Mr. MacEachen: In my particular region, and I have discharged this particular responsibility long enough to know what it represents—

An hon. Member: Too long.

Mr. MacEachen: In my region it means around the cabinet table representing the interests of all the region, the 11 constituencies in that region. When it was a question of providing in the constituency of Annapolis Valley-Hants a very substantial program of assistance to Michelin, it was not possible for the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants to come to the cabinet table and argue that case—

An hon. Member: What about Firestone.

Mr. MacEachen: —but it was possible for me, as the regional minister, to do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: That is the main function of regional ministers. The hon. member has made a great to do about tabling the list. When the Prime Minister comes back I will be happy to recommend to him that he make the list available. I am sure that that list will be on the Table and will confound the hon. member and begin the process of educating him in the process of cabinet government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PETRO-CANADA

ACQUISITION OF PETROFINA—ALLEGED ADVANCE KNOWLEDGE

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I know you will agree with me when I say it is very, very distressing for this House to watch a marriage break up before our very eyes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: My question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and it relates to a letter which came from the president of Maison Placements, an investment firm in Montreal. This letter refers to what the writer calls clear signs of a major leak in connection with the Petrofina acquisition, resulting in illegal profits to many people. It goes on to observe that the price of Petrofina shares was around $60 when the first rumour came into the market place, compared to the price bid of $120. I should point out that a chart which I have shows that Petrofina skyrocketed during this period whereas BP Canada, which is the other candidate for acquisition, was flat, and probably is a little bit lower in price now than the shares were at the time of the first rumours regarding Petrofina.

I have raised this point in the House on a number of occasions. The clear reason for this is that these leaks have driven up the price and have caused the Canadian taxpayers and consumers to pay more money for Petrofina. My question is this. Upon receipt of this letter what action has the minister taken? Specifically, has he referred the letter to the Toronto Stock Exchange which is investigating this situation, and has he discussed the matter with the president of Petro-Canada? This question is similar to the one I asked the minister about a week ago, to which I got no answer.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member referred to a possible marriage break-up. I hope he will not be attending a divorce next Friday night.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Your wit is as good as your energy policy.

Mr. Lalonde: I could give a very short answer to the question, Madam Speaker. We have never received the letter in question. I suspect the citizen in question called the press before he managed to get the letter over to me.

An hon. Member: He sent it through the Post Office.

Mr. Lalonde: I can tell the House what I have told it before. This gentleman appears to be an investment broker, but if he knew his business he would already have gone to the Ontario Securities Commission or the Quebec Securities Commission if he has any information, and asked for an investigation or inquiry.

An hon. Member: You don't care.

Mr. Lalonde: If he has any evidence at all, that is the way things are done. My hon. friend was in the investment business so surely he knows that this is the way things are done. The securities commissions of the provincial governments are there to investigate exactly that kind of charge.

Mr. Clark: What are you hiding, Marc?

Mr. Lalonde: As to the general price, the settlement, the hon. member knows, and I would refer to the fact that partners in his former firm have already indicated this publicly, that the price paid by Petro-Canada was a fair price in the circumstances for both parties. I invite my friend to phone his former partners and get advice from them rather than from some individual who appears to be more eager to get letters to the press than to my department.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, I might point out that there are other responsible people in the investment business who have been quoted as saying this Canadianization policy, carried out in this way, is going to cost Canadian taxpayers an arm and a leg. I was in the investment business, Madam Speaker, and I was involved in a number of transactions similar to this. When there were any leaks I, or other people involved in the transaction, took fast action to find out where those leaks occurred and took fast action to make sure that they did not occur again. The minister has shown no concern, no sense of urgency—

● (1440)

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member used to be much shorter with his questions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: I think he is following the bad example of some other members on both sides in this House. The hon. member on a short question.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, this is an important issue. I am trying to make an impact on the minister who is clearly showing no sense of urgency at all.

In view of the fact that the amount of the premium in dollars is $700 million over the price in September, could the minister tell the House why he has taken no action to find out where those leaks occurred?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, first I would remind the hon. member that the premium paid at the time of the transaction was lower proportionately than premiums paid at the time of transactions in takeovers all over North America the last year. The difference was about 37 per cent versus 56 per cent or 57 per cent as an average in the private sector. My friend should be aware of that.

As far as the other point raised by my hon. friend is concerned, I did invite him or anyone else who has particular evidence, or any evidence at all, about anything improper having taken place, to bring it to my attention, and I will transfer it with great pleasure to the Ontario or Quebec Securities Commission—

Mr. Clark: You will transfer it?

Mr. Lalonde: —or to go directly to those commissions. Under the law, as my hon. friend knows, having been in the investment business, the securities commissions are the agencies which investigate these matters.

Mr. Clark: You are responsible for Petro-Canada.

Mr. Lalonde: That is what the law provides for in this country.

Mr. Beatty: What is your responsibility?

Mr. Lalonde: These are the institutions to provide the investigations. In the meantime, I do not think it is responsible to level innuendo as my hon. friend has done, without any evidence.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCE OF SASKATCHEWAN

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Mr. Robert Blair, who just had a favourable resolution introduced in the House by one of his Liberal colleagues here, was in bad company yesterday; he spoke to the Toronto Liberal Association. Speaking about his company, Nova Corp., he said that it will have to cut back oil production in Saskatchewan, that the company is now losing about $1 on each barrel of Saskatchewan oil because of the minister's new energy program, that it does not have enough money to cover production costs—also as a result of the program—for 50,000 barrels of crude a day. He said that unless the provinces and the federal government have an agreement by April or May, he will have to follow his accountant's advice and shut down his operation. This will cost Canada about $400 million a year in additional subsidies for crude oil.

I say to the minister that this is not the Alberta government, so I do not want to hear silly excuses that they will not negotiate. Has the minister entered into negotiations with the government of Saskatchewan—his friends in the NDP government of Saskatchewan—to resolve this pricing situation in Saskatchewan, particularly the question which may affect heavy oil production in Saskatchewan? If the minister has, at what stage are these discussions, and when does the minister expect a solution so as to save Canada this tremendous additional cost?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would remind the hon. member that Husky Oil, a subsidiary of Nova Corp., has indicated that it is increasing its exploration budget this year rather than decreasing it, contrary to other announcements by some companies.

Mr. Wilson: How about its production?

Mr. Lalonde: Second, I have had discussions with my colleague in the government of Saskatchewan, something I have been unable to do with my colleague in Alberta, and there have been discussions at the officials level. We both recognize that the combination of the taxation provided under the National Energy Program and the very high royalties provided for under the Saskatchewan legislation make it difficult with regard to certain wells for some companies. Those negotiations are taking place. I have had a very fruitful meeting with my colleague from Saskatchewan, and I am looking forward to further discussions in the next while.

QUERY WITH RESPECT TO CHANGES IN PROGRAM

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants was the one who put "Hants in the minister's pants" to get action at the Michelin rubber factory.

An hon. Member: Try again.

Mr. Crosbie: I would not attempt to put ants in the pants of the minister of energy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: When the little red rump quietens down, I will go on with my question.

On October 28 the minister announced his new energy policy. Mr. Blair, a well-known Canadian nationalist, said yesterday:

—he is disappointed that the federal government has not yet substantially modified various provisions in the program that cut industry revenues and thus discourage exploration and development.

In view of that statement by a Canadian nationalist owning a Canadian-owned major oil company, is the minister now going to insist that this program be changed to meet these objections so that Canada can have some kind of an economic recovery in the 1980s? Will he overrule his colleague and bring in changes to the program?

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if I may be permitted to comment on the hon. member's preamble about Annapolis Valley-Hants and the member for that district, I congratulate him for understanding the process, but I wish he would take the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood behind the curtain and explain it to him so that understanding would develop on all sides of the House.

Mr. Clark: That is your job.

Mr. Crosbie: He is in bed with you. You are not in bed with me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, on the question which the hon. member raised, we have already undertaken significant changes in the program in response to representations from the industry. I mention the change in the treatment of exploration expenses and a change in the treatment of incentive payments with respect to the income or cash flow of corporations. As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has said, we are prepared to consider changes as representations and changes are made. That is the situation we face at the moment.

PENSIONS

NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON PRIVATE PENSION FUNDS—INQUIRY WHETHER ALL PROVINCES WILL PARTICIPATE

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal-Sainte-Marie): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Could the Minister tell the House whether the provincial governments have all responded to the invitation to take part in the national conference on private pension funds? If not, can she tell us which provinces have not responded or have refused to take part?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I am happy to report that no province has refused to take part in this conference. However, following the letter sent by the Right Hon. Prime Minister to the provincial premiers just before Christmas, the four Atlantic provinces, the province of Saskatchewan, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon have already appointed a minister responsible for pension reform, and I of course regret that the other provinces, especially Quebec and Ontario, have not yet found the time to do so. We hope that all those invited will be able to take part in this conference at the end of March in view of its importance for the pension funds of all Canadians.

LABOUR RELATIONS

B.C. TELEPHONE COMPANY DISPUTE—POSSIBLE TERMS OF SETTLEMENT

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Would the minister be prepared to confirm that the B.C. Telephone Company has absolutely refused to sign an agreement worked out by his mediator, accepted by both sides, until such time as it receives a second increase from the CRTC? If this is correct, can the minister tell this House precisely what action he intends to take in order to ensure that the people of Canada are not blackmailed by these multinational corporations?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the factual situation is not exactly as outlined by the hon. member, but it is nearly as bizarre.

Our very able mediator, Bill Kelly, sent a telegram to me yesterday in which he indicated that after his mediation he had brought about an offer by the company, the substance of which was accepted in totality by the union. In effect, all differences between the parties have been resolved on clauses within the agreement.

● (1450)

However, the company's proposal contains the following preamble:

This proposal is made on the basis that it will not be implemented until a sufficient rate increase is approved by the CRTC to cover the additional costs.

I only want to say that, as Mr. Kelly reported in his document, such increases are totally outside the field of labour relations or of my department, or of the government, or of the parties. I am not aware, in my experience in industrial relations, of any occasion in history in which any of the many utilities that are subject to regulation in this country ever before sought to put such a provision in a collective agreement. I think it is unfortunate. I can only say, in relation to what action can be taken at this moment, that Mr. Kelly has mediated to the point and that there is agreement on the clauses of the agreement and the terms, except for this preamble. One can hope that upon reflection the company will recognize the impossibility of any union accepting the particular clause they propose, though I have had a lengthy discussion on the telephone with Mr. MacFarlane—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Regan: —and I was unable to notice much progress in that regard.

Madam Speaker: I know the minister has a lot of important things to say, but perhaps he will say them more concisely.

Mr. Parker: Madam Speaker, it is precisely what I said, that we are being blackmailed. What I would like to ask the minister, since his words do not seem to be strong enough is this: will the minister recommend to his cabinet colleagues that they use their statutory power to roll back the CRTC's increase recommendation until such time as this company is prepared to sign a contract with its workers?

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, the hon. member probably is aware that there can only be a review of the CRTC increase recently given to the B.C. Telephone Company if an appeal is registered within whatever is the appropriate time period. As I understand the situation, that appeal process is open to various citizens and organizations. However, I think that the productive course of action is for the company to accept the fact that, since they have been able to agree on terms, they should sign the agreement and then make whatever application they consider is appropriate, which is perfectly their right.

I had started to say that I spoke to the president on the telephone, and I was unable to make much progress with Mr. MacFarlane in that regard.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN POLICY WITH RESPECT TO EL SALVADOR

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The minister will know that yesterday press reports out of Washington confirmed the U.S. congressional support for increased military aid to the government of El Salvador, and also said that U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman, Senator Percy, "will not rule out the use of U.S. troops in El Salvador."

Bearing in mind Canada's support for the United Nations declaration regarding non-intervention in El Salvador, and the representations the minister has had from the people of El Salvador, will the minister tell the House about his conversation with General Haig in Washington that gave him "reason to pause" in pursuing Canada's foreign policy toward El Salvador? Is the government now supporting a military solution to that tragic conflict?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, there has been no change with respect to Canada's policy concerning El Salvador. We have continued to protest, and protested again recently to the government there about what we understand are violations of human rights. With respect to the supply of offensive arms, our position has been that that should not be done, either by our country or by any other country, in a situation where there is internal discord. What I said was that I did not believe, however, that we should be leading a public crusade against the attitudes of the American administration which believes that it is acting in its own interest, and on the basis of information which it possesses and which it is beginning to share with its allies.

Mr. McLean: Madam Speaker, I notice on this issue a change from the usual expression of opinion on human rights issues. My question, in supplementary form, to the minister is: in the light of our commitment in the declaration signed on May 27, 1980, between Canada and Mexico regarding non-intervention, has the minister been in touch with the Mexican government regarding joint pressure on the American government?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, no, I have not at this point discussed that with the Mexican government. I hope to have a chance of talking with the Mexican foreign minister soon, but I must say that I am not contemplating, at this point, any joint approach to the U.S. on that subject.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PURCHASING POLICIES OF FEDERAL INSTITUTIONS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the minister responsible for regional economic expansion. In his absence, and in light of what the Deputy Prime Minister said today, I do not know whether to direct it to him in his responsibility for paying out all the money to Nova Scotia, or whether I should direct it to the acting minister for DREE, the Minister of Public Works. Since it concerns him, I suppose I should direct it to the Minister of Public Works.

In view of the recent news release by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion that buyers for institutions of the government in the Atlantic region are purchasing an average of 9 per cent of their goods from sources outside the region, although comparable products made in the Atlantic region are available at the same or lower prices, I wish to ask the minister what steps will be taken to encourage the various sectors of the federal government, which have substantial buying quotas, to make their purchases for their needs in Atlantic Canada from manufacturers in the region?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I would be quite happy to take the representation of the hon. member under advisement and to bring it to the attention not only of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion but, as well, other ministries that similarly may have some interaction in that particular region.

Mr. Crouse: Madam Speaker, I have one brief supplementary question because the minister himself may well be in a position to do something about this. Since the DREE survey discovered that 10 per cent of government purchases were from regional manufacturers while another 10 per cent could have been bought from Atlantic producers at a lower price than that paid, I would like to ask him why are locally produced products, priced below competition from outside the region, not being purchased, and as a suggestion for him and the rest of the government, will the government consider in future making these purchases from the lowest of public tenders, or have public tenders gone out of style under this government?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, again, without having notice of the question that is asked, I have indicated that I will bring the question to the attention of the minister. I assume that he is referring to the Ministry of Regional Economic Expansion in terms of purchasing. Without knowing the prices involved and the like, I feel I would have to bring it to the attention of the minister.

FISHERIES

TABLING OF MAIN ESTIMATES AND REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. As chair person of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, I am aware that some members of the committee are anxious to commence hearings on east and west coast fisheries matters. Can the President of the Treasury Board tell the House when the main estimates will be tabled in the House so the committee may get a reference to commence hearings?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to advise the House I will table the main estimates on February 25. That is next Wednesday.

• (1500)

Madam Speaker: I see no other course but to extend the question period today for about ten minutes in order to make up the time lost on laughing and jeering. Much of it was in good fun, and I do not object to that from time to time, but there must be a reasonable number of questioners every day in the question period.

PUBLIC SERVICE

APPOINTMENT OF ROBERT TITLEY TO POST WITHIN MINISTRY OF TRANSPORT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Transport, who plays a piano in his office and may not know what is going on in his department. I would like to know if the minister can confirm that one Robert Titley, an executive with Voyageur Bus Company, has either been offered the position or appointed to the position of director of railway passenger service development in the Ministry of Transport.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, indeed I am aware of it. The gentleman in question passed a Public Service Commission examination. There were seven or eight other candidates, and he won. That is the way the cookie crumbled.

I am surprised that the hon. member resents the fact that a person who has been occupied in trucking can then also be interested in railways. I am particularly surprised because my hon. friend is known as a multi-modalist. He has been a defender of a multi-modal station in Regina, which seems to incorporate the best of multi-modal attitudes.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, it would be great if Voyageur Bus Lines were in favour of co-operating with VIA Rail, but what the minister is doing now is like putting a coyote in charge of the chicken coop. This is a company which has roadblocked every move with respect to railway fares and with respect to co-operation with VIA Rail regarding schedules.

An hon. Member: Guess who owns it?

Mr. Benjamin: It is owned by Power Corporation of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: One Paul Martin lobbied Members of Parliament because he thought VIA Rail fares were too low.

Madam Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member ask his question?

Mr. Benjamin: I want to ask the minister if he can find somebody, somewhere in Canada or anywhere else in the world, who knows something about high speed intercity rail passenger traffic to appoint to this important position and do something about strengthening and enlarging that branch of his department, since air transport has three pages of listings in the government directory and rail transport has one inch?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, a moment ago the Minister of Finance was trying to teach cabinet government to one of the hon. member's colleagues. I will now have to teach the hon. member something about public administration in Canada. I heard about this appointment this afternoon when I was coming here. This is done under law by the Public Service Commission of Canada. I am in no way influencing the choice which has been made.

ENVIRONMENT

POLLUTION OF NIAGARA RIVER—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Right Hon. Prime Minister I would like to direct my question to the minister responsible for the environment of Canada.

Since the hon. member for Niagara Falls has thrown up his hands in his fight against the further pollution of the Niagara River and has indicated that it is now up to an exchange between high level authorities in the United States and Canadian governments to protect the quality of that river, will the minister indicate to this House what action the Prime Minister has taken or his government has taken to follow through on the Prime Minister's promise made a year ago that he would urge U.S. authorities to stop SCA from further dumping in the Niagara River?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I take issue with the first part of the hon. member's statement. There has been no member of this House and, indeed, no person I know who has been more active and vigorous in promoting the cause of the clean-up of the Niagara River than the hon. member for Niagara Falls.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: His record in that regard deserves the approbation of hon. members of this House.

We have consistently urged on American authorities that permits not be given for the SCA discharge until there has been a significant decrease in the present polluting activities with respect to the Niagara River. We are particularly concerned about the Niagara Falls, New York, sewage treatment plant. Our position on that has not been altered, and we have on a variety of occasions as vigorously as possible expressed our views to the American authorities.

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, that response is such that I have to wonder why there was a negative response to my motion under Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that the International Joint Commission has recommended a halt to the further discharge of chemical wastes into the Niagara River, do the minister and his government not now take the position that the International Joint Commission should be supported in its position and its recommendations followed?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, we have done so in the past, we do so now, and I am sure we will continue to do so in the future.

PIPELINES

DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES RESPECTING ALASKA HIGHWAY PROJECT

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Now that the new administration in the United States is settling in, and in view of the fact that 80 per cent of the pipe which will be manufactured for the pipeline in Canada will be manufactured in the Welland constituency, I wonder if the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources could tell us if he has had any contact with the American secretary in charge of energy or the pipeline with regard to the Alaska Highway gas pipeline project, and would he share whatever information he has with this House?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I believe I have already informed the House of my conversation with Secretary Edwards on this issue and about the reaction of the Reagan administration, which is extremely supportive of the Alaska gas pipeline. I am advised that today my colleague in the other place, Senator Olson, as the minister responsible for the Northern Pipeline Agency, has released an exchange of correspondence between himself and Secretary Edwards in which Secretary Edwards reaffirms the very, very firm commitment of the Reagan administration to the completion of the Alaska gas pipeline and assures us that the American government is fully behind this great project.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO BIGSTONE BAND

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. During a visit last fall to the Bigstone Band in Wabasca the minister promised financial assistance to Chief William Beaver of the Bigstone Band so that that band could continue with its sawmill operation and so it could continue with its band programs. This has not been forthcoming. Could the minister inform the House whether this will be forthcoming and whether he will be providing this assistance?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member indicated, I did convey to my department my concern about assistance to this particular band because of the very real need. I thought progress was being made in terms of offering assistance to this particular band. If that is not the case, I will check and let the hon. member know.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, these promises were made five months ago, and at the present time the Bigstone Band is facing cancellation of its timber quota. Logs will be left in the bush to rot over the summer. All the employees of the sawmill have been laid off. The band office has been shut down and all employees laid off. Is this just an empty promise? Can the minister do something about it, or is this just a continuing public relations campaign being waged through statements like this by all ministers of the Crown in northeastern Alberta?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): No, Madam Speaker. As the hon. member knows, there is real concern with respect to the dire financial circumstances of Chief William Beaver and his band. I believe the House is aware of the unfortunate situation with respect to personnel involved in the bookkeeping and auditing arrangements. This has been brought to the attention of the department. There is a strain on funds for this fiscal year. It may very well be that we will try to provide funds budgeted for the fiscal year commencing April 1. I realize the urgency of the situation. I will check to see what progress is being made.

FUNDS FOR FITNESS AND SPORT PROGRAM

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, I was pleased when amendments respecting aboriginal rights were passed by the constitutional committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: I was very impressed with "the Shawinigan Kid," the Minister of Justice, and also with the constitutional committee when they passed Sections 33(1) and 33(2) with respect to aboriginal rights. Because of this I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Why is the minister not giving the $1.2 million to the National Indian Brotherhood which was promised in the estimates with respect to fitness and amateur sport, which is now under the minister's department?

● (1510)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, the money for this program was allocated under the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare as a preventive health measure, and that is where the money has always been. Our budget is voted by Parliament, as stated. Parliament has not authorized any category of expenditure in this area. If we were to spend money in this direction within my department, it would simply mean that we would take it from somewhere else voted for the Indian people by Parliament. The fact of the matter is that our total funds are committed. Perhaps the hon. member would be interested to know that a good portion of the funds we have is subject to direction to recreational activities, and it always has been. The money to which the hon. member referred is directed more to the area of excellence, but we are concerned with this area, and money is being spent in this area in my department.

Mr. Paproski: That is not true, John.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Government House
Ottawa

February 19, 1981

Madam:

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. W. R. McIntyre, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 19th day of February, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary
to the Governor General

Madam Speaker: Does the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans wish to answer the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) or does he wish to put it off to another day?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) and myself discussed the matter but he had decided to look at the file before deciding on whether or not to give an answer. I do not know whether he is ready to do so now. I do know he did not get to see the file until he got back from Whitehorse early in the week.

Madam Speaker: The question could remain in abeyance but I am against doing so for any length of time. That is why I wanted to know whether or not you intended to answer it today.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order regarding the usual announcement on Thursday. I assume that next week's business will include some economic measures to solve the desperate economic condition of the country and that these will be placed before us for consideration. Could the government House leader also inform us as to the business which he expects to be bringing in tomorrow and next week?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs is now dealing with two or three important budget bills. As soon as the debate on the Constitution is completed, I can guarantee to my hon. colleague that we will bring some measures to the House dealing with energy and with the economy.

[Translation]

With regard to the legislative program for the next few days, may I say to the House that we shall devote the whole of next week to the constitutional debate, with the exception of Tuesday which will be an allotted day. Should there be any changes in that program, Madam Speaker, I shall so advise the parties of the opposition in due course.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Am I to understand that when the House leader referred to the whole week he did not include next Friday, the 27th, respecting which the House now has an order?

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Madam Speaker, it has been agreed that the House will not sit next Friday, and obviously when I said that next week will be devoted entirely to dealing with the Constitution except for next Tuesday, next Friday was not included.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, with respect to the House business, may I remind the House leader of two or three items.

First, I hope he is keeping in touch with the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs and will permit any legislation he produces to be dealt with without delay.

Second, may I ask him to pursue the matter I raised yesterday, namely, the possibility of our concluding the debate on the bill which would turn the Post Office Department into a Crown corporation. As hon. members are aware, there is some urgency about this. We certainly are prepared to deal with the matter in one day or, if we can avoid amendments which are contentious, it could be dealt with in an even shorter time than that.

May I also ask the minister, since he is the member of the cabinet responsible for the administration of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, whether he will take a serious look at the recommendation which the special joint committee made in 1967 when it reported that legislation. I refer to the recommendation that there be parallel legislation providing for collective bargaining on Parliament Hill. Will he give serious consideration at long last to the possibility of implementing that recommendation?

My last point has to do with the promised short debate on the report of the Standing Committee on Transport, on the understanding that there will simply be one short speech per party. What is the status of that report?

Mr. Pinard: The hon. member put four questions. In answer to the first one, I am still in touch with the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. In fact, I spoke to him today and I hope to have a clear reply in a short time.

On the second question about the Post Office legislation, as I said yesterday, I am certainly willing to consider dealing with the report and third reading stages of that bill as soon as possible if we can come to an agreement among the parties and the House leaders on a short time for the debate. I took note of the offer made by the NDP to spend a day or even less time to conclude the debate on that bill. I look forward to a House leaders' meeting in the near future to discuss this bill as well as to discuss the debate on the report of the Standing Committee on Transport, which was the fourth question put by the hon. member.

Finally, I will look at the recommendations of the joint committee referred to by my colleague in relation to amendments to the PSSRA.

Mr. Crosbie: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member on a point of order if it is on government business. I have notice of a question of privilege in the name of the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). Is he prepared to discuss his question of privilege?

Mr. Stevens: Yes, I am, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member now.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I believe my colleague wants to make only a short comment. I would have no objection if you heard him first, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I received one notice before the other and I usually take them in the order in which I receive them. But if the hon. member for York-Peel wishes to defer to his colleague, I will hear the hon. member for St. John's West first.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROSBIE—NOTICE OF INTENTION TO RAISE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): All I want to do, Madam Speaker, is to give you notice of a question of privilege today in connection with the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). He is certainly not a member of the clerisy or of the intelligentsia and—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have received notice from the hon. member. I have it in writing. It is not necessary for him to give me notice in the House. I will hear him when he is ready to proceed.

Mr. Crosbie: What I want to tell Your Honour is that the minister is not here and I do not want to proceed today in his absence.

MR. STEVENS—MASSEY-FERGUSON REFINANCING—ALLEGED MISLEADING STATEMENT OF MR. GRAY

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege arises from an exchange between myself and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) in the House on February 6. On that day I asked the minister the following question:

Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has he any statement to make with respect to the present negotiations involving the Massey-Ferguson situation and, if so, could he tell us what form the statement will take? Will he be making a statement on motions, or how will this House first be informed as to what his conclusions are?

The minister replied:

Madam Speaker, I have no statement to make at this time, but the matter is under active review.

I stress the phrase "under active review." I then asked a supplementary question which reads as follows:

To the minister's knowledge, during these negotiations has the Government of the United States or the Government of the United Kingdom been asked for any assistance with respect to Massey-Ferguson similar to what the Canadian government was asked for in the case of Chrysler?

● (1520)

The minister replied:

Madam Speaker, I think that question would be easier to deal with when we are in a position to announce the results of the considerations we are undertaking at this time.

In my opinion, the answer I received on that date was a clear indication that the question as to what assistance might be given to Massey-Ferguson was still a matter under consideration. As the minister stated, it was actively being reviewed.

In short, as a result of matters which transpired subsequent to that exchange in the House and other information which has been drawn to my attention, I think we can show, if a proper reference is made to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, that indeed the minister misled the House on February 6.

At a later point, if I may, I will get into the question whether or not he deliberately misled the House. I am aware of the precedents on that subject. If I am given the privilege of sufficient time, I hope to touch on certain precedents and on certain comments I wish to make concerning whether the minister intentionally or deliberately misled the House as a result of the exchange and the answers he gave on February 6.

Dealing with the specific facts, I would emphasize that the exchange I have just read into the record, according to Hansard, finished at exactly twelve noon on Friday, February 6.

We have found that subsequent to that a notice was posted in the Press Gallery calling for a press conference at three o'clock that afternoon, at which time the minister attended and made an announcement concerning what the federal government had agreed to do with respect to Massey-Ferguson. The press statement furnished to those persons attending the press conference at that time indicated there would be a "$200 million Guarantee for Massey-Ferguson Refinancing Package" and read as follows:

OTTAWA, February 6, 1981—The Honourable Herb Gray, federal Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and the Ontario minister of industry and tourism, Larry Grossman, announced today that the Governments of Canada and Ontario have agreed to guarantee the capital risk of a new equity investment in Massey-Ferguson to limits of $125 million and $75 million respectively.

Massey-Ferguson has indicated that these government guarantees will enable them to complete their refinancing package totalling in excess of $700 million.

In return for making it possible for Massey-Ferguson to complete its refinancing plan, the governments have a number of commitments from the company. These include a commitment that an engineering and R&D base for new North American manufacturing activities will be located in Canada. Company plans call for increased spending for engineering and R&D and include creation within three years of a new base in Canada for advanced future products.

The final drafting of the agreement will be completed over the next two months. The agreement will be conditional upon completion of the legal agreements between the company and its lenders.

In reaching their decision the governments took into account the elements of the refinancing plan the company had already achieved, its willingness to upgrade the Canadian operations and employment, and the over-all benefits to the Canadian economy of maintaining a full-line manufacturer of farm equipment.

Appended to that press release was a "Backgrounder" running for two pages and setting out the situation with respect to Massey-Ferguson. I will not read it into the record, but I emphasize once again we were told at twelve noon on Friday that this matter was under active review, only to find a notice was posted in the Press Gallery at 2.15 that afternoon that a press conference had been called, at which time the press release to which I have referred was distributed.

Subsequently I found out that Massey-Ferguson officials came to Ottawa on Tuesday, February 3. They met on repeated occasions with officials of various departments in Ottawa, including officials of the minister's department. I say these things in the urgent desire of satisfying Your Honour there is a prima facie case that this House has been misled, perhaps deliberately misled. Most importantly, I would point out that on Thursday, February 5, cabinet met and agreed in principle to the Massey-Ferguson support program. At that meeting it was decided to mandate four ministers to continue to overview the matter. Those ministers were the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of State for Economic Development, Senator Olson. I am informed that those four ministers—and this will be shown if a committee reference is approved by the House—met later that day. They met in the evening, and again they met in the early morning of Friday, February 6, at a meeting called for 7 a.m.

In the meantime, departmental officials met three times during Thursday with representatives of Massey-Ferguson, including a late night meeting which ran from 10 p.m., Thursday to 1.30 a.m., Friday. During this latter meeting a press release in the form I have read into the record was discussed, reviewed, finalized and agreed to. I emphasize again that the press release I have read into the record was finalized approximately 12 hours before we were told in the House that matter was still under active review and was under consideration.

Massey-Ferguson officials returned to Toronto early Friday morning, confident that they had an agreement. Again I emphasize, at the time Massey-Ferguson officials returned to Toronto, confident that they had an agreement, we were told in the House that the matter was still "under active review."

On Friday, between 1 p.m. and 1.15 p.m., the senior assistant deputy minister in the department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Mr. W. R. Teschke, notified Massey-Ferguson representatives by telephone in Toronto that the department intended to go ahead with an announcement, including the press conference to which I have referred, at 3 p.m. that day. As I have indicated, they subsequently posted a notice in the parliamentary Press Gallery at 2.15 p.m. advising that the press conference was scheduled.

In the context of what I have referred to, I believe the minister has misled the House by stating, first, that the Massey-Ferguson situation "is under active review", and then by stating that he could deal with my supplementary question "when we are in a position to announce the results of the considerations we are undertaking at this time."

The minister made those statements, notwithstanding the fact the cabinet meeting held on Thursday, February 5, decided to go ahead with the Massey-Ferguson deal, that a committee of four ministers were asked to expedite the matter, that a press release was prepared covering the matter at least 12 hours earlier. In short, the minister has clearly misled the House in that, the decision having been made, he chose not to inform the House of the government's decision, stating that it was still "under active review." The minister may have taken this course for one of three reasons. The first is that he actually did not know what was going on in his department, which presumably is not so, as we have been given to understand he attended the cabinet meeting and the meetings of the "gang of four", if you like. In the first instance, I am indicating that the minister may tell us that he did not know this press release had been prepared, and if it had been prepared no final decision was made, notwithstanding the fact that the Massey-Ferguson people thought they had a deal. In fact, a press release had been approved, as had the deal been approved, by the cabinet.

Second, it may be that the minister knew what was happening but he thought he would take a chance on not being frank in the House. I hope that is not the case. If we get into a scenario where questions are asked in the House and ministers feel free to be less than frank, or feel free to mislead the House, we are clearly being impeded in our duties as members of this House and there is a contempt of the House. I suggest that, at least, a prima facie case on this has already been outlined, as I have indicated.

The third possibility is that the minister wanted to keep the matter kind of loose, if you like. He wanted to fudge the question so that he could skate by question period. If that is the case, if he was almost deliberately looking for an excuse to be able to say that the matter was not finally settled, I think he was less than frank. He misled the House on Friday because, clearly, the matter was settled.

The question whether the minister misled the House deliberately or not is, of course, one which I suggest should be dealt with finally by the committee, as I understand the existing precedents. If I may, I intend to refer to some of those precedents. As I understand them, I need only show that there is a prima facie case. If I show that, then the usual course is to have a motion put before the House and dealt with by the House. I will be proposing my motion later.

First, I would like to touch on the question of misleading the House and the contempt which is generally found as a result of misleading the House. I refer Your Honour to page 1856 of Hansard for December 6, 1978, when the then Speaker, after referring to circumstances put on the record by my colleague from Northumberland-Durham stated:

Does that lead us to the conclusion that, by virtue of an act or omission, the House, or a member, has directly or indirectly been impeded in the performance of its function or his duty, or that there has been a tendency to produce such result? If I so find, then I really have no choice but to find, prima facie, that a contempt has been committed.

Granted, this is a rather nebulous, murky kind of an area, if you like. For example, there has been considerable debate in this House with respect to believing that someone has deliberately misled the House. There has been debate with respect to whether one can say it and not, in turn, be accused of unparliamentary language, in the context of wanting to use that wording in one's motion. As I understand the existing precedents, previous speakers have held that you do not use the words "deliberately misleading" in your motion or in your reference. That, of course, is something which the committee would naturally look into, if it is finally apprized of the situation.

I would like to refer to the precedent on page 1857 of Hansard for December 6, 1978. The Speaker said this:

Even beyond the precedents and the complex law of privilege, I cannot conceive that there is any one of us who would accept the argument that this House of Commons has no recourse in the face of such an attempt to obstruct by offering admittedly misleading information.

The Speaker then went on to say:

Having done so, I concluded that the motion put forward by the hon. member must therefore be given immediate priority and taken into consideration by the House at once. The House itself makes the decision on whether the motion shall carry, whether it shall be amended, or in any way altered and, in fact, whether there is a contempt. I do not make that decision; the House does.

I emphasize that in the information which I have put before you, Madam Speaker, with further information which I will be offering and witnesses who I suggest the committee should call, that a clear prima facie case exists in the context of the question of privilege dealt with in the precedents I have just cited. A prima facie case has clearly been made with respect to the exchange between the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and myself on February 6.

I would like to touch on one other matter, Madam Speaker. This is a reference from February 28, 1978, and it deals with a question of privilege, again involving the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland. It is a question which dealt with the words "misleading" and "deliberately misleading". When those words may or may not be used was dealt with in this reference, quite conclusively, I think. Without actually reading those sections into the record, I refer Your Honour to pages 3294 and 3295 of Hansard for February 28, 1978. I think it is a confirmation that the motion which I will be proposing is the correct form of motion. If you should find that a prima facie case exists, as I suggest, then that motion would be quite in order to put to the House.

Should this matter be referred to the appropriate committee, I suggest that various witnesses be called before that committee. It is quite obvious that the four ministers to whom I have referred should be called to give their version of when a final decision was made respecting this matter. Officials from each of their departments could also be called. I could even submit a list of the officials I have in mind.

As far as Massey-Ferguson is concerned, I think it would be helpful if Victor A. Rice, chairman, president and chief operating officer of Massey-Ferguson, be called. Vincent D. Laurenzo, vice-president and controller of Massey-Ferguson should also be called. D. Brian Long, vice-president of strategic and production planning of Massey-Ferguson should be called. I believe that two financial advisers to that concern, who certainly have information touching on this matter, could and should be called. I refer to John Cairns and Susan Murray. Representatives of Wood Gundy and Company of Toronto and Pitfield, MacKay, Ross of Toronto should and could be called since they have pertinent information as to when this decision was made.

In short, Madam Speaker, if you find that there is a prima facie case that this House has, indeed, been misled, perhaps even deliberately misled, I would propose to move:

That the contempt for the House of Commons shown by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on Friday, February 6, 1981, in refusing to inform the House that negotiations had been finalized with Massey-Ferguson, while preparing to make a statement to a press conference later the same day with full details of the refinancing package confirming that the minister misled the House on that day, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, the only contribution I have to make to this question of privilege raised by the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) is that I was present at a number of committee hearings, as was the hon. member for York-Peel. I refer to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, at which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) to my recollection testified. Unfortunately, since I was not sure this item would be raised today I did not bring the minutes of the committee meeting with me. If my recollection is correct, it was the meeting of October 21, 1980, at which the minister indicated, in a response to a question from me, when I asked him quite specifically whether or not he would be making a statement on motions in the House with respect to any deal consummated between the federal government and Massey-Ferguson, that he would. His answer to that question was, yes. I indicated this to the minister on another occasion and I just wanted it to be on the record that he did state in committee that he would be making a statement as and when an arrangement was arrived at between Massey-Ferguson and the government.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, this matter is before the House instead of the constitutional debate which hon. members opposite in the official opposition say should be more important than anything else—

An hon. Member: Honesty always is.

Mr. Gray: —and should not in any way be precluded.

On the date in question I answered a question by saying that I had no statement to make at that time on the Massey matter and that it was still under active review. I said that because at that time the cabinet had not yet reached a final decision on the Massey matter. It is quite true, Madam Speaker, that throughout the preceding week there had been discussions with officials of Massey, but contrary to my hon. friend's suggestion, no final decision had been taken by cabinet on the Thursday he mentioned; the final decision was not taken until after question period, after I left the House, and shortly prior to the posting of the notice in the Press Gallery at 2.15 p.m.

An hon. Member: Question period was still under way.

Mr. Gray: Whatever impression Massey officials may have had when they returned to Toronto, they had no way of knowing, they were not in a position to know, what the discussions were at the level of cabinet, discussions in which they could not participate, and could not participate any more than could my hon. friend. They may have certainly wanted to have an optimistic feeling, but whatever their impressions were they were not based on the facts of the situation as they then existed.

It is quite correct that material was prepared on a contingency basis, but that material was not finalized until after I left the House. In fact, I directed certain changes be made in it shortly before the decision was taken to post the notice in the Press Gallery, a decision taken by myself only a few minutes before the notice was actually posted at 2.15 p.m. The decision to post the notice was made by myself. I gave that direction immediately after the cabinet decision was confirmed.

So whatever conclusions my hon. friend has attempted to draw from circumstances, some of which are public, such as what I said in the House, other impressions which, while well intentioned, I think are mistaken, these conclusions are not accurate when he says that one way or another I misled the House when I gave the answer recorded in Hansard. Because my answer was correct. At that time the final decision had not been taken; therefore I did not mislead the House intentionally or unintentionally. I therefore suggest to the House that the hon. member's motion must fall simply on the basis of the facts of the situation.

If I might add one or two other comments, I would certainly be quite pleased if the House leaders work out a suitable time to make a statement in the House. I would also point out to my hon. friend that the other matter, which was the subject of the second question I received on the date in question, was put to me in the question period of the following week; that is, the question with respect to the participation of other governments, and I answered the question without any complaint by the House as a whole.

So I would repeat, Madam Speaker, that whatever impressions some may have received, the final decision had not been taken until after I left the House; and it was only after that decision was taken that I personally directed the notice be posted, a notice which was not posted until 2.15 p.m., and the press conference then ensued, leading to the issuing of the press release, making public the press release which my hon. friend read into the record.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): My intervention will be very brief, Madam Speaker.

An hon. Member: I hope so.

Mr. Nielsen: I hear shouts over there of "I hope so". They would like to muzzle and do away with this nuisance opposition, as was done in Ghana.

I merely want to emphasize that the Chair has heard a statement of fact by the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens); it has heard a statement of fact by the minister. I strongly submit that your task is not to determine the truth or untruth of those statements; your only task, I submit with great respect, Madam Speaker, is to determine whether or not, on the basis of the facts submitted by the two hon. members, a prima facie case of privilege has been made. Surely there must be sufficient doubt in your mind, Madam Speaker, based simply on the affirmation of the minister, with respect to the posting of the press release at 2.15 when it must have been prepared well in advance of the cabinet meeting that he asserts subsequently took place.

Mr. Gray: The notice was posted at 2.15.

Mr. Nielsen: The notice was posted, correct, but the release itself was on the Press Gallery bulletin board at 2.15. Am I incorrect in that?

An hon. Member: You are. Forty-five minutes after.

Mr. Nielsen: At three o'clock. There must be sufficient doubt in your mind, Madam Speaker, about the relationship between the timing of the posting of the press release, even accepting the minister's statement of fact, as to lead you inevitably to the conclusion that a prima facie case does indeed exist and that you should accept the motion of the hon. member for York-Peel.

May I suggest, because of the importance of the matter, that the Chair, perhaps out of sheer prudence, would want to read both those submissions very carefully before coming to a decision. I suggest, Madam Speaker, that you might take the luxury of having a look at it for whatever time is deemed essential, and then render your decision at a subsequent date.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): There are a few facts I would like to bring to the attention of the House, Madam Speaker. First of all, on the point just made by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), he should realize the day we were talking about was a Friday. Question period is at eleven o'clock on Friday, so I think the hon. member has his timing as well as his facts mixed up.

Secondly, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) cited two examples of precedents in this House concerning use of the words "deliberately misled". I am not sure that I followed the logic of his argument and he was seeking guidance from Your Honour about whether he could go ahead and use those words.

Committee Report

● (1550)

It is clear that the decision made by Mr. Speaker Jerome on February 20, 1978, as reported at page 3294 of Hansard regarding the use of the word "deliberate" in terms of misleading the House, has no relevance whatsoever to the debate this afternoon.

The other example quoted by the hon. member for York-Peel reported at page 1856 of Hansard for December 6, 1978, again had no relationship whatsoever to the alleged question of privilege that is before you. That instance, which I remember well as I was in the House at the time, concerned testimony given by former RCMP Commissioner Higgitt and a subsequent letter by the then solicitor general which was made available to the House. It was deemed by Mr. Speaker Jerome that that information misled the House. In no way has that any bearing on the debate today, which I submit is just that—an attempt to debate a subject. What we have here is a statement of the facts by the hon. minister. We have a dispute of those facts by hon. members opposite and clearly the honourable intention in this House is that one takes a minister and an hon. member at his word. The minister has outlined his position very clearly, I think.

Finally, Madam Speaker, I am sure that I do not have to bring to your attention the fact that Standing Order 15(3) gives a minister of the Crown the option of making a statement. Specifically it states that a minister of the Crown may make a short statement. The option is clearly with the minister.

I would also draw Your Honour's attention to Citation 264 of Beauchesne which states as follows:

The option of a minister to make a statement either in the House or outside it may be the subject of comment, but is not the subject of a question of privilege.

Finally, I should like to point out that for the second day in a row we have wasted one hour on spurious or alleged questions of privilege. I wonder what the intent of the opposition is in pursuing this course of action day after day.

Mr. Stevens: The minister was not here before.

Madam Speaker: I will take this question under advisement and rule on it later.

MACKENZIE KING TRUST ACCOUNT

Question No. 1,900—Mr. Stewart:

1. On what date was the Mackenzie King Trust account established and what are its aims and purposes?

2. What was the initial funding in the account and what is the present amount?

3. (a) How are funds disbursed from the account (b) to whom have funds been disbursed and for what reason?

4. Who are the trustees of the account and what remuneration, if any, is paid to each?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Public Archives that the reply to the above question is as follows: 1. Mackenzie King Trust account was established in 1952 and the interest is used to assist in the maintenance and care of Laurier House as a place of historic interest. The property is situated at 335 Laurier Avenue East in the city of Ottawa.

2. The initial funding was $225,000 and the present amount is $270,274.74.

3. (a) In accordance with section 3(4) of the act and by P.C. 1969-22/531, March 18, 1969, the Dominion Archivist is authorized to expend an annual sum not to exceed 70 per cent of the interest earned on the Mackenzie King Trust account in the previous fiscal year for the maintenance and upkeep of the buildings on the Laurier House property as well as an annual sum not to exceed 30 per cent of the interest earned on the above account for the maintenance of Laurier House as a museum and study centre and for the provision of sundry purchases therefrom, and that the unspent balance of the interest earned be returned at the end of the fiscal year to the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

(b) An annual payment to Public Works Canada not to exceed 70 per cent of the interest earned on the Mackenzie King trust fund and the balance of interest earned for the maintenance of Laurier House as a museum and study centre.

4. The Public Archives is the Trustee of the account and there is no remuneration.

STUDY OF CONNECTION BETWEEN WEATHER AND MIGRAINE HEADACHES

Question No. 2,028—Mr. Clarke:

1. With reference to the announcement on January 21, 1981 of an Environment Canada study which has verified a connection between weather and migraine headaches (a) over what period of time was the study conducted (b) what was the purpose of the study (c) what was the total cost to the Canadian taxpayer of the study (d) what percentage of the total cost of the study was funded by the Migraine Foundation (e) under the auspices of which branch of the Department of the Environment was the study funded (f) what follow-up study is being made in this area?

2. Does the department engage in studies of the co-relation between the environment and health on an ongoing basis and, if so, under what auspices is this undertaken?

3. Does the government donate financially to the Migraine Foundation for independent research?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment):

1. (a) Migraine data were collected for the period April 29, 1979, to December, 1979, inclusive. Analysis followed on a part-time basis during 1980.

(b) The purpose of the study was to determine which atmospheric conditions might be involved in the triggering or aggravating of migraine headaches.

(c) Total cost to the Canadian taxpayer was $4,600.

(d) 35 per cent or $2,600.

(e) Atmospheric Environment Service.

(f) None.

2. The Atmospheric Environment Service is not currently involved in such studies on an ongoing basis.

3. No.

DEPARTMENT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL—CONTRACTS FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Question No. 538—Mr. Orlikow:

1. For the fiscal year 1978-79, what contracts for professional services were let for studies, surveys and analyses into (a) present or future policies, programmes or information analysis and their efficiency and effectiveness (b) the examination of the administration or internal operation of the Department of the Solicitor General?

2. How much was committed on each contract and to whom?

Return tabled.

HOSTAGES—PRISON GUARDS OR STAFF

Question No. 1,612—Mr. Skelly:

1. Since 1960, how many prison guards/staff were taken hostage and what were their names, the dates and the locations of the incidents?

2. Since 1960, how many died in a hostage taking incident and how many were killed by (a) inmates (b) penitentiary staff and, in each case, what was his/her name, the date and the location of the incident?

Return tabled.

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada, and on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton) that the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Serge Joyal (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I rise before you today to take part in this debate somewhat like those enthusiastic and fervent pilgrims in the Middle Ages who were returning from Mount Saint-Michel, from the Ganges or from Mecca. During the sittings of the Joint Committee on the Constitution which lasted three months and a half, I had the opportunity to listen, to consider and to ponder on each and every point and objection; I did reconsider freely whether or not I should belong to this country. The witnesses who appeared before the committee did us an invaluable service by allowing its members to get out of their cities and of their villages to learn during all those sitting hours about our historical difficulties and advances, about the many facets of the people of different cultures who inhabit this huge land of ours. How could we thank the 314 individuals who, on behalf of their group, came to openly state their grievances, their expectations, their vision of this country which they would like to see fairer, more generous and more tolerant? The members of the committee had a common characteristic: they were hard working people with a keen sense of responsibility. During the 300 sitting hours the public could appreciate to what extent the members of the committee discharged to the best of their ability and in all honesty, their responsibility to assist the House in making an historic decision. I am grateful to each of them for having shown us the frustrations of Western Canadians as well as the expectation of our founding people that this country will again become a land of brotherhood and sharing. I am deeply grateful to my colleagues in Parliament and to the honourable senators for having entrusted me with those privileged duties which was essentially to help them to the best of my ability discharge their responsibilities.

[English]

I should like to thank especially the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) who is in the House today and, of course, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey), both of whom, on behalf of their parties, have maintained that confidence and that trust in the chairmen. I think if we are in a position today to debate such a proposed resolution, it is due in most part to their respect, their trust and their ability to express their opinions in a way which helps the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1600)

Mr. Joyal: I should now like to share with the House what lessons I have learned. This country, Canada, Mr. Speaker, was not built in ease and euphoria. The French settlers who came in the seventeenth century had to fight against a hostile environment at the cost of hardships difficult to imagine today before taking root in this land. In the eighteenth century, confrontation with a new occupant was a constant source of political tensions.

The rebellion of 1837 and the struggles for a responsible government took up the nineteenth century until confederation. Since 1867, Canada has witnessed a slow and lengthy process of political evolution. Step by step, it has won its autonomy, its independence, its sovereignty. Today, we have come to the last stage of the old era and the start of the new. We now face a choice, a fundamental one. We must decide what kind of country we want to build. That choice cannot be easy or devoid of growing pains. No country in the world has ever won its official independence without difficulty, without debate, without emotion, without passion. Those who would imagine that the Fathers of Confederation conceived the federal union of this country in easy discussions, in social gatherings at Charlottetown or at Quebec should read again those pages of our history. Those who would believe that the people took an active part in the efforts that led to the birth of Canada are totally mistaken. In fact, the public was almost completely excluded.

On November 7, 1864, Antoine Aimé Dorion, the hon. member for Hochelaga, my predecessor in this House, denounced before his electors the secret nature of the confederation debates saying, and I quote:

> You already know that a conference was held in Quebec City . . . The highest interests of the country were discussed at meetings held in camera . . . The lack of any official statement on the proceedings of the conference, the complete silence of the ministers of Lower Canada about the details of the coming conference seem to indicate that this measure is to be rushed through without consulting the people, without even giving them time to study its provisions and evaluating its bearing, its effects.

Today, as we debate this resolution, after 300 hours of proceedings under the light of television cameras, after inviting Canadians from every part of Canada to share their views and opinions with us, we certainly cannot make serious comparisons with the procedures followed by our predecessors.

[English]

I might add that during the 106 committee sessions the opposition spoke for two thirds of the time as follows: the official opposition used 43 per cent of the time; the New Democratic Party 22 per cent; the Liberal Party 34 per cent.

The mandate of the committee was twice extended at the request of the opposition; first until February 6 and then until February 13. Second, the opposition agreed that this was sufficient time for the committee to complete its work. Lastly, at least three million citizens were able to watch the debates, live or taped, on television.

[Translation]

The decision we are about to make for the future of our country after more than five months of sustained political debates will appear very clear to all Canadians. What does it involve? Its first objective is to correct historical anomaly, the last remnant of an obsolete colonial status. Canada is one of the seven most important countries in the western world. Next June, it will host the annual conference of the big seven and will sit with the United States, Japan, France, Great Britain, Western Germany and Italy. However, it has less control over its constitution than Vanuatu, the Seychelles or Santo Domingo.

[English]

Those who do not believe what I have just said or who think it is far-fetched only have to read the conclusions in the report of the foreign affairs committee of the British parliament to realize that all imperial pretensions are not dead.

I am referring, of course, to the view of a few hon. members and not to the view of the British government. Yet the fact remains there are a few who believe that Canada remains at the mercy of the Parliament which is not responsible, directly or indirectly, to the citizens of this country.

[Translation]

Several people, when the present move was initiated, concluded that it was meaningless and would not significantly alter the status of Canada. If the purpose were only to rid once and for all the minds of some parliamentarians of our colonial past, it would still be worthwhile. But we cannot reject all the responsibility for our present state on our mother country. It is because of our failure to agree on the means to control the fundamental changes in our Constitution that Westminster retained its colonial trusteeship. As a matter of fact, in 1931, when the Parliament of London, through the Statute of Westminster, wanted to grant its former colonies their constitutional independence, Canada, and Canada only, asked for that power to remain in London, since it could not agree on an amending procedure for the Act of 1867. This is what Mr. Ernest Lapointe, the then minister of justice, confirmed in the House on May 11, 1931, and I quote:

In that matter the imperial parliament is not really a dominating power; it acts as a trustee and as a guarantor, and merely gives effect to the will of the Canadian people.

And let us not think that the 1867 Constitution has never been amended. Quite the contrary. Since 1867, Westminster has brought in 21 amendments. How were these amendments made? In three cases, 1893, 1927 and 1931, Westminster amended the Constitution on its own to allow for a technical reform. In all other instances dealing with major changes, a request was presented either by the Canadian government, as in 1871 and 1875, or, since then, by the Canadian Parliament. Never has the British parliament refused an amendment on the basis that provincial consent had not been obtained. On the other hand, never has the British parliament accepted an amendment requested by a province. Thus in 1868, when Nova Scotia wanted out of confederation in accordance with a unanimous resolution by its assembly and a petition by 36 of the 38 assembly members, Britain replied that the Government of Canada was the only representative of the interests of the confederation before the imperial parliament. Only in one instance, in 1907, did the British parliament modify the terms of a resolution passed by the Canadian Parliament. The Canadian amendment was to increase federal subsidies to the provinces as a final and unchangeable rule, but London removed that condition because in the opinion of Sir Winston Churchill, then parliamentary under-secretary for the colonies, it seemed totally inappropriate in the legislation since Parliament could not relinquish its sovereignty and its power to amend acts.

Since 1931, spokesmen for the British government have always considered that Westminster was duty bound to agree to the requests of the Canadian Parliament. Thus, in 1940, when the unemployment insurance amendment was debated in London, the British Solicitor General stated, and I quote:

[English]

We square the legal with the constitutional position by passing these acts only in the form that the Canadian Parliament require and at the request of the Canadian Parliament.

My justification to the House for this bill—and it is important to observe this—is not on the merits of the proposal, which is a matter for the Canadian Parliament; if we were to embark upon that, we might trespass on what I conceive to be their constitutional position. The sole justification for this enactment is that we are doing in this way what the Parliament of Canada desires to do.

● (1610)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joyal: He continues:

I do not know what the view of the provincial parliaments is—It is sufficient justification for the bill that we are morally bound to act on the ground that we have here the request of the Dominion Parliament and that we must operate the old machinery which has been left over at their request in accordance with their wishes.

[Translation]

In 1943 when Quebec objected to the adoption of the amendment aimed at redistributing the seats in the House of Commons, the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, Mr. Atlee, declared, and I quote:

[English]

I have no information as to any province objecting, but, in any case, the matter is brought before us by an address voted by both Houses of Parliament, and it is difficult for us to look behind that fact.

[Translation]

Again in 1946, when Quebec objected to an amendment to change the principles of representation in the House of Commons, former Canadian prime minister Viscount Bennett stated before the House of Lords, and I quote:

[English]

Canada is the only one of the Dominions in which a party majority can amend the Constitution. They cannot amend it directly but they do it indirectly, because we have agreed that we will consent to pass any legislation that they may petition to have passed by this Parliament.

[Translation]

Similarly, in 1949, when an amendment enabling our federal Parliament to amend its own constitution was moved, no mention was made to the British Parliament that certain provinces were fiercely opposed to that amendment. The Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations said, and I quote:

[English]

The bill is cast in the terms of the address adopted by the federal Parliament of Canada and, of course, we are all ready to do what they desire.

When in 1960 we had before us the amendment providing for compulsory retirement of Superior Court judges at age 75, the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations declared, again I quote:

[English]

—legislation by the United Kingdom Parliament is still necessary where the subject of the amendment is one which affects the interests both of the federal Parliament and the provinces.

We are therefore to all intents and purposes acting in what is a formal capacity for the Canadian Parliament in a matter which is solely its concern. In accordance with long-established precedent, we refrain from discussing the merits of a Bill submitted to us amending the British North America Acts when this Bill has been introduced in consequence of Addresses to Her Majesty adopted by both Houses of the Canadian Parliament.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, the position expressed on many occasions by spokesmen of the British government cannot be misunderstood. Indeed, it is crystal clear. On 21 occasions, or each time it was asked to do so, the British Parliament agreed to a request of the Canadian Parliament without concerning itself with knowing whether the provinces had been consulted, whether they had expressed their agreement or whether they had disagreed.

Indeed, the Canadian Parliament is not required to consult the provinces and get their agreement before submitting a request to the British Parliament. The Chief Justice of the Manitoba Court of Appeal explained this quite well and substantiated it in an elaborate judgment given on February 3 last. In any case, long before this judgment was given, Canadian experts had already recognized this fact. For instance, in 1935, Professor Kennedy appeared before the Special House Committee on the Constitution of Canada and said the following on this subject:

I do not believe that the Parliament of Canada has the least legal obligation to consult the provinces in the process. This might be very good policy, but policy is not law. I believe that the Canadian Parliament can submit any request to the British Parliament.

This view was shared at this time by Professor Norman Rogers. It was also repeated before committee members by Professor Gil Rémillard, who had been invited at the suggestion of the official opposition, and by Professor Gérard Laforest, invited at the suggestion of the government party. This same view was expressed in the House by the Hon. Ernest Lapointe in 1940, by the New Brunswick premier, the Hon. Mr. McNair, in 1950 at a federal-provincial conference, and more recently, in 1978, by the Hon. Ron Basford and the Hon. Marc Lalonde. There is therefore no obligation for the government or the Canadian Parliament to consult the provinces or to obtain their consent before making a request to the British Parliament. The Manitoba Court of Appeal confirmed this once again on February 3 last. In the present context, to amend the Canadian Constitution, the Canadian Parliament can therefore submit a request to the British Parliament which, on 21 occasions since 1867, has always agreed to such requests without taking a position on their contents. Mr. Speaker, some people have thought, quite wrongly, that until now, the rule of unanimity applied. Again this week, hon. Senator Tremblay, whose integrity and commitment I respect, stated on the state-owned network that unanimity is the rule for amendments to the Constitution. According to the general impression, the provinces are better protected by the status quo which would be guaranteed by the so-called unanimity rule. According to this rule, all provinces must agree to any constitutional change. Unfortunately, as we have seen, this belief is not substantiated by our political history or the constitutional precedents.

In fact, we now have a constitutional amendment procedure which does not require the unanimous consent of the provinces, but a simple majority vote of the members of both Houses of the Canadian Parliament. Such are the teachings of history and jurisprudence. But, in my opinion, this cannot last if we want to truly really and thoroughly reorganize our federal institutions and adapt our Constitution to our present needs and future aspirations.

The Canadian Parliament must not retain this unlimited power to amend the Constitution of Canada by itself.

The rule of unanimity is an illusion behind which the provinces have taken refuge, Quebec in particular. It was not realized that this protection was a myth. Through its rejection of the amending formula in Victoria in 1971, Quebec has laid itself bare and is now shouting "rape!" That is what we must correct. The present resolution is doing just that by writing into the new Constitution the provinces' formal right to express their views on all future amendments. What this resolution sets out to do is take away from the federal government the power to amend the Constitution on its own by going to Westminster and giving the provinces the right to propose and approve any change that might affect their power. Far from taking anything from the provinces our action will confirm the partnership status of the provincial governments. The level of government that is actually losing the most power in this process is the federal Parliament.

The resolution under consideration also contains a provision that is quite fair and reasonable. In the present circumstances, as we have seen, when the federal government and the provinces disagree, the federal government alone may decide to act. From now on it will no longer have that power; it will have to come before the Canadian people which will settle the question following a national referendum.

Many people have raved about the newness and originality of that proposal. Here again, our history shows that this idea was put forward, at least since 1864, by none other than one of my predecessors in Hochelaga, the Member of Parliament, Antoine Aimé Dorion. He wrote the following in 1864, and I quote:

When it is a matter of doing nothing less than rebuilding the Constitution, laying down a new foundation for the political structure, the people, whose interests and prosperity are affected by such changes, must be consulted.

Dorion was already calling for a referendum. Later, in 1927, the Canadian League suggested the same solution before the Special Committee on the Canadian Constitution, and I quote:

[English]

That no repeal or alteration of any of the provisions of Sections 91 and 92 or of the basis of representation in the House of Commons or of the Senate shall be valid unless approved by the legislatures of a majority of the provinces or by a referendum supported by a majority of the total vote and by a majority of the voters in a majority of the provinces.

[Translation]

Two years later, in 1929, Brooke Claxton, who was to become a minister in the cabinets of Mackenzie King and St. Laurent, took up the same idea anew, and I quote:

[English]

Keeping in mind these considerations, it is suggested that power be given to the federal government to amend the BNA Act by Federal Act with the consent of the legislatures of five provinces or alternatively at the option of the federal government, a favourable vote on a referendum of the majority of votes in the country and in at least five provinces.

[Translation]

That was in 1929, Mr. Speaker. That same year, the Manitoba Free Press took a stand and published the following:

[English]

The Dominion parliament, we suggest, should, subject to limitations covering the rights of minorities, have the power to pass legislation amending the BNA Act; and this should come into effect unless a certain number of provinces, by their governments, ask for a vote of the people. In that event a national referendum should be held, ratification being contingent upon a majority vote over the whole Dominion and in five of the nine provinces.

The suggestion that the Canadian people should be called upon to take decisions in difficult situations is not new. In 1916, the Manitoba legislature intended to enforce its legislations by way of referenda. Newfoundland joined confederation in 1949 following a referendum. In May of last year, Quebec held a referendum when it tried to change the nature of its ties with the rest of Canada. Last fall, the Alberta government introduced a bill to authorize, if needed, the holding of a referendum. Whoever claims that the concept of a referendum is entirely foreign to the Canadian constitutional reality is ignorant of our tradition, both past and present. Who can object to the Canadian Parliament holding a referendum to decide upon a basic issue when the provinces intend to use such a mechanism either to join or leave the Canadian federation? Who can object to the Canadian people deciding, when the 11 first ministers fail to agree on the basic changes which our institutions and legislations require? Britain itself, when it considered joining the Common Market in 1971, held its own referendum.

The suggestion that such a mechanism is inconsistent with our tradition is absurd. In today's world, a referendum is the only way to associate the will of the people with changes which have become necessary. That is obvious. In holding a referendum, the Canadian Parliament is asking the Canadian people to exercise the power to decide upon whatever changes are wanted. Theirs will be the last word. Those changes, Mr. Speaker, have become imperative. As a matter of fact, Canadians have for a long time deplored the colonial status of their Constitution. In 1931, Henri Bourassa made the following statement in the House, and I quote:

It is not without a certain amount of shame that I realize that in this year 1931, Canada is still lagging behind all the other dominions in the exercise of unreserved autonomy.

In 1949, the then Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, made the following statement at a dinner given in his honour at the Royal York Hotel by the mayor and council of the city of Toronto, and I quote:

We Liberals also feel that we should find a way to amend our Constitution right here in Canada. This will not be easy. We do not want a Constitution that is too rigid, however we want to be sure that our Constitution includes the most complete safeguards for provincial rights, the rights of both official languages, and all other historical rights that are the sacred heritage of our national union.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the purpose of our efforts. We want to fulfil now the hope expressed for so long by ensuring that our Constitution protects the rights and freedoms of all Canadians. Canadians generally have a feeling that the basic rights and freedoms are very well protected in Canada. However, even though Canada maintains a good record as compared to other nations, our history is not beyond reproach. The period before confederation shows many instances of discrimination, often violent. Some of the more obvious cases were the genocide of Beothuk Indians in Newfoundland, riots between Orangemen and Roman Catholics in Bytown in 1848 and, in the Toronto of 1858, anti-French and anti-Catholic prejudice, the acceptance of slavery, as well as obvious prejudice against negroes later on.

In 1857, the attitude prevailing then was reflected in the Ontario legislature when Colonel J. Prince described the Negroes as follows, and I quote from his remarks in a Canadian legislature:

—the greatest calamity ever known in the two evil counties I have the honour of representing.

The immigration policy of the new Canadian nation in 1867 was also discriminatory in nature favouring as it did the British and Europeans as opposed to Orientals and others. The thousands of Chinese who came to British Columbia in the 1880s were slaves to all practical purposes, to the extent that Chinese companies literally sold them under contract to Canadian mining and railway companies. Their living conditions and the general manner in which they were treated were simply not human. Let us not forget that the Dominion Elections Act of 1885 provided, and I quote:

The expression "person" means any male person, including an Indian, and excluding a person of Mongolian or Chinese race;

No later than in 1975, there were 20 Canadian immigration officers scattered across the United Kingdom whereas there were only four in the New Delhi office to deal with all the applications filed by Indian applicants. In 1955, the Minister of Immigration stated the following, and I quote:

I do not believe that any immigrant, wherever he comes from or whatever his skills, is worth a Canadian baby because the former must learn to be a Canadian whereas the latter is a Canadian from the very beginning.

During the depression years, the Ku Klux Klan was strongly rooted in some parts of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Ontario. The Regina riot in 1935 and the general strike in Winnipeg provided many cases of violation of civil liberties. Later on, during World War II, 23,000 Canadians of Japanese origin were interned in various parts of Canada under the War Measures Act, even though 75 per cent of them had been born in Canada and many of them had been genuine Canadians for several generations. At about the same time, Jehovah Witnesses were outlawed; in 1940, 29 members of this sect were sentenced to one year in jail.

In 1953, 1955 and 1957, the Quebec Padlock Act, the regulations restricting the distribution of religious literature, were challenged before the courts. Not so long ago, in 1974, in the Laval vs Bédard case, the Supreme Court ruling clearly emphasized the weakness and flimsiness of the Canadian Bill of Rights which everybody thought was adequate protection. That is what must be prevented today. Our own history is not beyond reproach. Our statutes are not stringent enough. We know about the Indian Act and its discriminatory provisions regarding Indian women; that must be kept from happening in our Canada of the future and that is what the proposal before us is all about.

In Manila, in the Philippines, Pope John Paul II said on Tuesday and I quote:

Nothing can justify a breach of human rights even in exceptional circumstances.

Governments are there, he said, to serve the people and protect their dignity. They cannot pretend to serve the people's interests when they do not respect basic individual rights.

Human rights are paramount.

—strongly claimed the Pope.

What does the official opposition suggest? That the charter of rights and freedoms be referred to the provinces? But this would simply kill our proposal. Let us recall again the statements made last fall by the premiers: seven of them strongly opposed the entrenchment of a Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in the Constitution of Canada, and now this is what the Premier of Manitoba had to say:

● (1620)

[English]

—while Manitoba actively supports the protection of human rights it opposes the entrenchment of a charter of rights on principle.

[Translation]

The Premier of Saskatchewan, the Hon. Allan Blakeney, a man whom every member in this House would have thought to be all out in favour of human rights has said and I quote:

[English]

Saskatchewan is not in favour of entrenching in the Canadian Constitution the human rights which are ordinarily referred to as fundamental rights or legal rights or as the case may be. I share with Premier Lyon this view—

[Translation]

The Premier of British Columbia has said:

[English]

B.C. believes that individual rights and fundamental freedoms must be protected but we remain satisfied that the most appropriate method is through the exercise of the authority of the legislatures of the provinces and the Parliament of this nation.

[Translation]

The Premier of Alberta has stated and I quote:

[English]

So we come down to a conclusion that the better way to protect the rights of the citizens of our province . . . is . . . to leave that responsibility to the elected representatives.

[Translation]

The premiers of Quebec, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia have expressed exactly the same views, that within their provincial borders rights are not threatened. There lies the Achilles' heel, the weakness of the provincial position. Everything is seen, gauged, weighed, thought out, in a strictly limited perspective confined to the territory of one province.

[English]

Canada is more than the sum of its ten provinces. Ten provincial flags will never make a Canadian flag. Ten provincial charters of rights are not a Canadian charter of rights and liberties. Two provincial charters which protect the rights of the handicapped will never protect the rights of all the handicapped in Canada.

Canada is more than the sum of its parts. Canada is a society whose citizens have equal rights and liberties wherever they live, wherever they move or wherever they want to live.

Canada is a dream; a dream of equality, a dream of liberty, a dream in which the right to be different is guaranteed in the basic law, in which the rights of Canadians as Canadians, because they belong to this country, are the same everywhere, whether they are men or women, native or from mother countries, or whether they are immigrants full of hope who have just arrived dreaming of liberty and justice.

● (1630)

Quebecers had a unique opportunity to proclaim their unswerving loyalty to this country and their faith is this resolution on May 20. My generation of Quebecers believes in Canada because they are convinced this country can be a society where the freedom to be, the right to be different, the opportunity to develop one's potential can be guaranteed in the fundamental law of the country. There are not ten Canadas, there is only one whose new foundations it behooves us to define. We do not want to retreat behind our differences, or use our French cultural identity as an excuse or a plea to refuse to join in and partake of this great Canadian endeavour which may require some adjustments in our liberties but which, in the long run, will be beneficial to more people. Sir Wilfrid Laurier understood that very well. In 1897, in Paris, he recalled the decision that Quebec politicians had had to take after the 1837 rebellion. He said and I quote:

> Those of my fellow citizens who when confronted with this double provision believed in isolating themselves and not taking any part in the national development were not few. Mr. Lafontaine who, at the time, in the absence of Mr. Papineau then in exile, was the most competent man among us, was more highly inspired. I agree entirely with his way of thinking. He thought that to isolate oneself was always an error and that, for us, particularly, to isolate ourselves would be to bury ourselves in mediocrity.

That, Mr. Speaker, is our option, my option: As we enter the first stage in the reform of our institutions and legislation, I strongly believe that this resolution deserves the support of all Canadians because it provides essential safeguards for the preservation of their identity and the best way to achieve their ideal of a freer and more just country.

[English]

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased and honoured that I was able to be in the House today to hear the speech of the hon. member who just took his seat, the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal). Those of us who sat in the committee for any length of time were very much aware of the difficult task of the chairman in having to preside over the committee, especially for somebody of the character and personality of the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve who has the reputation in this place for being somewhat of a maverick, and I say that as a compliment. He had to sit there and not say anything; but indeed, in sitting there he presided over that committee with a degree of fairness, impartiality and dignity that I have not seen around here for a long time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I am, I will say, a little sad that the hon. member, in finally getting a chance to have his say, has said a number of things with which I would find myself fundamentally and basically in disagreement. I thought he and I were philosophical soul mates. Indeed, I suspect, Mr. Speaker, that if he searched deeply within his soul, he would probably find—and I am not accusing him of intellectual dishonesty—if he came from a province which did not enjoy the veto which the province of Quebec does under the amending formula proposed in the bill before us, that the procedures are as abhorrent to him as we on this side of the House find them to be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I want to pay tribute to my leader, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the former prime minister of Canada, who stood alone without an opportunity to consult his colleagues on October 2 and went against what seemed to be at that time the popular wisdom in the country when he said, "Hold on, it is our duty to oppose this." He was the one at that time to identify what the referendum procedure would do to this federation and this country, today and in the future. So we wish to express a debt of gratitude to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition because it was that opposition which touched off the debate which took place, first in the House, then in committee, and which today is back in the House. That opposition is very important, and the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve would be the first to agree that it is a very essential part of the process which is taking place here today.

I should also like to join with others in paying tribute to my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), who has carried out the responsibility of being the chairman of our committee on the Constitution with a great deal of dedication, devotion and patience, and I thank him. I am grateful to have the opportunity to thank him publicly for the leadership he has provided us in that committee.

I should like as well to pay tribute to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), who unfortunately is not in the House at present, for the outstanding work he has done in the committee as his party's chief spokesman. Believe me, I do not do so because the hon. member has announced he is going to split with his party. I would have taken the opportunity to do so anyway because we were all impressed by the very constructive and difficult role performed by him. We knew, those of us who worked with him, that he did not subscribe to the position of his party, and yet he put that position forward, as was his responsibility and duty. I congratulate him and his three colleagues—and especially I congratulate the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville because he is his party's spokesman on the Constitution, so the decision was perhaps more difficult for him—for announcing that they cannot support this package. That, of course, is consistent with the position which the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville took when this measure first came before this House.

Perhaps I might as well put on the record that just a few hours ago the Premier of Saskatchewan held a press conference at which he announced that he could not support this package. He was provincial premier number eight to do so. That means there are eight provinces today in this country which are opposing the process and the substantive parts of what is in this measure before us. The Premier of Saskatchewan said:

I was disturbed because I felt his action would widen the divisions in Canada.

Then he went on to say:

I was disturbed because while the September first ministers' conference failed, agreement on a compromise package of reforms had been so very close.

● (1640)

That was the message all premiers brought to us as they appeared before the committee.

The government can talk all it wants about the second phase of these negotiations. There are very important matters to be dealt with in the second phase. For example, we have been told that a preamble to the charter of rights is something which must come in the second phase of negotiations. We have been told that offshore rights, fisheries jurisdiction and a number of other questions must come in the second phase. But let us think for a moment about the climate which has been created for that second phase of negotiations. Realistically it is not a climate which is conducive to productive agreement on the second or third phase of the Constitution. The government will be sitting down with ten premiers, eight of whom feel that the process is illegitimate, to say the least, and that the government has violated the pact of confederation with its charter of rights and amending formula which transgress areas of provincial jurisdiction. They will do an end run around provincial legislatures, relegating them to nothing but mere municipal councils. This kind of atmosphere would not be conducive to agreement on anything. So, there will be no second phase for some time to come, and that is a tragedy.

I could talk about the charter of rights. A number of my colleagues spoke with a great deal of compassion about the most important and basic right of all—the right to life—and the impact the charter of rights could have on the question of abortion. What will probably happen is that the abortion question will be decided in the cold, harsh, cruel light of the interpretation of the exact wording of the law, not in an atmosphere where human dimensions and social pressures of the time will be brought to bear on that very important question.

Somebody said before the committee that there are two parts to the law. There is the bare bones of the law, but then there is convention and practice which clothe the law in flesh and blood. The flesh and blood element is not a part and, indeed, should not be a part of the judicial process; but it should be and has been up to now an important part of this legislative process.

The right to hold property is basic in a free and democratic society. It was denied us in committee. It had been promised us, then it was denied us. I could talk about property rights and what they will mean. I know how a grandson of an immigrant in Saskatchewan would feel if his grandfather had come to this country looking for land and the freedom which land provides, if he had cleared that land with his bare hands, if that quarter section or whatever was his. How do we explain to that gentleman that his Constitution denies or does not recognize his right to hold and enjoy property?

Mr. Blaikie: You are full of it.

Mr. McGrath: I heard the interjection of the hon. gentleman. It is worthy to note that the opposition to the right to hold property came from the province of Saskatchewan, which has that very right written into its own charter of rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Now, how is that for a double standard? I suspect my hon. socialist friends find that the truth hurts.

I could talk about the rerouting of the charter. The hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve said, "How are you going to get agreement from the provinces if you reroute the charter?" If we agreed to reroute the charter, we would be creating a better climate of co-operation in the country. Because in so doing, we would be recognizing what the provinces have been saying, that is, that under the balance of power of our federation there are two jurisdictions in Canada, and we must respect both jurisdictions. This process of unilateral action and this entrenchment of a charter denies the rights of the provinces to have their jurisdiction protected, protection which I submit is accorded to them under the provisions of the Constitution.

Also the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve talked about the importance of the charter of rights in protecting human rights and fundamental freedoms. I happen to hold very strongly the opposite view. I would say, with respect to my hon. friend, that the entrenchment of a charter of rights in the Constitution will not by and of itself protect human rights and fundamental freedoms. I give him proof of that statement. What about the Japanese Americans who were the first to be interned? What protection did they have under the United States constitution with its entrenched charter of rights? They were the first to violate and take away the civil and human rights of the Japanese citizens of that country. Indeed, it was pressure from them which forced Canada to do the same thing.

My colleagues have talked about the constitution of the Soviet Union and the rights enshrined in it. I should like to give a better example. India is one of the few countries in the Commonwealth which has maintained the parliamentary system and entrenched a charter of rights. We can take a look at the record of civil rights and fundamental freedoms in India. At the present time it has suspended its constitutional rights for a year. We know what happened during the previous regime of Madam Gandhi when people had no fundamental rights or freedoms, notwithstanding the glowing terms of the entrenched rights contained in the constitution of India.

Then I look at the few countries in the Commonwealth which have not entrenched charters of rights and I find they have one significant thing in common. These are the countries which have the best record of protection of fundamental rights and freedoms of all the countries in the world. I will name them: the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I believe we will live to regret what we are doing here today. When the fathers of our country 113 years ago put together the present Constitution—in its written form, the British North America Act—they opted for the British tradition. As we know, there are two traditions for constitutions. There is the written tradition. For example, after a bloody civil war or a revolution, the Americans decided to sit down and write a constitution, as did the French. Then there is the British tradition where there is an evolution of a constitution based on the historic rights and privileges of a people as they develop and are transgressed. The ultimate protection of fundamental rights and freedoms is contained in the Parliament of the United Kingdom or up to the present day in the Parliament of Canada.

We are setting up in this country a parallel legislature because the Supreme Court of Canada, as it is faced with questions based on the charter of rights, will eventually have to legislate; we all know what happened and what is happening in the United States of America. I personally think that will be a regrettable day for Canada. But that is not the majority view and, in a democracy I prescribe to the majority view, and will reluctantly go along with the charter. I believe it is a better charter because of the deliberations of the committee. I do not want to suggest that because I participated in that committee, because we participated in that committee, or because we were successful in getting six or seven amendments. I do not want to suggest for a moment that in any way legitimizes the process. We were merely carrying out our responsibilities as legislators. How often do we deal with bills in the House upon which there is fundamental disagreement? As parliamentarians what do we do? Do we wash our hands and merely walk away? That is not the tradition of Parliament. We must sit and try to make a bad bill into a better one. That was the attitude we took in the committee. We had to sit and try to make a bad charter into a better one. As a result, I believe we have a better charter of rights today.

The famous Kirby document has a number of things to say. What is interesting about the Kirby document is that it has consistently recommended the government's game plans. It said this:

> The probability of an agreement is not high. Unilateral action is therefore a distinct possibility. In the event unilateral action becomes necessary, ministers should understand that the fight in Parliament and the country will be very, very rough. For, as Machiavelli said:

It is very interesting that the document should quote Machiavelli.

> It should be borne in mind that there is nothing more difficult to arrange, more doubtful of success, and more dangerous to carry through than initiating changes in a state's constitution.

What we propose to do here today is deny the federal concept, the federal character of Canada. I hear hon. members asking what the ultimate resolution of this argument will be. One would say that that argument would lead you to separatism. I was one who fought against my province joining Canada. I would fight today against my province separating from Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I would fight equally hard for my province to maintain its political entity and its sovereignty within the federation we call Canada.

The Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) in a good speech to the House yesterday said something which has been said before by other ministers. I quote:

> I urge the House, as the only body that truly represents all Canadian citizens, to accept this resolution—imperfect as it may be in this or that detail, but in whole an imaginative and fair response to the challenges of our country.

The minister says, "as the only body that truly represents all Canadian citizens." What about the legislature of the province of Newfoundland, does it not represent Canadian citizens? What about the national assembly of the province of Quebec, does it not represent Canadian citizens? What about the assembly of the province of Alberta, does it not speak for Canadian citizens? What about British Columbia? The government has a role to play, but for it to suggest that this is the only legislative body in the country which can speak for Canadians as a whole is to adopt a unitary concept of Canada and deny ipso facto its federal nature. I regret that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I reject that, Mr. Speaker. I believe the federal nature of Canada will ultimately be destroyed if we persist.

I have a few minutes left, Mr. Speaker. I have had to search my soul, as have we all, because whether we think the process is legitimate or not, we are involved in it. We must ask ourselves what is the bottom line? We must ask ourselves what is the least we will accept? All right; the government refuses to reroute the charter back to the provinces where the atmosphere, because of the climate in the country, I suggest is such that you would get agreement. The government refuses to do that and I must live with that. I hope my children's rights will be protected.

It bases the amending process on the Victoria formula, so it will not budge from that. It must go into the package. There is one part of the package that, as a Canadian having a dedication to my country as a whole and a responsibility to my province as a unit, I reject outright, and that is the concept that the Government of Canada can at any time declare a deadlock and do an end-run around the provincial legislatures of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I reject that because it denies my province the rights we thought we were enshrining in our Constitution in 1949; that is, while we could be part of the greater nation of Canada we could still continue to maintain our political and cultural institutions within the federal system of Canada. That is the point which must be made. That is what is being denied us today.

There are none of us in the House who have an edge on patriotism or love of country. Indeed, somebody can say patriotism is the last refuge of this country. I make no excuse for the fact that I love this country. But equally, I love my province. I believe I have a responsibility to my province and if I fulfil and carry out that responsibility I am being a good Canadian and a good member of this federal nation of Canada. We must all carry out that responsibility to our provinces.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that my bottom line—and I say this to the people of Newfoundland and I will probably find myself in disagreement with the Premier of Newfoundland—is that if this package goes out of this Parliament with all its objectionable features I will suggest to the British Parliament, as a Canadian, "Hands off!"

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: The British Parliament has had its study. It knows what its constitutional position is, and it knows what are its constitutional responsibilities. But it has no business in examining a measure placed before it under a constitutional amending formula by a sovereign, independent and proud country. I will say this, Mr. Speaker; they did not ask for it. We have no right to send this package to Britain until the Supreme Court of Canada has had an opportunity to rule whether it is constitutional.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: To do so would run the risk of the national shame and embarrassment of having the Parliament of Great Britain reject a measure placed before it by the majority of the votes of the Parliament of Canada.

Finally, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if the government's majority has its way and obtains its amending referendum formulas, which will make the provinces and legislatures mere municipalities in terms of their relationship to the federal government, no province in Canada which holds to the position that the process is illegitimate and, hence, unconstitutional, and that the amending formula is ultra vires of the provincial constitutions, should have to accept this package. In my opinion any province could legally hold that the Government of Canada which tries to do an end-run around any provincial legislature could say, "No dice, it does not apply to us."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: That is the kind of Canada, the kind of division and the kind of future this government, by its unilateral action, has mapped out for itself. I hope this debate will be allowed to continue, Mr. Speaker.

I had a woman come to see me today because she discovered that the section protecting the denominational schools does not protect private schools in British Columbia.

● (1700)

As long as we can keep this debate going we can find and correct anomalies in the bill. My God, what is six months or a year compared to a constitution that is supposed to last us a lifetime? Remember, what we are doing here today is for the future of Canada. We must be very careful that what we do is done as well as we can to protect Canada, to protect the federal nature of Canada, because if we do not, Mr. Speaker, then the country is in for a long period of trauma, discord and chaos. For a country like Canada with such promise, with such a future, with so many important economic questions facing it today, that in my view would be a tragedy in the extreme.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows:

the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis)—The Environment—Niagara River source of Great Lakes pollution; the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn)—Fitness and Amateur Sport—Ottawa Citizen indoor games—Alleged payments to participating athletes; the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Wright)—National Energy Program—Financial effect of proposed oil industry nationalization.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions, private bills and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is at this point that I would ask the House to agree to stand all items under the heading notices of motions. We have, however, a point of order which has been raised on several occasions by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) and I think it would be consistent and a courtesy to him that prior to requesting hon. members to stand all items preceding order No. 43, we deal with the point of order raised by that hon. member. I want to do that with as little interference with the private members' hour as possible.

[English]

I hope I am consistent with the hon. member's views when I say that the point of order he raises relates to the matter of private members' public bills which have been accepted under our system called the draw and drawn on the basis of title. There are, I think, some 300 private members' public bills in the draw and something over 200 have no text or bill, if I may use that expression for the moment, and I will come back to that.

The question raised is whether or not the House can continually proceed by unanimous consent or by request of the government to stand private members' public bills when in fact no bill exists. That is the essence.

It is appropriate to remind hon. members that under this system the practice has been to permit hon. members to submit only the title and not the entire bill, therefore the Chair is in the peculiar position of attempting to proceed in a way, according to the bill of the House, that private members' bills can be given second reading, and at the same time try to deal with this fiction which exists, the very point raised by the hon. member for Vaudreuil, who points out that it is rather difficult to stand a bill if no bill exists.

I would indicate briefly that all other arguments and considerations having been reviewed, there still remains the simple and basic problem the hon. member raises: how can we stand a bill if no bill exists?

It is the conclusion of this occupant of the chair that we cannot do it. Accordingly, the objection raised by the hon. member is accepted.

It follows from this point on, with an exception I will mention in a moment, the House will not be asked to stand non-existent bills. Because of the practice of submitting titles for the draw, that kind of decision would place hon. members in a very difficult situation, particularly those whose titles have been brought to the attention of the House and therefore the Chair.

Out of courtesy and consideration for hon. members, there ought to be a period of time during which some adjustment can be made. Consequently, for the next 30 days, those hon. members who wish to submit the text of their bills through the Clerk of the House, will have their bills printed and those bills will follow the normal course and be attributed the normal rights to be printed, and dealt with in private members' hour. Those hon. member who do not see fit to pursue the drafting of their bills and to provide the House with a text will lose their position on the Order Paper.

That raises a question as to whether or not this in fact is the best expression of the will of the House. The responsibility of the Chair is simply to examine the facts and come to a conclusion. Hon. members may very well wish to find some better method of dealing with private members' bills and the fact of there being hundreds with no text. That is not a matter for the Chair to decide but one for the hon. members to review and decide for themselves.

The decision I am now making is not made alone, and I would want to express the view of other occupants of the chair and the Table to the effect that we understand quite well that this raises some difficulty for hon. members fortunate enough to have the titles of their intended bills brought before the House; however, the conclusion I have reached is that this is the business of hon. members to deal with as they see fit, and the Chair will co-operate in every way possible to assist the members in finding a satisfactory solution.

I will now deal with Standing Order 19. Standing Order 19(2) reads as follows:

> Orders not proceeded with when called, upon the like request, may be allowed to stand retaining their precedence;

Therefore, one wonders whether or not this ruling goes against the will of the House as expressed in the Standing Orders. The only argument I can present to hon. members is that it is difficult enough for the Chair to apply the Standing Orders from time to time and to try to understand the will of members, but if we go past that and proceed on the assumption that the Chair is going to further the fiction referred to earlier, I think the Chair is in an impossible position. It is the opinion of the Chair that the hon. member for Vaudreuil is quite correct in his view that unless the text of a bill has been submitted to the Clerk it cannot continue to stand on the Order Paper. I said, as a convenience to hon. members the ruling will be put in abeyance for a period of 30 days to give hon. members an opportunity to reorganize their titles in such a fashion as to provide a text with them.

• (1710)

Mr. Herbert: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) rises on a point of order as well. Perhaps it is appropriate that I ask the hon. member for Vaudreuil to give the hon. member for Yukon an opportunity to comment on the ruling, which I think is what he wants to do.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I rise not so much to comment on the ruling as to try to remove a difficulty from the Chair because I firmly believe the problem is one that should be resolved by hon. members themselves. As a result, if hon. members saw fit, I would move:

That the question of only the title of many private members' public bills being included in the draw and so introduced and the problem of determining the procedural acceptability of all bills contained in the draw and introduced be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedures and Organization.

If the House is in accord I would be prepared to so move.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): We are dealing with matters procedural and I have to observe to the hon. member for Vaudreuil that he has put forward a motion on a point of order. Our Standing Orders do not permit him to do so but we will find a way around that in a moment, if, in fact, it is the will of the House to proceed in the manner which the hon. member for Vaudreuil chooses.

I actually wanted to recognize the hon. member for Yukon.

Mr. Nielsen: I knew you did, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to comment on your ruling. That is a habit I never indulge in, commenting on rulings from the Chair. I assume the officers of the House have had some discussion with the Printing Bureau and have some reasonable assurance that the number of bills without texts, perhaps 200 or 300, I do not know, can be printed within the 30-day time limit suggested by the Chair. I assume the Chair has that assurance.

While the Chair did not directly state in its ruling that the bills would remain standing on the Order Paper in the order in which they now appear for that 30-day period, I drew the inference that that was so by the inclusion in the ruling of the statement that unless the text of the bill was provided within the 30 days it would not stand.

If the Chair could assure me on both points I think the procedure suggested in the ruling would be acceptable. It would be protective of private members' rights with regard to the measures they have on the Order Paper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Perhaps I ought not to enter into an assurance on a one by one basis. But I think the two points raised by the hon. member are very well raised and I shall deal with them right away so that other hon. members who may have a problem in this regard may feel relieved.

On the question of whether it is feasible to print, in the first instance I am assured it is, and in the second instance I tend to be rather old-fashioned and think that nothing shall impede the will of hon. Members of Parliament when they act and state in concert their wishes. Whether it is a problem or not is irrelevant; it has to be fixed if that is the wish of the hon. members, that is not a problem; neither in practice nor in theory.

The second question the hon. member raised is whether in the 30-day period private members' public bills would continue to be stood or not. I have not dealt with this for the simple reason that it is a matter of the will of the House. I will be putting that question to hon. members. In so far as it may be of assistance to the hon. member for Yukon, I would certainly recommend, as I did, that during the 30-day period no members' rights would be adversely affected. That is the question I will shortly be putting, whether orders prior to No. 43 shall in fact be permitted to stand. I would assume it is the wish of the House that during the 30-day period, no member would lose any rights he has at the present time.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the rights and privileges of all members, certainly that would be acceptable to us but we would need some prior indication before the question you are about to put is put, that it meets the general wishes of the House. If it does not, then I believe, since we are rather sparse in numbers this afternoon, perhaps more adequate and reasonable notice might be given so that members would be present in greater numbers to express their wishes on a matter as important as this. I think this would be required under the rules.

Your Honour referred to some discussions which took place. I am unaware of those. It may well be that there have been discussions with House leaders. If there is some indication that the question Your Honour is about to put is going to be accepted, then I have no problem, but, if there is any indication that it is not going to be accepted, then I think more reasonable notice should be given with respect thereto.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I must be expressing myself badly. I am going to put the normal question to hon. members as to whether they agree that by unanimous consent certain orders in this case all orders numbered prior to No. 43 should stand. That is done in every private members' hour. I have no idea whether it is the will of members that they stand or do not stand, but it is the will of members and not the will of the Chair that will affect the decision. We can proceed without difficulty in that regard.

As is normally the case, in the event there is not unanimous consent then they can stand in any case at the request of the government. I do not see that as a problem.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I see no difficulty with the latter point, namely, the order in which bills stay on the Order Paper. That is for the House to decide, but I think all of us would agree that any rights members had when the draw was made under the practice that then obtained should not be altered, in the present process, at least during the 30-day period.

The second thing I would like to say is, I assume what is meant by 30 days' grace is that within that 30-day period the member files his text with the table; whether it is printed or not is a mechanical problem that should not bother us.

The other point I want to make is to the effect that if there are 100 or so such bills on the order paper, I am sure that many of them are in the names of members who are not here—they may read Hansard or not—I think it would be a matter of courtesy, if this is put into effect, that a letter be sent from the Chair or the table to each member who has a bill on the Order Paper that has not been printed because he has not supplied the text. I may have eight or nine bills there but they are all printed, so Your Honour does not have to write me a letter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member has expressed himself, from the point of view of the Chair, perfectly. I think the suggestion that hon. members be advised by some form of letter or notice is an excellent one and that will be done.

I want to underline again, so that there can be no question, that no rights of any hon. member will be in any way reduced or affected over the 30-day period. That is why this has been put in, so that hon. members can come to the conclusion whether or not they want to proceed and to provide the text.

Mr. Collenette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There are a couple of things that I want to raise. I am very glad you made this decision. I think all members realize we are not commenting on your decision, we are merely seeking clarification. That is what has gone on in the last few minutes so that we cannot at some future stage say this decision of the Speaker was being questioned. It is merely clarification of how this is going to work and we on this side are perfectly happy with it.

A few minutes ago the hon. member for Vaudreuil indicated that if he got consent he might proceed with a motion to refer this entire subject matter to committee. The reason I am speaking now is to point out that if he seeks leave to put that motion, it is not debatable. He must have the leave of the House and if someone says no, then I cannot say what I was about to suggest. I would ask the indulgence of the House on this point.

It is well known that the government in the speech from the Throne talked about electoral and parliamentary reform in general. I would say that consent would not be forthcoming from one, as a member, on the grounds that this matter should be dealt with in the general context of parliamentary reform. We hope to be dealing with that later on in the session. I hope the hon. member for Vaudreuil will take this into account. It is not a question of stalling, it is a question of propriety; of perhaps not putting references to standing committees in isolation, of the general approach all parties will be anxious to see taken later on.

Mr. Nielsen: It is a question of members being given notice.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, hon. members have admonished me for trying to put a motion on a point of order. I was only suggesting what the motion could be, and I hope you realize that.

The important point is that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, as far as I understand it, has not met within the last three years. It might be just as well to give it a little bit of work to do. That is why I suggested, instead of this subject being debated here, where we could go on at considerably length that it be removed from this debating period and sent to a committee for study. At some future date the report of the committee will be brought to this House. I think the problem should be taken out of the hands of the Chair because I do not think it has anything to do with the Chair. The members themselves are the ones who will have to decide in the final analysis how they want to operate their own private members' hour.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, there are far too many members who are not here, members who have bills on the Order Paper and who would like to have notice of any such suggested procedure. On that ground alone, in the absence of so many members who have bills on the Order Paper, I do not think that procedure would be appropriate today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The remarks of the hon. member for Yukon and the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council make it clear, as between proceeding by way of unanimous consent to send the matter off to the committee on procedure and organization or by another method or consultation among House leaders or something of that nature, that there is not unanimous consent to put a motion before the House to refer this entire subject to the committee. I will take that as the situation in view of the comments made. I do not think it is necessary to put the question. One presumes those members who have pursued an interest in the subject today will want to communicate with one another in some fashion in order to discuss more fully the entire question of hon. members' rights in private members' hour and the question as well of private members' public bills.

I think we have now covered the matter and we should go on with private members' hour, of which 23 minutes have now passed. I am advised there will be royal assent at 5.45 p.m. I do not know whether the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will want to proceed with his bill. However, before he does I will revert to the normal practice.

Is there unanimous consent that all orders preceding No. 43 shall stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

[English]

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ABOLITION OF THE SENATE

On the Order: Private Members' Public Bills.

Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of Bill C-243, an act to amend the British North America Act, 1867 (abolition of the Senate).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In that case we will proceed, until I receive notice that the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod is here; we will proceed on the basis that so much time has gone by and that perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) might not want to proceed.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, you raise an interesting question. I have always found it difficult to get the Senate abolished in an hour. When that hour is cut down to about 20 minutes, I think that it puts quite a handicap before me. I do know that usually the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod is late—he never gets here on time, but that I suppose is a point of order. I would not mind settling for the House having a half an hour to debate my bill today, but if the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod does arrive at 5.45 p.m. and we have not had much time on this bill, maybe the House would consent to it being at the top of the list of bills the next time for another half hour? My suggestion is put with the condition that it depends on when the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod arrives.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, from our point I think this would be agreeable. Quite often on Thursdays on notice of motions for the production of papers private members' hour does end prematurely. Perhaps we could stipulate that when and if we arrive at this situation in the future on a Thursday, namely, instead of calling it six o'clock we may proceed with the balance of the minutes outstanding on the bill in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, that arrangement is satisfactory to me. I am glad the hon. member assumes that I will be here.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, we will agree to that procedure today. As for the future, perhaps it should be a matter to be discussed as suggested by the Chair.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I am agreeable to that procedure. However, we should go on notice now as having a point of order in connection with this bill which we are leaving aside because of the limited time at our disposal. I assume the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will be prepared to argue the particular point in question the next time the bill is called.

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I am seeking information as to whether or not we can delay recognizing the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod at the door of the House until such time as the half hour in today's debate has expired. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would have had his opportunity and there would be a portion of time to get some response to his proposal before we recognize the call at the door for us to go to the other place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The House can do as it wishes. It is somewhat similar to God; there are no limitations on the will of the House. There are a lot of limitations on the Chair though so I am not in a position to unilaterally declare what the House ought to do. I can only attempt to further the will of the House. If some hon. member, including the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) wishes to raise a motion of that nature, I suppose I will have to deal with it. In the meantime, my sense of the House is that that may not be the case, and I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rising. I suspect what will be proposed is what has already been proposed namely, that we get on with Bill C-243 otherwise we will be all night just debating procedure.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I was not proposing that we keep the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod waiting at the door. I merely suggested that what we do another day be determined by how many minutes we have today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): That is understood.

I now have to deal with the point raised by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) who made a point but did not explain it. I think what he was alluding to was a question as to the admissibility of this bill. I am waiting to see whether that is the case.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, in the remaining time of about 15 minutes it might be just as well to come to the point right away, and at least some of the arguments will have been presented. Essentially the bill to be discussed in private members' hour is a bill which, as a result of past rulings, and I refer to a ruling which came from the Supreme Court of Canada, is no longer subject to passage through this House of Commons.

If a bill cannot come to a vote, then I suggest it is equally not admissible for discussion. I could elaborate at length, but I suggest to you—and I was not wanting to get a ruling today for the obvious reason—that I was prepared to listen to the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as I felt that was appropriate in the circumstances. I still hope he will have the opportunity, if not today, at least the next time the bill is called, which may be as early as next week, to present his point of view, repetitious though it may be, because I have listened to him give the speech on this subject on several previous occasions and, undoubtedly, it is not likely to contain much new material. Nevertheless, since all of us are most interested—

An hon. Member: You never know.

Mr. Herbert: Since all of us are interested in the composition of the Senate in varying degrees—in fact, I discussed this subject on the floor of the House just a few weeks ago—I would be prepared to hear if there are any new arguments in view of the Supreme Court ruling.

The point is that under these circumstances I would certainly oppose such a bill ever coming to a vote in this House, and the object of presenting any bill—even in the private members' hour, where so little ever comes to a vote—is to attempt to get people to make up their minds and decide an issue by a vote on the floor of the House. If the Chair will eventually rule that that is not possible then, theoretically, there should be no discussion.

