that; I was not Minister of Railways. But I know that government railway cars were repaired at the head of the lakes, and I repeat it had much to do with relieving the unemployment situation in northern Ontario—that work and the contracts which were obtained by the steel mills at Sault Ste. Marie.

Now, in regard to the remarks by my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) who speaks of desiring the greatest efficiency on the part of the government railways. I doubt if there is an hon. member here who does not wish to see that. But at the same time, if a government road contract for the repair of cars, or the repair of something else, or the manufacture of rolling stock, or the manufacture of rails, can be given in such a manner that it helps to relieve the unemployment situation in this country, whether given by the late government or the present Government, so far as I am concerned, even if it can be shown that it costs a little more—unless the cost is so much more that it is a disgrace—I will promise the present Government that I will support them in such a contract.

Another remark of the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) was rather a criticism of the steel bonus. I remember when the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was citicised on other occasions in regard to this steel bonus which he brought in, when previously in office, I have seen him rise to his feet on some occasions and prove, and I think conclusively, that this bonus was a fine piece of legislation. I notice that when the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) raises the same cry, the Minister of Finance does not rise, I presume for the reason that it is not good policy, in the present condition of the Government, to quarrel with the hon. member for Marquette. I am going to help out the Minister of Finance in that matter, because I agree with the policy he introduced in 1896, or about that time. I think I am correct in saying that the bounties were brought in by the present Minister of Finance when he was in the Liberal government of that time. He brought in bounties which amounted to some millions of dollars. The hon. member for Marquette gave some figures which, I think, are approximately correct, as to the amount paid on these bounties. I have looked into the question myself, because, as some hon. members of this House know, I gave on occasions various discourses on the iron question in this country, and I considered the iron and steel question at some length. I heard the hon. Minister of Finance state, and I agree with him, that due to these bounties to a great extent the steel and iron manufacturing plants of this country were built up. The steel and iron industries were built up to a great extent by the very bounties given about 1896 by the present Minister of Finance who was a member of the former Liberal government. Possibly they were put on just before, but I think it was about that time. In my opinion these bounties had very much to do with building up the iron and steel manufacturing processes of this country. I wish to compliment the present Minister of Finance upon having kept them in force as long as he did. For some years past they have been discontinued.

I notice that my hon. friend from Marquette and many of his friends cheered him strongly when he criticized these bounties. I hold the Estimates in my hand, and in the Estimates I find a figure of $6,084,000 in the agricultural estimates. Last year it was $5,900,000. I challenge my hon. friends to my left to show that this $6,000,000 item is not a bounty to the agricultural interests of this country when the money is paid. I challenge them to say that it is not practically a direct bounty. In the agricultural estimates I find these items: Experimental Farm, $1,315,000; Administration and enforcement of the Destructive Insect and Pest Act, $235,000: Health of Animals, administration and enforcement of the Animal Contagious Diseases, and Meat and Canned Food Acts, $1,710,000, and so on, and all these items make a total of over $6,000,000. If that is not a direct assistance to the agricultural interests, I do not know what it is. It does not assist me as a professional man, and it does not assist manufacturing or any other interests. It is certainly a direct assistance to the agricultural interest, and therefore it is a bounty to that interest. So far as I am concerned, I support it, and support it whole-heartedly, and I think it should be carried out. But I think the members of the agricultural section of this House should be consistent when they criticise bounties, and if they are going to absolutely condemn all bounties in their criticisms in this House, then they should go after the agricultural bounty in the present estimates.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I wish to ask a question, which perhaps is not in order, but the hon. gentleman referred to the votes for the administration and enforcement of the Destructive Insect and Pest Act, Health of Animals, administration and enforcement of the Animal Contagious Diseases, and Meat and Canned Food Acts, and so on. I would like to know how the hon. member could call that a bonus to the agricultural interest. As a matter of fact, it is due to a large extent—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

The CHAIRMAN: I draw the attention of the committee to the fact that this is getting almost beyond the bounds of order, because the particular item deals with the expenditure in connection with rails and so on, $735,000, and while it is quite possible to make comparisons, such as were made by the hon. gentleman from Marquette, it is getting now beyond the bounds of relevancy to this particular item.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I think so.

Mr. MANION: I think the Chairman is quite right. I shall apply anything I have to say to the item under discussion. I wish to say that when you help to relieve unemployment, as is requested by my hon. friend from Cape Breton South (Mr. Kyte), who asks that work under this item be performed in the steel mills in his constituency, it is reasonable to do so, even if that work does cost this country a little more than it costs in some other plant. Is it not better for this country that we should pay a few more dollars that way, than that we should hand out doles, as a charity, to the unemployed of this country? I certainly think it is, and I am perfectly in accord with the request of the hon. member for Cape Breton South, when he requests that the steel mills should, if possible, if the expense be not too great, be kept in employment in times such as these. I say that, perhaps, with a certain amount of selfishness, because, if the unemployment became very bad in New Ontario, I should certainly be one of the first to request that the New Ontario corporations should be assisted in the same way to prevent unemployment continuing. I should like to have dealt with one or two other remarks of the hon. member for Marquette, but seeing that objection is taken, I think I shall have to refrain at the present time.

Mr. BOIVIN: It is not my intention to enter into a discussion of the bounty question to-night, because I think you had good reason to declare it out of order. The proper time for this discussion will be the budget debate. There is, however, a very important question before this committee to-night in connection with this item, and that is: Are the Canadian National Railways administered by the Canadian National Railway Board, or were they administered by the late government on the eve of the last general election for political purposes? The ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Stewart) tells us he and his government had absolutely nothing to do with the sending of a train load of rails to a certain constituency on the eve of the election, and I think, in giving that answer, he was perfectly right in theory. But if he was right in theory in giving that answer, was the late government right in deciding where these orders were to be placed? "Oh, but," he said, "there were a great many private corporations who did absolutely the same thing, who placed orders for goods they did not need, in order to relieve unemployment." I sat in this House during the last session, and if I remember rightly, I heard a great deal about unemployment and about the methods employed by the late government to relieve that condition. During the recess I heard a great deal about unemployment, but the government made no move in the way of giving orders until the month of October, after the general election had been announced, and when it was once more seeking the support of the people of Canada. Then they thought of unemployment, and what did they do? They passed an Order in Council authorizing a member of their government, the Minister of Labour, to put the gun to the head of the administrators of the Canadian National Railways and tell them when and where they should get their cars repaired, and when and where they should buy their rails. The ex-Minister of Railways said that private corporations did the same thing, but I should like him to name one private corporation that purchased goods from other similar corporations when its own shops were closed and its own employees were going without labour and without food. It is well known that the Canadian government railway shops at St. Malo, while they were, perhaps, not completely closed, were working on very short time with a greatly reduced staff. The Grand Trunk shops in the city of Montreal were working on short time with a reduced staff. The shops at Fraserville were working on short time with a reduced staff, and at Moncton the same state of affairs existed. What happened? Was employment given to their own men? Did they prevent their own machinery from being ruined by rust and neglect? Did they endeavour to use it by giving employment to their own men? Not at all. They closed up their own shops and they gave work to other firms. They did that by Order in Council. What right did the late government have to decide by Order in Council where the work should be done? If the late government desired to operate the National Railways of Canada and were brave and courageous enough to say so, well and good; but that is not what they pretended. They told us in the last Parliament that they had absolutely nothing to do with the National Railways. When they were asked an ordinary question concerning disbursements, or the cost of coal, or supplies, or rails, or cars, they said: We do not know anything about that. We will ask Mr. Hanna in Toronto. We cannot give you an answer; we have no right to give you an answer. We have nothing to do with the administration of these roads. They maintained that attitude until Parliament had been dissolved, until the candidates of all political parties were before their electors, and then they decided to change all this and pass Orders in Council to oblige Mr. Hanna and his associates to place their orders just exactly where the government would decide.

It may be argued that an Order in Council was necessary to provide the funds. There was no Order in Council passed to provide the funds in the month of October last. A Governor General's Warrant was passed, on the 21st December, 1921, to pay the debts contracted just a few days before the late government laid down the reins of office. The first Order in Council was passed in order to enable the then Minister of Labour to wield the big stick we heard so much about the other night, and to tell the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways where those orders would be given. The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) said that he would support this Government if it did the same thing. I should like to ask him if he would support this Government, if it took damaged cars from his constituency, from the other side of Fort William, and brought them to St. Malo, in the province of Quebec, to have them repaired, while his own shops were closed or running on short time.

Mr. MANION: Speaking generally, I would not; but the question depends a little on unemployment conditions at the time. I know nothing about the St. Malo shops; but I repeat what I said a few minutes ago; I do know that whatever contracts were given in northern Ontario, which is a part of the country I am most familiar with, did a great deal to relieve the situation of unemployment and were very badly needed.

Mr. BOIVIN: Exactly. The action taken by the late government on the eve of the election relieved unemployment where they wanted to relieve it and created unemployment where they wanted it to be created, or where they did not care whether it was created or not.

Mr. MANION: Would it not be a rather peculiar thing if they relieved unemployment where they did not want to relieve it?

Mr. BOIVIN: It would have been a very peculiar thing, but not half so peculiar as many things accomplished by the late government. My closing remarks are that from the explanations of the ex-Minister of Railways—and I may be very dense—I have not yet been able to understand why an Order in Council was necessary. I have not yet understood why a government, that had nothing to do with the administration of the National Railways, could empower a Minister of Labour by Order in Council to direct where this work should be done, and I have yet to learn that it is good policy for any corporation to close its own shops and use its money to have its work performed by other institutions while its own machinery and employees are absolutely idle.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) has expressed very great surprise that the late government found it necessary to pass an Order in Council in order to determine where certain car repairs should be carried on. No such Order in Council was passed; no Order in Council was ever passed directing where any work would be done. He also expresses very great surprise that an Order in Council should have been passed by the late government providing that the Minister of Railways should wield the big stick—

Mr. BOIVIN: I said, the Minister of Labour.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark):—that the Minister of Labour should wield the big stick and direct the officers of the two railway boards where the cars were to be repaired. No such Order in Council was ever passed, and there was no Order in Council giving to the Minister of Labour the right to determine where the work should be done.

Mr. BOIVIN: What did he have to do with the matter then?

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): He had nothing further to do with it than was authorized in the Order in Council itself—

Mr. BOIVIN: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark):—to confer with the representatives of the boards.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): It seems remarkable that hon. gentlemen should be so much amused that, in the consideration of the question of unemployment, the Minister of Labour and the Labour Department should be brought into consultation. The whole question of the placing of orders, of the number of cars to be repaired, of the number of rails to be ordered, was one with which the late government, neither directly nor indirectly, had any voice. I should like to make that clear.

Mr. BOIVIN: Except the Minister of Labour.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): The Minister of Labour had absolutely nothing to do with it.

Mr. VIEN: What did he do then to relieve unemployment?

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): If my hon. friend is not able to grasp the situation, I am afraid I cannot help him. Neither the late government nor the late Minister of Labour had a single thing to say or had any voice in the question of what cars were to be repaired, what supplies were to be purchased. That was a matter that was entirely within the jurisdiction of the two boards. Let there be no mistake about that. No attempt was made on behalf of the government to influence either board in any direction.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member said a moment ago that the Minister of Labour was to confer with someone or another with reference to the expenditure of this money. With whom was he to confer?

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Possibly I would make myself clear to the committee if I said this, that the Minister of Labour was to be the source of information as to the question of unemployment in the country.

Mr. MITCHELL: To whom was that information to be given?

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): That information was to be available for the members of the two boards of the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk, in whose hands the whole question of the placing of these orders and the purchase of supplies rested.

Mr. BOIVIN: Why was that included in the Order in Council?

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Why was what included?

Mr. BOIVIN: The fact that the Minister of Labour should advise.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Because the whole situation was predicated on unemployment.

Mr. BOIVIN: So that it was included in the Order in Council.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Yes. The Minister of Labour could not direct where a single order should go. He could give to the officials of the two boards the information as to unemployment which goes to the department and is on record there.

Mr. VIEN: Will my hon. friend tell me whether the Minister of Labour at the time advised the board of the Canadian National Railways as to where there was unemployment to be relieved?

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I have no knowledge of that: I never was present.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Hon. gentlemen laugh; but I would ask them in what respect it would be possible for me to have the information which my hon. friend has just asked for?

Mr. VIEN: It should be possible, because you were Minister of Railways.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): The Minister of Railways, under the law as it stands and as it stood then, has absolutely no authority to place orders for supplies. Surely my hon. friend knows that. That was the condition in October of last year, and it is the condition to-day.

Mr. VIEN: Can my hon. friend explain why 100 men were discharged at Fraserville when there was unemployment there, while unemployment was relieved elsewhere?

Mr. CASGRAIN: And 300 in Quebec city?

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I am afraid I cannot make the matter clearer to my hon. friend. If unemployment existed in the industries that were owned by the government, that was something of which the government had no notice; and I know that in the placing of all orders consideration was taken of the whole question of unemployment, not only in connection with the industries owned and operated by the government, but throughout the country as well. With regard to the question of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) as to whether or not the late Minister of Railways knew that cars were taken from Montreal to Nova Scotia to be repaired, I do understand that cars were taken from the province of Quebec to Nova Scotia to be rebuilt, and they were taken there for two reasons: first, because some of the car companies, not only in the province of Quebec, but also some in Nova Scotia, were not equipped for the handling of the class of work that was to be done; and, secondly, because at that particular time the condition of unemployment was much more severe in some centres of the province of Nova Scotia than in Montreal, where the work might have been done had it been done in the province of Quebec.

Mr VIEN: And the relief in Nova Scotia served a more useful purpose.

Mr. DUFF: The minister has given two reasons. I might add a third: Colonel Cantley was a Tory candidate.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): That is a matter which the member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) will have to thresh out with the boards of the two lines who placed the order.

Mr. DUFF: Colonel Cantley was a member of the board.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): That is a matter that does not go to the root of the whole question, for the reason—

Mr. DUFF: And he was defeated too.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark):—that the department did not place the order.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That order went to grease the wheels, so to speak.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I wish to make one further reference to what was said by the Minister of Labour, who referred to the placing of orders through the Minister of Railways. If I understood him aright that is what he told the House.

Mr. MURDOCK: What I said was that the impression had been conveyed to me repeatedly during the first two or three months I was in office, by representatives of these car concerns, that all previous orders for the repair of cars at New Glasgow, Amherst, Montreal, Hamilton and Fort William, had been made as the result of recommendations made by the Minister of Labour, as to the unemployment situation in the particular localities. Those recommendations were made through the Minister of Railways to the officers of the boards of directors of the National railways, and the orders went forth accordingly. I was given to understand that all that was necessary was for me to realize the unemployment situation in the various localities interested in the matter, and to make the necessary recommendations to the Minister of Railways, and that he would pass the word along to the board of directors, who would be only too glad to place another order for the repairs of additional cars, if we had additional cars to repair.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I desire to state without any qualification that all that was said to my hon. friend the Minister of Labour as to what took place last fall is entirely without foundation in fact. I have no mental reservations on the matter. I declare that his statement with reference to what took place has absolutely no foundation in fact at all.

Mr. LOGAN: I desire to speak on this matter only because it seems to me that there is a considerable amount of misinformation, not only on the part of hon. members directly opposite, but on this side of the House as well. In the first place, it is admitted to-day by the best railway concerns on this continent that it is not a paying proposition for railways to repair their own cars. In the United States there is not a single big concern to-day that does so. In Buffalo and in other parts of the United States there are large car repairing plants that do this sort of work, not for the government, but for private railway systems in that country. As regards this order that was placed by the late government and which is being completed at the present time, I would venture to say that in the Canada Car and Foundry Company's shops in Amherst the repairs have been made at 30 per cent less than they could be done in the government shops in any part of the Canadian National Railway system.

Mr. PARENT: What about the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. LOGAN: They are also giving out work for repairs. Now, what are the facts? I am not here to discuss whether or not this order was given with a view to political effect. If it was, they made a mess of it, because they did not get to work until about three days before the election. As I say, I know not what the idea was from the political standpoint; but I do know that if ever there was a government or a railway board that was justified in giving work to car companies in Amherst and New Glasgow, that government existed last October. I say this in justice to these towns, although possibly the statement may not be popular on this side of the House. In the town of Amherst, in which I live when at home, there are ordinarily employed in the different industries 2,300 men. Last fall out of those 2,300 workmen less than 400 had employment. For some months the local car works, which had employed from 1,000 to 1,250 men, were absolutely idle; men walked the streets; women were suffering; children were in want; the town itself spent large sums of money in attempting to deal with the situation; a relief association was formed and distributed thousands of dollars collected from the people; the red cross society endeavoured to cope with the situation. This order for five hundred cars was a godsend to the town.

Mr. VIEN: Does my hon. friend realize that the criticism directed against the late government was not because they gave a car order to Amherst to relieve unemployment, but because they delayed doing so until the election campaign began, granting relief only when they thought it might be useful to them?

Mr. LOGAN: I am not here to tell my hon. friend or anyone else what was in the mind of the late government. I am reciting the condition of affairs that existed in Amherst at that time, a condition which demanded immediate relief, and I am only saying that the best managed railroads throughout this continent are adopting this particular principle of placing their cars for repairs in outside shops. I am also pointing out that the government would have been derelict in its duty if it had not come to the rescue of the unemployed in Amherst last fall; there is no question about that.

Someone has said that certain Grand Trunk cars were brought down to New Glasgow for repair. Why? Because they were steel cars which could not be repaired anywhere else, as the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Stewart) stated to-night.

Let me now speak particularly to my hon. friends directly opposite. We expect this fall the greatest crop that western Canada has ever produced. We all pray that it may be so. There are to-day on the government-owned roads and roads controlled by the government about 15,000 cars needing repairs. Suppose there is a bumper crop in the West this fall, do you not think that any government should be reprimanded that did not put those cars in proper order to move that crop? Why should not the Government place those cars in the repair shops and relieve unemployment?

Mr. VIEN: At what date was unemployment felt for the first time in Amherst?

Mr. LOGAN: About fifteen years ago we had unemployment.

Mr. VIEN: At what time did the late government start relief there?

Mr. LOGAN: It was about fifteen years ago that we first had unemployment in Amherst, and then the government of my late lamented chief, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, placed contracts with the Robb Engineering Works for the repair of locomotives, to relieve the situation. That was the precedent which was established for putting work in private shops. I believe that the late government was not only justified in placing this order, but I also believe that it is the absolute duty of the present Government to relieve by similar means the unemployment situation existing in these towns to-day.

Mr. BOIVIN: Would the hon. gentlemen tell the committee if in his opinion the law as it stands to-day permitted the late government, or permits this Government, to dictate to the management of the Canadian National Railways where they shall place orders for the repair of cars?

Mr. LOGAN: I do not think that question is relevant to this discussion. If I did think so I would say that as the Government owns 22,000 miles of railways, and has the right to do anything for the relief of unemployment, it is its duty to take such action as may be necessary to that end. I may be defending the action of the late government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. VIEN: Does my hon. friend believe that the late government should have started before dissolution to relieve unemployment?

Mr. DUFF: A li'tle bit sooner.

Mr. LOGAN: Unemployment was not acute in Amherst until about August of last year. Let us be honest in this matter now. That is when unemployment became acute.

Mr. VIEN: You said it began ten years ago.

Mr. LOGAN: I said that unemployment became acute in August of last year; but in order to satisfy my hon. friend that we had a precedent for what was done by the late government, I reminded him that some years ago the government of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier awarded contracts for the repair of locomotives in Amherst when there was unemployment there, although unemployment was not acute at that time.

I do not think that our friends opposite should take the view which they do upon this question, because they may need these very cars within a few months, and we all hope they will. If it is true that there are 15,000 cars which need to be repaired, and if there is unemployment in this country, I think that a government instead of handing out doles here and there should give work to these men, who do not want charity but wages.

A good deal has been said to-night as to unemployment at Moncton, Fraserville and other places. I do not know the condition of affairs except in Moncton, and I deny that there was unemployment at Moncton at the time or that a single workman was displaced by giving this order to the Canadian Car and Foundry Company to relieve unemployment in Amherst. There is not the slightest doubt that an emergency existed in that town and that the relief was absolutely necessary.

Mr. SIMPSON: Considerable criticism has been levelled against the late government for having placed certain orders last fall for steel rails and other equipment in order to relieve unemployment. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) has described much more forcibly than I can the conditions prevailing in some of our industrial centres last fall. If some hon. gentlemen who have been criticising the action of the government at that time could have seen those conditions, I do not think they would be so ready to condemn the course that was then taken in placing orders in anticipation of our rail requirements in order that employment might be given to our workmen during the winter months.

The hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien) asked when the unemployment commenced. I may say that strong representations were made to the managements of the railway companies last spring by representatives of the steel companies at Sydney and Sault Ste. Marie to place railway business in order to provide employment for the men during the summer season. Accordingly, the orders were placed; they were completed in the fall, and the men were faced with unemployment in the winter. It was only natural, therefore, that the Minister of Labour should suggest to the railway companies that they should anticipate their requirements in the matter of rails and place orders so as to provide against unemployment. That is what was done. It is said that this course was adopted for political purposes. Well, so far as rail orders were concerned, at any rate, if it was adopted for that purpose it did not have the desired effect, because the greater portion of the rail orders were given to the mills at Sydney. What was the result? The hon. member for Cape Breton asked the Minister of Railways to have the managements of the railways anticipate their requirements to provide against the unemployment that has been existing down there for some time. I quite sympathize with him in the situation that he finds there. But let me tell you how the steel company in the constituency that I represent took care of the business that was given to them last fall. They realized that if they worked on full shift they could turn the order out in a very short time, and that the men would again be out of employment; so they put the mill on single shift and were thus able, on the business which they got at that time, to keep the wheels turning until about the middle of April. They sustained a loss of over half a million dollars in their endeavour to play fair with the companies that gave them the orders and with the men whom they employed. Is it not much better that the management of the government railways should anticipate their needs in this regard than that they should hand out large sums of money to relieve distress and suffering throughout the country, as the Department of Labour has had to do? You find in the estimates appropriations for over $500,000 to be paid out for relief—practically charity. The men do not want that; all they are asking for is an opportunity to work to earn an honest living for themselves.

Apparently the hon. member for Marquette does not think very kindly of the steel companies in this country; he criticises severely the subsidies or bounties granted to them in order that they might become established. While he is correct in stating that the bounties amounted to some $15,000,000, I may say that four of the largest steel companies in Canada have paid back to the Dominion treasury, through the medium of customs taxes on machinery and supplies, more than they received from the Government by way of bounties. The Algoma Steel Corporation in Sault Ste. Marie has a pay roll of approximately $8,000,000 a year. Think of the immense amount of tonnage that is provided for the National railways as a result of the operations of that corporation. Think of the amount of money that is collected by way of income tax upon the salaries of their officials and some of their better paid employees. When these things are taken into consideration, the amount paid by way of bounties is very small indeed, compared with the return that has been made to the public treasury. Moreover, when war broke out and Canada was asked to make munitions, we were able to do it only because we had the steel companies to take up this work. The hon. member for Marquette is very critical when it comes to the matter of bounties, but he is not so critical of the amounts found in the estimates to provide relief to needy settlers in Alberta and Saskatchewan by way of necessary supplies, wood, clothing, fuel, etc., and fodder for their animals. The amount provided for that purpose this year is $325,000, and a similar amount was voted last year. I do not criticise that at all, but is it not better for the government railways to anticipate their needs and thus provide work for the unemployed, than to hand out doles and charities?

Mr. VIEN: Was any unemployment relieved in my hon. friend's riding?

Mr. SIMPSON: Unemployment certainly was relieved in my riding and in the city of Sault Ste. Marie as the result of rail orders placed. No part of the $500,000 that is to be passed by this House for the purposes of relief is going to Sault Ste. Marie, —due to the fact that this rail order was placed.

The other day the hon. member for Marquette pleaded eloquently against the appointment by the Government of a special railway committee, to consider the question of freight rates, but suggested that the Crowsnest pass agreement be allowed to again come into effect. He realizes that our railways have to be run on a business basis and that a proper schedule of rates must be maintained if increased deficits are to be avoided; yet he asks for the restoration of the Crowsnest pass agreement in July, the effect of which would be materially to reduce the earning power of the national railways and to confer the greatest proportion of benefit on the shippers of grain in the West. Why, then, should he object when it is suggested that rail orders should be placed in advance to provide for unemployment, thus avoiding the necessity of handing out large sums for the purposes of relief?

Mr. HOEY: Now that the oratorical contest is ended, I would like to speak on behalf of the few in this corner of the House who still survive and who are fearful of a second attack. I would like to ask the minister how much of this money spent on car repairing was expended in the city of Winnipeg, and in the town of Transcona, where the government shops are located, and where the men were working on short time throughout the months already referred to in this debate? I put this question because I would like the people of these constituencies to know the extent to which the government came to their relief at that time when unemployment was rampant. I cannot see why my constituency should be discriminated against in favour of the constituency represented by my hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy River.

Mr. MANION: Before that question is answered may I point out one little fact to my hon. friend on my left—this is just for the information of the committee. While a contract was given for the repairing of cars in Fort William—I forgot to mention the fact before—the work on that contract was not done until one month after the election was over. That may answer my hon. friend's question. It did not have very much to do with the election apparently. If there had been a desire to influence the election the work would have begun one month at least before the election was over.

Mr. HOEY: That is not a reply to my question.

Mr. KENNEDY: In reply to my hon. friend, as regards the 2,000 cars mentioned in the Order in Council under discussion no orders were placed in the city of Winnipeg.

Mr. IRVINE: I would like to make one suggestion. If the Government have discovered any irregularities in connection with this matter on the part of the former government, they should make a charge to that effect publicly and follow it to a logical conclusion. The discussion on this matter for political reasons does not seem to get us anywhere whatsoever. I would suggest that the Government should do that and then let us pass the estimate and get on with business in view of the fact that so much time has already been spent in the discussion of this matter.

Item agreed to.

Mr. GOOD: I want to make a suggestion. It has already been stated by the ex-Minister of Railways that the practice has been followed of giving orders and making no payments until deliveries have been made. Now, I do think we must have some regard for conditions of unemployment, and I want to suggest that possibly orders can be given without specifying any prices, and that the prices to be paid finally when delivery is made be competitive prices. In that way our railways in the country will be protected against any kind of loss.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I did not have the opportunity of being present—

The CHAIRMAN: I draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that the item has been passed.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member who has just resumed his seat was speaking to that item.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not know what he was speaking to, but the item has been passed. However, if the committee is satisfied—

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I have heard you declare items carried on other occasions and other hon gentlemen have risen to their feet and spoken after you had made the declaration. I understand that some criticism has been indulged in with respect to the expenditure under this item last year.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member will allow me to read the next item his remarks will be pertinent to it and quite in order.

Staff and repairs—further amount required, $91,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I can only speak with such information as I have as to the criticism which has been made of the expenditure last autumn in connection with the repairing of cars for the government railway in shops other than those of the government railways. I want to speak particularly with reference to the repairing of steel cars. There are no facilities in any of the shops belonging to the Canadian National Railways for the repairing of steel cars. The only facilities that exist for the repairing of cars of that kind exist in the shops to be found in my constituency belonging to the Eastern Car Company. And when we stop to think of the tremendous number of cars that are to be found out of repair on the Canadian National Railways, and the fact that if you kept all the ordinary shops belonging to those railways doing nothing else you could not begin to effect those repairs, you will realize the situation we are apt to find ourselves in. To-day there are evidences in the great Republic to the south of the return of prosperity, of increasing development in all the manufacturing industries, and what will ensue will be this: In the United States they will retain all the Canadian cars that go there and that happen to be found there in connection with their business. They will keep them there and when my hon. friends from the West will want cars in the autumn for their good crop, such as we hope they will have they will not have them. It will be found that unless the cars now in hand are repaired and ten thousand other cars belonging to the Canadian National Railways are put in proper condition the West will be suffering from the want of cars for its crops and there will be a further shortage of cars needed for other industries. The theory that sufficient facilities exist in the ordinary shops of the Canadian National Railways to repair steel cars is a delusion. Such facilities are not to be found there; the facilities needed for repairing and re-fitting a car and putting it back in its old condition are only to be found in car making establishments. The Canadian National Railways have no car making establishment in connection with their plants, and it is perfectly absurd for hon. gentlemen to say that only shops connected with the National railways should be used for the purpose of repairing cars. As to steel cars, there are no such facilities in any shops on the Canadian National system.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Now in regard to the question of the purchase of rails and other equipment in connection with the system, and the expenditure of money which has been made, in view of the conditions that have existed in the past six months let me say that in times past there have been advances for seed grain to the West, and advances of various kinds in order to meet special conditions there; and I do maintain that bearing in mind the conditions that were to be found in all the manufacturing centres in eastern Canada when our railways needed, as they did need, rails, there was no reason why this expenditure should not have been made. I do not pretend to say that there was not in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite the idea that this expenditure in repairing cars, made at the time it was, might have been for political purposes; but the fact that fifteen other gentlemen along with myself were elected as supporters of the present Government from the province of Nova Scotia must have convinced them that if they did have any such idea in their minds, it did not work when it came to the election.

Speaking for those who are to be found in the coal and steel industries in my province, I want to say that the position taken by the late government in carrying out this expenditure, whatever their motives might have been, was one that was perfectly justified by the conditions and they had a perfect right to take the course they did. It is all very well to say that there may have been shops throughout the various portions of this railway system that are not operating and that could have done this work; but those who have not a knowledge of the conditions which appertain to the construction and proper repair of cars do not realize that these things cannot be done without the necessary facilities, and the special machinery that must be kept on hand in order to recreate a car, a proposition which is just as abstruse as the making of a car from the very beginning. In view of the fact that there are nearly ten thousand cars to-day that are in a state where they cannot be operated successfully I maintain that it is the duty of the present Minister of Railways to provide for the repair of these cars in the proper car shops of the country. If these cars are not repaired and if the ten thousand cars that are to be found all over the Canadian National Railways are left in their present condition, those members from the West who say this expenditure should not be made will have only themselves to blame if, when the autumn comes, they have not got sufficient cars to haul out their crops.

Mr. CRERAR: I want to correct a wrong impression in the mind of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). He did not hear the rather animated discussion before he entered the Chamber, or he would not be labouring under a misapprehension, as he appears to be doing just now. No one from the West, or from any other part of Canada, as far as I know, is objecting to having cars repaired.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Where are you going to repair them?

Mr. CRERAR: They should be repaired wherever they can be repaired to best advantage. We have repair shops attached to the Canadian National Railways. I submit that, when we have plants for the repairing of these cars, our own plants should have the opportunity of repairing them. I know it was argued by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan)—probably with a good deal of reason; I do not know—that in the United States the railways are giving their repair works out to private corporations. That may be. I am not discussing that aspect of the question. The point that I endeavoured to bring out earlier in the evening is that it is not a sound business policy to let contracts for the purpose of relieving unemployment at higher costs or higher prices than would otherwise obtain.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): They were not let at other prices than would otherwise obtain.

Mr. CRERAR: That information has yet to be disclosed.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Does the hon. gentleman suggest that the contracts that were given last fall were at a higher price than would otherwise obtain?

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Stewart) appears unduly sensitive in respect to this. My remarks earlier in the evening were in response to the remarks of my hon. friend from Cape Breton South and Richmond (Mr. Kyte) in which he argued that it would be sound policy for this Government to borrow money, build cars, make rails and store them up against the future. I submit that is not a sound policy, and it was against that principle of doing business in connection with our national railways that I was protesting and that I still protest. It is not sound business. Our National Railways are operating under a great handicap. We have deficits in operation. We are unable to meet our fixed charges. We have a constant stream of criticism coming from those who are opposed to government ownership of these railways, and we have the railways, not by virtue of our belief in the principle of public ownership, but because of the absolute and complete breakdown of private ownership. Now when we have them, let us handle them in a business way. That is all I am pleading for or suggesting. I am not suggesting, and no one is suggesting, that we should go along without making the necessary repairs to cars and engines, but I maintain it should be done according to sound business practice.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Does my hon. friend want to continue paying in the shops the McAdoo award wages, which are a great deal higher than are paid in the ordinary steel industries of this country, where steel cars are repaired? They are paying higher wages in the United States and cars are repaired at a much greater cost than when we have the arrangement for the repairs of cars on the cost plus basis. But that is not the policy he suggests. It is all very well to talk of repair shops at all points of the Canadian National railways. He has not the slightest conception in regard to the repair shop. There is not a repair shop on the Canadian National where they can repair a steel car, which is the modern car used in the transportation of freight in this country, and, therefore, it was wise and sound policy to send the steel cars to be repaired at these places where steel cars are made, and steel cars are not made in any shop that belongs to the Canadian National railways. It was sound and wise policy to have cars repaired on the basis of cost plus, rather than to pay the McAdoo award wages and the Chicago award wages in the ordinary shops of the country. That is the position of the matter. Moreover, in a very great number of cases the repairs could not be made in the ordinary repair shops. I say, instead of giving grants to municipalities, on the basis of one-third of the expenditure being made by the municipality for the purpose of relieving unemployment it is better to undertake work of this kind having regard to the fact that these cars supply the transportation necessities of the country. It is not sound business policy to allow these cars to remain unrepaired, or, if you are going to repair them, to repair them at a higher cost than the amount which you could have them repaired for on a business basis, and thus allow the railway to deteriorate, instead of endeavouring to keep the railway up to date. Is it not better to buy those things which are essential to the operation of a government railway system, and have them on hand, and by this means prevent unemployment, than to give money for which there is no return, on the basis of a one-third contribution by the municipality?

Mr. CRERAR: I have no particular quarrel with the remarks of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). They do not conflict with anything I said a moment ago, or earlier in the debate. By all means have repair work done where it can be done most cheaply. I am suggesting to the Minister of Railways that the Board of Directors of the National railways should do that very thing. If there is only one repair shop in which they can repair steel cars, they will have to go there. I can tell the hon. member that, as far as western Canada is concerned, there are tens of thousands of cars hauling grain and not one of them is a steel car. At the very time when the unemployment question was very serious, and the orders were placed last autumn for the relief of unemployment, there was not a single car sent to Transcona shops, which are situated a few miles from Winnipeg, where millions of dollars have been spent in establishing a car plant for the National railways. I really think that the hon. member for Pictou has not caught the sense of my remark, and I have no quarrel with what he said.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The only difference between the hon. member and myself is that apparently he wants to have the cars repaired at Transcona. There is a car shop there, and he thinks they should all be taken to that shop, although he does not know whether they can repair them there or not. If they do not go there, does he object to cars in eastern Canada going to shops which are quite handy, if they can be repaired at a less cost than in the other shops?

Mr. CRERAR: Not at all.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The hon. gentleman agrees with me.

Mr. CRERAR: Certainly.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. LOGAN: I desire to make one explanation which, I think, will enlighten the House as to the way in which these cars are repaired.. I regret very much, if this matter is to be discussed, that we have not before us the contracts made by the late government, or by the Railway Board, with the different companies. I wish to say that these cars are not dealt with exactly on what we call the cost plus basis. The contract was made that the government was to pay the car companies for their labour, plus a certain small percentage, but as far as all supplies for those cars are concerned, the Government itself, or the Canadian National Board, has the right to supply every article that is required in this work, and if it is not considered that the price being charged by the company for its supplies is reasonable, it will not pay that company for those supplies, if it can show that they could have been bought for a less price elsewhere. So that it is not only a contract on the usual cost plus basis, but it is even a better contract than that, because it is only the labour cost plus.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: While we are talking about car repairs, I desire to offer a suggestion to the Minister of Railways. Being an old railroad man myself, when I am travelling on the Canadian National railway system, it is always a pleasure to me and, in fact, second nature, to chat with railroad men. I have asked them this question: Why do we have so many wrecks on the Canadian National Railways? I give this to the Minister; I do not know how true it is; but they tell me that the reason is that American railways ship their old cars, loaded, of course, to Canada. These cars, which are in bad condition when they cross the border, are accepted, and shortly afterwards in Canadian territory, a journal or something else will break, and that will cause a wreck. The railway men tell me that these cars have to be repaired at the expense of the Canadian railways before they are sent back to the United States. I merely offer the suggestion to the minister that, I think, the inspection of these cars before they enter Canadian territory should be very severe.

Mr. COPP: I rise, not for the purpose of entering into a discussion of the matter before the committee, nor to criticise the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Stewart), nor to come to his defence as regards contracts let for the repair of cars during the late campaign. I feel it is my duty to correct an erroneous impression that may have been given to the committee in regard to the railway shops in the city of Moncton. When the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) says that there is not, in the Dominion of Canada, a railway shop connected with the Canadian National Railways that is in a position to repair steel cars, I can only say that he is altogether mistaken as regards the magnificent shops in the city of Moncton belonging to the National Railway system. If my hon. friend has any doubt in his mind or fails to accept my word in regard to the matter, all he has to do is to drop off at that city, and he will see steel cars being repaired there every day of the year.

I also desire to correct an error that was made by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan). I only wish his remarks were absolutely correct. I understood him to say that one of the reasons why the cars were—and should have been—repaired at Amherst and New Glasgow was the extreme unemployment situation in Amherst, while not a single man was out of employment in Moncton. I only wish the facts had been as stated by the hon. member; but I would draw to his attention this fact—and I know no one understands it more clearly than the ex-Minister of Railways—that last summer between six and seven hundred employees of the Canadian National Railways were laid off in the shops in the city of Moncton, and only a small percentage of that number have been reinstated.

I rise only for the purpose of correcting those two errors that have been made by my hon. friends from Nova Scotia, and I would point out, for the information of the Minister of Railways and the committee, that, in the city of Moncton, we have, in connection with the Canadian National railway system, shops splendidly located, splendidly equipped and manned by employees who are absolutely competent and able to carry out, not only the repair of cars, but the building, construction and equipment of all classes of cars required for the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. CHAPLIN: A few minutes ago the Minister of Railways informed us that the price of steel rails was $49 or $50 a ton. The suggestion has been made by some hon. members that that price was not in accordance with the market. Was the price at which the rails were purchased in accordance with the market at the time?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): One would have gathered from the discussion this evening that I was not present when the order was placed, but I understood that the price at which it was placed was about the market price at the time. I promised the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) that I would give him some information upon that point, and I hope, when my main estimates come down, to be able to give my hon. friend the information that he desires.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have endeavoured two or three times to get from the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Stewart) the exact meaning of his remarks in regard to the negotiations that took place between the then Minister of Railways and the railway management or the Government officials, or whoever these negotiations took place with. In view of the discussion that has taken place in this chamber to-night, I think it would be wise if we could have that Order in Council laid on the Table of the House so that we might understand exactly what its effect was.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I have not a copy of the Order in Council myself, but the minister or some other member of the Government can place it on the Table. There is nothing in that document that would justify the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite, or upon which could rest the suspicion that appears to exist as regards the action on the part of the boards of the government railways and as regards the late government itself in permitting and authorising the action by the boards.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have no suspicion at all. I simply want to find out the facts. I asked the hon. member twice, and I was unable to grasp, from the answers that he made, whom the then Minister of Railways had these negotiations with. If he can answer that question, probably we shall not need the Order in Council.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I have stated several times, since this discussion started that, as regards the then Minister of Railways and any other official connected with the government, they played no part in the placing of these orders. That is surely an unqualified statement, and it is the fact.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is the Department of Railways and Canals?

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I am speaking now of the Department of Railways, because that is the official department having control of railway management. That department had nothing to do with placing the orders. The orders were placed by two boards as a result of conferences held between certain members of those boards, as I understand the matter and understand it still, and the Canadian Pacific Railway. The only connection between any government official and the boards in the consideration of the matter was that the Labour Department, through its minister, was the fount of information upon questions of unemployment upon which they might wish to secure information. The then Minister of Railways played no part in any connection further than to secure the authorization through Council of the necessary financial arrangements to give effect to what was decided upon. That is the whole story as regards the Department of Railways and the then government. I might qualify that by this, that when the petitions and memorials and all the other communications came to the department from municipalities in which unemployment was most severe—

Mr. MITCHELL: Which department?

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): The Department of Railways. There is no question that we received petitions from municipalities, boards of trade, and labour organizations.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why were these petitions sent to the Minister of Railways? Should they not, in the ordinary course, be addressed to the Minister of Labour?

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I do not know why they were sent to the Minister of Railways, but my hon. friend will bear me out when I say that there is generally throughout the country a great misconception as to the part which the Department of Railways plays in the actual management of the nationally owned railway system. That is a condition for which the late government was not responsible, and one for which this Government would not be responsible. There is a very large volume of public opinion in this country that the Department of Railways and Canals plays a direct part in the administration of the National Railway System. I do not know how it is now, but I do know that it was not an uncommon expectation on the part of the public that the department should reinstate employees, purchase ties, and do all manner of things incidental to the administration of the system. That condition obtained in the past, and I have no doubt it obtains to-day, and what the department is obliged to do is to pass these things on to the board to which each particular instance may relate. Unquestionably representations were made to the Government and, as well, to the Minister of Railways, from day to day with reference to unemployment. There was only one thing for the Government to do, and that was to pass them on to the board whose duty it was to deal with them. And that was done. But so far as the Minister of Railways was concerned, let me make it quite clear that neither he nor any other officer of the Government played any part in deciding what rails it was wise to buy, or what cars it was wise or necessary to rebuild or repair. Not one word was offered by the minister or any officer of the Government as to where cars should be repaired. The Minister of Labour supplied to those who had the deciding of the matter the information with reference to unemployment in the different centres where rails were manufactured and cars built and where there were industries suitably equipped for carrying on the work. But, as I say, neither the Minister of Railways nor any other officer of the Government had anything to say in the matter.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): In response to the request of the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Mitchell), I shall be glad to lay the Order in Council on the Table to-morrow.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): Listening to the discussion to-night, it appears to me that we are arguing altogether on false premises. If the Canadian National Railway system or public ownership is to be made a success, are we going to continue the policy of making the Canadian National railways the scapegoat in regard to all unemployment throughout the Dominion of Canada? Knowing the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy), as I do, to be a shrewd business man, I do not believe that he will tolerate any such condition as that. If this or any other government is to make a success of the Canadian National railways it is their duty to place these orders where they can be executed at the lowest possible cost; and if there is unemployment to be dealt with in the country, then let the Government have a policy to cope with that situation, in keeping with the efforts that are being made by the local governments and the municipalities in the various provinces. But I contend that it is an entirely wrong principle that, in order to relieve unemployment in any part of the country, some particular public service, such as the Canadian National railways, should be saddled with a burden which would inevitably be reflected back in the freight rates, in respect of which we have complaints coming from all parts of the country. I think the Government would be well advised if they adhered to strict business principles, and having every confidence in the Minister of Railways, I take it that he will do so..

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Post Office Department—to hereby increase from March 1, 1921, the salary of the retiring General Superintendent of Postal Service to the rate he is now receiving, namely $5,700 per annum, $325.

Contingencies—Clerical Assistance—further amount required, $6,000—Printing and Stationery—further amount required, $14,000, $20,325.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Postmaster General): The first amount in this item is to provide a sum necessary to make the salary of the retiring General Superintendent of Postal Service from the first of March, 1921, equal to the amount which he is at present receiving. The gentleman in question has been in the postal service of this country for 47 years, having rendered notable and efficient service. Unfortunately, his health has broken down and he has applied for superannuation, and this small amount is required to put his retiring allowance from March 1, 1921, on the basis of the salary he is now receiving. As worked out it will increase his retiring allowance only to the extent of $75 per year. The second amount is $6,000 for clerical assistance, due to the fact that in the Main Estimates for last year the amount voted was found in the year's operations to be insufficient. By arrangement between the Finance Department and the Post Office Department, the latter was allowed to overdraw its appropriation to this extent on condition that the overdraft would be provided for in the Supplementary Estimates. Hence this item. The $14,000 is a vote to cover a shortage in the estimates of last year for supplies of printing and stationery that were obtained through the Printing Bureau on condition that the shortage, as in the case of the preceding item, would be provided for in the supplementary estimates.

MILITIA AND DEFENCE

To provide for urgent engineer services in Quebec (Governor General's warrant, Febuuary 10, 1922), $19,350.

Mr. CRERAR: Will the minister explain this expenditure?

Mr. GRAHAM: Our engineer in Quebec reported that the roof of the ordnance building was leaking badly and some damage had already been done. While he had his staff there to attend to these repairs he reported that he could also undertake some other repairs which would have to be done in a couple of months, and by doing all the work together the cost would be much lower. So we had the warrant cover the whole amount.

Item agreed to.

Civil Pensions, Life pensions to Robert Allen, Ronald Morrison, Walter Pettipas, $1,115,42.

Mr. GRAHAM: Vote 406 is inserted here in error; it should be in the supplementary estimates for the present year. I therefore wish the three items under this vote to be dropped. They will reappear in the other supplementary estimates.

Items dropped.

IMMIGRATION

Civil Government—Department of Immigration and Colonization—contingencies—further amount required (Governor General's warrant, February 22, 1922), $12,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Will the minister explain?

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): This further amount is required because owing to the extraordinary conditions prevailing on the continent of Europe in regard to immigration work it was found necessary to delegate high officials of the department to Belgium, Italy, Poland, etc., to investigate and study existing conditions in those countries with a view to regulating the emigration movement to Canada. The travelling and living expenses of these high officials, some of whom remained there many months, were naturally heavier than if they had travelled in Canada; the result being that our appropriations for this service are being found inadequate to meet our obligations chargeable to that particular vote.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of War Claims—Immigration and Colonization (Governor General's warrant, November 11, 1921), $140,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This item is to cover expenses incurred under the provisions of order in council 179 of January 29, 1919, and amending orders authorizing the repatriation at public expense of the dependents of men who served in the Canadian military and naval forces. When the departmental estimates for 1921-22 were prepared, a sum of $150,000 was applied for to meet the expenses of this service for the current fiscal year. This sum having, however, been reduced to $25,000, it was entirely inadequate to meet the liabilities, and after a careful estimate, based on liabilities already incurred and the estimated sum required to meet our obligations to the end of the fiscal year, 1921-22, it was found necessary to apply for a special warrant of $140,000, which was granted under Governor General's Warrant No. 3932 of November, 1921.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Indians—field and garden seeds—further amount required, $7,000.

Supplies for Destitute—further amount required, $34,000.

General Expenses—Further amount required, $10,600.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the explanation given by the department as to why their estimates were so far below the requirements?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This vote is required for field and garden seeds to the amount of $7,000. Last spring Indians who had land prepared but were without funds to purchase the necessary seed grain, and having no band funds held in trust by the department, were advanced funds upon the understanding that the cost of the seed would be refunded from the sale of grain raised. On some of the reserves in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta the crops were a failure, and in consequence the Indians are unable to make all the refunds. This vote is required to cover the deficits, as there was no appropriation in the main estimates. Had there been fair crops the whole cost would have been refunded. The Indians who still owe for seed grain will be required to make refunds from next season's crop if they have one, so that eventually the amount of this vote will be refunded, and should be regarded simply as a loan. A statement of the expenditure and refunds is given, if my hon. friend wants it.

As to the supplies for destitute, $34,000, this vote is required to pay for provisions, ammunition and twine delivered under contract during the summer of 1920 by the Hudson's Bay Company at different points in the Peace river, Athabasca and Mackenie river districts. The contractors are required to have their accounts for these supplies certified by the Indian agent to whom delivery of the supplies is made, but through neglect on the part of the Hudson's Bay Company's officer at Edmonton, the certified accounts did not reach the department until after the close of the fiscal year 1920-21, and consequently payment had to be made from the appropriation for the current fiscal year, 1921-22. It became necessary, therefore, to provide for these payments as the appropriation for the fiscal year 1921-22 is insufficient to meet this extra charge. These supplies are delivered annually under contract and are to meet treaty obligations. Hitherto they have always been paid for within the fiscal year in which they are contracted for.

As to the further amount of $3,600 required for general expenses, in the supplementary estimates for 1921-22 the sum of $19,200 was included to pay for 640 acres of land at $30 an acre within the boundaries of Ermineskins reserve in the province of Alberta, but only $12,600 was appropriated under Vote No. 518. It becomes necessary therefore to ask for a supplementary vote of $3,600 to enable the department to pay the balance due on this land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amount asked for is $10,600, not $3,600.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The further amount required for general expenses is $7,000. This with the previous amount will make the $10,600. This vote is required to replace the Indian agent's residence at Fort Smith, Alberta, on the Slave river, accidentally destroyed by fire on February 3 last, and it was absolutely necessary to replace it. Building materials such as hardware, windows, doors, cement, brick, building paper, etc., also a furnace, were purchased at Edmonton and transported to Fort Smith via Peace River, a distance of 988 miles. The necessary lumber was manufactured at the department's sawmill at Fort Smith, but funds had to be provided for wages, etc. The expenditure not being provided for in the main estimates, this vote becomes necessary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: With regard to the minister's explanation of the $3,600, can he tell me whether that is the case of Janse brothers who had a section of land within an Indian reserve that the department exchanged for a Hudson's Bay section? I remember the negotiations were pending a long while owing to a difference of opinion as to the value of the land.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Under the terms of the deed of surrender given by the Hudson's Bay Company to the Crown when relinquishing all claim to the lands in Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territories, which entitled the company to claim grants of land up to one-twentieth of all lands set out for settlement within the fertile belt, the section of land referred to passed to the Hudson's Bay Company. In September, 1885, the limits of the Ermineskins Indian reserve were surveyed by this department, in accordance with the terms of the treaty, and this section was included. This reserve was confirmed by Order in Council, dated May 17, 1889.

In 1906 the Hudson's Bay Com-
11 p.m. pany sold this section to Messrs. Janse brothers, of Calgary, both parties evidently having entered into the transaction in good faith, without the knowledge of its being part of an Indian reserve. Messrs. Janse brothers are unable to make use of their land as it is part of an Indian reserve. The department has endeavoured to arrange the matter by obtaining an exchange of lands, but the Indians refused to give a surrender, and the only recourse is to purchase from Messrs. Janse brothers. They have signified their willingness to accept $30 per acre, and to assign to the Crown whatever title they have received from the Hudson's Bay Company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The price paid seems to me rather high. When was the arrangement completed for the purchase of it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some months ago, I am informed—before December 6.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That may be. I remember when I was in the department we tried for years to make the exchange and we had great difficulty in doing it. We sought to refer it to an arbitration, but never were able to get that done. The price was below $30 an acre. But I do not just see why this should be in last year's estimates; it would be provided for in next year's estimates in the ordinary way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some appropriation was made in the estimates of last year to cover this, but evidently it was not sufficient.

Item agreed to.

Indians—British Columbia—
Relief to destitute—further amount required.. .. .. $ 4.000

Mr. MACKELVIE: Will the minister explain the details of this vote?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The estimated expenditure for this service for the fiscal year 1921-22 was $31,000, but owing to circumstances over which the department has no control, it proved inadequate to meet all the demands due to various causes, namely, failure of crops in some districts, fishing restrictions imposed upon the Indians by the federal authorities, unemployment and sickness amongst the Indian population of about 25,000. The expenditure for ten months up to 28th February has actually been $26,189.44, and for the twelve months ending the 31st March, 1922, it will at least be $35,000, so that a supplementary vote of $4,000 becomes necessary.

Every effort was made to keep this expenditure within the amount voted. Each agency was apportioned its share, and instructions were issued that these amounts were not to be exceeded without first obtaining the authority of the department. There are sixteen agencies in the province and extra grants had to be made to several upon representations made by the agents that unless the amounts first allowed were not increased, there would be suffering amongst the Indians through no fault of their own. On humanitarian grounds, therefore, the department was bound to come to their relief and authorize increased expenditure.

Item agreed to.

Hospitals, medical attendance and Medicines, further amount required, $5,000.

Owing to circumstances over which the department has no control, namely, sickness amongst the Indians of this province, the amount appropriated for this service, $68,200, is insufficient to meet all necessary expenditure up to the 31st March, 1922, and it is estimated that a further appropriation of $5,000 will be necessary. Increase generally in hospital rates have also added to the cost of this service. When it is considered that there is an Indian population of about 25,000 in this province, the expenditure on this account cannot be regarded as excessive. Every effort is made to curtail the expenditure, but it is difficult to estimate accurately twelve months' ahead what it will be. The expenditure up to the 28th February has been $74,000, so that a supplementary vote is necessary.

Item agreed to.

Office, Miscellaneous and Unforeseen Expenses; further amount required, $7,100:

An unforeseen expenditure of $2,100 was incurred in fighting forest fires that started on the Indian Reserve, at Christie Creek in the Nelson Forest District, and on the Tobacco Plains Reserve No. 2 in the Kootenay District. The fires were extinguished by the Provincial Forestry Department and much valuable timber was saved. The department repaid the provincial government on properly certified accounts, and as the estimates did not provide for this unforeseen expenditure, a supplementary vote is required. The sum of $2,000 is required to provide for payment of taxes which have been levied under the British Columbia Drainage, Dyking and Development Act in the West Nicomen District, on Indian Reserves Nos. 4 and 10 on West Nicomen Island in the New Westminster agency. As no provision was made for these taxes in the main estimates, a supplementary grant is necessary. The sum of $3,000 is required to meet expenditure it was found necessary to incur last summer in making necessary repairs to the agent's residence and office at Hazelton, B.C. When the present agent took over the duties of the late agent, who was superannuated, he reported that he found the residence and office in a very bad condition, the roof leaking, doors and window fittings rusty and falling, floors so badly worn that carpets or linoleum could not be put down without ruining them, the paper on the walls dirty and cracked, paint dirty, chimneys unsafe and fence greatly in need of repairs. No repairs or painting had been done to this building for many years. The late agent was a bachelor, which no doubt accounts for repairs not having been made before. The present agent was therefore authorized to have the necessary repairs made as economically as possible, in order that the house might be made habitable for his family. As this expenditure was not foreseen when the main estimates were prepared, provision was not made for it, and therefore a supplementary vote is necessary.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would call attention to the fact that there is an item there of some $2,000 to cover taxes imposed by the provincial government in respect to some drainage. The provincial government of course, cannot impose taxes in respect of drainage or anything else assessable against Indian reserves. The way it is taken care of is by contract, by arrangement in the first place, the department agreeing to pay so much. There should not be anything on record which acknowledges the right of any government to impose taxes of this kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is under the Drainage, Dyking and Development Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of the province?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They cannot by any act impose taxes upon Indian reserve property.

Mr. FIELDING: We pay local taxes in Ottawa for certain purposes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would be by contract.

Item agreed to.

Indians—general—
Relief to destitute Indians in remote districts—further amount required	$50,000
To prevent spread of tuberculosis—further amount required..	8,000
To provide for expenses in connection with epidemics of smallpox and other diseases—further amount required..	5,000
	$63,000

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the cause of the very large extra amount for destitute Indians in remote districts?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The estimated expenditure for this service for the fiscal year 1921-22 was $65,000, but owing to circumstances over which the department has little or no control, it proved inadequate to meet all demands.

For the ten months ending Feb. 28, accounts aggregating $116,000 have been presented for payment, and therefore a supplementary vote is necessary in order that all accounts may be paid.

Relief in the form of food, clothing, ammunition, twine, medicines and medical attendance, is provided for Indians and Eskimo who live in the more remote districts of the Dominion and are dependent entirely on the hunt for their existence.

This relief is administered by the fur trading companies at their various posts where the department has no resident agents, and the department has endeavoured from time to time to control and curtail this expenditure as much as possible by instructing these companies that supplies should only be issued to relieve distress amongst Indians and Eskimo who are too old or unable through sickness, etc., to hunt their own living; and at times to others who are in distress through failure of the hunt.

The department is compelled to adopt this method of affording relief to these natives when in distress, but every possible care is taken in checking the accounts through missionaries or members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, where available, besides which they are very carefully scrutinized in the department before payment is made, with a view to preventing abuses which might arise from the companies outfitting Indians who are capable hunters and who should not be a charge on the government. There are, therefore, inherent difficulties of management which the department has had to overcome, with a certain degree of success, but until these remote districts are more closely connected with civilization, and until the department is represented by local officers, the conditions will not be entirely satisfactory.

Owing to the remote situation of the posts, where relief is issued, the cost is naturally high, consequent upon the excessive cost of transportation.

Item agreed to.

Indian Education—further amount required, $35,615.45.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I only have one criticism to offer as to this item, and in doing that I can only take the same ground that was taken by hon. members to my right in the case of estimates of another department. When the Main Estimates containing the vote for Indian education was brought down a decrease of something over $101,000 was observable. Some of us took exception to that on the ground that education was one thing that should not be neglected. In the course of the discussion that followed we were assured that provision would be made in the Supplementary Estimates. Provision has been made for a certain amount but I still notice a decrease compared with last year of a little over $66,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: These estimates relate to last year. There are still further supplementary estimates to be presented.

Item agreed to.

Board of Commerce—further amount required to provide for arrears of salary of the secretary from July 1, 1921, to March 31, 1922, $3,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This ends the Board of Commerce.

Mr. CRERAR: This winds it up?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it covers the funeral expenses.

Mr. FIELDING: Financially and otherwise.

Item agreed to.

Expenses of the Canadian Delegates to the Economic and Financial Conference at Genoa (Governor General's warrant, February 20, 1922), $25,000.

Mr. CRERAR: Might I ask the Prime Minister the circumstances under which the Canadian Government were asked to participate in the Genoa Conference? Did we receive an invitation direct from Italy, as I understand the other countries that are sending delegates to this conference did?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: An invitation direct from the Italian government to the Government of Canada asking us to send delegates was received.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When did the conference commence?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My recollection is that it was about three weeks ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is this charged against last year's expenditure?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may inform my right hon. friend that it was necessary for the delegates to leave Canada during the last fiscal year to reach Genoa in time, and that the whole amount has not been used up. I am informed that there is an unexpended balance of $8,852.62 which has lapsed and must be revoted when we come to the estimates for this year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When did the delegates leave Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not the exact date here, but it was some time in the last fiscal year.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Some time in March, because the conference opened on April 5.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Even if they did leave Canada toward the end of the fiscal year that would not make it a legitimate charge against last year's expenditure. It would be a very small amount that could possibly be justified, if anything at all, against last year's expenditures. It should have been included in this year's expenditures in the usual way.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: An estimate was put in about the middle of March.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But even so the conference is being held this year.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I object to this resolution carrying. I think the Government should be fair in this matter. It is not a very large item, but it shows a rather too ardent desire to shove this year's expenditures into last year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. members think it is a joke. Well, there is something of a joke about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all. It is impossible to make provision for any delegates attending the conference except by Governor General's warrant.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well if there was a little money required to carry them on their way the Governor General's warrant might have covered it. The whole thing might have been covered by one warant but to charge it to last year's expenditure is not right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The delegates were each given an advance of $8,000, I think. That does not seem a very large amount to take over for such a purpose.

Mr. JACOBS: Particularly for Sir Charles Gordon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member thinks he is a pretty expensive man.

Mr. JACOBS: I am sure he needed money before he started.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The proper way for the Government to have acted was to have advanced such money as was essential if the delegates had to leave in March, and to advance the balance the coming year. Then the thing could have been done quite rightly without charging the entire amount to last year. That seems to be the general policy adopted—to make last year pay for this year's work.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may point out that the invitation was received on January 21 and it was at that time the Government began to make this arrangement.

Mr. CRERAR: I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he can give us any information as to the nature of the instructions given to these delegates as far as their work at Genoa is concerned?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Generally they were asked to participate in the conference, and to keep the Government informed as to any matters which it was thought advisable to bring to the Government's attention. I think my hon. friend had placed before him the proceedings at the Cannes Conference which outlined the work to be done at the Genoa Conference and the duties of the delegates would pertain to the programme outlined there. The delegates were instructed to observe those matters pertaining more essentially to the European countries, but to pay particular attention to those matters relating to the Dominion and not to take final action with respect to the signing of any treaties or agreements without fully informing the Government of the nature of the proposed treaties before final action was determined upon.

Mr. CRERAR: And receiving the Government's approval.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, and also to see that all agreements or treaties that were signed were made subject to the approval of Parliament.

Mr. JACOBS: I see by the press that the conference has determined the question of the mandate of Great Britain over Palestine. Can the Prime Minister tell us if any instructions have been given our delegates with regard to their action in the matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, they have an absolutely free hand in regard to Palestine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can the minister tell us what has been accomplished by Sir Charles Gordon and his co-representative on behalf of Canada in the way of economic regeneration?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Government has asked Sir Charles Gordon to give a report at the end of the proceedings, and I will have pleasure in seeing that that report is brought down in due course.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As yet they have not any information as to anything being accomplished.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think the world has word of anything being accomplished in the conference, our delegates are in the same position as delegates of other countries, and I presume they are doing just as well as the others.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I observe that certain countries are in danger of losing their representatives on account of the high cost of living at Genoa. Has the Government considered that matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I think their expenses are being paid by the Italian government, so that, as far as this Government is concerned, we have escaped.

Item agreed to.

Reprinting Criminal Code including 1920-21 amendment, $1,500.
Reprinting annual statutes, years 1907, 1908, 1909, 1910, 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915, 1919, 1920, $9,100.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think this is charged under the wrong heading. It is charged to legislation. The reprinting of the Criminal Code is part of the administration of justice and I think should be charged to that department, and probably "reprinting annual statutes" should also come under that department. I do not know whether any one desires the change to be made at the present time, but I think for the future notice should be taken of it, and it should be put in its proper vote in the Department of Justice, and not under legislation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think the hon. gentleman is quite right in regard to that, although this work has been done by the Law Department of the House of Commons.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did see some explanation to the effect that this was to cover the cost of material at the Printing Bureau, and that copies of these statutes were for sale on application.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is it in last year's estimates?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should think probably the 1921 amendments would be done pretty well in the early part of the year.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not know whether I am in order in asking the Government whether it is their intention to revise the Criminal Code. This code was introduced about 30 years ago and no revision has taken place since. It is customary to revise the ordinary statutes every ten years. I know that the matter was discussed at a recent meeting of the Council of the Canadian Bar Association, and it was thought advisable to urge upon the Government the necessity of a revision of this code, because many amendments have been introduced in the past 30 years.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It was revised in 1906, when all the statutes were revised.

Mr. JACOBS: That is 16 years ago, and I think something should be done in the matter of consolidating it and bringing it into some kind of shape.

Mr. BOIVIN: I might say, for the information of the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), that he can obtain a copy of the Criminal Code which is completely revised, with the exception of the amendments passed last year. The revision has been made from time to time by the Parliamentary Counsel, and the code in its completed and amended form can be obtained from the King's Printer.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not mean the ordinary revision, but I refer to the question of overhauling the entire code and bringing it abreast of the times. There are very many matters which I think ought to be re-codified and re-discussed, if I may use that expression. The Criminal Code must naturally keep abreast of public opinion, and, as it is the rule in other countries to have their criminal legislation gone over from time to time, I think it would be well that we should deal with that now. There are many things in the Criminal Code that might be changed, as many things have happened during the past sixteen years. The Criminal Code is an important piece of legislation, and it should be given more attention than it has been receiving during the past sixteen years.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What my hon. friend has said has application to the Criminal Code, but the time has long since passed when the whole of the statutes of Canada should have been revised. There has been no revision of the statutes since 1906, when the Criminal Code was revised, consolidated and passed. The work of revision of the statutes which, I think, should take place every ten years, is long overdue, but I understand the work was well under way last autumn. Very substantial progress had been made on that work on, I believe, very satisfactory financial conditions and terms. It would not take very long now to complete the work, and I sincerely hope the Government will prosecute it to a successful conclusion at the earliest posible moment.

Mr. JACOBS: To what extent was the work done last autumn?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I should think three-quarters of the work had been done.

Mr. JACOBS: By whom?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. O'Connor had done a good deal of it. I do not remember just what the arrangements were; but they provided for complete revision at a cost very substantially less than it had been done before, although ordinarily the cost would be very much greater now. I think the Government would do well to review the whole matter thoroughly, because I thought it an excellent arrangement for revision.

Mr. JACOBS: In matters of that kind, is it not necessary to have reports made from time to time to the Government as to the advisability of changes, additions, amendments and so on in legislation? I do not mean in the matter of consolidating the statutes, but in overhauling an entire statute.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That, of course, is another matter which hardly should be committed to the man in charge of revision.

Mr. JACOBS: To Parliament?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. It is certainly time we had a complete revision; the arrangement made for revision was economical, and the work was going on most expertly. I hope the Government will continue the revision and have it completed.

Mr. BOIVIN: How long was Mr. O'Connor employed on this work?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I could not say; but Mr. O'Connor is a man, who, when he is on a task, works night and day. He is a prodigious worker when he is at work, and he is a very efficient man in that class of work.

Mr. BOIVIN: What salary was paid to him for the work?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I could not say what was paid. I knew at one time what the arrangement was, and it can easily be ascertained.

Hon. D. D. McKENZIE (Solicitor General): I hardly think there was any such understanding about the matter as that given by my right hon. friend. The leader of the Opposition says that there was an arrangement with Mr. O'Connor about this work. We all know that Mr. O'Connor is a very capable man and a very efficient worker in anything which he undertakes. But it must not be supposed that it rests with this Government to continue the arrangement, because the arrangement was cut off by the late government many months before they went out of office, and they paid Mr. O'Connor for the work he did.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think that is right.

Mr. McKENZIE: If there is anything to be done henceforth, what will be done must be taken up afresh and some new arrangement made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I really think my hon. friend is wrong because I knew nothing about that.

Mr. McKENZIE: My right hon. friend will find that I am not wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN: By what officer was this done?

Mr. McKENZIE: The matter, as regards the settling up, was done by the Deputy Minister of Justice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what the Deputy Minister of Justice may have felt or thought or done about the matter; but I do not think the government, as a government, authorized the cancellation of any arrangement. If so, I knew nothing of it, and I would be surprised that such is the fact.

Mr. McKENZIE: My right hon. friend may rest assured that I have the correct information, because I have it from Mr. O'Connor himself. It is not second hand at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I talked to him not long ago, and I did not get that impression at all.

Item agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

Agriculture—for stock grazing and feeding—Governor General's warrants, December 1, 1921, and February 7, 1922, $50,000.

Mr. LUCAS: Will the minister kindly give us some explanation of this item?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): This heading is somewhat misleading. I do not know exactly why it is inserted in this way, but this is the way in which it has been carried in the estimates from year to year. It is really for what is familiarly known as the free freight which the Government of the Dominion, the western provinces and the railways have arranged to carry for the settlers in those dry areas. About $25,000 was for Alberta, $10,000 for Manitoba and $15,000 for Saskatchewan.

Item agreed to.

Labour—unemployment relief, further amount required (Governor General's warrants, July 23, 1921, and January 16, 1922), $400,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much was the warrant of January 16, 1922?

Mr. MURDOCK: Each warrant was for $200,000.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are only two remaining items—401, and 426 relating to Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. Possibly, if there is no objection, we might pass them; and if there is likely to be any discussion on them it could take place when the main estimates come up.

The CHAIRMAN: The items have all been passed except 406, which has been withdrawn.

Progress reported.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) is anxious to have Bill No. 71, to amend the Railway Act, 1919, go to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines. With the consent of the House I would move that we return to Public Bills and Orders in order that the hon. member may move the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Church, Bill No. 71 to amend the Railway Act, 1919, was read the second time and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

THE IMMIGRATION ACT, AMENDMENT

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With the permission of the House I move to have the following names added to the Special Committee to which have been referred Bills Nos. 16 and 17: Messrs. Ryckman, Ross, (Kingston), Hocken and McQuarrie. That makes up the twenty members of this Special Committee.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

Friday, May 12, 1922

The House met at three o'clock.

RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax) presented the second report of the Special Committee appointed to consider Railway transportation, as follows:

Your Committee recommend that the discussion, as well as evidence being taken by the Special Committee considering Railway Transportation Costs, be stenographically reported and printed as part of the record.

REDISTRIBUTION

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—DAYS FOR PRIVATE MEMBERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH T. SHAW (West Calgary): Mr. Speaker—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask:

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Shaw) caught my eye first.

Mr. SHAW: I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he would be prepared to recommend, and the House if it would be prepared to concur in, the recommendation that the resolution regarding redistribution, of which I gave notice, should be considered at some time fixed conveniently to suit the Prime Minister.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): There is no objection to having any matter considered, but the Government would like to select its own time for its consideration.

Mr. SHAW: Could the Prime Minister now indicate what time would be satisfactory to him?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it would not be possible to do so at the moment. I might mention that my hon. friend's resolution is one of a large number that appear on the Order Paper, and I think it would only be fair to hon. members that these resolutions should be taken up in the order in which they appear. There appears to have been some misunderstanding as to when private members' day would end. I said to the House—and I think it was generally so understood when I spoke the other day—that Monday and Wednesday of the present week would be the last days on which private members' business would have precedence. I should now like to say that there is the motion relating to the subject of oleomargarine, No. 23, which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that in the best interests of the Dairy Industry and of the public generally, the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine should be discontinued in Canada after September first next.

The Government would like to have the views of hon. members of the House on that subject, and I would be agreeable to promising consideration of this resolution on Monday next, if members of the House wish to have it taken up at that time. In regard to the other motion, I think I will have to ask my hon friends to allow the Government opportunity to consider what would be the best time to consider it.

Mr. GOOD: I have read the resolution which was submitted by the Government, and it distinctly states that next Monday will be available for private members' resolutions. I had previously understood the Prime Minister as he now expresses himself, but the resolution distinctly permitted members, resolutions on Monday next. I hope that is generally understood.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad my hon. friend has raised the point. Of course, I shall have to place myself in the hands of the House in this matter. I noticed in looking over the records that the resolution did appear as my hon. friend has said, but I immediately drew the attention of the Clerk to the circumstance that the amendment that I had proposed was intended to mean on and after Monday. The words "on and" were omitted in the printing. I think every hon. member who heard me speak here—and I think Hansard will bear it out—understood that the Government would desire to take Monday next for its business. The Government would like to hold to this, but we are agreeable to making an exception with respect to the one motion I have spoken of. If hon. gentlemen did not so understand me, I am prepared to consider the matter further, but I think it is desirable to get on with the main business of the House as rapidly as possible.

Mr. CRERAR: My understanding of the matter was precisely as the Prime Minister stated, that after this week the Government would take all days for their business. It is true, the motion as it appears in the records bears a different construction. I would suggest to the Government however that, perhaps, under the circumstances it would be advisable to leave Monday for private members, if the Government can see its way to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to meet my hon. friends opposite so far as possible. Might I suggest—if this is agreeable to the House—that the Government undertake to ask that resolution No. 23, that is the one respecting oleomargarine, be considered first thing on Monday next, and then when that resolution has been disposed of, we take up the other notices of motions in the order in which they appear? If that is agreeable to hon. members, I will undertake to follow that procedure.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): As resolutions passed by the House govern their wording, and not speeches—I am not at all contradicting what the Prime Minister says—we have Monday next as private members' day unless some action is taken in the meantime; and it is only by appropriate action to the contrary that that could be changed.