As I say, I did not want to argue this procedural point today, because I wanted to hear from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. However, possibly what we will do now is discuss the procedure until Black Rod appears; hopefully, not putting you in a position of having to make any ruling. Next week we can listen to the hon. member present his arguments on Senate reform, or "abolition" as he puts it. At the end of that period of time, we will probably hear from the Chair that because this matter cannot come to a vote, it should be dropped and the bill itself will be dropped from the Order Paper.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I had some knowledge that this subject might arise, and for a number of reasons I am in complete disagreement with my colleague, the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) on the admissibility of Bill C-243. First of all, the Supreme Court decision on Bill C-60 in the Thirtieth Parliament concerned a bill of this House which was advocating a change in the Senate. I believe it did not receive second reading, and I stand to be corrected, but there was agreement on all sides that the bill be referred to the Special Joint Committee for pre-study. There was a division in that committee, calling on the federal government to make a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada on the ability of this House to introduce and pass a bill dealing with the change in the Senate.

As you may recall, it was not in Bill C-60, to abolish the Senate, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would have, it was merely to change the method of appointment, election or nomination of senators, based on the proportional representation formula: Appointments were based half on the strength of the various parties in the House of Commons, and half on the strength of the various parties in the legislatures.

The Supreme Court ruled as a matter of law, that passage of that legislation was outside the ambit of this House. However, the Supreme Court of Canada has no right to pronounce judgment on what we may or may not discuss. It has only the right to interpret the statutes, the laws that are passed in this House, or it may give an opinion on what would be the result of a law passed by this House if the Government of Canada made a reference to the Supreme Court for that purpose. Alternatively, as we are seeing now with the Constitution, I believe the various provinces could challenge this in their courts, and then it could come up to the Supreme Court by way of appeal. It is my contention, and I may be wrong, that what the hon. member for Vaudreuil is asking you, Mr. Speaker, is really outside the purview of the Chair. I do not want you to take this as though I am lecturing the Chair. I am trying to be helpful.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Go ahead.

Mr. Collenette: I am trying to point out my understanding that the Chair has to administer the House in accordance with the Standing Orders. The consequences of legislation passed by the House, or any discussion thereof, is not a matter of the Chair to decide.

I will draw your attention to a ruling that Madam Speaker made last summer. Unfortunately, I do not have the reference at hand, but I am sure members opposite will remember it. I am sure the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) will remember it. It concerned the tabling of a ways and means motion by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) last summer, when it was argued by some members in the House, including the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), that that ways and means motion was illegal.

I argued in the very lengthy procedural case that we had, and this argument was substantiated by Madam Speaker, that the Chair did not have the right to rule as to whether a particular piece of legislation or document tabled in this House was legal. That was for the courts to decide. The sole role of the Chair is to decide on the admissibility of motions or bills in accordance with the Standing Orders of the House.

I would say in this particular case there is no question that we are talking about a bill which has not been passed and, therefore, the Supreme Court has no jurisdiction. It is a proposed bill. It is up for second reading—

An hon. Member: Unless they have a reference.

Mr. Collenette: The Supreme Court has no jurisdiction to pronounce upon the bill by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—

Mr. Nielsen: Unless they have a reference.

Mr. Collenette: Unless it has a reference from the Government of Canada. I feel this bill should proceed in the normal way. By the same token, I feel it is not within the ambit of the Chair to decide whether or not this bill is in order, because my hon. friend from Vaudreuil was asking you, Mr. Speaker, to pronounce on the legality of this legislation, if passed. First of all, it has not been passed. Secondly, I say that the Chair has no right to express itself on the legality of the legislation.

From time to time, the Chair does make certain pronouncements in private members' hour concerning the Royal prerogative. I think we all accept that because the Standing Orders of the House clearly state that only the government can introduce bills dealing with the expenditure of money or the raising of taxes. In that case, the Chair can obviously enter a caveat as the Speaker often does at the beginning of private members' hour, that the bill might exceed the Royal prerogative, but he or she might allow discussion to continue.

It is my contention that what we are talking about here does not fall into that category. We are not talking about the procedural aspects of Bill C-243, which was accepted, I might say, by the officers of the Table and was printed. This has not been the first Parliament in which this bill has been introduced; I remember making my maiden speech on this very bill.

An hon. Member: You are not the only one.

Mr. Collenette: Many have done so, because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been trying very valiantly, through the years, to get this piece of legislation passed by the House of Commons.

I would argue that on precedent alone, this bill has been admitted in other Parliaments, and it should not now be cited as inadmissible because the Supreme Court of Canada made an interpretation of a bill that was not, to my knowledge, and I stand to be corrected, given second reading. Bill C-60 was simply introduced and it went to committee for preliminary study. I stand to be corrected. I should know because I was on that committee, but all the things we have to remember sometimes become clouded. In that case there was no onus on the government to make a reference of Bill C-60, but the government accepted the wishes of the majority of members on that committee to make such a reference, and the Supreme Court of Canada ruled. But that was only on the eventuality that Bill C-60 would pass, and it dealt only with those sections relating to a change in the composition of the Senate.

I understand the concerns of my friend, the hon. member for Vaudreuil. I hope we do not make what I would say would be an improper decision, and rule this bill out of order after it has been introduced. It has been on the Order Paper. It has been debated in other years. I hope we do not take that decision for reasons which are really outside the control of this House and outside the Standing Orders of this House.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I presume the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is rising on the same point of order rather than to debate the bill.

Mr. Knowles: That is right, Mr. Speaker. If Black Rod comes on time, I shall not have to talk very long. If he is late, as he usually is, we shall fill in the time.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) said he made his maiden speech on this bill. Others have done so as well. It is quite true that I have been trying to get rid of the Senate for a long time. Some members have said to me, "Shouldn't you give up? You have been trying all these years, and it is still there." At least I can say that of those who were in the Senate when I first came here, only two are still there, so I have almost got rid of the Senate as I knew it. The trouble is that there are too many willing volunteers who are ready to go over and take the places of those who pass on.

Mr. Nielsen: I know one who is not.

Mr. Knowles: Yes. You are looking at him.

This question falls into at least two parts. One relates to the responsibilities or prerogatives of the Chair in a case like this. The other is the question which my friend, the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), raised, and he rather surprised me. I thought he was a democrat. Obviously he is not a New Democrat, but I thought he believed in free discussion and so forth. However, I shall come to that in a moment.

So far as the Chair is concerned there are a couple of very clear citations in Beauchesne's fifth edition, as they have been in all editions. This one appears on page 38. It is citation 117(6) and reads as follows:

> The Speaker will not give a decision upon a constitutional question nor decide a question of law, though the same may be raised on a point of order or privilege.

So my friend, the hon. member for Vaudreuil, had the right to raise the point, but I am afraid the citations are very clear, that you, Mr. Speaker, do not have the authority to rule on a constitutional question.

There is another one in the book on another page, but actually it is the same citation. It is in the same words exactly, except it is based on a different occasion when the Speaker so pronounced.

I put it to you, would the Chair not be in an impossible position if every time a bill were introduced, whether it was by a private member or by the government, the Chair had to decide whether it was legal, whether it was constitutional or whether, if both Houses of Parliament passed it and the Governor General agreed to it, the courts would strike it down?

As I say, that is such an impossible position I am not surprised the citations in Beauchesne's fifth edition are as short as they are.

I know I went over all this at the beginning of this session. Last April or May when I filed the bill, there were those in certain positions who thought I should not even be able to put the bill into the draw because of the Supreme Court of Canada ruling on Bill C-60. I discussed it with officials concerned with this sort of matter. I discussed it at length with Madam Speaker and, in the end, she seemed to agree with me. She is not here to confirm what I am saying, but I think it is fair to say that she seemed to agree with me that she did not have the right to stop me from putting in the bill. I know that when bills were given first reading there was the caveat with respect to all of them that points of order could be raised at second reading. At any rate, we went over all this argument, as I say, last April or May, as to the right of a member to put in a bill. I submit that that is a clear right and it is not in the hands of the Speaker to say, no, this bill must not be proceeded with because it touches a constitutional question.

On the question of the rights of the courts, it has been pretty well indicated by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council and by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) that the courts can interpret our legislation. The courts can give an opinion if one is asked for by the government. The courts can also strike down a bill which has been passed by Parliament on the ground that it is unconstitutional. I cannot recall that happening very recently. I remember one a while ago which might have been, but the government changed it to avoid that trouble. Of course, way back before the memory of quite a few members now here, the Bennett government passed a package of reform legislation, in 1934 or 1935, just before the election of that year. The Liberals, who were in opposition, questioned its constitutionality. Nevertheless, the Bennett government had that Parliament pass those bills.

Mr. Nielsen: Unemployment insurance.

Mr. Knowles: Unemployment insurance, and there were one or two others at the same time, all in the social field. Mr. Bennett had picked up some ideas from Roosevelt. He had a conversion in his fifth year and became a Tory, moving to the left. He brought in all that social legislation. The courts struck it down, afterwards, not before.

If I seem to be dragging this out, I hope the House will give me credit for doing so because we are waiting for Black Rod. Where is he when we need him?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please.

Mr. Herbert: I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has convinced me with his argument.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): For the benefit of the hon. member, I might indicate—if he is dragging this out, as he himself indicated, in order to fill the time until we hear the rap on the door—that I do not propose to take the matter under consideration. I propose to give a ruling immediately, because in my mind it is crystal clear that it touches upon the rights and privileges of Parliament. I do not have any difficulty in doing so. What is the wish of the hon. member, that he fill the gap or I fill the gap? It is irrelevant to me.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps we could share the gap, Mr. Speaker.

It is awfully nice to know before the Chair rules that the ruling will be in your favour, but I do want to say a few words to my hon. friend, the hon. member for Vaudreuil, almost to chide him. We are good friends. We discuss these things. I was shocked he took the position today that because the Supreme Court of Canada made that ruling on Bill C-60, Parliament is denied forever the right to bring in a bill to change the set-up of the Senate or to abolish it.

It is bad enough, and I will deal with that when I get to debating the bill next time, that the government took Clause 44 out of the constitutional package and left the Senate with the veto it has always had over bills and over joint parliamentary resolutions, but for the hon. member for Vaudreuil to suggest that because of that Supreme Court of Canada ruling, which was only an opinion of what it would do with that bill if it got passed, because Parliament can never vote on and, therefore, must never discuss a bill dealing with the composition or the existence of the Senate—

Mr. Herbert: I am convinced.

Mr. Knowles: Well, that is good. My friend is convinced, the Speaker is ready to give a ruling our way, but where is Black Rod? At least today I am being a prophet who knows what I am saying. The other day I predicted what would happen on the first day of the debate on the constitutional package, and I turned out to be dead wrong. Today I predicted that Black Rod would be late, and he is.

I think this is serious. I think it has been useful that the hon. member for Vaudreuil has raised the point and that we have had this discussion. I think it is useful that the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council spoke as he did. Hon. members may not like my proposal to abolish the Senate, hon. members may not like various proposals that are put before the House, but we have the right to discuss them.

I remember on one occasion when Mr. Auguste Choquette, a former Liberal member of Lotbiniere, proposed in a bill that the monarchy be abolished. It would be no surprise to hon. members, especially to hon. members over here, that the hon. Gordon Churchill was horrified at the suggestion and raised the very point the hon. member for Vaudreuil has raised just now; that is, that such a bill could not be introduced, that it is not in order. The Speaker of the day said that members might not like the idea but they had the right to discuss it.

I remember when I brought in bills to make income tax information public so we could see what was being done. That was a long time ago. Hon. members said it could not be done and they tried to vote me down on first reading. I remember Mackenzie King leading the vote in favour of it and saying that, whether or not they liked the idea, the member has the right to present the idea before Parliament.

I hope I have won on both counts. I hope I persuaded the member for Vaudreuil that these matters should be discussed, whether we like them or not, and I hope that Mr. Speaker will now, if we have time before Black Rod arrives, give a ruling and make it seem as if we were still talking when Black Rod arrives. As I have said before, this place reminds me of a verse in the Book of Revelation which says that there was silence in heaven for the space of half an hour. That is something we cannot do here. We cannot sit here silent and wait; we must either be talking or go. I am told that Black Rod is here. So I hope I have left you time, Mr. Speaker, to make the ruling which you have already indicated, and I trust that on another Thursday I will be able to proceed with the debate on the substance of this important bill.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I just want to say, Mr. Speaker, that, like the add for Clairol, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is not getting older, he is getting better.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I see that the Black Rod has appeared, but my understanding of history is that he and his office have been made to wait as a practice for several centuries. So we will dispose of the matter raised by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) at a rapid pace.

The ruling is very simple. Parliament is supreme and it can discuss what it wishes. It cannot be limited in what it chooses to discuss, whether by court order or otherwise. I think it might be worthwhile to indicate that the sub-thought to that is that the House from time to time expresses its will and limits itself, and the usual format of that is the Standing Orders. The Chair's responsibility is simply to understand and interpret and, through the will of the House, to apply the Standing Orders. The arguments presented by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre are well taken, and regardless of court rulings it is, in my view, not only the privilege—and I refer to the law of privileges—of hon. members to raise such subjects as they see fit to debate, but it also is a right of the House of Commons and of hon. members to seek to debate such topics as they in their wisdom see fit.

Consequently, we will consider that the hon. member's Bill C-243 has not been debated and that at the next opportunity for private members' hour it will occupy the entire normal period given to debate of this bill. The hon. member looks as if he might have a problem in this regard. May we recognize Black Rod?

Mr. Knowles: No, Mr. Speaker, I was simply going to ask for what you just decreed. That is fine.

ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Madam Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Madam Speaker, with the House, went up to the Senate chamber.

● (1800)

And being returned:

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber, the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to certain bills:

An act to amend laws relating to fiscal transfers to the provinces.

The Constitution

An act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, and other acts subsequent to 1970.

It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6.07 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton) that the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most important Parliaments that has been convened for many years. It is important because this Thirty-second Parliament is one of the most issue-oriented sessions that the members who presently hold seats in the House of Commons and, indeed, those who have been appointed to the other place, could be called upon to face at this time.

But as we debate these issues, and particularly the one before us today, we must at all times remember we are a very privileged people to be Canadians. In these days of great world upheaval, uncertainty and turmoil we are a very privileged Parliament and nation to be able to debate in strong, but hopefully rational and constructive terms, the constitutional future of this great country of ours with which God has blessed us so richly. I think it also presents us with the opportunity to use the various personal talents which He has given to us.

I am sure most of us, as we take this Canadian Constitution debate seriously, are fully aware of the great importance of this measure.

As we discuss the Constitution we realize what we are as Canadians is really God's gift to us and what we become, or how we use our talents of understanding, breadth of mind, and spirit of brotherhood, is our gift to Him. Like most members of this chamber, I consider it a distinct honour and privilege to have the opportunity to represent a large number of Canadians and, hopefully, to be able to relate in some way to all Canadians from coast to coast, because that is becoming very important to this Parliament. That, indeed, as we all know, is a formidable task.

[Translation]

The constitution of a country covers everybody. It is the source of great emotional reactions on the part of serious citizens because it forces us to take into consideration the future and the full political independence of our nation and give them prominence.

[English]

As a fourth generation Canadian from Northern Ireland I have always leaned very strongly toward the true spirit of Canadian nationalism. I had the distinct privilege of growing up on a small farm in the western end of Victoria County in the central part of Ontario. I had an uncle who went west and became one of the campaign managers for the late right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert—

Mr. Epp: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hopkins: —who, when I came into this House, asked where I happened to go astray. My father and mother in Victoria County, like many of yours, were hardworking, honest and kindhearted with the very limited resources available to them. I need not tell you after whom that particular county was named.

My wonderful mother, whose first name is Victoria, is well into her eighties and still going strong. Other names in that community called Argyle were Ross, McFadden, Currie, McAlpine, McEachern and McArthur, McPherson, Burton, Moore, McLeod, Campbell, McIntyre and I do not know how the Irish got in there.

I moved at an early age to eastern Ontario and found myself in the middle of an almost totally German-speaking community in Renfrew County. I was faced with a small grade one class that spoke only German and I spoke only English, and the grade three's were the interpreters between the teacher and the grade one class, so I knew what a language barrier was long before I came to Parliament. Just a short distance away was a large area settled by Canadians of Polish descent who spoke Polish in everyday conversation, and most still do. The little hamlet of Wilno in the northern part of Renfrew County is the oldest Polish settlement in Canada, about 116 years old.

Therefore, my experience with Canadians from origins other than English and French came very early in my life, and added experiences since then have given me a tremendous impression of our multicultural groups in Canada. They are proud Canadians and are a national force for cementing Canadian unity. The Polish Alliance of Canada was founded in 1907 and, while I stand to be corrected, I think it is the oldest ethno-cultural minority organization in the history of Canada. Clause 27, which is of interest to all multicultural groups, says:

This charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

Along with other members of this chamber, it has been my privilege to meet and get to know on a very personal basis, loyal, sincere and hardworking Canadians from all walks of life who have enriched Canada with their multicultural talents and contributions.

[Translation]

As a long-time resident of the Ottawa Valley I have met people and developed personal friendships with thousands French-speaking Canadians. Since I first came to this House I have enriched my life by joining several francophone members and senators and working with them. They have always been very understanding and very patient with me.

[English]

It is obvious to every Canadian that the writing and amending of a constitution does not come easily. The two volumes written by Donald Creighton on Sir John A. Macdonald illustrate many of the difficulties he had in those early days. We have only to look at the Americans who had to revise their constitution 12 years after they wrote it.

We know as time goes on life becomes more complex, and it becomes more difficult to amend constitutions. It is fair to say that only those who take major steps in history get things done. They are embattled and criticized, but conviction and a deep desire for achievement is worthless unless acted upon.

There are many who will say we are breaking new ground. That is not really so in this debate. The history of Canada, since day one, is dotted with constitutional debate of one kind or another. It should not be considered a remarkable achievement that the provinces and the federal government decided in 1931 to leave our Constitution in Britain without an amending formula. It is very easy to agree to do nothing. Our desire to bring the Constitution home today is a real challenge, and anyone who says that simply bringing it home without an amending formula and a charter of rights and freedoms is taking the easy way. They are correct, that is the easy way, but that does not come to grips with the key problem of the amending formula and charter of rights and freedoms. Those who suggest this are simply postponing the provision of an amending formula until a later date and that battle could drag on for many weeks or months.

The proposed resolution provides that for a period of two years from patriation, amendments will require unanimous consent of Parliament and the provinces until an amending formula is agreed upon using one of three methods and, while these are well known to the members of this House, I wish to put them on the record.

If, during the next two years, federal and provincial governments can reach unanimous agreement on a formula, it will be adopted. To facilitate agreement, a first ministers' constitutional conference will be held each year until a formula is implemented.

If the provinces and the federal government fail to agree unanimously on a formula, but seven or more provinces, representing at least 80 per cent of the total population of all the provinces, agree within two years after patriation on an amending procedure that meets the requirements set out in the resolution, this formula and a formula similar in principle to the Victoria formula will be put to the people in a referendum. The federal government will also have the opportunity, at that time, to put forward a formula of its own choice instead of the modified Victoria formula.

If the provinces do not present an alternative formula, the modified Victoria formula will automatically come into effect two years after patriation. In general, that formula would require that amendments to the Constitution be approved by Parliament and by either the legislative assemblies or, in a national referendum, a majority of voters in a majority of the provinces, including: every province that has or has had a population of at least 25 per cent of the population of Canada; at least two Atlantic provinces, at least two western provinces with combined populations of at least 50 per cent of the population of all the western provinces.

The argument being used that we are asking Britain to amend our Constitution instead of doing it ourselves surely does not hold water. The proposed resolution before us is a product of Canada's Parliament. Before it reaches Britain it will have passed through both Houses of our Canadian Parliament. Many dedicated MPs and senators from all political parties have sat for days and weeks in a joint committee of both Houses to hear briefs and representations from many Canadians and particular experts. I join other members of this House in commending them and thanking them for their work.

I say to all Canadians that the proposed resolution which will be going to Britain is indeed a made-in-Canada product. As an English-speaking Canadian brought up, and having lived, in the atmosphere which I earlier described, I have always been a Canadian nationalist. I believe in a strong federal government, one that has the nation's regional interests at heart and one which is ready to sit down and exchange constructive views on a two-way street basis with the other regions of the country.

I am a Canadian federalist who, I think, has some understanding of all Canada and who wants to understand even better this great nation from coast to coast, this nation that is God's gift to us as Canadians. In this same context I say to this House and to all Canadians that a poor man is not he who is without a cent; a poor man is he who is without a dream. Our dream is to patriate our Constitution and have an amending formula.

Our daily thoughts should be elevated above the ceiling of this room. The secret of success is consistency of purpose. Even the woodpecker owes his success to the fact that he uses his head, and keeps pecking away until he finishes the job he starts.

Mr. Stevens: Look at what he does to the tree!

Mr. Hopkins: I do not know whether that was the woodpecker or the tree.

It has often been said that the measure of success is not whether you have a tough problem to deal with, but whether it is the same problem you had last year. Surely that is the essence of this whole exercise we are going through. This is the story of the patriation of our Canadian Constitution. We have made great strides in recent times regardless of diversity, which we hope is always a healthy process in our democracy.

The government is off to a good start with this proposed resolution and I appeal to the members of this House to give this plan a fair trial. I repeat, there will be first ministers' conferences after the Constitution has been patriated and is truly Canadian. Without having the Constitution home, time will continue to lapse. Do not forget that we as Canadian federalists, and we were proud that night from coast to coast, made a commitment to the federal supporters in the province of Quebec in last year's referendum, that we would bring in reform. At the same time, we must carry on some very sound and realistic talks with our western Canadian friends. A good two-way street must be built for that purpose and that must be an objective of all parties concerned.

I strongly believe that in this great issue surrounding our nation's Constitution we should take from the past its fires and not its ashes.

If we cannot join hands in a positive way for Canada and Canadians; if we cannot find common ground without weakening the federal government; if we cannot tackle successfully the completion of a 113-year old Constitution for Canadians and our wonderful home and its great potential, then we must learn a lesson from the author, L. P. Jacks, who said: "The pessimist sees the difficulty in every opportunity; the optimist sees the opportuntiy in every difficulty." If we are going to see the opportunity in every difficulty in this debate, then we cannot help but succeed.

In order to answer some of the questions from those Canadians who have requested information about the impact of the proposed resolution on our parliamentary process in Canada and the Queen as head of state—because every time some changes come up, we in English Canada are asked questions about the place of the Queen and our government institutions—I am going to take a direct quote from the introduction of the explanatory notes:

"When these proposals come into effect, they will signify the passing of the last vestige of Canada's former colonial status. The fundamental nature of our political system will not be changed: Canada will remain a parliamentary democracy with a federal system of government and the Queen as Head of State. However, now, after 113 years, we will finally have a constitution that is completely our own and that can be amended entirely within this country. The changes are also momentous in that, for the first time, Canadians will have basic rights and freedoms enshrined in and protected by the Constitution."

Let me also state there is one thing that has bothered me as a Canadian nationalist from English-speaking Canada and as one who believes in a healthy federal state, and that is that Canada is the only sovereign country in the world which still has to turn to the Parliament of another country to amend its own Constitution.

Mr. Stevens: Why are you doing it?

Mr. Hopkins: We are doing it because the R. B. Bennett government never changed that at Westminster in 1931.

Mr. Andre: You flunked history at night-school.

Mr. Hopkins: If more initiative had been taken at that time we would not be debating this in the House today.

Canada is an influential middle power in the world and there is no way we should allow this situation to continue and, in all reality, I am sure that our friends in Britain will be glad to see this matter cleared up once and for all.

I and other members and senators have received comments to the effect that a reference to God has been left out of the Constitution. I want to make it very clear that this is not the case and that anyone who is spreading this is inaccurate in their statements.

On June 10, 1980, this government, headed by the Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, tabled in the House of Commons, a preamble which was entitled "A Statement of Principles for a New Constitution." It was one or more of the provinces who asked that this preamble be set aside and discussed at a later date. It is one of the items which will undoubtedly be taken up at the first ministers' conference following the patriation of the Constitution from Great Britain.

I will cite the preamble which we urged upon the provinces to include in this Constitution, as follows:

> We, the people of Canada, proudly proclaim that we are and shall always be, with the help of God, a free and self-governing people.
> Born of a meeting of the English and French presence on North American soil which had long been the home of our native peoples, and enriched by the contribution of millions of people from the four corners of the earth, we have chosen to create a life together which transcends the differences of blood relationships, language and religion, and willingly accept the experience of sharing our wealth and cultures, while respecting our diversity.
> We have chosen to live together in one sovereign country, a true federation, conceived as a constitutional monarchy and founded on democratic principles.
> Faithful to our history, and united by a common desire to give new life and strength to our federation, we are resolved to create together a new Constitution which:
> shall be conceived and adopted in Canada, > shall reaffirm the official status of the French and English languages in Canada, and the diversity of cultures within Canadian society, > shall enshrine our fundamental freedoms, our basic civil, human and language rights, including the right to be educated in one's language, French or English, where numbers warrant, and the rights of our native peoples, and shall define the authority of Parliament and of the Legislative Assemblies of our several provinces.
> We further declare that our Parliament and provincial legislatures, our various governments and their agencies shall have no other purpose than to strive for the happiness and fulfilment of each and all of us.

Unlike the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) who spoke this afternoon, I do not believe Canada will break up because we have many solid Canadians out there. Let me say to all my colleagues on both sides of the House that storms make oak trees take deeper roots.

Mr. Andre: Unless the woodpecker gets to them.

Mr. Hopkins: After our constitutional provisions are complete, we in Canada will probably have the best oak trees with the deepest roots in the world, united and intertwined together in one closely woven family, because today we are looking at this debate in the middle of conflict. When we look back, it will look quite different to us as we go ahead to full nationhood.

To all people across Canada and to my friends on both sides of the House, there are three lines to a poem written by John Boyle O'Reilly, which I think sum up what should be the aims of each and every one of us in this House and which should be the aim of all Canadians across Canada. In part, the poem reads:

> First across the gulf we cast
> Kite-borne threads, till lines are passed,
> And habit builds the bridge at last!

It is going to be habit in Canada, after we patriate the Constitution and after we have the first ministers' conference, which will hopefully weld this nation together, to build the bridge that will take us on to greater nationhood in years to come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gary Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I join the debate on the Constitution with a great deal of respect and humility. I have respect for this as one of the greatest national issues of all time, an issue for which the time has come. I enter the debate with respect for the politicians who have taken part so far. I would like to identify with respect the efforts of members made on behalf of all of us, particularly those who took part in the committee debates. I enter the debate also with respect for this institution of which I am a member and the opportunity and the vehicle it gives us to take part, allowing us to participate in the democratic process.

My humility stems from being a part of this issue which is of such fantastic importance to the future of Canada. I think Canadians must have some feeling of ambivalance about this issue because we have been dealing now for weeks and even months with an issue which, in some ways, lacks a sense of priority in terms of national issues; things such as the economy and all the economic factors making life difficult for people throughout Canada today. Surely they must wonder what we are doing spending the amount of time and effort we are on the Constitutional issue. At the same time, I think each one knows in some vague and unclear way that the constitutional issue and the results which come from our deliberations now will come to play a dramatic role on their futures and the way their lives are conducted in Canada in the future. I think particularly about the province of Ontario.

I want to spend a few moments talking about Ontario's position because I come from Ontario. One of the things that needs to be clear about Ontarians, and about people like myself who try to represent people in Ontario, is that we need to look at this issue in a clear and careful way. We need to look at it with a long view, not with a short, a narrow or a political view. We should take a look at the long-range effects of the way our deliberations now will have an impact on our relationship with the rest of the partners in confederation on issues such as energy, and even with the way industry in our own province will develop. The relationships we establish now and the types of arrangements we make with different governments across the country will be important. In my opinion, it is important that politicians in Ontario look at that, and it is something important for all of us to think of as we go on and as we develop this process.

Our current Constitution has many origins. It comes from the Crown, from common law and from British statutes. All of our amendments to the British North America Act are British statutes. Our Constitution comes from orders in council, the judicial committee of the Privy Council and its deliberations. It comes from Canadian statutes, such as the Bill of Rights and the Dominion Act of 1875. It comes from Canadian and British treaties. It comes from parliamentary procedure and rules. It comes from the British North America Act itself. It comes also from conventions, such as having elections every four years or so, sometimes sooner.

Our nation's history has been a success story against many odds. One of the most important of these odds is the diversity we have in geography, in climate and in resources. Another difficulty we have is the diversity of our population and our cultures. We started off with two founding cultures. We now have a variety of cultures all of which contribute to the Canadian mosaic.

I would like now to go back in time and take a look at the legal processes which have brought us to where we are today in our constitutional discussion. There are a number of places where we could start, but the most appropriate place in looking at this is the Royal proclamation of 1763. This resulted in Canada being designated as a colony of the British empire. With this proclamation we were promised the early establishment of English law and also representative institutions. Another significant factor in this proclamation was the guarantee it gave aboriginal and treaty rights to natives. Following this was the Quebec Act of 1774 which recognized the Catholic church and the French law, which was given its proper place in respect of civil matters. The Quebec Act gave an identity to the French culture in Canada.

In 1791, we had the Constitutional Act. With this, the colony was divided in two parts: Upper and Lower Canada. Both were given a structured government. Both had a governor, an executive council, a legislative council and an assembly that was elected every four years, and this was the first time Canada had elected representation.

After the rebellion of 1837, Lord Durham brought forward his report with three major recommendations: the union of Upper and Lower Canada, the establishment of responsible government in Canada, and also his concept of a federal union. This was followed, in 1841, by the act of union which created Canada.

In 1864, the Macdonald-Cartier union government failed, and this led to our series of constitutional discussions and conferences, first in Charlottetown, and then later in Quebec. From those discussions came the British North America Act of 1867, the piece of paper we are looking at today and trying to patriate to Canada. The federal bicameral system, modelled after Westminster, was thus established in Canada. The British traditional system of government was brought to Canada, and was modified to meet Canada's needs.

In 1890, Sir John A. Macdonald said to his assembly, and I quote:

> If I had influence over the minds of the people of Canada, any power over their intellect, I would leave them this legacy: Whatever you do adhere to the union. We are a great country, and shall become one of the greatest in the universe if we preserve it; we shall sink into insignificance and adversity if we suffer it to be broken! God and Nature made the two Canadas one—let no factious men be allowed to put then asunder!

We know that in 1867 we had union in four of the provinces: Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. This was followed in 1871, by British Columbia, Manitoba in 1881, Alberta and Saskatchewan in 1905, and finally Newfoundland in 1949. From here, until World War I, there was very little activity; but at that time we started to develop what was a sense of Canadian nationalism. With the Borden government, in 1917, this flowed into the Imperial Conferences of 1923, which gave Canada control over its foreign policy, and then the Balfour Declaration of Sovereignty in 1926. From these Imperial Conferences came the 1931 statute of Westminster.

We have heard many references to the statute of Westminster, and the fact that we were not able to reach agreement in Canada. As a result of that lack of agreement the statute of Westminster was altered, from Lord Balfour's original declaration, to mean that Canada did not agree with what he was trying to say in his declaration. I quote from Section 71 of that act:

> Nothing in this act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal of the British North America Acts of 1867 to 1931.

By that provision, Canada was excluded from the Balfour declaration.

In spite of the fact that we excluded ourselves from what might be considered to be our sovereignty, and what many are reacting to now, in 1939 Canada did what I consider to be the ultimate act of sovereignty: it declared war on its own behalf in World War II.

During the 1960s, we had a hectic time with constitutional reform. Indeed, up until recently, we had at least six first ministers' conferences and 11 constitutional efforts. In 1964 we had the Fulton-Favreau efforts. In 1968 we had the Toronto conference with Robarts-Johnson. In 1971 we had the Victoria formula, which we are considering now.

The Victoria formula requires some comment. The key things in the Victoria formula are that the provinces seem to be unequal. Some provinces are indeed more equal than others. This formula seems to be quite appropriate, if you happen to come from one of the central provinces, which now, or at some time in its history, had 25 per cent or more of the population; if you do not, then you are a second-class citizen.

I believe the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) mentioned yesterday, in the House, that if that amending formula had been in place now, Canada would never have had medicare.

Following the 1971 Victoria formula came the Vancouver formula. With the Vancouver formula, which many of us support now, we found that the federal government, along with support of seven provinces representing approximately 50 per cent of the population, could provide a constitutional amendment. This was initially agreed to by all provinces, but at the last moment, it failed to be consumated.

In 1976 we saw a Parti Québécois government elected. It stood for political independence and economic association. It really focused Canada on a referendum debate rather than a constitutional discussion. In 1980, thanks to a good deal of support from members opposite, we saw the results of the referendum in Quebec showing magnificent support for Canada. However, implicit in the result of this was a perceived need for federal renewal. Last year we saw an unfortunate turn of events, for the unrest that was seen in Quebec, has now been transferred to western Canada.

Now, in 1981, I stand here discussing this in the constitutional debate on the proposed constitution act of 1981, and I would like to comment on several parts of the process that have taken us to this point. Some of these matters are obvious, and I am sure they are repetitive to members opposite, but I think they are worthy of mention. The most important of these factors is that nation building, as we have it in Canada today, is a dynamic and evolutionary process that is changing and it has taken us, over a period of time in a number of ways, to the position where we are, and that process can be expected to continue.

Along with the evolution of our legal constitutional position, we have had a concurrent and similar evolution in many of our cultural and social attitudes. The attitudes of people have changed over a long period of time. Their morals have sometimes changed; the way that they conduct their personal and governmental affairs themselves has changed. Many changes have been dramatic, and have been brought on by conflicts both within and without our country.

These conflicts which started with the Plains of Abraham, continued and included the American Revolution, the war of 1812, the rebellion of 1837, the U.S. civil war, Boer War, World War I, World War II and the Korean war and then even to a conflict without arms in the Quebec referendum and the discussions that are going on out west today. All of these confrontations have resulted in changes, many of which have been happening at the time we found we had adapted changes in our legal position.

The third major point is that all of these factors have occurred today with the background of a federal co-operative consensus system, which I think is a key factor. What is important today is that we recognize the evolutionary nature of the institutions and the cultures of this county, that we establish at once the proper process basis to deal with inevitable conflicts that will come as we continue to experience growth, that we relieve these areas of potential conflict by anticipating the needs and the aspirations of regions and integrate them through just and honest process, and that we recognize the strengths of regions as assets on which to build our future.

The hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal) spoke this afternoon about Canada being a creation which is greater than the sum of its parts. There is no question about that at all. The question need not even be asked, but the fact that he identifies it and the way it is identified concerns me somewhat because it implies there is misunderstanding of the way Canada can be a strong whole. There seems to be an inherent difference in the way hon. members opposite view a strong Canada and the way hon. members on this side view a strong Canada.

If I can use a medical analogy, I think each part of us as human beings is an important and integral part of a whole human being and that the whole human being can be no stronger than each one of its parts. We can borrow strengths from each of our parts to make the whole survive, but that is a limited process. Indeed, as each one of our parts is strong, so too will the entire body be that much stronger. Above all, today I believe our efforts must be to establish a constitutional process which has the confidence of the people of Canada.

As he was making his initial presentation, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) implied that after 50 years we have nothing to show in Canada. There was an effort to make a correction, that what he really meant to say was it was only in constitutional reform. I was listening that day, and that is not the inference I took from hearing him. The implication was that we should do something now in haste because after 50 years we really have nothing to show for our efforts. This attitude has left him in the position where he says that in spite of not liking unilateral action and in spite of doing what he thinks people do not want done, he will go ahead with this process because he thinks it is important and because he thinks we have not done anything in 50 years. The irony is that while he has an understanding of the need for reform, I believe he has a misunderstanding of the type of action and process we need.

The error may be fatal. The people who will suffer are now led, through simplistic advertising, slogans and some brilliant political speeches, to believe that the problems will be resolved by the proposed constitution act of 1981. Perhaps, so far, the only casualties are federal-provincial relations among eight of the provinces and the federal government. So far the only casualties are the relationships between Canada and Great Britain. So far the only casualties are the relationships of trust between the government and two thirds of the people of Canada who do not believe the federal government should act in a unilateral fashion. This is all that has suffered so far.

Federal-provincial relationship are being changed. The consensus nature of federalism is being changed now. The co-operative nature of federalism is being changed. We have unilateral action now. When will we have unilateral action again in the future? The permanent referendum system is a permanent amendment to override provincial authority. The hon. member for St. John's East this afternoon called it a run around the end, and that is a good expression. We are seeing moves now which take us from a co-operative federalism toward a unitary state. We ask the British government to accede to the convention of granting our parliamentary package, while we fail ourselves to respect the convention of sending Britain requests which already have provincial consensus. We are forcing Britain to become involved in our affairs. We are trying to force another country to amend that which we argue we are mature enough to deal with ourselves. The incongruities are enormous.

The Minister of Justice has included a permanent referendum formula, while arguing we cannot have a referendum now because it would be too divisive. The amendment the Conservative party brought forward in this House asks that this be removed. The amendment states, and I quote:

> That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Acceptance of this amendment would do much to restore the confidence of the people of Canada, the respect of the federal government for process, and federal-provincial relationships would certainly improve. I join the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) in asking the government to drop the permanent referendum clause.

We have heard much talk of entrenchment. The essence of this discussion is the question of what will be supreme, Parliament or the Supreme Court of Canada. There are many good arguments on both sides. In fact, this has resulted in some of the best political debates I have heard in my short political life.

If we look at the different countries around the world, the different commonwealth nations, countries which have entrenched charters of rights and freedoms, and those which have not, and if we try to compare them, we will see that in the end it really does not matter. It does not make any difference whether or not rights are entrenched. There is no consistency in the effect of entrenchment. Some countries which have entrenched charters of rights are clearly abusive to their citizens. One of the best charters of rights is that of the U.S.S.R., and there are other examples.

What really matters is not whether rights are entrenched but the health of the system which supports rights. How healthy is our system? How healthy is our parliamentary system? Is the Supreme Court of Canada effective and responsive? I suggest there is some question about the health of this parliamentary system. This is a parliamentary system which will use closure. This is a parliamentary system in which even this afternoon people talked with utter disregard for the rights and privileges of Members of Parliament. Ministers of the Crown disregard the individual rights and freedoms of Members of Parliament and their responsibilities to their constituencies.

Mr. Fox: Baloney. Even Benno doesn't take that seriously or believe that.

Mr. Friesen: You better believe I do.

Mr. Gurbin: The other thing I would like to mention in this same reference is the question of the tone of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The tone of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms at this time is that the government gives its people rights; it deeds them out to people and allows them to do certain things. The point has been well made by others, as well as by myself, that really a charter of rights and freedoms and the designation of specific rights are limitations on governments. The rights and freedoms of people are there inherently by birth. Charters are in fact necessary in some cases to limit the actions of governments. The whole tone of this charter is repulsive.

Mr. Diefenbaker had a preamble which we tried to include in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I was interested in the last speaker's reference to its being included or not, and the fact that this should be a second stage of the constitutional discussions. I am not sure who is the supreme reference in the current Constitution. If there is a blank spot at the top, I wonder who occupies that position. I wonder who has that ultimate authority.

Mr. Shields: Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

Mr. Friesen: Fast Eddy.

Mr. Gurbin: If it is not God, or if God is to be put to the second stage, that is an interesting move. But if it is not God, I wonder who it is. If God is at the second stage, I wonder what that means. I wonder what it means if God is second on the list of priorities.

There were some major amendments proposed, but they were refused. Others have spoken about this as well, but the most important single one is the right to property. We brought forward an amendment which was part of the Diefenbaker preamble. The interesting thing about this, of course, is the fact that when this was first presented it was accepted, and then for obvious political reasons it was no longer acceptable. This is an extremely important factor to most of the citizens of Canada. It was already a fact, and I find it unusual and very curious that the government would choose not to include it. I understand some of the difficulties the NDP members have with this, but I think that is consistent with the difficulties they have with anything that makes sense.

• (2100)

Mr. Gurbin: As an example of what others are doing with property rights, I would say that the United States protects its property rights in the fifth and in the fourteenth amendments; that Australia's constitution allows for just compensation when private property is expropriated federally; that Belgium stresses just compensation according to law; and that there is a UN Declaration of Human Rights which states that the right to own property is a fundamental human right. Canada has already signed this, and yet we will not include it in our constitutional amendments.

One of the great difficulties with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms as it now exists is its application to native groups. Although the native groups, through their representations to the constitutional committee, have indeed been able to have their amendment included, the difficulty is that this amendment allows for the provision and the guarantee of aboriginal rights, but these are undefined aboriginal rights. Aboriginal rights mean many things to many people, and this will be, as time goes on, one of the major sources of friction and difficulty the native people and the government will have in Canada. This should be clarified.

This is another indication that the constitutional discussions which we are having now, the amendments to and the consideration of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, should be considered carefully over a measured period of time.

The control of natural resources is a key issue, and there have been some efforts to deal with it, but the efforts made have not really dealt with the primary issues and concerns, particularly of the resource rich provinces, the tone, mood and style which has been developed thus far leave us with pessimism about the opportunity, as time goes on, for the government to deal with these issues effectively. There is very little reason for those provinces which feel threatened to feel comfortable with the attitude and the form the federal government has now established.

A major additional point in the Constitution which has not been dealt with in this act, but which has seriously been considered by most who have looked at constitutional reform, is Senate reform. I will spend one moment on that subject, particularly because of the proposal made by Senator Roblin in April of 1980. He looks at a new Senate as having four main functions, and I think these should be recognized because they are important for people who are looking at these constitutional debates and at the opportunities which might arise.

First, he thinks a new Senate could be established to protect regional interests against a too aggressive central government. I think that might help, in particular, people in western Canada. Second, he looks at it as a sober second thought, a legislative revising body. Third, he looks at it as an effort and an ability to initiate committees of review and investigation in matters of important public concern, and fourth, he looks at it as providing a reservoir of cabinet representation when necessary if regions are not well represented in the House of Commons.

Senator Roblin suggests that a Senate could be elected, and this is indeed an attractive idea. It is a golden opportunity to provide relief if many of the strains on the future governing of our country are to be avoided.

There has been much discussion about what members on this side of the House feel and what they really support so far as the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is concerned. There is no question that members on this side and myself personally support a charter of rights and freedoms. We have never had any argument as to that. I do not know of a parliamentarian who does not in some way support this concept. There are reservations about the form, about what things are to be included, but there is no question about having a charter of rights and freedoms, even if we went only as far as the Bill of Rights, brought forward by the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. If everyone did not support it, that is good evidence to show that it is not a required basis for securing rights within a democratic system, if that argument need be made. The point is that the efforts of the opposition to what the government is now doing are not based on opposing a charter of rights and freedoms but rather to having it included in another country as an amendment before the BNA Act is returned to Canada.

All members I know support patriation of the BNA Act. I do not know of anyone who does not feel that can be done without difficulty. There are those who might say it need not be done, but I know of no one who feels that it cannot be done. Indeed, Canadians in general support this move.

The third part of the government's package is the amending formula. We have a great deal of difficulty with the amending formula and the arrangements being made by the government to allow amendments to be made to the BNA Act when it is brought back. I think there could be provincial agreement on an amending formula.

At one time, in 1974, there almost was agreement, and with the climate in the country today I think the opportunity clearly exists, if efforts were made to agree on an amending formula that was acceptable to all the provinces and the federal government agreement could be achieved.

The essential point, after considering each one of these three concepts, is that as a unit and with the process that has been established by the federal government now, they are unacceptable separately. However, with patriation, and an amending formula which had been agreed to by the provinces and the federal government, these concepts are entirely acceptable and could be implemented in the near future. But there must be a separation, a splitting of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and any other amendments to the BNA Act before we ask the British government to return the act. The rest can be developed in Canada by Canadians as represented by provinces and territories, by individuals and by special interest groups. We can only gain by seeking the co-operation of those we pretend to govern. The federal system can only gain by encouraging an environment which fits its provinces and people in the most acceptable fashion. A solution cannot be imposed because it cannot be understood without a dialogue which leads to agreement.

I suspect, Mr. Speaker, that each Member of Parliament, if not each person in the country, has his or her national vision. It is the range of visions which gives strength to our existence, allows practical and idealistic ideas to compete, to co-operate and to contribute to nation building.

I am a very positive and constructive person, Mr. Speaker; this is my nature. But, although I take part in this debate, this moment of history passes me and many parliamentarians by, not because we think less of our country, not because we do not believe in most of the substance of the proposal, but because we believe the process for the evolution of our democratic system must be established on the basis of consensus if it is to work at all, and because a process established otherwise would be divisive instead of unifying.

I cannot vote for this act. The government has no mandate for and no consensus on this act. The act denies the very essence of successful federalism. In the end, the people and the country will survive and history will judge us all. We will be a great nation, depending on the will of the people to overcome the barriers thrown up by the perhaps well-intentioned but certainly misguided politicians.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to take part in this historic debate on Canada's Constitution. We all know this will be a long debate. Our party wants as many members as possible to take part in it, to speak and to express their views, so I will be brief and I will commend my example to my colleagues.

When I spoke on the initial proposal last fall I said, that while I supported many features in the constitutional package, I deplored the inadequacies in the charter of rights and its failure to recognize the rights of women and of Canada's native people. Today I am happy to say that most of my earlier objections have been removed. This is a good package. It is not perfect, but it is a good one. Through the work of the joint committee the original proposal has been improved beyond all measure.

In this respect I want to pay tribute to all members of the committee. They worked long, hard hours; they gave their dedication and sincerity to that process. In particular I wish to single out the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) and the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson).

I regret that the government and the Tory opposition were not willing to accept the amendment moved to Section 15 by the hon. member for Burnaby which would have protected people from discrimination on the grounds of marital status, sexual orientation or political belief. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville said he cannot support the proposal in its present form. I regret that, but I want to say it was largely because of the work of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville that today I can support the package. I very much appreciate his work.

Before I move to the question of aboriginal rights, which I think is central to the Constitution, I want to look at some of the other positive features of this package. In addition to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, it enshrines the principle of equalization so that all Canadians will have equivalent access to social services. It has a resource clause which gives provinces greater control over their resources, and it gives them the right to indirect taxation. The proposal includes an amending formula which I believe is reasonable and fair, considering the diverse nature of our nation. This amending formula requires the consent of each of the four regions.

There has been an attempt to whip up opposition in the west to the fact that Ontario and Quebec have veto power. We need to remember that the west also has veto power in this respect, as do the maritimes. When we look at the population of the four different regions—the maritimes with two million people, Quebec with 6.5 million, Ontario with 8.5 million and the west with seven million—apart from the maritimes, which is much lower in population, the other three regions are more or less equally balanced. What other formula could give the needed flexibility and still protect the interests of each region?

Surely we do not want to endorse the need for unanimity. This has been the hangup for the last 50 years. We do not want to have a situation where Prince Edward Island, with half the population of Vancouver Island, would have a veto.

The Tories have advocated the Vancouver consensus. This would give each province the right to opt out of such fundamental provisions as the charter of rights. This is the kind of amending formula which would have warmed the hearts of the confederate states back in 1860; it denies our basic unity as a nation. I believe the present amending formula is reasonable and fair, and I speak as a member from British Columbia. Above all else, I support the constitutional package because at long last it recognizes the rights of aboriginal peoples of Canada. We cannot overestimate the symbolic significance of this step.

In the pre-Confederation history of Canada, Britain and France entered into relationship with various Indian nations; they looked upon one another as allies. They formed pacts of peace and friendship. The Royal Proclamation of 1763, which recognized the rights of aboriginal people, indicated that an historic relationship of trust had to be maintained. At the time the British North America Act was passed in 1867, this relationship was not considered, it was completely forgotten. The Indian people were not consulted about their place in the new nation. The federal government protected their interests only to the extent of reserving to federal jurisdiction "Indians and lands reserved for the Indians" under Section 91-24 of the BNA Act.

In the 114 years since that time the aboriginal peoples of Canada had no constitutional standing. The Indian Act has not been a helpful act as far as Indian people are concerned. It is something which has been imposed upon them. Legislative changes in the act over the past century have robbed Indians of their right to determine the course of their own lives, the form of their own government and the shape of their own societies.

When the government brought out its original proposal to patriate the Constitution last October, it did nothing to improve that situation. The rights of aboriginal peoples were not recognized, except in a negative manner. The historic covenant relationship between Indian people and the Crown was completely ignored. When I and other members of my party objected to this denial of rights, the government answered that it was impossible to recognize such rights.

On November 7 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about this. He answered as follows:

—I think the simple claim of aboriginal rights, without anyone knowing exactly what it means, is not a matter which one can convincingly argue should be put in the Constitution at this time.

When I asked the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) about aboriginal and treaty rights, he claimed their rights would be protected through the old section 24, which everyone knew was inadequate. All Indian, Metis and Inuit people across the country said it was not worth anything. He implied that nothing more was either needed or possible.

When the Tories brought out their amendment to the Constitution, they went even further than the government in denying the rights of aboriginal peoples. Their suggested amendment did not even mention these people. Their amendment would have read as follows:

The guarantee in this charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed as denying the existence of any rights or freedoms that may pertain to any cultural community or any other rights or freedoms that may exist in Canada.

This is what the Tory party was willing to offer the aboriginal people of Canada; this was their amendment. The facts are very clear and may be found by anyone who cares to read the record of the constitutional committee.

All members of the committee listened very attentively when representatives of the Indian, Metis and Inuit appeared before the committee. We listed and asked questions, but neither the Liberals nor the Tories were prepared to take any positive action. I am very proud of the role the New Democratic Party played in forcing the government to make a positive recognition and affirmation of aboriginal rights. In this respect I should like to pay tribute to the leader of my party who was involved in some very difficult negotiations with the government. These negotiations were successful and I would like to commend the government for its willingness to move on this important issue. I would also like to commend members of the Conservative Party for giving the amendment their unanimous support when it was put forward to the committee. I invite them now to join with us in supporting this package so that recognition and affirmation of aboriginal rights will become a constitutional reality, and not simply a dead letter in the constitutional report.

Mr. Manly: When we bring the Constitution home we will be saying to ourselves and to the world that we are no longer a colonial people. By recognizing the rights of the aboriginal peoples we are also saying that we no longer want to be a colonizing people. We do not want to look upon the Indians, the Inuit or the Metis simply as subjects to the colonized and as a people who have lands which can be exploited. We want these people to take their full place and their full stature as members of Canadian society.

For this to happen we need a change of attitude, as well as a change in the Constitution. Without the political commitment to see justice done for the aboriginal peoples, our new Constitution will remain only a scrap of paper. Through their experience with a long series of treaties, negotiations and agreements the aboriginal peoples know how empty and hollow our promises can be. Right now the James Bay Cree, who received many assurances a few years ago in exchange for the surrender of their rights, are finding that the Government of Canada and the government of Quebec are going back on their word. These people are suffering a serious health problem and our government says it is powerless to do anything about it because of the agreement.

This is why some of the Indian people are a bit uneasy about the wording which says their rights are hereby "recognized and affirmed." They would like a stronger wording which says that those rights are sanctioned, ratified and confirmed. They would like to see additional protection for their rights in the amending formula so that no changes could be made in those rights without their consent. We would support any strengthening of their rights in the amending formula.

But even without this we recognize that Canada has taken an important step forward, which now needs to be ratified by this House. Constitutional recognition of aboriginal and treaty rights must be backed up by serious negotiations which will give these people an economic base on which they can build. The future actions of the government will indicate how serious it is in the recognition of these rights.

One major problem needs to be faced by us all. We are concerned about Section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act which discriminates against Indian women on the basis of sex. If an Indian man marries a non-Indian woman she is entitled to Indian status. However, if an Indian woman marries a non-Indian man she loses her status. In both cases women take their status from their husbands. I remind this house that the Indian Act was imposed upon the Indian people. This discrimination was not of the Indian people's making. However, many Indians have come to accept it, as all people sometimes accept discrimination which does not directly affect them. I think the time has come to change this situation.

I would like to throw out two challenges. First, I challenge the federal government to develop a program of land entitlement and financial entitlement which will make it possible and attractive for bands to receive Indian women back into membership, without these women becoming an additional burden upon communities already struggling with poverty and very meagre resources. Let us have some positive action on the part of the federal government to make it possible for bands to receive these people back into membership.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Manly: Second, I challenge Indian bands themselves to develop their own procedures for membership; procedures which do not discriminate on the basis of sex. In this regard I was very pleased to receive a copy of a telex from the Aboriginal Council of British Columbia, which represents many different tribal federations and many different bands. I believe this telex indicates that Indian society is not static, chauvinistic or a relic of the past, but that it is dynamic, moving with the times and that Indian people themselves are committed to fairness. I would like to read the telex. It is from George Watts, chairman of the Aboriginal Council of British Columbia. It reads:

> The Aboriginal Council of British Columbia meeting in full delegation Saturday, February 7, 1981, gave unanimous approval to the following resolution:
> Moved by Ray Jones (Gitksan-Carrier Tribal Council) seconded by Leonard Tanner (Okanagan):
> That all tribal groups in the province of British Columbia actively seek legislative change to the membership section of the Indian Act before the next quarterly meeting of the Aboriginal Council, and
> That the tribal groups endorse the reinstatement of people of our nation not recognized as being Indian, and
> That the chairman on behalf of tribal group representatives forward a telegram to the Minister of Indian Affairs informing him of our position.

This telex indicates that the Indian people are serious about removing discrimination. They do not want to be discriminated against by non-Indian society: they do not want to discriminate within Indian society. By recognizing their rights we will make it possible for Indian people to remove this kind of discrimination. By recognizing their rights in the Constitution we will make it easier for them to gain recognition of their economic and their political rights so that once again they can take their full place as members of the Canadian society.

I want to conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that I believe this is a good Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I believe this is a good Constitution. I am proud to give it support.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in participating in this debate. I had hoped to be able to do this last October when the debate began. As events proceeded, the government made certain not too many of us would be able to participate in the debate at that time. Thus, the speech I planned to make at that time had to be postponed.

I am pleased to follow my countryman from British Columbia who just concluded by saying this is a great Constitution and a great bill of rights. In the next few minutes I will be examining them to see whether they are as great as he says. Maybe he has very selective vision. We will see.

We must keep in mind as we debate this issue that it is an important issue for the House only because it is on the Order Paper. It is not an important issue before the country. I think members on both sides of the House will agree that the people across Canada believe it is the economic issues that ought to be debated in the House at this time. It is the inflation which we are facing in our country and the robbing of the low income group of 20 per cent of their pay cheques which should be before us for consideration.

An hon. Member: Two supporters have just arrived.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I hope after all this applause you credit me with a few extra minutes, and then some.

An hon. Member: Three more just arrived.

Mr. Friesen: While every other western nation is debating the problems of energy supply and security, we debate the Constitution. It seems to me it is evident all across Canada that this Constitution, or any other, will not put one extra slice of bread on the table.

I spoke to a Liberal member from the eastern townships and asked how much he was getting on the constitutional issue and he said zero; yet we have the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) saying we have to pass this package now because the people of Quebec are demanding it. The people of Quebec know the important issue facing us today is the economy, and if this package addresses the referendum in Quebec, why do the three party leaders in the province of Quebec oppose it? We understand why Mr. Levesque might oppose it, but why does the Liberal leader in that province oppose this package if it is the answer to the referendum?

This package has the highest priority on the Order Paper only because the government controls the Order Paper.

I want to begin my remarks by paying tribute to my leader who on October 2 was given 90 minutes by the Prime Minister to study the text, analyse the issues, look at the problems and then address the people of Canada; 90 minutes, Mr. Speaker, in that short time he homed in on the critical issues facing the country now and in the future if this proposition passes in its present form.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: He did all Canadians proud. I was proud of him, and I know the people of Canada now recognize that it is because the Right Hon. Joe Clark assumed the leadership that night and it is because of his perceptions, his honesty and his willingness to put his future on the line, that we have an open and honest debate in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: I also want to pay tribute to my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) whom I watched very carefully during the debate in October and in the proceedings of the committee. I observed his skill, his patience and his statesmanship, and I want all members of this House, all the people of Canada, to know that I am proud to call him a brother.

Finally, I want to pay tribute to the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal). I came to this House at the same time as he, and I remember very well that he was the mover of the Speech from the Throne that year. I recall listening to the conservations of other members in the government benches at that time when they said this is a young man who bears watching, and he has done this chamber proud. I watched him during the proceedings of the committee in which I participated several times. I saw his fairness, his incisive intellect, his respect for the institution, his respect for the people who appeared before the committee, for the people on the committee, and I was proud to call him a colleague and a friend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, probably one of the most frequent words used in this debate is the word "entrenchment". The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) in his "Householder" to his constituents last fall used that word and defined it as meaning "to dig deep" and "put into place" so that something will be immovable. It is a word taken from construction, and that is a good definition. If that is what entrenchment means with respect to the Constitution, then it is imperative that we be careful of what we entrench. If it is going to be immovable or difficult to change then we have to be careful what we put in.

I think it is recognized that a charter is a statement of an understanding of what we as a people perceive to be right or wrong in our society, and is designed to address those perceptions. It is only those ingredients we want which must be there, otherwise the foundation will crumble. I would ask, particularly my colleagues from the province of Quebec, suppose in 1867, the Fathers of Confederation had entrenched in the British North America Act, a bill of rights based upon the mores, perceptions, bigotry and lack of understanding that existed in the Quebec community of that time. I wonder if today the people of Quebec would be enjoying the flowering of their culture and their language. Would we be where we are as a nation; would the French-speaking Canadians be where they are had we entrenched such a bill of rights?

The difficulty with entrenching a bill of rights is that none of us have that omniscience whereby we can anticipate the future; none of us are that wise. I repeat, we must be careful of what we entrench. In the jargon of the construction trade, there can be no lumps of clay, there can be no raw dirt mixed in with the concrete. And I believe we are entrenching in this Constitution some materials that make for a crumbly foundation.

One of those foreign ingredients, one of those lumps of clay, one of those ingredients that will cause the foundation to fall apart, is the amending formula. Any formula which makes of some provinces second-class citizens and indeed of some, third-class citizens, is a foreign object to that aggregate in the foundation. It is something we do not want.

While the Prime Minister talks about a charter of rights, at the same time he talks about second and third-class provinces because of the very nature of the formula he is imposing. The difficulty with this charter of rights is that we are entrenching not only good things, we are also entrenching unfairness into our Constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: If the hon. member for Davenport is right when he says that entrenching in a constitution means to dig deep, then we ought not to be entrenching unfairness in this Constitution.

Let me show what I mean, Mr. Speaker. The amending formula is what is called the Victoria formula, now reduced to seven provinces but 80 per cent of the population. Clause 45 provides that a province which at any time has had 25 per cent of the population has a permanent veto in the amending of the Constitution. That means that two provinces, Quebec and Ontario, have a permanent veto. In 1971 Quebec had 27.9 per cent of the population of Canada; in 1981 it has 26.4 per cent. In other words, the percentage is going down; in one decade it has dropped by 1.5 per cent. Using the same ratio, by 1991 the population of Quebec will be 24.9 per cent. But, under the 25 per cent limit, Quebec will still have a veto on constitutional amendments.

British Columbia has a population of about 2.5 million and it increases by about 500,000 or just under 1 per cent each decade. In 1971 the population of British Columbia was 10.1 per cent of the total Canadian population; by 1981, it had risen to 11 per cent. This means that by 1991 it will be 11.9 per cent or 12 per cent.

With the progression we have today, in order for British Columbia's population ever to reach 25 per cent of the population of Canada, and for the province therefore to enjoy veto power, it will take 14 decades; it will take 14 decades for British Columbia to become equal to the province of Quebec. That means that in the year 2120 British Columbia will become equal with two other provinces, even though the population of the province of Quebec by that time may have dropped to 20 or 18 per cent. One hundred and forty years from now British Columbia will have made it.

The hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly) says this is a great Constitution. How long is British Columbia supposed to wait to become an equal partner in confederation? The proportions I have given hold true only if the rest of the population remains constant. If the population in other provinces grows, however, then British Columbia will have to wait another 25 or 40 or 50 or 200 years. So, by the year 2180, assuming that all provinces experience growth, British Columbia will become an equal.

I say to my colleagues who come from the province of Quebec, it took you 114 years to achieve the kind of equality you want to enjoy, and I applaud the fact you are achieving that—I am happy for you—but British Columbia has been waiting 110 years. Do you want us to wait another 140 or 200 years under this amending formula? Is that your concept of fairness?

Members of the New Democratic Party applaud the Constitution even though my friends from British Columbia have been called upon to represent the interests and needs of that province and to make sure it enjoys the full benefits of confederation, as does any other province. They are saying this is a good deal for British Columbia, even though we will have to wait 200 years. My friend, the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Parker), laughs but I wonder if his constituents who are waiting for full partnership are laughing. British Columbia wants to be a full member of confederation.

The proportions I have given tonight rest on the assumption that population growth remains stable in the rest of Canada. British Columbia does not want full partnership at the expense of the other three western provinces. Under this amending formula British Columbia can form 50 per cent of the western population with one other province but no other western province can do that.

Under this amending formula Prince Edward Island, with a population of 120,000—which is less than in my own constituency where there are about 175,000 people—is now an equal with all the other maritime provinces. I am happy about that, but in the process Prince Edward Island with 120,000 people has gained more power than the 900,000 people in Saskatchewan and more power than the 900,000 people in Manitoba.

An hon. Member: One million.

Mr. Friesen: One million. Is this fairness? Alberta has over two million people and Prince Edward Island with 120,000 people has a power equal to or greater than the province of Alberta. Members opposite say this is a fair Constitution? My friends in the New Democratic Party say this is a good Constitution.

● (2150)

An hon. Member: Not all of them.

Mr. Friesen: That is the New Democratic Party.

An hon. Member: Minus four.

An hon. Member: That is socialist justice.

Mr. Friesen: I took both a sense of pleasure and pain when I watched the news conference on television last night conducted by four members of the New Democratic Party. I applauded and I felt the anguish they felt. It was not an easy thing for them to do, to maintain party loyalty and to stand for principle. I do not belittle that at all. I admire the stamina and the integrity of these four people. In the news release one of them said this:

I want to turn for a moment to the amending formula. It is a particular denial of co-operative federalism when the amending formula now before Parliament includes two key features that have never been discussed at federal-provincial constitution conferences within the past decade.

I admire that kind of integrity and that kind of honesty. I wish to God we had 12 members of the New Democratic Party from British Columbia who had that kind of integrity. What about the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett), the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose), and the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) and the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson)? Where are these British Columbians who are supposed to be looking after the interests of British Columbia? They have been voted for and called to this House to look after the interests of the people of British Columbia.

Mr. Blackburn: No, the people of Canada.

An hon. Member: They are in bed with the Liberals.

Mr. Kempling: Make a speech, Blackburn.

Mr. Friesen: I said at the outset that the ingredients in the foundation have to be consistent and they have to be clean.

Mr. Andre: Western Canadians don't count.

Mr. Friesen: The amending formula is bad because we are entrenching unfairness into it. It is wrong.

Second, the unwelcome ingredient we do not need, the ingredient which will destroy the foundation, is such that we are entrenching an illusion. I recall that the representative from the Canadian Civil Liberties Association who came before the constitutional committee said the charter of rights in that form, admittedly somewhat amended and improved now, was a verbal illusion. That was what he called it, and that is what it is. When I first read the Constitution and looked at the charter, I looked at the provision. Seemingly it had all of the ingredients of a charter of rights as we usually think of them, and as we read them the French or the American charter, for example, but something was bothering me about it. I could not understand what it was, but I had a gnawing feeling that something was wrong. Then I began to look at the language of the charter, in other words, the grammar of it. Whether or not there is a direct speaker, every writer has a speaker. Every writer, whether the speaker is identified, puts a speaker into that piece of writing. If the speaker is not identified, you find the speaker in the style of the writing. As an example, let us take the American bill of rights, the first amendment passed ten years after the original constitution was written. We find in Amendment I:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion,—

Let me repeat that: "Congress shall make no law." Who is being addressed? Who is being spoken to in that amendment? It is the Congress, it is the government who is being spoken to. Who is speaking to the government? The people are speaking to the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: The language of the American bill of rights indicates clearly that the people are the ones who have all the rights, all the privileges and all the power except those that they assign to the Congress. They have the residual powers.

I might add there is another aspect of this style in the American bill of rights. In Amendment VI we find the following:

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial,—

Notice the emphatic form of the words "shall enjoy."

Let me turn to the proposed charter here in Canada. I read in Clause 2:

Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms—

Who is spoken to? The citizens are the ones being spoken to. If the citizens are the ones who are being addressed, who is doing the speaking? The government is doing the speaking. It is the government, the state, that is giving the powers to the individual, except those it wants to keep to itself. That is just the opposite to the American bill of rights.

Notice the passive form of the verb "has" in the Canadian charter whereas. The American one says "shall enjoy." What is so important about this? The one who is extending rights is the real owner of those rights. The one extending those rights has the real power. If he has real power, he can take the rights away.

The people have the power in the United States. They can also take away the power. That has been done. The U.S. has worked a formula into the Constitution itself by which the American people can take powers away from the government. This is known as initiative and referendum. The one extending the powers owns them and can take them away. The Canadian charter by the very wording of it, means that the central government, which says it will assign certain enumerated rights and privileges to the people, can also take them away.

Someone mentioned the Russian constitution. I have a copy here. The language in it is in the same passive form: "every citizen has the right." We know that the citizens of the Soviet Union have had their rights taken away, because the government enjoys all the rights anyway.

An hon. Member: The Canadian and the Russian are the same.

Mr. Friesen: I heard the hon. member. I wish he would repeat it.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

[English]

THE ENVIRONMENT—NIAGARA RIVER SOURCE OF GREAT LAKES POLLUTION

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, I rise concerning the question I posed in this House to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Simmons) on Monday, February 16, 1981, regarding the Niagara River as one of the greatest sources of Great Lakes pollution.

This deadly problem concerns not only those in the Niagara River vicinity, but all Canadians, and it must be dealt with immediately.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. MacBain) who is listening to this debate and who was one of the first to raise this troubling matter during this session of Parliament on November 19, 1980. At that time the hon. member asked:

Will the Government of Canada ask the government of the United States to take the necessary steps to reopen the recently completed SCA hearings, in light of the new evidence concerning quantities of TNT recently located on . . . the Niagara River from Niagara Falls, Canada?

I know the efforts the hon. member for Niagara Falls has made and is continuing to make to keep on top of this issue. His representations to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), to the Minister of State for Science and Technology and the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts), to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan), and to the IJC are commendable. Indeed the hon. member recognized, as we all must, that a problem of a severe nature exists in the Niagara area, which must be solved.

An editorial which appeared in the Toronto Sunday Star on February 15, 1981, prompted me to raise my question with the minister, as it too had seen the urgency of this matter. Indeed, the International Joint Commission which oversees the Canada-U.S. Great Lakes water quality agreement stated that the Niagara River remains a dangerous cause of pollution in the Great Lakes.

The commission in fact urged governments on both sides of the border to give this problem top priority, to try to eliminate the known sources of contamination—organic, chemical, and metal wastes—which are being dumped into the system, as well as preventing future contamination.

There are deep concerns over the amounts and variety of pollutants which are being dumped into the system daily, including such toxic substances as lead, arsenic, copper, mercury, PCBs and many others. The major contributors are the chemical and industrial sites along the banks of the river, as well as the added absorption of sewage wastes from both New York State and Ontario.

A New York State sewage plant on the upper Niagara, for example, is currently dumping vast amounts of sewage directly into the river and has been doing so for some time. It is this type of blatant action which must be curtailed. There are some fears that contaminants from many of the chemical waste sites along the river, such as from the Hooker Chemical Company, are seeping into the soil and creating further dangers. The Star reported, and I quote:

SCA Chemical Waste Services is currently before the American courts in a battle to continue dumping millions of gallons of chemical wastes into the Niagara yearly.

The Niagara River system provides drinking water to the cities and citizens along its banks. Also it provides water for irrigating crops which produce much of the fresh fruit and produce marketed to Canadians in all parts of the country. It has now been shown to be in danger of a disastrous overloading of various highly toxic wastes, many of which are known to be lethal to man.

One must stop to think what long-term and short-term effects these chemicals and contaminants will have on the health of the people who now live near the Niagara and future generations who will continue to make their homes there. Stronger measures must be taken now in order that we may protect these Canadians and preserve that which we will hand down to our children in future generations. We must ensure that the Niagara is not subjected to these great amounts of pollutants in the future, in order to preserve and protect our children's futures.

What can the Canadian government say it is doing to solve this problem and to protect the wellbeing of its citizens? It is imperative that all levels of our government work together in a concentrated effort to clean up these sources of pollution to the river and prevent further disintegration of the system from new sources.

But this is not enough. The Canadian government must work with the government of the United States in a joint venture and in a bilateral effort in order for any serious changes to work. Canada and the United States, as signatories to the Great Lakes water quality agreement, have the tools for co-operation and must continue to work together toward reducing the influx of pollutants into our Great Lakes. Without this joint concern and co-operation, all of our efforts are fruitless.

It is surely not too late for us to act upon these problems. Surely we can reverse the present levels of contamination into the Niagara River and subsequently into the Great Lakes.

I should like to congratulate the Toronto Sunday Star for drawing this serious problem to the attention of Canadians. Its editorial motivated me, as a Member of Parliament, to raise this issue in the House of Commons. No government can ignore these problems or their effect on our society and we, as concerned Canadians, must endeavour in every possible way to eliminate such destruction of our natural resources.

Canadians have a right to know what constructive action the governments on both sides of the border have taken and plan to take in the future to clean up all sources of contamination along the Niagara River and the Great Lakes.

I am a little disappointed that opposition members on the Conservative side are poking fun at such a serious problem. Shame!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It is a good thing you don't read the Toronto Star comics.

Mr. Kempling: He is on the comic page anyway.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first I want to congratulate my good friend, the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis), for raising this issue and also my good friend, the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. MacBain), for having pursued the issue over a number of months. This is an issue which concerns all of us in this House.

The International Joint Commission report on pollution in the Niagara River contains quite a number of specific recommendations for joint U.S.-Canadian programs. These recommendations include the establishment of a comprehensive and co-ordinated study of the total Niagara River system, including the identification of sources of contaminants, implementation of control programs and monitoring their effectiveness.

These major recommendations have already been acted upon for some time. Environment Canada has had a comprehensive surveillance and monitoring program in the Niagara River for many years. This program was strengthened in 1979, with the result that the Niagara River is the most intensively monitored portion of the Great Lakes system today. As a result of this effort, a federal-provincial report on the environmental quality of the Niagara River was released in 1980. I am pleased to note that the IJC has relied heavily on the data compiled by Canadian agencies in its report.

As early as last April, Canadian federal and provincial officials met with officials of New York State and the United States Environmental Protection Agency to work jointly on identifying specific sources of contaminants to the river and on the development of controls and monitoring requirements. More recently this co-operative effort has taken shape, as the Niagara River Toxics Committee is charged specifically to map direct and indirect discharges to the river and waste disposal sites suspected of having an impact in the area, to undertake an over-all assessment of the total pollution to the river, to advise on reported controls and to evaluate their effectiveness.

The International Joint Commission is also concerned about any additional discharges to the river which would increase the input of contaminants not only to the river but also to Lake Ontario. This has been our concern for some time now, and it is for this reason we have urged that SCA discharges not take place until its existing problems upstream have been adequately resolved. The Minister of State for Science and Technology and the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) has addressed this issue with American officials on a number of occasions.

Finally, Environment Canada is paying particular attention to the difficulties being experienced on the U.S. side of the river. We are actively encouraging investigations into past disposal practices and into resolving existing discharge problems, especially with respect to the Niagara Falls, New York, sewage treatment plant.

Once again I thank the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park for bringing this matter to the attention of the House.

Adjournment Debate

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT—OTTAWA "CITIZEN" INDOOR GAMES—ALLEGED PAYMENTS TO PARTICIPATING ATHLETES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I am very interested in the fact that the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis) raised his question. All of us in this House know the reason for our having the late night show is dissatisfaction on the part of hon. members with the responses they receive from the government or with the actions of the government respecting the issues in question.

I fully understand why the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park would be irate at the fact that the government is not taking any action on this issue. It is on the same basis that I am now raising my question because I was very dissatisfied with the response I received from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), who is responsible for amateur sport in this country.

The background is simply this: there have been reports in the press with respect to payments by the Ottawa Citizen, the one newspaper remaining in Ottawa, our national capital, to amateur athletes participating in the Ottawa Citizen Indoor Games.

There are two aspects which have caused me some serious concern. One is the whole question of where we are going in terms of amateur sport, and the other is the reports which have been forthcoming, and not denied by the newspaper, about an attempt to suppress the reporting of this particular story by a reporter employed by The Citizen. This is a matter of great concern in Canada today. The Kent commission is investigating the monopolistic tendencies of the newspapers in our country. The one-newspaper town is becoming a reality in more and more cities across Canada, and this is a very delicate issue to which we must address ourselves.

We should discuss in Parliament whether there is going to be a proper balance in terms of reporting and whether one-newspaper towns will have that balance where there will be freedom of reporting and disclosure of information, regardless of whether the newspaper involved is what I consider to be a commercial enterprise.

I know the management of the Ottawa Citizen has indicated that this event is not a commercial endeavour. There have been reactions to the fact that I raised this matter in the House of Commons and suggested that the Ottawa Citizen, according to the editor, lost something like $80,000. But let us face it, this particular indoor track meet, which is very popular and successful—and I hope it will continue—is a promotion by the Ottawa Citizen the same as the promotions one finds in the brewery business or the cigarette business, and the fact that the Citizen does not break even and loses money is a price the newspaper pays for this promotion. To suggest that it is not a commercial endeavour is, I think, not as close to the actual facts as one would hope, in view of the response from the editor of the Ottawa Citizen.

The Minister of Labour, who is responsible for fitness and amateur sport in Canada, said he will not investigate this matter. I find this to be a curious business. I do not wish him to be the policeman of amateur sport. That was not my purpose in asking him to look into this matter. But the minister responsible for amateur sport is the person in cabinet designated to disburse a substantial amount of money to amateur athletics across Canada. It seems preposterous for the minister to say he is not going to look into the matter at all, that he is not responsible for this and has no interest in it, when I am sure the taxpayers of Canada would be very interested to know who is in receipt of these funds.

In terms of the minister's properly administering his department, it would seem to me that he would want to know exactly the nature of guidelines set by the organizations which are funded by the department. I suppose that was the point I was making to the Minister of Labour. It is his responsibility as a custodian of taxpayers' money to find out exactly what is happening in terms of the organizations and associations to which he is disbursing funds. That question remains unanswered by the minister.

I was more satisfied with the response of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming), to whom the Kent commission is reporting. He responded in the House that the matter would be brought to the attention of the Kent commission. Subsequently I received a telephone call from his office assuring me that this matter was brought to the attention of the Kent commission, that is, the whole concern of suppressing news stories by the Ottawa Citizen or newspapers involved in commercial enterprises. The Minister of State for Multiculturalism has assumed his responsibility to have this matter looked into and to ensure that this aspect is investigated so that there will be a balance in Canada and we will not have a one-newspaper town subjected to coercion, or whatever one wants to call it, by the publisher or the editorial staff, as apparently took place, on the face of it, in this particular instance.

I should like to refer to an article by Julia Turner which appeared in last Saturday's edition of The Globe and Mail, in which she pointed out that Tim Harper, a reporter for the Ottawa Citizen, made a telephone call to follow up on a tip he received about these payments and was told by the senior editor that the matter was to be dropped. In a meeting on Thursday to explain why the story was dropped the sources said that the newspaper admitted to the payments.

I should like to conclude on this note: the Minister of Labour has a responsibility to find out whether this is an isolated incident or whether it is widespread in terms of the disbursement of funds. I simply ask the parliamentary secretary if he will respond by indicating why the minister is refusing to take any action in this regard.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Ottawa Citizen Indoor Games are organized and sponsored solely by the Ottawa Citizen. They have been held annually for the past four years at the Civic Centre, which is located in my riding of Ottawa Centre. Quite frankly, the games have been a great success. Whether or not they have been a profit-making venture by the Ottawa Citizen, I think they have contributed greatly to the ability of my constituents and others who visit the national capital region to see first-class amateur athletics. The meet about which we are talking tonight was sanctioned by the Canadian Track & Field Association, the national governing body for track and field in Canada.

As to the question of payments to some athletes which the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) raised, both Canadian and foreign athletes who have participated in these games or in similar games in Canada have received a great deal of attention in the media over the past week or so. The Ottawa Citizen, the sponsor of the games, and the Canadian Track & Field Association, the national governing body, have both stated publicly that any expense payments were made in accordance with established practice and were for expenses only.

The responsibility for the matter of the amateur status of Canadian athletes rests with the Canadian Track & Field Association. It is not intended to have departmental officials investigate these allegations, as it is not the responsibility of the department.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—FINANCIAL EFFECT OF PROPOSED OIL INDUSTRY NATIONALIZATION

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, on January 20, I rose in the House and asked a short question of the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). The essence of my question was what it is costing Canadians to buy oil companies and, second, whether there is a saving to Canadians. Unfortunately, the Minister of Finance was not able to answer me at that time. Hopefully, the parliamentary secretary will be able to do so tonight.

I would like to review some of the financial aspects from which I drew my question. The national energy policy states that the dividends paid to foreign countries in the past year has been approximately $600 million. We also know from the national energy policy that the government wishes to reduce foreign control from 70 per cent to 50 per cent. That means 20 per cent of $600 million is $120 million in dividends which Canadians will save each year. That is all they will save, and no more. With my background in investments it is not hard for me to calculate what we are really talking about in share prices.

I am sure the parliamentary secretary will confirm my figures when I say that the average oil company in Canada trades at 50 times its annual dividends. It is simple to take $120 million and multiply it by 50. You get $6 billion, which is the initial cost to Canadians. So, we will save $120 million a year but will have to pay a minimum of $6 billion. Unfortunately, this is only the start of my story.

When we look at Pacific Petroleums, we see it was bought at 50 per cent above its market value. When we look at Petrofina, we see that it was bought at over 100 per cent above its market value prior to take-over rumours. If you take these figures and start breaking them down, you come up with some very startling conclusions. To begin with, we have a figure of $6 billion as a minimum amount, which will be the cost to the Canadian people. But we have Pacific Petroleums, for which we paid a premium of 50 per cent over the market value, which brings us up to $9 billion. Then we have Petrofina, for which I said we paid a 100 per cent premium, which now brings us up to $12 billion. I would like to go on a little further and then come back to this, since a strange thing comes out of it.

We know from the National Energy Board that we consume approximately 1,850,000 barrels of oil a day in Canada. We know that the Canadian ownership account will tax us up to a maximum of $4 a barrel. If you multiply the barrels of oil per day by the number of days in a year, you come up with a figure of $2.7 billion for which the Canadian government can tax Canadians. This money could go out of the country. No one can stop it from doing so. You and I know, Mr. Speaker, that if we have X dollars to buy something—and we know what the current interest rates are—we can calculate how much we will pay for a product.

I would like to come back to what I said before. If we pay $6 billion for these oil companies, the cash flow which Canadians will be taxed on, which is money leaving the country, will be $1.1 billion. Part of my question dealt with that matter. If the amount we pay is $9 billion, it will go up to $1.7 billion in cash flow that Canadians will be taxed on each year. But what if the cash flow is $2.7 billion upon which we are taxed? How much can we buy with that? Knowing current interest rates and knowing that Canadian National, to use an example, can borrow at 14 per cent, with probably a 20-year bond issue, with that cash flow of $2.7 billion we could afford to purchase Canadian oil companies up to the amount of $16 billion. I have been trying to find out what it will cost Canadians. I am now saying it will cost Canadians a minimum of $6 billion and probably up to $16 billion. Anyone who wants to buy any firm or industry should know what they are prepared to pay for it. I want to know from the parliamentary secretary what the government is prepared to pay. How much money is the government prepared to export just to get a state-owned oil company? What will it cost Canadians? How will the government stop these funds from leaving the country? I would like the parliamentary secretary to answer that.

Of all the money involved, not one dollar will improve our oil situation. The government says it wants self-sufficiency by 1990. In 1974 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stood in this House and said we will have oil self-sufficiency by 1980. We do not have self-sufficiency, and the province of Alberta is saying by 1990 we will be importing three times the amount of oil now imported. Somebody is not telling the truth.

We know what the Prime Minister said in 1974, we know what the Alberta government said in 1974 and only the Prime Minister of Canada can be proved wrong, certainly not the province of Alberta.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it was very interesting to listen to the analysis of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Wright), especially with regard to his estimation of the value of securities and how they achieve their value. He seemed to imply, and I think Hansard will indicate this, that it is the value of current dividends that determine the value of shares. I hate to disillusion the hon. member, but I used to teach people like himself who were in the investment business—

An hon. Member: There goes his credibility.

Mr. Evans: —and at that time the value of shares was based upon the present value of future dividends, not current dividends, and if you talk about future dividends, you are saying that the cash flow of the firm in the future determines its value.

The hon. member asks how much we are prepared to pay. It depends on the estimate of the future cash flow and dividends. And when he says we cannot stop money from flowing out of the country in a nationalization or Canadianization program, whatever he wants to call it, he is right. When we or a Canadian company buys the assets of a foreign multinational, certainly there is always the chance those funds will leave the country, but the alternative is that if foreign ownership is retained, then dividends will flow out of the country in perpetuity, and if the system works as the hon. member and I both agree it should, then the present value of the dividends leaving the country will equal the present value of the money that is leaving the country as the purchase price.

All we say is that by improving Canadian ownership we are getting a bigger control of our own resource base in Canada. Canadians should participate more in the control and management of resources in Canada. That is the purpose of the Canadianization program, and the price being paid for those assets, as it was with Petrofina, is a fair price, as analysts have indicated, and reflects the value of the benefits that Canadians will receive from those assets in the future.

An hon. Member: Nonsense. State control; no benefits at all.

Mr. Evans: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to respond to the hon. member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

At 10.29 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE CONSTITUTION

SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The bad news for the government is that 64 per cent of the Canadian people have been joined by the Premier of Saskatchewan and four members of the NDP in opposing the government's constitutional package. But the good news for the government is that Russia's Pravda, the official voice of the Communist party, has come to the Liberal party's rescue and lashed out at those who oppose the Liberal party's constitutional policy as reactionaries. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek):

That, in this case, the government listen to us so-called reactionaries and reconsider both the process and the substance of its constitutional proposals.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

SUBSIDIZATION OF UNITED STATES MOTORISTS BUYING CANADIAN PETROLEUM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the latest figures which show the number of American motorists crossing the Canadian border to buy Canadian gas has risen to the point where some 24,000 cars crossed into Canada in a single day over the Peace River bridge at the Fort Erie-New York border crossing, and that these trips have increased by 60 per cent over 1980, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Huron-Bruce (Mr. Cardiff):

That this House call on the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to determine what the total cost to the Canadian taxpayer is for subsidizing the U.S. motorists gassing up in Canada, which must be in excess of $100 million a year, and that he make a statement as to what action the government will be taking to correct this situation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

TREATMENT OF RAMNARINE FAMILY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. On February 18 the Ottawa Citizen published an account of the treatment accorded a Canadian citizen, Mr. Ramnarine, a resident of my constituency, whom I have been trying to assist in bringing his wife and family to Canada since 1978. Immigration officials have managed to delay and bungle this attempted reunion so often that the family of seven are now on their fourth set of medicals. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That this House order the Minister of Employment and Immigration to provide all facilities necessary to ensure that this family be granted visas prior to the expiration of their fourth set of medicals, and that immigration officials responsible for the grossly incompetent manner in which this case has been handled be severely reprimanded, and full disclosure of the details of this mess be provided to this House.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF BILL C-48—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I too rise under Standing Order 43 to propose a motion. Having regard to the fact that the government's energy policy, as outlined in Bill C-48, now before the standing committee, is already showing serious dilatory effects on further exploration and development of new resources, and since provisions of Bill C-48 are clearly in contravention of certain international agreements under GATT, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That the government withdraw the present bill and immediately replace it with legislation, clearly designed with the aim of achieving energy self-sufficiency, and with sufficient safeguards to assure not necessarily government but Canadian ownership and control, without the Draconian measures contained in Bill C-48.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GRAIN

COMPENSATION TO FARMERS FOR EMBARGO ON SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len. Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the fact that the government accepted the responsibility to pay farmers for profit lost due to the embargo on grain to Russia amounting to over $60 million, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight):

That the Prime Minister direct his minister to pay the farmers immediately.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

STATE CONTROL EXERCISED BY ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact the Alberta government has moved heavily into state ownership with such grabs as Pacific Western Airlines and Alberta Energy Corporation from the private sector, and has now put Neptune terminals of Vancouver, 1,000 hopper cars, and three large inland grain terminals, under Alberta Tory state control, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the creeping socialism and state control exhibited by the Tory-Lougheed administration be heralded by this House as a prerequisite for nomination to the Socialist International, and that these actions set the stage for Grant Notley to be the next premier of Alberta.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUS OF WOMEN

SPEAKING ENGAGEMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) is going to Britain in March to press the government's case for a charter of rights which purports to guarantee equality between men and women in Canada, yet the principal forum in which the minister intends to speak on the issue is the Canada Club in London that bars women from membership. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs recognize such total inconsistency and cancel any speaking engagement which takes him to a forum that treats women like second-class citizens.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PRESERVATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS IN LATIN AMERICA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the reports today in El Salvador that the United States is intervening in the affairs of that country in an effort to cut off political opposition to the present government, and in view of continuing grotesque violations of human rights within El Salvador, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Prime Minister impress upon U.S. President Reagan, during his visit to Ottawa in March, Canada's strong support for the preservation of human rights in Latin America.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR RELATIONS

ACTION TAKEN BY ONTARIO HOSPITAL BOARDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), I move:

That this House deplores the vindictive action of a number of Ontario hospital boards in suspending 2,500 hospital workers and firing 28 unionists, an action completely out of line with modern management labour practices and one that is inimical to the provision of health services, and that this House calls for the immediate reinstatement of all of these workers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EL SALVADOR—POSSIBLE UNITED STATES MILITARY INTERVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, in light of reports from the United States Congress that it now has bipartisan support for increased military aid to El Salvador; in light of the statement by Senator Charles Percy, chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee, that he will not rule out the use of United States troops in El Salvador; and since Canada is a signatory to the United Nations Human Rights Declaration and a partner with Mexico in seeking non-military means to resolve the situation in El Salvador, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House direct the Prime Minister, during his meetings with President Reagan, to explore every opportunity of settlement of the El Salvador situation without involving military intervention by the United States armed forces.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

QUERY RESPECTING MINISTER'S MEETING WITH AFFECTED INDUSTRIES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In a submission to the National Energy Board last week major consumers of energy, such as the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, the Canadian Institute of Public Real Estate Companies, and a number of other associations stated they recognize that the number one problem with the government's National Energy Program is that it jeopardizes our security of supply. They also made the point that the industries they represent are being seriously hurt by the National Energy Program in two ways. The first is, because of the slowdown in exploration and development of the major projects, which is hurting them now and will hurt them more as the year progresses. Second, they say that their future security of supply is in jeopardy with serious consequences for industry.

Since the minister is responsible for the industries represented by these associations, has he had a meeting with these industries to determine first-hand their concern so that he might better represent their interests around the cabinet table when changes in the energy program are discussed?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, last week I met with a delegation from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and reviewed this aspect with them, along with a number of other aspects. I am satisfied the program we have put forward is directed in a way which is in the best interests of the Canadian manufacturing sector and Canadians generally, strengthening our industrial base and developing self-sufficiency in energy. If there is to be further adjustment in this area I think that while we are certainly ready to have discussions, if there is a slowdown in activity one must also look for the appropriate response from the government of Alberta, as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has pointed out.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, along with the Minister of Finance and the minister of energy, basically dismisses the entire Canadian business community which says that this program is damaging, and damaging now. It is the view of the associations which represent industries primarily located in Ontario and Quebec that the economies of those provinces will be seriously hurt this year as a result of the National Energy Program and that they will be put in serious jeopardy in the future because security of supply will not be met by this program. Has the minister at least discussed this possibility with his counterparts in the governments of Quebec and Ontario to ascertain if, in fact, there are other people besides himself who share the view that the entire industry is wrong? Will he take the initiative to discuss this with his counterpart in the province of Ontario so that he may be apprised of the real situation?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, I am certainly looking very carefully at what the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has said. I am always ready to have an exchange of views on these matters with my provincial counterparts, although our counterpart in Ontario is rather busy right now in another area of activity.

But I certainly touched on this, and a number of areas of joint interest, for example, when I was in Winnipeg earlier this week with my Manitoba counterpart. I am very interested in the potential for industrial development which I am convinced is there to be achieved through the implementation of our National Energy Program. Along with our own willingness to discuss the situation I think there must be an equivalent willingness on the part of the government of Alberta, since they are the ones refusing to proceed with major projects. It is not the federal government which is refusing to proceed.

ROLE PLAYED BY GOVERNMENT OF ALBERTA

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is the minister telling the House that he feels the government of Alberta is primarily responsible for the health of Canada's manufacturing industries and for the concerns of the industries represented by such organizations as the Pulp and Paper Association of Canada? Is that what the minister is telling the House? Would the minister please explain how it is that virtually the entire business community in Canada, not just the oil and gas industry but all of those who make daily investment decisions with regard to their future, has reached the conclusion that the energy program is disastrous? Could the minister tell me on what basis he reaches a contrary view?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, it is the hon. member who has reached certain conclusions. I am certainly prepared to consider very carefully what these organizations have said. But the most interesting point in the hon. member's question is the implication that he believes we should be taking a position of leadership, in terms of management and direction of major projects, rather than the government of Alberta. I hope he will explain that to his colleagues in Alberta.

PREMIUM PAID ON ACQUISITION OF PETROFINA

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday, in answer to my question concerning the premium paid on the Petrofina acquisition being lower than the North American average for similar types of transactions, he said it was 37 per cent as against 56 per cent on similar transactions. In saying that he made the point that I have been trying to make over the past two or three weeks; he has established the premium of 36 per cent on the price of $87.50 which was the price at the time of the takeover and not the price at which the shares had been trading before all the leaks over the past few months began occurring.

In view of the fact the price was $60 when rumours of a takeover occurred, and I remind him of the chart I showed him yesterday, how does he justify a 100 per cent premium in comparison to the 56 per cent North American average referred to in his answer?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, when I referred to the 56-57 per cent premium, it was a premium paid over the price of the shares at the time the takeover took place, and I compared apples with apples, contrary to what the hon. member is trying to do. I would invite my hon. friend to consider the facts. The important thing is what is the company's worth.

The overwhelming consensus of investment analysts who have commented on this is to the effect that Petro-Canada paid a fair price and no more, and that has been substantiated by outstanding analysts right and left in the investment community.

Mr. Lalonde: The decision taken by the management of Petro-Canada was based on information gathered from expert consultants they hired, so it was a good business decision, as were the decisions taken in the last two takeovers which were also condemned at the time by the Conservatives and which proved to be excellent deals for Canadians on all counts.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, using the minister's own figures, the 100 per cent premium that is clearly there, I show the minister the trading range of BP Canada, another candidate for acquisition, and the trading range of Petrofina which has gone through the roof as a result of the rumours resulting in the clearly exorbitant premium of 100 per cent compared to the minister's normal figure of 56 per cent. In view of that will the minister now acknowledge that the leaks which forced the price up to $87.50 when the deal was completed, have cost Canadian consumers and taxpayers up to $300 million in added costs, and will he also cease being so defensive about this matter and order the management of Petro-Canada to report to him on how they are going to act in the future so that these leaks do not recur and cost Canadians these large amounts of money?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, frankly, I do not feel any need to be defensive about this deal.

An hon. Member: It is not your money.

Mr. Lalonde: It has been and will prove to be an extremely good deal for Canadians, and I think my friend is in a very small minority in carrying on the old war of the Tories against Petro-Canada without any justification, and without support from the public.

As far as that particular deal is concerned, my friend should stop being so offensive in his innuendoes and implications. If he has evidence of leaks from Petro-Canada, let him state the facts and they will be investigated by the proper authorities. If he has evidence of leaks from Petrofina, then he should bring them to the attention of the securities commission concerned, and I am sure they will want to investigate them. That is the rule of the game, that is the law in this country. Once more, Madam Speaker, as far as this particular deal is concerned, I think Canadians support it and certainly the government does.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

APPLICATION OF REBATE PROGRAM FOR BENEFIT OF CANADIAN CONSUMERS

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the piano player my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It concerns the rebate program which is currently being carried on by General Motors, Ford, and Chrysler in the United States. Rebates of up to $1,800 are being offered on cars, many of which are produced in Canada. The president of Chrysler, Mr. Iacocca, known as the Ayatollah Iacocca, is reported as making a remark to the effect that March will be "a great month for car buyers. We're really going to hype the market." I should like to ask the minister why are GM, Chrysler and Ford not going to be "hyping" the market in Canada, particularly in view of the fact that just a week ago the minister made a deal with Chrysler. Can he not see that the benefits of this kind of arrangement should go to the consumers of Canada as well as those in the United States?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, I will seek further information about the way this rebate program is being applied. When I looked into similar matters in the past I found that similar or equivalent concessions were being offered in Canada but in a different form than those in the United States. I will check to see if this is the case in this instance.

It is interesting to note with respect to the announcement made about Chrysler, that the United Auto Workers issued a statement in which they endorsed the new operating plan proposed to the federal government by Chrysler Canada and agreed to by us last week. I think it is very important to recognize in this House that the workers, those whose jobs are most fully involved, support the agreement we announced last week.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, that has nothing to do with the rebate program. I asked a very specific question with respect to rebates. Rebates have been going on for some time, and the minister comes to this House and says he will look into the matter. By the time he finishes looking into the matter the rebate program will be over. Rebates are only planned for the months of March and April.

INVESTMENT BY AUTOMOBILE COMPANIES IN CANADA

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): My supplementary question, Madam Speaker, is this: since the minister took over the portfolio of industry, trade and commerce and responsibility for the riding of Windsor West, he has promised the renegotiation of the Auto Pact, on which nothing has happened and he has promised other initiatives with the Japanese, and apparently nothing has happened on those. What exactly is he doing to ensure that Canadians will have a fair share of the new investment that will take place by GM and Ford in the years ahead? Can he give us a guarantee that we will have investment in Canada equivalent to our market share and that the marketing practices of the auto companies will be the same in Canada as they are in the United States, since they are getting such great benefits from the government and the taxpayers of Canada?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend should spend less time worrying about playing the piano and more time concentrating on the information provided to this House and the country about our efforts in the areas about which we are talking. We did begin with the previous United States government, as we promised, formal consultations on the operations of the Auto Pact. These discussions have continued and we will be pressing them forward with the new administration. As a result of our discussions with Japan, we have had responses from the Japanese industry in terms of major buying missions as well as the response from the Japanese government that it would be encouraging Japanese industry to respond positively to the type of action we want from the industry in terms of greater Canadian content here.

In our discussions with Canadian-based industry and through formal action we have taken steps which will lead, in the case of Ford, to the restoration of 1,300 jobs in the Oakville plant and the investment that is necessary there to have assembled in the Oakville plant a new front wheel drive fuel-efficient car. We have commitments by way of information from General Motors—

Madam Speaker: Order. Ministers, too, should try to keep their answers brief.

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, the minister said he would make a statement in the House on Chrysler. He has not done that. He said he would make a statement in the House on Massey-Ferguson. He has not done that. He holds press conferences. He is the minister for press conferences. He is not a minister responsible to this House telling the House what is going on here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: I do not need lectures from the minister telling me how to do my job. I have been in the House waiting for him to make statements.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I must remind the hon. member this is question period. Would he ask a question, please?

Mr. Rae: My question to the minister is this: when is he going to make a statement in the House of Commons indicating what firm steps will be taken to guarantee Canadian shares, and to guarantee that Canadian consumers and Canadian workers will reap the benefits of the Auto Pact, rather than simply making statements outside the House as to what his intentions are over the next 25 years?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, through answers similar to the one I was giving a few moments ago, I was giving this House concrete, definite information on the action we have taken to bring a fair share of investment to this country, to preserve and to add to jobs for Canadian workers. If my hon. friend would spend less time on mock indignation—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Gray: —and more time listening to what concrete action we are taking, and what action we are going to take, he will be doing a better job than the one he claims he is doing for the people of Canada. At least, in doing what I am doing—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: —I can demonstrate concrete action for Canadian workers, and that is more than he can do.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROVINCIAL BOUNDARIES

MAINTENANCE OF LABRADOR AS PART OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada. The minister will know from today's press that a consortium has been formed in the province of Quebec called La Société de Développement Quebec-Labrador-Rigolet Inc., with the acronymn LABEC. That consortium has asked the government of Quebec for permission to claim much of the mineral, forest, oil and gas resources of the province of Newfoundland.

If you will bear with me, Madam Speaker. The government of Quebec, would seem to be tacitly approving of this claim based on an anomaly in the law whereby, for example, they claim the government of Quebec did not agree to the privy council boundary definition of 1927. They base that claim on the amendment of the Constitution of 1871 and the amendment of 1898, which gave to Quebec very much of the territory which is now part of the province of Newfoundland.