DATE OF THE BUDGET

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I think I will anticipate the question of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). I almost imagined that he had some reference to the possibility of the Budget. I had the hope and plan, indeed, that I might fix a date towards the end of the coming week, but to be on the safe side, I propose to fix Tuesday, the 23rd, as the date of the Budget.

PRIVILEGE—MR. COPP

CORRECTION OF REPORT CONCERNING REPARATION CLAIMS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. A. B. COPP (Secretary of State): I desire to take this opportunity, as a matter of privilege, of correcting a statement attributed to me in a report appearing in the Montreal Gazette, and possibly in other newspapers throughout the country:

> Mr. Copp stated that reparation claims amounting to $22,000,000 had been filed. Some of these claims had already been satisfied.

I desire to state most explicitly that I made no such statement as that, and if hon. members will refer to unrevised Hansard, page 1735, they will see exactly what I did say. I do not, for a moment, suggest that the reporter wilfully made this statement; but I do not want the statement spread broadcast throughout the country, because there have been filed in the department a large number of these claims, none of which has been paid. Those who have filed reparation claims, if some had been paid, would naturally be surprised that all the claims had not been considered at one and the same time. I want to make it clear that no claims have been considered or paid by the department.

POTLATCH INSTITUTION

NUMBER OF INDIANS SERVING GAOL TERMS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. W. FINDLAY (South Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Government if they have any further statement to make with regard to the matter, to which I referred a few days ago, of those in British Columbia who are at present taking part in the Indian celebration commonly known as the Potlatch. It will be remembered that, when I brought this matter up the other day, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that he was unable to hear sufficiently what I said to conclude what I was talking about. He suggested that he would confer with the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) and myself, and let me know what the situation was. I have had, I may say, one or two private conferences with the Minister of the Interior, and it will be remembered that, when I first introduced this question, the reason was that the minister had made a statement in reply to a question placed upon the Order Paper by the hon. member for South Vancouver (Mr. Ladner), and—

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. gentleman intends to put a question?

Mr. FINDLAY: Yes, for information.

Mr. SPEAKER: No debate is permissible on questions on the Orders of the Day.

Mr. FINDLAY: I merely want to know if the Government intend to give me any information as to the situation with regard to those Indians.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think I owe my hon. friend an apology for not having given him this information sooner. It was at hand yesterday; the Minister of the Interior had it, and he intended to give the reply in the House yesterday; but he was obliged to leave in the afternoon, and he left the answer with me. I have it here. The position is as follows, according to this statement by the acting deputy Superintendent General:

> The reply as prepared for the House contained the particulars with respect to the number of convictions for potlatching and the number of those serving terms of imprisonment as ascertained from Mounted Police reports up to the date of the question as it appeared in the Order Paper. We have just now received—

This is dated May 10:

> —from our agent for the Kwawkewlth agency, where these prosecutions have taken place, a report which contains the following paragraph and which I presume is an exact statement of the facts and is somewhat different from the particulars that we have gleaned from the Mounted Police reports: ;
> "The principal item of interest during the month of April was the completion of the potlatch prosecutions., Fifty-eight informations had been laid which after being heard resulted in nine dismissals, twenty-three were given suspended sentence, twenty-two were sentenced to two months' imprisonment and four six months' imprisonment. In the case of three of the latter the stay of execution was suspended and an application made for parole."

Those, I think, are the true facts of the case.

Mr. FINDLAY: Do I understand that, at the present time, they are all released except four?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Apparently not. The hon. gentleman will be able to refer to the statement I have read.

SUPPLY

AIR BOARD

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair:

The Air Board—
Salaries..	$ 75,000
Contingencies..	17,500
Canadian Air Force and Civil Aviation..	907,500
	$1,000,000

Mr. PARENT: What does the Civil Aviation consist of?

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Militia and Defence): The Civil Aviation consists almost altogether of work done for the other departments, such as fire ranging, work done for other provinces, and survey work.

Mr. JACOBS: How much for other provinces?

Mr. GRAHAM: The province of Quebec last year erected buildings worth, if I remember aright, $20,000 at Roberval, and the department went fifty-fifty They took the buildings as the province's share, and they did the fire ranging for the province. Ontario paid $50,000 for her share, and British Columbia $20,000.

Mr. JACOBS: If this was worked up by the provinces, why do the Dominion authorities contribute anything to it? The provinces in some cases, are much better off than the Dominion authorities.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is one of these peculiar situations where the federal Government participates, as it does sometimes in the matter of education. It is an experiment in collaboration with the provinces. The imperial authorities presented by the federal Government $5,000,000 worth of aviation equipment, and the work could not very well be undertaken by all the provinces unless they purchased their own equipment, so we gave it to them. The federal government undertook for a time to do this work. This year we have informed the provinces as well as the other departments of the Dominion government that if they want work done we shall be glad to undertake it, provided they pay the cost of doing it.

Mr. STEVENS: Is this reduction in connection with civil aviation, or with what might be described as the military branch?

Mr. GRAHAM: Both. There is a misconception as to what the department really intends to do with the Air Force. It was divided into civil and military. As a matter of fact, if Canada were in a position to enter largely into a field of this kind I should be rather inclined to leave the service as it was, under an air board attached to the department. But the force is comparatively small, and, in my opinion, must for a few years at least be in a merely experimental state. Consequently it and the Militia Department are being brought under the Department of National Defence. The Militia Department is not absorbing any of these entities; the idea is simply to amalgamate the three services so as, if possible, to reduce executive expenses. There has been a considerable difference of opinion, and not without reason, as to whether it was better to keep the Air Force outside the military branch than to bring it into the Department of National Defence. If we had a large organization and anticipated a large expenditure and a great development in the Air Force, it might be as well to leave it by itself. But I take it for granted that we are not in a position to develop any considerable organization just now in Canada. Furthermore, when civil aviation has reached a certain point in its development, private companies will largely undertake this work. I may not be in accord with hon. members, but I do believe that the Dominion is not prepared to enter upon any large scheme of government-owned and operated civil aviation service. I think that we should rather, for a time, act as instructors, allowing private companies and the provinces to get into the business themselves and look after their own affairs. That part of the work will be carried on under the new arrangement precisely as was done previously, and we hope this year to carry on all the civil aviation work we did last year. We are asking, however, that the provinces and the other departments of the Government pay the costs of operation, and we can assure them that the work will be done just as thoroughly as heretofore.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are two changes, I understand. The minister purposes to ask for larger contributions from the provinces for the services they get, and he also intends to assess the other departments for the benefits they derive from the organization. That accounts, I presume, for the substantial diminution in the estimates?

Mr. GRAHAM: It will account for some of it; the amounts are not overly large.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope the minister will not feel discouraged when I say that I concur in the attitude that he has taken towards this estimate, and I sincerely hope that my fidelity to the estimate will not alter his, and that we shall not find him coming back with another one later on. Very manifestly it would not be the part of economy, and consequently not the part of wisdom—because it would not carry with it efficiency—if all the provinces should commence individually air force organizations, at least while the science is in the experimental stage. You could scarcely conceive a greater waste of effort and money than would eventuate from such a course as that. The Dominion is the possessor of the equipment for this work. The work is almost wholly experimental, and undoubtedly can be done better by the Dominion Government in co-operation with the provinces than it ever could be done by the provinces themselves, each acting on its own initiative and separately. For myself, I have the utmost confidence—well, I will not say that, but at any rate I have some confidence—that very considerable results will be achieved, and that ere long, in the matter of forest fire protection. I may be wrong, but I think that in discussion of the estimates of the Interior Department this session the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) explained how a very considerable saving had been effected already on the timber areas in British Columbia by the adoption of this method of preservation. The department is therefore well advised as respects that matter, if there were nothing else to influence them, not to abandon the Air Force work. In regard to survey work for the Interior and other departments, although I am not sure that it has yet reached the point where it might be described as being a success, nevertheless it has not been brought to the point where failure is evident. There is in this connection also an opening for real service and real economy. For these reasons I support the attitude of the minister and hope he will not abandon it.

Mr. GRAHAM: My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) is right. I imagine it will not be very long before a good deal of the work on the ground in the matter of fire protection is done away with. Most of the work is done in the air; in the Winnipeg district that is the case at the present time. The department received a letter the other day from the engineers, who are preparing their report on the deep waterways, informing us that the air service had been of inestimable value to them in doing their work.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I understand that the High River station has rendered a great service in saving the Dominion forest reserve in that district, or at least in the vicinity, from destruction by fire during the past year. Is it the intention of the department to do away with this station at that point?

Mr. GRAHAM: We hope to be able to do the work, to put it mildly, as thoroughly as it was done last year, and if possible to do more work.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I should like a more definite statement from the minister. I have had letters from the boards of trade, not only in my own constituency but in the constituency of my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote), protesting against any diminution on the part of the federal government of its activities in this matter. They are opposed to such a course for more reasons than just the preservation of the forest as such. The preservation of the forest is absolutely essential to the irrigation projects now under way in southern Alberta, and we protest most earnestly against any diminution on the part of the Dominion government of the good work that has been done in the past. I should be glad if the minister would state definitely whether or not that station is to be maintained.

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot for the life of me see how the report got out that the air station at High River was to be abolished. I received a great many communications myself, and delved all around the department, but without avail, to find any one who knew how the suggestion had got out. The station will be maintained, as I said before, and possibly more work will be done than was done last year.

Mr. KELLNER: Did the minister say it was the intention to have the provincial governments pay for this work in the different provinces?

Mr. GRAHAM: We are asking the provincial governments to pay the cost of operation in connection with any work we do for them. They were informed last August of this decision on the part of the department.

Mr. KELLNER: It would not seem right that the provinces which have not got their natural resources should have to pay those expenses in the same proportion as the provinces which have.

Mr. GRAHAM: Three provinces have asked us to perform the work—Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia, and I am afraid the question of natural resources does not come up in connection with these provinces.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): How much of this work was done in each of the provinces last year, and at what cost?

Mr. GRAHAM: The cost of the operations at Vancouver was $63,958.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): That would be for the province of British Columbia?

Mr. GRAHAM: No, some of that was for the Dominion. About $20,000 was paid by the British Columbia government. At High river the cost was $120,669. Quite a large proportion of that was for construction of the wireless station there and other work in connection with it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Would that $120,000 be charged wholly against the province, or would part of it be borne by the Dominion?

Mr. GRAHAM: All by the Dominion, I think. At Victoria Beach, Man., the expenditure was $66,870; at Sioux Lookout, $35,574; the Ontario government reimbursed the federal government $15,000 of that expenditure; Roberval, Quebec, $31,099; Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, $43,322; Ottawa, $59,512; Haileybury, $1,049.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Is the High river station the only one in Alberta? I think most of the timber is in the northern part of the province.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is the only station in Alberta. Last year a machine was sent to Jasper for a short time.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Is it the intention of the department to extend the work into northern Alberta in view of the fact that this method is more efficient than the other?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am afraid we cannot promise much extension of the work with the estimate where it is.

Mr. DUFF: What work was done at Dartmouth, Nova Scotia?

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a station which was used largely for sea-planes. It was in use during the war. The work performed at that station was not very extensive last year, most of the expenditure representing maintenance.

Mr. DUFF: Does not the minister think that that station should be closed?

Mr. GRAHAM: We will consult with the provincial government.

Mr. GOULD: I did not catch from the minister his report for the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. GRAHAM: It would be hard to catch. There was no request from Saskatchewan, and no work was done.

Mr. GOULD: I am pleased to hear the minister state that fire prevention work over our timber areas would be done by aeroplane, and I merely wish to add that that is the thought which was in the minds of our people here when we were talking about the militia estimates, that the air service will do the work in future instead of the militia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the plan is right of assessing against the provinces the services performed for them, as certain provinces will require more service than others and they should pay proportionately. But what is the value of collecting from the various departments for any services rendered in regard to work formerly done by those departments? It will entail all sorts of bookkeeping and an additional cumbersome organization.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is a matter of arrangement between the departments. As Minister of Railways my experience was that whenever anything was to be carried some members of the government got it into their heads that my railways ought to carry it for nothing, and my department was made the goat, and at the end of the year the real showing of the railways was not evidenced in the report. So far as the Dominion treasury is concerned it does not make any difference. But for years past the militia estimates have been severely criticised and economy has been urged. What I had in my mind was this. For example, if the Interior Department wanted to appropriate $50,000 for fire rangers, and this Air Force were not in existence, the Department of the Interior would have to pay for the men engaged in the work. If we do the work for the Interior Department, then the Department of National Defence should not be charged with an expenditure, that ought to be made by the Department of the Interior. I wanted to show the actual expenditure of my department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has been pretty frank. The only object he has in mind is to keep the defence estimates down, and thereby be able to show that the Government has kept its pledge.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the other men do the same thing it will be all right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know he is all right. The Intercolonial Railway when it was operated by the Department of Railways was made the goat—it was supposed to carry everything free. That was all remedied by the late government, so this government will not have to face that condition again.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not see any evidence of that anywhere. I will bring that up on the Orders of the Day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That has all been cured. This is a case of the government service. You might just as well take any other department and where it does anything that was formerly done by another department charge it up to that other department. That would apply to the Departments of the Interior, Militia,—to every department of the Government. You would have a sort of interchange bookkeeping system that would be the most cumbersome and unmanageable in the world. If the Department of Militia and Defence is performing certain services, those services are not performed for particular individuals, as was the case with the railway service in former years; those services are performed for the whole nation. I see the object the minister has in view, but that is no good reason for adopting this course as relating to the Air Force. I submit the same plan should be followed as in all other departments of the government.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not want to block these estimates, Mr. Chairman, but I submit that the man who is put at the head of a department should run it on business principles, and if some other department wants his department to spend $50,000, that other department ought to ask for the appropriation and make the necessary transfer. In a large departmental store every branch is on its own footing, and if it lends anything to another branch it gets credit and the other branch is debited with it. That is the only way in which the head of such an institution can tell which branch is doing business properly and which is not. Now, if one branch of the government service is to be charged with work done for three or four other branches, it may look like a very extravagant branch when it is perhaps the most economical of the lot. I had my difficulties with the Department of Militia and Defence when I was Minister of Railways with reference to the transport of troops and so forth. I insisted that they should use their own railway and that they should pay for it when they did. Why should the Department of Railways carry troops for the Department of Militia, run up its deficit and keep down the expenditures of the Department of Militia?—I am referring to it, of course, from the point of view of the presentation of the results of the work of each department to the House and to the public.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What the public want to know is what the Air Force is costing. The minister proposes to charge each department for any special work he does for it, and there will be no way of ascertaining what the Air Board costs. That is a way of camouflaging it, of disguising it, by making it appear, if only the total is looked at and no examination is made beneath the surface, that the expenditure has been reduced. If I understand the minister's statement aright, the whole operations of the Air Board are to be continued. I have not heard that any are to be cut off, unless it be that work heretofore done for the provinces on the principle of fifty-fifty is now to be done entirely at provincial expense. That would involve a reduction, but only a very slight one, because the amount contributed by the provinces was very small indeed. But the whole work is evidently to go on and the whole expense will probably be there. All the salaries are continued—$75,000 for this year just the same as last year. What I object to in the system is this: certain newspapers in this country when these estimates were published proclaimed that the minister had performed a wonderful service; that he had cut down the Air Board estimates by some $600,000 or $700,000. But it is evident that the whole work is to be continued; there is no real cut in the estimate, no real reduction in the expense. A good many promises of reduction were made, but according to the statement given this afternoon by the minister the work is to be carried on as formerly, though instead of charging it to the Air Board, where it should be charged, it is to be spread out over various departments, with the result that the public will not know what the Air Force is costing. Now, last year the Air Board performed services for the Department of Marine and Fisheries; coastal patrols to prevent poaching and fishing out of season; transportation of spawn; rapid transportation to inaccessible points in British Columbia. That is all charged against the Air Board; we know what the Air Board is costing. Last year certain work was performed by the Air Board for the Department of Agriculture: securing vertical and oblique photographs of mosquito-infested areas in proximity to Vancouver. That was charged to the Air Board. If that work is continued it will be charged to the Department of Agriculture and we shall not know what the Air Board is costing. Last year the Air Board did work for the Department of the Interior; oblique photography of deltas, lakes, etc., for map purposes; also forest fire protection work, forest reconnaissance, and inspection of burnt areas from the air All that work was charged to the Air Board, so that the people know what the cost is. Now, the minister proposes to charge it to the Department of Interior, and no one will know what the Air Board costs. Last year the Air Board did work for the Department of Customs—here is a new avenue of work for it: patrols to prevent smuggling of drugs from the East into Canada. I think it was brought out in a debate we had in the House a few days ago that a good many of these drugs gain access to Canada by being thrown overboard in casks and barrels and picked up by fishing boats near the coast and brought ashore. That has been very largely stopped through the efforts of the Air Board. The activities of the board in this respect are now to be charged to the Department of Customs. I submit that the proposal is wrong. The air service is now a very important item in the budget of every country. Last year the vote for this purpose in the United States was $95,000,000; I think it is about the same this year, or perhaps larger. In Great Britain the amount spent is tremendous. Australia and New Zealand have made their first expenditure in air service, and I think every civilized nation has done likewise. The work is experimental as yet and the people are curious to know just what it costs. It is an expensive service, there is no doubt about that. Machines are costly; repairs run into large sums; high-class men have to be well paid—flying operations from the beginning to end are vastly expensive. I submit that the estimates last year and the year before were pared down to a very modest and reasonable amount, one quite in keeping with our general expenditure and our general requirements. This year there is a change in method, but there is going to be no change in result; in fact, any change made under the proposal of the minister will be detrimental. We know to-day just what the Air Board costs, what officials will be retained, and what salaries are to be paid. By the way, I understand that the resignation of the only official who acted in a purely honorary capacity and who gave wonderful service has been accepted since the new Government took office. I refer to Colonel O. M. Biggar, who since the Air Board was constituted had been its deputy chairman and gave his services without remuneration. About a year ago he tendered his resignation to me when I was acting as chairman of the board, but I did not accept it; he was too valuable a man. But I believe that the new administration has accepted his resignation, although he was the only unpaid official in the air service, and his work was extremely important and exceedingly well done, as is everything which Colonel Biggar does. On the whole I cannot take exception to the amount which the Government proposes to expend, but I do think it should be put just as plainly as it was last year; the House and the country should know what we propose to spend. It should all be in the estimates; let us know what the Air Board is costing Canada.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is so easy that I am surprised that my hon. friend should bring it up. If he had kept in mind what I said about the departmental store he would know and the country would know exactly what the air service costs. If there are to be credits from other departments they will appear as well.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why not put them all in one?

Mr. GRAHAM: They will be in one, but if there are any receipts from provinces or from other departments, they will be shown. The estimates will not be changed. Last year there were receipts from provinces.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then the information the minister gave the committee a few moments ago was very misleading, or I am very dense. I understood, because he put it in very plain language, that all that was done for the various departments was to be paid for by them. Now he leads me to believe that his present estimate is the whole expenditure on the air service. I do not know which is right. If the amount stated in this estimate, $1,000,000, is to be the total expenditure, reduced by $625,000 from last year, the minister should not maintain his whole staff as he is doing. He has cut down 33 per cent of his expenditure. I assume, then, that he will cut down at least one-third of his air operations. One may reasonably suppose that a third of his staff would likewise be cut down. But the first information which he gave to the leader of the Opposition was the correct information, that he proposed to continue the operations. He is now trying to camouflage it by letting each department charge itself with the amount which the service performed for that department represents. What the committee want to know, and what the people of this country want to know, is what the whole cost of the air service is going to be; if $1,000,000 is going to be the expenditure, let us know it, and if every department is going to add to that amount, let us know that also.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will remind the minister, before he rises, that I pointed out the difference between the $1,000,000 and the $1,625,000, and after he told me there were to be charges against departments and against governments, I said "That accounts for this difference," to which he replied that it accounted in part.

Mr. GRAHAM: To a very small extent, I think I said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To any extent at all, it contradicts what the minister said, because if all the charges are in the $1,000,000 and the credits come in from the departments, they would not account for one dollar of the difference.

Mr. GRAHAM: Hon. gentlemen seem to object to the way in which I have brought this estimate down, and the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) talks of "camouflage." There is no camouflage about it at all. He talks of not reducing the staff, but I am inclined to think he knows better. He knows because there have been many people to see him about it. Practically all the temporary staff of the Air Force, or at all events the great majority, have gone now and $35,000 will be saved in temporary employees who were paid out of the Air Board vote. There is $35,000 saved before we begin to reorganize.

Mr. GUTHRIE: First, that is not a correct statement; secondly, it is an unfair statement.

Mr. GRAHAM: Absolutely correct and perfectly fair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No one has seen me on this subject, not a single individual from the minister down to the lowest official, and there has not been one letter—not a word.

Mr. GRAHAM: They have been to see me.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What I state is absolutely correct. Here is the estimate, $75,000, for this year just the same as last year. If you have cut down your operations this year one-third, why do you need the same vote as last year? I maintain that you are not cutting it down except on paper. You are really going to continue the same operations. I hope you will, but I say that you are trying to camouflge the expenditure. What about the resignation of Colonel Biggar, may I ask?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think this matter was explained by myself in the House on a former occasion, but when the militia estimates come up my hon. friend always takes great pains to make it embarrassing for the gentlemen themselves as well as for the minister, when any person retires of his own accord or is retired. The hon. member for South Wellington is no better friend of Colonel Biggar than I am. As I said in this House some weeks ago, Colonel Biggar worked for this 4 p.m. department gratis as vice-president and as soon as I came into the department he told me that he had offered his resignation some time before, and he offered it again. I asked him to retain his position for a while until we discovered what we were going to do. Then, when the time came to discuss the question of amalgamation, Colonel Biggar again offered his resignation, and I accepted it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has his place been filled?

Mr. GRAHAM: His place has not been filled.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does the minister propose to fill his place?

Mr. GRAHAM: If we have the reorganization, there will be no place to fill.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is the Air Board as now constituted to be continued?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think my hon. friend has probably not read over the bill. The Air Board is not to be continued.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How is it to be operated—as a branch of the Defence Department? Is it to be a separate branch, and if so, who is to be the presiding genius, and what assistants will he have?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is very difficult to give these details before the reorganization is at least partially completed. The bill for bringing about the reorganization has not yet become law. As I explained some time ago, the Air Board will be an integral part of the Department of Defence: it will not be absorbed by the Department of Militia and Defence. I think I can say to the House that practically all the technical officers and most of the staff will be taken into the new Department of Defence. We shall have a Director of Aviation, and perhaps one or two assistants. The technical officers we have now will be part of the Department of Defence, and not on the outside but on the inside.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I see that the sum voted for salaries last year was $75,000. The minister says that he is getting rid of temporary employees to the amount of $35,000, but there is no corresponding reduction in this item. Why is that?

Mr. GRAHAM: That was not under this item. That was not my explanation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Out of what vote were the temporary help paid last year?

Mr. GRAHAM: Out of the general vote for the Air Force.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What were these people doing who were in temporary service?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am informed they were doing technical and equipment service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know just what that means. What is it? Repairing machines?

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. GRAHAM: Aeronautical engineering staff, and stores. In addition, there were a lot of temporary clerks, as there are in every department. They were carried in the main bulk vote to the amount of $35,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why was that service necessary last year and not this year? The officer of the department will know.

Mr. GRAHAM: Because the staff does not need to be so large. In the first place, we are amalgamating, and we expect to get along with fewer quarter-masters and accountants, for instance. We expect to save something there. Then we have not so much money to spend. Some of the details of operation will be cut out, although the main work will be carried on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not just get my mind around that. The bill is not through yet for the amalgamation. I have always contended the minister did not need the bill, but he says he does. The bill is not yet through, and if these temporary employees are all being let out in anticipation of the bill going through, if they are away from the service now, they are not needed there, of course. There must be something that was done last year that is not being done this year, and I am anxious to find out what service that is. What would the amalgamation have to do with the aeronautical engineering service, for instance? Nothing in the world. The men repairing aeroplanes are not going to be any different whether the department is called National Defence, or Air Board.

Mr. GRAHAM: We will be doing less flying; there will be less of this kind of work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What flying service is being cut down or eliminated?

Mr. GRAHAM: At the present time there is little or no training being done at Camp Borden. The camp will be opened up a little later on, but not to the extent it has been, probably.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But what service is going to be reduced? There would not be any training at Camp Borden last year more than this year. What service is being cut down or taken away?

Mr. GRAHAM: My information is that flying is being cut down proportionately. All I have stated in the House here is in reference to the main work of civil aviation in the department. We hope to carry on the work that is being done for the provinces this year, but the other work is being cut in every particular, or we could not make this reduction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is to say, there is going to be less aeroplane service for the protection of our own forests?

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. minister said that outside of what we were doing for the provinces all the rest was cut proportionately. Now, we are not protecting our own forests for the provinces, we are protecting them for ourselves. It follows, therefore, that that is being cut, or else the minister was not accurate. The minister's reply from his seat would indicate that he is not cutting that service. Then what is it? Is it the survey service for the Interior Department or for the Customs Department? What is it that is being reduced?

Mr. GRAHAM: I merely gave my hon. friend one item. We are not building any stations this year. We built quite a number last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presume when stations are built they are built, and it would hardly be economy to tear them down. That accounts for some. Can the minister account for anything else?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is very technical.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not in the witness box. I am giving the House all the information I can give. We are doing this thing at Camp Borden, and cutting the expense in every quarter, without interfering with the special service of the organization.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I asked him if he was cutting at one quarter and he indignantly denied it.

Mr. GRAHAM: The right hon. member must not put words in my mouth. He is not catechising a witness in the witness box, and I am not going to permit him, even if he has been Prime Minister, to put words in my mouth which I have not used. I have answered the question fairly and thoroughly, and if talking and manufacturing in his own mind questions that he did not put, and answers that he did not receive, amuses him, let him go on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister may not be a witness in the witness box; I did not say he was. But he is a minister of the Crown in Canada, subject to inquiry in the House as to his estimates.

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I asked him was what being reduced; I desire specific answers, and I am entitled to them. I am not demanding any answer because I was Prime Minister or anything on account of myself, other than that I am a member of Parliament, with the rights of a member of Parliament. The minister wants to get away by simply saying "Oh, I am reducing, I am cutting down expense," with the hope that the committee will get the impression that this is a great matter of economy on his part without reduction of service. Then I asked him what service he was reducing, and his reply was that he was reducing all-round proportionately. Then he said that he was not reducing the service to the provinces, but was reducing the rest. I am not putting words in his mouth. These are his own words. I said he must be reducing the service for the protection of our forests. From his seat he disputed that. Where have I put words in his mouth? Not at all. He is not reducing that service. He has so answered. I hope that answer is right and that he is not reducing the service. What service is he reducing? He said "we built some stations last year, and did not need to build them this year." That accounts for some reduction, but it is not a reduction of service.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is a reduction in money.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very good. I have accepted that. That is quite clear. We understand that. If that accounts for the whole reduction, all right, I am satisfied, but if it is something else I want to know specifically what it is, and I would like the minister to explain on what ground I am not entitled to an answer. I would like to know specifically what is being reduced, what has enabled him to do it, and where is the service that is going to be left, and why?

Mr. GRAHAM: I have answered these questions several times. The right hon. gentleman does not expect to get answers in dollars and cents in every detail. He knows that is impossible. We do believe that when we get the department properly organized, if we are allowed to do it, we can perform the essential service that we did last year at a much less expense than last year. We are cutting out at the present time training at Camp Borden. We will have the instruction school at Camp Borden later on I hope, and without giving the details in every particular, as no person can know at the present time just what they will be, we are undertaking to carry on the work with the reduction of $625,000, and I hope we will be able to do it; I believe we will. The work to be done by the different departments of the Government will depend on the requisitions of those departments of Government. Just at the moment I cannot tell in what I am going to reduce the work done for the different departments of government. I may reduce some and increase others; that will depend on the requisitions the different departments make. But we do believe we can carry on the service and give satisfaction to the provinces for $1,000,000. When the department is fully reorganized, and we get it in working shape, we will be able to give details, but at present it is impossible to give them, because we have not our organization perfect.

Mr. STEVENS: I wish to ask one or two specific questions. Is it the intention of the department to maintain the same forest patrol in the railway belt in British Columbia, and in what is known as the Peace River block? Take the railway belt—

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, in the railway belt.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it intended to maintain the same patrol service at Vancouver in connection with the Customs Department and the other miscellaneous services rendered by the board and the department last year?

Mr. GRAHAM: The Customs Department have already asked that the patrols be maintained, and we believe we can maintain them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister resists giving us the details. He says "I am cutting down the amount, and you must leave it to me to make the saving where I can." I submit, the minister is not treating the committee properly. He can give many more details than he has given. Here is an estimate of $1,525,000 Canadian Air Force and Civil Aviation. His officers cut it down to $907,500. Note the "$500." They have it down to a matter of a hundred dollars. It is not as if it were reduced to a round $1,000,000, but it is reduced to $907,500. The officers of this department have the details making up that $907,500. They have the corresponding details making up the $1,525,000 of last year, and those details will show where the reductions are in each case, and the minister or his officers can tell this committee just how the reductions are made, whether by reduction of service, or how and just how much of that is due to the fact that the stations have been built, and how much is due to something else, and what the other things are.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Furthering what my right hon. friend has just said, the item of $907,500 has not been put there by chance or guess. It represents something. Last year the same item was $1,525,000, and we know what it represented. It was stated in the estimates last year that $700,000 of it was for civil aviation; $825,000 of it was for the Air Board for the military end of the service.

Of the $700,000 the items were as follows:

Flying for other Government Departments	$365,000

They charged it all up to the Air Board last year.

Experimental Flying Research	$ 50,000
Upkeep of equipment	80,000
Acquisition and equipment of civil air stations	220,000
Total	$715,000
Less amounts for operation on account of Ontario and Quebec	35,000
Total sum required	$680,000

In addition, there is an item of $20,000 for licensing, inquiry into accidents, survey of air routes, etc. This makes a total of $700,000. When we come to the military side of the Air Board work, we have a total of $825,000, according to the following details:

28-day refresher course for 190 flying officers	$380,000
28-day refresher course for 50 ground officers	22,000
3 months' course for 400 mechanics	240,000
Spare parts	100,000
Seaplane training	60,000
Provincial executives	23,000
Total	$825,000

That is what Parliament voted last year.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member has given us the full details of the expenditure of 1921-22. Would he be good enough to keep right on and give us the details for this year?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. DUFF: Has the hon. member the details?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I have not.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member has those of last year, wherever he got them. Will he tell us where he got those details from?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I had them in the House last year. I was questioned on them.

Mr. DUFF: Not those details.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If I was asked questions on them, I certainly had them before me, because this is the memorandum that I presented to the House last year when my estimates were before the House.

Mr. DUFF: Does it not belong to the department, and not to the hon. member? What right has the hon. member to that memorandum? It belongs to the department.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have a right to it, and there is the duplicate of it in the department. I think there is a duplicate of it at this moment in the desk of the minister. If there is not, there should be. I want to know what is going to be done with the money for the current year. There is a lump item of $900,000, and not a single detail of what they are going to do with it. The least the minister could do would be to give to the committee some idea of what the expenditure is going to be. He must know how that item of $900,000 is made up. It will not take more than a minute or two to give it to the committee, and the committee is entitled to the information.

Mr. GRAHAM: I made the explanation a moment ago. It was all very well for my hon. friend last year to have the estimate of what he was going to do, because he was carrying on the Air Board just as it was before. All he had to do was to sit down and make out the estimates in detail. He knows, and the committee, knows that, on account of our reorganization, which I hoped would have taken place some weeks ago, but which has been delayed, it is impossible to sit down and make out those details, because we have not got into our new organization, we have not our departments together. The Air Board itself is not in a position to sit down and make out all those details, because it does not know whether it will be operated. Let me point this out to my hon. friend. I could give him some figures in connection with stations, not details, because, under present conditions, it is impossible to make out the details for the coming year under present conditions. We propose to keep the estimates within $1,000,000 and to give the essential services.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will that include the work which the Air Board is going to do for other departments?

Mr. GRAHAM: That will depend whether I can get any money out of the other departments or not. The figures to which I referred are; in round numbers:

Headquarters	$32,440
Vancouver air station	81,560
High river air station	82,000
Victoria beach air station	90,000
Parry Sound and Whitney unit	31,810
Ottawa air station	49,000
Ottawa photographic section	21,000
Aeroplane and engine repair depot	38,000
Roberval air station	35,000
Dartmouth air station	9,000

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister has let us have some light on some things that have been a mystery to us for some time as regards the merging of the three departments of Militia, Naval Service and the Air Force. He intimates to the committee now that, as regards the Air Force, the essential features are to be retained, which I assume to be the commercial or civil aviation features. As regards national defence, the Air Force is going to cease to exist entirely. The training at Camp Borden, the minister has informed the committee, is to be discontinued.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, I did not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Or, that he hoped to have it reinstated at a later date.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say it was to be discontinued.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Then I misunderstood the minister. The Air Service is one that, I am afraid, the majority of people are inclined to underestimate. At the conference which took place at Washington some time ago between the great powers, one might have observed how readily the disarmament proposals which were made were being accepted by some of those countries, and at the same time the information came out—and it is undoubtedly the view of many of those countries—that the air force was going to be a much more prominent feature of warfare in the future than it had ever been in the past, and that possibly some of those naval armaments would not be so invulnerable as they had been in the past, and might possibly be a handicap. As far as I can understand from the minister's explanation, the Air Force, as a defensive force, is practically going to cease to exist; the civil aviation is going to be continued if some arrangement can be made with the provinces to employ these people, who will be under the Department of National Defence, purely as a civil force, and the services of those men who attained such wonderful experience and training during the war will be dispensed with. The minister is apparently unable to give the committee the information which has been repeatedly asked for, because he does not know what arrangement he may be able to make with the different provinces in utilizing the force which would be under his control. I hope I have not misstated what the minister has said. The Departments of Naval Service, Militia and the Air Force are not being amalgamated into Department of National Defence; and so far as I can gather, the only body of, I will not say men, but of anything savouring of military training in this country, which body is going to be maintained and for which the estimate has been kept up, is that of the Boy Scout movement in Canada. Is it possible that the people of this country are going to depend on our boy scouts as a body of national defence in the future? The minister may smile, but this is a serious matter. While peace may prevail in this country at the present time, who knows how long peace may continue and how soon we may require the services of those men whom the minister is practically ignoring to-day and allowing to go back into civil life again? It is most important and essential that a number of these highly trained experts should be retained, so that this country might benefit from the valuable experiences which they have gained from the services which they rendered to Canada, instead of allowing this to become purely a civil force.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am glad to have my hon. friend speak in that way, because my great trouble during the past two weeks was in the opposite direction. The majority of people complained that I was making this all military and not leaving any civil force. As a matter of fact, practically all the aviators engaged in forest protection work are members of the Canadian Air Force, of the Defence force. This work which they do in doing civil aviation is for civil purposes, but it gives them possibly the best training they can get. They are really training for defence purposes in the work that they are carrying on. For instance, flying over the forests, photographing the ground beneath, is just the work they would be doing on the battlefield. While civil aviation is to be carried on, the bulk of it will be carried on by members of the Civil Aviation Force who will get the best training in air work in that way.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I quite understand that the only men who are really competent to operate these flying machines are the men who have seen military service. But the minister has not denied the fact that it is becoming a civil force and is no longer a part of the national defence force at all. Why should men who are acting as fire rangers throughout the country be listed as part of the defence forces of the country? Yet that is what the minister is doing.

Mr. MANION: There is a very strong opinion on the part of authorities throughout the country that there is a great deal of destruction going on in our forests, and I understand that part of this force is used for the purpose of protecting these forests. Possibly the minister at an earlier stage may have explained this matter thoroughly, but if he did I was not present. I should like him to give to the committee more in detail some of the work which is being done by the air force in the protection of forests. He might tell us how much work is being done in sections of the country where the natural resources belong to the Dominion, and in other parts where the provinces own their own resources, such as Ontario, British Columbia and Quebec. This is an important question which is engaging the attention of the people of the country to-day.

Mr. GRAHAM: We discussed that matter at great length. We have been doing work for the province of Ontario, for example, in the protection of forests, and also for Quebec and British Columbia. The activities of the force have been engaged in the Forestry branch, the Geodetic Survey branch, the Topographical Survey branch, the Dominion Water Power branch, the Parks branch, the Reclamation Service department, the International Boundary Commission and Town Planning branch, and the Geological Survey branch; and also in connection with the Department of Marine and Fisheries, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Customs, the Canadian National Railways and the Department of Trade and Commerce. The force did some work for the Ontario government in forest protection, and, as well, for the provinces of British Columbia and Quebec.

Mr. MANION: What arrangement is made, in regard to this work, between the Dominion government, and, say, the province of Ontario, which owns its own lands? Is there some arrangement by which the work is carried on partly by the Dominion government and partly by the province?

Mr. GRAHAM: We are running two stations in Ontario, at Whitney and Parry Sound. The province pays the cost. Last year they paid $15,000. British Columbia last year paid $20,000. In Quebec there is a station built at Roberval. We took their construction of the station as their share of the work; but this year we propose to do the work on a return payment basis.

Mr. MANION: That is, they pay the expenses.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister has given some stations where the cost is to be so much, totalling a very small sum, and he evidently desires to leave the impression that he is to have $625,000 saved by economies pending some bill which is to pass the Senate. Now, in the first place, the minister has been in departments long enough to know that all the amalgamation in the world will amount to a comparatively small matter compared to the cost of the services themselves. In fact, I doubt myself if it will amount to anything at all; I think it is mostly talk. For that matter, the minister could bring about the amalgamation under the law as it is to-day. The Air Board, under the statute passed a few years ago, could be moved into his department at any time; he does not need any bill for the purpose. But to say that he cannot tell what is to be applied to certain services, that is, how his officers estimate the application of this money, because he is awaiting the results of reorganization, is really to make a statement that cannot be accepted by any one who has had anything to do with departments. The minister knows what services were rendered before by the departments under every head; and when he comes to this committee and says that he does not know what he intends to do as respects any service that last year cost so much money, but wants the committee to vote him the money and let him do what he likes, he is simply asking for a blank cheque. Details have been given in previous years, and reorganization—a matter of an accountant or a supervisor here or there—has nothing at all to do with the question of services rendered in these various fields, so that there is no reason why the information cannot be given. If I am wrong the minister will correct me, but it seems to me that he told his department to cut the vote to a million dollars. They saw they would have to have $75,000 for salaries, and in order to make up the reduction they have cut the second vote to $17,500, and the estimate for Canadian Air Force and Civil Aviation to $907,500. If they have not made up their minds as to how they intend to apply the money in the particular fields of service, as was done last year, then they are not prepared to come and ask for a vote. They should wait until they are ready to submit the figures to Parliament; but they need not wait for reorganization. They cannot cover such a multitude of sins with the pretext of waiting for the bill to pass the Senate. They should know, if they do not, what it is intended to apply in the various fields designated by the ex-Minister of Air Service. I really think they must have that information here. If they cannot give it with absolute accuracy, they could be accurate enough for all the purposes of the committee.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): I represent a section of the country covering some 10,000 square miles, where forest fires are an annual occurrence. Tremendous losses are sustained in both Gaspé and Bonaventure as a result of these fires, and I am glad to know that an arrangement is being made with the provinces by which protection is to be given to the forests. I think that is the phase of the aviation service that will appeal to the people generally, because our forests are one of the most valuable assets of the country. Do I understand from the minister that this service is provided on application from the provinces, and that the arrangements rest with the provincial governments? Is there a patrol kept up regularly in the Gaspé peninsula?

Mr. GRAHAM: Where the Dominion has no lands the province itself is responsible for the protection of forests. They call on the department to provide the service, for which they pay. We are now in correspondence with the Quebec government.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not intend to detain the committee, but I want to point out as a final protest that while we, as the people's representatives are deliberating on an item involving a million dollars, there is not one man in the committee, save the minister himself, who knows what is to be done with that money. Now, is that right? If we vote this money, every dollar of it can be spent for the militia of Canada, and there is nothing before the committee to limit the minister in any way in the expenditure of the money. We are asked to vote it blindly without any particulars except as regards two or three stations mentioned by the minister a few moments ago, which account for a small portion of the vote, and the general statement that work is to be done at High River and one or two other points. If we are to vote a million dollars without inquiry and without any definite information except the general statement that it is to be applied to the air service, I do not know why we cannot vote millions and millions of dollars without any details. I never saw a more blank vote asked for, and, if this committee passes it, I never saw a more blank vote given. I make my protest; I am not going to do anything more about it.

Mr. JELLIFF: I am not sure that I fully understood some of the figures given by the hon. minister. I understood him to say that the expense of the High River patrol last year was $120,000, and that this year it was to be $82,000, and that he expected to be able to give the same patrol service as was given last year in that part of the country. It is almost impossible for me to conceive how he can do that unless there was much extravagance and waste in the expenditure last year. We are very insistent in our part of the country that the patrol system be maintained to the fullest extent possible, and even extended. I do not know how far the patrol extends, but I live pretty well south in the province, in the Lethbridge district, and I know we have had a number of very serious forest fires to the west of us in the Waterton Parks region. My recollection is that we have had such forest fires nearly every year. I do not think that the High River patrol as at present constituted reaches that far, although I may be mistaken. If it does not, I deem it essential that, instead of being restricted, the High River patrol should be extended so as to cover the Dominion forests and parks clear to the international boundary line. That is essential not only to preserve the forests for their timber, but to ensure the success of our irrigation projects there, as the snow on the forest clad hills is the source of moisture upon which that part of the country depends in a large degree. I hope the minister will look into this matter again and see that at least there is no cut in the amount allocated to keep the patrol at High River in a state of the highest efficiency.

Mr. GRAHAM: The difference is largely due to the fact that we spent approximately $30,000 last year in construction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I would suggest to the minister the advisability of letting this vote stand over until we have some definition of what "National Defence" really is. In the bill for the consolidation of the three old branches of the service I do not see any definition. If national defence in the future is to consist of an air force for forest ranging and the detection of smugglers, I think the House should know it, and that the Upper Chamber should also be so advised before the bill becomes law. To my mind national defence has an entirely different meaning from that of civil aviation for the purposes which have been outlined here. An air force undoubtedly is going to be a tremendously important factor in the defence of all countries in the future, much more so, I believe, than the average person realizes to-day, and it seems to me that you are dragging the service into the mire when you utilize it to detect smugglers and forest fires. The prevention of smuggling is essentially a work for the naval service—for the ships that are to be returned to the Motherland with the compliments of the Government of Canada. I quite agree with the late Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) that we should have something more than this information so far given to this committee. If this money is to be expended on civil aviation, and the training at Camp Borden and elsewhere is to be abandoned, I think it is a very, very important matter and should be treated a little more seriously by the Minister of Militia and Defence.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will try to explain the matter to my hon. friend again. This civil aviation in no way interferes with the practical work of the members of the Canadian Air Force, which is a defence force. As I said before, Camp Borden is closed at the present time, but it will be reopened and instruction will be given there as heretofore, but whether on as extensive a scale I do not know.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: During the present year?

Mr. GRAHAM: During the present year. Civil aviation for forest ranging and that kind of thing is confined to a few months in the summer. The training of the men in the Canadian Air Force can be carried on not only in flying but in other defence work during the whole year. I have given two or three times already particulars of the stations to which half of the $900,000 is to be allocated. The balance will be used in training of a military character for defence purposes and for the replacement of equipment and parts. As a matter of fact, it is hard to say what that amount will be. As was stated by the leader of the Opposition, I think it is comparatively easy to get the personnel for the flying corps; the expensive matter is the purchasing and maintenance of equipment, and you have to get the equipment as spare parts before you know whether you need it or not. I do not see how I can give the committee any further particulars. I have given them every particular that my official says he has. When we get down to our reorganization, which I assure my hon. friend is the most difficult thing I ever tried in my life to bring about—except, perhaps, to get a wife—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You made a better job then.

Mr. GRAHAM: I had better raw material to work on, perhaps. When we get the staff reorganized and working together we will have a plan in detail of just how much work will be performed with the balance of this vote.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Cannot the minister at least tell us how much of this $907,000 we are asked to vote is for the Canadian Air Force and how much is for civil aviation? Surely a rough division is possible.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have given that two or three times already.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: May we have it again? I have not got it right.

Mr. GRAHAM: The amount for civil aviation will be approximately $473,000 odd. As I have just explained, the balance will be for military training at Camp Borden by our instructors and the replacement and procuring of material and equipment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister says there is reorganization and that there is no telling what he may do. Well, he ought to know what he is going to do. Is he going to continue, for example, the votes under housing and personnel, the vote under hangars? That information was all before the House last year. It may be the minister cannot tell us whom he is going to be able to let go; I am not asking him for that. But of the services rendered the state he can tell us what ones he is going to continue and what ones he is not going to continue, and what ones he is going to reduce. If his officers are not in a position to give that information, then they should be sent back and made to get into that position. Also he can tell us how much was spent last year on construction and equipment of stations that does not need now to be spent. How much of this $625,000 is accounted for by that? That, with the other information, would give us all we are entitled to. I ask the minister to remember the orations we have heard often in this House and all through the country about the "fullest information to Parliament," about "the larger liberty" and "the new freedom," and to try to give us a little information.

Mr. GRAHAM: Last year we spent on the construction of civil aviation stations, about $60,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And equipment?

Mr. GRAHAM: Equipping the stations, of course.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all the information we are going to get.

Item agreed to.

NAVAL SERVICE

Naval service—to provide for the maintenance of the Royal Canadian Navy, $1,500,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: Mr. Chairman, in asking for the supply for the Naval Department for the ensuing year I think it is but fair to the committee that I should explain that the money chargeable to the Naval Department is not expended entirely on the naval service proper. I will place on Hansard the names of the various branches of the department so that in discussing the estimates hon. members will understand that under certain headings we are asking for supply for services which have nothing to do with the Royal Canadian Navy.

We have what is known as the Royal Naval Service itself. Then we have the Fisheries Protection Service, which is composed of ten vessels, two on the Atlantic, two on the Pacific, two on the Great Lakes, and four not in use at the present time. These patrol the coasts of Canada and are charged with the regulation of fisheries. The duties of that branch I will explain under the estimates relating particularly to it. Then we have the survey of tides and currents, a service that is highly technical, involving the preparations of tables, etc., for the use of navigation. Then we have the branch called the Hydrographic Survey, composed of four main parties and five ships. These operate on the lower St. Lawrence, gulf of St. Lawrence, southern coast of Nova Scotia, and coast of British Columbia. The duties of this service are the preparations of charts of the coasts of Canada, such charts being guides for mariners; the fixing of relative levels of the St. Lawrence system as a basis for the study of international relations on the river by means of chain of automatic gauges. Then we have what is probably the most wonderfully developed branch, the Radiotelegraph Service. There are 43 radio stations owned by the Canadian government. On the eastern coast these are operated by the Marconi Company, who are subsidized by the Government; on the Pacific Coast they are operated by the Government. They have charge of the direction-finding radio stations on the Atlantic, at St. John Chibucto, Canso, and Cape Race, Newfoundland. This service administers the Radiotelegraph Act and has charge of all radio matters in Canada; issues licenses to all radio stations in Canada, commercial, experimental and amusement; issues licenses to ships equipped with radio; inspects all ships and stations to which licenses are granted; holds examinations for various grades of radio-telegraph operators; handles all accounts connected with radio matters.

The subject of the Canadian navy is one which has interested the people of Canada for some years. In 1910 what is called the Naval Service Act was passed, under which Canada established for herself a naval service. In 1911, I think it was, arrangements were made under which the British Admiralty handed over to the Dominion certain services which the Admiralty had previously performed, particularly those relating to the docks at Esquimalt and Halifax. Now, there was great divergence of opinion as to what we should do under the Naval Service Act. That act, of course, provided for different things. Under it the then government purchased two ships, the Niobe and the Rainbow, for the purpose of training young men for naval service. The purchase was made in 1910, in consultation with the Admiralty. In 1911 the government changed, and in 1912 these ships were tied up. When the war broke out in 1914, the Niobe was refitted and placed in service, and served one year. Then it was taken out of commission and used as a depot shop, or something of that kind. In 1911, I think it was, an arrangement was made, followed by a treaty later, by which Canada agreed to do what Great Britain would otherwise have had to do in the matter of patrolling the waters of the Behring sea for the protection of the seal fisheries around the Pribyloff islands. The Rainbow was deputed for that service and she was steaming for these waters when the war broke out. She was brought back into naval service, and served during the war. In 1920 she was sold for $67,000 to some commercial firm, by whom she is still being used as a freighter. We had no ships to take the place of the Niobe and the Rainbow until the British government, after the war presented to Canada three ships, the Aurora, the Patricia, and the Patriot, and two submarines. The records of the British House of Commons disclose that a question was asked in the House as to whether Canada undertook to maintain these ships in commission when they were accepted, and the answer was, in substance, that there was no agreement except that implied by the acceptance of the ships. I think we are all agreed, notwithstanding any criticism that has been made, that Canada must maintain something of a naval service. We started such a service in 1910. It has passed through various vicissitudes, and I think the opinion now generally expressed as to what Canada must do in the matter of naval service is primarily to protect her own coasts and harbours, and her fisheries. We showed during the war, although we had no navy, that Canada was ready to do her part just as well as any other portion of the overseas dominions, or as thoroughly as the Motherland herself or any of her allies, so there can be no question of the willingness and anxiety of the Canadian people to do their duty as a young nation in the making. What has been done in the past will be continued, I believe, in the future.

We are in this position in regard to the question of a navy. Every country in the world to-day is endeavouring to reduce its armament. At the great conference in Washington recently, where we were represented, the great nations of the world agreed not only to take a holiday in naval construction, but to scrap many of their fighting ships. All over the world to-day people are anxious to reduce as far as possible, within the limits of safety, and without any sacrifice of national dignity the expenditure on fighting machines and fighting material. Let me quote just a few sentences from the report made by our own representative at the Washington Conference, Sir Robert Borden, to show what the trend of public opinion is on this question. On page 17 of that report, in sessional paper No. 47, we find the proposals that were made for the reduction of naval armaments:

(1) That all capital-shipbuilding programmes, either actual or projected, should be abandoned;
(2) That further reduction should be made through the scrapping of certain of the older ships;
(3) That in general regard should be had to the existing naval strength of the Powers concerned;
(4) That the capital ship tonnage should be used as the measurement of strength for navies and a proportionate allowance of auxiliary combatant craft prescribed.

I also want to read from page 80 of this report to show the trend of public opinion as represented by the great minds of the great powers of the world, and to make it clear that the trend is towards a reduction in expenditure on armaments, without any sacrifice of national dignity and consistent with considerations of safety. Referring to the great powers the report says:

5 p.m.

The treaty provides that all other capital ships of these Powers, either built or building are to be scrapped or disposed of as provided in the treaty.

It is provided that the present building programmes are to be abandoned and that there is to be no building of capital ships hereafter, except in replacement and as the treaty provides.

Let me pause for a moment to make a comparison with the proposal which was made on November 12 on behalf of the American Government in respect to capital ships.

That proposal set forth that 18 ships were to be retained by the United States, with a tonnage of 500,650 tons. In this treaty the same ships are to be retained.

In that proposal there were set forth 22 capital ships to be retained by the British Empire. Under this treaty the same number of ships is to be retained; in fact, the same ships, with the single substitution of the Thunderer for the Erin, with a tonnage of 580,450 tons, as against the calculation in the proposal of 604,450 tons for ships retained.

In the case of Japan, the proposal set forth 10 ships to be retained. By the treaty, the same number of ships is to be retained, the difference being that the Mutsu is to be retained and the Settsu is to be scrapped. The tonnage retained by Japan, as indicated in the proposal, was 299,700. The tonnage retained under the treaty is 301,320. The effect of the retention of the Mutsu, a ship just completed, on the part of Japan, was to make necessary certain changes for which the treaty provides.

Mr. LEWIS: The minister referred to the number of ships permitted to the British Empire. Would that include Canada?

Mr. GRAHAM: It would include, I think, all the overseas dominions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Have we a capital ship?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think we have.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then how can it include Canada?

Mr. GRAHAM: I said, the overseas dominions, and if Canada had a capital ship it would affect us.

Mr. LEWIS: We would benefit, of course, from having these 26 capital ships in the service of the Empire. Is Canada paying towards the upkeep of those ships? Is it because all nations in the world are moving to reduce their expenditure on armaments, as the minister has just read, that he is reducing this item to $1,000,000? Or did that apply to Canada, which practically, to all intents and purposes has no navy?

Mr. GRAHAM: It applies to Canada, being one of the overseas dominions. As I pointed out, Canada has no capital ships. She does not contribute to the upkeep of the British Navy. No man in the world, I think, would agree more heartily than myself to the proposition that the British Navy is essential to the peace of the world. The British Navy not only saved Canada but saved our friends on the other side of the line, and it is a question of policy whether there should be a contribution, or that each portion of the British Empire should do its own part. Canada at the present time has taken the ground that we, as a young country, growing up, having our own service,—the British government having handed over to us the naval service, which we undertook, and the management of our militia,—should proceed along that line. It may be in the years to come that Canada will have to develop, perhaps, a larger naval service than she has or has had, but one that will maintain the principle of Canada, within the Empire, being a nation that, so far as possible, looks after her domestic affairs. However in the times of stress and war, the British Navy is the safety of the world.

Mr. SHAW: I should like to know from the minister if under the Washington Agreement, it is possible for Canada to have a capital ship until the expiration of that agreement which will occur, I think, in 1940.

Mr. GRAHAM: I would rather think not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Unless it were in reduction of Great Britain's capital ships.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We could look after one of her ships.

Mr. SHAW: We could not in Canada, if we are bound by the terms of the Washington Agreement, build one capital ship until 1940, unless we did it through England.

Mr. GRAHAM: I imagine, as part of the British Empire we could have one transferred.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No difficulty about that.

Mr. GRAHAM: But I am not absolutely sure that we will.

Mr. LEWIS: One reason that I asked the question was that I noticed a statement in the paper by Lord Lee a little while ago that he was just a little disappointed that the whole burden of the 26 capital ships was going to fall on the taxpayers of Great Britain, who were already overtaxed. But, morally, I think we are responsible, because we are receiving protection, and if the members on the other side of the House, and we on this side of the House, are always saying that, as far as we are concerned, we are a nation, and that we want to stand on our own feet, I think we ought to help pay for the protection we receive.

Mr. GRAHAM: If we started discussing that question, it would take us pretty far afield, because that is a pretty large policy, It has been said that certain things did take place at the conference of premiers. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The resolution is on the table of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am inclined to think what is on the Table of the House is not everything.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is everything:

Mr. GRAHAM: It is everything that is on the Table of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is everything, in so far as Canada's engagements go.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not going to be led astray. Some day we may discuss that matter. I have a lot of documents in my desk relating to it. I was just reading part of the report of Sir Robert Borden of what took place at the conference at Washington, merely to point out to the House and to the country the trend of the public mind. I find the following in this report:

"The United States proposes, if the plan is accepted—

"(1) To scrap all capital ships now under construction. This includes 6 battle-cruisers and 7 battleships on the ways and in course of building, and 2 battleships launched.

"The total number of new capital ships thus to be scrapped is 15. The total tonnage of the new capital ships when completed would be 618,000 tons.

(2) To scrap all of the older battleships up to, but not including, the Delaware and North Dakota. The number of these old battleships to be scrapped is 15. Their total tonnage is 227,740 tons.

"Thus the number of capital ships to be scrapped by the United States, if this plan is accepted, is 30, with an aggregate tonnage (including that of ships in construction, if completed) of 845,740 tons."

Under this arrangement as made, instead of the 15 ships under construction being scrapped, there are 13 of those ships scrapped or disposed of, and the total number of ships to be scrapped or disposed of instead of 30 is 28. The tonnage is substantially the same—a very slight difference.

In the case of Great Britain the proposal was this:

"The plan contemplates that Great Britain and Japan shall take action which is fairly commensurate with this action on the part of the United States.

"It is proposed that Great Britain—

"(1) Shall stop further construction of the 4 new Hoods, the new capital ships not laid down but upon which money has been spent. These 4 ships, if completed, would have tonnage displacement of 172,000 tons.

"(2) Shall, in addition, scrap her predreadnaughts, second line battleships, and first line battleships up to, but not including, the King George V class.

"These, with certain predreadnaughts which it is understood have already been scrapped, would amount to 19 capital ships and a tonnage reduction of 411,375 tons.

"The total tonnage of ships thus to be scrapped by Great Britain (including the tonnage of the 4 Hoods, if completed) would be 583,375 tons."

Now, the fact is that under that the present treaty, Great Britain, as stated in the first paragraph I have just read, has stopped the further construction, has abandoned the construction of the four new Hoods which are mentioned. Great Britain is permitted under the treaty to have two new ships, but these are not ships of the size contemplated in the case of the four Hoods, which was in the neighbourhood of 48,000 or 49,000 tons, and, as I have said, there are four ships to be scrapped when these two new ships are completed.

And the provision for the scrapping of the three dreadnaughts, second-line battleships, and first-line battleships, is substantially unaffected, the fact being that there will be, I think, under the treaty 20 ships scrapped instead of the 19 that were mentioned in the proposal.

Now, I read that quotation from Sir Robert's report just to show the trend of the world's thought. We do not expect war. We hope we will not have it for many years. We hope we will never have it in our time, and the action of the great nations in uniting to take a holiday in the work of armaments points in that direction. Nevertheless, if there never is to be any war, we have certain duties to perform, and, having accepted the mantle of nationhood, in a measure at least, we must assume part of the responsibility. The responsibility we undertook with the Mother Country was to have a naval service of some kind. At the present time, as I said before, the Dominion of Canada has five ships. When the Government came into office I discussed the question of the naval service a great deal with the officials of the department. The Aurora is a small cruiser. There are two destroyers and two submarines. These make up the fleet. I had in my mind, as I have at the present time, and will disclose it to the House in a few minutes, the idea that other naval plans could be outlined and carried into operation, which would be far more effective in the way of placing Canada in a position to have an effective service than the training that can take place on these five ships. I suggested to the officers that we could divide these ships, send one or two of them to the Pacific coast and keep one of them on the Atlantic coast. I had an idea that the Aurora could be used on the Atlantic, and this shows my absolute unacquaintance with the naval service and what a navy is supposed to do. I had the idea that we could take two destroyers to the Pacific coast, and keep the Aurora on the Atlantic, and continue our training, and possibly train on the Pacific coast as well, and perhaps perform our obligations in reference to the protection of the seal fisheries at Behring sea with the use of the destroyers. This, the officer told me, was absolutely out of the question; if we separated those ships and sent two of the destroyers to the Pacific coast, those destroyers would not do at all for the purposes of training by themselves and would be wholly unsuitable for the pelagic sealing protection. He also informed me that the Aurora, by itself, would not supply the training that was expected to be had by the young men in the navy. I then gave up my idea of using those ships for that purpose. We discussed the question of maintaining, say two of them on the Atlantic coast. This presented obstacles in the way of cost for the benefit received; and as a final solution of the matter, I asked the officers of the department to prepare me a scheme which could at once give training to the men both on land and on sea, that would be more in keeping with the protection of our coasts than it would be in harmony with high-sea fighting, because the fleet as now constituted is for action on the sea, and not for the protection of our harbours and coasts, as we understand that protection.

The policy outlined by the technical officer, Captain Hose, the committee will find under the Naval Service Act, chapter 43, of the statutes of 1910, which provides for a naval service, as follows:

The Naval Reserve Force shall consist of such persons as join the said reserve after naval service or after undergoing such training as may be prescribed. All members of the said reserve shall be liable to active service upon an emergency.

The Governor in Council may make regulations for the government of the Naval Reserve Forces.

In time of war no officer or seaman in the Naval Reserve Force shall be required to serve continuously for a longer period than one year; but any officer or seaman who volunteers to serve for the war or any longer period than one year, may be compelled to fulfil his engagement. Provided, however, that the Governor in Council may, in case of unavoidable necessity (of which necessity the Governor in Council shall be the sole judge), call upon any officer or seaman to continue to serve beyond his one year's service for any period not exceeding six months, and for such further service he shall not be entitled to any increased rate of pay, unless, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, the circumstances of the case and the conduct of the person concerned merits it.

That is one kind of force. Then there is another which provides for a volunteer force, and I want to submit to the judgment of members of the House that, in the Dominion of Canada as we are now situated, a better service on our own behalf, a better service for the Empire at large, will be obtained and can be retained by using the voluntary effort of our young men better than by having a great permanent force. The act of 1910 provides for this. It reads:

The Governor in Council may organize and maintain a force to be called the Naval Volunteer Force.

The Naval Volunteer Force shall consist of officers and seamen raised by voluntary engagement from among seafaring men and others who may be deemed suitable for the service in which such volunteers are to be employed.

The Governor in Council may make regulations for the government of the Naval Volunteer Force.

Every naval volunteer shall be engaged for the term of three years and, provided his conduct and qualifications are satisfactory, shall be eligible for re-engagement for further periods of three years up to the age of forty-five years; at the expiration of each term he shall be entitled to his discharge, save as hereinafter mentioned.

Naval volunteers shall receive such training and capitation or other remuneration as may be prescribed.

In an emergency the Governor in Council may order and direct that the Naval Volunteer Force, or such part thereof as may be deemed necessary, shall be called into active service, and the naval volunteers so called out shall be liable to serve under such regulations as may be prescribed.

If a naval volunteer's period of service expires while he is employed on active service, he shall be liable to serve for a further period of not more than six months, and for such further service he shall not be entitled to any increased remuneration, unless, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, the circumstances of the case and the conduct of the person concerned merits it.

In short, the proposal that I have to lay before the House, and for which estimates are asked, is that we discontinue in commission the ships that we now have; that we continue the protection and care of the wharves and docks at Halifax and Esquimalt; that we provide a reserve force composed of officers and men, officers who are now in the navy—the number of them altogether, I think, will be 233, if I remember correctly—that we create on the Pacific coast at Esquimalt an establishment with one small ship and two trawlers of about 450 tons; that we establish there a portion of our naval force for training in the protection of our shores, protection of our harbours, mine-sweeping, mine-laying; that at Halifax in the east we have the same services. I may say that we have the boats that we can use for this service economically. We have in contemplation the selling of one small boat that we have and the purchase of another which, if it can be secured at the same price as the other one is being sold at, will make an ideal ship for the Pacific coast, and Captain Hose tells me that it is just the ideal craft for patrolling the seal fisheries. We have not such a craft in the present group of ships. With these three at Halifax and these three at Esquimalt, we shall have, in those two services alone, ships, boats and crews that will give first-class training to young volunteers. In addition to these ships, it must be remembered that the second line of defence, if one might call it so, the great reserve in the Dominion of Canada, is our merchant marine. I do not mean altogether by that the merchant marine owned by the Government; but it includes all our wonderful merchant ships which during the late war performed such great services, a service second only to that of the great warships and, perhaps, in many cases not second.

Then we have the Fisheries Protection service, containing quite a number of smaller ships. We hope in time, if the scheme goes through and is successful, as I predict it will be, that we shall find an outlet for our young men whom we train in those ships in our own boats in the Fisheries Protection service. Further than that, as long as the Government continues to operate the merchant marine, I believe that will furnish an outlet for the young men so trained. This means that, under this estimate, in another year—it will take most of this year to get organized—some 1,500 men can be trained during the year on land and on sea for two or three weeks. These young men will not go to Halifax or Esquimalt at the same time; they will go at different times and receive their instruction, so that the officers will be kept busy most of the year. This will have one benefit, namely, that it will not take a single man out of industrial employment in this country. In a permanent force he is out of industrial employment and is a consumer and not a producer; but by this method the young men will get training on land and sea for two or three weeks per year over a period of three years just as the militia get training now for several weeks during each year. They will be given the rudiments the first year; the next year they will receive training in mine-laying and mine-sweeping; they will be taken out for a short cruise in the ocean and back again. This will have the effect of instilling into the minds of our young men that they can take a part in this work and train for naval service without leaving their own employment. They will be absent for only a few days.

It strikes me that another feature of this will be that, as part of the course, the regulation will require that these young men take a drill wherever they reside, of an hour a day for some few days in the year, at no cost to the country except, perhaps, that of an instructor from the department. This will not involve the expense, proportionately, that our military training has involved, for the simple reason that we have in all centres of the Dominion now armouries where this department, organized with the National Defence Department, will provide the quarters for the young men who wish to train, without the expense to the naval service. Newfoundland has a force of this kind; so has South Africa; and I believe that in preparing the young men in the way I have outlined, forming a volunteer force, we shall instil a better spirit into them because they will feel that they are doing the thing because they want to do it. I believe that in the years to come it will be shown that in taking this step we have begun at the right end of the problem. To my mind the problem of having anything like a naval service is not solved by getting one or two ships, and having a permanent force on them. The force at present consists principally of men from Great Britain; we have men of our own, of course. But this proposal will bring our own young men more intimately in touch with the naval service and so far as patriotism can be inculcated by that kind of service it will develop that spirit to a greater extent in our youth. I do not want to be prophetic, but should we require, in the years to come, to develop a navy, we shall have on hand in the Dominion young men trained to take positions in that navy. Under this scheme we are retaining four officers from the British Admiralty. The rest, kindly loaned to us, will return to the Royal Navy. The others will be young Canadians. I do not know that I can say anything further. This is the scheme we have in mind for the training of 1,500 men annually for this work and for which we now ask from the committee an appropriation of $1,500,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister's statement is important in this sense, that it touches a subject that is of paramount consequence to our whole country. It has been of great concern for years, and indeed will be so long as we are a country. I do not propose now to go into any detailed criticism of what are described as the proposals of the Government as related to naval service. They require careful examination, particularly at the hands of one who is not familiar with the question from any technical standpoint. I merely give now a statement of my view in a very broad and general way.

I was impressed, as the minister proceeded, with the thought that the Government's plan of defence is admirably adapted to guard our shores with absolute security throughout the days of peace and quiet. So long as there is no danger I am quite sure that this force which the minister proposes will be entirely adequate to meet any assailant. I am thoroughly in accord with the sentiment he uttered when he commenced his address, and I am only sorry that his concrete proposals have not the remotest relationship to that sentiment or to its inevitable consequences. Yes, in time of quiet and serenity the five trawlers will be all right and we shall be quite safe in training our navy in our armories. But in time of emergency and danger, which in my humble judgment, as a layman, is really the time one requires to prepare against, then it is that defence is rather more desirable than in sunshine and calm. In such a time, though, we are to depend upon the British navy and the British taxpayer—I do not know of what value this Government's service is going to be. I wonder if the minister is armed with any statement, from one acquainted with the needs of empire defence, as to the value of this service? If he has such a statement I should be very glad if he would give it to the committee. It occurred to me, as he spoke, that it would be rather serious for us if Great Britain herself prepared for her and our defence in this manner, if she put a few trawlers on the Atlantic to watch the fish, and put a few boys into our armouries as a sort of diversion or pastime. If she took that course what would become of our defence in the hour of crisis and peril? Where would Britain be? Where would we be? No, she does not take that course; that indulgence is reserved for Canada. I am afraid the minister's statement will be received with profound disappointment, if not with poignant humiliation, on the part of this country.

The statement just given makes some comparison of what we are doing, with what South Africa has done. I fear his comparison will not hold good very far. South Africa is a very small country in population and a very young country compared with Canada. He also compared us with Newfoundland. I do not doubt the comparison is likely a very good one in the measure of what we are doing. I have no doubt, too, that possibly Trinidad and maybe Bermuda would be appropriate comparisons; but the minister omitted these two countries.

So far as our freedom of action is concerned, it stands to-day where it has always stood throughout our history. The position taken by this country last summer was embodied in a resolution agreed to unanimously by all the representatives of the nations of this Empire. It was a resolution which obviously expressed the right course, because the measure of imperial defence essential could not be known until the measure of world armaments would be dealt with by the Disarmament conference. The Disarmament conference is over, and now the time for determination of our policy has come. We are free to decide. This is the resolution that was passed:

> That while recognizing the necessity of co-operation among the various portions of the Empire to provide such naval defence as may prove to be essential for security, and while holding that quality with the naval strength of any other power is the minimum standard for that purpose, this conference is of the opinion that the method and expense of such co-operation are matters for the final determination of the several parliaments concerned, and that any recommendations thereon should be deferred until after the coming conference on disarmament.

That was the resolution that was passed.

Mr. SHAW: I should like to know from the right hon. gentleman if that resolution is to be taken as implying a contribution to the Empire by Canada for naval purposes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all; it is to be taken as implying just what it says. Let me read it again:

> That while recognizing the necessity of co-operation among the various portions of the Empire to provide such naval defence as may prove to be essential for security—

[Mr. Meighen.]

The word used is "co-operation." There are many ways of co-operation. The method is left absolutely open.

> —and while holding that equality with the naval strength of any other power is the minimum standard for that purpose, this Conference is of the opinion that the method and expense of such co-operation are matters for the final determination of the several parliaments concerned, and that any recommendations thereon should be deferred until after the coming Conference on Disarmament.

Now, it would be well to proceed with the estimates for the purpose of obtaining any information that may be desired; but I do not think the discussion should be closed to-day. I think perhaps some time next week might be fixed when the discussion of the issue in its general aspect could be continued.

Mr. GRAHAM: We might take the other branches in this department first, such as the Hydrographic.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to ask my right hon. friend one question to clear up a matter of doubt which appears to be in the minds of a good many hon. gentlemen. I assume he has read the London despatch which appeared in the newspapers of the 10th instant of an address delivered by the Right Hon. Lord Lee, First Lord of the Admiralty, who was one of the British delegates to the recent Washington conference, before the Colonial Institute in London on the subject of the Washington conference. The despatch contains the following:

> Lord Lee pointed out that the Imperial conference, after a full, prolonged, and intimate discussion of the naval needs of the Empire, had agreed that the maintenance of an Empire navy was the common concern of the whole Empire, and that the extent and form whereto the burden should be shared should be left until after the Washington conference.