My question, Madam Speaker, is simply this: is the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of Canada prepared to state in the House and reassure me, as he did in committee, that as the Attorney General of Canada he would be prepared to argue on behalf of Canada that the boundary between Newfoundland and Quebec, as defined by the privy council, of 1927, is and will remain the boundary between Quebec and Newfoundland?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I had to deal with that problem in committee. The government's view is that Labrador is part of the province of Newfoundland. Labrador is not part of the province of Quebec as it was established in 1949 when Mr. St. Laurent unilaterally accepted Newfoundland into confederation and recognized, in so doing, the border according to the Canadian Constitution. Probably Mr. Peckford would be well advised to look to the federal government as his friend. He should not stay in bed with Mr. Lévesque all the time.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, first, the minister should not try to deceive the House by saying that Mr. St. Laurent accepted Newfoundland unilaterally in 1949, because he knows that provision was made for Newfoundland's entry into confederation in 1867, and that it was agreed to by the partners at that time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: There was no unilateral action. All the minister has to do is read Section 148 of the British North America Act.

An hon. Member: Read the Constitution.

Mr. McGrath: I notice the clowning Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I would ask members to co-operate with the Chair and please ask their questions. We are having too many speeches and lengthy preambles before the questions.

Mr. McGrath: Madam Speaker, perhaps it might be easier for us if ministers did not try to mislead the House during question period.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: The minister did mislead the House. However, my question to the minister is this. Is he prepared to state that the boundary established by the terms of union of 1949 shall remain? Just so there is no doubt in anyone's mind, is the minister now prepared—and this will go out as a signal of the position of the Government of Canada to this consortium in Quebec—to say to Newfoundland that you will exercise, as the government, your constitutional authority and establish a corridor through Quebec so that Newfoundland's hydroelectric power can be transmitted to markets in New York? The minister has refused to grant that up to now, and he knows it.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, we said we are willing to do for Newfoundland what we have done for any other province wanting to export natural gas, oil and so on to any other province using our federal power. In a letter signed by the Prime Minister of Canada to Mr. Peckford we said that we want to do that when there is a real contract and a real need. We all recognize it would be better for Mr. Peckford to try to make a deal with Mr. Lévesque, they are so friendly these days, but I am pleased to see that the premier and the hon. member know that we need a strong federal government to protect the interests of Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

QUERY RESPECTING TELEGRAM FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA ECCLESIASTICS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. The minister has received a telegram from the archbishop's office of the Archdiocese of Vancouver signed by all the bishops of British Columbia and the Yukon. It points out that the present proposed charter focuses almost exclusively on the rights of the individual as an existential entity and very imperfectly recognizes groups in relation to society. One sentence from the telegram reads:

In our opinion the imbalance between individual and collective rights in the proposed Canadian charter poses a threat to many groups and societies including the church and church related societies such as schools, hospitals and social agencies.

Does the minister share these concerns expressed by the archdiocese in British Columbia? If so, is he willing to stake his reputation, without qualification, on the statements he made in committee on this subject that the charter would protect group rights, such as churches, independent schools, hospitals and social agencies?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, these questions were answered in committee dozens of times. The Canadian charter guarantees rights and freedoms, but it also protects group rights. We made sure that the rights entrenched in the Constitution, for example, in some provinces the right to have confessional schools, will be well protected. We have also recognized in the Constitution the principle of muticulturalism in Canada. We have recognized the collective rights of the Indian people. I think that during the proceedings of the committee the three parties gave their unanimous approval to each of those items. We have maintained a very good balance between individual and collective rights.

QUERY WHETHER CHARTER OF RIGHTS COVERS UNBORN CHILDREN

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice, to whom I sent notice, because I think all members in the House will be interested in the precision of his answer.

In the proposed charter of rights, Section 7 reads:

Everyone has the right to life—

Section 15 reads:

Every individual is equal before and under the law—

Could the minister clarify the meaning of those two sections with respect to the abortion question? When the government uses the words "everyone" and "every individual", does the government include the unborn child? Will the government take steps to ensure there is no ambiguity concerning constitutional protection for the rights of the unborn child?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, we dealt with that problem extensively in the committee. I hope the hon. member read the committee's report. We said that the question of abortion in Canada will not be affected by the charter of rights, that the question of abortion will be dealt with, as it has been in the past, through the Criminal Code. The Criminal Code has a provision about it. It is clear, and it is enforced by the provinces. The situation will remain the same. We do not intend to change the legal situation in Canada with regard to abortion. It will remain as it is now.

REPRESENTATIONS WITH RESPECT TO STATUS OF WOMEN

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my first question to the Minister of Justice. The minister has been meeting with representatives of the ad hoc committee on women and the Constitution as a result of their conference in Ottawa last weekend which was so successful. Has the minister given serious consideration to some of the improvements they would like to see made in the charter, for example, the use of the word "person" where "individual" is now used? Will he advise which particular improvements or additions it might be possible to introduce in the charter?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, following the representations made by the different women's groups at the committee stage, Clause 15 was amended to meet some of these requirements. They made other suggestions. As we are now in the final stage, the possibility of any change is not great. Some aspects were dealt with in committee and some of those were disposed of by the committee. We have already met many of these points but, as I told them, we will see whether it is possible to make any further improvements. It is not possible to have a perfect charter. I repeat, I believe we met most of their points. If there is a possibility of more improvements, we will do our best to study all aspects of them. However, we are at the third stage of the resolution and the possibilities of amendment are quite limited.

VIEW OF MINISTER ON RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING STATUS OF WOMEN

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, the minister knows that the Prime Minister said these were probably worth-while additions. I will address my supplementary to the minister responsible for the status of women who has also been meeting with representatives of the ad hoc committee. Does the minister think these are worth-while additions that are being proposed and, if so, which ones is he pressing upon his colleagues?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, we are always pleased to meet with representatives of any women's group to talk about different positions and different points of view. Also, I am very pleased to pass on their representations to my colleagues in cabinet, which I will be prepared to do in these circumstances.

STATUS OF OPPONENTS OF GOVERNMENT'S CONSTITUTIONAL PROPOSALS

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. Is it the position of the government that Canadian citizens and Members of Parliament who oppose the government's constitutional proposals are citizens with less commitment to freedom and justice than those who support it?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): What a silly question.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, that is a matter of debate. I would just say that I find it unusual for hon. members opposite to talk about being in favour of a charter of rights only if all the first ministers agree, when they know that in the case of the hon. member for Provencher the premier of his province said he will never accept any charter of rights in Canada. I therefore find that the hon. member is speaking out of both sides of his mouth, something I cannot do.

Mr. Epp: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Justice has not answered my question. The points he raised today have been matters of debate. I am asking him about a statement that arises directly from the Prime Minister's statement yesterday. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development says it is a silly question. Maybe it was a silly statement on the part of the Prime Minister. What I am asking the minister, for the integrity of Parliament is this: does the government support the position of the Prime Minister that those Canadians, Members of Parliament and members of the other place, who feel there is a better way to have constitutional amendment are not just as Canadian and do not want to protect freedom and justice equally as those who indicate they support the government process, and justice, freedom and liberty?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I have not read the Prime Minister's statement. I suggest the hon. member's question is a matter of debate. I agree that hon. members are anxious to take action, but I wonder why the hon. member is so sensitive to arguments, since members opposite claim that we are bent on dividing this country and question our motives. If one believes in a charter of rights, one must believe also that it should apply to all Canadians. And I do not understand why the hon. member, although he claims to be in favour of a charter of rights, will not make sure that all Canadians enjoy the same rights. In this connection, I think that if he has firm convictions, he should see to it that all Canadians enjoy equal rights.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—FOOD AID SUPPLIED THROUGH INTERNATIONAL RELIEF ORGANIZATIONS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. CBC reports last night indicated that the assistant secretary for European affairs in the Reagan administration is visiting various European countries to ask them to suspend food aid which they propose to supply to the people of El Salvador through relief organizations such as the International Red Cross. I know that yesterday the minister said he would not lead a crusade against the attitude of the American administration. I wish to ask him whether he will immediately let the United States state department know that Canada disapproves of any attempt by the United States to influence the cutoff of much needed food supplies to the people of El Salvador, particularly when those food supplies are being distributed through highly respected international relief organizations.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we are certainly not considering any cut-off of food aid in the manner described, nor am I aware that we have even been asked to do so. Emissaries from the U.S. government visited my department this week concerning El Salvador. To the best of my knowledge at the present time, and I will check further, the conversation had to do exclusively with information concerning the supply of arms to the rebel forces in El Salvador. I repeat, I am not aware of any such request.

Miss MacDonald: That was not the question, Madam Speaker. I asked the minister if he would bring to the attention of the American authorities the disapproval of Canada as to the way they are proceeding to try to influence other countries, particularly now in Europe, to cut off food supplies through international agencies. It is my understanding that Canada has been asked to make a very modest contribution to the International Red Cross to assist with food aid in El Salvador. Has a decision been made to supply that modest contribution? If not, how quickly will it be done to help out in this humanitarian effort?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, any decisions that we make with respect to food aid in El Salvador or elsewhere will be made on the basis of normal principles. My answer to the previous question did answer what the hon. member asked. I stated I was not aware that the United States was making any such representations. It would surely be gratuitous for us to make a protest against something we do not believe has happened.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

INQUIRY RESPECTING PROVINCIAL ACCOUNTABILITY FOR FORMULA PAYMENTS

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): I thank you, Madam Speaker, for recognizing me once again. My question is for the Secretary of State. In view of the lack of monitoring mechanisms at the federal level concerning the ultimate use of formula payments to the provinces under the official languages program for minority language education, can the Secretary of State assure me that he will try to do better than his predecessors in this regard so as to make the provinces accountable to the Canadian people, and that he is not planning on hiding behind the argument that he can do nothing as education comes under provincial jurisdiction? I ask this question, Madam Speaker, in view of the report of the FFHQ, which severely condemns the lack of monitoring mechanisms and which even hints at misappropriation within provincial jurisdictions, and also because of the appeal by the people of Vonda, Saskatchewan, which has been rejected.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Corbin: They are not interested over there. Shame on them!

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, in reply to this very important question, which is of major concern to my colleagues representing francophone constituencies outside Quebec, I would like to say first of all that I have arranged a meeting with the president of the FFHQ and members of her executive Monday afternoon. I imagine that she will want to discuss this question.

I also want to add, Madam Speaker, that at my last meeting with the Council of Ministers of Education of Canada held in Fredericton two or three weeks ago, I discussed this matter with the ministers of education of the various provinces when we renewed for the fiscal year 1980-81 the statutory transfers for minority official language education and also for second language instruction according to the provinces. I indicated for my part that the federal government would not be willing to renew automatically a new five-year agreement unless we could come to an agreement on the matter of accountability mentioned by the hon. member. The ministers of education agreed to form a task force which would look into the matter and report to the Council of Ministers of Education in September.

TRANSPORT

FREIGHT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM FOR RAPESEED PRODUCTS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Can the Minister of Transport assure the House that the interim freight assistance program for rapeseed products will be extended beyond March 31, and could he also indicate whether there will be any modifications to the existing program to cover the full differential between the minimum compensatory rate and the frozen rate? I ask this as a matter of importance to the rapeseed industry, which is contemplating export and domestic markets at the present time.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am very sorry, but the question should be addressed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The rapeseed product subsidy is one which falls under his department.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, I thought the Minister of Transport had some responsibility for matters pertaining to transport. Perhaps he could elicit the answer from his colleague.

May I then direct the question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and ask him if he could assure the House that the interim freight assistance program for rapeseed products will be extended beyond March 31, and may I also ask him whether there will be any modifications to ensure that the full differential will be taken into consideration? I refer to the differential between the minimum compensatory rate and the statutory frozen rate.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, this matter is being worked on at this time, and I hope it will be possible for us to make an announcement very soon.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ALLOCATION OF EMERGENCY FUND

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. On February 11, 1981, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and Senator "Bud" from the other place, announced the establishment of a $1 million emergency fund to "enable Indian groups to protect themselves against adverse social and economic effects of major natural resource developments in or near their communities". As of February 11, was that $1 million emergency fund allocated by the Treasury Board and, if it was not by February 11, has it been allocated as of today?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, approval in principle had been given to the existence of such a fund. I do not recall whether all the details with respect to the specific areas of allocation have yet been established.

COST OF IMPACT STUDIES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

An hon. Member: He is not here.

An hon. Member: He was here a second ago.

Mr. Fulton: He was sitting here just a second ago. Perhaps in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I will put my question to his parliamentary secretary.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has identified 126 major projects involving billions of dollars which will impact upon Indian communities in Canada. I wonder if the minister, his parliamentary secretary or someone responsible in this House for Indian Affairs and Northern Development could indicate whether $8,000 per impact study is viewed as adequate by the government.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I shall see to it that this question is referred to the minister, and I wish to assure the hon. member that he will obtain a reply in the very near future.

POST OFFICE

INQUIRY RESPECTING PASSAGE OF BILL SETTING UP CROWN CORPORATION

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. For some time now, we have been considering the bill to turn the Post Office into a Crown corporation. Does the Minister intend to bring the bill back to the House in the near future, that is to bring it in for third reading, and if not, why the delay? Also, can the Minister tell us when he intends to proceed with third reading of the bill?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, it is my hope that our House leader, together with his counterparts in the other parties, will find some available time so that the House can pass this bill. As hon. members know, this legislation has long been awaited by Post Office employees and management, and I hope that it will be passed in the very near future.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS

INVESTIGATION OF FIREPLACE GLASS PANELS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It has to do with exploding glass panels on fireplaces. In view of at least ten reported cases—known to his department—of potential injury and death from red hot glass missiles from all makes of exploding heat circulators, I wonder if the minister could give us a progress report on the investigation now under way by the product safety branch of his department.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, one of the reasons why these panels explode is that unfortunately some consumers fail to clean and maintain them. I thank the hon. member for bringing this case to my attention. I know that my officials will be taking a closer look into this matter, but I do not think we would be justified at this time in labelling them as dangerous products.

[English]

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I have another list I could bring to the minister's attention. Apparently these glass panels can break or explode if rolling logs hit them, if there is water on the glass, if hot embers should hit the glass, or if cold air rushes from chimneys. The list goes on and on. I was amazed to learn that the product safety branch knew a full three weeks to a month after the first reported incident before letting the public know about this serious situation. I ask the minister, please, to investigate why his product safety branch sat on this red hot situation for almost a month and did not live up to its mandate to issue a very strong warning to consumers. Will the minister look into that inexcusable delay, particularly at this time of year?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, products of this type have been on the market for years. A few such incidents do not necessarily mean that it is a dangerous product and I suggest the hon. member is wrong in being concerned about the quality of that product.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

APPLICATION OF GRANTS IN LIEU OF TAXES PROGRAM

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. As the minister knows, municipal taxpayers in the Ottawa-Carleton region are facing municipal tax increases ranging from 12 per cent to 21 per cent this year. Strong doubts are being expressed as to whether the federal government is paying its way, notwithstanding the changes made, by the agreement of this House a little while ago, to the grants in lieu of taxes program. Would the minister personally review this matter, in view of the fact that there was unanimous approval in this House, to see if the program is being applied fully, fairly and without discrimination in this area?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I am happy to report to the hon. member because of his natural interest in his constituency and this area.

My officials have reviewed the matter. In fact the additional $5 million payment which the federal government has estimated will be paid this year over last year to the city of Ottawa is made on the same basis as payments to other cities, not only in Ontario but across the country. I regret that I must inform the House that the claims made by the city of Ottawa for three times as much as anyone else is getting really do not support a reasonable case or a reasonable review. We think their claims are highly unrealistic, and the way in which they have gone about it has brought little credit to the city and to the council.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the question of transmitting the true situation is very important. It can be done in terms of this House of Commons as the minister has tried to do, and I do not fault him for doing that, but I think it could best be done if the minister would arrange to meet personally with the elected officials of the city and, if necessary, of the region, to clear the air with respect to the matter because, as I said to the minister, this bill was approved by all parties in the House of Commons. Would the minister undertake to do this and explain, so that we and the officials can be absolutely sure that there is no shortfall as they are claiming?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, I have already had the opportunity to discuss this matter with the mayor of the city—

Mr. Nielsen: On the telephone.

Mr. Cosgrove: I must admit that the confusion, or however it is described, in the situation at present was certainly not brought about by the actions of the federal government. The problem, in my opinion, is one that has to do with the assessment of the value of the property, which is prepared by officials of the province of Ontario and not by the city or the federal government. Our officials, who have reviewed their estimates, have said that technically there are adjustments to be made because there are miscalculations. I do not think this is a matter which politicians can solve, but rather a matter on which officials are working at present. I hope it will be resolved and that reason can prevail in this situation.

PRIVILEGE

MR. RAE—NOTICE OF INTENTION TO RAISE QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, since the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), who answered my question yesterday, is not in the House, and since the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan), who is the minister responsible for the riding of Broadview-Greenwood, is presumably either in the riding of Broadview-Greenwood or thereabouts or somewhere else, I should like to wait until they return to the House. Since I will not be in the House until next Wednesday, I give you notice, Madam Speaker, that I intend to raise this matter on Wednesday.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. FULTON—QUESTION RESPECTING EMERGENCY FUNDING

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It was my understanding that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) was going to be in the House, and he was. This is an important question. Now that he is in his place could I get a response from him, because I have a very important and urgent question regarding emergency funding. The question to the minister was regarding the $1 million emergency fund to native people for socio-economic—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member presented his question of privilege the other day, and possibly the minister has read it in Hansard. Is the minister prepared to answer that question of privilege today, or does he want to wait until both ministers are here? Is the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) asking a question? The question period has concluded.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. The point of order of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) has nothing to do with the question of privilege. It has to do with the fact that at the beginning of the question period the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) was in the House. If the minister was in the House at the beginning of the question period, can we not assume that that same minister will be here when the time comes to ask a question? That is a fundamental question—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House, but I was talking to the hon. member just a couple of minutes ago before he asked the question and then had to slip out of the House for a few moments. I am aware of the question which the hon. member asked and I would indicate to him that this $1 million fund—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. My loudspeaker was not working and I did not quite hear what the hon. member for Skeena said at the beginning. I thought he was referring to his question of privilege the other day. This is no time to ask a question or even to answer one once the question period is over. The hon. member can ask his question on another day when I will be glad to hear him.

STATISTICS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-630, to amend the Statistics Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Herbert: Madam Speaker, this bill will permit a person who objects to answering Statistics Canada questions to do so without penalty, except in the census of population or census of agriculture.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,273, 1,426, 1,547, 1,698, 1,708, 1,830 and 1,893.

SALE OF CMHC-OWNED UNITS

Question No. 1,273—Mr. Greenaway:

1. For each year from 1975 to date, by province, how many (a) homes (b) apartments (c) commercial properties did Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation (i) put on sale to the public and what was the market value of such properties (ii) sell at market value (iii) sell below market value and what was the dollar differential involved (iv) rent out and what revenue per annum was obtained from such rentals (v) leave standing empty and for what reasons (vi) enlist the co-operation of real estate boards to handle and what boards were involved at what cost or fee to the corporation?

2. For each year from 1975 to date, by province, how many (a) homes (b) apartments (c) commercial properties did CMHC offer incentives to purchase on, and (i) what was the nature of such incentives (ii) what was the cost involved (iii) what percentage of the costs were CMHC responsibility?

3. For each year from 1975 to date, by province, how many (a) homes (b) apartments (c) commercial properties did CMHC advertise for (i) sale (ii) rent and what media was used for such advertising and what was the cost of the advertising, in each case?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): A reply to this question would require the tabulation of financial details relating to the sale and/or rental of more than 50,000 properties. The labour costs involved in such a task would be prohibitive.

ZENITH TELEPHONE SERVICE

Question No. 1,426—Mr. Halliday:

For the past two years for which statistics are available, what was the cost of the Zenith telephone service for citizens to contact the local offices of (a) the Department of National Revenue (b) Air Canada (c) the RCMP (d) the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of National Revenue is concerned:

(a) Taxation	1978-79	$2,274,794.85
	1979-80	$2,856,947.36
Customs and Excise		Nil

In so far as the management of Air Canada is concerned:

(b) Charges for Zenith toll-free telephone facilities, provided for customers in offline cities, are included in total billings to each reservations office where the lines terminate. To determine these specific charges would require excessive time and cost.

In so far as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is concerned:

(c) 1978-79 $290,132
1979-80 $282,026

In so far as the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is concerned:

(d) Nil. CCA does not utilize Zenith telephone service.

TRIDENT AIRCRAFT LIMITED

Question No. 1,547—Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich):

1. Since January 1, 1980, did the government advance any money to the Trident Aircraft Limited in British Columbia and, if so (a) in what amount (b) were guaranteed loans for the corporation underwritten by the government (c) for what purposes?

2. Was Mr. Derrick Lock attached to the corporation and, if so, was he paid from public funds and in what amount?

3. Is Mr. Lock listed on the public service payroll for purposes of seniority, superannuation or for other public service privileges?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Regional Economic Expansion as follows:

1. (a) Since January 1, 1980, IT&C has paid to Trident $2,408,908 in the form of a repayable contribution.

(b) and (c) Under the Canada-British Columbia Industrial Development Subsidiary Agreement, DREE has agreed to cost share with the province a low interest loan in the amount of $2.9 million to the British Columbia Development Corporation (BCDC) to finance the construction of 110,000 square feet of manufacturing space for Trident Aircraft Limited at the Victoria International Airport. This loan to B.C.D.C., who will build the space for Trident on a lease-back basis, has as one of its conditions the requirement that Trident must have all its financing in place before any disbursement will be made on the loan. As the condition precedent has not been met, no DREE funds have been disbursed to date under the terms of the agreement with BCDC for the Trident facility.

2 and 3. Mr. Derrick Lock is employed with Trident under the Public Service Commission's Interchange Canada Program. Mr. Lock's salary is paid by the Crown, with the company reimbursing the Crown for the full amount; Mr. Lock of IT&C is in the commerce officer category at level 2, salary range $26,509 to $37,556.

PRIME MINISTER'S TRAVELS

Question No. 1,698—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the Prime Minister's visit to Saudi Arabia, the Yemen Republic and Arab Republic of Egypt between November 15 and November 22, 1980, what are the names of all persons who will accompany the Prime Minister including public servants and their job designations and the reason for their presence?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The Prime Minister was accompanied by: Master Sacha Trudeau; Mr. James Coutts, Principal Secretary to the Prime Minister; Mr. Michael Shenstone (Riyadh, Jeddah, San'aa, Luxor, Cairo), Assistant Under-Secretary, Department of External Affairs; Mr. L. H. Smith (Riyadh, Jeddah), Assistant Under-Secretary, Department of External Affairs; Mr. Robert Fowler, Assistant Secretary to the Cabinet, (Defence and External Relations); Mr. Ted Johnson, Executive Assistant to the Prime Minister; Mr. Patrick Gossage (Riyadh, San'aa, Cairo), Press Secretary to the Prime Minister; Miss Nicole Sénécal (Cairo), Asssistant Press Secretary, Prime Minister's Office; Mr. B. V. Johnstone (Jeddah, Cairo), Visits and Conferences Services, Department of External Affairs; Mr. Ralph Coleman (Riyadh, San'aa), Special Assistant, Prime Minister's Office; Inspector George Carter, RCMP Liaison Officer.

The descriptive titles of the individuals indicate the reason for their presence.

DND—CONTRACTS FOR FRUIT AND VEGETABLES

Question No. 1,708—Mr. McKinnon:

1. For the past year, what was the number and value of Department of National Defence contracts for fruit and vegetables?

2. How many of the contracts were placed in (a) British Columbia (b) Ontario (c) Quebec (d) Nova Scotia and, in each case, what was the total value of the contracts?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. For 1979/80 the total number of contracts were 678 at a value of $3,701,468.84.

2. (a), (b), (c) and (d):

The breakdown of the contracts for the four provinces asked for in the question is:

Province	No. of Contracts	Value
British Columbia	80	$553,210.00
Ontario	138	$784,686.50
Quebec	134	$398,097.68
Nova Scotia	100	$572,112.62

LANG, MICHENER & CO. TORONTO

Question No. 1,830—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to question No. 1,489 which states in part, that Lang, Michener & Co. of Toronto received payment in the amount of $8,124.34 for government legal work (a) what is an exact outline of all work done (b) on what dates was the work performed (c) on what dates was the firm paid for the work involved and, if in instalments, what was the date and amount of each instalment (d) what are the names of the lawyers who performed specific work?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): The reply to Mr. Cossitt's question No. 1,489 stated, in part, that the firm of Lang, Michener & Co. of Toronto were paid $8,124.34 for work performed as legal agents. In researching the answer to question No. 1,830, it was determined that Lang, Michener & Co. did not act as agents of the Crown but rather they acted as the solicitors for the plaintiffs (the expropriated owners). The $8,124.34 was in fact a payment by the Crown of legal costs reasonably incurred by the expropriated owner in asserting a claim for compensation under the Expropriation Act. As a result of a clerical error, the $8,124.34 was incorrectly recorded as an agent's fee.

Consequently, the answers to the above question are:

(a) Nil;

(b) Nil;

(c) Nil;

(d) Nil.

PUBLIC SERVANTS' RETIREMENT PENSIONS

Question No. 1,893—Mr. Herbert:

How many public servants retired with pensions in (a) October (b) November (c) December 1980, and how many are eligible for a pension increase of 9.7 per cent on January 1, 1981?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Preliminary data indicate that the numbers of public servants retiring with pensions in October, November and December of 1980 were as follows:

(a) October—466;

(b) November—549;

(c) December—1,937.

All of the foregoing would be eligible for the 9.7 per cent increase commencing in January, 1981, under the terms of the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, if question No. 586 could be made an order for return, that return could be tabled immediately.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 586 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT USE OF PRIVATE COURIER SERVICES

Question No. 586—Mr. Stewart:

During each year (a) 1978 (b) 1979, did the government make use of private courier services and, if so, by department, what was the (i) name of the courier (ii) amount paid to each?

Return tabled.

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the other questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, last night at ten o'clock p.m. I was in mid-flight in my speech. I was making the point that if we are going to entrench rights in the Constitution, the very fact that we are entrenching them makes it imperative that we be careful what we entrench. I was trying to make the point that one of the ingredients which we are, perhaps unwittingly but nevertheless actually, entrenching is the principle of unfairness because of the kind of amending formula contained in this charter and what it does, for example, to the province of British Columbia, in that it makes us wait at least 140 years, and perhaps 200 years, before our province can find equality with two other provinces. That is an unfair principle, and you cannot entrench a charter of rights and expect it to last if it embodies a principle of unfairness.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: The second point I was trying to make is that we are entrenching in this charter an illusion that while the charter talks about entrenching human rights, citizens' rights, the language of the charter really reverses that. When you look at the language of the charter and you see who is speaking and to whom that speech is addressed, you find that we are not at all entrenching citizens' rights because the language of the proposed charter says that the speaker is the government, and the government is saying that every citizen shall have the following rights. The government is the speaker. If the government is the speaker and citizens are the audience or the recipients, it means that the government has the real power and all the rights, except those which it enumerates or out of some gratuitous impulse extends to citizens. The government is presenting a proposed charter which purports to give rights to citizens. It is presenting an illusion; it is a fraud. It is not entrenching the rights of citizens; it is entrenching the power of the state.

Time does not permit me to develop the following point, but I should like to indicate that the charter is entrenching memories of rancour and dispute. Members on the government benches are trying to say that this is just another flag debate, that given ten or 15 years all ill-will will dissipate and people will be thankful for the government presenting its charter. I want members to know that this is not an ordinary flag debate. Parenthetically I would add that there are many thousands of people across Canada, particularly those who fought under the Red Ensign in two world wars, who still regard it as their flag, even though they have accepted the present one. All the rancour from that debate has not dissipated. But, the flag is a symbol; the Constitution is the fabric of our country. We are not talking about symbols here; we are talking about what will make our country function. When a level of dispute and division is stimulated by this proposal, both in its text and in its method, we cannot but expect that memory will stay for the entire life of the Constitution; it is entrenched in the Constitution.

I should like to refer to a story which appeared in this morning's edition of The Citizen. This banner story gives an indication of the level of rancour and ill-will. The article by Mr. Iain Hunter is entitled "Patriation dividing Canadians, PM admits", and in part it refers to a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) while he was in Vancouver. It reads:

> The NDP, he said, were split between "those who like freedom and justice more and hate the Liberals less," and "those who hate the Liberals more and like freedom and justice less."

Ideologically I am poles apart from the NDP. Those who heard my remarks last night will know that I am poles apart from them and their position; but far be it for me ever to say that they are less patriotic in having taken that position. For the Prime Minister to go around the country making the statement reported in The Citizen results in that attitude being entrenched in the Constitution; it is now entrenched in the Constitution.

In the two minutes remaining I should like to refer to the wording of the Constitution. One of my colleagues said that there was a similarity in the wording of this proposed charter and the existing one in the Soviet Union. This is right, it is the same passive mood; it is the same enumeration of rights to citizens, while government holds all powers. The structure of the two charters is identical, the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) said that the Canadian and Russian are the same. I want all the constituents in Northumberland-Miramichi to know what their member holds as an ideal comparison to our country, and that he seems to believe this is an endorsement of our Constitution rather than an anathema to our country.

The constitutional proposal is opposed by four western provincial governments, by 70 per cent of the members of Parliament from those provinces, and by 67 per cent of the population of Canada. With such opposition we can hardly assume that the Prime Minister has a mandate for this charter of rights or the resolution. If judgment is reserved for those who tamper with weights and measures because it oppresses the poor, how much more judgment will be meted out on us in this chamber if we endorse the injustice of this proposition?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it was almost with a sense of humour that I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen). To try to equate in the Canadian Parliament such a fundamental matter as the entrenchment of the charter of rights and freedoms with anything analogous to what goes on in the Soviet Union indicates such excessiveness as to be almost totally irrational. It is indicative of the desperate situation in which some members of the official opposition find themselves in opposing this resolution in the first place.

There is no doubt about it. I have talked with many of my fellow Canadians, and I believe that we should exhibit a sense of pride in the process of patriation. It is long overdue. If one puts any confidence in polls, I think the polls would indicate that the vast majority of Canadians are in favour of the entrenchment of a charter of rights and freedoms to ensure equity and justice for all of us in the country.

But in terms of my special responsibilities as Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the hon. member would be wise to note the significance and impact of the charter of rights and freedoms upon the aboriginal peoples of this country. It is the greatest single advance in 100 years in terms of the protection of those rights. There are many citizens who are original peoples in all four western provinces. I dare to say that if you speak to those Canadians, those first Canadians, with respect to what they feel about the necessity for the enhancement of those rights now entrenched in this declaration of rights and freedoms, you will find quite a different response from the first citizens in western Canada. If there is any doubt perhaps the hon. member would wish to speak to some of those Indian leaders who have fought so long and hard to achieve the very objective which is now before us.

These rights and freedoms have a double significance, if you like, for all Canadians. They reinforce the desire for the entrenchment of aboriginal and treaty rights in the Constitution. It now makes their position in Canada a secure one. I might say it no longer equivocates with respect to what those rights are. No longer are those rights ambiguous as far as the aboriginal peoples of this country are concerned. They now know that those rights are part of the fundamental laws of Canada. It symbolizes their uniqueness as Canadians. At last it does away with the paternalism that they have often felt relative to other Canadians and Canadian institutions. So it means a great deal to them.

Indeed, it is a critical milestone they have achieved. I am confident it will lead to a much better understanding of Canadians and Canada by the aboriginal peoples of this country. Those people do have a very unique type of concern for Canada which has not always been understood by Canadians. As I have said, they have been trying for 100 years to achieve this. They regard it as a special commitment by the Parliament of Canada with respect to the passage of this resolution. Analogous to this special type of commitment they have always had for Canada is their commitment to the preservation of our political integrity in this institution.

I would like to indicate a personal experience of mine with respect to this special type of commitment that the aboriginal peoples have for Canada. I travelled to northern Quebec before the referendum to speak to Charlie Watt, the head of the Inuit people in northern Quebec, and Billy Diamond, head of the Cree people there, to find out what their position was with respect to the referendum and, indeed, if it was warranted, to encourage their support for the no side. They did not need any encouragement from me. They were committed to voting no because of their deep sense of commitment to this country.

They are looking to this national institution, Parliament, to entrench the bargain which they fought so hard to attain. We must realize that there has always been a special relationship between a recognition of the culture of our aboriginal peoples and their commitment to this country. Because of what this Parliament has done and because of what the committee on the Constitution has done in terms of recommending this proposal to Parliament, the link between their culture and their commitment to this country has been strengthened. That is no mean achievement which they have attained.

I congratulate the committee for the work they have done. As the hon. member from the eastern Arctic said in his speech, which I read with considerable interest, he felt that now that these principles have been established in this resolution, Canada's original peoples can work with the rest of us together to build a great country. He emphasized the aspect of togetherness in terms of achieving this objective. The Inuit, the Indian people and the Metis have a right to feel a great sense of satisfaction with respect to what has been achieved.

I think, too, that some special recognition should be given to the members of the committee on the Constitution, and they would be the first to agree. What the members of the committee have done is fundamentally change the relationship between Canada and the aboriginal peoples. They did it in a real sense of non-partisanship. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), my predecessor, played a critical role. The hon. member from the eastern Arctic—

Mr. Knowles: Nunatsiaq.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) represented his people with skill and commitment. The Leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), displayed his commitment to the enhancement of aboriginal rights throughout, and to the desperate desire of the original peoples of this country to attain this type of equality. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) in all his work has shown a dedication to the same objective. My hon. friend, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), who has fought diligently and valiantly for months to achieve this objective, deserves the recognition of all of us in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The list goes on and on, including the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey), Senator Austin who, when this final entrenchment took place in the committee, had tears in his eyes, and others who were part of that constitutional committee, such a fundamental breakthrough was this provision.

Again, I do not think there would be a member in this House who would take away the justifiable credit which is due to the Inuit and Metis people themselves for this achievement. They have done extensive work. It is the beginning for them of a new period of accomplishment. Since 1971 they have had endless meetings. They have lobbied and researched time and time again. Sometimes the meetings were heated and sometimes there was confrontation. But gradually there was increased understanding and, I think, increased mutual respect. Many of us, including myself, have learned to listen a little better. Thus, we must give credit where credit is due, and that is to the aboriginal peoples of this country for what they have achieved.

Not so many months ago, in December, the Indian people came by the hundreds to Ottawa. The way in which they conducted themselves showed wisdom and sagacity which was, perhaps, the envy of many of us here in public life. They did not go in for confrontation but rather to win support through reason. It is indicative of the strength of their culture and the wisdom of their elders that they have been able to achieve this remarkable feat.

Some of the leaders are here with us, in the gallery, and I would like to recognize them. We have Sykes Powderface of the NIB and Saul Sanderson of the Saskatchewan Indian Association. We have Indian members of the minister's office and staff. We have many who must feel a great sense of elation at the achievement of this unique feat. George Manuel, who used to be president of the NIB and is now head of the British Columbia Union of Chiefs, is here. It must be with some considerable satisfaction that they see Parliament has at last entrenched these rights. Charlie Watt of the Indian community and Mr. Daniels of the Metis deserve a great deal of credit. Their expectations cannot be disappointed now.

If the resolution were not approved and if the entrenchment of these rights were to be omitted, as members of the official opposition indicate, then the aim of entrenchment of aboriginal rights would become just a token in the negotiating process and all this achievement would be lost. It would be intolerable to the original peoples of this country.

That is why, as Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, having talked to them about their absolute determination to achieve this objective, it was very disappointing last night to learn of the position of Premier Blakeney. The vast majority of the federal members of the NDP have led in the entrenchment of these rights, and it seems strange for Premier Blakeney, in light of the significant native population in his province and what has been achieved in terms of that entrenchment, not to support the resolution at this stage. It seems to me a remarkable letdown for this jealously guarded right they now wish to see preserved.

One must recognize at the same time that they are the first citizens of his province, and as premier he has extolled the necessity for the entrenchment of these rights. So I can say with considerable confidence, as Sol Sanderson, president of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indians, has said, that if they say they do not have support in western Canada for entrenchment of these rights, they do not speak for the Indians of Saskatchewan and neither does Premier Blakeney; rather it is the federal Members of Parliament who have fought so long and hard behind the Indian people to gain this entrenchment.

Can we now talk about some of the general provisions rather than the special provisions respecting aboriginal rights. We know these rights for all Canadians will include basic democratic rights, fundamental legal equity, the elimination of discrimination based on race, religion and sex. But they have a special significance for the aboriginal people in our cities; these anti-discriminatory provisions will mean that they will have protection against discrimination in the cities and job markets everywhere.

Their equity in our legal system will be guaranteed; Indian women will be protected against discrimination both as Indians and as women. The discriminatory provisions of the Indian Act, intolerable to Indians, as they are to other Canadians, will be eliminated and the government and Indians will have time to work together to find new membership provisions that will be just, equitable and appropriate to the Indians' cultural interests.

Furthermore, let me talk about the special rights achieved for our aboriginal people. Aboriginal and treaty rights are now recognized and affirmed in a special part of the Constitution Act devoted solely to this subject. The inclusion of these provisions was the occasion of the most spontaneous expressions of satisfaction in the committee that any parliamentarian can recall. I believe members of that committee felt they had arrived, together with the aboriginal people, at a turning point in the status of native peoples in this country. I agree it is a turning point, perhaps a new starting point.

Second, the aboriginal and treaty rights and freedoms established by the Royal Proclamation of 1763, as well as land claims settlements, are protected by the rights and facedowns accorded by the charter. This is a unique protection based on a unique heritage.

Third, the Constitution Act will ensure that constitutional questions of interest to aboriginal peoples, together with the question of which rights should be included, will be discussed by their representatives with first ministers. This guarantee symbolizes, indeed formalizes, the commitment of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the aboriginal peoples in October 1980, that in the next phase of constitutional negotiations issues such as an elaboration and definition of what those aboriginal rights are will be discussed. Internal native self-government, representation in political institutions and the responsibilities of federal, provincial and territorial governments for the provision of services will all be discussed, and with good will we can define precisely what we mean when we entrench these fundamental rights.

An hon. Member: Where is the good will coming from?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I would like to indicate that as far as the Leader of the New Democratic Party is concerned, I understand that during the course of this debate he will be proposing the inclusion of a provision affirming aboriginal and treaty rights in Section 54 of the Constitution Act. The government will support this amendment. This is a significant acknowledgement of the importance of aboriginal and treaty rights in Canada. The result of such amendment will be the entrenchment of aboriginal and treaty rights in the same manner and degree as other fundamental provisions of the Constitution, including the office of the Queen. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms and aboriginal and treaty rights will be subject to change only through the general amending formula that applies to all other key provisions.

There is, then, added symbolism in this amendment which I believe will not be lost on the aboriginal peoples. They have always regarded the Queen as the symbolic protector of their rights and freedoms. The role of the Queen is not changed by the resolution, and protecting aboriginal and treaty rights in the same clause as the Queen's office demonstrates the significance of the proposed amendment.

In addition, the government acknowledges a need for other processes to discuss and respond particularly to the special needs of Indians. Therefore the government is prepared to discuss with them in coming months ways of formalizing discussions between ministers and Indians that will promote the long-term development of a more responsive and effective relationship with the federal government. I am personally prepared to take a leadership role in the establishment of that process. So let us not underestimate the importance of this charter of rights and the Constitution Act. This act establishes once and for all the basic principle that aboriginal and treaty rights are recognized and affirmed.

This basic fact will apply to all governments at the next stage of constitutional renewal in the discussion on the refinement and elaboration of these principles, and this is extremely important. This fundamental law of the nation will bind the federal and provincial governments to respect and support these aboriginal rights. To do otherwise would be to perpetuate and, indeed, permit potential inequity and arbitrary actions in our relations with our native peoples. To endorse a concept such as the Vancouver formula with its checkerboard effect would mean some provinces would have these rights and some very possibly would not.

And so, Madam Speaker, the government acknowledges the great need for approval of this charter and this Constitution Act. I, along with others, am prepared to renew my commitment to the native peoples as to their involvement in a very real way in the future process. I cannot emphasize that enough. Regardless of the outcome of the discussions on the Constitution. I believe, because of the provisions of the proposed charter, no government or individual will again be able to put aside or disregard the rights of Canada's original peoples.

For this reason, among many others, I believe sincerely that this House must, and indeed should, approve this resolution. If we were not to do so at this time we would be breaking faith with Canada's Indians, Inuit and Metis, who came together with representatives of this House and the Senate to develop the words that have been included in the resolution now before us for consideration.

May I again indicate to members on all sides, despite the rhetoric we have heard expressed in recent days, my appreciation of the non-partisan support they have afforded and the very real effort they have extended. There should be a great sense of pride in what has been achieved. Surely if the native peoples, the original peoples, the aboriginal peoples of this country, have anything to say about it, we will no longer denigrate the charter and what it means to Canadians, more especially the first citizens of this country.

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to take part in this historic debate. I wish to join with others in the House in expressing appreciation to the committee, to those members from all parties who gave leadership at committee stage, bringing us to this stage of discussion.

I am one who could identify with the minister as he spoke of our native and aboriginal people and the importance of ensuring their rights. I am interested that as he speaks on behalf of the government and in his portfolio, he does not speak about Indian women and does not address the representations made to the government and to him by the conference which was held in Ottawa last weekend.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I did.

Mr. McLean: At that conference the leaders of women's movements across Canada questioned whether we were approaching the charter in the right way. They affirmed the importance, as did the minister, of the charter and came down squarely on the side of the charter, but they said, "Do it right." They said—and many of them are brilliant lawyers—"We believe that the charter as it now stands will entrench discrimination against Indian women." While sharing the minister's commitment to human rights, I would point out to him that I hold a commitment that when we act in this symbolic and real way, then our charter should do what we and all Canadians want.

In my opening comments, Mr. Speaker, I should like to reflect for a moment on comments made in 1948 by Canada's first Canadian-born Governor General, Vincent Massey, when he spoke about his dream for Canada. I should like to share with this House, and through this House with my riding of Waterloo which I have the honour to represent, indeed with all people across Canada, my concerns about what is happening to my Canada as we move too quickly to do something that we all want.

Speaking about his love for the nation that we all love and which we wish to serve in this Parliament and through this action, Massey said:

> I believe in Canada, with pride in her past, belief in her present and faith in her future;
> I believe in the quality of Canadian life, and in the character of Canadian institutions;
> —I believe that Canada is one, and that if our minds dwell on those things which its parts have in common, we can find the unity of the whole;
> I believe that with sound work, the spirit of a team, and an awareness of ourselves, we can look forward to achievements beyond our imagining.

That imagery and devotion that Massey expressed is not present in the component parts of our country. Increasingly the spirit of a team, the spirit of a partnership, is being threatened by proposals put forward by the government to change the nature of, and fundamentally remove from, component parts in the Canadian experience, rights which have been ours and are ours constitutionally.

Canada is a federation which has developed through a spirit of co-operation and consensus throughout its history. What we now have before us is a constitutional proposal which undermines this historic reality. We find in this unilateral action, the intention to move outside Canada to take decisions about the rights of all Canadians. We find something which does not lead to a sense of team spirit or a sense of partnership.

I am more and more tempted to think of the analogy of a marriage breakdown or divorce, or a family relationship in which one of the partners decides to rule the roost. Without the necessary accommodations we seem headed toward divorce. In order for people to hear each other it is sometimes wise to have counselling, but this takes time. Today I plead with the government to give us the time we need in order to do this thing properly. Let us bring the Constitution home. Let us agree on the amending formula and then together, within an agreed time frame, let us look at the package of rights and reach agreement in this House. We want to be supportive but the process is wrong in terms of nation-building and in terms of human dynamics.

We must look at the manifestations of this action across the country and hear what the groups are saying. Let us not be led to believe that it is merely a matter of the provinces versus the nation; let us hear the people through their groups and institutions as they speak to us as Members of Parliament.

Let us remember that as a nation we have lived by consensus and that we have agreements. The quality of life that we celebrate is the result of consensus. The provinces have been a part of important agreements which allow our country to operate. We can think of the Old Age Pension Act in 1927, the depression years and the series of annual relief acts, the hospital insurance plan, the Canada Assistance Plan, medical insurance, unemployment insurance and the Canada Pension Plan. In each case the federal government and the provinces reached consensus and found ways to accommodate their differences.

I serve one of the most unique and rewarding ridings in the country, the new riding of Waterloo which takes in Kitchener-Waterloo. I have had the opportunity to live and work in Prince Edward Island and Atlantic Canada and to serve as a civil servant in Manitoba. I have worked in Saskatchewan and I was raised in British Columbia. As I look at this country from coast to coast, I see the resources and the differences and I celebrate them. I crave a process which will allow us to hear one another more fittingly and more fully.

In my own riding I see the need for consensus in order to accommodate the great and exciting diversity of the area. The Pennsylvania Dutch Mennonites settled the region. They were followed by German craftsmen whose heritage is kept alive by the German clubs and the annual celebrations of Oktoberfest. The 1971 census showed that 32 per cent of the population of Waterloo is of German origin, as is 27 per cent of the population of Kitchener. In recent years this area has led the country in receiving the boat people. Across the community, in the universities and in the workplace we find the Germanic and Asian groups coming together with a diversity of peoples and interests which range from the farming communities to small business to the electronics industry, the rubber workers and the insurance industries. They have different agendas, yet find the forums to hear each other in order to build a community with pride, one for another. The process of finding consensus in moving ahead, in terms of our seeking a national constitution, is wrong.

The complexities are many. But we must take the time, as we do in our communities, to understand the issues and to listen to them. As this debate goes on, and through the televising of the committee hearings, people realize the confrontational style of "Here is the package; you must do it". This attitude is bringing more resentment than unanimity.

From the government benches we hear the argument raised from time to time that this country is difficult to govern. Someone has said it cannot be governed. I believe that Canada can be governed. I believe that our pluses far outweigh our minuses. Canada has today, which it did not have in the past, an excellent network of communications and of transport. We can meet each other. We can talk to each other, often via electronics. We can communicate.

I had the opportunity to serve Canada while living abroad in Nigeria for some five years. I think of the difficulties that young nation had in nation building. I think of the major cleavages and the strong feelings among tribal groups and among major religious groups. Initially, that nation's historic pattern was to try a unitary system. That was unsuccessful. But then the nation's builders listened to all parts of the country. A constituent assembly was formed which enabled the diverse sections of the country to be heard. As people began to talk again after the tragic civil war, they began to find structures which would accommodate their diversity. We now find a modern day Nigeria moving ahead. It is made up of 19 States. Its system of government had gained and is gaining strength through the recognition of its diversity.

On the matter of rights, we come to a question of philosophy which is important for Canadians to address, both in terms of personal worth and in terms of the focus by which they approach life in our nation.

Let me suggest that the discussion around whether or not our charter will include a reference to God is one which goes to the nub of the issue in terms of the point where we begin. Do we begin with inalienable rights or do we begin with rights which are somehow granted by the government?

In committee, representatives of the Progressive Conservative Party suggested in a motion that a preamble be added to the charter of rights. It was rejected by the committee. However, the preamble would have affirmed that the Canadian nation is founded on principles which acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free individuals and institutions. Individuals and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values and the rule of law.

As the record will show, this motion in committee was opposed by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson). The argument was that many people do not believe in God; therefore, the reference should not be included, that any such inclusion would diminish their rights as a consequence. There was some discussion that this ought to be in the preamble instead of Clause 1 of the charter, and if so, it could be approved by the provinces. We should remind ourselves that our Judeo-Christian roots have had a reference to God as part of the building process of this nation and its values. Immigrants coming to Canada came for the freedom to express their concepts of God as they saw fit, so the Mennonites, the Hutterites and the Soviet Jews came.

God and the motivation of that belief has played an important part in the building of our nation. Take, for example, hospitals, agricultural development and transport. These roots come from the premise that God gives life and gives rights, and governments perform under God. God grants rights, not governments. Governments are there to see that rights are maintained. The charter we agree upon is to serve that function. It seems to me very arrogant to leave out a reference to God.

For those who say our society is changing, let us look at our multicultural mosaic today. Let us be reminded that those who come from the Islamic, Buddhist, Confucian or other religious backgrounds bring with them a concept of God which is not strange to their culture. Surely as we look at our roots and try to imbed our determination to protect rights, we need to go back. We need to go more slowly to see that the premise on which we build is still maintained in the charter, in its preamble, or wherever.

When we resume in the time remaining I wish to continue discussion about our rights. I want to reflect upon a most significant meeting, held here in the nation's capital last week when over 1,000 women were present. I want to reflect on the charter proposal and to reflect upon whether or not it will serve their interests. I want to reflect upon the proposals put to the government by the women of this nation. I want to reflect upon the growing concern of other groups across this country, including questions which have been raised in the media this day by the Canadian Council for Social Development, and as other groups begin to say "Slow down, do it right, do what you want to do."

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I will call it one o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): As suggested by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLeah), we will call it one o'clock.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 12.58 p.m. the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the House rose at one o'clock the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean) had the floor.

Mr. McLean: Mr. Speaker, before the lunch break, I was suggesting to the House that there is a need to recognize our Canadian tradition of dealing by consensus rather than unilateral action. We have a rich diversity which needs to be respected in all of its variations in the process of developing our charter. It is argued that Canada is difficult to govern under our federal system, that we need this unilateral action in order to become a changed nation. That flies in the face of modern technology, communication and transportation. Compared to other parts of the world, this nation is much more governable and these are not the problems they are painted.

I was also suggesting that the very essence of the proposals put forward is that they put the supremacy of government over and against the supremacy of the individual and the inalienable rights we have, and that the omission on the part of the government of any reference to God is symbolic of that shift toward the tendency of the government to decide rights rather than rights being given as a gift to us as part of our humanity.

I stated also that I wished to talk about the importance of the charter. We on all sides of the House should begin to realize that there is concern with respect to seeing that human rights are protected. At the moment the government has before it well-thought-out and articulated proposals which are the result of the conference held by the ad hoc committee of Canadian women here in Ottawa on February 14 and 15. We will be waiting to hear how the government will respond to the proposals and amendments recommended for inclusion.

Today another council, the Council on Social Development, said publicly that the charter of rights could be used to deny access to social services. This is another group which should be heard, and the concerns which are raised should be addressed in order that we can have a sense of unity with respect to the proposals before us.

In the context of this debate and as we deal with human rights, I want to say that our charter and package on human rights must do what we want it to do. The outcome of the committee meeting of women this past weekend was a clear signal from women that the entrenchment of human rights is something they want and affirm; but it should be done properly and the proposals now before the House and the nation are not good enough.

It is interesting that today in the question period the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) confirmed that very few additional proposals will be included. He seemed to indicate that the government intends to ram through its proposals regardless of the opinions of large sections of our nation and regardless of the opinions of the provincial governments.

Women have sent representatives to Parliament Hill to speak to every member of Parliament, despite the discouragement of the Minister of Justice. Over 1,000 were here for two days, and they want their views known. They are concerned that the Constitution committee did not travel and that women who do not have the financial base men across the nation have are handicapped and disadvantaged again in the matter of their ability to travel, to speak and to articulate their concerns.

The committee heard four or five representations or groups and received other submissions, but many of the 1,500 or more women's groups across the nation are only beginning to be aware of the implications of what is before us, as is the nation as a whole.

It is very interesting to me as one who was able to attend that meeting for two days, along with my colleagues, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney), the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) and the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett), that there was not one person from the Liberal government benches who was there throughout the meeting, and there were no women from the Liberal Party.

The proposals in the charter before this House and this nation were prepared by a cabinet of which one woman is a member. They were prepared by a bureaucracy which is headed by men in almost every case. It is small wonder that the women present were very concerned as to whether their concerns will be met.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member who presently has the floor noted the absence of women members from the Liberal side at the weekend meeting of women from across Canada. I point out to the hon. member that this party was represented, not by one but by many members in the constitutional committee, and they listened to the requests of women from across Canada. The party opposite was not represented by one.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Waterloo has the floor. This appears to be an exchange.

Mr. McLean: The conference raised the question whether the transitory majority will impose its will. Will it not hear the concerns of 51 per cent of the Canadian population? Women have not yet ruled out whether they, along with other concerned groups, will find themselves having to lobby overseas. The importance of this meeting cannot be underestimated because it was a reminder that no longer can decisions be made in Canada without women being part of them.

When questioned clearly as to whether the provisions as they now stand in the human rights charter are acceptable, a panel of women lawyers thoughtfully commented that there are no guarantees that women will be any better off than they are now. The words in the charter are too ambiguous. You either have equality or you do not. It is hard to have a little bit of equality. Those women lawyers went on to suggest that there are other dangers, such as the danger of entrenching discrimination on the basis of culture, and that these concerns need to be addressed. It is small wonder the conference found itself anxious about the time-frame and the limited opportunity.

Women are also unsure where the government stands. A headline in the Ottawa Citizen on Thursday, February 19, reads: "Women unsure where Axworthy stands". The former president of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, Doris Anderson, took exception to the comments of the Minister of Justice in his opening remarks in this debate. She objected on Wednesday to the minister's quoting her as saying that the changes are a major step forward. According to the Ottawa Citizen:

> Anderson said at a news conference that the government has come a long way toward meeting the needs of women in its proposed charter of rights, but that doesn't mean it has come far enough ... "to make it absolutely clear that Canadian women have equality in this country ... changes should be made."

Changes are recommended in the thoughtful brief which is presently before the government and the minister for consideration. The resolution of that conference was that it endorsed in principle the concept of an entrenched charter of rights as per the recommendations made on February 14, 1981, and that unless the charter reflects the amendments suggested, it should not be included in the submission to the British government in order to provide time to incorporate these amendments.

I know that the House and the women of Canada will be waiting for the minister responsible for the status of women to comment on this thoughtful submission which has been given to him.

In their resolution the women went on to say that, failing the full adoption of these amendments, incorporation of a charter of rights should be accomplished by a constituent assembly, the membership of which should be 50 per cent women. They went on in their review of the charter to say, for example, that there should be an amendment to Clause 1 of the charter so that it will include a statement of purpose providing that the rights and freedoms under the charter are guaranteed equally to women, and with no limitation. What they are saying is "Do it right."

They go on in another thoughtful recommendation, which is before the government, to suggest that Clause 7 be amended to include the right to equality of economic opportunity. Why are women so concerned about economic opportunity? Economic opportunity has not been incorporated in this document, and that reflects the reality of the discrimination. In a pamphlet published by the Advisory Council on the Status of Women the following facts are outlined:

> 51 per cent of working-age Canadians are women.
> 47.8 per cent of all women are working or looking for work, compared to 37.1 per cent in 1968.
> 38.9 per cent of the labour force are women: an increase of more than 6 per cent in the last 10 years.
> 1,635,000 women have joined the labour force since 1968, compared to 1,296,000 men.

They go on to write about employment discrimination in these terms:

> For every dollar a man earns, a woman earns only 60 cents—
> Women have to work more than eight days to earn the same money that men do in five days.

And so the litany goes on. They remind us that:

> 4.9 per cent of working women are in managerial-administrative positions.
> 62.7 per cent of all women working for pay are in clerical, sales or service jobs: 36.9 per cent in clerical, 9.4 per cent in sales, and 16.4 per cent in service.

The discrimination is known and the facts are becoming more and more part of our thinking, but the process of meeting these concerns and the time required in order to see that these injustices are addressed in our Constitution, as in so many other areas, have not been provided. I want to suggest that not only has the women's conference focused on injustice, on deep concern and a rising awareness—small wonder that the minister was not anxious that that meeting should be held in terms of its comments on the proposal that the women are determined to move quickly with as much understanding as possible at the grass roots level across the country—but at the conclusion of the conference the women said that the process of creating our Constitution was too hasty and that it does not adequately reflect the needs of women. Their resolution stated that the Women's Conference on the Constitution insists on a full and fair debate in Parliament on the constitutional package before it, and opposes any closure of debate.

We are beginning to see a new form of closure. We find fewer government members speaking, shorter speeches by members on the government side, a tendency to say, "We will let opposition members talk it out as quickly as they can and we will try to get it through before the nation understands what is happening to the fundamental nature of the nation"; and we will have a package to boot, if they have their way, which does not do what we want.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You are hitting home.

Mr. McLean: Let me suggest, Mr. Speaker, about the process of indecent haste, that in the arguments which I have heard in my 44 years as a Canadian, through my schooling years, through eight post-secondary years and at university, I do not recall any discussions in the classrooms and in the coffee shops about the nature of our country. I have to say that the discussion which is now taking place is going in the right direction and is healthy, but to attempt to terminate the debate at the point when people are becoming informed and are discussing the nature of the nation is beyond belief.

How do we learn, Mr. Speaker? We learn not just because somebody publishes an article or a speech is made. We learn through the conversations that have gone on, through the networks we have, through the groups and organizations where we test our values, we look at what we believe in, at what we think is important and where we rehearse our history. This process takes time. If you take, as an example, the women's network in Canada, you find that in many cases it is just beginning to develop. It takes time for them to begin to address what these things which are alleged to protect their rights are and whether in fact they will do so. When the time comes for a charter to be written which we can all support, I want to see the Constitution brought home with an amending formula. I want to vote for it, and, at a later period, after there has been time for consensus-building, after there has been time for consultation and recognition of our diversity, I want to join in supporting human rights, as does every member of the House.

A process which is wrong illegitimizes the entire Constitution and it creates, as we have seen, ill-will and suspicion throughout the nation. As my colleague, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), said, every time the government decides that the means justify the end, ordinary people are hurt, and in this process ordinary people are being hurt as they feel disillusioned in their country and disaffected.

If the hon. member who shakes his head would spend more time in the various regions of this country, he would know about that suspicion. He might say that it makes it worse to talk about it, but that is not so. As one who has roots in the west as well as in central Canada, I grew up knowing and always being aware of what it costs to be from western Canada as compared to being from other parts of the nation. Perhaps it has taken 54 years to discuss this from time to time, but let us by all means carry on the discussion in an organized and systematic way, not with indecent haste. So far there has been little chance for our 22 million people to be involved and to give expression to their concern.

The process is leading to hostility. It is alleged that we are too concerned with the process. We are concerned with the process because the process brings a fundamental change to the nation and to its conceptions upon which we wish to build our sense of justice and our rights. There is a saying that justice not only must be done but must be seen to be done. In the process which takes place across the nation at this point, whether it involves women, whether it involves councils on social welfare, or whether it involves other groups which have appeared before the committee, people have not yet recognized the validity of what we are doing in this place.

At the beginning of my comments I spoke about Vincent Massey's dream for Canada, his belief that one Canada is possible if our minds would only dwell on those things that we have in common. He said he believes that with sound work, a team spirit and an awareness of ourselves we can look forward to achievements beyond our imagining. I suggest that at the moment the spirit of the team is missing in the nation. The spirit of the team is built when we communicate, when we share our beliefs, our convictions, our history, our background and our hopes for the future. The spirit of the team is not built when the captain of the team says, "You run this way and that and do what you are told; I do not mind what you think."

I have alluded earlier in my remarks to a marriage breakdown. A marriage can be saved if there is wisdom to listen, to conciliate and to begin to recognize the yearnings. There is a great love of our nation across this land; there is a great resource of human spirit. At present, the rights we want to be preserved will not be preserved. We are hearing increasingly often from those we wish to serve, and therefore I support the amendment that we bring the charter home, as we want to do on all sides of this House.

We should come to an agreement on an amending formula and deal with the whole process within a certain time-frame. We should not push aside the reaching of a consensus on the right package. Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for giving me the opportunity to make this intervention.

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, on February 8 last, the New York Times published an international economic survey. I looked through it, as is my custom, to see if there was an article there on Canada, and sure enough, on the last page, appropriately positioned, was an article entitled "Canada, Poor Prospects and Fragile Unity". Datelined Calgary, the article began:

● (1430)

It was the start of an evening of car races here not long ago when the track announcer asked the spectators to rise for the recorded playing of the national anthem, "O Canada."

Not five seconds into the solemn song there was a jarring scratching sound as the record needle was lifted. "You all know the rest", the announcer said, dispensing with the national formality. "Now, on with the races."

We can contrast that with referendum night in a constituency in east end Montreal in which I worked. It was a seat held by a PQ member of the National Assembly. We managed to win by 1,000 votes—52 per cent to 48 per cent. A number of speeches were made, and then they asked me to say a few words. I had the feeling that quite enough had been said and said, "I only want to hear one thing; I would like to hear our national anthem". One can imagine a hot committee room packed with 200 people. They belted out "O Canada" louder and with more feeling than I can ever remember.

During the referendum we discovered two things. We discovered our flag and we rediscovered our national anthem. The contrast between the referendum night and the Calgary race track could not better illustrate the necessity to reform our Constitution without delay. It is clear that we are at an impasse. It is most evident in the disagreement about the amending formula. Members of the official opposition cannot accept that Ontario or Quebec have vetoes, ignoring their populations which still make up over 60 per cent of Canada, ignoring the vital reasons of Quebec for retaining such a power. They also ignored the formula that met with the approval of all provinces in 1971.

Members of the official opposition also find the referendum proposal equally offensive. They invariably choose to ignore that in order to pass a referendum would require a double majority—a majority throughout Canada as well as a majority in all regions of the country. They choose to conjure up visions of the most outrageous circumstances one could imagine—expropriation of resources and the change of provincial boundaries—which they know would never secure the required majorities in any event. They ignore the fact that referenda have produced very conservative results in a number of federal states where they are in use, including Australia. In that country 16 constitutional referenda have been held since 1900, some dealing with several subjects. Of the 36 proposals put to the people, only eight have obtained the required majority.

The official opposition likes to pretend that the federal government could tilt a referendum in its favour with a heavy advertising campaign. However, I believe that this demonstrates a lack of credit in the inherent wisdom of the Canadian people. They choose to forget that in spite of a heavy propaganda campaign conducted in every conceivable manner over three and a half years and a question designed to meet with the maximum approval, the Parti Québécois lost the historic referendum last May.

I suppose the strongest objection raised by hon. members opposite is to the unilateral nature of our action. This is where the differences between our parties are most fundamental. There is no recognition by the official opposition that the national government may have any overriding responsibilities.

I think this is well illustrated in an exchange which took place in the committee on January 8 between the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) and Professor Maxwell Cohen who was appearing as an expert witness. The exchange revealed that in a reference case the federal government can go directly to the Supreme Court, whereas provincial governments must initiate their cases in courts of appeal. This offended the hon. member's view of the "necessary symmetry and balance" between the two levels of government. In his response, Professor Cohen stated:

It would be a pity not to see a very positive side to the federal Parliament and federal parties. After all is said and done they are part of the national system.

He put a series of questions to the hon. member:

Are you not unhappy with the over-use of the theory of equality of the two levels of government because in fact are they really equal? Do you conceive of the provinces? Yes, they have jurisdiction, they have exclusive rights in a particular area but are we really talking about equality in the ideological, over-all, political, historical sense? Do you not want to retain the sense of there being an overriding Canadian national identity and interest?

We in this party believe there is an overriding Canadian national identity and interest. The federal NDP feels the same; members of the Official Opposition do not. We in this party believe that we have responsibilities which must be exercised now, for the good of the country as a whole.

How did we ever reach that conclusion, Mr. Speaker? Some members of the official opposition and certain newspapermen would have us believe that our actions are dictated by what they think is the personal obsession of our leader. Not only is that an insult to our leader but it is an insult as well to my intelligence and to the intelligence of all members of our party.

I would like to say to our critics that the members of this party share a vision of Canada which reflects that of the great majority of Canadians. Each one of us has his or her own reasons to arrive at that conclusion and to share that vision of Canada. We have all followed our own line of reasoning.

I would like to explain today some of the reasons why I took this position. First of all, I grew up here in the city of Ottawa and although I was raised in an anglophone environment I number among those Canadians who are of neither French nor English origin. When I studied Canadian history I had no prejudices or preconceived ideas, but I have always felt sympathy for the underdogs. I recall a certain sadness when I read about the defeat of Montcalm on the Plains of Abraham. Over the past eleven years I have had the privilege of living in Quebec and I like to think that I understand the aspirations of French Canadians. How many times I sat at a lunch table and heard about the ups and downs of French Canadians trying to go into business 30 years ago!

Mr. Speaker, let us imagine the difficulties, the hesitations and the doubts experienced by any young man going into business. And on top of that francophone businessmen had to express their hopes and their dreams before bank managers who did not speak a word of French. That explains the popularity of the PQ slogan d'égal à égal during the referendum campaign, even among those who voted no. As they renewed faith in Canada, their Canada, the people who voted no expressed a feeling which underpins human dignity—the wish to be treated as equal, the will to lead a productive life in which their opportunities are as good as those of other Canadians.

The time has come to keep our promises. Since 1963 when Lester Pearson commissioned a report on bilingualism the constitutional debate has widened. Those who were born in 1963 are now 18 years old. Many of them attend university or join the labour force. They are a full generation behind us, however, today still, certain Canadians fight for their fundamental rights.

[English]

I heard the hon. member opposite who preceded me speak about the fact that it takes time to come to a consensus about what our rights are. But I would ask him: how long does one wait when people in the country are deprived of rights which ensure their basic human dignity? We may disagree about the method but I think that we can unite around the charter. I have no doubt but that the vast majority of Canadians uphold the rights set out in the charter. I believe it is a noble statement and a noble expression of our commonly shared values and can become a powerful force for unity.

● (1440)

Professor John Humphrey, president of the Canadian Human Rights Foundation, gave me the following definition of a bill of rights. He said:

> A bill of rights is, or should be, the concrete legal embodiment of the national consensus as to what minimum rights belong to individual men and women in their quality as human beings, that is, because they are human beings and for no other reason. That is why they are called "human" rights. And because there can be no human dignity without them they should be the same for all Canadians in all parts of the country wherever they live.

Surely, the rights that allow us to live in dignity go right to the heart of our existence as a nation. Surely, this is what the groups who appeared before the committee on the Constitution meant when they said that the same basic rights and freedoms should apply uniformly to all Canadians, whether in British Columbia or Newfoundland. It seems to me this is the exercise we have been engaged in over the past several months. We are defining those basic minimum rights which we feel should exist from coast to coast and without which this country cannot survive. We have heard the submissions of groups and individuals representing millions of Canadians. We have considered the representations of the provinces and we are doing it from our perspective as parliamentarians who represent every corner of our country. It is an exercise which cannot be done from the perspective of a provincial capital and which surely cannot be done from Westminster.

I would like to say a word or two about the rights which we have included in the charter. There are rights which are called "fundamental", as if to suggest that the other rights are any less fundamental. I reject any such distinction. I believe that all the rights set out in the charter are fundamental human rights of equal value, without which there can be no human dignity, in the words of Professor Humphrey.

Having said that, it is probably difficult for many Canadians to conceive of a Canada where we could not enjoy the basic rights set out in Section 2 of the charter, the so-called fundamental rights. Those who were born after World War II, like me, have enjoyed greater liberty than any other generation in history. At times we may take our freedoms of thought, religion, expression, assembly and association for granted. However, the committee was reminded of occasions in Canadian history in which such rights were infringed. To prevent such abuses and to remind ourselves of the importance of such freedoms, they should be entrenched in the Constitution today.

Other rights in the charter, though equally fundamental, are more difficult to secure in practice.

Since coming to Parliament, Mr. Speaker, I have realized that every Canadian needs to have a charter of rights entrenched in the Constitution. Like any other member of Parliament, I have had the opportunity, through meetings with my constituents, to realize the problems faced by those whose rights are not respected, who cannot find a job become they are considered too old or because they are handicaped or simply because they are women.

As Gordon Fairweather, the president of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, said before the constitutional committee, the purpose of the charter of rights and freedoms is to protect the weak from the strong and those who are powerless from the powerful. Mr. Fairweather also said that in his three years of experience with the commission, because it has been in existence for only three years, he has come to realize that many Canadians are completely powerless.

Mr. Speaker, human dignity for the people in my riding of Laurier, is the right not to be told at age 40 or 50: you are too old to work. Human dignity for a textile worker is the right to not be paid under the minimum wage just because that worker is a woman. Human dignity for a handicapped person is the right to work and to lead a productive life. And as I said in my maiden speech in October, 1979, human dignity is the right for all Canadians to work anywhere in Canada.

While doing door to door campaigning in my riding I met many construction workers who used to work in Ontario when there was a slowdown in the building industry in Quebec. This freedom of manpower movement is vital, I think, and I find it unfortunate that it ceased because of the building war between Quebec and Ontario. When I say that this issue seems vital to me, I am sure it seems much more vital to those people who find themselves without any means of livelihood because of economic barriers erected during the last few years.

An entrenched charter of rights will allow the courts to play a much more important role in the protection of human rights in Canada. Any student of constitutional law can tell you that the courts have treated the Canadian Bill of Rights as what it is—ordinary legislation—and have interpreted it as not to invalidate conflicting legislation.

A result of this interpretation is that a Canadian, Sandra Lovelace, has been forced to seek remedies outside Canada by going to the United Nations Human Rights Committee. It is a scandal that she should not be able to find justice and equality within Canada. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, how Canada will look in the eyes of the world community if a judgment is rendered by the United Nations Human Rights Committee declaring that the particular provision in the Indian Act discriminates against Indian women.

One of the main criticisms of the constitutionally entrenched charter is that Parliament and not the courts should be the final arbiters in matters relating to human rights. In the British tradition this function belongs to Parliament. However, every Member of Parliament knows that on a day to day basis courts can best protect an aggrieved individual. Parliament has little time to concern itself with the personal problems of the man or woman at the corner of Peel and St. Catherines, or Portage and Main for that matter. It is true that at the allotted time a Member of Parliament can put a question to the government in power, which may result in an investigation, or even in new legislation. But what guarantee do you have that you will be able to catch a minister's attention or that he will listen to you? An individual acting alone has very little clout, and even less if he happens to belong to a minority. He has a much better chance of bringing his case before the courts, and if he has a good case he will obtain a remedy, a remedy which may not only benefit him but all others in the same situation.

Entrenching a charter of rights does not mean that Parliament can then sit back and do nothing. The committee was reminded of this by Dr. Noel Kinsella, chairman of the New Brunswick Human Rights Commission. I will loosely paraphrase what Mr. Kinsella said. He said that the courts are but one institution for the protection of human rights and that there are many others. The other two major institutions are the legislatures and Parliament, and also the people through public opinion and the voluntary sector. He said that we in Canada, in terms of the enhancement of human rights, must not come to the conclusion that a bill of rights in the Constitution is the final guarantee of human rights, since the great advancements in race relations in the United Kingdom have been made following upon the race relations act, in the United States following upon the civil rights act, and in Europe following upon the European convention.

The courts, the public, the press, Parliament, the legislatures—each and every one of us has a vital role to play if we are to continue to enhance human rights in modern Canadian society and to meet the needs of a modern Canada. That is the message we heard in the committee and that is why I urge this House to adopt the resolution.

The Constitution

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the government's resolution respecting the Constitution of Canada. I do so because I consider it my duty and responsibility to speak out on behalf of the more than 68,000 people that I represent in my riding, who have consistently returned me to this House for 24 years through ten federal elections.

An hon. Member: You cannot last forever!

Mr. Crouse: Don't you bank on it, my friend. I have pretty good staying power!

Since this proposal was first introduced October 15, 1980, I have received hundreds of letters from my constituents expressing their fears, anxieties and concerns for the future of Canada. I share their opinion that our Constitution should be a unifying document, one which brings joy and pride to the hearts of all Canadians. Unfortunately, this has not been the case, and many of us now realize that some of the unwise decisions made by this government in its constitutional proposals may well create a backlash which could inflict mortal wounds from which our confederation may never recover.

If Canada is strong enough to endure the blows already dealt to our national unity, we still could be confronted with constitutional provisions which, unless amended, will be permanent causes of regional alienation and dissent. We are all well aware, Mr. Speaker, of the long series of efforts to reach agreement on constitutional reform. On at least two occasions agreement was reached, but when the time came for ratification someone always lacked the energy or initiative or political will required to take the final step.

The long series of efforts and failures reached their climax at the last meeting of first ministers. However, I am not all that certain that meeting ever had a chance to succeed. I say that because of the unrealistic time constraints and objectives laid down at that time by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Both the pre-conference committee and the conference itself tried to reach agreement on much too broad a spectrum of reform, thereby opening up too many areas of disagreement. It is my opinion that if the committee and first ministers had concentrated on reaching agreement on an amending formula and patriation, I am confident it could have been reached. The way would then have been open for immediate patriation and impetus given to resolving the issues in an atmosphere of co-operation and good will.

I believe the time constraints placed on the committee and the conference were unrealistic. Negotiations of this type are, of necessity, slow and laborious; they require much patience, time and perseverance; they simply cannot be hurried. You cannot expect to plant an acorn today and sit under the shade of the oak tree tomorrow, and this seems to be one of the Prime Minsiter's problems. With the Prime Minister insisting on unrealistic deadlines, the prospects for success are practically nil.

Another cause of failure was his almost total rejection of the viewpoints and concerns of the ten provincial premiers. In his philosophical approach to what he regards as Canadian nationhood, he held that Canada is more than the sum total of its provinces, that the federal government, rather than being a partner with the provincial governments, is a power above and apart, representing national interests which transcend those of the ten provincial governments combined.

While attaching great importance to his so-called people's package, including the charter of rights, the Prime Minister was unresponsive to the equally important concerns of the provincial premiers in matters which affect not merely their regional interests but the well-being of the nation as a whole. The Prime Minister's attitude is a viewpoint that I cannot accept.

The provincial governments, Mr. Speaker, exercise on behalf of the people of those provinces the powers given to them by our present Constitution. Practically every part of this country today is adversely affected by unresolved jurisdictional disputes involving the ownership and management of natural resources, including offshore mineral rights. When the premier of my province states that he does not believe the natural resources of Nova Scotia should be wrestled from the grasp of Nova Scotians, he is only saying what the people of that province want him to say and, by virtue of the Constitution, have the right to expect him to say on their behalf. This is what he must do. If he did not take that stand he would be false to his duty and negligent in the responsibilities imposed upon him by those who elected him.

As one of the first Canadian provinces to have its own flag, Nova Scotians hold their traditions high. We are a proud people, proud of our heritage and proud of the fact that our forebears came to Nova Scotia from many lands across the sea; from Scotland, Ireland, England, France, Germany, Norway, Switzerland and Sweden, to name but a few. Some of my forebears came from the Rhenish Palatinate and some from Hanover in 1753, before Germany existed. All of these people came for one reason or another, to escape religious persecution, to establish new homes on their own lands where they could sink their roots and seek a new way of life free from harassment and persecution.

As Nova Scotians, we believe that the rights accruing to us before confederation are still ours. In fact, the British North America Act states that whatever the provinces had before confederation, such as mineral rights, they were to retain after confederation. This is spelled out in Section 109 of the BNA Act.

The first seed of ownership was planted in 1605 by the commission given to De Monts, that gallant and adventurous French explorer. It was further strengthened by the Royal Charter of 1621 given to Sir William Alexander. Then there were the treaties of Utrecht and Paris in 1713 and 1763. Our claims were expanded by the commissions of Cornwallis and other governors, as well as by the creation of the legislative assembly in 1758 and legislation passed by the government of Nova Scotia between 1758 and 1867.

From these facts it should be noted that our claims as Nova Scotians to our province and our mineral rights go back over many centuries, and I say to you, sir, that we are not about to give them up because of a unilateral decision made to gratify the ego of one man. Our claims to offshore mineral rights are now threatened by this government, and I cite this example to indicate that the solution to our problems does not necessarily require constitutional amendments; what is required is a recognition that often the national and regional interests of the country are inseparably related.

The provincial governments must, therefore, be treated as equal partners of the federal government in the policy-making process through which solutions to these problems must be found. However, when the provincial governments made it clear that any amendments to the Constitution should guarantee their rights to the ownership of natural resources and that the priority of provincial economic policy should be reaffirmed and entrenched, the Prime Minister responded that he was not prepared to bargain, in his words, freedom for fish or fundamental rights for oil. Is it any wonder that under these circumstances the first ministers' conference ended in failure.

The proper thing to do at that point, in my opinion, would have been to temporarily set aside all issues other than patriation and agreement on an amending formula which even then, in all probability, could have been reached. However, this course of action did not suit the Right Hon. Prime Minister who, instead, decided to embark upon a course of unilateral action to both repatriate and amend the Constitution despite warnings from most of Canada's premiers that such action would have dire consequences for confederation.

Patriation per se is not a matter of disagreement among the Canadian people. Practically all are agreed that our Constitution should be our own statute, passed by our own Parliament and enshrined in this Parliament. I agree with that. It is equally true to say that patriation of our Constitution is not a matter of widespread public concern even after this Liberal government spent millions of dollars on television advertising to tell Canadians that life would be uncertain if the British North America Act did not return to Canada.

Mr. Ouellet: That is not true. We did not spend millions of dollars on that. That is totally untrue.

Mr. Crouse: The hon. gentleman says that is totally untrue. He is in cabinet so he would have the figures. When he makes a speech he can put the true figure on the record. Perhaps I have understated the amount and, if so, he can set the record straight.

I was saying the people are not as much concerned as we would have liked them to be. I say that to you and to the government, sir, because of the facts made known as a result of a recent Gallup poll taken among Canadians in which they answered that they regarded different matters as having urgency. Patriation would seem to have a very low priority. Canadians seem to believe that the really serious and urgent problems are inflation, unemployment, energy, balance of payments and budget deficits. I say to the government, through you, sir, it is high time it took some action on these urgent economic problems.

Unfortunately, these problems do not seem to concern the Right Hon. Prime Minister. In my view, today he is a man on a mission, on a crusade to change if not the world, then at least Canada, in order to assist in reflecting his ideological and philosophical preferences, with never a thought for the wishes of the Canadian people. This man is on the last lap of his political career. Whether that lap takes one year or another election does not make any difference. He sees what he thinks is best for Canada and, with the single-mindedness of the true believer, is determined against all odds to achieve it. Call it what you like, disguise it as you will, what he seeks for Canada today resembles a socialist dictatorship in my view. If you do not like that term we can call it a centralized paternalistic system, where free choice is limited and where state control is excessive. He proposes that the collective should replace individualism, all in the name of the common good of the average citizen. I say to this House, that the common man's individual liberties will be the casualties.

As the Right Hon. Prime Minister points out in all his writings, his background and leanings do not favour British parliamentary democracy nor a constitutional democracy. He knows better than the average Canadian that if he succeeds in getting human rights and language rights entrenched in the Constitution in the manner he proposes, parliamentary democracy in this country is dead, as will be the monarchy.

Inevitably, Canada will become a republic with a presidential system under the Prime Minister's plan. Make no mistake, the constitutional proposal is entirely that of the Prime Minister, no one else, and he is pushing this proposal with all the force at his command.

What do we see from this side of the House? We see an uncritical group of Liberals blindly following the Pied Piper who blows the flute and leads them over the cliff to their destruction. Occasionally one will surface like Moby Dick and blow his spume into the air, then disappear below the surface, never to be seen again until he somehow reappears in his place to vote as his master dictates.

The over-all effect of this action and this resolution will be that the federal government will intrude ever deeper into our daily lives. There may be some who will claim I am being too critical of the Right Hon. Prime Minister, but I am merely stating truths as he has publicly recorded them. In fact, when Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Pelletier joined the Liberal Party in 1965, after taking a leave of absence from the NDP, they issued a prepared statement which said in part:

> The undersigned are still following the same goals—they are continuing to adhere to the same political ideologies that they have for a long time set forth in "Cité Libre." We don't repudiate any of our convictions. We have only resolved to pursue elsewhere and in other ways the intellectual and social struggle which has always claimed us.

When he was justice minister he was taunted with some of his former writings and he responded by saying "everything I wrote I stand by". Three years later—and this is one of the benefits of being in this House for a long time because one can remember these things—while defending a political decision he said, "I acted on the information I have been accumulating since I was three years old".

This leads me to ask what information, what ideas have formed the basis for the right hon. gentleman's actions. He has pinpointed three main sources for his ideas. In 1971 the Prime Minister said:

> In my youth the people who influenced me the most were the Christian existentialists like Mounier. In his last key editorial before his death Emmanuel Mounier wrote in his review "Esprit", "The proletariat must be allowed to continue the positive work of the communist party while eliminating all the poisons which are mixed therein. Such is one of our principal tasks for tomorrow."

In 1966 Mr. Trudeau stated that he found Professor Harold Laski of the London School of Economics "the most stimulating and powerful influence" he had encountered. Laski's single most important book, "A Grammar of Politics", which the Prime Minister studied, laid out these central principles:

> The necessarily federal character of society; the incompatibility of the sovereign state with that economic world order so painfully struggling to be born (communism); the antithesis between individual property rights in the essential means of production and the fulfilment of the democratic idea; the thesis that liberty is a concept devoid of real meaning except in the context of equality, there cannot, in a word, be democracy unless there is socialism.

In 1976 Prime Minister Trudeau said:

> In terms of economics, you know, I spent two years studying with Schumpeter and two years studying with Leontief, and if you want to know who is formenting my economic thinking you'd do better to think in terms of Leontief and Schumpeter.

I found that Schumpeter was Prime Minister Trudeau's Harvard professor. As his major work the professor wrote "Capitalism, Socialism and Democracy" in which he said:

> I have tried to show that a socialist form of society will inevitably emerge from an equally inevitable decomposition of capitalist society.

So it may reasonably be said that the Prime Minister's ideas drawn from the writings of Schumpeter, Laski and Mounier have remained basically the same for the past 30 years.

Let us now look at some of the Prime Minister's writings and compare them with his more recent statements and actions to see how they affect Canadians and will affect Canadians in the immediate future. In 1961 he said:

> I should like to see socialists feeling free to espouse whatever political trends or to use whatever constitutional tools happen to fit each particular problem at each particular time.

Is that not exactly what the Prime Minister is doing today, using whatever tools suit him and suit this particular problem? What did Mr. Trudeau say in 1961 before he was Prime Minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau) on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Cousineau: Mr. Speaker, last week I pointed out to the House that the hon. member was sinning against Citation 319 of Beauchesne's fifth edition. I realize now it was no accident. He did so deliberately in a well-orchestrated way of mentioning the name of our Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker, I believe he chooses to ignore the practice of this House.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has called attention to the rules of the House whereby we should refer to hon. members by their constituencies, members of cabinet by their departments and the Prime Minister as the Prime Minister and not by their personal names.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time the hon. member has taken the opportunity to do this. I should suggest to him if he wants to make a speech, he should rise and do so.

Mr. Blais: It is a legitimate point of order, and the Speaker has ruled on it.

Mr. Crouse: When I was quoting, I was quoting what Mr. Trudeau said in 1961. He was not then the Prime Minister nor a member of this House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I invite the hon. member to observe the custom of referring to people who are currently members of the House or members of the cabinet according to the custom, as I understand it, which usually prevails in this House.

Mr. Crouse: I will follow the custom, Mr. Speaker, as recommended by you.

An hon. Member: Don't brag about it.

Mr. Crouse: The hon. gentleman likes to interrupt. He does not seem to know what the debate is all about. I cannot recall him making much of a contribution. If he will bear with me while I read into the record the writings of the Right Hon. Prime Minister, maybe he will learn a little bit about the man who is blindly leading him over the cliff to his own destruction. I will go on with what the Right Hon. Prime Minister said in 1961 when he was not prime minister.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): When he was Mr. Trudeau.

Mr. Crouse: Yes, when he was Mr. Trudeau.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: In 1961, the present Prime Minister said:

The nationalization of the instruments of production is now being considered less as an end than as a means, and one that might in many cases be replaced by more flexible processes of economic control and redistribution. The erroneous, liberal idea of property helped to emancipate the bourgeosie but is now hampering the march toward economic democracy.

In 1975, on national television, the Prime Minister stated:

We haven't been able to make it work, the free market system—the government is going to have to take a larger role in running institutions. It means there is going to be not less authority in our lives but perhaps more.

Mr. Pepin: Quote your own books.

Mr. Crouse: I am quoting the Prime Minister's own writings and I am quoting from his speeches. If the truth hurts, sir, you better stand up and defend your own group. Do not try to interrupt when I am trying to put the truth to what the Right Hon. Prime Minister has said to the Canadian people.

An hon. Member: You will have a heart attack.

Mr. Crouse: I won't have a heart attack. I am enjoying every minute of it.

In 1976 the Right Hon. Prime Minister said—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: I must be hitting hard core pains over there. Listen to them squawk. Never before have I heard such grunting and growling out of those who are being led over the cliff. Never before when I have made a speech has this happened. Somewhere I must be hitting the truth.

Mr. Simmons: You are warping it.

Mr. Crouse: In 1976 the Prime Minister stated:

We haven't been able to make even a modified free market system work in Canada to prevent the kinds of problems we are now experiencing.

There are many more quotes, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps you could keep a little order and keep the rabble over there down a little bit. I do not interrupt, sir, when they are making their speeches and I ask them to have the courtesy not to interrupt me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simmons: Is there a doctor in the House?

Mr. Crouse: There are many more quotes of the Prime Minister I could place on the record, but surely I have given this House enough to make all members realize the Prime Minister is a leader who is as arrogant as he is intelligent. Since he considers the free market system is no longer working, he and his henchmen have already started on their process of industrial nationalization with the purchase of Petrofina. We hear such things as: "never mind the price. Canadians will pay whatever we feel they can handle," and "let the taxpayers pay." The government has no worry over the large-scale loans to automobile companies. If they are not repaid, I expect this government will take over Chrysler so that Canadians can have their own cars. They may not be called Chryslers, they may simply be called Canadians, with a six under the hood, a four on the floor, with the government in your pocket, you will be driving along with your tongue in your cheek wondering what will come next.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: The Italian government owns Fiat.

Mr. Blackburn: They are doing a good job with Fiat.

Mr. Crouse: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) has us on the road toward owning Chrysler.

I say to all Canadians that unless they want to give up all their freedoms and be subservient to one-party rule in Ottawa, wake up before it is too late. That is what I am saying to that group over there. I have them awake now, at least I have their attention. They have been asleep, they say, for the last 16 years. It is time they woke up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: On a Friday afternoon, we can all have a little fun.

I just stated the Prime Minister's views on property ownership. Having heard his views, hon. members now know why the Right Hon. Prime Minister does not intend to have the right to own property included in his constitution. During discussions at committee stage, the Progressive Conservatives moved an amendment to the resolution requesting that property rights be included in the charter of rights.

Property rights were agreed to by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) who gave a solemn commitment to the committee, in the absence of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien). However, this commitment did not meet with the approval of the Prime Minister or the other socialists in the House who travel under the NDP banner. As a result of the deals made behind the scenes, the government broke its promise to protect this important right that millions of Canadians feel and firmly believe should be included in the Constitution. Every person who understands common law has looked upon his home as his castle. I ask the government through you, sir, why not entrench property rights in the Constitution? Thousands of immigrants, including my ancestors, came to this country for one thing, namely, the right to own land and to be free, because they could no longer do so in their own country, or because their land had been taken from them.

The charter proposed includes a series of rights, many of which fall under provincial jurisdiction. Many of the rights included in Mr. Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights are also included in the Prime Minister's, but one important right is missing; that is, the right to own property, property which cannot be taken from you except by lawful means following a fair hearing.

What are the implications of this act upon the average Canadian? It does not mean that our homes, businesses or farms will necessarily be taken away from us, but it does mean they will go without protection under the new Constitution. Yet, I say to you, sir, with all the sincerity at my command that property ownership is the fundamental basis for freedom in any democracy, and that is the point.

The loss of guaranteed property rights strikes fear in the hearts of many Canadians. Fear, like hate and love is a very positive moving force. It was fear that caused many seamen to refuse to sail with Columbus. It was not that they feared the sea because I presume they were good seamen. It was not that they feared the ships; although they were small, they were seaworthy, but they feared setting sail with a captain who refused to tell them where they were going, the length of the voyage, its cost or their ultimate destination.

An hon. Member: What a trip.

Mr. Crouse: Yes, and what a trip you fellows are going on. If only you could wake up and realize what a trip you are taking.

I say to the government, through you, Mr. Speaker, and to government supporters, this is similar to the situation we have in Canada today. The Right Hon. Prime Minister's policies have already changed the composition and the direction of Canada. Look at how our traditions have been violated, undermined, ridiculed and obliterated. We will never be the same, and only one man, the Prime Minister, has done it. He is still doing it. This constitutional package, which is taking up so much time of this House and of the country, is really only the tip of his iceberg. In my opinion, our present Prime Minister is the most determined prime minister Canada has ever had. He is also the most unprincipled in his efforts to achieve the ends he sees as desirable.

Having read much of his writings, it is obvious he has borrowed and copied many of his ideas from Machiavelli, Marx, Richelieu and Lenin.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: Hon. members over there are laughing. I hope some of these men on the other side can read. If they can read, they would note that what I have said was quoted from their own leader and I have cited the books he said he found most interesting and desirable.

It is obvious he has borrowed much of his beliefs from the men I have mentioned. He embodies a doctrinaire elitism which seeks to bring the people to a certain level of understanding or acceptance which he thinks is best. He is a zealot, perhaps even a fanatic and terribly dangerous, just as any fanatic is dangerous.

This is unfortunate for Canada at this time for he has a belief, a single-minded conviction that he and only he is right. Let us face it, the only ones who can now stop the Prime Minister in his madness are in the Liberal Party and that party is now, unfortunately, composed on people who only obey orders, even if those orders will ultimately destroy this nation.

The government in placing this resolution before this House insists in incorporating in it a referendum proposal which would give the central government unilateral power to change our Constitution without any reference to the elected representatives or elected governments of any province.

This is the proposal, and on that premise this government, after denying our provincial governments their right to prior consultation, has the unmitigated gall to ask Great Britain to vote on Canadian basic rights and freedoms. I say this is an insult to every provincial government and to every Canadian. It is a surrender of Canadian sovereignty by the present government which seeks to justify its actions on the grounds that we could never reach agreement on these important questions in Canada. To strengthen their argument, we are told by many speakers that Canadian federalism is a 54-year record of failure. I do not accept that allegation.

Prior to the advent of this present Liberal government in 1968, Canada and Canadians were not doing all that badly. We have not been debating the Constitution for 54 years. The record will show that since 1927 this matter has come up in federal-provincial discussions on 48 different dates, which is something like one day per year. This should indicate to everyone concerned that there is something difficult within the problem and, therefore, it is not something to be solved by some fancy words or by one man's desire to impose his views on the whole country.

The Canadian federal system run by reasonable governments has produced agreements on many topics, namely medicare, the Canada Pension Plan, equalization payments and hospital insurance, to name but a few. All of these agreements were reached through a process of negotiation and consensus but now this will no longer happen and, in future, changes will be made unilaterally by one government in Ottawa.

By tearing up our federal traditions, we risk tearing apart our entire country. I say to this government, through you, sir, that charters of rights, amending formulae and referenda are not symbols but are the practical tools by which our nation will be governed in the future. All laws and especially fundamental constitutional laws are not worth the paper they are written on unless they represent a consensus arrived at by discussion and debate. You cannot force this bill down the throats of Canadians unilaterally without creating anarchy and rebellion. We are close to that now with eight provincial premiers, as of this morning, raising as loudly as they can their objections to this legislation, this resolution, this proposal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for South Shore has the floor.

Mr. Ouellet: He is abusing it.

Mr. Crouse: I never knew the truth could hurt so much. I do not believe there is any provision in this constitutional proposal which is more objectionable than the permanent enshrinement of a referendum to change Canada's Constitution. This is not just any referendum. It is a power to be given to the federal government to break a so-called deadlock, a deadlock that would be solely and totally determined by the federal government. It is a referendum which could be used to bypass the people's elected representatives and the provincial legislatures. It is a referendum which could be used by a majority to override the rights of minorities, the very people which the proposal purports to protect.

For reasons I have mentioned, I intend to vote against this resolution. I believe if it is passed by a majority vote that it will be the beginning of the end of our nation as we presently know and love it. I hope I will always be able to say I am a Canadian, a free Canadian, free to speak without fear, free to worship God in my own way, free to stand for what I think right, free to oppose what I believe wrong and free to choose those who shall govern my country. This heritage of freedom I pledge to uphold for myself and all mankind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: It seems my right to do just that is being questioned here this afternoon. It is the thin edge of the wedge when you cannot make a speech freely expressing your own views, opposing that which you believe wrong without the herd's uncontrolled yapping, trying to prevent me from putting forth those views in which I strongly believe. That is the very essence of my speech. Already our rights are being eroded. Those words I stated are the final words in the Bill of Rights as established by the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. I say in closing that they are as true today as they were when they were first passed by the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) on a wonderful speech. We on this side appreciate what he has to say. I also want to comment on speeches made in this House by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) and the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean).

I congratulate all my colleagues on both sides of the House who sat on the constitutional committee. They did an admirable job and are to be commended. In particular, I congratulate my colleague for Provencher (Mr. Epp) who led the official opposition in the Constitution committee. He did a tremendous job.

The people of Canada are facing the most serious constitutional crisis since confederation. As the Right Hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) has often stated, the crisis has come about as a result of years of negligence and indifference on the part of the Liberal party.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has adopted an intransigent attitude on the question of constitutional change. All of the provinces have been made to feel they are simply fifth wheels on Ottawa's chariot. The provinces are realistic in demanding consultation in order to determine the shape and style of a new Canada.

Canada's future must be decided by the provinces and the federal government in council together. Let me say this, the future of Canada will not and cannot be decided by one man, Pierre Trudeau—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Paproski: —to suit his own private view of confederation. Canada's BNA Act was put together in 1867 by the provinces sitting around a table.

Mr. Blais: It was put together by Sir John A. Macdonald, if you want to know.

Mr. Paproski: If it must be rewritten at this late date; let it be done in the same way as the original act was framed.

Mr. Knowles: The minister and I know, we were there.

Mr. Paproski: I know Stanley Knowles was there. All you have to do is look at the pictures and you can see him.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member should be referred to as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Blais: Well, Steve, at least you are funny.

● (1530)

Mr. Paproski: I do not intend to be funny. I think this is a very serious and pertinent topic, and I do not consider it to be funny. The minister says I am trying to be amusing. It is Friday afternoon; I think we can inject a little bit of humour, but this is a serious matter and I wish he would take my remarks as a serious speech.

I personally feel that the Constitution should be patriated unchanged, except for an amending formula and that amendments should be made in Canada by agreement with the provinces. I say with some confidence that the provinces would all be ready to settle for less power if they could be assured of more consideration by and consultation with the federal government. Let me say that one more time. I say with some confidence that the provinces would all be ready to settle for less power if they could be assured of more consideration by and consultation with the federal government.

Mr. Rossi: You know they will never agree to that.

Mr. Paproski: You would be surprised.

The requirements on what a workable constitution for a federal state must do for its people are indeed stiff. First of all, any constitution, and particularly a federal one like ours, is the general directing plan for the common life of its people. It is the supervisor of the life of the society. But the people who share in a federal system take different views of life and opportunity. Those views are ingrained in them by history, experience, occupation and inherited attitudes. Our greatest mistake in a federal system is to be unhappy because we cannot live in close unity like a loving family. If we were like that, we would not be struggling to live under a federal system.

I believe this struggle arises largely out of excessive centralization of power in Ottawa. The malfunctioning of the party system in Canada is one of the results of this excessive centralization.

The policies of the Liberal Party have produced an acute polarization of votes in this country. There was originally—and this is still unresolved—a conflict between the Francophone and Anglophone communities.

[Translation]

A conflict due to a large extent to the personality of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). And I quote in this regard journalist Jacques Poisson who wrote in the newspaper Le Devoir dated February 9:

—Mr. Trudeau is, at one and the same time and to various degrees, the spoilt brat, the constitutional despot . . . the poisoner of the Canadian political climate.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: My colleague, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) read something about Canada in the New York Times of February 8. I appreciated the hon. member's remarks, but why did he not read the article in Le Devoir of February 9? I do not wish to comment on some of the beautiful adjectives Monsieur Poisson used with respect to our Prime Minister, but let me just read a few things.

All told, Mr. Trudeau's public personality embraces, in varying degrees, a tyrannical brat, constitutional despot . . . crazed manipulator of human marionettes, demon of paradox——expert . . . intimidator, master of contempt, poisoner of Canada's political climate, a narcissist searching for a cosmic mirror in which to reflect his ego.

I do not even know some of these words.

Constitution, c'est MOI; democracy, c'est MOI; reason, c'est MOI; common sense, c'est MOI.

Mr. Simmons: Who wrote that?

Mr. Paproski: This is a great article by Jacques Poisson in Le Devoir on February 9. I noticed that Pravda has also endorsed the Prime Minister and what he is doing here in Canada. With friends like that, who needs enemies?

Today there is an emerging conflict between east and west. Canada is a land of diversity. Our Constitution must therefore contain enough flexibility in its terms to enable us to come to compromises that will let us flourish in our diversity.

My father brought his family here from Poland and the Ukraine in 1929. Veen priyeekhav do Kanadi: that means "He came to Canada". My father did not come just to one town, he did not come just to one province. He came to Canada.

Mr. Simmons: Hear, hear! Come on over, Steve.

Mr. Paproski: He came to the Canada as seen through the eyes of our Fathers of Confederation which, despite those strained economic times, still offered freedom, opportunity and prosperity.

In this debate on the Constitution what we are really doing is acknowledging the uncomforting reality that the vision and hopes of men like my father and of generations before him may never more prevail in Canada.

The Liberal government has presented a resolution which contains a Canadian charter of rights and freedoms which makes no reference to the affirmation that "the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God" as it is stated in the Canadian Bill of Rights of 1960 brought in by the Progressive Conservative government of that day. The opportunity and prosperity which is sought by all those coming to Canadian shores, in addition to cherished freedom, is also being undermined by this government.

The amendment presented by my colleague, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) reiterated a right which had been given to Canadians by the aforementioned bill of rights, and that was "the right of the individual to enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law". This right now is being threatened.