Is my right hon. friend aware of any understanding arrived at at the conference which he attended with respect to any obligation upon Canada in relation to an Empire navy?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am certainly not aware of anything beyond the resolution. That, I presume, is a press statement of what Lord Lee said. Lord Lee was doubtless interpreting for himself the resolution. There was no agreement or understanding of any kind whatever save that embodied in this resolution which has been on the table of this House since the opening of the session.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Was that resolution not passed in the face of proposals similar to those suggested by Lord Lee in the newspaper report? In other words, were there not proposals made by the British representatives at that time for a contribution from the dominions?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would have no difficulty whatever in answering the question if I could do so in honour. The conference published its report, and I am bound to abide by it. Those are the conclusions of the conference. I cannot go behind those conclusions until it is agreed that publicity can be given. The Government is in a position to obtain consent for such publicity, if it yet can be obtained. It has refused to try. Some things are confidential for a time, but do not need to be so for all time, and the seal of confidentiality can be lifted sooner or later. If the Government secure consent to lift that seal, the details of the proceedings at the conference can be known. Until then I abide by the report which is on the table, as I am in honour bound to do.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are we right in assuming that the Canadian government is not obligated in any particular with respect to matters of imperial defence beyond what this Parliament has already approved?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government is not obligated by me save to the extent disclosed in the document now on the table.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I ask the right hon. gentleman the question as one of the representatives of Canada at the Imperial Conference. Is he aware, directly or indirectly, of any obligation resting upon the government of this country as a consequence of the conference which he attended with respect to naval defence other than what has already been approved of by this Parliament?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am aware of none, and there is none arising from that conference other than what appears in this document.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): It might be interesting to get the sequel of the matter we have been discussing with the right non. gentleman, so that we may know the position in which Canada stands at the present time. We find that at the conference which took place last summer in England a conclusion was arrived at by all the representatives there from the various overseas dominions, and was embodied in the resolution which the right hon. gentleman has read, and which practically stated that consideration of the question of participation on the part of the overseas dominions in naval defence was to be postponed until after the conference which was to take place at Washington. Sir Robert Borden's report in regard to that matter is interesting. He points out that the conclusions arrived at at Washington do not apply to the navies of the overseas dominions, because these navies were treated as being part of the entire naval defence of the empire, and he instances the fact that the cruiser Australia, one of the largest vessels of the Australian navy, which played such a prominent part in the war, is to be scrapped. He goes on to say:

> While the provisions of the Treaty limit the total naval power which the British Empire as a whole is permitted to maintain, they leave entirely untouched the question of co-operation in the maintenance of that power. This question stands exactly where it stood before the Conference, for the decision of the Parliaments of the Empire. The subject of Imperial co-operation was not discussed at Washington, either in the British Empire delegation or elsewhere; it was unnecessary to consider it for the purposes of the conference, nor were the delegates authorized to discuss it.

The point I want to make is that, as a result of the Disarmament Conference at Washington, when conclusions were arrived at as indicated by the minister in discussing this question, that the time had arrived for a naval holiday by dismantling a good many ships in commission and stopping construction of others already laid down, participation of the overseas dominions in any scheme of imperial defence was left entirely untouched. It must therefore form the subject, if it is to be considered again, for the next Imperial Conference. That seems to be the sequel of the situation following what the right hon. gentleman read as the conclusion of the Imperial Conference last summer.

One cannot help remarking in connection with this matter that the statements made by Lord Balfour and by the American authorities, and the conclusions arrived at there, showed that the opinions of the leading statesmen of the world on this subject is that the time has arrived when there must be a suspension of the abnormal expenditures which have been made for naval defence, and that that suspension is to continue until 1936. I do submit that this country, in view of our financial position and the onerous burdens we are carrying, must face the situation in the light of the experience which these men have gained and which is embodied in the conclusions they have arrived at.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If I caught correctly what the hon. member said, I take no exception at all to the terms of the extract he read from the report. I would presume it was quite right that the Empire delegation at the Disarmament Conference was in no way entrusted with the power of decision in anything that related to co-operation among the dominions of the Empire in the matter of naval defence, and therefore I am in thorough accord with him. I think perhaps I have as good a right as any member of this House to express the fullest sympathy, indeed, enthusiasm, with all the purposes of the Disarmament Conference. That that conference did make it possible for the heavily burdened nations of the world to reduce their naval armaments is a matter for the sincere congratulation of all humanity. It is no doubt that it did take a very long and a very practical step to that end. As to what may be the residuum of necessary defence for this Empire, after all that is done, and as to what, the residuum fixed, may be our share therein, is another question. I venture to suggest that he would be a remarkable Canadian who would find our share taken care of in an honourable way by the estimates presented now, and by the proposals of the minister.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The right hon. gentleman may be enthusiastic with regard to the result of the conference at Washington, but he knows very well that the conclusions of the Imperial Conference were that this whole subject should be postponed until after the conference on disarmament at Washington had taken place, and that the question as to what participation there should be on a permanent basis should form the subject of another imperial conference. In the meanwhile, why should we not have a naval holiday, the same as every other country?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Until another imperial conference?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But I did not understand the minister to say he was deferring the final pronouncement of his policy until there was another imperial conference.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Nor did I say so, either.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought we were getting the policy now. The naval holiday that the hon. member wants for Canada is only to last until the next imperial conference; is that what I understand him to say?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): No; my right hon. friend is at his old trick of quibbling and hair-splitting. The point I am making is this: the effect of the resolution adopted by the conference which my right hon. friend attended last summer, and agreed to by all the delegates, was that the question of the participation of the overseas dominions in the naval defence of the Empire should be postponed for consideration until after the holding of the conference in Washington. That was expressly set forth in the resolution which my right hon. friend has read. Now, the conference at Washington has taken place; conclusions of a general character have been arrived at, and the absolute inference, having regard to the manner in which the question was dealt with by the Imperial Conference last year, is that its consideration is to be postponed until another imperial conference is held.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, if I was hair-splitting and quibbling I was only repeating the position which the hon. member himself had taken and which he has now repeated. That is what I understood him to say before. The resolution that was passed did not postpone the determination of the part to be taken in imperial defence by any dominion until the next imperial conference. It says:

> That, while recognizing the necessity of co-operation among the various portions of the Empire to provide such naval defence as may prove to be essential for security, and while holding that equality with the naval strength of any other power is a minimum standard for that purpose, this conference is of opinion that the method and expense of such co-operation are matters for the final determination of the several parliaments concerned, and that any recommendations thereon should be deferred until after the coming conference on disarmament.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Who are going to make the recommendations?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The recommendations referred to there would doubtless be recommendations by another imperial conference if it chose to make any, but it does not say by any means that nothing should be done pending another imperial conference. If this Government is saying that it is waiting for recommendations from another imperial conference, then perhaps my hon. friend's words would have some application. Does the hon. member say that they are waiting, before making a declaration of policy, for the findings or recommendations of the next imperial conference? The hon. member, when I suggested that, resented it with some heat.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): That is what the Imperial Conference wanted the overseas dominions to do—to wait until another conference was held.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all; this resolution means just what it says. But, I say, if the Government were to state—which it does not—that it is waiting before coming to its conclusion for another conference, possibly the comments of the hon. member would have some relevance. But the Government does not say so; the hon. member himself affirms that the Government does not say so and that he does not say so. The Government has come down with its policy, as it had a right to do; it was not in any way bound to wait by the terms of the resolution of last summer. It has come down with its policy, and that policy is now before us for our consideration.

Mr. IRVINE: May I ask the right hon. gentleman what these recommendations which he has read refer to?

Mr. MEIGHEN: To the method of co-operation with the other dominions and with Great Britain as to naval defence.

Mr. IRVINE: Do they not also imply the expense on the part of each nation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What imply the expense?

Mr. IRVINE: The recommendations. The right hon. gentleman has, in his resolution, mentioned the expenditure and the method.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The recommendations can cover anything that another conference decides to recommend upon.

Mr. GOOD: I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether in his opinion this Government is under any obligation to advise a policy prior to any recommendations which may come from a subsequent imperial conference? It seems to me a rather strange thing that the Government should attempt to lay down a policy prior to the holding of another conference. Does the right hon. gentleman think the Government would be wise or justified in taking such a step at the present time?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the question arises, because the Government has taken the step. The minister has made no reference whatever to waiting for another conference; he has announced his policy, such as it is.

Mr. SHAW: I am very glad to hear the leader of the Opposition say that the resolution to which he has referred does not involve this country in any obligation, and I accept his statement in that connection so far as contribution is concerned. But I am frank to say that while I have been able to read only the summary of the speeches of the premiers of New Zealand and Australia, they seem to bear a somewhat different construction. I think, Mr. Chairman, that we should have an opportunity to discuss this matter very fully in order that we may determine exactly our position and exactly what our obligation may be in the future.

Mr. GRAHAM: My suggestion is that the item for the naval service proper be allowed to stand until next week, so that hon. gentlemen may have an opportunity to get ready for a discussion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Could we fix Thursday?

Mr. GRAHAM: I suggest that my right hon. friend consult the Prime Minister as to that. But the proposal is one of some magnitude; it reaches further, possibly, than our own shores and we ought to fix a day for its discussion.

Item stands.

Civil Government—naval service—salaries and contingencies, $255,220.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is more than last year.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is an increase of $5,000, but we had to provide for statutory increases amounting to $8,000, so it is really a little less than last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: With a "five-trawler" policy, one would think it would be a good deal less.

Mr. GRAHAM: A five-trawler policy would not be very effective for the purposes of the nation. This item includes radio-telegraph, hydrographic services, and so on.

Item agreed to.

Hydrographic Survey and to provide for the maintenance and repairs of Hydrographic steamers, $350,000.

Mr. GOOD: The minister explained that the work involved here was a survey of the coast. Is this survey never to be completed? If it is not completed now, how long before it will be completed?

Mr. GRAHAM: This survey will be continued for a long time. As my hon. friend here says, like the brook it goes on forever. Changes, of course, are taking place all the time, and the survey will probably continue as long as my friend and I last, at all events, as long as I last.

Mr MEIGHEN: There is an increase of $35,000 this year. This is a very large item, and I do not think the increase is really necessary. It is not necessary to push the item through before six o'clock.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the Chair and the House took recess.

THE CANADIAN TRANSIT COMPANY

The House in committee on Bill No. 52, respecting the Canadian Transit Company—Mr. Rankin—Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Mr. McBRIDE: I should like to say a few words in connection with this bill. I do not want the committee to think I am criticising their work in any way, but I think this bill passed the committee in somewhat of a hurry, as the committee was in session only about twenty minutes. This company, which goes under the name of the Canadian Transit Company, wants to change its offices from Windsor, Canada, to the American side, and I think we should look into this bill a little more carefully before we pass it. We must stand up for the good name of Canada, and if any company comes over here in order to get prestige from the name of Canada, I think Canada ought to be good enough for it and to keep, its headquarters in. Not only do the directors of the company want their headquarters transferred to the other side; but they want to sell bonds in Canada and when they do so, they want to have the right to mortgage the property. I know, on a number of occasions when this sort of thing was carried out in British Columbia, bonds were sold up to pretty nearly the limit of what the company intended to do. They sold the bonds to people who did not expect that there would be anything crooked about the matter. They sold the bonds to men working for $30 a month. I know men working for that amount who invested over $2,000 in such a company. They then mortgaged the property and allowed the mortgage to lapse, so that the people lost everything they had. I do not think this bill should be passed as it is. I do not think it has had the consideration that this House should give it nor that the Railway Committee should have given it. We have the good name of Canada at stake in this matter, and I think this bill should be referred back.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would suggest that, as the sponsor of the bill is not present, it might stand, unless the hon. member wishes to make a motion.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee has no power to refer back. That is the power of the House only.

Mr FIELDING: I think the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) that, as the sponsor of the bill is absent, the hon member will, perhaps, be content to let the matter stand for the present. My disposition in a case like this is to accept the judgment of the committee; but as neither the sponsor nor anyone from the committee is present to support the bill, I would not like to join in passing it to-night. I would concur in the view that it be laid aside for the present.

SUPPLY

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair:

NAVAL SERVICE

Hydrographic Survey, and to provide for the maintenance and repairs of hydrographic steamers, $350,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: At six o'clock the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) called my attention to the fact that there was an increase of $35,000. This increase over last year's estimate is accounted for in part by the steadily increasing number of new charts and new additions to old charts that require to be published each year, and in part by statutory salary increases. In addition the sums provided for the operation of ships' parties on the Atlantic coast and on the lower St. Lawrence for the last two years were not sufficient to maintain these parties at work during the whole season, and consequently operations had to be curtailed. It is much more ecomomical to continue operations, once they have been started, as long as possible, and it is proposed that a sufficient sum should be provided this year to enable the parties to remain in the field until weather conditions compel them to return.

Item agreed to.

Fisheries Protection Service and to provide for the repairs and maintenance of the Fishery Protection steamers, $345,500.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understood from the minister that the fisheries protection service was included in the first vote, No. 214. I knew it was not, but there must be some explanation of what is included in that vote related to the fisheries service as distinguished from this vote.

Mr. GRAHAM: I explained that I was giving the list of services performed under the Naval Service Department, but which had no connection with the naval service vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understood those trawlers were to protect the fish.

Mr. GRAHAM: Those trawlers I said were practising coast defence. I did not make any reference to their being used for fisheries protection. I did say it was hoped that we would be able to supply men for the fisheries protection boats at the time they would be part of our reserve force.

Mr. MARTELL: What progress has been made towards handing back the patrol boats in connection with the fisheries protection service to the Department of Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. GRAHAM: The deputies of the two departments are working out a scheme for the transfer of more than one of these branches to the Department of Marine and Fisheries in case our plan for reorganization goes through.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does the minister intend that all the various services covered by items 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220 and 221 shall now go under the jurisdiction of the new Department of Defence, or will they be left with the Department of Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is the matter I was speaking about. The deputies of the two departments are working out a plan, if it can be worked out, for the transfer. Under that plan will go a portion of the staff, the estimates for which I put through this afternoon. We are trying to make a division of the staff as well as of the service. My own idea is that the Department of Defence should have nothing in it except that which pertains to defence.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The hydrographic survey I assume pertains to defence as much as to fisheries, and the fisheries protection service belongs as much to defence as anything else. Where would the minister put the radiotelegraph service?

Mr. GRAHAM: We have in the Department of Militia and Defence a small radio service, but that service proper is in the Department of Naval Defence, and no definite conclusion has been arrived at in regard to it. My own idea is that that should go with the Marine and Fisheries Department as well, for we will still have in the Department of National Defence a small radio service sufficient to carry on our work in connection with flying operation and the naval service.

Mr. MARTELL: Is Captain Barkhouse under the control of the Naval Service or of the Marine and Fisheries Department?

Mr. GRAHAM: The Naval Service.

Mr. MARTELL: I suppose in the event of the transfer of the fisheries protection service to the Marine and Fisheries Department, he also will be transferred to that department?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. MARTELL: I should like to bespeak the minister's favourable consideration for Captain Barkhouse. He has been in the service for a great number of years. My experience with the department, and I think it will be borne out by every official there, is that Captain Barkhouse is probably the ablest man in the employ of the Marine and Fisheries Department on the Nova Scotia coast as regards the fisheries protection service, and I believe the minister would be well advised when the transfer is made and a commodore, or some such officer, of that service is appointed, to promote Captain Barkhouse to the position on account of his long experience, thorough training and outstanding ability. I do not think there is a better man in Canada for that position. In a word, he is a fine type of Nova Scotia seaman and an excellent official.

Mr. GRAHAM: Everything my hon. friend has said about Captain Barkhouse is true, so my officials tell me, and I shall call the attention of the Minister of Marine to my hon. friend's recommendation.

Mr. STEVENS: I understood the minister to say that the Fisheries Department was to be put back under the Marine Department.

[Mr. Cuthrie.]

Mr. GRAHAM: I was talking of the fisheries protection service. The Fisheries Department is in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, but the fisheries protection service has been taken charge of under the Naval Service since its inception. Whatever complaints there may be about the fisheries protection service come naturally to the Fisheries Department and have to be transferred to the Naval Department. This roundabout course involves delay and is condemned both by the deputy and correspondents. In view of that it seems to me it would be better if the fisheries protection service were put under the Fisheries Department.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not know whether this would be the correct time or not for me to refer to something in connection with the fisheries on the Pacific coast. Perhaps it should be held over until the Fisheries estimates are before us.

Mr. GRAHAM: If it belongs to the Fisheries Department, the minister is not here.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister will at once advise me if I should hold this over. During the latter years of the war the fees in connection with the salmon fisheries on the Pacific coast were very drastically increased, a step which, I think, was quite correct; but with the conclusion of the war certain cheap classes of fish became unsaleable, and the canners found themselves still saddled with these abnormally high fees, although the earnings from their product had dropped off very substantially. I believe that last year the minister was considering the reduction of these fees. I intend to briefly discuss that point, and the minister will at once advise me whether or not he is in control of the fees under these estimates.

Mr. GRAHAM: That comes under the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How many vessels are engaged in the fisheries protection service?

Mr. GRAHAM: There are six.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Are these armed vessels, and are the crews enlisted under the Naval Service Act?

Mr. GRAHAM: Two on the Atlantic are armed, and one on the Pacific, but those on the Great Lakes are not. I am informed that the crews are not enlisted men.

Item agreed to.

Radiotelegraph service, and to provide for the building and maintenance of wireless stations and the general administration of radiotelegraphy throughout the Dominion, $440,400.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How much of the vote of last year was spent?

Mr. GRAHAM: $436,741.75.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Have we any stations in the interior part of Canada—I know we have them on the seaboards—which could be used in case of interruption of telegraphic service? I understand there was a proposal to establish some stations in Ontario and some in the midwest, as well as one on the eastern side of the Rockies. Has any advance been made in that direction?

Mr. GRAHAM: The Marconi Company have the right under their contract to establish cross-country stations. They are now building one at Montreal.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is that the first one?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Where are the stations located on the Pacific coast?

Mr. GRAHAM: Prince Rupert, Dead Tree Point, Alert Bay, Bull harbour, Estevan, Cape Lazo, Vancouver and Victoria.

Mr. STEVENS: Has the department in contemplation the extension of this service on the Pacific coast—for instance, to connect the coast service with the Yukon?

Mr. GRAHAM: It has not been considered as yet. Eventually it will have to be done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suggest that the Government consider the question of cost. The cost of maintaining the telegraphic land line to the Yukon is, I always did think, prodigious. I remember bringing the matter up more than once and asking the officials to go thoroughly into it with the view of determining the possibility of establishing wireless stations. The cost of upkeep would surely be infinitely less than the cost of the upkeep of a land line.

Mr. GRAHAM: The department has discussed that with the Public Works Department on more than one occasion. I think they have a scheme practically worked out, but it has never been consummated. I agree with my right hon. friend that it would be cheaper to maintain a radio service than to meet the annual cost of repairs and upkeep of the telegraph line.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I may say for the benefit of the minister that the strongest pressure will have to be brought to bear upon the officials of the Public Works Department. They have had it under consideration—and I kept prodding their consideration—for a long while, and that under a live minister. The minister will have to keep very busy indeed if he is going to get any results there.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): In connection with the suggestion that the radio be substituted for the present land line to the Yukon, known as the Yukon telegraph line, I think myself that the Government might very well seriously consider such a proposal, but not with the view of altogether scrapping or abandoning the Yukon line, because in the Yukon territory its operation and maintenance is economical. That part of it is not subject to the heavy storms or weight of snow with which the part of the line in northern British Columbia has to contend. An examination of the accounts and expenses of upkeep will show that fully eighty-five per cent of the cost occurs south of the Yukon boundary in northern British Columbia. I think it would be altogether in the interests of economy if that Yukon telegraph line could be disconnected from its southern connection at, say, the new mining camp of Atlin in British Columbia, or at White Horse in the Yukon Territory. The line from there south to the National Transcontinental is practically of no use except as a connecting link, and on that portion of the line the greatest part of the expense occurs. There is practically no revenue from it. The stations are isolated; supplies for upkeep of service and maintenance of operators have to be carried over hundreds of miles on pack-horses, with consequent high cost for both maintenance and repairs. Double shifts have to be maintained at these stations, they are so isolated; it is not safe to have only one man, as is done in the Yukon. Now, from the National Transcontinental west to Prince Rupert that government telegraph line is duplicated by the National Railway telegraph line. There is no need whatever for two lines from that point of contact west to Prince Rupert. If the Government would establish one radio station either at the mining town of Atlin, British Columbia, or at the mining town of White Horse in southern Yukon, they could cut out all that expensive stretch of land line. The sooner this is done, the sooner they will commence to save money and bring about greater efficiency. For weeks at a time nearly every winter that line is down; the people of the north country are cut off from communication, and are obliged to send their messages by radio or by cable around to Alaska and Seattle. I would very much regret the taking of any step which would remove the telegraph line within the Yukon territory, connecting, as it does, points along the trail and along the river, affording means of communication for steamboats in trouble along the river, and providing communication between the mining camps. I may say that I am negotiating with the Public Works Department in an endeavour to have them extend that line within the Yukon Territory for a distance of some 75 miles from the main Yukon telegraph line to Mayo. More business goes over that section than over any other part of the line, and leaving out of consideration the expense of maintaining the line through British Columbia, that section is a paying unit, and the proposed Mayo branch would undoubtedly pay and handle a great volume of business. The Mayo branch would undoubtedly pay and handle a great volume of business. I therefore wish to support the remarks that have been made in favour of establishing a radial station in northern British Columbia or southern Yukon, which would make unnecessary that very expensive telegraph line to the south connecting with Prince Rupert.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Minister of Public Works has heard the remarks of my hon. friend, and I hope he will be successful in getting that line fixed up in the Yukon.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to add this observation to what the hon. member for the Yukon has said. On the Coast we have a series of wireless stations which are rendering a most valuable service in many ways, not only commercial but the usual service rendered by such points of communication on a coast. They form as it were, a link with the north which could very easily be extended into the Yukon, and that is a point that I think the Minister of Public Works, as well as the minister having this service in charge, should bear in mind. I note in the estimates that for the Yukon service from Ashcroft to Dawson the sum of $279,000 is set aside. I think a very substantial reduction could be made in that expenditure and the saving transferred to the item now under consideration.

[Mr. Black.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: To me $279,000 seems an enormous amount for the maintenance of that line from Ashcroft to Dawson. It represents the interest on five or six million dollars. I believe I am within the mark when I say you could establish a radio system throughout the whole Yukon for $2,500,000, or not more than $3,000,000 at the outside, and give the people there and the people of Canada a better service. I believe this item could be cut in two.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This matter is under consideration by the Department of Public Works at the present time, and I hope we shall be able to proceed more rapidly with it than apparently was the case under the late administration, despite the fact that the then leader of the Opposition was prodding the Public Works Department.

Item agreed to.

Patrol of the northern waters of Canada, $15,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is really to publish the reports of the Stefansson expedition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister state what is the policy of the Government towards the northern islands, with particular reference to those covered by the Stefansson expedition, laid claim to on behalf of Canada, and to Wrangel island.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is a delicate matter to state the policy of the Government on that question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the Government any policy?

Mr. FIELDING: What we have we hold.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would recommend the Government never to fall away from that principle.

Mr. GRAHAM: Some people have failed to do that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government failed once, but I think if they had the same thing to do over again they would act differently.

Mr. GRAHAM: The old government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, the old government my hon. friend was in. It is well known that there is a dispute as to Wrangel island. The question of the proper attitude of Canada towards that island is doubtless before the Government. This vote has to do with these matters, and I am asking if the Government is in a position to say what its views are with relation to the retention of Wrangel island or the continuance of Canada's claim thereto; and the same words apply to the other islands covered by the expedition.

Mr. GRAHAM: The policy of the Government, as I understand it, is as just expressed by the Minister of Finance—what we have we hold.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, have we Wrangel island?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes, as I understand it, and we propose to retain it.

Mr. FIELDING: We had it in December, and we have not let it go.

Mr. SHAW: I think there is probably, as the leader of the Opposition has said, a great deal more to this matter than appears on the surface. I understand that the United States have published a map in which they show all the lands north of Melville island, I think, as being a country which does not belong to anybody, and which is consequently open for discovery by any nation whose expedition may happen to locate there. I think it is a matter of the utmost importance that we should not lose sight of the fact that the extreme northern part of this country should be preserved to Canada. It may not seem of much importance now, but I have no doubt that in the years to come it will be a matter of very great regret if this or any other government fails to take proper measures to ensure that that country belongs to and is secured and maintained by Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I can only say in addition to what has been said by the hon. member for West Calgary, that this question is being discussed in the United States papers now. Within the last month it has been discussed in the New York Times and the Washington Post, and there is no doubt that certain interested parties in the United States intend to make a claim to Wrangel island as United States territory by right of prior discovery. In my view, from the little inquiry I have made, I am satisfied that that claim is unfounded. There is no right of prior discovery beyond the right of Canada or Great Britain in that respect. However, this matter is going to come to the front in the very near future, and I think it is high time that this Government should take a stand on the matter, and make its stand known to the world. It will be a matter for international discussion very soon unless we are going to forego our claims and let the United States take over the island. Whether the island is of very much practical importance I do not know, but parties in the United States seem to think it is. In fact, one paper says that from one point of view, the mineral wealth of Wrangel island is far greater than that of Alaska. That may be problematical, but it is the basis of the claim which is made by certain interests in the United States.

9 p.m.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Government has had interviews with Mr. Stefansson. I do not know that it is in the public interest to disclose the full nature of those interviews, but I might say that at the present time the Canadian flag is flying on Wrangel island, and there are Canadians on the island, members of a previous expedition of Stefansson's. Mr. Stefansson is about to take a ship up to Wrangel island with some of his men, and has recently had it fitted out with supplies. The Government certainly maintains the position that Wrangel island is part of the property of this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is clear and definite. Of course, the Prime Minister knows that the men that were there were there long before he had been in his present position, and therefore some considerable length of time. I may say as well that there may be claim to this island on behalf of Russia, a claim based very largely on the geographical location of the island. The island of Ellesmere on the west coast of Greenland is also one to which the Government should give some attention. An expedition was about to be launched by a Dane, with, I think, the approval of the Danish government, designed to make some occupational claim in Ellesmere island, and it was anticipated, probably, to base on that occupational claim certain rights of Denmark in the island. I call that matter to the attention of the Government, so that whatever position Canada is in with respect to Ellesmere island will be held, because, in my judgment, Ellesmere island is of greater consequence than Wrangel island.

Mr. BROWN: This is a matter of intense interest to every member of this House. Some subjects are discussed, and those who take part are able to speak in a loud tone. This is a matter of great interest, and yet this whole discussion is conducted in such a tone of voice that it is almost impossible for us to hear anything, and absolutely impossible for those at the far end of the chamber to hear at all.

Item agreed to.

Pay of temporary officers and clerks at Headquarters Halifax and Esquimalt dockyards, $20,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is being omitted in the services as respects temporary clerks, or what services are being reduced to account for the reduction of $20,000?

Mr. GRAHAM: My deputy informs me that it is just as it has been in the Militia Department. The services of the temporary clerks were required during the war, and there has been a natural decrease since. This is the result of the temporary service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That has been going on for some time.

Mr. GRAHAM: Oh, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mostly in the records department?

Mr. GRAHAM: Mostly overseas account.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of war claims—naval service, $956,800.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What are the claims?

Mr. GRAHAM: The items are as follows:

Imperial Government—
Pay and victualling of overseas division from October 1917 to March 31, 1919— £96,500	$470,000
Claim for difference in exchange	268,500
Sundry amounts charged to British Admiralty refunded by them but now considered by the Imperial authorities as expenditure payable by the Canadian government	100,000
Re-conditioning of Imperial drifters and trawlers	90,000
		$928,500
War Service Gratuity & Separation Allowance adjustments		10,000
Medal—
British War—Silver, 4,800 at $1.50	$7,200
Victory—Bronze, 4,100 at 26¾	1,100
		8,300
Vessels in reserve—
Watchmen, etc		10,000
		$956,800

Mr. GUTHRIE: I suppose the committee understands that these war claims that are now being paid under the heading of "adjustment of war claims" were formally carried in the estimates under an item called "Demobilization vote." The name has been changed, but the purpose of the item is just the same. This claim arises out of the late war. There are a number of claims, I fancy, not ready for settlement. I had occasion last year to enter into a controversy and discussion with the Ministry of Shipping in England in regard to their claims against the Dominion of Canada. What I want to know is whether the item now under discussion is one of the items which were taken into account which we adjusted last summer. I may say that after three or four weeks of pretty hard work, in which I had the very able assistance of an accountant from the Militia Department, we succeeded in reducing the claim of the Ministry of Shipping by an amount of $750,000, and we agreed upon a stated amount for the various items that were chargeable against capital, but the account had to do very largely with the question of passage money, and damages to ships while in the Canadian service. It was purely a shipping account, I cannot remember just what the figure of the total account was, but there was one very serious outstanding claim which I refused to settle, and I hope it has not been settled yet. It was in connection with a boat which was submarined, and which was in the hospital service of the Dominion of Canada at the time at which it was submarined. The case had been referred in England to a board of arbitration upon which Canada was not directly represented. The finding of the arbitration board was that Canada must pay the replacement value of the ship, and I think that value was something like $5,000,000. The ship was certainly chartered by Canada, or by the British government and used by Canada at the time of the disaster. The cost of the ship was about half that amount, and, in the first instance, when the Admiralty dealt with losses of that kind, they allowed the cost of the ship, but after a few months' experience, with an allowance of that kind, the same board of arbitration changed the basis of allowance and allowed the cost of reproduction, and, as the cost of construction of vessels had risen enormously in the interval, Canada was let in by the arbitrators finding for an award of something like a million or twelve hundred thousand pounds, but, as Canada was not represented directly on the board—we were nominally represented by some department of the Admiralty—I objected to the payment of that amount, and I assume the amount is still outstanding. My object in mentioning it now is to bring it to the attention of the minister, because I think that is one of the claims that should be very seriously reconsidered before it is allowed. The other claims I dealt with were all shipping claims, and the account with which we were dealing was adjusted after a reduction of $750,000. Does this item involve the matters which were settled by the representatives of the Admiralty and myself and Mr. Garrison of the Militia Department last summer?

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not in this expenditure. I think you will find it in the Militia Department.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There was some uncertainty. The Admirality made a claim against Canada for a million dollars which they said the naval service of Canada owed them, and they requested authority to deduct it from the settlement of accounts, I had no authority to agree to that and I thought perhaps it was this $1,900,000 which we had before us.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Something was said by the minister as to a claim on account of the difference in exchange. It was some $200,000, was it not?

Mr. GRAHAM: It was $268,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How does this arise?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I understood the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) to say that the British government were seriously asking the Canadian government to become responsible for the loss of this hospital ship that was sunk by a German submarine. It seems to me that a claim of that kind would be absolutely absurd, and I join with him in saying to the minister that I hope the minister will never acknowledge any such claim on the part of Great Britain against Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have not acknowledged it, but there is something in the contention that we are liable for something in the matter. When we took over ships as hospital ships, we took them into the service of the Dominion of Canada, and we became responsible for them and for all the wear, tear and damage. The rates got so high that it became impossible to insure these ships. The British government abandoned insuring ships and we did likewise; in fact, I do not know that we ever attempted to insure them. We have, however, paid losses on ships under our control which were sunk by submarines. The point that struck me was that we should not be liable for anything but the actual value of the craft sunk, and that was only 50 per cent of the amount found by the board of arbitration.

Mr. GRAHAM: If my recollection in reading over some of the documents in the department serves me aright, some of the settlements were made through the High Commissioner's office; but the details, to which my hon. friend refers, I imagine, I have in the Militia Department somewhere.

As regards the question asked by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), the British Admiralty sent us drafts on New York instead of on Montreal. We really received more money than we should have received, because we got the benefit of the exchange on the American currency. They are now making a claim for the amount of exchange.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I hope that will not be given into at all, because at the same time that we received drafts on New York, if I remember correctly, they also insisted on our making payments in New York at the New York rate. I also remember very distinctly that the British Admiralty took full advantage of the New York rates; and if we have taken advantage of them, we have only been acting in accordance with the same rule. I think the item should be struck out.

Mr GRAHAM: My hon friend knows that the decision in this matter lies with the Department of Finance. Although this item is inserted, we do not propose to pay the claim unless we are instructed to do so by the Finance Department after investigation. By inserting the item in the estimate, we do not admit the claim at all; but should the Finance Department, after investigation, decide that this claim is good, we have provided the money to settle it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It seems to me that it would be better to settle the matter in this way, namely to advise the Finance Department that we do not think there is any claim; and if a new claim has to be looked after as a result of different advice, it may be dealt with by a Governor General's warrant. I do not think it should be admitted even to the extent of inserting the item in the estimates. We have a claim for a very much larger amount which England as steadily declined to admit. Unless I am very much astray in my recollection, I think the fact is that we have already settled cross accounts with the Admiralty on the basis of New York exchange, and I think, therefore, no action should be taken in this matter.

Mr. FIELDING: There is a large question between this Government and the British government in connection with the matter of exchange, and we must be prepared to give and take; whatever we lay down on one side we expect to claim on the other. My impression is that, if this claim be approved, it would require an appropriation of Parliament to pay it. Therefore, my hon. friend may be wise in inserting the item, but I quite concur in the view that he had better not be in a hurry to make payment until the whole matter is adjusted.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I certainly agree that he should not be in a hurry to make payment. I am quite sure that the whole matter will be properly and fairly adjusted. When it once gets to the British government and out of the routine of the offices, I do not think there will be much difficulty in adjusting the matter. I have no doubt, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) takes a very well earned holiday this summer and goes over to England, he will be able to adjust the whole of this matter without any difficulty.

Mr. DUFF: I think the minister said, in explaining the details of this item, that part of it was for war medals. The department issued a war service badge which was very unsatisfactory, and many complaints have come to the Minister of the Naval Service and his officials. I have received, in the last two or three years, probably two or three hundred letters from young men who received this war service badge which was issued to men who served in the Canadian navy or to Canadians who served overseas in the British navy. The badge was very much larger than the one issued to the soldiers, and these young men claim that it should be similar to the one issued to soldiers, instead of the large white badge which was issued by the Naval Department. I have, upstairs in my room, about a dozen of these badges which were sent to me by these boys. They would not keep them, and they asked me to bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Naval Service and to ask him to have issued a new badge which would be satisfactory to them. They want one the same size as the one issued to the soldiers, which badge was quite satisfactory. This will cost a very small sum of money, and these young men, who risked their lives on the sea, should receive some consideration from the Government. I trust the Minister of Naval Service will look after this matter and issue the badges to the naval men.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I understood the minister to say that one of the items contained in this very large appropriation is for reconditioning or repairs to certain vessels, known as drifters. We had a very large number of most curiously constructed, queer looking vessels floating around the coast of the maritime provinces. I do not know where they were built, and anybody who knows about conditions there knows they were of no value during the war. I cannot understand why we should be now voting money for vessels of that kind. Some of them belong to the Canadian Government, but I do not know whether there were brought across the Atlantic any that belonged to the Imperial government.

Mr. GRAHAM: As a matter of fact, these were trawlers or drifters that were built in Canada on the order of the Imperial government and lent to Canada. The contract with the Imperial government was that we should repair them and place them in the same condition as they were before. None of these items, of course, will be paid without the fullest scrutiny.

With regard to the medals, I must admit that the medals issued by the Naval Department have called forth a good deal of protest. Many that were issued by the British Admiralty were large. The Naval Department, I understand, has issued some that were smaller; but so far as I could learn, neither the larger nor the smaller were quite satisfactory. We will go into the matter and see if any alteration can be made in the design of the badges.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think there was an understanding with my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) that we might go on with Public Works to-night, although that was not the understanding last night.

We have departed a little from the announcement made last night, but this has been done after consultation with the two leaders opposite. We will take up Public Works for the rest of the evening.

PUBLIC WORKS

Public Works—public buildings—rent, repairs, furniture, heating, etc., $4,959,600.

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay, Minister of Public Works): The first three items in this vote have been passed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Subject, I think, to getting some information as to what was spent last year.

The CHAIRMAN: That reservation does not apply to the first three items; they have been passed. The item now under consideration is the fourth:

Lighting, including roads and bridges, $90,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then we will ask for information regarding this item.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The amount spent last year up to the 31st of March was $80,084.59.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Can you not get on with $80,000 this year as well?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The accounts are probably not all in yet. I notice that in 1920-21 the expenditure was about $88,696.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, costs are going down now.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There was a contract let last year for lighting, and I imagine that this estimate is based upon it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are things not cheaper this year? I thought the Government was to bring about a lowering in the cost of living.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): These contracts were entered into on the first of October, 1921.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For how long?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): For five years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much does that cover of this amount?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The contract covers the lighting of the Parliament buildings, and all buildings owned or rented by the Government in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Amounting to what proportion of this vote?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): $63,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the rate?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I heard you announce the fact that the item had reference to public buildings, but in this corner we have not been able to hear a single word since that announcement. We are here to discuss public affairs and if we cannot hear what is going on, then we ought to meet in a chamber in which we can hear. It is simply impossible two-thirds of the time for members at this end of the House to tell what business is being transacted at the other end.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The particular item before the committee is a vote of $90,000 for lighting, including roads and bridges.

Mr. GOOD: If hon. members would only realize that there are others in the chamber who would like to hear the questions they ask besides those to whom those questions are addressed, the proceedings would be much more satisfactory. There are hon. members back here who tell me they have not heard one-quarter of what has been going on, and it is really too bad. It is simply scandalous that such a condition should prevail, and we who are expected to participate intelligently in the discussion of public affairs should be able to hear what hon. gentlemen are saying. I wish to protest although I do not see why it should be necessary to do so. There would be no cause for protest if hon. members would only bear in mind that there are other gentlemen in the chamber besides themselves for whom they ought to have some consideration.

The CHAIRMAN: I may remark that the difficulty lies not so much with hon. gentlemen who are discussing the items under consideration, as in the fact that there is an incessant conversation in an undertone among hon. members themselves all over the chamber.

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask a question, Mr. Chairman? What are the duties of a chairman?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have not yet had an answer to the question I asked regarding the rate.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The lighting rate is 5 cents per kilowatt hour for the first thirty hours, monthly use of installed capacity, and 2.2 cents per kilowatt hour for the next seventy hours, and ½ cent per kilowatt hour thereafter for monthly use. There is a discount upon bills paid within thirty days of 12 per cent if the transformer in the building is owned by the company, and 15 per cent where the transformer is owned by the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As I know that hon. members could not hear the minister, I will simply say that the bargain made last October appears to be a very provident one and I hope it will not be altered for the worse by the Government.

Item agreed to.

Heating, including salaries of engineers, firemen and watchmen, $385,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a decrease which, I presume, is owing to the reduction in the price of coal. To what else is it to be attributed?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There has been a marked reduction in the price of coal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What else accounts for the reduction?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is all.

Item agreed to.

Departments generally—char service, including $100 to E. Snowdon for firing noon gun, $385,000.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): There should be something more descriptive than the mere word "generally".

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This amount is required for char service in the cleaning of offices in government owned and rented buildings in Ottawa for the year 1922-23. It also includes $100 to E. Snowdon for firing the noon gun. The details of the expenditure are: supervision, $1,920; Foremen, $7,420; charmen $47,120; charwomen, $307,767, and contingencies, $20,772, making a total of $385,000.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Are these people under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Repairs, furniture, grounds, street cleaning and maintenance, $700,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What accounts for the reduction here? I presume it is mainly because the furniture is new.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Apparently $700,000 was the amount expended last year, and that is what we are asking this year.

[Mr. J. H. King.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does not the minister hope to secure a reduction? I would think there might be a reduction, due to the lesser amount of repairs required now.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I imagine the repairs would be the same from year to year. There may be some decrease in wages.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Repairs to good new furniture will not be as extensive as repairs to furniture many years old.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is also the supply of new furniture.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the new furniture is all supplied.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is not supplied in my room yet.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is supplied from this vote.

Item agreed to.

Rideau Hall (including grounds)—improvements, furniture, maintenance, etc., $60,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much was spent last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The amount spent last year was $58,000.

Item agreed to.

Rideau Hall—allowance for fuel and light, $19,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is this more than last year with the price of coal going down?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The vote of $19,000 is for the payment of the annual amount to His Excellency the Governor General for fuel and light required at Rideau Hall, including the military secretary's cottage. The $19,000 is paid directly to His Excellency in four payments. The increase in this appropriation was made upon receipt of representations from His Excellency that the sum of $17,000 was inedequate. The matter was referred to the chief architect, who on the 9th February, 1922, submitted the following report to the deputy minister:

Replying to your memo of January 12th with regard to the increase of the fuel and light allowance for Rideau Hall, I attach a report from Mr. Croll, in which he states the cost for the year ending April 30th, 1921, to be as follows: Coal, $15,379; wood, $512; gas, $1,553; light, $1,622; electric bulbs, $225, making a total of $19,292.

Mr. BAXTER: The question is not strictly in order, but I should like to know where the coal is obtained for these buildings.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is being supplied from our own Canadian mines. Last year I believe it was supplied largely from the mines in Minto, New Brunswick.

Mr. BAXTER: I am delighted to hear it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Up to very recent years the coal supply came from the south, but the policy of getting Canadian coal was inaugurated two years ago.

Item agreed to.

Telephone service, $93,600.

Mr. CARROLL: Are the telephone and telegraph services of the Public Works one at the present time?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We have a branch of the telegraph and telephone service. This item is not connected with that service.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Public buildings—Dominion Immigration buildings—repairs, furniture, etc., $18,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: How much of this is for furniture?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This vote is required for indispensable repairs and renewals to buildings at all immigration agencies throughout the Dominion, and for furniture and so forth which may be required during the year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How much was spent last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Last year $34,441 was spent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What will not be necessary this year so that the $18,000 will be sufficient?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Out of the appropriation of $45,000 for 1921-22, $30,000 was provided for the supply of bunks at the immigration buildings in Halifax, St. John, and Quebec, as requested by the Acting Deputy Minister of the Department of Colonization and Immigration in a letter dated 5th February, 1921. That accounts largely for the decrease this year.

Item agreed to.

Fittings and general supplies and furniture, $185,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much was spent last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Last year we spent $169,705.

Mr. STEVENS: Does that item cover all the public services throughout the Dominion or only those in Ottawa?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It covers the public services for the whole of Canada.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Are these furnishings replaced from year to year? I imaging that most of the members who are familiar with the debate on the necessity for economy must be somewhat startled when they observe the elaborate furnishings which have been brought into this building during the last two or three weeks. I doubt whether some of the furniture ever will be used, and a good deal of it I think we could very well get along without until these buildings are completed at any rate. We had an item of $185,000 last year, we have another item of $185,000 this year for fittings, general supplies and furniture, and a few minutes ago we passed an item of $700,000, the greater proportion of which was also for furniture, the minister informed us. There must surely be a limit to the purchasing of furniture. We have been told that $30,000 was spent last year for bunks. I think we ought to have some information as to whether sufficient bunks have already been supplied, or what the limit is to be.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): These bunks were supplied during last year—my hon. friend was a member of the House when the appropriation was voted—and were used in the immigration sheds throughout the Dominion. This vote is for fittings, supplies, furniture, filing cabinets, adjustable rollers, bookshelves, steel drawers, etc., for public buildings throughout the whole of Canada. The amount spent last year was $169,000. The appropriation this year is made on the recommendation of the department which has the matter in hand, and must be the judge.

Mr. MANION: Throughout this country in past years there have been built by both governments expensive and elaborate public buildings in different towns and cities. I admit that in the capital city, such buildings should be in keeping with the dignity of government, but in some towns and cities it seems to me they are too large and too elaborate and might well be subdivided in order to afford more space for use as public offices. I have in mind some cities, including my own, where there are immense buildings for the Customs D• partment while other branches of the public service are spread over the city in rented quarters. It has been my impression that not only in my own city but in others, there would be plenty of room for other departments if these large buildings were further divided up. I am not blaming the present Government in the least, for most of these buildings were erected years ago; but in some of the customs offices I have seen there seemed to be enough room to provide for the needs of cities five or six times the size of those in which the buildings were situated. Possibly the minister would do well to carry on the work that was taken up by Mr. McCurdy, who, I happen to know, was looking into the possibilities of co-ordinating or bringing together some of the different offices of government. Of course, I would not like the minister, in return for my suggestion, to carry out the idea in my city alone.

An hon. MEMBER: Use that for a starting point.

Mr. MANION: No, not even as a starting point. But I would be quite willing to see my city taken with the rest of the cities in anything which is done in this connection. I think the minister would be well advised to carry on the work that Mr. McCurdy started to do, but which he did not have an opportunity to complete.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I shall be very glad to give that matter consideration. It is advisable wherever possible to bring these various services under one roof. My hon. friend suggests that he would like any action taken with respect to his city to synchronize with similar action in others. We will bear that in mind.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): In view of the surplus last year of $16,000 would it not be possible to cut this item this year? The price of fittings, supplies and furniture should be coming down like the prices of other things.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The amount of $169,705 is the amount expended, so far as the department knows, up to March 31 of this year. When the accounts are complete we may find that sum augmented. I would not think it advisable to cut the estimate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There would be no accounts coming in after this for fittings, general supplies, and furniture. It is inconceivable that the department would not know now the actual expenditure of last year, and if the minister looks at the year before he will find additional reason why the vote shold be reduced this year.

Mr GOOD: Do the Dominion public buildings include the public buildings in Ottawa, or only those outside the city?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Only those outside Ottawa.

Item agreed to.

Dominion public buildings—heating, $420,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Can we get some particulars in regard to this item? I assume it is for heating accounts outside of Ottawa.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The amount is required for the purchase of fuel, etc., for heating the public buildings throughout the Dominion outside of Ottawa.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was spent last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): $450,013.72.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister explained that owing to the reduction in the price of coal he was able to effect a reduction in the estimate for heating in Ottawa from $540,000 to $385,000, or about forty per cent. Why can he not do the same in this case? Coal has gone down elsewhere, certainly, just as much as here. If only $450,000 was spent last year, he ought to be able to get on with $300,000 this year.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): 35,500 tons of coal at $9.55 per ton would amount to $339,000; wood, $25,000; removal of ashes, $12,000; heat, gas, $3,500; steam heat, $25,000; fuel oil, $3,450; contingencies, $11,600. That makes up the $420,000.

Mr. STEVENS: What does the minister mean by steam heat? Is not the other fuel used for that purpose as well?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In some localities we are able to purchase steam from a central heating plant.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the minister going to continue to purchase in quantities, or is he going to revert to the old process of patronage in coal?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The purchases will be made through the Purchasing Commission, in quantities as required, I suppose, in the various localities.

Mr MEIGHEN: By contract and tender, as before?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I would say yes

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): Has the minister any information as to the relative difference between the cost of coal heat and of steam heat, as referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens)? I have in mind the city of North Battleford, which I suppose is one of those that have a municipal heating plant and a number of big buildings.

Mr KING (Kootenay): I am not sure we have the information as to relative costs, but I believe North Battleford has a contract for steam heating from a central plant.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister has given us the price of coal this year, $9.50. What was the price yast year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Last year, $9.55.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it was only $9.55 last year, $9.30 or $9.50 this year is far too high.

Mr. LOGAN: I find in a return which was brought down at my request on the 20th of April last, that coal was imported from the United States for use in federal buildings as follows: in 1918-19, 28,973.91 tons, at a cost delivered of $318,850, or an average cost per ton of $11; in 1919-20, 32,646.81 tons, at a cost delivered of $327,941.65; in 1920-21, 52,279.58 tons, at a cost delivered of $821,748.55, or an average cost per ton of $15.71. In other words, while the Public Works Department imported in round figures, 29,000 tons of American coal in 1918-1919, at a cost of $319,000, or an average cost per ton of $11, this tonnage increased for the year ending March 31, 1921, to over 52,000 tons or nearly double the quantity, at a cost of nearly $822,000, or nearly treble the cost in 1918-1919.

The leader of the Opposition has spoken to-night of some Canadian coal being used in the public buildings in Ottawa. Very little could have been used, because under his government and its predecessor the amount of American coal imported for the use of public buildings jumped inside of three years from 28,000 odd tons to 52,000 odd tons per year. Is it the policy of the present Minister of Public Works to discontinue using American coal in federal buildings where Canadian coal can be procured at a decent price?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When that was done in 1920-1921, Canadian Companies were not in a position to supply the coal. Was not Canadian coal bought last year for the public buildings?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Of course it was, and what was the proportion?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Replying to the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), the date he stopped at was the date up to which there was an ample market for Canadian coal elsewhere. In Ottawa the policy was established—I cannot give the exact date, but certainly all the time I was Prime Minister, and I think before—of buying Canadian coal rather than American coal because the prices were so comparable we could do it. So I was right in what I said. The time came when the market for coal overseas was exhausted, and what did the late government do? We pressed on the railway companies to buy Canadian coal to keep the men employed. They, of course, resisted because the price was higher, but we stood behind the company and paid the excess price out of the treasury of Canada in order to keep the men employed to the utmost extent we could during that hard period. That was the course the late government pursued in all these things, and I think it was right. What is more, I would do it again. I believe we ought to use Canadian coal. There is a limit, of course. You cannot go very far above the market price at which you can get coal elsewhere, but we can afford to do something in order to extend further the market for coal produced in our own country.

10 p.m.

Mr. LOGAN: The hon. gentleman's argument would be all right if his facts were right, but perhaps he does not know quite as much about the coal trade as we who come from the province of Nova Scotia. I can tell him that when he purchased 52,000 tons of coal in 1920-1921, as compared with 28,000 tons in 1918-1919, the bottom had then dropped out of the coal market and the miners of Nova Scotia were walking the streets.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was not last year.

Mr. LOGAN: The bottom dropped out of the coal market in 1919, after the armistice in 1918, and in 1920-1921 coal was an absolute drug on the market and our miners in Nova Scotia were unable to secure employment. It may be hard to explain why in that year the amount of coal imported from the United States was almost twice as much as the amount imported three years before.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that we will gain much unless we get the real facts. They ought to be here. I asked the minister how much Canadian coal was bought last year for use in Ottawa, and how much American coal.

Mr. LOGAN: The figures I am quoting are from a return brought down to the House, so there cannot be any doubt as to the correctness of the figures.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member gave the figures for 1920-1921. What were the figures for last year?

Mr. LOGAN: It was in 1920-1921 that we had a lack of coal orders in Nova Scotia. I am as anxious as the ex-Minister of Finance to hear the reply of the Minister of Public Works. The ex-Minister of Finance has rather intimated that this is not a matter of importance.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I never said any such thing. I think it is a matter of importance, and it is important that we get the facts.

Mr. LOGAN: The amount involved may not be stupendous, but the principle involved is a very important one. In my humble opinion the time has come in this country when we must establish a Canadian national coal policy, and it must be the rule of this Government, not only for its public buildings, but for the railways, to purchase coal mined in Canadian mines. Look at the item before us. The government of Canada, for the year ending 31 March, 1921, bought over $800,000 worth of American coal for use in its own public buildings. Do hon. members think the United States of America would buy Canadian coal to use in their public buildings? At Washington they would almost sooner burn wood than Canadian coal.

We need in this country more Canadianism and more devotion to Canadian industry. We preach the doctrine, which is all right in itself, to buy Canadian goods made in Canada, but we often forget to buy coal produced in Canada. It is one of our natural products. Upon it depends a large amount of the revenue of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and yet we will find that, even down in some cities in the maritime provinces, large quantities of American coal are being brought in, and burned and very often burned by those who are preaching the loudest "buy goods made in Canada".

[Mr. Logan.]

This is in my humble judgment, a most important matter, although only involving perhaps a few hundred thousand dollars. At the same time, it is important in principle that it should be established in this country that we should patronize Canadian home industries, particularly those that are producing from our natural resources. We had a statement made here not long ago, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Pictou, (Mr. Macdonald) in reference to the amount of American coal burned on Canadian railways, and I think the answer was "about a million tons per year". Do hon. members realize the fact that down in the province of Nova Scotia—and I presume this remark applies to the western country as well—about two thirds of our collieries are idle, that men are walking the streets looking for work, and at the same time the government of Canada is buying a million tons of coal per year for railway purposes? According to this statement, for the year ending 31 March, 1921, we burned a million dollars worth of coal in public buildings. This is not Canadianism, and not a policy which will build up Canada, particularly that part of Canada which depends so largely upon the production of this very important product of our country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I entirely agree with my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan) in the principle he has enunciated. The late government went so far as to practically pay premiums for Canadian coal, and they were criticized for it in this House. I am amazed at one statement my hon. friend makes. He tells us that down in the maritime provinces American coal is being burned. If it is true that any one of our public institutions is burning American coal where Canadian coal could easily be got, the least my hon. friend can do is to give the facts to this House. Let us know what the institutions are and where they are, because frankly I am amazed to hear the statement.

Mr. LOGAN: I think the hon. member may have misunderstood me. I did not say the government of Canada was buying coal for use in maritime cities from American sources. I said American coal was being burned in those cities by people who were preaching very loudly the "made in Canada" doctrine. I was amazed not long ago to pick up a Halifax paper and to see that they congratulated, I think, the school commissioners for having purchased a very large amount of coal, but when I came to consider the kind of coal it was, I found it was American coal being burned in the city of Halifax, in that province which depends so much on the production of coal. What we need in this country, in reference to coal and in reference to many other products of the country, is more Canadianism, and we should patronize Canadian industries as far as possible. There may be cases where it would be too expensive to bring in Nova Scotia coal, say to central Canada. That is another question, but, as far as the portion of Canada east of lake Superior is concerned, there should be no coal purchased by the government of Canada for use on the railways or the public buildings, except coal produced in a Canadian mine by Canadian miners.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have only one word to say, and it is not in criticism of the hon. gentleman. I admit, without going into the facts—for I cannot get the facts—that I do not understand just why that increase took place. There may be some explanation. It may be there was some additional use for anthracite coal, which is not produced in the maritime provinces, and it may be that, as well, there was increased consumption for some special reason in those parts of Canada to which there cannot, of course, be access for maritime province coal. I want to impress upon the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) that the last government went as far as they could. You can go too far, I know, but we did not go too far. Hon. members are criticizing us for not going far enough. We went so far in the purchase of Canadian coal as to pay a premium for it. I cannot give the figures, but I am sure the Finance Minister will correct me if I am wrong. We went to the expense of hundreds of thousands of dollars, in order that the workmen of the maritime provinces might do business. We had to stand for criticism from hon. members on this side of the House for doing it, and we had to defend ourselves, but I have learned to know the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) well enough to say he would have stood up and stated what he thought was right, no matter on which side of the House he happened to be.

Mr. McBRIDE: I fully agree with the sentiments expressed by hon. members, but I do not think they have gone far enough. I think they should advocate a tariff on fuel oil, so that our mines in Canada would have a better chance to give steady employment to our miners.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am glad that the hon. member for Cumberland registered so strongly in favour of Canadian products. However, before this subject was introduced, there was a question asked to which a distinct answer was not given. The contrast was made between heating the Ottawa public buildings and the Dominion public buildings, and before an answer could be given another question was put, and, to my mind, at least, no clear explanation was given as to this difference. It seems that the heating, including salaries of engineers, firemen and watchmen of the public buildings at Ottawa, shows this year in the estimates a reduction of $155,000—that is $540,000 reduced to $385,000. I presume there has not been much reduction in the salaries of the engineers, firemen and so on. Then we have the plain item for heating Dominion public buildings. The vote last year was $450,000, and this year $420,000 is asked, a difference of only $30,000. I would like to have some explanation from the minister as to that.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The decrease in the item for public buildings in Ottawa is principally due to a very material reduction in the price of coal. In 1921-22, the estimate provided for the purchase of 13,500 tons of bituminous coal at $15 per ton, and 11,400 tons of anthracite coal at $17 per ton, making a total of about $379,000. In 1922-23, the estimate is for 25,890 tons of various kinds of coal, at a cost of $230,000, an increase of 990 tons and a decrease in cost of about $148,000. There is also a large reduction of $18,800 in the allotment for wood. For the past two years, owing to the uncertainty of the coal situation, a large quantity of hardwood was secured; but now that conditions are becoming more stable, the only wood that will be required for the next year is a supply of kindling wood. Besides those two reduced items, there is a reduction of $3,072 in the contingent appropriation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister has not yet told us how it is that he cannot extend the economy in coal to other points where he is buying coal.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I would point out to the minister that, on the one hand, on a basis of $540,000 last year, there is a reduction of $155,000, and on the other, on a basis of $450,000 last year, there is a reduction of only $30,000. The statement that he has given has not explained that, at least to me. In a word, how is it that we can save $155,000 on $540,000, and only $30,000 on $450,000?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think the explanation given regarding the Dominion item will be satisfactory. As regards the estimate, $420,000, outside service, I have cited the items making that up and the quantity required, namely 35,500 tons. I imagine that the departmental officials must have a fairly accurate knowledge as to the tonnage of coal that is required. The requirement is a yearly one, and it would not vary very much from year to year.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That would make no difference, because it should be relevant in either case.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This appropriation is largely due to the use of bituminous coal where anthracite coal was previously used. This scheme necessitates the purchase of a much greater tonnage of coal than in the previous year, but at a much reduced price. In 1920-21, the quantity was 31,216 tons; in 1921-22, 35,000 tons, practically the same quantity as we are asking this year, namely 35,500 tons.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister is entirely losing the point as regards what we desire to know, and that is why it is costing just as much to buy coal this year as it did last year in connection with these outside points. We all know how the price is down. The minister has shown how it is down in Ottawa.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The price of coal in 1920-21 was $13.09; in 1921-22, it was $9.55, and from present indications I do not think the price of coal will be much less this year. We are estimating it at $9.55 this year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister is estimating it at the same price although there is a difference in Ottawa. What is the reason why, when there is a difference in Ottawa, the minister cannot get it outside of Ottawa? Is the real difference not this, that last year the government insisted on using Nova Scotia here and got a proper price for it? I wonder whether the deputy could not just tell the minister whether the fact is or is not that last year we burned Nova Scotia coal and got it at a cheaper price, and that is available this year. Is that not the fact?

[Mr. Ryckman.]

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is a fact.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why cannot we have it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Last year we had an appropriation of $540,000 for heating public buildings in Ottawa. This year we are asking $385,000, which item, I believe, is passed. There is a comparison now as to the expenditures between the two items, the Outside Service and the Inside Service. I have given the information as I have it here. The decrease is principally due to the price of coal. The price of bituminous coal last year was $15 per ton, and anthracite coal, $17 per ton.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Apparently we cannot get the information.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): You will get the information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It does not make much difference whether we get it or not, so long as the minister gives his pledge. Is he going to continue to buy Nova Scotia coal for the government buildings this year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is nothing very startling about the policy of the late government in connection with coal purchases. As regards Canadian coal being used in public buildings throughout Canada, I may advise the hon. gentleman that it will be the policy of the Government to utilize Canadian coal where it can properly be used. Coal is not produced in Ontario, and there is the question of shipment to that province. My hon. friends will realize that the matter will undoubtedly be dealt with in the interests of Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not asking that. We are dealing with this Ottawa item. As my hon. friend has admitted, we did burn Nova Scotia coal here last year. Is it his intention again to invite tenders from the Nova Scotia dealers and give them the business next year. There is no trouble about carrying it into Ontario. I am asking only in reference to Ottawa.

Mr. LOGAN: Will the minister tell me how much coal was burnt in the public buildings in Ottawa last year?

Mr. BOYS: May I ask the member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), a question regarding the purchase of coal in the United States in 1920-21 to the extent of $800,000, as mentioned by him. What kind of coal was that? Was it bituminous or anthracite, and could it have been purchased in Canada?

Mr. LOGAN: I want to get an answer to the question I have asked the minister?

Mr. BOYS: The minister is looking up the information, and I thought that while he was doing so I might ask the hon. member this question.

Mr. LOGAN: The return brought down in answer to my motion does not specify how much bituminous or how much anthracite was imported into this country. Now, I submit, that there is no necessity for importing any American coal for public buildings and government railways in Canada east of lake Superior, because bituminous coal, which can be used in the heating of all furnaces, can be purchased in Nova Scotia and in New Brunswick. The coal that was purchased for Ottawa by the late government was bought in New Brunswick and not in Nova Scotia. I make that statement by the way. Coal can be purchased in Nova Scotia at the present time, delivered on the government railways, at about $5.50 a ton. The Government owns the railways; they own railways running throughout the province of Ontario; and if they would carry coal at cost from Nova Scotia they could deliver it at the eastern end of lake Superior in competition against American prices. But they cannot do so if they charge the regular cost of transportation on coal. A few years ago the Government of Canada carried coal from Nova Scotia to the city of Montreal at $1.60 a ton. They increased the rate from $1.60 to $3.80. We contend that that is an excessive freight rate, but they would never suggest that it was the exact cost of transportation and my contention, even in opposition to what has been intimated by the minister, is that there is no need for this Government to buy any American coal for use in Ontario if they will only buy it in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick and transport it at actual transportation cost. They can buy a million tons of coal to-day in Nova Scotia delivered on the government railways at $5.50 a ton, and good coal at that.

Mr. BOYS: I am not criticizing for one moment the purchase of coal in the maritime provinces; quite the opposite. But to reach an intelligent conclusion regarding the criticism offered by the hon. member (Mr. Logan) with reference to the $800,000 expended on coal in the United States, it is necessary to know whether that coal was anthracite or bituminous coal. If it was bituminous, then the criticism might be well founded; if, on the contrary, it was anthracite, there was no ground for the criticism. And the same argument would apply to the discussion on some of the other items.

Mr. LOGAN: I contend that there is no necessity for buying anthracite for public buildings, and that is why I want the minister to tell me how much anthracite was bought last year for use in heating public buildings in Ottawa.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have the information. There were purchased 163 tons of anthracite.

Mr. HANSON: I am informed that the late government let a contract to a company in my constituency for supplying all the coal used in the public buildings here, and I understand that the contract price is lower still than that named by the member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan). I believe that coal is being loaded in New Brunswick, under contract made by the late government for the heating of public buildings in Ottawa, at as low as $5.25. I am glad the minister is laying down the policy which he has stated. It would be a great benefit to the district I represent and, incidentally, to the district he himself comes from. I do not see the necessity for buying anthracite coal, because in the lower provinces the use of anthracite in large public buildings is being entirely discontinued.

Mr. MARTELL: I wonder if my hon. friend from Cumberland means that coal should be transported by the railways at rates affording special consideration to the coal operators?

Mr. LOGAN: Any government coal bought from the operators in Nova Scotia for the use of the Government should be transported at cost. It is not giving any advantage to the operators.

Mr. MARTELL: I received telegrams about a fortnight ago from people in my constituency complaining that American soft coal was being sold in the town of Windsor at about $4 less per ton than Canadian coal produced in Nova Scotia. Now, I claim that the railways of the country ought to be run on a business basis, and if you are to give special consideration to coal produced in any part of Canada the people generally will be taxed in consequence. Coal is not entitled to any greater consideration than any other commodity produced in the country. My reply to my own constituents was that the object was to get coal at the cheapest possible price and not at the expense of the public at large, and that they had to put up with it, and I was very glad that they were able to get coal for $8 or $9, as against $15 which has been charged during the past few years. My advice to the Government is to buy coal where it can be purchased at the cheapest possible rate. If that is done the Minister of Railways will be able to administer the railways of the country as a business proposition. If the railways give special concessions to coal it will mean so much more of a deficit; and I repeat that it will be the part of wisdom for the Government to procure their coal where it can be got at the cheapest price.

Mr. HANSON: I should like my hon. friend to go down to Pictou and Springhill and some other places down there, and preach that doctrine at election time.

Mr. MARTELL: I am not afraid to preach it.

Mr. HANSON: I am sure you have not the courage to do it.

Mr. MARTELL: I have the courage to practise whatever doctrine I preach, and if you come to my constituency and advocate that any special concession should be made in favour of any coal company in Canada at the expense of the consumer I will run against you. I will even go into the old Tory county of York and run an election there against the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HANSON: No one is advocating any special concessions in favour of coal sold to the public. But the member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) contends that the Government in hauling its own coal for public buildings should do so without a profit, and he is quite justified in that contention.

Mr. MARTELL: The Government should be run on a business basis and the railways should not be hewers of wood and drawers of water for anybody. They are public utilities which are supposed to serve the interests of the people, and nothing should be done whereby the taxpayers can be mulcted in unjustifiable costs. I repeat that coal should be got at the cheapest price no matter where it comes from.

[Mr. Martell.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite sure the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) is amazed when he finds the tremendous amount of anthracite tonnage —163 tons—which the late government imported into Ottawa. Of course it was an exceedingly small amount. There was a reason for it: the late government was very sincere in trying to bring about a condition that would enable as much of our own coal as possible and our money kept in the country. Among other things we looked into the changing of our furnace equipment so that we could use bituminous coal, and in that way help our own coal mining industry and our own unemployed. City by-laws, of course, make a good deal of trouble in some instances, but I dare say we will be able ultimately to use still more of our own coal. Perhaps the minister can tell us what percentage of maritime coal was burned here in Ottawa.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Of maritime bituminous coal we burned 23,745 tons.

Mr. LOGAN: How much coal was burned altogether?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A total of 25,607 tons.

Mr. LOGAN: Where were the 2,000 tons purchased?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It was 1,300 tons.

Mr. HANSON: Was that purchased by tender?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): By tender. The requirements last year were: 23,745 tons of bituminous coal; 163 tons of anthracite coal; 1,530 tons of coke; 169 tons of peat; making a total of 25,607 tons of fuel.

Item agreed to.

Lighting, $195,000.

Mr. LUCAS: What accounts for the increase of $15,000 in lighting?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Of this increase $12,500 is due to the necessity of supplying lamps to all buildings throughout Canada occupied by the Department of Militia and Defence.

Item agreed to.

Rents, $1,250,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why this increase in rents at the present time when we are supposed to be cutting down services and dismissing employees.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The increase of $120,000 is due to the inclusion of rents for the Militia Department amounting to $185,000. These are included at the request of the Department of Militia and Defence.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does that mean that the Department of Public Works is now carrying a part of the expenditure of the Department of Militia and Defence?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much is the Militia Department helped out altogether?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): To the extent of $185,000.

Mr. MARTELL: Were these buildings rented by the government previous to December last?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They were rented by the Militia Department.

Item agreed to.

Harbour and river—Nova Scotia—Baddeck—repairs to wharf, $3,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, it is Friday night, and judging from the the deserted appearance of the benches on both sides I think that most of the members have gone to catch their trains. I imagine the House generally did not think the Opposition would be quite as easy as they have been with the Minister of Public Works in allowing so many estimates to go through in the last few minutes. In view of the progress we have made and of the lack of attendance, I would suggest that the House might adjourn.

Mr. LOGAN: Does the ex-Minister of Finance desire that we postpone consideration of the Nova Scotia estimates until some Opposition members from that province get here?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not at all.

Mr. LOGAN: You would have to wait about ten years for any of them to get here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We will go ahead.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then let us hear what is going to be done at Baddeck. What are the repairs to the wharf there?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The appropriation is required to renew the deck of the wharf which is badly decayed and unsafe.

Mr. HANSON: Where is Baddeck?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Down in Nova Scotia.

Mr. HANSON: What is the trouble there?

Mr. McKENZIE: I shall have much pleasure in telling my benighted brethren across the way where Baddeck is. Baddeck has figured prominently in the literature of this country, and any gentlemen who have never heard of it before must have sadly neglected their education. The ex-Minister of Finance need not worry himself to find out why this or any other public work in the province of Nova Scotia needs to be repaired, for the simple reason that during the ten years that he and his party were in power they absolutely allowed these public works to fall into decay, and now they require to be put into a proper state of repair. We are doing the best we can with the remnants of the moneys that our predecessors left in the treasury to make good their dereliction of duty. The wharf at Baddeck is a very good one; it is practically a part of the Intercolonial system. One of the termini of the Intercolonial is a place called Iona, and a very excellent ferry runs between Iona and Baddeck. This wharf has been neglected and is now badly in need of repairs.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this a wharf at which subsidized boats call?

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, quite a number of subsidized boats call there. The steamer Marion, plying on the route between the city of Sydney and Whycocomagh, calls there, and there is a subsidized steamer called the Bras d'Or, a new boat, which calls at Baddeck. Other boats which come from Halifax and go through the St. Peter's canal make some calls at this wharf. It is the only wharf at Baddeck which is capable of accommodating them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In view of the lucid information given by my hon. friend, I withdraw my opposition to the item.

Item agreed to.

Big Bras d'Or—repairs to wharf, $1,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would the hon. Solicitor General enlighten us with regard to this item?

Mr. McKENZIE: This is also a public wharf, and somewhat the same conditions apply. The hon. ex-minister was in Bras d'Or not very long ago and possibly went through the lakes; he knows the route of the steamer Marion from Sydney to Whycocomagh, a distance of about 80 miles. There is no railway in that part of the country and this boat calls at wharves, just as trains call at stations.

Item agreed to.

Cow bay (Port Morien)—repairs to breakwater, $4,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is proposed to be done?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is proposed to renew the crib work at the outer end of the breakwater, which was washed away. The average length of the work required is 125 feet and the average width 40 feet.

Item agreed to.

Digby—repairs to pier, $5,000.

Mr. HANSON: What is proposed to be done at Digby? The Government have a large pier there; I did not know that it was out of repair at all.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This amount is required for repairs and renewals to floor and fenders, annually necessary on account of wear and tear.

Mr. HANSON: Is it proposed to spend the whole amount?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Inverness—repairs to pier, $11,300.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How is this sum made up?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The proposed work will consist of repairs to the eastern pier. Repairs to cribwork are necessary because the outer end of the eastern breakwater has been partly destroyed, on a length of 210 feet and a width of 18 feet, 55 feet having been damaged on a height of one foot to 5 feet, 105 feet totally destroyed, and 50 feet damaged on a height of 3 feet. The amount required for this work is $2,650. Then there is close piling on 335 feet of channel face, $2,285; construction of a seawall 300 feet long, $965; repairs to pile, brush and stone work, $5,356.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this a place where you have frequent destruction by the elements?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there a railway there?

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. CHISHOLM: Perhaps I can give my hon. friend the information he desires. This pier is at the terminus of the Inverness railway. The undertaking was commenced some years ago over $200,000 being spent in an effort to complete it. For the last ten years a little money has been spent there annually, but each fall the storms would carry away all the work that had been done because it had been commenced too late in the season. This appropriation is to repair some of the destruction done last fall. When this is completed and the necessary dredging done, we will have a very fine harbour there, one of sufficient depth to facilitate the carrying on of the fishing industry in that locality. It is mainly for the purposes of the fishermen.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: From what the minister says, the elements are always breaking down these works. Is the pier in a wrong location, or is it so placed that it is unnecessarily exposed to the elements?

Mr. CHISHOLM: For the last ten years the work has never been done at the proper season. In 1910-11 a good deal of work was done, but since then it has only been partly carried out and always at a season of the year when any substantial work was impossible. Every year during that period I have in this House called the attention of the minister to the fact that it was useless to spend money there in the fall of the year, and I say the same thing to the present minister. If it is his intention to finish this work, the only time to do it is in the early season; otherwise it will be destroyed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will this amount finish the work?

Mr. CHISHOLM: It is to finish the work that was undertaken.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Do I understand that when this money is expended we shall hear no more of Inverness?

Mr. CHISHOLM: There are annual repairs.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not speaking of annual repairs—unless you have annual washouts, which apparently you do in a lot of these little harbours Will this $11,300 complete the whole undertaking as planned?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Joggins, repairs to breakwater, $1,200.