The vision of a country which offered opportunity to pursue goals and aspirations in freedom has for many years attracted peoples from different lands to our country. Canada is people, and it is this very distinctive characteristic of our different peoples within Canada that distinguishes us from our southern neighbour and other anglophone countries in the world.

It is this embracing of the diversities of English-speaking Canada and the distinctiveness of French-speaking Canada that truly reflects the Canadian identity. It is the multicultural character of our country, profound in history and rich in traditions, which must be fostered and protected if we are truly to respect individual and collective freedoms.

I must say that I telephoned the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming) this afternoon—or my office did—to say I would be speaking. I hoped the minister would be in the House. I know he is busy, but as a former minister of multiculturalism I wanted him to hear some of the things I have to say this afternoon.

Mr. Blais: Your heart is in the right place.

Mr. Paproski: The Liberal government has done nothing to promote a sincere and significant contribution to the development of multiculturalism in Canada. The so-called permanent policy on multiculturalism and its present minister are a shame. Just what is Canada without the recognition of its diverse cultural origins or without the official acknowledgement that over one-third of our population is neither of French nor English origin?

Multiculturalism goes beyond the entertainment novelty of song and dance. It is a history, a language and a way of life contributing to the Canadian social environment. It is certainly not something to be drummed out at election time or when the government needs to improve its public relations image.

The present minister in the Liberal government is a perfect example of what I have just said. That is why I said I telephoned his office. I wanted him to be aware of what I am saying to him today. One wonders about his priorities. Is he really promoting the multicultural nature of this country or is he concentrating on selling the Liberal government?

● (1540)

An hon. Member: The former.

Mr. Paproski: He is the minister of propaganda, the Goebbels of the Liberal Party.

The Progressive Conservative Party of Canada recognizes the multicultural reality of the Canadian society and is committed to developing this premise. We should not simply accept or tolerate Canada's multicultural nature. We must celebrate it as a formidable guarantee of our uniqueness as a nation and our continued diversity and freedom as a people.

In keeping with this premise, the cabinet of the Leader of the Opposition has reflected this diversity of backgrounds—and I must mention in this context the Hnatyshyns, the Mazankowskis and the Paproskis, that great Irish team! No other cabinet in all of Canada's 112 or 113 years of history has had such a wide representation of talent and expertise. This cabinet was moving toward the enhancement of the multicultural program by proposing an upgrading of the status of this program within the structure of the Department of the Secretary of State.

In keeping with this commitment, the Leader of the Official Opposition last year established a new program within his office and appointed Michel Lamoureux as his special assistant for multiculturalism; he not only speaks French but also Italian, Spanish and other languages, and before I am finished it will include Ukrainian and Polish. Most Canadians, however, are really unaware of a multiculturalism policy in Canada, and those who are aware of such a policy perceive it only in the context of allowing immigrants to maintain their customs and folk traditions.

In one united and independent Canada, Canadians should enjoy effective equality in political and socioeconomic rights, irrespective of their ethnic origin, religion or mother tongue. All ethnocultural communities, from the Anglo-Celtic and French to the smallest ones, contribute to the Canadian cultural mosaic, and their cultural activities should be given moral and material support by the state in proportion to the groups' willingness to survive.

Section 27 in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in this constitutional resolution refers to multicultural heritage. The section reads as follows:

27. This charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

These three lines are an insult to the non-English and non-French citizens of our country. This section is one of interpretation, not one of recognition that over one-third of Canada's population is neither of English nor of French descent.

I do hope that the Prime Minister of Canada and the Minister of State for Multiculturalism will seriously reconsider section 27 of the resolution and will enshrine in the Canadian Constitution the recognition that is due to the members of Canada's ethnocultural communities.

Hon. members opposite may think this is not a serious matter, and I hope the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) is not laughing at what I have had to say today. I have a lot of respect for francophones across this country as well as for anglophones, and I would like to see the same respect accorded to one third of our people who are neither Anglophone nor Francophone. I hope we will keep this in mind and consider it very seriously.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I realize that at this time of the day my remarks will have to be split into two parts, so I will take the opportunity in my opening remarks to comment in a general way on some of the highlights of this debate which has taken place so far. I have deliberately, as I did in the second reading debate, watched each of the speakers, listened carefully to what they have said and tried to put it into perspective.

I think the highlight of this debate, which is equivalent to the third reading of an ordinary bill, took place outside the House when the young hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) who, having been named the spokesman of his party on constitutional matters and having led the debate on behalf of his party in committee with distinction, moderation and sincerity on national television which covered that committee, went before the television cameras this week, along with three other members of his party, and told the people of Canada that he and the others could not vote for this resolution. It was a difficult thing for those four men to do. I respect that type of courage, not only because it was demonstrated by a member of a party which is different from my own but because it represents to me something that is very important.

This demonstrates that in every party there must always be someone who, on a tremendously important issue like this, will put the principles of his country first before party loyalty. I include in these remarks the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) in our party who, after a great deal of struggle and strain within himself and after talking it over with the caucus, announced that he will vote for the resolution, and he gave his reasons publicly. To my knowledge, not one Conservative member denied him that right. Now we see four members of the NDP saying publicly something which was said by the leader of our party on October 2. I will quote the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville from the press release of his statement, a very simple statement, which reads as follows:

Since I feel so strongly that this resolution ignores federalism—ignores the Canadian way—and will further divide the country, I have informed my leader, Mr. Broadbent, and my caucus that I will oppose this resolution when it comes to a vote in the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: Surprise, surprise.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have heard members of the House attack the party for being divided, and I heard a Conservative member, who disagreed very strongly with the NDP, come to their defence yesterday. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville went on to say in his statement:

—my basic opposition rests on the wrongness of the process.

This is the heart and soul of this entire debate. One cannot build a foundation or a house, let alone a constitution of a nation, unless there is purity of thought and purpose. One can build what only looks like a foundation or a house, but it is not a house unless it receives the time, care and attention it deserves.

I would think Canadians are now somewhat more proud of Parliament than they were two or three weeks ago. They have heard a member of this party declare his sincere convictions which were different from those of the rest of us; he is one among a hundred. Also they have heard four members of the NDP stand up and declare their sincere convictions. They know they can put more trust in a party which allows independence of mind on fundamental principles than they can when there is solid voting.

Among the 150 Liberals who sit opposite, I am sure there must be some who are concerned that they are destroying, by their stand in this House, the sincere position of Mr. Claude Ryan, the leader of the Liberal party in Quebec. Also they are destroying—and perhaps they want to—the position of the head of the government of Quebec, the Honourable René Lévesque. These men are Canadians. The latter honestly confessed that he does not like the Anglos, particularly if they live in the city of Montreal or in London, England, but that he does not have anything against the rest of us.

An hon. Member: Who says?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): In 1961 he stood up in Ottawa as a member of the Lesage government, when he accepted the presidency of the Canadian Council of Resource Ministers, and stated that the only way the federal system would be saved was by co-operation.

An hon. Member: He was a Liberal then.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Yes, he was a Liberal then.

An hon. Member: Today he is a separatist.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): He believed that there was good in Canada, if we worked together and co-operated.

An hon. Member: What is he today?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): If one asks him today why he left the Liberal Party—

An hon. Member: It was because he was a separatist.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): —he will say publicly and honestly, as he has done many times, that when he became a minister in the Lesage government he had no trouble getting co-operation from the government of the day from 1960 to 1963, but that he was faced with a new type of co-operative federalism in 1963.

During the Diefenbaker period more agreements were signed by the federal government with the provincial governments than at any other time in the history of confederation. These agreements dealt with matters mostly under provincial jurisdiction, but in the interests of developing a stronger Canada agreements were made with the provinces to carry these things forward.

We have heard in this debate that we would never have had a hospitalization plan or a medicare plan under this type of resolution. But in a constitution, in respect of which one thinks of working together, with sovereign rights held by provinces in certain fields and others held by the federal government, but both agreeing in advance that they will never break apart, one could always get agreement if there was a willingness to co-operate.

I was personally able to make agreements with Premier Duplessis. Surely he was a nationalist. My colleague at that time, the minister of labour, Mike Starr, made agreements with Duplessis concerning education, roads, forestry and power. If we could make agreements with strong nationalists in the province of Quebec who were yielding to no one in their awareness of their distinct culture, then why can other governments not do it?

Unfortunately in 1963 we inherited a prime minister who thought co-operative federalism meant calling the provinces in, sitting them down ten across the desk, listening to the civil servants behind them, and telling those provinces what they were to do. Unfortunately, for this late prime minister, he was up against six or seven of the toughest provincial premiers. It was like murderer's row across from him. There was Stanfield, Smallwood, Lesage, Robarts, Duff Roblin, Manning and Bennett. Who would want to take on those ten fellows and try to tell them what they were going to do? Everyone knows that Premier Lesage ran prime minister Pearson off the field of battle in no time. Pearson had to sacrifice his own ministry to bring peace between the federal government and the provinces.

In the last number of years the Canadian way of doing things by consensus has been steadily destroyed. Today we are debating a way of life in Canada. It has been put best by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) when he said that it was really a question of consensus or confrontation. The same comment was made by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) and other people. The Canadian way and the only way a federal system will work is when everyone is treated as an equal, regardless of which level of government is concerned, until it comes time to pay, and then there is a little bit of argument. This issue of consensus versus confrontation as a technique was used successfully by governments of all political stripes for over 100 years, but within the last ten years they have experienced failure.

May I call it four o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that all motions preceding No. 38 shall stand, by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND—INTERCEPTION OF COMMUNICATIONS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton) moved that Bill C-238, to amend the Criminal Code (invasion of privacy), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

● (1600)

He said: Mr. Speaker, at the outset I must confess to the House that I am not the original draftsman of this piece of legislation. Nor is it the first time it has been before the House of Commons. This bill was first introduced in an earlier session of Parliament and spoken to on March 3, 1978, by Mr. Eldon Woolliams, Q.C., who everyone knows who has been here for a while, sat in this House from 1957 until 1980, latterly for the constituency of Calgary North.

There are many members of the House who did not know Mr. Woolliams. On the other, there are many who did know him. I think all of us who knew him, regardless of what side of the House we might sit on, felt him to be a truly estimable Member of Parliament, who, by his background and learning, brought a very finely tuned sense of justice and equity to the work in the House of Commons. If one reviews his background it is interesting to note that he was a practising lawyer, and still is, of great distinction in the province of Alberta. But not many of us know that he was a teacher before he became a lawyer. He distinguished himself as a trial lawyer and as a parliamentarian. He maintained his interest in the law. He was our party's critic with regard to justice and legal affairs. He appeared in that role on many occasions with respect to amendments to the criminal law and other things. He was a special delegate and lecturer for Canada to the United Nations seminar on human and civil rights held in Mexico City in 1961. He was a justice delegate for the Canadian Congress on Peace through Law in Belgrade, Yugoslavia in 1971. He carried himself in the House as an avid political partisan, to be sure, but also as an avid partisan of equity and justice, and reviewer of the law to ensure that the law evolved. He did so to ensure that the individual was not forgotten. It was because of his concern at that time that he brought forward this bill. It was a private bill with respect to certain amendments to the Criminal Code respecting the invasion of privacy.

As the House will remember, we have had some spirited debate in this House on the question of wiretapping and on the question of the necessity for the administration of justice to keep up with technological change while others not so interested in the preservation of order in society were doing so. He was very concerned, while these procedures were being carried out, that we become watchdogs of the rights of individuals in terms of the administration of justice. Mr. Woolliams' finely tuned sense of justice caused him concern about some changes in the criminal law which were made in favour of the individual during the minority Parliament of 1972-74 but which were changed in the Parliament that met later in 1974.

This bill raises a number of concerns which were important then, and which I suggest to the House are important now. They are important because of what has happened and what is happening to our society. There seems to be a willingness for society to accept the fact that it is now becoming a society of groups rather than a society of individuals. We have large corporations and large unions. We have advocates of law and order, and I happen to be one of them. But in some cases we have advocates of law and order who tend to downplay the importance of groups and talk about the importance of individuals. We talk about groups and people in terms of statistics. We are always talking about the percentage of unemployed, the percentage of disadvantaged, the percentage of senior citizens and the percentage of our population who are veterans. This is a reflection of a society which has turned inward and forgotten that inside those groups, which compete from time to time, there are individuals who count as well.

The history of criminal law has been in the direction of protecting society. It is an important direction but it ought not be the only direction of criminal law. Mr. Woolliams was concerned that the wiretapping legislation and the ability to govern electronic bugging had moved in this direction too far. What he did was propose a bill which would have preserved a number of things and, hopefully, moved the law back a shade from the direction it had taken. This bill is a simple one. First of all, if enacted it would protect the important right of privacy between the solicitor and his client. This would enable the solicitor and client to discuss openly the case with which they are concerned, in the tradition of the common law, without the fear of electronic bugging. As Mr. Woolliams said, one had to consult with one's client in the middle of a field in order to be sure that your conversation was not being electronically bugged.

This bill would also protect the right of privacy of candidates for political office, enabling them to freely discuss matters with their supporters, friends or with others who were involved after the writ was issued. This bill would guard against the admissibility in a court of law of evidence gained through electronic bugging. This bill which I have proposed today, which is really Mr. Woolliams' bill, would limit the use of evidence in a court of law which had been taken illegally. As hon. members in the House know, the Supreme Court of Canada has gone far beyond this basic principle.

The bill would also provide for the ultimate destruction of evidence obtained through the use of electronic devices two years after the completion of the matter for which it was obtained, the trial or the appeal. In this way, the electronically-obtained evidence would not be left lying around to be dredged up and used inappropriately at some other time.

The most important, and perhaps the most controversial aspect of this bill, is that if enacted it would reinstate the 90-day notification clause to ensure that the person against whom the electronic surveillance was being used, if it was not intended to continue, would have the benefit of knowing that. Under the law he would be notified that it had occurred.

The purport of all these matters was to bring the law back a wee bit to ensure that the law would not be used against an individual in an improper way. I realize that is a very delicate balance; to balance the rights of society against the rights of the individual, but it is something which we must all guard against.

Those things which had occurred in the evolution of the law offended the finely-tuned sense of justice of the then member for Calgary North. But there is another reason why this bill is timely and why I want the government to consider either allowing this bill to go forward or, failing that, allowing it to go to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Privacy has become important in another way. All members of the House know that the government of which I was a member was working on privacy legislation which would have been introduced. They also know that the government in office has brought forward privacy legislation and coupled it with freedom of information legislation in Bill C-43. That bill is now before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. It was such an important piece of legislation that all of us agreed, notwithstanding the fact there were differences, the bill ought to go forward in one day, and in fact second reading debate on that bill took place in one day.

The whole issue of privacy from the point of view of the individual is there, and I think if we are to consider the question of privacy, then all matters of privacy, including the criminal law aspects, ought to be before that committee so we will know how they impact, criminal and civil one upon the other, and we can judge the evolution of the law in terms of the individual.

As I said earlier, we have become a society of groups. We have forgotten to a great degree the importance of individuals and that one of the most fundamentally important rights of a citizen in a free society is that of privacy. That is, privacy of his files, of personal information, privacy of his personal affairs and the important right of privacy from inappropriate snooping by police and authorities, however well intentioned. They are there to protect society but we must ensure that the zealousness of their pursuit does not override the rights of individuals to a free, unfettered and undisturbed life.

The electronic age is upon us and, as technology grows, the potential for that kind of interference grows as well. And I would ask the House, if it cannot see fit to approve the bill, to at least allow the committee now seized with the review of privacy legislation as part of Bill C-43, to also review it as it applies to criminal law. I daresay if the committee does this, they will find relationships and principles that apply in both fields and we will be doing justice to the subject of criminal law in great measure. But more than that, we will have an opportunity to review the operation of a very significant change in the criminal law of Canada, and in that sense this bill can provide the vehicle for that sort of review.

I do not intend to take up any more time of the House with respect to that. One could speak about how that electronic surveillance provision in the Criminal Code came about; Hansard is full of that. I think the duty of Parliament is to look at new departures in the law from time to time; not to close the book on what has gone before, but to always be vigilant in ensuring that criminal law is applied fairly, that it is not wanting in some way or that individual rights are not damaged. To the extent that individual rights are not promoted, society itself is damaged. That delicate balance is something we should have under constant review and this bill provides the opportunity to do so.

The parliamentary secretary is here and I ask him to consider that request at least with respect to sending the subject matter of this important legislation, relating as it does to privacy, to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs so we can consider the civil and criminal aspects in respect of the law of privacy.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Trade)): Mr. Speaker, I only want to say a few words. It is ironic to think that in this House we always learn at the last moment that the subjects which most interest us are going to be discussed. I had the opportunity to work with the member who originally moved this motion, Mr. Eldon Woolliams, with whom I also had the opportunity, in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, to discuss the admissibility in a court of law of evidence directly or indirectly obtained through illegal bugging.

Following this long debate in committee, we had introduced through the minister an amendment to Section 178.16 to make it again possible for the judge to refuse this evidence when it might tarnish the image of justice. I am, of course, aware of the debate to which the hon. member referred and which is now going on, especially in the United States, concerning the merit of the American rule of total exclusion. I do not want to give my own opinion on this issue at the present time as I know that other members want to take part in this debate, but even in the United States there is no unanimity among the judges or the members of the legal profession, who opt for one side of the argument or the other according to their approach to all the problems caused by the total exclusion rule, since there is no irrefutable evidence in the United States that this rule has prevented the police from acting within the limits normally allowed by law, as the sponsor emphasized earlier. The data on this issue is still very incomplete and it still remains to be shown that the exemplary nature of the total exclusion rule has had the expected results and that the law enforcement bodies have reacted in the way that the hon. member hopes that our own police forces would react to total exclusion.

On the other hand, the virtually total admissibility rule of English common law has caused other types of problems, since it encourages in fact certain action on the part of those who present this evidence without giving to the judge the possibility of maintaining the normal dignity of our courts. Such a provision as Section 178.16(2), which has not yet been seriously tested by the courts, would tarnish the image of justice. I hope that it will be tested eventually and that, for once, our courts will show some legal initiative in this regard, and what I anticipate and wish is that this issue will finally be tested against Scottish common law, which does not follow the rule of total exclusion, but still stands out against the virtually total admissibility rule of English common law, by providing a series of criteria which the judge presiding at the hearing can use to exclude evidence according to the seriousness of the offence and the seriousness of the penalty which could be imposed on the accused if found guilty. So, Mr. Speaker, I was hoping that at last this provision would be applied, that at last it would be tested before Canadian courts, and as a result of the discussions we had in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs I was hoping that Canadian courts would imitate or try to imitate the jurisprudential trend which prevails in Scottish common law.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, I took the floor unprepared. I have a lot of documentation on this subject which fascinates me. I would have liked to be able to speak longer in the House but I am only trying to clarify a few points and to explain my own position on the subject. In this respect I would urge our Canadian courts to be more active and I also hope that lawyers and attorneys general will take the issue of Subsection 178.16(2) before the courts so they will be able to rule on it.

[English]

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): I listened very carefully to the remarks of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). In most cases I find myself either agreeing or partially agreeing with what he says on various subjects from day to day as we seem to be on the same wave length. Today I can say that I do not agree with anything he has said on this particular bill. It does not seem that we are talking about the same thing.

This bill does not really talk about the rights of individuals; it gives lawyers and candidates for federal office more rights than the average individual and more rights when they are actually breaking the law. We are not talking about solicitor-client relationships but about lawyers using the telephones, or lawyers' partners or members of their households using telephones in order to break the law.

Talk about the right of the individual sounds very well in this House of Commons. I do not think the right of the lawyer was mentioned once by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. In Sault Ste. Marie several years ago a lawyer was actively engaged in a conspiracy to traffic in narcotics and the police were having difficulty finding the telephone he used. It turned out to be the barrister's telephone in the courthouse. That makes sense; if you are going to do something illegal, then use the telephone the police are least likely to tap. The police finally got an order to wiretap the barrister's telephone in the courthouse and the evidence was used in a public trial to convict him.

There was a great deal of discussion amongst members of the bar in Sault Ste. Marie at that time about whether this was done in the spirit of the law. I think we came to the conclusion that as lawyers we were officers of the courts and should not be above the law; that at the very least we should be furthering the law and that to have more rights when breaking the law would be unacceptable. But that is exactly what would be proposed by the hon. member opposite, and it surprises me, Mr. Speaker.

We are looking for a delicate balance between the right of the individual and the right of the community as a whole to be protected. In this search for balance, which has been debated many times in this House of Commons, I do not think lawyers and Members of Parliament should have any more rights than the man in the street they are either protecting or representing. In effect, the bill would prohibit the wiretapping of any phone commonly used by a lawyer, and any communication of a candidate seeking election to the House of Commons during the currency of an election campaign. Why stop there? Why not extend this to municipal politicians or provincial politicians who break the law? After we have protected all these people while they break the law using the telephone by assuring that they cannot be wiretapped, then let us extend this to priests, ministers, psychiatrists and anyone who has a confidential relationship with another. While they are breaking the law, let us give them that protection.

It must be kept in mind that a wiretap authorization may be granted only if a judge—it has to be a judge to whom the application is made—is satisfied that it would be in the best interests of the administration of justice to grant the authorization, that other investigative procedures have been tried and have failed—these are all criteria—that other investigation procedures are unlikely to succeed or that the urgency of the matter is such it would be impractical to carry out the investigation of the offence using other investigative procedures only. These are all criteria the judge to whom the application is made can apply. The application is not made to a policeman or a desk sergeant or a duty officer, but to a judge, and it is he who must be satisfied that the criteria are met.

I suggest to the hon. member opposite that the principle that no person is above the law is firmly entrenched in the concept of the rule of law and not men.

There is a very serious case to which I should like to refer, Mr. Speaker, and probably most hon. members who have been round the House or involved with Quebec are familiar with it. The case was Roncarelli v. Duplessis. Mr. Duplessis was the premier and attorney general of the province of Quebec. Mr. Roncarelli sued Premier Duplessis, the right honourable, personally for damages arising out of the cancellation of his licence issued by the Quebec Liquor Commission. Mr. Roncarelli was not a professional bailsman—he owned a restaurant—but he provided bail for Jehovah Witnesses who were distributing pamplets in contravention of a Montreal bylaw of the day. This bylaw was ultimately struck off the books. At the trial Mr. Roncarelli won his case. He lost at the court of appeal. Finally, at the Supreme Court of Canada, he was successful.

Mr. Knowles: Who was his counsel?

Mr. Irwin: I don't know.

Mr. Knowles: It was Frank Scott.

Mr. Irwin: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has alluded to a very well-known and famous civil libertarian who acted as counsel for Mr. Roncarelli. I think that only adds to the importance of the case because Mr. Scott's ventures into the courts were few and far between, and they were always on very important issues.

This was a landmark decision because it held, in effect, that no man, not even the premier of a province and an attorney general at that, is above the law or can act arbitrarily in disregard of the law.

The hon. member opposite is dealing with lawyers and then political candidates. In the Roncarelli v. Duplessis case the decision of the Supreme Court would suggest that this should not be so but that such persons should be subject to just as much scrutiny, be they the attorney general, a lawyer or a political candidate, if involved in criminal activity, as any ordinary citizen. That is the whole point, Mr. Speaker.

We go further than this, however. In 1977 this Parliament passed the Criminal Law Amendment Act which amended section 178.13(1.1) of the Criminal Code to read:

> No authorization may be given to intercept a private communication at the office or residence of a solicitor, or at any other place ordinarily used by a solicitor and by other solicitors for the purpose of consultation with clients, unless the judge to whom the application is made is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the solicitor, any other solicitor practising with him, any person employed by him or any other such solicitor or a member of the solicitor's household has been or is about to become a party to an offence.

It is not a case of the client having committed a crime but of the persons indicated above being or about to become, a party to an offence. Parliament thereby recognized that the communications of a solicitor or, more properly stated, a client seeking legal advice from a solicitor, has a unique status in common law jurisdictions.

There is protection in the Criminal Code and there is protection—and I will get to this—given to clients but not to their solicitors who are committing crimes.

● (1630)

However, Parliament also decided that this privilege was not absolute and that where the solicitor or another solicitor practising with him or one of their employees or members of their households has been or is about to become a party to an offence as defined by Section 178.1, of the Criminal Code—they are not simple offences, in fact, they are very serious, including murder, treason, robbery, kidnapping, importing or exporting narcotics, etc.—a judge could authorize the interception of a private communication by electronic surveillance.

As a safeguard, Section 178.13 (1.2) was enacted which reads:

Where an authorization is given in relation to the interception of private communications at a place described in Subsection (1.1), the judge by whom the authorization is given shall include therein such terms and conditions as he considers advisable to protect privileged communications between solicitors and clients.

In other words, it is not a holus-bolus right to wiretap. The judge can make it mandatory and set out specific terms and conditions which must be adhered to by the police. For instance, monitoring might not be automatic, which is often the case. The tap is put on and the tape is let go for 24 hours before being checked. It could be directed to specific targets. It could be directed to specific individuals with whom the solicitor is dealing, and so on. There is no definitive description given in the section. It is a right, it is a mandatory obligation, and the judge must adhere to it in his examination of the request. The scope is minimized. Further, it is not the normal run-of-the-mill holus-bolus affidavit which usually emanates from the police in situations like this. The affidavit required in these specific circumstances must be quite clear, much more definitive and much more directed to the specific individual and the specific circumstances.

Section 178.12 formerly required that an affidavit filed in support of the authorization set out the names and addresses, if known, of all persons, the interception of whose private communications there are reasonable grounds to believe may assist the investigation of the offence and, if not known, a general description of the place at which the communications are proposed to be intercepted or, if a general description of that place cannot be given, a general description of the manner of interception proposed to be used.

The difficulty with that former provision was that the information required was disjunctive, not cumulative and did not give the judge enough background information.

Recognizing that more information was required for the judge before he could be satisfied that what he was doing was proper and just in the circumstances, Section 178.12 was amended to acquire further information.

I see the logic of my argument is driving the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton out of the House.

Section 178.12 is further amended to require that the names, addresses and occupations, if known, of all persons, the interceptions of whose private communications there are reasonable and probable grounds to believe may assist in the investigation of the offence, a general description of the nature and location of the place, if known, at which the private communications are proposed to be intercepted and a general description of the manner of interception proposed to be used. As well, the affidavit requires the number of instances, if any, on which an application has been previously made in relation to an offence of a person named in the affidavit and on which the application was drawn or no authorization was given, and so forth.

It is a very broad requirement. It is not like walking into your friendly candy store and obtaining permission to wiretap. It is carefully gone over. Affidavits are required and there are safeguards. Once these safeguards are adhered to and a decision is made by a judge, the lawyer who is engaging in criminal activity, the MP or intended MP who is engaged in criminal activity has no further right than any other individual has in Canada.

If you are talking about confidentiality of clients, these safeguards are in the Criminal Code already. The solicitor-client relationship and solicitor-client conversations are protected under the Criminal Code, and rightly so. We are not talking about clients who may be charged with a crime, we are talking about the lawyer who is engaged in a crime. There should be that freedom between clients and their lawyers.

As my allotted time is drawing to a close, I would say that in my opinion the private members' bill, and I say this respectfully, has absolutely no merit and should not be supported. Its dangerous consequences would be to put lawyers and their close associates above the law. If anything, lawyers should be in the vanguard promoting respect for and compliance with law. The hon. member opposite referred to his background. I am a lawyer. I have been a defence counsel, president of a law association and I have been a commissioner of police for a short time. I think I am looking at this problem with some sort of balance.

Mr. Knowles: Have you ever had to go to a lawyer?

Mr. Irwin: I could never afford a lawyer, that is why I had to become one.

As well as this extra right given to lawyers, the hon. member is saying it should also go to Members of Parliament. I think this is wrong. Necessary safeguards are in the Criminal Code. The wiretap is the last resort. It requires the authorization of a judge who must be satisfied that the wiretap is necessary and the conditions for it are met. Surely lawyers and potential parliamentarians should be subject to criminal investigation by wiretapping if they are involved in serious crimes. Surely they should have no more rights than the average individual on the street.

I would implore hon. members not to support this bill. If hon. members want to look at wiretapping in general, and if there is a desire for more protection and more safeguards, that is one thing, but if hon. members say the safeguards are sufficient but, let us just give lawyers more, I say that is wrong.

Mr. Al MacBain (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, my intervention this afternoon concerns Bill C-238 introduced by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), for whom I have the utmost respect. It was typical of the hon. member to mention that the bill was formed and prepared under the direction of a previous member of this House. Before coming to this House I knew about the professional reputation of the hon. gentleman. I am well aware of the standards he upholds in this House and before the Bar of Ontario. I, for one, as a member of the other side of the House have always appreciated his quiet effective manner. He is always a gentleman and he always presents his arguments to this House in a like manner. It is therefore with some regret that I find I cannot support this Bill C-238.

Bill C-238 is an act to amend the Criminal Code, the invasion of privacy provisions, to safeguard lawyers and candidates of this House previous to an election. The bill upsets what the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton said. It upsets the delicate balance between the invasion of privacy of the individual and the protection of society against crime. It upsets the right of individuals and the responsibilities of our society to protect its members and citizens.

Bill C-238 would prohibit wiretapping of a telephone, commonly used by a lawyer or a candidate seeking election to the House of Commons during the campaign period. This bill would make lawyers and members of the House of Commons a special class of citizens. I spent 30 years in the practice of law and have just completed one year as the Member of Parliament for Niagara Falls. For neither of those designations would I claim a special privilege not granted to ministers, priests or any other member of society who deals with individuals in a very special way, including those concerned with crime.

I appreciate the underlying consideration, that this bill gives protection to the clients of lawyers and constituents of Members of Parliament. I suggest this special status is not required by lawyers or for those they represent. Wiretap orders are not given out lightly by our judiciary. In each and every case the judge balances the rights of the individual against the rights of society, to which I referred a moment ago.

Will we put certain people in our society above the law? We believe in the principle that no person is above the law. That principle ought not to be lightly turned aside. That point was made by the previous speaker, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Irwin). To suggest that a political candidate for this House, even if he may be involved in a crime, should have a special privilege denied to others, I cannot accept.

Before a wiretap order is given for a lawyer's telephone, the judge must be persuaded by affidavit evidence that the lawyer is or is about to become a party to an offence. That is a very special and significant provision. The order is not otherwise available to the police.

Except for special cases, a lawyer's telephone cannot be tapped. There is a built-in protection which, in my opinion, is sufficient for the lawyer and client relationship and to protect that principle which we all accept. In my opinion, the same necessity does not arise for a member of this House.

Should the principle in Bill C-238 be extended to make crime a safer business for anyone, even for lawyers? That should not be the case. When a judge grants a wiretap order where a lawyer is involved, the Criminal Code requires that in order to safeguard privileged communications between a lawyer and a client, in accordance with the normal relationship of solicitor and client, other conditions can be inserted by the judge if he deems them advisable. In most cases there would be special provisions.

If the premises of this bill are sound, why are MLAs and members of municipal councils not given the same protection? I have been unable to make a distinction. I accept that the bill was introduced by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton in good faith and with great sincerity. I regret, as I said before, that I cannot accept the bill as having any merit. I do so with great respect for the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, of whom I spoke very highly only a few moments ago.

The bill would be totally unacceptable in the constituency of Niagara Falls. There is no way I can go home tonight, and I hope to be able to after spending two weeks in this wonderful city, the home of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, and have this bill accepted by the residents of Niagara Falls. It just would not be accepted. The people I represent do not wish to put lawyers or candidates for the House of Commons in a special class. We do not want, need or ask for this special privilege and this House ought not to grant it.

Lawyers have a special responsibility to society. I firmly believe that. In my early youth at Dalhousie law school in Halifax, Nova Scotia, which I had the honour to attend, we spent a lot of time discussing this fact. Lawyers, not just in Canada but all over the world, have a special responsibility and special duty to society. As the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie said, we are officials of the court. We have special responsibilities. I suggest we need no special privileges.

As lawyers we know that society is a thin veneer. We know that society is a delicate fabric. We know this from our study of the law and of what has happened to societies when the law has not been given the care and attention it has deserved. The place of law in modern society is well known to lawyers. We have a duty to uphold it. Every citizen has a duty to uphold the law, but I think most lawyers throughout the world would accept the principle that lawyers have a special duty to uphold the law. They ought not to seek any exemption from it.

If lawyers or candidates for election to this honourable House are involved in crimes and they fall into the net of the wiretap, I say, so be it. It will happen obviously, from time to time; no profession is completely free from the criminal element. I would be wrong to suggest that the profession of law, of which I, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton and the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie are members, is free from the criminal element, but we strive for that freedom. From the very day we enter law school that is drummed into us. It is drummed into us long before we learn about the rule of Rylands and Fletcher that lawyers have a special duty. Never in my years in law at Dalhousie—and I am sure this is true of the honourable institution attended by the two previous speakers—was there any suggestion that as lawyers we should be given any special privileges or any special exemptions from the law of the land or from the rule of law. I think we ought not to ask for that.

As lawyers, like many others in our society today, we are concerned about organized crime in this country. It is a genuine concern. We are concerned that genuine police work is being hampered. I say genuine because lawyers also have a duty to ensure that the police do their duty within the law. When they do not do so, they must answer to the law.

We are concerned that organized crime is finding ways to get around the good laws of this country which are laid down to protect our society. Organized crime is finding ways to enter legitimate business and legitimate industry. This is of grave concern to lawyers, to politicians and to businessmen. There are many in our society who are concerned about this trend in our country and concerned that our neighbour to the south is experiencing a difficulty at this time. If history goes on the way it usually does, when there is a problem in our great neighbour to the south, that problem at a later time is usually found in Canada. This is a great concern to us.

I ask this honourable House not to support Bill C-238.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, since four o'clock we have been listening to lawyers stating both sides of the case. Perhaps a non-lawyer might try to give the verdict.

I may say that whenever any measure having to do with wiretapping comes into this House, we are interested because our basic disposition is to be against it. However, since the time is limited, I had better get to what I have to say.

I say quite frankly to my friend, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), that I think those on the other side have made a pretty good case against the proposition in this bill that special consideration should be given to lawyers and candidates in a federal election, but I point out to those on the opposite side that there are five clauses in the bill. They have spent all their time on the one they could easily knock down. I wish they had given some time to clause 1, which has something to do with making it impossible to get an order for continuing authorization at the same time as one gets the original authorization.

I wish they had had something to say about Clause 2, which tries to strengthen the law so that wiretap evidence can be introduced in court only if it has been obtained legally. I think that is a pretty important matter to consider.

Then there is another clause which would reinstate the application of that part of the law, that used to be there, which makes it necessary for persons who have been subject to wiretapping to be notified within 90 days thereafter. Then there is an interesting clause which suggests that certain materials which have been obtained by a wiretapping should be destroyed after a certain length of time. I am not surprised that my friends opposite did not attack these other points because they seem to have some merit.

One thing the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Irwin) said was well put. He said, "If you want to have a look at the whole question of wiretapping, fine; just don't concentrate on the business of a special privilege for lawyers and candidates." I agree with him with respect to the latter, but I think the other matters having to do with wiretapping are such that it would not hurt to have the whole question reviewed by the appropriate committee.

There is still time if hon. members opposite would like to bring forward a motion that the bill not be read a second time but that the subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for study.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the last participant in this debate, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), has brought his usual wisdom to the subject, for which we thank him. He gave us a number of insights which I believe should be pursued. He did the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and all of us a favour by pointing out what is the main weakness in this particular bill.

I believe there is nobody in this House who feels very happy about the subject of wiretapping. It is an unpalatable subject in some respects or, to put it more correctly, it has some unpalatable connotations. Anything that can be done to make conditions for permission for wiretapping more stringent is a step in the right direction. The people on this side who have spoken before me have very rightly devoted their time to what would be, if this bill were accepted by this House, a monumental error on our part.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Knowles: What about the other four clauses?

Mr. Simmons: I was coming to that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS ACT

SUGGESTED RETITLING OF LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the Hazardous Products Act, the title itself, is used to prejudice potential customers against the use of cellulose fibre insulation, even though the product itself is safe, and that the act does not distinguish clearly between the danger of installation and the danger of the product itself, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, in the interests of preserving fair competition in the marketplace, rename the act with a title such as the Products Safety Act, or any other title which will preserve fair competition.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SIMON FRASER UNIVERSITY FUNCTION

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Last weekend ceremonies were held at Simon Fraser University to honour F. R. Scott, including a skit in which Michael Pitfield, Clerk of the Privy Council, was to portray the Clerk of the Celestial Council; the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was to portray the Holy Ghost; and the Chief Justice of Canada, the Right Hon. Bora Laskin, would portray the voice of God. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House request the Prime Minister to make a statement on motions as to whether the skit at the Scott ceremony at Simon Fraser University did in fact take place and represented a rehearsal for the real thing, in the unilateral attempt by the Prime Minister to have the Parliament of the United Kingdom pass a charter of rights for Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

AGREEMENT MADE WITH DENE THA TRIBAL COUNCIL, ALTA.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Last year the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) made an agreement with the Dene Tha Tribal Council in Alberta to provide some $5 million. Now he has apparently reneged on this agreement, with the result that the council is unable to pay its bills and contractors who worked on water and sewerage projects remain unpaid. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That a caveat be issued to all persons entering into contracts or agreements with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, warning them of the minister's demonstrated bad faith and the fact that he does not check with his officials as to the existence of funds before he makes all kinds of wild commitments and promises which he then does not keep.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

CANADIAN AMATEUR HOCKEY ASSOCIATION—PARTICIPATION OF FEMALE PLAYERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, in view of the continuing controversy occurring in Winnipeg over the recent suspension of three girls from their respective hockey teams and subsequent threats of suspension toward their coaches for playing them anyway—and now the community clubs themselves have been so threatened—I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, to move a motion which almost had the unanimous consent of the House on last Thursday and which I hope will have unanimous consent today. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

S.O. 43

That this House encourages the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association to be more flexible and, in all fairness, to allow girls like Heather Kramble from the Pirates Community Club in Transcona, to play out the season with a view to sorting out this problem between seasons and not now at the expense of the girls and their teams.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

MINISTER'S PRESS RELEASES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) recently announced a $1 million emergency fund to help native communities prepare themselves for energy developments near their reserves, and whereas the minister has since withdrawn his commitment because the fund has not received Treasury Board approval, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That this House demand that the minister display greater consideration for the magnitude of his ministerial responsibilities by verifying all his press releases and statements prior to release with the senior bureaucrats of his department who are obviously controlling and running his department, so that the native people of Canada will not have to suffer any more disappointments than they already have at the hands of this flip-flop government.

LABOUR RELATIONS

DISPUTE AT TEL AIR SYSTEMS, OSHAWA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the employees of Tel Air Systems of Oshawa, all of whom are women, have been on legal strike since November 24. Considering that the Canada Employment office in Oshawa is advertising for employees to break this strike, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker):

● (1410)

That this House instruct the minister responsible for employment and immigration to prohibit his offices in Oshawa from such advertising and thus stop this vendetta against working women on a legal strike.

PROPOSED MARKET ASSURANCE PLAN—SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Since the proposed Market Assurance Plan for grain, or MAP as it is commonly known, is being promoted at this time in western Canada by the Canadian Wheat Board and members of its farmer-elected advisory committee, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker):

That because the proposed Market Assurance Plan is new, and to adopt it without appropriate prior thought and attention could produce major changes in western agricultural policy and farming practices, a special committee be formed to investigate all aspects and implementation of the program. As a guideline, the committee could be made up of representatives of the three provincial prairie governments, western farm organizations, and members and support staff of the Canadian Wheat Board.

FORESTRY

FUNDING OF HYBRID POPLAR PROJECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I am confident that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) would agree that the hybrid poplar project which is currently under way in southern Ontario is deserving of government support. In light of this fact, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin):

That the government continue to fund the hybrid poplar project for an extended period of time, once the initial five-year period is up.

I believe the five-year period ends next year, and I understand that DREE is responsible for funding the project in the amount of $2.5 million, with a similar amount to be funded by the Ontario provincial government.

METRIC CONVERSION

ALLEGED FUTURE FINES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, today I received in a plain brown envelope—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Domm: —a notice that the Liberal government intends to prosecute, without conviction, by imposing a $1,000 fine on anyone in the 33 metric test centres who refuses to use metric weigh scales on January 1, 1982.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Domm: Therefore, I move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie):

That this Stalinist approach to metric conversion against the will of the people of Canada be withdrawn by the government and that we follow the lead of the United States and proceed on a voluntary basis into metric conversion in the retail food sector.

It is high time the government listened to the consumers and businessmen, and not to the dictatorial regulations of the Metric Commission.

SUPPORT FOR CHARTER OF RIGHTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Al MacBain (Niagara Falls): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of statements made this past weekend in Saskatchewan by Canada's Human Rights Commissioner, Gordon Fairweather, strongly endorsing the proposed charter of rights, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton-Middlesex (Mr. Ferguson):

That this House urge the official opposition to end its attempt to deny Canadians their basic liberties by voting to support the charter of rights in the current constitutional resolution now before this Parliament.

RADAR INSTALLATION FOR VICTORIA INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. With the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) paired, or twinned, under the Liberal buddy system with the member for Esquimalt-Saanich, and being a minister of the Crown, presumably claiming to be like his colleague, the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) in relation to Broadview-Greenwood, responsible for Esquimalt-Saanich, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen):

That the minister acquit his alleged responsibility to that constituency by ensuring that funds earmarked for the Trident Aircraft Company by redirected toward the installation of radar at Victoria International Airport, giving him thereby greater peace of mind whenever he has cause to land there.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PETRO-CANADA

ACQUISITION OF PETROFINA—DATE AND TERMS OF INITIAL OFFER

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have some questions regarding the Petrofina acquisition, for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister will know that on September 3 to 10, the price of Petrofina shares increased by $16, and from September 29 to October 2 the price of Petrofina shares increased again by $11½, in both instances as a result of takeover rumours. I wonder if the minister—and this is a very straightforward question—I wonder if the minister would state precisely when Petro-Canada made the first offer to Petrofina. What was the price of that offer, and were there any other significant terms or conditions?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I do not have the date of the first offer. It was some time last fall. There were discussions. I do not think there was ever a formal offer made by Petro-Canada, as a matter of fact. There were discussions, but the spread between what Petrofina was asking and what Petro-Canada considered was an appropriate price at the time was so big that nothing came out of these discussions. I do not remember exactly when—in the fall, or maybe mid-summer—but there were extensive discussions over a period of months.

DATE RESPECTING $120 PER SHARE OFFER

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I can understand that the minister might not have those details at hand, and he would understand that it would be of interest to the House to have those details specifically. The fall is a long time. I would like to have any specific dates and any specific terms or conditions that might be at issue here, that the minister could lay before the House now.

As a supplementary, let me remind the minister that at the end of September Petrofina shares were trading at about $62½ a share. On October 13, 1980, the Montreal weekly Finance mentioned the specific figure of $120 as the price which Petro-Canada would make as an offer to Petrofina. Since that, in fact, was the price when the deal was announced in early February, I wonder if the minister can tell the House when was the first time the price of $120 a share was used in the negotiations. When did that price first arise?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, while the Leader of the Opposition is quoting the Gazette, I might quote him The Globe and Mail of November 15, 1980, when that paper was quoting an oil analyst who said that $1.4 billion was a fair value for Petrofina, and that was last November.

An hon. Member: Now the question.

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the question raised by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is concerned, as far as I know, this offer would have been made only late in January; but again, I will inquire at Petro-Canada and ask exactly when this figure was mentioned for the first time. I believe it would have been only in the last period of discussion that took place during the month of January. I will inquire.

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL INVESTIGATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, just so that it is clear, I am interested in the last portion of the minister's answer. I am not necessarily interested in the offer. The kind of precise information we would like to have is when that price of $120 was first mentioned.

I have a supplementary question to the Prime Minister, who will know that there are inquiries being undertaken by exclusively provincial agencies into the Petrofina—Petro-Canada deal. The Prime Minister will know that there were at least three price jumps during the time of negotiations, some of which must have had to do with leaks. He would also know that there is a very significant federal involvement here. Not only are we dealing with a federal Crown corporation but significant amounts of taxpayers' money. I wonder if the Prime Minister would tell us whether this investigation is going to be left to the provinces or whether, in light of the unusual involvement of federal taxpayers' money, he will instruct the Solicitor General or some other appropriate federal minister to undertake a federal inquiry into this question?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the proper agencies to carry out this investigation are either the stock exchanges in their current operations, or the securities commissions of the provinces. These are the authorities, the agencies, that under our Constitution are provided with the responsibility for examining operations in the stock market. That is where those investigations should take place. I would argue with the right hon. member that, in addition, this ensures that there is complete independence, complete autonomy of those agencies in their investigation, and then the opposition will not be able to spread innuendos that the investigation is not going to be carried out in the proper way. It is going to be carried out by provincial agencies under their proper mandate, and we will wait for the report of those agencies.

ADVISERS INVOLVED IN NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The constitutional protection that the minister refers to has not stopped the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs from proposing the establishment of a federal securities commission so I do not see how he can justify hiding behind that, in light of the investigation which the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has been seeking. Both the minister and Mr. Hopper, chairman of Petro-Canada, have referred to the role of advisers who were involved in the Petrofina negotiations. Could the minister please advise the House of the names of these advisers, what their role in the transaction has been, and when they became involved in it?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, as far as the federal securities commission proposal is concerned, I am glad to know that we will have the support of the opposition if we ever come forward with such a legislative proposal. I would remind the hon. member, however, that unless and until such a body is instituted, the proper agencies to carry out those investigations are the provincial agencies that have been set up under the law to examine securities operations and securities regulations.

As far as the question raised by the hon. member is concerned, I will be very glad to inquire at Petro-Canada for that particular information but I suggest to him that this should be a question on the Order Paper rather than one put in the question period. I will be happy to ask for the information and provide it to him.

INSTRUCTIONS RESPECTING FUTURE ACQUISITIONS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, I am not sure that the government will still be in place by the time the proposal for a national securities commission comes around if it keeps going on the way it is going now. Surely the government must realize that in this transaction, with all the leaks that have taken place and all the money that has been made, ministers were taken for patsies by the people involved in the transaction. These sorts of leaks rarely occur in transactions which incur private sector participants only. If strict precautions are not taken in the future, the minister will be taken for a patsy again. Will he state clearly to the House what instructions he has given to Petro-Canada to avoid a recurrence of the leaks which have clearly taken place and which have proven to be so costly to Canadian consumers and taxpayers?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the instructions are standing operating instructions to all Crown corporations in such a situation, and to Petro-Canada in particular. Before the Petrofina takeover, Petro-Canada had already carried out two takeovers, one of Pacific Petroleum and the other of Atlantic Richfield, which proved exceptionally good bargains for Canadians. I submit that the Petrofina acquisition will prove to be the same.

As far as the alleged leaks that the hon. member refers to are concerned, I have indicated to him that if he has evidence of any leaks taking place he should refer it either to me or to the securities commissions. I will be happy to refer it to the securities commissions for investigation.

● (1425)

As far as leaks are concerned, I have checked this matter carefully myself, and I have no evidence at all that there could have been any leaks—

Mr. Nielsen: What about circumstantial?

Mr. Lalonde: —coming from officials of Petro-Canada. There is not a shred of evidence in that respect. As I said, I have examined that aspect. If there were any leaks from Petrofina officials, I am not in a position to assess them. The best way to assess this problem is to have the securities commissions carry out their normal investigations in this matter. That is the way it should be done, and that is the proper way of doing things in business. My hon. friend should know that.

COMBINES

PROJECTED TAKEOVER OF ABITIBI-PRICE BY THOMSON NEWSPAPERS LIMITED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It concerns Thomson Newspapers Limited. This is the same company whose questionable behaviour a year ago led to the government's establishment of the Kent commission on press ownership. My question pertains directly to Thomson's announced takeover bid for Abitibi-Price, the country's largest producer of newsprint. Since such a takeover would further concentrate Thomson's already vice-like grip on the industry and reduce competition in the industry throughout the country, would the Prime Minister take the opportunity to make it very clear that the Government of Canada opposes this takeover bid?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I cannot make that clear at this point because I am not informed of the details of the operation, or even of its more particular aspects. But willingly I will undertake to draw the matter to the attention of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the facts are clear, a takeover bid has been announced by Thomson—already one of the largest firms in the newspaper business in Canada—to take over the largest producer of paper. If the Prime Minister verifies these facts, which I am sure are the facts, would he at least guarantee to the House that he will take steps to stop this takeover bid, at least until the Kent commission itself looks into its implications and makes a recommendation on the subject matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for having guaranteed the veracity of the facts. But he, himself, has not expressed any opinion as to whether there exists any law which would permit us to prevent such a takeover, if that is indeed what is in the works. I would have to inform myself of that particular point.

There are many things which the government would like to see done or not done, but it does not always have the legal means to achieve that end—

An hon. Member: That never stops you.

Mr. Trudeau: —and that is what I would like to ascertain, Madam Speaker.

REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN TAX LAW

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, there are two points. Of course the government can express its opinion whether it thinks it is in the public interest or not, and that is clear. Second, it can find out whether there are certain laws, as the Prime Minister has suggested, by which it could act to stop such a takeover. However, there is one specific law in existence which I would like a commitment from the Prime Minister to change. Current tax policy permits firms, taking over other firms, to write off as a deductible expense the costs of such takeovers. Therefore, the people of Canada are financing the takeover of some firms by others, which adds nothing to the productive capacity of Canada. Since this law is regressive in its effects, will the Prime Minister take steps to get rid of that law?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the general subject of concentration, particularly in the newspaper industry, and one which the hon. member recognized, led us to set up the Kent commission. I presume that if it finds the laws or policies have to be changed in any particular area to ensure greater freedom of the press, it will make such recommendations to the government and the government, of course, will consider them very earnestly. That is why the Kent Commission was set up in the first place.

In so far as the particular tax law is concerned, to which the hon. member alludes, I would want to refer it to the Minister of Finance. It would seem to me, not being a tax expert as I believe the Leader of the New Democratic Party might be, that this law has its justifications in many areas since it has the effect of preventing some companies from going bankrupt, preventing workers from losing their jobs leading to an incentive to one company to help the survival of another company. There may be some exceptions, but it seems to me that the hon. member would be a bit imprudent to suggest that the law be changed, that the tax policy be changed completely if it is to lead to an increasing number of unemployed.

GRAIN

COMPENSATION PAYMENTS TO FARMERS FOR EMBARGO ON SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. A year ago the Prime Minister made a commitment to western grain farmers that they would be paid compensation because of the embargo on the sale of grain to the Soviet Union. When will that payment be made by the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I undertook then, as I believe the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition had, to the extent that damages could be ascertained and ascribed to the boycott, that damages would be paid. That is our commitment. I understand that officials of the various departments involved, in co-operation with the farm groups, are establishing those damages and will be finishing their work very soon. The matter is not one of paying compensation. That is agreed. The matter is one of determining how much compensation should be paid. That, of course, is related to the amount of damage suffered by the farmers as a direct result of the boycott policy of the previous government and of this government.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: On December 9, 1980, the Minister of Agriculture stated in this House as reported at page 5549 of Hansard:

> The final report has yet to be submitted, and I hope this will take place within a few days.

Will the Prime Minister direct the Minister of Agriculture to give this priority attention? Also, will he undertake to have the Minister of Agriculture either make a statement in the House giving the basis upon which this compensation is to be paid, or appear before the Standing Committee on Agriculture so that the computation can be examined by members of Parliament?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Madam Speaker. It would be important when compensation is paid to the farm community that indeed all members of this House be in a position to know on what basis the amount was established.

POSITION OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE RESPECTING DRAFT RESOLUTION

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. In the past, his government has always refused to submit its constitutional proposal to the courts, under the pretext that this was not a case to be decided by Canadian courts but rather by the British political authorities. Can the minister tell us if his position with regard to the courts remains unchanged? Can he also tell us why he greeted the Manitoba Court of Appeals judgment with such optimism? Finally, would he repeat in the House what he told the committee, and I quote:

The only obstacle in his way was a possible negative judgment by the court.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I have on several occasions answered such questions in committee, and since the matter is before the House I do not think it would be appropriate to go over the committee's work.

Mr. Kilgour: Madam Speaker, my supplementary concerns section 2 of his resolution which deals with freedom of conscience. Does the minister think that the courts could use this section to invalidate the laws which prohibit businesses from staying open Sundays and on Christmas Day? If not, could the minister provide us with a legal explanation?

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member had bothered to come to the committee hearings, he would have had an answer to this question. He can always read the minutes of the committee. I do not intend to use question period to go over the work done in committee.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PRIORITY ASSIGNED TO PROGRAMS

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In a recent interview in Halifax the minister said that the armed forces re-equipment program now has top priority within his department. His chief of defence staff indicated that personnel costs are being given a top priority. He said:

Instead of having the capital grow at 12 per cent real growth, we are now having it grow at 10 per cent real growth, because we know that in the personnel, operating and maintenance area there is a need for real growth.

Which of these conflicting programs has top priority?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, there is no conflicting statement. The National Defence re-equipment program has been going very well for the past two years. I mentioned previously that after the re-equipment program we will be giving top priority to the question of personnel. As far as the increase in capital expenditure or real growth is concerned, I believe the defence estimates will be tabled on Wednesday. The hon. member will then be able to see if we stand by our commitment that in the next few years the real growth of defence will be increased 3 per cent.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, according to the CBC the minister was also asked while in Halifax what he intends to do about Canada's noticeable lack of a minesweeping capability. The minister replied that he would discuss the problem at a NATO meeting. Would the minister tell the House what he intends to ask our NATO allies in this regard, and would he also tell the House what has happened to the follow-on ship study commissioned by the previous government which he has now had in his hands for eight months. Will he now table it?

Mr. Lamontagne: In reply to the hon. member's question, my answer with regard to minesweeping was very clear. I said at the time that our NATO allies, including the United States, were concerned about the question of minesweeping and that for Canada it was a question of priorities. As I just mentioned, re-equipment of our forces is a priority and personnel is a priority. We will see in the future if our financial resources are sufficient to get into something like minesweeping. However, at the moment there are other priorities.

LACK OF PROGRESS IN EMPLOYING NATIVE PEOPLE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. In light of recent reports that the office of native employment has reported failure to convince government departments to hire native people despite a Treasury Board directive to do so, what new initiatives is the minister going to announce to ensure that government departments comply with Treasury Board directives?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): I thank the hon. member for that question, Madam Speaker. The matter of native people's representation is of great concern to Treasury Board and to the government. As the hon. member knows, an affirmative action program was launched last summer to correct this problem, not only with respect to native people but also with respect to women and handicapped people. That project is proceeding on schedule with three departments, my own, the Department of Secretary of State, and Employment and Immigration. I am very disappointed with the results of the report of the joint council to which reference was made in this morning's Globe and Mail. I expect the report will be presented to Treasury Board ministers for review within the next few days.

I might add there are some good things happening, particularly in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which is one of the departments principally involved with this program. In that department there has been an increase in native representation from 24 per cent to 27 per cent. The hon. member might be interested in listening to this answer because I am sure he will be pleased to note that two thirds of this increase is in the officer category. I am by no means whitewashing the performance across government, because it has been poor, but I want to point out that we are working actively and we share the concerns expressed by the hon. member.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I expected the minister would be ready to answer the charges in this morning's Globe and Mail. I also expected he would say they have programs within three government departments. However, I checked with Treasury Board officials to see how many people are involved in the affirmative action program. I found out that in the Department of the Secretary of State, only six people have been hired to look at that. In Treasury Board there are only four, and in the Department of Employment and Immigration, the department of the minister responsible for the status of women, there are only four people to look after the affirmative action program within the public service. I ask the minister a straight question. Does he think that is good enough to provide equality for women, native people and the handicapped in this country?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, I would point out that we already have equal opportunity programs with respect to these three categories across government. The affirmative action program was designed as a pilot project to be applied to three departments in three phases. We will be nearing the completion of the first phase in the near future. It is to get at systematic discrimination against these groups in the public service. For that purpose we have launched pilot projects with competent personnel. We are on schedule, and when those results are known I hope we will then launch a government-wide effort. However, we are not about to bloat the person-years of the government on a program not yet properly defined and fine tuned.

INDUSTRY

CLOSURE OF MULTINATIONAL CORPORATIONS—SUGGESTED STUDY BY TASK FORCE

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

In recent years certain regions of Canada have experienced problems because large multinational companies have had to close down. This was the case on the North Shore at Sept-Îles, Port-Cartier and Schefferville, and ten years ago Gulf Pulp had shut down at Clarke City. I would like to know whether he intends to review the legislation concerning the closing of those multinationals and to see whether it might be advisable to tighten up the regulations governing plant shutdowns.

Madam Speaker, I would also like to know if he would agree to have the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Labour set up a study group which would report to the House on the possible closings of those multinationals so as to make sure that the workers and the regional economies are truly respected?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the House is aware that the Government of Canada has taken the lead when it comes to establishing behaviour guidelines for multinationals in the various countries where they operate, and Canadian expertise in that field is well known.

However, the hon. member is right when he points out that it is sometimes in the application of those guidelines that there is still progress to be made. In January three ministers of this government announced measures to be taken and funds to be spent to assist workers laid off as a result of such closings or such curtailed operations, and the hon. member will recall that the government is always prepared to protect workers against such operations. I am simply assuring the hon. member that the North Shore cases he has brought to my attention will be examined by the ministers and that we will do our utmost to make sure that the workers are fully respected.

STATEMENT ON NATIVE PEOPLES MADE BY CORRECTIONAL SERVICE SPOKESMAN

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. When asked how many natives worked for his service Mr. Paul Croft, spokesman for the correctional service, said giving out that information would violate human rights, but when asked how many people or natives were in prison, he said 841 inmates, or almost 9 per cent of the federal prison population, are natives. I ask the minister what will he do about this obvious and blatant hypocrisy on the part of this man under his charge?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I suggest that question should be properly put to the Solicitor General. I have not read the statement, but the Treasury Board is not responsible for all statements made by all public officials simply because they are in a particular employment group.

REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. I wonder if the Prime Minister sees the incongruence in those two statements made by a public official. Would he take this under advisement, look into it, and see what he can do about this obvious hypocritical statement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would be happy to ask for a report on the incongruity of those statements.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR EXAMINATION OF AIR QUALITY IN CHAMBER

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I had planned to put my question either to the Minister of Public Works or the Minister of the Environment, but in their absence I shall put it to the President of the Privy Council.

For a number of months I have been sitting here watching the Manitoba Tyndall stone up above the galleries opposite us getting blacker and blacker around each of the vents. I do not know whether they are heating vents or fresh air vents. I have checked, and some of this is taking place on this side of the chamber as well.

In view of concern about the environment, and in view of concern about some of the ideas which are expressed in this House, perhaps an examination of the air we are breathing should be made. If whatever is coming through those vents is blackening the Manitoba Tyndall stone, what is it doing to some of us?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles: I point out that the worst of it is on the government side. Will the government House leader have either the Minister of the Environment or the Minister of Public Works look into this matter? Perhaps he might do it himself, in view of his responsibility to the members of this House.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the President of the Privy Council for that favourable and positive answer. I should like to put a supplementary question to him.

Will he consult with the Chair as to the possibility of permitting the television cameras or the still photographers to take pictures of this blackness so that the public will know what it is we are concerned about?

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Madam Speaker.

TRADE

REGULATION CONCERNING IMPORTATION OF COFFEE

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, now that we have taken care of the important issues, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Just about a month ago Canada signed an agreement with the International Coffee Organization to monitor the import into and distribution of coffee within Canada. The minister's department notified customs brokers on January 29 that, effective February 1, a new form called a certificate of re-export issued by the United States government would be required for importation of coffee into Canada.

I would like to ask the minister how he can expect importers to comply with that regulation, which requires the U.S. government to supply the forms, when he notifies the brokers three days before those forms are required. Can he assure the House that members of his department are not stating government policy when they say that they will withhold imports into Canada until those forms have been used?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend has raised an interesting point. I will look into it and get back to him as soon as possible.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, it is bad enough that the brokers were notified only three days in advance that they had to comply on February 1, but members of the Department of National Revenue customs division were notified February 11 that those forms would be required. Can the minister get in touch with the Minister of National Revenue to get the government's house in order? In view of the fact that one of the American suppliers is threatening a boycott of imports into Canada if this mess is not cleaned up, will the minister make certain that the government departments are functioning as they ought to, so that the brokers and the importers do not suffer injury as a result of the bungling of the government?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, in looking into the matter I will take steps to see that there is proper co-ordination between the various departments and the importing community.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ACID RAIN—INQUIRY WHETHER SUBJECT WILL BE DISCUSSED DURING PRESIDENT REAGAN'S VISIT

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Canadians are becoming increasingly concerned about the damage caused to the environment by acid rain. They are therefore asking the federal and provincial governments to take action before the point of no return is reached. Since 50 per cent of the acid rain comes from the United States, will this question be one of the main issues to be discussed during the visit of President Reagan in Ottawa on March 10 and 11?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I must admit to the hon. member that the agenda has not yet been finalized, but I can assure him that I shall see to it that this subject is discussed. As the hon. member will know, at the Venice meeting held last June, Canada underlined its environmental concerns and insisted that protection against acid rain be considered in the preparation of the final communique, which referred to the increased use of coal. At that time, Canada stressed the care which must be taken in the area mentioned by the hon. member. I can assure him that I shall once again emphasize this concern of Canadians to President Reagan during his visit to Canada.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MEASURES TO STRENGTHEN CO-OPERATION BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, my question is somewhat supplementary. It is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The visit of President Reagan provides an important milestone in the history of Canada-U.S. relations and should be used not only to examine current bilateral problems such as acid rain, the fishing treaty and the Garrison dam, but also to look ahead to new ways of manifesting the joint interests of Canada and the United States. Is the minister's department proposing any new measures to deepen the co-operation between Canada and the United States? Will these new measures go into the fields of international development and space research?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, at this time I think we will not propose to the American administration any specific measures for the future, but indeed we will propose to them general co-operation on matters which will benefit both our countries and the world.

Mr. Roche: Madam Speaker, if we are not going into future expansion of our long history of co-operation, then I should like to ask the minister a very pressing question. Will the government impress upon President Reagan the importance of his agreeing to attend the North-South Summit in Mexico and of his lending the great weight of the American government in a positive way to help break the current North-South deadlock?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, certainly we feel very strongly that the United States should exercise leadership in the world by participating in this very important summit. I have already conveyed that message to Secretary Haig. I cannot speak directly for the Prime Minister—he can do that for himself—but I am sure this message will also be given to President Reagan during his visit.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED ADOPTION OF NEW INDEX AND PROVISION OF ENERGY SUPPLEMENT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. Due to double digit Grit inflation, has the minister given any consideration to preparing a new and specialized index on which pension increases would be based on an index more in line with actual expenditures made by veterans or widows, rather than the consumer price index currently being used?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, all the aspects of the program aimed at improving the lot of veterans are considered, especially as concerns inflation. As everyone is well aware, both for pensions and allowances, we ensure that benefits are indexed yearly in some cases and quarterly in others. We are always concerned about the income of our veterans and especially that of their widows being eroded by inflation, and we shall look into this matter as carefully as possible.

[English]

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Speaker, I have a brief supplementary question. The government energy pricing policy and the budget have hit particularly hard at recipients of veterans pensions. Would the minister consider an energy supplement to pension payments?

Mr. Lamontagne: This will be taken into consideration, Madam Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

QUERY WHETHER SKAGIT RIVER ISSUE WILL BE DISCUSSED WITH PRESIDENT REAGAN

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. It follows on the question asked earlier as to what the agenda will be with respect to the meeting between the Right Hon. Prime Minister and the President of the United States. Will the Skagit River issue also be placed on that agenda?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I cannot give the hon. member those assurances now for the same reason I gave the hon. member for Gaspé, that the agenda is presently being negotiated. In the case of the Skagit River, I can be less definite than I was in the case of other cross-border pollution problems because successive provincial governments of British Columbia have been deeply involved in this matter. As the hon. member knows, they signed a contract with the city of Seattle and took money from that city over a period of years, which makes the federal government position a little less easy to define.

Mr. Fraser: Madam Speaker, as the Right Hon. Prime Minister knows, through the Secretary of State for External Affairs the Government of Canada filed briefs with the International Joint Commission defending and taking a position in favour of the province and of those Canadians who do not want this Canadian valley flooded. In view of the fact the Government of Canada is taking this position at the International Joint Commission, would the right hon. gentleman please give this some consideration? It would be of very great help if the matter were raised in direct conversations with the President of the United States.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, certainly I can accept the hon. member's suggestion and give it very serious consideration. The Government of Canada, as the member says, supported the application or the appeal by British Columbia before the IJC. The IJC remains a quasi-judicial body unique in character, since it is composed equally of members from both countries. But I repeat that this case is different than, for instance, the Garrison project, where our representations have been clear, continued and, I would say, effective, at least during the period President Carter was in office. In the case of the Skagit, the position I have taken over many years with successive premiers of British Columbia is that they signed a contract with the city of Seattle, they received money from the city of Seattle to compensate them for flooding, and the best course would have been to negotiate out of that agreement by paying compensation to the city of Seattle. The governments of British Columbia have always refused to heed my advice in that regard, and I cannot say that they had no right to do so. I just say that now they have chosen the appeal route to the IJC, the best we can do is to support them.

LABOUR RELATIONS

B.C. TELEPHONE COMPANY DISPUTE—FURTHER ACTION NECESSARY TO ACHIEVE SETTLEMENT

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. Recognizing that the prolonged British Columbia Telephone strike is in fact not only of interest of British Columbia but also of national interest, in that a benchmark settlement may well be established, and in that the strike is now impeding the rapid real growth the province has been experiencing, and in that the disruption to business and to the service industry has reached a point that a settlement is now becoming highly essential, does the minister intend to take further action to bring the parties together in order to achieve a settlement?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the question of a settlement in the British Columbia Telephone dispute certainly is a very important one, particularly in the British Columbia area, but in general as well. It appears that the area of settlement would not establish a benchmark at all, in view of other settlements in other disputes in the British Columbia area at the present time and the quantum of the settlements involved.

We are in the very strange position that last week the parties agreed on all elements of settlement but, as the hon. member knows, the company put forward in a rather bizarre and unprecedented preamble that it would only be willing to put those settlement figures into effect at such a time as the CRTC approved a further increase in rates. In view of the editorials by at least two leading newspapers in the Vancouver area and the overwhelming attitude of the public, including the business public, I think that such a preamble or condition is totally unreasonable and that the appropriate way for the matter to be settled now is for B.C. Tel to forget the preamble and agree to the terms negotiated by my very able mediator, Mr. William Kelly.

Mr. Wenman: Madam Speaker, I think it is appropriate for the minister to make a strong statement against the actions of the telephone company, but in fact it threw it somewhat back into the ball court of the federal authority. I do not think it is good enough just to say that is it.

Is the minister saying that there is no potential for assistance from his department or no possibility of the minister assisting in pulling the parties together now that this action has been recognized as unsuitable? Is it not time, or does the minister not see a time in the very near future that he will have to step in and take some action in the public interest which is now being damaged severely in British Columbia?

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, certainly I appreciate the genuine concern of the hon. member for the problem, particularly for third parties who are having difficulty in achieving installations in order to take possession of new space, and for new buildings to open, and other problems. Now of course, with the general strike, a great inconvenience may develop for the public as a whole, but as the hon. member is fully aware, the powers of my department are those of persuasion and of mediation.

Having had our most able mediator involved, and having brought the parties together, I am not sure what more could be done at this time which would not interfere with the free collective bargaining system. I presume the hon. member is not suggesting that we force a settlement on the parties. In the absence of that measure, it seems to me that the best weapon for the moment is public pressure on the parties, and particularly on the company, to realize how unreasonable the condition is that they added to what would otherwise be a settlement.

SUBSIDY TO VIA RAIL CANADA

Question No. 1,535—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. What is the forecast level of subsidy which the government will have to pay VIA Rail Canada for (a) 1980-81 (b) 1981-82 (c) 1982-83 (d) 1983-84 (e) 1984-85?

2. What steps will be taken, if any, to improve VIA's financial viability and reduce its burden on the taxpayer?

3. For distances (a) of less than 200 miles (b) 200 to 500 miles (c) over 500 miles, what is the ranking of the various modes of passenger transportation in terms of fuel efficiency per passenger mile?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport):

1. (a) The forecast level of government subsidy payment for VIA Rail Canada Inc. for the fiscal year 1980/81 (in 1980 dollars) is approximately $324 million. See list below for a detailed explanation of this figure. In addition to operating subsidy payments, the government is providing funds in support of a major capital improvement program being undertaken by VIA. For the fiscal year 1980/81 (in 1980 dollars), capital payments are expected to equal $117.5 million.

(b), (c), (d), (e) The subsidy funding levels for the fiscal years 1981/82 to 1984/85 have not yet been approved and therefore are not available at this time.

2. The following action has or will be taken to improve VIA's financial viability and reduce its burden on the taxpayer. In accordance with the transportation policy statements made by the government in 1975 and 1976, periodic reviews of rail passenger services are conducted to determine or guide policy decisions on its future direction. Selective review and restructuring of the rail passenger system to best suit public need is being carried out through rationalization plans developed in the past by the Canadian Transport Commission and formulated now by VIA. The plans are implemented subject to the results of public hearings conducted by the CTC to ensure system changes are not contrary to the public interest. Transport Canada provides operating subsidies to VIA under a contractually based financial system which is designed to offer incentives to increase the efficiency and effectiveness of VIA's over-all operation. Capital is provided to VIA to improve the operating efficiency and marketing attractiveness of the fleet. In this respect, VIA has undertaken a program of capital investment in LRC (Light, Rapid, Comfortable) trains and in the improvement of existing equipment. Reservia, a computerized reservation and ticket printing system, was introduced in the spring of 1980 to provide more efficient service to the public. Linkage of the system with Air Canada's Reservac system is planned to further improve VIA's customer service. An aggressive marketing strategy has been adopted by VIA which has resulted in traffic gains at a current rate of about 10 per cent annually. VIA expects to buy or lease those passenger train stations currently owned by CN or CP which VIA requires to operate its services. Conversion of certain of these stations to multimodal (i.e. housing bus operations as well as rail) stations is being considered to allow more cost-effective use of the facilities and convenient modal transfer. Studies designed to test or assess technical and economical improvements in service are part of the government's and VIA's ongoing activities.

3. (a), (b), (c)

Based on current average modal load factors,—bus, rail, automobile, and air in this order—are increasingly less energy efficient at any distance above 100 miles, the minimum distance measured, taking into account only 'direct' energy expenditure. Direct energy being that which is used to propel a vehicle. If 'indirect' energy consumption (i.e. the energy used to produce the fuels used to manufacture and maintain vehicles and to construct, maintain and operate the associated infrastructure) is included as well, the auto is more efficient than rail at distances of less than approximately 150 miles. Otherwise the ranking is unchanged.

1980/81 Estimates
Payments to VIA Rail Canada Inc.

Original Operating Contract	$301.8 million
Minus x budget cut	3.5
	$298.3 million
* plus Supplementary Estimate (1980)	$ 20.6 million plus Labour Assistance	5.0
Approved Operating Subsidy	$323.9 million
Approved Capital	117.5
Total Payments	$441.4 million

* The $20.6 million is part of a supplementary estimate for $36.3 million for revised operating costs charged to VIA by CN. Of this total, $10 million was approved to cover charges for 1979 (calendar year), $20.6 million for 1980 (calendar year), and approval of the remainder was deferred pending the disposition of the cabinet document on the rail passenger program. The difference between the figures of $454.9 million appearing in the government Estimates Book and the figure of $441.4 million is the $10 million of the supplementary estimates applied to 1979 and the $3.5 million budget cut.

INSTITUTE OF APPLIED METAPHYSICS

Question No. 1,620—Mr. Cossitt:

Does an organization known as "I Am" or the Institute of Applied Metaphysics, or any subsidiary etc. connected therewith, have a Department of National Revenue number making donations deductible for income tax and, if so (a) on what date was this granted and for what reason (b) is or will an investigation be made as to whether it should be rescinded and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Claude Tessier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue):

(a) I Am—Institute of Applied Metaphysics was granted the status of a registered charity effective January 24, 1972, and is therefore enabled to issue official receipts for income tax purposes to its donors. Its registration was granted in accordance with the Income Tax Act because, on the basis of information available, it met the requirements of the Income Tax Act for registration as a charity.

(b) As is the case with any taxpayer, a registered charity may be audited at any time for taxation purposes and every year selected charities are included among taxpayers audited by the department. The confidentiality provisions of the act do not permit disclosure of whether an audit of this taxpayer has been, or will be, undertaken.

LANGUAGE TRAINING PROGRAM

Question No. 1,731—Mr. Stewart:

1. Since the inception of the Language Training Program, what was the total cost of administration for (a) the Public Service (b) Crown corporations (c) RCMP (d) the Canadian Armed Forces?

2. How many (a) public servants (b) employees of Crown corporations (c) RCMP personnel (d) CAF personnel have had instruction in (i) French (ii) English?

3. What percentage of candidates on completion of training were then deemed to be functionally bilingual having as a mother tongue (a) French (b) English?

4. Since the inception of the bilingual bonus, what was the total amount paid to public servants and others who qualified for the incentive?

5. How many (a) public servants (b) employees of Crown corporations (c) RCMP personnel (d) CAF personnel received language instruction in (i) Ottawa (ii) other areas of Canada (iii) outside Canada?

6. How many (a) public servants (b) Crown corporation employees (c) RCMP personnel (d) CAF personnel were brought to Ottawa from other points in Canada to undergo language training?

7. What is the average (a) length of a language training course (b) cost per pupil?

8. How many (a) public servants (b) Crown corporation employeees (c) RCMP personnel (d) CAF personnel were required to repeat language training because of an unsuccessful first course?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): 1. Data is available centrally from two sources only: The Public Service Commission with respect to employees trained at PSC's centres (this includes some of the personnel of the RCMP, Crown Corporations and National Defence) and departments and agencies (Schedules A, B and C of the Financial Administration Act—including the National Defence) that, since 1976, have been providing Treasury Board with information on their own internal training program. The above-mentioned expenses include language training activities, testing, orientation, research, specialized assistance and also the 1980-81 main estimates.

Responsible for Language Training	Fiscal Years	Administrative Costs
a) Public Service Commission (PSC)	1964-1980	$292 million
b) Armed Forces	1968-1980	$178 million
c) Departments/Agencies	1975-1980	$ 23 million

2. French and English language training is mostly administered by the PSC and the Armed Forces personnel. As far as in-house training administered by departments and agencies is concerned, there are no centralized records available.

Responsible for Language Training	Fiscal Years	Clientele	No. of Employees French Course	No. of Employees English Course
a) PSC	1966 to 1980	Public Servants	38,286	10,511
		Crown Corporations	6,386	1,325
		RCMP	1,303	325
b) Armed Forces	1966 to 1980	Members	31,016	25,992

3. The Public Service Commission has at its disposal since 1973 only standardized methods for testing the language proficiency of an employee in terms of the level of the language requirement of the occupied position. The PSC indicates in its 1977 and 1978 annual reports the number of students on continuous language training and having passed the Language Knowledge Examinations (LKE). When converted into percentages, these numbers read as follows:

a) from 1973 to 1977, 75.4 per cent succeeded in the French language course and 76.1 per cent in the English language course;

b) from 1974 to 1978, 80.4 per cent succeeded in the French language course and 80.6 per cent in the English language course.

Those who did not take or succeed the LKE represent:

a) employees who withdrew from training for pedagogical reasons;

b) students who withdrew voluntarily;

c) those who were recalled by their departments;

d) students who failed.

In other respects, the PSC 1979 Annual Report indicates the rate of success in the LKE for the same year:

a) 96.2 per cent for the French language course;

b) 99.8 per cent for the English language course.

As for the Armed Forces, it is estimated that most of the students on training were capable of working in the second language at the level of proficiency required by their profession or classification at the end of the course.

4. Since the inception of the bilingualism bonus plan, we have established that close to $164 million will have been paid by March 31, 1981.

5. There are no centralized records available for in-house training administered by departments and agencies. The number of employees having received training is broken down as follows:

Responsible for Language Training	Number of Employees on Language Training 1966-1980
	Ottawa	Regions	Outside Canada
a) PSC
Public Servants	24,631	24,166	—
Crown Corporations	2,839	4,872	—
RCMP	530	1,098	—
Armed Forces	677	822	—
b) Armed Forces	6,712	48,548	1,748

6. Subject to the same limitations as specified in question 5, data is as follows:

	Number of Regional Employees on Language Training in Ottawa 1966-1980
Public Servants	5,416
Crown Corporations	341
Armed Forces	562

7. Data shows actual and historical information, as provided by the PSC and the Armed Forces. Because of the evolution and diversity of programs since 1966, the average lengths and the unit costs were derived from a simple mathematical calculation and should be interpreted carefully.

Responsible for Training	Period	Average Duration of course	Cost per Student Actual
Public Service Commission	1979-80	*849 hours	$5,390
		487 hours	$3,092
	Cumulative
Armed Forces	1966-80	379 hours	$3,128

*Average duration required in 1979-80 for a graduate.
Average duration required in 1979-80 for a non-graduate.
Derived from all courses and total training hours, total number of students and total costs since 1966.

8. As indicated in question No. 3, from 1973 to 1978, less than a quarter of students enrolled in the PSC's continuous language training, did not succeed the LKE or withdrew. In 1979, we observed a moderate failure rate of 2.9 per cent in the LKE. Among those who failed the LKE, very few were able to retake the exam given the time-frame to satisfy the language requirements of bilingual positions and also clauses protecting entitlements. In addition, the official languages policies revised in 1977, state that an employee cannot undergo language training at government expense to attain the same or a lower level. Furthermore, the official languages policies do not oblige an employee to repeat language training. The few employees who might have repeated a course did so on their own initiative.

ADVERTISING EXPENDITURES

Question No. 1,786—Mr. Stevens:

For the current fiscal year, what are the estimated expenditures of Telesat Canada for (a) advertising (b) free or subsidized publications (c) other information conveyed to the public?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Telesat Canada is neither a Crown corporation nor an agent of Her Majesty. It is an independent, shareholder-owned company in which the federal government is a substantial, but not a majority, shareholder. Telesat reports to government on a number of areas which are clearly identified in the Telesat Canada Act. While the information requested in this instance does not fall within this area of government responsibility, I am informed that the president of Telesat Canada has written to the hon. member and has offered to respond to any inquiries he may have regarding the normal commercial operations of the company.

CEIC LABOUR MARKET DEVELOPMENT TASK FORCE

Question No. 1,819—Mr. Orlikow:

1. What was the total budget allocated to the CEIC Labour Market Development Task Force?

2. What is the anticipated cost for professional advice, assistance and special studies commissioned by the task force?

3. Have contracts been awarded for professional advice, assistance and special studies commissioned by the task force and, if so (a) to whom (b) what remuneration is anticipated for each contract?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. $825,750.

INTEREST ON AN UNPAID TAX BALANCE

Question No. 1,892—Mr. Herbert:

Can an individual, who is assessed interest on an unpaid tax balance, deduct the amount of the interest from interest earned in the same year when compiling a tax return and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Claude Tessier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Interest payable in respect of three different types of obligations is deductible from a taxpayer's income. A taxpayer may deduct interest: (1) on borrowed money used for the purpose of earning income from a business or property; (2) on an amount payable for property acquired for the purpose of gaining or producing income from the property or business, and (3) on amounts paid to a taxpayer under an Appropriation Act for the purpose of advancing or sustaining a manufacturing industry, or for prospecting, drilling and exploring for minerals.

It should be noted that in cases (1) and (2) above, the interest is not deductible if the income from property involved is exempt, or is property that is an interest in a life insurance policy.

The interest payable under subsection 161(1) of the Income Tax Act does not constitute interest payable on money borrowed from the Receiver General for any of the above purposes, but rather is an imposition under law to pay interest on tax arrears. Therefore, any interest assessed on an unpaid tax balance would not be deductible against interest income nor would it be considered an allowable business expense.

GASOLINE TAX REFUNDED TO FARMERS

Question No. 1,995—Mr. Herbert:

1. Since the inception of the Excise Tax program on gasoline to date, what amount was refunded to farmers in (a) Quebec (b) Ontario?

2. For each province, what percentage of farmers file for a refund and what is the average value per claim?

Mr. Claude Tessier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): 1. Since the inception of the Excise Tax program on gasoline to January 13, 1981, $6,084,789 has been refunded to farmers in Quebec and $21,733,765 has been refunded to farmers in Ontario.

2. The most recent figures available from Statistics Canada indicate there are 51,587 farmers in Quebec and 88,801 farmers in Ontario. Excise gasoline tax records indicate 21,298 farmers in Quebec and 57,375 farmers in Ontario have been reimbursed for the refund. Therefore, 41.3 per cent of farmers from Quebec have received a refund and 64.6 per cent of farmers from Ontario have received a refund. The average value per claim in Quebec is $89.88 and in Ontario is $107.34.

OLD AGE SECURITY PENSION

Question No. 2,050—Mr. Herbert:

Is a person aged 65, who delays an application for Old Age Security pension payments so as to receive the entitlement retroactively in the succeeding calendar year, assessed personal income tax on a sum in the year that the person reaches age 65 which would include a pension entitlement that had not been received?

Mr. Claude Tessier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): No.

CÔTEAU-DU-LAC—HISTORIC SITE

Question No. 2,066—Mr. Herbert:

1. How many persons visited the historical site at Coteau-du-Lac in 1980?

2. Between what dates in 1981 will the site be open?

3. Is any new construction work contemplated and, if so, what is its purpose and estimated cost?

4. What is the amount of the budget for the operation of the site in 1981, not including any possible construction work, and how many persons will be employed?

5. What is the amount of the advertising budget for the park and is there any advertising in the United States?

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): 1. 26,200 visitors.

2. From May 18, 1981 to October 18, 1981. School year: from May 19 to June 19, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. weekdays, 10 a.m. to 5.30 p.m., weekends. Regular season: from June 20 to September 7, 10 a.m. to 6 p.m., 7 days a week. Fall: from September 8 to October 18, 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. from Wednesday to Sunday.

Order Paper Questions

3. Yes. The construction of an interpretation and visitors center in 1983-84; $366,000. Canal improvements stabilizing the remains of existing walls; stabilizing the wall and the gabion wall along the St. Lawrence River, 1981-84; $207,700. Refitting the interior of the blockhouse, 1982-83; $66,000.

4. $87,525; 2.51 person-years or five employees.

5. Advertising, none; advertising in the United States, none.

PRIME MINISTER'S RESIDENCE

Question No. 2,077—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was the construction of a swimming pool at the Prime Minister's official residence, 24 Sussex Drive, paid for by gifts to the Crown?

2. Do records exist of such gifts and, if so, on what dates were the gifts made and what were the amounts?

DND—PURCHASE OF FISHING EQUIPMENT

Question No. 2,084—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of National Defence purchase $22,935 worth of fishing equipment from Federal Safe Air Supply Co. and, if so, for what purpose?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The Department of Supply and Services purchased from the Federal Safe Air Supply Co., on behalf of the Department of National Defence, an emergency fishing and sewing kit supplied in a metal container. The kit is one of the components used in survival packs issued by the Department of National Defence to operational personnel.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Is that agreed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton), that the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, when I finished my speech on Friday afternoon I was in the process of complimenting those members of the New Democratic Party who had left their party on this issue on a matter of principle. I also complimented the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) for having done the same thing as a member of the Conservative Party. I suggested that among the Liberals I trusted there would be equal thought and that many of them, on principle, would disagree with what is being done here in the House. I suggested that they, too, would match the democratic pattern of the two parties on this side of the House. I am positive that in any group of people there must be some concern over what is happening here and, therefore, that there be a difference of opinion. We have won a lot of credit for this Parliament because individual members have taken a stand based on their conscience and their judgment.

One of the things which I had intended to mention, which I will pass with a single statement, is that I do not think anything has shocked the Canadian people more during the discussions in the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution and the debate in the House than the fact that these representatives of all parties did not willingly, gladly and enthusiastically accept the principles of the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights and the preamble thereto. The preamble of the Bill of Rights mentions the supremacy of God. What Liberal is opposed to that? What NDPer is opposed to that? I do not know. They will have to answer for having turned that down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The Diefenbaker Bill of Rights was the first bill of rights in the world which gave high priority to the family. At a time in this country when the family is being heavily attacked, and all countries in the western world, I do not understand why the Liberals and the NDP should turn that down. But they must answer for it. One way in which they can answer for it is with their votes with respect to this particular resolution.

The third point I wanted to mention was the right to enjoy property, which is the first item in the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights. Why any Liberal or any NDPer would deliberately, in full public glare of television, radio and newspaper, stand up and declare that they did not want this entrenched in the Constitution is beyond me. Anyone who knows the history of the new world, South America, North America, Australia and New Zealand knows why people came to these lands. They came to enjoy the ownership of land. To the working man, that means his home.

I would like to say a few words about the first day of the debate with respect to the first section of the bill. I think the country of Canada was well served by the quality of speeches given by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), the spokesman for the Conservative Party, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), and by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). Those were three able speeches given by three able parliamentarians. The country should be glad that they heard a different point of view from each. I leave it to the people of the country to decide which one they support. I know where I stand, but I leave it to the people who saw and heard those three speakers. It was a good opportunity to view Parliament at its best.

I like to think the tendency held by some to put down people who break away from their parties on such important issues should be subdued. I think when a member speaks quietly and clearly, without provocation, he should be listened to. That is all I intend to say on that point.

The issue that came out of the first day of debate was very obvious. That issue is with respect to whether Canada's way of life between the two levels of government is one of consensus or one of confrontation. There is no halfway point. With respect to this issue we must ask the people of Canada to decide what the Canadian way is. Is it confrontation between governments through the use of press and radio publicity to beat another government into submission, or is it consultation?

In the main, for 110 years we have succeeded with the consultation technique. Certainly there were hard trade-offs. In the early days per capita grants were traded with the provinces. In the old days a certain number of Senate seats were used as a trade-off. In recent years amounts of money granted under various deals have been traded off. There must be compensation when this type of trading is being done and when you get down to the dollars and cents part of it.

Generally speaking, our federal nation and every other federal nation which has done well in the past hundred years has used the principle of consensus, not force and certainly not confrontation. It looks as if we will turn our backs on that concept now. By saying that this measure must be taken immediately smacks to me of something which I call the new-style fascism. It is not fascism of the type we had insidious and more dangerous. This is the fascism of people who like to call themselves the elite, the ones that know better. This elitism has taken over not only the socialist countries of the world, but also our type of democracies.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): We call it by various names, a dictatorship or a bureaucracy, but it all adds up to the same thing: the small people of each country think that they have more knowledge and judgment than the mass of the people, and they want to insist on giving every bit of control to this small group, whether it be in the provinces or the federal government.

This feeling is in the provinces. It has to be fought. It is also in the federal government—and has been here for 30-odd years—and it has to be fought. It was not too pleasant to hear put forward in the House, by politicians who should be the defenders of the people against this elitism, or this new type of fascism, that even though the thing is wrong, even though it will divide the country, let us ram it through because that shows we are for change; and then 100 years from now maybe they will forget it. This does not sound right in this type of chamber.

I have a number of other comments, but with the time going on I will be brief. I would like to repeat in all seriousness: regardless of party or regional affiliation or anything else, rightly or wrongly, we are deciding something very important for the people of Canada over the next 100 years, not just for the next two or three. We should know a great deal about the set of rules which we are proposing to talk about before we rush ahead and start to make changes, not because I am a Conservative who believes that the fastest progress is made by going slowly and carefully, but because my common sense and instincts tell me that you do not rush forward into something that is very important unless you are absolutely sure that it is the best you have.

I do not accept that the present charter of rights is the best that we can do, any more than I accepted the Bill of Rights under John Diefenbaker as the best we could do. We in the Diefenbaker government spent three long years trying to make it as good as we could, and we put forward something that we were very careful to say did not infringe on provincial rights and we hoped would set a pattern for the provinces to follow. It was not perfect. Some of the proposals I liked; but some of the others I am not too sure about. I am simply saying that it is beyond the capacity of human beings ever to write a law that meets all the needs of all the people. All you can do is strive to do the best you can.

In these discussions on the Constitution that we have had in Canada over the last decade, several facts have been discussed a little bit, and some have not been discussed at all. I think it fair to say that if you are going to amend the Constitution to help fit these facts, we have done a pretty good job in the last ten years in discussing the French fact. Canada should be proud of the fact that, in the main, the great mass of the people across the country, in spite of all their ancient bias, have tried their level best to reach a conclusion which was acceptable and fair on this question of language. It is not perfect, but it has been discussed very thoroughly and the movement forward has been tremendous. I think the Liberals accept that position or they would not be bringing in this type of charter. Therefore, on that type of fact, I think there have been good marks. The various leaders across the country and the masses of the people, in talking and thinking about it, have come down on a pretty fair play.

We are proud that the people of Quebec voted for that point of view in the referendum. We know they are not all happy, but we are proud that simply a majority of them are happy, and we hope that they will be happy, as the years roll on.

The six facts which must be discussed are all economic facts. You cannot build a rule to run this country or any country unless the political rules fit the economics of the nation. The first fact to be discussed may surprise you, and I think the basis of it is important. It is education.

In 1867, education was something that the provinces fought for, believed in, and had to have if they were to be partners in this new nation. They wanted to control and be able to help protect the culture in their area. This fact of the Constitution of 1867 has been honoured pretty well. However, it was certainly clear many, many decades ago that with the federal government coming in and taking responsibility for economic matters in the country, and since education has been one of the main arms in the arsenals to give us better use of our economic and human resources, obviously the federal government had to come in on the side of education. Without going into detail, suffice it to say that the federal government is now involved to the extent of $3 billion worth a year, but there is nothing in the rules that gives us this right.

Therefore, in a new constitution we should be discussing what types of rules we can put in that would legitimize the necessity for the federal government to be involved in education. Obviously, I am talking about education from the economic point of view, not only schools for the trained technical people, but the post-secondary and all economic sectors of university. Because this is where the cutting edge of education makes its impact on the economics of the country: on the technical side, on the economic side.

I believe I have made it clear, and that most people will agree, that this has not been discussed candidly. In order for the provinces and the federal government to discuss a subject like this candidly, there must be tremendous amounts of good will on all sides, because education is one of the great, fundamental, vital powers of the provinces.

The third fact, which has been mentioned only once in the last year, is the urban fact. Whether we like it or not, in the next 100 years I would suspect that at least 80 per cent of our people are going to live in built-up or urban areas. Yet under the present Constitution, the people who live in these built-up areas are considered to be creatures of the provinces. How long will it be before the people of the cities of Halifax, St. John's, Montreal, Quebec City, Toronto, London, all the great cities of the provinces—yes, Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon, Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver, Victoria—realize that with all the responsibilities they have under our present way of life in Canada, which will be with us for the next 100 years, and forever, possibly, they must be given some authority to carry out these functions which goes beyond their present powers as creatures of the provincial governments?

We can all understand why the politicians do not want to mention the urban fact. It frightens the daylights out of the provincial premiers, and that terrifies the federal government. That does not mean we should not be discussing it. With 80 per cent of our people living in cities and regional government areas, there must be a place in the sun for them. It is my belief that this can be done in a manner which strengthens both the provinces and the federal government at the same time; but we will leave that to another debate.

The fourth fact that I want to mention has been discussed to some extent but not precisely, and that is that Canada is a regional type of country. I would calculate that there are 17 to 19 economic divisions in Canada. The people of Quebec and Ontario know what I am talking about. Quebec is not just one region but four or five distinct regions economically and they cannot all be run by one rule. Ontario is made up of at least five regions and those who live in those regions know what I am talking about. They talk the same way as westerners. Twenty-five years ago I defined Canada as being composed of two parts—Toronto and the rest of us. The same thing that I heard in Saskatchewan, I heard in Lac-Saint-Jean in Quebec; in the Gaspé I heard the same thing that I heard in northern Ontario. The advertising signs used in business are the same. For instance, small loans are called petits prêts. It amounts to the same thing—that we are all in hock to the money lenders!

Until we as politicians grasp the fact that there are not just two or three regions in Canada but 17 to 19 regions, we will have the same old difficulties. No one can tell me that all of British Columbia is one region. All you have to do is go ten miles outside the city of Vancouver and this will be evident. Go 300 miles from Vancouver and you will find the same thing as in Ontario. That is what it is like out there. If we are going to develop a set of rules, then for heaven's sake let us realize that they must be based on the economic opportunities for people in all the regions if they are to work.

It is evident that we are moving toward new forms of industrial complexes, not just along the St. Lawrence but also in northern Ontario, northern Quebec, the Atlantic provinces, Alberta, British Columbia; even Manitoba, Saskatchewan and the Northwest Territories will have big industrial complexes some day.

The thinkers of this country are now asking what Canada will be like in 100 years. They point out that as wealth grows and is distributed throughout the country, the divisions will be organized on the basis of cultural centres. One hundred years from now there will still be a place for Toronto as a cultural centre. Today it is the centre of the cultural activities of most of Canada. To listen to the CBC you would think Toronto was a nation on its own. It has a right to retain its place in the sun if we can see ahead that far. Like New York, it will survive—the industrial community of New York has moved to New Jersey, of course—but it will survive because it is a sound cultural centre and that is good economics. I could discuss this at some length, Mr. Speaker, but I will pass on.

The fifth fact is national development. When I came to this House I was full of beans and vigour and had ideas about how the country could be developed. I remember the great conference on forestry in 1906 under the Laurier government. I remember the great conference held in the United States about the same time under the early Roosevelt. I remember the Gordon Royal Commission report of 1956 and I played a part in the Resources for Tomorrow Conference of 1961 in which we tried to find out what the economics of the country were. For the previous 68 years we had known what the wealth was and now, 20 years after 1961, I say that we need a renewal of that Resources for Tomorrow Conference in order to find out where the wealth will be for the next 100 years and draw up appropriate rules.

I want to know not only about renewable resources but about non-renewable resources. In 1961 that information was not available but it is available now. Above all, I want to know about human resources. This is the greatest waste in our nation and most of it takes place in our cities. Human resources are not being utilized because we have not developed the necessary framework. Before we sit down to discuss all these things, we must have the right attitude. They cannot be discussed in one or two years; it would more likely take from three to ten years.

I will list my final fact now and then go on to my proposal, Mr. Speaker. The sixth fact is welfare. In the last 60 years the world has moved into the social revolution. As we can see from the deficits experienced in all countries, this has required tremendous readjustment. In this country the burden lies most heavily on the provinces. Until we ask, with good will, how we can best harmonize this social revolution with the provinces, there will be no peace in Canada on this front. This social revolution will be with us for another 100 years. It is happening all over the world but we have just become aware of it in the last 40 or 50 years.

I have rushed over quite a bit of material in a short time, Mr. Speaker. The time-frame for what I have talked about is three to ten years. A positive attitude must be taken by all levels of government, by all people and all parties. But Canada is worth it. Let us think about these things in a positive way and not try to ram them through.

I suggest that this bill be split. We should repatriate the British North America Act, have an amending formula, get it back here and settle down to the job that we have to do over the next three to ten years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Another six or eight months' work on the charter of rights would not hurt. After that, the conferences should start. We have never used the experts because they do not get along well with politicians so we could separate them and let each have its own conference. The experts could tell us in which areas the human resources and the non-renewable resources could be developed in the best interests of the nation. They could tell us the best way to use the renewable resources. We have a great deal of knowledge already but a tremendous amount of new knowledge has evolved in the last 20 years. The experts should do what they do best—give us the facts; then the politicians at every level of government could play their part.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, after this process has taken place it might be necessary to reconsider the idea of a constitutional convention. That decision is five or ten years ahead, however, so we will not worry about it now.

I think if we approach this with the right attitude and take time to make these decisions, we will serve our people well for the next 100 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege for the member for Montreal-Mercier to take part today in the debate preceding the adoption by the House of Commons and the Senate of one of the most significant joint resolutions addressed to Her Majesty the Queen with a view to amending the Constitution of Canada. I must point out that as a woman, as a Quebecer and as a member of the national government I fully endorse the principles contained in the resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to sit in the House now that the time has come for Canada to achieve full independence in its domestic and external affairs. I realize that I did not waste my time during the referendum campaign. Now I would like to examine why a charter of human rights must be included immediately in the Constitution of Canada. The first premise rests on one of the wishes expressed by United Nations Secretary General Kurt Waldheim, and I quote:

[English]

The high goals set in the international bill of human rights can only be achieved when its principles and standards are fully recognized in law and observed in practice.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that is why I think that the charter of rights will become part of the first law of the land, namely, the Canadian Constitution. An outstanding personality, Andrei D. Sakharov, who was awarded the Nobel peace prize in 1975 thought that it was important to include the charter of rights in all the laws of each country. I quote:

● (1530)

[English]

The defence of human rights is not political in nature. It arises from moral principles and their link to peace. Therefore, all people of good will, whether their political opinions are "rightist" or "leftist", can and should participate in the defence of human rights.

And Sakharov has stated in several of his works that the charter of rights should be part of the Constitution of a country, that is, the first law of the land.