Mr. HANSON: Is there a breakwater at Joggins, away up there at the head of the Bay of Fundy? It is beyond reason a breakwater should be required there. It is not out on the Atlantic, and hardly on the Bay of Fundy. It is on a very dirty river, if I recollect correctly.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is a breakwater at that point to protect the shipping pier of the Maritime Power, Coal and Railway Company. Schooners and costal steamers playing between St. John and other Bay of Fundy ports load and discharge produce and merchandise at that place. It is a general utility wharf.

Mr. HANSON: It seems to be a breakwater to assist the Maritime Power and Railway Company. How long has this breakwater been built, and what steamer runs between St. John and Joggins? I do not think there is one myself.

Mr. LOGAN: I happen to know the locality pretty well. This breakwater is a combination breakwater and wharf. It has been used for the last twenty-five years.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Since 1879.

Mr. LOGAN: As usual, I was well within the mark. There is a most important trade carried on between Joggins and the city of St. John. All the goods that go into that part of the county of Cumberland go by water from St. John and are landed at Joggins. It has been used all these years, and, incidentally, the breakwater is a protection to the little harbour in front of the coal company's coal pockets, but that is merely incidental. The wharf is used for public purposes and has been for forty-three years. The hon. member for York-Sunbury was hardly born then.

Mr. HANSON: Is there a steamer running between Joggins and St. John?

Mr. LOGAN: A steamer runs down the Petitcodiac river, calls at Joggins, and goes to St. John. Quite a schooner trade is carried on there. In the summer months you will find four or five or six schooners right inside that breakwater engaged in the coast trade.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister will have the engineer's report showing the amount of traffic done at that point.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): All I have as to traffic is what I have read. Schooners and coastal steamers plying between St. John and other Bay of Fundy ports load and discharge produce and merchandise at that place. The repairs are urgently required. The daily output of coal there is 870 tons.

Mr. HANSON: Not a ton goes from this wharf.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Our information is from the district engineer.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is any other trade done at this wharf besides that in coal?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): General produce and merchandise.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does that consist of, and what is the amount of the trade?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not that information.

Mr. HANSON: There has never been any coal shipped from this wharf. I think the repairs are for the wharf of the Maritime Coal and Railway Company.

Mr. LOGAN: This breakwater was built twenty years before the Maritime Coal Company came into existence. There is no coal shipped over this breakwater at all. It is used as a wharf for coastal schooners, and is in front of the Maritime Coal Company's own wharf near its coal pockets. This combination breakwater and wharf is not for the accommodation of the Maritime Coal Company, but for the accommodation of small schooners and the small steamer that calls there, and for the accommodation of the town of Joggins with nearly two thousand inhabitants. It serves a large section of that part of the country, with a population of from five to ten thousand people.

Item agreed to.

Margaree harbour—repairs to breakwaters, $26,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This is a large item. What is the explanation?

Mr. CHISHOLM: This is another monument to the indifference and folly of the late government. Three years ago a certain amount of destruction was wrought there by the storms. I told the minister at the time from my place in the House that about $800 would make the repairs, but this was neglected. Next year about $3,000 would have done the work, but not a dollar was spent, and the breakwater was allowed to go until finally it became necessary to expend $26,000, and I venture to say that it will be necessary to spend four or five thousand more.

11 p.m.

This is perhaps one of the most important little harbours in eastern Nova Scotia. It is the only medium of transportation for a population of about 10,000 people. There is a large fleet of boats runing in and out of this little port, and there are now three steamers plying along the coast, making five calls a week at that port. I could not give the exports and imports, but they are very substantial indeed. The point I wish to impress not only in criticism of the late government but for the guidance of the present Government with respect to works along the coast, is that this work should be done early this season. If not, we will be coming back for an item of $40,000 next year in addition, because the balance of the work will be gone. This is an old work dating from before Confederation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to get the exact facts from the minister. He will know the traffic in and out.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is an important fishery harbour, and is also the commercial centre in many respects for the adjoining agricultural district. Three subsidized steamboats call at this port, and as the nearest railway station is 20 miles distant, most of the freight is transported by water. The village has a population of 1,000.

Item agreed to.

Port Hood, repairs to wharf, $12,300.

Mr. HANSON: Tell us something about this.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is a revote of $3,000, to complete work now under contract with Mr. T. B. Morrison. The work consists of cutting down to 2½ feet above low water the wrecked portion of the pier, 325 feet in length, and reconstructing this part with fully ballasted native timber crib work, 20 feet in width, to height of ten feet above low water, or to the level of the covering of the adjoining portion of the pier head. Amount required $2,800.

The second item is to rebuild the pier head of the breakwater, carried away by January, 1922, storms from low water in sections 50 ft. x 37½ ft. and 40 ft. x 25 ft. to close pile the outer end of the wharf with creosoted timber, renew part of covering and replace ballast in several bays of work, amount required $9,800, making a total of $12,300.

Item carried.

Shelburne, repairs to wharf, $4,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is that?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): To renew the planking on the wharf and some guard rails. I will give the quantities. They are as follows:

73 M ft B.M. 4" plank at $30	$2,190 00
10½ M. ft. B.M. square timber at $33	346 50
Iron and spikes	375 00
Labour	1,450 00
Contingencies	138 50
Total	$4,500 00

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the adjournment of the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What business will be taken up on Monday?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The first item of business will be concurrence in the reports of Committee of Supply, and putting the Supply Bill through the different stages. Then, as mentioned earlier in the day, we will take up the motions of private members that appear on the Order Paper, beginning with No. 23, relating to oleomargarine, and, when that has been disposed of, we will take up the other motions in the order in which they appear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has my hon. friend considered whether or not we shall have any choice as to how those motions are to be taken up? Is that not left entirely in the hands of private members? Are they not to be taken in their turn? I would have thought so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I spoke of it this afternoon, and asked if there was any objection, and I understood the House was unanimous. I presume anything the House may agree to will be permissible.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know. Perhaps the House did come to an agreement. I was not here at the time. If we had to come to any agreement, I would have thought that we would have agreed, at least, to give preference to the motion for redistribution. I would have no difficulty in agreeing that my hon. friend should give preference to that motion on Monday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I mentioned, in answer to the hon. gentleman who asked the question, that that motion would be taken up at a later time, but the Government would like to fix its own time for it. I wish also to mention to my hon. friend—and I mention it now so that hon. members will know—that on Tuesday we will go on with the estimates on naval service and continue with the militia estimates.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

Monday, May 15, 1922.

The House met at three o'clock.

SUPPLY BILL

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): At the previous sitting of the House I intimated that it was very desirable that we should to-day have concurrence in the reports of Committee of Supply which we have already had, in order that we might complete a Supply Bill with particular reference to closing the accounts of the past year. I would ask for the unanimous consent of the House to take those formal proceedings to-day, and if there is no objection I move that we take up Government Orders.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I know of no special reason for objecting to this other than the absence of the former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), and I would not press that objection if it is going seriously to inconvenience the Government; but if not, I would suggest that the matter stand over until to-morrow.

Mr. FIELDING: I am quite willing to concur in the suggestion of the right hon. member. I have no desire to press the motion unduly.

Motion stands.

NATURAL RESOURCES OF PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister), laid on the Table correspondence between the Prime Minister of Canada and the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta since July, 1920, respecting the transfer of natural resources. He said:

I am bringing down all the correspondence which I am able to find.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. D. D. McKENZIE (Solicitor General) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 92, to amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said:

The House will remember that two resolutions with regard to amending the Dominion Elections Act were introduced this year and accepted by the House. Both of them have reference to section 29 of the present Elections Act. One has special reference to the removal of the disqualification of certain women voters, a matter which has been very much discussed in this House and with which hon. members are familiar. The other has reference to continuing the qualification of a voter, male or female, who may have moved his or her domicile or residence within two months before an election. Those are the two principal matters dealt with in this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EMPIRE DAY AND ASCENSION DAY — ADJOURNMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should be glad if the Prime Minister, (Mr. Mackenzie King) would inform the House whether any arrangement has been made in connection with the holidays next week. Usually the House has not sat on the 24th of May, and there is another holiday on the following day.

Mr. BUREAU: We never sit on Ascension Day.

Mr. MANION: Will the Prime Minister say what the intention of the Government is in the matter?

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall move that when the House adjourns on Tuesday next, the 23rd instant, it shall stand adjourned until the following Friday. Wednesday and Thursday will both be observed as holidays.

Mr. ARTHURS: Why not include Friday too?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As regards Friday, the Government, I think, would like to carry out the wishes of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not Friday, no.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Apparently there is a difference of opinion on the question.

GRAIN TRADE

JUDGMENT OF MANITOBA COURT OF APPEAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Some time ago an hon. member called the attention of the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) to a decision of the Court of Appeal of Manitoba on the question of federal jurisdiction in the matter of the grain trade. That decision was of a very serious nature and the Minister of Justice stated at the time that he was securing information as to its effect before determining what course the Government should follow. Since then some two weeks or more have elapsed. If the decision goes to the extent that it appears to go, there will be cause for action on the part of Government and Parliament, unless the whole supervision of the grain trade is to remain in the most precarious position. I now call the attention of the Government to the matter again. Although the Minister of Justice is absent, I hope we may have a statement on the subject from the Solicitor-General or the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As soon as the Minister of Justice returns I will ask him to make a note of the remarks just made by my right hon. friend.

THE CANADIAN TRANSIT COMPANY

House again in Committee on Bill No. 52, respecting the Canadian Transit Company, Mr. Gordon in the Chair:

On section 2—Head office:

Mr. McBRIDE: I took exception to this bill the last time it was before the House and asked that it be referred back to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph lines. When it was before that committee I did not consider that it received either the time or the attention to which it was entitled. As I said before, the word "Canadian" in the name of the company lends a certain prestige to the concern; and I notice in the press that another corporation is to be known as the German-Canadian Company. Now, I think that if this company desires to have whatever advantage may attach to this special designation it should have its head office in Canada and should be Canadian in fact. I do not see why it should have the title "Canadian" and hold its meetings in other countries. I would like an explanation of this before the bill is passed.

Mr. RANKIN: The home of the company is in Windsor where its head office is situated, although it is true that a great many shareholders and some of the directors live in Detroit. For the accommodation of those shareholders it has been deemed advisable to hold some of the meetings in that city. The same practice, I may observe, prevails in connection with the Niagara Bridge Company, some of the meetings of which are held in Niagara, Ontario, and some in Buffalo. There is nothing derogatory of the national dignity of this country in the matter; it is purely a question of courtesy to the shareholders and directors who reside out of Canada. The amendments which are proposed have been found necessary to facilitate the business of the company in different ways. I repeat, the company has its head office in Windsor, and its place of business is in this country. I can see no objection to the passage of this bill.

Mr. McBRIDE: I do not think the explanation is entirely satisfactory. The name of the concern is the Canadian Transit Company, and all its meetings should be held in Canada.

Mr. CARROLL: The company is already incorporated and this bill is simply to amend the original act to facilitate the shareholders in transacting business on the American border. We are not giving the company a new name, and, as my hon. friend (Mr. Rankin) has explained, the head office is in Windsor.

Mr. HANSON: Notwithstanding that statement, I would call the attention of the committee to the fact that a subsequent section in the amending bill provides that the company shall be taken out of the provisions of the Railway Act 1919, under which the meetings of the company should be regularly held in Canada. The section to which I refer says:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of the Railway Act 1919, any general meeting of the share holders of the company, whether annual or special, may be held elsewhere than at the head office of the company; and may he held at the city of Detroit, in the state of Michigan, one of the United States of America.

I do not know what the practice of this House has been in the past, but it does seem to me that companies organized under Canadian jurisdiction should be Canadian in fact as well as in name and should be amenable to all the laws of this country. In the absence of some very much better explanation than that which has been given by the sponsor of this bill, I submit that this section should not carry.

Mr. MARTELL: So far as I understand the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Rankin), this section is simply to provide for the shareholders holding meetings in Detroit as being the more convenient centre. The head office of the company still remains at Windsor notwithstanding anything in this amending act, and of course all the books of the company will be kept there; in a word, everything pertaining to the company will be in Windsor, and the company will continue to be amenable to our laws. As a matter of courtesy and convenience this amendment is necessary to legalize anything that the shareholders might do at any meetings called in the city of Detroit, where the majority of them reside, and simply gives what I term extra-territorial jurisdiction.

Mr. MacLAREN: As Detroit is very near the border it is consequently very near many Canadian towns. If, for instance, Windsor were the city designated for the shareholders' meetings, it could hardly be said that it would be any inconvenience to either the directors or the shareholders to attend there. This would save time and would ensure all meetings being held where I think they should be held, in Canada.

Mr. ARTHURS: The whole purport of this bill, so far as I understand, is to designate where the head office shall be. There is no question in my mind that the company should not be allowed to have its head office nor to hold its meetings in Detroit.

Mr. FIELDING: Was this point considered by the committee which examined the bill? If it was, and they gave their deliberate judgment in favour of the amendment, I would be inclined to accept it. If it was not considered by the committee, there may be good reason to refer the bill back to them.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The question was considered by the committee, and I do not think there should be any objection to the amendment. It is only a matter of business after all. You have got to make it convenient for the shareholders to attend meetings, and undoubtedly for the majority of them Detroit would be the more convenient centre. We have the same thing at Niagara Falls. The Bridge Company can hold its meetings either in Niagara Falls, Ontario, or in Niagara Falls, New York, but as a matter of fact the shareholders generally meet in Buffalo, that being the most convenient point for the majority of them. The same thing will apply in this case, Detroit will suit the convenience of the majority of the shareholders of this company. I think the clause should carry.

Mr. McBRIDE: I do not think this bill got proper consideration by the committee. It was a special committee, they had to send whips out to get a quorum, and the committee sat less than twenty minutes. In my view the bill did not get the consideration it was entitled to.

Mr. CRERAR: What is the nature of the business of this company; is it international in character?

Mr. RANKIN: It is a company to build an international bridge between Windsor and Detroit, which will be one of the most important international structures undertaken in many years, and it will probably result in great benefit to both countries. The clause was fully considered in committee and passed. There is nothing in this bill except a few simple amendments. I do not understand why hon. gentlemen should object to this clause if it will expedite the business of the corporation, as it undoubtedly will.

Mr. CRERAR: How long has the company been in existence?

Mr. RANKIN: Since 1921. The head office is in Windsor and will remain there; that is the whole thing. This clause is to facilitate the business of the company and to show good-will towards the Detroit shareholders and directors.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I know the gentlemen associated with this company, which is formed for the purpose of building an international bridge between Detroit and Windsor. There are a great number of American shareholders, and the principal directors, including Mr. Hiram Walker, live in Detroit. It is a matter of convenience to these gentlemen to have the meetings of the company held in Detroit. I think that is the sole purpose of the amendment.

Mr. CRERAR: I am asking merely for information. The majority of the stockholders and the directors, I take it, live on the American side, although the company was incorporated under a Canadian charter?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I think that is so.

Mr. CRERAR: In that case I can see no objection to the bill.

Mr. McCONICA: I happened to be a member of that special committee, and while I am not fully advised as to this bill, I understand it was carefully considered, the solicitor of the company appearing before the committee and explaining the purpose of the bill. As I recall, two companies were usually formed for such a purpose as this,—the building of an international bridge. There will be an office on the Ontario side and one on the Michigan side. It was held that certain amendments should be made to enlarge to some extent the powers of the company, and to extend the courtesy to the American shareholders of allowing them to hold their meetings on either side as they might see fit. The majority of the stockholders in this international bridge are supposed to live on the other side of the river; but there is no danger of the bridge being moved away, no matter where the meetings are held, and it seems to me that if we want an international bridge it makes but little difference where the stockholders hold their meetings providing we have control of the Canadian company, which we will at all times have. I think the committee were fully advised as to this measure when it was under consideration by them.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. McQUARRIE:

1. How many civil servants in Canada are receiving salaries of eight hundred dollars and less per annum?
2. How many are receiving nine hundred and sixty dollars or less?

Mr. SPEAKER: When this question came up the other day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) asked that it stand as an order for return. Rule 37, subsection 4, reads as follows:

> If a question is of such a nature that in the opinion of the minister who is to furnish a reply, such reply should be in the form of a return, and the minister states that he has no objection to laying such return upon the table of the House, his statement shall, unless otherwise ordered by the House, be deemed an order of the House to that effect and the same shall be entered in the Votes and Proceedings as such.

My opinion was that this subsection applied and that the minister was at liberty to ask that the question stand as an order for return. I have since consulted the law officers and clerks of the House on the subject and have gone into it deeply, the more so because it seems that the wording of the subsection is very clear. Subsection 3 leaves it to the discretion of the Speaker to have declared as a notice of motion any question which may entail a lengthy answer, and subsection 4 leaves it to the minister himself to say whether the question covers such a wide range that it might properly, in order to avoid its remaining unanswered and appearing on the Order Paper from day to day, stand as an order for return. As I have stated, I have consulted the law officers of the House and they concur in my opinion. My ruling is, therefore, that the question in the present instance should stand as an order for return.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Ouimet:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, letters, tenders and other documents, exchanged between the Government and Hector Chevrier, regarding the contract for carying the mails between Rigaud and St. Redempteur, Quebec?

Mr. Seguin:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, memoranda and other documents, regarding the establishment of a Tobacco Experimental Station at l'Assomption, Quebec, and the purchasing of the college farm for this purpose.

ORIENTAL IMMIGRATION

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Centre Vancouver) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters and documents, since January 1st, 1922, that have passed between the Government of Canada or any Minister, or any of its officials and the Government of China, or the Consul General of China, or any other person representing the Government of China, relating to the further effective restriction of Chinese Immigration to Canada.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If my hon. friend has in mind the reference I made, in the course of the debate the other evening on oriental immigration, to interviews that had taken place between the Government and a representative of the government of China on this matter, I would say that the negotiations to which I referred were in the nature of personal interviews which I have had with the Chinese Consul General, Dr. Tsur, during the last two or three months on two or three different occasions. They have all been in the nature of personal interviews, and there is no correspondence to be brought down.

The same remarks would also apply to the next motion:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and documents, since January 1st, 1922, that have passed between the Government of Canada, or any minister, or any of its officials, and the Imperial Japanese Government, or the Consul General of Japan, or any other person representing the Imperial Japanese Government, relating to the further effective restriction of Japanese Immigration to Canada.

These matters in the opinion of the Government are more effectively dealt with by personal negotiation wherever possible. We happen to have in the Dominion at the present time as representatives of China and Japan respectively, two gentlemen who are very capable of conducting negotiations, and the Government is taking advantage of their presence to discuss these matters with them. I presume my hon. friend will not wish to press these two motions, seeing there is no correspondence.

Mr. STEVENS: If I understand my hon. friend correctly, there is no correspondence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No correspondence.

Motions withdrawn.

OLEOMARGARINE

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that in the best interests of the Dairy Industry and of the public generally, the manufacture and importation of Oleomargarine should be discontinued in Canada after September first next.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this question divides itself into two branches: one, the relation of oleomargarine to the dairying interests of Canada, and the other, its relation to the general public. Agriculture as we all know, is the basic industry of Canada, and dairying is the second most important branch of that industry, so I need make no apology for dealing with this question.

To begin at the very genesis of the subject we are asking for protection for the dairying interests of Canada—and I use the word protection not in its fiscal sense, because we are not asking for fiscal protection, but merely for that form of protection that the ordinary citizen is entitled to in his everyday relations, the kind of protection that a man says he is entitled to when he finds that his house has been broken into and he claims the protection of the law. This is the kind of protection we are asking for in this instance. You may call it preservation, if you like, or protection in the dictionary sense.

If it is proved, or can be proved, that oleomargarine is a correct substitute for butter, and can be made more cheaply in Canada than butter, then by all means let us change this resolution and prohibit the sale or manufacture of butter in Canada. That is logical and in thorough accord with economic laws, but it cannot be so argued, and it cannot be so proved. Oleomargarine is not a substitute for butter. It is a deceptive counterfeit, and intended to be sold as an imitation of butter, and not as a substitute. Whilst we are on the subject of the tariff, I might mention that the vegetable oils which form a large portion of oleomargarine pay a duty of 17½ per cent ordinary; that is, if they are brought into Canada and used in the manufacture of a paint, say, they pay 17½ per cent duty; but when entering into the manufacture of oleomargarine the duty is rebated, and the vegetable oils come in free. Not only that, but oleomargarine itself comes in free when imported from the United States. Although we have a duty on butter we have no duty on oleomargarine. There is a very small duty on butter, something equivalent to 5 per cent ad valorem, as compared with 33 per cent on textile products. In addition to allowing oleomargarine to come in and compete with butter, we allow the small quantity of butter that is embodied in oleomargarine to come in free. So the dairying interests are hit in both respects: the competition of oleomargarine coming in free and of vegetable oils coming in free, and of the butter in oleomargarine, which is a very small amount, also coming in free. The government returns since the importation and sale of oleomargarine were authorized some years ago, show that there is a marked tendency to encourage the importation of oleomargarine rather than its home manufacture. While the amount manufactured has decreased very greatly, and so has the amount imported, the amount imported has decreased to a lesser degree than the amount manufactured. In other words, the trend of trade is not to manufacture this article in Canada, but to import it entirely from the United States. So we are asked by those who are opposing this resolution to build up for the benefit of a United States industry the sale and manufacture of oleomargarine to compete with our own product of butter. Hon. members will bear in mind, I hope, the attitude of that same United States as regards our products. They have just put a prohibitory duty on butter going into the United States.

It may be a matter of interest to know that the customs have this difficulty confronting them to-day. The manufacturers of kitchen compounds, such as crisco, manufactured of lard and vegetable oils and brought in openly as such have to pay a duty. They have been applying to the customs to be allowed to bring this stuff in free because they say: "This is the same as oleomargarine, and oleomargarine is the same as this." But because they are honest and call the thing a kitchen cooking compound, they have to pay a considerable duty on it, while the so-called oleomargarine comes in absolutely free. Oleomargarine was prohibited from entering this country thirty-six years ago, and I have no doubt it would still be under prohibition if it had not been for the circumstances arising out of the late war. In December, 1917, I think it was, the war was on, and there was urgent necessity to conserve butter as it was needed by the men at the front. Accordingly, it was found necessary to ration the people of Canada. Butter was very scarce, exceedingly scarce, and it was also, naturally, dear. An Order in Council was passed in that month, in that year, allowing the introduction and sale of oleomargarine. That it was entirely and exclusively for that reason I shall show by a quotation from Hansard. The then Minister of Agriculture, now the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), in speaking to the subject quoted the Order in Council under which oleomargarine was allowed to be first used in Canada and these are the words of the Order in Council:

> Such regulations to be enforced and to have effect for the period during which the present abnormal conditions continue, the conclusion of such period to be determined by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, as provided in the regulations, and as a war measure only.

I would emphasize that oleomargarine was introduced and allowed in Canada in 1917 as a war measure only. Those are not the remarks of the hon. member for Marquette, but the exact words of the Order in Council. At that time very strong opposition to the proposition developed from the agricultural interests of Canada. The former member for, I think it was, Vaudreuil-Soulanges, now a senator, was one of those who headed the opposition; he presented a petition signed by twenty-seven thousand of his and other constituents against it. Resolutions were also brought in from eight hundred agricultural societies in eastern Canada and—very naturally—they strongly opposed the introduction of oleomargarine. However, the government of the day, and the then Minister of Agriculture, represented what the necessities of the day and of the hour were. There was the war situation, the scarcity of butter and its extremely high price; and an appeal was made to the patriotism of the dairying interests of Canada to stand back and allow this article to be introduced. The opponents of the proposition—without bringing the matter to a vote—withdrew their opposition, and the thing passed on the distinct understanding that the admission of oleomargarine was a war measure only and would be withdrawn as soon as the conditions referred to ceased to exist. Now the importation of oleomargarine was a matter of good faith on the part of the government. I submit, the war is over now, and those war conditions no longer exist—some war conditions exist, but not those in question—and as a matter of good faith to those men who sacrificed their interests on the occasion referred to, it is up to this House and this Government to implement the bargain entered into in good faith at that time, and restore the situation to where it was before.

Now as regards the other two aspects of the situation at that time—the scarcity and the high price of butter—what do we find to-day? Instead of the scarcity that then existed there is an enormous surplus. No section of the trading community responded to the plea, the demand, the request, of the government to produce more and more like the dairying interests did; they have produced to such an extent that to-day there is a large surplus that has to find a market in some foreign country. That surplus cannot find a market in the United States for a prohibition has been put upon its admission by the very country we are now being asked to benefit by allowing the admission of oleomargarine. Our surplus of butter must seek a market in Europe or elsewhere; but there is no question whatever that there is to-day—and there is a prospect of it being for a long time to come—a large surplus of butter in Canada that must be disposed of; and when there is a large surplus of any article in a country it is idle to say that that article is scarce; so that aspect of the subject can be considered disposed of.

Then we come to the question of prices. That I know is one that can be argued from every point of view. I simply make the statement and will leave it to other members, more personally familiar with the subject, to deal with the question of dairy products and the prices at which they are now being produced. I am credibly informed that dairy produce to-day is generally selling throughout Canada at a lower price than the actual cost of producing it. Therefore, we find that the war conditions—the fact of the butter being needed at the front, the scarcity, and the high price—have all passed away; and it is now left to us to observe good faith with the farmers of this country, and in view of the present abundance of butter and the existing low prices to put the trade back to where it was in the year 1917. So much for that branch of the subject, and as regards its relation to the dairying interest I think I have made out at least a plausible case.

4 p.m.

Now, as regards the relation of this question to the general public. The outstanding feature of oleomargarine is that it lends itself to pretence and fraud. It does more than that; it demands pretence and fraud because these are the very bases of the conditions of the trade. The successful manufacture and sale of oleomargarine depends entirely on how nearly it can approximate and pretend that it is something else than what it really is. The object is to make it look like butter; the object is to make it taste like butter; the object is to give it the same colour as butter; to put it up in a package similar to a package of butter and, as far as possible, by every available device, make it appear to be butter. It may be asked: If it really does look like butter, tastes like butter, smells like butter, and is coloured like butter, is it not as good as butter? But that is not the point. Chemists are so expert to-day that they can make anything taste like something else. We have only to go to a hospital here and find nurses administering the well-known medicine called castor oil, beloved of our youth. The nurses, to-day, before you take that dose will slip a little capsule into it and the taste of castor oil is gone. I remember the Canadian Pacific hotel in Vancouver being prosecuted some years ago for serving duck out of season. The game warden was alert, and had dinner at the hotel, and kept a portion of the bird served to him which he said was duck, as did also a number of friends. The hotel management was prosecuted and when the chef—of course being in British Columbia he was a Chinese—was asked what had been served he said: "I catchem veal I heap savey make him taste all the same, duck". In this instance the chef made the veal served to taste exactly like duck. So it is with oleomargarine. When you are told that it tastes like butter, that it looks like butter and has the smell of butter, it by no means follows that it has the same food value as butter.

As regards the matter of the colouring I would like to quote again from Hansard—the question was very thoroughly debated last year and the year before. During the debate one hon. member whose constituency I forget—stated that a special committee investigated the question some years ago. Apparently this hon. member had taken part in it, and he asked one of the witnesses, the manager of one of these large manufacturing companies, a question. They were talking about oleomargarine and the witness had said that he bought June butter as much as possible because June butter is of a higher colour. He explained that the reason they bought June butter to mix with this oleo mess was because it was of a higher colour and made the product look a little more like butter. Now the hon. member in question asked of that witness this question:

> Is it not a fact that you realize that if it was sold without any coloring it would be unsaleable?

The manufacturer in reply to this question said:

> It would not be so palatable, it would be like using lard.

So that is the situation: If it were not for the little admixture of butter and the colouring that is put into it to make it look like the same thing, to use oleomargarine would be like using lard. That is not my opinion; that is the sworn evidence of a manufacturer of oleomargarine himself.

Mr. HARRIS: Was that a manufacturer in Canada or a manufacturer in the United States?

Mr. NEILL: That particular man was a manufacturer in Canada. The trouble with oleomargarine is that it is a sickly white looking mess, it has not even approximately the appearance of butter, and the great effort therefore is to make it look like butter. In the United States, where the trade has got a regrettable hold on the public the manufacturers went to the government and said: If you will allow us to colour our oleomargarine—not to put in any other valuable ingredient whatever but just to colour it—we will voluntarily pay you ten cents a pound of an excise duty. This is an industry going to the government and offering, for this simple little concession, to agree to pay an excise tax of ten cents a pound, or nearly 50 per cent of the cost of production, provided that they are allowed to do—what? Only to put a little, simple, harmless colouring into this stuff. Why? Was it to make it more palatable, wholesome, or valuable? Not a bit of it—it was to make it more fraudulent, to make it look more like butter than it did before, if presented to ignorant or uninformed people. But this colouring did not add anything to the value or to the food content; it simply made it look more like butter. And for that privilege they were able to pay a high excise tax.

Mr. EULER: Colouring is often added to butter itself. Does that make butter any more palatable?

Mr. NEILL: I do not quite see the bearing on the question; but as a matter of fact I will leave it to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) to deal with that. I am of opinion that colouring is not allowed to be added to butter.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Yes, it is.

Mr. NEILL: It is not added to butter in the dairying district that I represent. More than that, I find in Hansard a statement that colouring is not added to butter. That would appear to be borne out, because we find the manager of this factory saying: "We made it a special object to buy June butter because that was more highly coloured." If I am wrong in that respect, I am wrong; but that does not affect the question of the colouring of oleomargarine. I am not aware that any agricultural industry ever offered to pay the Government 10 cents a pound for the privilege of colouring.

Mr. LADNER: Does the hon, member suggest that oleomargarine is coloured in Canada? Does he not know that the regulations prohibit that?

Mr. NEILL: Yes. I was not talking about oleomargarine in Canada; I was talking about oleomargarine in the United States, and I was endeavouring to show that they were so anxious to be allowed to make it look more like butter that they offered this inducement. In Canada, they are not allowed to introduce any colouring into oleomargarine, I quite admit, and I am well aware of that; but let this resolution be defeated to-day, and it will be only a few years before they will be making to the government of Canada the same proposition as they have made successfully to the government of the United States as regards paying an additional tax if they are allowed to colour oleomargarine. Oleomargarine in Canada is not at present coloured except by butter being added to it.

Mr. GOOD: The hon. member has stated that this offer which has been made by United States manufacturers has been made successfully. Has he ascertained it to be a fact that the United States Government has added an excise duty of ten cents a pound for the privilege of putting in colouring?

Mr. NEILL: I take all my information on this point from Hansard of last year, and if it is not correct, it ought to be. As a matter of fact, it is correct; the United States Government accepted that offer and imposed that tax. But the manufacturers endeavour to evade it in this way: When a man buys, say a thousand pounds of oleomargarine, they send it out uncoloured, but they send a package of colouring along with it, so that the man can add the colouring. As regards Hansard, it was stated definitely last year that that was the law in force in the United States.

In regard to the matter of standards, in the United States—and again I am quoting Hansard, I hope correctly—they have a strict standard which must be lived up to in the manufacture of this product. In Canada, I think it is an absolute fact that there is no standard whatever. I have in my hand literature which I will deal with later on, which talks vaguely and beautifully about the contents, but which does not tell us what the percentages of the ingredients are. Again I quote from Hansard. Somebody gave evidence before this commission as to how the analysis of different samples of oleomargarine varied, and this is the answer:

> It was found that the content of tallow in oleomargarine varied as widely as from 22 per cent to 47 per cent and lard varied from 6 per cent to 28 per cent, vegetable oil varied from 15 to 49 per cent.

Does that not open a very wide field for every kind of fraud? How does the poor man, about whom we hear so much, know, when he is buying oleomargarine, whether he is getting a brand with 49 per cent of vegetable oil, or only 15 per cent? When we compare that with the strict governmental rules under which butter is made, handled, stored and sold, we wonder why so much favour is accorded the manufacturer of oleomargarine.

Oleomargarine contains butter and milk to a certain extent. That fact is very widely advertised in their propaganda, but we are not told how much butter or how much milk it contains. Great stress is laid on the fact that it contains butter and milk —and the only decent thing about it is that it contains butter and milk. Some months ago I went into a store in the lower part of the town—not this town—where poor people would naturally stay, and I asked for a pound of oleomargarine. As it was being put up, I apparently hesitated, and I asked whether it would not be more profitable for me to pay the extra spread on butter; but the man assured me with emphasis that there was no need for that; that this was practically 75 per cent butter. He may not have known that he was lying; he may have been told that; but if I was an uninformed man and was told that I could get this stuff at twenty cents cheaper and that it was 75 per cent butter, I would be likely to say: "That is good enough for me." That shows how easy it is to deceive the public in an article like this. In other articles the deception would be apparent. No doubt that man had a reason for trying to sell me oleomargarine, because he was making a bigger profit out of it. That may account for the circular distributed amongst us from the Retail Merchants' Association advocating that they might be allowed to continue to sell oleomargarine. Oleomargarine is manufactured in Canada by a very small and close monopoly; and naturally, under those conditions, while butter is made by hundreds of thousands of people and sold by thousands of stores, and the price is well known, the competition keen and the profit small, when you get an article on which there is a monopoly and it is sold by itself, the profit is great, and it is more profitable to sell oleomargarine than butter. The hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Boyer) last year in the debate, stated that the spread between the cost price and the selling price of oleomargarine at that time was twenty-five cents. I understand the spread in this town to-day between oleomargarine and butter is as high as twenty cents. That may be only a piece of rather astute propaganda, because they know that this matter is coming up. I have it on the authority of no less than the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) that last year the spread in Ottawa between oleomargarine and butter was only seven cents a pound. I find that also in Hansard.

The difficulty to distinguish between the two leads to the greatest difficulty in the detection of fraud in connection with oleomargarine. In the United States, thousands of cases are brought up every year, and they are not able to convict more than a very small percentage of those who are guilty, on account of the difficulty of being able to detect the fraud. It was only last year or possibly two years ago, small as the trade in oleomargarine is, that 2,000 pounds of it were seized as near to the city as Montreal. It was being sold as butter. That also, I get from the politician's Bible—Hansard. It would take, not an army of inspectors, who come in contact only with the operations in the factories, but an army of detectives to ferret out every instance of this fraud, because they would need to go into all the stores, the cheap restaurants and the boarding houses; for the Government statistics show that these are the people who most frequently buy oleomargarine. That is the sort of trade the manufacturers of oleomargarine cater to. Those who suffer are the poorer people who are less well informed, less able to investigate the respective merits of this spurious article and genuine butter, and whose physical condition makes them less able to afford to buy an inferior food. They are the ones who are most likely to be imposed upon. Amongst the many regulations which have been vainly framed in an attempt to cope with this situation is the one that requires a card to be posted in every eating house where oleomargarine is sold. That has been the law since December, 1917. We in this House are a body representative of all the people throughout Canada. Now, I wonder how many hon. members can rise in their places and declare that they have seen such a card, printed in inch-and-a-half letters, in any public eating place. I have never seen any such placard myself, although I have been given oleomargarine to eat in some of these places. Earlier in the session a friend said to me: "If you are down on Chinese cooking I would advise you to go to such-and-such a restaurant; they advertise all 'white' cooking". I thought it would be a change, for once at any rate, to eat something that no Chinaman had cooked, and so I went to this place to which I had been directed. But when the girl who took the order passed through the swinging door on her way to the kitchen I saw my old friend Wong Fung Choo,—the same fellow I have seen at every restaurant between here and the Pacific. He was back on the job again. The only attempt which this restaurant made at serving white cooking was to put a white suit and a white cap on Wong's head. But I was sufficiently familiar with my old friend to recognize him under this disguise. The restaurant has since been burned, my friend Wong, I trust, along with it. It is about as easy to stop the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine as butter, as it is to prevent the importation of Asiatics under a "gentleman's agreement". The parallel is exact, and we in British Columbia know how easy the latter problem is.

There is another aspect of the butter situation,—this is a dry subject, even if it is greasy. There is a substance in butter which is known technically as the vitamines. There are three classes of vitamines, but the principal one is that which is soluble in fait; I think it is called "soluble A". That vitamine is composed of a substance which is derived from leaves. If one could eat about four pounds of leaves he would be able in that way to obtain the proportion of vitamines essential to health. But one could not conveniently do that, and so nature has provided the dairy cow as a means of furnishing this indispensable element. The dairy cow eats the leaves and through the milk and butter which we get from her we obtain the vitamines that are absolutely needed for the proper growth of children, especially young children, as well as for young people of fifteen and sixteen years of age, and invalids. I desire to be perfectly accurate, because I know that there are able men coming after me who will try to tear my argument to pieces. I will admit frankly, therefore, that vitamines are found to a very limited extent in beef suet. The proportion, however, is so small as to be negligible; and when the contention is made that oleomargarine contains vitamines it is nothing but a mere pretence. It would be equally true for one to say that the ocean contains gold, because nearly all salt water contains some gold; but the gold content is so infinitesimal that no sane man would contemplate the ocean as a gold mining possibility. And so with regard to the presence of vitamines in oleomargarine. In dairy products, on the other hand, vitamines are found in abundance, particularly in butter and cheese. Now, I have a great deal of evidence which I shall not undertake to read. It was given before that special committee and was also submitted by members of the House last year, and it all goes to show that dairy products are absolutely necessary if you want to develop strong vigorous children. The lack of genuine butter and other dairy products is responsible for the nervous and neurotic condition of so many children. It is this lack of proper nourishment that causes the disease known as rickets. Good butter is also much more easily digested by invalids and children. You can imagine what oleomargarine is like when a manufacturer of this substance said that if it were not for the little butter in it it would be like eating lard. And that, certainly, would not be acceptable to a weak stomach, as I happen to know,—I have a weak stomach myself; and when I am eating oleomargarine I need no card with letters of any size to tell me of the fact. By the way, when I say that I have a weak stomach I am speaking physically; I am not referring to my mental or political stomach which has long since got enured to any diet; so that politically I can swallow anything.

I have been trying to make my remarks as brief as possible commensurate with the importance of the subject under consideration; but I shall read an extract or two before I conclude. In the Hansard to which I have referred allusion is made to a number of experiments—as a matter of fact they were demonstrations—carried out in hospitals, orphan homes and gaols, to show the respective merits of oleomargarine and butter; and in every case it was proved that the most economical, from the poor man's point of view as well as from that of the authorities, was the dairy product. There is only one other matter to which I shall refer now, as I shall have an opportunity later to answer any counter arguments that may be advanced. There has been an intense and expensive propaganda—lobby work—in connection with this matter during the last few weks. I know I should hate to pay the printing bill. It has even gone beyond the circulation of printed matter; the subject has been treated in editorials in the newspapers. I have in my possession an appeal, apparently sent me by mistake, asking me to deal with the question editorially if I thought fit to do so; and I see that some people have thought fit to take it up editorially. Reading some of these editorials, I have recognized in them so striking a resemblance to the printed propaganda of the manufacturers that it is almost too much to believe that they were written by the editors themselves. They follow almost word for word the printed matter circulated by the manufacturers. I would ask hon. members where they think the money is coming from to pay for this propaganda. The rules and regulations surrounding the manufacture of oleomargarine are of such a restrictive character that they practically preclude all but two firms from manufacturing this commodity. It is impossible, to all intents and purposes, for any one else to manufacture it. There are just these two corporations manufacturing oleomargarine here and importing it, into Canada, although possibly more than the two import it. One of these firms is a big American concern, while the other is supposed to be Canadian. They had four factories operating when they first started, and last year they turned out together, by the government returns, 1,900,000 pounds odd, or about 230 tons each per factory. Any one who knows anything about running a factory will realize what a substantial loss must have been incurred in connection with such a small output as 230 tons a year, unless one of two conditions obtained: either a very big profit, or the expectation of an enormous profit in the future. The consumption of oleomargarine in Canada dropped, from the year 1918—only four years ago—from 13,000,000 pounds annually to 3,000,000 pounds odd. So that you can see that, with the equipment originally installed, a heavy loss must have been incurred unless they made an enormous profit or expect to make that profit in the future. The object of this propaganda therefore must surely be to recoup the manufacturers for these losses by seeking to create a larger demand for this product once they can get it thoroughly established in Canada.

Now, it is a well-known doctrine, both political and legal, that when you have a bad case you should abuse your opponent, and when you have a weak case you should misrepresent facts, seeing that you cannot be worse off anyway. I want to read some of this propaganda and explain briefly how very misrepresenting it is. Any propaganda that has to misrepresent plain facts must surely be fundamentally weak. We find, in an article that has been in the hands of all hon. members, and of which I have received copies, a statement as to what oleomargarine is composed of.

> It is made of—
> A, pure, highly refined beef and pork fats;
> B, creamery butter and fresh milk;
> C, other vegetable fats.

I will show you what they say about the creamery butter and fresh milk later on.

> Oleomargarine is 75 per cent the product of Canadian farms.

I have read that statement in a great many newspapers lately, and no doubt this is the source of its origin. Oleomargarine is not made of 75 per cent of the product of Canadian farms. The product imported last year from the United States was 1,300,000 pounds of oleomargarine; the amount manufactured in Canada was 1,900,000 pounds. Of the total product only 68 per cent was manufactured in Canada. And yet we are told that 75 per cent of the oleomargarine manufactured in Canada is 75 per cent the product of Canadian farms. But it is not true to say that 75 per cent of what is manufactured in Canada—which is only 68 per cent of the total—is made out of the product of Canadian farms. Still less is it true that 75 per cent of all used in Canada was the product of Canadian farms. That is utterly ignoring the large and ever-decreasing amount imported; but while decreasing, it is not decreasing so rapidly as the manufactured stuff. We find another statement:

Growth accessories are found in oleo oil from which oleomargarine is prepared.

That is one of those subtle half-truths which are partly true and utterly false. There is so small, so fractional a quantity of growth accessories in oleo oil as to be negligible. A small amount is found, yes, but it is not comparable with the amount found in butter.

There is an undoubted demand for oleomargarine by a large body of Canadian consumers.

Very well, we will take their own figures, not the government returns, which differ, I may say, from this statement. Their own figures will tell you what the demand was. In the year 1918 the total consumption, supposing that all that was brought into Canada and all that was manufactured here was eaten, was 13,997,000 pounds, practically 14,000,000 pounds. That was the year of war when butter was scarce and high. In the year 1921 it was 3,200,000 pounds odd. It has dropped down from 14,000,000 to 3,000,000 pounds, and yet we are told that there is "an undoubted demand for oleomargarine by a large body of Canadian consumers." Divide 3,200,000 pounds by the population of Canada, and I do not think it can be shown that there is a very heavy demand for oleomargarine at the present time.

An hon. MEMBER: During that period of reduction has there been any further restriction against the use of oleomargarine?

Mr. NEILL: No; that is the first suggestion I have heard of any further restriction. Reason No. 13:

Over 1,000,000 pounds a month are now consumed in Canada—proof of its acceptability.

That is 12,000,000 pounds a year, is it not? And yet last year the government returns shows that the total amount imported and manufactured—not consumed—was only 3,200,000 pounds odd. Yet the manufacturers make the bare, bald statement in order to pervert the minds of the readers of this pamphlet that over 1,000,000 pounds a month is being consumed. An argument based on grounds so far removed from the facts is calculated to discredit many more of the arguments contained in this pamphlet, for it is always safe to judge the unknown by the known. Further on there is this statement:

Provision should be made to protect the public from fraud in connection with oleomargarine and all other products.

It is too costly, and they know it cannot be done.

No legislation should limit the legitimate manufacture and sale of oleomargarine.

I may say that no legislation should limit the manufacture of jemmies and other house-breaking tools; but their manufacture is forbidden by law. But what are you going to do with them if their manufacture is legitimate? What are you going to do with oleomargarine when it is manufactured? You are going to use it for an illegal purpose—to palm it off as butter.

It is in common use in Australia, New Zealand and the United States.

This is in deep, bold, black letters. That is only one-third true and two-thirds false. It is not in common use in Australia, it is in use to only a limited extent; and it is not in use in New Zealand at all. It is not forbidden, but it is not in use. I suppose it can be said that it is in common use in some parts of the United States. They tell you what oleomargarine is made of:

1. Oleo Oil—

They tell you how nice oleo oil is, but they do not tell you whether 22 per cent or 44 per cent comprises the ingredient.

2. Neutral—lard,—

They do not say whether it is 6 per cent or 48 per cent which contains lard. The third ingredient is milk. They say:

Milk—the fats are churned with milk under the most rigid sanitary inspection.

But they do not tell you how much milk is used. You can guess at it.

4. Butter—finest creamery butter containing no artificial colour is used.

Dairy butter is not good enough for them, only the "finest creamery butter containing no artificial colour is used." "It contains no artificial colouring." That is where I got my information about Canadian butter containing no artificial colouring. If my statement is incorrect, it is only one more misstatement contained in this pamphlet. Let me tell you what they say in another part of this propaganda. They are talking about oleomargarine, and they say:

The whole is churned in milk and a small percentage of butter is used by some makers.

This is not my propaganda, it is not even Hansard, it is by the same people, the Canadian manufacturers of oleomargarine. They say, "a small percentage of butter is used by some makers." But here they get busy and say, "the finest creamery butter containing no artificial colour is used." "Some" butter is used by "some" people.

We find that these products are mixed together and churned. No Sir, they are not churned, because I take again the word of the manufacturers here. The products are mulsified, they are made into an emulsion, the same as in the manufacture of soap—the process is identical, and the result is very little different. Churning is a process by which you draw out of something, such as milk, butter fat. You could churn this stuff until doomsday and you would not produce any more satisfactory stuff than you put into it. They say that the whole mixture is made —into a palatable form from those fats, which, although quite wholesome, could not otherwise be used as a spread-for-bread.

It must be palatable if, as stated, it is "like eating lard." Then we find this statement in regard to food value:

The British government a few years ago made tests of the calorie value of oleomargarine, and, as a result, they adopted it for use in government institutions.

But, Mr. Speaker, we know that British margarine is very superior to the Canadian or American product. It is made under strict regulations and has to conform to a high standard. If they found it of so high a standard why did not they quote the tests imposed by the British Government? The manufacturers of oleomargarine are not modest. They would have quoted the blue book, but they do not. They say:

The British government found it highly satisfactory.

Further on we find the following:

Tests of the energy-value of oleomargarine made recently by a competent authority resulted interestingly. Calorific value in separate fats showed many brands averaged 3,710 calories per pound.

But they do not tell you who the "competent authority" is. Would it not have been a good thing to tell you who made those tests? We also find the following:

Oleomargarine should sell under its own name and on its own merits. It should not be allowed to trade on the name of any other product.

Absolutely correct. I say, "amen" with all my heart. Neither let it trade upon the appearance, taste or colour of butter. Let it sell on its own basis as a cooking article. We are told further on:

Oleomargarine came into existence because of a shortage of palatable, edible fats and oleomargarine has thrived because the production of these has never kept pace with the growth of population.

The production of butter fats in Canada has more than kept pace with the growth of population, and oleomargarine cannot be said to be "thriving" when its consumption dropped from 14,000,000 pounds to 3,000,000 pounds in four years. I think that is an exaggeration, to say the best of it. Later on we find quotations from various gentlemen, from worthy and admirable members of parliament who made certain remarks in the House last year on this subject, and extracts are given from Hansard. But, curiously enough, all these gentlemen quoted are speaking in favour of oleomargarine—Mr. Michael Clark of Red Deer and four other hon. gentlemen. But why did the manufacturers not say that thirty-five pages of Hansard are full of the remarks of people who are not in favour of oleomargarine? Why did he not tell you, if he wanted to put it fairly and honestly, that the government of the day, strongly entrenched as they were with a good majority behind them, could have put through any bill they liked? It was brought down in the form of a bill in the name of the Minister of Agriculture, and when that hon. gentleman introduced it he said: We are going to pass this bill. But the pressure was so great, exerted as it was by members on both sides who were united in objection to the measure, that the minister rose in his place and said: Boys, we will pull it out, if you will only be good, and we will put it in for one year only. So he withdrew his bill in deference to the measure of opposition that developed in the House, though he could have put it through if he had liked. That is a fair statement of the facts in that connection.

Now, I wish to quote one more passage from this pamphlet, and it is the gem of the whole collection. They wind up with the production of opinions by experts. You all know that you can get an expert's opinion on almost anything; you can get one medical man to swear that a man is insane and you can get another to swear that he is not insane. This pamphlet, this propaganda, quotes four experts—all, no doubt, very estimable men. Here is one of them:

> Dr. H. W. Wiley, the noted pure food authority of the United States government, in 1900—

That was eleven years ago, wasn't it?

> —testified before the Agricultural Committee.

I do not know what committee is referred to. He testifies as follows:

> In all my extensive analysis of butterine or oleomargarine, nothing objectionable or deleterious to health has ever been found, and oleomargarine, as made to-day, is pure, palatable and more nutritious than butter.

The most extravagant assertion of the maker of this dope is out-Heroded by this one—that oleomargarine is "more nutritious than butter." Now, I will give you Mr. Wiley's comments on this same subject as quoted in the House and found on Hansard at page 934. The name is given in this case as "Dr. Harvey Wiley"; in the pamphlet from which I have just quoted it is given as "H. W. Wiley"; I assume that the same man is referred to. I quote from page 934 of Hansard as follows:

> Dr. Harvey Wiley stated in a recent issue of Good House-keeping: "As far as I am concerned, I should never give my children nut margarine, oleomargarine, or any other margarine, as a substitute for butter. Butter contains a vital principle necessary to the growth of children which none of its substitutes possess. I should never give children nor grown persons in my family food products containing a preservative such as benzoate of soda.

I wonder which remark was made first; has the mountain come to Mahomet, or Mahomet to the mountain? That, I think, will cast some doubt upon the evidence of experts, when you find them saying a certain thing at one time and quite another thing—as is alleged—at another. Now, when witnesses in a court of law are proved to be incredible on several important points, their evidence is thrown out on all points. You often hear a judge say: I do not believe that witness; I have found him so incorrect on so many points; he may be trying to tell the truth but he is evidently unable to do it. We will give our friends the benefit of the doubt; we will say this propaganda was formulated in ignorance—perhaps it was; at any rate, I submit that it is not worthy of credence. I submit that I have produced evidence that will commend itself to the judgment of hon. members, and, with the facts which will be brought out by other hon. gentlemen more conversant with the technical branches of the subject than I am, will convince the House that we ought to keep faith with the farmers and go back to the conditions as they existed in the year 1917.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria city): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and to the compliments which he has paid to the manufacturers of oleomargarine. I think, however, that in one or two respects his statements are subject to correction.

The hon. gentleman said that the spread between the price of butter and the price of oleo at the present time—in this city to-day the price of creamery butter is 48 cents; of animal oleo, 28 cents, and of vegetable oleo, 24 cents—was due to propaganda. Now, I know the gentlemen interested in the manufacture of oleomargarine; they are reputable citizens, and I think the hon. member ought to have proof before he makes statements of that kind. This spread, as in the case of nearly all manufactured articles, is due largely to the cost of ingredients used in the manufacture, and to other business conditions which vary, as all know, from time to time.

With regard to the cooking compounds, I may say that practically all these compounds are now made in Canada; the oils used therein are imported in their crude state, duty free. I might point out, too, that oleomargarine is not the only thing that is used to "humbug the public"—if that is done. There are many other things that can be twisted about in the ordinary channels of trade to deceive the public. I do not think anything has been done in connection with oleo in that respect which is not done in other lines, as I hope to prove a little later.

The hon. gentleman has suggested that the English margarine is very much superior to that which is produced in Canada, due, as he says, to close inspection. I do not think that the English inspection can be any closer than that which is applied in Canada. The work is carried on only in certain licensed establishments under the close supervision of our Meat Inspection Branch, a branch of the Department of Agriculture which has established for itself a very high reputation. Every movement connected with the handling of all the materials used in the manufacture of oleomargarine is subject to the most careful inspection.

If we were to follow out the desire of the mover of this resolution we would simply take away from the people of Canada the privilege of purchasing a wholesome food which is manufactured and sold in practically all other countries. It is a food that was used by our soldiers throughout the war, and whether it contains a high percentage of vitamines or a low percentage, certainly the Canadian troops did not lack "pep" when they met the Germans. Moreover, the hon. gentleman would place entirely in the hands of the dairymen the manufacture of a material which is used as a spread for our bread and for many other purposes. Now, the dairymen are a very reputable lot of people; the dairy industry is one of the most important in the country; I am a dairyman myself. But I do not feel that the dairymen have the right to demand as much protection as is asked for by this resolution; I do not think the Canadian dairymen really need it. If the butter makers of the United States can make butter at a profit notwithstanding the sale of oleo in that country, surely the Canadian dairymen can do likewise.

There is no question at all about the wholesomeness of this article, which has long since been accepted all over the world as a useful food product. The dairyman prepares his butter from milk products, and he has the right to colour that product and make it look like June grass butter all the year round. The beef men should have the same privilege in the matter of marketing to the best possible advantage the oil obtained from the beef. I may say that the by-products of the ox play a most important part in the price paid to the farmer for the living animal. All farmers who are producing beef cattle will agree that the price of beef cattle has gone down very largely in late years, due to the fact that the by-products have fallen in value. If this resolution should pass and no legislation be brought down to extend the period during which the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in this country shall be permitted, then the oils obtained from some 600,000 head of cattle passing through our inspected abattoirs every year would have to find a market somewhere else. That is one reason why the manufacture of oleomargarine should be permitted in this country, under careful inspection.

Again, I submit that it is preposterous that we should take away from the poor men of this country the privilege of buying oleomargarine if they wish to do so. By "poor men" I mean those who are working for the smaller wage—for salaries which, perhaps, permit them to make a living only by the careful exercise of economy—men with large families; men who have heavy expenditures to meet throughout the year. I say it is preposterous that we should take from these men the privilege of buying a wholesome food article like oleomargarine if they wish to buy it. The force of this statement is accentuated by the present scarcity of work throughout the country; there is hardly a city in Canada which has not had a long bread line of unemployed during the last few months.

Oleomargarine does not interfere with the production of first-class butter, but it does check to a certain extent production of the lower grades of butter, those grades that our Department of Agriculture is making a strong effort to have the farmers leave alone altogether in favour of a better quality. It has been well proven, too, that no one will buy oleomargarine if it is possible to buy butter at a reasonable price. This is clearly shown, I think, by comparing the figures for the last few years. In 1918, oleomargarine was manufactured in Canada, to the amount of 10,483,179 pounds, with 3,494,622 pounds imported, making a total of 13,977,801 pounds. In 1921 we manufactured 3,780,392 pounds, and imported 2,057,035 pounds, making a total of 5,837,427 pounds, showing a falling off between 1918 and 1921 of no less than 8,140,374 pounds, or something over 60 per cent. That shows that as the price of butter went down from the highest peak, the consumption of oleomargarine decreased to a very great extent indeed.

In 1918 we manufactured 93,298,348 pounds of creamery butter, and in 1921 that had increased, in round figures, to 111,000,000 pounds, an increase of 17,701,652 pounds, in spite of this awful competition from oleomargarine. The total consumption of butter in 1921 is estimated by our dairy branch of the Department of Agriculture at roughly 240,000,000 pounds, as against a consumption of oleomargarine of 5,837,427 pounds, or slightly over 2 per cent, and certainly not any competition to be alarmed at. This shows that during this period the manufacture of creamery butter has made very substantial gains over the manufacture of oleomargarine, and it is another indication that the people will not willingly buy oleomargarine if good butter is to be had at a reasonable price.

Some of the most important dairy countries are the largest consumers of oleomargarine. In many of these countries in Europe, the high priced butter is shipped to other countries, and oleomargarine is consumed at home There is no country with a greater reputation for butter perhaps than Denmark, where in one year the population consumed 44 pounds of oleomargarine per head.

One of the best gauges of the prosperity of the dairy industry is the price of dairy cows. That gives you a good line on the prosperity of the business and the sale of dairy products. During the years when the largest quantity of oleomargarine was imported and manufactured in this country, we found the prices of dairy cows perhaps the highest on record for very many years.

What is oleomargarine? It consists of oleo oils and of edible beef fats. Let me say that these fats are secured from the carcasses of animals slaughtered in inspected establishments. No other fats are permissible except those imported accompanied by a certificate to that effect. There is a division between the edible beef fats and the non-edible beef fats. Oleomargarine also contains neutral lard, which is also secured under inspection; fresh milk from cows that have been tested with tuberculin, or milk that has been pasteurized; butter that is free from rancidity and is of first-class quality; vegetable oils, imported into this country from the United States principally, accompanied by a certificate from the Bureau of Chemistry at Washington—in fact, our Minister of Agriculture can ask for any certificate he wishes that will appear to cover the situation. In addition to these other ingredients, oleomargarine contains a small quantity of salt. Nut margarine is made entirely from vegetable products, and is churned with fresh milk. As I have already pointed out, all these articles are manufactured under the very strictest inspection and must be accompanied with proper certificates when imported into this country.

I must admit that when I first heard about the manufacture of oleomargarine, I pictured this material being gathered in the ordinary country slaughter-house and I was rather in favour of not permitting its competition with the dairy products of this country. However, after having an opportunity to investigate the matter thoroughly by visiting the establishments where oleomargarine is made, and after making a very careful inspection, in which I was aided by the experience I have gained in my profession, I entirely changed my opinion. I find that generally, in fact, altogether, the conditions under which oleomargarine is prepared and these fats are secured, under careful and constant inspection, are decidedly better than the conditions that prevail in the average dairy barn in this country.

In connection with our regulations governing the manufacture of oleomargarine, the dairyman has been very carefully protected, as well as the consumer. In the first place, this article is not permitted to be manufactured except in licensed establishments where inspection is carried on. No colouring matter is allowed to be added in the manufacture of oleomargarine. No colouring matter is permitted to be sold or given away with packages of oleomargarine. No mixing of butter with oleomargarine is permitted by anybody without a license, which means that the business is confined to these establishments. They are not permitted to use the words "butter," "creamery," "dairy," or the name of any breed of cattle on the package or in any advertising. The labels and brands must be approved by the Minister of Agriculture. Here is one of the packages with the word "oleomargarine" plainly showing. Here is another one in which the material is put up, and on the material itself the word "oleo" is stamped in very large letters. Careful record is kept of all oleomargarine sales by all our wholesale dealers in this material. They are compelled to sell only in the original packages. The importation and manufacture of oleomargarine is entirely under the supervision of our Veterinary Director General and his efficient aggregation of inspectors. The Dairy Commissioner takes care of sales within the country and the use of oleomargarine.

Let us see what have been the results from the enforcement of the law. We find that in 1919, there were eight convictions for infractions of the oleomargarine law, as against 111 for the sale of bad butter. In 1920 there were twelve convictions under the oleo law and 126 convictions for the sale of bad butter. In 1921 there were fourteen convictions for selling oleo against the law, and 126 for selling bad butter; showing that the producers of good butter have no reason to fear the manufacturer and dealer in oleo so much as the man who produces bad butter in competition with it. This indicates—

Mr. WARNER: Could the hon. member give the number of firms that were selling oleomargarine alone compared with the number that were selling butter alone?

Mr. TOLMIE: I could not give my hon. friend figures in that form. I presume that in a great many of the grocery stores it is the usual thing—it is pretty usual in our country—to sell both oleomargarine and butter. The figures I have given indicate that it is much easier to control the sale of oleomargarine under the present law than it is to control the sale of butter produced in many establishments where constant inspection is not carried out.

I quite agree with the previous speaker in one or two points. I think we should certainly impose a duty on oleomargarine coming into this country; and I think we might even go further and fix a standard for oleomargarine. I understand that some of the European manufacturers now deodorize the oil obtained from the British Columbia whale and use it in the manufacture of oleomargarine. I am told the work is done so completely that no fishy flavour of any kind attaches to the resultant product. In this country the manufacturers confine themselves exclusively to the use of the vegetable and animal oils obtained from our killing establishments throughout the country.

Mr. STANSELL: Are all these oils obtained from the killing establishments in our own country?

Mr. TOLMIE: Some of them are imported from the United States. When so imported, they are accompanied by a certificate from the Bureau of Animal Industry at Washington. As perhaps my hon. friend knows, these certificates are exchanged between our Health of Animals branch in Canada and the Bureau of Animal Industry in the United States; each country accepts the certificates of the other.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to take up the time of the House any longer than to say that I feel that this material being healthy in its nature, should be permitted to be sold in Canada. Those who desire to buy it should have that privilege if they wish. But we should carefully protect by inspection the manufacture and sale of such commodities so that there will be no interference with dairy produce, and I think my figures prove that the trade in oleomargarine has not at present any such effect. The by-products, as I have pointed out, play a very important part in the sale of beef animals within the country, and on this account I think we should permit the sale of oleomargarine in Canada, as its sale is permitted in other countries. I may say that I am a dairyman, engaged in the dairy business at the present time on the Pacific coast. I am also a breeder of pure bred cattle, and perhaps if I were to oppose the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in this country I might make a good many friends among the dairymen. At the same time, however, I think that in this House we should take a broader view of the subject. Personally I feel that oleomargarine is a good thing to have in Canada, that it is for the benefit of the great mass of the people. Under the circumstances I propose to forget my attachment to the dairy industry for the present and oppose the resolution.

Mr. LEWIS: Can my hon. friend give us any explanation as to why the Danish farmer sells his butter to Great Britain and is in such poor circumstances that he has to eat a substitute for that butter? Also does my hon. friend suggest that the Canadian dairy farmer should do the same thing in the case of his family?

Mr. TOLMIE: I have no suggestion to offer as to how the Canadian dairy farmer should best act in the interest of his family; I have one family and I feel that is about all that I can take care of. I think it is generally understood that the Danish farmer sells his butter to Great Britain and eats oleomargarine because he wishes to pocket the difference in the price of these commodities, which is very substantial.

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): The question of prohibiting the manufacture of oleomargarine in Canada has been debated in this House for several sessions. I am of opinion that a good deal of time thas been wasted because of the fact that each succeeding session witnesses a repe-

5 p.m. tition of the arguments of the session before; and for that reason I rise to-da , more than perhaps from any other motive, to suggest that on this occasion we settle once and for all the question of whether oleomargarine shall be made and sold in this country. To my mind there are only two real factors governing the case, and they are these: Is oleomargarine a wholesome product, is it a fit food for the people of Canada? That is one consideration. The other: Is oleomargarine sold for what it is, and not represented as being something else? If we can establish that oleomargarine is a wholesome product, and that it is not sold under misrepresentation, then I contend that it is a legitimate article of commerce, and that this Parliament should not interfere with its manufacture and sale under proper safeguards. So far as I have heard, the mover of the resolution has not made out a case showing that oleomargarine is detrimental to the health of the consumer; in fact, I think it is pretty generally admitted that such a claim cannot successfully be made. We have had the testimony of the Dominion Analyst that oleomargarine is a wholesome commodity. Last year, and again to-day, the ex-Minister of Agriculture testified as to that, and I have a very high regard for his opinion. Oleomargarine is made under license, it is manufactured in government inspected institutions, its sale is surrounded by all sorts of safeguards. At the same time I would say this: If the sale of oleomargarine, in so far as misrepresentation is concerned, is not yet sufficiently safeguarded, as my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) would indicate, I would be quite in favour of passing such further restrictions as will ensure that the interests of the people shall be adequately protected. It is not even suggested seriously that oleomargarine is ever sold in Canada for anything other than what it actually is. The ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) has just exhibited cartons or packages in which the product is sold, and I do not think any one could possibly mistake oleomargarine for anything else. It may be true that in restaurants, and other eating places, oleomargarine is sometimes passed off as butter; but as was stated by a previous speaker, it is doubtful whether misrepresentation and deception obtains to a greater extent in the sale of this commodity than it does in the sale of many another article which might be named. The only argument against the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine is that its prohibition would be for the protection of the dairy interest. In other words those who favour this resolution want the sale of oleomargarine stopped in order that more butter may be sold, and sold at a higher price. Now, I say, with all deference to the opinion of those who differ from me, that if that is not a special plea for a particular interest, a plea that should not be countenanced by this parliament, then I would like to be shown a more glaring example. I am very sure that all of us, especially now that the farmers have so many difficulties to contend with, are very anxious that they be permitted to carry on their activities under the most favourable conditions. Personally I sympathize with that view; but surely Parliament is not going to accept the principle that it is justified in destroying any industry, any legitimate Canadian industry, which permits the great mass of the people of Canada to buy a wholesome article at a lower price than the price of butter, in order to benefit and add to the profit of any other industry. I think that is an absolutely unassailable position to take. This Parliament is not justified in destroying one legitimate industry for the purpose of assisting another legitimate industry, important as the latter may be. If we accepted such a principle, where would it lead us?

I am going to draw a few comparisons. Some may say that they are far-fetched; but I do not think so; I believe they are on all fours with the proposal made to prohibit the manufacture of oleomargarine. For example, if we can wholly prohibit the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in order to benefit the makers of butter, why should not the man who produces lard, the raiser of hogs, the owner of a packing house, object to the sale of vegetable compounds, oils and products that now enter into cooking and baking in the home? The argument is just as good for the one as for the other. Why should the manufacturer of silk stockings not object to another man being allowed to make cotton stockings, because it hurts his business? If people can afford to buy only cotton stockings why should they not be permitted to do so?

Mr. CHAPMAN: Or paper ones.

Mr. EULER: If anyone in Canada can make serviceable stockings of paper, I would be quite willing to allow him to do so, so long as people who are buying those stockings would know what they were buying.

Mr. BROWN: So, in the case of paper boots.

Mr. EULER: As regards paper boots, the people of Canada did not know what they were buying at the time.

Why should not the manufacturer of the fifty-seven varieties that we hear and read so much about in advertisements, come to this Parliament and ask for a law prohibiting the housewife from canning her own fruit, pickles and preserves? The prohibition would be just as logical in the one case as in the other.

Then we are told that oleomargarine is an imitation, and merely because it is an imitation it is a reprehensible thing to allow that to continue.

Mr. LEWIS: Will the hon. member suggest that a cotton stocking is not a stocking and that a silk stocking is?

Mr. EULER: Not at all. The point which I am endeavouring to make is that, if you are going to destroy one industry because it is hurting another industry, you are wrong. Therefore, I say that the silk-stocking manufacturer—and this is merely by way of a homely illustration—is quite as much justified, because his business is being interfered with by the cotton-stocking manufacturer, to raise an objection. Merely because an article is an imitation is not necessarily a reflection upon it, so long as the people who buy the imitation know what they are buying. We have that constantly in commerce. You go to a fur store, and you are a better expert than I am if you can distinguish some of the furs sold under one name or another. But if a person is buying a class of fur coat, knowing that it is merely an imitation of another class of fur coat, I do not see why there should be any objection to that person being permitted to purchase it, so long as she, because it is nearly always one of the gentler sex, knows what she is buying. We might say that concrete cement, is an imitation, or a substitute, if you like, for stone, and a very good one, and just because it is an imitation or a substitute is no reason why we should not use it. Cotton is very often used in place of wool, and a very good article it is.

The hon. gentleman who moved the resolution spoke of vitamines; he said the butter contains a large percentage of vitamines and that oleomargarine does not. I am not sure whether he is correct in that or not; but surely he will not argue that, because there are no vitamines in oleomargarine, the people who are buying oleomargarine are necessarily not going to get their vitamines in some other form. He will have to devote his attention to many another prohibitory measure. I read the other day that potatoes contain a very large proportion of vitamines. These vitamines are located immediately under the skin of the potato. If you peel it as most housewives do, you lose all the vitamines. I propose that we also pass a resolution prohibiting housewives from peeling their potatoes and thus force the men to eat them whole. I sometimes go into a restaurant in which, opposite the various items of food, there is to be found the number of calories or heat units that each one of these foods produce. I think bacon tops the list. Would the hon. gentleman, therefore, argue that we must all eat bacon to the exclusion of veal, beef, eggs, cereals, meat and all the rest of them? It is entirely absurd to argue along that line. If that principle were recognized, we would be obliged to have a food inspector at every man's table to see that we are eating only those things which have the proper number of vitamines, calories and so on.

The hon. gentleman also stated that there can be no great demand for oleomargarine, because of the fact that, whereas we consumed some 12,000,000 pounds some few years ago, last year we consumed only 3,000,000 pounds. If he is correct—and I have no doubt he is—his difficulty is going to settle itself in a very short time. If people bought only 3,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine last year, that shows that they prefer butter or that they can afford to buy butter. But if there are still some who like to buy it, why should the Parliament of Canada take away from them the right to do that? Such a course amounts to prohibition. I am not speaking of prohibition in its ordinary sense; but even in the prohibition of liquor, the chief argument we heard usually was that it was a detriment to the people who use it and to those who are dependent upon those who use it. That may or may not be a fair argument; but even in that case, many people set up against it the argument of personal liberty. I am not going to discuss that at all; but as regards oleomargarine, the excuse cannot be made, that it is harmful, and, therefore, we should not have prohibitory legislation with regard to it.

Butter, it has been said here to-day, is at present being sold at 48 cents a pound and oleomargarine at 28 cents a pound. That in itself constitutes a very important reason why those people, who cannot afford to pay 48 cents a pound for their butter, should not be deprived of the opportunity and right to purchase that which satisfies them and which is the best they can do under the circumstances. But I would go a step further than that; I would say that, even if oleomargarine costs more than butter and it is wholesome and I want to buy it, no man has logically a right to interfere with me if I want to buy oleomargarine and to pay for it. That is merely the right of the individual, and I think that is the issue at stake in this resolution more, perhaps, than any other.

I would be very much surprised to hear my hon. friends, who are directly, not angularly, opposite, support this resolution, because it is protection in its worst form. It is more than protection; it is prohibition. Tariff protection, if I may say so, is directed usually only against the foreigner. The manufacturer who wants tariff protection in this country desires as much as possible to shut out goods coming from a foreign country. On the other hand, if this resolution passes, we shall prohibit our own Canadian people from engaging in a certain industry, producing an article which, it is admitted, is a legitimate article of commerce. That would be the grossest and most unjustifiable interference with personal liberty that might almost be imagined. The law prohibiting oleomargarine should have been repealed long ago —not merely suspended from year to year. It was passed as long as thirty-six years ago. Well, it is about time it was repealed, and I would say that the Government, instead of again debating whether they should suspend this prohibitory law for another year, should make up their minds about it and repeal it absolutely, so that it shall not be necessary next year to repeat this performance, and do the same thing the following year and the year after that. For the reasons given I am definitely opposed to the resolution. I trust the law will be repealed and this vexed question settled once and for all.