Why must we adopt a Charter of Rights? Mr. Speaker, I believe that any Canadian who is aware of the efforts made to this date through federal as well as provincial legislation, realizes that all Canadians do not in fact enjoy the same rights in this country. Indeed, we have to recognize that the ten provincial governments and the national government each have laws recognizing rights that differ from one province to the other. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I feel it is imperative for minimum identical basic rights to be recognized for all Canadians, that those rights be recognized definitely in such a way that parliaments or assemblies, whether national or provincial, cannot change them overnight through the will of the majority.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I feel the charter of rights should above all protect the minorities. As the majority is represented in Parliament, I feel the first law of the land must be the one that recognizes the rights of the minorities.

I should now like to look back briefly on our history, and in so doing perhaps refute the opinions expressed by our colleagues of the opposition who claim that the charter of rights does not exist in parliamentary systems especially in England where in fact the history of the charter of rights was made, through the non-written tradition of court decisions. Over time, a tradition of a charter of rights was in fact established which has always been observed with regard to British citizens.

That history finds its origin with the Magna Carta of 1215 and King John Lackland. Most of the other kings who followed him in England continued to respect that charter. In 1628, King Charles I accepted the Petition and King William, in 1689, accepted the Bill of Rights.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, a charter of rights does exist in the motherland, entrenched in the British Constitution which is based upon a different system from ours. At present, the same charter of rights is not included in our own Constitution.

I should like to quote from a recognized authority, namely Encyclopedia Americana, in which Mr. Cromwell Young refers to the deficiencies of the Canadian Bill of Rights. And I quote from page 744 of Encyclopedia Americana:

[English]

The Canadian Bill of Rights is a legislative act rather than a formal amendment to the written Canadian Constitution. It became law in 1960, during the period when John G. Diefenbaker's Conservative government was in power.

I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, to remind my hon. friend that it was recognized under a Conservative government that this country needed a charter of rights.

At page 744 of the Encyclopedia Americana, the explanation of the Canadian Bill of Rights continues:

In the years since its passage the bill has proved less effective than many had hoped, and its application has been limited. Because it is federal statutory legislation and not part of the Constitution, its provisions extend only to matters coming within the legislative authority of the Canadian Parliament; matters coming under provincial jurisdiction are outside its scope. In addition, although Section 2 of Part I provides that other laws of Canada are to be construed and applied so as not to infringe any of the declared rights and freedoms, courts have been reluctant to accept the bill as an instrument for overriding other federal statutes.

We can conclude by this authority that the Bill of Rights has its limitations even though it was regarded as a very good bill when it was entrenched. Probably that is why the Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker in his memoirs "One Canada", published in 1976, said:

My experience with the provincial governments indicated that they were too jealous of their jurisdiction over property and civil rights to support any amendment applicable to themselves. I have little hope that their attitude will be altered in the years ahead. To have made provincial agreement a condition for enacting a Canadian Bill of Rights would have meant a complete failure to achieve this important objective.

I must remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the Hon. John G. Diefenbaker—

Mr. Epp: The Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker.

Mrs. Hervieux-Payette: —was considering the adoption of a Bill of Rights in 1960 as the first step toward entrenching a future Bill of Rights in the Constitution. In his memoirs, Mr. Diefenbaker continued:

Under my philosophy, the Bill of Rights was based upon the belief that certain rights and liberties of the citizen are so fundamental to our way of life that no law and no force should be allowed to encroach on them.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I think that in light of these authorities we must recognize that the charter of rights we now have in Canada and which applies to the federal government has many limitations, and I believe that my colleagues will fully agree on this point. On the other hand, I think that in our own history we find, as the Canadian Council of Churches pointed out, that Canada already has in its Constitution a nucleus of a bill of rights, but that the Canadian government and Parliament should go further and include in that bill of rights the fundamental rights, albeit very limited, that are already recognized, according to the Canadian Council of Churches, while adding to them other fundamental rights. I quote their brief to the 1950 Senate Committee on a Charter of Rights which says:

[English]

Without ignoring or minimizing the constitutional problem which the introduction of a Bill of Rights would present, we venture to suggest that to the extent that our Constitution now provides for the English and French languages, the separate school system, and periodic elections and sessions of Parliament and the provincial legislatures, Canada already has the nucleus of a bill of rights. Therefore, in view of these facts, is it too much to ask that the Constitution be extended to take in the following suggested human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The list included most of the rights recognized in this motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, as a woman member, I should like to remind the House briefly of the virtually unanimous support given by all women's groups who appeared before the Committee on the Constitution. First of all, I am very proud to note that the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women made a great contribution to the debate and that these women submitted a remarkably good brief to the committee. I should like to quote from their recommendations to Parliament:

We wish first of all to underline that we are in favour of entrenching the protection of our basic freedoms and rights in the Constitution. First, the charter will serve as a symbol and a guide to the legislatures. It is highly desirable to ensure that certain freedoms and certain basic rights will not suffer from any legislative interference likely to restrict them. We women are only too well aware of the inequities created by the legislation. We are only too well aware that the present Bill of Rights cannot put an end to discrimination when it becomes law.

I believe that this submission truly shows the need to include a charter of rights in the constitutional resolution. Again I refer to the National Action Committee on the Status of Women.

[English]

The National Action Committee on the Status of Women concluded, "Notably, it was agreed that we support entrenchment of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms in principle."

That group made a wonderful contribution in presenting various amendments and I am sure the minister has answered most of their concerns and preoccupations.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, another group, the Canadian Congress for the Promotion of Educational Opportunities for Women, has reacted quite favourably. It has stated, and I quote:

The Canadian Congress for the Promotion of Educational Opportunities for Women is in favour of entrenching into the proposed Canada Act the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Therefore, I think and will continue to think, with a few other groups, that most groups of Canadian women are in favour of the principle of enshrining a charter of rights. And there is one group in particular which, I feel, has done a very good job with limited resources and which I had the pleasure to meet at the committee. This group has joined its voice to the voices of nearly all the other women including those who have been discriminated against from time immemorial. I am referring to the Indian rights for Indian Women. These women sent the following message to Parliament, and I quote:

● (1540)

[English]

Our general response to the Canada Act is, in two important respects, favourable. First, like most Canadians, we favour patriation. Enough ink has been spilt on this matter that we do not feel obligated to add our two cents worth. Second, we believe that a new, patriated constitution should contain a charter of rights, provided that, as is the case in the present proposal, affirmative action programs are not proscribed. Those who appeal to a British heritage of legislative supremacy and tolerance of diversity for protecting rights should look to the current condition of British citizens of black and East Indian ancestry. In these important respects, we support the government.

This group has suffered a lot of discrimination in this country. I suppose it will be the first to re-establish its rights according to the new constitutional motion.

On top of that, the National Association of Women and the Law has also agreed to the entrenchment of a charter of rights. I quote:

We recognize a number of advantages fall from entrenchment of a charter of rights and freedoms into our constitution. Firstly, it is symbolic and educational as a statement of the value placed on human dignity and integrity in our society. Secondly, an entrenched charter would bind both the provincial and federal governments to a uniform standard . . .

Thirdly, by requiring adjudication by the courts, it would provide Canadians with an alternative forum to the elected legislatures for enforcement of their basic freedom and rights.

I believe this group made a very valuable contribution when they talked about the law. I presume they must know something about it.

The last group was the Native Women's Association of Canada. It did not specifically mention the charter of rights but went into the rights themselves, asking this Parliament to recognize some rights. One of the rights they wanted to promote was, and I quote:

That the rights of aboriginal people must be recognized to extend to all individuals of aboriginal descent no matter where they live in Canada.

That native women have equal access to and participation in decision making processes, and that they be protected in law against discrimination based on sex or marital status.

I believe this group has suffered enough and wish to see the Constitution patriated with the charter of rights.

To conclude on the charter of women's rights, I want to express my thanks to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) for the amendments he agreed to make after the presentations of the various groups.

One of the first amendments was with regard to the title which reads "equality rights" to emphasize the goal of this clause. Second, the general proposition of equality of individuals would be stated in the following terms: "Every individual is equal before and under the law." I believe the minister was very attentive to the presentations made to him by the various groups and that he responded in a very positive way.

The third amendment accepted by the minister was that there would be the particular statement of "the right of the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination." This is a very positive change which will prevent some problems in the future with regard to the interpretation of the charter of rights.

The fourth change that was made was with regard to clause 15(2). It has been made to relate affirmative action to non-discrimination rights. This was a very good contribution by the women's groups which permitted the minister to make these amendments. Fifth, and final, the list of specified groups was expanded to include "mental or physical disability". In this country, one can be affected by various problems in terms of discrimination, and be the subject of discrimination in addition to many other issues.

[Translation]

I want to say, Madam Speaker, that following the meeting with the group of ad hoc committees arising out of the Conference on Canadian Women and the Constitution held February 14 and 15 last, I met with representatives of that group and we discussed extensively the recommendations made to the government. I do hope that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) will in fact move the amendments recommended by that group since she contributed to the adoption of all those amendments. Besides, I note that in its second resolution the Conference adopted the following:

> That it be resolved that the women attending this Conference support the patriation of the Constitution with an amendment formula—

And further on they expressed the wish that a charter of rights be also included. I think we should clarify in Clause 31 that three-year period provision, namely, whether the charter shall have effect the day after it comes into force or not until three years after that date.

I pointed out to the spokesman for that group that there could be a danger of the rights being limited since the courts which right after the adoption of the Charter would have to decide upon the various statutes containing discriminatory clauses, could choose the lowest common denominator with regard to each piece of legislation thereby depriving in fact some of those groups of the rights they already have rather than extending those already in the legislation. I think that the three year moratorium is a good idea since, in any case, Canadian Parliaments will have to amend all their statutes, which is not as easy a task as it may seem and since it may take a very long time for the Supreme Court to bring in such amendments.

Madam Speaker, I would like to conclude by reminding this House of my special interest in Section 38 of the motion. I am indeed very pleased with the amendment introduced by the minister, and I quote:

> Notwithstanding Section 40, an amendment to the Constitution of Canada
> (a) adding a province as a province named in Subsection 16(2),
> may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and the legislative assembly of the province to which the amendment applies.

And I will revert to section 16(2) which makes French and English the two official languages of the legislatures and the governments of these provinces. However, I hope that, as Quebecers, we have not been misled during the referendum campaign by the Right Hon. Premier of Ontario who, campaigning alongside Quebec members, pledged to respect the French minorities of Ontario.

In this regard, Madam Speaker, I would like to read into the record, if I may, the statement we made in Toronto last January:

[English]

> We . . . want to express to all of the citizens of Ontario, through their premier, the Hon. William Davis, our appreciation for the support which Ontarians have given to our government's constitutional proposals. We would like to underline the fellowship of interest which unites us, as Canadians, with the people of our neighbouring province.

● (1550)

> Now that we are about to fulfil the promises which we made to Quebecers during the referendum campaign, we look to the people of Ontario, through their premier, for their support. We ask that the rights guaranteed to members of the English-speaking minority of Quebec by Article 133 of the BNA Act be extended to Ontarians whose mother tongue is French.
> We believe that the extension of Article 133 to Ontario would only confirm, in our new Constitution, rights which the Government of Ontario already recognizes in practice: the right to appear in court and the right to pass laws in the two official languages of Canada.

I am repeating that request to the Premier of Ontario, perhaps through his friends on the opposite side, so that in the future French people in Ontario will enjoy exactly the same rights English-speaking people enjoy in Quebec. I remind my hon. friends that it was never under a Liberal government that rights which were granted were removed from the English-speaking minority in Quebec. Those people enjoy full status as citizens of Quebec with regard to the language issue.

I am very proud to say that fine institutions in this country such as McGill and Concordia and many other services are available to the English minority, and I just express the wish that in the future the French minority will enjoy exactly the same rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —I am pleased to rise to take part in this debate on the amendment to the resolution before us. I would like to begin my remarks by joining in the tribute which has been paid by all members of this House to those who served on the joint committee, including the two co-chairmen, and particularly those members from all sides of the House who served long hours under very difficult circumstances to ensure that there was as full a hearing as possible.

I think the House will understand if I pay particular tribute to my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), who has moved the amendment I want to address today. I think many of us in the country and many of us in this party in Parliament knew of the qualities of the hon. member for Provencher, but one thing that has occurred with the televising of the committee hearings is that his commitment to his country and his immense competence are now known and celebrated across the land. As his leader I wanted to take this opportunity to pay public tribute to him for the work he has done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Part of the purpose of parliamentary debate is to draw public attention to alternative views of our country and of its challenges. I think we all know that Ottawa is a very easy place for conventional wisdom to develop. We also know that Parliament provides the one forum in which that conventional wisdom can be challenged and alternate views expressed. That has happened in this debate.

I am proud of the role my party played in the change of opinion in the country. But there is still a long distance to go because there are still several Canadians who have accepted in all sincerity false premises about our country. They have accepted them because they have been the official views expressed by the government too long in power in this city and in this country. Generally they have been views which have been apprehensive about nationalism, particularly in Quebec, and views expressing skepticism about the ability of different provinces and interests to agree.

I came here nine years ago as a private Member of Parliament with the suspicion that that view was wrong. Now, nine years after that first election, having had the honour of serving the country as its Prime Minister, I have the conviction that that view is wrong. It is not simply mistaken as a simple error would be but fundamentally wrong in a way which can literally rend and break our nation if it prevails.

I am entering this debate at this stage to deal essentially with two false assumptions. The first is the assumption that the Canadian federal system has failed, and I will deal with that in a moment. The second assumption is that what is proposed here to replace federalism is something that is only a little unorthodox but is otherwise within the Canadian tradition. That is utterly false. We are dealing here with a proposal for a radical change in the way Canada works, a change that abandons the best about what we have learned as a nation. If accepted, it could tear us apart as a country.

I ask the House to contrast this proposal with Canadian tradition in three important ways. First, with respect to the principle of equality among provinces, our Canadian tradition has treated every province as an equal in the federal partnership. This proposal creates different classes of provinces. Two of those provinces would have a permanent veto over constitutional change. Eight others would have much less power. It changes a system of equals into a class system, and that breaks and abandons the Canadian tradition.

Second, with respect to the federal idea itself, our Canadian tradition is that we are a nation too large and too diverse for one government alone to decide our destiny. So, we have given important powers to two levels of government, Ottawa and the provinces. This proposal allows Ottawa to ignore the provinces absolutely and to change the most basic law we have, our Canadian Constitution, and it thereby opens the door for the provinces to be ignored on other questions too. That again breaks and abandons the Canadian tradition of partnership.

Finally, I ask that this proposal be contrasted with the tradition of respect for Canadian sovereignty. Our Canadian tradition is to make our decisions ourselves. This proposal could not be accepted in Canada. The government itself argues that provincial legislatures would take longer in approving the charter of rights. Everyone knows that the Canadian process would not allow the creation of second-class provinces and that the Canadian process would certainly not allow a referendum which could wipe out absolutely the power of the provinces in constitutional change.

The Canadian process would not let that happen, but the British process might. It is for that reason that this government is trying to use Britain to do something it knows it could not do here in Canada. On the most important law we have this government is trying to use our colonial status to force changes that a fully sovereign Canada would not accept.

Those are not minor changes on the margins of things; they are basic changes. They are changes in our federal system, changes in our sovereignty and changes in our sense of being equals in the Canadian family. Their fault is not that they are radical; their fault is that they are wrong, deeply and dangerously wrong, for our country.

It is not necessary to demonstrate in detail the danger inherent to the creation of different classes of provinces and it is certain that everyone rejects the Liberal Party's proposal to have the British take decisions on issues which concern Canadians. Let us speak of the dangers which threaten federalism. If today the central government does not take into account the opinions of the provinces on constitutional changes, tomorrow it will show no respect either for their opinion on other important matters. Its centralizing appetite will continue to grow. It might decide to extend its jurisdiction over communications. It might be tempted to invade the educational field. It might come under pressure to undermine the guarantees offered to the minorities. And it might do that by using the referendum mechanism, a referendum for which it will draft the question and decide the timing. Those are the new and very real dangers which threaten us if the proposed resolution is adopted.

The concept of federalism is threatened in a more subtle way. Part of the strength of the provinces today is to know that they are equal to the central government in their fields of competence. The provision on the referendum destroys that element of security. The provinces would be inferior since they would always be under the constant menace that the central government might manipulate public opinion and take certain powers away from them, and thus the Canadian concept of the federative pact would disappear for ever. In a country as wide and as diversified as ours, each province is justified in preventing the federal system from being turned into a unitary regime. But the province of Quebec, the most distinct of our provinces, is the one which can benefit most from the federal system and the one which stands to lose most in an overly centralized regime. The other parties here, the NDP and the Liberal Party, are prepared to drop the federal system which has ensured the protection of the rights of Quebec and those of the other provinces. Only the Progressive Conservative Party has fought to defend those rights.

Madam Speaker, we have done that for two reasons. First because we acknowledge that the great majority of Quebecers who voted no as well as those who voted yes in the May referendum all voted in favour of a renewal which would extend the powers of their province, and not in favour of what the Liberals are doing now to restrict those powers. The other more serious reason is that we belong to a country where a strong and proud culture ought to be encouraged to open out, and that growth is possible only within the structure of an equitable federal system. Our aim is not only to defeat a bad resolution but above all to protect the great and noble principle of Canadian federalism and thus promote the simultaneous growth of distinct cultures.

Let me now deal with the accusation that the federal system does not work. When the hon. member for Provencher was speaking the other day about the success story of Canadian federalism, I noticed the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) smiled as though he did not believe it, as I believe he does not believe that we have had a success story. But I want to deal with the idea that since 1927 we have had 54 years of failure in the country. That is simply an absurd accusation.

Of course, there have been times when the federal system has stopped one man from getting his way; that is among its virtues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Through the last five decades our Canadian federal system has allowed a number of positive Canadian things to be done in a way—and I want to emphasize the importance of the way—which won them not only a place in our laws but also acceptance as being legitimate products of Canadian agreement.

The fact is that our federal system works whenever reasonable governments and leaders allow it to work. This system which works in the country has produced hospital insurance and medicare, the Canada Pension Plan and equalization, agreements on energy, highways, education and welfare, and a range of other agreements. The genius of federalism in a country like ours is precisely that it does work when its member governments want it to work.

If I might digress for a moment into light statistics, I should like to consider the substance of the allegation of 54 years of failure. When the Prime Minister talks about 54 years of failure, he is really referring to the fact that in 1927 we began discussion at federal-provincial conferences of a way to bring our Constitution home. But he makes it sound as though we did nothing else during those 54 years but discuss our Constitution and grow frustrated when we could not bring it home; that is the implication he leaves.

Well, a few other things happened during those five decades—a world war, the depression, births, deaths, the CBC was created, as was the Wheat Board and the Bank of Canada, the Seaway was built, the north was opened, we "joined" Newfoundland, oil was discovered, the quiet revolution occurred; there were all those little diversions from the 54 years of failure about which the Prime Minister likes to talk.

What was happening to the Constitution during that time? It was discussed, but not quite for 54 years. In fact, if one consults the record of federal-provincial discussion on the Constitution or on related measures, one will find that in the 54 years since 1927 the Constitution has been discussed for exactly 48 days; less than a day a year. Most Canadians spend more time discussing the weather than we in this Parliament or federal-provincial conferences have spent discussing the Constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The other point to make is that on the eve of this declaration of failure, agreement was at hand. The Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) does not like to talk about the Vancouver amending formula now, but I have the record of the discussions in the committee proceedings for November 13 at which time he admitted that the Prime Minister was prepared to accept that consensus as a basis for bringing our Constitution home. He knows, as the House knows, that others were prepared to accept that agreement as a basis by which we could amend and patriate our Constitution. He knows that, and that is the case.

I hear the ministers muttering about the correspondence from Mr. Wells. The correspondence from Mr. Wells points out that that was the case. That consensus was there, that possibility was there. A prime minister who wanted agreement could have got agreement at that time.

Of course, various provinces attached conditions, as did the Prime Minister, but the conditions the provinces attached were conditions which could have been negotiated away. He raises his head and questions whether they could be. Of course they could. I say to the Prime Minister: I could have negotiated them away; any prime minister who wanted agreement on an amending formula could have negotiated that discord away because the conditions were not major ones. The conditions were ones which the provinces were prepared to put aside. The Vancouver formula is a formula which can be the basis of bringing our Constitution home and changing it here in Canada, if there were a federal government which really wanted to do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: That is important to understand, because a failure to understand it would allow the Prime Minister to blame one more failure on federalism. It was not federalism that was at fault here; it was the incumbent prime minister of the day who was at fault here. The federal system would have yielded an agreement on an amending formula; the prime minister in place on the day refused that agreement. That is not the fault of federalism.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice have stated in the House and to Canadians outside Quebec that they are speaking on behalf of that province and that they respond to the aspirations and dreams of Quebecers. The Minister of Justice even quoted Laurier, Henri Bourassa and André Laurendeau in support of his arguments. The newspaper La Presse has justifiably denounced, and I quote:

The brazen association of someone like André Laurendeau to an operation which will make him turn in his grave if it succeeds.

And all those who know the unequalled concern of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Henri Bourassa for the survival of French Canada will be aware that both these men always maintained that French Canada had survived because under the federal system the rights of the provinces are respected. Which of these three men and what other Quebec leader before the present Prime Minister would have dared to impose an amending formula against the wishes of eight provinces and all the political parties in their own province? What group of Quebec members would have allowed such a thing in the past?

The Minister of Justice has told us that he and his leader promised during the referendum campaign exactly what they are offering us today.

To my knowledge, no journalist has reported any such thing.

—writes Marcel Adam of La Presse. Adam added that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice have asked the rest of Canada, and I quote:

—to accept constitutional changes. This dramatic appeal could only be accepted by Quebecers as a pressing invitation to allow their claims.

And what were these claims? All those who have followed objectively the events of the last 20 years in Quebec would reply—Quebec's self-development. To suggest that this unilateral resolution, which ignores the wishes of their government and their legislature and which is rejected by their political parties, will give to Quebecers what they requested in the May referendum, amounts, like Adam said, and I quote:

—to taking people for idiots.

[English]

Let me deal, if I might, with the question of legitimacy. As this House knows, having dealt with law and tried to make law effective the question of legitimacy has as much to do with justice as it has with simple law. For its own reasons the government limited quite severely the number of expert witnesses who would appear before the joint committee. By that limitation it limited the public debate on the legality of Parliament acting alone in defiance of both the other partners, and in defiance of public opinion, by using a party vote at one level of the federal system to change the basic law of the federation.

The arguments about legality will be made elsewhere. As the Manitoba Court of Appeal decision revealed, opinion is divided as to whether this proposal before us is legal. The question I ask Canadians to consider is whether this procedure is legitimate. Is it just to have one part of the partnership use trickery to change the rules of the whole partnership against the wishes of the others?

That question is important for reasons other than morality, because if the procedure is not legitimate it will not work. We will have a system brought in place which might have a place in the laws of the land but has no place in the faith of the people, no place in the hearts or the minds of the people. You cannot simply change behaviour by passing laws. Indeed, what you can very often do by passing bad laws is to create the kind of negative reactions which will achieve results opposite to those which you had hoped to achieve.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There is a tendency among the supporters of the government, whether in the New Democratic Party, the Liberal Party or elsewhere in the country, to pretend that the controversy this measure creates will quickly pass away. In pretending that, they ignore both the history and the current reality of our country.

To cite history for just a moment, there have been times in the Canadian past when the government sought to act without proper agreement and sought to impose the views of one side on questions which were fundamentally divisive. That happened with the North West rebellion. It happened with conscription. In both cases the country suffered permanently because the grievance of discrimination was added to the other grievances of the minority whose views were ignored. No one who travels in the west today could ignore the sense of grievance there, or the degree to which that sense of grievance will be aggravated if those provinces are given second-class status under our Constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, no one who has been in Quebec with their ears and eyes open during the last decade could ignore the importance of provincial rights to the people of that province. When all of the parties, governments of the west and all of the provincial parties of Quebec, stand together against a measure with the determination that we have seen in their stand here, then only the blind would believe that the anger will pass away.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I find it instructive that the defenders of this unilateral and divisive resolution no longer deny that it is divisive. They know they would not be believed. They know it is divisive. Some find it exhilarating. Instead, they claim that the division will pass away as soon as the resolution becomes law, as they say happened after the flag debate. Neither a vote to approve this resolution nor colonial action in Britain will end the divisions which are growing in Canada and which are being fed by the actions of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: If this measure is successful, the aftermath of it will not have us gazing upward at a symbol as it snaps in the breeze and learning how to honour that symbol. The aftermath of the adoption of this resolution will have us looking around at the breaking of our federation and, perhaps, at the breaking of our nation itself.

Why do the Prime Minister and his supporters in the Liberal and New Democratic parties think that elected legislatures and governments of the provinces will simply accept being totally by-passed in the amendment of our Constitution? What makes anyone think that will be acceptable? Of course it will not be. Why did the Prime Minister and his supporters think that regions and provinces this resolution discriminates against will cease to feel the victims of discrimination? They will not cease to feel that. They will be reminded of it every time there is the possibility of the law being invoked.

We are not discussing here a symbol to be seen. We are discussing here a constitution to be used. And when that constitution institutionalizes inequality among provinces, when that constitution authorizes means to break the federal partnership, then that constitution makes divisions permanent. That is what this project will do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There is an even more dangerous dimension to be considered. When that constitution is imposed—let me call the attention of the chamber to the process we have seen here—after advertising campaigns designed to manipulate public opinion, imposed after admitted attemps to manipulate the provinces, imposed after the Prime Minister himself has stood in this House and admitted that he was "less than candid to use his words, in telling the truth to the people and the Parliament of Canada about what the British said about our Constitution, then the manner of the imposition itself becomes a grievance which could become a permanent grievance in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It is time to face facts, Madam Speaker. The Prime Minister and his supporters have profoundly divided Canadians of good will who could have worked together and who wanted to work together. They have disappointed Canadians of good faith who thought that Constitution-making, to be valid at all, had to be a process of consensus, not the imposition of the will of one government or of one man. Those sincere and hopeful Canadians who see a charter of rights and freedoms that should be the expression of the dreams of all our people are being held hostage to a terribly divisive process. Obviously, the Prime Minister should free the charter voluntarily from that process. He should let us complete our work upon it with a few more improvements here in this House. He should let us agree unanimously in this House, for the sake of Canada, to recommend that charter go not to a foreign country but to the provinces of Canada, to the other partners in our confederation, so that together we can work on the rights, the liberties and the freedoms of the people we together serve.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Lyon!

Mr. Clark: The courageous Minister of Justice shouts across the House "Mr. Lyon." There is one premier, and perhaps there are others, who has been outspoken in saying that he is against a particular proposal. What is the reaction of the Minister of Justice? Does he try to persuade him? Does he try to create public opinion which will change the opinion of that premier? No. He runs away to Britain and abandons the federal principle of this country.

• (1620)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I share the commitment of many in this House and in this country to a very strong charter of rights—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —just as I understood the commitment of other members of this House and other citizens of this country in earlier times to a universal system of medicare or to the principle of equalization.

The commitment to those issues, and to others, was as intense as the commitment to a charter of rights. The cause, arguably, was as important but in those cases the Canadian federal process was followed. The Canadian way was respected. Why not now? If it was good enough for medicare, why is it not good enough for the charter of rights? If it was good enough for equalization, why is it not good enough for the charter of rights? Why should this one measure, this one obsession of the man who happens to be Prime Minister, allow us to break away from the federal system with consequences which none of us can contemplate except to know that they will be bad?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, there are many in this chamber and in this country who remember the deep debates about medicare in Canada. They occurred in every political party and in every region of Canada. The result was that we followed the process of Canadian federalism and we obtained agreement. We now have a national medicare program in this country because we followed the Canadian federal way of getting agreement, of persuading people, of changing opinion, not simply running away to Britain when we ran into somebody who seemed to take a position different from our own. We followed the Canadian way on medicare. We can follow the Canadian way on the charter of rights.

An hon. Member: Spending power.

Mr. Clark: In this country we could have had, not simply on a matter of—I am being shouted at from the other side, and I say that is fine.

Mr. Chrétien: Tell the truth. It was imposed by spending power. The provinces complained at that time.

Mr. Clark: I want to get the Minister of Justice on the record. He is saying that it was imposed by the use of the spending power, and that many people were concerned about that.

Mr. Chrétien: That's all.

Mr. Clark: But it was done within the context of the Canadian federal system. That is the distinction between this case and that. That is the distinction there. They find it funny that we should abuse the Canadian federal system here. What I find funny, but not humorous, is that this government, simply because it is committed to a particular charter of rights, is prepared to abandon and damage the federal system and the Canadian way of doing things. Instead of using the patience, the time and the perseverance that it takes to get anything that is worthy done in this country, they run away to Britain. That is what I find absolutely unacceptable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me pursue this for just a moment, because there is no question that there are sincere, dedicated people in the country who do not share the view of this Prime Minister and of many people in the House regarding a charter of rights. That is abundantly clear. But it is also abundantly clear that those are people who would be prepared to engage in argument and discussion in this country. If they are premiers and members of legislatures, they are people who would take account of informed public opinion when the time came to cast their vote in the legislature of Manitoba, Ontario or Quebec. If public opinion wanted a charter of rights as strongly as this government says it does, then public opinion would make itself felt upon the legislators and provincial legislatures across the country, and we would have this system in a Canadian way. Not simply would we have it in Canadian law; we would have it accepted in Canadian practice as being a legitimate way to get change in a country like Canada. This charter of rights, unhappily for the people it is supposed to protect, will never have that kind of legitimacy because it will always bear the heavy odour of imposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me ask the House to look at this question in another way. If we begin by imposing the Prime Minister's obsession and build in a referendum which allows the Constitution to be changed without the provinces being consulted, what obsessions will follow? What will be the next program forced by the centre upon the parts? What will happen to the federation when its more independent members, such as those in Quebec or in the west, say, "We have had enough of this; we have had enough of these obsessions being forced by running away to Britain or by the use of a referendum that ignores the provinces and undercuts the federal system"? What will they say then? They shake their heads because they do not have the answer. I have the answer. We will have a country in very deep trouble, trouble which is not necessary but trouble caused by the way in which this government is pushing through an obsession of its own with no regard for the consequences for this country and regard for the Canadian way of doing things.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Throughout this debate we have proposed better ways to proceed on this matter: asking Britain simply to send our Constitution home with the Vancouver formula, proposing a system of incentives to obtain final agreement on that formula in Canada, splitting the package in two so that Canadians can deal with our rights in our country. Again, we now propose deleting the offensive anti-federalist referendum proposal. What animates us in all of this is the absolute certainty that there is a better way to bring our Constitution home and a better way to bring it up to date.

Of course there have been problems in the past. I am prepared to say that some of those problems might be less acute now simply because we have had the process of discussion, particularly televised discussion before the joint committee. I think that public opinion is more informed and that some of the people who have taken hard positions on some of these questions would take more flexible positions now.

The point is that our system can be made to work in this country. But two motives dominate us in what we do with the proposals, the alternatives we bring forward. First, we must respect the Canadian-federal system, because it does work, and nothing else will work in a nation like ours.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The second motive is to have our Constitution-making become a source of agreement and pride in the country rather than a source of conflict and anger. The great irony is that the government is using a constitutional process which drives Canadians apart at the very time when, in other aspects of our lives, Canadians are coming together.

Over the last decade in particular there have been great and positive changes in two regions in this country, Quebec and western Canada, changes most of all in self-confidence. In both those regions, people feel equal to Canadians from other regions. They want to play a major role in building a great country. This feeling is there but it has not always been there. I can remember times, growing up in western Canada, when the sense of having to suffer some kind of inequality was simply something to be borne. There was the sense that western Canadians could compete as equals. I am sure that if Quebecers spoke from their hearts in this House, they would tell us there have been times when their sense of subordination to the English was profound. Well, that sense is not now in Quebec, nor is it in western Canada. What is there instead is a sense of pride and confidence and a determination to get on with building a great country.

The tragic irony is that at a time when there was that sense of Canadians wanting to build together and when regions which had felt inferior began to feel equal, instead of using that great emotion and that great sense of Canada to build common Canadian purposes, this government brought in a measure which drives Canadians apart. Our Constitution could be a source of Canadian pride and unity. Our Constitution has been made a source of Canadian shame and division. That is the result to which we object most absolutely here, and it is for that reason that we intend to use every device which is available to us to change public opinion, to change this resolution, and to stop this government from bringing through a constitutional package that would be bad and divisive for our country.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, the constitutional resolution before us is simple and compelling. It will give us our own Constitution with an amending formula and with a charter of fundamental rights and freedoms. It recognizes the rights of Canada's Indian, Inuit and Metis peoples. It ensures that children may be educated, where numbers warrant, in either of our two official languages. It recognizes the rich heritage that people from so many different ethnic backgrounds and cultures have brought to Canada. It enshrines the principle of equalization, recognizing that in sharing our immeasurable resources and in working together to meet new and unforeseen challenges we will continue to be one of the most fortunate nations in the world.

Last May, during the vote on separation, all parties in this House and all provincial premiers made a commitment to constitutional reform and to renewed federalism. We are now honouring that commitment. Our commitment and our Constitution will enable us to get on with the task of building, through negotiation, a new and better way of sharing powers and responsibilities with the provinces. This is the base on which we will build a modern Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat surprised when I listened to the speech of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). He stated that the Progressive Conservative Party was the only one to support Quebec's position on the constitutional issue. I would like to ask him a few questions. Can he explain to Quebecers what the Vancouver formula will do to help Quebec share its basic rights as a province, which rights differ from those of the other provinces? I would also like to ask him what this government has done in support of the linguistic rights of Quebecers.

I suggest that we have done a great deal to demonstrate that Quebec is important for Canada, and I would like to tell the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition that when he speaks of the divisions which have been created in this country, I have not seen any at this time, but he can expect the greatest division not to be in our country. This division will be among those who are blind. Most Canadians, or at least 85 per cent of the population, support the entrenchment of a charter of basic rights in our own Canadian Constitution.

[English]

I should like to say that at the heart of the resolution before us is the relationship it seeks to establish between individuals and the state. The state will not be able to deny fundamental freedoms such as freedom of speech or freedom to worship in one's own religion. Governments will not be able to erect barriers against Canadians moving freely from coast to coast or seeking work in any province. Every individual will be protected against discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age, mental or physical disability. And finally, the Constitution guarantees important legal rights. I wish to focus my comments on some of these legal rights, Mr. Speaker, and on why they must be entrenched.

I speak of security against unreasonable search and seizure; the right on being arrested to retain counsel and as well to be informed of the right to have counsel; the right to habeas corpus; to trial within a reasonable time; to reasonable bail; to trial by jury for serious offences; protection against cruel and unusual punishment and, most important, specific remedies are made available where any such legal rights or any of the rights or freedoms guaranteed in the charter have been infringed or denied.

If there were to be an improper search or seizure, for example, the official involved could be subject to a fine or perhaps even to suspension. If excessive force were used, the victim could be awarded damages by a court. If a municipality were to deny a religious group a licence for a gathering, a court could overrule that and order, by mandamus, that a permit be issued. It could award damages. If a school board were to deny second language education, it could be compelled to supply it if numbers warrant.

An important right and one which I think demonstrates the essence of what we are achieving in terms of human rights is provided in the case where evidence is obtained illegally. The constitutional resolution amends our present law. It states that where constitutional rights have been broken in gathering evidence, the court can grant a number of remedies, including such evidence being declared inadmissible. This will occur only in circumstances where the court can determine that its admission would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

That is one way the charter could balance the protection of the individual against arbitrary or excessive use of government authority and the protection of society against crime. We have not adopted the American rule which prohibits the production of evidence, however relevant, as proof of guilt if such evidence is obtained illegally. If such a rule were implemented in Canada it would generate a feeling of frustration among law enforcement officers and also among citizens since the rule itself or a simple violation of the rules could lead automatically to acquittal.

The charter would seem to improve upon the existing legislation which, in most cases, allows the production of illegally obtained evidence. Therefore, this new provision strikes a balance between the individual's rights and the collective need for an effective enforcement of the law and for an equitable judicial system. Consequently, a piece of evidence which is considered relevant, even though it may have been obtained illegally, will be allowed unless its production might bring discredit upon the administration of justice.

[English]

Our courts, under the legal rights provision, will be able to decide, for example, whether a search was conducted in a reasonable manner. They will be able to determine whether it was reasonable that a 15-year-old girl who was arrested for jaywalking, or a pregnant woman who was arrested for not having paid a speeding ticket, should be subjected to the humiliation of a strip search. They will be able to determine whether, in the case of raids, the police have acted within reasonable strengths and within reasonable bounds or whether activities now under study by the McDonald Royal Commission were reasonable in the circumstances. If the court should determine that they were not, then the victims will have a remedy available to them.

● (1640)

The charter entrenches another most important right, namely, a person's right not only to obtain and instruct counsel but also to be informed of the right to have counsel. This is a progressive step which recognizes that rights should not only be available but they must be made known.

Another such right which I am proud to see in this constitution is that trials must be held within a reasonable time. Every individual who is accused and arrested should have the opportunity to have his or her guilt or innocence determined quickly. This is not only fair but, when you consider that it costs about $30,000 a year to keep a person in detention, it also makes good economic sense.

Some have said that we need not entrench these and other basic legal rights in a constitution, that it is sufficient for us to leave them to our federal and provincial law makers and to the common law. Let us, therefore, examine this proposition together. First, we do have a Bill of Rights that mentions some, but not all, of the rights contained in the constitutional resolution. How strong are these rights and how good a job do they do? Look at the Lavell case. Mrs. Lavell, an Indian, married a non-Indian. Under the Indian Act, she lost her status rights even though the same would not have happened had she been a man. At that time the Bill of Rights precluded discrimination based on sex. The Supreme Court held that it could not overrule the Indian Act; it was just another act along with the Bill of Rights. In similar circumstances, Sandra Lovelace has had to appeal to the United Nations because no appeal was available in Canada. When freedom from discrimination based on sex, or on any other ground, is set down in our Constitution, it will take precedence over every other law, federal, provincial or municipal. That is why we need entrenchment.

Second, we need entrenchment because even the long and prestigious history of the common law of Great Britain has indicated that it may not, in itself, prove capable of protecting important freedoms. For example, last October 21,000 U.K. prison guards went on strike. They were not available to escort accused persons to court hearings under habeas corpus. The response of the Home Secretary was to introduce a bill in Parliament authorizing the suspension of habeas corpus. So much for rights which are not entrenched in a Constitution.

Third, it is true, as many members opposite have said, that Canada is enriched by its diversity. We respect that diversity. We respect the diversity of its peoples, its geography, its customs and its traditions. The fact that we respect this diversity and are enriched by it does not mean our basic minimum rights and freedoms should be diverse, different and disparate. On the contrary, is it not fair and just that Canadians from Newfoundland to Vancouver Island, from our southern border to our far north, should enjoy the same basic minimum human rights? There should be no second-class citizens. Provinces should not have the right, as hon. members of the opposition advocate, to opt out of guaranteeing basic, minimum human rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peterson: Let me cite some facts which illustrate the nature of this problem. At present, we have 11 different bills of rights in Canada, one federal and ten provincial. Seven provinces provide no protection for the physically handicapped. No province protects the mentally disabled. Three provinces provide no or only limited rights for women. Five provinces do not protect the aged in their charters. Furthermore, it is desirable that basic legal rights, such as the right to a speedy trial and reasonable bail, should be available, not only for federal criminal offences but for the numerous provincial offences, such as highway traffic, liquor and environmental laws.

A major argument against entrenchment is that it will leave questions of interpretation, and thus the application of rights and freedoms in specific cases, to the determination of our courts. Some say this will deny the supremacy of Parliament. To this argument, our only response can be: "So be it." The courts now determine which of our powers are federal and which are provincial. Every day, the courts are called upon to dispense justice and to interpret the rights of individuals. It is merely a logical progression to give them additional authority to interpret our fundamental rights and freedoms as individuals.

I would rather see the courts charged with this responsibility than leave a free hand to legislators, legislators who have in the past shown themselves capable of enacting laws which disenfranchised Chinese Canadians, which abolished the use of French in Manitoba, which denationalized the citizenship of Japanese Canadians, which suppressed freedom of religion and speech in provinces, which restrained public assemblies and which limited the use of English in the province of Quebec. Life has changed considerably since the nineteenth century when doctrines such as Parliamentary supremacy were adumbrated. We no longer fear the power of a monarch. What does concern us is the incredible multiplicity of regulations, rules, orders and directives that are not debated in Parliament and which can infringe basic rights. These regulations emanate from the numerous bureaucracies and regulatory agencies created at the federal level, the ten provincial levels and at thousands of municipal levels.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peterson: While the task force on regulatory reform made many recommendations that would open up the regulatory process to public scrutiny and to accountability of legislators, we believe entrenching the fundamental rights contained in this constitution bill will help to avoid abuses of the rights of individuals when they arise.

In 1976, with the agreement of all provinces, Canada ratified the universal declaration that has now become the international bill of rights. In both drafting and amending our charter, the international bill served as a touchstone. It would bother me were we not prepared to take every step here in Canada to implement, foster and protect those rights which we have agreed to by international treaty.

To summarize, entrenching a charter is a declaration to Canadians and others that we believe first in protecting human rights and freedoms. We believe these rights and freedoms should not be brushed aside by a transient majority in any legislative body.

I wish to quote the words of a former prime minister, Lester B. Pearson, who said:

> In short, freedom and welfare must be kept in a healthy balance or there will be trouble. This essential balance can be achieved by applying, to every proposal for further intervention by the state, the question: will it truly benefit the individual; will it enlarge or restrict his opportunity for self-expression and development?

Governments are elected to serve the needs of all people, not their own. Their highest calling is to protect individual rights and freedoms. Those who would deny Canadians this Constitution that we propose because we have not obtained the unanimous support of the provinces are closing their eyes to the present and turning their backs on the future.

An hon. Member: Why haven't they supported it?

Mr. Peterson: The hon. members asks why the provinces have not supported this resolution. I am happy to trace the course of history in recent times. We have seen one province seeking to bargain rights for higher oil prices, one province seeking to bargain rights for offshore oil resources. We see one province whose leader is dedicated to separation and is committed to ensuring that federalism in Canada does not work.

We are not using the wrong process to break a deadlock. We are using the only process to obtain our own Constitution with an entrenched charter of rights, something which is sought by 85 per cent of the Canadian people. We are at a crossroads and it is time to act. History will record this measure as an act of statesmanship and national building of the highest order. I am proud to support it.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I know the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is going to leave now because he does not want to hear the blame he is going to receive from me.

An hon. Member: He does not want to hear the truth.

Mr. Jelinek: He never wants to hear the truth. That is why he is not going to the people on the Constitution.

I have followed this debate with great interest over the past weeks and, indeed, months. There have been some good speeches, some emotional speeches. The last speech by the backbench Liberal member of Parliament certainly was not a good or emotional speech. When commenting on good and emotional speeches, I must refer to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), who led off the debate for this party a couple of days ago, and the speech made earlier this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). Listening to speeches like that makes you proud to be a Canadian.

I have always been proud to be a Canadian. I am even more proud when I hear members responding to the wishes of Canadians. If anything has been missing in the context of a general debate on the Constitution, it is the fact that there has not been enough input from apolitical Canadians, those not affiliated with a political party. That is an important sector of our system as well. I refer to the individual Canadian who does not have the time to get involved. When I found out I would be taking part in this debate, I made it a point to hold public forums. These were held not only in the various areas of Halton in the last week or ten days, but, like the experience of most members, across Canada.

Today I do not intend to emphasize the technical analysis dealt with by previous speakers in a very proper and direct fashion. I want to bring to the floor of the House what I have been told by my constituents. I find that to be of great importance because a Member of Parliament is elected to abide by the wishes of the majority of his constituents. I have always felt that way. That is my feeling on this issue as on previous issues.

I know my speech will be cut at five o'clock for private members' hour. Before that time arrives, I wish to stress that opposition to the Liberal constitutional package is from the Canadian people, not just the interested groups, the eight provincial premiers and a number of New Democratic Party Members of Parliament. The opposition is from the majority of Canadians. Every poll, householder and other source shows that to be the fact.

Responses to a questionnaire in my constituency indicate that 83.1 per cent support patriation of the Constitution as it now is in Westminster. Only 18 per cent of those feel the provinces should be excluded. In other words, only 18 per cent support the Liberal motion. A Gallup poll in January showed that 64 per cent of Canadians opposed the Trudeau proposition and 22 per cent supported it. That was in January. We are now near the end of February. As hon. members know, the longer this debate goes on, the more support Canadians show toward the position of this party on patriation of the Constitution. The Canadian Federation of Independent Businesses asked their membership of 55,000 whether they were in favour or against. These are businessmen from across the country, including Quebec, the maritimes, the west Ontario. Seventy-five per cent opposed the Liberal position.

Canadians want the Constitution returned to Canada, but not in the way the Liberals are proposing. I have before me something which has been read into the record on a number of occasions; I think I have time to read it one more time. On October 22, the Leader of the Opposition moved the following motion:

That this House supports the immediate patriation of the Constitution of Canada, incorporating only the generally agreed upon amending formula known as the Vancouver consensus, so that all other constitutional changes shall be made in Canada by Canadians.

Canadians support that motion. Why cannot we, the elected representatives, Liberal, New Democratic or Conservative, act in this House of Commons on behalf of the majority of Canadians?

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn)—Canada Savings Bonds—Request for increase in interest rate; the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid)—Environment—Pollution of Niagara River—Representations to United States authorities; the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly)—Native rights—Agreement with Committee for Original Peoples Entitlement—Government position.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF CROWN CORPORATIONS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of reorganizing the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by dividing its present responsibilities to provide for the establishment of two separate and distinct Crown corporations, one which will deal with all programming and distribution aspects and another which will be responsible for production.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion deals with the subject of the Crown corporation known as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Whenever this topic comes before any general audience, it tends to raise the level of interest of CBC-philes and CBC-phobes. There are extremities of view on this particular subject. There are those who think there is very little wrong with the CBC and therefore only fine tuning—if I can use that metaphor in this context—is necessary to improve that corporation. Then there are those who are absolutely opposed to anything the CBC does and would like to see it sold or disbanded—anything just to get it off the corporate landscape of Canada.

I have been interested in the work of the CBC for quite some time, partly because of my background. My academic training is in the arts. I have an inherent interest in the arts. I am very concerned about the value structure in our society, and television and radio are the great communicators of values in our country.

Let me say parenthetically that I have been critical of the CBC many times. I am sure that often my criticism has been interpreted as CBC bashing when it was not intended to be that at all. I want hon. members to understand now that the motion before us is not to be used for CBC bashing. It is to be used so that we can look at the corporate structure for which we in Parliament are accountable. We can analyse it, hopefully somewhat dispassionately, and see if there are not perhaps better ways of dealing with these matters.

In March, 1980, an article entitled "Focus" was published in a magazine called Report. The article was written by Pierre Lortie. Mr. Lortie is the executive vice president and partner of the Montreal organized research firm SECOR Incorporated. He is a widely read author on economic matters. He received his bachelor's degree at Laval University and studied as well at Louvain, Belgium. He was executive assistant to the Quebec minister of finance from 1970 to 1972. He has also advised the government on urban transit and taught at Laval University. I would say that this man has fairly good credentials. I think he has all the right credentials to make some commentary on government organization and government corporations.

He argues that we ought to sell the CBC, presumably to the private sector, perhaps dismember it in some way or other and allow other communications industries to buy up those segments of CBC after it has been dismembered. That is not my argument. I underscore that that is not my argument, but Mr. Lortie makes the point that it ought to be sold for a very important reason, and that is that its original mandate is no longer necessary. He says that the CBC was founded by an act of Parliament in 1932 to establish and consolidate an infant communications industry in Canada. I will quote from Mr. Lortie's article as follows:

> A cursory overview of the rapidly-expanding technology in telecommunications leaves the curious feeling that the CBC has outlived its usefulness. One can no longer seriously argue the case for development of an "infant industry" where the radio and television broadcasting industries are concerned: both are mature.
> Foreign ownership is not a problem. Some might complain about the proportion of foreign programming. But we know from experience that public ownership and millions of dollars in subsidies to a Crown corporation do not solve this problem. The CRTC reported in 1977 that "to maintain a commercial presence and keep a share of the audience, CBC offers a high percentage of U.S. entertainment programming during prime time." More precisely, according to the report, 64 per cent of prime time fare consists of U.S.-made programs. Here it looks as though it is easier to preach about virtue than live with its predicaments.

Then he goes on to say that the prime industries are no longer radio and television but are industries such as pay-television, STV, fibre optics and satellite-to-cable television. Those are the infant industries today, not television as we know it.

Second, he says the function of the CBC was to establish the industry in all communities of Canada to bring that medium to all communities of Canada. I think all members of the House know that that has not happened, in spite of such programs as the accelerated coverage program. Mr. Lortie goes on to say:

> We have seen that the major impetus for establishing the CBC or enlarging its mandate was the need to develop a Canadian broadcasting system while the "industry" was still in its infancy. Furthermore, it was asserted that a public broadcasting corporation is required to provide service to small communities and remote areas. On the face of it, the last argument is compelling. Yet, if you hail from a small community in Quebec, your personal experience should leave you wondering. For example, the TV stations in Chicoutimi, Rimouski, Sherbrooke and Rouyn-Noranda are owned by private investors, often local citizens, not by the CBC. However, the CBC does own powerful TV stations in Montreal and Quebec City. In view of its fundamental mission, the network established by the CBC warrants a general examination.

The point is, of course, that the CBC has been great in establishing itself in major centres, but it has taken a long time to move out into the perimeter areas of Canada. I think particularly hon. members from Quebec know how factual that statement is.

However, regardless of what Mr. Lortie says in his article and regardless of how persuasive his argument is, that is not my point today. My argument is that we ought to split the CBC down the middle into two corporations. One should deal with programming and distribution, and the other one should deal with production. The issue is not whether we ought to have a public corporation. The issue is how efficient that particular corporation is.

I might add that my argument for splitting it already has some precedents because I think hon. members know that the original act which created the CBC and subsequent acts included another mandate which is not the CBC's today, and that is the mandate to be the regulatory agency for the communications industry in Canada. It used to be what we now call the CRTC. That was part of its job, but Parliament and the industry realized that that was no longer relevant to its job and that there was a massive conflict of interest in that respect. Therefore, Parliament cut off that particular responsibility. I am sorry to say an aspect of it still exists in the present act whereby the CBC is charged to advise the CRTC on matters of the industry. But the issue is one of efficiency.

I should like to refer to the Lambert commission report which was published approximately two years ago. It examined efficiency in government spending and indicated the following:

> —accountability is the fundamental prerequisite for preventing the abuse of delegated power and for ensuring, instead, that power is directed toward the achievement of broadly accepted national goals with the greatest possible degree of efficiency, effectiveness, probity and prudence.

That is the job. Hon. members will know that the operating budget of the CBC today is about $1.5 million per day, or over $500 million a year in tax dollars. There is at least one reason for the tremendous cost of operating the CBC.

I put a question on the order paper which was answered on June 3 by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Stollery). One of the questions in question No. 1,025 was:

> How many individuals are employed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in the (a) English (i) television (ii) radio (b) French (i) television (ii) radio networks?

I wonder if hon. members have a ball park understanding of the number of permanent employees in the CBC. In the French and English networks, radio and television, plus those who are operating in ancillary forums around the Ottawa area, there are 12,035 permanent employees.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Is that just in Ottawa?

Mr. Friesen: No, these are across Canada. The fourth part of my question was:

How many individuals were employed by the CBC on a contract basis in (a) 1979 (b) 1980 to date—

Of course it referred to the French and English television and radio networks. In 1979 there were 30,817 persons on contract, and by 1980 the figure was 32,189. In other words, in one year the number of employees on a contract basis had grown by 1,372. That increase cost us something like $5.5 million.

At the same time the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) put a question on the Order Paper which was answered on October 7. His question was similar to the one I asked. The second part of his question was:

How many persons are regularly employed by the CBC on a contract basis?

Here is the conundrum: in answer to my question, the parliamentary secretary indicated 32,189, but in answer to the question of the hon. member for Vaudreuil it was 1,085. There is a lot of spillage or leakage somewhere, which can easily happen. The only difference between our questions was that he used the word "regularly." Are we to say, then, that 31,000 are irregular, or are we to say that there has been an awful ballooning in one year of 31,000 people employed by the CBC on a contract basis? There is something wrong.

Then the hon. member asked the following question:

How many persons receiving an annual salary from CBC also receive contract payments for specific assignments?

Of course that referred to moonlighting within the corporation, and the answer was that 412 were on regular salaries within the CBC and also moonlighting and receiving contract payment.

My point is that one cannot expect a corporation with approximately 44,000 employees, which is really the size of the city of Chatham or some other small city, to operate efficiently; there is a lot of spillage in that size of corporation.

We ought to split the corporation into two separate organizations. We hope this will create some competition which would plug some of the holes through which the leaks are taking place. Competition is always related to efficiency, or vice versa. So, I propose one separate corporation dealing with production facilities. Those facilities ought to be available by contract to independent and CBC producers on a fee for service basis. An independent producer would then be able to go into those facilities and say, "I want to rent these facilities for a production I have in mind; I am willing to pay the going rate." That corporation should be managed on a cash and value of production basis; CBC producers should pay the same amount as independent producers; then there will be some control of the costs.

The second corporation would deal with programming distribution. That CBC distribution centre would design its programs on the available ones from independent or CBC producers. It would buy those programs on a budget and value criteria. Because of the market system, hopefully it would find programs produced by independent producers to be just as attractive—and sometimes even maybe even more attractive—as those produced by CBC producers. The marketing division of the separate program distribution corporation would treat independent and CBC producers on an equal basis. In that way there would be an opportunity for CBC production costs to be held in line, because it could not have massive cost overruns and find a product which would be saleable to the distribution corporation. Therefore, CBC producers would have to discipline themselves in producing their programs. Also it would open up the entire area of distribution and viewing opportunities for a host of independently produced programs which ought to be seen but are possibly being shut out, because it is too easy for a bias to exist within the CBC against anything produced outside of the corporation.

I believe my proposal deserves some study. It is not an idea which will be bought overnight. I am sure the people within the CBC will fight it because they have a vested interest. I suggest to hon. members that there would be greater opportunities for parliamentary control of the vast expenditure of $1.5 million per day in the CBC today, for which we are accountable, if there were two independent corporations competing for the marketplace and providing what I think would be a higher quality of viewing for Canadians.

● (1720)

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member made some very legitimate and good points. However, I question his modus operandi.

Mr. Friesen: The "however" came too early.

Mr. Irwin: I put it to the hon. member that there are now two distinct parts to the CBC. There is CBC Radio Canada and CBC in English Canada and there is talk of a CBC-2. In essence, we would have a CBC-1 and 2 in English Canada and a CBC-1 and 2 in French Canada. Thus, there are four units. The hon. member suggests that this be broken into production and distribution. In essence, he is talking about chopping CBC up into eight distinct units. If he is looking for more efficiency and more accountability, and I am quoting him, then I suggest that is not the way to do it. I think what he should be looking for—and I say this sincerely—is the good in CBC. He should be promoting that. I suggest it is more difficult, politically, to do such things. I will give an example, namely Louis Riel. It was a good production, it taught Canadians—

Mr. Friesen: It was run three times in three years.

Mr. Irwin: It taught Canadians right across Canada something about their country. It was entertaining. But it cost $2 million. Would the hon. member opposite say we need at least a dozen of these productions every two years, or one every two months? Would he suggest we spend $24 million? I hardly think so.

I think what he is doing is what is popular, and what I did for many years, that is, CBC bashing. It is almost as good as bureaucrat bashing. As top officials of the CBC say, "We are loved where we are not, and we are hated where we are." There is much truth in that.

What is CBC and how does it relate to this proposal? The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) has placed before the House a very important motion concerning the two major functions of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, that is, program production and program distribution. The motion, in essence, proposes the examination of the advisability of re-organizing the CBC into two separate and distinct Crown corporations, one having responsibility for production and the other being primarily involved in the distribution of programs it would acquire, purchase or negotiate from the production facility. The theory behind this is not new. If the hon. member will read "Touchstone", I think he will see that is exactly what the president of the CBC wants to do.

Mr. Friesen: Not "Touchstone", but "Tombstone".

Mr. Irwin: The president of the CBC is talking about getting more Quebec people involved in production. He talks about better programming. I ask you what the other television networks are doing? Global has financial difficulties. What is CTV doing?

Mr. Stollery: Zero.

Mr. Irwin: That is right, zero. CTV is owned by a series of very lucrative affiliates. What they do is give just enough to the network, just enough to make it break even without doing top-notch production. They do some production, but not much. What is ATV doing? It is looking inward and not looking at all at Canada. Most of its production is designed to look inward. I say to the hon. member opposite that the only network doing anything of any importance and any quality is the CBC.

By the way, the hon. member is wrong with respect to the number of employees. He is 742 short. There are now 12,777, and holding. This is an updated figure.

The matter of two separate and distinct organizations to perform these functions must be examined in the light of past development and future options for the growth and health of public broadcasting in Canada. It must be looked at in the context of the utilization of public funds. What we have done with the CBC is to have set it up a decade or so ago and we have said that it must provide facilities to all towns with a population of over 500, all little villages with populations of over 500 and all little inlets with populations of over 500. They must bring CBC to the Eskimos and to all areas which the other networks will not serve. They have done this. But it has cost a lot of money. Most of the money has gone into hardware.

Consequently, having followed the mandate of Parliament, they are now being criticized for bringing CBC to all areas of Canada. What they are looking for now is exactly what the hon. member has said—a production base. To create this production base in English Canada, they need the equivalent of what they put into Montreal. I challenge the hon. member opposite to put forward a motion in support of a production centre in Toronto. I say to him that he does not have the courage to do that, because if he did, he would find many people who would support him. He knows that such a production centre would cost $200 million. Is the hon. member suggesting that a production centre be built in Toronto at a cost of $200 million? That is exactly what it would cost.

We have given many mandates to the CBC. They have had to go to Regina, Victoria and New Brunswick, where there was no CBC until this year. They are just moving into New Brunswick. They have made their plans. They have announced that it will take some time for them to establish themselves there. The CBC is also in Sudbury. They are in these places because of the demands of Members of Parliament. The CBC having done all these things, it is now being criticized for using funds to follow the mandate of this Parliament. If this is an error, it is the result of our perception of Canada. It is not hardware which is needed, it is better quality Canadian programming.

Oddly enough, I was out in the hon. member's province as a CRTC commissioner. That was my last hearing. We were dealing with a presentation from a large B.C. delegation which was saying that they were receiving five U.S. channels in their area. They said that was undemocratic and that they were entitled to receive six. There were 10,000 buttons distributed by well-meaning British Columbians which said "CRTC, CBC—Get out of B.C." The slogan rhymed—that is culture.

Mr. Friesen: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I cannot let the hon. member's comment in this regard go by. It was not this side of the House which published those buttons, but the former Liberal member for Vancouver-Kingsway who was peddling them.

Mr. Irwin: Over the years the CBC has been the most effective channel through which to address the matter of Canadian program development. Again, this was primarily due to the small Canadian population base, as well as the accompanying and persistent constraints on production and distribution.

In the Canadian private sector, we have one of the best production facilities in North America. It is called Glen Warren Productions, which is situated in Toronto. It is part of the CTV empire, for want of a better word. Why is that facility not used?

Mr. Friesen: It is for Americans.

Mr. Irwin: As the hon. member says, it does American productions which are sold to the United States. And that illustrates the attitude of the private sector. It is an attitude which the CBC must fight. If I understand correctly what the hon. member opposite has said, he is suggesting that we should build more facilities—

Mr. Friesen: No, no.

Mr. Irwin: Let me finish, please. The hon. member is saying we should build more public facilities which the private sector can use.

Mr. Friesen: Keep the ones you have.

Mr. Irwin: He wants more public facilities that the private sector can use, or ones that we already have, so that they can use their facilities for United States productions. What kind of subsidy is that?

Mr. Friesen: What is the difference between selling that and selling lumber?

Mr. Irwin: The CBC has always been a prime mover in Canadian program development but, at the request of Parliament, it has also figured highly in the extension of the broadcast distribution facilities.

We must make up our minds today, or within the next year, whether there will be a CBC at all. Right now in Ontario there are 56 American stations coming into the province. I firmly believe that you should not watch Canadian programs just because they are Canadian. You should watch Canadian programs because they are a good quality product. We, as parliamentarians, must decide today whether we will put our money where our mouth is and give the CBC the necessary funds to carry out this type of programming.

• (1730)

Obviously, we are producing good actors, writers, comedians, people in drama, because they are showing up in California. We must be doing something right in Canada because these people are coming out. In the words of Northrup Frye, they are thrown up from their environments. We are producing these people in all parts of Canada; but at the head end, namely, the House of Commons, we are not giving the required support to the CBC and its production in terms of the dollars necessary to keep these people in Canada and not let them escape to the United States. If we did, then we would be able to produce quality programs which, first, would be watched by Canadians and, second, could be sold on the world market.

Mr. Friesen: You don't want to export them.

Mr. Irwin: We want to export them, Mr. Speaker; CBC wants to export them; the private sector wants to export them. They are not being exported because they are not being bought; and they are not being bought because they are not good enough; and they are not good enough because we will not put the dollars into them.

An hon. Member: Wait until Andrew Johnson reads this.

An hon. Member: Alan.

Mr. Friesen: Sorry, Al Johnson.

Mr. Irwin: In addition to the competition from which we are suffering, primarily the United States—there is not that much coming in from Europe—the CBC has another problem. It is seriously challenged today by cabletelevision, pay TV, closed circuit delivery systems. Do you know what these are? They are supposed to result in an expansion of culture, but they are really one more way of hustling the American product, one more way of making a dollar, and one more way of defeating our own Canadian culture by not supporting it. Besides that, they are suffering from the adverse effects of optical fibre technology, of the videodiscs on the market, of the satellites. For $420, you can buy a dish which you just set up and point south. You lift it 18 or 19 degrees above the surface, and you can receive almost 21 or 22 U.S. programs. This is all new in the last three or four years.

The CBC was suffering before that. Prior to that time, other than sports, news and specials, it had a watch factor of perhaps 10 per cent. Over all, with these factors, it would have had a watch factor of, perhaps, 20 per cent. In other words, before these came onto the market, 25 per cent to 30 per cent of the time we were watching Canadian television, and 70 per cent to 80 per cent of the time we were watching U.S. broadcasting. It was worse in English Canada. It was far better in French Canada.

Mr. Friesen: Let's build a wall.

Mr. Irwin: But they are suffering too, from exposure to the culture from the United States. It is far worse now with the satellites, the videodiscs and the various technologies which have come on the market.

The point is that the whole on-air broadcasting and on-air culture is more fragile today than it was three or four years ago. Even though it is politically popular today to attack the CBC as if it were in the best interests of Canada, I do not think it is constructive any more. The CBC is on the ropes, and Canadians must decide whether the corporation is going to bind this country together, in the broadcasting sense, or whether we are going to keep it on the ropes and drive it right out of the ring, because it can be done. People listen to what is said in the House of Commons, and if we say irresponsible things—and I do not suggest that what you are saying is irresponsible—they are going to be taken as the truth, and if they are taken as the truth, people are going to turn even more against the CBC. There will come a point in this House of Commons, if people do not periodically try to defend what the CBC is trying to do, when there will be a vote, and there may be sufficient numbers in this House to vote to disband CBC, and then what are we going to do, watch ABC, CBS? Perhaps we could watch educational television from the United States? That time is nigh. Just listen to what the hon. member has said, because he makes some good points; but carry it one step further and give the CBC the support that it deserves and merits. After all, it is not doing it for its own benefit. It is doing it for the benefit of Canadians across this country. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the proposal by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) that consideration be given to dividing the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation into two, with completely separate jurisdictions over program production and distribution, provides fruit for argument both for the status quo and for change. The test of a final decision, I believe, is whether such a move would improve control and promote progress in these areas, and, of course, whether or not such a move would prove cost-effective.

In establishing some framework for efficiency, it should be pointed out that the corporation has a good record of performance. Studies have demonstrated that the CBC is an efficient and productive organization compared with other public broadcasters. The conclusion drawn from the studies is that the CBC has produced more programming in radio and television with less public funding and fewer employees than the BBC, or the networks of France and Japan. In fact, the CBC produces more than twice as many hours of programming per employee than other public broadcasters, in both television and radio.

I think that if you are a fan of radio, the way I am, then you, Mr. Speaker, along with other members of this House, would agree that the quality of CBC radio is unsurpassed in North America at the present time.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. MacLellan: CBC radio has been worked upon over the recent years, and has developed to be not only informative, but extremely enjoyable.

The CBC is demonstrably one of the most efficient, if not the most efficient, program production houses in the world, doing more with less than any other national public broadcaster. Much of this is done by a competent, talented staff aided by external contributions.

In terms of efficient use of funds, the CBC's costs per hour of programming are substantially lower than those of other public broadcasters. The total budget per hour of CBC's production output in 1975-76 was $11,600 for television compared with $43,500 for the BBC, $56,200 for the Swedish service and $78,400 for the French system.

From these statistics, the conclusion can be drawn that the CBC's ratio of program and distribution expenditures to administrative expenditures compared favourably with those of the private broadcasting sector, a conclusion which was at that time supported by the analyses of the private broadcasting sector done by Statistics Canada.

The CBC has taken a conscious managerial decision to increase greatly its involvement with the independent production sector. Its involvement embraces a number of areas; namely, procurement of programs from independent producers, commissioning productions, co-financing and co-producing arrangements with independent producers, and craft support including post-production houses, like film processing labs and sound recording studios, as well as script development. Indeed, whenever CBC and Radio-Canada schedules can be complemented by such material, effort is made to include independent Canadian productions. It should be noted, however, that competition and private sector productions are not necessarily synonymous with lower production costs, or that private producers do not incur cost overruns.

I would say that the CBC has a record of assisting, where possible, the independent producers in carrying out their tasks. I am sure you have noted, Mr. Speaker, that people have complained there are many more employees of CBC present when press conferences are called than people from other networks and they want to know whether this is necessary. It should be noted, however, that the independent producers, the competing networks, make use of the equipment set up by the CBC. Certainly the costs of the independent producers would be considerably higher were it not for the fact that the CBC supplies a good deal of the necessary equipment.

A brief analysis of the situation in the United States makes this point quite clear. The major United States networks do relatively little in-house production, other than news, current affairs programming and sports. The bulk of the variety and drama productions comes from independent producers in Los Angeles and New York City. The structure of the United States industry is not without its costs. Having selected scripts for pilots, a network will pay what essentially amounts to a "licence fee", which today is usually less than the actual cost of making the pilot. In that market, it is the producer who absorbs the difference, with the hope of making it up on rights for syndication, foreign sales and literary rights.

The point made here is that, even in the United States, producers seldom cover their costs on a production. Cost overruns are either guaranteed outright by the networks in the manner of "overage" payments or the producer gambles on a long syndication run. There are built-in inefficiencies in all systems but what counts in the United States is the large market base and the potential for the recovery of costs, along with sizeable profits. In Canada, the marketplace is much different. Production funds must be utilized efficiently to achieve optimal results.

To some degree, we have already seen the corporation's efficiency in responding to its program production mandate and its flexibility and willingness to seek out the services of the Canadian independent production sector. This clearly has a stimulative effect on this service industry sector. Also, the single organization concept for both the distribution and production functions has been found to be efficient. The corporation has been able to draw upon its over-all resources to respond to so challenging a mandate. The dual agency alternative appears to add nothing new to the present broadcasting system.

Other questions also, are raised about the corporation. Would the present organizational structure not be in a better position than two corporations to integrate within its ranks the changing objectives and functions of the CBC? In its long-range objectives, is the CBC not now well placed to exploit and to market the substantial expertise of skilled personnel, associated with the combined hardware and distribution side of the business for example, to Third World countries seeking our aid, as it frequently does? The issue of morale among all experienced and dedicated staff, too, must not be overlooked.

Furthermore, from the point of view of the over-all efficient use of public funds, it is difficult to imagine how two separate and distinct organizations would not add to the burden to be borne by Canadian taxpayers. From a purely administrative point of view, many of the present functions would be duplicated since, depending on the structure of the organization itself, separate boards of directors and management functions would have to be established if the organizations were to function properly. Other questions, such as co-operation between the two organizations, duplicate roles regarding contracts with industry, governments and regulators also come to mind.

The CBC has an admirable performance record, and further, it has an unexcelled international reputation. Public broadcasting in Canada is superior in quality worldwide, relative to the financial support and human resources available. Separate and distinct organizations would not necessarily increase the efficiency and effectiveness of the services being provided and would, in all likelihood, cost more.

While I would not declare that the CBC has mounted the uppermost pinnacle of efficiency and can ascend no further, I believe it has coped well with developing requirements and is planning well to meet the future. My advice to the House, therefore, is don't tamper with success!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, fairly often we hear the Progressive Conservative Party requesting the government to cut down the number of Crown corporations in this country. So it is a bit of a change today when the hon. member asks that two corporations be created where one is doing the job. I do not hear my hon. friend advocating that private broadcasters should break themselves into separate corporations, one side for production and the other side for programming. Frankly, this is an idea we have heard in the past and not found acceptable, so we see no reason to support the motion that is before the House today.

I do not criticize the hon. member for bringing in a motion that calls for a discussion of broadcasting generally and for a discussion of the CBC. Perhaps we could do this more often. I am prepared to say that in my view the CBC, for all its faults—and it has them not only in broadcasting but in labour relations, and so on—is nevertheless doing a good job in Canada. It is a unifying force, an institution for Canadianism, and I think we should give it our full support.

In my view, the proposal in the motion does not go in that direction, and therefore I hope the House will not pass it this afternoon but that instead, there will be other expressions of support by members of this House of Commons for a very useful and worth-while institution in this country, the CBC.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) and others. Although the purpose of the motion is pretty clear, that the hon. member would like to see the CBC made into two corporations, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has just explained the sense behind it, the point of it escapes me. The arguments of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta, which I have heard on these kinds of subjects for many years, give me no clue as to why he would be interested in creating two Crown corporations instead of one. Given his philosophical view of these things, I am puzzled as to why he would be interested in creating yet another layer of bureaucracy. I am sure many people would argue, as he would, that one of the problems with Crown corporations is that they are weighted with bureaucracy. His argument that we should create a special bureaucracy to take the place of the CBC, therefore puzzles me. It does not seem to make any sense to me. I would also point out to the hon. member that when he discusses the CBC, he seems to take the view—and in this regard he has associated himself with other motions—that there should be unlimited access to signals from outside of the country. I am sure the hon. member is interested in more productions being done in Canada, because I presume that is the only substantive argument he is putting forward in favour of this motion. But I do not understand how this can come from an hon. member who believes in freedom of information and in signals being allowed across borders. He seems to take the view that that is something with which there should be very little interference. Canadian production, CBC and private, already has difficulty in competing with U.S. networks which think nothing of spending half a million dollars per hour on production. In Canada, the only serious production house, namely the CBC, spends $100,000. In other words, Canadian production is outspent five to one by the competition.

The hon. member would now like to see a special Crown corporation put together to take care of production. At the same time he does not want to give protection to the existing facilities in Canada. The sort of protection that may well be needed, in view of the technological changes, was explained to him by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Irwin). The arguments which he put forward appear to be contrary to his previous approach to the problems of broadcasting in Canada.

—Mr. Speaker, in short the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta has proposed that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as it now exists be replaced by two distinct Crown corporations which would be fully independent from an administrative standpoint. That is what he has proposed. One corporation would be responsible for programming and the other for distribution. I must say that there is no mention of the CBC technical problems which are more complicated than a simple distribution operation.

Those problems have cost a bundle to the Canadian taxpayers because of the technical means the CBC representatives have to use. And as the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie was saying, they have just now approached the problems of northern New Brunswick which is one of the under served areas of Canada, and the cost of survival in Canadian regions where there are very few people. First I would like to give this motion a short historic background. Then I will weigh the pros and cons of that proposal in light of the technological challenge of the 1980s. Or I might leave that task to my colleague from Manicouagan (Mr. Maltais) who perhaps may want to speak to this motion for a few minutes.

Whether we are talking about the English or the French network, with all their hesitations and their evolution which mirrors the development of Canada over the last quarter century, the history of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation spells success. And yet the corporation has had to overcome serious obstacles, including the breadth of the territory and the dispersion of the Canadian population, as in New Brunswick for instance. The very economy of television production is an even more serious obstacle because from the outset it militates against the production of Canadian programming. American competition is so strong indeed that some people have said that Canada's radio-television system has become ever more a means of recycling American broadcasts. Those obstacles appear to be almost insurmountable since the funds at the disposal of the American networks are two to three times larger than those available to the Canadian networks. In addition, the Canadian networks can buy low cost American programs and get more advertising dollars than they would for a Canadian program. Finally, through the cable distribution system, Canadian viewers can tune in to a great many programs aired by American stations.

[English]

I will end my remarks at this point because I know there is another hon. member who would like to say a few words on this subject.

[Translation]

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, a while ago, I was astonished to hear my colleague from the opposition ask that the CBC be divided into two entirely separate entities. As pointed out the former speaker, I feel the problem with CBC, at this time, is one of consolidation. To my mind, we can say that all in all, the CBC has been a great success. Just think of how vast and diverse is the territory it covers! It is a challenge that not even the American network could have met with such a small population as is the case in Canada.

As my time is very limited, I should like to stress one point only, the responsibility the CBC has to try to increase the Canadian and even the regional content of its broadcasts. That, to some extent, is the problem which confronts the Canadian people in terms of identifying the contents of its own network. Why should Canadians often prefer American or foreign programs? Because, within the contents of our CBC broadcasts, either in French or in English, there is often a feeling that programs are a copy or a remake of other programs that have nothing particularly Canadian about them.

In the area I represent, our main difficulty with the CBC concerns regional programming. In that regard, the minister was very firm recently when he said it was imperative for the CBC to move toward regional productions, that people might identify themselves with the content of their own network. One thing is sure: with the limited financial resources we grant the CBC, because after all our resources are limited—which often is not the case at the creation level—we do have to make choices.

However, in view of the main objective of the CBC and the difficulty of meeting this objective, in view of the terms of reference given to the corporation, I believe that it can be said that it has had a major success. We should consolidate further before thinking of dividing up the network. I am really surprised to hear my colleague opposite talk about dividing the network and having two separate units since his colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney), appeared like myself before the CRTC to object to CBC II and Tele II.

I believe that the CBC should not aim for an extended mandate at the present time, but should instead try to consolidate what it now has. I believe that all Canadians would be proud of an increased quality and unity in the contents of CBC programming. This is one of the major objectives of the CBC at the present time as a Canadian network, and we must do everything, not to divide the CBC, but rather to unify it and to ask it to consolidate its present assets to look further to the future.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired. Accordingly, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock p.m., the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) had the floor.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Mr. Speaker, before the private members' hour I stressed to hon. members the importance of listening to the people at the grass roots, something that many of us, primarily the Liberals opposite, have not done enough of, particularly when it comes to the constitutional debate. My public forums in the constituency of Halton, at Acton, Milton and Oakville, were well attended. The people there were representative of other parts of Canada. They really let me hear what they thought about the Constitution.

Without a doubt, they want the Constitution here. In fact, it should have been here years ago, but certainly not in the package that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Liberals introduced before this House and in the manner they introduced it.

People ask me why this Parliament has been preoccupied for nearly a year with the constitutional debate, virtually ignoring the important issues. That is the question. This was made clear to me in October of last year when I sent a questionnaire to my constituents. I asked them, "What, in your opinion, are the most important issues in Canada today?" The replies were as follows: inflation, 47.1 per cent; energy, 14.3 per cent; unemployment, 9 per cent; law and order, 8.1 per cent, and so on down the line until the Constitution, 3.5 per cent.

The results of this constituency poll, as hon. members know, were verified by a recent Gallup poll which clearly indicated that the majority of Canadians still consider inflation the number one problem, unemployment close behind, and the Constitution way down the line.

In the public forums where I speak in my travels across Canada I am asked why the elected representatives are preoccupied with this situation at this time when we are facing inflation at 12 per cent, unemployment of one million or more, and bankruptcies, the largest portion of which occur in the small business sector of our economy. In 1980 alone, they accounted for some $700 million in liabilities. That is a shocking increase when one considers that only ten short years ago the total dollar value was only $300,000.

Real wages in 1980 increased by 9.9 per cent, only to be eroded by a 15.2 per cent increase in the price of food. Almost two million person-days were lost as a result of strikes and lockouts in the last three months of 1980. The national debt soared to a projected $14 billion this year. These are some of the concerns about which Canadians ask me, their elected representative. I am sure they are asking the Liberal members as well.

Any sincere attempt to develop a true people's package, as the Prime Minister refers to it, not a Constitution package, should address itself to the real concerns of the Canadian people, those I have just stated. It would propose, not the removal of the constitutional guarantee to own property, for example, which is something I want to touch on a little later but, rather, fuel and shelter allowances or a mortgage rebate plan. It would demonstrate a willingness to come to an energy agreement with Alberta. It would spell out a national energy plan which would incorporate the wisdom of the business community rather than the philosophic edicts of bygone colleagues.

Having said that and having articulated what I know are the major concerns and priorities of the citizens of this nation, I would like to turn to the issue of patriation. My colleagues have referred to this before me, but I want to put something on record again because it is important to say it over and over so that the Liberals will go back to their ridings, listen to their people and come back to the House of Commons representing the wishes of their people. When the vote comes before this Parliament, I hope they will vote in a non-partisan way and on behalf of their constituents.

It would be convenient for the Prime Minister for political reasons to define positions on this resolution as being either for or against it. This distorted perception needs to be clarified again because clearly the government is making every attempt to tag those who do not go along with his constitutional proposals as being colonials. This is just another example of the Prime Minister's contempt of the Canadian people and another example of what he hopes will be a successful attempt to mislead a misinformed and manipulated multitude into overlooking the inadequacies of his package and to distort the efforts of those concerned about the dangerous precedents which will be set should this proposal proceed as the Prime Minister has planned. It is because of regard for the federalist principles upon which this nation has been founded and upon which assurances our provinces, partners, contracted into this federation that we are determined that no constitutional amendments that would create third-class provinces and give a permanent veto to central Canada will be accepted. The Prime Minister knows this. He also knows that the package as it now stands would never receive a consensus in Canada. This is why he is going to Westminster, not just to have the Constitution patriated, for there is a number of simple ways of proceeding with such a revision, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said earlier today. The Prime Minister is going to Westminster with the hope that the British government will see fit to pass what he knows will be unacceptable to the Canadian federation. In short, he has a separate set of rules for his favourite amendments. It is the Right Hon. Prime Minister who is the colonialist when he speaks this way.

I do not think it is unreasonable that we on this side of the House have asked that the convention of a century of Parliaments be recognized and the sovereignty of the provincial legislatures be recognized. This is what the Vancouver consensus proposes should be done. We know there is agreement throughout Canada for this process. We also know by instinct that no one man has the right to change our nation, to disregard convention or to destroy our federation just because he chooses to do so. Nor is it unreasonable to begin with the position that agreement can indeed be reached rather than assume that such is not possible.

The Prime Minister would like us to think that our federation has not worked. Many others before me have reminded us that it indeed has. Federal-provincial agreements have often been reached in the past. I refer, for example, to medicare, the Canada Pension Plan and equalization, to name a few. Agreements will continue to be reached in this country in the future, but not with the passage of the proposal before us. That is one of the reasons why Canadians disagree with this over-all proposal.

I know all members have received all sorts of letters from their constituents. I would like just to quote a few excerpts from the many letters which we have received, all opposing the resolution. I challenge a Liberal Member of Parliament to tell me that his constituents, in writing, through phone calls or by questionnaires such as the one I put to my constituents, agree with his proposals. In other words, I am suggesting that hon. members opposite will be voting against the wishes of their own constituents.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: We always wake them up when we tell the truth. That hurts them the most. It happens every time. Here is a letter from a constituent in Calgary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) has the floor.

Mr. Jelinek: The following is a quotation from a letter from a Canadian to me.

> Trudeau is bent on changing this country into a socialized dictatorship and you are the only people who can stop this fool . . . He is dividing the country to conquer it.

That is from Robert Moyer of Calgary. Here is part of another letter:

> Equal application of discriminatory rights is not the answer.

That is from Judy Alexander of Oakville. Here is another one:

> If Pierre changes our Constitution and then brings it home, what he is bringing home is not our Constitution but Pierre's Constitution. We are led to believe there is nothing we can do to stop this changed Constitution from arriving in Canada because Pierre was voted into power by a majority.

That is signed by Margaret Catchpole of Oakville. There is a point in that. This Canadian citizen voted for the Liberals, perhaps, but she did not give the Liberal government the mandate which the Prime Minister says he has in dealing with the Constitution. I did not hear him make great waves during the election campaign about the constitutional proposals and what he would do. In fact, I did not hear him say anything during the election campaign. However, what did remind me of his campaign promises in the last election campaign were those of Premier Lévesque of Quebec when he ran his last election campaign on the economy and not separatism but then reversed the situation.

I do not like quoting too much, but I must quote one part of an editorial for the benefit of the Liberal government, which is mostly comprised of Quebec members.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: We have read many editorials from Ontario, from the western provinces and from the maritimes. Here is one from Le Devoir, which usually supports the Liberals. I will read just a portion of it, as follows:

> If Mr. Trudeau wishes to be intellectually honest, he will recognize that he has no moral right to alter the federal system without consulting the country. Before going any further the Prime Minister should call a general election. It is essential that Canadians know clearly what future is being readied for them in Ottawa and London.

That is from an editorial in Le Devoir of October 16. There should be an election or even a referendum because when we are talking about the future of our country, the people should have a say, and they do not have a say when it comes to the benches opposite and to the majority of those left wingers to my left, with the exception of the four escapees and now their new supporter in Saskatchewan.

Allow me to become a little personal because this is relevant to this whole situation. My family and I escaped from a foreign country in which rights, privileges and freedoms were taken away. I speak of Czechoslovakia. There were five of us children and my parents. We left because we were bred on the strengths, opportunities and freedoms which used to exist in that country. When these disappeared, my father in his wisdom took the whole family, seven of us, out, with no money, to a new country where we could not speak the language. We did not know the new way of life in the new country. We came to the shores of Canada. Upon stepping onto the shores of Canada, I and my family fell in love with this country. We have loved this country dearly from the day we stepped onto its soil. It has given us many opportunities. It has given me opportunities in the fields of amateur sport, professional sport, business, the helping of disabled children, Big Brother organization and the list goes on. It was a country which provided the freedoms, hopes and aspirations of many Canadians like myself and my family. My reason for telling this story is very simple. We came to Canada because the freedoms were here—the freedom to move, the freedom to speak, the freedom to work, and freedom of the press.

● (2020)

Mr. Irwin: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: What does the hon. member opposite have to say about it? Why does he not rise and say what his constituents think about the Liberals opposing this? The Liberals are trying to tell me that Canada does not have these freedoms. They are trying to tell me that Canada has no freedoms, that we are not allowed to speak or to travel.

Mr. Portelance: What happened in Czechoslovakia?

Mr. Jelinek: Now an hon. member opposite is telling me to go back to Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Blais: That is not what he said.

Mr. Jelinek: That is a good Liberal! In that sense, if we compare—

[Translation]

Mr. Portelance: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member has not understood what we have said on this side of the House, I would advise him to read and pay attention to what we said previously. We would not want to see what happened in Czechoslovakia occur in Canada. This is what we said.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: They sound like a bunch of penguins over there. I have the Soviet constitution in front of me to which I should like to refer. It is amazing how similar it is to our Constitution. Section 2(a) of the proposed Canadian Constitution reads:

freedom of conscience and religion;

Article 52 of the Soviet constitution reads:

Citizens of the U.S.S.R. are guaranteed freedom of conscience, that is, the right to profess in any religion, and to conduct religion worship of atheistic propaganda.

Section 2(b) of Canada's Constitution reads:

Freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication;

Article 50 of the Soviet constitution reads:

In accordance with the interests of the people and in order to strengthen and develop the socialist system, citizens of the U.S.S.R. are guaranteed freedom of speech, of the press, of assembly, meetings, street processions and demonstrations.

It goes on and on. Elections shall be equal; each citizen shall have one vote; all voters shall exercise the franchise on an equal footing. All the rights which are supposed to be entrenched in our Constitution are in the constitution of the Soviet Union. They are very similar, to the point where the right to own property is not included in either constitution. The Prime Minister does not want to include it and the Liberals refused to accept the amendments of my party. It is interesting to note that both these constitutions do not include property rights. Therefore, is it any wonder that the Kremlin or the Soviet Union, through its official newspaper Pravda, has finally thrown its support behind the Prime Minister and the Liberal government?

Some hon. Members: Naturally.

Mr. Jelinek: Is that a coincidence?

Mr. Blais: Tell us about Bill Davis.

Mr. Jelinek: If I had had more time, I would have dealt in more detail with the right to own property in this country, which is why many people came here. If certain rights are not entrenched in the Constitution, obviously they will disappear in the future.

Mr. Blais: Oh, come on.

Mr. Jelinek: If not, why is the government not entrenching them? Can they tell me that?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: They will not tell me. I do not have the time to deal with that matter, primarily because of the many interruptions of the Liberals during my brief remarks.

For the record, I should like to refer to some of the statements of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) who is present in the chamber. In chronological order, on June 25 last year, the Prime Minister stated that he did not discuss the problem of lack of consensus in Canada with Mrs. Thatcher. He said:

Well, that's a hypothesis I did not ask her to examine and I don't believe she did examine—

On September 26, press reports of the London talks indicated that only the technical aspects of patriation were discussed. On October 30, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that Mrs. Thatcher was informed of the possibility of disagreement in Canada, but he led us to believe that the British did not see any problem. He went on to say:

—there was a common assumption that on both sides that the normal constitutional convention would be followed.

On October 31, the same minister reaffirmed his position of October 30. Then on January 22, the Prime Minister told us in a press conference that he informed Mrs. Thatcher of the charter and of the possibility of disagreement in Canada on June 25. He told her on June 25 that the government would not get support—or so he said—so she knew.

Some people could refer to these inconsistencies as flip-flops. God only knows the Liberals have had enough of those. We do not have to go all the way back to 1974, at which time the Liberals said that we would never have wage and price controls, and a few months later they imposed much tougher wage and price controls than this party would have recommended.

I could refer to the recent election campaign when they said, "Do not vote for the Tories because they will increase the price of gasoline by 18 cents." Since last year, as all of us who buy gasoline at the gas pumps know, the price of 18 cents per gallon of gasoline has roughly doubled.

Some hon. Members: Even more than that.

Mr. Jelinek: Yes, even more than that. The Liberals know what a flip-flop is. We can compare the June 25 statement of the Prime Minister to the one of January 22. It was not tongue in cheek, as the Prime Minister likes to say. He said that perhaps he was less than candid. It was not less than candid. He lied, he lied to the Canadian people and he lied to the media. We have a Prime Minister who lies to the country and gets away with it. In any other country, like the United States and elsewhere, a leader of the government would be impeached for lying to the people, especially in regard to an important situation like the future of the country. I challenge the Prime Minister to either withdraw his statement—

Mr. Blais: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am dismayed with the comments of the hon. member. He is using unparliamentary language and I would ask him to abstain from doing so in the future and to withdraw the allegations and statements that he made in unparliamentary terms. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that you will ask the assistance of the clerks of the Table to have the member himself withdraw from the House or withdraw his offensive comments.

● (2030)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister has raised a question of language used by the hon. member which is unparliamentary. In particular, reference to lies, I believe, would be construed as unparliamentary. Is the hon. member prepared to withdraw those allegations?

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I still have a few minutes left. The minister says that he is dismayed by my unparliamentary language, to use his words.

An hon. Member: Withdraw!

Mr. Jelinek: Be quiet for one second and listen.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Jelinek: The minister says that he is dismayed by what he refers to as unparliamentary language. I, and Canadians, are dismayed by the Prime Minister's language.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I invite the hon. member who is making his point to consider that certain references are generally accepted as unparliamentary. That particular expression is unparliamentary. If the hon. member could rephrase his remarks to avoid an unparliamentary expression, I invite him to do so.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, my conscience does not allow me to withdraw something which I believe in very strongly.

An hon. Member: Resign!

Mr. Jelinek: Anyone who knows the facts, Mr. Speaker, knows that the Prime Minister lied. My conscience will not allow me to withdraw that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I invite the hon. member, in the tradition of this House and the customs which have prevailed, to consider the language he has chosen. I invite him to restate his remarks.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the Prime Minister has acted in an unparliamentary way by twisting truths and by lying. I cannot possibly withdraw my statement.

Some hon. Members: Resign!

Mr. Blais: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want to direct the hon. gentleman from Halton (Mr. Jelinek) to some of his own words which he used earlier in his speech when he related how his own family had left a country called Czechoslovakia because rights had been infringed upon. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to recognize that he is infringing upon the traditional rights of all members of this House and this democratic institution. By his behaviour he is directing himself toward that sort of abuse from which his own family fled, from a country in which they felt they could no longer live. I suggest to him that if he respects the institutions and the traditions of Canada and our parliamentary institution, he ought to accede to the requests that the Speaker has made of him, and do so promptly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. When the Prime Minister tells an untruth and then covers it up by saying that he said it with tongue in cheek, he is doing exactly what the hon. member says he is doing. On the rules—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With respect to the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor)—

Mr. Taylor: Would you let me finish, please, Mr. Speaker?

The rules of the House are that a member cannot say those words. I suggest the hon. member accept the ruling of the Chair, since that does not change any of the facts.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I appreciate the intervention of the hon. member for Bow River.

Again, I would ask the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) if he has anything he wishes to say.

The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) on a point of order.

Mr. Blenkarn: No, Mr. Speaker. I believe the hon. member for Halton has ceased speaking. I think that—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As far as the Chair is concerned, the hon. member for Halton still has the floor. There are certain matters which must be considered.

Mr. Jelinek: Thank you for extending my time, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Jelinek: Let me say to hon. members opposite that Mr. Speaker has just recognized me.

I began my remarks by saying that we should listen to the grassroots, to Canadians as a whole, from coast to coast. We should listen to their wishes. Before the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) arrived in the chamber, I had quoted some statistics which show that the majority of Canadians are opposed to the unilateral—

Mr. Chrétien: Not true.

Mr. Jelinek: The minister says "not true." A Gallup poll which came out, and all forms of other questions—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I invite the hon. member to deal with the serious matter of the language he has used. I invite the hon. member to rephrase his remarks regarding the allegation that another hon. member of the House has lied. I have ruled that this is unparliamentary.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, my conscience has already told me what to do in this regard. I already made it very clear that I am unable to do so for the very reasons which I stated earlier. If I am allowed to continue and finish my remarks, I will be happy to take that opportunity.

Mr. Chrétien: No way!

Mr. Knowles: I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if I could make a personal appeal to the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) with respect to this matter. He has already stated it is his intention to stand firm. I know that it may seem difficult for him in view of that to change his opinion. But I ask him to show, as he so often does, respect for this place.

One of the advantages that we have here is that we can hit back and forth as hard as we want. We can argue until we are blue—or red—in the face. Confrontation, and all of that, is in order. But in order to keep the place going we have established certain lines which we will not cross over. I would like to say to the hon. member that we appreciate very much how difficult it may now be for him but that we will greatly respect him if he will agree to the request of the Chair and make it possible for us to avoid any unpleasant scene.

I am not getting into the argument. I am not discussing what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said. I just make the personal appeal to the hon. member for Halton to do something for which we would all greatly respect him.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I add my personal appeal to that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)? It is not a matter of an individual's conscience, it is a matter of the rules and procedures by which hon. members govern themselves in this House. The precedents are clear, and in my opinion the citation is abundantly clear concerning language which is parliamentary or unparliamentary. I invite the hon. member to rephrase his remarks.

• (2040)

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, as you know, I have, and always have had, in my eight years or more as a Member of Parliament, due respect for the Chair, and I certainly have as much respect for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). But, Mr. Speaker, when we are talking about something that has happened, and is true, what would my conscience say if I suddenly had to back down and say: What I said, I did not really mean, or we can resort to flipflops or speak tongue in cheek, as the Prime Minister said? I cannot do that, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to you, to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and to all hon. members of this House.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think that under the circumstances, I have no choice but to ask Your Honour to move that the hon. member, according to the rules, be suspended from the House of Commons.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Jelinek, I have to name you for disregarding the authority of the Chair. I invite you to withdraw from this place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Maybe the Prime Minister will stop talking with tongue in cheek.

An hon. Member: Maybe he should be named. There are different ways to say "a liar".

And Mr. Jelinek having withdrawn:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton).

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I think it is customary, Mr. Speaker, under the written rules, that when a speaker is named in person, the leading member on the government side, the House leader, has to move a motion which must be accepted by the House before the hon. member has to leave.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) has said is correct in terms of what is usually done. But since, in this case, the hon. member for Halton withdrew without a motion being put to ask him to withdraw, do we need go any further? I do not think we want any unpleasantness. Why do we not let it rest at that?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has a point well taken. The Chair has no authority to request a direct motion. In the circumstances, all the Chair can do is to recognize the hon. member for Mississauga South.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I hate to correct the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but the precedents are very clear that when a member is named by the Speaker, it is the responsibility, under the customs of this House, for the government House leader or the Prime Minister, or whoever is sitting in his place at the time, to move a motion and have it passed by the House before the matter is complete, because the motion must include certain things.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's point is well taken. However, there is no direction that the motion must be presented immediately. If there is a decision to present such a motion, it would be usual to assume that there might be a few minutes needed in which to prepare it. Is the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) seeking the floor?

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, on the same question, on the point of order that is before the Chair at the moment, it would seem to me that if the hon. member who has left the House is in error in not following the rules of this House by retracting what he said, then it would likely be true that the Chair could give serious consideration to the precedents, the rules of this House, which indicate that in order for what has happened to happen, a motion from the government side, or from some member of this House, that the member leave the House, would have to be moved.

Now two wrongs do not make a right. I would suggest that if it is Mr. Speaker's intention to delay the point at which this motion is presented, I should like to know the time-frame for such a delay.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it is usual to have a motion in such circumstances. A motion was moved, and it was on the receipt of the motion that Your Honour then requested the hon. member to retire, after naming him.

An hon. Member: There was no motion.

Mr. MacGuigan: In those circumstances, the hon. member having already left, there is no way in which any irregularity of procedure can now be undone. The hon. member had to make his case and others had to make his case while he was still here. At this point, even if there were an irregularity in the procedure, I would submit, Your Honour, that that cannot now be undone, and, the hon. member having left, the matter must be considered closed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I must repeat that the precedents are very clear. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) stood in his place and suggested that you move the motion. That is impossible. The Minister of Justice, representing the government, has to move a motion before this matter is legal. Nothing else must interfere until that is done.

Mr. Chrétien: No, no. I said that I was sorry, but I had no other choice, being the ranking member of the cabinet, but to move at this time that he be named, as you did, Mr. Speaker. I had that very unpleasant responsibility because of my rank in the cabinet.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I concur with what the minister has said. I believe that the member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) is correct in citing the precedent. I believe that what we have is a situation where the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) has voluntarily withdrawn. I imagine it could be interpreted to mean that now that he has voluntarily withdrawn, he could come back tomorrow, and I think that is where the matter rests, unless those who want to raise it at a more appropriate time do so.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Now that the Minister of Justice has moved his motion, that is correct. He has not put into the motion the duration of the suspension because the whole matter is not legal, under our rules.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair heard the Minister of Justice rise to propose a motion that the hon. member be named. The Chair decided to name the hon. member. Under the circumstances, the Chair felt there was really no option, and the hon. member has left the chamber at the invitation of the Chair. The Chair will consider any further motions if and when received. Meanwhile, the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Mississauga South.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) is a Member of Parliament who chose Canada. He was not born here. He chose Canada over Czechoslovakia. He chose the freedoms that all Canadians, native born and otherwise, have from our very heritage, and from the seed of our father's loin, the right to enjoy—

An hon. Member: Are your serious?

Mr. Blenkarn: Those freedoms and rights to express ourselves are very important. The hon. member for Halton was speaking with emotion. When, as a result of abusing the technical orders of the House, he removed himself, he left with the feeling that he was standing up for the freedoms of Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blenkarn: There is a tremendous interest in this country, in this Constitution of ours. The proposals were worked on through the summer when there was little interest in the Constitution. I suppose, in relation to the question of inflation, there is little interest, but there is a great number of people in Canada who are very seriously concerned with what we are doing here in this chamber.

● (2050)

This fall I sent 5,000 copies of the Unity Canada brochure containing constitutional proposals to my constituents. The proposals which were presented to the House in October were really propaganda pieces, intended to sell the Constitution. I did not care; I sent them out. I was not worried about the fact the government had flown Canada geese across the television screen; I sent out the proposals as they were, with the comment: "This is what the government is proposing to do with the Constitution in Canada, tell me what you think." My constituents told me. Eighty per cent of them were opposed to the process or to the details of it. I stand here tonight on behalf of the constituents of Mississauga South, and I suggest to the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) on behalf of the constituents of Mississauga in total, as a good portion of my correspondence comes from his riding as well.

An hon. Member: How many responses did you get?

An hon. Member: Four?

Mr. Blenkarn: It was not in the tens of letters; it amounted to tens of hundreds. We have a constitutional proposal, and most of the people of this country are opposed either to the ongoing process or its detail.

It is true that almost every one of my constituents wants the Constitution of Canada to be patriated. We want to feel, as Canadians, that the Constitution of this country is ours, and we do not want to be beholden to Britain. We respect the Queen and our British heritage, but Britain is now a foreign country to us. There is no reason to go to foreigners to patriate what is ours, to change what is ours, to plead, beg, grovel or demand that Mrs. Thatcher use a three-line whip.

People have raised issues about this. In my riding, some people came together and formed an association to protest this constitutional activity. I should like to read from a brief prepared by Bob Shapton, chairman of the Committee for Constitutional Awareness. The address is 1150 Haig Boulevard, Mississauga. In one place the brief indicates:

> It is our position that the current furore over the proposed amendments is an eloquent demonstration that Canadians do not want one man, one party, or one region's views enshrined as the new Canadian Constitution. It is only after a major consensus-building exercise has resulted in a common statement of purpose for this country, should we formulate a new constitution.

Much has been said about this process, so let us examine it. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) said that Canadians want the details of what is going into that package; the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that Canadians want the details of what is going into that package. They have both said that Canadians do not like a situation where in the process of what they are doing does not have the general support of Canadians. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice are saying that the end justifies the means. They say to us, "It does not matter how we do it. You like the end product, don't you?" I suppose in the last world war Canadians liked the end product when we evicted the Japanese in British Columbia, stole their property and sold it.

An hon. Member: Where was your party?

Mr. Blenkarn: It was the end justifying the means. When Hitler killed millions of Jews, it was the end justifying the means. Where was the member's party in that? Their claim is that the end justifies the means. Stalin said the end justified the means when he got rid of the kulaks.

An hon. Member: And Mussolini.

Mr. Blenkarn: So did Mussolini. Yes, the end justifies the means. It does not matter how one does it, the end justifies the means. That is what the Prime Minister said, that is what the Minister of Justice said, and that is the proposal before this House; the end is supposed to justify the means.

Let us go back and consider the history of this country. I come from the province of Ontario. We have always felt that we have two capitals. The capital of the province is Toronto, and we own the capital city of Ottawa. For a good part of this century we have had 40 per cent of the population of Canada and most of the industry in Canada. Ontarians basically feel that they own the capital city of Ottawa, so they have two capitals, and are therefore quite prepared to say that we should have a unitary state. When I ask my constituents, "Why don't we have a standard of education and a standard for workmen's compensation across Canada?", they reply, "Why don't we? We have the majority."

We in my province of Ontario can say that we are part of Canada, we own Canada. We can even summon up enough bravado to say that we can throw away any equalization grants to which me might be entitled because we are Canada, we are the province of Ontario.

One of the most important Ontarians, John A. Macdonald, the first prime minister of this country, was prepared to say, after he said he wanted a unitary state, that Canada must be a federal country. Because of our differences in cultures and attitudes we must be a federal country.

While some people in Ontario would be very happy to impose Ontario standards across Canada, it would be wrong because we have been in the past, and perhaps still are, the most prosperous province in the country. It will not work, it will not wash, it is not correct.

In a federal state, each province, whether it be Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, Saskatchewan or New Brunswick, a province with its hand out looking for a gift or worried about its fish, is equal in terms of jurisdiction. We in Ontario with our large population base, vast wealth, manufacturing industries and Pickering nuclear plant, must recognize that Canada is a federal state.

What will this Constitution and process do? It will tear apart the federal state, rip it asunder. After the proposal goes through the House, the bitterness, nastiness and divisiveness that should not exist will exist as never before.

● (2100)

Normally I do not quote the New Democratic Party, but I cannot help but quote from the brief of the province of Saskatchewan presented to the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution by the Hon. Allan Blakeney. At page 2 it reads:

In 1867, it was recognized that, in a country like Canada, only a federal form of government could work. Some may have desired a unitary state, but they knew it was not possible. Only a federal system could achieve union, while accommodating the great distances, the fierce regional loyalties, the linguistic and cultural differences, and the distinctive economies of the four uniting colonies. Only a federal system could achieve unity without imposing a totally unacceptable uniformity.

In 1867 we created a country, Canada, as a federation of four colonies with distinctive cultures, linguistic backgrounds, attitudes and ways of approaching our problems. We created two orders of government, both of which operate today in the name of the Queen. When statutes are passed in a province or regulations are promulgated, they are promulgated in the name of the Queen. The provinces are not subservient to the Dominion.

Last fall, there was an effort to work on constitutional proposals which, to some extent, had been hammered out over the summer. The Prime Minister said that there was no agreement and, to some extent, misled the House when he talked of 54 years of indecision. Let me again quote the Premier of the province of Saskatchewan. At page 6 of the brief he said:

I want to emphasize, though, that by September, 1980, after intensive negotiations, Canada's 11 governments had reached a significant measure of consensus on even the most contentious constitutional issues.

It would be pointless to speculate, here, on the reasons why governments failed to reach final agreement at last September's first ministers' conference. The point I want to make is that a negotiated agreement was within our grasp, and could have been achieved—with more time, with flexibility, and with good will on all sides. In deciding to proceed unilaterally, the federal government has brought an end to the process of federal-provincial negotiations. And it has done so not at a time when those negotiations were hopelessly bogged down, but at a time when progress had been made and might have been continued.

The Prime Minister did what he could with the Kirby memos and the rest of the documents to ensure that constitutional consensus between the federal government and the provinces would not work. Now he presents through his government a unilateral act which tries to destroy the basis of federalism.

I do not agree politically with the Premier of Saskatchewan. I have no use for socialism, but the evidence is that agreement was possible. Agreement was there, agreement was on the road. There is no reason why the agreement bogged down, except for the fact that the Prime Minister stated in the House that there was no possibility of agreement. The evidence is that there could have been agreement, but it was frustrated. The Prime Minister said there is justification for unilateral action and talked about 54 years during which we could not reach agreement.

The brief of the province of Saskatchewan continues:

What can be the justification for unilateral action? Many are offered. Most rely upon the failure of governments to reach agreement respecting patriation after repeated attempts since 1927.

But I remind you that the idea of entrenching a charter of rights was not discussed in 1927; it did not emerge until 40 years later. Some of the provisions of the particular charter contained in the resolution appeared only last summer; others were revealed for the first time only two months ago. Clearly, many of the provisions have not been subjected to any substantial period of public scrutiny. Similarly, the proposal for an amending formula involving a referendum has not been under discussion for 50 years. Indeed, it has not been under discussion for 50 weeks or even 50 days.

Amendments have been subject to some sort of process. We have had consultative process before in this country. We had it when the Constitution of Canada was amended to provide for the federal government's handling of unemployment insurance. Amendments to the Constitution were made in 1960 with respect to supplemental old age pensions. Recent amendments to the Constitution provided for the retirement of judges at age 75. Do not say for one moment that amendments to the Constitution of Canada have not been made without the consultative process.

Indeed, there have been no amendments in this century to the Constitution of Canada affecting the rights of a province without consultation. In the Thirtieth Parliament an attempt was made by the Government of Canada to amend without consultation the operation of the Senate of Canada in Bill C-60. This was taken to court and the right to amend the Constitution of Canada without consultation was thrown out by the Supreme Court of Canada.

One cannot help but wonder why the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Justice would not take what is now before the House of Commons to the Supreme Court of Canada for a ruling as to its legality. Is it illegal, is that the reason? The minister took Bill C-60 to the Supreme Court of Canada and it was thrown out. Is he afraid to take this process to the Supreme Court of Canada? The answer can only be yes, because the opinion of his law officers is that he might lose. Therefore, the House of Commons, the highest court of Canada, is being asked to look askance at what is being attempted.

Canada is a federal nation, a partnership of provinces or colonies joined together, the last one being Newfoundland, to form this Dominion. Those colonies turned over certain of their powers to a national government. The national government has no right in that arrangement to change those powers and responsibilities without massive consensus. I do not talk about absolute unanimity but about massive consensus.

When we look at this process, we must look at the fact that eight of the ten provinces are opposed to what is happening. Six of the ten are taking the federal government to court. I have received in my office an opinion poll by an independent business group. It reports that 20 are in favour of what the government is doing, 83 are opposed, and nine are undecided. What the government is doing is not acceptable to the people of Canada or to the vast majority of provinces of this country. It is abhorrent to the concept of federalism.

An hon. Member: What about Ontario?

Mr. Blenkarn: We will talk about that in a moment. The concept of this government is that the end justifies the means. I say to the Minister of Justice that if he had a Supreme Court of Canada ruling to the effect that the means he is proposing are legal, if he had all-party support in this House and massive consensus, say eight out of ten provinces, as the bill requires, for the amendment, perhaps then what he is doing would be correct. However, without legal approval, massive consensus of the provinces and all-party support in this House, there can be no justification for passing this resolution. This resolution is not a simple bill, a part of the Income Tax Act, or a change in the ordinary procedures of this House. This resolution attempts to change the very fabric of Canada.

Without massive consensus, all-party support and Supreme Court of Canada approval, this resolution cannot and must not be pushed through. It cannot be done simply because on February 18, 1980, 147 Liberal Members of Parliament were elected, almost entirely from central Canada, Ontario and Quebec, without a member west of Winnipeg. Just because the electoral system works that way, it does not entitle those opposite to force through with their majority basic changes in the fundamental rights of Canadians.

The Liberal majority was not created on that basis. Therefore, it does not have the right to use the weight of its vote to force on me, my children and my children's children a basic change in the Constitution of our country. It must have the massive support of the provinces and Canadians generally, and not just a majority. This resolution can only be put through with massive support right across Canada. If the government is not prepared to go for that, then government members must vote against this resolution because my kids and my kids' kids will not support them.

I want to talk about the referendum portion of the resolution for a moment. This constitutional proposal has provision for a referendum or plebiscite. These have only been held on three or four occasions in Canada, one in connection with prohibition, in connection with conscription and one, recently, in the province of Quebec. Each of those public opinion appeals have been the most divisive this country has ever known.

In the first plebiscite in connection with prohibition, the province of Quebec voted against the other provinces. It was very divisive, as was the one in connection with conscription, with the predominantly English-speaking provinces voting in favour and the province of Quebec voting against. Canada was torn apart. Canadians in one part of Canada were devided against Canadians in other parts.

One great problem with referendums is that the majority may be in favour but Canadians in one part of the country may be very much opposed. While a referendum is broken down into the four segments of Canada—the Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Ontario, and the west—we may run into the problem of one segment voting against the interests of the rest of Canada. We may be better off to have the provincial governments do the voting. I hate to say we should not consult the people because consulting the people looks democratic, but the history of Canada shows that referendums have been divisive. We need only go back to the referendum in Quebec where there are still hurts and anguish. The losers do not give up. They still yearn and hurt, and families yearn and hurt because of the result of the vote. We would be far better off to bury our differences with provincial governments rather than resort to the referendum technique, even though that technique may appear democratic.

Let me deal with the amendment provisions of this resolution. This resolution incorporates the Victoria formula founded in 1971 in Victoria, ten years ago. It is true that that formula had wide acceptance at that time. We would, in fact, have had an amendment procedure for this Constitution back in 1971 had the province of Quebec not reneged. But things have happened since 1971. Since 1971, the west has grown. It is like a young man breaking out at his shirt sleeves. The west is bursting its seams. It has the aggressiveness, the confidence and the drive young men often have. That part of the country is not satisfied with the Victoria formula any longer. In that part of the country, provinces have 10 per cent, 12 per cent or 15 per cent of the population now, but that part of the country is not happy to allow another part of the country, which today may have 25 per cent, but not tomorrow, a permanent veto. Some provinces in the west may have tomorrow 25 per cent of the population and the west wants equal status in confederation. On that basis, the Victoria formula will not work today. This is 1981. It will not work.

The province of Saskatchewan has advocated the formula of 80 per cent of the provinces with 80 per cent of the population. I can buy that, but I can tell hon. members what the provinces will buy, and that is the Vancouver formula. The provinces will all buy the Vancouver formula. Under that formula, two-thirds of the provinces with 50 per cent of the population can change the Constitution.

The only objection is the checkerboard effect that might have. That is the reason of the Prime Minister for refusing it. Let us talk about checkerboards for a moment. The whole country is a checkerboard. Our medicare rules are different from one province to another, our education rules are different, our workmen's compensation is different, our housing standards are different. Even the government's current bill before the House, Bill C-61 on juvenile offenders, is different from province to province. There is nothing at all in this country which is the same from province to province. There is nothing unusual about a checkerboard in Canada. We are used to it. The enforcement of every part of our Income Tax Act, and sometimes our Customs Tariff Act, is different from province to province. Do hon. members think that is strange? This is a vast country, and the way we look at things individually in Canada is different from one province to another or from one community to another. We are not upset about that. That is Canada. It is a checkerboard. I can make a right turn on a red light in one province but not in some others. The rules in this country change from one province to another and from one community to another. Hon. members opposite say we will create a checkerboard if we follow this system. That is nonsense. The truth of the matter is that the country is a checkerboard. Let us understand that. That is the very nature of the federal state of Canada.

If we want to build a constitution, we have to build a constitution which is acceptable across Canada. If some things are subject to a checkerboard, so what?

You are indicating, Mr. Speaker, that I have only two minutes left, so I will have to make a couple of points very quickly.

I want to deal with the preamble to this charter of rights. Under our coat of arms the following words appear: "A Mari Usque Ad Mare," from sea to sea. That is a quote from Psalm 72. "Dominion from sea to sea" is emblazoned in stone.

Let us deal with the charter of rights for a moment. There was a refusal in the committee to allow the preamble of the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights. That bill of rights talks about affirming that Canada is a nation founded on the principles of the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person, and the position of the family in a society of free individuals and free institutions. I want to say to hon. members opposite that except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it. I want to say to hon. members opposite that if they refuse a preamble in the charter of rights which talks about the importance of the Creator or the importance of God in our society, then they are labouring in vain because their charter of rights will not stand up and will not be something Canadians will respect. It will do them no good, and while hon. members opposite may vote to ram it through and while they may use diplomatic pressure to push Great Britain to approve it for them, they labour in vain with that charter of rights without a preamble referring to God, the family and the purpose for which we are here as Canadians.

May I be allowed to make one more point, Mr. Speaker? As a Member of Parliament and as a lawyer I know that people came to this country from Europe to buy and own land. I remember their coming to my law office with paper bags containing ten dollar bills and twenty dollar bills to buy their first pieces of property. And hon. members opposite refuse to put the freedom to own property in a charter of rights! How can they possibly vote for this package without its containing the right to own land, the right of the people, who came from the tenant farms of eastern Europe, to own land, to be in Canada and to stand on their feet here, and the right for them to say they are free to own property? That that does not matter is impossible for me to believe. Hon. members opposite deny their heritage.

You are indicating to me, Mr. Speaker, that I have no more time. I have a lot more to say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson).

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I take part in this historic debate on the Constitution of Canada. I want to say that I am proud to have served as a member of the special committee on the Constitution. It was an historic committee in many ways. I want to commend the outstanding work of the members of that committee from all parties and particularly that of the outstanding chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal). He guided that committee with wisdom over many, many hours—and troubled waters in many cases. I want to pay particular tribute to the work done by a number of other individual members, including the Constitution critic of the Conservative Party, Senator Austin from the other place and a man who was not a member of the committee but who appeared day in and day out, the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien).

• (2130)

As members of that committee, we heard witnesses from all provinces in Canada and from the Territories, from women's groups, native groups, civil liberties groups and Canadians all across the land.

It is very important that it be clearly understood that the resolution we are debating in Parliament tonight was made in Canada and shaped by Canadians. It is an insult to those Canadians who appeared before the committee and laboured long and hard on briefs to suggest that this work is not being done here in Canada by Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): We listened with great interest to the representations made before that historic committee. I should like to backtrack just a moment, if I may, to about four months ago when the government presented Parliament with a proposed constitutional resolution. There were four major elements in that proposed resolution. The first was patriation. I do not think anyone in this chamber would suggest that the time has not come when Canadians should be able to amend their Constitution in Canada and should not have to go on bended knee to Britain to ask for changes to their Constitution. The second was an amending formula. Of course, there must be some way of changing the Constitution of Canada once we get it home. The third was the principle of equalization, one of those principles which is particularly important to this party. This party, and the CCF before it, have fought for it long and hard. It is the principle that right across this land there should be a certain basic standard of services. The rich and the poor should all have access to adequate health care, to education and to decent housing. Surely that is a principle which all Canadians must espouse. Finally, with respect to a charter of fundamental rights and freedoms including language rights, while there can be debate on the substance of what should be included in a charter of rights, I suggest that in this day and age, after the long course of history and the many attempts which have been made to entrench a charter of rights in Canada, surely the time has come to move, and to move now, to recognize that Canadians all over the land have fundamental rights and freedoms which no government can arbitrarily take away.

I recognized these principles and their importance four months ago. However, I voted against sending this package to the constitutional committee. I was the only New Democrat to do so at the time because I had very grave concerns, particularly about the charter of rights. It was a document which was described by many at the time as being one which would be better left on the table. In fact, had that charter of rights been entrenched, in many ways Canadians would have been worse off. There was no protection in that charter of rights for the handicapped; there was no recognition of the right of equality for women; there were no provisions for remedies in that proposed charter of rights. The War Measures Act could have been enacted tomorrow under this charter of rights in exactly the same terms. Above all, there was nothing in that charter of rights to recognize the rights of the aboriginal peoples of the country. It was the view of this party that this was our last opportunity and that were we not to act at that point in our history and were we to delay in recognizing aboriginal rights, we would have betrayed the trust of the aboriginal peoples of this country.

My party and I had concerns about the process, about the invocation of closure at a very early stage and about the denial of the opportunity to televise proceedings, for which we had to fight. During his trip to western Canada, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) suggested that somehow western Canadians were incapable of using reason and resorted only to passion. He accused them of hysteria, which made it no easier to deal with this particular proposal. Then, of course, there was the December 9 deadline, which turned out to be completely unworkable. It was extended by two months, largely as a result of the demands of group after group that they had the right to be heard.

The resolution went to committee; we heard many witnesses. What emerged is a different document in many ways. It is so different now that, despite my very serious initial concerns with respect particularly to the charter of rights—and I will elaborate on them in a moment—I support this proposed resolution. As a result of the changes we have made, the role my party has played in this process and because in many ways it is a different document, I intend to support the proposed constitutional resolution when it comes to a final vote provided, as my leader said, there is a full and fair debate in the House of Commons, there are no adverse amendments, no sudden changes and no introduction of amendments on Friday, the effects of which are taken away on Monday. I intend to support this resolution, provided those conditions are met. I view the role my party played as being a constructive and positive one. It will be with pride that I will support this resolution at third reading.

Before I examine the role the New Democratic Party has played in this process, I should like to say a few words about the suggestion of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and certain other Conservative members that a bill of rights is something new and that this is a recent decision made by one man who is attempting to foist his views on Canada. I should like to examine briefly the history of attempts in this country in the last four decades to achieve a constitutional bill of rights and to put to rest, once and for all, any suggestion that this is the work of one man. These rights are too important to be left to one prime minister or to parliamentarians generally. They belong to all Canadians; Canadians have been fighting for a long time to achieve these rights.

It was in 1947 that the first joint Senate-House of Commons committee was established to look into the question of a United Nations charter of rights and freedoms and what we might do in Canada. Also, in 1947 the province of Saskatchewan, under Tommy Douglas, enacted a bill of rights. In 1948, the United Nations enacted a universal declaration of human rights, and Canada played a part in that decision. In 1950, a Senate committee considered the whole question of entrenching rights and freedoms in the Canadian Constitution. At that time, three decades ago, over 50 national organizations appeared before that committee asking to entrench fundamental rights and freedoms. Then in 1960, there was the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights. I think Members of Parliament should be aware of certain developments behind the scenes of which perhaps they were not aware. There was a special committee at that time which considered that bill, but in January of 1959, the then premier of Saskatchewan, Tommy Douglas, wrote the then prime minister, Mr. Diefenbaker, saying that the time had come for a constitutional amendment in this country to entrench fundamental rights and freedoms.

So, it was not the present Prime Minister who was the great pioneer in this area. If anyone was a pioneer, it was Tommy Douglas who fought in 1959 to entrench these fundamental rights in the Constitution of Canada. When in 1960 the CCF moved to entrench these rights and freedoms in the Constitution, and not just to have an ordinary bill, two parties opposed it—the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party. It was the CCF which was the pioneer in an attempt to entrench fundamental rights and freedoms in Canada.

To show hon. members how far we have moved, the committee which considered the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights in 1960 sat without any interpreters. There were no interpreters then for French or English, and there were no reporters at that committee who understood the French language. We have come a long way.

Witnesses appeared before that committee on the question of a charter of fundamental rights and freedoms. One of the witnesses who appeared was a representative from the Canadian Labour Congress. The Canadian Labour Congress had fought long and hard since its founding in 1956 for a constitutionally entrenched bill of rights. One of the witnesses who appeared on behalf of the Canadian Labour Congress at that time was the man who now sits as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I am proud to say that he played a role back then, two decades ago, in pressing for a constitutionally entrenched bill of rights. That was long before the present Prime Minister was actively involved in politics.

Another man who played an active role was a very distinguished Canadian, Frank Scott. He was honoured only this past weekend for his contributions in this area. Frank Scott made representations to the committee in 1950 and also to the committee which considered the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights in 1960. There was a federal-provincial conference in July, 1960, but no further action was taken.

In view of some of the remarks which have been made about God in this proposed Constitution, I think we should study our history a little more carefully than have other hon. members on this side. I reject any suggestion that we play politics with something as important as freedom of religion. I suggest that is what other members on this side of the House are doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Conservative members have suggested that the Conservative Bill of Rights, the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights, contained a reference to the supremacy of God. I suggest to them that when the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights was introduced in committee, there was no reference to the supremacy of God. The Conservative Party then did not believe that this was a fundamental matter.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): It was a Liberal member who introduced an amendment on the last day of the committee hearings to entrench that in the Constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Let us expose this hypocrisy for exactly what it is. If members of the Conservative Party are serious about entrenching freedom of religion, why are they not prepared to take the next step? Why do they say it belongs only in the preamble? They will not entrench freedom of religion, they say it is up to the provinces to decide.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): We can have God in New Brunswick, but maybe not in Manitoba. We can have God in British Columbia, but maybe not in Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): That is their formula. That is what they mean when they talk about freedom of religion.

I come from a family which is very deeply religious. My mother held deep religious beliefs before her death. For anyone in this chamber to suggest that, because my personal views are that we should respect freedom of conscience, in some way I am denying freedom of religion, I suggest is an insult not only to myself as a member but to all other Canadians in this pluralistic society, this great society which recognizes the rights of all minorities in Canada. They are playing politics with God!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the debates have gone on. In 1968 there was a first ministers' conference which involved a discussion of a charter of rights. In 1971 there was the Victoria Conference. In 1972 there was the Molgat-MacGuigan committee. In 1978 there was Bill C-60. In 1979 there was another first ministers' conference. In 1980 there was another first ministers' conference. How much longer do Canadians have to wait before we can finally have a charter of fundamental, basic rights? Surely that time has come.

Let no one be under any illusions; we have been trying for years to achieve a statement of fundamental rights and freedoms. The Conservative Party suggests that the only way we will achieve this is through unanimity. I will come to their amending formula in a few minutes.

Before I do so, however, I would like to turn to the role which has been played by my party, the New Democratic Party, in the process of constitutional change. I am proud of the changes we were able to achieve in the areas of resource control equalization, and the amending formula, but I am particularly proud of the changes we were able to achieve in the charter of rights.

What were those changes? Where was the Conservative party when these changes were being made? The committee heard from many groups. I have a list of a few of them here. We heard from the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, the Association of the Mentally Retarded, the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, the Canadian National Institute for the Blind and la Fédération des Francophones hors Québec on minority language and educational rights. We heard from Indian, Inuit and Metis groups, the National Association of Japanese-Canadians, the United Church of Canada, and many, many others. As a result of these representations and as a result of the work done behind the scenes and in committee by members of the New Democratic Party, on January 12 the Minister of Justice tabled extensive amendments. Prior to January 12, where were members of the Conservative Party? Where did they stand on these questions? Where did they stand with respect to a charter of rights? They stood silent. They said not a word in this House on changes to the charter of rights. That is their commitment to the question of a charter of rights. During the course of our deliberations not one speaker referred to the charter.

What were some of the changes we were able to achieve? The proposed constitutional resolution was one. We were able to achieve fundamental changes in the legal rights sections. Clause 1, which was dubbed by many the "Mark truck clause" or the escape clause, was significantly tightened as a result of pressure from the New Democratic Party and from many witnesses who appeared before the committee. Where did members of the Conservative Party stand on Clause 1? They stood silent. They said not a word.

Clauses 8, 9 and 11(d) theoretically deal with entrenching, freedom from arbitrary arrest or arbitrary search and seizure. We moved amendments in these areas. Witnesses appeared before us. The government moved to strengthen that area. Where did members of the Conservative Party stand in this important area? Silent; they said not a word.

Clause 11(c) deals with protection from self-discrimination. We in the NDP pushed for changes in this area. Many witnesses appeared. Where did members of the Conservative Party stand with respect to protection from self-incrimination? Silent; they said not a word.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Trial by jury is one of the fundamental rights Canadians have taken for granted. We pushed, and pushed hard, to entrench the right to trial by jury. We were supported by the Civil Liberties Association and others in this regard. Where did the Conservative Party stand with respect to the right to trial by jury? Silent; they said not a word about this fundamental right.

Clause 15 deals with equality rights. Initially, it was a very weak section. We in the NDP pushed, and pushed hard, to strengthen this section to guarantee equal rights for women and for the handicapped, and to strengthen the affirmative action provisions. Prior to the committee's considering these particular amendments, where did members of the Conservative Party stand? We will read Hansard in vain to see any expression of concern about women's rights by the Conservative Party in this debate.

Where did the Conservative Party stand on the suggestions made by many witnesses that we had to put some teeth into this proposed charter of rights? We proposed a section which would provide tough and effective remedies. The government accepted that section. Where did members of the Conservative Party stand with respect to a need for a remedies section in the proposed charter of rights? We heard not a whisper from them.

Most important are aboriginal rights. We heard from group after group of native people, Indians, Inuit and Metis. We heard Edward Scott, church groups and civil liberties groups. They all appeared before us and said that if we did not move now to recognize the fundamental rights of Canada's native peoples, we would never, ever achieve those rights.

● (2150)

My colleague, the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Island (Mr. Manly), and other members of this party fought long and hard to achieve recognition of aboriginal rights in the Constitution. Where do members of the Conservative Party stand on aboriginal rights? On January 12 they tabled certain amendments they felt should be proposed. Aboriginal peoples will look in vain for any suggestion that members of the Conservative Party felt that their concerns were important because they did not table one single amendment to recognize the aboriginal rights of Canada's aboriginal people.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): That was their commitment to aboriginal peoples in Canada. It was a proud moment when the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) moved on behalf of the New Democratic Party an amendment to entrench aboriginal and treaty rights in the Constitution. Prior to that, the Conservative Party was almost silent on the question of aboriginal and treaty rights. The Tories voted against the amendments and the mobility rights which were proposed by my party and supported by aboriginal peoples. They voted against provisions in clauses 15 and 21 which would have protected and recognized the special status of aboriginal peoples in this country. I am proud of the role my party has played in recognizing the fundamental rights of the aboriginal peoples of this country.

An hon. Member: And with good reason.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I would like to quote from a brief which was submitted to us. There were many briefs submitted to us on behalf of the aboriginal peoples, but I believe one of the most moving was from the Nishga native people of my own province. They said:

> We perceive that you and the Parliament hold what may be the last key to the Nishga people being treated with justice by the white majority of our nation.
> There will be no entrenchment after patriation.
>
> The claim to aboriginal title to land is based on the time immemorial occupation by the Nishgas of the Nass Valley. At no time were the Nishgas the subject of conquest; at no time were they the subject of treaty. The Royal Proclamation of 1763 set out how governments were to respect the concept of native ownership of lands unextinguished by treaties.
> You, as a committee, and the Parliament of Canada, hold the onerous responsibility of charting the future course of aboriginal title and the issue of aboriginal title in this country.
> The Nishgas' destiny is in your hands.

The government has responded to the Nishgas and the other aboriginal groups in this country, but it did not respond to the Conservative Party because the Conservative Party said that this was not a priority to them. That party tabled no amendment on aboriginal rights.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Those were the fundamental changes which were made to this package, and I recognize that other changes could have been made. The minister knows we proposed a number of amendments in the areas of strengthening the provisions for women's rights and legal rights, for example, to include the right to a fair hearing. We suggested the addition of a commitment to economic rights and strengthening the equality rights provision to prohibit discrimination on the basis of marital status, sexual orientation or political belief. We have come a long way from the day the government initially tabled its resolution.

What do members of the Conservative Party want to do with the charter of rights? What they want to do, as my colleague said, is play checkers. They say, "Split the package; send the charter to the provinces."

We heard the Leader of the Opposition say this afternoon, "Maybe the provincial governments' attitudes will change.

Maybe they will listen to the people." We have not heard anything from the premiers on this important question. A couple of weeks ago, six premiers met. I believe it was in Montreal. They had an opportunity then to say that they recognize the concerns of aboriginal people, the handicapped and women, but they could not even decide on an agenda for their meeting. We know very well that by sending back the charter of rights to the premiers, the charter of rights will be killed.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): We know where the premiers stand. We know where Sterling Lyon, the Premier of Manitoba, stands on the charter of rights. He said that we have not:

—had the experience of significant rights, entrenched in the Constitution, inhibiting the development of new rights, such as the rights of handicapped people, or the right to privacy.

In other words, we should not be putting the rights of the handicapped in the Constitution because we have no experience with them. Mr. Lyon says it is not the Canadian way to give Canadians fundamental rights and that:

Manitoba's position was broadly supported by a majority of the provinces.

He says that entrenchment of rights is contrary to traditional and successful parliamentary government and that:

There is no historical justification for the entrenchment of a charter of rights—

The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition says maybe we can change Premier Lyon's mind.

An hon. Member: If you can find it.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I have a very simple question for the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. What evidence does he have that Premier Lyon is prepared to change his mind today? Is he prepared to allow the hopes and aspirations of the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are handicapped, and the aboriginal peoples, women's groups and others to depend on the whims of Premier Lyon of Manitoba? I say no. I say we should move on this charter today, and move with pride.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I see that I have a couple of minutes before calling it ten o'clock, but I would like also to say that there are two provinces which support a charter of rights. One of them is Ontario, and we know what would happen if we were to send a charter of rights back to Ontario. We know all too well what would happen, because the man who was responsible for initially writing the section on legal rights was none other than the deputy attorney general for the province of Ontario. We heard from Rodrick McLeod, the assistant deputy attorney general, who said that the charter of rights was too strong in its initial form.

We say that these rights do not belong to provincial premiers. Fundamental rights do not belong to provincial premiers or the Prime Minister of this country. They certainly do not belong to the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Great Britain. Fundamental rights and freedoms belong to all Canadians, and not just to the politicians of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): We do not believe, for a moment, that we should send that charter of rights back to the premiers who, only four months ago, said they wanted nothing to do with it.

If the Tories really believe in a charter of rights, why are they playing this game of smoke and mirrors with Canadians and suggesting, on the one hand, that they want to raise the hopes of the handicapped and others but, on the other hand, saying, "Just a minute; we are not prepared to impose it?" Either they believe in the rights of Canadians or they do not. I have seen no evidence that they have any commitment to those rights in which they pretend to believe.

An hon. Member: Your eyesight is good.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Then there is the Conservative amending formula, the checkerboard formula. I would like to take a couple of minutes to discuss the checkerboard formula, but I see that it is ten o'clock, and I will reserve my comments for tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS—REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN INTEREST RATE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, on January 22, I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), in connection with Canada Savings Bonds, to be fair to the ordinary people of Canada and pay them an interest rate on their savings which would be appropriate to his high interest rate policy. At that time the minister said "—of course we intend to be fair to those who have purchased bonds." Since January 22, when I asked that question, the minister and the government have refused to be fair. At the present time, the interest paid on Canada Savings Bonds is 11.5 per cent. Just this week the government placed $700 million worth of ordinary bonds on the bond market at 13.75 per cent. A number of bond issues are presently selling with an interest rate in excess of 14 per cent and the government is paying pretty close to 17 per cent on its treasury bill indebtedness. It pays 13.5 per cent to the big insurance companies, the sophisticated lenders, and nearly 17 per cent to the big banks, those which can afford to buy treasury bills.

To the ordinary people of Canada, the people the government conned into buying Canada Savings Bonds as an investment in the country, the government pays 11.5 per cent. The ordinary people who bought their bonds because they were an investment in Canada, for some strange reason believed the propaganda put out by the government. Until now they also believed the minister when he said in this House, as reported at page 6449 of Hansard "—of course, we intend to be fair—."

What is fair about that when you can get 13 or 13.5 per cent at a bank, and when you can buy one year bills at a trust company and get 14 per cent or better? What is fair about the government's intention? The answer is, nothing. Since January 1, about a billion dollars worth of Canada Savings Bonds have been redeemed. Because interest is calculated on the first day of every month, there will be another massive redemption next week. My calculations show that $968 million worth of Canada Savings Bonds have been redeemed since January 1 and there will likely be massive redemptions after March 1, a Sunday.

It is not just the people of Canada with whom I ask the minister to be fair, in terms of investing in Canada Savings Bonds. These bonds are a very expensive way for the government to borrow money. In floating an issue, the government pays commissions equal to 1 per cent of the bonds. In addition, it pays for massive advertising, printing and other things involved in the cost of a bond issue.

The parliamentary secretary is in the House tonight to answer my question, and I suspect that he can confirm that the cost of raising money through Canada Savings Bonds is close to 1.5 per cent. The billion dollars worth of Canada Savings Bonds redeemed between January 1 and today represents a massive cost to all of us; not just to the people lending money at an inadequate rate of interest but to the whole of Canada, those who have to pay for inept financial management.

On January 22, I suggested to the minister that he raise the interest rate on Canada Savings Bonds to 12.5 per cent. The minister has not done that, so we continue to get massive CSB redemptions. According to the Bank of Canada statement dated February 19, year over year we have had $1.923 billion worth of Canada Savings Bonds redeemed. The minister said to me and to members in this House that it was because he intended to be fair. However, the minister refuses to be fair. He wants to be able to borrow the savings of Canadians and gyp them by telling them that they are getting a good deal. He does not want to give them what they can get in a bank account or a savings plan.

The government has an obligation to come clean with Canadians. It can either pay Canadians a fair rate of interest on their savings, or induce them into handing their money over to a government which does not even give them 12 per cent interest, which is the rate of inflation.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in his question of January 22 to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) noted that $261 million in Canada Savings Bonds were redeemed during the week ending January 14, 1981. In view of this rather high rate of CSB redemptions related to the high level of interest rates generally, the hon. member asked what the minister was prepared to do to reduce the future level of such redemptions. It was suggested that the government should be fair to CSB investors by increasing the rate of interest on these bonds.

I recognize that the 11.5 per cent 1981 CSB rate and the 10.5 per cent rate payable in the remaining years to maturity on all issues is somewhat lower than the current interest rates on other forms of government debt. However, it is not unusual for CSBs to have a slightly lower rate of return than other forms of government debt. Canada Savings Bonds compete in a different market. The CSB rate is guaranteed for a period of several years, whereas treasury bill rates, while attractive at this moment, may well move down sharply when short-term instrument yields change. Government of Canada marketable bonds, longer-term bonds, also have a more attractive yield at this moment than CSBs due to the market risks associated with these instruments. If interest rates move to higher levels, investors will suffer a capital loss when selling Canada marketable bonds, whereas Canada Savings Bonds can always be redeemed at full face value by the investor.

The government is continuously monitoring the level of interest rates payable on short-term savings instruments, and feels that in the present environment the yield on outstanding Canada Savings Bonds issues is still fair and reasonable. In most cases, the current rates payable on savings instruments which compete directly with CSBs have not changed dramatically since the interest rate on all issues was revised on November 3, 1980 to 11.5 per cent for the current year. The only major exception is the chartered bank non-chequable saving rate which has moved up by 3 percentage points since early November to the present 13.5 per cent. However, as most hon. members know, depositors are not guaranteed this rate for any stated period. It may go down as quickly as it went up. This is not the case with the rate on Canada Savings Bonds.

I am aware that some rates at present payable on longer-term savings instruments are also higher than those now payable on CSBs. However, in many cases these instruments cannot be redeemed before maturity. In others, redemption before maturity results in a stiff interest penalty, bringing the effective interest rate substantially below the current Canada Savings Bond rate. CSBs are a good investment. The rate currently being paid is a rate that is fair, given the flexibility which investors are offered with regard to the guaranteed face value and the ability to redeem these instruments at face value at the choice of the investor at any time.

Adjournment Debate

ENVIRONMENT—POLLUTION OF NIAGARA RIVER—
REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, one by one legal efforts to block the controversial SCA pipeline from discharging chemical wastes into the Niagara River are dying in the courts. I am well aware of the efforts made by local environmental groups, the efforts of the previous member for Niagara Falls, Mr. Jake Froese, and of the great efforts made by the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. MacBain) across the way. What he needs and must have is the support of his colleagues on that side of the House. Only top level negotiations and agreement between the highest authorities of both the United States and Canada will bring to a halt this SCA proposal. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the election campaign of 1980 made a commitment to the people of Niagara through the hon. member for Niagara Falls that he would urge the U.S. authorities to prevent SCA from discharging chemical wastes into that river.

On February 19, in the absence of the Prime Minister I asked the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) exactly what steps the minister or his government had taken to urge the U.S. authorities to pressure SCA into discontinuing its proposal. The minister continues to avoid or refuses to answer or to admit that he cannot do anything about it or will not take any action to prevent this continuing or proposed discharge.

In the special report of the International Joint Commission, the recommendation was made that further dumping of those substances which have given rise to the high level of pollution be terminated. According to the IJC, neither the U.S. nor Canadian governments have met the 1978 pollution guidelines. The minister responded that he and the government do support the IJC, which must mean that they accept its recommendations. The question, therefore, is what the minister and his government are prepared to do in support of those recommendations.

We already know that the sewage disposal plant in Niagara Falls, New York is one of the pollutants of that river. There is no use in just saying it is one of the problems today. A question must be asked as to what is being done to pressure that municipality into remedying the waste problem.

Years ago sources of pollutants were identified and the proportions of pollutants established. Studies have been done, and recommendations have been made. The level of toxic chemicals, such as dioxin found in fish and gull eggs around the southern Lake Ontario region, is indeed shocking to all of us. According to officials of the state of New York, Lake Ontario fish contain the highest levels of dioxin in the world.

The minister declared that his position has not changed and, indeed, will remain the same. The question is what position the minister is advocating. The river is considered to be one of the most polluted in the entire North American continent. Over the last summer and fall it was learned that besides the massive amount of chemical waste making its way into the river, large amounts of explosives have also been discovered. Local environmental groups and citizens on both sides of the border have expressed their fears and anger not only at the decision of the American courts but also the Canadian government's lack of a firm stand which could have had a positive influence on the U.S. authorities.

I therefore would like to ask the following question: what concrete action is the Minister of the Environment or the Canadian government prepared to take to have the recommendations of the IJC implemented? What communications has this government had with the U.S. government since the decisions of the New York courts were handed down on February 12, 1981?

If the present United States administration remains true to expectations, the likelihood is that pollution in the Niagara River will increase rather than decrease. The International Joint Commission has found that situation intolerable. The people of the Niagara region have found that situation intolerable. Hon. members opposite can join with the hon. member for Niagara Falls in impressing upon the minister that he must make it clear to the U.S. authorities that the present situation is not only unacceptable but also that certain specific, positive action must now be taken to impress upon them that this river is an international waterway and that there must be respect for it as such and for the people who live on both sides of that waterway.

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first I want to thank my friend, the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid), for having raised this issue on the late show. I believe it goes without saying that the government is concerned about the issue he addresses. It is an issue we have had occasion to talk much about in this House over recent months, and that is due in part to the continuing efforts of my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. MacBain), who has left no stone unturned in continuing to bring this to the attention of the department and the government. He is doing a good job with it, and he has the support of members on this side of the House. That is not the problem. I believe the hon. member for St. Catharines is just being mischievous when he says that might be the problem. That is not the problem at all.

Indeed, it is very easy to point the finger and, were I in a finger-pointing mood tonight, I would remind the hon. member for St. Catharines that while he is in the mood to enlist collaborative and co-operative effort, he should go out and enlist the efforts of his colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser), who, as minister of the environment, refused to do anything on this particular issue. He did absolutely zilch. He did nothing on this issue. I remind the hon. member for St. Catharines of that. The record shows that.

While the hon. member for St. Catharines is in the mood for enlisting co-operative efforts, I invite him to go and see his provincial Tory colleague, Mr. Welch, who lives in the area.

He represents the area but he will not, mind you, drink the water. Mr. Welch has refused to do anything about it in his capacity of MNA with the Ontario government, nor has the gentleman who holds the position of minister of the environment in the Ontario government. He also has refused to do anything on this issue.

If the hon. member wants there to be co-operative effort and if he wants to point fingers, I can help him do a bit of both, but I suggest instead that he recognize that this is a problem which is of genuine concern to all of us. There is nothing to be gained by pointing fingers. Does the hon. member think for one fraction of a second that there is anybody in this House who wilfully goes out and encourages the further pollution of these waterways? That is the suggestion we hear tonight. We are all in this together, and I suggest to the hon. member for St. Catharines that we would all be a lot better off if we stopped pointing fingers and began examining what has been done.

Had I sufficient time remaining—the hon. member has seven minutes, but I only have three in which to respond—I would tell the hon. member about the number of diplomatic communications going back a number of years. The most recent were on November 28, 1980 and December 5, 1980. I could give the hon. member a whole list of what has been done. With the change of administration in the United States, we are now making an effort to discuss the recommendations in the latest IJC special report.

NATIVE RIGHTS—AGREEMENT WITH COMMITTEE FOR ORIGINAL PEOPLES ENTITLEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on February 2, I raised with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the question of the government's failure to honour agreements made with native peoples in Canada. I wish to pursue this question with special reference to the James Bay Agreement which was signed by the Hon. Judd Buchanan for the Government of Canada on November 11, 1975. Section 14 of the agreement provides for the establishment of a Cree regional board of health services and social services. Subsection 22 reads as follows:

> The budget from Québec to the Cree Regional Board shall include funding for the support of health services, which are not included in provincial programs for the general population, but which are provided to the native people by the Department of National Health and Welfare or other agencies.

Section 28.11 of the agreement provides that Quebec and Canada shall provide funding and technical assistance for essential sanitation services in each Cree community.

The government has seen the agreement as an easy way to wash its hands of all responsibility for the native people in the James Bay area. Last summer, at least ten children died of stomach disease. This reflects the lack of adequate sewage, sanitation and a water supply which was supposedly provided for under Section 28 of the agreement. The governments of Quebec and of Canada must take responsibility for this epidemic and for those deaths, because of their slowness in establishing proper sanitary facilities.

But even after these deaths, even after this epidemic had come to public attention, what happened? Because of disagreements over financing the Quebec government put the Cree board under trusteeship. Cree communities were without services from local clinics and hospitals because there was no funding available to pay health staff. This trusteeship was lifted last week, but the problem continues. The Cree have stepped into the crisis by spending other moneys to take emergency correctional moves.

Last September, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) promised that there would be $1 million to help cover these emergency measures. However, like so many of the promises of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, when the time came to work out the details these people were told that there was no money available. They were told that the money would have to be found in their housing budget. It is estimated that a permanent solution to the problems of health and sewage in these communities will cost at least $10 million in capital funds. The government offered only $3 million and said that the other funds will have to come from the general revenues of the Cree. This is a complete denial of the requirements of the agreement.

Last week, in a letter from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), she said:

> I am following the situation very closely. However, I have been advised that to take any action beyond what I have described, unless it was at the request of the Cree board of health and social services and the ministry of social affairs of Quebec, would put the federal government in breach of the James Bay agreement.

The Cree board of health and social services has requested help. They have requested that the federal government step in and provide some assistance. It is shameful for the government to say that it is helpless to do anything; it is shameful for it to hide behind the James Bay agreement and say that nothing more can be done.

The credibility of the government is on the line. We have talked about the recognition of aboriginal rights in the Constitution, but there is a very clear indication that words are one thing and deeds are another. The COPE agreement is in difficulty because the minister wants the people of that area to make compromises. After an agreement in principle was signed by the government, the people are being asked to make compromises. The government is not living up to the requirements of the James Bay agreement.

What is the government doing? What long-term measures is it taking to ensure that the health of the James Bay Cree communities will be protected? What measures is it taking to ensure that Quebec lives up to its part of the agreement? What is it doing to ensure that its word, given on behalf of the Canadian people, will be honoured?

Mr. Ray Chénier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his very important question, but we must realize that at this point the Grand Council of the Cree are alleging that both Canada and Quebec have failed to fulfil their obligations regarding health services, and that it is bringing the two governments to court.

● (2225)

The federal government has been committed and remains committed to the agreement. To say that nothing has been done is not absolutely correct, since on September 19 there was a meeting with Chief Diamond. At that time, short-term sanitation repairs to Rupert House and Nemiscau were discussed and an amount of $941,000 was allocated to it.

The discussions continued for the months of September, October and November when the details were being hammered out. But when the Quebec government took over the trusteeship of their health services and the Cree made a request that this be removed, it brought the whole case to court. At that point, we backed off. We are still waiting to testify in those hearings, but we have not been requested to do so yet. The suit against Canada has not been heard, nor has a schedule been hammered out.

As the hon. member indicated, the trusteeship has been removed. There seem to be indications of a rapprochement between Chief Diamond and the Quebec government. This may bring about a solution.

It is very important to repeat that the allegations about Canada not remaining committed are not true. We are fulfilling our responsibilities and we intend to continue fulfilling them. The minister remains willing to do whatever he can to resolve the matter without resorting to further legal action.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

At 10.27 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PENSIONS OF FORMER PRISONERS OF WAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. After considering the cumulative negative effects of the government's National Energy Program and the MacEachen budget, as well as allowing for the increase in information about the long-term effects on Canadian prisoners of war of prolonged incarceration, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That this House direct the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs to review the rate at which former prisoners of war are assessed and increase these rates to compensate for the present 12 per cent rate of inflation and the adverse effects of the budget and the energy program on their pensions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE PRIME MINISTER

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, whereas the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made several misleading statements last weekend in Vancouver, including a claim that he would have liked to see the constitutional powers over communications and fisheries given to the provinces, and also that he personally would favour a different constitutional amending formula which does not grant a discriminatory veto to Quebec and Ontario, and whereas these statements are clearly contrary to his widely stated policies, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That in accordance with the Prime Minister's public offer to resign if television personality Jack Webster would do likewise, this House hereby invites Mr. Webster to accept the Prime Minister's challenge and resign as an act of patriotism so that Canadians might be spared from further verbal contortions by this inconsistent Prime Minister who is so "exhilarated" over the divisions which he has produced in our country.

HUMAN RIGHTS

ABHORRENCE OF KU KLUX KLAN RACISM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, considering that members of all parties in this House have expressed their abhorrence of all forms of racism, I hope this motion will receive the unanimous agreement I think it deserves.

In view of the fact that Canada is a country which was built through the co-operation of people from all ethnic and racial groups, and since Canada prides itself on its heritage of racial and ethnic tolerance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That the House expresses its horror at reports that the racist Ku Klux Klan is now organizing four camps in southern Ontario to provide military and arms training for its members.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE MINISTRY

ASSIGNMENT OF INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The publisher of the Windsor Star has recently indicated concern about the quality of MPs representing that area. He stated on February 12:

Our MPs are run a little ragged, I hear, worrying about the Constitution, corporate assistance and surplus eggs.

He went on to say:

Windsor, Ontario is a forgotten city.

In view of this crisis I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That the federal government follow the precedent set in the Broadview-Greenwood affair and appoint competent cabinet ministers to be responsible for the ridings of Windsor West, Windsor-Walkerville and Essex-Windsor.

GRAIN

TRANSPORTATION POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, western Canada's problems with grain transportation are well recognized and studied. Recently four ministers of the Crown, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, and the Minister of State for Economic Development have each stated different positions on when and how they believe the government should proceed with the solution to this urgent national problem. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the Prime Minister assume his responsibility for this very important national issue of grain transportation by getting his own cabinet to agree on one policy to take to the farm community on grain movement, thereby setting an example for the rest of the country on how to achieve consensus on pressing national issues.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN FUNDING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, farm bankruptcies in Canada were up 78 per cent in 1980 over 1979, a fact which is clearly attributable to the unusually high interest rates. Therefore, under Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish):

That this House request the Minister of Agriculture to increase the funding of the Farm Credit Corporation immediately by an additional $150 million as requested by farm groups such as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and further, that the Minister of Finance investigate an assistance program for small businesses and farmers to help them get through this period of ridiculously expensive credit.

COMPENSATION PAYMENTS TO FARMERS FOR EMBARGO ON SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to the farmers of western Canada.

In light of the many shallow promises made by various cabinet ministers on compensation announced for western farmers regarding the grain embargo to the U.S.S.R., and in light of the fact that the initial adjustment payments have been announced but so far the farmers have not received any money, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That this House instruct the federal government to announce compensation payments to farmers immediately, and that the Canadian Wheat Board be instructed to place the interim payments for this crop year in the hands of the farmers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

AIR TRANSPORT

SERVICE BETWEEN CANADA AND GREENLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since Transport Canada has announced that First Air, a southern Ontario airline, has been awarded a licence to service the first Frobisher Bay-Godthaab, Greenland, air route without even allowing Air Inuit to submit an application for the route, in view of this unfair procedure, and in light of the fact that it would be most appropriate for an Inuit-owned and operated airline to service the two largest Inuit communities in Greenland and Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That the Minister of Transport re-open the competition in order to give all licensed carriers an equal and fair opportunity to apply for the operation of a scheduled air service between Canada and Greenland.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

LOCATION OF REGIONAL OFFICE IN PETERBOROUGH, ONT.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), in a letter to the mayor of the city of Peterborough, dated May 22, 1979, said, and I quote, "I am pleased to advise that the date for the establishment of a regional office in your city is April, 1982. It is expected that approximately 150 Health and Welfare Canada jobs will be located in Peterborough. My officers are working with the department . . ." to see that this happens. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare having given her word, now stand by that commitment, and allow the regional office of Health and Welfare to locate in the city of Peterborough.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED RENEGOTIATION OF F-18 AIRCRAFT CONTRACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Yesterday McDonnell Douglas of Canada announced that a further 248 workers would be indefinitely laid off at McDonnell Douglas' Toronto plant. This brings to 864 the number of workers laid off since Canada signed a $4 billion contract with McDonnell Douglas for the purchase of F-18 fighter aircraft, a contract that was supposed to create jobs for Canadians, not more unemployed. In light of this situation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That this House condemns the government for its failure to secure from McDonnell Douglas firm commitments of job creation for the Canadian workers it employs, and further, that this House instructs the government to renegotiate the F-18 contract so that firm job-creation commitments for Canadian workers are included in the industrial offset package.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

CRITERIA ESTABLISHED WITH RESPECT TO INDUSTRY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who spoke yesterday to a luncheon meeting of the Canadian Club in Montreal and indicated that it was the policy of the Government of Canada to, and I quote:

—encourage the movement of productive resources from those industrial activities with diminishing prospects to strong and potentially strong industries and subsectors.

I gather that this is the beginning of the much heralded, long awaited industrial strategy the government has been talking about for so long. Can the Minister of Finance tell the House of Commons, since he has spoken of industries with diminishing prospects, just what criteria the government has established, and will he identify those sectors of Canadian industry that the government considers to have diminishing prospects?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, in the budget speech I think I stated that there was bound to be, in a dynamic economy, changes in the composition of the labour force, and that certain industries would have to adjust to changing conditions. It seems to me that it is essential to the future strength of the Canadian economy that we take advantage of strong sectors and, where necessary, assist weaker sectors to adjust, not necessarily to go out of business but to adjust to new products and new lines of activity. It seems to me that unless we take account of that particular problem, the over-all strength of the economy will be weakened.

I would just add, in conclusion, that the adjustment program announced by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Employment and Immigration, addresses the question of adjustment and has adopted the approach of designating certain communities that might be eligible for particular adjustment assistance. I am not aware of the extent to which that process of designation has been implemented to the present time.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the minister is the master of the empty generalization. We had his budget six months ago, the so-called budget—it was not one at all. We had the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, shortly before he offered to resign, promising a national industrial strategy. Now we have the minister going before a national forum to indicate that there are specific industries the government has in mind which have diminishing prospects. Obviously the government is planning that kind of thing. Obviously it has decided which industries are going to be the victims. We want to know, and investors and employees across the country have a right to know, exactly which industries are on the government's hit list. Which industries does the government believe have diminishing prospects? What is it talking about? Can the minister please be specific and give the House his criteria and his list?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, we have no hit list. I believe the Leader of the Opposition ought not to take a destructive and despairing attitude about this approach. On the contrary, it seems to me that he ought to be supporting an approach that takes a positive attitude toward adjustment of the economy. We have a number of illustrations presently of a number of industries, for instance, the textile industry, in which the government, through its programs, is assisting and has assisted that industry to adjust to changing conditions. In my speech to the Canadian Club in Montreal I added that, for example, we have participated with the provinces and with the firms in the pulp and paper industry in assisting them to modernize and meet new challenges in the market. It seems to me that that is the positive light in which the right hon. member ought to look at these comments, instead of making the empty generalization that there is a hit list.

AIMS OF INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT STRATEGY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, we are quite prepared to support any program and any attitude that is open and up-front with the Canadian people. What concerns us is that we have an industrial strategy being concocted in secrecy by this government for more than a year and having plans developed prior to that time, so there has been a lot of planning going on. Obviously there are specific industries which have been designated. The minister has moved himself to speak about certain industries with diminished prospects and certain industries that are strong. If he will not tell us the industries which he believes have diminishing prospects under his government, will he table in this House of Commons a list of those industries which he believes to be strong, or potentially strong? The whole country will then know what the aims of this industrial strategy are, so that we can bring it out in public and not keep secret an industrial strategy which should not be confined simply to bureaucrats in Ottawa but should be the result of the participation and the debate of Canadians across the country where concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I draw to the attention of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition another aspect of the adjustment policy with which he ought to be familiar, because it was under his government that final approval was given to the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs which, in the main, had been negotiated by the preceding government but which was approved totally by the succeeding government, despite the barrage of criticisms that we had received from the opposition benches during the negotiating process. He will recall that under that particular arrangement there is an adjustment provision by which industries affected by increased international competition, as we move into the GATT period, will be assisted and will be ensured of a place in the new marketing arrangements. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition ought not to try to shroud this particular approach in mystery. If he had just read his briefings when he was Prime Minister, I would not have to tell him about these things today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ADJUSTMENT AID FOR INDUSTRIES FACED WITH DIMINISHING PROSPECTS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is a supplementary one for the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance had a lot to say before he became the minister. Now he has become the silent minister. But he spoke yesterday.

The minister is going to encourage the movement of productive resources, that presumably is cash, from certain industrial activities with diminishing prospects. The businessmen and people of Canada want to know from what diminishing prospect industries is the minister going to move those productive resources because the private sector does not want to invest in the productive resources of industries which are going to diminish. Will the minister tell us this: is it textiles? Is it footwear? What are these industries with diminishing prospects? What are the strong industries? Perhaps he could inform the private sector so that it will invest also in the strong and not in the weak. Will the minister come clean with the House? I say to him, don't be so mysterious. Don't be afraid to give us details of your bold proclamation of policy yesterday which sounded so good at lunch time.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it did sound well, and it was applauded by the discerning audience at the luncheon—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: —an audience which was made up largely of businessmen who did not shrink in fear from knowing that the market from time to time indicates increasing demand for particular products and decreasing demand for other products. As a result of these market decisions, particular industries have to adjust to new circumstances. That is what I am talking about. Where particular firms and industries have these problems, it will be the intention of the government to assist them to adjust to conditions which have been determined by the marketplace, not determined by the government, of that I want to assure you, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, it would have to be a discerning audience to know what the minister meant when he won't tell them. I ask the minister: why don't you bring the people of Canada in on it? The people of Canada are discerning. Their jobs are the ones which will be lost, and it is their prospects which the minister is talking about. Silence is golden, but with this minister, silence is no longer golden. We want to know what is to happen, Madam Speaker. We do not want weak-kneed generalities, we want to know what the policy is.

AREAS AND COMMUNITIES AFFECTED BY GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Could I ask the minister my supplementary, Madam Speaker, and relieve your burdens? The minister also said that the process of adjustment will not be easy and the burden will fall relatively more heavily on particular areas and communities. On what particular areas and communities in Canada is the minister's policy to fall more heavily? What are those areas and communities? Is it Nova Scotia? Is it Cape Breton? Is it Newfoundland? Is it Windsor? What are the areas and communities which are going to suffer this heavy burden? Will he enlighten the people of Canada about that? Will the minister stop his weak-kneed, bafflegabbing and knee-flubbing and give the people the facts?

An hon. Member: Yes or no?

● (1425)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am glad that the Leader of the Opposition supported the hon. member for St. John's West by a compliment on that rather concluding question which tailed off into obscure generality.

Mr. Crosbie: That's the area you dwell in.

Mr. MacEachen: If the hon. member for St. John's West knew anything about the national economy, he would know about certain areas in the country that are experiencing particular difficulties. Let me mention one particular area, namely, the part of Nova Scotia I represent, the island of Cape Breton.

The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys recently wrote to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and to the Minister of Employment and Immigration in recognition of the fact that there were special adjustment problems in that area, and asked that that area be designated for special assistance under the adjustment program. That is what we are talking about. Instead of trying to hide the weak areas of the country that require adjustment, we are prepared through an adjustment program to designate them upon their request, and then provide them with the necessary adjustment assistance. Therefore, let us have no more of the bafflegab, if that is the word, we get from the opposition.

DECLINE IN PRODUCTIVITY—EFFECT ON WORKERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. It also concerns his speech to the Montreal business establishment which he said was so well received. I can understand why it was well received. The minister said in his speech that, because of reduced levels of productivity, ordinary Canadian workers could not now expect higher wages, benefits or pensions. Since wages have fallen behind in each of the past three years as a percentage of the GNP while at the same time profits, dividends and other forms of unearned income have actually gone up as a percentage of the GNP, why did the minister single out ordinary workers as the people who would have to bear this burden? Why did he not single out some of the people who take all their income in the form of unearned dividends?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member reads my statement he will find that at no point did I refer to "ordinary workers" or suggest that for any particular reason they ought to be put in a category of those who are responsible for the decline in productivity in the country. The point I made was that for quite a number of years, for example, 1961 to 1973, productivity in Canada just about doubled. Instead of growing in the last number of years, productivity in Canada has declined. I want to add that if we expect to have a higher standard of living, the economy as a whole has to produce more in order that we may enjoy that better standard of living. It is a disservice to everybody to put our heads in the sand and ignore the fact that over the past number of years output per person in the labour force has decreased and, unless we turn that around, we have very little prospect of enjoying the rising standards of living which we had in the earlier period. That is the point.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, what the minister said was long and some of it was actually accurate, but none of it answered the question I asked.

● (1430)

I read the minister's speech with care, if not with a lot of interest. On page one of his speech the minister said that working people's wages, pensions and social welfare, would have to be curtailed. Since it has been unearned income, profits and payments of dividends which have increased as a percentage of the gross national product for the last three years while workers' incomes have actually gone down as a percentage—and gone down in real terms—why has the minister singled out workers in this particular case to bear the responsibility for increased productivity and not some of the people in the blue chip audience to which he was speaking?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, as a graduate of the London School of Economics the hon. member for Oshawa is showing remarkable simplicity in his approach to this question of productivity. He knows perfectly well that productivity cannot be assigned exclusively to the activity of workers. That would be a stupid assertion.

Mr. Broadbent: It certainly would.

Mr. MacEachen: It was not made by me. The productivity of the economy depends not only upon the work force but also upon the contribution of capital and many surrounding influences as well. What I did say, and what I will continue to say, is that if Canadians and the country as a whole want to provide for better pensions, higher wages, better social welfare and a better cultural life—these are laudable objectives, and I support them—and if we want to have all these things in greater measure, then we have to learn to produce more and increase productivity in the country. That is the simple question.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, that was a simple answer. It was the second time in a row the minister did not answer the question asked. However, I will take a different tack. Speaking of the incompetence of graduates from the London School of Economics the minister just has to look to his left to see a living example.

STUDY OF WAGE RESTRAINT PROGRAM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Since it is obvious that the government has rejected a fair prices commission in the past and has turned down a tax cut for middle and low-income people, making it clear that ordinary workers will have to struggle for themselves if they are to get anything out of this economy, will the minister deny that right now his department is considering some form of wage restraint program which it might bring into play if the workers in this country should finally, after three years, manage to get wage and salary increases commensurate with the level of inflation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I certainly would not accuse the hon. member of incompetence. I have such a high regard for the institution where he studied that I thought he would have a much broader understanding of economic forces. I might add that I have noticed that some graduates are better than others.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I have too.

Mr. MacEachen: The answer to the question is that there is no plan in my department—if that is the question—to launch a program of wage and price controls.

Mr. Broadbent: That wasn't the question either.

Mr. MacEachen: There is absolutely no plan, and I am not making any such recommendations to my colleagues. I encourage all members of the department to assess circumstances and brainstorm, but certainly if that storm reaches my desk it will be swept away mighty fast.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

QUERY RESPECTING INCREASES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my questioning is also directed to the Minister of Finance. I want to take him back again to the speech he made in Montreal which he says was received with at least courtesy. Would the Minister of Finance indicate to the House why he did not reciprocate to the members of the audience and at least give them accurate information? I specifically refer him to the following statement he made:

> The government's expenditure plan, in particular, was established to keep federal spending within the rate of growth of the economy in order to ensure a steady reduction in the deficit—

Bearing in mind that the minister released only two weeks ago the expenditure levels in Ottawa for the first nine months of this fiscal year, which indicated a 16 per cent increase in expenditures and a $1 billion increase in the deficit, would the minister indicate why he felt justified in misleading his audience in Montreal that in fact a 16 per cent expenditure increase is in line with the growth of the economy, which is actually below 12 per cent for the same period?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not think the hon. member is justified in comparing a nine-month expenditure flow with the projections contained in the budget.

Mr. Stevens: Look at your release of two weeks ago.

Mr. MacEachen: With the release of a few weeks ago I stated a certain expenditure growth for a nine-month period to compare that with the objective of maintaining expenditures of the government within the trend line of the gross national product.

Mr. Crosbie: You didn't say trend line.

Mr. MacEachen: I want to tell the hon. member that my objective, as shown in the budget papers, is at 1983-84 not to take any more out of the economy than is being taken out at the beginning of the period. In other words, with the flow of income we will not take a greater share for the government. That is the principle on which I have been operating, and I do not think the hon. member can test it on the basis of a nine-month expenditure flow released by the department.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I remind the Minister of Finance in asking my supplementary question that he did not refer yesterday to a trend line in the economy. He said he would keep expenditures within the rate of increase of the economy.

However, let me take the Minister of Finance back to the other statement he has referred to with respect to the hiatus point of 1973. He said that in the 12 years to 1973 real gross national product doubled. However, then he went on to state:

> In the seven years since 1973 . . . our average annual rate of growth has been cut in half, and our rising expectations or sense of entitlement has served only to fuel the inflation that we have come to know all too well.

Would the Minister of Finance indicate why he then chose to go on to blame the workers, for failing to produce the productivity that he says is essential, without making it clear to his audience that in the same 12-month period the total aggregate federal deficit was only $5.4 billion compared with the last seven years when his government has run up a $48 billion deficit, a 750 per cent increase? Clearly that is what killed productivity. It is bloated, fat government at the federal government level, not the workers of this country.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I cannot blame the London School of Economics for that outburst. I will have to find a different university.

Mr. Stevens: Western.

Mr. MacEachen: I am pleased that hon. members have paid some attention to the speech made in Montreal because I did want to focus the minds of people in the country and the House on the question of productivity. I went on, if the hon. member will permit me to say so, to analyse very carefully what I thought were major areas in which steps ought to be taken in order to increase growth and investment and, accordingly, productivity in the country.

At no point would I be inclined to point the accusing finger at the workers of this country because there is absolutely no evidence that workers are not putting out as much as they have in the past. However, there is evidence that there are other factors which are decreasing the productivity of the country. Some of them are irreversible. Some can be turned around, and the deficit is not very much a part of that over-all picture.

SMALL BUSINESS

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING INDEPENDENT RETAIL SECTOR OF PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Small Business. I wonder if he could update the House on the representations he has been making to his cabinet colleagues on the sorry plight of the independent wholesalers and retailers in the downstream sector of the petroleum industry and particularly on the stranglehold on supply that the independents in the province of Quebec are facing. What representations is he making to correct the situation?

● (1440)

Hon. Charles Lapointe (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Madam Speaker, my colleague, the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and myself have had several meetings with the independent oil distributors, especially those in Quebec, as well as with the Alberta independent exploration companies. All necessary action is being taken to ensure a regular supply to the independent distributors in Quebec and we are monitoring the situation daily.

[English]

Mr. Huntington: Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. I am wondering whether I could ask him if Petro-Canada, by any chance, will come to the aid of the independents? Will there be more or less competition now that Petro-Canada has joined the majors? Will there be an increase in supply for the independent sector of Canada, or will we see all the independents lost the way Merit was in Burnaby, British Columbia?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, this is a specific government policy which is clearly stated in the energy program and which aims at maintaining a strong and vigorous independent sector in Canada. In the specific case mentioned by the hon. member, I must point out that before it was taken over, Petrofina was already helping to supply the independent distributors of Quebec, and I am convinced that Petro-Canada will want to maintain this policy and perhaps even emphasize it if required. Discussions are now going on with the independent distributors and we shall determine their exact requirements.

TRADE

EXPORTATION OF COAL FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA TO JAPAN

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, although I should like to point out to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance that the hon. member for Oshawa, the hon. member for Burnaby, and myself actually graduated from the London School of Economics, unlike the fellow to his left.

My question to the Minister of Energy concerns the Northeastern British Columbia Coal deal. The minister will recall that last week I asked him a question which revealed an internal document of the British Columbia government. Now I have that document in my possession and will release it to him. Will the minister agree that the public should be entitled to know the figures behind this very important deal? Will he agree to release publicly all the documents in the possession of the federal government with respect to this deal?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the government contributions required under this agreement have already been made public by my colleague, Senator Olson, the Minister of State for Economic Development. As for the release of some other documents, I shall ask Senator Olson, and I am convinced that he will be willing to make public the documents which would be available under the bill before the House concerning public information.

[English]

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I am pleased the minister is prepared to make these documents available, including all telexes, hopefully. I hope Mr. Basford, the new director of the northeastern coal development, for the province of British Columbia, will do likewise.

PIPELINES

PROPOSED GAS PIPELINE TO VANCOUVER ISLAND

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): My supplementary question concerns another megaproject in British Columbia. Last Friday the British Columbia government announced that it would approve the building of a gas pipeline by British Columbia Hydro to Vancouver Island. During the announcement there were some unfortunate comments by the minister of energy for British Columbia. In spite of those comments, is the federal Minister of Energy still prepared to give British Columbia a financial commitment to help with the building of this line?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I will refer to my previous answer. I indicated to the hon. member that I would consult with my colleague in the Senate and that I was confident he would release the documents which would be available for publication under the public information bill being considered by the House at the present time. I would not like him to misinterpret what I told him in French.

As to his particular question, the decision announced by the government of British Columbia was obviously one taken by that government in its own wisdom. We have indicated that we were ready to negotiate or to discuss with the government of British Columbia the possible contribution for the building of a gas pipeline to Vancouver Island. However, the terms of those negotiations and the conditions under which there could be any federal contribution would be subject to negotiation. We would have to look at the exact plans of the government of British Columbia, at why this particular option was chosen compared to another one, and then advise as to what amount of contribution, if any, is required in the circumstances. But we will be available for discussions.

DISASTERS

INQUIRY RESPECTING AID POLICY AND ASSISTANCE SOUGHT BY QUEBEC

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the alarming situation caused by flooding and the emergency this represents for hundreds of people who have to be evacuated, what is the policy of the federal government concerning available emergency services and equipment to help victims of the flood? Has the Quebec government already requested some assistance from the federal government?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I believe that the major responsibility of the Canadian Armed Forces is certainly to help Canadians when circumstances warrant it. We have provided such assistance in the past, in Manitoba, Ontario and elsewhere in Canada in the case of floods and forest fires. When we provide such assistance to a province, we have first received a specific request on the part of the provincial government. I must advise the hon. member that we have received as yet no such request from Quebec to give assistance to the victims of the floods. I may add, Madam Speaker, that our Armed Forces are always available if Quebecers or any other Canadians require any assistance.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CN EXPRESS—RETENTION OF STAFF ON PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. On February 4, 1981, the minister told the House that Canadian National Express on Prince Edward Island would continue to operate but with a reduction in staff from 41 to 19 positions. Contrary to what the minister told the House, CN officials have now informed the CN employees involved that no more than 11 of them will be kept and that the figure may be as low as two or three. Will the minister tell the House what he meant when he said that 19 positions would be saved? Are those 19 positions full-time, or do they include people who will be laid off and called back only on a relief basis at the discretion of CN? In other words, have the figures been artificially inflated for political reasons?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the figure I mentioned, which was the 19 used by my hon. friend, is the figure which was guaranteed by CN Express to me. It represents full-time jobs, and I will see to it that it is honoured.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Transport just so that the employees, the House and I will be entirely clear on what he is saying. Will the minister assure the House that he will not allow CN officials to reduce the number of CN Express employees on Prince Edward Island below the commitment of 19 full-time positions before 1983, when the entire matter is to be reviewed? Is it a commitment to save 19 full-time positions?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I can only say that I said about 19. There may be one or two more or less, but it does not mean ten more or less. It is about the figure I indicated. That is the commitment CN gave me, and I will see to it, as I said, that it is honoured.

INDUSTRY

RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING EXTENSION OF QUOTAS ON TEXTILE IMPORTS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who earlier today mentioned government assistance to the textile industry. I will put a very direct question to him in the hope his response will not be all wrapped up in cotton wool.

As I am sure the minister is aware, the Textile and Clothing Board earlier this year made recommendations to the government regarding the extension of the quotas presently in effect on offshore imports. I would like to ask the minister very simply and very directly: when will the government consider these recommendations which were put forward by the Textile and Clothing Board, particularly in light of the fact that the arrangements are due to expire later this year?

● (1450)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the intention of the government, if possible, is to have a response to the recommendations by the end of March of this year.

NATIONAL SECURITY

DANGERS POSED BY BLACKMAILING ACTIVITIES OF SOVIET OFFICIALS

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In view of the public disclosure the week before last of the circumstances of a U.S. military attaché in Moscow being entrapped by the KGB for blackmailing purposes, and in light of the public confession last weekend of a former British ambassador to Moscow of the same thing, which he said he publicized to alert the western world to the dangers of Moscow life and those same KGB policies, has the Solicitor General been made aware of any past occurrences of this type, or any potential blackmailing activity, which endangered Canadian or allied security?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I have not been made aware of any such matters involving Canadian or allied security.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, would the Solicitor General make inquiries of his officials, now that other nations are exposing past occurrences, and report to the House some of these situations which have been hidden in the past on the grounds that these circumstances would endanger the security of those self-same allies?

Mr. Kaplan: I would be glad to look into that matter and see whether there are any such matters which could be made public at this time.

ENERGY

PROPOSED REDUCTION IN ALBERTA OIL PRODUCTION

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It has to do with the Canadian supply of oil. In view of the announcement made by the Alberta government to cut back 150,000 barrels of oil as of March 1, could the minister inform the House as to the status of the negotiations and his assessment of what effect this will have on eastern Canada particularly?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have already indicated that I hope the government of Alberta will not find it necessary to resort to cutbacks, which would hurt all Canadians and Albertans in particular. Yesterday I wrote to the minister of energy in Alberta suggesting that since Alberta officials were not ready to make a report to their cabinet for at least another two or three weeks it seemed unnecessary to resort to the cutbacks at the present time. I also suggested that we should pursue the negotiations and discussions.

On the other hand, if the government of Alberta concludes that it wants to proceed with these cutbacks, then we will obviously have to find the necessary supply abroad. The necessary steps have been taken to ensure that Canadians will not suffer over the next few months in terms of supply.

Oral Questions

NATIVE RIGHTS

LAND CLAIM SETTLEMENT IN WESTERN ARCTIC

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In October, 1978, the government signed an agreement in principle with the Committee for Original People's Entitlement. The agreement provided the basis for a land claim settlement with the Inuit in the western Arctic. The minister now wants COPE to make further concessions and compromises. With this kind of double-dealing, how does the minister expect any native group in the country to trust him? Are agreements in principle only one stage in the long process of stripping native people of their rights, or will the government keep its word?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, there is an almost unending list of misinformation, misconception, and erroneous charges in the hon. member's question. How the dispute arose is quite simply that I, in an open fashion, sent a memorandum to my negotiators. I sent a copy of it to the COPE negotiators. In the letter I asked if they would address some concerns which were very real. They knew about these concerns, whereas we did not. Many of the people concerned with this matter in the north knew about them.

The letter was sent in order to see if the process of give and take and the process of negotiation would give us a solution. This procedure occurs in negotiation processes all the time. I dare say that the negotiators for COPE send memos back and forth to their principals also. There was no implication of any breach of any agreement in principle. It was not the basis for final agreement, which would be a breach of agreement in principle. It was simply saying that we should address some of these real concerns to see if we could not work out a solution. I see absolutely nothing wrong with any federal government minister sending instructions of that kind to his negotiators to see what can be done about problems of concern.

Mr. Manly: My supplementary question is for the same minister. The Inuit people had already made great concessions at the time the agreement in principle was signed. Will the minister cease all further double-dealing and follow the 1977 recommendations of the Berger commission, the National Energy Board and the government's own agreement in principle? Will the minister guarantee to the House of Commons that he will respect the commitment to establish a wilderness park on the Yukon's north slope, free from any pipeline or transportation corridor?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, I have already indicated to the hon. member that negotiations have been stalled for a period of time. I believe it is in everyone's interest that these negotiations be reinstituted. I do not think it is helpful to either side to carry on with the negotiations and stake out fixed positions in advance of negotiating. If the hon. member wishes to be a part of the negotiation process which hinders a final result, that is his business. I think we should leave the process to negotiation.

GRAIN

IMPLEMENTATION OF MARKET ASSURANCE PLAN—SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport in his capacity as the minister who answers for the Canadian Wheat Board. There is a new grain marketing plan being discussed in western Canada called the Market Assurance Plan. I believe the implementation of such a plan could produce major changes in western agriculture. Would the minister give consideration to setting up a special committee comprised of members from the three western provinces, farm organizations and the Canadian Wheat Board, to study this program fully so that all farmers and grain producers in western Canada will know exactly what the Canadian Wheat Board is talking about before any program is implemented?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member has said, this is just a plan. It was developed by the Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board. I repeat again that it is only preliminary. My understanding is that the Canadian Wheat Board is consulting with farmers in district meetings which are now being held with members of the different committees. So, the process of consultation is on. The hon. member suggests another possibility, which I will bring to the attention of the minister of state responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Murta: My supplementary question is for the Minister of Transport. Since such a program does have some effect in terms of detracting from the solution of the real problem with respect to grain marketing in western Canada which is, of course, grain transportation, could the minister indicate at what stage the government is at in terms of either a resolution to the problem or a study of the Crowsnest Pass rates so that this issue which is of the utmost importance to producers in western Canada can now be resolved?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister answered this question two Fridays ago. He said quite frankly that he was looking for a feeling of support from western Canada on this subject. I think this feeling of support is coming up now and it is getting stronger and stronger. I am doing my very best to assist its development.

AIRPORTS

DELAY IN BILLING OF LANDING FEES

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It is about landing fees which over the past number of months have been almost as repetitious as the minister's answers.

● (1500)

When an invoice in multicopies, run off the computer for a landing which took place on May 4, 1980, is not mailed out until February 9, 1981, is there any real justification for keeping those fees in place?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I believe that the increase in fees is justifiable. I am a believer in progression and regularity as opposed to confronting users of government services with increases of 30 per cent, 40 per cent or 50 per cent, as has happened in the past, usually due to electoral circumstances. So, if there has been a bit of a hang-up on this one, I will attend to it immediately.

Mr. Ellis: Madam Speaker, the minister missed the point. Taking nine months to send out one single little invoice obviously does away with the need for any of them. Surely the whole process could be done away with, and we would all be better off.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MR. STEVENS—MASSEY-FERGUSON REFINANCING—ALLEGED MISLEADING STATEMENT OF MR. GRAY

Madam Speaker: On Thursday last the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) raised a question of privilege alleging that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) misled the House on February 6, 1981, and moved a motion to refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The hon. member's complaint flows from a question put to the minister during Oral Question Period on February 6 in which he inquired of the minister if he had a statement to make with respect to the negotiations involving his department and Massey-Ferguson. The minister replied that the matter was under review.

The hon. member alleges that the minister misled the House in his answer because, in his view, "clearly the matter was settled". In support of his arguments, the hon. member for York-Peel mentioned that the relevant cabinet meeting had been held on the previous day. He further alleges that this decision having been made, the minister chose not to inform the House, stating that it was still "under active review."

In his remarks on Thursday last, the minister indicated that he had no statement to make at the time the question was posed to him by the hon. member since the final decision was not taken until after the question period. The particular point at issue at this time is whether there exists a prima facie case of privilege upon which a motion can be entertained.

Point of Order—Mr. W. Baker

I have reviewed with care the arguments presented by all hon. members who participated in the discussions on Thursday last in order to determine precisely if a prima facie case of privilege had been established.

It seems to me that we have before us a series of facts the interpretation of which is disputed by two hon. members. Hon. members are aware of Citation No. 19(1) in Beauchesne's fifth edition which reads as follows:

A dispute arising between two members, as to allegations of facts, does not fulfil the conditions of parliamentary privilege.

I also draw to the attention of the House Citation No. 322 which reflects a long-standing practice of this House that statements made by members in this House must be accepted.

I therefore find, in this instance, that a prima facie case of privilege has not been established.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. WADDELL—TABLING OF LETTER WRITTEN BY MR. LALONDE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) referred to a letter that he had written to Mr. Leitch, the minister of energy of Alberta, in response to a question. If that is so, I ask that the minister table that letter, it being on a very important matter to this country, the matter of energy pricing.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, if that is the will of the House, when you come to tabling of documents I will make it available.

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—INQUIRY RESPECTING ACQUISITION BY PETRO-CANADA

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, yesterday in the question period, as reported at page 7548 of Hansard, in answer to questions from the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) as to when Petro-Canada made the first offer to Petrofina, what the price of that offer was, and whether there were other significant terms or conditions, the minister later on when referring to that said that he would make an inquiry and, I assume, report to the House. Has that inquiry been made? Does he intend to table, later on today, the results of that inquiry? If not today, will he table those results later?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have indeed made the inquiry. I have asked to obtain the information in writing, and I would be very happy to make it available as soon as I have it.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROSBIE—CANADA COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I gave you notice, I think last Thursday, of a question of privilege on a matter which affects my rights as a member of the House, and in connection with the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) and his Canada community development program. Under that program the amount of $2,741,000 was allotted to the federal district of St. John's West, my district, for this year. A local advisory board was appointed to advise me, the minister and his officials, on what projects should go ahead. There were 110 projects submitted by groups throughout St. John's West. There were 43 projects approved which used up the moneys allotted. The local advisory board and the departmental officials gave a priority rating to all projects, using a scale of nine. So, these were the projects that had the highest priority. That was all done last fall. There were 67 projects which were not funded.

One of these projects was a recreation project at Mount Carmel, a community in my district, 1468 MA 2. That project had a score of .23 out of nine points. It ranked ninety-ninth of the 110 projects. Of the 67 projects not funded it ranked fifty-sixth in order of priority. The community of Mount Carmel already had a project awarded for the building of a wharf and repairing of a fisheries facility for the amount of $65,000.

The minister's office contacted me in January to ask whether I would agree to an additional $25,000 being awarded for this Mount Carmel project. I said I would look into the matter. The minister's office said he had an additional $25,000 that he could award for this project in St. John's West. I looked into the records. It just happened to be kicking around, that extra $25,000. I looked into this, and when I discovered that this project ranked ninety-ninth in priority of 110 projects, I did not give my consent.

I went outside Canada on a trip, and just before I got back the provincial Liberal member of the House of Assembly for the provincial district of St. Mary's-The Capes, which lies in the district of St. John's West, had made a public announcement that this project in Mount Carmel, MA 2, was going to be funded with $25,000. It was not announced by the minister's department. It was not announced by the member. The impression given to the people of St. John's West was that I had lost my senses and was misapplying public funds to fund the project that ranked ninety-ninth out of 110 projects submitted in my district.

This project did not warrant any funds being spent on it. I quote to you the guidelines of the minister's department in his letter of July 30, 1980, when he announced the program. On page 2 he set out that the applicants for these projects had to show, and I quote:

—an intention to follow a hiring plan aimed at the redressing of imbalances in employment opportunities for women, youth, native people and physically disabled persons—

These had to be factors in assessing proposals for funding.

The officials of the minister's department threw out this Mount Carmel project, on the grounds that it did not meet these guidelines, that it did not meet the affirmative action guidelines of the minister's program, giving two reasons for rejecting it:

i) it is not supportive of the affirmative action principles laid out in the intentions of the program.

ii) it only marginally meets the federal-provincial requirements (recreation).

But the Liberal provincial member for the district contacted the office of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey), who is the cabinet minister from Newfoundland, and that minister apparently contacted the minister responsible and persuaded him that for political reasons this project for Mount Carmel, sponsored by two Liberal co-workers, two Liberal campaign workers for the Liberal member, Mr. Hancock—who will be the ex-Liberal member when the next provincial election is called—convinced the minister to ignore the guidelines of the program and to misspend public moneys on this project in Mount Carmel.

In the provincial district of St. Mary's-The Capes there were 21 other projects which were not funded but scored higher in priority than this Mount Carmel project.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): My goodness.

Mr. Crosbie: North Harbour, St. Vincent's, O'Donnells, Gaskier's, St. Mary's, Branch, Point La Haye, Admiral's Cove, St. Bride's, Mitchell's Brook, Colinet, St. Stephen's, Harricott, Patrick's Cove and Mall Bay: all were, in order of priority, ahead of Mount Carmel. They were all in Mr. Hancock's district. He is stuck with them all. He turned his back on them. He ignored their greater priority, and he tried to favour his Liberal friends in Mount Carmel when the community already had a project.

● (1510)

Mr. Crosbie: I will debate that gentleman, Madam Speaker. I am going to debate him in all these communities. If he shows his face in any of them in the future, he will need a bodyguard, I can assure you, for turning his back on his own constituents and favouring his Liberal friends in that community.

I referred to Hansard for June 4, 1980. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) asked the minister a question because he thought the minister's guidelines with reference to this program were unconstitutional. As reported at page 1476 of Hansard, the minister said:

We, as a government, have felt that the best source of advice as to local priorities in the various regions of Canada is members of Parliament.

He said Members of Parliament, not members of the house of assembly, not Liberal members of the house of assembly, but Members of Parliament. He went on to say:

—I happened to conclude that Member of Parliament are the best sources of advice on our regional priorities.

Then our critic in this area, the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) wrote the minister on November 4, 1980, expressing his concern about how priorities were to be decided. I am sorry, he wrote on August 18, and received a letter from the minister on November 4, 1980, which stated:

I propose to seek this advice from provincial governments, and from the staff of the commission. It is essential, in my view, that advice and judgment on local priorities be sought from the local level as well. In this context an important and valued source of perspective is the Member of Parliament elected to represent that area.

I do not want to take too much time on this, Madam Speaker. It was a political axe job by the Minister of Employment and Immigration who is unworthy of that office, in my view. He has approved a government program in a district where there is a local advisory board chaired by Mr. Walter Manning of St. Bride's with other members from the federal district of St. John's West. This is a district in which I have never interfered with the recommendations of the local advisory boards. They are asked to advise on local conditions and, I believe, their advice should be accepted. A project which rated 99th out of 110 received an award of $25,000 which was not in the program in the first place. It is additional money which the minister conjured up from somewhere, money that was not distributed across Canada as it was supposed to be. It was given to a project that scored .23 out of 9 points.

If I did not have this opportunity to bring the matter to your attention today, Madam Speaker, if I had not written to every newspaper in Newfoundland about it, if I had not written to every community that is involved in it, people might have thought that I had lent myself to this kind of prostitution in the spending of public funds for political purposes. But I have written, Madam Speaker, and I am going to tell every household in St. Mary's-The Capes and St. John's West just how serious the government is about unemployment and creating jobs and how they administer their programs without political favouritism and political interference. Every household in St. John's West will understand perfectly the minister's idea of the way he should carry out his public duties. They will know that because a Liberal member of the house of assembly has two Liberal friends who applied for a project, although it does not deserve public funds, and although the community already has a fishery project, an economic development project recommended by the local advisory board, the minister approves the spending of money on a program against the recommendation of his officials, against the recommendation of the local advisory board and without the concurrence of the hon. member.

I submit that this is a breach of my privileges as a member, Madam Speaker. It is disgraceful conduct on the part of the minister. It is a breach of my privileges as a member, and if you will find a prima facie case, Madam Speaker, I will move the requisite motion to have this sent to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to which this gentleman should go to have his peers determine his fate. I have no doubt that if his peers do that impartially and justly he will be out of here within a fortnight.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, this is a matter that can be dealt with very quickly. Before he rose to his feet, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) knew that there is no question of privilege whatsoever. Having been absent from the House for several days, however, I suppose he had to use up his air time and wanted to make sure that he got full exposure of his voluminous lungs.

The fact is that any decision in this respect is the prerogative of the minister. We have extended the courtesy to Members of Parliament of asking for their advice and guidelines, but we retain the discretion to make decisions.

The hon. member indicated that he intends to provide his constituents with some information about this case. I hope that he will provide some additional information about the case to make sure that they have all the facts. He has been known, from time to time, to neglect giving all the information that is required.

The first thing the constituents of St. John's West should know is that this is a program of direct employment creation. It is a program which was cancelled by the hon. member when he was a minister and a member of the previous government. All of a sudden he is standing here crying great crocodile tears and saying that the poor people of St. John's West are being denied the privilege, that his government denied to every single community across Canada when they cancelled every employment creation program. Furthermore, they totally denied the right of a Member of Parliament to any consultation whatsoever when, under a similar program, they cancelled the local advisory boards.

What kind of hypocrisy is this when the hon. member will stand here and claim the rights of democracy are being denied when he and his government have denied those very rights to every member of this House? On those grounds, every member of the House could claim a breach of privilege by the hon. member opposite and the government of which he was a member.

Mr. Paproski: That is not true.

Mr. Axworthy: Furthermore, Madam Speaker, I find it somewhat surprising that the hon. member for St. John's West should take umbrage at the government being prepared to give more money to his constituency and at the fact that in the reallocation we were giving priorities to communities which had heavy unemployment and we were prepared to assign money. He is saying, "It was not my priority." Let me remind the hon. member that under the project in question an application was sent out. We told them and the Members of Parliament that it was not acceptable under our terms. The project was redrafted to contain new proposals. Being a government with some flexibility and openness of mind, we were prepared to reconsider that project.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Obviously the hon. member is not of the same mentality. In the tradition of fair play, we contacted the hon. member's office and said, "Here is a reapplication for a project. Would you give us your opinion of it?". The hon. member said, "I would be glad to. Send me the project." Members of my office staff called his office several times over the succeeding four weeks only to find out that he was off gallivanting in South Africa—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: If the constituents of the hon. member want the true facts, they should ask, "Where was he when he should have been doing his constituency work?" He was off in South Africa. It is not for me to judge why he was in South Africa: he has a right to go anywhere he wants. But if he is so preoccupied with and concerned about his constituency responsibilities, he should have given some advice to his staff before leaving so that they could have made a recommendation. He was not back in his office until February 1, and the final date for projects was February 2.

I submit, Madam Speaker, that the hon. member feels some guilt about not fulfilling his responsibilities and not looking after his constituency as he should have been doing at that time. That is why we gave approval, based upon the recommendation of a regional minister who was doing his duty and covering for the hon. member for St. John's West who was somewhere else.

I would like to see the report that the hon. member will give to his constituents. If they knew the true facts, I do not think the hon. member for St. John's West would be around this House very much longer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) rising on the same question of privilege?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Yes, very briefly, Madam Speaker. The point raised by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) was that there has been a breach by this minister of the undertaking he gave on June 4, 1980, when he indicated:

—I happened to conclude that members of Parliament are the best sources of advice on our regional priorities.

That was the policy set down by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) on June 4, 1980. The substance of the question of privilege raised by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West, is that that clear guideline, publicly given, was departed from in this case. That is one matter which Your Honour will have to judge, but there is now an even more interesting question raised by the very anxious and nervous Minister of Employment and Immigration. It concerns his claim in the House today that a proposal which had been rejected, had been judged to stand ninety-ninth out of 110 projects. The proponents of that proposal were asked to submit their proposal again. They were asked to rewrite it and were given a second chance at having a proposal approved which had been rejected on its merits.

That raises questions as to whether the other 16 applicants who had ranked below this particular project in St. John's West were also invited to rewrite their submissions, or whether they did not have the appropriate political colouration to have this minister ask them to try again so that they might squeeze their way into the established guidelines. That is another question to be looked at.

What we are dealing with here, Madam Speaker, are two very important matters. They require a great deal of levity from the other side. One has to do with whether the word of the Minister of Employment and Immigration can be believed. He said one thing on June 4, 1980, then he acted in another way. That is one question on which your Honour will have to judge.

The other very important question has to do with the propriety of departure from guidelines in particular instances where the minister, or his political party, happen to be involved. We have an admission from the minister that he went back to these Liberal proponents of a Liberal project and asked them to rewrite their application, after the deadlines had passed and after the opportunity had passed for everyone else, in a way which might make it the expenditure of public funds acceptable. It is very important to know whether that has been a broadly practised procedure, whether everyone is asked to rewrite their applications, or whether that privilege is extended simply to friends of the minister and to political friends of the Liberal Party whose proposals are rejected on their merits but who are then asked to rewrite their proposals so they can become eligible for $25,000 of new-found public money.

What is at issue here is whether the same standards apply to everyone. It is clear from what the minister has said that the same standards do not apply to everyone. It is clear that there is one standard applied to Liberals and a different standard applied to other more responsible citizens in the country.

There is also the question as to whether or not there has been a departure by the minister from his solemn word in this House in a way that constitutes a question of privilege. Those, Madam Speaker, are both matters upon which you will have to judge.

Madam Speaker: Judging from the discussion until now, it appears to me to be a complaint and a difference of opinion as to how the government reaches its decisions.

I will not hear too many members. I see the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) is rising. I think the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) mentioned him in his question of privilege. I would like the hon. member for Calgary West to be very brief in his remarks. I will recognize also the Hon. Minister for National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey). After that, I will determine whether or not to allow any further interventions on this question.

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I do want to speak because the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) indicated that I had a part in this action. Indeed I did. As regional minister I did receive representation from that riding, as I do from ridings all over Newfoundland and Labrador. I pass those along to the respective ministers, and I will continue doing so. That is the job, as I see it, of a regional minister. If the hon. member for St. John's West did not follow that practice while he was on this side of the House, then I submit he was not doing his job.

We did make an attempt as my colleague, the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), has said, to contact the member for St. John's West, but he was in Africa.

Mr. MacEachen: Africa!

Mr. Rompkey: I would like to go to Africa, too, but I have a job to do here in this House. If someone is in Africa, then someone else still has to look after Newfoundland and Labrador. That is what I was trying to do, Madam Speaker.

An hon. Member: No wonder it is such a mess.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rompkey: Third, the hon. member for St. John's West indicated that it was officials who had ranked this particular project and judged it. I want to tell him and this House that it is not the officials in the department who are running the department, but the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and that is as it should be.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That explains it.

Mr. Clark: Calamusa knows that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rompkey: Fourth, the member for St. John's West has accused us of cutting off spending to Newfoundland. He said that this government is deliberately cutting off spending to Newfoundland for some reason or other. According to him, we are doing that for some nefarious reason. He said we are so stupid as to cut off spending to Newfoundland, in spite of the fact that the people of Newfoundland elected five Liberals. He is making that accusation. He has accused me particularly of interfering in a project called synchrolift. Some members of the House perhaps do not know what synchrolift is, but I have been accused of cutting off that project.

However, here I am accused of helping to allocate additional funds to the member's riding. The hon. member has to make up his mind. Does the hon. member want more funds for Newfoundland or does he not? Does he want more funds for St. John's West or does he not? The hon. member has to make up his mind. If he does not want funds going to St. John's West today, then he should quite clearly say to the people of St. John's West, "I do not want any more money going into St. John's West". We will not follow that advice, but he should say it if that is what he thinks.

This is a matter, Madam Speaker, on which you will have to judge, and clearly I think you will judge that there is no question of privilege and that the Minister of Employment and Immigration acted properly in the interests of Newfoundland and Labrador, and particularly in the interest of the people of St. John's West.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I rise on this question of privilege because the letters I wrote on August 18 were mentioned by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). Those letters quoted an excerpt of Hansard for June 4. At that time the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) rose in this House to ask the minister if his guidelines for spending money in this fashion were legal. The minister did agree to consult the law officers at the Table. We do not know whether that consultation took place.

The issue being raised here today is sometimes obfuscated with rhetoric, but it is a question of whether or not privileges of the members of the House have been violated in the sense that a minister of the Crown has used his position to move outside of policy guidelines mandated by members of the House.

If we think by analogy of a minister of supply and services who deliberately spent money outside of the public tender process or of a minister in charge of the public service who deliberately avoided the competition process required in the law, we would have to conclude that they would certainly not be acting in a manner consistent with policy guidelines as laid down by members of this House.

What we are dealing with in this question is a set of guidelines regarding the spending of public money. It is very similar to a purchasing policy, or a public service policy, in that particular groups which supply labour services to the government for social purposes have to be selected. To be sure that competition is fair, they have to be selected according to a criterion which is public, which is known to all and equal.

The hon. member for St. John's West raises the issue that in this case those guidelines have not been followed. I believe the suspicion that they were not followed is clearly evident to members of the House and to the Chair. I would suggest that by referring the matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections there is an opportunity to call witnesses, to examine the situation and to draw a conclusion which might be fair. If the minister's decision is to be upheld, then any suspicion of misconduct should be laid to rest. However, if the opposite is true, then the House will have to deal with it.

I would urge you, Madam Speaker, to give serious consideration to referring this very important matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Madam Speaker: These decisions, which the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) described in his intervention, obviously belong to the government. The alleged disregard which the government may have had of any advice which should have been forthcoming, or was forthcoming, in regard to that decision is also the responsibility of the government.

Point of Order—Mr. Nielsen

The way this subsidy was announced and who benefited from it might be objectionable to the hon. member for St. John's West. However, he can complain about it as much as he wishes. He said in his intervention that he was taking all means at his disposal, including raising a question of privilege, in order to have it known that he is not satisfied with the way the government has taken that particular decision, and it is open to him to do just that. As a member of the clerisy, I believe the hon. member for St. John's West knew in advance that this does not constitute a question of privilege. The government must take its responsibility for all these decisions. Governments live or die on the wisdom of those policies or decisions.

As for the point raised by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes), I am informed that the officers at the Table did not receive the request that they should examine the legality of the way the government is spending its money. If anyone had, I am sure the officers at the Table would have told him that it is not up to them to express an opinion on the legality of government spending. The way the government spends its money is for this House and, eventually, for the population to judge. Therefore, this does not constitute a prima facie case of privilege. I must rule that the matter be closed.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. CROSBIE—STATEMENTS REGARDING TRAVELLING

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I have a point of order in connection with the statements made by two ministers referring to my being in Africa. In my January householder bulletin I told my constituents where I was going, which is more than the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did. While he was stuck in the snow, I was on my way, and the results of my trip to Kenya, South Africa and Brazil were much more satisfactory than his.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order. I believe the hon. member is arguing rather than raising a point of order.

MR. NIELSEN—TABLING OF LISTS OF MINISTERS RESPONSIBLE FOR RIDINGS

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) will recall the exchange between himself and the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), not on the question of privilege but in question period following on a matter raised by him last Thursday. During that exchange, the Minister of Finance undertook to seek the consent of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the tabling of the list of ministers responsible for a riding or ridings in Canada. Has the Minister of Finance sought that consent, and will that document be tabled today in anticipation of the notice given by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood that he intends to raise the question of privilege again tomorrow?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, there is no hesitation in making the list of such ministers available. The list is being assembled and it will be made available as soon as possible. I will welcome the opportunity to listen to the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood tomorrow on his complaint.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I merely rise to express the wish that the Minister of Finance table the list before tomorrow in order that the information might be available to judge the question of privilege that the hon. member will be raising. Members on this side may wish to participate in it. If any consent is necessary, I am sure we can agree now to the minister tabling that document at this time.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I do not have the list and I do not undertake to table it before the hon. member raises his question of privilege. I do not think there is much of a question of privilege, but I will be glad to listen.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—BLACKENING OF MANITOBA TYNDALL STONE

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, notice of which I gave Your Honour at noon today. It is in a somewhat different vein than the question of privilege we have been discussing since three o'clock. I realize that what I am about to say will give all my colleagues in the House a splendid opportunity to laugh at my expense. I assure you, Madam Speaker, that I shall not complain. Sometimes I think we might try more often to arrange for laughter. It would be a good tonic to help us cope with some of the things we have to experience here.