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I propose to support the resolution introduced and so ably discussed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). He has gone into the subject so exhaustively that very little remains for me to adduce in support of the reasons he has given to the House. Undoubtedly hon. members have been recently supplied with literature presenting the arguments on behalf of both interests in the matter. The arguments that have been submitted in support of the permission to import and manufacture oleomargarine have been amplified in the literature that has been sent to us. It is said that oleomargarine is manufactured and imported under the strictest regulations. Apparently it is; but I wish to emphasize the difficulty of enforcing regulations of this kind and the possibility, indeed the probability, of their being evaded, besides the opportunity that is presented to those who sell this inferior article of representing it as being equally as good as butter. It is claimed that it is a wholesome article. I do not dispute that. It is said that it is a legitimate article of commerce. That cannot be disputed either, for it has been made so by the laws of our country. It is also said that many countries permit the sale of it; and that, too, is true. And we are told, further, that it is made largely from the products of the farm, although there is a difference of opinion as to the exact quantity of animal products that are used in the manufacture of oleomargarine.

My objection to the manufacture and sale of this article does not rest upon the ground that it is an unwholesome foodstuff. I place my objection on the broad ground of protection. I am a believer in protection for every industry in this country—protection for the manufacturer, protection for the labourer and protection for the farmer. I believe that any one who enjoys any of the benefits in his particular line must be prepared to concede that there is some disadvantage and some handicap in another line. Now, the farmer and the dairy interests of this country need protection against anything that unduly interferes or competes with their products, and they certainly need protection against the free importation of this article. They therefore need protection against the manufacture of it as well. I wish to read a resolution passed by the National Dairy Council of Canada at its meeting held in Winnipeg on January 31st last. That resolution, dealing with the question of oleomargarine, reads:

> That owing to the depressing conditions of dairying, the present low prices of butter fat, the importance of stimulating and encouraging an increase in the production of cream on the farms in Canada and the difficulty of securing suitable markets, both domestic and foreign, for the butter at present manufactured in Canada, the National Dairy Council of Canada is of the opinion that no further encouragement should be given the importation, manufacture or sale of oleomargarine by the Parliament of Canada. And that this council urgently requests the Dominion Government to refrain from introducing any legislation dealing with oleomargarine at the next session of Parliament.

That resolution comes from an organization representing the dairymen of Canada. I think it may be accepted as their considered opinion on the subject, and frankly again I want to state that my attitude towards this matter is based upon the ground of protection to that vast industry. There is no industry in the country that is more exacting than agriculture, and that requires a greater effort at the hands of those engaged in it. There is no industry that, perhaps, in years past, has yielded so moderate a profit, and the men who are engaged in it to-day feel that they should have protection against the importation of this inferior substitute, because it is inferior. That is the ground upon which I place my objection to the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine.

Now, the hon. member who spoke last (Mr. Euler) said that we should not destroy any legitimate industry in this country. Well, as I understand the facts, this industry was established with the distinct notification and the clear knowledge that it was only a matter of permission granted during, and by reason of, the war. From its inception the unequivocal understanding was that it might be terminated at any time. So that in connection with this industry there is no vested right which can be advanced in argument against any action which Parliament might think it wise to take in the matter. I said I was in favour of protection. I have heard a good deal in this House about the disadvantage in connection with high freight rates; and I sincerely hope that some way will be found to overcome the obstacle which the farmers in the West have to contend with from the present high freight rates. I believe that they should, if possible, be protected against the great handicap of distance under which they labour. And I would point out to my hon. friends on my left that they might, and indeed fairly should, consider that as a feature of the principle of protection. I should like to see the coal producers of the maritime provinces protected against the same handicaps of distance and, if possible, some concession given them in the matter of rates in order that they might have a market for their product in the West.

I do not think I need elaborate this question; I have made my position clear. I believe the dairying interests of the country should receive very careful consideration at the hands of Parliament. It has been correctly stated that the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine in the past was intended to be permitted only during the war and because of war conditions. Those conditions have disappeared and the industry finds itself confronted with shrinking markets. It has a surplus of products, and the markets of the world are to a certain extent demoralized. Prices are falling and the conditions that existed when this permission was granted no longer prevail. We are back again where we were before that permission was given.

The House should take this question into its very serious consideration from the standpoint I have urged, namely, the principle of protection purely and simply. I believe in protection for every industry in Canada. The farmer is entitled to protection in this matter, and others should be prepared to concede it to him. I hope that the resolution will meet with the approval of the House and that any legislation necessary to implement it will be brought down in order that the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine may be prohibited, at least until it is found that conditions generally are such as to render it advisable, in the interests of the public, to permit the operation of the industry. I know there is a great difference of opinion in this House upon the subject, but I urge that the interests of our dairy and general farmers should receive favourable consideration, and that they are entitled to that fair measure of protection which the prohibition of the manufacture and importation of this product would give them.

Mr. A. T. LEGER (Kent, N.B.): In the interests of dairy and mixed farming in my constituency I am heartily in accord with this resolution. We are encouraging mixed farming and dairying in my part of the country as much as we can, and it is undoubtedly true that the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine is, to a certain extent, destructive of our farmers' efforts to raise more stock and more dairy products.

The subject matter of this resolution has been before the House for the last five or six years, and when, the first year after the war, the question of continuing the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine was considered, although, I believe, the majority of the people's representatives were opposed to such continuation, they felt that it would perhaps be better to extend the period for another year when conditions would be about normal.

No one can expect to make this House believe that any article containing a mixture of tallow and oil with a small amount of milk or cream is a good substitute for butter. I was amused to see the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) produce a package of oleomargarine. The exterior looks fine, but, Sir, I do not believe he ever examined the inside of similar packages. I purchased a package on one occasion to satisfy my curiosity. I found the contents to be a greasy, oily looking mixture which I could not believe was fit for human consumption. But it is pressed on some poor people. I would not like to see my people use such a substitute for butter. I always like to see a poor man use good, substantial food, and not these unsatisfactory substitutes.

In stock raising we have to use the milk from our cows. I ask hon. members, would it be right for us to throw away the cream, as we would have to do, so that oleomargarine may take the place of our butter? I think not. Now that we are getting back to normal conditions there is no longer any necessity to import or to manufacture this stuff at the expense of our dairy and stock raising industry. Therefore I am strongly in favour of doing away with the further importation or manufacture of oleomargarine, and I shall have much pleasure in supporting this resolution.

Mr. E. A. MUNRO (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, the main argument in favour of the continued importation and manufacture of oleomargarine seems to be changing ground somewhat. It never was considered equal to butter for its food value, but it was thought advisable to encourage its use as a cheap substitute for our poor people. I would ask, where are the poor people in this country? A good many of us have heard our Progressive friends describing the hard conditions that at present exist in the prairie provinces. Personally, I believe what they have told us. You may ask me why. I reply, simply because I am a farmer. But you have got to convince a good many people besides farmers, as you will find out before you get through here. Therefore I am sympathetic when my friends from the prairie provinces ask for the re-establishment of the Wheat Board with all its original powers. But, mind you, I am consistent, for while I am ready to grant my Progressive friends that assistance so far as I am personally concerned, still I consider it to be a form of protection.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MUNRO: I repeat, I consider it is a form of protection, and more, it is an interference with personal liberty to a certain extent. Nevertheless, governments have taken similar action in the past, and why should they not do so in this instance, if you people are in the condition you say you are, and I believe you, because whether farmers are grain growers or dairymen, their condition is very unsatisfactory. Therefore I am sympathetic and I am going to stay with you.

I may be told that I am dealing with the grain issue instead of the dairy issue. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, how many grain growers are in the dairy business. I presume that many grain growers have some milk cows. Now, just to show what condition the dairymen find themselves in out west, I am going to read a newspaper clipping from the Financial Post of February 24, because I take it that when the dairymen and grain growers come down to this House and ask for protection they need it, and need it badly. But the dairymen in question have not come down and asked for any special legislation. Here is the despatch, sent from Edmonton:

> This province will produce 18,000,000 pounds of butter in 1922, and 25,000,000 in the year following, according to an estimate of the Alberta Dairymen's Association. This will be 100 per cent increase in two years, and as prospects are now it is thought not too high a mark.

Listen to this:

> The dairymen have gone on record as favouring an increase in duty of from 3 to 6 cents a pound on butter coming in from New Zealand, which is Alberta's chief source of competition.

Is that protection? I do not say they are wrong; but we in British Columbia need it even worse than you do, because we get your butter from the East; we get the New Zealand butter from the Coast: we get Chinese eggs; and a whole lot of things like that, all of which makes it very interesting for us.

Mr. CRERAR: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that New Zealand butter sells in Vancouver in competition with butter manufactured at home there? It is rather remarkable.

Mr. MUNRO: Why, New Zealand butter is all over Canada; it even goes to New York. Some reference has been made to the poor people and how necessary this oleomargarine is to them. Well, judging from the story we have heard from the Progressives, the poor people are not confined to the towns and cities; I never heard a harder-luck tale in my life than we have heard this session on the floor of this House, and it can be duplicated over and over again. We have the pioneers living on their farms in lonely, secluded places, going to the grocery store with a few pounds of home-made butter in order to obtain the necessities of life, while many so-called poor people living in the town and cities, move about on the bright and cheery streets, and attend the moving picture shows and the theatres while the orchestra plays: "Pack up your troubles in your old kit bag"; "We won't go home till morning", and so on.

It is alleged that oleomargarine is a substitute for butter. Does the price of butter in this country justify the sale of oleomargarine as a substitute? I am a dairyman; I have been at the job more steadily, perhaps, than the ex-Minister of Agriculture, (Mr. Tolmie), and I do say that butter is being manufactured in our country at a loss to-day. If it were not for the fact that the Fraser Valley Milk Producers' Association had access to a market in Vancouver whereby we can supply whole milk at prevailing market prices, we would go out of business. We are just marking time. Just to give you an example, last year the Fraser Valley Milk Producers' Association, a purely co-operative concern owned by the dairymen of the Fraser valley, produced 143,000 pounds of butterfat in excess of the production of the previous year; yet they received $500,000 less in money. Wages were also cut last year by $50,000. At present the dairymen are not making one cent profit; at the rate they are selling now they cannot pay taxes and live unless other commodities drop accordingly; yet some people say that the dairy industry is not being injured by the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. I was talking to some Ontario men the other day—farmers, practical men who have made good. They told me that they were having a hard time in getting along; that they did not know how they were going to get through the present difficult situation. I met another man the night before last who had recently visited the scene of his early life on the farm, the place where he had farmed for years. He told me that he never saw so many farmers up against it in his life. He said: "They are all trying to borrow money, not knowing how they are going to pay it back."

We hear a good deal about the value of our home markets; almost any hon. member will wax eloquent in five minutes when he comes to talk on that subject. Now, is it a reasonable suggestion that the sale of oleomargarine in this country will build up a home market for dairy products? You know it will not build up a home market; if it would, do you think the dairymen of this country would send a resolution such as was read by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart)? Did the hon. member for Leeds not read a resolution of the British Columbia Dairymen's Association?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It was a resolution of the National Dairy Council of Canada.

Mr. MUNRO: Well, it was approved by the British Columbia Dairymen's Association at their annual convention held at Chilliwack in February last. This resolution read as follows:

> Whereas the dairy industry is becoming one of the most important branches of Agriculture in the province of British Columbia;
> And whereas the present low prices received by dairymen for all dairy products make it necessary that the market for dairy products both at home and abroad should be stimulated and enlarged in order that those in the business may be suitably remunerated;
>
> And whereas the admission of oleomargarine free of duty into this country from the United States, while there is a high duty on Canadian butter entering the United States, and the sale and use of oleomargarine as butter, often without the knowledge of the purchaser, are unfair and injurious to the manufacturers of butter in Canada;
>
> And whereas the price of butter is now so low that it is within the means of all who desire it;
>
> Therefore, the British Columbia Dairymen's Association, in annual meeting assembled, is of the opinion that the admission and manufacture of oleomargarine in Canada should be discontinued, as its use is now detrimental to the best interests of the country;
>
> And that a copy of this resolution be sent to the honourable the Minister of Agriculture for the Dominion of Canada and to the federal members of all constituencies in the province of British Columbia.

Some hon. members try to convince the House that it is not at all a serious matter for the dairy business if the sale of oleomargarine is permitted in Canada. But who knows the dairy business best, the men actually engaged in it, or those who have never had anything to do with it? I submit that the men who have been engaged in this business for a long time know the most about it. The convention of the British Columbia Dairymen, to which I have referred, was one of the largest gatherings of its kind that has been held in British Columbia, and I have read the conclusions which they seriously arrived at, and which they have submitted to hon. members of this House.

I contend also, Mr. Speaker, that if the Government permits the continued sale and manufacture of oleomargarine in this country they will be taking a course inconsistent with both federal and provincial government policies in the matter of assisting in the establishment of creameries. Why, I believe that the federal government had a travelling creamery go about the country —I shall be glad to be corrected if that is not right. I know that in the province of British Columbia the government are spending a lot of money to assist pioneers in different parts of that new country by buying up good stock, putting it in there and sending out instructors to give the people a start in the business. They realize its relationship to successful pioneering and farming. Is the Government going to take the trouble and incur the expense of instructing these people in the making of good butter, the handling of milk, and that kind of thing, and at the same time permit the manufacture of a substitute like oleomargarine to take its place?

With regard to the argument that the manufacture of oleomargarine should be permitted because we have so many poor people, I would like to ask hon. members this question: Have we so much poverty in the towns and cities of this big new country of Canada, with its population of 9,000,000, that we have to import a substitute for butter from the United States? Is anybody willing to take the position that we cannot supply our own people with good butter; that we must import a cheap substitute? Shall we take that position when butter is selling at such a low price that the dairymen are working for nothing, and we are looking for a market in which to dispose of the large surplus dairy products which we cannot consume at home? It seems to me that the argument is ridiculous. If it ever had any justification, it was during the war, but conditions now have come back to normal and we do not need to continue something which was adopted as a war measure. We dairymen differ from our friends the Progressives to this extent: we are asking that we go back to pre-war conditions; they are asking that we continue war conditions. We want to go back where we were. We did not ask for this thing; it was brought in, as it was alleged, in the public interest; now we want to return to normal conditions. The fact remains, Mr. Speaker, that butter is being manufactured under cost price, and any further depression of that market will simply have the effect of injuring the industry to that extent, if not of wiping it out altogether. I may add that these are the things that are driving the producers from the soil and swelling the ranks of the poor people in the cities. Instead of robbing Peter to pay Paul, we should encourage the so-called poor people in the towns and cities to go out on the farms and make butter for a change. Many people seem to think that when you get a piece of land your troubles are at an end; it would be the finest thing in the world if we could get these people on the land and let them see whether or not their troubles are no more.

Another argument advanced in favour of the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in Canada is that this article is used in other countries. But Canada, for the most part, is in its pioneer stage; it is a new country. The dairy industry is not so well established in this country as it is in older countries. Here we have labour conditions against us. It has been the policy of this country for a great many years to protect the young industries of Canada from outside competition by a tariff or a subsidy. The system of protection, based on this principle, is recognized and in force to-day, and I say that if protection is the policy of this country at the present time, the dairying industry is entitled to protection under the tariff just as much as any other industry in Canada. Do those who oppose this resolution argue that because the United States trades in oleomargarine, Canada should also be prepared to follow the example of the United States and give to the Canadian farmers and dairymen a Fordney tariff? Let me here point out that the following states on the other side of the line have passed laws prohibiting "filled" milk: New Jersey, Colorado, Utah, California, Oregon, Wisconsin, Ohio, Maryland and New York. What about following that example? I ask again, are you prepared to go as far as the United States have gone and give our Canadian farmers and dairymen a Fordney tariff? If so, I say as a dairyman you can pave your streets with oleomargarine, so far as I am concerned.

In conclusion, I would call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the last census of Canada points out certain things, one of which is that we are not holding very many of our prospective settlers who come to this country. The mesh of our colonization and land settlement schemes seems to be too large, and these prospective settlers are slipping through it and are lost to us. Apparently the evidences of peace and prosperity on the farms in this country are not sufficient to persuade these people to stay.

There is still a greater tragedy taking place, Mr. Speaker. We are not holding our own sons and daughters on the farms of this country, even though those farms be improved and represent the toil and savings of a generation. It is always a hard thing for fathers and mothers to watch the trunks being filled as their sons prepared to leave the old farm, but there is a harder thing still, and that is that we have no sane argument to offer to induce them to say at home on the farm. Poets write and fools rant about the back to the soil movement, but as a matter of fact, the secret of the migration from the farms can be told in four words—long hours, and low pay. There is no line of farm work—and I speak with knowledge because I have been on the farm all my life from fifteen years up—that can hold a candle to dairying for a form of slavery. You have to be up at five in the morning to milk the cows; you work all day providing for the cows in the winter and doing a thousand and one other jobs, and at five at night you have to milk the cows again. You may say: Get somebody else to do that work; but as soon as you talk milk to a man he begins to look for the road. I have had men come to me who I knew were good milkers, and they would want $3.50 a day and a house built for them, and then they would say, "I do not know how to milk," and I knew they had been milking for years. Men who can milk and are willing to do the work are demanding all the milk is worth. You cannot trust a greenhorn to do your milking, and an experienced man can practically make his own terms.

Furthermore, dairying to-day is an expensive business. Municipal authorities and governments are constantly making the sanitary regulations more strict, which means that you have to provide costly equipment to produce good milk. Then there is the expense of constant replacement of pure bred sires. You have frequent losses, and never know when another is going to occur. Last year a little disease, of a very common kind, in my herd meant a loss of $1,000 to me, and I could not recoup myself. I had to go through the form of milking these half-dry cows all summer and pay men to do it. I got a letter from home only the other day saying that a breeder of pure bred Jerseys had had sixteen high-priced animals slaughtered because of tuberculosis. He will get some compensation from the government, it is true, but not enough to begin to square himself. It will take him years to make up that loss. This is a business that is becoming harder and harder to carry on, because of the aversion of all classes of men to milking. You mention milk to them and they will not work for you. It simply means,—and I know the farmers in the House will bear me out,—that you have to do the work yourself. I heard of farmers on the prairie last fall who were nearly crazy over their crops with so much to do, and who would try and persuade one of the hired men to milk, but they would all try and get out from under it, one after the other. Young men do not want to milk cows and the old men are worn out at the job. What is going to happen when the old men die? They who have camped on this job and done the work no matter how long it took or how much they got for it? What is going to happen when these men drop out, and the modern man starts operations and is up against the modern idea of six or seven hours a day, and time and a half for overtime, and has to provide for depreciation, overhead charges and interests on his investment? That is where we are headed, and you will be sorry, Mr. Speaker, when that day comes, that you did not eat more butter when it was cheap.

The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has said some rather peculiar things in his speech this afternoon. He seemed to think that imitation was all right, but I would suggest that imitation is a rather dangerous thing, and I will give an example. Toadstools and mushrooms, for instance, are very much alike, but if you eat a toadstool for a mushroom, the results are very disastrous.

Mr. EULER: Would you say a toadstool is an imitation of a mushroom or a mushroom an imitation of a toadstool?

Mr. MUNRO: The points of similarity are so great that either might be an imitation of the other. The hon. member also spoke of paper stockings. I submit this as a farmer. We do not ask for paper stockings, but what happened last fall, when we were paying two prices for stockings not much better than paper? The farmers had wool hanging on the poles in their barns, and they could get hardly anything for it. I submit, when you talk about paper stockings, that the manufacturer who gets 30 per cent protection should be content to furnish socks at decent prices or have that tariff reduced.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, we have heard presented the strong features of each side of this case with respect to the importation into, and manufacture in Canada of oleomargarine. Many arguments have been adduced, based upon the interest of some particular section of people. The views of the National Council of Dairymen have been presented on the one hand, and the views of the organization in support of oleomargarine have been urged on the other. But I submit that we must find some guiding principle that should actuate the Government in this matter, we must consider principles of public policy rather than the demands of political expediency. Some hon. members may be influenced through opinions in their constituencies; it may be the influence of the Dairymen's Association in one particular section, it may be the influence of the manufacturer of oleomargarine in another locality. Therefore the views of these hon. members are coloured by what they see behind them or what they anticipate in front of them.

I suggest that the only proper way to determine a question of this nature is to consider, in the first place, what the functions of government are in relation to it. In my own opinion there are two functions the government should bear in mind. First, they should make sure that oleomargarine is a pure food; that it is not a food which contains chemicals or ingredients that are injurious to health. The second, is that the government should make sure that the people will not be deceived, that when they buy this particular article they will know exactly what they are buying. To venture beyond this, Mr. Speaker, is to undertake an exaggerated form of paternal legislation.

It might be asked if a government can tell the people that they can or cannot use oleomargarine—perhaps I am repeating the argument of some hon. members but it will bear repeating—why can they not also enact laws that people shall eat three meals a day, or that they shall drink milk instead of water, tea or coffee? It may be asked why cannot paternal legislation cause the adoption of such regulations as will require the farmers to feed their cows on clover, or their horses on clover and timothy and hay instead of on timothy and hay and sometimes straw? Further, it may be asked, why cannot it be provided that people shall eat No. 1 fresh butter instead of imported butter from other countries, or that they shall eat ordinary butter instead of the oleomargarine which is the subject of the present discussion? I submit that what should guide us in coming to a conclusion in this matter should be the national consideration of what is best in the general interest and welfare of the people; and that the functions of a government, as I said before, should be directed to inquiring whether this particular food is pure and whether the people are being deceived in any particular with respect to it. When hon. members allow considerations beyond these to determine their attitude, I submit they are not founding their decisions upon the right premises.

I would like to direct the attention of the House to some of the considerations in support of the importation of oleomargarine into Canada and its manufacture here. In a circular issued by the Retail Merchants Association of Canada, a very large organization, they tell us:

> Having a trained knowledge of our business, we stand ready at all times to express our opinion, when requested, as to the quality of the goods selected, and in the case of foodstuffs to advise as to their healthfulness, etc.

Then the circular proceeds:

> The members of our Grocers' Section who sell oleomargarine, before recommending it, made exhaustive enquiries as to its manufacture and the ingredients contained in it. The Chief Analyst for the Dominion Government was consulted and pronounced it a perfectly good food, and he stated that it contained no harmful ingredients. On each package is stamped the approval of the Department of Agriculture of the Dominion of Canada, and our retail grocers and general store merchants thoughout Canada, therefore, feel perfectly justified in stocking it and offering it for sale. If our customers did not want it there would be no sale for it, but our experience shows that they want it, and, in our opinion, seeing that it is a non-injurious and palatable product, and that it contains nothing that is unhealthful, they should be allowed to buy it if they so desire and no law should be passed to prevent them from having it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that is the real point of this discussion: if the people want to buy oleomargarine why should they not be allowed to do so? The only reason why it is proposed they should be denied the privilege of buying it, is because one section of the community believes it will be prejudicial to its best interests. The strongest argument that I have heard in support of the resolution came from the hon. member who said, "I base my contention entirely upon the question of protection." But this is not a question of protection. The resolution proposes to prohibit entirely the importation into, and the manufacture of the product in, this country; and so even the argument of protection has no foundation in fact so far as the merits of this case are concerned.

Mr. MARTELL: Does not my hon. friend think that the dairy industry has as much right to ask for the protection of the importation or manufacture of oleomargarine, as the shoe manufacturers have to ask for a tariff in order to keep shoes from the United States and other countries out of Canada?

Mr. LADNER: The hon. member apparently misses the exceedingly important point involved: he does not distinguish between prohibition and protection. If this resolution asked for the imposition of a tariff on oleomargarine I would say it would come within the consideration of reason; but when it declares that, although oleomargarine as a food is good, people shall not use it, I cannot understand how the parliament of any free country could seek to impose its will to that extent upon the public.

Mr. MARTELL: Why any protection on anything?

Mr. LADNER: The hon. member is getting into a very wide field when he considers the question of any protection on anything. I believe before Parliament prorogues, that question will be pretty fully discussed and all kinds of arguments will be advanced. That, however, has no reference at all to the point to which I wish to direct the attention of the House. In my opinion, the question is a very simple one. As I was saying, an organization that is supporting, and that desires the right to purchase, oleomargarine in the stores is the Great War Veterans' Association in different parts of Canada. This is a resolution passed by the Toronto branch:

> Be it resolved that the Great War Veterans' Association, Toronto district and York county command, urge the Dominion government promptly to take steps to assure the continued manufacture and sale of oleomargarine so that housewives may be enabled to continue freely to purchase oleomargarine for their families if they so desire.

The National Council of Women also wish to be permitted to continue to exercise that right, and I am informed that a great number of organizations in different parts of the country desire to have that right. I should like hon. members, who are opposing the merits of the contention submitted on our side, to direct some attention to the point whether it is within the functions of a government to pass such paternal legislation as will prohibit people from buying in any store a product of this or any other kind which is pure and which people want. That is the whole point of this discussion, namely how far is Parliament going and to what extent is it entitled to pass legislation of that kind?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The hon. member speaks about prohibition and protection. Was not his object, when he advocated the prohibition of Asiatic immigration, the protection of Canadian labour?

Mr. LADNER: I cannot conceive that it would be easy to impose a tariff in the sense of the human equation on Asiatics coming into this country. That is largely a social problem, whereas this question is largely an economic one.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to briefly express my opinion in support of the proposed resolution for the prohibition of the sale of margarine in this country. I already had occasion, last session, to expound my reasons for opposing the manufacture and sale of this product. At each session, some member deems it his duty to introduce a resolution to prohibit such sale. That alone would suffice to show that such legislation is not sound, that the act which was passed some years ago, allowing the sale of this product, is unwarranted, and that there is no general wish for its maintenance, on the part of the people of this country. Such being the state of public opinion, it should be dispensed with.

I think the time has come,—since that legislation is about to lapse—to remind the Government that it is the wish of our farming community, of our agricultural societies, of the settler and of the farmer, that the manufacture and sale of this product should become a thing of the past, as far as I am concerned, I do not think it should exist. In fact we are asking very little when we request that this transitory legislation, which is on the eve of lapsing, be discontinued; we ask for a return to the statu quo, we ask, on behalf of the farmers, the same legislation they had in former years.

Previous to the late war, which compelled us to enact special legislation in order to supply needs which circumstances required, we existed without this butter substitute, without this famous margarine which certain countries got in the way of consuming and that we always look upon with horror in this beautiful agricultural country. There is no reason whatever to maintain a product of this kind in Canada. Agriculture is the principal industry of the country, and we do not need, I repeat it, to have recourse to this detestable legislation which was enacted in times of hardship, to permit the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that it was during the sad days of the great war, when we lacked sufficient products in this country to feed our own people, when the European markets were wide open to us, when our products were sought and sold at exceedingly high prices, it was then that it was considered expedient, but only for a limited time, to adopt transitory legislation, so as to allow for a year or two and no more, the sale of oleomargarine. On the eve of this act lapsing, the advisability of maintaining it was discussed in this House; there was then question of continuing it for two years; protests were voiced in this House; we did not want it maintained for the excellent reasons then brought to bear and which still hold good to-day, and we asked that, instead of enacting a new law for two years, it should be re-enacted for a year only. Presently the act will lapse and that will be the end of it.

We have nothing to ask for; we must simply abide by the acknowledged fact and let that enactment become null and void so as to return to normal times, those good times during which we lived before the war, having none of these ephemeral laws, none of these makeshift enactments. Let us allow that legislation to lapse and we shall witness once more that heyday of prosperity we enjoyed before the war. We want no such legislation as existed these last years in order to bring back upon the market that substitute for butter which is not needed in this country, because we have that good farm product in such quantity and of such quality as will satisfy our needs—in such large quantities as will allow us to place it upon foreign markets, and to let the whole world know the fair name of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that some honourable members should ask for the maintenance of such an enactment. I regret it, I say, because this is a time in the year when everything seems to get a new lease of life; the beautiful countryside is verdant once more, and in the fields the farmer's hand throws out the prolific seed. The tiller needs encouragement and we, lawmakers, must not stand up and say to him that the most splendid product from his farm, the product of the dairy industry, will not have a free scope as formerly and that we shall have it compete with an inferior article. He needs encouragement, that farmer, when he holds in his hand and spreads the seeds of wheat which bring wealth to this country; he wants us to stand by him and support him in that most important dairy industry, and tell him: Now, farmer, carry on as in the past.

The dairy industry is still the greatest source of wealth in our land. It is that industry we are developing in this country and in my beloved province of Quebec, where our public men have devoted the best part of their time towards securing the success of an industry that has built up Quebec's reputation. It is to that industry that have devoted themselves men like the present minister of agriculture in that province, the Hon. Mr. Caron, a model farmer, who has favoured it with all his might, all his heart, who has brought it to a high degree of perfection and who wishes that it be the foremost in his province. Were we to tell him: You have followed the wrong path; on that industry we shall graft as a rival a substitute for butter, we shall place upon our market, upon the table of our fellow-citizens that substitute for butter which is called oleomargarine and have it to compete with that splendid product. Such a course would be an unfortunate blunder on the part of this House. We ought to look after the farmer and encourage him. The farmer was the pioneer in our country. He certainly deserves our support and the best encouragement we could give him would be to repeal such an enactment which opens our markets to oleomargarine as well as to butter.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I feel it my duty to say a few words on the question before the House, representing as I do an agricultural constituency in which is made about the best butter to be found in the province of Quebec. The future prosperity of this country rests almost wholly on its agriculture, and anything that this House can do should be done to encourage a return of population to the farms, because unless we can build up this basic industry I see no hope for Canada in the future. Since 1882, the province of Quebec has developed a magnificent market, abroad as well as at home, for butter and cheese. By the statistics for the year 1920, I observe that the output of butter brought a return of $23,000,000 odd and cheese over $13,000,000. There are 1,800 factories distributed throughout the province of Quebec, and the making of butter and cheese is probably the most promising of all our industries. The splendid donation made by the province of Quebec at the outbreak of the war of half a million dollars' worth of cheese was a great stimulus to the industry, to which it attracted considerable attention.

I should consider myself recreant to my duty if I did not vote against the continuance of this attempt to foist upon the country a product which I do not think the people want. It was allowed as a substitute during the war and there is now no further need for the manufacture of it. Those who can buy butter at any reasonable price do not care for oleomargarine. I do not think that any man going into a store would buy this article if he could get butter at a fair price. People had to buy oleomargarine during the war because the price of butter was very high, but now prices are all reasonable and they can afford to get the genuine product.

We should give the farmer every encouragement possible. He does not enjoy the protection which the manufacturers and the capitalists are given; and, furthermore, he has to contend with weather conditions and markets. The markets of the United States are now closed against him, and the farms are all suffering from an exodus of the rural population to the cities. Thousands of people have left my constituency, and the same is true of other places in Canada. We must make the conditions of rural life attractive so that these people may be induced to return to the farms. In the province from which I come particularly, there is no more promising industry than the dairy business, and I therefore feel it my duty to support this resolution. I congratulate the hon. member who introduced it (Mr. Neill) for the very fair and complete manner in which he laid the question before the House.

Mr. WILLIAM F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South and Richmond): The speeches on this question have been very brief and I hope to follow the example set by other hon. gentlemen. I do not personally like oleomargarine. I had the misfortune of being obliged to eat it for some considerable time and I know something about it. As I understand the question before the House, however, it is not a matter of taste but a question whether or not we should permit the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in this country. I take the ground that a person who can afford to buy butter will buy butter, while those who are unable to buy it will buy oleomargarine. So that I fail to see the force of the argument that the manufacture of oleomargarine in Canada is going to injure in any way the dairy interests of the country. The hon. member who so very ably presented the question to the House said that there was a great deal of sham and fraud about the manufacture and sale of this article. Well, we are all more or less in the hands of those who sell us anything we eat or anything we wear. For example, how many people out of the 8,000,000 or so who inhabit this country are able in the fall of the year to clothe themselves in the very best of woollens? A very small percentage. Indeed, very many people in Canada are obliged to wear underclothing which is not made of wool at all. No doubt they would like very much to be able to get the real article, but they cannot afford to pay for it, and because they are bound to get inferior clothing we might as well say that they are the victims of fraud and sham perpetrated by those who sell them the cheaper goods. Again, there are a great many different grades of shoes, and sometimes we find them with soles that are made of paper instead of leather. Nevertheless, there are people who buy shoes of this kind because they cannot afford the more expensive grades.

An hon. MEMBER: Should these manufactures be protected?

Mr. CARROLL: I am not considering the question whether there is too much protection or not enough protection. I am not arguing from that standpoint. Now, if the people of the country do not wish to eat oleomargarine there is no duty whatever imposed upon them to eat it. If they can pay for butter they will certainly not buy oleomargarine; but if they are unable to buy butter and are perfectly satisfied with a substitute, why should they be hindered from procuring it? I do not see how they can possibly injure the dairy interests by buying oleomargarine when they could not buy butter in any case. I am not speaking for my own constituency in this matter. For once, in my life, at all events, I may speak from the broader and more national point of view. I do not think that there are ten pounds of oleomargarine used in the constituency I represent, although it is one of the largest industrial constituencies in Canada. But if there are people in this country who desire to use oleomargarine as a substitute for butter or for cooking purposes, I do not think that this Parliament should deprive them of that right which they should enjoy as free-born Canadians. I shall vote against the resolution for these reasons and for many more which I could state.

Mr. AIME M. DECHENE (Montmagny) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, on every occasion when this question was discussed in this House I had the honour to take part in the debate, and my firm attitude of the past, on this question is the one which I intend to maintain this evening, in other words, to oppose the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. It is therefore a pleasant duty for me to support the resolution of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and to ask all our colleagues to join us in our effort to remove from the market of this country, a certainly inferior product which has not the value attributed to it; for after all, oleomargarine and other products of the same nature have but a very small value. It may be eaten with bread, as for instance on a slice of bread which we give to children, though devoid of the most nutritious constituents found in butter; but it cannot be used in a very palatable way to cook food. We all know that when oleomargarine comes in contact with heat it disintegrates immediately and a tallow smell is given out which is very disagreeable; this explains why no one likes to consume hot food prepared with oleomargarine. It however finds a ready sale, under the disguise of cheapness, with the people who think they are economizing by using, instead of butter, oleomargarine, an article of inferior quality.

During the war, we were forced to allow the use of a substitute owing to the high cost of the dairy products such as butter and cheese. This was a war measure, one which should have been repealed immediately after the armistice; but, in order to meet the wish of everybody, the government of that day thought it prudent and wise to continue this legislation for a few months more. Last year it seemed absolutely decided that we would, this year, see the end of such legislation; however rumours are spreading which forecast a further continuation of this legislation for some time to come. This would certainly cause considerable harm to the dairy industry of this country. Some twenty years ago, dairying was very little thought of, not only in this country but in the foreign markets. The problem was solved by encouraging the dairy industry and prohibiting the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine and other such products. Ever since the dairy industry has had full scope, it has progressed considerably. Our products have acquired a great value. In the past they were considered of inferior quality in the market, however, to-day they are highly appreciated, not only in Canada but in foreign markets. The Department of Agriculture observing that the greater part of the population was interested in the success of the dairy industry, established these past years, competitive examinations following courses of instruction in butter-making. The result of these competitions is published yearly. That of last year showed that we had made considerable progress in the manufacture of butter. Every year, since this co-operation has been established, there is a marked improvement. Now, that we are in a position to meet competition from Denmark and New Zealand, and to compete against them on an equal footing in the British, French and Belgian markets, we seek to obtain permission, in Canada, to sell substitutes. Having laboured for twenty years to improve his herd, having faithfully followed the advice of the Department of Agriculture, at Ottawa, and of the provincial agricultural departments, the farmer will behold all his work reduced to nought; now that he is on the eve of securing a market and establishing a good reputation, while his industry is becoming remunerative, he will find that we allow the sale of products which are substitutes, simply imitations, and therefore bound to be a very unfair competitor.

Some of the hon. members who spoke this afternoon or this evening said: "You will ruin an industry and the capital invested will prove a loss." According to the manufacturers' own figures, there has been manufactured, during the year 1921, 3,780,392 pounds of oleomargarine in Canada, and according to the same source, 2,057,035 pounds were imported. On the other hand, there was more than $199,000,000 worth of butter and cheese produced amongst 3,258 factories. Should we, by continuing this year this legislation help to develop an industry which would compete and ruin the one we already have? It is all very well to allow, in this country, the development of as many industries as possible, however, on the other hand, we should take the necessary steps, not to ruin those which our rural population have established within the past twenty or twenty-five years, on a basis which does credit to Canada. We had in the year 1920, about 3,258 factories making butter and cheese. How many oleomargarine factories are there? I think, we could say, without fear of contradiction, that they are no more nor less, but side lines of the large packing establishments of this country and that they alone really benefit by them. They tell us, on the other hand, that if they are not allowed to manufacture oleomargarine, they will be at a loss to dispose of the by-products of the steer. I see, by their own figures, that they have imported from the United States a quantity of vegetable, mineral and even animal oils in a greater proportion than what is manufactured in this country.

So as to enable them to import a few thousand pounds of mineral or animal oils, that can be produced in their present industry which is deserving of encouragement, should we also allow them to create a monopoly and jeopardize the industries already established? I contend, Mr. Speaker, that we would then be working towards demolishing what we have built with so much perseverance upset the calculations of the farming community. Do you not believe that, if one of these days, the farmer realized that the sale of oleomargarine and its by-products, or any kind of oil mixed with butter, proved a serious competitor in the market, that he would do as many others have already done and say: "Well, there is already very little money in farming, I shall give up the dairy industry. I shall discontinue rising at half past three or four o'clock in the morning to milk the cows, I shall not retire to bed at eight or nine o'clock, at night, after having again milked the cows and given the necessary care to the herd, thus I shall give up competing against the sale of all those vegetable and other oils, which are imported from the United States. Why so much worry to supply certain privileged ones, with a few pounds of butter, when the large manufacturers of this country, themselves, favour American industries by importing hundreds of thousands of dollars worth, nay, several millions, of their products in preference to our own.

A young man brought up on the farm with his father would naturally come to this conclusion: "Conditions on the farm are so bad, the farmer is so poorly encouraged that he is not even allowed to retain what he has to-day, moreover unfair competition is being brought to bear to annoy him, I shall therefore follow the example of other young men, go and live in the city." Thus we shall again be working to depopulate the rural districts in the interest of large cities. If you wish to keep our young men on the farm, give them a chance to lay something aside for themselves. Otherwise they can not be blamed if they move to large centres, to work as labourers, and walk the streets at half past seven or eight o'clock at night.

Some one said, a few minutes ago: "That there was a market for oleomargarine therefore we should produce some for sale". This reasoning struck me as being false, because any dealer, any man who is acquainted with the ways and means of selling a product to others, can sell them any thing whatever. We know to-day that it is not the value of the goods themselves which render them marketable, but rather that man who is a hustler who sells them. Place the best article in the hands of an ordinary commercial traveller he may have very little success but place an article of little value in the hands of a man of experience, and you will see how quickly he will dispose of it. Why? because all depends on the salesman, the article itself plays no part in the transaction. Because a product is saleable, is that a sufficient reason to allow its sale to the detriment of good products which should have the first place on the market?

The price of butter and cheese, at the present time, is very nearly what it was before the war. Any labourer or salaried man whatever could at that time purchase butter. He had enough money to do so. Yet, his salary was rather less than it is to-day. If he earns more money now, if his income is greater, should he not therefore have the means to purchase the butter which his fellow-countrymen are manufacturing and which would help the farmers to hold their farms, since the latter are obliged to pay the high prices demanded by labour.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the great majority of the agricultural population of this country understand, as we do, that it is necessary to immediately suppress such an industry before we allow it to develop. Those who have invested capital in the manufacture of oleomargarine, of butterine or other substitutes for butter, knew what they were doing. They knew that it was an industry bound to disappear with the war, just like that of ammunitions. To-day, then before this industry develops, why not prevent any further expense, but immediately prohibit the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. I believe that in this manner, we shall prove to the country that we really wish to do something to help farmers to improve their present condition. Let us give everybody a chance, and we shall never regret having done our full duty in this as in many other circumstances. Let us pluck out the thorn before it causes any serious injury.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I think it would be unfortunate if this debate closed without those who sit in this corner of the House making themselves heard. I cannot claim that there is perfect unanimity among the organized farmers of the prairies in this matter, but I think I can enunciate the principles that from the very beginning have lain behind the organizations which we represent—principles which we have not consciously departed from. I know it is being urged in some quarters these days that we are not true to our principles in making our request for the Wheat Board. I can only say that in so doing we have not, consciously at least, departed from our principles, as we certainly would be departing from them if we were to support the resolution submitted by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill).

The resolution most distinctly declares that it is being advanced in the interest of the dairy industry—and, of course, it is added "the public generally." The hon. member might just as well have left out those words as his argument in favour of the resolution from the standpoint of the "poor consumer." The hon. member would have been perfectly consistent if he had done so, for he is already on record to the effect that in his view protection is simply a local matter, and that he is prepared to be protectionist or free trader according to the location in which he is placed. Therefore when he spoke of looking after the interests of the consumer, I say he might just as well have saved himself the trouble, for in view of his previous statement no one will believe him.

Two arguments are being advanced in favour of this resolution, arguments that should be kept distinctly apart, but instead of keeping them separate the hon. member has rather mixed the two together. When he was speaking I could not but wonder if his association with the Chinamen had made him as expert in camouflaging a situation as he said the Chinamen are in camouflaging the kind of meat they place before their customers. If that is true it is unfortunate, and it certainly affords one more reason, in addition to those already given, for the exclusion of Asiatics.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, two arguments are advanced in support of this resolution, one from the standpoint of the consumer—the "poor consumer," who is to be protected from something he might eat that would do him physical harm. On this point I do not presume to have an opinion. I know nothing about oleomargarine, I have never eaten it to my knowledge; but we have testimony from a great variety of sources that this product when manufactured under proper supervision is not unwholesome, and I am prepared to accept that evidence as perfectly valid. If it can be shown that the consumption of this product is detrimental to the health of our people, well, we will be moved to consider the advisability of restricting or even prohibiting its sale. But that is not a question which I wish to consider from the standpoint of the farmer; it is a question that must be settled by those who are specially competent to deal with it along these lines, and on that account I do not presume to have an opinion on it, I am, as I said, content to accept the opinion of those who are competent to deal with that phase of the question. We might say this, however, that even the layman can easily understand that the manufacture of this product must be surrounded by certain safeguards. That is evident on the face of it. If those safeguards are not sufficient, if the restrictions already imposed upon the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine are not what they ought to be, then by all means let us impose further restrictions; but so far as interfering with its sale, I cannot see my way clear to adopt such a position at this time.

Now, let us consider it from the standpoint of protection to the dairy farmer. Our organizations—I am speaking of the farmers' organizations—have been built upon the principle of no special privilege. Those who sit in this corner of the House were elected on a platform containing a plank in favour of the free importation of foodstuffs, and for my part I have no intention of going back on that principle. Let me say a word to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) who has advocated protection for the farmer. He advocated the discontinuance of the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine purely from the standpoint of protection; therein being a protectionist he was, of course, perfectly consistent. But if he has been able to find out how the farmer is to be protected, it is something that we have not been able to find out yet. My interest in political affairs began in the election of 1878, when Sir John Macdonald introduced his national policy, and I remember well the arguments that were then advanced in support of that policy, that the farmers must have protection. The poor farmers of that day were deluded, and many of them are still labouring under the delusion that it is possible to protect farmers although the great bulk of their exports find a market in foreign countries. From the standpoint, then, of consistently maintaining our principles, I feel that I for one—and I know there are many who feel like me—must oppose this resolution. I do not think, even if we admitted that principle, or were willing to violate our platform, that the protection sought would really be of any value to us. I think that argument can be maintained in this as well as in other connections, that when we have to compete in the markets of the world with our foodstuffs it is not reasonable to suppose that this trivial protection could be of any value to us. Even if I were convinced that the discontinuance of the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine could be of any value to farmers, I would still, from the standpoint of the principles that have placed behind our organization, be compelled to vote against this resolution.

When I come to discuss these matters before the public and to urge our position on other questions, I want to be able to say to the labouring man: We will pay you good wages, but there must be no loafing on the job; we want an honest day's work for an honest day's pay. And I want to be able to say to the manufacturer: You must stand on your own feet just as we have to stand on our own feet. Therefore on this question of the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine I do not propose to lower the flag under which our farmers' organizations have marched during the last twenty years.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, like nearly every other subject of debate, there are two sides to this question. I freely and frankly admit that at the outset, but I propose to take one side and try to show cause why the resolution should be sustained. The history of oleo dates back to 1867, when an eminent French investigator discovered how to make cheap butter out of the natural fats and oils. Ever since it has been used as a substitute for butter.

I am not going to take exception to those who put up a plea for the poor man's butter, but let us investigate to what extent it has been used, and to what extent we might be able to compromise probably with that plea and make some advances in the direction of meeting those demands. The extent of the manufacture and importation of oleo during the last three years goes to show that its consumption is directly related to its price and the price of butter. For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1920, the consumption of oleo in Canada amounted, in round numbers, to nearly 15,000,000 pounds; in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1921, it was nearly 11,000,000 pounds. Last year, when real butter, through the drop in price, came within the reach even of many of the poorer people, the consumption of oleo was reduced to 3,250,000 pounds. This shows that when conditions return to normal or nearly normal, the demand for oleo decreases accordingly, and presents a justification for the course taken in 1917, when the price of retail butter ran up to 70 cents or more, and it was regarded as a hardship upon the people to be obliged either to purchase butter at that price or do without it. It was at this time that the prohibition of importation and manufacture of oleomargarine was removed, and it has never since been re-established. I realized something of the difficulty which would be involved in removing a law of 9 p.m. this nature once it had been enacted and vested rights had become established. Accordingly, in 1917 I opposed the importation and manufacture of oleo, believing that the reasons for doing so were not sufficient and that there would be difficulty in reverting to former conditions.

So long as we have in force another prohibition which is effective with regard to the production of butter in Canada, it seems to me that we should be making a mistake in permitting the importation and manufacture of oleo. I refer to a prohibition which was enacted in 1886 by the government of that day and continued in force in its earlier form until 1903. In that year the dairy industry—which was a struggling one in those days; it was not as well established as it is now—was given further encouragement in the prohibition of the manufacture and importation of renovated butter. The idea was to enable the dairy industry to get upon its feet, because it was not an easy matter to start that industry in Canada. Some people take the ground that dairying is an industry indigenous to this country. But it is not so indigenous to Canada as it is to many other countries with which we have to compete; not so indigenous as to make it unnecessary for the legislators of 1886 and and 1903, in order to give it a fair chance, to prohibit the manufacture and importation of oleo as well as the renovation of dairy butter by mixing it with creamery butter, thus deteriorating the quality and discouraging the creamery industry. So long as that prohibition upon renovated butter prevails it seems to me we are moving in the wrong direction; we are putting the cart before the horse. Now, some people take the ground that renovated butter is objectionable, but not half as much objection can be urged against it as was urged some years ago against the introduction of oleomargarine. I find on discussing this matter with my fellow members that a great many of them are not aware that a prohibition upon renovated butter was enacted in 1903 and exists to this day. The effect of this prohibition is most strongly felt in connection with dairy butter made in the frontier districts of Canada in places remote from creameries. Those who make it are poor people; their facilities are not the most ample, and though the butter is not manufactured under unsanitary or unclean conditions, it is produced in primitive surroundings and without proper storage. It is put on the market in the ordinary country store; it goes to the retail store, then to the wholesaler, then to Winnipeg or Calgary. Finally it is banished from the country. It is not permitted to be renovated and find a market in Canada; it has to go to St. Paul, climb over the 8-cent Fordney tariff wall, pay the freight rate to St. Paul—and you can imagine how much the man on the frontier gets for it when it goes through that procedure.

I have before me a summary of the quotations on butter and oleomargarine in the Minneapolis market of the 8th of this month. At that time the retail price of creamery butter was 40 cents a pound—it varied from 40 to 42, but I give the low figure in each case; renovated butter was 32 cents, a difference of 8 cents; oleomargarine was 25 cents, or 7 cents cheaper than the renovated butter. I am persuaded, Mr. Speaker, that if the renovation of this butter were permitted in either Calgary or Winnipeg the result would be to save the freight rate to St. Paul, to save the 8 cent duty imposed by the Fordney tariff bill which would make at least a saving of nine cents, and to enable this product to sell in Winnipeg at the same price as oleo. That is only an estimate, but I think it is a fair one. I do not think the price would be above that of oleo, but even if it were two or three cents more, it would still have many advantages over oleo. It is not merely three or four per cent butter fat, as oleo is; it is 100 per cent butter fat and has 100 per cent content. Those of us, then, who feel solicitous on behalf of the poor man and are desirous of giving him cheap butter should be willing to give him real butter manufactured in Canada. Remove the restriction; let this butter be renovated and we will kill two birds with the one stone; we will come to the relief of the frontier man who to-day can hardly get a living price for his dairy butter; we will let that butter come within seven cents of being worth as much as first-class dairy butter. At the same time we will help the poor people who have to buy this necessary article of diet. Let us take that course rather than let the by-products of the big plants of Canada or of any other part of the world enter into competition with the honest dairy cow of this country. I am prepared, if my colleagues will agree with me, to take that prohibition off by legislation this session, as a means of giving real relief; as a means of giving butter which is not 2 per cent butter—some of my friends here claim that they have had enough 2 per cent—but 100 per cent butter with 100 per cent food content. Then, if we subsequently want to throw on more brakes with a view of taking action affecting the dairy industry in the West as well as in the East, that will be a matter for consideration.

Now I am going to take up a number of the arguments that have been made in favour of oleo. We have heard of the poor man's butter and of the greater food value of oleo. I always used to hear it claimed that oleo was of lesser food value than butter, but let us suppose that it just evens up, that there is an equal number of calories in butter and oleo. That depends, of course, on who takes the sample. If you have butter with a large water content, and oleo with a small water content, the analysis will show to the advantage of oleo, but if the samples are taken fairly and show an equal number of calories, that, after all, is only one factor in the analysis. It shows the energy, the heat property, but it does not show the assimilative power of the human system to make use of these articles. Everybody knows that butter is not only more palatable than oleo, but more easily digested and assimilated. There is no comparison between the two articles in that respect. How many of us here, if given the choice, would take oleo? Not one.

Then it is said that it is contrary to free trade principles to prohibit the importation of oleo. Here I find myself strangely aligned to-night; but we want enough votes. I find myself aligned with my protectionist friends, I like them for one thing; they are at least candid, even if they are wrong, but in this instance they happen to be right.

I hear the argument made by some that they do not believe in prohibition of anything. Others say that they do believe in prohibition because they want to prohibit this article. I am not going to be forced into the position of being a protectionist, nor do I think it is necessary, because in the sense in which we usually use that word this is not protection at all. Why? Protection means a tariff or tax on some commodity to encourage the production of a similar commodity in our own country.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Is a cow similar to a packing plant with which you are asking it to compete? Not at all. There is no comparison, so the question of protection does not arise. I take the ground that the prohibition of the manufacture and importation of oleo is not protection at all in the sense in which we usually use that term, because the things competing are different. It is a cow competing against a packing plant, and not only the packing plants of Canada, but of the entire world. If that be so, the question of protection does not come in.

The other evening we discussed a question where there were two classes of the same species competing with each other, and to that extent it was like against like. That was the question of the exclusion of the Asiatics or the restriction of their immigration. Every man in this House, if I recollect aright, took the ground that they should either be excluded or their numbers restricted. In that instance it was man against man, the yellow race against the white race. It was admitted by everybody that the competition was unfair, and that is what I claim in this case. The comparison in the case of the Japanese versus the white race was more justifiable because the two classes competing were both men made after the same pattern, and recognizing the same Creator. The competition was unfair. We all recognized that it was unfair. Every man in the House who acquiesced in or voted against that resolution recognized the unfairness of certain kinds of competition. We can do that without being charged with being protectionists. Would you have a game-cock compete with a utility barnyard bird and call the competition equal? Would you have the Japanese compete with the white man in British Columbia and call that competition fair? So if exclusion or restriction in that case is justifiable, it is much more justifiable that the good dairy cow should not be asked to compete against the immense packing plants of this continent. I am just as much a stickler for free trade, and for as little restrictions on trade, as any other man in this House, but there is such a thing as absolutely unfair competition and this is a case in point—and unfair competition is something that we have all recognized should not exist.

Another argument is that people should have the right to eat what they want. Anybody who takes that ground must also go a step further and say that people should be able to drink what they like. We have lots of precedents in Canada, we have seven out of nine provinces that say you cannot drink what you like. Whether that is right or wrong, that is what we have said. Consequently we have a precedent before us.

I want to refer to another prohibition and this raises an important point. If we permit oleo to be manufactured and imported how many steps will it be from that to the permission of the importation and manufacture of filled milk and cream? Just one. In fact, we have it now. Somebody put a question, and a very proper one, on the Order Paper the other day asking if we were going to legislate against filled milk and cream. I inquired into the matter through my staff, and we found that it had obtained more or less of a foothold already in Canada. However, until we knew what we were going to do with oleo, it was thought we had better let the matter stand because the two questions were on all fours. Oleo is in many cases almost entirely made of natural fats, and in other cases of vegetable oils, and in nearly every case there is from two to five per cent of butter fat. The oil is injected into the butter fat to make the article appear like butter. But in filled milk and cream the butter fat content is taken out from the milk and the cream by the separator, in the usual way. Then the sweet skimmed milk is filled again with other vegetable oils as a substitute for the natural butter fat taken out, and there you have filled milk, with the natural oils taking the place of the butter fat. The same is true of filled cream.

In the United States they permit the manufacture of oleo; the business is established there. I am not criticising these older countries at all, but although this oleo business is established there, nine of the states have prohibited the manufacture and sale and importation of filled milk and cream. That is what is happening right at our door. The question is shall we put in the thin edge of the wedge by recognizing oleo, for if you recognize oleo you are going to have great difficulty in stopping the importation and manufacture of a similar product, except that it applies to milk and cream instead of butter. Where are you going to draw the line? Are we going to let great vested interests establish themselves in this country for the purpose of making filled milk and cream? Should we not rather nip it in the bud now? I am not complaining of the lobbyists who have been around here for the last two or three weeks with their propaganda on behalf of the manufacture of oleo; I have no objection to that at all, but the farmers are a little too busy just now looking after other things to come here to Parliament and look after their own interests. They are at a disadvantage in this respect, and the moment a vested interest grows up in this country, either by legislation or by common consent, there is a lever that you find it pretty hard to work against.

And so I say, if this privilege is extended to oleomargarine we shall have the same thing demanded in the case of filled milk and cream. As a matter of fact in the answer which was given to the deputation referred to by myself on behalf of the Government I said there was no legislation at present; but if it was found that the Public Health Act, the Pure Food Act, and the health laws of this country did not protect the public, then legislation might be required later. That was our answer and I do not see how there could be any other answer to this because, to all intents and purposes the same principle is involved. Nine states in the American Union say to the public "You cannot consume this filled milk or cream". And yet it has a considerable food content, it is of considerable value as an article of diet; but it is deemed not to be in the public interest in the United States that the dealing in this article should be recognized by law and established; that is the point.

Mr. BRISTOL: I am very ignorant about this matter. In the United States is oleomargarine prohibited by law?

Mr. FIELDING: Hear, hear; that is the question.

Mr. BRISTOL: If not, why prohibit oleomargarine in Canada?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, I was pointing out that this question was on all fours with the other one alluded to. But I may say that in the United States the dairy industry is well established. It is older than ours in Canada—and I will deal with that aspect in a moment—and certainly the competition is not as disadvantageous there to the dairying interest. But when we come to Canada it is a horse of another colour. In both cases the principle is the same but I think we should draw the line here. The question has been asked: If a person wants to eat oleo why should he not be allowed to? To that I reply: If we want to drink anything why should we not be allowed to do so? But seven provinces of this country have prohibited intoxicating liquor; and nine states of the American Union have passed a prohibitory law as to filled milk and cream.

Mr. JACOBS: Would the eating of oleo set a person drunk?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No it would not, I hope not at all events, but it would be deleterious to the chief corner stone of agriculture, the live stock industry and especially dairying—there is no question about that. It would be discouraging to every man that milks a cow and knows what it means to hunt after them; it would be discouraging to those men who have been putting up with the vicissitudes of dairying. I want the House to remember that it would take very little to put men out of dairying. It is the last straw that breaks the camel's back, and we do not know that this is not the last straw. We do not make sufficient butter for home use in this country because we import supplies. That raises a very important question. We do import and we feel the competition very keenly. But are we asking for protection against importations of butter from Denmark or New Zealand? I know some men who have taken a stand all their lives against protection, but in the peculiar position in which they find themselves in the dairy industry to-day, beset by difficulties on all sides, they have actually proposed that we raise the protection on butter. I have diligently, and I hope as consistently, refused to agree. I have said "No" and I continue in that stand. We are not asking that the duty be raised on New Zealand or on Danish butter, although we could find a lot of people who supported the Liberal policy in the past who would to-day support the raising of the duty on American butter in retaliation for the Fordney bill. However, we are not doing that, we are not asking for such a thing; but if the fair play asked for by the dairymen is not granted I know that a demand for better treatment will come from many sources, sources that are not dreamt of to-day, and which will be hard to resist because it is not fair to subject our dairy industry to this competition.

I might say while I am on this subject that oleo has been used for many years in the Old Country as well as in Denmark and Holland. That does not mean anything to them except as a source of revenue. Look at the situation of those countries compared with ours. All that Denmark and Holland have to do is to put their butter on the boat, run it two or three hundred miles, or a little more, across the North Sea, and up the Thames, and they are right in the heart of Old England—one of the best markets in the world, in fact the world's market for butter—with practically no expense for transportation. And then in those countries you have an industry that was established hundreds of years ago, whereas we have practically only just started in this country. And then another thing, is that in Denmark and in Holland the people are frugal, thrifty and industrious, and for business reasons they choose to eat oleo and sell their high class butter. That is what a lot of our people do not even want to do. We used to do it fifty years ago, but it is not done to-day except to a very small extent. There is no comparison between the situation of dairying in this country and the situation of dairying in these European countries. In other ways they are situated advantageously as compared with us. Take their climate, take their pasture lands, take the comparatively few months of the year they have to feed their dairy cattle as compared with ours, and a dozen other things I could mention in which they have the advantage of us. If we were so situated, and the dairy industry in this country had been established for hundreds of years, you would not hear very much talk about prohibiting oleo in Canada either.

Take New Zealand and Australia. While oleo is not prohibited in those dominions it is very little used, at least so I am informed by the members of my staff. New Zealand, on the other hand, has also a favoured climate and a comparatively short stabling season. It puts its butter right off the grass into British Columbia in competition with our winter made butter, and we have a hard struggle competing with it and yet we do not ask for a higher duty. And you tell me that that is protection? Why it makes one think one might as well have the game as the name. Still we are not asking for higher protection, I do not even think of suggesting it; but I do ask that we reconsider this question now after having tried it for several years merely as a war measure.

Now, we are asking for fair play and the restoration of the conditions that existed prior to 1917. The governments of both the old time parties were wedded to that system. The old Conservative government of 1886 brought the law in. The Liberal government of 1903 supplemented it by further legislation against the renovation of dairy butter. In 1917 oleomargarine was admitted as a war measure and to-day we are talking about its prohibition entirely. I would go further, Mr. Speaker, and say that if dairying was developed all over Canada in the manner in which it is in the eastern provinces we might not say so much about oleomargarine; but in western Canada to-day the dairy industry is in exactly the same condition that prevailed down here forty or fifty years ago.

Let me address myself in a kindly way to the eastern provinces. All that we ask is the same kind of fair play that you enjoyed during all the years during which your industry was put on the map. I know something of farming conditions in eastern Ontario; I know what they were before the dairying industry was established. I took part in the establishment of it as a boy; and I know this much—it was dairying that put eastern Ontario on the map. I believe to a large extent it has done the same thing for Quebec— although there it is not the only factor—and for some of the maritime provinces. Dairying developed in Ontario when not only oleomargarine but renovated butter was prohibited. To-day there are four new provinces in the West. From the east you are sending us your banking institutions; and your lecturers who go out to the West tell us that we should not be farming exclusively along the lines of grain growing, that our land is becoming depleted of fertility. Then, when we think of taking your advice—and it is good advice although perhaps given a little prematurely, but still with good intent—and we start out into dairying, you come along and propose to hold back from us that measure of fair play that the dairy industry enjoyed in all these eastern provinces during past years. I know the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) does not believe me. He comes from a city; but before I have finished my remarks, he will at all events see the other side of the question, however he may vote.

Mr. JACOBS: Is there in the world any country which prohibits the manufacture of oleomargarine?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not that I am aware of. Is there in the world any country that professes to be a dairy country so disadvantageously situated as Canada is, with no market?

Mr. FIELDING: Such cold winters.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is the cold that makes one do one's best; a cold country makes the men in it. The reason why we have the men we have is because we have to fight against the natural advantages of other countries; but we do not want to be overburdened as we will if the sale of oleomargarine is to be continued.

Everybody knows the advantages which New Zealand possesses, and the Argentine is also becoming a competitor. All these countries have short feeding seasons in the winter and they all have water transportation. The Amazon and La Plata run into the heart of South America; they tap that country on all sides, and whether the product be wheat or cattle or butter, it can be transported by river and ocean to the various other countries of the world. Our chief competitors, Holland, Denmark, Ireland—another country on the water—New Zealand, Australia and the Argentine—you cannot mention one of them so disadvantageously situated as Canada, especially on the plains of the West. Look which way you will, to the West or to the East—to the West you have high freight rates that paralyze trade and to the East long freight hauls, and the West is working under more or less primitive conditions, just at the very period that it would expect to receive the succor and support that this legislation afforded to the East for such a long time in its pioneering stages.

It has been said that every country permits the sale of oleomargarine, and I have discussed that point. If you give this country an opportunity to get established for one-quarter of the time that other countries have been established, we shall then not ask for this small measure of support to the dairy industry in this cold country of ours. When anybody makes light of the cold or the long winter, let him feed stock and thus realize by experience the expense of feeding stock in the winter, and then let him make good butter under such conditions. We are overcoming that tremendous handicap, but we do not want any further handicaps imposed on the dairy industry.

The argument is advanced that vested interests are involved. I have not a thing to say against the packers; I know they are having a hard time of it at present, and if there were about half as many of them as there are now, there would be some business for them all. I have nothing but sympathy for them; but when they knew that this legislation was only to be temporary as a war measure, they should not have invested any substantial amount of money in capital expenditure. I do not think they have spent very much money in the establishment of buildings. The plea is advanced that capital is locked up, and while I have no doubt that some capital has been invested in this way, I believe a great deal of it can be used as it was used prior to the manufacture of this article in 1917. Some people never miss an opportunity of having a crack at the packers, but I am not going to take that attitude at all. I take the opportunity of saying that possibly some of their places which are used at present for the manufacture of oleomargarine can be used instead for renovating our butter, thus creating an industry indigenous to the country. There is a home-made article that can be made into a better article of consumption than any oleomargarine I ever saw.

The hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie), made a comparison between the convictions made under the Oleomargarine Act and those under the Dairy Products Act. The convictions for the manufacture of some kind of spurious butter, that is butter with too much water in it or something of that nature, numbered 126 and the violations in regard to oleomargarine numbered 14. But if you work that out on a percentage basis, the number of the violations in regard to oleomargarine, if you take the quantity of butter into consideration, was greater than the number of violations in regard to butter by 30 per cent, so that point is not well taken.

I have not said anything against oleomargarine as an article of consumption; I have said not one word against the sanitary conditions surrounding its manufacture. As a matter of fact, I do not think we can consistently take such an attitude. At one time we could; but as the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) said, a reasonably good article is being put on the market in packages plainly marked. There is a strict prohibition against putting it up otherwise, and it is inspected at every point. That is all well and good and all true; but nevertheless the information which I have received from the members of my staff in the Dairy branch goes to show that, while this is all performed religiously up to the mark, one-half of the oleomargarine that is purchased, is used, not to spread on bread, but for baking purposes, for which any of the other ingredients now on the market could be used. On the other hand, a considerable proportion of that which is used for spreading on bread is used in boarding houses. It is purchased just as it is described, legally enough; but colouring matter is procured at an adjoining druggist, and the oleomargarine is coloured to look like butter and is put on the table as butter. Thus a man thinks he is getting a cheap butter is paying just as much for it as if he were eating real butter. I asked Mr. Ruddick why a tab could not be kept on this, and he said: "We have not a sufficient appropriation to keep the necessary mass of inspectors who would be required to prevent this masquerading of oleomargarine as butter." Every respectable dairyman will tell you that. Notwithstanding all the precautions that have been taken,—and some speakers have said that if there were not enough restrictions more should be put on—there are some things that it is simply impossible to put sufficient restrictions on to prevent violation of the law, and this seems to be one of them. It is a simple proposition for any one to buy oleomargarine perfectly legally, and then to get colouring matter to mix with the oleomargarine, which is then put on the table as butter and not as oleomargarine at all. Of course, we cannot take too strong exception to oleomargarine on that ground, and I refer to it mainly because the ground has been taken that it is not used in a masquerading capacity for butter, but it is. That is not an unanswerable argument, because practically every law in the world is evaded more or less.

I might refer briefly to some of the reasons pro and con. The first legislation in regard to this matter was passed in 1886, and it is interesting to read the first act and to see what it amounted to. It reads:

> Whereas the use of certain substitutes for butter, heretofore manufactured and exposed for sale in Canada, is injurious to health; and it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture and sale thereof: Therefore, Her Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—
> 1. No oleomargarine, butterine or other substitute for butter, manufactured from any animal substance other than milk, shall be manufactured in Canada, or sold therein, and every person who contravenes the provisions of this Act in any manner whatsoever shall incur a penalty not exceeding four hundred dollars and not less than two hundred dollars, and in default of payment shall be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months and not less than three months.

That is the original law. While I do not think our present law is quite as severe as that, yet the main principle of it was observed up to 1917. Canada in spite of her disabilities has grown to be an outstanding dairy country which is prepared to compete, so far as the tariff is concerned, with any other dairy country in the world. And she has done that. I have a very interesting communication from Mrs. Elizabeth Shortt, President of the National Council of Women, resident in this city. I will not read the letter nor my reply, but she has been doing useful work, from her standpoint, in enlightening the public on the subject. Then there is a letter from Mr. James A. Calder —this is not the real Calder—manager of the Saskatchewan Creameries Company, Moosejaw.

An hon. MEMBER: Any relative of the "real" Calder?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No relative; this is a creamery man. This gentleman has one of the leading creameries in Saskatchewan, if indeed it is not the leading one, and he speaks strongly all through the letter with reference to the disabilities imposed on dairying in the West, at a time when hundreds of thousands of people are turning in hope to this industry as against exclusive grain growing. And now they are faced with this extra disability. When I go West after this session, as I hope to, and tell the people what we propose to do in connection with dairying, and inform them that it is our hope to do something in the way of encouraging silos, the growing of corn and sunflowers and the putting in of what are known as trench silos, that will look very good; and then some guy in the audience will say: "That's all very well, but do you expect me to compete against oleo"? I suppose I should have to reply: "Yes, unfortunately. I was opposed to it myself, but the House decided that we should encourage the manufacture and importation of oleo, and of course the Government had to take the responsibility for what was done." The man would say, naturally, that he had some hesitation about going into dairying. He might say that he came to this country to get away from chores night and morning and thought he could make some money growing wheat and also in taking up dairying. And he will add that the Government the people expected so much from had put this permanent disability on the industry—because it is no longer a war measure—so that the struggling dairymen were unable to get along. What can I say in reply to such a representation? I have no answer at all.

I have a resolution regarding filled milk. The gentleman who sends it sees a cloud on the horizon no bigger than the proverbial man's hand, in the shape of filled milk. He says that whereas an industry has developed in the United States for the manufacture of a substitute called "filled milk", whereas this and whereas that, therefore "don't you do it, because it will get you sooner or later". Those, of course, are not his words. I am paraphrasing his language. And there is a resolution passed by the National Dairy Council with regard to oleomargarine. I believe the member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) read that.

Now, for the first time to-day I heard a dairyman expressing himself in favour of the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine, and that was the member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie). Every single authority I have been able to get in connection with dairying has been opposed to the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, and while there may be other dairymen like my hon. friend from Victoria city I have never heard them voice approval of this article.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member for Victoria City does not make his living by dairying. He only tinkers at it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am a dairyman in a sense too.

Mr. NEILL: Perhaps only tinker too.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, while perhaps I may not be exactly a dairyman, I may say that in the pioneer days of the Northwest Territories I was kept out of the poorhouse by dairying, and it was home dairying too. Later on I was associated with the industry in an administrative way, and have been privileged to help start dairying in Saskatchewan. But if you are going to compel the industry to face this disability, while it may not be ruined thereby, you will greatly discourage the people in southern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta who are just trembling on the brink to-day. They do not exaggerate the hard-luck story, but there is no doubt about the fact that they are on the very brink of the precipice and it is questionable whether or not they can be placed in a position of safety again. Certainly, they cannot be put on their feet by exclusive grain growing; that is too precarious. It must be by some form of live stock industry, and nothing will bring quicker revenue than dairying. With that hot country, capable of growing corn and sunflowers as fodder, and with the policy of the provincial governments of providing dairy cows, all that is needed is to create a desire on the part of the people to combine these circumstances to establish a life saving industry that will put them on the map again.

Mr. BRISTOL: Is it domestic oleomargarine manufactured in Canada, or the article manufactured in Chicago, that gives trouble to the dairy farmers of Saskatchewan?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Both. One is largely vegetable and the other animal fat. It really does not matter which kind is sold, but the imported article is more objectionable.

Mr. BRISTOL: It occurred to me that transportation on the imported article might affect the price in eastern Canada.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You might put an embargo on imported oleo, but that would afford an element of protection to the man who made it at home. I thought of that alternative, but it only got me into difficulties.

Mr. LADNER: Does the minister suggest that the price of butter is affected by the use of oleomargarine manufactured in Canada?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The consumption of butter is.

Mr. LADNER: I am asking about the price.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I shall answer the question in my own way. Dairying was the branch of agriculture that stood up the longest after the war, and for that reason people are going into the industry more than ever the world over. It is the one safe line of agriculture, and because of that we are going to have great difficulties not only in securing markets but in holding them. Consequently, anything that deprives the dairyman of the home market is a detriment to the industry; and to the extent that oleomargarine is used as a substitute for butter it will lessen the demand for the dairy product. I do not say how much it is likely to interfere with the price, but oleomargarine will certainly interfere with the market for butter. Every country is seeking markets, and that is the story in Canada. The situation is very acute, and at all dairy conventions in Canada since New Year's, it has been the same tale from East to West: We must hold what markets we have by improving the quality of our product, and at the same time endeavour to get new markets for disposing of it.