In any case, yesterday afternoon I gave vent to a concern I have had for a number of months about the blackening of the Manitoba Tyndall stone over certain vents around the chamber. I asked the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) to investigate the matter to see if some sort of air is being pumped into this place which might be doing something to some of the members of this House.

Immediately after I raised that question, one or two hon. members applauded my concern. One or two others suggested that maybe there were no black spots there, maybe they were just shadows. That gave me some concern. I spent most of the day looking at them. The more I looked, the more convinced I was that those black spots are black spots. Even now there are members looking at them and realizing that those black spots are black spots.

I like to be very sure about these things, so last night I stayed a little later than I usually do.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles: I stayed in the chamber after all others had gone and until those bright television lights in the upper part of the chamber were turned off. Then, Madam Speaker, I found that the black spots were gone. I realized that they are in fact shadows cast by these chandeliers. Therefore, it is not a case of the walls being black, it is a case of my face being red.

Madam Speaker, I should like to apologize to the House for having created any concern. I hope any members who were coughing last night did not feel it was because of the air we were breathing. I am happy to assure them from my examination that there is no discolouration of the stone where those shadows are.

Since I raised this as a question of privilege, I suppose I should be presenting a motion. I am not going to move that the matter be referred to a shadow cabinet. But I should like to move:

That the member for Winnipeg North Centre be forgiven for his perceptual error, it being clear that this is not the first time that a member of Parliament has seen something that was not there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I can see that the House is quite willing to applaud this motion. I must tell the hon. member that this morning I came to look at the wall.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Having observed that the black spots were no longer there, I thought it was because of the status of the hon. member in the House that his request had been executed overnight and that the spots had been removed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MR. MANLY—IMPUTING OF MOTIVES BY MINISTER

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This is the first time I have felt the need to do so. I find this a rather difficult situation, following, as I do, on the comments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). However, I hope you will find, without a shadow of a doubt, that I do have a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There must be a full moon.

Mr. Manly: In question period this afternoon, I raised concerns about the government reneging on a 1978 agreement in principle with COPE. In response, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) imputed motives to me by suggesting that I was letting myself be used in the negotiating process. I suggest that my duties as a Member of Parliament require that I be able to raise a question of such fundamental importance without having motives imputed.

Tabling of Letter

● (1540)

May I remind Your Honour that in 1977 the report of Chief Justice Thomas Berger recommended that there should be a wilderness park established on the north slope of the Yukon Territory. When it was looking at the question of a pipeline corridor, the National Energy Board realized that a corridor going through this area would cause great damage to the environment. It recognized that a pipeline or transportation corridor would destroy the entire concept of a wilderness park on the north slope of the Yukon Territory. It would threaten the porcupine and caribou herds and the nesting area of hundreds of thousands of birds. It would threaten the traditional areas of the Inuit people and the people—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I will call the hon. member to order because he must expose to me in what way he feels his privilege has been breached, and not enter into a debate about the question he posed to the minister. If the hon. member can tell me in what way he feels his privilege has been breached, I would be glad to listen to him.

Mr. Manly: Madam Speaker, I will endeavour to do that.

In his response, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Affairs suggested that I was being used in the negotiating process and that instead of asking these questions with a sincere desire to have the minister commit himself to this House and come clean before this House, that I was a part of the negotiating process.

I ask that Your Honour look at this matter and find that there is indeed a question of privilege. If Your Honour does, I would be glad to move that the matter be referred to the appropriate committee for consideration.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member is quite right. No one is allowed to impute motives to hon. members. He is also quite right that he should be allowed to raise a question of privilege if he feels that there is a breach of privilege, but it seems to me that he has had an occasion now to put the facts right and to explain to the House that he did not have these motives, whether or not they were imputed by the minister.

I feel that the hon. member has made his point, and I do not recognize that he has a question of privilege.

ENERGY

TABLING OF LETTER WRITTEN BY MR. LALONDE TO MR. LEITCH

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, following the request made a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), I am tabling copies, in French and English, of the letter I sent yesterday to Mr. Merv Leitch, the minister of energy and natural resources for Alberta.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING CRIMINAL CONTEMPT

Hon J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-631, to amend the Criminal Code.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howie: Madam Speaker, the purpose of my bill is to substitute an independent voice in the imposition of sanctions for summary contempt of court, which now could put a judge in the difficult position of being the aggrieved party, the prosecutor and the judge at the same time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

CONGRATULATIONS ON ENGAGEMENT OF PRINCE CHARLES

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am sure all hon. members heard today with great pleasure the happy news from Buckingham Palace and would wish this House of Commons to send a message of congratulations to Her Majesty the Queen expressing our great happiness at the forthcoming marriage of Prince Charles and Lady Diana Spencer.

[Translation]

Therefore I move, seconded by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, that a humble Address be presented to her Majesty the Queen, in the following words:

[English]

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, respectfully desire to express our great happiness to Your Majesty and His Royal Highness Prince Philip on the announcement of the engagement and forthcoming marriage of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Lady Diana Spencer, and to assure Your Majesty that this happy announcement is greeted by the members of the House of Commons with great joy.

That the said Address be engrossed; and

That a message be sent to the Senate informing Their Honours that this House has passed the said Address and requesting Their Honours to unite with this House in the said Address.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion moved by the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN MEDIA CORPORATION

Question No. 1,449—Mr. Beatty:

1. Did the government hire Canadian Media Corporation to handle the purchase of space and time for government advertising?

2. Did the Canadian Media Corporation exist prior to 1980 and, if not, on what date was it incorporated?

3. Did the Canadian Media Corporation perform work for other clients prior to being hired by the government?

4. Did the government have a company with previous private sector experience as an agency of record under contract prior to hiring Canadian Media Corporation and, if so, what was the name of the company and for what reason was its contract terminated?

5. What competition, if any, was held by the government to allow companies with extensive experience as agencies of record to compete for the contract awarded to Canadian Media Corporation?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Supply and Services is concerned: 1. The Department of Supply and Services has entered into contract with Canadian Media Corporation for the provision of agency of record services.

2. Canadian Media Corporation was incorporated on April 16, 1980.

3. No.

4. Yes. (a) Media Buying Services Limited, (b) For convenience.

In so far as the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) is concerned:

5. At a press conference in May, 1980, a public invitation was extended to the advertising industry to express interest in the agency of record. Presentations were subsequently made to the Government by two organizations with agency of record experience. After studying these presentations a decision was made to enter into a contract with Canada Media Corporation.

DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION (1951) LIMITED

Question No. 1,806—Mr. Herbert:

Does Defence Construction (1951) Limited have access to government telephone lines, and (a) if not, has this been considered (b) if so, what is the estimated value of the service?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Yes. (a) Not applicable. (b) Defence Construction (1951) Ltd. paid $62,437.10 for this service in 1979-80.

Question No. 1,807—Mr. Herbert:

1. Does Defence Construction (1951) Limited pay interest on security deposits and, if so, at what rate?

2. Are coupons clipped from bonds submitted as security deposits?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. No. However, in accordance with the Financial Administration Act, interest is paid on contractor security deposits (certified cheques) cashed into the Consolidated Revenue Fund by the government (Department of Finance). The rate which fluctuates monthly is equal to 90 per cent of the simple arithmetic mean of the accepted weekly three-month treasury bill tender rates for the month immediately preceding the month in which interest may be paid. For example, during 1980 the rate ranged from 9.10 per cent to 14.8 per cent per annum. No interest is paid on bonds or on certified cheques which, at the request of the contractor, are held uncashed.

2. No. However, at the request of the contractor any matured coupons will be detached and forwarded to the person who provided the security deposit.

Question No. 1,813—Mr. Herbert:

Since April 1, 1970, who have been directors and officers of Defence Construction (1951) Limited and (a) on what date were they appointed (b) who had previous experience in the construction industry?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence):

(a) and (b)

CNR PENSION TRUST FUNDS

Question No. 1,839—Mr. McKenzie:

1. In each year 1960 to 1979, what was the total cost of administration for the CNR pension trust funds?

2. For each year, were the administration costs charged to the CNR or were they charged to the pension trust funds?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1 and 2. Prior to 1968, administration costs for the Pension Trust Funds were assumed by the railway and were not separately recorded. The CN Investment Division has been responsible for the administration of the CN Pension Trust Funds since 1968 and the related expenses have been charged against the income of the Pension Trust Funds.

Such Expenses total:

	$ Thousands
1968	$413	1974	$1,003
1969	543	1975	1,174
1970	647	1976	1,299
1971	716	1977	1,486
1972	782	1978	1,803
1973	861	1979	1,723

The apparent rapid increase in the aforementioned expenses must be viewed in light of: (a) growing costs due to inflation; (b) expanding assets under administration; (c) growing complexity of operations.

Nevertheless, administration expenditures have been maintained well below one tenth of 1 per cent of assets under administration, a rate which compares favourably with fees charged by trust companies and other investment managers.

DSS PAY OFFICES

Question No. 1,950—Mr. Anguish:

1. Was a decision made to have all pay offices operated by the Department of Supply and Services, including central and regional pay offices, operated on one computerized pay system and, if so (a) on what date (b) who made the decision and for what reason?

2. Was a completely new pay system developed and subsequently abandoned in the mid-1970s?

3. Which system was chosen, the central or regional, when all offices were moved onto one system?

4. Were studies undertaken to support the decision to move to one system and recommending the decision to move to that system and, if so, who did the studies and are they available?

5. Are Privy Council staff paid by a system which bypasses the single computerized pay system and, if so, for what reason?

6. Is the old central pay system still being used to pay Post Office Department employees?

Order Paper Questions

7. What is the average length of time it takes for a pay increase to take effect for a worker in (a) the Post Office Department (b) departments served by the new central pay system, from the time the increase is granted until it appears on the worker's cheque?

8. What is the average length of time it takes for employees in (a) the Post Office Department (b) departments being served by the new central pay system, to start receiving regular cheques from the time they commence work?

9. On what date was the new central pay system implemented?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Yes. In July, 1968, Treasury Board secretariat approved a plan put forward by DSS that envisaged a total payroll system which would allow the Comptroller of the Treasury to standardize procedures and methods while affording the maximum flexibility to respond to user demands for a more effective reporting of expenditures and personnel costs. The plan supported the basic concept for the creation of a central processor containing pay account data on all government employees and common computerized central processing combined with the remote issue of pay cheques and activity reports. A reduced number of pay offices, all operated by DSS, was to be linked with the central processor through communication lines. The reasons given for adopting the new concept were: to meet the demands of collective bargaining being introduced to the public service in 1969 along with various provincial medicare plans; to standardize payroll accounting procedures, improve efficiency and reduce costs, and to meet the central government needs for consolidated and timely reports on personnel information.

2. Yes. The development of a new pay system based upon central computer processing was begun in 1972; and in the spring of 1974 it had reached the stage of trial conversions to test the proposed system. As a result of these trials it became apparent that the centralized concept had severe limitations and would be incapable of administering the approximately 300,000 pay accounts distributed across Canada. Consequently the decision was taken in November, 1974, to terminate further development of the system.

3. The regional pay system.

4. Yes. In late 1974 study groups were formed in DSS to examine the potential of the various options for payroll administration. A formal report was submitted in March, 1975.

5. The Privy Council staff is paid through the regional pay system.

6. Yes. The central pay system continues to administer Post Office pay accounts except for term and part-time workers who are paid by local regional services offices.

7. The length of time for processing a pay increase depends very much on the workload current in the pay office where the account is administered. Recent statistics monitoring work in progress indicate very little time difference between the office processing postal pay accounts from the offices servicing all departments. Although separate reports are not maintained on the processing time for pay increases from other actions the statistics for the last two months show that more than one half the requests received in the pay offices were processed within two weeks, while 85 per cent were completed within a four-week period. The remaining 15 per cent are currently outside the four-week limit due to a backlog situation created by the CR labour disruptions. It is expected that the temporary backlog will be eliminated by March, 1981. These times do not cover processing within the employee's department. This applies to normal pay increases, however revisions negotiated through collective agreements are permitted a 90-day implementation period.

8. As indicated in the reply to question 7, there are no significant differences in times between the pay office servicing the Post Office from the pay offices giving service to all departments. Priority is given to the processing of pay of newly joined employees and on these requests our objective is to issue the pay cheque to the employing department within two weeks of the request being received at the pay office.

9. Following the selection of the regional pay system in 1975 to be the standard system for administering the payroll for all public servants, a development plan was originated for the progressive redesign of the system to meet standards of processing to be set in conjunction with Treasury Board. The enhancement process is continuing today; by April, 1981, the payroll of all departments, with the exception of Post Office, will have been transferred to the regional pay system.

GRAPHIC DESIGN SECRETARIAT

Is there presently a Graphic Design Secretariat and, if so, where is it located and what are its present responsibilities?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): The Graphic Design Secretariat was established as a part of Information Canada for the general purpose of improving the over-all effectiveness, efficiency and quality of graphic design and design management in the government. The secretariat ceased to exist in 1976 with the termination of Information Canada. The secretariat's responsibilities associated with the Federal Identity Program (FIP) were transferred to Treasury Board along with some staff. Two design advisers are presently located in Treasury Board, with responsibilities for developing design standards and policies for the FIP, and for advising government organizations on implementation. FIP objectives and policies are set out in chapter 470 of the Administrative Policy Manual, which is available on request from the Administrative Policy Branch, Treasury Board Canada. Chapter 470 makes reference to the former graphic design secretariat in describing the background leading up to the development of the Federal Identity Program.

PERSONNEL RELEASED FROM CANADIAN FORCES

Question No. 2,008—Mr. McKinnon:

For each year 1970 through 1980, how many service men and women were released from the Canadian Forces?

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence):

As of December 31 Each Year	Servicemen	Servicewomen	TOTAL
1970	10,620	370	10,990
1971	9,443	286	9,729
1972	9,435	211	9,646
1973	8,675	328	9,003
1974	10,328	470	10,798
1975	10,860	728	11,588
1976	10,026	797	10,823
1977	10,193	924	11,117
1978	8,719	712	9,431
1979	9,992	764	10,756
1980	10,105	995	11,100

DND—PURCHASE OF SPONGES

Question No. 2,085—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of National Defence purchase $10,865 worth of sponges from P. F. Thompson Associates Ltd. and, if so, for what purpose?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): A competitive contract valued at $10,865 for sponges was issued by the Department of Supply and Services to P.F. Thompson Associates Ltd. on behalf of the Department of National Defence. Usage indicated is "General Janitorial".

DND—CONTRACT WITH TRUE SOUND MUSIC LTD.

Question No. 2,086—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of National Defence place a contract for $11,500 with True Sound Music Ltd. for an organ and bench and, if so, where is the instrument to be located and for what purpose?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): The Department of Supply and Services (Calgary district office) purchased from True Sound Music Ltd., on behalf of the Department of National Defence, an organ and bench to be delivered to the Canadian Forces Base, Calgary, Base Supply Section. The Department of National Defence requisition stated that the instrument was for the church located on the CFB, Calgary.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if question No. 5 could be made an order for return, this return would be tabled immediately.

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Is it the pleasure of the House that question No. 5 be deemed to have been made an order for return?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SPEECH WRITERS FOR CABINET MINISTERS

Question No. 5—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Between January, 1976, and May 22, 1979, on how many occasions did a cabinet minister employ or otherwise arrange for the services of a freelance or contract speech writer or speech writer of any kind?

2. In each case (a) who was the Minister (b) what was the fee (c) what was the occasion of the speech and in what location was it made (d) who was the writer?

3. What was the total cost to the taxpayer for all speeches in the categories mentioned in Part I?

Return tabled.

Mr. Evans: Madam Speaker, I suggest that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT'S ECONOMIC POLICIES

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to introduce economic policies that would restore the economy to its full potential and give Canadians confidence in their future.

He said: Madam Speaker, last Saturday several newspapers in Canada carried the results of a recent Gallup poll in which the people sampled were asked the following question:

Do you think the federal government's policies for tackling the country's economic situation give you a feeling that they are or are not handling the situation properly?

Sixty-one per cent of the population said no, the federal Liberal government is not handling the economy properly. Twenty-five per cent said yes.

Are the people right? Is the federal government handling the country's economic situation properly? No, the people are wrong, said the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in a speech in Montreal yesterday. He said that problems in the economy are not his responsibility as Minister of Finance. They are, he said, the responsibility of the private sector. The problem in our economy, according to the Minister of Finance, is that Canadian workers are greedy and lazy. He did not use that language, obviously; he is too good a politician to do that, but he says that the root cause of our inflation is that Canadians want better wages, pensions and benefits but are unwilling or unable to produce more to finance these benefits. What an affront to the Canadian worker, and what a colossal cop-out by the Minister of Finance, the man who is supposed to be responsible! Does the minister really believe what he is quoted as saying in his Montreal speech? He said, and I quote:

—the nature of productivity is such that the government can only play a supportive role. Ultimately the productivity revival will have to come from the private sector and from individual initiatives.

If he really believes that, he should resign forthwith. To suggest that the government has only a peripheral effect on productivity is to show either incompetence or dishonesty. One would like to think that the integrity or honesty of the government and its ministers need never be questioned, but, regretably, we know from sad experience with this government and its ministers that honesty is not a virtue held in high esteem.

● (1550)

For example, how can we accept or believe in the integrity of the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance when he said in his budget that there would not be an export tax on natural gas, but in the next breath announced a charge on natural gas sold to United States consumers? Let me say by way of an aside that I was taught, as I am sure everyone in the House was, that telling the truth is not only morally right, but is in your own best interests as well, because lies have a way of coming back to haunt you. That lesson has just recently been learned by the Minister of Finance.

Currently, the government of Alberta is challenging in court the legality of this charge on gas sold to United States consumers. They have argued in court that this charge is unconstitutional. Counsel for the federal government said that the federal government can certainly impose an export tax, that an export tax is constitutional. When the judge asked counsel for the federal government, "How is it that this charge on natural gas sold to United States consumers was described by the Minister of Finance as not an export tax? He said that there would be no export tax", counsel for the federal government was forced to admit that it was the same thing. The government's own lawyer was forced to admit in front of the judge that the Minister of Finance was not telling the truth when he stated in his budget document that there would not be an export tax on natural gas.

The statement of the Minister of Finance yesterday that the main problem in the Canadian economy is lagging productivity caused by the private sector is exactly in the same category as the statement that there is no gas export tax; it is simply untrue. The main problem with the Canadian economy is the one flagged by Canadian people in the latest Gallup poll, namely, the government's mishandling of the economy. The sad fact is that, in spite of being back in office for a full year now, the government and the Minister of Finance have yet to develop or articulate a coherent economic policy, or any policy, for the matter.

Hugh Anderson wrote an article about the governor of the Bank of Canada which appeared in yesterday's edition of The Globe and Mail. He started the article with a statement which I thought was revealing:

For a man widely credited with running the only national economic policy Canada has, Bank of Canada Governor Gerald Bouey remains remarkably unruffled—

As Mr. Anderson indicated, the only national economic policy of the country at the moment is the tight money policy of the Bank of Canada. Is Mr. Anderson fair in his assessment? Let us look at the record.

Aside from the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada or its responsibility in that area, the government's economic policy comes from the main economic ministers: the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), the Minister of State for Economic Development, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). If a single one of these ministers, or any of the ministers of state associated with them, has yet produced anything which can be recognized as a coherent policy, certainly it has escaped my notice and the notice of almost everyone in the country. Indeed, frequently their actions are at variance with generally-stated goals.

I should like to speak now for a moment about the Minister of Transport.

He has been in office for a full year. The only action he took, or attempted to take, was to try to undo the positive actions of his predecessor, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), regarding the Prince Rupert grain handling facilities. Since then he has done absolutely nothing to improve transportation in this country. In nine months, the hon. member for Vegreville accomplished more than this minister did in a year or more than any of his Liberal predecessors did in their tenures.

Let us consider the Minister of Agriculture. I am not an expert in agriculture, but all I have heard from the Minister of Agriculture in the last year is his repeated statements that he is the world's best minister of agriculture. That is all I have heard, that is all anyone has heard. If there has been an initiative regarding agriculture, certainly it escaped my notice.

Where is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, that great paragon of virtue, that great human dynamo who was going to change single-handedly the economy of Canada? He was going to repatriate the economy, increase Canadian ownership and lower interest rates. He was going to resign if he could not lower interest rates; he was going to have an industrial strategy.

Mr. Mazankowski: Amazing Gray.

Mr. Andre: Yes, amazing Gray. Where is the industrial strategy? He was asked about it the other day and he said, "We have to wait for the Constitution". What is the connection between an industrial strategy and the Constitution? This was not explained by the minister. Apparently he and his entire department are twiddling their thumbs, worrying about the Constitution. When they have finished worrying about that, they will get around to developing an industrial strategy.

Then there is the minister in the other place, the senator from Alberta, the Hon. Bud Olson, the Minister of State for Economic Development. Has anyone told him what his responsibilities are? Has the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) taken him aside and told him what he is supposed to do? I have been trying to keep track of that minister. I have read the speeches he made across the country in an attempt to discern the responsibilities of that department. They baffle me. I have yet to see any tangible evidence in support of what that minister is doing. He gives speeches and says that they are trying to make an adjustment. "Adjustment" was a key word in his speech to the Quebec Chamber of Commerce. He said:

—we decided early on that we needed some way to ensure that specific federal policies worked together to achieve the right goals. What we came up with was a framework of eight components, the "guts" of the economic development process, if you will.

Then he went on to talk about the eight components. He said:

The eight components are:

—human resources;

—capital investment;

—energy;

—natural resources;

—technology;

—infrastructure;

—market development; and

—institutions.

It is a marvellous list. Now let me take a look at what the government has actually produced in terms of the eight components, the guts of the Canadian economic development process which the minister is supposedly overseeing.

Human resources—so far all I have heard is that the government intends to cut the funding to universities by $1,600 million. Will it help promote human resources to cut the guts out of the funding to universities?

Capital investment—I wonder whether the minister can explain how this tight money-high interest policy is helping capital investment. The predictions of the Conference Board of Canada, the Economic Council of Canada, Data Resources of Canada and the Minister of Finance show capital investment going down next year. Where is the substance to back up this goal?

Energy—it has to be a laugh! The energy policy of the government ensures absolutely that we will be short of energy and will be held hostage to the whims of OPEC nations.

Natural resources—has there been a statement, a policy or an announcement on natural resources? If so, it has escaped my notice.

Technology—the government has cut back on its commitment of funds to the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council. The Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) indicated that he expected the private sector to make up the shortfall in the government's spending on research and development. He said the government cannot be counted on to do that.

Infrastructure, market development and institutions—these are fine words but they have no substance whatsoever.

What about the matter of energy? Government economic ministers, be it the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Finance or the Minister of State for Economic Development use the following phrase, in virtually every speech: "The key to Canada's future is development of our energy potential."

• (1600)

The budget cum energy policy given by the minister last October 28 stated three goals which sound marvellous. No one disagrees with those goals. They are self-sufficiency by 1990, 50 per cent Canadian ownership by 1990, and a fair and equitable revenue-sharing scheme. How could anyone disagree with that? But let us look at what, in fact, has been the impact of this budget cum energy policy. It has been predicted that by the middle of May, half the number of drilling rigs in this country—rigs and equipment which are necessary to explore for the oil and gas which we will need if we are to be self-sufficient—will have left or will be in the process of leaving. That industry is 90 per cent Canadian-owned. It is owned by Canadian citizens living in Canada. This policy, under the guise of Canadianization and self-sufficiency, is driving out half the number of drilling rigs. They are being driven to the United States. And all of this is under the guise of Canadian ownership.

The amount of money which is leaving Canada for greener pastures in the U.S. and offshore as a result of this energy policy is in the billions of dollars—not millions, tens of millions or hundreds of millions, but billions of dollars. This year alone, the estimates are as high as $3 billion, which could and should be invested here in Canada. It is going to the United States. It is not foreign money, Mr. Speaker, but Canadian money. It is money controlled by the Canadian independent oil and gas sector which has been responsible for, on average, 70 per cent of the exploratory wells drilled in Canada over the last ten years. It is the Canadian sector which is designed to Canadianize the industry, as stated by the government. That is absolutely absurd.

I would like to deal next with the question of fairness in sharing. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Minister of Finance and those who speak in defence of this government's energy policy talk about the necessity of having a fair distribution of the economic rent from oil and gas. The figures they are prone to use for the existing sharing scheme are 45 per cent which goes to the province, 45 per cent which goes to the industry, and only 10 per cent which goes to the federal government. That is simply not true. The fact that they keep repeating this untruth is one of the root causes of the failure of this government to be able to reach an agreement with the provinces. Who would want to negotiate with someone who continues to tell untruths of this kind? Who would want to negotiate with someone who will not accept the facts?

What the government has done, and I use the favourite economic phrase these days of "economic rent", is to establish the economic rent on a barrel of oil as being $40. By government fiat it has said that it will take approximately 22 of those dollars, which is a little more than half of the $40, and distribute it to the consumers. The government then says it wants to consider sharing the remainder, but it does not want to be asked to consider what has already been distributed by government fiat. To withdraw the $22 from the equation is a form of dishonesty, Mr. Speaker, if not something stronger. Even when the government looks at what is left, the numbers remain cockeyed and concocted to a point which makes them, in fact, untrue. A more realistic comparison has the federal government receiving in the vicinity of 20 per cent, not 10 per cent as it did under the old regime. Certainly, under the new regime it will be a lot more. I do not understand why the government cannot learn that simple lesson. If you want to reach an agreement with someone, the first thing you must do is be honest in your approach. No one will deal with someone they do not trust, not without their hand on their wallet.

If that sounds unduly harsh or critical, Mr. Speaker, I remind the House and the country of a quote which appeared in a newspaper article a few months ago. I believe it appeared in The Globe and Mail and it was about the national energy policy. I believe it was some time in November. In this quote, the assistant deputy minister of energy, one Edmond Clark, who is attributed by many to be the author of the national energy policy, said there was no question that if this were a unitary state we would be paying closer to world price. In other words, the price which is established in this country has nothing to do with the national good. This government does not see itself as having a national mandate; it sees itself as an institution, the federal government, in competition with other institutions in our economy. Therefore, in that competition, since it will be dealing the high cards, the trump, if you will, it will deal harshly so as to ensure that its will prevails. As I said, one of the ways in which this will be done will be by distributing 50 per cent of the economic rent and by talking about sharing the remaining 50 per cent.

I wonder if hon. members opposite ever stop to think about western alienation and the rise in separatism. I wonder if they realize to what extent this may be attributed to the attitude of our national government which says, "Look, we must be interested in the responsibility of the government before that of the country." It may come as a surprise to the Minister of Finance and hon. members opposite that Alberta is a part of Canada. We are a part of the whole. So is Saskatchewan and so is British Columbia. People in Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Alberta are baffled by this thinking. They wonder why the federal government thinks it is virtuous to buy from Mexico at world price but a sin to buy from Saskatchewan, British Columbia or Alberta at three-quarters of the world price. Quite frankly, they do not understand that. I do not think this could be rationalized by a government which thought of Canada and not just of Ottawa.

Then there is that absurd Canadianization program which is nothing more than a nationalization program. There is also the PetroCan tax, which caused a constituent of mine to write a letter to me which I thought was rather interesting. If you accept the wisdom of the PetroCan tax, wherein the consumers across the country are being asked to pay for the purchase of Petrofina, then why does the government not put the public to a real test and have that PetroCan tax applied only at PetroCan stations? Since this is such a marvellous idea, a constituent of mine wrote to me and suggested that if the government believes in the National Energy Program, then it should establish a national automobile program. His suggestion should appeal to the government. The goals of the national automobile program would be threefold. They would be to establish at least 50 per cent Canadian control of the automobile manufacturing industry by 1990; to assure Canadians of an adequate supply of new cars; and to apply a blended pricing policy which would shelter Canadians from world pricing pressures but which would still allow the federal and provincial governments to receive their fair share of the revenue. I think that would be a marvellous program. My constituent goes on in some detail, but the part that I thought would be particularly appealing to the government is his concept of a federal government Canadianization tax, an "AutoCan tax", if you will, of $500 on each new car sold. A new Crown corporation would be created. This money would be given to Auto Canada, a new Crown corporation. It would use the proceeds of this tax to buy out one of the multinational automobile companies, thereby establishing a 50 per cent ownership of the Canadian automobile business. I think that is great. I think we could next do the same for the clothing business, the mining business, and the pulp and paper business. I mean, it is a winner. All you do is put on this little tax and give the money to a Crown corporation, which can then buy up the foreign-owned industry. It is just a Jim-dandy idea. If the government likes the National Energy Program, they should love this national automobile program and any others which follow.

The National Energy Program is a disaster. I am convinced that it is so bad that the government will have to swallow it within a few months. The question is, how long will it be before they do change their mind? Will the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources realize he has made a mistake sooner, rather than later, to save the country damage from what he is doing? Will the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have the courage to remove him and put somebody else in if the Minister of Energy does not change his mind? Those are the relevant questions.

I suspect that we will go through a few more months of hardship before that happens, but I would be willing to make a considerable wager that this National Energy Program will be altered, because it is absolutely unacceptable. Except for what Mr. Keith Spicer described in a newspaper the other day as "the handful of ideologues" in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, there is not a single person in Canada who supports this program. I do not have enough time to list all the industrial associations which criticize that program—manufacturers, pulp and paper companies, public real estate companies, virtually every industrial organization in the country.

What has the minister of Finance, who has been in office a full year, done in that time other than bring in, over his signature, the National Energy Program? What else has he done? He describes his program to the press as a program of "gradualism". He says he believes in gradualism, and he is gradually trying to make things better, too. What he has, in fact, done is to take a bad situation and make it worse. That is not my opinion; that is the opinion of the experts who make their living assessing the economy and the impact of government action.

The minister introduced a budget which declared war on one industry in one part of the country. That might perhaps be forgivable if there were some over-all benefit to the country, of which there is none, according to the experts.

Let us consider, for a moment, some of the observations being made about the performance of this Minister of Finance as the result of the budget brought in last fall. I have the assessment made by the Conference Board, which is considered to be the expert in short-term projections on the economy. It projected in 1981, just prior to the budget, that gross national expenditures would increase by 1.9 per cent; after the budget, the board dropped its growth projection to 1 per cent. Prior to the budget, the board thought that real disposable income would rise by 2.8 per cent; after the budget its projection dropped to 1 per cent. Before the budget, the board estimated that the consumer price index would rise by 10.5 per cent during the next year; after the budget it said it would be 11.7 per cent.

Instead of having a disastrous situation, we will have a calamitous situation. Productivity, before the budget, was predicted to grow by .8 per cent, which is not much; but after the budget, it was projected to drop by .2 per cent.

The Minister of Finance had the gall to go to Montreal yesterday and say that it is the private sector that is lousing up productivity in our country, and they must pull themselves up by their bootstraps. The Conference Board says that it was the minister's budget which caused a drop of 1 per cent in Canadian productivity. Instead of going up by .8 per cent by next year, as would have been the case before his budget, it will drop by .2 per cent.

The minister says that there is nothing the government can do, and it is up to the private sector. The evidence is right here. It is what the government did and is doing that is driving down the productivity.

What does Data Resources of Canada say? The minister thinks highly of this group, because he quoted them in his budget. They said:

> The budget therefore represents one more force weakening the prospective recovery in 1981 to 1982.

This is the independent organization of people who make their living predicting trends in the economy. They say that this budget will make matters worse.

What does the Economic Council of Canada say? The general impact of the federal budget appears to increase the rate of unemployment. That is what the budget did. The Minister of Finance stood up here during question period today and said that he feels for the people; yet he authored a budget which the Economic Council of Canada says will increase rates of unemployment. He went to Montreal and said, "It is not my fault; it is the private sector's fault; it is the individual's fault. You must pull up your bootstraps and be more productive."

If that is what he feels, why does he not get off people's backs? If that is what he feels, he should stop bringing in stupid budgets like this. If he is concerned about the people of this country, when is he going to put together a coherent set of economic policies? When will he stop relying totally on the governor of the Bank of Canada to implement the one national economic policy we now have, namely a tight money and high interest policy? When will he start balancing that out?

The minister is engaged in what is described as "the big lie technique", the technique of pulling out hair, the gall to state these objectives by using flowery language to describe these attractive goals of Canadianization, increased productivity, more industrial development, and fairer revenue sharing, and then taking action which is exactly opposite to those goals.

When I read the speech which the minister made in Montreal yesterday, I found it difficult to know whether to laugh or cry. Given the total lack of any economic development policies during the past year since this government took over, I wonder whether it is not fair for the Canadian people to ask us to turf these members out of office.

Therefore, I take pleasure in moving this motion, and request that the House give serious consideration to condemning the government for its failure to introduce economic policies which would restore the economy to its full potential and would give Canadians confidence in their future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, these days, a number of words have become almost household terms, such as "unilateral", "divisiveness", "alienation", "separation", and so on; but Canadians around the country have indicated unanimously, whether it be in the halls of the House of Commons, the streets of Ottawa, or in the towns and hamlets in rural areas across Canada, that they have a question, which is, "What, in God's name, is going on there in Ottawa?"

A few days ago, one of the members of the Liberal Party across they way, while discussing the Constitution, indicated that now is the time to patriate our Constitution because it is the last vestige of colonialism in Canada. At the time I did not know whether I should laugh or cry on hearing that comment. Obviously, the individual did not understand the true meaning of colonialism, or he equates it with political symbolism along with economic realities. But if one were to look at the definition of "colony", one would find it is land or territory where resources are exploited for the benefit of a foreign country.

That is us, Mr. Speaker; we are a branch plant country, a colony. For example, let us consider our negative trade balance for fully manufactured goods. In the 1970s, it was nearly $90 billion but in 1979, it was $17 billion for the year, and 1980 was no better.

Just the other day I read in a newspaper that Canada is a rich, developing country and that like all underdeveloped countries, we are experiencing a chronic state of underdevelopment and a chronic state of underemployment.

Let us consider as well the current crisis in the automobile industry, and the past, present and proposed lay-offs in that sector. Let us consider too, the problems being faced by Massey-Ferguson and the deteriorating situation at McDonnell Douglas that was brought to our attention today. There is no question that Canada is being held back by a government which continues to support a branch plant economy; it has indicated clearly time and time again that it has set its mind on a branch plant approach to solving our economic problems.

A "visionary paralysis" would be a good way to describe the government's position and policies. Unfortunately, it is preoccupied with the present and, as the previous speaker indicated, it is preoccupied with the Constitution. It is composed of short-term, tunnel-vision thinkers who spend all their time devising simplistic methods of levying new taxes in an equally simplistic effort to reduce our increasing deficit.

What we need is for some clear national objectives to be established, some clear, definitive intertrade policies, some new long-term financial policies. If one were to ask members of the government, leaders of business and leaders of labour what the objectives and goals of this government are for 1990, what would the answer be. I suggest that if one looked at the fields of agriculture, mining, forestry, fisheries or self-sufficiency in food production, one would not find the goals clearly stated or precisely identified, either for the government or for Canada.

I must give the government credit for one goal, and that is the goal of ensuring that a measly 50 per cent of the oil industry in Canada is owned by Canadians by 1990. This is a tiny step in the right direction.

We have to ask what the Tories' goals and objectives are. It is easy to recognize that the philosophy of the Liberal Party, by definition, has no long-term goals. What are the goals of the Tories? What are the clearly stated objectives of the Tory party in Canada?

An hon. Member: Back to the eighteenth century.

Mr. Riis: Back to the time of the wealth of nations, of Adam Smith. Presumably they are based on the policies of 1776; the gospel according to the Tories. God help us all.

What Canada needs is for the government to state very clearly now what its job-creation objectives are; what percentage of unemployment should be dropped—should it be 2 per cent or 3 per cent? I think it is a shame that we have come to agree that 8 per cent or 9 per cent is acceptable. What is our target? What are we aiming for?

We should consider, too, our target in home construction. We say that we are going to build 240,000 homes in Canada this year but why not build 500,000 in the next two or three years? Why not build more decent homes that Canadians can afford?

What is the balance of payments goal for Canada? What are the small business policies designed for the entrepreneur? And as the previous speaker indicated, what is the industrial strategy for Canada? During question period today we heard vague references to the beginnings of an industrial strategy. We have been waiting for it for years and years. The minister responsible for an industrial strategy indicated that he will be saying something about this in the months ahead. He has to spend a considerable amount of time discussing it with the various vested interests concerned, and I am not convinced that it will be to the benefit of Canadians if it is based on the past record of the Liberal Party.

Productivity is a topic that has been before the House a number of times, and it was raised again today by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). He spoke of productivity goals but he had the courage to suggest that the output per worker has decreased and that, by and large, that is one of the crucial factors which hinders Canadian development today, and he said that Canadian workers will have to bite the bullet.

I think it is clear to anyone with even a rudimentary understanding of economics that technology and equipment are problem areas which affect productivity. Money must be spent on research and development, but with a branch plant economy in no way can we expect serious research and development to occur in this country.

Mr. Minister, you have the courage to suggest that Canadian workers are a part of the problem of Canada's lack of productivity and, Mr. Minister, I suspect that we should identify the real problem in this. Indeed, one could suggest it is yourself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would ask the hon. member to address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Riis: Unquestionably, what this country needs now is strong political leadership to bring government, labour and business together and to address what my leader so aptly identified a number of weeks ago as the pending economic crisis that this country is about to face. We need to establish an open dialogue between these three parties in an effort to create a greater awareness amongst Canadians about our economic problems and to develop positive, co-operative solutions to them.

We have inherited a legacy which is the result of both Liberal and Conservative policies. It emphasizes the competitive and destructive forces in Canada. The problems with our Constitution today are simply a reflection of these difficulties. I refer to the balkanization that has occurred in the regions of Canada and the provinces of Canada. The provinces recognize that they are on their own, that their backs are to the wall, and they can no longer count on the comprehensive co-operative and economic programs of this government because they are simply not there.

Put in simplistic terms, the programs of the Liberals and the Tories have resulted in a directionless, accelerated, goalless exploitation of our resource wealth—dig the coal, dig the copper, export it as quickly as possible, as we did in the days of the fur trade and the squared timber trade during our early economic development.

Although I suspect the Liberals would deny it, they have taken us to the brink of a policy of continentalism over the years which recognizes the North American continent as an economic unit but has not paid much attention to the existence of the 49th parallel.

A few months ago when the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) led the previous government, he gave us another example of a blatant, unbridled rush to an even more aggressive and destructive form of continentalism. Under his policies, Canada would have been even more subservient to the dictates of the North American marketplace.

An hon. Member: Joey Reagan.

Mr. Riis: The Tories had little to say about a sound Canadian economic strategy. They wanted to return to the time of Adam Smith and the simplistic economies of the eighteenth century. Had the Tories been permitted to continue with their policy, I suspect we would now be in a permanent state of underdevelopment in this country, increasingly dependent on resource exploitation, and increasingly dependent on foreign imports. But Canadians soundly rejected that Tory program.

I hope and pray that the next time around, the people of Canada will soundly reject the hollow and shallow promises being made by the Liberal Party. I do not think there is a better example of a hollow promise than the discussion on research and development that is occurring in Canada today.

• (1630)

Research and development in Canada, except for Ireland and Iceland, places us at the very bottom of the industrialized western nations. At the moment our contribution to R and D is 0.9 per cent, and the minister has the audacity to stand up and say "we hope in five years to have it at 1.5 per cent of our GNP". I suggest that is a Neanderthal approach to research and development. Simply 1.5 per cent will condemn us to falling further behind in the race of western nations to participate in the development of a sound and sophisticated economy. Research and development will not even reach that in five years, as the minister has, in a sense, indicated.

An hon. Member: Like a piano player in a cathouse.

Mr. Riis: The best measure in research and development is not the percentage of money spent per GNP, but the number of people involved as a percentage of the total population. After all, it is not the money poured in for research and development but it is the creative, energetic, innovative minds of people following a clearly defined policy which results in the positive contributory research and development of a country.

Let us look at some figures for a moment. I shall refer now to industrial research and development. The figures I have selected are from 1977. The situation, of course, has not changed since then, some have even suggested that it has worsened.

In 1977, Canada, with a population of 23 million, employed 22,000 people in industrial research and development, whereas Sweden, with 8 million people, employed 24,000 people; Holland with 14 million people had 26,000 employed; France, with 54 million people, had 120,000 employed; West Germany, with 61 million people, had 197,000 people employed; Japan, with 115 million, had 306,000 employed; and the United States of America, with 217 million, had 394,000 people involved in industrial research and development.

All of these countries, with the exception of Canada, have on stream at the moment aggressive five-year plans to double and triple those numbers of individuals involved in research and development. What is so shameful is that Canada has no goal in this area in any meaningful way. Why is this? We have to ask why it is that we are so far behind and seemingly falling further and further behind. Either a great difference exists between our industrial objectives, policy or strategy and those of other countries, or we simply do not know what is going on. I am sorry to say that I am forced to accept the latter, that we do not seem to know where we are going. We do not seem to know what our economic objectives are in this country. Consequently, we are unable to have a decent post-secondary educational policy or a research and development policy because we do not know what it is we are trying to accomplish. As the previous speaker indicated, the government is suggesting consideration of cutbacks of $1.5 billion in post-secondary educational funding. This is at a time when more money should be spent in those areas in an effort to invest in the future of Canada than is being spent now.

In conclusion, we could end up in the next few weeks with a Constitution that is the envy of the world. However, if we are not careful, we will end up with a situation in Canada without the economic wherewithal to really do anything with the Constitution.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) for giving me an opportunity to make a statement today on the economy.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The silence is about to be broken.

Mr. Knowles: Is this another budget?

Mr. MacEachen: I must say I am not obliged to thank him for giving me any ideas as to how to manage the economy. In fact, the resolution which he has moved condemns the government for its failure to produce economic policies which would allow the economy to reach its full potential. In the course of his speech, the hon. member made not a single constructive suggestion which could be described as economic policy. In fact, the Conservative Party is groping, day after day, for a policy of some kind and it does its groping before us all during the question period as it searches for an economic policy. Because there is no co-ordination and because there is no real thought given to the question of the economy, contradictory statements are made day after day. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), supported by his seatmate, the former president of the treasury board, led an attack on what they consider to be government extravagance, the failure of the government to be more restrained, the failure of the government to reduce the deficit and the failure of the government to reduce even further the rate of spending.

That is that wing of the party. The other wing, for example, is represented by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), who, day after day, asks for more spending and more social programs. At times, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) joins that group when he calls for energy tax credits, and so on. I intend to say more about that later and I intend to say a bit more about the usually contradictory and often dangerous medicines prescribed by the official opposition for the Canadian economy.

First, I want to describe to the House some recent developments in the Canadian economy which are not only welcome but, in my view, are further evidence that the balanced, non-extremist approach, adopted in the October budget was the wisest course of action to take in the present situation in Canada. I stated in that budget that I rejected extreme solutions on either side. I stated quite clearly that I wanted to follow a moderate course and avoid the dangers of the extremists' positions, one adopted by the New Democratic Party and the other, not adopted by the Conservative Party but by the hon. member for St. John's West when, in his more right-wing moments, his true colours come to the surface, and he is permitted by the red Tories to show that bit of blue which designates his colours.

Mr. Broadbent: The Liberal Party is the party of the dead centre.

Mr. MacEachen: The most recent information I have on the economy, Mr. Speaker, makes it clear that there was an unexpectedly strong recovery in the economy in the second half of 1980.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We all missed it. Where was it?

Mr. MacEachen: The growth in real output during the third quarter was at an annual rate of 1.7 per cent. The fourth quarter figures will become available at the end of this week, and I expect they will show a growth rate of more than 6 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I think that is rather remarkable in light of the gloom and doom which has been voiced by members of the opposition.

Therefore, for the year 1980 as a whole we may see a small increase in growth rather than a decrease in real growth which we expected at budget time. That recovery and that strength in the economy is most welcome and will be appreciated, I am sure, by all members of the House.

Another development is that employment has continued to rise. Almost one quarter of a million new jobs were created last year. Unemployment is still high but it is less than 7.5 per cent, less than I expected in the October budget. Of course, the main reason for this recent strength in the economy is the remarkable strength of our foreign trade. Our trade surplus in the fourth quarter was more than $11 billion. This is a record figure and probably exceeded our deficit on non-merchandise transactions. We may have had the first current account surplus since the first quarter of 1974. That is what is happening to the economy.

• (1640)

As well, there has been some recovery in consumer spending and housing helped by the decline in interest rates last summer and fall.

Mr. Andre: What decline in interest rates?

Mr. MacEachen: That decline may have gone unnoticed by the hon. member for Calgary Centre. In light of his comments this afternoon, I would say he has not noticed a lot of things that have happened in this country and in this Parliament. I do not want to exaggerate, but there has been some recovery in consumer spending and housing, helped, as I said, by the decline in interest rates last summer and fall as well as by the increase in employment.

To do this well in the troubled world environment we are now facing is evidence of the fundamental strength of Canada's economy. We could not achieve those trade figures without a strong competitive power. Our competitive power is strong because our costs have risen less than in most industrial countries and because our exchange rate is favourable to our exporting countries.

It is obvious that other countries envy our rich resources. The products of our mines and forests have swelled our export figures. As one of the world's great exporters of grain, we are benefiting from high international prices. These are some of the positives that one ought to lay on the record in discussing the Canadian economy. Of course, our varied sources of energy are of immense value. One of our greatest challenges is to ensure that we develop them in ways which will serve the interests of all Canadians.

I noted the comments made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre on the National Energy Program. It is obvious that he holds these views very strongly. They are not my views, not the views of the government or of the Liberal Party. Our views are quite different from those held by the hon. member for Calgary Centre. The sooner we recognize that there is a vast difference between this party and the party opposite, the better understanding we can reach in the debates in this House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles: Tell us what is the difference.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is seeing one of those black spots. He is the one who told us that Members of Parliament sometimes see things that are not there. He has been having one of his attacks in the last moment or two.

We have also secured impressive success in the new growth areas of high technology. I am delighted that my speech in Montreal received as much attention as it did today. I have unusual experiences in my life. I am accused by the hon. member for St. John's West of being silent. When I break my silence, the first man to complain is the hon. member for St. John's West. However, I broke it yesterday and talked about the impressive success that the Canadian economy has had in the area of high technology.

In my speech I talked about the Dash-8, the Challenger, the PT-6 and Telidon. All of these are world class examples of Canadian technology. We need to develop more. The emphasis which the spokesman for the NDP, the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) placed on research and technology is a priority which I share and which this government shares. That is why we have placed in our spending plans a high priority on the general area of economic development. One of the most important components in that area is further support for research and development, a well-placed emphasis which was echoed by the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap.

I would like to say as well that the regional patterns of economic growth are changing in Canada. I did not hear very much from the opposition this afternoon about the regional character of the Canadian economy, how varied the economy is and how different the rates of growth are in various parts of the country. We all know of the dramatic growth in the western provinces.

Let me tell the hon. member for Calgary Centre that my Canadianism is not restricted to my own region. I am delighted that Alberta is currently showing a strong rate of growth and Saskatchewan has a healthy rate of growth. British Columbia has a problem with housing and services. Why? Because of strong economic activity.

Mr. Andre: You will notice there are no Liberals there. Do you think it is a coincidence?

Mr. MacEachen: I want to emphasize that the pattern of growth is different in various regions. There is a strong and promising growth in western Canada. I assure the hon. member for Calgary Centre that the National Energy Program will assist and facilitate the further development and growth of western Canada rather than impede that growth, as he suggested in his speech. I will be ready to stand by that prediction a year or two down the road when the economy will be strong and definite.

There is a new promise of growth in Atlantic Canada. There is no longer any doubt that we have a major commercially viable oil field in Hibernia. There are new markets for the coal of Nova Scotia and new potential for the fisheries of Atlantic Canada as a result of the development of the 200-mile limit.

Let us not put down this country in an economic debate. Let us look at some of its strengths and acknowledge its weaknesses as well. There are weak spots in the Canadian economy. The weakest spots recently have been in the automobile industry, in the farm implements industry and in some other manufacturing industries located mainly in Ontario.

We have taken steps to support the automobile industry in this particularly difficult adjustment period. We have taken steps to assist the farm implement industry. We are absolutely determined to ensure that the manufacturing industry achieves its potential for further growth and development. I did not find the same pessimism among the businessmen who spoke to me before my budget, especially from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Their message to me was that we have regained our competitive position; we had lost it, but we have regained that position; we are in a good position now to compete vigorously and aggressively internationally; and "Please don't do anything in your budget through additional corporate taxes that will impede our future growth and development."

• (1650)

An hon. Member: And you listened to them.

Mr. MacEachen: We did listen because I thought that in maintaining the status quo in the tax regime in that area we were doing something quite constructive, and that has proved to be the case.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The main problems we face in Canada are closely interlinked. The first is the slowdown in productivity, and the second is the accelerating rate of inflation. These are the two problems we face as an economy. I have heard not a word from spokesmen opposite as to how we should cope with these seemingly intractable problems. One gets the impression that they are intractable as one sees each industrialized country wrestle with declining productivity. Even Germany and Japan, the model economies of the world, are struggling with the problem of declining productivity.

So what do we do about it? I receive no answers from members of the opposition. These are worldwide problems, but that does not make them any less serious for Canada. In my address yesterday I pointed out that output per worker has actually declined since 1973 after rising by nearly 3 per cent per year in the previous 12 years. That has happened in our economy; there is no point in attempting to avoid staring it in the face.

Mr. Andre: How come it happened?

Mr. MacEachen: It has happened for a variety of reasons, but it is important to understand that when one uses output per worker as a measure of productivity, that is not casting any slur on the workers of this country. When we use that expression, it is used as a measure. It is not an evaluation of how hard individuals work. It is not a moral judgment nor a political judgment; it is simply a way of measuring the productivity of our country.

What I was saying yesterday in Montreal is that if we in this country want—as I think we should have in the future—better standards of living, better security for the needy, better pensions and better wages, the only way we can reach that is through increasing productivity. There is no other way.

I made the statement that as a nation we are entitled only to what we produce. We are entitled to the gross national product, to nothing more and to nothing less. Rising entitlements can only be legitimized through increased economic growth. I demonstrated that because during the period 1961 to 1973 the gross national product nearly doubled. But how did that come about? It came about because of rising productivity. In the last seven years, since 1973, there has been declining productivity. Even though the rate of growth in employment has been about the same, we are now facing a situation in which we have the phenomenon of declining real incomes. If we want to turn that around, we have to do a number of things, and I discussed these matters quite fully in the address I gave yesterday.

Of course, inflation is a very serious problem. Prices have been rising rapidly ever since the early 1970s. There was some relief in 1976 and 1977 as a result of the anti-inflation program. Food prices declined at that time, but they have been accelerating steadily since then. The cost of living rose more than 10 per cent last year, and in January of this year, it was 12 per cent higher than a year earlier. We have not done quite as badly as some other countries, but we have not done as well in meeting the challenge of inflation as have Germany and Japan, which have done better than Canada. However, we have done better than quite a number of other countries.

An hon. Member: Name one.

Mr. MacEachen: We know that inflation is bad, unjust and discriminatory. It has strong elements of injustice because it affects different groups in the economy and in society differently. Retired pensioners, for example, and those who are not strong in the economy suffer most. That is why inflation is bad from a social point of view, but it is also bad from an economic point of view because it prevents us from reaching our full potential in the way of economic growth and in the way of employment growth.

The fact is that at the present time inflation is deeply embedded in our system. It is embedded not only in the system but also in the psychology of the population, all of us. That psychology has to be turned around. It will not be turned around quickly.

There are those who believe it can be turned around very quickly by what I consider to be punitive economic policy measures, by turning the screws and by pursuing policies which will have an effect on inflation and probably bring the rate of inflation down more rapidly through deep expenditure cuts, for example, or strong doses of monetary policy. Those things may bring down the rate of inflation, but at what expense? At the expense of declining output and rising unemployment.

If hon. members say to me, "Why don't you bring down inflation more rapidly through this type of measure," my answer is simply that I feel that the social costs are too great and that there is more to economic policy than the policy itself. One has to examine its impact on the community and society, what it will do and how well it will be supported by the population. All the evidence is not in on this particular question, but I would not recommend to my colleagues nor to Parliament a policy which would be Draconian in its application through monetary and fiscal policy in order to reduce inflation rapidly.

That is why I have opted for a policy of gradualism. I believe over time that would produce the results with the least possible damage to the economy and society. That is the stance I adopted in the budget, and it is still my stance.

All that has happened since the budget reinforces the necessity for a strong anti-inflationary stance in the economy. Let me repeat very briefly the elements of that anti-inflationary stance. First of all, there is the necessity for restrained growth in the money supply. The Bank of Canada has been successful in meeting its progressively lower growth targets and has had the government's full support in doing so. The reduction in the target band from 5 per cent to 9 per cent to 4 per cent to 8 per cent, recently announced by the governor of the bank, is a further step in this steady approach to achieving the monetary conditions for non-inflationary growth.

I fully support the further step of the Governor of the Bank of Canada. Of course our job and the job of the Governor of the Bank of Canada in administering monetary policy in Canada has been made more difficult by the volatility of the interest rates in the United States which we have all observed. Faced with these conditions, in my opinion the Bank of Canada has struck a reasonable balance between moderating the impact on Canadian interest rates and on the exchange rate.

When American interest rates rise and remain higher than Canadian ones, as they did for a good part of 1980 and the beginning of 1981, there is a pressure on Canadian interest rates and the exchange rate. You take it on either or on both. The governor has struck what I thought was a balanced approach by taking it on both. It is a matter of judgment. I do not think anyone has found a better way.

The fiscal policy is another element of our anti-inflationary stance. We are determined to reduce the deficit and our financial requirements. Relative to the size of the economy, our deficit and financial requirements this year have been held below the peak levels reached in 1978-79. Deficits as a percentage of the gross national product are projected to be cut in half over the next three years under the budget's tax and expenditure plan.

So, we are winding down the deficit. But, why not a faster reduction of the deficit? In 1980 there was some weakness in the Canadian economy. If we had reduced the deficit and decreased expenditures more rapidly, we would have increased the weakness of the Canadian economy. That had to be taken into account. We intend to hold government expenditures to or below the trend growth of the gross national product. This is not only important from the point of view of reducing inflation, but also to ensure room, resources and incentives for sustained private sector growth. We will be able to achieve deficit reduction while hopefully avoiding general, personal or corporate income tax increases, further helping the economy to achieve its potential.

Obviously comparisons are drawn between our fiscal stance and the measures proposed by the President of the United States. I have no intention of prescribing for the United States economy; that is the exclusive responsibility of the authorities of the United States. But I would say that in substantial part, for example, the tax measures of the president represent a catching up to a system already in place in Canada. United States personal income tax cuts will not go much further than to make up for the past and prospective increases which result from the lack of indexation in that country. I believe the tax relief for 1981 which will be afforded to the Canadian taxpayer through indexation is greater than the tax relief which will be afforded through the cuts proposed by the president.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Also I would add that the proposed new depreciation rates in the United States leave our industry, especially manufacturing, in quite a favourable position relative to that country.

The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) asked me to take guidance from the economic package of the President of the United States. As I said, it is not for me to prescribe for the United States, but if we undertook at the present time the deep expenditure cuts inherent in the president's proposal, if we, for example, decided to reduce our expenditures to a rate of growth of 6 per cent per year, as is the presidential objective, we could not do so without harming basic fundamental social programs of vital importance to Canadians.

I believe that by 1983-84 the rate of growth in government expenditures will be about 10 per cent. In order to achieve this, we will have to secure a saving of $1.5 billion in intergovernmental transfers. We do not know where those savings will occur yet. The hon. member is premature in saying that they will occur from post-secondary education; that has not been decided. But even to achieve the savings I am projecting, which are less onerous than the ones projected in the United States, it is essential that we secure not only savings within our own programs but savings in intergovernmental transfers.

This is our gradualist stance; over time we will reduce inflationary pressures by following a moderate, gradual, medium-term, fiscal monetary and expenditure plan. That is where we are at as a Liberal Party. I believe this moderate course will ensure that the Canadian economy in the 1980s will achieve its full potential, that productivity and investment will be improved, and that we will not fall victim to some of the more extreme economic policies advocated from time to time by members of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, certainly the presentation of the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) was from a purely political point of view. His arguments had very little relationship to economics or fiscal and monetary policies. He justified everything he has done.

It reminded me of being in the House during my first session when I believe the Hon. John Turner was minister of finance. It has been said on several occasions that that was the turning point in the Canadian economy, the turning point from management to mismanagement in basic government programs which affect the entire economy of the nation.

I remember seeing Mr. Turner standing in approximately the same location as the present Minister of Finance and defending policies which were critized by economists, businessmen, and the rank and file of the people as not being in the best interests of Canada. He defended them with an evangelistic fervour which has been unequalled in the House, even by the present Minister of Finance. It was the beginning of the decline in Canada's economy. Eventually that gentleman saw the folly of the ways of the Liberal government and without a word left the government, and properly so. The only regrettable thing is that he made his contribution to our present economic crisis—and we are very close to a crisis—and left without giving Canada any guideline as to what might better be done for this country than he was able to do following Liberal politicians and their bureaucratic recommendations. Today is a repetition of the bureaucratic recommendations which were obvious in the program of the then minister of finance to whom I have just referred.

This is a divisive program. It cannot be described in any other fashion. The Minister of Finance has stated that it is his objective to save $1,500,000,000 in cost-sharing programs, grants to the provinces, etc. All this is doing for Canada is transferring the tax responsibility and the service responsibility from the federal Minister of Finance and the federal Grits to whomever may be unfortunate enough to find himself in power in any province in Canada.

His dismissal of the idea that secondary education may suffer as a result of the reduction in the distribution of wealth to the provinces is just not worthy of a man of the intelligence which he is supposed to have. There is no question that if $1,500,000,000 is pulled back from the provinces, then services rendered by those provinces must suffer or they, in turn, must tax. Can the provincial governments then expect the political repercussions which emanated from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) when in campaign against provincial governments and, in defence of the federal government she criticized the health programs of virtually every province in Canada after she had tried to cut the purse strings before they left Ottawa? That is the policy which this government is again projecting. It will reduce the grants to the provinces in one way or another. There is no question but that those programs in those provinces will suffer.

One provincial minister of health in Canada has said that there is no way that progressive policies which have been adopted historically can be followed. He says that they may be able to maintain the present medicare program and the present hospital program. He says that they have been trying to supply auxiliary services which have been expanding on a regular basis, but if there is a cut in the federal funds awarded for health to the provinces then that will be the end of the progressive programs of which he has been so proud. We will come to the position where we shall tax the provinces, if there is to be any progression in health. And so it goes throughout the provincial programs which have been so dependent upon the largesse of the Liberal government in Ottawa, which largesse is apparently shrinking today.

I was rather amused when the Minister of Finance said that he spoke to businessmen before handing down his budget. I wonder how many of them have given him the privilege of an address since he handed down his budget. His performance has certainly not pleased the business community. It has not pleased consumers. It has not pleased the manufacturers or the wholesalers' associations, or any other group. I wish I had time to give the minister some quotes to support this. Even that loyal paper, The Toronto Star, had a recent item on February 12 condemning the policies of the government in respect of its application of interest rates and the cost of doing business. The minister does not want a Draconian policy, but he is forcing one upon the provinces of Canada. Indeed, the provinces will take the blame and not the federal government, if there is any way that it can be transferred by the Liberal government to them.

We have conducted ourselves in a fashion which is very comparable to the German fiasco of inflation immediately after World War I. I challenge you who support this government to read the various steps which took place, and to compare the identical cash flow situation in Germany after World War I with the cash flow situation which we have here today. Yes, we have a favourable trade balance. No, we do not have a favourable balance of payments cash flow in this country. What is worse is that we must depend upon foreign sources for our borrowings and unless our exports go up immensely and our imports go down drastically then our cash flow, our balance of payments, will get worse, as it did in Germany after World War I.

The reasons are different. The reason over there was that they had payments to make as reparations to those countries which were victorious in that war. Our reasons are that we are spending in excess of our means. We are sending money out of this country in the form of interest and in other forms of cash flow, such as loans to other countries at no reasonable interest rate. We are not aware of just what the consequences of the unfavourable balance will be in the towers of Ottawa, as we build it and continue to build it by further deficit financing and further borrowing abroad.

There are those who have said of inflation that it just is possible that once it has reached the double-digit stage it is irreversible and that there is not the will of government. That is what the Minister of Finance said today. He said he does not have the will or the political courage. He said that he does not have the courage to apply to Canada those economic measures which could, in fact, reverse the inflationary tendencies which are so devastating to the total welfare of our economy.

I think you would find that at the moment, Mr. Speaker, we are resorting to any means possible. We are borrowing. We are giving the Canadian people a mild sedative to ease the pain for the short term. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the delusions of the opiate are there ahead of us in the long term, if we do not resort to a responsible position.

Let us take a look at a few of the little things that happened in 1980 versus the things which the minister was talking about today with respect to employment. According to statistics, the rate of job creation under this government is one half of that achieved by the previous government in its short term in office. We can take those months and compare them. But there is something even worse than that. The rate of employment in the private sector is only one quarter today of that of 1980. The real job creation has taken place in the public sector, at public expense—at taxpayers' expense. That is where the job creation has taken place. The minister smiles, but he is fully aware of that.

The rate of employment in the public sector has gone up 12 times in 1981, or since February of 1980 until today. So it is easy, as long as the taxpayers will pay the bill, to have job creation at public expense. But it is more challenging and beyond the scope of the imagination of this government to create an economic atmosphere in which employment will take place in the private sector.

The minister referred today to the psychology of inflation, those things that people anticipate and want. He has not referred to the government policy which might in any way deflate those inflationary expectations. He says he is going to turn the screws, but not on himself, rather on the provinces.

The two problems of productivity and inflation to which he has referred are real. I share his concern about the existence of both. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that as long as interest rates are as high in this country as they are, any small businessman—and small business employs about 60 per cent of all Canadians—is very hard-pressed to see the logic. To obtain a more productive plan, when the interest rate at this moment in time will cost more than the savings in higher productivity, is self-defeating. The only way we will achieve higher productivity is when the incentive for it is there in earnings for the labourer and in earnings for the employer. Both are absolutely essential. There is a feeling of insecurity. No one knows which way the government will move next to collect its money.

I said in this House earlier, in another debate, that I agree with the Minister of Finance that, in fact, we do have an international problem. In fact there are similar policies in other countries. We do have interest rates which are too high—not only in Canada but in other countries. I submit this is self-defeating, if we cannot get together with some of the others who find themselves indubitably in the same position of declining standards of living.

• (1720)

We can talk about rights, we can talk about defence; we can talk about any number of matters on an international basis. Why does this nation not take the initiative and call an international conference to determine how, where and when we can get down to the point where people can afford to live? It is not impossible.

If we are as concerned as we claim to be about the Third World and about Canada—and we can express little interest in the Third World, economically, if we do not express an interest in prosperity at home—why have we as a government not obtained for this nation some opportunities to get rid of some of the products which others need and which we can produce in abundance? We are prepared to sell our raw materials to Japan. We need to sell them; I recognize that, but we have very much been denied the right to sell beef or agricultural products on the Japanese market. This activity is increasing very slowly.

We drive down the street, and we meet Japanese cars, but it will be very difficult to go to Japan and find a Canadian french fry— maybe a few. There are obstacles there which we must remove, and if the Minister of Finance wants that era of prosperity to recover, we must negotiate and develop a two-way street. We have a European Economic Community. Why are we not trying to put fish, agricultural products, building products, and pre-fab houses into their market? Why should we take the various European vehicles—cars, among other things? A Japanese car is not the only item which comes into this country from which we derive no employment benefit for the people of this nation, except when someone is needed to drive it up to meet a customer.

I ask the Minister of Finance, the trade ministers of this country, when did we list last get a contract in the European Economic Community for an up-to-date telephone system, an electronic system? I agree with the Minister of Finance who said that Canada has probably got the best technology in the world. But we are not successful in our tenders on these items which can turn the economy around in this nation, and all this is coupled with an element of desire on the part of the minister to turn the screws on himself instead of on the provinces, which is his present objective.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. McCain: The Minister of Finance claimed that there are regional problems. Indeed, there are. There is regional difficulty in the industrial structure of Ontario. So we are, and I do not complain about this, offering assistance and incentives to the manufacturing industry, the auto industry and the machinery industry. Good! But what makes me angry is that we talk about Massey-Ferguson, with its 6,000 plus employees in Canada, getting $100 million, maybe $200,000 million in assistance from the Government of Canada. However, in the Atlantic region, we have 100,000 people in fishing boats, in processing plants, and in boat manufacturing groups, 100,000 people engaged in that industry. And we are not getting as assistance to that fishing boat industry, the equipment to modernize that fleet, and we are not getting the equivalent of the interest on the aid which has been extended to Chrysler and to others in that category. That is the division which exists, and that is why there is regret in Atlantic Canada that there are these problems. There are divisions.

In this country we are trying to apply a single forest policy across Canada, and yet in Atlantic Canada we have the budworm to a degree that no other part of Canada has. We cannot get the co-operation of this government to develop proper sprays, insecticides, pesticides, proper applications to preserve that forestry. One third of all the working people in New Brunswick are employed in forestry. But there is nothing coming forward there, nothing comparable to the assistance that is given to Chrysler.

I do not regret the assistance to Chrysler. I regret the division that the Minister of Finance mentioned. Why does he not exert some influence?

What about agriculture? I mentioned the necessary trade policies that we need, that if we are going to take all the goods from the European Economic Community, the Japanese, et al, then let us get some goods in there as well. Agriculture needs assistance. It needs a port in St. John's and in St. Andrews. It needs trading opportunity. Again, we are not getting the equivalent of the interest on the aid that has been extended to industry in central Canada. There is no quarrel with aiding central Canada, but let us not be divisive or regional, and let the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) speak up for those regions which need the help. They are very obvious by their silence, while people in need suffer.

The minister mentioned Hibernia. What is the story of Hibernia? If you talk to anybody who has any knowledge of that Hibernia oil field, what will they tell you? We are not going to proceed with development in the most productive way until such time as the federal government ends its era of uncertainty, until it gets down to brass tacks and tells us where we are going.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: We talk about uncertainty. The government has given the country misinformation. It has said that it was new information when it was old. There is not any question but that all the statements which were made in this House, for instance about the removal of oil rigs from the west, were right and up to date, but the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources quoted figures which were two or three months old, and they were quoted to the public as if they were gospel.

On one day, when those figures were given in this House, I found that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Rompkey) knew how many rigs were going out, that the oil industry in Alberta knew how many were up on blocks and not working, but the Minister of National Revenue misled this House and the people of Canada to believe that the figure was one half of the 180 which were out of production. That is the uncertainty, the lack of trust which has been generated. No, you do not have to be Draconian, but you must show leadership.

● (1730)

The minister must show leadership in order to get the steel mill going in Sydney, an area that he represents. He must show leadership and courage as Minister of Finance in order to get the offshore resources going and to remove uncertainties and give them the regulation they need. We need the money that these things will produce, and there must be planning if that is to be forthcoming. We cannot go on in this way, with rail line abandonment and the removal of express services in Atlantic Canada. Some of the little communities will shrivel and die because they cannot get services. Only yesterday I received a message from a little village which is 25 miles from the nearest express service. It has been told there will be no more deliveries. And beyond that village there are people who live 50 miles from the CP Express service, and it is to be removed. These things are divisive, Mr. Speaker. They are divisive to western Canada, to Atlantic Canada, and to central Canada.

Let us start to serve Canada, Mr. Speaker, with an economic policy that builds, develops, and creates incentive. Let us not discourage people with high interest rates. Let us get on the track.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the speeches given today by members of the official opposition and the opposition, and especially to the speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). I think that his was one of the best speeches and explanations of the government's economic policy ever given in this House. I am sure it was able to illuminate the government's policy clearly and concisely for hon. members opposite and for the public who may have been watching television.

The minister indicated that the government's policy is a balanced approach to gradual reduction of the deficit over time; the maintenance of social programs, of the basic core of the social programs that have been the backbone of this country and which have been a model for the rest of the world; the movement of our priorities within the envelope system toward greater economic development; incentives for energy development, and the National Energy Program. This is a program that I am proud of in spite of the comments of hon. members opposite. The minister has indicated that he is proud of it. We think it is the right policy and program and that in the years to come it will prove itself as being the right approach.

A great deal of misinformation has been passed around by hon. members opposite and the media about the nature and effects of the National Energy Program. I intend to deal with some of these in my speech, Mr. Speaker.

There has been a great deal of debate in the House in past months, particularly by the official opposition, which indicates that they believe the government does not have priorities, that it should undertake programs in a number of other areas, that spending should be increased, the deficit should be reduced, interest rates lowered, and that inflation should not be stimulated. I think hon. members of the official opposition will admit, if they think clearly about it, that to do all the things we have been advised to do would lead to utter and absolute economic chaos in the country. We cannot do all the things that hon. members opposite recommend. You cannot increase spending at the same time as you reduce spending; you cannot decrease the rate of inflation and at the same time dramatically decrease interest rates. Those things are inconsistent.

I would ask hon. members opposite, I would plead with them, to put the policy proposals they have into some kind of framework so that they can be understood and are consistent. If one thing has become clear with regard to the economic policy and the economic pronouncements of the opposition in past months, it is their total inconsistency. If the opposition expects the government to listen, it will have to take a consistent position on major matters of economic policy such as the deficit, inflation, growth and development. It must tackle the questions of cutting the deficit, of reducing government spending on the one hand and on the other increasing massively the money available for research and development, for industrial adjustment, industrial relocation, retraining programs, energy tax credits, subsidies on home heating oil, and so on. It must resolve how we can meet the problem we have with the province of Alberta about the price of oil, which it would like to see much higher, while at the same time we hold down the price of oil to the consumer.

When I read the motion put forward by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) I almost regarded it as a laughing matter. It has become clear during the past months that the opposition has no idea what a coherent, consistent economic policy is, one that recognizes all the factors to be considered in developing a policy that is in the interests of the entire nation.

We have to be concerned with unemployment at the same time that we are concerned with inflation. We have to be concerned with economic growth and development at the same time we are concerned with reducing the deficit. These things have to be balanced. In October last the Minister of Finance brought forward a budget that took a balanced approach and which will lead to a reduction in the deficit.

As the minister said, we could take a Draconian approach. I do not say, for example, that the United States has taken a Draconian approach, but from the point of view of expenditure cuts their approach is much harder than the approach taken in this country.

I believe, as I think hon. members opposite believe, that our social policies form a sound, solid basis of social security for Canadians. They are a consistent, coherent set of policies and form a sound basis. Perhaps that is not the case in the United States and, as a result, perhaps the President of the United States in his wisdom believes that he could undertake much deeper cuts in some social programs than I believe we could in Canada. To make such cuts in Canada would undermine the basic integrity of our social security system and, to my mind, that is totally unacceptable.

There have been some accusations made against the government in the past, particularly in the debate on borrowing authority. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and others regard the budget which he introduced in December of 1979 as a standard against which this government should be measured and against which the last budget should be measured. Today the hon. member for Calgary Centre implied that if the hon. member for St. John's West had been allowed to implement that budget the country would be in better shape, the deficit would have been reduced further and faster, interest rates and inflation would be lower, and there would be greater economic growth and development, the business community would be in better health, and so on. That is incorrect, Mr. Speaker. In a speech I made last week I indicated why it is not correct. Our budget indicates clearly that we are going to show a reduction in the deficit, and that our financial requirements will decline by an amount similar to that which would have been achieved had the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West been implemented.

Yesterday the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) spoke in Cornwall and indicated that when his government was in power a year ago it had a plan to cut the national deficit by $5 billion. He noted that at present our total deficit is $14 billion and indicated that the deficit under the Conservative government would have been much smaller. If all factors are considered, if we are intellectually honest and analytically correct in evaluating the situation, we will find that the deficit was grossly understated in the December, 1979, budget.

First, if we just look at late winter and the early spring of 1980 we find that the dramatic oil price increases were not anticipated in that budget. That alone would have increased the deficit facing the budget of the hon. member for St. John's West by some $2.3 billion this year as a result of the higher oil import compensation payments. Hon. members opposite can say "no, that is not correct, we would have done something about it". But what would they have done? Would they have reduced the oil import compensation payments? Would they have increased oil prices much faster than they promised in the budget? We never hear these kinds of things when hon. members say that they would have done so much better.

The hon. member for St. John's West has admitted the recession would have led to a deficit, and I will quote him again, "a few hundred million dollars" higher than he had projected in that budget, and with it interest costs. Over all, the deficit under that December, 1979, budget would have been $2.7 billion to $3 billion higher than the forecast found in the December, 1979, budget. If those figures were put together, hon. members would find that the deficit in the December, 1979, budget and the reduction between now and 1983-1984 would have been no better than the deficit reduction found in the budget of October 28, 1980, presented by the Minister of Finance.

If hon. members look at financial requirements, under the October 28, 1980 budget, they are to be reduced faster, and by a greater amount, than the financial requirements would have reduced under the budget of December, 1979. The facts are there, Mr. Speaker. Hon. members can evaluate the data I have put forward to them and I will be glad to explain it all to them in person if they need more help. I hope this indicates that, given the situation confronting this economy, the budget which the minister has put forward is a responsible, reasonable, and the best possible response to those economic situations.

We also hear that we have a high interest rate policy in Canada. In the past the minister has put forward an explanation of how these excessively high interest rates have come about. It is said honestly and in a straightforward manner that because of the federal reserve policy in the United States, there has been a rapid rise in interest rates there. In turn, that has caused an outflow of capital from Canada, causing our interest rates to follow theirs. If our interest rates did not follow those of the United States, the Canadian dollar would drop even further. The Bank of Canada policy, the policy supported by the minister and by the government, is a balanced response which takes some of the pressure in higher interest rates, some of the pressure in the decline of the dollar, and will try to balance out these pressures.

Mr. McKinnon: Herb Gray knew nothing about this. Explain it to Herb, too.

Mr. Evans: Hon. members opposite have said in the past and today that that is not true, that the United States policy had nothing to do with Canada or very little to do with Canada, that our policies are being brought about by mismanagement of the government or are being brought about by a government which does not care. We put forward the proposition earlier that other countries were experiencing the same kinds of difficulties as a result of that U.S. policy and hon. members opposite said "no, that is not true".

Helmut Schmidt in Germany, according to a press report the other day, said that he was greatly disturbed by that very policy in the United States because it was placing extreme pressure on the Deutschmark and other Euro-currencies in the European Common Market. It bears out what the minister put forward in the past, namely, that the U.S. policy has had a dramatic effect. When you consider the proximity of our two countries and the ease with which capital flows between Canada and the United States, the effect on us has been even greater than the effect on those countries. When one considers that Canada is comprised of 24 million people versus 240 million in the United States, if U.S. policy has an effect on a country like Germany with 50 million to 60 million people, it will certainly have an impact on a country like ours with 24 million people and a much smaller capital market.

We faced those problems. The minister responded in a responsible way, and the governor of the Bank of Canada responded in a responsible way. We took that pressure, partially in interest rates—our interest rates did not go as high as those in the United States—in order to protect Canadians from even higher interest rates. But the price we paid was a reduction in the value of our currency from 87.5 cents to 83.5 cents, which I believe is today's value. Our dollar has dropped as low as 82.5 cents. To me, that is a clear indication the government understands the monetary system and that it is working in a balanced way to try to avoid the excesses which would be foisted upon us by hon. members opposite.

We have heard hon. members opposite say, "Drop the interest rate. Unilaterally keep interest rates 2 per cent, 3 per cent or 4 per cent below where they are now." That would be possible. There is no doubt that if you went stark raving mad, you could do that but consequently the value of the currency would drop like a rock. Once the public's confidence in the currency of a country is shattered, not only would you get a reduction in the value of the currency reflecting the economic situation, but you would get a reduction in the value of the currency caused by a serious financial panic in the country. That is not rational. It is not good economic policy. It is certainly not a policy that would be followed, was going to be or ever will be followed, by this government.

We hear comments from hon. members opposite that there is no development policy or economic policy which has coherence. I say that is not true at all. If we look at the budget figures we find there is a massive increase in 1981-1982 in expenditures by this government for economic development. The increase for economic development is 22 per cent. If we look at energy development, we find that expenditures for energy development will increase from $3 billion to $4 billion a year between now and 1983-1984.

If oil import compensation payments were taken out we would find energy and economic development expenditures would increase from $6.9 billion in 1980-1981 to more than $13 billion in 1983-1984. That is a massive increase in economic development funding.

We have also put in place a policy for assisting adjustment in manpower training. Clearly the government understands the difficulties. Clearly the government has put forward a rational and reasoned economic policy to deal with those difficulties.

What members of the opposition fail to understand is that one has to follow a balanced approach, one has to follow a consistent approach. Therefore one cannot devote all of the energies and resources of the government to dealing with problems in one particular area today and then shift those resources to dealing with another area tomorrow. That is what we hear from the opposition day after day. Today we hear, "We want more expenditures; more things to help people." Tomorrow we will hear, "Forget the people, we want more things now to help increase research and development, increase industrial development, increase energy development," and so on. The following day we hear that Draconian policies are wanted to get interest rates down, among other things. It is totally inconsistent. If hon. members are honest and listening closely today, they will see that the policy prescriptions and discussions which have been put forward are the right ones.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre did not put forth any policy alternatives. He just complained bitterly about what the government was doing. We find in fact there have been no policy alternatives put forward. There has not been a fair and rational analysis of the government's economic policy, which I am convinced is the right policy.

• (1750)

If I might close on one note. There has been a suggestion by the hon. member for Calgary Centre that the National Energy Program is the sole and total cause of a mass exodus of oil rigs from western Canada. The hon. member for Calgary Centre should once and for all come clean. The facts of that issue are clear. They are not as told by the hon. member for Calgary Centre. In fact an oversupply of rigs was generated over the past two to three years. Gas is found in most of the holes drilled in the west. There is now a glut of gas and no hope in the near future of either domestic or foreign markets for that gas. Small producers cannot shut in that gas and sit on it. They have to sell it. If they cannot sell it, which is the market situation, why drill for it?

The other fact is that the United States has gone to world prices for oil. If hon. members opposite want us to go to world prices for oil, they should say so. That is not what they said in the past. By keeping our price below the world price, oil exploration and development in the United States is much more profitable. That is why the rigs have moved out of the country. That is being realized and admitted now in the press, in the west, and by the oil industry. The truth is finally starting to come out that it is not the big, bad NEP that is causing all the problems.

You have indicated, Mr. Speaker, that my time is up. I think I have been able to show a few things today. One is that the government understands the situation we are in presently. We have a coherent and consistent policy for dealing with that. There has been an awful lot of hokum coming from the other side of the House for the last four to five months. I hope at some time they will come to their senses and it will stop.

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) forward that speech to his colleagues at university and get their reaction. I would like to point out to him that the outflow of capital has not only been a fact due to interest rates. It has been Canadians running their money out of the country to get it on the oil play in the United States.

The last time that I spoke in the House was before the Christmas recess. At that time interest rates were on the way up and the dollar was on the way down. Since that time the dollar has gone down even further and interest rates have gone up.

Mr. MacEachen: You are wrong there.

Mr. Fennell: It has gone down.

Mr. MacEachen: No.

Mr. Fennell: By a couple of points you are right. I acknowledge that.

Mr. MacEachen: It has never gone down as far as it was that day.

Mr. Fennell: Hopefully interest rates in Canada have peaked. They will probably head down again in a few months. We will have a few months' respite from this high interest rate policy of the Liberal government. All of a sudden the government will have marvellous new spending programs. That will push interest rates up again. They will have to borrow more money. That money they spend is not theirs. It belongs to the taxpayers of today and of the future.

The government has said that it never heard any good suggestions from our bench. I suggest that sometime the government members should sit down and read the 20 hours of debate that went into the December 18-19 discussion on the economy. Some excellent points were brought up in those debates, maybe not all, and maybe not all from one member. However, I maintain that the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and his parliamentary secretary should go through every speech to find any essence they can grab onto in order to make this a better country.

That may get us out of the economic dilemma which is crucifying our youth, senior citizens, low and middle income earners, and the balance of the economy. The only economic development I have seen come forward from this dilapidated government is a bailout for Chrysler and Massey which may cost the taxpayers of this country hundreds of millions of dollars.

There was a spending spree which will cost the taxpayers between half and three quarters of a billion dollars more than Petrofina was worth. It will not add one cupful of oil to our reserves, which are rapidly disappearing. Perhaps the government will justify the price of Petrofina by suddenly putting the price of crude oil in Canada up to world prices. Ministers will then say they are heroes, that it was worth $120 a share. That is an expensive lesson for this country.

Next week marks the first week of reduction in production in Alberta and the commencement of an additional billion dollars expenditure per year for foreign oil. This is all brought about due to the total lack of communication and co-operation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde).

The above-mentioned comments refer to bailouts, buyouts and sellouts. It will cost the taxpayers of this country $3 billion this year for this great budget. The minister talks about a 22 per cent increase. I have not worked it out, but it will be much more. What benefit are we in this country getting directly? It is time that the country stopped being fearful of plagiarism and found out how West Germany and Japan accepted world oil prices and overcame the economic disadvantages. The government continually says we cannot afford 75 per cent of world prices. Ministers should visit Japan and review the research and development in that country provided by direct grants and by tax incentives. They should send people to Texas to see the boom created by a sensible and fair energy program, both by the Democratic and Republican parties.

The government should study the American small business act which provides for reduced interest rates early in a company's origination or expansion. They do not refer to small business as a company requiring $100,000 to $500,000. They go as high as $25 million, and refer to corporations with 2,000 employees. The Americans have faced economic reality. Business today is larger than we realize it is. It must be larger in order to compete successfully in the 1980s.

Our alternative is pretty pathetic, a $100,000 guaranteed loan at one per cent over prime which works out to about 20 per cent at today's rates, or a $500,000 debenture which cannot be deducted for income tax purposes. The great Federal Business Development Bank charges 2 per cent over prime, which currently costs borrowers 20 per cent. Who can afford a 20 per cent loan on debt in this day and age?

Instead of all these Mickey Mouse plans the government should have put up guarantees to the chartered banks and subsidized interest loans. Say the interest rate is 20 per cent; the government would provide a 10 per cent subsidy to get the effective interest rate down to 10 per cent.

Assume they pay that 10 per cent directly to the banks and assume that there is a 20 per cent failure of the money that is guaranteed by the banks, which is very high. The government could have provided $10 billion in guarantees through the chartered banks to small entrepreneurial Canadians to create labour, reduce unemployment and help the industrialization of this country, from being a supplier of raw materials—

May I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening at which time the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Ontario for the completion of his remarks.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. When the House rose at six o'clock, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell) had the floor.

Mr. Fennell: Mr. Speaker, I seem to be put in this position quite frequently. When we were interrupted for the supper hour, I was making a concrete suggestion. The minister said we never come up with any concrete suggestions. I would like just to repeat it.

What I was getting at was that this government has used $3 billion of taxpayers' money on the various programs it has undertaken. My proposal, very simply, is that we look at the small business act in the United States. In the United States loans are guaranteed through the chartered banks. For example, the interest rate would be reduced on small business loans by 10 per cent. In effect, a 20 per cent loan would be a 10 per cent loan. Let us assume that there is a 20 per cent failure factor with respect to these loans, so we have to write off another potential $2 billion of what we are providing. Under this scheme the government could have spent $3 billion guaranteeing $10 billion to chartered banks to help small entrepreneur Canadians to create labour, reduce unemployment and create industrialization in order to take this country from being a supplier of raw materials, which we have been since the beginning of time, to being a processor and manufacturer of finished products. This would still cost $3 billion, and I think it would be a much better way of spending our money.

It would also recover its potential cost from corporate taxes, income taxes and sales taxes, and it would give the country the opportunity to make its citizens proud, productive people. They are ashamed now. They are not as productive as their neighbours. They would like to be more productive and, by putting money into investment in manufacturing, they become more productive.

With respect to inflation, I hope with the new leader at the helm of our neighbour we might benefit from some rub-off. If we do not, then we will face not only an energy crisis by 1985 but also an inflationary crisis which will erode all the basic values upon which this country was built. We will require wheelbarrows to carry our money and bicycles for transportation because we will not be able to afford to buy cars from countries with sound currencies. They will be too expensive, and we will not even have the fuel with which to run them. Are we to face the same crisis Germany faced in the 1920s and China faced several times in the first half of this century? It is time for us to get up off our backsides and develop a sound and practical economic and industrial policy to encourage Canadians to get away from what the minister said. He said that Canadians are a discouraged group right now. Canadians should be encouraged to become a successful industrial nation, to use our huge supply of natural resources, to process them and manufacture them and create unparalleled employment and pride in our country.

The greatest fear I currently have is for our youth. I have five children. We hear about makeshift give-away programs created by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). Some last for three months and some last for nine months, but they do not equip youth with any benefit which will help them in future employment beyond the period a particular program lasts. We must develop long-term apprenticeship programs which permit youth to develop skills using modern technology which will enhance the productivity of Canadians in the future.

What action are we taking to assist our senior citizens? Why must we be the judges who say that a productive Canadian must retire at the magic age of 65? Let us consider the mortality rate of those gentlemen—particularly gentlemen—who retire at age 65. How many deaths are caused by boredom after energetic, useful and productive lives in the labour force? Are we addressing the erosion of their lifestyle, or have we stuck our heads in the sand hoping the problem will go away? It will not go away.

We must control government. We must get our budget into balance and bring inflation under control. We must do more than just wrestle inflation to the ground, which is the argument we have heard from the other side.

Every time I hear about a regional grant, I think regional grants are a great idea, but all the money just flows back into the two central provinces. It does not help the provinces where the money is spent. We must reassess the regional granting system. Grants should be given to the regions to develop industries which are most suited because of the proximity of raw materials, convenience to the market or the adaptability of the labour force. We must allow the regions to develop their own industries rather than industries being imposed upon them by a group of bureaucrats in Ottawa.

The government does not acknowledge that this country is made up of many different peoples from different regions with different needs and lifestyles. This should be acknowledged by the centralist government in Ottawa. They should adapt programs in conjunction with the regions, rather than subjecting the regions to ones imposed by unitary government.

The government talks about Canadianization programs. Very clearly they are nationalization programs. Is this Russia? Are those the goals we are reaching for? Does nationalizing by paying millions of dollars out of the country increase employment? Does it bring more income tax back into the country? What about corporation and sales taxes? Could it simply be a method of acquiring successful tax-paying corporations and of turning them into bungling Crown corporations run by unsuccessful Liberal candidates and unemployed friends of the party?

The truth is that Crown corporations do not work and have not worked in the past. The president and chairman of Petrofina indicated that he would not stay with the corporation. The incentive to management, owners and labour is removed. This is what is disruptive about Crown corporations.

Mr. Caccia: How about Air Canada?

Mr. Fennell: Personally I fly CP if I can, and it is only a second choice.

The Auditor General indicated in his report that bureaucracy is not as productive as the private sector. I plead with the government to look at its policies and what it is doing to this country so that Canadians will have an opportunity to move ahead to the point where hopefully Canada will be a great nation of highly productive and proud people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peter Lang (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I should like to read into the record the motion we are discussing. The following motion was put forward by the Conservative Party:

> That this House condemns the government for its failure to introduce economic policies that would restore the economy to its full potential and give Canadians confidence in their future.

This motion is couched in the most broad and obscure language; it is singularly lacking in specifics. There are no specific criticisms and no constructive or positive solutions. One must assume that the opposition, despite its rhetoric, endorses our policy because it cannot come up with anything better.

The fact is that the Canadian economy, in common with nearly every industrial country of the OECD, has undergone a period of slow growth. However, on balance the record will show that Canada has done much better than nearly all other major countries of the industrialized western world. The record is much more credible than the doom and gloom assumptions inherent in this motion.

Canada had a rather small growth, as measured by the real GNP, in 1980. This is not surprising, in view of the fact that the United States also underwent a brief, but sharp, recession in 1980 which saw a decline in real output in that country. In fact, according to the latest OECD Economic Outlook report, the four major European countries of Germany, France, United Kingdom and Italy averaged a 1.25 per cent decline in real national output in 1980. The same report suggested that our recovery in real output this year, although modest, will be better than in any other major western country, with the exception of Japan. We all know that the quality of life in Japan, where one must pay $75 for a steak dinner, would not be acceptable in Canada. If we take the entire decade from 1969 to 1979, we find that the growth of real output in Canada averaged 4.25 per cent per year. This was a record growth among all major OECD countries, second only to that of Japan.

An hon. Member: Who was in power during that time?

Mr. Lang: In answer to the hon. member, for 90 per cent of that time it was the Liberal government.

Compared with the United States, Canada has been at least a full percentage point a year ahead in terms of economic growth over the past decade. Attaining one's full potential is not difficult when one's major trading partners are faring relatively well. However, it is difficult in the short-term if one's trading partners are undergoing a recession. After all, Canada is one of the major trading countries of the world. Germany is the only country in the entire world which has both a larger population than Canada and larger per capita exports or imports.

We hear very little from the opposition regarding Canada's record of performance in international trade. It is not often that Canada records a trade surplus of some $8 billion, despite the recession in the United States. Two thirds of the increase in Canada's exports last year were to countries other than the United States. The increase in our exports to non-American countries more than paid for our entire increase in merchandise imports. Our share of exports going to the United States last year of 63.4 per cent was the lowest since 1966. Our share of exports going to EEC countries other than the United Kingdom was the largest during the last decade, at 8.3 per cent. These figures indicate that we are broadening and diversifying our trade and that we are less dependent on a single trading partner, particularly the United States.

Our current account surplus last year in relation to our total GNP was the best since 1974. One used to hear opposition members belabour the fact that Canada's current account deficit was the largest among OECD countries. Why do we not hear them acknowledge the fact that it is now among the best? The latest OECD Economic Outlook in December, 1980, estimated that the total OECD deficit would be in excess of $73 billion, with Germany, Japan, France and Italy all recording higher current account deficits than Canada.

While much has been said in the media regarding the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the United States dollar, comparatively little has been heard about the fact that both Canadian and United States currencies have gone up sharply in recent months as against most of the major European currencies.

In recent years our underlying competitive position has definitely improved both at home and abroad. We are benefiting from a much more competitive Canadian dollar. Our unit labour costs in manufacturing have gone up comparatively less than in nearly all major industrial countries of the western world. Coupled with substantially lower energy costs and with net export positions in food, forest products, mineral products and energy, Canada can look to the future with more confidence than any other country of the free world.

Our record of performance as far as job creation is concerned has been consistently at the very top among western OECD countries. It is not often recognized by the opposition that we are one of the few major OECD countries to show increases in manufacturing employment. In 1979 the increase in Canadian manufacturing employment was 115,000, or 5.9 per cent. Even in 1980 there was an increase in employment in manufacturing of some 37,000, or 1.8 per cent, despite the recession in the U.S. If we look at the record of manufacturing employment in recent years of some of the major industrial countries, we find that there has been an absolute decline in manufacturing employment in countries such as Japan, Germany, Australia, France, The Netherlands, Norway and Sweden, and I could go on.

● (2020)

In broader and more general terms, Canada's record of employment creation, even in the midst of a so-called recession, has been the best in the western world. In the last three years a total of over one million additional jobs were created in Canada.

An hon. Member: Not in the private sector.

Mr. Lang: The opposition is pointing out that Canada had a year of no growth for the first time since 1954. They should be pointing out as well that this is the so-called recession and that we added close to 300,000 persons to the employment rolls.

This government's record of performance on unemployment deserves some comment. The opposition used to insist that Canada's jobless rate was the highest of the OECD countries. However, despite that so-called recession in 1980, the unemployment rate in Canada did not increase. It remained at the same level as in 1979. More importantly, it actually declined on a seasonally adjusted rate as the year progressed. Our most recent unemployment rate of 7.3 per cent was the lowest monthly rate in the past 12 months. Despite the fact that Canada's labour force continues to grow faster than in any other major country of the OECD, current unemployment rates in this country are lower than in the United Kingdom and in Italy. They are now comparable with those of France and The Netherlands, which have stagnant labour forces or no unemployment growth.

The U.S., which only a short while ago had a lower unemployment rate than Canada, has now caught up with us. Its unemployment rate is now equal to ours. But its record on total employment and manufacturing employment gains do not compare with ours. We have done a much better job in terms of creating jobs than has the United States. It is fair to say that the policies of other countries have scarcely come near to the policies which this Canadian government has proved to be more effective in the past decade.

Let us turn now to the problem of inflation. To most people in Canada inflation is the number one problem we face. We find that it, too, is not confined to our country but that it afflicts every major industrial country of the world. It is true that the consumer price index in Canada increased by 10.1 per cent in the calendar year 1980. However, the OECD reports that the average rate of inflation went up by 11.5 per cent in four major European countries last year. It also points out that the consumer price index in the United States last year rose by 12.4 per cent, following a 13.3 per cent rise in 1979. Canada has fared much better than the United States in dealing with inflation.

Much has been made of the fact that the Canadian consumer price index rose by 12 per cent between January, 1980 and January, 1981. The fact is that energy prices, which increased by an average of under 10 per cent in both 1978 and 1979, increased by 16 per cent in 1980. Moreover, energy prices in the most recent 12-month period increased by 25 per cent in Canada, with the increase in fuel and gasoline prices being even higher than that. Thus, it is strange to hear criticism from the opposition that we are not moving our domestic prices of energy up fast enough to close the gap with world prices. And at the same time the opposition belabours the rise in inflation. They cannot have it both ways. If we accelerate sharply the pace of energy price increases, it follows that we must witness an escalation in the rate of inflation, which carries with it high interest rates. In turn, high energy costs become imbedded in the cost of producing food, tractor and combine costs, the price of fertilization, the cost of processing, transportation, communications, clothing and other elements of the cost of living. It is inconsistent and misleading to pretend that we can fully absorb in a painless fashion increases in energy prices, which are two to three times as fast as the underlying rate of inflation, without inflation being exacerbated, as the Conservatives would like us to believe.

In summary, Canadians can comfort themselves that while we are obviously not able to realize our full potential in the short run, because of international inflation and oil shortages, the Canadian economy is faring much better than that in any other major country of the western world. There are no quick fix cures for the inflation and slow growth which afflict all countries of the industrial world. The performance of the Canadian economy is most commendable in relative terms. Given our wealth of human and natural resources and our high technology, we can look forward with confidence to the medium and the long-term future.

There is growing evidence that in terms of growth the Canadian economy in recent months may have turned the corner. The growth in the Canadian economy in the second half of last year was appreciably faster than in the first half. Moreover, there has been a definite upturn in recent months in the newly published Canadian Composite Leading Indicator.

It would appear that Canadians have more faith than their U.S. counterparts that inflation can be brought under control. Personal savings in Canada, which reflect faith in bringing inflation under control, in recent years have been consistently higher than in the United States, about 10 per cent versus 5 per cent. The speculative bubble which has been present with respect to gold, silver and other commodities has burst. Wage rates, which have kept up with the consumer price index, have been relatively restrained for some time now. All in all, Canadians can look beyond the immediate problems to the medium and long term with confidence.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise two concerns that I see with respect to our national economy. The first is that we must reach a speedy agreement on oil pricing to reduce uncertainty in the business community and to reduce the uncertainty of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: The second is that the doom and gloom prophecies and criticisms which come from the Conservative Party create uncertainty in the business community and in the people of Canada. There is not much we can do about that.

The federal government has shown flexibility with regard to oil price agreements. It is up to the Premier of Alberta to recognize that we cannot go on any longer without an oil pricing agreement. He must recognize that we cannot go to world prices and that Canada as a whole cannot suffer increased inflation, increased unemployment and lack of energy security in order to allow Peter Lougheed to build his Alberta Heritage Fund.

There are also regional diversities in the economy of our country. This government deals with them. We have adjusted our industrial strategy so that we can deal with the problem of the west having a booming economy while the economies of Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes are slowing down. We also have DREE programs and equalization grants to support our social programs which are so important.

I think it is important to recognize that Canada has developed a national economic policy, in conjunction with a national energy policy, that provides a climate for the full development of our economic potential. I support this government's position right down the line.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang), who just finished his remarks.

● (2030)

I cannot help but comment on some of the things he said. Everyone starts out by comparing our economy to others around the world and saying that we have done well in relative terms. The point must be made that other countries are not as fortunate in their physical and human resources as we are. Surely the only legitimate comparison is with our own potential.

For those hon. members from Quebec who follow hockey, I would point out that the Montreal Canadiens do not play in a league with the Sherbrooke Beavers; they play in their own league. Surely that is the kind of comparison we should make of our ability to perform in the sphere of economics. We should be talking about our own potential rather than comparing ourselves to countries less fortunate in physical and human resources.

Two or three weeks ago, the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) spoke in this House and told us that on one of his business trips to Hong Kong some businessmen had remarked on the opportunities and resources that Canada has, and said they could not understand how we managed to mess things up so badly.

This afternoon the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) spoke of an unexpected strong recovery and referred to a 1.7 per cent annual growth. I do not know how anyone could regard a growth of 1.7 per cent as unexpected. He pointed out that employment continues to rise but he did not mention that unemployment is also rising. For the first time in this country the total number of people who are out of the marketplace and looking for work is over one million. Hon. members opposite should be consistent, and when they speak of the rise in employment they should also speak of unemployment as a percentage of the total work force. Otherwise we only get half the story.

The Minister of Finance also spoke of an $11 billion trade surplus which he claimed was close to being cancelled by the deficit in the non-merchandise account.