I will now refer to some of the arguments that have been advanced during the course of the debate. As I said at the outset, there are two sides to this question, and I am prepared to make a compromise proposition rather than insist on those who think as I do having our way, or those who think opposite having their way. I believe in a free-for-all such as this we are speaking our real heart's opinion, and if that be so, as I am sure it is, then if we can come to a compromise whereby the man or woman who wants cheap butter can get it without prejudicially affecting the youthful, incipient dairyman, then I think such a compromise would be a very commendable one. That is what I appeal for.

The hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) spoke of the effect that either the manufacture or non-manufacture of oleo would have on beef cattle. From inquiries I have made I find that only 10 per cent of the tallow generated in our beef cattle goes into oleo. Of course, if oleo were freely manufactured it would gradually require a greater supply of tallow, but at the present stage the consumption of tallow does not amount to any appreciable volume.

Then the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) said that Canada is not justified in destroying one industry in order to build up another Now, Mr. Speaker, is it fair to say that the manufacture of oleomargarine is an industry when it was permitted to be established on grace and to meet a temporary condition only? The manufacturers were permitted to manufacture oleo to meet the scarcity of butter due to the heavy export demands during the war. They knew at the time that the manufacture had its limitations, and they deliberately engaged in it. The very fact that its importation and manufacture was extended for one year last session shows that the industry was always regarded as of a purely temporary character, and there can be no doubt that those who engaged in it recognized its limitations. Consequently it cannot be said that we are destroying any industry. It was a catch piece of business for the occasion, and the manufacturers took their chances at the time they started to make oleomargarine, and they will have to take their chances if its importation and manufacture should be discontinued. But if those same manufacturers are permitted to manufacture renovated butter, part of their loss of business may be made up, and this renovated butter will make a very good substitute for oleomargarine. The hon. member took the stand: You have no right to interfere with me as to what I want to eat. Well, I have pointed out that if he takes that ground, it logically follows that we would not tolerate our right to interfere with him in what he drinks. If he insists upon perfect liberty in one direction he must naturally insist upon it in the other direction; the two go together.

The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) supports the resolution because, he says, it means protection to the dairy industry. That is an attitude I cannot agree with, and I have given my reasons. However, if all my hon. friends immediately opposite who do honestly believe in protection see protection in this proposal, why, we will welcome every one of their votes on this occasion.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Munro), who is something of a philosopher, said: The young men will not milk; the old ones cannot, as they are broken down. So when they die, what are we going to do? I suppose the answer again is: Eat oleo. But that is not sufficient. Undoubtedly the young men do dislike milking cows. We have so many attractions—we have our fine, inter-urban highways; we have our high-powered cars; we have our barrel of gasoline, and all we have to do is turn the tap and fill the tank of the car; we have a baseball match down the line; we have a nice road, and we have a nicer girl, if you like, across the way that the young man wants to take to the baseball match. How can the dull routine of dairy farming stand up against such a temptation, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. McMASTER: Away with the girl!

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Away with the Ford!

Mr. MOTHERWELL: On top of all that you are going to let oleo have a chance. Is it any wonder that our dairymen are alarmed now? As my hon. friend said, the younger people do not want to milk cows—and there is not a man across the way who has raised a family but knows that. I do not know how we are going to change the tastes of our younger people. We have got to get back to hard work again, Mr. Speaker. We have got to recognize the virtues of honest toil faithfully performed even in milking cows. There is no question about that. My hon. friend says, let the hired man do it. There is about one in twenty hired men who will milk, that is all; the rest will tell you to milk the cows yourselves—they will tell you something else worse than that sometimes. Now, you have got to do it yourself or have some member of the family do it for you. With the young men refusing, and the old ones going out of business, we have got to the point where every little discouragement, no matter how slight, is sufficient to turn the tide against dairying in this crisis we are going through. Do not make any mistake now. I am not jesting about this. I know the hard, insistent, exacting work connected with dairying, and I know if you add one more discouragement it will be just enough in many instances to turn the tide against dairying.

The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) remarked that the introducer of the resolution might as well have left off the latter portion of his speech. I do not think so. If it can be established that dairying is going to be discouraged by the introduction of oleo, and you are going to strike at the chief cornerstone of our agricultural interest, then I say that all Canada is affected. There is no question about that. We can only plead for the dairy industry to the extent that it is interwoven with the general industry of the country.

Mr. BROWN: I think the hon. minister misunderstands my argument. What I suggested the introducer of the resolution might as well have left off was his argument that margarine was deleterious to the consumer.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know that he made that plea, Mr. Speaker, but it is the general public weal that we must take into account. In just the same way when my hon. friend of the party over the way at an angle of forty-five degrees, asked for a wheat board—and we hope we will get some kind of a wheat board, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, that sounds better than dairying. Now, can any hon.

gentleman who advocates a wheat board turn down this proposition? After all, it all depends on whose ox is gored. We may as well all admit—with the exception of the hon. member for Victoria City—that we are selfish, and that we cannot help seeing any question but from our own particular viewpoint. But I see this question from the viewpoint of one who has been charged for the time being, Mr. Speaker, with the duty of administering the Department of Agriculture over this vast country, and I cannot for the life of me see this question from any other standpoint than that the introduction of oleo at this time is a discouragement to one of our basic industries, and if you discourage dairying—

Mr. IRVINE: Will the hon. minister support the wheat board on the same principle as he is supporting the prohibition of oleomargarine?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, the illustrations are not parallel. They are along the same lines, but not exactly the same.

Mr. IRVINE: The hon. minister makes them parallel by saying that if the people sitting at an angle of 45 degrees opposite advocated a wheat board they ought to advocate this on the same basis. The application to the minister's argument, therefore is evident.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is rarely that you can get exact parallels in this world. This is not a parallel, any more than the Japanese question is a parellel. The one deals with cows, the other with men; in the case of my hon. friend it is the Wheat Board. But in the case of the Wheat Board my hon. friends are asking for something of especial interest to themselves. If a thing is in the public interest; if the interest of an industry is locked up with the public interest, then it is good business to advocate it, and that is what I am endeavouring to do in connection with the dairying industry. An hon. member has put this note in my hand:

> Oleo lessens the number of cows raised and therefore starves the soil and hurts mixed farming in general.

That is true. In the older countries of the world the people are so much concerned about the fertility of the soil that they do not use mechanical power on the land because it is non-productive of fertilizer. I had the pleasure of visiting Europe eleven or twelve years ago, and I asked the older farmers there why they did not make more use of mechanical power. They use all kinds of animal power, even to native oxen from the Carpathian mountains, proceeding on the principle that every hoof of live stock which can be obtained and maintained should be kept on the farm. So it is with the dairying industry; every additional hoof kept on the farm results in increased fertility of the soil. I know that may not appeal to western men; the question does not affect us there as yet. In fact, our difficulty is to get our manure piles taken from the barnyard with the least possible expense, though in the older sections the fertilizer is being used on the land as it should be. But the amount of live stock in the older parts of the country will determine to what extent the fertility of the soil will be maintained and increased.

Some hon. members have had the advantage of discussing this matter in the House on several different occasions. More than half the members of this Parliament are new members—I am one of them—and to those new members the subject is not a worn out one as it may be to hon. gentlemen who have been here for some time. There is an honest difference of opinion on this question. Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that if we apply the brakes at all we should start with renovated butter? I am prepared to advocate the removal of the restriction in that regard, which would result in the liberation for sale in our own market, at approximately the same price as oleo,—of 1,000,000 pounds of real butter which is 100 per cent fat and has 100 per cent food content.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the House deals with oleomargarine, not with manufactured butter, and I propose to confine my attention to the resolution.

Once upon a time there was in this House a Liberal member who was a strong free-trader, representing an agricultural constituency. One day somebody suggested by resolution that encouragement should be given to the raising of hogs. My friend, the Liberal member, strongly supported the resolution, and after that he became known as the man who was a free-trader in everything except in pork. I am afraid that my good friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) has disclosed himself to be a free-trader in everything except in butter. In most matters, especially those relating to agriculture, I defer to the views of my friend and colleague the Minister of Agriculture, for I know he is master of the subject, while I know but little about it. If I thought that the question at issue was that of the dairying industry I should not speak at all. But I do not think that is the question. I am obliged to follow in this matter not the leadership of my colleague the Minister of Agriculture, but the leadership of the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie), who, I say, made a speech to-day which, in my judgment, has not been and cannot be answered. If I thought the people of Canada for the most part were fools; if I thought they were lacking in intelligence; if I thought they were incapable of judging for themselves of what they wanted and where they should get it; if I thought they needed that tender guardianship which we provide for children and Indians and lunatics—why, in that case I would vote for the resolution; because this resolution simply says that the people of Canada are not to be trusted to decide for themselves whether or not they will buy a commodity which the whole world accepts.

Canada is the only country in the world, so far as I know—the only country claiming to be civilized—which does not allow the use of oleomargarine. Just when we began to forbid it, I do not know. When I came into the government more than a quarter of a century ago there was no question about oleomargarine. It was on the prohibited list and there it remained until quite recently, during the war. In all that time nobody ever thought anything about oleomargarine, because so long as good butter could be obtained at a reasonable price, nobody wanted oleomargarine. And that is the condition to-day; the people of Canada will not buy oleomargarine so long as they can get 10 p.m. butter at a fair price. If there has been a development of the oleomargarine business it simply has been because a very considerable percentage of our pepole have not had the means to buy butter and they have bought oleomargarine rather than not have anything at all.

Now, why in the world should Canada set itself up as a judge against the rest of the world? You are all familiar with the old story of the juryman who held out against all the others and who said afterwards that he had never met eleven such stupid men in his life as those fellows who sat on that jury with him. So it is that we are setting ourselves up against the civilized world if we adopt this resolution.

The only question here is this: Is this a commodity which can properly be dealt with; is it wholesome and safe and clean? The Minister of Agriculture says: "If you are going to admit the right on the part of the people to eat oleomargarine, you must logically admit their right to drink whiskey." But if my hon. friend had had a good case he would not have used that argument, because there is all the difference in the world. I think my hon. friend is one of those who regard whiskey not only as unwholesome, but as a poison. At all events, according to him, the great majority of the people condemn whiskey because it is unwholesome, because it is wicked to drink it, because it is damaging, morally, physically and every other way. Will my hon. friend say the same of oleomargarine? If he cannot do so, then where is the analogy? It goes to pieces.

Then, my hon. friend says that the hon. ex-Minister of Agriculture is the first dairyman he has met who has opposed the object aimed at by this resolution and has favoured the admission of oleomargarine. The minister says that all the dairymen of the country are asking for it. Well, if you call a dairyman's convention and ask their opinion on this matter, of course they will say, "Shut out oleomargarine." If you move a resolution to increase the duty on butter, they will probably vote for that too. Does my hon. friend ever read the reports of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association in which that body advocates high tariff? Does my hon. friend regard that as conclusive evidence that they ought to get it? It is just as good evidence as he adduces to-day when he says the dairymen's association passed resolutions in favour of prohibiting the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine.

Do not forget that this is a commodity which the whole world uses. It is not a poison; it is not unwholesome. Perhaps in the early days of oleomargarine it was a cheap and nasty production, and there may have been good reason for putting it on the prohibited list. But to-day the conditions are different. My hon. friend himself admits that oleomargarine is manufactured under severe restriction and inspection which guarantees its cleanliness and its production under sanitary conditions. It is a good thing in its way. It is not as good as butter; we do not pretend it is, but it is not unwholesome. If it is a wholesome commodity, if the wide world treats it as an article in which you can trade, in the name of heaven why shall we in Canada say we cannot trust our people to know whether or not they want oleomargarine?

I do not think there is a sound argument used from beginning to end against oleomargarine. I deny that there is competition between butter and oleomargarine. They are two distinct products, and if you provide that the oleomargarine shall be distinctly marked and labelled—and the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) showed us a sample to-day plainly marked, plainly labelled—there is no chance in the world of any one being imposed upon by getting oleomargarine in the shape of butter, unless he is very dull and wants to be imposed upon. Every shop that sells oleomargarine has to sell it labelled as such.

Oleomargarine is used by the poorer people of this country to-day. It is nonsense for my hon. friend to talk of giving them cheaper butter. We do not want cheaper butter. We want the dairyman to get a good price for their butter but inasmuch as it is a fact that many of the poorer people in this country cannot buy butter even at its moderate price to-day, surely we are not going to deny them, especially those in the cities and towns, the right to get a substitute so long as it is sold under its proper name; and in that case it cannot be a competitor with butter. I insist that they are two distinct products, and there is no real competition between them at all.

There were many points raised by my hon. friend that I should like to speak to but I shall not enlarge upon them to-night. The whole question is this: Here is a commodity that is traded in by every country in the world except Canada. Surely there is no reason why it should not be traded in in this country, unless our people are lacking in the intelligence that we believe they possess. It is because I believe they are intelligent, because I believe they are able to know what they want and able to make a distinction, because I believe they are not going to be so easily fooled and humbugged into having oleomargarine palmed off on them as butter, that I am going to oppose the motion made by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill).

I was surprised to get a certain piece of information from the Minister of Agriculture to-night. I have always understood that Canada was a dairying country. I have been down in the eastern townships of Quebec and have heard eloquent speakers declare that there was no finer agricultural, grazing, or dairying country in the wide world than those eastern townships of the province of Quebec, but to-night I learn from my hon. friend that that is a mistake. It is a country in which the dairying interests are in such a perilous position that at any moment they may be destroyed by the butter which is being brought up from the Argentine. I have a better opinion of Canada as a dairying country than my hon. friend, but I do not want to argue that question. I simply say that oleomargarine, whatever it may have been in the old days, is now an article of commerce which every other civilized country in the world recognizes as such, and I can see no earthly reason why the Canadian citizen shall be told, in effect, that he is not intelligent enough to distinguish between oleomargarine and butter when he goes to the grocery shop.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The question of the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine first came up during the early days of the Union government. Previous to that time, we did not have oleomargarine in Canada, and there was a distinct pledge given at that time, when it was admitted owing to war conditions, that when the war terminated and those conditions passed, the act would cease to exist. Since that time, however, it has been extended from year to year, and some have been advocating that it should be made permanent. Among those I believe was the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). I think his criticism of last year and of two years ago was that the act should not be simply extended for a year, but be made permanent.

I listened with a good deal of interest when I came into the House to-night to the address of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). I was somewhat in doubt as to just what policy the Government were going to pursue on this question, for they have undoubtedly discussed it, and as I listened to the eloquence with which the Minister of Agriculture dealt with the question I wondered if he was going to live up to the reputation he has been establishing during the last few weeks in Parliament and in the country. After listening to the hon. gentleman who is leading the Government to-night (Mr. Fielding) who, I would imagine, has given us the policy of the Government on this question, I can picture in my mind the Minister of Agriculture turning another sharp corner just about as quickly as he has turned some others during the past few days.

I do not think that the fate of agriculture or of the dairying industry depends to any great extent upon how this question is determined. We have heard the Minister of Finance refer to oleomargarine as a wholesome article of food, and point out that no one has shown it to be anything else. It is somewhat singular that although we now have a Department of Health connected with the Government, there is not a member of the Government, nor was there of the late government, who could inform this House just what constitutes oleomargarine—not one. I have asked the question repeatedly, and I have been unable to find any one who was able to give us that information. "Oh," they say, "it is manufactured under strict supervision in the abattoirs in this country, and there are a number of veterinary inspectors who are looking after this matter." But what about our Department of Health? Why are they not looking into this article of food for human consumption?

The plea has been made repeatedly in favour of oleomargarine on behalf of the children of the poor in this country. Mr. Speaker, it is on behalf of the children of the poor in this country that I am arguing here to-night against allowing oleomargarine to be imported and disposed of in this country as it has been in the past few years. It is surprising how many people you find who like to get something for nothing. Milk fat differs from all other fats in that it contains certain life-giving substances that are essential for promoting the growth of the young. It appears that an all-wise Creator has placed this substance in the milk fat of all animals, and that it is not to be found anywhere else. Yet some clever people, realizing that this is a food product absolutely essential in promoting the growth of the young, have got the idea that if they can only get some cheaper commodity and be able to dispose of it under the plea that it is a wholesome food and will take the place of butter, they are going to make a whole lot of money out of it. That is about the size and substance of the arguments in favour of oleomargarine.

The Minister of Finance says that every country in the world except Canada permits the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. I say there is no country in the world that gives these people the same privileges and freedom with regard to the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine that they have in Canada—not one. In France they will not even permit it to be sold at the same shops with dairy products. Yet in this country you find this stuff advertised in all the market reports in the dairy column. Why should that be the case? If it is not a dairy product, why should it be advertised as a dairy product in this country? They say they are going to sell oleomargarine on its merits. Then why should they be so anxious to put it up in pound prints of exactly the same size and shape as butter, and make it look like butter, and churn it in milk to give it a butter flavour? It is also mixed with butter, not only two per cent of butter, but in some cases as high as thirty-three per cent. Why should that be the case if this is a wholesome food? It is because they know it adds to the value of the article. I have spoken consistently against oleomargarine ever since it was permitted to be imported and sold in this country. It was one of the first-born children of the late Minister of Agriculture, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). He has upheld the manufacture of oleo in this country; he was responsible for the enactment of regulations such as they have in no other country where this stuff is used. I will quote from these regulations and then ask you whether you think the dairyman has a grievance or not. Here is one example:

> No person other than a manufacturer of oleomargarine shall mix oleomargarine and butter.

Why should the packing houses have a special right to mix oleomargarine and butter in this country? The regulations further say:

> Oleomargarine shall not be manufactured in Canada in any premises used as, or connected with, a butter factory.

Now the butter manufacturer is subjected to the most stringent regulations not only by the municipal and provincial authorities, but by the federal government, in order to ensure the wholesomeness and the purity of his product and to standardize it. Notwithstanding that, the federal government grants a license to some of these packing companies, who manage to get their ear, permitting them to use highly coloured June butter—as was admitted in sworn testimony given before a committee of this House—to colour the tallow and oil and make it look more like butter. Because we have it on the strength of the sworn evidence of the manager of the Harris

Abattoir in Toronto that unless that was done the stuff would taste like tallow and the people would not buy it. Consequently these packing houses buy highly coloured June butter in order to mix with their product. The privilege was granted as a war measure and there was no complaint heard from the farmers of this country. An Order in Council was passed, under the War Measures Act, commandeering all the butter that was being manufactured in the creameries of this country from September 1, 1918, down to a certain time. Now there were twenty-five million pounds of butter in the cold storage warehouses in Canada at that time and in the hands of the oleomargarine manufacturers there were 3,622,830 pounds. The butter that was being turned out by the dairymen of Canada was commandeered, but the oleomargarine manufacturers and wholesale dealers were left in charge of their supplies.

These are some of the things I have objected to in the past; and when the hon. member for Marquette was Minister of Agriculture I directed his attention to a number of the injustices which I considered the dairymen of this country were suffering.

I have endeavoured to be consistent in this matter although I have had to criticise those with whom I was associated politically, and I intend to be consistent whether what I advocate agrees with the policy of my associates or not. Nor am I taking the stand I do because the county from which I come is interested in this matter to any great extent, because the great majority of the farmers there are purchasing their butter instead of manufacturing it, although the county is one of the most noted dairy sections in the whole Dominion. I ask hon. members whether they consider it is a good thing that an old established industry, like the dairy industry, should be jeopardized to the extent that butter making has often been in the past by reason of legislation enacted by this Parliament. For it must be remembered that the future of western Canada, as well as the East, as the Minister of Agriculture has pointed out, depends wholly upon the live stock industry. We have induced thousands of returned men to settle upon farms; yet in the fact of that certain hon. members would pass legislation to deprive these men of their means of livelihood; because that is exactly what it means.

I did not hear the arguments which were advanced early in the afternoon with reference to this matter. But I have heard some of the reasons advanced by the manufacturers of oleomargarine for continuing this policy, such as are contained in the circulars which have been diligently sent out by them. They claim to be using Canadian products for the manufacture of oleomargarine, when the fact is they are importing most of their stuff and paying practically no duty on it at all. Let me give you some idea of the quantities brought in for eleven months of the past year; they were all the figures I could obtain at the time I received this information: Lard compound, 335,161 pounds; oleo oils imported —and the manufacturers say " Oh but look at the splendid market afforded here for the oleo oils from our beef cattle"—1,731,005 pounds; cotton seed oil 348,583 pounds; cocoanut oil 219,132 pounds; peanut oil 125,889 pounds; butter oil—I do not know what that is; I believe it must be something of the kind that the Minister of Agriculture calls renovated butter—823,558 pounds; salt 279,634 pounds; the total of all commodities imported was 3,862,962 pounds.

These went to make up the oleomargarine which was manufactured in this country during eleven months of the past year. A slight duty was paid but 99 per cent of such duty paid during the past year has been returned to the manufacturers. The amount of such drawback allowed to the two manufacturers interested was $388,345.53. The Canadian oleomargarine manufacturers enlarge on the market their industry creates for beef fats, and other articles of the kind, in this country; but when they make such importations, as I have shown from the United States, it puts a different complexion on the matter. Their claim is not well founded. It is a deliberate attempt to introduce a system into Canada that is not in the interest of agriculture because it concedes to these people privileges that those who are engaged in agriculture do not possess.

Furthermore, these manufacturers import articles upon which there is practically no duty. There is a duty of three cents a pound on butter under the British preference and a duty of four cents a pound on butter imported from other countries. During eleven months of the past year we imported butter to the amount of 5,805,422 pounds. Of this quantity 2,036,471 pounds came from the United Kingdom under the British preference. These imports had an advantage over the butter that came in from the United States of one cent per pound. From Australia we imported 287,724 pounds; from New Zealand 2,148,752 pounds; and from the United States 1,332,210 pounds. These are some of the things that are happening right in our own country. We are appointing trade agents, and doing everything possible to find markets for the products of this country; and yet instead of endeavouring to build up and stimulate some of the industries that are natural to, but are lagging in, Canada we are working vigorously in the opposite direction.

I am not going into these questions in detail to-night because hon. members who were in the last, and the previous parliaments, know what my views are in these respects. I must say, however, I am more than surprised that at this late date, after the extent to which this stuff has been coming into Canada, with all the facilities we have, our Health Departments are not able to give us any information as to the food value of this article. No one will contend that it can take the place of butter or butter fats, notwithstanding the agitation which is being put on foot and which had its origin in this city of Ottawa about the time that the war was very bad; when conditions apparently justified something being done along that line fats were permitted to be utilized in this way while we had not a sufficient supply of butter. I might read some of the resolutions which have been passed by some associations in this city, although that is something which I do not like to do. I know, however, that the activities which have been shown during the past few months by certain associations throughout this country, have had their origin in this city amongst those who are not so vitally interested in agriculture as many other people in this country are. In 1919, resolutions were passed in this city, and the members of these associations endeavoured to get into touch with the various branches of these associations throughout the country so as to have them write to their member and to the Government advocating that the sale of this stuff should be legalized permanently. Let me read one resolution which was passed in Ottawa. This is taken from the Ottawa Citizen of April 14, 1919:

> It was moved by Mrs. Adam Shortt and seconded by Lady Pope,
>
> That whereas fat is an essential food for human beings, and that children deprived of it suffer not only from malnutrition in the present, but are permanently injured in physique; and whereas, there is not enough butter in the country to supply everybody if margarine were banished; and whereas, butter is so high a price that thousands cannot have butter, because of the cost; and whereas, margarine is a butter substitute of equal caloric value with butter; and whereas, margarine has been allowed in the country under the War Measures Act, which comes to an end with the signing of peace;
> Therefore, be it resolved that we women of Ottawa do now appeal to this federal Government now considering child welfare, to permanently legalize margarine in Canada, in order that children may thrive and not decline and that consumers be not deprived of their legitimate right, as in other countries, to have margarine for domestic use.

And so on including arguments which have been advanced in support of oleomargarine.

Is it a wholesome article of food for children? I have in my hand some evidence to the contrary, not furnished by dairymen's associations or any one interested in dairying. Probably this has been referred to by some previous speaker, and, consequently, if I am repeating something which has been said before, it goes only to strengthen previous arguments. This reads:

> When oleomargarine was admitted to Canada as a "war measure" (and subsequently continued as packer's and produce dealer's measure) the children of Canada were betrayed to an insidious, relentless enemy. Chief among those betrayed were the children of the lower strata, where money to buy genuine butter, might be as scarce as the inclination to spend the extra cent or two a pound for it.
> There is plenty of evidence to show how insidious is the enmity of oleomargarine to childhood—how it imperceptibly stunts the growth of the child, and prevents its development, at the same time apparently providing a satisfactory and necessary food element.
>
> The eye is deceived, but not the body. The profits accrue to the packer-manufacturers and the distributors, but a toll of under-nourishment is taken from the children who eat it, in order that these selfish profits might be made.
>
> The city of Rochester recently had a noteworthy experience in connection with the use of butter and oleomargarine in an orphan asylum.
>
> In this asylum the practice has been followed for years of weighing every child at regular intervals. Because of the high prices of butter, the management substituted oleomargarine on January 1, 1917, and supplied it to the children for six months. At the end of this time, results were so unsatisfactory that butter was replaced in the ration. Here are the weights of seven children over four periods of six months each:
>
> The first six months, while butter was fed, these seven children gained 23.75 lbs.
>
> For the next six months, while butter was still being fed, the seven children gained 44.25 lbs.
> For the next six months these children were fed oleomargarine in place of butter, the diet being otherwise the same. The result was a loss of 9.5 lbs.

In the next periods, butter was again replaced, with the result that, in the following six months, the children made a gain of 56.87 lbs.

This official report from the city of Rochester is one of the strongest indictments of oleomargarine we have ever seen and it comes, not from the dairy interests, but from a city organization. The class that would stand to gain most from the suppression of oleomargarine would be the growing children.

It is on behalf of the growing children and the working people of this country, the people who are putting their good money into this spurious article, that I am speaking to-night, and not on behalf of the dairymen, because, as time goes on these people will realize that this commodity cannot take the place of butter and people of good judgment and sense will see that their children are supplied with the genuine article. In the meantime, however, is it the duty of the Government to permit this stuff to continue to be sold and not to have it inspected? I would have thought one of the first steps that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) would have taken would have been to see that the medical authorities of the Department of Health made a proper analysis of it, so that he might have been in a position to-night to inform this House as to the true food value of this commodity. This has not been done, and, consequently, we do not know even yet what the food value of this article is.

I opposed it in the past because of the regulations which were enacted giving these people the freedom which they have. What right have they to purchase butter which has been manufactured under the strict regulations to which I have referred, to take it into a packing house and to mix it up with cottonseed oil and other vegetable fats, to churn it with milk, to go to all these pains in order to deceive the consumer and to sell it under butter's trademark, because that is what they are doing when they put it up in a package in imitation of butter? Although the wrapper may indicate that the content is oleomargarine, when it is stripped off the wrapper, when it is cut up into blocks and put on the tables of boarding houses throughout Canada, how are you going to detect it? It is said that you canot detect it from butter; that it is wholesome. It may be wholesome, but we do not know how wholesome it is. It is possible a grown up person would not feel the injurious effects of it; but as regards the young and growing child, never yet has anything been discovered that can take the place of the qualities that milk fat contains. People may attempt to imitate, and they may eventually discover something that will take the place of butter; but so far nothing has been discovered that can take the place of milk fat. Consequently you will find that some people will be anxious to put some spurious article on the market, and I contend that the poor of this country, because it is the poor and not the wealthy people who are buying this stuff, have suffered more as the result of this policy and will continue to suffer more than any one else.

No doubt other hon. members desire to speak on this, and I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the House; but I want to re-emphasize the fact that dairying is not such a profitable industry as some people would like us to believe. In Ontario, dairying has been established for many years; in fact, the first cheese factory established in the Dominion of Canada was established in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. Cheese manufacturing had its headquarters there for many years, and the town which is my home town is possibly better known in the Old Land as a result of the exportation of cheese and dairy products than any other town in the Dominion. I refer to the town of Ingersoll. The late Edwin Caswell, of Ingersoll, was one of the first exporters of cheese in this country.

During the last few years a census has been taken of the farms in the county of Oxford and also of the farms in the county of York by the provincial government with a view to establishing the actual cost of dairy products in this country, and I am going to point out very briefly the result of that census. In the county of Oxford, it was shown that the cost of producing 100 pounds of milk was $2.94, and in the county of York, it was $3.32. The price received in Oxford was $2.81 and in the county of York $2.85; or, taking everything into consideration, there was a loss of 13 cents per 100 pounds in Oxford and 40 cents per 100 pounds in York. These figures were obtained after careful investigation of upwards of 100 farms in each of these counties, an endeavour having been made to find out, by as minute an analysis as possible, what the actual cost of production was and what they were receiving in return. Now, these are some of the things that the dairymen of this country have through experience very well fixed in their minds, and when associations that have nothing to do with agriculture or dairying pass resolutions such as have been passed in this city and elsewhere, beseeching the Government to see that this article that is manufactured by farmers is allowed to be incorporated with the cheap commodities imported duty free and turned out by these manufacturers and placed on the markets of the country, it is apparent that their chief plea is a fraud from beginning to end and should not be countenanced by any government. So long as I am engaged in any industry I shall feel that I am entitled to the same consideration that is accorded every other industry; and anyone who advocates the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine as at present permitted undoubtedly shows a contempt for dairying and agriculture generally.

I do not think that this commodity should be allowed to be sold in Canada; but certainly if you permit the sale of oleomargarine here the imported article and the commodities which go to make it up should be subject to a customs tariff just the same as other things that are imported. Furthermore, it should be manufactured and placed on the market on its merits. No attempt should be made to deceive the public by mixing it with butter and churning it in milk. I believe there are vegetable oils in the oleomargarine sold in England, which is entirely different from the commodity that is placed on the markets in this country. In some countries they do not allow oleomargarine to be put up in quantities of less than 10 pounds, whereas in Canada we allow them to put it on the market in pound prints identical in shape with dairy products.

Now, I have referred to a few of the objections I have to the continuance of the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. I heartily support the resolution, and I trust that the sale of this article in Canada will be prohibited. If, however, the Government do decide to permit its manufacture and importation, they should impose a tariff upon it like anything else, because it should not receive special privileges over an old-established industry like the butter industry. The fact that oleomargarine may have 25 or 30 per cent, of butter fat incorporated in it, and 15 per cent of milk, is no reason why it should be allowed to compete with genuine butter.

Let us do something at least to show that we are in sympathy with those men who are labouring under great difficulties at the present time;—I refer to the returned soldiers who have gone on the land. Many of these men, with the limited experience they had, have been tempted to go into dairying and the live stock industry. And the country depends more on the butter industry than upon anything else. It is only by the manufacture of butter that we can hope to establish a successful live-stock industry in Canada. I heard an hon. member the other night—I think it was my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) —bemoaning in very doleful tones the condition of the farmers in western Canada. He pointed out that the land was becoming impoverished and was producing six bushels per acre less than a few years ago. Well, what can you expect? We listened to the provincial Minister of Agriculture from Saskatchewan, Hon. Mr. Hamilton, the other day, before the committee on agriculture, endeavouring to prove the contention that we should have a wheat board in this country by the fact that the income of the average farmer in the province of Saskatchewan from a 320 acre farm was, I think, about $1,200 less than his expenses. To my amazement, the only two things the farmer had to sell were wheat and oats. It struck me that such a man was not much of a farmer. Any one can go to Saskatchewan and on fertile land grow wheat and oats as long as the land retains its fertility. But there comes a day when it will not be so responsive, and the only method of keeping the soil fertile is by going into the live-stock industry in conjunction with other farming. This has been demonstrated time and again, not only in Canada, but throughout the world. People need not think that they can go on taking from the land forever without putting something back, without exhausting its fertility. This is the chief cause of the trouble to-day. In many of the old provinces much of the land has become impoverished and it is no small task to bring it back to a state where good crops can be grown. I think it will be one of the greatest misfortunes this country has ever experienced if we follow the course advocated and pursued in the past and put all our lands under cultivation, neglecting live stock and dairying. We should develop this industry in conjunction with the cultivation of the soil. To-day it is imperative that we should establish the dairy industry on a sound basis, and we cannot hope to do so if we allow and handicaps to operate it. I therefore support the resolution.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): The subject matter of the resolution under consideration by the House this afternoon and evening is not by any means a new one.

Indeed, it is a hardy annual that has appeared every session since I came to the House five years ago; and I agree entirely with the view expressed by the member for South Waterloo (Mr. Euler) this afternoon when he said that he hoped we should be able on the present occasion to make a final disposition of it. I have a particular interest in this matter, Sir, because of the fact that the first job I had after I became Minister of Agriculture in 1917 was to draft the regulations—assisted, of course, by expert men in the department—covering the sale and manufacture in, and the importation into Canada, of oleomargarine. These regulations were passed at that time under the War Measures Act for the reasons stated by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) this afternoon. In 1918 another Order in Council was passed extending the regulations and in some respects making them rather more stringent than before. In the autumn session of 1919, when the power of the government to act under the War Measures Act had lapsed, parliament passed legislation extending the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine for another year; in 1920 parliament considered the matter further and again extended the period for another year; the same thing happened the following year, and now in this session we are once more considering whether or not this legislation shall pass out of existence or be continued.

I am opposed to the motion of my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), and I am opposed to it for the very reason that my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) supports it. I believe I have stated before in this House that the gentlemen who believe in the principle of protection in fiscal policy could consistently believe in protection to the dairy industry in this way. I do not believe in the fiscal policy of protection, I do not believe in protection at all for that matter in trade, and consequently I am opposed to the resolution.

I agree entirely with my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), in his observations on the contribution to the discussion made by the hon. member from Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie). I submit, too, that his arguments have not been answered, and that they alone constitute sufficient reasons for this House to continue the legislation in question.

The argument of the protectionists in matters of fiscal policy is that it is necessary to build up your home industry. Our friends who argue against the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine take exactly the same position. I am at one with the remarks made by my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) this afternoon when he described this motion as embodying the most vicious kind of protection. And it is the most vicious kind of protection, for the reason that it not only prevents the importation of a necessary and useful article of food but it entirely prohibits its manufacture at home. If protection can go any further than that, I am at a loss to understand how it can be accomplished.

Now, frankly, I was astonished—astonished, Mr. Speaker, is a mild word for me to use—at the speech delivered by the Minister of Agriculture this evening. Why, Sir, I can throw my mind back over a number of years and recall with what eagerness I used to listen to him when he preached the sound gospel of freedom and of liberty in matters of trade, and I was amazed, indeed, I was grieved to see him haul down the flag of liberty by the most specious pleading that could be indulged in and ask for protection of the grossest form for the dairy industry. My hon. friend must surely have fallen into bad company. I hope it is only a temporary lapse, Mr. Speaker, and that he will in due time return to the true faith, which he understands as well as any man in this House.

When we come to a consideration of the merits of this question, what do we find? It has not been successfully argued, nor can it be successfully argued in this House or out of it, that oleomargarine is not a wholesome food. The whole weight of evidence shows it is a wholesome food. It is made from animal fats, excellent foods in themselves, blended with vegetable oils that are also excellent foods in themselves, and no evidence of a reliable character has been adduced to show that oleomargarine is not a suitable and valuable food product. Now, if it is a food product of value, and if it can be secured a little cheaper than the higher grades of butter, why should any one in this House or out of it seek to deprive the people of a wholesome food by absolutely prohibiting the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine? That argument cannot be successfully controverted, except as my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture tried to do this evening by the most specious pleading that could possibly be attempted.

If we take the history of this article throughout the whole civilized world we find there is not a country to-day but is using it—that permits its manufacture and sale. Now, I am convinced that if the various civilized countries are doing this, it is because oleomargarine has a food value. I have no belief in the arguments advanced that its continued importation and manufacture will destroy our dairy industry. It cannot destroy that industry. Reference was made this evening to Denmark's position in regard to oleomargarine. What was her position? It was not, as my hon. friend, the Minister of Agriculture, stated, that Denmark has for hundreds of years been engaged in the dairy industry. If he will study the history of Denmark he will find that sixty, seventy or eighty years ago there was no peasantry in Europe more impoverished than that of Denmark, and that there was no country in Europe more backward in agriculture than Denmark.

Mr. WARNER: Has it been oleomargarine or butter that has helped Denmark?

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend from Strathcona had waited for a moment I would have satisfied his eager curiosity in that respect. Denmark built up her agriculture largely on her dairy industry. It is common knowledge that the average Danish farm is about ten acres in extent. Nowhere in the world has agriculture been carried on so intensively as in Denmark. They built up a splendid dairy industry. But if my memory serves me right, for the last thirty or thirty-five years Denmark has permitted the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine, and yet her dairy industry, now the finest in the world, has been built up alongside the competition of oleomargarine.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Do you know of a country outside of Canada where dairy products are permitted to be mixed with the other constituents of oleomargarine? It is not allowed in Denmark.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know, Mr. Speaker, and I submit that that is not relevant to the particular question we are discussing. I will deal in a moment or two with the point raised by my hon. friend from South Oxford. That is the position that has been taken by Denmark in regard to the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine. There is not a country in the world, I repeat, that has not permitted its manufacture and importation.

There is one other question: Has the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine injured our dairy industry? My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture knows that as far as the exportable dairy products of Canada are concerned they have been mainly in the form of cheese. Prior to the war Canada exported annually 180,000,000 to 200,000,000 pounds of cheese, which found its main market in Great Britain. The cheese industry was developed in Ontario and in the neighbouring province of Quebec rather than the butter industry, and it is only in comparatively recent years that the latter industry has been developed in this country. But has it withered and failed under the competition of oleomargarine? Not according to the trade figures, because I find that in the last four years the butter exports of Canada have been well up to the mark. In 1917 we exported almost 8,000,000 pounds of butter; in 1918, almost 5,000,000 pounds; in 1919, 13,500,000 pounds; in 1920, 17,500,000 pounds, and during those years we have been using oleomargarine.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Would the hon. gentleman give us the exports for 1921?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know that I have those here.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: About 9,000,000 pounds.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, it goes up and down.

Mr. CARROLL: Perhaps my hon. friend would give us the imports of butter into Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: I have not those figures, but I have the imports of oleomargarine. In 1918, they were 2,262,000 pounds; in 1919, 4,000,000 pounds; in 1920, when we had a big export in butter, a little over 6,000,000 pounds.

There is one other point which I would like to bring to the attention of my hon. friends who support the motion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni—and I would like the Minister of Agriculture to give some thought to this aspect of the question. If Canada is going to develop a dairy industry, it cannot be developed on the home market alone. No industry in Canada can be developed soundly if it is dependent only upon the home market, and that is one of the reasons, Sir, why

I do not believe in protective tariffs. If, then, we are to build up our dairy industry, we must build up our exports of butter in the face of oleomargarine competition in every country in the world. Do my hon. friends who believe that the Canadian dairymen and butter producers must be protected against oleomargarine competition at home forget that they must face that competition when they get into the outside markets of the world? The whole thing is illogical, absolutely illogical and inconsistent.

I am as great a believer as any one in the possibilities of the development of the dairy industry in Canada. Our country is splendidly located in that respect. It is only a matter of time, and not a very long time, either, when our neighbours to the south of us, the great American Republic, will come to Canada for their foodstuffs in increasing measure. I have mentioned it to the House before, but it is a fact worth recalling again, that more than two-thirds of the 106,000,000 people that constitute the United States proper live in incorporated towns and cities, and no part of Canada is better situated to supply the densely populated portion of the United States with dairy products than Ontario and Quebec. As that population grows, as the United States becomes a food-importing country, you will have in that country the greatest and broadest possible market for the dairy products of these provinces. If that market is not sufficient, we are only a few thousand miles from Great Britain, perhaps the greatest single consumer of imported dairy products in the world.

If my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture and the Government desire to develop this industry, I submit it cannot best be done by preventing the sale and manufacture of a useful food product that can be supplied to some of the people of Canada at a lower price than butter. But they can best do it by promoting sane methods of marketing our agricultural products, and by assisting in the development of refrigerator services in the shipment of those products to the markets of the world. These are means by which the Government can legitimately assist the development of an industry of this kind. The waste that goes on through short-sighted methods of marketing, the loss that occurs through deterioration in quality, particularly of such perishable commodities as butter and cheese, can scarcely be estimated. It was for that reason that when I was in the Government a few years ago I urged my colleagues to undertake the erection of an up-to-date cold storage warehouse in Montreal in order that there might be provided at that great port the means whereby these perishable products could be kept in condition until they were placed in refrigerated space in ocean vessels and sent in the best possible condition to the markets of Europe. By these means, if we proceed intelligently, we can assist the dairy industry in the greatest possible way —far better and to a far greater extent than we can by attempting to stimulate artificially a market here at home by preventing the importation and sale of oleomargarine.

I am rather at a loss to know what the policy of the Government may be in respect to this matter. If I am to judge by the rather remarkable speech delivered by the Minister of Agriculture this evening, I would not have very much hope that they will follow the path of wisdom in the matter. I trust however, that on a little more reflection my good friend the Minister of Agriculture will see the error of his ways. I wish just to assure the Government that if they bring in legislation at this session of Parliament providing for the importation or manufacture of oleomargarine in Canada, they will have my hearty support in that action.

Now, one thought in respect to the arguments advanced by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). I do not know to what extent butter is used in the manufacture of oleomargarine. I do lay this down: that it is the part of wisdom for the Government to see that suitable regulations are enforced for the protection of the public health; to see that only healthful ingredients enter into the manufacture of oleomargarine and that only a pure food product is imported. That is quite properly the function of government. But once you surround the manufacture and importation and sale of this article with proper safeguards, then I submit that the interests of the country will be best served by allowing it to be sold, always as oleomargarine, not as butter—let the people know what they are buying. The business interests of this country will be safeguarded in that way and a sound policy established, and, I trust, permanently followed.

Let me repeat, in closing, that I hope the Government will bring down legislation to make this thing permanent. We do not want any special privilege to dairymen or to any one else in this country. I have full confidence that the dairymen of Canada can stand up against the competition of oleomargarine; the facts of the last five years prove that beyond any question of doubt. I am against special privilege to dairymen, just as I am against special privileges to manufacturers in the way of tariffs, and for this reason if for no other I will oppose the motion proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. J. L. STANSELL (East Elgin): Mr. Speaker, it requires some degree of courage to support a resolution after it has been so vehemently denounced by my esteemed friend the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). I do not profess to be the judge that he is either of sound judgment or of stupidity, but I do believe I know something about the dairy industry and the manufacture of butter. I was pleased to hear the hon. member from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) inform the House that it was he who was responsible for drawing up the regulations governing the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine. If those regulations had been as carefully drawn and were as strict as those governing the sale of butter, I am not sure I would have raised my voice in protest at this time, but they were not so. I do not know in what respect my hon. friend has been associated with farming, but he confessed to the House to-night that he did not know what the Canadian exports of butter were for the last year, he did not know what the imports were, and if I heard aright a question this afternoon, he did not know that a large quantity of New Zealand butter was being consumed in Canada. If that is the fact, he is not the highest authority on this subject, in my estimation.

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend will permit me he is not quite doing me justice. I gave the export figures in my remarks to-night.

Mr. STANSELL: For this year.

Mr. CRERAR: Not for the present year, but those figures can be secured from the blue books in a few minutes.

Mr. STANSELL: I was referring to this year's figures. I have been very much interested in the arguments put forward here to-night and the different views expressed on this question which is of intense interest to the House and the country. It is a question that should be settled one way or the other, and I am very glad it has been approached in the way in which it has, for I believe that, as hon. members, we ought to respect each other's opinions. If this were a matter on which the arguments were all on one side it would have been settled years ago, but good arguments have been made to-night both for and against the resolution. Possibly I was most favourably impressed by the speech of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) who probably said everything that could be said against the resolution in the way of argument, and said it in a very logical and clear manner. He is quite consistent in the attitude he takes. It has been said that his arguments have not been answered here to-day. The hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) has also put up a very strong argument for the other side, and in some respects his argument has not been answered.

I do not propose at this late hour to take up very much time in giving figures or going over ground that has already been covered by former speakers. I shall simply summarize in a brief way my views on this question. The question before the House is whether after September next the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine in Canada shall be permitted or not. I have received representations from opposing interests, and I think it is only fair in considering this subject that we should realize where requests for this legislation have come from. I do not think I can do anything fairer than to present the arguments that have been submitted on each side, because we can depend upon the interests affected to put up the strongest claims possible in support of their own argument. I think hon. members in common with myself have all received a copy of the circular issued by the Canadian Manufacturers and Importers of Oleomargarine. It is only fair that we should consider the financial investment of those who are desirous of having this privilege of manufacture and sale continued. Considerable money has undoubtedly been invested, and I have no doubt that the manufacture of oleomargarine is carried on in a clean manner, subject as it is to government inspection. It must be remembered, however, that when this investment was originally made, it was well understood that the manufacture of oleomargarine was permitted only as a war measure and the money was invested on that understanding, knowing the risk involved in the venture.

On the other hand, I have been asked to oppose the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in this country by the following interests: the National Dairy Council representing The Ontario Milk and Cream Producers' Association; The Dairymen's Association of Western Ontario; The Dairymen's Association of Eastern Ontario; The Dairymen's Association of the Province of Quebec; The Montreal Milk Producers' Co-operative Agricultural Association; Canadian Milk Distributors Association; Canadian Ice Cream Manufacturers' Association; The Western Canada Ice Cream Manufacturers' Association; Canadian Creamery Association; The Western Dairy Manufacturers' Executive; Milk Condensaries; The Provincial Dairymen's Association of Manitoba; The Provincial Dairymen's Association of Saskatchewan; The Provincial Dairymen's Association of Alberta; The Provincial Dairy Association of British Columbia; The Fraser Valley Milk Producers' Association; The New Brunswick Dairymen's Association; The Nova Scotia Dairymen's Association; The Prince Edward Island Dairymen's Association; Milk Powder Manufacturers; the Holstein-Friesian Association of Canada; Canadian Ayrshire Breeders' Association; Canadian Jersey Cattle Club.

When such a number of organizations all over the length and breadth of Canada present their views in this way, representing the capital investment that they do, I think it is only fair that we should give reasonable consideration to their claims. If we were to consider this question from the standpoint of the money invested, I think all hon. members will agree that the investment and the labour employed in the dairying industry, is entirely out of proportion to the money invested and the labour employed in the oleomargarine business; the balance is nearly all on one side, that of dairying. It has been interesting to follow the arguments as to what extent protection enters into this question. I should like to give what in my opinion is the principle of protection. I cannot agree with some of my hon. friends to my left, who are sincere in being free traders and are opposed to the principle of protection. Possibly at some time in the future I may be able to agree with their views, but conditions at present are briefly these: We are, whether we believe in it or not, and whether we like it or not, under a protective policy at the present time, and if I may venture into the realm of prophecy, it will be some years yet before the hopes of my hon. friends to my left are realized and this country does absolutely without protection. The very fact, as has been pointed out by some of the speakers, that this is a cold country, with climatic conditions that do not obtain elsewhere, makes it necessary in my opinion to have at least some measure of protection for our industries, to develop a home market. Now, if I understand the principle of protection, in whatever form it may come, it is state aid granted to a certain section of our people, who, apparently, are not able to help themselves, to the extent that is advisable in the interest of the country. For the manufacturers the most natural form of protection is a protective tariff. For our friends from the west, who are not very greatly impressed with the idea of a protective tariff, the only protection that strongly appeals to them is compulsory legislation for the marketing of their product, wheat. Now I must say that I admire their beautiful inconsistency when they state that they do not believe in protection at all. But this is a particular form of protection adapted to their needs. Call it what you like; it is a form of protection adapted to meet the needs of the farmers of western Canada. I must say that I have a good deal of sympathy with the ideas put forth in support of that proposition. Nevertheless if that is the only kind of protection that is to be tolerated in Canada then my sympathy for my western friends begins to ebb very rapidly. I think it is realized that no matter in what part of Canada we may reside we have as much right to interpret the conditions there as to our own best interests, as those who reside in any other part of Canada have to interpret the conditions which affect them. Reference has been made to a request recently presented to the House from British Columbia. In that province they have a problem which they deem most important. I refere to the oriental problem. It has been dealt with in various ways, but in the opinion of British Columbia, exclusion or prohibition is the correct solution. I am not prepared to dispute that position; the representatives from the province should know what form of protection is best adapted to the needs of British Columbia. Naturally the dairymen's associations, and the producers of milk and the other articles manufactured from it such as cheese and butter, believe in a certain kind of protection which is adapted to their industry. I listened carefully to the manner in which this was characterized by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). He described it as a pernicious form of protection, and in so doing was ably seconded by the hon. member for Marquette. Possibly that is very nearly a correct description; but personally I must say that I do not like the words "protection" or "prohibition" nor the words "exclusion" or "compulsion." Nevertheless in the laws governing this country there are embodied very many of the principles that can be designated as either one or the other, we must submit to certain restrictions for the general good. Therefore, even if we apply the term protection to the dairy industry; if we go even further and call it "pernicious protection," in my opinion protection as applied to the needs of the farmer has not so often erred on the side of generosity that we cannot, in this instance, afford to give them the benefit of the doubt. If this is pernicious protection we might well afford, considering the condition of the dairy farmer at the present time, to make a little step in that direction.

Let us for a moment consider the composition and the value of this article. It must be remembered, as I pointed out at the beginning of my remarks, that if I am engaged in the dairying industry and producing butter I am subjected to regulations that are very stringent. If, by any means whatever, I get more than 16 per cent of water incorporated in that butter—and I assure you, as one who spent some years in the manufacture of butter, that it is a very difficult thing to regulate—I render myself liable to the laws of the country. It is the same if I incorporate in that butter anything but pure butter fat, allowing only for the smallest fraction of impurities, such as a slight amount of mineral matter. If there is any thing beyond that I render myself liable. Yet in connection with the manufacture of oleomargarine there are no such restrictions. If it is clean it may contain any quantity of water, and almost anything else; there is no law or regulation governing it. If this article was composed entirely of materials produced in Canada, and was manufactured and sold only on its merits, I could not have the courage to rise and say a word against it. The claim has been made for oleomargarine that it consists to the extent of 75 per cent of Canadian products. That is not exactly borne out by the facts because in a return that was asked for some time ago in this House and brought down, we were told that a total of 3,862,962 pounds of various products were brought in from foreign countries and used in the manufacture of oleomargarine—products imported practically free of duty. We have also been informed that the total quantity of oleomargarine manufactured during 1921, the latest year for which I have returns, was 3,780,000 pounds; while the quantity imported was 2,057,000 pounds. What, may I ask, is wrong about that? Just this: It is a form of competition that no other industry in this country would tolerate for one moment. We are protected, as manufacturers of butter, to the extent only of from three to four per cent of duty and possibly that advantage is wiped out entirely by the exchange rates. We are shut out entirely from the United States market by the high rates imposed on our products. Is it fair that any of our manufacturers should go to that country and import from there the raw materials they need to the extent to which they do, make that importation practically free of duty, and place their product on the market in competition with our butter, not on its own merits but so camouflaged by the addition of a portion of butter as to make it palatable and more nearly resemble the article it competes with. I am quite willing, as I believe other farmers in this country are, to admit into Canada articles that do not benefit us but may be needed for some other industry. All that we desire is a favourable consideration of the problems confronting the men who are at present engaged in the dairy industry. I am fairly conversant with the condition of that industry in Ontario and I tell you that the situation of those men is anything but rosy. I have that on the authority of some bank managers who tell me that never in their experience has the situation of the dairy farmers been so critical as it is now, and that collections are almost impossible. Surely other interests should be prepared to sacrifice a little in order to grant the protection needed for the dairy industry.

Something has been said by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) about the composition of oleomargarine and its food value for growing children. Let me tell the House that if the interests of the growing children of our country could be eliminated I am not sure that I would say anything in favour of this resolution. A large proportion of our population, and I refer to the children, are not in a position to protect themselves in this and some other respects. In all experiments that have been made from whatever source, the results as given by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) have been found to apply, and no one has made any attempt to refute his argument. It is admitted in this pamphlet which I hold in my hand—and I think I am fair when I use it for illustration—that "growth accessories" are found in the oleo oil from which oleomargarine is prepared, and it is stated that they have been discovered in animal fats. This pamphlet does not state to what extent they have been discovered, but it goes so far as to say that they have been discovered in butter fats and animal fats. This pamphlet also states that they are present in the milk with which oleomargarine is mixed in the process of manufacture. That is correct, and that is the very method by which this gains its appeal with the consuming public, namely, by representing that it is equivalent in value to butter. If butter or milk were not used to any extent in the manufacture of oleomargarine, these "growth accessories" or vitamines would not be found to any great extent. Therefore, oleomargarine cannot be compared with butter for the use of growing children.

As regards cost, oleomargarine may be cheaper than butter; but as regards actual food value, I am free to state that the poor man whom some hon. members seem to be so much interested in, if he would spend the same amount of money on butter and spread it a little thinner, would have more value than he would by investing the same amount of money in oleomargarine at a cheaper price. If we are to make any mistake at all, let us make that mistake on the side of protecting the children, the rising generation.

One of the main reasons advanced by practically every speaker is that other countries permit the sale and use of oleomargarine. In my opinion, that is the poorest argument of all, because I am sure we, as Canadians, are sufficiently wise to be able to take care of ourselves regardless of what other countries may do. If we look to the country to the south of us, to a certain extent at least they tolerate, lynching; but we do not tolerate it in Canada, and would not do so for one moment. We do not propose to imitate them in that or in many other things. If we look over some European countries, there are many conditions that prevail amongst their peoples who, we are told, consume so much oleomargarine, which conditions we do not want to find amongst our Canadian people. We might take, for example, the Swiss who have no navy, and I believe in Canada we are coming dangerously near to that state of affairs. These arguments about other countries do not appeal to me. We surely can afford to stand alone if necessary.

It has been stated that this is a poor man's food. I have studied this question for some years, and I have heard the argument that you must not take away from the poor man the material that he needs for a spread on his bread when he is not in a financial condition to buy high priced butter. This argument has its appeal; but in every case where this argument has been presented to me, I have asked what the particular person advancing the argument did himself and without exception the reply is: Oh, we use butter for our family; it is just for the labouring man that we want the substitute. In this country I do not believe in two standards; conditions should be such that the labouring man should be entitled to a pure, healthy and beneficial food just as any other class in this country. It is only because of lack of information that an appeal like this carries any weight. If every family in this Canada of ours was sufficiently well informed as to the comparative merits of butter and oleomargarine there would be no sale for oleomargarine to spread on bread. Oleomargarine, has not, as I have pointed out, the particular life giving growth accessories as described in this pamphlet, that butter has. Butter also has peculiar value as a brain food. Surely hon. members have met many people who do not use sufficient butter. I do not, of course, refer to any hon. member in this House because it is quite evident that we have all been well supplied with that particular kind of diet. I am acquainted with some people who are sufficiently poor in this world's goods to come within the class spoken of and I have not been able to find that that class of people demands oleomargarine.

Mr. DICKIE: We have been told that 3,800,000 pounds of various substances are imported into Canada for the manufacture of oleomargarine. We are also told that 3,700,000 pounds of oleomargarine were manufactured in Canada. We are told that a great deal of butter goes into this oleomargarine. How are we going to squeeze our butter into 3,700,000 pounds of oleomargarine if we import 3,800,000 pounds of other substances which go into the manufacture of oleomargarine?

Mr. STANSELL: In the first place many of these materials are brought into Canada in the raw state and are refined to some extent which process would reduce their volume. I might say also in all fairness that I am giving not figures obtained from other sources which are available and which I have considered, but the figures from a pamphlet which I have in my hand supplied by the oleo interests. The figure of three million pounds odd refers to the manufacture of Canadian oleomargarine. The two million pounds odd refers to the importation, but strange as it may seem—and this is also given in this same remarkable pamphlet,— it is stated that the consumption of oleomargarine in Canada is 1,000,000 pounds per month. I do not vouch for the accuracy of these figures; they are there to speak for themselves. I cannot explain them. My contention is that when we in this Parliament as representatives of the Canadian people decide to encourage the feeding of the young and rising generation on an article of such an inferior quality to butter as oleomargarine, we are taking a step that, to say the least, is entering a road leading in the wrong direction. If we follow it to its logical conclusion it will only be a step until the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) will be justified and we shall be asked to provide a home market for this article known as filled milk which at present we do not know but which will follow after the thin edge of the wedge has been inserted in this matter. Those are the reasons advanced why we should vote for the continuation of the sale of oleomargarine, namely, because other countries permit it and because we should think so much about the poor man's family.

The reason why I support the present resolution is because under present regulations the competition is unfair and it would not be submitted to by any other manufacturing industry in this country. I trust that other industries are sufficiently fair to give to the dairy industry that much needed form of protection that this resolution will provide. In conclusion, let me say what should, in my opinion, be the duty of the representatives of the Canadian people. It should be the duty of Canada's representatives to guard and develop, not a spineless, navyless, oleo-oiled, peasantry, but a healthy, strong, virile manhood and womanhood, able and willing to protect and perpetuate this country as a nation. And if in this way we can do something to guarantee the young and rising generation a generous supply of one of the best and most wholesome foods, then I submit we are taking a step in the right direction as legislators in this country. If I must choose, as I have to on this occasion, between the welfare of the manufacturer and importer of oleomargarine, on the one hand, and, on the other, the Canadian dairy interests and the growth and development of a healthy rising generation, I am forced to give my decision and the benefit of the doubt to the latter; and in doing so I believe I am doing what is best in the future interests of the country.

Mr. D. W. WARNER (Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I realize that this is not a proper time of night to commence a long speech, but I think we are debating something which it is worth our while staying all night in order to decide rightly. The House seems to be very much divided; the different groups are broken. We are going to do very much as we please in this matter, judging by the way hon. members are talking all over the Chamber, some for and some against in every group. Consequently I feel quite at home in taking my stand in opposition to my leader (Mr. Crerar) in this group. I feel I am justified in doing so. If he had put in as many years milking cows, and if he knew the difficulty in connection with this work as well as I do, I do not think he would have made the kind of speech he delivered. I notice that most of the gentlemen who are talking here to-night in opposition to this resolution are not the men who take the milk pail and milk the cows. I have seen the difficulties of the dairy business right from the beginning of my business career. I know that it has had a hard time. I know, at the same time, that those who are opposed to this resolution are opposed to it from an honest conviction. At least, that is my belief. But, Mr. Speaker, I can hardly agree with them in the fine, delicate point they raise regarding the difference between asking for a compulsory wheat board and supporting the motion for the abolition of oleomargarine.

Mr. McMASTER: They are both unsound.

Mr. WARNER: I am bound to tell the House that I do not agree with those hon.

members if they are persistent in that attitude. I have not tried to convert any one in my group or in any other group to my ideas. I know, though, what the people in my constituency want, and I would not come here and misrepresent them in any respect in anything I do. But that is what I should be doing if I voted against this resolution. I know that I have a different constituency from those which some of my hon. friends to my left represent; and if we did anything that would make dairying harder for the people in my constituency we should be in danger of losing some of them. If I thought that the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine would be no more considerable in Canada in the future than it is at the present time, I would not occupy the time of the House expressing myself in favour of this resolution and opposing the importation and manufacture of this commodity.

Mr. CARROLL: What are the sales of oleomargarine in this country now compared with those of three years ago, taking into consideration the falling prices of butter?

Mr. WARNER: That question has been answered several times to-night, but I would say to my hon. friend that the conditions now are absolutely different. Furthermore, oleomargarine was asked for only as a substitute during the war, and the fact that the price of butter has come down is no doubt largely responsible for the diminution in the sales of oleo.

Mr. STANSELL: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. IRVINE: Perhaps I might ask the hon. gentleman a question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members not to interrupt unduly the member who has the floor. However, my eye first caught the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine).

Mr. IRVINE: Does the farmers' platform not include the free importation of foodstuffs?

Mr. WARNER: I understand very well what there is in that platform, and I do not think that it has any application at all to this case. I am not aware of the need of oleomargarine in this country. I quite realize the difficulty which the dairymen are faced with, and if you prohibit the importation and sale of this article you will save the dairy business, and probably have cheaper and better butter. But if you encourage the use of any substitute for butter you lessen the demand for the latter to that extent. However, if people are going to misconstrue a platform to the detriment of an industry, then I think that platform should be changed.

Mr. STANSELL: Does my hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) state that the Progressive party has a policy from which no member should dissent? If so, they are more partisan in their allegiance than either of the old parties.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WARNER: Have I the floor again, Mr. Speaker?

An hon. MEMBER: Do not mind them.

Mr. WARNER: I am here to represent my constituency. I have been told that if I am narrow enough to represent one constituency and one constituency only, I am probably not big enough to make a good representative. Well, I will take that for what it is worth. But if I represent that constituency as it desires to be represented I feel that I am not only doing my duty but doing what is in the best interests of Canada that I should do. As I said shortly before hon. members began to bombard me with questions, I represent a constituency that is somewhat different from the constituencies which other hon. gentlemen represent. It is made up of small farms. The farmers make butter or sell cream and carry on a dairy business because they can do it better that anything else. They have a brush country which they have to clear, and they can sow grass on it and have a pasture so that they can keep a few cows before they are able to break much of the land. Many of them have been on the land for years and have got only 30 to 50 acres broken.

Now, it is one of the best districts in Canada; I except none. That district has not had a crop failure in the twenty-five years that I have been there. Those people are getting along in a moderate way; they are living, but they are not making money, and the dairy business is about the only thing that has kept them going. I know that to be so. Now, if you are going to do anything to make it harder for those people you will need a pretty good immigration policy to get newcomers to take the place of those people who may be forced to abandon their homesteads. We are talking of spending money to induce immigrants to come to this country. I say, gentlemen, you will do more good by making the people prosperous that are here now, and you can do this better by giving them a good chance to make a success of the dairy business, than by spending money to get immigrants to come in and take their place.

My hon. friend from Marquette—my leader—mentioned that he wanted cold storage and lots of other things to take care of the dairy industry. We want them too, we are not objecting to them—neither are we objecting to the Wheat Board to take care of the wheat crop. Our leader suggested that in Denmark the dairy farmers are very prosperous. I have spent a good deal of my time in institute work, and I have been practically all my life trying to induce people to go into mixed farming, which of course includes a little dairying. In the course of my institute work I have learned that Denmark would not have been prosperous with the dairy business alone, if it had not been for the skim milk her farmers fed to their bacon hogs for the production of the fancy bacon exported to Great Britain where it fetches fancy prices. The Danish farmers are very favourably situated in regard to Great Britain and have the best of opportunities to put their products on the British market. I do not object if the people of Denmark want to eat oleomargarine and sell their butter to Great Britain at a higher price than they pay for the substitute; but we cannot do quite the same thing.

We have pamphlets here as part of the propaganda to further the interests of the oleomargarine manufacturers, and I have been approached to support the continued importation and manufacture of their product. Who is paying for that propaganda? The manufacturing interests, of course. And they do not expect to keep their production of oleomargarine at its present level, they are going to encroach on our dairy business more and more. The more oleomargarine that is put on the market the more butter it displaces, and the more profit will go into the hands of the big companies that already have a monopoly in this country, while the man who is out on the farm having a hard time to keep his homestead will have to get along with that narrowed market and to that extent he and his family will be so much worse off.

I am not going to quote facts and figures, it is too late to do so to-night. I have lots of them here, but it would be repeating what others have already said, and I have too bad a cold to talk at any great length; indeed, I would not have intervened in this discussion at all but for my keen interest in the matter. There are no two ways about it. As the Minister of Agriculture said, and as others have said, you cannot hire a man to work on a farm if you want him to milk cows. And I want to tell you that I do not believe the milking machine is a success yet; it takes a pretty good man to run one of those machines satisfactorily. What would we do in this country if something else were manufactured in the place of milk? The principle is the same. All day long we have been talking about how good oleomargarine is for adults to eat, but I have not heard one single member say that it was good for children—not one. We want our children, the poor man's as well as the rich man's, to have good, nourishing food, and for growing children there is not the slightest doubt in the world that oleomargarine is no substitute for butter. I suggest to my hon. friends on my left that if they will take the same money's worth of butter and spread it a little thinner they will get more benefit than they can ever expect to get from spreading this grease on their bread.

I know what oleomargarine is like; I had two kinds for dinner. I tasted and tested them pretty well. I do not like oleomargarine. If other people like it they are welcome to it; I do not object to their using it because I do not like it. But I do object to its continued importation and manufacture if it makes the dairy business harder for our farmers to continue at. We have spent milions of dollars at one time and another to try to get people to engage in the dairy business. My friend to the right read about twenty resolutions from twenty different organizations making certain requests. Who knows what is needed in this country in regard to the dairy business better than the men who are engaged in the business?

And I am not so delicate about saying whether this is or is not protection. If you have got to stretch your mind a little to keep your business going, why, you have got to do it, that is all. I cannot see that the granting of what this resolution asks for gives protection to the dairy business any more than a compulsory wheat board would give protection to the men who are raising wheat.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WARNER: Now, I will have this House understand that I am not opposing the wheat board. I shall continue to work for that wheat board and do my utmost to help get it. That is what we want. But I do want a chance for the dairy business; I want it to be treated in the same way, even on the same plane. I do not agree with my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown), any more than I agree with my leader, that this is protection. We are not asking for protection, we are asking for a chance to live, and we know how hard it is to keep the dairy business alive. We understand it. Who knows better than those who are in it how hard it is to continue in the dairy business? I know I had to sell my dairy herd in 1918 because I could not get anybody to help me carry on the dairy business. And it was a dairy herd that I thought a lot of. In the course of my life I had built up two herds, and this one I had worked with since I came to this country. But if the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine is to be allowed to continue I do not think I will be the only man who will have had to go out of the dairy business. It is only the man who has a growing family that can engage in the dairy business, because otherwise he would have to hire men to help him, and he could not afford to pay the wages demanded under present conditions.

Now, Mr. Speaker and hon. gentlemen, this is the reason why I am speaking in support of this resolution,—simply because I cannot draw the fine distinction that it is asking for protection, as stated by our friends to the left. I do not see that we will weaken ourselves in the least by asking for protection of this kind. It is not protection in the way that we understand protection, that is, as a tax on articles that we have to buy. These people have been paying taxes on the articles they have had to buy until to-day they have barely enough to live on, and now if you put a little more burden on them maybe you will lose more of these men the very first year than you will gain by immigration over a long period.

The returned men have been encouraged to go on the farms and they are now working under conditions that are absolutely intolerable. Many of them are living from their cows, simply hanging on, hoping that Parliament will do something to give them a fair chance. They are looking for a revaluation of their property so that they may go ahead and make the rest of the payments on it. I have had letters from the dairymen in my constituency, men who have not more than from 30 to 50 acres under cultivation, who support the other farmers in their demand for a wheat board. They have asked me to support that; I have done so, and I do not wish to misrepresent them on this subject by voting against the resolution. They want the support of the farmers all the way through for farmers' interests.

I do not understand this proposal as protection; I look upon it as a chance to make a living, to go ahead until things get better and we have an opportunity of clearing more land and making it available for farming purposes.

It is hard for hon. members to understand the conditions which prevail in these parts of the country unless they have been on the ground. I know what I am talking about, and I know that in many parts of Canada outside of my own constituency the dairymen are having a hard time to keep their business going. Let this House go slowly before it does anything which will make it harder for the dairy business to be carried on.

Mr. W. K. BALDWIN (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, you would think from the arguments which have been advanced during the course of this discussion that every country in the world has legalized the manufacture of oleomargarine. I want to tell you that in the United States its sale and manufacture has been legalized, but only under certain conditions. For ten years the agriculturists of that country fought desperately against the introduction of oleomargarine, and not until the population of the United States had reached the figure of 65,000,000 was the measure passed through Congress. But it was provided that no one could sell oleomargarine by retail without paying a license of $60 for the privilege of doing so. That condition prevailed until very recently; I do not know that it does not prevail to-day. If any change has been made, it has been made quite recently. Now, what was the condition? The payment of the license fee of $60 by the retailer made it impossible for him to handle that conglomeration known as oleomargarine, but it did not debar the wholesaler from selling it to lumbermen, miners, or construction men who did not use butter. No injury resulted to the dairy products, because those who ate oleomargarine under those conditions were not consumers of butter.

Some reference has been made to vitamines. Why, there are not as many vitamines in 100 pounds of margarine as there are in one pound of butter. Let us remember also that the late government put many returned soldiers on the land. These men paid an average price of $100 each for their cows and they are having a very hard time indeed to get along. The same condition prevails down in the country where I live. There is another point which is worth remembering: if the Government destroys the dairying industry of our country by permitting this legalized conglomeration to be brought in from a foreign country the business of hog raising, involving the production of bacon, pork and lard, is closely connected with the dairying industry. The sensible people of this country know very well that if they want anything to replace butter they can get shortening, cottolene, and even lard, for one-half the price of oleomargarine. Oleomargarine is often sold as butter. The ex-minister showed us a package to-day as an example of the beautiful lithographic work which is turned out by the oleomargarine people; but the farmer uses an ordinary piece of paraffin paper; he says he can afford nothing better. Now, I am a retailer, and I do not wish to destroy the retailers' organizations, but I have handled a litttle oleomargarine and I want to tell you that I never could sell it when I had any butter. It is easy enough to sell it at a profit of eight cents a pound, but when you retail butter everyone knows the price of it; it is quoted in the papers. If a grocer buys butter and gets two or three cents a pound on it, he is getting all the profit he can get because competition regulates prices, but he can make more profit on one pound of oleomargarine than he can on four pounds of butter.

There has been some talk of vested rights in this country, but I would point out that all the oleomargarine I ever bought was made in the United States; and I would prohibit that. If there are one or two factories in Canada which are manufacturing oleomargarine, they will not be put in a very desperate position if oleomargarine is prohibited. It is the duty of the Governernment to stand by the creameries and cheese factories throughout Canada which they have encouraged and in connection with which they have helped to establisn cold storage plants. Particularly should this be done at a time when the farmers of the country are having a hard struggle to get along. The Government will be seriously blamed if they do not proceed as they should in this line.

Mr. MARTELL: Down in Nova Scotia, particularly along the seashore, the people use molasses when they cannot get butter. Can my hon. friend tell me the relative value of molasses and oleomargarine?

Mr. BALDWIN: I have sold molasses and I have sold oleomargarine. According to my observation, I should say that one pint of Barbados or fancy molasses contains more food value than a pound of oleomargarine. That reduces oleomargarine to a pretty low level.

We have had debates in this House and pretty strong arguments on this subject; I have had a little hand in them myself. But I never characterized oleomargarine as strongly as some of the members of the late Government did. They said it was worse than soap, nothing but a mixture of grease. I do not intend to continue this debate or make it any worse than it is. I stand behind the Minister of Agriculture and I would guarante that every agricultural college in this country, every manager of an experimental farm, every man, in fact, who knows agriculture, would support this resolution.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I would not get up at this time of the night were it not to correct one slight misconception which apparently exists in some parts of the House, and that is that this resolution is only being opposed by those who are not dairymen—by those farmers who are wheat raisers and by other people who know nothing of the difficulties involved in getting up early in the morning and getting out at night to milk cows.

Mr. BALDWIN: I have milked cows for fifty years.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was not referring to the hon. member. He is supporting the resolution. I am sorry to have to disagree for once in the whole of this session with my hon. friend and neighbour from Strathcona (Mr. Warner), but as I come from very much the same sort of constituency of small mixed farms, I thought it would be well to show that even the men from those constituencies were not unanimous on this question any more than any other party or group in this House. I am not going at all into the question of the food value or wholesomeness of oleomargarine as that has been pretty well covered. I have never eaten oleomargarine, to my knowledge, and I know nothing whatever about it, but I want to look at the question from two angles.

In the first place, if oleomargarine is a good food, and I at least am convinced by the weight of evidence that it is a good and wholesome food when manufactured and sold under proper supervision, and if it is sold as oleomargarine and not as butter, and I believe with proper supervision and inspection that can be done, then the question simply is this: Will it ruin the dairy industry? That is not the only question but it is one. I do not believe it will. I do not believe that oleomargarine is going to be a factor which will enter very seriously into competition with the genuine dairy article. What do the sales of oleomargarine during the last year prove? They prove that oleomargarine is sold only when the price of butter is so high that a great number of the common consumers cannot buy it, and that when butter gets down to the point where the average man can afford it, he buys butter, and the sales of oleomargarine fall off accordingly. That is amply proved by the manufacture and import figures during the last three or four years. Taking that into consideration, I cannot agree with the idea that oleomargarine will enter so seriously into competition with the dairy industry as to put it out of business.

Mr. WARNER: Does the hon. member think I claimed we would be put out of business?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was not really answering the hon. member for Strathcona, but rather the definite trend of argument that had permeated the whole of this debate, not the argument of any one in particular. I think there was no doubt what the trend of the debate was. It was that the dairying industry would either be put out of business or be seriously hampered in its development. I contend that the point has not been proved that it would be either.

There is one point that has been raised by those opposing the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine with which I have some sympathy, that is, if it were proven, that oleomargarine was detrimental to the growing generation, if it could be proved that it was an unsuitable food for children, and that it lacked the necessary elements which go to produce healthy children, growing into strong adults. If it were nothing but a question between these children eating butter and eating oleomargarine there would be a great deal of weight in that, but it is a question of eating oleomargarine or dry bread in a great many cases. If the butter is within their reach, they will buy it. If they cannot buy butter, where does the force of that argument come in? Because I contend that any kind of fat, animal or vegetable grease, on bread makes a better balanced ration than bread alone. From the point of view of the health of the children, I do not think that point is well taken. That is all I intend to say on that.

I just wish to take a little exception to some things that have been said in regard to the protective element in this measure. To my mind, there can be no difficulty in deciding that it is protection. It is intended for protection. It is intended to enable the dairyman to sell his butter for a better price than he could otherwise obtain. It is intended to restrict the use of other things that might enter into competition with butter, and so enable him to control the market.

Mr. CANNON: If that is so, what is the difference between the dairyman's claim and the claim made by the western farmer for a wheat board?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was rather expecting that question, and as a matter of fact, I intended to touch on it. I think myself there is all the difference in the world. What are the farmers asking for in asking for a wheat board? What is their idea in connection with a wheat board? Their idea is this: they have come to the conclusion, and I would not support the demand if I had not also come to the conclusion, that a wheat board would not increase the cost of bread to the consumer, that it would not entail one dollar of expense to the people, to come out of taxation. Granted these two points, it is simply a demand from the raisers of the wheat themselves, from those who would come under compulsion, that they be permitted to market their grain as they choose.

Mr. CANNON: How could the grain grower get more and the consumer pay less, or, at all events, not any more than he is now paying?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am afraid at a quarter past twelve there is hardly time for me to enter into the merits of the wheat board, especially as that subject may come up later, but I would say this, if I can give the information in two minutes time, that as a rule what the consumer pays depends on the price of flour, and the price of flour does not follow the price of wheat in its fluctuations up and down. When the price of wheat goes down, the price of flour may go down also, but a long way after, and when the price of wheat goes up, the price of flour goes up with it. But that question will come up later, and my friend will no doubt get all the information then that this side of the House can give.

Mr. CANNON: I am very anxious to have it.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I have pretty nearly lost my trend of my argument with having to think of the wheat board. I was speaking of the proposal contained in the resolution before the House as a form of protection. As I say, I cannot exactly understand how it can be looked upon in any other light. If, like my hon. friend from Strathcona, I could honestly see the matter in any other light than protection, my difficulties would largely disappear; but like himself I have to consider the question in the light of my own reason, and reach my own conclusions. I have to act, speak and vote in the light of those conclusions, and I cannot see that it is anything else but protection in its most violent and most aggravated form, because it simply is intended to enable the dairymen to control the market by cutting out any possibility of competition—along this line at least. Now as to that—

Mr. STANSWELL: How can we control the market when we already produce more than that market can take and have to export the surplus?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I would ask my hon. friend how the manufacturers of any article can control the market for home consumption when they are sending exports abroad? If they can shut out competition in the home market in any line they can control that home market to a certain extent, no matter what they are selling abroad, and to the extent they succeeded in shutting out anything which might come into competition with butter they would expect an increase in the price of that butter. That I contend is absolutely protection. Because of that; because I have taken the ground always, and because the men whom I represent, who are dairymen very largely, have taken the ground always, that giving any one part of the population a privilege which is not accorded to all the population, that benefitting one portion of the population at the expense of the rest of the population, is bad business, I think I am perfectly consistent in opposing this resolution, and in advocating unrestricted trade as far as this particular article is concerned.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question, question.

Mr. T. J. STEWART (West Hamilton): I think it only right for me to read a resolution on this subject which has been adopted by the Local Council of Women, Hamilton. The letter forwarding the resolution says:

> You will find enclosed a copy of the resolution passed by the Hamilton Local Council of Women re-oleomargarine. When this subject comes up in the House, the Women's Council will appreciate if you will present their views on this subject as stated.

The resolution itself reads:

> Considering that oleomargarine has proved its worth in food value, and that it is a legitimate article of commerce, this organization of women urgently requests that the ban against oleomargarine be lifted for all time.

I wish to say that I think hon. members will agree with me that women are much better judges of the effect of oleomargarine on their children, and that more than ordinary value should be attached to a resolution of this kind coming from such a source. Now in the city which I have the honour to represent, 85, if not 95, per cent of the people are in favour of the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in Canada, although probably not more than 5 or 10 per cent of the citizens use that commodity to-day. The reason for such a large preponderance of opinion in favour of oleomargarine is that the popular sympathy goes out to the class of people who find it very difficult to provide adequately for their families at the present time when work is so very scarce. The majority of people are, therefore, very willing that the use of oleomargarine should continue, because the poor people who benefit by its use are unable to buy butter for their children. In many cases women have told me their hearts bled for poor children who longed for butter but could not obtain it, but for whom oleomargarine proved a fairly satisfactory substitute. The evidence given against oleomargarine has not been very strong; the reasons against its use exist largely in the imagination of the speakers who have opposed it. What adequate reason exists for depriving of oleomargarine these poor children whose parents cannot afford to buy butter? I think we should be acting very cruelly towards that class of people if we were to adopt this resolution, and I shall vote against it.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I would not rise at this hour if it were not to say a word or two in reply to the statement that has been made by several speakers that this is not a form of protection. I wish to distinctly state that I regard it as a very positive and aggravated form of protection. If we are going to prohibit the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine why should we not do the same in the case of lard, crisco, domestic shortening or anything else that, in any conceivable way, may be made a substitute for butter? It seems to me that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) in referring to renovated butter made out no case for the support of the resolution, but rather presented very strong reasons for the establishment of conditions in Canada permitting the renovation of butter, and I am entirely in agreement with him in that regard.

I would also say that the case he made out with regard to filled milk is no argument in favour of the proposed resolution, but rather an argument in favour of the consideration of the question of whether or not it would be wise to permit the use of that article.

I do not wish to say anything more at this late hour. I shall vote against the resolution, and I might say that in that connection, that I have also had a great deal of experience in dairying in a practical way, and it has never changed my opinion one whit in regard to the principles involved in this particular resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question, question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member who moved the resolution is now about to conclude the debate. If any other hon. gentleman has anything to say he should speak now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Close it up quickly.

Mr. NEILL: It had been my intention to speak for three or four hours in the hope that those who were opposed to the resolution would have the good sense to go home. I think those who favour the motion are the more resolute—shall I say the more intelligent?—and therefore they would be more likely to stay. However, I have been committed to a pledge to cut my remarks down to ten or fifteen minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: That is too long.

Mr. NEILL: Thirty minutes I mean to say and if there are interruptions I may have to occupy forty-five minutes. I have condensed a great deal I had intended to say but there are one or two remarks I must offer. In reply to the last speaker who said that this indubitably was protection let me say this: If it is protection simply to prohibit oleomargarine what would it be if we were asking for a duty of eight cents a pound on butter coming in from the United States, as provided in the Fordney tariff bill in respect to imports from Canada? What kind of expressions would then be employed by hon. members on both sides to describe that form of protection? There is a great difference between a duty of eight cents a pound as specified in the Fordney bill, and the prohibition of this cart grease we are talking of now.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) said that the exportation of butter in the year 1920 amounted to seventeen and a half million pounds and the importation of oleomargarine amounted to six million pounds. I think that amply proves the assertion I made earlier in the debate that there is no scarcity of butter in Canada, which was one of the three reasons given for allowing oleomargarine to be introduced. Out of the mouth of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) is it established that we have an ample surplus when we were compelled to make exports of 17,500,000 pounds. The hon. member says that shows we were not suffering much from the importation of oleomargarine; but if the 6,000,000 pounds of oleomargarine had not been imported into Canada, we would have had 6,000,000 pounds more butter sold locally. The hon. member remarked that it was a well known fact that you could not build up a market for any article to any great extent out of the home market alone. You cannot; we never denied that; but is it not a fact that the home market is the best of all markets?

I wish to say, in order to disarm hostility, that I am not a dairyman myself. I am induced to take this step only by watching the struggles of dairymen in my district. Perhaps the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) will not give me credit for this, but I have also some lingering desire to give the kiddies in this country some proper nourishing food.

Mr. COOTE: If this House were to pass this resolution and if we were to prohibit the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, could the hon. member give us any guarantee that the kiddies about whom he is so anxious would get the butter?

Mr. NEILL: Absolutely. There is nothing else for them to get. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in his treatment of this subject differed, I thought, very strongly from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell); but on this matter I think I must accept the mature judgment of the Minister of Agriculture. His long experience in the matter surely entitled him to be considered a master mind in this regard. I could not help thinking that the Minister of Finance rather what is called begged the question. That is to say, he made an assertion that such and such was the case without proof, and thus disposed of a great deal of argument. He said that it was not true that oleomargarine is an unwholesome product. Unwholesome is a matter of comparative degree; it depends what you call unwholesome. Oleomargarine is not unwholesome if it is in the kitchen; it is unwholesome when it is in a baby's stomach. It is not unwholesome of itself; it is made in a clean manner; but it is unwholesome in a person's stomach. Dirt has been described as matter out of place, and oleomargarine is unwholesome when it is out of place. Beefsteak is a very nourishing thing, but it turns an invalid's stomach and it is an unwholesome thing for that invalid. Lard—some hon. member called it a grease compound—when it is introduced into the stomachs of children and invalids is unwholesome in itself, while it would be thoroughly wholesome to cook the dog's food with or something of that kind.

Another statement made by the Minister of Finance is that oleomargarine is allowed in every country in the world. I must take exception to that because I have authoritative information from the department's own agent that it is not used in New Zealand at all and only to a very slight extent in Australia.

Mr. FIELDING: I did not say that it was used; I said that it was not prohibited by law so far as I knew, in any country in the world. I think that is correct. If I am wrong, I shall be happy to have my hon. friend correct me.

Mr. NEILL: I thought the hon. member said that it was used in every country. At all events I will make that correct. If it is not prohibited in every country, it is not used in Australia and New Zealand.

The last statement the Minister of Finance made was that those who would vote in favour of this resolution would do so on the assumption that the people of this country were not of sufficient intelligence to form a judgment as to what they should buy or not buy. Ever since the day Adam went into horticulture and Eve flirted with the devil have we not had laws of all kinds and have they not been for the protection of the women, the poor and the children? What are we here to-day for if we are not here to make laws to protect somebody from somebody else? If we are sufficiently intelligent to make our hand hold our head, let us go home and each provide himself with a battleaxe and go out on his own. Let me go into the three-card trick. I invite my hon. friends, more particularly of the Progressive party, to come and see me to-morrow and I can demonstrate to them that the marble is under this or that particular cup, and I will invite them to bet on it. Why should I be prohibited from doing that? Let them keep themselves; their intelligence should be sufficient, in the language of my hon. friend opposite: the same thing applies to bogus oil stock and many other things such as peddling confederate bills and other things we are legislating against. Law is made for the protection of the poor and helpless and that is what we are asking for to-day, as regards the secondary element of the resolution, the protection of the poor and ignorant.

Two hon. members spoke very highly of the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie). To be candid, I followed his remarks with close attention and while this may be my misfortune, I could see only two points in his speech. One was the very unfair argument that convictions for selling bad oleomargarine were much fewer than those who were selling bad butter. In answer to that, is the fact that twenty or thirty times as much butter was sold as oleomargarine and therefore, there were more convictions in the case of the former. Such an argument did not seem to require much answer. The other argument was apparently an endeavour to secure the support of my hon. friends to my left and it was put in a way that I do not think will appeal to them. I am not ashamed to appeal to them myself; but I will appeal to their heads and hearts and not to their pockets or stomachs as was done by the hon. member. He held out a threat or promise or bribe—you have beef cattle and the amount of money you will get for your beef fat will enable you to become rich and retire for life. I was glad to see it fail and as regards the small amount of oleo fat that is in a steer, that would not make you very much richer than you are now. Moreover, this has been in force now for four years and I leave it to hon. gentlemen to know how much their pocketbook has been increased in that time. The hon. member for Lisgar went into a discussion of the tariff; but I will keep away from that. We will not call it protection; we will call it prohibition if that will make my hon. friend any happier; we will call it preservation in the same way as we seek to protect the downtrodden wheat-grower by a wheat board.

Mr. BROWN: That was not my argument.

Mr. NEILL: We will not discuss the subject, as the man said. I recall the story of a man who did not go to church and the minister came along and said: "I have not seen you in church." John passed the subject off. The minister said again, "John, you have not been in church lately." The old Scotchman replied: "Weel, now, Mr. So-and-So, we'll no discuss the subject," and at this late hour, we will not discuss the question whether it was the hon. member for Lisgar or not. I will take it back as regards him. Some hon. gentleman made the remark anyway. The hon. member for Lisgar did discuss free trade. Free trade surely made Great Britain; it is a beautiful ideal, a beautiful theory. I believe in it as a theory; but I keep my theories in the clouds and my politics on the earth. Why, I would warn hon. gentlemen to my left that while this policy of free trade is an admirable one if you happen to believe in it, it is possible to run any theory to death, to pursue this fetish, this butterfly until it takes you over the precipice, until free trade becomes almost license. It was suggested this afternoon that free trade meant buying anything you like, and, I suppose, selling anything you like, whether it be oleomargarine or wheat, and drinking anything you like, and finally, in the last analysis, doing anything you like. That means simply one word—license, and that is free trade carried to excess. When I say that, I do not say that I shall not vote for the Wheat Board. I intend to vote for the Wheat Board, because, being in a farming community, I believe they have very hard times on the prairies and they require preservation just as we require preservation in the opposite ends of Canada in the dairying industry. The way my hon. friends to my left vote on this occasion will not make any difference with me.

I shall be very sorry to see my hon. friends from the prairies vote in any considerable numbers against this resolution, for I believe that they could not take any one single step more calculated to alienate the entire sympathies of all the rest of the farming community of Canada. I shall be sorry to see them do that, for I hold them in high respect and have a great belief in their future. I thought the day would come when they would form a party sufficient to dominate Canada both in numbers and in policy, but if they show any tendency to sectionalism there are those who would be only too pleased to observe it. I hope they do not show any such tendency. If they do they cannot logically expect sympathy from other farmers from Quebec or the east or the extreme west. It is said that they are too class-conscious. The trouble is that they are not class-conscious enough. They ought to join hand in hand with the farmers of Quebec and Ontario and the East and on agricultural matters consider every question from the one point of view of the farmers. As the politician in the Old Country said, we must all hang together or we shall hang separately. That is the attitude which I would urge my hon. friends to take. No man liveth unto himself and no man dieth unto himself. That is good Scripture and it is still true. We are told in the literature so often rehearsed this afternoon, and in these regulations, so numerous and hard and fast, but so easy to evade, that the manufacturers were not allowed to put anything on their labels suggestive of milk or butter or cows or any animals on the farm. They were not allowed to put the name of any beef brand on their labels, but there is one of the labels in my hand. Does any hon. gentleman recognise the colour of that animal? I would not object to the colour of the steer which is pictured here, because it represents danger. But I object to the symbol on the label. It should not be a steer; it should be a nigger—a full big, dirty, greasy nigger with his bare feet treading out the vegetable oils in this article, which is sold under the guarantee issued in New York that it was properly made in the southern states. In fact, there should be two niggers upon the label, the one pedalling with his dirty feet and chewing tobacco, with all the habits the practice carries with it and the smaller one stepping airily into the vats to make the necessary repairs to any machinery that goes wrong. Put such a picture on the label and I shall be more willing to accept it.

I shall now refer to another point not introduced into the debate. I want you to think for a moment of the young girls of this country. I am interested in this phase of the question, because I have had girls of my own. Go into the country districts and look at the type of young women there. They are strong, vigorous, deep-chested women, with a complexion that they did not get out of drug stores. Then go into any town or city, from Vancouver to Ottawa and what do you find? They are small, stunted, anaemic looking.

Mr. McMASTER: Nonsense.

Mr. NEILL: And if you go into the restaurants, the cafes and the cafeterias and observe many of the young girls there you will get a fair idea of what they regard as a proper meal. I saw one the other day, a young girl of seventeen or eighteen, in one of these places, and I took notice of what she ordered. She asked for a fruit salad, a mixture of little bits of odds and ends, a small roll of bread with a tiny dab of butter, some coffee and some weird mysterious confection of no earthly food value, although costly. That is the town girl's conception of what is a suitable diet. The agricultural department's experts tell us what constitutes a proper ration for a cow and a horse, but the young boys and the girls in the city are not taught the faintest conception of what constitutes even a fair ration for themselves. They certainly do not get the dairy products that the growing people in the country get. It is not from lack of money; it is not from lack of salary; it is due to lack of sense or knowledge. These girls are well dressed, they swarm in the theatres and movies. So that the fault is not that they have no money. They could not get the proper nourishment in the things they buy, because these vitamines are to be found only in dairy products. I venture to suggest that the fine figure of my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Tolmie) was not grown without vitamines. He was brought up on a farm.

Mr. IRVINE: Will my hon. friend explain what a vitamine is?

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member should have been here this afternoon when I explained this point at great length. He must excuse me if I decline to do so again. However, I might briefly reply that a vitamine is something vital to the growth of young children and is found only in dairy products. Now then, all that is the matter with the women you see in the towns is that they are underfed and under-nourished. If my hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) who is a university man, does not know what a vitamine is, how can you expect a stenographer in one of these buildings to know? Do not make it any worse for these young girls just for the sake of big profits for these corporations in the United States.

Now, we come to the question which has been so well trotted out in this debate, the rights of the poor man to buy what he likes. How tenderly these poor benighted men are dealt with in this instance by the rich corporations! We must stand up for their inalienable right, given them by God to buy what they like. I represent a workingmen's constituency and although this motion has been on the Order Paper for weeks. I have not heard a single complaint from a workingman in opposition to it. The workingmen know what virtue there is in a campaign carried on in their behalf by the rich corporations in the United States. Is it for the benefit of the corporations or of themselves? Which is their real concern? The right to buy! Yes; their right to buy an imitation. I have a formula for producing a substitute for milk. It looks exactly like milk and tastes like milk, only it has not half the food value of the real product. And in years to come, when politics cease to support me, I am going into that business, if this resolution does not pass, and I will get the support of these same hon. gentlemen, who say it is all right to palm off this spurious stuff on the country, to sell that milk substitute then. It will be all right to sell it to the public, if hon. members think that this resolution is wrong. That milk substitute is nothing but a little bit of chalk and a lot of water, but it is just as good as this oleomargarine. We hear a lot of talk about the inalienable "right" of the poor man to buy what he likes. Very well. Suppose we argue for a little while on his "right" to a decent living wage, his right to have such conditions as will afford him employment by which he may be able to earn enough money to provide for himself and his children the real article. Instead of legislating for the benefit of corporations in the United States, and calling it patriotism—a very shady sort of patriotism in my estimation—would it not be infinitely better so to legislate that employment might be abundant, work available, and in consequence dairy products brought within the reach of all? Would it not be better to do that and so keep alive that industry and build up a strong young race?

I started out with the assertion, which has not been contradicted in a single instance, that this legislation was introduced in 1917 for three specific reasons: First, it was a war measure; second, it was due to the scarcity of butter; and third, there was the question of high price. That is admitted; it has not been controverted. I asserted it in the most positive way and it is on the record, and Hansard bears me out when I say that the people of the country, through their representatives, made a bargain with the dairy industry that the importation and manufacture of this article would be abolished as soon as conditions in the country permitted. That has not been done. I asked, I have asked before, I asked this afternoon, and I ask the House again to-night to see to it that the pledge made then with the dairy industry shall be honoured, and that this war measure shall now be abandoned. It is for us now to keep faith with these people who are engaged in this industry.

The House divided on the motion of Mr. Neill, which was negatived on the following division:

YEAS

Messrs.

Archambault,
Baldwin,
Béland,
Bowen,

Mr. KAY: I was paired with the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Wilson). Had I voted, I would have voted for the resolution.

Mr. FIELDING: I was paired with the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken). Had I voted, I would have voted against the resolution.

Mr. TOLMIE: I was paired with the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau). Had I voted, I would have voted against the resolution.

On motion of Mr. Fielding the House adjourned at 1.10 a.m. Tuesday.

The House met at three o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 93 to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: This bill is a short one, and the principal clauses in it contain amendments raising the ages of girls, in the case of indecent assault, from 14 to 16, and carnally knowing from 14 to 16; removing the words "of previous chaste character" in the latter case; and repealing an amendment inserted in the Senate in 1920 that in the case of seduction and for carnally knowing a girl between 14 and 16 the trial judge may instruct the jury that, if in their view the evidence does not show that the accused is wholly or chiefly to blame for the commission of the offence, they may find a verdict of acquittal. These provisions were all passed by the House of Commons last year but were rejected in the Senate. In addition to these there is a provision extending the provisions about bribing police officers to police commissioners; and one correcting a technical error with respect to section 244. This section imposes a penalty for the offences mentioned in the three preceding sections, but by an amendment some sections were added to the code and inserted in the middle of these three sections so as to raise a doubt as to the application of section 244. There is a provision to protect English hall marks on gold and silver; a provision to remove a doubt as to what the maximum penalty should be for stealing an automobile; an amendment to the section with respect to the carriage of animals by railways, to do away with the necessity of getting a written request from the owner to enable the railway to keep the animals the maximum time in the cars, that is, 36 hours; a repeal of the section giving the clerk and deputy clerk of the peace at Montreal and Three Rivers certain powers of justices—the repeal of this section has been requested by the Attorney General's Department of Quebec—a provision giving municipalities of Ontario the fines when they bear the expense of administering the law under which the same are imposed instead of paying them to the province as at present; and an amendment extending the provisions of section 1038, which enables certain penalties to be recovered by civil process, so as to make it include corporations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Health) moved that the House do to-morrow go into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain proposed resolution concerning amendments to:

The Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, chapter 17 of the statutes of 1911, as amended by chapter 31 of the statutes of 1920 and chapter 42 of the statutes of 1921.

Motion agreed to.

GRAIN TRADE

JUDGMENT OF THE MANITOBA COURT OF APPEAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice): Reference was made yesterday by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) to a question which was put to the Government some days ago in regard to a certain judgment which was rendered by the Court of Appeal of Manitoba in connection with the Canada Grain Act. As soon as I came into possession of the judgment and the notes of the judges I studied the case. I had a conference with my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) and the member for Saltcoats (Mr. Sales), to whom I intimated my views of the case. They both requested an opportunity of meeting the members of the board before anything should be decided upon. I acceded to the request and was governed accordingly. The members of the board, I may say, arrived in Ottawa this morning, or last night. This morning they had a conference with the Minister of Trade and Commerce at which I understand, the member for Saltcoats was also present. They informed me a few minutes before the opening of the House to-day that they had not yet arrived at any final decision but would come to a conclusion during the course of the day. To-morrow, therefore, I hope to be in a position to make a statement to the House as to what decision the Government will take in the matter.

ASSINIBOINE RIVER FLOODS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): I desire to call the attention of the House and of the Government to a matter of great concern to the province of Manitoba. I refer to the overflowing of the river Assiniboine. As hon. members have no doubt read in the papers, a great deal of land has been flooded in the constituency of Brandon, and the destruction has spread further east until now Portage la Prairie, which I have the honour to represent, is affected. I have no definite information as to the total destruction caused by the flood, but it will be seen from the press reports that considerable damage has already been done. Carcasses of horses, cattle and pigs, and the wreckage of granaries and outbuildings are to be seen floating down the river. Last night I sent a telegram to the editor of The Free Press at Winnipeg with a view to securing some information that I might submit to Parliament, but unfortunately I have not yet received an answer. However, as I have said, considerable damage has been done already, and perhaps there will be further destruction still. I would not bring this matter to the attention of the House if I did not think it my duty to do so. I believe that the federal government in the past has spent sums of money in building dykes along this river to keep back the flooding waters in the spring. I do not know how much they have spent for the purpose, but the fact is that they have expended money on this work, and I believe they assumed responsibility for the waters flooding the country. I have nothing to suggest, but I think it would be all right if the Government would—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to kindly put his question to the Government as tersely as possible. There can be no argument on the Orders of the Day.

Mr. LEADER: The question I would ask the Government is this: Do they intend to do anything to alleviate the sufferings of those people along the Assiniboine river?

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would inform my hon. friend (Mr. Leader) that the Government has already taken notice of the matter to which he refers. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) has had a report made by the officers of his department, and the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) has already advised the provincial authorities that any officers of his department in the West will be available for such services as it may be in their power to render. The matter is receiving the attention of the Government; more than that I cannot say at the moment.

Mr. LEADER: I am pleased to accept the hon. Prime Minister's statement, and I hope he will be able to do something for those settlers.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE

The House proceeded to consider certain resolutions reported from Committee of Supply.

Annual Drill, $1,400,000.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think the Assistant Clerk read for annual drill the sum of $1,400,000. This is evidently a mistake, because we spent a busy day getting that item reduced by $400,000.

Mr. SPEAKER: Evidently the error is copied from the Votes and Proceedings. It shall be corrected.

Mr. CALDWELL: If this item is copied from the estimate there may be a possibility of similar mistakes occurring. The items are read so rapidly that it is impossible to follow them from the Estimates; one has to rely on his memory.

Mr. FIELDING: The clerk assures me that there is no mistake in the records; it was merely a mistake in printing.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE SUPPLY BILL

On the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) the House went into Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Gordon in the Chair:

Mr. FIELDING moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty, on account of certain expenses of the Public Service for the financial year ended March 31, 1922, the sum of $9,623,792.61 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING: The resolution we have just dealt with closes the accounts for the last year. I now move, with respect to the current year:

Resolved, that towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty, on account of certain expenses of the Public Service for the financial year ending March 31, 1923, the sum of $88,517,204.53 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 85, granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial years ending respectively March 31, 1922 and March 31, 1923.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On Clause (2)—$88,517,204.53 granted for 1922-23:

Mr. CRERAR: How far does this carry us?

Mr. FIELDING: All the appropriations which have been adopted in committee are included in this bill. As a matter of fact, all that we desired to get was the special appropriation for the past year, but in some cases the reports were so blended that they could not be separated. Therefore we have included all the supplies voted up to the present time, but in the Supply Bill they are divided into the former year and the current year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We ought to have that bill. It has not been distributed yet.

Mr. FIELDING: I have never known one to be distributed, but if my hon. friend insists I have no objection.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend is aware that the clerks make up these bills and we have to accept their assurance as to the bills being accurate; I have always found them so.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. SPEAKER: In justification of the Assistant Clerk, I must inform the House that there was no error in the consideration of the resolution of Tuesday, May 9, 1922. If the words in italics are read, the House will see that the item is:

Main Estimates, five-sixths of the amount set forth below, less $400,000.

That is exactly as it was voted. I think I owe this explanation to the House in order to justify our worthy Assistant Clerk.

SUPPLY

NAVAL SERVICE

The House in Committee of Supply.—Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Naval Service—to provide for the maintenance of the Royal Canadian Navy, $1,500,000.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of the Naval Service): Mr. Chairman, I want to make a short statement to the committee; it may help to guide its deliberations. Hon. gentlemen opposite will not, I am sure, attribute to me any considerable degree of modesty. In the course of the remarks I made the other day on the appropriation for the Royal Canadian Navy, I used these words:

I suggested to the officers that we could divide these ships, send one or two of them to the Pacific coast and keep one of them on the Atlantic coast. I had an idea that the Aurora could be used on the Atlantic, and this shows my absolute unacquaintance with the naval service and what a navy is supposed to do.

A little further down I said:

This, the officer told me, was absolutely out of the question; if we separated those ships and sent two of the destroyers to the Pacific coast, those destroyers would not do at all for the purposes of training by themselves and would be wholly unsuitable for the pelagic sealing protection.

Now, the Director of the Naval Service tells me that I was too modest about myself and too emphatic about him. I will not admit either, but I want to state the attitude which the Director of the Naval Service says he took. He strongly favoured the retaining of the squadron, and he insists that he did not assure me that he could not use any unit of this squadron to assist in carrying out the scheme that I had in mind. I understood his attitude as I stated it, but life is too short to quarrel about it, so I accept his word that I misunderstood him. Some day I may get him to accept mine that he misunderstood me, but not to-day. Now, I am pleased to announce to the committee that the Director of the Naval Service assures me that the first suggestion I made, or a portion of it, is practicable, namely, that one of the torpedo boat destroyers can be used on the Pacific and one on the Atlantic; that the volunteers for the naval service can be trained on these two destroyers, in gunnery, seamanship, and all lines pertaining to the naval service, so far as that training is carried out on a ship of that size. The corrected suggestion I have to make is this: I propose to ask the committee to sanction the use of these two torpedo boat destroyers as suggested, instead of the two small ships mentioned in the outline of a few days ago.

I want to correct a little misconception which, I think, exists with regard to these trawlers. My idea of a trawler —and this, I suppose, would be the idea of most hon. gentlemen—would be that it is something in the way of a small fishing smack. These trawlers, however, are seagoing craft, 130 feet long, each carrying a 12-pound gun and manned by from twenty to thirty men. Some thirty or thirty-five of these trawlers were in commission on the coasts of Canada during the war, and rendered wonderful service. I am informed that our share of the patrol of the Pribyloff islands, involving work which we agreed to perform but which for several years we have not done, can be carried out by a craft of the nature I have described. The revenue cutters of the United States are not large ships. They are larger than these, but the Director of the Naval Service assures me that there would be no difficulty in having one of these so-called trawlers proceed to the seal fishing area and patrol those waters. In order that hon. gentlemen may understand that part of the undertaking with respect to the seal fisheries of the Pribyloff islands which we have not performed, I will read a memorandum which has been prepared on the subject:

On July 7th, 1911, a treaty was signed at Washington between Great Britain, United States of America, Japan and Russia for the adoption of means looking to the preservation and protection of the fur seal in the Bering Sea. Under the terms of this treaty the nations interested agreed to prohibit their nationals from engaging in pelagic sealing in the waters of the Pacific Ocean north of the 30° of north latitude. The nations interested undertook to carry on such patrol as would be necessary to enforce the terms of the treaty.

In August, 1910, the Colonial Office had asked if Canada could take part in the Bering Sea patrol and on October 22nd, of the same year, an Order in Council was passed stating that the revenue vessels of the Canadian Government on the Pacific coast were too small for this service, but that the vessels which it was proposed to obtain for the Canadian Naval Service could undertake the patrol and that as soon as the ships were built and equipped Canada would be prepared to send one or more of them to do patrolling within the limits specified.

On September 21st, 1911, the Colonial Office wrote to the Canadian Government stating that the British Admiralty were "prepared to arrange that a vessel of the Imperial Navy should carry out the patrol in the waters North of 30° north latitude and east of the meridian of 170° west longitude until vessels of His Majesty's Canadian Navy were available for carrying out this service."

[Mr. Graham.]

The limits suggested were those of the Canadian Pacific Station. The patrol was to be a joint one with the United States. Patrol of the Pacific Ocean west of the 170th meridian was to be carried out by Russia and Japan jointly.

After this date the British Admiralty maintained two sloops, the "Shearwater" and the "Algerene" on the Pacific station for the purpose of this patrol.

In May, 1914, the Colonial Secretary asked if the Canadian Government could detail H.M. C.S. "Rainbow" to undertake this patrol. The "Rainbow" had been out of commission for some time but she was prepared for sea, placed in commission and was sailing for Behring Sea when news was received that war was imminent. She was therefore detained and on the declaration of war took up her duties as a cruiser in the Pacific Ocean, and no British ship has attended to the Behring Sea patrol since that date, the patrol being effected by United States vessels.

Canada is very interested in the question of pelagic sealing and derives a considerable income from the killing of the seals on the Pribylof Islands. She should therefore take part in the patrol and have a vessel available for inspection of the Pribylof Islands and the killing grounds so as to ascertain for herself how the treaty is being carried out and what results are being obtained.

The revenue obtained in 1919 for Canada's share of the sales of skins from the Pribilof Islands was $266,000. Prices of skins have gone down and last year the amount realized was $65,000. In April of this year a sale was held which netted Canada $23,000. Another sale will be held in the fall.

It will be observed, therefore, that Canada agreed to carry on this patrol, or, at least, to inspect the work and see that it was properly carried out and that treaty obligations were respected; and also that we have a financial interest in seeing that this is done. The Director of the Naval Service assures me that this work can be performed and Canada put in a better position than she has been since the signing of this treaty in regard to her share of the patrol of the sea fishing areas in Behring sea.

Mr. MARTELL: I understand that under the Pelagic Sealing Treaty, which was negotiated in Washington, nationals of all parties to the treaty, such as Russia, Japan, United States and Canada, were to be prohibited from engaging in the seal fisheries. It was understood, however, that at certain seasons of the year a certain number of seals were to be caught and sold and the proceeds divided among the various parties to the agreement. How does the revenue derived by Canada from the sale of these seals compare with the cost of the patrol?

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, since the treaty was signed the patrol has not cost Canada anything, because she has not carried it out.

Mr. MARTELL: The treaty provided for it?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes; at any rate it provided that Canada should look after any patrol which the British admiralty engaged to carry out under that agreement. But, so far as I can ascertain, Canada has not undertaken that work, although she has been getting receipts from the seal fisheries.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was not our share last year in the neighbourhood of $700,000?

Mr. GRAHAM: We can get the figures from the Department of Fisheries. I am told that from one sale that was held our share was $23,000, and that there is to be another sale this fall.

Mr. MARTELL: Has the Pelagic Sealing Treaty been denounced, or are we still working under it?

Mr. GRAHAM: The treaty is still in existence, and the United States is doing her share of the patrol work, and so, I believe are Russia and Japan.

As to the submarines, as I announced a few days ago, the Government's policy is not to retain the submarines in commission. The use of the submarine in warfare is a question about which there has been a great deal of discussion among the great nations of the world during the past few months. It was discussed at some length at Washington; it has been discussed elsewhere, and I presume that it will be discussed in the future at other places, perhaps at the Genoa Conference. I think it is well to point out to the committee now that this action of the Government has a pretty strong foundation. I admit at once that there are those who argue, and argue strongly, that the submarine for defence purposes is very useful, one reason that is advanced for its usefulness being that only a submarine with its hydrophone system can detect the approach of similar vessels, that vessels that do not submerge cannot perform this service. Nevertheless, it will be remembered that strong ground was taken at the Washington Conference by several representatives of the great nations, of Great Britain, in particular, as to whether the submarine should be retained at all. There were some, if I remember the reports of the conference aright, who favoured the total abolition of the submarine in future warfare. Others took the opposite view. I am pointing this out to the committee to show that, to use ordinary language, in tying up the submarines, the Government of Canada is following a very dependable lead.

In tabling a return to an Order of the House on the 11th of April last, containing the documents of the Cannes Conference, the Prime Minister said, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar)—I quote from unrevised Hansard, page 902:

> I therefore beg to present:
> 1. Copy of Memorandum on Anglo-French relations and of the draft of the proposed treaty with France presented by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom to Mr. Briand at the meeting of the Supreme Council at Cannes, January, 1922.
> 2. Copy of Resolutions adopted by the Supreme Council at Cannes, January, 1922, as the basis of the Genoa Conference.

I find in the memorandum presented officially by the British government these words:

> The third is the question of submarines. His Majesty's Government make no condition of this, and they fully understand that the divergencies of French and British views on the subject may be due to different ideas of the uses which submarines can serve. The British opinion, however, based on four years' war experience, is that submarines are effective only against merchant ships and are ineffectual otherwise as instruments either of attack or defence.

I think that is about as strong language as could possibly be used in reference to the use of the submarine. So I submit for the information of the House, as it may help in the discussion of this item, that in putting the submarines out of commission the Canadian government is following the exact lead of the British Admiralty and its policy is in harmony with the official declarations of the British government's representatives gathered together in conference with the great nations of the world.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now that France and the other assembled nations at the Washington Conference have declined the British lead of abandoning the submarine, is it a fact that Great Britain herself has abandoned the submarine?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not say that Great Britain has, but that does not affect the argument that the submarine has been declared by Great Britain not to be a success, either in attack or defence, except against merchant vessels. This is a question that I suppose will be discussed more or less at conferences in the future.

I want to point out to the committee that this proposal, as announced the other day in the House, is not a finality on naval policy. There is no finality on naval policy in the whole world to-day. The great nations of the world will probably meet several times again before they arrive at a conclusion as to the restriction or development of armaments, including the navy, and conferences will be held by the Overseas Dominions as to what share they ought to take. According to the report, such a conference was provided for at the conference held recently. The policy of the Government is along the lines and in accordance with the Naval Service Act passed in 1910. There is not a suggestion in it that is not contained within the paragraphs of the act of 1910. While all countries of the world are wondering at the present time what policy they will finally adopt for attack and defence, Canada is proceeding along safe, sane, economical lines, and when the time comes that a future policy is to be decided upon, we shall have a foundation on which can be built a naval policy worthy of Canada, if the Parliament of Canada decide on development.

I do not know that I need say anything more. I wanted to make this explanation about the submarines, the trawlers, and the torpedo boat destroyers, so that the committee would not be discussing the matter without knowing the full facts.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): The minister stated a moment ago that there was no finality about this proposal. Well, it is pretty near to finality. We would not have much further to go to make it final. I think the minister this afternoon has been in somewhat deep water.

Mr. GRAHAM: Where else should the navy be?

Mr. GUTHRIE: He has been labouring pretty hard. His statement this afternoon is not at all in accordance with the statement of policy which he made on Friday afternoon. He has undergone another change of heart, and a most radical one, and has laboured in pretty deep water this afternoon in an effort to explain it. It was not surprising to those of us who sit in this corner of the House. It was remarked on the streets of Toronto yesterday that we would have another flop here in naval matters; and I have no doubt in my mind that when the minister and the government read the Toronto Globe's editorial on Saturday, the process of changing heart and changing policies at once began, and we have the result of that change to-day. Now it is amusing for all members to sit and listen to my hon. friend's explanation this afternoon of the reason why he was going to abandon these two submarines. That is not the reason he gave on Friday. Why, on Friday the announcement he made to the House was that he was going to abandon the naval service and to go into the volunteer service. That was his reason for stating the policy which he then gave, but in the interval he has had to take up some communications that passed between the French government and British government on the programme that was laid down and discussed at Cannes; and he came to the House this afternoon with a radical change of policy simply because he found from his own friends and his own prominent supporters outside of this House, that the scrapping process which he announced on Friday afternoon was not going to meet with the approval of the rank and file of his party throughout the Dominion. I do not think it was very hard for my hon. friend to take a somersault, or for the members of the Government to take a somersault; they must be quite used to that sort of thing during the present session. It is a spectacle which has ceased even to amuse hon. members in this corner of the House under the conditions which have existed since the session opened.

Now what my hon. friend proposes is simply this: To take the five ships which were a gift by Great Britain to this country and which were accepted by it in good faith—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. GUTHRIE: To take those five ships and scrap them, save two which he says now he finds he can use as training ships.

An hon. MEMBER: Ships that were asked for.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would just as soon that my hon. friend did not interrupt me; he can reply to my remarks later if he wishes. I do not know whether they were asked for or not; we shall probably find that out as the debate goes on. The proposal now is to utilize two and scrap three. I do not remember that any serious objection was taken to the acceptance of these ships at the time they were received from the British government. I believe that when we did accept them it was on an understanding, either express or tacit, that we would keep them in commission, that we would operate them, that we would treat them as a nucleus of some kind of naval service which this country was going to establish at some time in the future. Away back in the year 1910, we who supported the government of that day thought that we had settled a policy in regard to naval service in this country by adopting what was then known as the Canadian Naval Service Act. It provided for small beginnings. That was right enough. We were to build up a naval service in this country on the lines laid down in that act. It was to consist in the first place of the Royal Canadian Naval Service; that would be the permanent force of the navy. It was to consist, on the other hand, of a volunteer naval service corresponding to the volunteer militia which we have in Canada to-day. These were to go hand in hand; and I think we could all reasonably suppose that as time went on and the country developed, the naval service would likewise grow and develop. A change of government took place in 1911 and a new policy was adopted, or an effort was made to adopt a new policy. But the new policy, which consisted of the presentation of three dreadnaughts to Great Britain as a first contribution, never got through parliament. It did pass the House of Commons, but it never became law because the Senate, which is a part of this parliament, rejected that bill. So the matter stood at the outbreak of the war; and throughout the years of the war there was little or no development of any naval service in the Dominion of Canada as a purely Canadian naval service. But at the conclusion of the war did not the time arrive when we should take up the work again? We had a law on our statute book establishing a Canadian naval service. At the end of the war was it not reasonable to think that Canada would once more engage upon the work, taking it up from the very beginning? No one's ideas, no one's views on the subject were at all extravagant. All we intended to make was a beginning, and in making that beginning the offer of five ships suitable for our purpose, suitable for initial operations, the offer of five ships as a free gift came to Canada. We accepted the offer, and went on with our naval service policy based upon the act passed by this Parliament in the year 1910. There it is to-day. These five ships are in commission in the Canadian Naval Service, under our jurisdiction and our control, only forming a modest beginning for the purpose of training our young men, for the purpose of making a start or enabling us to do a little, or begin to do a little, of that which I think we should do in regard to naval operations within the British Empire, but particularly for the protection of our own country, our own harbours, our own coast; and our own fishing too, if you will. The expense is not very great,—two and a half millions I think was the total expense of last year. And yet the minister comes before Parliament on this occasion to say practically; "I am going to repudiate the policy which was accepted in 1910, when I was a minister of the Crown, which provided for the establishment and maintenance in this country of a Royal Canadian Naval Service, and I am going to devote myself to getting up instead a volunteer naval service. We will scrap or put out of commission",—I say, scrap—the five boats which we accepted from Great Britain in good faith with the idea that we would maintain them, and instead of that we will get a couple of trawlers of 470 tons—two trawlers on the Atlantic and two trawlers on the Pacific, and one other boat"—not one of the five according to the statement made on Friday last but one other boat which the minister then had in his mind's eye. But to-day he says he can utilize the two destroyers to take the place of these other boats, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific, and that is going to be his establishment. Then he is going to train up a force of men on the principle of two or three weeks training a year; drill them in the armouries throughout the country; take them down to the ocean the first year and give them initial instruction; and take them down again the second year, give them a trip out on the ocean for a few days and teach them something about mine sweeping; and the third year I do not know what he proposes to do, but he is going to give them another holiday for two weeks, and in the interval some training in the armouries throughout the Dominion; and in that way he hopes to build up something in the nature of a naval reserve in this country. Why, I think anyone who sat in the House in 1910, and in subsequent years, knows that you cannot make a sailor by merely giving him two weeks' training a year for three years; you cannot make a naval sailor without a long continuous course of training; that is elementary. Training at brief periods for one, two, three, four or five years is not going to accomplish anything for you. A long, protracted and hard course of training is necessary, and unless we pursue such a course it is not going to result in anything. The hon. minister estimates that he can carry out this volunteer scheme at an expenditure of about a million and a half, while the greater scheme, which had the approval of this House and the approval of the Admiralty, will only cost two and a half millions. The greater scheme is in itself a most modest one and is not expensive, but it may yield some results and may train some men. It may eventually amount to something and be of some real value to the country. But it looks to me as if it were going to be pure waste of money to spend a million and a half a year on a volunteer service such as described by my hon. friend on Friday last. I am not alone in that opinion. I read it in the Toronto newspapers, and I see it in the editorials in the Montreal newspapers. You might just as well throw your money in the ocean as to spend a million and a half on any such scheme as was outlined by the hon. minister on Friday afternoon. I think he has tried to improve his scheme between last Friday and to-day, because he knows it is absolutely unworkable. Well, what are we going to do? Are we going to spend a million and a half of money in playing at naval warfare, getting together a few naval volunteers in this country, and bringing them down to the sea for two weeks each year as a sort of holiday? It is not going to get us anywhere, or establish anything in the nature of a permanent naval service. I believe there is only too much in the criticism that it will be an absolute waste of money. Why can the minister not be content with the present programme? Where is the demand? In what quarter of the country is there any demand to change the programme? The hon. member from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) has criticised the present arrangement very severely, and has said that it is a waste of money to spend two and a half millions on the five ships in commission. What will he say in regard to the million and a half the minister proposes to spend on the volunteer services, on the trawlers, and on the armoury drill and the like? I have tried to find where the criticism of the present policy is. I fail to find it in the press. If there is criticism in the country, it is that we are not doing enough, and that we reasonably should do more, but I have heard of no criticism inside the House or out of it, save only the words of the hon. member from Lunenburg, that the programme which we carried on last year and the year before should be at all reduced. Let the Government be content with that programme. I agree that it is not one of which we can boast very much, but it is infinitely superior to the programme which the minister brought down to the House earlier in the session. If the minister wishes merely to play at the naval game, let him form his naval volunteer force, and put out of commission these ships and his naval reserve. That is the scheme he has outlined, as I understand it, and to that scheme I am heartily opposed.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Lunenburg): I am sure the House has listened with a great deal of interest both to the statement made by the Minister of Defence (Mr. Graham) and also to the statement made by the hon. member from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), but it is very amusing to me, and I am sure it must have been to hon. members, to hear the hon. member from South Wellington speak about the "flop" which the hon. Minister of Defence had taken since last Friday. I presume that word flop comes quite naturally to the hon. member from South Wellington, because if there is one flopper in Canada to-day that deserves the title, it is the member for South Wellington. I need not go into details in order to explain to the House and the country how and why. The hon. member deserves that title, because everybody knows the whys and wherefores of what happened in 1917. The hon. minister has told us that he intends to keep the two destroyers, one on the Atlantic coast and the other on the Pacific coast, for training. I do not object seriously to keeping those two boats for training, but if, as his Director of Naval Service told him, the idea was to keep the vessel on the Pacific coast for the purpose of protecting the seal fisheries, it seems to me he is going beyond what is necessary in regard to this matter from a naval standpoint. In my opinion, the matter of protecting the seal fisheries in the Behring straits comes entirely under the Fisheries Department, and should be looked after by one of the Fishery patrol boats.

The matter of the Canadian Navy, as has been said by the hon. member from South Wellington, is one in which the people of the country have been interested for a number of years, but it comes, in my opinion, with very bad taste from the hon. member from South Wellington to compare the record of the Liberal party in regard to their naval plan, either their past history or their present record, with that of the party with which he is now associated.

5 p.m.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I made no comparison.

Mr. DUFF:—or what happened the last few years in Canada in naval affairs. It might be well to review this matter in a very few words to show what both parties have done; in that way we can come to a conclusion as to whether the policy of the Liberal party, or the policy adopted by the Conservative party, is the better one. I have taken the trouble to look up the records of this House, in order to find what practical work was done by the government of this country previous to 1910 when the Naval Service Act was introduced, and I find that neither the Conservative government nor the Liberal government spent any money on what is known as the Naval Defence of this country. I need not go back very far. For instance in the year 1905-6, the year 1906-7, the year 1907-8, or the year 1908-9, there was not one dollar voted by this parliament towards the naval defence of this country. Although the hon. member from South Wellington says that I was the only person in this House who had criticised the navy and the naval expenditures, yet it seems to me that I should be more interested in the protection of the coast lines of this country than the hon. member for South Wellington or in fact any other member who lives in the interior of the country. I do not wish to say that they should not take an interest in this matter, but I think they will be the first to agree with me that those who live on the Atlantic or the Pacific coast are more vitally interested in the protection of those coasts than those who live in the interior of Canada. I remember during the years of the war, in the years 1918, 1919, when German submarines came across the Atlantic, when those submarines were within five miles of the Atlantic coast, we realized that it would have been very nice to have a navy. But we were not scared at all. The people who were born and bred on the Atlantic ocean are not so easily scared. The hon. member from South Wellington has said that I am the only one that has risen in this House and criticised the navy and deprecated the fact that so much money is being wasted, but it seems to me the members of the House and the people of the country will agree with me that I have more interest in the matter than the hon. member has in view of the fact that I live on the Atlantic coast, and represent an Atlantic coast constituency.

Neither the Liberal party nor the Conservative party spent one dollar on naval defence up to 1908-9. The Laurier naval policy was introduced in this parliament in the year 1910. I need not tell hon. members what that naval policy represented or what it meant, but the Liberal party endeavoured at that time to put an act on the statute book and to carry it out, in order to create a naval sentiment in this country. Although the Liberal party voted in this Parliament for a naval service, and purchased from the Mother Country two training ships, the Niobe and the Rainbow, when the bye-election came in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska in 1910, the very gentlemen who are now supported by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), aided and abetted by certain Tory newspapers in Quebec—English newspapers at that—went through the country and did everything possible to defeat the Liberal candidate, purely and solely on the question of Canada's share in the naval defence of the country. That is what happened. And yet the hon. gentleman rises in this House and throws taunts across the floor, endeavouring to show that we on this side are not interested in naval matters in Canada. It is a well known fact that leading men in the Conservative party sent telegrams of congratulation to the Conservative candidate—more truly speaking, the Nationalist candidate—in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska, eulogizing him for the attitude he was taking in that campaign. Then what occurred when the general election came on in 1911? Did the Conservative party uphold the Liberal naval policy which was passed by this House in 1910? Did they go up and down the country telling the people that we ought to have a naval policy in Canada and that we should have ships on the Atlantic and the Pacific in order to protect the coast lines of this country and safeguard the avenues of traffic on the two oceans? Not at all. They did not utter a single word in favour of the naval policy in that campaign. On the contrary, the leading men of the party which the hon. member for South Wellington now supports toured the province of Quebec supporting the Nationalist candidates who were opposed to the naval policy of the Liberal party and of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. They told the people of Quebec that if Sir Wilfrid Laurier was elected and his naval policy was carried out their sons would be commandeered and carried across the seas to Japan, there to be disemboweled. And one of the men who conducted this sort of campaign was chosen as Deputy Speaker of the House, afterwards becoming a Cabinet Minister in the Conservative government. That gentleman it was who gave utterance to the famous saying that in order to breathe the breath of freedom "it was necessary to shoot holes through the British flag." Yet these are the men for whom the hon. member for South Wellington is acting as spokesman, criticizing the Liberal policy with reference to naval affairs in this country.

What transpired after the election had taken place? They had to carry out their bargain with the Nationalists of Quebec, twenty-two of whom were returned to Parliament as a result of that campaign, which was one of the most dastardly campaigns ever carried on by a political party in Canada. Did they spend $2,500,000 in naval defence? Not at all. The Liberal party in 1910-11 expended $3,000,000 on naval affairs, and in 1911-12 they voted $3,000,000 again for the navy of Canada. But as soon as those gentlemen assumed office, to demonstrate just how much interest they had in the naval protection of our country on the Atlantic and the Pacific, in 1912-13 they reduced the vote to $1,600,000; in 1913-14 to $1,000,000; and in 1914-15 to only $1,000,000. Now, that is the naval policy they carried out. They had so little interest in naval matters that they reduced the vote in 1913 and 1914 by $500,000 more than the minister (Mr. Graham) is reducing at the present time.

Mr. GRAHAM: And that was before the war.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, one and two years before the war. The two ships that were purchased from Great Britain, the Niobe and the Rainbow, were splendid vessels, admirably adapted for training purposes, and they could have rendered very valuable service not only before the war but even during the war. But the Conservative government did not keep the crews on these ships after they had made their bargain with their Nationalist friends. They paid off the crews, and the Niobe was tied up at dockyard at Halifax, with two chains at her bows and two at her stern; and there were not sufficient caretakers left on board to keep the machinery in order. When the war broke out in 1914 this boat was moored to the dock, grounded on her beef bones, and it took six weeks after the declaration of hostilities to get her into any kind of shape to go to sea. As I said before in this House, and I repeat it with emphasis on this occasion, if the Niobe had been put into commission on the Atlantic, and the Rainbow on the Pacific coast, on the 4th of August, and if the telegrams that came from the Pacific at that time had been answered—and it could have been effectively answered had these ships been in commission—there would have been a sufficient number of vessels captured on the Pacific and the Atlantic to pay the cost of the war to Canada for the first year. But these people did not want to do anything for the navy. The Borden government did not want to do anything for the defence of the country, and no other conclusion could be arrived at than that they were afraid to break the bargain which they had made with the Nationalists. The war went on and we spent a great deal of money—some $30,000,000—on what was described as naval defence. I have no hesitation in saying that most of that money expended during the war on the Atlantic and the Pacific was wasted. In 1920, the Union government accepted five ships from Great Britain. Now, the people of the country were not consulted in regard to that gift. I do not blame the British government for having offered these ships to Canada; indeed, I think they are to be commended for having done so. But I do say that the ships were accepted by the government of Canada without the authority of the people, who were not consulted in the matter. Notwithstanding the fact that Parliament was then in session, the whole thing was done over the heads of the people's representatives. Is there any man within the sound of my voice, or in Canada, who will assert that since these ships have come to Canada they have been of any practical value so far as the defence of our coast lines is concerned, or in keeping the traffic lanes open on either coast? I do not hesitate to say that they have been absolutely useless for defensive purposes. They have served no good purpose in the last two years, and whatever money has been spent to pay the crews and keep these vessels in commission has been utterly wasted to the people of this country.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the hon. member know what the British Admiralty are doing with the same kind of ships which they sent to Canada as a gift?

Mr. DUFF: To use the words of the hon. member for South Wellington, they are "scrapping" them. I repeat that these ships, for purposes of defence at any rate, have been absolutely useless, and to prove that statement I have only to call attention to the fact that they have not spent three months on the Atlantic coast or on the Pacific since crossing the Atlantic. They have been wandering all over creation. They arrived in Halifax some two years ago, remained there about six weeks, and the first thing we read in the newspapers was that they were going to take a trip to the Pacific. They were fitted out at great expense to the country and proceeded down to the West Indies and through the Panama canal, and after a time we learned through the newspapers that they had arrived at Vancouver or Victoria. Now, that was a delightful trip. I have no doubt that most of us would have liked very much to be on board one of those cruisers or torpedo boat destroyers on such an extensive and delightful voyage. But I think every one will agree with me that that trip was of no practical benefit to this country. Those ships were not defending the Canadian coast line while on that trip, and consequently no one can argue that from the time they left Halifax for Vancouver until their return to Halifax two or three months later any practical results were obtained in regard to the defence of our shores.

Then during last winter did those ships stay on the Atlantic coast and do any particular service that enured to the advantage of this country?—and I need scarcely add that during the winter months we can use boats of this description on the Atlantic coast, poor as they are, for the weather there is very rough; men of the merchant marine, both those in the liners which cross from the Old Country to Nova Scotia and those in the sailing ships which ply to all parts of the world practically, have to make that coast in stormy weather during the winter months, and there are times when it might be very handy, if a wireless were sent from one part of the coast to another that a ship was in distress, to have these ships available to render aid. But where were they when they might have been of some service? For four months those ships were down in Barbados and Trinidad. In fact the officers and crews helped to open the Barbados legislature.

The winter over, those ships are now back in Halifax. But what work is there for them to do in regard to defending our coast line or keeping open the lanes of traffic? I say those ships are absolutely useless. And the question in my mind is not whether we should continue these ships in commission, but: Can we in our present financial condition spend sufficient money for the upkeep of a navy which will not be of any service for our national defence either on the Atlantic or the Pacific, or to keep open the ocean lanes for our merchant marine? There is the whole question. Will any sane Canadian say that one cruiser, two torpedo boat destroyers and two submarines would be of any service if war broke out between Canada and—what country shall I say?

Mr. LANCTOT: There is no country with which we can possibly be at war.

Mr. DUFF: I agree with my hon. friend, because we are a peace-loving people and are not going to seek an excuse for declaring war against any country. But if war did break out, what use would these five boats be to defend our coast line either on the Pacific or on the Atlantic? How would you subdivide them? Would you cut the Aurora in two and send one part to the Pacific coast and keep the other part on the Atlantic coast? The minister says that he is going to send one torpedo boat destroyer to the Pacific and retain one on the Atlantic. He can do that with those destroyers, and also with the two submarines. But what effective service could one destroyer and one submarine on either ocean render to this country? Absolutely none whatever.

My argument is the same to-day as it always has been—that if we cannot spend $100,000,000 a year in order to maintain a sufficient navy on both oceans to be ready for any eventuality, which is absolutely improbable, then it is useless for us to spend $2,500,000 or $1,500,000 for the purpose of pretending that we have a navy.

I do not think I need argue the point any further. There is the whole question in a nutshell. Many hon. members will recollect that when, two years ago, we were discussing the taking over of those five boats the then President of the Privy Council, Hon. Mr. Rowell, in reply to my contention that the ships were no good for defensive purposes, said: Oh, no, that is not what they are intended for. They are to keep open the traffic lanes so that shipping can move between the Atlantic and the Pacific with safety. And no less an authority than the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) supported the view expressed by the then President of the Privy Council.

No man who knows anything about marine matters will dare get up in Parliament or on any public platform and state that these five ships can keep open the lanes of traffic for the fifty-seven different routes on the two oceans. If we want the ships necessary to keep open our traffic lanes, then let us be men enough to vote, not $1,500,000, but let us vote $100,000,000—if we can afford it. It is useless to vote only $1,500,000; we cannot afford to vote $100,0000,000. That being so, why do we not act like sensible business men, and without taking politics into account settle this thing on a business basis? That is the right and proper thing to do in the circumstances.

I submit that it is useless to spend $1,500,000 on these ships in view of the financial condition of the country, and in view of the fact that other national services are starving for government aid and cannot get it. Yet the previous government came to this Parliament and asked for a naval vote of $2,500,000, and this Government is asking for a reduced vote of $1,500,000—both votes being for something which is not of much benefit to this country. There is my whole argument, and I say that it is absolutely impossible to refute it.

I notice that while we are reducing our naval expenditures other countries are doing the same. I have in my hand a press dispatch from London, England, stating that the British government have cut down their naval expenditure to the extent of £16,000,000, or about $80,000,000.

Mr. LEWIS: What is the amount of their naval estimates to-day?

Mr. DUFF: I have not got that information.

Mr. LEWIS: That reduction does not mean very much unless we know what the appropriation was before and what it is now.

Mr. DUFF: I quite understand that that is a small reduction compared with the total naval expenditure of the British government, but I think it will be admitted that the very fact of that reduction being made proves that they realize the necessity for reducing their naval expenditure. Certainly if the British government feel justified in making that reduction, it seems to me that, as I said a moment ago, situated as we are, if we cannot afford to spend a sum of money that will give us something practical in the way of naval service, then it is good business for us to reduce our naval expenditure to a minimum.

I am very much afraid that whilst an overwhelming majority of people in this country are not favourable to naval expenditures of any great magnitude, a small minority do not share that very widespread view. A few days ago I read a press dispatch from London of a speech made by Lord Lee, First Lord of the British Admiralty, in the course of which occurs the following:

> Lord Lee pointed out that the Imperial Conference after a full, prolonged and intimate discussion of the naval needs of the Empire, had agreed that the maintenance of an Empire navy was the common concern of the whole Empire.

In other words, Lord Lee says that the delegates to that conference which was held in London last year agreed "that the maintenance of an Empire navy was the common concern of the whole Empire." So far as I am concerned, if that was agreed to by any delegates from Canada, I submit that they should not have done so without first consulting the representatives of the people in this House. It was bad enough for the then government to accept these five ships without consulting Parliament, which was in session at that time, but it seems to me it is worse for members of any government to go to the Old Country and agree with the British representatives and the delegates from the other Dominions that they would do something in regard to Empire naval defence without first consulting the views of our people through their representatives in Parliament.

As far as I am personally concerned, I am fairly well satisfied with the statement made by the Minister of Defence (Mr. Graham). In view of the fact that we have some sort of naval organization, I think that perhaps it is not right or fair that the whole naval vote should be cut out at once. I can understand that it might not be necessary for him to spend the $1,500,000 which he is asking for, and I suggest that in the interests of the people he should save any part of that amount which he can as the year goes on.

As to the proposal of the minister with regard to arranging for naval service training for two or three weeks each year, I must agree with the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), that it is impossible to make sailors in two or three weeks. The hon. member said, in effect, that the money would be wasted in any attempt to make sailors in that short time.

Mr. MARTELL: Does the hon. member consider that a sailor can be made at all on one of these ships? In order to get the proper training, would the men not have to go on sailing ships, square-riggers, and so on?

Mr. DUFF: I think my hon. friend is right, to some extent. They do make sailors now on steam vessels, though they are not able seamen or as good as the sailors you make on square-riggers, fore-and-afters, and tern schooners. But I say you cannot make a sailor in three weeks. If the argument of the hon. member for South Wellington is good, that you cannot train a man for naval service by keeping him two or three weeks in an armory, on a training ship, or even by sending him two or three weeks to sea, either on one of these patrol boats or on one of these destroyers, then it seems to me the same argument should hold good with regard to the militia, and I am only sorry now we did not fight harder to get the militia vote for annual training further reduced. If you cannot make a sailor in two or three weeks, you cannot make a soldier in two or three weeks.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would succeed if he tried again.

Mr. DUFF: In making a soldier, or a sailor?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, in getting another reduction in the militia estimates.

Mr. DUFF: I am a very modest man. I will let the hon. leader of the Opposition read between the lines; he can come to his own conclusions. I believe, however, there is some merit in the proposal put forward by the minister in regard to a naval reserve. Some of the very best men who were in the British navy during the war, either on the fighting ships or on transports, were men who had been trained in the naval reserve. We all remember the gallant stand taken by the British army on the Gallipoli Peninsula. We remember reading in our newspapers one morning of the decision to abandon the peninsula. We read the vivid story of how these soldiers fought and backed their way down the hill fighting inch by inch, and when they arrived on the Gallipoli beach they found the boats there, ready to take them to the transport. We read that the sailors, naval ratings from the transports, were on the shore; they saw that the soldiers and their equipment were put on the transports. To the naval reserve was left the gallant task of firing the stores on the beach and being the last to embark; and these men had been trained in the naval reserve of England and the naval reserve of the small dominion of Newfoundland. If the minister, then, can work out some scheme whereby, at a minimum of expense to the country, we can train a naval reserve, the money will be well spent. I myself have a scheme in my head, Mr. Chairman, which would not cost very much money. We all remember that during the late war the Militia Department created a kind of sausage machine from which they ground out honorary colonels by the bushel. Now, I do not want the Minister of Defence to make me a rear-admiral for this suggestion, but I want to say this to him. We have on the Atlantic coast, and I think also on the Pacific coast, men who require practically no training; men who can be enlisted in a voluntary naval reserve at very small cost to the country. If the minister would like me to do something in this regard I could get anywhere from 5,000 to 10,000 volunteers in my own county to serve as a naval reserve on the Atlantic coast. These are the men who should be engaged; they do not have to be made sailors in two or three weeks, for they are sailors now. They have ploughed the seas ever since they were boys of twelve or fifteen years of age; they have gone fishing on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, and during the war they braved the submarines in the bay of Biscay and in the Mediterranean, carrying foodstuffs to the people of Europe. These are the men, who in my opinion, are ready to do either the work they did before, or any special work in connection with the defence of their country. It is not necessary to spend much money on a naval reserve this year; the minister should go slowly and work out a proper scheme, and not be in a hurry to spend any more this year. But if the time comes when the minister thinks it necessary after mature deliberation to have a naval reserve, I say that in my county—and in this respect it is only like a number of other counties along the Nova Scotia coast—thousands of young men can be obtained by the voluntary system who will be glad indeed to give two or three weeks a year, or more, in order to be so trained that they may be able to serve their country if necessary, in her defence.

In conclusion I may say that I should be very glad to vote any sum of money which I considered necessary for naval defence, either on the Atlantic or on the Pacific coast. But I submit that either $2,500,000 or $1,500,000 devoted to the naval defence is almost wasted, even though it is given the name of money voted for the naval service. Let us be reasonable and sensible in this matter; let us look at it from the plain, business standpoint. If we cannot do anything in the matter of naval defence with either $1,500,000 or $2,500,000, then why should we be talking across the floor of this Chamber just because we feel we want to make some point against the Minister of Defence on the ground of his having cut down the estimate? I say he should be congratulated for cutting it down, and, further, that unless he can propose a good scheme under which it would be necessary to spend money on a naval reserve, the minister when he comes before the House another year would follow a course approved by the people, not only of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, but of the country generally, if he said: "I find it is not a practical thing to spend money on a naval service, so I have decided to cut the whole thing out". I say the people of this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific would give the minister credit for doing what he thought was right in the general interests of the country.

Mr. McBRIDE: The hon. member (Mr. Duff) made the statement that one of the ships purchased by the Laurier government was chained to the dock at Halifax, by the late government when they came into power, and that the other was laid up at Vancouver. He said that if these ships had been in proper trim to go to sea when the war broke out they could have seized enough shipping to pay for the war.

Mr. DUFF: No, I did not say that.

Mr. McBRIDE: The hon. member said, if I am not mistaken, that if these ships had been ready for sea when the war broke out they could have seized enough shipping to pay for the first year of the war.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, the first year. The hon. member said the whole war.

Mr. McBRIDE: Then the hon. member said that so far as the five ships taken over by the late government were concerned, if war broke out they would be practically of no use.

Mr. DUFF: I said, for practical defence purposes.

Mr. McBRIDE: Would not these five ships that were accepted by the late government serve a better purpose than the other two tinpot boats that were scrapped? Let us be honest. The five ships that the late government accepted from the Imperial government, if they were in proper shape, would go a long way to defending at least the Pacific coast.

Mr. DUFF: You can have them on the Pacific coast.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): The hon. member for South Wellington has said that he has not heard any criticism whatever of naval matters or of the grants to be made for the upkeep of the Canadian navy. I would like to say that there is a considerable body of opinion which has not been able to express itself through some of the Montreal and Toronto papers, which evidently are read by the hon. member for South Wellington. I would like to state further very frankly that so far as my constituency is concerned, I came here pledged to advocate national disarmament. That is not a personal viewpoint merely. It is the view of the people who sent me here, and I take it that the best contribution we can make in this House is to try to represent the opinion of the constituents who sent us here.

I quite agree that the expenditure of something like $1,500,000 on ships to defend the coast lines of Canada is a good deal like playing with the problem. I can quite appreciate the position that if you are really going to defend our coasts, you might rather have to spend $100,000,000. That is one thing that we should keep before us—the practical business side.

There is another aspect I should like to mention. We ought not to take any further steps in this matter until after the next Imperial conference and until after it is decided what the status of Canada really is. Some of us feel very strongly that we must not do anything whatever that would lead us into any sort of imperialism or draw us into responsibility for doing something over which we have not absolute control. We feel very strongly, a good many of us, that we ought not to be associated in any way whatever with any conferences which may possibly commit us to that from which we cannot very well draw back, but as to which we can have no final decision.

I am not at all sure concerning the reason for the acceptance of that gift of ships from the Motherland. I am not sure as to how much value they will be to this country. I happened to be in the city of Vancouver when that fleet came into English bay, and I know that a great deal was made in the papers of the event. It was suggested that this was indeed the beginning of a real Canadian navy. The officers entertained and were entertained, and all that kind of thing, but there is a very large section of the people that since the Great War have ceased to be impressed by that kind of performance. It has been said on this floor to-day that the war is over, and yet there are members who have directed our minds back to 1910, and suggested that we ought to carry out certain policies which were proposed away back in that year. I submit that to-day we look out at the world with very different eyes from what we did in 1910. Surely the war has taught us some lessons, and among others that preparedness does not insure us against war, but that the surest way of creating and maintaining peace amongst the nations of the world is that we should indeed scrap our navies and our great armaments. You may laugh at such a position as that if you please. You may ridicule it; any hon. gentleman is at liberty to do that; but that is coming to be more and more the considered opinion of a considerable number of people in this, as well as in other countries.

Now that we have had a naval policy proclaimed at Washington, we are beginning to breathe a little more freely and feel that we can go on quitely with our business without undertaking any more of these tremendous financial obligations under which we have been labouring in the past. Surely we have an opportunity here in Canada of quitely reorganizing our affairs, not on the old basis, but on an altogether new basis.

The hon. member for South Wellington suggests that as the country grows, the naval service will grow and develop. That is precisely the militaristic point of view, according to which militarism is an essential part of any nation's life. From this standpoint we must always look forward to being able to defend ourselves by force of arms. I submit that that time has passed, that militarism is discredited, that the great world war, in which tens of millions of lives were lost and through which the whole world has been plunged into bankruptcy, has taught us that war is not effective, that militarism is a discredited weapon, and that we must look forward to the reorganization of our national and international affairs on an altogether different basis from that which we have had in the past. I would urge that we here in Canada very largely separated from other nations, and freer in that respect to work out our own affairs than most of the nations, should begin at once to stop naval expenditure and to recognize that it is only by the cultivation of international goodfellowship that we shall obtain any security from external attack.

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): Coming from a constituency which, in the days when shipbuilding was supreme in the province of Nova Scotia, built the largest wooden ships that were ever constructed in Canada, I feel it is my duty to rise and congratulate the minister upon a policy which will indirectly help in the very best possible way to bring back to Nova Scotia her commercial supremacy on the sea.

I was very much amused, as the hon. member for Lunenburg says he was, to hear the ex-Minister of Militia refer to "floppers." I am probably the youngest member in the House from the Maritime provinces, and while I have many sins to answer for, as I do not claim to be a paragon of righteousness, I am thankful that I do not have to answer to the atrocious charge of ever having been a "political flopper." I stand in this House this afternoon proud of the fact that I can support a Liberal Government, the true successor of the Liberal government led by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I followed the great Sir Wilfrid, as did all my forbears, and of him it can be said in the words of the poet Tennyson, he was a man > "Who never sold the truth to serve the hour,

> Nor palter'd with Eternal God for power;
> * * * * * * * * * * * * *
> He never shall be shamed
> ...what ever record leap to light.

I stand here this afternoon supporting my hon. leader who is the successor of that great chieftain, Sir Wilfrid, and whose naval policy has been vindicated time after time since he first enunciated it to Canada. He is not like the ex-Minister of Militia of whom we could say, as Sir Walter Scott said of "Old Immortality":

> He delights in haunting ancient places and refreshing tombstones while the stream of life goes by and flowers bloom unheeded at his feet.

The hon. ex-Minister of Militia probably wants to get back to the days prior to 1910. Those were the days when my hon. friend had sound reasoning and peace of mind for he was standing for a policy which any reliable man in Canada would be pleased to uphold and advocate. But my hon. friend is sick at heart and has no peace of mind for he has shared in the vacillating measures which were adopted under the government of which he was a member, from 1917 down to the end of 1921. The result is, that in order to bolster up a case against the excellent policy which has been enunciated by the present Minister of Defence he stands up and wobbles very much like a "land lubber" endeavouring to get his sea-legs while suffering from mal de mer caused by the bilge water from the pumps of the leaky ship of government which sailed Canada from 1917 up to December, 1921. We are not the only people that are making cuts in both military and naval matters. My hon. friend and colleague from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) has stated that Great Britain herself is cutting down her naval expenditure by eighty millions of money. The great dominion of Australia is also scrapping the Sydney, a ship, I believe, which was built wholly and entirely for Australia and of which Australians were proud. I believe that pursuant to the League of Nations an agreement was entered into looking towards disarmament, and we in Canada should not wait for the other portions of the British Empire to lead the way. We in Canada should not ask to be shown what other portions of the British Empire are doing in order to do the right thing, because Canada is mistress in her own house. Canada will be governed by Canadians; and I am proud this afternoon to know that we have a Government which has the courage of its convictions, a Government which will listen to the dictates of the Canadian people and also has the courage to see that Canadians shall be properly led with a view to economy not only in commercial matters but in military and naval affairs.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the Chair, and the House took recess.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

House again in Committee on Bill No. 5, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On section 1—Extension of time for construction.

Mr. McCONICA: When this debate was adjourned I was speaking to the amendment offered by the hon. member from Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael). I am a member of the Railway Committee, but I was absent on the day this bill was considered, owing to illness—the only day I have been absent. Therefore, I feel that it is proper that I should be permitted to state my position in regard to this amendment. As hon. members will understand, this amendment, applies to six branch lines that are under charter to the Canadian Pacific Railway in the two Prairie provinces, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Two of these lines are within the boundaries of the constituency of Battleford. My contention is that it is time that the railroad should show a disposition to begin to construct these branches, and that something positive should be required of this company. The country to be served by these branch lines in every instance is very much in need of this construction. Some of them have been in need of it, perhaps, for years. People settled along the proposed line. The war came on, construction was referred, and the settlers have gone on year after year at very great inconvenience.

The time has come, I think, when Canada should arouse herself from the lethargy in which she is resting to-day. If we propose to build up this country, it is time for us to get busy. I consider it almost a disgrace that at this time there should be unemployment in Canada. It is too bad that we should lack railway facilities at this time, when we have great need of improvement; when the world is in distress and needs those things which Canada can produce, and when people are hungry, cold and houseless. We have abundant natural resources, and great forests, but our mills are idle and our fields are uncultivated and uncut. Now are we going to get busy? What put Belgium back into industrial activity? Because she went to work. What must Canada do? Go to work. There is a job for every man who looks for one, if things are properly conducted in Canada. There is no excuse for unemployment. It is a crime for the able-bodied men in this country to go without work for six days in the week. A longtime ago we were admonished that six days we should labour and do all our work, and on the seventh we should rest from our labours, because it is the Sabbath of our Lord. What does that mean? It means that we must observe the Sabbath, but it means a little more than that. It means that for six days we shall labour, and the man who loafs six days violates that commandment every day of the six, and if he loafs on the seventh, he violates that commandment also, for he is pursuing his ordinary avocation on the Lord's day. I say that in that command we have an assurance that every man can find a job if he looks for it, and I do not know where there are more jobs than here in Canada.

I do not know anybody in better shape to begin to employ labour than the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is laying away its surplus. The people are needing the extensions. The labourers require employment and the people need the money. Let us start the construction, and the railway will get the tonnage and the people will get service. The people will get something to eat, something with which to clothe themselves and the wheels of industry will start. Now is the time, just as quickly as we can get at it. If we stand with our hands folded year after year, and let things go by, it will only be a question of a very short time until we go into bankruptcy. We need immigration in Canada. But we want something for them to do. We must improve the western part of the country if we desire to accommodate immigrants, and the way to improve it is to build branch railroads. We have plenty of trunk lines, but what do they amount to if there are no branches? It is the branches that bring business; they create the tonnage which makes the railroads profitable. I hope that hon. gentlemen will see the wisdom of providing that they shall go to work in earnest within two years and spend enough money to mean something. The Railway Act provides for an expenditure of 15 per cent, and that is the provision inserted in this amendment. I contend that it is a reasonable provision; otherwise the bill is substantially an extension of the charter for five years, and I do not believe that it is the intention that such an extension should be granted. I, therefore, sincerely trust that the House will see the wisdom of adopting the amendment.

Mr. McCREA: This is the third time that this matter has been considered by this House. It was dealt with by the special committee, who granted the extension asked for; so I cannot understand why hon. members should persist in opposing it here. It has been discussed throughout the entire time devoted to private bills on each of the two former occasions it has been before the committee in this House, and the object has been simply to obtain, if possible, a snap verdict. Now, I believe in the development of the country. But if I am rightly informed, as I think I am, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have seven or eight different branches in various stages of construction at the present time in the western provinces. True, the Canadian Pacific Railway is a strong and powerful corporation; nevertheless, it is hardly reasonable or fair that it should be asked to do too many things at one time. The hon. gentlemen who have been insisting on this amendment are very loud in their protests against high freight rates. They demand cheap transportation. As I have just remarked, it is true that the Canadian Pacific Railway is a corporation of considerable magnitude, and hon. gentlemen say that they ought to be able to proceed with this work because they have all kinds of money. I do not dispute the fact that they have sufficient money for operating purposes; but neither the Canadian Pacific Railway nor any other corporation, big or little, using sound judgment, is going to take the money which it has for operating purposes and put it into permanent investment in the construction of roads. What they will do, before starting upon the construction of this or ony other important branch railway, is to go and sell bonds, and I presume there is not a gentleman in the House, who has had anything to do with the financing of any concern, who does not realize that the present is a very critical time to sell bonds to advantage. If we force the Canadian Pacific Railway to go and sell bonds for the construction of this extension, probably at seven or eight per cent and running over a period of twenty, thirty or forty years, we shall simply be putting a burden on them that will react on the freight rates. If I am correctly informed, the extension that has been asked for in this particular case can really be constructed only by the Canadian Pacific Railway. It can, of course, be built by the Canadian National Railways; but, for my part, the National Railways have as many lines on hand as they can operate advantageously, and I would not by any means advise that they should undertake to build any extensions that can be built by anybody else. The Canadian Pacific Railway are simply asking for the usual extension, namely, two years to commence and five years to finish. If the money market should happen to take a turn for the better and they could get their money reasonably, so that they could carry on the construction now under way, they would probably take advantage of the circumstance; because it is my belief that they are just as anxious to build the extension as the people are to have it. The conditions, however, are such that it is not wise on the part of this Government to try to place burdens on the Canadian Pacific Railway or, for that matter, or any other corporation that would compel them to go into the money market and buy money at this particular time, when they would have to pay an extremely high rate of interest for it. In the interest of the western farmers and, indeed, of the people generally, who expect and want cheap transportation, we should give the railways an opportunity to take advantage of the money market when it is favourable, and when they can get their money at a reasonable price. I think the Canadian Pacific Railway has a record in this country that ought to be a fair guarantee that they are not bluffers or slackers, and that they will do their work and do it to advantage, if given a fair opportunity. It is not to the advantage of the western people, nor any other community in the country, that we should force the railways to go into the money market at an inapportune time, because if they have to pay too much for their money the cost will eventually fall upon the people in higher freight rates.

Mr. STEVENS: I want to say a very few words in regard to the bill, which is practically on a par with what I might term a sister bill that was before the House a few days ago. Both of these bills —but I am speaking now more particularly of this one—were, I understand, fully considered and threshed out before the Railway Committee. Now, I do not wish to lecture the House at all, but I would observe that, with the large and well equipped committee which this House has for the consideration of private bills, such as the Banking Committee and the Committee on Railways and Canals, it would seem advisable, unless there is a vital principle at stake, that the decisions of a select standing committee should be accepted, for two reasons: In the first place, before that committee there appear the representatives of those who are interested. I understand, from the reports, that the Railway Committee gave this bill careful consideration. These very proposed amendments were considered by the committee, who decided to report the bill in its present form, or at least with the minor amendments referred to by the Chairman in reading the bill. In the next place, if we brought into the House these matters which are more or less in the nature of details, it would be desirable that the House should have before it in detail all the evidence and the reasons in support of or in opposition to them, just as in the committee. That is what should be done if the House is seriously going to consider from time to time minor amendments of this kind. Now, let us look for a moment at the amendments. As I understand the two amendments, one is to shorten the period of time from two years to one and from five years to three, for commencement and completion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, at all events, that is a matter of detail which the committee itself is more competent to determine than we are in this House, unless we are in a position to hear all the evidence. Now what is the situation? The section of the act which has been referred to by a good many hon. members—

Mr. CARMICHAEL: The hon. member is not speaking to the amendment. He is speaking on the question of time, which is not mentioned in the bill.

Mr. STEVENS: I had passed from that and got to the question of bonds, so that my hon. friend's objection is not well taken.

The CHAIRMAN: The part of the bill which it is proposed to strike out reads:

> —if within the said periods respectively the said lines are not commenced or are not completed or put into operation, the powers of construction conferred upon the company by Parliament shall cease, and be null and void as respects so much of the said lines as shall then remain uncompleted.

The point of time has some relevancy to this particular amendment, as the hon. member will see.

Mr. STEVENS: I so understood it, Mr. Chairman. In regard to such an amendment, the details are certainly more familiar to the Railway Committee than they are to this House, and if the House is to be called upon to determine all matters of detail after a bill has passed through the committee, then I consider we ought to have the same information as was furnished to the committee.

But let me turn for a moment to the question of bond issue. There is a clause in the Railway Act, inserted there a few years ago for a distinct purpose; it refers to the expenditure upon a railway or a branch line of a proportion of the capital stock or the bond issue of the railway company. That clause was inserted because we had a regular epidemic of railway charters. Individuals would get a charter for a railway, and then go out into the market and peddle it, hoping to secure some monetary advantage. This charter mongering, as it was called, became a veritable pest, so Parliament inserted in the Railway Act the clause to which I have referred. During the past few years that condition of affairs has almost, if not entirely, disappeared, and we have to-day but two great railway systems, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific—two enormous corporations controlling virtually all the railways of Canada.

This company and these branch lines are controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway. There was only one criticism that I could direct at the application originally, and that has been taken care of by the committee, namely, the desirability of the Canadian National Railway having running rights over a portion of this line. That was provided for in the amendment now before the committee for adoption. So I think, Mr. Chairman, that it is desirable that we should accept the decision of the Railway Committee except where a matter of vital principle is concerned. I submit that in this case it is rather a matter of opinion after hearing all the evidence in the case which the Railway Committee had the advantage of hearing.

Let me take one further reference. In the course of this discussion some hon. members said that we should apply business principles in dealing with railway matters. We hear that opinion expressed very frequently, and in that connection from time to time the Canadian Pacific Railway is held up as an ideal business institution, which it undoubtedly is. But let us consider this point for a moment. The Canadian Pacific Railway with its enormous ramifications, and with its numerous railway extensions from year to year, cannot provide the necessary appropriations for those extensions in the same year in which it secures the bill for the purpose; it must plan a certain distance ahead. By the time this bill is passed a considerable portion of the season for construction will have passed, and in my estimation it is unreasonable, and has always been considered so, to ask any concern to commence operations within one year and to tie it down to that limited time with any sincerity of belief in its ability to fulfil the obligation.

I must say that this bill is satisfactory, both as regards the period of time and the bond issue, for these two matters are well cared for in the general act and in the method of procedure which has been followed so consistently in the past. Therefore personally I would feel very much disinclined to vote against the report of the committee which has given consideration to this matter after reviewing all the evidence.

Mr. MARTELL: In the Railway Committee I happened to be one of the supporters of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), and in the Committee of the Whole I also supported him, as I agreed to a great extent with what he was asking for. But this House has already twice defeated the motion of my hon. friend, and it seemed to me that on each occasion the majority of the members were in favour of granting this extension. Therefore why should we waste further time in endeavouring to hold up this bill? I have heard the matter debated pro and con, and I still have my own opinion in regard to it, but whilst I disagree with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) that this House should be guided by the report of the Railway Committee, I believe that the House should be supreme and that we should have an opportunity of discussing this bill if we deem it necessary.

Mr. STEVENS: Would my hon. friend permit me to interrupt him? I said we should be guided largely by the committee in matters of detail.

Mr. MARTELL: Yes. But this amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni having been twice defeated, I have only to say that although I voted for him on both occasions, I do not like this factious opposition, and as the majority of the House seem to be in favour of the bill, if the matter is pushed to a vote I shall reverse my former stand and vote for the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: I rise to support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael). I do not believe that any hon. members, unless they have had actual experience of western conditions, can appreciate what railway communication means to settlers in western Canada. We have spent many millions of money to induce immigration, and those who have come to this country have been guided to western Canada, and placed on government land on the assumption and the promise that railroad communication would be provided within a reasonable measure of time. Now, Sir, I can give from actual experience instances in some districts where the people have been ten, fifteen and twenty years on the land without railway communication, and they are anywhere from twenty-five to fifty miles from a railway. What use is it for this country to spend millions of dollars each year to bring in fresh immigrants when we have our old settlers leaving by the hundreds and thousands? I received a letter only the other day from a gentleman in my constituency to this effect:

> If I have two thousand bushels of wheat to haul to the elevator this year, it will take me sixty days in the fall to do so.

You can readily understand that if you take sixty days out of a man's fall work there is practically no possibility of his making a success of farming where he is a long distance from the railway.

I am going to give the House two examples in my own constituency where the Canadian Pacific Railway have not kept faith with the people. Any one who is conversant with the southern part of Alberta knows there is a railway constructed from Lethbridge east to Manyberries. That line was supposed to join up the Canadian Pacific railway in Saskatchewan. Construction was started at both ends, but a section in the middle is not yet completed. In 1916, I believe it was, these two pieces of railway were brought within twenty-eight miles of each other, and the roadbed has been built on something like fourteen miles of that gap. There are 12 or 14 miles of road-bed to complete, and 26 or 28 miles of the steel have yet to be laid. The work, I believe, was done in 1916. You can understand how the settlers feel there, especially those who live at the eastern end of the portion which runs from Lethbridge when they have to pay on the hauling of their grain back to Lethbridge and then by Medicine Hat on the main line of the Canadian Pacific. The people on the other side of the Saskatchewan border who have to get coal from from Lethbridge may have to pay freight on their shipments all the way around from Lethbridge to Medicine Hat and Swift Current and back again to within 110 miles of Lethbridge. Now, I maintain that is a condition of affairs that should not exist and that the House should take into consideration. In the same constituency this company have for some years had a charter for the construction of a road from a place called Leader in Saskatchewan to Pashley in Alberta. They built 25 miles of the line and this 25 miles has been running under construction for a number of years. Hon. members must realize that the construction company are running the trains over that 25 miles of railway, as the road has not yet been taken out of their hands; and the construction company in this case, I believe, is the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. When any of the farmers in that district desire to use the services of this construction company for the hauling of a car of grain or other supplies a distance of 25 miles, the construction company charge them $40 or $50 for that service. It will be seen from these examples, therefore, that we in western Canada do not feel like letting bills of this kind pass without criticism. As a matter of fact, many of the members at this end of the Chamber were elected with a view to their protesting against this system which has been carried on in the past. We are here to protest against it, and that is what we are doing. The time is not far distant when the railway companies which are getting grants of charters will be asked by the House to put up some bond guarantee as an assurance that the lines in question will be constructed within the time stated in the charter. I am satisfied that we have in the past been somewhat too easy in granting those charters and I believe the time is now ripe when the members of the House should see to it that these companies live up to their charters.

Mr. CAHILL: When an hon. member moved in this committee a few days ago to refer a bill back to the Railway Committee I supported the motion because the amendment had been moved in the committee itself, and I thought it was only fair that the bill be returned to it for further consideration. But the purpose of this amendment is to amend the bill in Committee of the Whole rather than to refer it back to the Railway Committee. The amendment has some merit; I am quite ready to agree with my hon. friends opposite who say that the railway companies are getting a little advantage over the act in this particular clause. But that matter also was discussed in the Railway Committee. I had it brought to my attention after the previous bill was placed before this committee that some hon. gentlemen who were opposing it did not understand that the particular clause which was in the bill had the effect of over-riding the Railway Act. But that circumstance does not occur in this case. My recollection is that no such amendment as is now proposed was moved in the Railway Committee. The clause was explained in the Railway Committee, and the committee adopted the bill as it is to-day—that is, with the amendment giving the National Railway the right to run over certain portions of the line. If this committee wishes to change the Railway Act or to over-ride the desires of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National in a clause which they want to insert in the bill, they have a perfect right to do it, either in this committee or in the House. But as the member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) has pointed out, the railway companies, the people who are interested, cannot appear on the floor of the House and argue their point; therefore, I support the bill not as proposed to be amended in Committee of the Whole, but as reported by the Railway Committee.

Mr. LUCAS: Subsection (a) of section 1 of this bill affects the constituency which I have the honour to represent. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) stated that this was a new charter. But this is not the case of a constituency in which the charter for the construction of a railway line has just been granted. I have a paper here from which I will read a heading in order to give you an idea of what the people of that constituency have been led to believe for years with regard to the construction of this line. The paper is dated at Edmonton, September 11, 1912, and it says:

> Construction to commence at once on Bruderheim-Whitford Lake Line.

Now, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are coming back to this Parliament and asking for an extension of charter. I may say that the announcement in this paper to which I refer has reference to the Canadian Northern, which previously had the charter. Owing to the subsequent financial condition of that road, however, they were unable to carry on and the government took the lines over; the Canadian Pacific then came along and secured a charter through this territory. In view of the fact that the Canadian Northern had the charter first, and in order to prevent duplication, a clause was inserted in that charter to the Canadian Pacific granting to the Canadian Northern certain running rights. The clause read:

> Provided that for the purpose of avoiding duplication of construction on that portion of the line west of Lloydminster, the approval of the route map may be made subject to joint construction or operation with the Canadian Northern Railway terms to be agreed upon by the companies or settled by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) tried to convince the committee to-night that the reason these railways were not being built was because of financial conditions. I have here a clipping, Mr. Chairman, dated March 1, 1920, in which the following statement of Mr. D. C. Coleman, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was quoted:

> The railway companies are very much concerned at the moment over the possibility of a shortage of suitable construction and track labour during the coming year, but if anything like an adequate supply of labour is obtainable it is our intention to make a start on the Cutknife Northwesterly lines during the present year.

He made no statement as to difficulties on account of finances; he attributed them entirely to labour. I submit that the labour situation in the country to-day in itself constitutes an ample reason why the railways should start construction at the earliest possible date.

Now, referring back to that clause which has been inserted giving the National Railways and the Canadian Pacific joint running rights, I submit that is one of the reasons why the Canadian Pacific has held back the construction of this road. I have before me an extract from the Edmonton Bulletin of so recent a date as February 14, 1921, which also quotes some remarks made by Mr. Coleman. It states:

> The obstacle standing in the way of the completion of the Cutknife branch, Mr. Coleman explained, was the fact that settlement had not been reached between the C.P.R. and the Canadian National in regard to the latters application for running rights, over the branch from Lloydminster to Whitford Lake. The vital importance of the completion of this branch to the people residing in the territory it would serve was pointed out to Mr. Coleman, who promised that everything would be done by him to bring the matter forward.

Now, I am satisfied the objection has been overcome. The Board of Railway Commissioners have sat and given their decision, and if the matter cannot be agreed upon in a satisfactory way it could be brought to arbitration and ultimately settled by the railway commissioners.

In the district I represent the farmers are hauling their grain from twenty-five to thirty miles and almost every hon. member on this side of the House has been petitioned for his support when this matter came before the House. I know the conditions with which the farmers there are confronted. It is one of the best farming districts in Alberta, and the Canadian Pacific have admitted that there is no deadwood in that line, but that it would be a paying proposition from the very start. I am not here to say anything against the Canadian Pacific. I think we ought all to be proud of what it has done. It has undoubtedly done a great deal for Canada, but at the same time I submit that it has been well paid for everything it has done. They are now asking for this charter. Well, there are always two sides to a bargain, and if the people of this country through their representatives in Parliament grant this company an exclusive right for a certain number of years to build that line of railway, then if another company came along to-morrow after this charter had been granted and offered to build a line of railway there, the Canadian Pacific would say, "No, you people are bound; you have given us a charter." I submit that it should work both ways, and that if the company gets an exclusive charter for a certain number of years, it should not be averse to putting up some guarantee or bond that it will carry out the undertaking.

I think the amendment is a very reasonable one. It does not curtail the time at all, but simply asks the company if it is acting in good faith that it will start construction within the specified time and be prepared to spend a reasonable amount of money. I have therefore much pleasure in supporting the amendment.

Amendment negatived.

SUPPLY

NAVAL SERVICE

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Naval service—to provide for the maintenance of the Royal Canadian Navy, $1,500,000.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, in the course of the debate of last Friday, I made some very short comments on the Government's naval proposals, both as to their purpose and their extent, and by the sentiments I then expressed, though they followed immediately on the minister's address, I still abide. The minister to-day makes some alterations of importance as affecting some of the positions he took in his address of Friday; but as regards the general scope and purpose of his policy not of very great consequence. In the debate then, and now I am afraid, the Government will not have found among the hon. members of this House very much enthusiasm for its naval proposals. Of the hon. members who have spoken some are of opinion that the money voted, and the plans of the Government that the money is intended to realize, are such as to be of no value. Others oppose, because they do not believe in doing anything at all. The only thing there appears to be unanimity on, is that the money to be spent in accordance with the Government's plans will be wasted.

To get a comprehension of the question one does require to have in mind the history of this discussion in this Parliament and country for some years. The Government has not reviewed that discussion, although I think it should have. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) has done so in a way; has done so in his way. I listened to him with interest, and there were some of his comments that were really worth noting. I thought, as he proceeded, that if he had not been so controlled by mad partisanship his common sense on this question would have had some show and might have triumphed.

The question arose first in this House in the session of 1909, when a resolution was proposed by Sir George Foster, now of the Senate. The debate I need not follow, for I do not want to be long. Suffice to say that owing to conditions, more or less serious, then existing, it was felt on both sides that unanimity was desirable, that possibly some sacrifices on both sides might be made to gain it, and a unanimous decision was arrived at embodied in a resolution which I will not at the moment read but to which I will refer hon. members. It appears on page 3566, volume 2 of the Hansard of 1909. Summarizing that resolution, it said that Canada recognized her increasing obligation to take part in the common defence, of this Empire; that a system of periodic and regular contribution to a central navy was not the best system as a permanent policy; but that the House would approve of the creation—the speedy creation—of a Canadian naval service to meet the needs and purposes of the resolution. That was passed unanimously. The following year a Naval Service Act was brought into Parliament by the government of that day—a Naval Service, Act providing for the establishment of a Canadian naval service. Estimates for the purpose of carrying out that policy, aggregating, I think, the figures given by the hon. member for Lunenburg, $3,000,000, were introduced. The opposition of the day opposed that act. The opposition of the day took the ground that conditions had become more and more perilous; that it was evident we could not, under the terms of that act, develop such a trained force here in Canada as the act contemplated, build such a fleet here in Canada as the act contemplated, within such time as would be effective at all to meet the world situation that was impending. Consequently, the opposition suggested that in place of commencing this policy now—without at all opposing it, on the part of its leader at all events, as the right principle for a permanent policy —instead of spending our money that way, under those conditions, we should spend it by way of direct help in order that Canada might do something in time of real assistance to the Empire in the trouble that was felt to be approaching. The government's bill passed. The government, I understand, advertised for tenders for the building of ships. I do not know when the tenders were advertised for: I think in July, 1910, because the bill passed early in that year; but the general election came on the 21st September, 1911, and no tenders whatever had been accepted. In a word, there was nothing done, save the marking of time, up to election day.

Following the election, an Imperial Conference was held, attended by representatives of Canada. The Admiralty laid before the conference certain facts tending to show conference certain facts tending to show the necessity of the whole Empire becoming sufficiently armed as to naval defence.

Mr. CRERAR: What year was that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was in 1912. The Admiralty, as well, laid before the representatives of the government of Canada, and of the Empire, certain additional facts which they did not feel could be made public but which were disclosed to the leader of the Opposition of that day. Upon those facts—based upon the public memorandum, and, as well, upon the undisclosed details—the government came to the conclusion that the only thing that could be done that would in all probability be effective would be to make then such effective addition to the central navy as would enable it better to meet the contingency that it was feared was only too clearly impending. No one contended even then that the war that later came was any certainty, that it was inevitable in any way; but the conduct of Germany was such that there was reason to fear danger in the not distant future. The government, therefore, proposed to Parliament the provision of funds to construct three capital ships, those ships to be owned by the Dominion of Canada, to be at the disposal of the British navy, subject to recall at any time by this Dominion, and to add to its effective fighting strength; and proposed that in the meantime—while we made that expenditure which was estimated to be in the neighbourhood of thirty or thirty-five million dollars—definite action for the creation of a Canadian naval service might well wait. We took that course. I was not a member of the administration, but the government took that course in the belief that only in that way could effective assistance be rendered in time; but the leader of the government at no time in his public career ever made any assertion hostile to the idea of a Canadian naval service as a permanent policy for this country.

The opposition of the day opposed that measure. The opposition moved an amendment—Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved it himself—an amendment which, along the lines of the resolution of 1909, admitted frankly the responsibility of this country, admitted our moral obligation to co-operate in the matter of naval defence, but set its words against the terms of the government's proposal, and proposed instead the creation of two fleet units—one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific—under the Naval Service Act of 1910, in that way fulfilling, as they felt, the obligations of this country.

The arguments against that are the ones I have so very briefly set out, namely that it could not be done, the men could not be trained nor could the ships be built for the purpose, as it provided, in Canada, in any time that would likely be at all early enough to meet the emergency that was felt to be near. The government's policy was carried in the Commons and was defeated in the Senate. That debate was in 1913, and was perhaps the most momenous, from many respects, of any that ever took place in Parliament. In 1914, the year following, the war broke out. I am not making any boast as to the course the government pursued, it being vindicated by that war. If the war had never broken out, it would not have reflected upon the bona fides, nor upon the judgment of the administration. The fact is that the war did break out, and that if we had commenced in 1910 even, the creation of a naval service, under all the authorities that have had any experience in this matter, we could not have arrived at any effective service by the time the war did break out. Much less could we have done it if we had commenced in 1912 or 1914. However, in that position we confronted the struggle.

The next incident that took place of consequence was, I think, in the year 1918. I am not purposely omitting anything. I do not recall any consequential matter in the meantime. In 1918 the subject again came before the Imperial Conference. In that year the Admiralty presented a memorandum which I have not seen recently, but which, no doubt, is on record in this House, setting out the great advantages from a strategical standpoint of a central navy, and its great advantages, as well, from an economic standpoint. The representatives of the overseas dominions, however, felt that there were difficulties in the way of accepting the Admiralty's conclusions and putting them into realization in the dominions, because of strong local feeling there existing, and, as a consequence, there was presented to that conference, on behalf of the representatives of the overseas dominions, by Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister of Canada, a memorandum embodying the conclusions of those ministers. That appears in Hansard of the 27th of April, 1921. I have no doubt it appears sooner, but in the debate of that day it was quoted by myself, and may be seen in the speech that I made then. That was a debate on the subject of my duty, when I should go later to represent this country at the Overseas Conference. I think it is of sufficient importance that I read that memorandum to this House. It is at page 2640 and reads as follows:

> The Dominion ministers, having considered the Admiralty Memorandum of May 17, 1918, on the Naval Defence of the British Empire, which was circulated to the Imperial War Conference, 1918, submit the following conclusions and observations:
> 1. The proposals set forth in the Admiralty Memorandum for a single navy at all times under a central naval authority are not considered practicable.
>
> 2. Purely from the standpoint of naval strategy the reasons thus put forward for the establishment of a single navy for the Empire under a central naval authority, are strong but unanswerable. The experience gained in this war has shown that in time of war a Dominion navy (e.g. of Australia) can operate with the highest efficiency as part of a united navy under one direction and command established after the outbreak of the war.
>
> 3. It is thoroughly recognized that the character of construction, armament and equipment, and the methods and principles of training, administration and organization, should proceed upon the same lines in all the navies of the Empire. This policy has already been followed in those Dominions which have established naval forces.
>
> 4. For this purpose the Dominions would welcome visits from a highly qualified representative of the Admiralty who, by reason of his ability and experience, would be thoroughly competent to advise the naval authorities of the Dominions in such matters.
> 5. As naval forces come to be developed upon a considerable scale by the Dominions it may be necessary hereafter to consider the establishment for war purposes of some supreme naval authority upon which each of the Dominions would be adequately represented.

That as I said, was presented on behalf of the overseas dominions. The war, of course, not being at an end, no definite step was taken. A year ago last fall, the Prime Minister of Great Britain suggested a further Imperial Conference, or rather a conference of Prime Ministers. The telegram of invitation suggested certain subjects inclusive of the discussion of the wisdom of renewing the Japanese Treaty, and year following, was broke out. I am other matters connected with foreign policies. Subsequently the Prime Minister of Great Britain suggested further subjects among others, the question of naval, military and air defence. The invitation of the Prime Minister was accepted. A debate took place in this House on April 27, 1921, the government having fixed a day on which members of the House might express freely their views as to what should be the course of Canada's representatives at the conference. In the course of that debate reference was made again to the memorandum I have just read, the terms of which, upon the return of our representatives in 1918, were laid before the House, and as respects which, so far as my memory goes, there has been no adverse criticism in this Parliament. In the course of that debate the subject of naval, military and air defence came up. A motion was moved by the then leader of the opposition, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), embodying instructions to Canada's representative, that on no account was he to bind this country to any further naval or military expenditures. That resolution was resisted by the government on the ground that instructions to representatives at a conference were inconsistent with the very purpose and character of such an assembly; and that if that principle were followed by other countries, if their representatives were all to be shackled and bound in advance, then there would be no value in the conference. That resolution was defeated. In the debate I emphasized the view that there could not be any effective discussion of the naval question at that conference because, first of all, I was of the impression that the conference called was of the nature of a conference of Prime Ministers akin to the Imperial War Cabinet that had sat during the war, and that naval questions were more properly taken up at Imperial conferences proper, where matters affecting the dominions, in a domestic sense, came under review. Further, I expressed the view—and this was the argument which I emphasized repeatedly —that while the nations of the world were then groping, it was true, somewhat in the dark, but groping nevertheless, to come to some understanding by which the whole world burden of armaments could be reduced. I felt that until those efforts should have reached some fruition, and we would know what were to be the aggregate responsibilities thereafter of our Empire, we could not with advantage debate the question of naval defence. In the course of that conference, —though I am not at liberty to give the discussions, I am free to give the conclusions and such discussions as are revealed in the official document filed—a resolution was arrived at which, I may suggest, fairly well embodies the sentiments that I expressed in the debate in this House on the 27th of April preceding. That resolution I read to the House on Friday last. It is so pertinent that it should be read again.

> That while recognizing the necessity of co-operation among the various portions of the Empire to provide such naval defence as may prove to be essential for security, and while holding that equality with the naval strength of any other power is the minimum standard for that purpose, this conference is of the opinion that the method and expense of such co-operation are matters for the final determination of the several Parliaments concerned. And, second, that any recommendations thereon should be deferred until after the coming conference on disarmament.

Prior to the adoption of that resolution a prolonged debate had taken place on the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese Treaty. I may refer to a partial consequence thereof. Perhaps I should not use the word "consequence". Let me merely say that following the debate, after the debate, whichever way you choose to put it, the notable invitation came from President Harding for a conference on disarmament. That invitation was accepted with alacrity by Great Britain, following a most favourable reception at the hands of the conference itself. The disarmament conference, therefore, had been fixed, and in that way machinery was open by which there might be a consummation of the great longings of the powers that there should be some arrangement by which armaments could be reduced.

It is not out of place to interject here the observation that we get nowhere in these discussions by merely expressing an aspiration, a vague sigh and hope, that the nations may cease to do battle in the arbitrament of rights. We do not reach out any distance towards armament reduction by merely throwing down our own arms and leaving ourselves at the mercy of those who do not. The sane nation, the wise nation, the nation that deserves the right to that appellation, seeks to the utmost of its powers, by coming to terms of agreement with other great nations of the world to make it possible, compatible with its own safety, to reduce its weapons of defence and then manfully carries the burden so reduced. That is the course which this Empire has pursued. I venture to say that of all the nations of the world, of this day or of any previous day, no one has ever struggled harder than has Great Britain, in the years before the war and in the years since, to bring about this much desired result. And of all the nations of this Empire there is none that has contributed more sincerely and ardently, and certainly —without the lightest thought of boasting— more effectively than Canada has done to help the Empire towards that end.

The disarmament conference at Washington is the longest step that has ever been taken by the advanced nations of this world towards the practicable goal of disarmament. As a result of that conference, the possibilities outlined by the minister himself (Mr. Graham) in his speech of last Friday, have been arrived at. Great Britain is able to reduce her capital ships by, I think, twenty-three or twenty-four; and the United States, by the abandonment of projected vessels and vessels under construction, and by the scrapping of vessels prior to certain types, is also able to reduce her capital ship strength by, I believe, twenty-eight. The three great leading powers of the world, Britain, the United States and Japan—I do not omit France out of any feeling that she is not a great power, but her position is very much weakened by reason of the war, which we all undoubtedly deeply regret—came to a definite understanding as to ratio, an understanding which is the very heart and centre of the agreement arrived at,—that ratio being five, five and three in capital vessels, the complement or what might be termed supplementary vessels to be proportionate to the capital ships of each nation. That has been made possible as a consequence of the disarmament conference; therefore we know now the residuum, the aggregate responsibility for naval defence that rests upon the British Empire. We know now the point up to which we must go, and beyond which we cannot proceed. Therefore, we are in possession of the facts, to determine what are the duties of the Dominion in the premises, and what course it should pursue.

Now, the question arises: What is our duty? What is our obligation? Well, in the first place, I submit that we have an obligation. I do not know whether anyone disputes the fact or not. If anyone disputes it to-day, I am not aware of anyone who disputed it in April, 1909. The resolution unanimously agreed to in this House in 1909 acknowledged the obligation of this country. The very commencement of the resolution recited that obligation. But we do not need resolutions to enable us to understand our obligations. If in this world we receive the advantage of services rendered, it follows, I think, in the mind of honest people, that we should contribute either to those services or to their upkeep. That we do receive to-day and have received through all our history the advantages of the British navy as a great public service, there is no room for doubt —no room for dispute at all.

[Mr. Meighen.]

The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) stated this afternoon that even in the late war, he, a citizen of Nova Scotia, residing on the Atlantic coast, had no fears at all. "Why," he said, "though the war raged around I sat there under my vine and fig tree and no man made me afraid." Why was that? The hon. member knows why it was. He rested in that security just for the reason that we all rested in the same position, just for the reason that many of the nations of this world, wholly independent of the British Crown, rested in like security—the reason being the strength, the power and the purpose of the navy of Great Britain.

While Canada was a growing nation we made no effort whatever to assist in that form of defence. We accepted the results with the feeling that we had some obligation to bear a share. But that feeling did not bring practical results; it was a matter of growth, of continuous and increasing realization, and the formal acknowledgment came in the resolution of this Parliament unanimously passed in 1909. Consequently we recognize the obligation. We do not recognize it as a contractual obligation; it never was, it is not such to-day. We recognize it as a moral obligation binding upon us.

The method by which we fulfil that obligation, whether by co-operation through the construction and manning vessels of our own, or by assistance to a central navy—is for the choice of the people of this country through their Parliament in the light of the best opinion we can gather. The method is for us to choose, the extent we are to go is for us to choose; always it has been so, it is so to-day.

There has been difference of opinion as to what method we should follow; there has been difference of opinion even dividing parties in this House, but on the part of Canadians worthy the name and regardless of party there has been no difference of opinion as to the obligation itself.

Now, I venture to suggest that with that obligation existing, we cannot do justice to our own people, we cannot do justice to the manhood of this country, we cannot do justice to the children of this country, if we as a nation lie under a manifest moral obligation and refuse to do anything towards its discharge. The nation that plays the part of a poltroon and sponger in the life of the world will find that conduct reflected in the moral character of its people and in the estimation in which it is held abroad.

Had it not been for the belief in the imminence of war I do not doubt at all that this country would without serious party division have come to an effective conclusion as to the right line of naval policy. The belief in the imminence of war, and the difference of opinion that that involved, had the effect of severing us as to the best method to be adopted. Now that the war is past and we are in a position to lay down the lines of a permanent policy, the reasons for that division have disappeared.

We have now passed every emergency that then threatened us, but that there is no possibility of any future danger surely those who profess the truth will not contend. When we see Britain taking upon herself the obligation she does; when we saw the United States, prior to that conference, entering upon a squarely designed programme to surpass all the nations of the world; yes, when we see France to-day, even by the press of to-night bringing down a programme of naval construction and maintenance, exceeding by $69,000,000 her programme of last year, it begins to dawn upon us that we may be a little premature in concluding that the great new social order has arrived, and that the possibility of war has gone.

The duty of this country to-day is to devise a method of carrying out its just obligation in the light of existing conditions, and the question before this committee is whether or not the proposals of the Government fulfil this obligation. I purpose to inquire very briefly whether they do or not.

It is necessary to say first, that after the war in 1920 the ships that we had during the war were manifestly unsuited by that time for any purpose at all. I do not wish to enter into any controversy now as to the value of the ships that were bought in 1910—the Niobe and the Rainbow. It would not be inconsistent with argument ot assume that they were of some value then, but, they were of no value in 1920, and even long before that year—that is, of no practical value as a nucleus for a navy, and virtually of no value even for training purposes. So putting aside matters of controversy that do not affect the issue now at all, let us come to 1920. Feeling that we necessarily must commence some training, knowing what the other dominions of the Empire were doing, knowing what the Mother Country was doing, we accepted from Great Britain a free gift, not of obsolete vessels at all, but of oil-burning vessels of the most modern type. We accepted the Aurora, built in 1914, an oil-burning cruiser; then we accepted two oil-burning torpedo destroyers, built in 1916, and two submarines, built either then or later.

I do not say there was an express undertaking with Great Britain, but as a matter of deliberate policy for ourselves we undertook to utilize those ships and to train upon them as best we could the personnel of a navy for this country. We undertook that and no more, because we felt that the time was coming, either through the League of Nations or otherwise, when the great powers would be able to agree to a reduction of armaments and thereby we would know what the obligations of the various nations were to be.

We started in this way, completed the complement of those vessels, and proceded to the work of training our young navy. The hon. member for Lunenburg endeavours to make fun of that navy. He says, "What use were those boats for guarding our seas? Why they took a trip down through the Panama canal and cruised around the west coast of Canada. They were not guarding our shores at all." He seems to think they were only utilized for joyrides for the seamen, or as spectacles for our population to gaze upon.

Now, let me put it to the hon. member for Lunenburg: Shores need to be guarded when they are attacked. Men need to be trained upon their ships when there is no attack—trained in time of peace for the purpose of meeting peril if peril comes. Does the hon. member think that the Royal Navy of Great Britain is strung around the British Isles watching for some hostile ship to fire a shot? Is the United States navy stationed at some short distance from the shores of that country, the ships a few flags apart, watching there for fear some hostile vessel may steam upon her shores? That is not what their navy is doing. Those navies were doing just what the navy of this country has been doing. They were training, they were steaming; they were proceeding to various portions of the world. The United States navy was doing that; the Royal navy does it continually. And I say this, without having looked at the records very lately —but I say it with considerable confidence: what we did was under recommendation as a good and effective way to serve the purposes for which the navy existed.

Mr. DUFF: Will my right hon. friend permit me a question, as he seems to address his remarks to me? Does the whole British navy and the whole United States navy leave the British Isles and the United States coasts respectively and go about all over the world?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know whether it does or not.

Mr. DUFF: Did not the Canadian navy do that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am very sure that more of the British navy does, than ever does of ours. This naval complement we accepted, of very considerable value—of certainly marked value for training purposes. That task and duty we fulfilled, abiding the day when we would know what the aggregate obligations of the Empire were. Now that time has come, and the Government of the day comes to Parliament and says that our full duty under those aggregate obligations is to spend a million and one half dollars to scrap one ship—the Aurora—or to tie it to anchor, lock it in the stable or hand it back; to scrap the two submarines, or hand them back. First of all their suggestion was to scrap the other two as well and establish in their place one ship on the west coast and one on the east, a small vessel on each, to be surrounded by two trawlers of 450 tons, these to constitute the naval service of this country,—the trawlers on the west coast to go up in the Behring sea to protect pelagic sealing. My hon. friend corrects me? He feels that it is quite the proper course for the Canadian navy to protect seals, but not to protect fish?

Mr. DUFF: If my right hon. friend will allow me, I said distinctly this afternoon that I did not think the Canadian navy should be used to protect the seal fisheries; that that was the duty of the Fisheries Protection service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend is right; he said that this afternoon. The minister said the purpose of these trawlers was to protect pelagic sealing around the Behring sea.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, I did not say that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understood the minister to say so.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say it was the purpose; I said that was one of the duties that one of these trawlers could perform. There is a marked difference.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, if it is, I would consider it was a purpose.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will my right hon. friend allow me, now, so that we can just put it straight? It might be one of the purposes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is all right. Is not the minister afraid that while these trawlers are up watching the seals in the Behring sea, the hon. member for Lunenburg will be standing up and objecting that our shores are not guarded at all?

Mr. DUFF: Do not worry a bit.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A million and a half to train men, he says, for two or three weeks, partly on land, an hour a day, and partly on ships. They are to go out for a very few days, he says, and come back, and that training is to be merely by way of pastime during holidays; it is to take no boy or young man from his regular work; thereby we are to develop a naval service for this country. Does the minister know of any nation in the civilized world that ever adopted that plan to develop a naval service? I venture to say that even the little country of Switzerland never followed a course like that, though it lies in the lap of Europe, away from the sea, nestling in the Alps.

Mr. VIEN: There is no navy in Switzerland.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. They depend on other nations protecting them and I believe the hon. member for Lotbinière would have us follow the example of Switzerland and have no navy either.

What are the proposals of the minister tonight. A million and one half for two trawlers on one coast and two on another, these to be headed by one torpedo boat destroyer on one coast and one on another. There is to be no continuous training at all, though it is a fact, as the minister knows—and no one can know better, if he has consulted with his experts—that to develop a seaman for the purposes of a naval service you require not weeks, not months; you require years of continuous application. You require to make it a life work; otherwise there can be no naval service at all.

Now, what is the position of this country? The aggregate obligation of Great Britain, after you accept a reduction possible this year, as stated by the hon. member for Lunenburg—and that reduction is even more than the hon. member stated, but I know he did not intend to understate it at all—with that reduction as stated by the hon. member, the aggregate obligation of Great Britain will be in the neighborhood of $400,000,000 upon a little over 40,000,000 people or approximately $10 per head for every man, woman and child of the population of those islands. That will be the residuum after she has exhausted her efforts, assisted by this country and by every other country whose assistance she could garner, to reduce this obligation to the very minimum.

Now the minister in his address the other night expressed more than once his belief in the necessity of reduction consistent with safety and with national dignity. Mr. Chairman I do not stand as much on national dignity as some men; I would have been fully satisfied if the minister had stopped with "consistent with safety". When a nation has armaments reasonably consistent with safety, then there is consistency with national dignity, at all events to suit me. When you go as far as necessary for safety under world conditions you have gone all the length you need go for the purposes of national dignity.

Britain feels that for the purposes of safety she must maintain, a single-power standard. She cannot afford to go below it. To do so—and she was recognized by all the nations of the world at Washington as being right in her decision not to go below a single-power standard—to do so she is called upon to expend in the neighborhood of $400,000,000. That is the position Great Britain is in. Great Britain be it remembered, until a very few years ago, being an island Empire, having responsibilities in every part of the globe—here and in the Southern seas and all over the world—Great Britain felt that in her peculiar position she could not be safe under less than a two-power standard. She was compelled to abandon that position some years ago. She adopted a 60 per cent defence standard—that is, over the next highest power, but for reasons good to her—doubtless owing in the main to the destruction of the German navy, Britain receded from that resolve and adopted a one-power standard. I am sure there is no citizen of Canada, there is no citizen of the dominions of the Empire, who would for one moment question the claim on the part of Great Britain that it is absolutely essential for her security that a one-power standard be maintained. Is Britain, in a naval sense, to pass to the standing of a second rate power? If she does, are we not affected just the same as the people of the British Isles? If Britain passes below the one-power standard and other nations in naval matters get ahead of her—these same nations being much stronger than she is in military organization—then where has the security of this Empire gone? Consequently, she is determined that a one-power standard must be maintained, with the acquiescence of every dominion of this Empire, and to do so she binds her people to an annual taxation approximating $400,000,000. That is the position of the Mother Country. What is the position of the other dominions? Australia has been expending on naval defence at the rate of $14,062,500; that is for the year before last; I have not last year's figures here. Fourteen million odd dollars for a population of five millions. New Zealand has been expending on naval defence $1,088,400 odd for a population of 1,200,000 people.

Mr. VIEN: Would the hon. gentleman assimilate the position of New Zealand or Australia to that of Canada in respect of naval defence?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member means would I compare?

Mr. VIEN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is this difference. We in Canada are nearer to Britain and nearer therefore to Britain's Royal navy, and on that account more secure. There is that difference all right. We perhaps if we are of the character to follow such a course, could rest with greater security on the back of the taxpayer of Great Britain. Australia has been spending for purposes of defence at the rate of $6.13 per capita. She has been spending for purposes of the navy $14,000,000 odd, or at the rate of about $2.80 per capita. The proposals of this Government are to spend in Canada $1,500,000, or at the rate of 17 cents per capita—$2.80 in Australia, and 17 cents in Canada, $2.80 in Australia for purposes of real training, for effective purposes, and 17 cents in Canada, wasted on services that cannot produce a man for the navy or an effective vessel for defence.

South Africa does not distribute between her naval defence and her other defences but her expenditure per capita for all defence is $5.55 as against Canada's for all purposes of $1.69. That is the difference between the Union of South Africa and the Dominion of Canada, though the Union of South Africa is a far younger nation than we are, having progressed only ten or fifteen years in its national life, while we are in the fifty-fourth or fifty-fifth year of our national existence. That is how we compare with these other dominions.

Last year, even under the proposals then there might have been something in the criticism of the hon. member for Lunenburg that they were so low as to be criticisable on the score of ineffectiveness; no man with any knowledge of the subject could criticise them on the score of extravagance. But to-day the minister comes here, under pressure, I believe because I think I know the minister, and I would do him the credit of saying I do not believe these proposals reflect his mind, reflect his sense of Canadian manhood, reflect his sense of British citizenship—

An hon. MEMBER: Do not cry.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That comes from the hon. member from Quebec.

Mr. POWER: I did not say anything.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is the hon. gentleman referring to me?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, but I would be prepared to if the hon. member wants to say anything. I was referring to the hon. member for Quebec South.

Let me put the minister's position in the light of our obligations both within this Empire and before the world. If it is the British navy that makes us safe, is there not some obligation on the part of this country to do something to assist the British navy, either by some navy of our own or otherwise? Is there not? How does the minister argue his own mind out of that position? I do not think he does argue his own mind out of that position. I think the minister is under pressure from certain sources in this country, under dictation from them, that compels him to come down and present this miserable policy to the Parliament of Canada. His policy is the triumph of Bourassaism in this country.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Would the hon. gentleman inform the House and the country what sources he thinks are influencing the minister?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought I had pretty well, in the last sentence.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): You made a lot of innuendoes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. member has anything of importance to suggest—

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Do not play the baby. Answer the question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does the hon. member say? He cannot address those words to me. I will not adopt his style, or use the hon. member's term. Both are unworthy of Parliament.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Why do you not answer the question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did. I stated the section that I believed dictated this policy, that had triumphed in the determination of the Government to present this policy to Parliament.

Mr. GRAHAM: They did in 1911, but not now.

Mr. VIEN: It was your unholy alliance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am glad to give hon. gentlemen the opportunity to cheer. In 1911 I know, and I do not seek to blink this at all, that there were opponents both to the naval policy of the government and to the naval policy of the opposition in this country, who did not want to do anything whatsoever. I am aware of that. I am aware they elected members to this House. But I am aware as well that their policy found no reflection whatever in the policy the government of that day brought down to Parliament. The hon. member laughs. Does he say that a policy of constructing and placing within the British navy three capital ships was a policy that reflected in any degree the wishes of those men?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): They kept you in power.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has asked me a question and I suppose he expects an answer. The policy of those men he refers to was reflected in the fact that after 1911 the then government, with the aid of the anti-British refused to carry out the decision by Parliament to have a Canadian navy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I answer it was reflected in no such way, because the same element was even more determinedly opposed to the three capital ships than to the Canadian navy.

Mr. GRAHAM: And they were in the government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member knows that there were none in the government opposed to that course. The government stood as a unit for that course, and the government came—

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): What about Nantel?

Mr. MEIGHEN: —and proposed three capital ships. I am speaking of policies of governments, proposals of governments to this House. I want to reason this matter.

Mr. VIEN: You spoke of Bourassa.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I say that this reduction at this time does reflect the triumph of that element in this country.

Mr. VIEN: Not at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member says "Not at all". What element does it reflect?

Mr. VIEN: Common sense.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Common sense? Very well. The hon. member believes this is common sense; he is welcome to his belief. The hon. member then has not much confidence in the common sense of his late chief who, in 1913, proposed as a permanent policy of this country the establishment of fleet units on both coasts that would have cost sums transcending this ten times over —in actual upkeep.

An hon. MEMBER: That was before the war.

Mr. VIEN: The year 1913 and the years 1921 and 1922 are quite different.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know they are. I know they are quite different; quite different on the part of hon. members opposite too. There is this fact: In 1913—it is true it was before the war—but the policy was proposed by those who asserted that there was no such thing as emergency at all. I can bring the hon. member quotation after quotation showing that it was asserted time and again that they were laying this down not out of any fear of immediate conditions, but as an incident to the nationhood of Canada; that Canada could not assert in one breath that she was a nation with the responsibilities of a nation, and in the next breath assert that she would not make plans for naval defence. Such was the principle outlined by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and there was much to support that principle. The only reason it was opposed was this: We believed there was danger, and grave danger, and that if we waited to construct and equip fleet units we would really contribute nothing to meet that danger at all. As a matter of permanent policy this can be said for the course pursued by the then leader of my hon. friend: It was of a magnitude and on a scale worthy of this country.

Mr. VIEN: My hon. friend is wrong in this because the policy to which he refers was referred to by him and his associates as "a tin pot navy".

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, I agree. The policy of leaving the Naval Service Act out of operation virtually till September, 1911, and buying only those two little ships was wholly ineffective and was not improperly described as a tin pot navy policy; but the policy proposed by my hon. friend's leader in 1913, and I distinctly referred to the date, was on a scale and of a character which, had it not been for the circumstances as we believed, of emergency, was worthy of this Dominion and this nation.

Mr. MARTELL: Was not my hon. friend insistent against that policy, and was he not aided by the Nationalists?

Mr. MEIGHEN: For the reason just given I was against it. I certainly was not assisted.

An hon. MEMBER: The campaign was financed by your party.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So far as in my power I took care that there was no weakening in policy, out of deference to any section and I would like hon. members opposite to follow that course to-day. It is steadfast policy by governments that counts. It is the policy of this Government that I condemn to-night as unworthy of our country; as tending to put us in the position of free boarders within this Empire; as refusing to do what we ought to do, as an autonomous nation under the British Crown.

Mr. DUFF: May I ask the right hon. gentleman a question? just there? Is it not a fact that in 1911 when the Liberal party went out of power they had spent $3,000,000 that year towards the naval policy of Canada; and is it not a fact that in the 1912 session of Parliament the government led by Sir Robert Borden, of which the leader of the Opposition was a member, reduced that estimate to $1,000,000?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes that is a fact; or rather that is not exactly a fact, but what the hon. member seeks to bring out is true. The $3,000,000 was in the estimates in 1911.

Mr. DUFF: And the year previous?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have the exact figures. In 1910-11, the expenditure was $2,256,709; in 1911-12, $1,901,494; in 1912-13-14, $2,086,049.

Mr. DUFF: I am afraid the right hon. gentleman has added a number of items connected with the fisheries to that sum; they were all under the naval service. The amount I gave was the actual amount for the naval service. What the hon. gentleman has been giving is the expenditure for the naval service and for fisheries protection, to that his figures are not correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not sure of that.

Mr. DUFF: Well, that is the fact.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member probably knows that this includes fisheries protection expenditure?

Mr. DUFF: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well, it will bring the amount down to less than what the hon. member says.

Mr. DUFF: If the leader of the Opposition will pardon me, what I want to say is this: The Liberal party, the last year they were in power, spent $3,000,000 for what is known as the Canadian navy. The Borden government the first year they came into power reduced that amount by $2,000,000, to $1,000,000, which shows quite conclusively that they were not in favour of a Canadian navy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not correct. I am only correcting the figures for the purpose of accuracy, not for the purpose of defeating the hon. gentleman's point, because as he conceives it, it is right; They spent for all purposes in 1910-11, $2,256,709. Something less, but not so much less was spent in 1912-13, and in 1913-14 for that purpose. But suppose we agree there was less spent on the Canadian navy by the government of Sir Robert Borden than by the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier the reason was this: The government of Sir Robert Borden felt that we could not reach actual results in time that way, and that the right course was to do something immediate and effective, and therefore we proposed to build the three capital ships as part of the British navy. That is the reason there was a reduction in those estimates. But what I put to the hon. member is this: If it took to maintain the Niobe and the Rainbow—the little service that was got together in 1910—if it took $2,256,709 under the cost conditions that then prevailed, what does the hon. member hope to secure with $1,500,000 under the cost conditions that obtain to-day? The hon. member, however, is not inconsistent in his point; he says we cannot get anything.

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear; very little.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I believe he is a better judge than I. According to my light I think it is worthless; but what I do not understand about the hon. member is this: He says that $2,500,000 last year was so small that it was ineffective and useless, but he says that he will support $1,500,000 although it is less than $2,500,000; and the reason is that he hopes the minister will not spend it. The hon. member nods his head.

Mr. DUFF: Quite right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I must compliment him on the strength of the party tie that binds him.

Mr. DUFF: I may say to the leader of the Opposition that I can split hairs as well as he can.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, I do not know that voting for worthless expenditure is splitting hairs, but if such is the consummation of the art I decline to follow the hon. member to that end.

Mr. DUFF: I would not like you to follow me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not care for my hon. friend to do so. If we are going to take this step I submit this to the minister: Let us drop the million and a half. What is the value of spending a million and a half in the way he proposes to spend it? If we cannot do something that is of some real value then let us do nothing at all. Do not let us pretend to be carrying our obligation when, in fact, we are not carrying it in any sense. Let me put this as well: If the Government believes the majority of the people of this country want us to follow this course and do nothing in relation to defence, then in the name of honour and of decency let us step outside of the field of Empire altogether and get on our own feet.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How can we stay and hold our heads up within the circle of the Empire and refuse to bear anything like a commensurate share of the cost of the Empire's defence, as the other dominions are doing? Do not let any one say that I favour stepping out. No one values British connection more than I do. But British connection is of value and something to be proud of if we rise to its responsibilities, as well as accept its advantages. There are those who say, "Oh, we are in favour of British connection because of the traditions of Great Britain, because of this and that other glory of Great Britain", but who follow by the assertion that we cannot pay any money in discharge of the responsibilities that undoubtedly are incident to British connections, responsibilities far less than we would have had to discharge if we stood independent as a nation—far less than our corresponding obligations would be as an independent nation. "Oh" they say "if we do anything in the way of assisting, in national defence, that is Imperialism" and they turn in holy scorn from the very thought of "Imperialism". But they say "nevertheless though we do not do anything we want British connection", and they call that loyalty. That definition of loyalty I do not understand. I do not argue that we as a Dominion ought to assist on a scale commensurate with our population, either by way of service of our own, or assistance in any othre form. Great Britain has responsibilities in respect of crown colonies, and I do not think there are any anyway who would not acknowledge that her responsibilitiy per capita is justly greater than ours. Surely on the other hand no one will urge that 17 cents per capita for the Canadian people is fair assistance on our part, when the burden resting on England is something like $10 a head for the people of that country. I oppose the minister's proposal on the score, first in view of the plan he has revealed, and on the score that it is incompatible with the maintenance of the honour and self respect of this Canadian nation as an integral part of the Empire.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My right hon. friend who has just resumed his seat has said, and I think quite rightly, that this question cannot properly be appreciated without some review of the history of the naval policy, and of the discussion which has taken place in regard to it. He says that the Government had not reviewed the discussion, though he thought they should have. I hope my right hon. friend did not feel that, after he had sat down, the last word would have been spoken, because, while he did review the discussion to a certain extent, he left some material parts untouched. Possibly, I may find it necessary to review this question a little more at length than would have been necessary had my hon. friend not sought to have the House believe that he was covering all aspects of it. He very properly went back to the resolution of 1909, which was unanimously adopted in this House as the basis of the naval policy. He said he would not read the resolution to the House, but would quote the substance of it. I noticed in his quotation a particular phrase, whether it had any significance or not I could not say, but I doubt if it will be found in the resolution itself. It was to the effect that this Parliament recognized an obligation in the nature of the common defence of the Empire. That was the expression he used. I am not saying whether that obligation exists or not, but I shall read the exact words of the resolution so that the House may have its exact terms before it. The resolution reads:

> The House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada, as they increase in numbers and wealth, to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.
> The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the mother country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the Imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.
>
> The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian Naval Service in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial Navy along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial Conference and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the Empire, and the peace of the world.
> The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever the need arises the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the Imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour of the Empire.

That was the resolution accepted unanimously in this House, providing for the establishment of a Canadian naval service, and setting forth that whatever might be done in connection with the Canadian naval service should be in close relationship with the British Admiralty, and along the lines of decisions that had been reached at an Imperial Conference. The outcome of that resolution was the act respecting the naval service, which was assented to on May 4, 1910. I have a copy of that act in my hand, and looking it over I think I am right in saying that it has in view four main objectives. The first is the provision for a Department of Naval Service and the administration of that department. The second makes provision for a naval reserve force. The third makes provision for a naval volunteer force, the organizing and maintaining of a force to be called the Naval Volunteer Force. The fourth provision, which is an important one, is that in times of emergency the naval service and the members of the naval forces I have spoken of may be placed by the Governor in Council at the disposal of the British Admiralty. That was the law passed in May, 1910, by the then Liberal administration. That law embodies the Liberal policy as it was stated at that time, and as we are standing for it to-day. There has never been a party which had greater reason to feel proud of its policy, more able to say that its policy had been vindicated by the facts of history at every turn, and that it was a wise and prudent policy in every particular, than the Liberal party in regard to its naval policy.

My right hon. friend said that after the Naval Service Act had been passed the Liberal party, in other words, the Government of the day, had done nothing save the marking of time, up to election day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Two ships, the Rainbow and the Niobe.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let us see about the marking of time and make a comparison based upon facts as to what was done. Here is the record of the Liberal Administration while in power. The Naval Service Act was passed on May 4, 1910. Immediately, a deputy minister of the department was appointed, and steps were taken to organize the department in its different details. On the 8th July advertisements were inserted in the leading newspapers of Canada for the construction of vessels for the Canadian navy. Canadian and British firms were invited to tender. On August 18 the second-class cruiser, the Rainbow, which had previously been purchased by the Canadian government from the British Admiralty for use as a training ship on the Pacific, sailed from England and arrived at Esquimalt on Nov. 7. On October 10 the first-class cruiser Niobe, previously purchased from the British Admiralty by the Canadian government for use as a training ship on the Atlantic sailed from England and arrived at Halifax on October 21.

Recruiting for both the Rainbow and the Niobe started on their arrival, also the organisation of the dockyard at Halifax. According to the report of the Deputy Minister of the Department of Naval Service for the year ending March 31st, 1911, recruiting was satisfactory and the complement of the Niobe was practically complete on that date. There were still a few vacancies on the Rainbow. By January 19th the Naval College at Halifax was formally opened. On May 1st, tenders, in accordance with the advertisement and information furnished, were received by the government of Canada from several firms. On May 12th, the Hon. L. P. Brodeur, Minister of the Department of Naval Service, sailed for England to attend a subsidiary conference of the Imperial Conference on Naval Defence. On June 29th, an agreement was concluded between the British Admiralty and representatives of the Dominions of Canada and Australia, respecting the control of the naval service and forces of the Dominions of Canada and Australia, setting forth the limits of the Canadian and Australian naval stations respectively. On July 16th, the Hon. Mr. Brodeur, returned to Canada. Then on July 29th, the Canadian Parliament was dissolved and on September 21st the Dominion general elections were held.

Because of the impending elections, the Prime Minister of the day, (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), with the high sense of honour that characterized him, felt that it would not be proper to accept the tenders and award the contracts immediately on the eve of the contest.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When were the tenders asked for and when were they received?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The advertisements were inserted on July 8th, 1910, and tenders in accordance therewith, based upon information furnished in the interval, were received on May 1st of the following year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the House was not dissolved until well on in July?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. But, as I mentioned, the Minister of Naval Defence was absent in England in the interval attending a subsidiary conference of the Admiralty on the question of naval arrangements.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When did he leave?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He left on May 12th and returned on July 16th. I think the Prime Minister was also away at the time. He returned on July 16th and on the 29th of that month Parliament was dissolved.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why was the space of ten months necessary before tenders were received? And why were they not accepted when received?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend may know that, in regard to ships of this character, much of the information that had to be supplied to the firms tendering was necessarily of a confidential nature. It was furnished in part by the British Admiralty and, in part, from other sources. It therefore required considerable time in order to prepare the tenders for submission to the government. The position, as outlined indicates that if a government had tried its best to proceed quickly, and had eagerly sought to get the naval service under way, it could not have been expected to proceed much more rapidly than did the Liberal administration of that day. The Naval College had been established and the Naval Service Department brought into being. The tenders for the various ships were in, and the whole arrangements were virtually complete. But for the fact that the question of Reciprocity reached such an acute stage during the discussions of that year, the whole naval service would have been launched in the course of the year 1911. Was that marking time, as my right hon. friend suggests? That was doing everything it was possible for a government to do to bring into effect the original purpose of the act, that of creating a Canadian naval service.

But from the moment after the election of 1911, what happened? From that hour until the war was over, during all those years, the government that succeeded the Liberal administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier has not a single act to its credit. Although they came into power in 1911, and had before them the tenders for these various ships, they refused to award a single contract. That is how much attention they paid to naval service and how much they believed in the existence of an emergency. The Niobe and the Rainbow, for which sailors had been recruited, were tied up to the docks. If those hon. gentlemen believed in an emergency and were prepared to meet it in that way, they were not fit to hold office as the governors of the country. That is the difference between the two administrations. It is all very well to talk a great deal and to utter an abundance of words. But actions speak louder than words, and if the two administrations are to be judged by their actions, the country will not have much difficulty in deciding which of them prepared in an effective way to meet our national obligations in regard to naval service.

I will not follow my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) in his endeavour to arouse prejudice and passion in the country. It seems to be one of his weaknesses that it is impossible for him to make a speech of any length without injecting into it, sooner or later, something calculated to stir up racial or religious animosity in the country. But when he begins on this occasion to talk about Bourassaism as being a factor in any naval question before Parliament he is going pretty far afield in his effort to arouse prejudice and hatred, which we had all trusted were buried ere the close of the great war. I tell my right hon. friend that his time would be better employed, when he is talking about moral obligations—

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask my right hon friend—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Have I hit the right hon. gentleman again?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend has a perennial joke on that subject. I suppose he may say that I am hit when I rise to refute a misrepresentation. The only method he has of hitting me is to misrepresent my position. Will he explain how the mention of Bourassaism is calculated to arouse prejudice and religious ill-feeling in the country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Fortunately I may leave the matter in the hands of the House. Hon. members are quite able to judge the effect and intent of my right hon. friend's remarks. I do not seek to misquote him in any way. However, I shall not go into the nature of the conflict in 1911. But I can remember how he and his friends in the province of Ontario went up and down the back concessions declaring that Laurier's creation was a tin pot navy. They told the people that he was a French-Canadian and would do nothing for the Empire; and while they were making these representations in one province, other of the right hon. gentleman's friends were going up and down the province of Quebec saying that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his party were too imperialistic, and were trying to force Canadians, by conscription, upon warships in order that they might be brought into European and Japanese broils.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend may refer to others, but he should do them the justice of quoting them exactly. So far as I am personally concerned, I deny absolutely that I ever in my life—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. gentlemen opposite have the habit of meeting argument with roars. Now, I never made any reflection in my life on Sir Wilfrid Laurier or any other man because he was a French-Canadian. But I do not refrain from referring by name to any man as a political force merely because of his race.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend as the leader of a great party should be more chivalrous to his followers. He should be prepared to take upon his own shoulders the obligations of his party instead of always trying to creep out from under himself. I will not follow him in the history of the campaign of 1911. We all recall only too vividly the Nationalist-Conservative alliance whereby the Government formed in 1911 was composed of a certain number of Nationalists and Conservatives, which two forces operating together, prevented any step whatever being taken towards putting into force a naval programme to meet the obligations of the day, notwithstanding that those same hon. gentlemen were professing that there was a great emergency of which account should at once be taken.

In 1913 the government of Sir Robert Borden did bring into the House a resolution in regard to the navy. I shall read that resolution and the amendment which was proposed to it, and I shall ask the House to decide which of the two parties was the sounder in its judgment on matters of naval policy. This is the resolution which was moved by the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden on the 5th December, 1912:

Resolved that it is expedient, in connection with the bill now before this House, entitled an Act to authorize measures for increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire to provide:

(a) That from and out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada there may be paid and applied a sum not exceeding $35,000,000 for the purpose of immediately increasing the effective naval forces of the Empire;

(b) That the said sum shall be used and applied under the direction of the Governor-in-Council in the construction and equipment of battleships or armoured cruisers of the most powerful and modern type;

(c) That the said ships when constructed and equipped shall be placed by the Governor-in-Council at the disposal of His Majesty for the common defence of the Empire—

The phrase used by my right hon. friend a few minutes ago.

(d) That the said sum shall be paid, used and applied, and the said ships shall be constructed and placed at the disposal of His Majesty subject to such terms, conditions and arrangements as may be agreed upon between the Governor in Council and His Majesty's Government.

The Liberal party opposed that particular policy as outlined. Why? Because they believed at the time that it was not as good a policy, for dealing even with the situation then forecast by the right hon. leader of the government of the day, as was the Liberal policy of 1910.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Which claimed there was no emergency.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will answer my hon. friend in one minute.

I ask the members of this House to appeal to the events of history as they have transpired, since that resolution was proposed, and ask themselves how far the judgment of the then Prime Minister was to be compared with the judgment of the leader of the Liberal party of that day.

What was the proposal? To give to the British government a contribution in money for the construction of three of the largest battleships in the world. That is what was then proposed. Of what service would those three battleships have been in the late war? The large dreadnaughts were of little or no service and supposing that resolution had carried, what would be the situation as regards those ships to-day? They would have been in British waters throughout the whole period of the war without being of any real service at all, and to-day they would have been among the number of capital ships consigned to the scrap heap. Does my right hon. friend think that that judgment was sound and safe and calculated to ensure permanent support for the Mother Country and a fuller recognition by this country of its obligation in the matter of naval defence?

But what were the facts in regard to those ships; why was that proposal made? It was made because of the Nationalist-Conservative alliance, so that the Nationalists in the government might go to their friends in the province of Quebec and say, "We are proposing to give a contribution of money to England to purchase three of the largest battleships in the world, and so end for all time to come anything in the nature of a Canadian naval service or a further recognition of our obligations." And in order that the Conservatives in the government might go to their Imperial friends in the province of Ontario and say, "This is only the first step in a series of contributions towards a permanent Imperial naval defence fund." That was the position.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the hon. Prime Minister not afraid that by attacking the Nationalists of Quebec he may arouse race and creed divisions in this country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not in the least afraid of arousing any prejudice in that connection. If my right hon. friend is still sensitive in regard to his Nationalist allies, I feel sorry for him, but I do not think there will be any danger such as he suggests from any remarks I have made.

Now may I quote what was proposed in the amendment to this resolution of the government of the day? The Liberal amendment was wholly consistent with the Liberal policy as laid down in 1910; and, let me repeat it again, in the light of the events of the war it has been vindicated and justified a thousand times over. The amendment proposed was as follows:

This House declines to concur in the said resolution and orders that the same be referred back to the committee, with instructions to amend the same in the following particulars, namely, to strike out all the words after clause (a) and substitute therefor the following:

The memorandum prepared by the Board of Admiralty on the general naval situation of the Empire and communicated to this House by the right hon. the Prime Minister on December 5th shows that several of the most important of the foreign powers have adopted a definite policy of rapidly increasing their naval strength.

That this condition has compelled the United Kingdom to concentrate its naval forces in home waters involving the withdrawal of ships from the outlying portions of the Empire.

That such withdrawal renders it necessary that Canada without further delay should enter actively upon a permanent policy of naval defence.