I have some graphs here that were prepared by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). We all recognize the valuable work he has done on behalf of the business community of this country. They show that the monthly trade balance in food products, which are basically raw material, is on the increase. Exports of crude materials such as coal and products which do not have value added to them, are on the increase. Exports of semi-manufactured products are on the increase. When it comes to manufactured goods, however, there was an $11 billion deficit in 1977, a $12.2 billion deficit in 1978 and a $17.2 billion deficit in 1979. When we import manufactured goods, we import jobs, but when we export raw material we export jobs. In 1980 the deficit in manufactured goods was close to $18 billion. When we talk about trade surpluses, therefore, we should remember that the surplus is basically in raw materials. The things that create jobs and wealth for our citizens are end products, but in this category the graph zooms down to the basement. If we could have manufactured the $18 billion worth of end products that we imported last year, 350,000 jobs would have been created in this country.

That is the kind of thing we would like this government to do. We realize it cannot do everything and that things cannot be changed overnight but we must move to correct this horrendous balance of payments deficit in the manufacturing sector. We cannot ignore it or pretend, as the minister did, that we have a trade surplus of $11 billion, without pointing out where that surplus is. We cannot address the problem unless we recognize it.

The Minister of Finance is not in his place this evening. He was scheduled to appear at a meeting of the finance committee this evening to discuss Bill C-59, the borrowing authority bill. Hon. members will remember that the government introduced closure in order to get it to committee in a hurry. I understand that no notice was given of cancellation of the committee meeting and there was no meeting of the steering committee. A notice was sent to the offices of members of the committee that it would not meet this evening. The excuse given was that the minister would be in the House listening to our expressions of concern about the Canadian economy. The minister is not only silent, he is contemptuous. If he is not going to be in the House tonight, surely he could have at least gone to the finance committee meeting. The very able Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) is in the House, and I am pleased to see him. Surely the minister should have had the courtesy to come to the House after cancelling the committee meeting.

This afternoon the parliamentary secretary covered many aspects of the Canadian economy in his speech. At one point he spoke of the opposition being intellectually honest and academically correct. I should like to remind him of his appearance at the finance committee in December, 1979, when the subject was interest rates, and quote from the proceedings of that committee to illustrate how he has been intellectually honest and academically correct, consistent and coherent, as he said in his speech. I should like to draw attention to some of the things he said when he was outside the government and to point to some of the policies this government is pursuing at the present time.

Speaking of the Bank of Canada, he said on December 11, 1979, as reported at page 21:14 of the committee proceedings:

When the chips are down, the bank cannot be relied upon to maintain its control over the money supply; as a result, would you agree that this should result in a removal of discretionary authority from the bank, and a directive, as you said, to maintain control over the monetary aggregates only?

The committee was considering a method of controlling the money supply as a means of regulating the inflation rate. He continued:

And I would go one step further, as I have in the past in this committee, and ask you if that would imply to you that the bank be given a directive to allow both interest rates and the exchange rate to find their own level in the marketplace without outside intervention.

The question under consideration was that of the Bank of Canada interfering in the marketplace to regulate the interest rate or the value of the Canadian dollar. When he was in opposition, the parliamentary secretary advocated that the money supply be set and the market allowed to determine the interest rate and the value of the dollar.

We know that the Bank of Canada regularly interferes in the marketplace—every Thursday at the auction—to do what it can to regulate the value of the Canadian dollar. When the parliamentary secretary talks about being coherent and consistent, I would urge him to set an example, which is not evident in some of the things he has said at the finance committee and some of the things he now supports as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. If the government wants to urge members on this side of the House to be coherent and consistent, I should like the parliamentary secretary to do the same.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has miraculously appeared. I hope he remains to listen to what I have to say. This afternoon, when he was congratulating himself on the performance of the Canadian economy, I was afraid that he might get a sore arm from patting himself on the back. Indeed, I was about to suggest that the House should send him a bottle of liniment to use on his arm so that it would not get any worse. However, he has returned to the Chamber and I am glad.

I should like to turn now to some of the things that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said. The government insists that we be consistent and coherent in all we say, but we all remember the occasion two or three years ago when, in a year-end review, the Prime Minister said we would have to accept more government interference in the marketplace, because a free market economy obviously does not work. In answer to a question put two or three weeks ago, the Minister of Finance said that the government still believes in the market economy, in the market approach. I would urge that the government get its own act together and decide what is consistent and coherent as far as its policy is concerned.

Let me talk a little about an area that I come from, and that is western Canada, and relate it to grain movement in particular. We all know that there are many problems associated with the grain transportation business in western Canada. There have been many positions advocated as to how to correct this problem. What I find rather unfortunate—I want to pick a word here that is not too hard on the government—is that the government itself cannot get its own act together to decide what kind of approach it wants to take to this problem.

An hon. Member: How about "stupid"?

Mr. Mayer: We have the minister in the other place responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board saying he does not want anything done with the statutory rate problem. We have the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) saying, in a speech given in Edmonton some two weeks ago, that he would like to see the matter resolved within the current crop year, which would mean that there would be a solution to it by August 1, 1981. We had the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) saying that he would like to refer the matter—or is trying to get a position through cabinet whereby the matter would be referred—back to the Canadian farmer through a position paper. We also have the minister responsible for economic development in the other place saying he does not want anything done until there is a chance to do some kind of study on the CPR and the land grants that it had, and whether those kinds of revenues from the land should be included in the revenues that the railroads are claiming against other things besides grain movement.

So, we have four ministers of the Crown taking different positions. I find this very unfortunate, because what has happened in the past two to three years, is that farm groups have come together and established a negotiating position. I might add that when you have several farm groups representing large numbers of farmers in western Canada coming together and agreeing on a position to take to the government, it is a position that is arrived at with a considerable amount of soul-searching, and yet that is what has gone on in western Canada, and that is the position that farm leaders have taken.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said here in the House, some two weeks ago, that he does not want to move on the statutory rate issue until the farm community has established its position. I find that, again, to be a very unfortunate statement because if the farm community was being irresponsible, I can simply say that our position is unified. We want the government to assume all of the additional costs between the compensatory rate and the statutory rate, and that should be paid to the railways by the federal government, which would be a further drain on the federal treasury.

The farm groups in western Canada have not taken this position, although I think it would be very easy for them to do, and it would be a unified position, and they could take it to the Prime Minister, who says he wants to have a unified position presented to him. It would be very easy for the farm groups to simply get together and say, "We want the federal government to totally fund the difference between the statutory rate and the Crow rate," and yet the farm community has not done this. They have taken a responsible position, yet the Prime Minister castigates them because they do not have a unified position, and he is not going to move on it until they do.

I might add that it is not simply a problem for western Canada, as I pointed out in this House several times before. It is a major problem which affects all of Canada. It would help us in our foreign exchange earnings and help to add to the $11 billion surplus which, as the minister correctly pointed out, Canada had in its trading accounts. It would add to that. As a result, it would add to the value of our dollar. It would decrease the pressure on our interest rates and thus, we hope, lower the interest rate. It would help the manufacturing industry in eastern Canada, and, it would help Massey-Ferguson and Chrysler, so that presumably those companies could find themselves in a better financial position.

This is what I find to be inconsistent as far as this government is concerned. Again, I have to castigate them for standing up and simply saying that we cannot have it both ways. I am not asking for additional government expenditures, and at the same time expecting the government to go ahead and decrease its deficit. Nothing I have said this evening has pointed in both directions at the same time.

The government can do one other thing which would not in the least involve an increase in its expenditures and would show benefits as far as the economy is concerned. For a brief time, when my party was in power, we appointed a grain transportation co-ordinator to look after grain movement in western Canada. This is a position which has been long advocated by all parties in the House. The position was filled in October of 1979 by Dr. Hugh Horner, a former member of this House. He resigned from that position in October of this year, and that position has not yet been filled by the Minister of Transport. I find this unfortunate, because we all know that we have limited transportation capabilities in western Canada, and the co-ordinator was doing an excellent job of getting the best out of our grain transportation system. Most of the people to whom I have talked thought that he had done a very good job in terms of co-ordinating grain movement. This is a position that is now vacant.

We have an acting director of the grain transportation authority in western Canada. We have several people assembled from industry across Canada who have been on loan to the grain transportation authority, people from the grain companies, from the transportation companies. They are rapidly losing morale, and the information I have is that a lot of them will be thinking very seriously about resigning before the start of the spring planting season in western Canada. If we lose these people whom industry has loaned to the grain transportation authority, the whole grain transportation authority is in danger of collapsing. This is a responsibility of the federal government, and I would urge the federal government to go ahead and assume its responsibility. Again, it would not cost the federal treasury any additional money. The position is in place, and simply to let it die by default by not appointing a new co-ordinator, to my way of thinking, is a shame, because it is one way of making maximum use of the limited number of transportation facilities we have in western Canada.

I would like to point out another area in which I have concerns. When the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) was minister of transport, he made no bones about establishing the goal of increasing our exports of grain by some 20 per cent over the just-concluded crop year. We have not heard anything in terms of a target like that.

Let me back up. The target was to increase our capabilities, to export grain by 20 per cent so that by the year 1985 we would be exporting 30 million tons of grain. He came very close to increasing the amount of exports that we had by 20 per cent, and without the unfortunate accident in Vancouver in which the Second Narrows Bridge collapsed we would have reached it during 1979-80.

So far as I am aware, the government has not presently announced any intentions of what their target will be for increasing the amount of exports. Again, this would help our economy. It would help, as I said previously, our ability to foreign exchange around the world, because we know that grain is certainly going to be in demand around the world. Anybody you talk to who is in the grain export business knows that our grain will be sold if we get to export position.

As I pointed out, there are a couple of areas in which the government can do without spending additional amounts of money. It would help the government to earn more taxes, thus increasing the revenue base from which the government operates. At the same, it would not increase government expenditures.

In addition, we heard the western development fund announced in the Speech from the Throne. This is a commitment of money that is apparently made to western Canada. Some of us have made suggestions to the government as to how this money should be spent. We have suggested that it be spent on infrastructing on roads, on upgrading railroads, and things of that nature that will be an investment and will show a return as a result of that part of the country being able to produce more.

I understand, from the conversations that I have had with some of the members opposite, that there have really been no guidelines set as to how this western development fund would be used. There is an area that the government could pursue without committing any additional money, and thereby increasing the government deficit. I would urge the government to get on with setting the guidelines for how the western development fund will be used so that we can proceed to use this money to help us generate more jobs and more economic activity in the country.

In the time remaining I would like to speak briefly about the small business community. As some of you know, the small business community—depending on whether you look at new jobs or the total jobs in the small business sector—accounts for roughly 50 per cent of the jobs in Canada. One of the things we tried to impress on the minister when we talked about the Small Business Development Bond is that it should be extended past the end of the current year, and that it should also be extended to businesses that are unincorporated. I have also had conversations with the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Bussières), and I appreciate the opportunity I have had to speak to him. Any of the times that I have talked to them, they have pointed out that it is a very expensive program, and that it would be hard to justify extending the Small Business Development Bond past March 31, 1981.

Recently I received some information from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business which shows that the amount of money required to create a job under the Small Business Development Bond—to create jobs, not to maintain jobs, which is another aspect—is lower than for some of the other programs. For instance, the Canadian Federation for Independent Business estimates that it would cost $5,600 to create a job under the Small Business Development Bond concept. Under the Regional Development Incentive Program, the cost was $8,400. The Canada Works is roughly equivalent to the Small Business Development Bond. In the local employment assistance programs it costs $7,000 to create each job. I would urge the minister to have another look at the Small Business Development Bond. What appeals to me and to the small business community about it is that there is no paper work involved. We all know of the paper burden. We all know of the work which has been done by the office of paper burden reduction. I have to congratulate the minister on this. I think the office has done a good job and it is generally recognized that that office has done a lot to eliminate paper work which is a real headache for many small businesses.

So far I have just talked about the cost to the government to create a job in terms of lost tax revenue. It says nothing about the kinds of jobs that will be maintained. The Small Business Development Bond is of the most benefit to those businesses that are not taxable. In the main it will serve to keep those people in business. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business estimated they would create 36,000 jobs by a loss to government of $1.25 billion. I asked the CFIB for a figure, and I asked them if they had done any work on their models to show how many jobs would be saved if everybody who made use of the Small Business Development Bond were in a loss position or in a non-taxable position. The estimate was 63,000 jobs. Therefore it seems to me you could look at a considerably lower figure than $5,600.

If we look at the Small Business Development Bond, not only in terms of the additional jobs it would create but also in terms of jobs it would save you would find that the people who would benefit the most from it are those in a loss position, and a figure considerably lower than $5,600 to create one job would result. Even now $5,600 compares very favourably to the other costs of creating jobs under other government programs. As I said, the beauty of it is there is no paper work.

I hope that I have pointed out to the government that there are many things we have said on this side consistent with a lower deficit and increased economic activity which, in the long run, will generate more taxes for the government.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) who led off our party in this debate began his speech by telling us that when he went home his constituents greeted him with the simple question: "Good God, what are you people doing in Ottawa?" I suppose members will not be surprised if I say that is precisely the question I am asked whenever I am home on weekends.

Last year the cost of living went up by 12 per cent. For food consumed at home, it went up by over 13 per cent. For fuel and utilities, the cost of living went up over 21 per cent. Therefore, it is not surprising people complain and wonder what they are going to do. It is not surprising that a Conservative economist, Michael Manford, of Merrill Lynch Royal Securities Ltd., is quoted in today's The Globe and Mail as saying that inflation in Canada in the next year will get worse rather than better. It is not surprising that workers who are still fortunate enough to have jobs, particularly when they belong to unions and have some bargaining power, are now beginning to demand and are trying to get double-digit wage increases. Workers need an increase of more than 10 per cent just to try to keep their standard of living where it was last year.

It was disturbing, to say the least, to read the speech given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) yesterday to the Canadian Club. In part it read:

> The simple truth is that as a nation, we are entitled only to what we can produce. We are entitled to our gross national product—to nothing more, to nothing less—and rising entitlements can only be legitimized through increased economic growth.

Last year's economic growth was less than 2 per cent. It will probably be less than 2 per cent this year. If that is all ordinary citizens can look forward to, then the minister is saying to them that they can expect and should get a decrease in their real income of about 10 per cent. This is not what the minister is expecting of other sectors of society, those who do not work for wages and salaries. He certainly has no right to expect that kind of approach from ordinary people in this country.

Also there are concerns about unemployment. I heard the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Lang) boast about how well we are doing in Canada. I do not think we have a right to boast when according to official figures 945,000 people were unemployed in January of this year. That is 8.3 per cent of the work force. The figure for women and young people is substantially higher than that.

The former minister of employment and immigration implied on more than one occasion that unemployment was not very serious because often it is not the primary earner who is unemployed. Nothing could be further from the truth. People in this country are very concerned. They are not only faced with the kind of unemployment now prevalent in most parts of the industrialized world; they are now frequently seeing a very disturbing phenomenon in Canada. They see plants which have been in operation for 50 or more years being closed and the people who have worked in these plants for all of their working lives losing their jobs. These plants are being closed for reasons beyond the ability of the workers to do anything about it.

Yesterday morning before I came to Ottawa I met with a group of workers who had worked at the Maple Leaf Mills Ltd. plant which had been in operation in Winnipeg for more than 50 years. It closed very recently. Let me illustrate what unemployment and plant closure mean to one person. This illustration could be duplicated hundreds and thousands of times across Canada, but the situation in Winnipeg is not nearly as serious as that in the province of Ontario. My example concerns a woman, age 57, who worked at the Maple Leaf mills for 35 years. Just before the plant closed she was earning $8.61 an hour or about $344 a week. When the plant closed, this woman was laid off. At age 57, it is very unlikely she will ever get a job again, certainly not one that would pay her the kind of money she was earning. She worked in a unionized mill. The union contract had a clause in it about severance pay, so this woman will receive full pay for the next 35 weeks. In other words, she will receive 35 weeks of severance pay which works out to about $12,000. Also she will receive almost a full year of unemployment insurance benefits. However, after that she will be in real trouble because the mill did not have a good pension plan. She will get $81 a month until she reaches age 65. How is that woman to manage? How are many of the people who are being laid off to manage? Nevertheless, the minister indicated that workers in this country cannot expect any more in increased pay than the increase in productivity.

I have pointed out how wrong the minister was to have suggested that, but if he really believed it, he should have taken steps to see that kind of approach applied across the board to all sectors of our society. The hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap talked about that this afternoon. While the minister has been telling the Canadian people to lower their expectations, the government never applied that kind of thinking to the business community in this country.

According to the business section of yesterday's Globe and Mail, the banks in this country increased their assets in the last year by 22.7 per cent; the Royal Bank, 22.1 per cent, Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, 20 per cent; Bank of Montreal, 30.3 per cent; Bank of Nova Scotia, 25.9 per cent and Toronto-Dominion Bank, 23.4 per cent. Therefore, we are not talking about small impoverished corporations but the largest and richest corporations in this country.

When we look at their profits, we see they are in the hundreds of millions of dollars. In 1980, the Royal Bank increased its profits after taxes by 21 per cent from $270 million to $327 million, the Bank of Montreal by 15.1 per cent to $263 million, the Toronto-Dominion Bank by 14.5 per cent to $121 million and the Bank of Nova Scotia by 22.3 per cent to $221 million.

The oil companies have gone on strike. When a group of workers in this country goes on strike, immediately we see editorials in newspapers and demands in Parliament and the legislatures that something be done to stop the strike because it creates difficulties for the people. The oil companies, among the richest corporations in this country, have gone on strike. They have refused to invest in Canada and are cutting back on exploration. Why? They are not making enough profits. The figures show that is untrue, that it is a lie.

The figures are very clear. In 1980, the profits of Imperial Oil increased by 38.3 per cent over 1979 to $682 million, Shell Canada by 37.1 per cent to $355 million, Gulf by 31.9 per cent to $380 million and Texaco by 41.5 per cent to $373 million. That is what is going on in this country, but the Minister of Finance tells the ordinary citizen of this country to cut back on his expectations. All he wants is to live the kind of life he lived in the past. He is prepared to work and do his share.

What did the minister say in his speech in Montreal? He said we are in trouble because our productivity is not growing. He said:

> Although we have enjoyed roughly the same rate of employment growth in the last seven years, output per worker has not only failed to increase—it has actually declined.

An editorial in some part of Canada will indicate we are not doing great because Canadian workers are not prepared to work. That is not true. If our productivity is not increasing as it was in other years, there are very clear reasons why. It is not because Canadian workers do not want to work. It is because government and industry have not prepared for the kind of society in which we live.

We have no industrial strategy in this country. Despite all the speeches he made while in opposition, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) has not brought forward an industrial strategy. The result is that our manufacturing industries are steadily declining. In 1970, 26 per cent of the work force was engaged in manufacturing. By 1979 that figure had dropped to 19 per cent. In 1970, 21 per cent of our exports were manufactured goods. Today it is 10 per cent. In 1970, we had a $3 billion deficit in manufactured goods. In 1979 the deficit was $11.5 billion.

Our factories are not operating anywhere near capacity. Plants which were designed to operate on two shifts now work only one shift. Workers who were working five and six days a week now work three. Corporations did not use their profits in years of high profit to modernize and retool their plants and equipment.

For many years the automobile industry made tremendous profits, as did the pulp and paper industry. Now they come to government cap in hand asking for help. The percentage of our labour force in the service sector is increasing every year. That sector is not as productive as the manufacturing or mining industries or the oil and gas industry which is highly mechanized and automated.

Lastly, we have the spectacle of Canadian corporations and the multinationals involved in a rash of takeovers; Thomson buying FP Publications and Hudson's Bay, CP busily trying to buy corporations in the United States and Seagrams wheeling and dealing. These takeovers do not add anything to the productive capacity of this country. This is why our productivity has not increased in recent years.

This country is and will continue to be in trouble as long as the government refuses to do what every other country in the industrialized world has done, with the exception of the United States and Canada. Government must take the lead in planning, together with industry and labour, to use human and natural resources to the fullest capacity in order to produce our food and the goods for which we have a natural advantage and compete for sales in the international markets in order to keep Canadians working.

Until the government gets involved in that kind of planning and devises the kind of industrial strategy the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce spoke about so volubly when in opposition, this country will not only continue to be in trouble but the trouble will get much worse.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the discussion this evening centres on the goal of greater economic growth, a goal we all desire. We look for growth to be sustained over time and growth to be balanced in a regional as well as in an industrial sense.

In seeking those broad goals, we have committed ourselves as a government to reducing the deficit in our total balance of payments. Second, we have undertaken to reduce the rate of inflation. Third, we are seeking to promote employment and viable industries and to generate more exports. Fourth, of course, we want to implement those policies in a way which benefits all regions of Canada. This evening I want to say a word about broad goals in terms of the National Energy Program announced in the budget last autumn.

We seek a reduction in the current deficit in our balance of payments by eliminating, as a major goal of that program, the need for imported oil. We are also doing so through a fundamental commitment to conservation, which has been absent in Canada in the past. We are also doing so through a commitment to substitution of more plentiful forms of fuel for scarce and expensive oil. We seek also, through incentives to the industry, to bring on-stream new supplies of domestic petroleum.

As the House knows and as most Canadians know, Canada is today more than energy self-sufficient. We are, in fact, net exporters of energy. With the National Energy Program, we have set ourselves the additional goal of becoming self-sufficient in oil by 1990. Those programs will help us to correct the deficit in our balance of payments, one of the principal goals of our current economic policy.

With regard to its effects on inflation and unemployment, we have not undertaken in the National Energy Program, a cheap oil policy. However, as the national government of our country we must manage our national economy. We must protect consumers just as we must ensure producers a fair return.

I might note in this connection that in estimating the impact of inflation resulting from higher energy prices, the Economic Council of Canada recently estimated that a one dollar increase in the price of a barrel of oil will add about .5 per cent to the consumer price index. Rather than push inflation even higher, we want Canadians to pay less than world price for their oil, leaving the difference in the pockets of people rather than in the coffers of governments.

I have referred to industrial growth, and the employment that is generated from such growth, as another principal economic policy commitment of this government.

We see the energy policy and, indeed, the energy industry as principal motors of the further growth in our economy. In that connection, we have distinctly Canadian assets. We have become a leader in the technologies associated with oil sands, enhanced oil recovery, natural uranium reactors and frontier petroleum exploration, particularly in sensitive environments.

I do not need to remind the House of the commitments made in the national energy policy to major expenditures between 1980 and 1983 which will give further incentive to growth in this most dynamic segment of our total economy. Those who have consulted the National Energy Program will recognize that almost $12 billion has been allocated to a variety of activities which will bring additional growth to our economy, but growth on a basis which will promote regional balance throughout our country. We look toward equalization, the sharing of benefits and, indeed, the sharing of the costs in developing further in that most prosperous sector in our economy. But by doing so in a way which brings advantage to all regions of Canada, we are nevertheless ensuring that the principal oil-producing province, Alberta, will receive over $100 billion in revenue from petroleum during this decade.

In the National Energy Program, Canadianization is also a major element which makes for economic growth. We want to ensure that more benefits resulting from the growth of our petroleum sector go to Canadian workers and that more of the profits remain in Canada to be reinvested in our own economy.

The means of enhancing Canadian participation in our petroleum sector involves four principal methods. First, we seek to encourage companies already active in the oil and gas industries, by grants and other incentives, to become more Canadian in ownership and control, such as in the recent case of Dome.

Second, we are encouraging Canadian companies not now active in the petroleum sector to enter the oil and gas industry.

Third, new companies which were not in place in the past are being formed. I refer, for example, to the initiatives taken by the co-operatives in Canada to enter the petroleum industry.

Fourth, the vehicle of Petro-Canada is available to play an active role in attempting, on behalf of all Canadians, to acquire outright, foreign-controlled firms. We have recently seen the example of its acquisition of Petrofina, which ensures that a fully-integrated national oil company will be operating for the benefit of all Canadians.

In giving further substance of our National Energy Program, we have consulted the private sector in order to benefit from its suggestions about how the program might best be applied. We remain determined to achieve our goals, but we remain equally flexible with respect to the ways in which we may achieve them.

The National Energy Program is one of the most comprehensive, far-reaching economic initiatives undertaken by any government in Canada in recent decades. The very size and complexity of the challenges we have faced have made necessary detailed and continuing consultation with the petroleum industry and, indeed, all those sectors of our economy affected by the program. That need was recognized from the start. It has gone forward. Several significant adjustments have resulted from consulting with the petroleum industry in the elaboration of the National Energy Program.

I wish to take a few minutes to record for those interested some of the initiatives we have recently taken. First, the industry indicated to us that a new definition of Canadian exploration expenses proposed in the budget would have had an adverse impact on the industry's ability to finance such investments. We responded in Bill C-54. It contains amendments to ensure the immediate deduction of expenses incurred in drilling dry holes, whether for development or exploratory purposes.

Favourable tax treatment will also be continued for wells drilled in frontier areas before the commencement of production. In addition, the existing treatment of drilling costs of wells which qualify for exploration expenses was extended for a further year, to the end of 1981.

Second, the industry suggested to us that the value of the incentive payments outlined in the program could be increased if investors had access to a full tax deduction for exploration and development expenses prior to fulfilling all the requirements for a grant. The rules which we first set forth were subsequently amended to accommodate the industry's suggestions.

Third, while the payment of the generous incentive grants to eligible investors would increase their available cash for petroleum investment, an accounting problem arose in the treatment of grants in their annual operating statements. A typical Canadian company receiving petroleum incentive grants might show an encouraging rise in reinvestment capacity but at the same time a discouraging external appearance of reduced income, unless the grants could be fully reflected in income from the beginning. Accordingly, the government has been working with representatives of the petroleum industry in order to explore ways in which full and favourable impact of the incentive grants may be reflected in the financial positions of companies.

Fourth, the House may recall that in recent days new rules governing the Canadian ownership requirements were announced. They result from the response of industry to an invitation from the government some time ago to discuss tentative proposals for the measurement of beneficial Canadian ownership to determine the eligibility of individual companies for incentive grants. After consultation with more than 100 corporations, individuals and associations active in the petroleum industry, significant changes were recently incorporated in the Canadian ownership rating rules.

These include a provision to deem as 100 per cent Canadian all shareholdings of less than $50,000 and with Canadian addresses. We shall enable small companies of less than $5 million in assets or $10 million in revenue to complete a short form application for their Canadian ownership measurement. Numerous other changes designed to streamline the necessarily rigorous process of establishing true Canadian ownership and grant eligibility have been made.

Fifth, there have been intensive discussions of the petroleum incentive program with industry. Those discussions resulted in a new phased-in approach to Canadian ownership targets, including the creation of a new intermediate level of incentive grants. Under the new sliding scale of targets, companies with Canadian control and at least 65 per cent Canadian ownership in 1981 will be eligible for maximum incentive grants. The minimum requirement for these grants will rise by two percentage points annually to reach 75 per cent, the goal we originally proposed for 1981.

Sixth, a new intermediate category of incentive payments will be available to Canadian-controlled companies with at least 60 per cent Canadian ownership in 1981, rising by one percentage point annually to 65 per cent by 1986. The creation of this new category of eligible companies will enable many corporations to spend more on petroleum exploration than had been previously anticipated. This will provide an attractive intermediate target for those companies with Canadian ownership of between 50 per cent and 59 per cent in 1981.

The government regarded as reasonable and creative the view of the petroleum industry that a phased-in approach would ease the pressure on Canadian capital markets enabling greater access to new equity financing by the many companies now responding to the Canadianization proposals in the National Energy Program. At the same time, oil and gas supply for the benefit of all Canadians will be enhanced by a more vigorous pace of incentive-assisted investment.

The evidence is there. We have been flexible. We shall continue to be so. Ideas for making the National Energy Program more practicable and effective have been welcomed and are clearly producing results. We look for more of the same kind of reasonable, ongoing consultation as the National Energy Program is put into full effect. Co-operation is essential, for example, for the successful implementation of our ambitious off-oil or substitution program on which the total goal of Canadian oil self-sufficiency by 1990 depends so much.

The Government of Canada has clearly assumed a strong leadership role in the national energy policy. But strength should not be mistaken for inflexibility. There are those who argue that our willingness to make adjustments in the National Energy Program is beside the point. From time to time we hear from critics that although they may profess full support for our basic goals, they hasten to reject our methods as mistaken or unworkable. I submit that any examination of the National Energy Program and the particular elaborations we have brought forward will show that not only will Canadian ownership be enhanced by the program, but Canadian supply and self-sufficiency in oil will also be strengthened.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to compliment the previous speaker; never in the history of this Parliament has the rape and pillage of private industry in this country been made to sound so dull.

I do not understand why the more important issues of this country must be discussed on opposition days. When I return to my riding in British Columbia, those people tell me that we should not be discussing the Constitution in the House of Commons, but we should be discussing the cost of living. They do not want to hear about a charter of rights; they want to hear about a reduction in interest rates. They do not want to hear about an amending formula; they want a means to lower unemployment and create jobs.

I wonder how many members on the government benches, when they wake up in the morning, instantly think of the nuances of the Constitution which is before the House.

Some hon. Members: We do.

Mr. Cook: Perhaps two members, but I can tell them what happens in the rest of the country when people wake up in the morning.

Mr. Chrétien: Will the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Will the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook) accept a question?

Mr. Cook: Mr. Speaker, I will accept a question at the end of my remarks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cook: Mr. Speaker, may we have a little order? If I am pricking them, will Your Honour ask them to please bleed quietly?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby has the floor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cook: We on this side of the House and a good many members on the other side can freely admit that at the moment this country has absolutely no industrial strategy. There has been a total failure. When we think of what is going on in terms of regulatory reform in the government, when we consider the many changes which have already been made to the energy policy, we realize that there is very little communication and consultation with either business or the people of this country. Otherwise, this kind of debate could be taken up for matters which are important to the people out there, not what is important to one arrogant old man trying to go down in history, with a good many people following along behind him.

• (2130)

What this government does is govern by fiat, not by fairness and not by interest in what the people are doing. We heard the previous speaker talk about what in my view is the deplorable oil policy. I would like to give a couple of examples of what is taking place in the west and what this oil policy is doing to small business in the city of Vancouver. On April 1, according to the oil policy, Canadian suppliers of heavy bunker oil will be trying to sell a product for which there will be a very insignificant market.

I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) will listen to me, since what we have is a fight between the Department of Transport, which understands a bit about this situation, the Department of Finance, which does not understand the situation, and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources which wants but will not receive those tax dollars.

The current Canadian price of Bunker C is $28.20 a barrel. The proposed price with the new tax included will be $38.59. The current Puget Sound price for Bunker C is $31. That means there will be an increase of $13.45 a barrel Canadian, or a 47 per cent increase in price. For the benefit of members opposite I should explain where Puget Sound is, since one of the officials in the Department of Finance, when questioned on the matter, asked me where it was. It is immediately south of Vancouver. I suggest maps be provided to the various departments so that they can find out a little bit about their own country and the neighbouring shores.

Mr. Andre: Where is Vancouver?

Mr. Cook: For the benefit of the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), Vancouver is 800 miles west of Calgary.

The new tax will bring marine diesel fuels up to $53.34 a barrel. This represents an increase of $18.95, or a 55 per cent increase. What will happen when these taxes come into effect on April 1? Perhaps the government will change its mind, and all service industries will be hit, along with all hotels, restaurants, ship repair establishments and longshoremen.

I would like to give a more concrete example of what is taking place. At the present time there are 40 Polish fishing vessels off the coast of Canada. They are serviced by the Kuszuby II, a factory ship. When in Vancouver for refuelling, price changes were announced, and it left immediately for Puget Sound. The loss in taxes to the federal government was $500,000. The loss to British Columbia through provincial sales taxes was $44,000.

The Poles expressed difficulty with respect to forecasting whether to ever again enter the port of Vancouver in order to refuel. Those taxes and differences in prices are destroying the marine bunkering industry. Five companies involved will now be out of business because most of the ocean-going traffic will go south. Why? Because the Department of Transport, the Department of Finance and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources cannot sort out the situation among themselves and do not realize what they are doing to the west coast. One example of what they are doing with your energy policy—

Mr. MacEachen: "Our" energy policy.

Mr. Cook: It is yours, not mine.

Another example of the kind of foul-up which is occurring, not only on the west coast but on the east coast as well, has to do with the current Canadian price for marine diesel fuel of $34.39 a barrel. The current Puget Sound price is $42.81. This government proposes to increase the price by 55 per cent. The proposed Canadian price will then be $53.34, substantially higher than the American price. The export tax will go into effect when the destination of a Canadian vessel is a foreign port, regardless of any other ports of call. We will lose 25 per cent of the jobs for seagoing and associated personnel. This does not include losses to the berthing and maintenance service industries. Smile, if you will, but bear in mind we are talking about 2,000 jobs.

Canadian vessel owners must bid for contracts in competition with U.S. companies which have access to cheaper fuel. Towing cement from Gibsons Landing, British Columbia, to Adak in the Aleutian Islands will cost a Canadian firm $58,000 more than a U.S. firm for the same contract, the same service. The reason is the government's ruddy export tax which should not be applied in this case as it is costing Canadians their jobs. It is costing the west coast a good deal and I suspect the same is true on the east coast.

Mr. Andre: They are just jobs in British Columbia.

Mr. Cook: They are jobs in British Columbia. I also suspect they are jobs in Halifax. When the government talks about its magnificent energy policy, it should get down to the nitty-gritty, talk to the people in business who are dealing in these areas, the small companies, the backbone of this country, which the government is destroying.

I ask the ministers responsible to look at what is happening. Any sensible person will realize that the oil export tax applied at the level it is on the west coast will destroy all kinds of jobs. I suppose this matters not to the government, since the government representatives from the west coast have not brought this to their attention.

I would like to talk about other insensibilities of this government. We have a government which is economically insensitive to what is taking place in this country.

An hon. Member: It is bad all over.

Mr. Cook: It is bad all over. What causes that? A government that will not address itself to issues important to Canadians.

Let us talk about some Department of Fisheries and Oceans regulations. On the west coast there are new regulations in connection with salmon sport fishing. These will damage the B.C. tourist industry substantially. They will hamper small resorts, and marine operators who cater to U.S. sport fishermen along the coast. The ban imposed by the government includes a total four-month ban on all sport fishing in the Georgia Strait beginning next December. It includes an immediate ban on downriggers and one chinook a day limit starting April 1. Everyone is concerned with chinook salmon on the west coast, even the sport fisherman, but there must be a better way of imposing the regulations. There must be a way that fisheries officials could consult with sport fishermen's associations to arrive at some form of ban or reduction that makes sense.

Let me give some shocking figures with respect to something else. I do not care what regulations there are on sport fishing, until the government does something, those regulations cannot be enforced. In 1948, there were 109 fisheries inspectors on the west coast and approximately 3,000 private small boats at that time. Today, at latest count, there are 204,404 rowboats, inboards, outboards, sailboats, canoes and, for all I know, some tubs as well. How many fisheries inspectors does it take to handle some 204,000 sports fishermen?

In 1948 there were 109, and in 1981 there are 120. That shows a total neglect of enforcement in the area of sports fishing. If the government wants a proper fishery on the west coast, it should realize this cannot be achieved using the same number of inspectors as in 1948. As well, changes will have to be made in the regulations which will ensure the continued growth of the tourism industry in the province.

I had four other points to make, Mr. Speaker, but I see that I will not have time so I will go over a couple of them briefly and quickly. The first is the economic insensitivity of this government. British Columbia has a great opportunity to develop its north-eastern area through the B.C. coal agreement. The amount of money involved is staggering and the benefits to Canada could be colossal. These include a 72-mile railroad costing $350 million. Through the National Harbours Board and the CNR the line to Prince Rupert would be upgraded at a cost of $50 million and $80 million worth of new rolling stock would be purchased. A new coal loading port would cost $70 million. Over 15 years the shipment value of the coal is expected to reach $7.04 billion. Those are some of the benefits. I cannot agree with my friends to my left who are afraid to sell a little coal. British Columbia has thousands of years of coal stocks, mountains of it. The development of the railway would open up a new portion of the province and allow ancillary mines and industries to develop through the area. Yet there are arguments, there is nit-picking, niggardliness rather than a push to make the deal and get the job done. The taxation accruing to the federal government from this deal would more than meet any up front money the government of British Columbia is seeking.

Early this afternoon an hon. member gave some figures for research and development in this country which illustrate how backward we are in this area. Out of a population of 23 million, 21,519 people are engaged in research and development. This must make us the laughing stock of the world. It is almost criminal that a government could avoid thinking about this, could avoid changing the situation.

This government spent all its time worrying about something the country is not worried about, that the country is not even thinking about. It forces us to do the same and ignores the real problems in the country, such as creation of more jobs.

I should like to see the government produce an industrial strategy for Canada, show concern for the small independent businessman, introduce a program to increase jobs and productivity, a program to bring in lower interest rates, a program to reduce inflation. The failure of this country and this government to deal with the key issues which concern the people brings shame on all who sit on the benches opposite. Mr. Speaker, this motion should be passed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member invited me to ask a question at the end of his speech. He made a proposition, but I do not know if he was speaking on behalf of his party. We on this side of the House would be willing and eager to dispose of the Constitution tonight so that we can discuss the economy for the next two weeks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 58(9), to interrupt the debate and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the proceedings now before the House.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Andre) which was negatived on the following division:

Madam Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

It being 10.16 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 2(1).

At 10.16 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 25, 1981

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

THE ENVIRONMENT

ACID RAIN—SUGGESTED TOPIC FOR DISCUSSION WITH U.S. PRESIDENT REAGAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that a recent Canada-U.S. scientific study documented in great detail the fact that acid rain is devastating the environment of both countries, including as many as 4,000 lakes killed in Ontario alone, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley):

That this House urge the Prime Minister to make the growing crisis of acid rain a major agenda item in his forthcoming discussions with the United States President in Ottawa.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

CALL FOR INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that research and development are the foundation on which rests not only tomorrow's jobs but upgraded career opportunities for all young Canadians, and in light of the fact that the most recent utterances of the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts) have changed nothing in Canada with respect to research and development, and furthermore that only Ireland and Iceland, of the free-world industrial nations, spend less on industrial research and development, as a percentage of GNP, than Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. Gilchrist):

That the Minister of State for Science and Technology stop playing roulette with the future of young Canadians, and develop an industrial strategy based on Canadian technological superiority.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ECONOMY

YOUTH ENERGY-EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The unemployment rate for young Canadians between the ages of 15 and 24 was a staggering 14.6 per cent last month, yet at the same time the federal government continues to promote a National Energy Program that discourages the progress and expansion of the Canadian oil industry which has the potential to employ many thousands of these young people. In view of this disgraceful situation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That this House direct the Minister of Employment and Immigration to confer immediately with his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, to see if, between the two of them, they can produce a reasonable energy-employment strategy which will put our youth to work, and help Canada to reach its goal of energy self-sufficiency by 1990.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

DEALINGS IN SHARES OF PETROFINA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that Insiders Reports filed with the Ontario Securities Commission, dated January 23, 1981, show that four officers of Petrofina Incorporated sold shares and options over a short period in January of this year, resulting in a profit in excess of $400,000, and in view of the fact that one officer in particular purchased 1,000 shares on January 16 for $60 per share and sold them on the same day for $90 per share, for a total profit of $30,000 in one day, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That since the Canadian public is purchasing this company, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources immediately set up a special federal inquiry into the share transactions on the Petro-Canada-Petrofina deal.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDEPENDENCE OF ESTONIA

TRIBUTE TO CANADIAN-ESTONIAN COMMUNITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter which I believe will receive the unanimous and enthusiastic support of this House. In recognition of the sixty-third anniversary of Estonian independence; in gratitude to the thousands of Canadians of Estonian origin and the valuable contribution which they have made to the greater good of Canada; in support of their continuing efforts to achieve freedom for their homeland; and in honour of those Estonian freedom fighters both in Canada and in Estonia who last week were presented with the Estonian gold medal, Messrs. Heinsoo, Niklus and Kukk, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski):

That this House pay tribute to the Estonian community in Canada and express the hope that one day soon their homeland will enjoy the same freedoms which they themselves have found in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I am sure hon. members want to show their appreciation of this community by their applause.

HOUSING

CUT IN SOCIAL HOUSING BUDGET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Vacancy rates throughout Canada remain at criminally low levels making it almost impossible for Canadians to find acceptable shelter in many areas. Despite that crisis, the federal government has reduced its social housing budget for 1981-82. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That this House urge the Liberal government to restore the 5,000 social housing starts which it has taken away from the Canadian people.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

MANITOBA BUDGETARY DEFICIT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the announcement last Friday that Manitoba's Conservative government, a government that sought election on a platform of 'acute protracted restraint', has recorded a $178 million deficit for the nine-month period ending December 31, 1980, some $75 million more than for the corresponding period in the previous year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy):

That this House grant leave to the former president of the Treasury Board, the hon. member for York-Peel, to visit his colleague Premier Lyon in order to investigate this matter and to recommend to the Premier of Manitoba what further drastic cutbacks are needed to reduce the provincial deficit and further harm the Manitoba economy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

CANADIAN-BRITISH MINISTERIAL DISCUSSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I rise today under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In order to dispel the myth that I was nervous yesterday, according to misrepresentations by at least one national newspaper, and in view of the inconsistent and contradictory statements made by the Prime Minister when discussing his meeting or meetings with Mrs. Thatcher concerning the unilateral Liberal constitutional package, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga):

That the entire matter respecting the meetings and discussions held by any Canadian cabinet ministers and the Prime Minister—

Mr. Trudeau: Your hands are shaking.

Mr. Jelinek:

—with their British counterparts, be brought before the appropriate committee in order to clarify, once and for all, the many existing uncertainties and inconsistencies in this regard.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

FUNDING FOR CANFARM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, it is clear to anyone in a rural community in Canada that farmers do not enjoy the benefits enjoyed by many other sectors in the Canadian economy, particularly ailing branch plants of American firms. The same government that in the same week can find $40 million to bribe a multinational oil company to stay in the tar sands while denying one fortieth of that amount to Canfarm has confused priorities. It cannot make up its mind whether we are going to starve or freeze. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That the Minister of Agriculture help farmers everywhere and re-introduce the previously promised funding to help Canfarm survive.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING ARRANGEMENTS—INQUIRY RESPECTING TASK FORCE REPORT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and it has to do with the established programs financing arrangements. The minister will recall the House was informed that the government was considering cutting back the $1.6 billion it makes available to Canadian community colleges, vocational schools and universities across the country. Since that time there has been the establishment of a task force which will report in late June. Would the Minister of Finance tell the House whether the government has suspended absolutely all internal consideration of cutbacks in its contribution to community colleges, vocational schools and universities across the country until it has had the opportunity to receive and consider the report of the task force?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it would not be necessary to suspend any such consideration because we have not reached the point where we are considering cutbacks to universities or community colleges.

Mr. Crosbie: Read your budget.

Mr. MacEachen: I am grateful to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition for giving me the opportunity to tell hon. members that we have reached no decision on this matter and, therefore, those who believe that we are determined to make cutbacks in these particular areas are premature in their conclusions. What we have said, which is clear in the budget projections, is that for 1982-1983 and 1983-1984 we expect to secure savings in the field of intergovernmental transfers to the provinces in the amount of $1.5 billion. The intergovernmental transfers amount to $17 billion, of which transfers for post-secondary education are a relatively small part. We have not reached any conclusions. We are looking forward to the examination of the parliamentary task force which will assist us in reaching our position before we present it to the provinces.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I have to draw the attention of the minister not only to his own budget, in which he indicated there would be cutbacks, but also to the statement of his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare who, in a CBC television interview on November 8, 1980, talking about cutbacks in the EPF arrangements indicated that medicare and matters related to health would not be cut. She then went on to talk about education and said:

This is a candidate for savings which will be rechannelled differently.

In other words, the minister of health has said the exact opposite of what the Minister of Finance has now told the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Since his colleague, the Minister of Justice responsible for social development, has already admitted that there was consideration of cutbacks before the social development committee of cabinet which would affect community colleges, vocational schools and universities, what I would like to know, and I repeat my question to the Minister of Finance is this: has the government suspended absolutely all of that consideration of cutbacks of federal moneys which would go to educational institutions, and will it keep that absolutely on hold until it has the opportunity to receive and review the task force report?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I have no hesitation in telling the House that we do not intend to make any decisions on this question until we have received and studied the report of the task force which we have established. In the meantime, we intend to proceed with our own studies of this very important subject matter which will be, as the right hon. member knows, a matter for negotiations with the provinces.

At the meetings of ministers of finance in December, preliminary discussions were undertaken among the ministers of finance by way of preparing for these negotiations. When they begin in earnest, the federal government will be putting forward its position to the ministers of finance but that stage has not yet been reached. Undoubtedly, we will want to hear from the parliamentary task force before we put our position before the provinces.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, what we have had here today is an indication that the government is carrying on exactly as it was before the task force was established. The task force is simply a smoke screen to try to take the heat off the government, to try to keep away from parliamentary debate the fact that the Government of Canada is now actively considering cutting back $1.6 billion of aid to community colleges, vocational schools and universities across the country, and is transferring the burden away from the federal government toward students and their parents across the country. The Minister of Finance is just now finding out what is going on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1420)

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT OBLIGATIONS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Let me ask a specific question regarding the obligations of the Government of Canada. Does the Government of Canada believe that it has an obligation, legal or moral, to Canadian universities, community colleges or vocational schools to give three years' advance notice before terminating any assistance for education under the Established Programs Financing arrangements?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the first thing I want to say is that the Leader of the Opposition really does not know what is going on in this House of Commons when he says that the task force has been set up as a smokescreen by the government. The task force was asked for by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —and by the hon. member for Mississauga South when he moved a motion under Standing Order 43, as I recall, asking that a parliamentary task force be established. We are doing it at the request of members of the opposition, and are glad to do it. The Leader of the Opposition is as mistaken on that point as he is on all the other points, particularly when he says that we have reached a decision to cut off funds to students in Canadian universities. How desperate is the Leader of the Opposition when he puts forward that misrepresentation!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, the only cause for desperation in this House is the desperation of ever getting an answer from this minister who cannot find it within himself to give a straight answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We asked whether he was telling the truth or whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare was telling the truth. He has not answered. We asked him whether he believes there is a moral or legal obligation on the Government of Canada to give advance notice to the colleges and students whom he intends to cut off. He does not answer. Will he answer one of those two questions?

Miss MacDonald: Answer them both.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the questions are impossible to answer because each of the questions is based upon a blatant misrepresentation of the facts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSSIBLE EFFECTS IF REDUCTIONS MADE IN EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTION FUNDS

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister tell the House if the federal government terminated the $1.5 billion that it pays to universities, community colleges and vocational schools across Canada for their operating costs, if the federal government did terminate that amount of funds—and there is a certain amount of credibility given to the assertion that the government is giving active consideration to that because of the statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare—does the Minister of Finance realize that would result in annual cuts of $100 million to the University of Toronto, $40 million to the University of Manitoba—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. member should ask his question and not give statistics.

Mr. McMillan: In light of that and the fact that the minister has not denied that the government is seriously considering or contemplating massive cuts in federal government support for operating costs of post-secondary educational institutions, will the minister tell the House, even if the government has not made its decision and even if it is just negotiating, whether it is at least contemplating cuts of that magnitude? If so, will he advise how the quality of education and research in Canada can be maintained in the face of such massive cuts?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is basing his question on a hypothetical situation; if something happened, if this happens, if that happens, if the other situation happens. He is asking me to address hypothetical future developments. All that I said in the budget, and it has not been concealed, is that for the two fiscal years ending in 1983-84, in the negotiations with the provinces, some of which have very healthy surpluses I may add in passing, we hope to achieve savings in these intergovernmental transfers.

● (1425)

All the agreements to which we refer have termination dates at the end of March, 1982; so there is nothing unexpected in what we are doing. It is totally normal to renegotiate these agreements for a new phase, and I ask the hon. member not to engage in the rather shabby—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —tactic of trying to strike fear into the minds of students of universities in the country in anticipation of a decision which has not been taken yet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, with all due respect to the minister, these are not hypothetical assumptions. On the one hand we have a statement from the minister of health saying that there will be substantial cuts in the area of federal government funding for post-secondary education institutions in the country.

How does the Minister of Finance reconcile that statement, on the one hand, with his own statement, on the other, made in Montreal earlier this week, Monday, February 23, to the Canadian Club in which he said, very briefly, Madam Speaker:

At a time of relatively high unemployment, areas and sectors of the economy are critically short of skilled manpower. There is a need for a major reorientation of our education and training systems to manpower requirements of the 1980s.

Madam Speaker, how does he reconcile that statement, and especially the concluding statement, "There is a need to ensure that the engineers and scientists—"

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask a question. A supplementary should obviously be shorter than the first question, because it is a supplementary. I do have to apply some discipline to some hon. members who go on too long in their questions.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, how does the minister reconcile his statement, that there is a need to ensure that the engineers and scientists of tomorrow are effectively turned out by our universities, with the statement by the minister of health that the federal government is contemplating massive cuts in expenditures by the federal government for the operating costs of post-secondary educational institutions in Canada, including community colleges, universities and vocational institutes?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, no matter how often the hon. member or his leader repeat the misrepresentations, they do not become facts. It has never been stated by the Minister of Health, to my knowledge, that we were contemplating massive cuts in support of community colleges. That is quite a false statement, and what I said in Montreal seems to me to be quite defensible. I do not take the view that the quality of education in the country is to be measured solely by the amount of money we pour into the system.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—CANADIAN GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. According to Sunday's New York Times, the only foreign military personnel known to be in El Salvador are from the United States of America.

In this context, I would like to ask the minister, considering that Canada firmed its opposition to such intervention by voting in support of the United Nations' resolution on El Salvador last fall, can the minister explain to the House why he stated in a letter to the editor in chief of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald just a few days ago:

In the circumstances, it is not Canada's role to mount a public protest against the United States.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, that letter was about a different subject, or a different aspect of the same subject. It had to do with other questions and not with the question of the presence of advisers.

We have no resident ambassador in El Salvador. We have only the same knowledge of events there which my hon. friend has. We, obviously, have presented our position to the United States, one which is concerned with the supply of offensive arms to any country which is in a state of civil disorder. We have communicated that view to the American government. That is what the letter which was quoted was about.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, already some 13,000 lives have been lost in this bloody civil war in El Salvador. All objective observers pin down exclusive responsibility for this to the vicious junta which is in charge of that state right now.

Considering that church leaders representing almost every faith in Canada have joined church leaders in the United States and church leaders in El Salvador condemning outside military intervention, why does the Government of Canada not join the governments of Venezuela and Mexico in publicly condemning this outside intervention?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, of course our position is against outside intervention, and I understand that in fact the position of the American government is to attempt to prevent outside intervention on the part of Cuba and other communist countries.

• (1430)

OBJECTION TO INTERVENTION BY OUTSIDE FORCES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister, who has expressed interest in North-South problems and especially the problems of the emerging world. The Prime Minister knows very well that there are progressive forces at work in the Caribbean. Indeed, the leader of the movement in El Salvador is a social democrat working with Catholic workers in opposition to what can only be described as a fascist, vicious junta. Given the expressed public opposition of the Prime Minister to such repressive regimes, why does he not join the Presidents of Mexico and Venezuela in urging the Americans and all other people who are intervening from outside to get out of that country and to mind their own business?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, in his last words the hon. member has really reiterated the policy of the government. We do not think there should be outside intervention in that area but, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs just pointed out, there is intervention not only on the side of what the hon. member describes as fascist forces but also on the side of what he describes as progressive forces. There are arms going to both sides, and if the hon. member wants to be evenhanded, he should condemn not only the United States but also those who bring in arms to the other side.

Mr. Broadbent: I said that.

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member is saying that, he is repeating the position of this government.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

QUERY RESPECTING RECOMMENDATIONS AND INCENTIVES

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. Our youth suffer much more than their share of unemployment. Over 500,000 young Canadians are out of work today. Is the Minister of Finance so desperate for solutions to the problem that all he can offer the young people of Canada is to lower their hopes and expectations?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, absolutely not. The Tory party is the source of that despair in the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, it is very obvious to the Canadian people that the Minister of Finance has been living in a cave and is not tuned in to the youth of Canada. I will ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance.

Instead of handing out grants and goodies in a shotgun approach, which is not working—and statistics show that—will the minister not bring forward to this House specific recommendations and ideas so that through incentives the private sector can hire young unemployed Canadians?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, yesterday I spoke in the debate in the House and attempted to set forward the views the government holds with respect to the general growth of the economy. I believe that is the way we provide for a growing labour force, including the youth of the country. What was notable yesterday was that while I put forward a large number of ideas, I did not receive any from the spokesmen of the hon. member's party during the debate.

Mr. Taylor: You weren't here to hear them. Where were you?

ENCOURAGEMENT OF PRIVATE SECTOR JOB OPPORTUNITIES

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who will know that from January of last year until January of this year employment among young Canadians declined by 4,000. Why has the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce supported policies which have cost young Canadians jobs? What specific action is he prepared to take to ensure that the young Canadians about to graduate from post-secondary educational institutions do not find that their first experience with the labour force is to be told that their skills are not needed in Canada?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we are building and putting in place policies based on the foundation of the budget of the Minister of Finance, which is designed to provide growing opportunities for our young people. I think these policies will have that effect in a way which will promote the wellbeing of young Canadians and Canadians generally.

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, the minister has just achieved a new platitude of achievement.

In view of the fact that in Canada's manufacturing sector year over year January to January there was zero growth in employment in Canada, when will the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce take the responsibility for this area which falls under his jurisdiction and introduce policies which will get the private sector growing again?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, we have been introducing policies which are achieving—and will increasingly achieve—just that effect. The electronics development program is one example, with major incentives to help this high technology industry increase and advance the program to bring about increased employment through rationalization of a segment of the heavy construction industry. The front end loader program is another range in which 1,200 jobs are involved.

An hon. Member: Front end loading.

Mr. Gray: When I refer to front end loaders, I am not talking about the way my hon. friend phrases his questions. We have put a number of programs in place in recent months, and there will be others to add to employment opportunities for young Canadians and all Canadians.

SUGGESTED REPLACEMENT OF WELLHEAD TAX

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Canadian people, including young people, are about to be the victims in the escalating conflict between the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the government of Alberta. In view of reports that the Canadian government is about to increase oil prices to motorists and to home owners to raise $1 billion to pay the costs of more imported oil, will the minister indicate publicly that he is prepared to reconsider his 8 per cent wellhead tax and replace it with a profits tax, which would be more acceptable to Alberta and also raise money for the federal government?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, this is obviously a matter for the Minister of Finance because he is responsible for the budget. However, I can indicate to the hon. member that we have sent a letter to the government of Alberta indicating that we are ready to start negotiations and that we feel it is unnecessary to resort to cutbacks at this present time.

I hope the government of Alberta will reconsider its decision, but up until now I must say that the possibility of a change of mind by the government of Alberta does not appear to be very great.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I read the minister's letter. I asked him to table it yesterday. It is very weak; there are no proposals in it. The Canadian people will not stand by and permit this thing to happen between Canada and Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: I ask hon. members just to listen and let me put my question to the minister.

Is the minister prepared to reconsider the tax on provincial Crown corporations? Would the minister put that as a new proposal to Alberta and thereby remove another aspect which disturbs the producing provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia? Is the minister prepared to reconsider that tax on provincial Crown corporations, which is a new tax the provinces oppose in principle?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I have listened to the hon. member's suggestion with interest, and I will be happy to raise it with the Minister of Finance.

[Translation]

INQUIRY WHETHER GASOLINE EQUALIZATION FUND WILL BE CONTINUED

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Jonquière): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The biggest French language daily newspaper in America, not to call it by its name, stated recently that the province of Quebec, which in the last few years has been dependent upon western Canada for half its oil requirements, will stop receiving a single drop of western oil in no more than two years from now, and will then depend exclusively on oil imported from OPEC countries. Can the minister tell the House whether his view of the future is that pessimistic and could he also state whether the equalization fund which allows all Canadians to pay the same price for their oil will be maintained whatever happens in the future?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am certainly not as pessimistic about the future. As for the oil supplies for Quebec, it is clear that conventional oil from Alberta will be on the decrease during the next decade, but at the same time, the supplies of non-conventional oil from the tar sands and heavy oil deposits in Alberta and Saskatchewan should increase significantly.

While there might be a decrease in western oil supplies early in the next decade, we can expect a substantial increase in these supplies in the latter part of the decade. Moreover, if there are major finds off the coast of Newfoundland and the Beaufort Sea, Canada will obviously have no difficulty in becoming self-sufficient during this decade and Quebec will be assured of steady Canadian supplies to meet its requirements.

Finally, I would like to give the hon. member assurances that, whatever happens, the oil pricing regime all across Canada for basic oil supplies will be maintained by this government and Quebecers will continue to benefit from this policy as in the past.

TRANSPORT

DEVELOPMENT OF OFF-TRACK ELEVATOR PROGRAM

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. As the average age of Canadian farmers is rising rapidly, there is a very serious need to encourage new young farmers. These young farmers, unless they are very wealthy, must go into frontier agricultural areas to obtain land. Upon arriving in these areas they will find that grain transportation is extremely inequitable and that they will have to transport their grain up to 100 miles at their own very high costs. In light of this, will the minister now implement a program for off-track elevators?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I discussed this question of off-track elevators during the summer when I visited a great number of farm organizations and pools. I did not find a great enthusiasm for the concept except in some very special circumstances. I tried to generate some discussion of it but, generally speaking, people were more interested in branch line retention than they were interested in off-track.

The consequence of off-track elevators would be that the federal government would be invited to have a trucking assistance program and possibly after that it would be invited to contribute to the road expenditures of the provinces. With the limited money we have now, we are concentrating on the rail lines.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for telling me that this applies to special circumstances; that is precisely why I asked the question.

We realize that we need something in these frontier areas because it is the only place where young farmers can go. In light of that, will the minister enter into negotiations with the provinces, grain handling companies and the federal government to encourage some form of subsidy to get the thing rolling so that there will be some kind of a trucking subsidy in order that the very serious needs of these young farmers are taken care of?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I presume my hon. friend has in mind the Valleyview situation. I have received a number of representations on that. As there is no railway in the area, and as a number of studies have demonstrated that it would be exceedingly expensive to build one in this area, the question of pioneer zones is now considered to be essentially a provincial responsibility. The government of Alberta has a road program to improve the situation of grain transportation in pioneer areas. The other day I had a conversation with a couple of members of the Alberta government and they seem to consider it in the same way as I do.

HOUSING

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO INCREASE CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. Young people today who are seeking accommodation for the first time are finding that they have virtually nowhere to go. They cannot rent apartments because none are available or the costs are too high; they cannot buy homes because the costs, including mortgage interest costs, are too high. What specific action is the government taking to increase accommodations for Canadians?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as I have mentioned several times in the House, in the budget statement I reintroduced the MURB program at the request of provincial financial ministers and at the request of the industry itself. I might add that this was the only specific proposal which I received from that sector of the economy for inclusion in the budget. I responded to that request. At the present time I have no new programs to announce because, for one reason, I am concerned about the state of our public expenditures and the necessity of not adding further to what I consider to be a very large deficit in our public finances.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. We are faced with vacancy rates in St. John's, Newfoundland, of 0.1 per cent, in Toronto of 0.6 per cent, and in Vancouver of 0.4 per cent, when the industry indicates that 3 per cent across the board is the average. Surely this MURB program will not correct the situation quickly enough. Does the minister not have any other program which will do it?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, as I stated yesterday, I was listening for suggestions from the opposition. I have no further program, but may I say—

Mr. Crosbie: You are the government.

Mr. MacEachen: —that if a large number of suggestions were made to assist housing at the present time, I doubt within the present fiscal restraint it would be possible for me, as Minister of Finance, to recommend the financing of these programs. I think the Tory party had better get its economic act together and decide whether it wants more or less spending.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DISASTERS

INQUIRY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT POLICY ON AID FOR QUEBEC FLOOD VICTIMS

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Terrebonne): Madam Speaker, my question is for the hon. Minister of National Defence. In view of the urgent and even disastrous situation caused by flooding all over Quebec, and especially around the Thousand Islands River, near Terrebonne, and in view of the procrastination of the Parti Québécois government and even of the Parti Québécois caucus as far as requesting assistance is concerned, is the minister considering unilateral action by the federal government to provide assistance as soon as possible to the victims of these floods in spite of the inaction of the Quebec government?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, the question asked by the hon. member for Terrebonne is quite clear. I replied yesterday that the Canadian Armed Forces were ready to act quickly at the request of the Quebec government. Unfortunately, it is not customary for the federal government to act unilaterally in such cases without the approval of the provincial governments. However, we are prepared to make available to the hon. member and his colleagues the equipment that he would need to visit the flooded areas so as to show everyone that the Canadian Armed Forces are ready to help Quebecers and other Canadians.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

CAPITAL BUDGET AND SOCIAL HOUSING CUTBACKS

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, as the minister responsible for CMHC is obviously ashamed to show his face in the House today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Mitchell: The announcement today that capital funds for CMHC would be cut by over $2 million, at a time when costs are inflated, and that social housing units would be cut by 5,000, at a time when there should be a huge increase, is of major concern to all Canadians. Will the minister explain how he and his government can justify these drastic capital cost cutbacks to CMHC when he knows, as my hon. friend said, that vacancy rates are below zero in most Canadian cities, people simply cannot afford the cost of housing, municipalities are begging for community service grants, and native and northern housing is a national disgrace?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I will draw the hon. member's representations to the attention of the minister responsible for CMHC.

Mrs. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I would consider that quite irresponsible, since the Minister of Finance is certainly the one who has a major say in the budget. Since the minister a few minutes ago was asking for suggestions from the opposition, he might consider the representation from Vancouver for $15 million for land banking, not to mention the repeated requests for increases in social housing money. Will the minister explain why he has cut back, instead of increasing the number of social housing units, when he knows that most Canadians cannot now afford private home ownership with interest rates at 16 per cent or over? People simply must have shelter for their children, and social housing is the only answer.

● (1450)

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has asked me to justify why we are not undertaking more spending in the Canadian economy. I would remind the hon. member that housing starts in January showed some considerable improvement.

Mr. Rae: Compared to 1965, or what?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood asks compared to what—compared to the previous month of December.

Mr. Rae: Which was the lowest.

Mr. MacEachen: I remind the hon. member that if he looked more carefully at his statistics rather than barracking in the House of Commons he would make a more constructive contribution.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUMMER JOB OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact that the majority of the government's make-work programs are geared to the winter months, when the northern native population is involved in hunting, fishing and trapping, as opposed to the summer months, when the real level of native youth unemployment is highest, what specific funds will the minister make available to create jobs this summer for our native young people who so badly need summer jobs?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, consideration is now being given to a policy which would provide job opportunities for native young people this summer.

INDIAN HOUSING PROGRAM

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I refer to a comment made by the hon. member for Vancouver East who mentioned a report in the Canadian Press which revealed that cabinet has decided to reduce CMHC's special housing program by almost $2 million. This special social housing program includes housing projects for native people. What is the minister doing to ensure that this program, which affects our native population, will not be cut and that this badly needed housing will be built in the summer months by young native people, thus ensuring them jobs, training, and the badly needed houses? Will the minister promise that this area with regard to native housing will not be cut back?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member shoud know, this government committed itself to additional funding this year over and above what the previous administration had given for Indian housing. This was done not only because of the backlog which existed but also to provide job opportunities for natives. We intend to maintain the same increase next year. In addition to that, further consideration is being given by my cabinet colleagues to increasing housing starts greatly to provide the very job opportunities the hon. member is talking about.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ESTABLISHMENT OF PULP AND PAPER MILL IN MATANE, P.Q.—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, my question is for the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Two weeks ago I asked the Minister of State for Small Business about the decision to build a paper mill at Matane rather than in the Matapedia Valley as promised by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. The minister replied that no decision had been made. Matapedians must now forget their dreams. This is yet another example of the questionable methods used by the government to gain votes.

My question is as follows: Can the minister tell us whether he is happy with the mood that prevails in the Matapedia Valley after the action he has taken in regard to the paper mill promised to the people of the area, a promise which he has not kept?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, seldom have I heard such misrepresentations. I remind him that it is the government of Quebec which, on September 5 last, announced, without prior consultation with the federal government, the establishment of a paper mill in the Matapedia Valley, that it is the government of Quebec which a few days ago cancelled that decision on the recommendation of its department of the environment, so the federal government was not involved in that issue.

Mr. Clarke: Madam Speaker, the minister promised to pay, and I quote:

—even a prohibitive differential.

Can the minister tell the House when the government will keep the promises it made to these people and to others?

Mr. De Bané: Decidedly, Madam Speaker, the hon. member simply refuses to understand. I will say it again: it is the government of Quebec which recently cancelled that decision on the advice of its department of the environment which determined that the project could not be carried out without any damage to the environment. I made that commitment three years after the Quebec government told the people of the Matapedia Valley that they were entitled to their own paper mill, and at that time, the building differential which I was prepared to pay was minimal and to quote the Quebec Premier, practically non-existent. We have just learned that prior to their announcement of September 5, Quebec officials had never even considered the matter.

NATIONAL SEA PRODUCTS PLANT LOCKEPORT, N.S.—INQUIRY RESPECTING GRANT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. On July 23, 1980, a disastrous fire destroyed the National Sea Products plant in Lockeport, Nova Scotia, causing the loss of some 305 jobs. The plant represented more than 50 per cent of the economic base of the Lockeport area and the 1979 payroll was approximately $2.5 million. Almost seven months has passed since the date of the fire. In the interim officials of National Sea Products have provided government officials with detailed plans for a new plant in Lockeport. I therefore wish to ask the minister if he is in the position to indicate when a DREE grant will be made available to assist in re-establishing this much-needed facility.

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I would like to compliment the hon. member for his genuine concern with respect to this problem. I am happy to report to him that at the moment my officials are discussing an offer with the owners of the company. I hope the offer which is being made by my department will be accepted by the company and that the plant will be rebuilt in the very near future.

Mr. Crouse: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his answer. I would like to point out to the minister that his parliamentary secretary replied to a similar question on January 13, 1981, stating that a reply to this matter could be expected within the next few weeks. Of course, such delay in getting something started is costing the company an estimated $100,000 due to inflation, while increasing the burdens of the municipality which must provide welfare payments to the workers where unemployment insurance benefits have expired. I would like to ask the minister what other steps, if any, can the company take to expedite the reconstruction of this plant, bringing this situation to a final conclusion?

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker, I would like to be crystal clear in my response to the hon. member. The moment the company accepts the offer which has been made to it, on a confidential basis, then that is the moment I will be able to make a press announcement. But, of course, I must wait for the company's acceptance of the offer which has already been made by my deputy minister on my behalf.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

RESULTS OF INVESTIGATION INTO APPLICATION OF REBATE PROGRAM

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On Friday last my colleague from Broadview-Greenwood asked a question with regard to the rebate program in the United States. The minister answered that he would look into it. Has the minister spoken to the auto manufacturers involved, to whom did he speak, on which day did he speak, and what did he say?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, promptly after answering the question in the House last week, I instructed senior officials from my department to get in touch with management of the motor vehicle manufacturers. The reports I have indicate that there are equivalent and, in some cases, better programs of rebates available to Canadian consumers offered by the three great motor vehicle manufacturers which are being extensively advertised by them, and I would be happy to provide further details in a forum which provides more time to give a detailed answer than the daily question period.

An hon. Member: How about a statement on motions?

Mr. Deans: In light of the minister's answer, why are we paying substantially more for vehicles in Canada than the sale price for similar vehicles in the United States?

An hon. Member: Five or six hundred dollars.

Mr. Gray: As I recall, the question last week related to the matter of whether a rebate program on interest rates in the United States for motor vehicle sales there, was available in Canada. The information I have received indicates that equivalent programs are available here. If one looks at the general question of differences in prices, we must take into account facts such as the existence of a federal sales tax here which does not exist in the United States, as well as the difference in exchange rates; but in terms of the question which my hon. friend expressly asked me last week, I promptly looked into the matter, and I have given him a summary of information I have received. I will be happy to give him more detailed information in a forum enabling me to speak at greater length than the daily question period.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN ON ENGAGEMENT OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE CHARLES

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate as follows:

RESOLVED: That the following Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General, namely:—

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Edward Richard Schreyer, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, Chancellor and Commander of the Order of Military Merit upon whom has been conferred the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada:

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:

The Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, have agreed to an Address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen expressing our great happiness to Her Majesty and His Royal Highness the Prince Philip on the announcement of the engagement and forthcoming marriage of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Lady Diana Spencer, and respectfully request that Your Excellency will be pleased to transmit the said Address to Her Majesty the Queen.

ORDERED: That the Clerk do go down to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that the Senate have passed an Address to His Excellency the Governor General respectfully requesting that His Excellency may be pleased to transmit the said Address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen expressing our great happiness to Her Majesty and His Royal Highness the Prince Philip on the announcement of the engagement and forthcoming marriage of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and Lady Diana Spencer, and request the House of Commons to unite with this House in the Address to His Excellency the Governor General by inserting therein the words "and Commons".

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Therefore, Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House do agree with the Senate in the said Address to His Excellency the Governor General respectfully requesting that His Excellency may be pleased to transmit the joint Address to Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen;

That the words "and Commons" be inserted in the said Address of the Senate; and

That a message be sent to the Senate informing Their Honours that this House unites with the Senate in the said Address.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members have heard the motion moved by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) and seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FULTON—ALLEGED MISLEADING MINISTERIAL STATEMENTS

Madam Speaker: Does the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) now want to respond to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton)?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, I do, Madam Speaker. I know what the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) had to say, and I can only comment that the offence he seems to have taken is with reference to a conversation which he had with me in the House in which I indicated that I would be pleased to talk to him again about the panel of experts looking into the Alice Arm's situation. That is quite true. I thought that there would be an opportunity to talk to him further before a final statement was made by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) and myself, knowing, as I did, that it would be made very shortly.

I did not anticipate, at the time of the deliberations between my colleague and myself, that a statement would be ready by the next day. When I did become aware of this, I looked around very quickly to see if the hon. member was there, in order to give him some indication of what was forthcoming, but I did not have the opportunity to do so. I think that it is simply a question of not having had the time necessary to talk to the hon. member again. May I indicate, however, that I have been talking to the hon. member off and on, trying to find a position that would be acceptable to all concerned, and I have endeavoured to continue to do that to the best of my ability, taking into consideration the constraints of time.

I would hope that that would be an explanation of the so-called offence which the hon. member has taken with reference to the fact that he was not consulted again, prior to the announcement having been made.

I will conclude by saying that it seems to me that my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans—who has the paramountcy of responsibility in this particular area along with myself—has strived valiantly to meet many of the areas of real concern which have been expressed, not only by hon. members but certainly by the Nishga people with respect to public participation and the calibre of people on the scientific panel.

Also I have indicated to all concerned that we do not hesitate to make adequate funding available so that they can make well-researched presentations to this very high calibre scientific panel looking into the question. I hope negotiations will carry on so that we can have a meeting of minds with respect to the matter.

I take this opportunity to give this explanation on the basis that it might afford some understanding of the background.

May I just conclude by saying that, of course, we all know it is not a question of privilege in the first place.

Mr. Fulton: On the question of privilege, Madam Speaker?

Madam Speaker: No, I cannot hear the hon. member because he has already intervened on this question of privilege. But I am rising to say that I simply cannot remember the foundation of the point of privilege raised by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), because the question is a few days old, and also I cannot remember the arguments which he brought forward also owing to the fact that his question of privilege relates to events which go back to last summer.

I just have to reserve my ruling on this question of privilege. It looks as though it is an explanation between the two hon. members; but I will reserve, at any rate, and rule on it later.

The hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) on a question of privilege.

MR. HUNTINGTON—ACCESS BY MEMBERS TO PRESS LOCK-UP ON ESTIMATES

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Thank you, Madam Speaker, I have given you notice of privilege this morning. My privilege is that as a Member of Parliament, and particularly, as the official opposition new spokesman or critic of the Treasury Board, I was denied access to a lock-up for the press gallery, and members of the press this morning at eleven o'clock in Room 200 of the West Block.

In the past, members, elected or otherwise, have been allowed access to briefing sessions on the budget in advance of the presentation of the budget in the House, so that the spokesmen and the critics could properly prepare themselves and perform their functions in an efficient and effective manner.

As a former chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, we had the privilege of working with the Auditor General in the tabling of the Auditor General's report, which was a highly secret document until it was tabled by the Speaker in the House of Commons.

• (1510)

Much time was spent in debate on the question of Members of Parliament having access to the lock-up along with members of the press. In the wisdom of the committee at that time, and I believe with the full sanction of the House and the Speaker, Members of Parliament were allowed into the press lock-up so long as they left the Auditor General's report in the room with their name on it. The Auditor General's report would then be delivered to their desks in the House. In this way, members dealing with the Auditor General's report were at least allowed a sense of honour and duty and were given an opportunity to familiarize themselves with a very important document and with the issues involved.

It is my opinion that the action taken today by Treasury Board, which plans the expenditure programs of government and approves the programs of government, is in contempt of Parliament. Interested members with a meaningful role to play in the process of Parliament have been denied access to the documents and proper time for, deliberation and study of them.

I might point out that the volume I have in my hand is the form of the main estimates for March 31, 1981, and the estimates ending March 31, 1982, will be at least as thick, as major and substantive changes of direction are involved. As you can see by the flag indicators in this document, there were many details that I wished to examine so that I could be effective in questioning the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) in the House today. He had announced that he was going to table these estimates.

A great deal of work goes into this. I am not a graduate of a law school specializing in finance. I am not a graduate of the London School of Economics.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Thank God for that!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: I come here from the school of hard knocks. I have put a fair effort into trying to understand the structure in this House in the six years that I have been a member. I have tried to get a working knowledge of the estimates, but I do not find it easy. I think most hon. members do not find this volume with its maze of figures easy to understand. I confess that I find it difficult. I have to work very hard before being ready to hand it over to the public accounts committee and to understand the immense amount of work that committee does in trying to reorganize this information so that it is more meaningful to members of the House.

When the President of the Treasury Board tables his estimates today, he will be taking an historic step in the process of trying to bring control over expenditures back to Parliament. Parliament has lost control over supply. We have a guillotine hanging over our debating time. All of this works to the detriment of members of this House who represent the taxpayers and the people of Canada in overseeing the wise use and expenditure of the tax resource.

A new summary document is to be introduced which will deal with the "envelopes" and the flow of information so that we can have a bird's eye view of what is going on. This is an historic moment for me.

Some members of the opposition and members on the government benches have spent four or five years in the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, but the Auditor General's office has spent some $25 million, using the best brains in the country from the legal, accounting and management consultant professions, on devising and delivering a form of disclosure which will ensure accountability for the vastly expanded expenditures of the federal government.

As a member, I am denied a right given to the press gallery which is being fed information in a lock-up to which I and my colleagues are denied entry. We are fed steak over in the office of the President of the Treasury Board, then we are supposed to come here as representatives of the people and examine the minister who has all that staff behind him to make sure that he is letter-perfect.

As a member of the opposition, I want to do my job on behalf of the constituents of the country at large. I really resent being denied access to this information. For one thing, I am a privy councillor and I am a Member of Parliament. In the Standing Committee on Public Accounts the Auditor General of Canada, who is an officer of this House, treats us with a great deal of respect, but this is being denied me as a Member of Parliament by the Treasury Board.

I think the President of the Treasury Board will agree that my grievance is a very real one and I hope that he is sympathetic to it. I therefore move:

That the matter of a Member of Parliament being denied access to a Treasury Board lock-up on estimates at 11 a.m. on February 25, 1981, to which the press was invited be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for consideration and report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I respect the point made by the hon. member that there is a good deal of difficulty involved in absorbing the information contained in a volume the size of the main estimates in the short time available to him before coming into this House. I would suggest that attendance at a lock-up which was conducted with the press, for which there is historic precedent, would not have been of great assistance in that exercise. I would add, Madam Speaker, that this is a question which, I believe, should be addressed. The right of members of this House, as I understand privilege, is to receive the estimates when they are presented in the House of Commons, not before.

An hon. Member: What about the press?

Mr. Johnston: I will come to these points one by one, if I may. It is true that in other instances, a precedent has been established for a lock-up, such as with respect to the Auditor General's report. In addition, there is a lock-up with respect to the budget, but I do not recall being invited to a lock-up when the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) deposited his estimates in the autumn of 1979.

Mr. Stevens: They were your estimates.

Mr. Johnston: There was no such lock-up. There was no lock-up when the estimates were deposited in this House—

Mr. Andre: There were no estimates.

Mr. Johnston: —last year, in the spring of 1980. There were complaints from the press because we broke precedent with a tradition which had apparently existed for many years, and there was no press lock-up. There is a tradition according to which the critics for the opposition parties are invited to meet with the President of the Treasury Board before the estimates are deposited in this House. As the hon. member indicated, this took place today over lunch.

I regret very much that the hon. member feels that his privilege has in any way been affected. I suggest that the lock-up is a matter of courtesy, not privilege. The privilege of all members of this House is to have the estimates made available to them in the House of Commons. If the hon. member is suggesting that there should be no press lock-up, that is another matter and perhaps it should be addressed by the committee to which he suggests his question of privilege be referred.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): I will be very brief, Madam Speaker, but I want to address a couple of points raised by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). He suggested that the question of a lock-up and access to it by Members of Parliament or others, is a matter of courtesy, not of privilege. Surely that goes to the root of the matter. What we are suggesting is that it is a matter of privilege that Members of Parliament be extended the same courtesy as that extended to members of the press. Surely the President of the Treasury Board can understand that.

I think advantage should be taken of the suggestion of the President of the Treasury Board that this matter be examined by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. The fundamental question is whether Members of Parliament are entitled as a matter of right to expect the same courtesies respecting the supply of information and official documents, as are members of the press. Or do we, as was suggested by a member of the New Democratic Party, need to be elected to the press Gallery in order to gain access to government information?

That is a fundamental question which ought to be examined by the committee. It is absurd to suggest that members of the media have privileges and the right to expect courtesies beyond those which Members of Parliament, elected by the people of Canada, have.

The President of the Treasury Board spoke about practices in the past. Granted, there have been practices in the past, budget practices and practices which, among other things, were examined most recently by the Lambert Commission's inquiry into the government's control and account ability for public expenditures. The fundamental recommendation of the Lambert Commission, whose recommendations in total were endorsed by the Liberal Party and by our party, was that it was absolutely essential there be a clear, open, honest approach to the whole question of government spending, that it was necessary for this openness to exist. I do not think I am being unduly partisan in suggesting that one of the reasons for this practice of a press lockup in the past, without the benefit of opposition members there, is that it is easier for knowledgeable staff or persons being paid a salary to make their minister and the government look good. They can present a case to the media without criticism from the opposition, resulting in press stories which are perhaps advantageous to the government. This clearly flies in the face of the recommendation of the Lambert commission which says that in order to bring government spending under control, there must be this openness and honesty about spending so the public really knows what is going on, and only through that knowledge can the question of public expenditures be brought under control.

For those two very good reasons I would heartily recommend to the Chair—and I think it is important that the Chair consider the role of members vis-à-vis the media—that the recommendation of the President of the Treasury Board be accepted. This matter should be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections so that procedures more in keeping with the thrust of the Lambert Commission, and I might suggest with the thrust of the freedom of information legislation currently before committee, are followed and so that members of this House of Commons will not feel they are in an inferior position to members of the fourth estate.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I share the concerns of the hon. member who has raised this point of privilege. Until the hon. member brought this matter to my attention, I was not aware there was a lock-up. As yet, I have not seen the estimates which are to be tabled in this House. The hon. member who raised the point of privilege, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), and I had lunch today about two hours ago during which we were given a press release kit to go over which was to help us come up with some kind of intelligent response to the tabling of the estimates in this House.

I understand this may not be a question of privilege, as the President of the Treasury Board pointed out, but if it is a courtesy extended to the press, I would at least expect that same courtesy to be extended to Members of Parliament so that we can respond intelligently. I am sure the reason for the press lock-up is so that they can respond intelligently to the media and to Canadians at large. As the critic at the Treasury Board for the New Democratic Party I think I should have that same right. It will enable me to go through this very complex document and to give an intelligent response in the House of Commons. The media can then pick up my views on this document as well. As a critic, I feel somewhat offended that I was not even informed about the press lock-up on the estimates which took place this morning. Therefore, Madam Speaker, I would ask you to give serious consideration to the point which has been raised.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, I join in supporting my colleague's question of privilege. If you find a prima facie case in favour of his position, I will support his motion when it is made. I was not refused entry to the lock-up at the same time as my colleague, and I went to room 200 in the West Block at 1.45 p.m. in the hope that I could at least pick up a few details concerning the estimates yet to be tabled. I was confronted at the door by a Mr. Gerald Simoneau of the Treasury Board. He stated that I had no right to see the estimates, that they were solely for the press.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stevens: The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) stated the case clearly when he said it was simply a matter of courtesy to the press. This minister, and presumably this government, feel that it is proper to give courtesy to the press but not to members of this House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: I found it ludicrous that when I asked to see someone senior to Mr. Simoneau, I was confronted by two other members of the Treasury Board, namely, Mr. David McEachran and Mr. E. R. Stimpson, who informed me that it was true, that the minister had specifically stated no one was to be admitted other than members of the press. I asked whether I would be admitted if, prior to three o'clock, I qualified as a member of the press. Mr. McEachran's answer was "yes, you may be accredited to the press. If you are, we will admit you as another press member", and he said I could quote him in the House.

That answer struck me as being absolutely ludicrous. It is government gone mad, on the one hand, to say to a member of this House that he has no rights and not to extend to him the courtesy of letting him see what the press already has access to, and, on the other hand, to say to a member that if he becomes an accredited member of the press quickly, he will be admitted.

I almost did get accredited as a member of the press. Someone overheard what had been said and offered to take me on staff if that would help. He said he would be very interested in seeing the same courtesy extended to me as that given to the press, namely, a preview of the estimates to be tabled.

Although I was able to get on the technical staff of the press, unfortunately, the Press Gallery has its own bureaucracy, and I could not be cleared for membership in the Press Gallery prior to three o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: But here I am, elected as a Member of Parliament for the riding of York-Peel, elected to represent, as I understand it, not only the people of York-Peel but generally the people of Canada, and I am told that if I could have cleared my membership in the press gallery quickly, I could have seen the estimates. But as a representative of the people of Canada, there is no way that this President of the Treasury Board would let me have access.

We are not naive. We know the real reason why members on this side of the House are not being permitted to see the estimates. In the estimates a spending program of approximately $70 billion is anticipated, a much higher figure than was ever anticipated. In no way does the government want to meet embarrassing comments which might be raised by hon. members on this side of the House, which, incidentally, might be heard by those same members of the press, and perhaps even reported. What we are witnessing here is, first, contempt of Parliament, and second, something which in no uncertain way is interfering with our activities as Members of Parliament. We should not tolerate two standards with respect to courtesy extended on Parliament Hill. If it is a matter of courtesy to allow the press a preview, it should at least be a matter of courtesy to allow all members of this House, to see the estimates prior to their being tabled in the House.

The president said there was no lock-up before the tabling of the 1979 Estimates when I was president of the treasury board. Of course, the President of the Treasury Board was a mere backbencher in the opposition ranks at that time. Perhaps he fails to realize that the critic of his party, a former president of the treasury board, did discuss the matter with me. He said, "In view of the fact that they are my estimates you will be tabling, there is no need to give me a preview of what I have already seen." That has no relevance to the situation today. The situation today is a clear question of privilege, and I hope, Madam Speaker, on behalf of my colleague you will find a prima facie case.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I will be quite brief. As a former minister of state for Treasury Board, I rise in support of my colleague, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). I am very much concerned about the fact that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) should make a conscious decision to exclude Members of Parliament from an information briefing which is being made available to the press gallery.

I want to make it very clear to the President of the Treasury Board that members on this side of the House are not in the least opposed to a lock-up at which members of the Press Gallery can be present. We believe it is essential that members of the press, who are charged with the responsibility of reporting on the estimates and other important announcements being made by the government, have full and complete access to government information. However, if it is essential that members of the press have access to this information to do their job of reporting to Canadians what is being done by government, surely it is even more important that Members of Parliament on all sides of the House be entitled to the same information. They should be entitled to receiving the same briefings and have the opportunity to raise questions and get information from the government as to its activities.

The minister says it is not a question of privilege but a question of courtesy. It is a matter of discourtesy. The President of the Treasury Board made a conscious decision today and gave orders that Members of Parliament should be excluded from that lock-up. That is what the officials said to my colleague from York-Peel (Mr. Stevens).

The minister says there are no precedents, it has not been done before. If the minister looked as far back as the budget produced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), he would recognize that there is a long-standing tradition in this House of Commons of an advance lock-up, that members of Parliament, and research staff in some instances, should be allowed in to get advance information about the government's plans so that when the information is released, they will be able to comment in an informed way about what the government is doing. This is the essential question on the issue.

What could there conceivably be in the estimates to make secrecy more necessary than in the case of a budget? What justification could there be for denying people the right of access to information about the estimates when we accept as a matter of common procedure that they should be entitled to have information in advance with regard to the budget?

My colleague, the hon. member for Capilano, mentioned as well the long-standing tradition whereby Members of Parliament for all parties are allowed into a lock-up with the Auditor General prior to the tabling of the Auditor General's report to be briefed as to the findings which will be presented in Parliament. Surely that is appropriate as well. To the best of my knowledge, there has never been an instance where the security surrounding a lock-up and the privilege granted to Members of Parliament has been abused. I cannot think of an instance where a leak has taken place.

Mr. MacEachen: I can.

Mr. Beatty: Nor can I think of a single instance where, in the case of a lock-up on the budget, there has been a leak as a result of a Member of Parliament being there to hear about it in advance. Surely this same courtesy should and could have been extended in this case to Members of Parliament.

It is not simply a question of Members of Parliament being over-sensitive about their prerogatives. If that is what it was, I do not think that any member on this side would expect you to have sympathy. The issue is how we represent our constituents. How are the people of Canada best served? Are they best served by a procedure which excludes Members of Parliament, which feeds them steak and mushrooms and press releases over lunch at the same time as the press is receiving a full briefing about information which is being withheld from Parliament? Or is it in the interests of Canadians that Members of Parliament, who will be called upon very shortly to respond to the President of the Treasury Board and ask him questions in this House relating to his estimates, be given the opportunity of having some advance guidance from the department as to the substance of that information?

As a former minister, I feel there is nothing more complicated which comes before Parliament in the course of a year than the estimates. It is not good enough for a Member of Parliament charged with the responsibility of responding on behalf of his party to the government's spending plan to simply receive a press release. Surely he is entitled to full information and to have his questions answered by the officials and the minister in the very same way as are members of the press.

Finally, I repeat that we are not objecting in the least to a lock-up for the press in order that they can get this information. We are saying if it is essential for the press to have access to this information, in order for them to do their job, then Members of Parliament serving their constituents and the people of Canada deserve no less.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, in my opinion the facts are relatively simple. In this instance members of the opposition want to enjoy the same consideration as the press, but everything has to be set in proper perspective. First we must find out if there was a breach of the standing orders and of the established tradition before deciding whether or not in this case there is a question of privilege or a simple lack of courtesy.

I suggest there is neither. In my opinion the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) is being very humble when he says that out of courtesy perhaps he could have done more than he did today. Let me explain. First as regards the rules, S.O. 58(14) and 59 set forth the obligations of the government as they relate to the main estimates. All we need do under the provisions of S.O. 58(14) is to ensure that these estimates are tabled in the House before March 1 so that henceforth, through a motion moved under S.O. 59, they may be referred to the various appropriate committees which must report at the end of May. Therefore hon. members opposite and on this side will have three months to scrutinize, study and analyze these estimates.

That being the case, Madam Speaker, it seems obvious to me that the President of the Treasury Board did not in any way breach the standing orders of the House and no other rule exists under which he would have to serve notice or in any way whatsoever consult members opposite about the estimates. Therefore we religiously followed Standing Orders 58(14) and 59 without breaching the privileges of hon. members. Since the Standing Orders were respected, did we fail to follow our tradition or practice? When introducing the main estimates in years past, of course out of courtesy for newsmen, because of their obligation to go to press before a set time, they attended a lock-up to get acquainted with the estimates, but such was not the case for hon. members. So there is no precedent which members opposite can cite to say that today, in 1981, we are not observing a practice for that practice does not exist, and that has not been demonstrated by anyone here today. Besides, I think we started something new because the President of the Treasury Board was thoughtful and courteous enough to invite critics of the opposition parties for lunch to brief them on these estimates. That has indeed been confirmed by opposition members, they had that meeting beginning at lunch hour until the estimates were tabled, even if it was not necessary.

Now then, Madam Speaker, it is enough to compare what was done today with the procedure followed in the case of the budget, although there is a basic difference on which I will elaborate later. In the case of the budget, and it is not all that different, my colleagues opposite will admit that the critics and a few members of the opposition do not meet at the same time as the newsmen. That is false.

In the case of the budget, things are not much different: my colleagues opposite will agree that the critics and a few members of the opposition are not invited to meet at the same time as members of the press. That is false! In the case of the budget, the press is admitted for a lock-up at eleven o'clock in the morning, while the critics and a few members of the opposition meet around six o'clock in the evening for a briefing on the budget before it is brought down at eight o'clock. That is not a breach of privilege but an established pratice. If, in the case of the budget, the press attends a lock-up six or seven hours earlier than the hon. members, if that is not a matter of privilege, why should it be now when the press was briefed on the estimates only at ten o'clock this morning, and the critics and a few hon. members opposite were invited for lunch by the President of the Treasury Board himself for a briefing on the estimates, which he is not required to do?

We see that, in the case of the budget, the press meets at eleven o'clock for a budget that becomes public knowledge at eight o'clock in the evening while the hon. members or a few of them are convened only at six o'clock; today, the press met at ten o'clock this morning, and the few hon. members met only two hours later, around noon or 12.30, having been invited by the President of the Treasury Board for a briefing. That is a fine example of courtesy on the part of the President of the Treasury Board, and not a matter of privilege nor a lack of courtesy; quite the contrary. So, I fail to see, Madam Speaker, how my colleagues opposite can possibly complain of any shortcoming on our part.

May I say in closing, very respectfully and unassumingly, that there is a fundamental difference between a budget and the estimates. The budget contains measures that are implemented immediately, which may justify a prior meeting with hon. members, which is not provided for in our Standing Orders, but which has become an established practice, and a precedent and which is part of our parliamentary procedure.

Moreover, the estimates do not come into effect immediately as some provisions in the budget do. Those estimates are only tabled in the House to be referred later, in the circumstances on Monday next, March 1, to the committees which during three months will examine and analyse them. The press conference was not held to deal with the estimates. The press conference was held to give newspaper men some information and enable them to write their articles in due time to appear in the news that same evening or in the newspapers the following day. The hon. members cannot complain. They will have three months to analyse and consider them in committee and discuss them during the allotted days. There will be 25 such days during the taxation year beginning after March 31.

Madam Speaker, I want to do my part as Leader of the Government in the House and support the measures helping hon. members to protect their privileges. I am fully aware of the importance of that matter.

We keep a careful watch over our prerogatives, rights, and privileges but in all sincerity I consider that in the present case, not only is there no breach of privilege, because it is not required by the Standing Orders, and I could perhaps be blamed for my legalistic approach if I restricted my comments to that, but there was no breach of courtesy for either of the reasons I have already mentioned. The facts are known, I shall not repeat them. Not only did we not break the rules of courtesy but we have fully respected standard parliamentary practice and even went further since the President of the Treasury Board kindly made himself available for questioning.

In a few minutes he will make a statement outlining the new format of the estimates. The hon. members opposite will have the opportunity to ask him questions during a period of time which is left at your discretion under S.O. 15(3), Madam Speaker.

This preliminary debate takes far too long, in my opinion, but since several hon. members have already spoken, I would like to correct the facts so that hon. members clearly understand that there is a difference between a private meeting with the press and a meeting with the hon. members and that we have never failed to follow the practice, or to comply with the Standing Orders or the rules of courtesy. On the contrary, we went further than we should have. I am pleased about it, and I even hope that this new practice will continue. But, Madam Speaker, I dwell on that point only to indicate that this matter is absolutely crazy.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I am going to be quite brief with respect to this matter. I listened to what my hon. friend had to say, and what he is saying is that we have broken new ground. I do not really believe that we have broken new ground, since lunch, when the estimates are not seen but a press release is seen. I do not think that is breaking new ground.

If it is his intention, as the leader of the government has expressed his intention, to break new ground, then I think we have something that we might be able to work with. I want to say to him that his argument with respect to the distinction between budgetary matters, on the one hand, and estimates, on the other, is something that could be argued against if one wanted to take the time of the House to argue against it. In other words, it can apply both ways.

The fact of the matter is that over the course of the years we have expanded the rights of Members of Parliament with respect to the Auditor General's report, with respect to the budget, and what is important here is the expansion of the rights of Members of Parliament for separate briefings, not necessarily press briefings such as occurred this morning with respect to press briefings, but separate briefings, with the documents and with the advisers that are in existence for the Auditor General briefings and for the budget briefings. I do not know of any earthly reason why that principle ought not to be present. I did not find, in anything that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) indicated, that he would be unwilling to have that kind of arrangement made.

The point of this argument, the point of my rising, is to suggest to you, Madam Speaker, that you hold this question of privilege in abeyance so that we can discuss, through the appropriate channels, the way in which a procedure can be established, satisfactory to all sides of the House of Commons, so that we would continue the expansion of the matter of openness with respect to the plans of government.

I did not think there was any unwillingness on the part of the President of the Treasury Board with respect to that. As a matter of fact, I think he was discussing that point with the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) when they were sitting together a little while ago, and I hope that would be the case. I hope that the Chair would recognize the position of Members of Parliament, and especially the critic for the Treasury Board, on the day on which these estimates are brought forward, who must leave this place or deal with a statement, but who must leave this place and deal intelligently in the public press with a media that has been prepared by a briefing.

I think a sense of fairness would be realized and accomplished if in the case—whether or not you find a question of privilege later on, I cannot comment on—but whether or not you do, if this matter was held in abeyance so that through the usual channels we might discuss continuing the expansion that has gone on and has been spoken to today with respect to the rights of Members of Parliament to do their job, because that is our job, in terms of government expenditures; in fact, it is our responsibility. It is not a question, Madam Speaker, of denying the press these rights because Members of Parliament do not have them; it is a matter of expanding the rights of Members of Parliament.

I hope that my friend, and the House leader of the New Democratic Party, would be agreeable to discussing this matter, holding in abeyance, of course, the question of privilege and reserving on it until we have had a chance to explore it.

Madam Speaker: I am afraid that if I do not try to put an end to this debate, it will be quite impossible for hon. members from all parties to be performing their duties that are coming up in the form of questions to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). If too much time is taken up now, it will cut in on the time that hon. members will have later in the day to ask questions.

So, because of that, I will try to put an end to this debate and say this much about it. The issue has been before the House several times—the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) did give me notice and I did have a chance to look at other circumstances when this question was debated in the House—it has come up several times.

My immediate predecessor, after looking at all the arguments presented to him, was very reluctant to find a prima facie case of privilege in similar circumstances. I am inclined to agree with him that this does not constitute a question of privilege on the basis that members' duties do not require them—speaking of one hon. member in particular—to go to such a lock-up. This is not specifically one of the requirements of his duties. Therefore, it would be difficult to find a breach of privilege based on the fact that he was not invited to attend a lock-up. It is true that the hon. member was denied advantages which would have accrued from his attending such a lock-up, but that privilege was denied all other members of this House.

I appreciate the argument that the hon. member, as the official opposition critic, and the official critic of the New Democratic Party, will have to discuss these things quite early once the estimates are known to him and known to the House. I appreciate that, and that is an argument I certainly have weighed, but the advantage has been denied everybody. I am looking at privileges in this House, and I do not think one can say that the ability of the hon. member to perform his duties in the House has been impaired by the fact that he has not been able to attend the lock-up.

● (1550)

Hon. members have referred to procedures which are different in the case of the Auditor General's report. I simply make the distinction that the Auditor General's report is perhaps a special case because the Auditor General is answerable directly to Parliament. However, I have to take cognizance of the fact that procedures seem to be quite different from the budget to the estimates to the Auditor General's report, and perhaps the House would benefit from the standardization of those procedures. However, it is not for me to determine that. For that reason, and because nothing in our Standing Orders allows me to make a judgment that there would be a prima facie case of privilege, I will rule right now that this is not privilege, despite the fact that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) pleaded with me to keep the matter in abeyance.

Even if I say now that this is not a question of privilege, that does not preclude consultation between different members of this House in order to see whether some procedure, which would be satisfactory to all, might not be adopted or to examine whether these procedures should be standardized.

I noticed that hon. members referred constantly to a matter of courtesy. I will not say whether it would be a courtesy or something else, but I think it is up to the members themselves to get together and determine what procedure should be followed in these cases. It would help the Chair if hon. members did because the Chair is constantly asked to rule on this when there is no basis on which the Chair is able to rule on it.

I rule that this is not a question of privilege but urge hon. members to discuss this and consult each other, if they so desire.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have heard your ruling and, of course, I cannot respond with respect to that ruling. I am well aware of that. I note the question of privilege, and I just wish to bring to your attention that the whole reason Parliament was started in the first place was so that Parliament could scrutinize the King's purse.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry. The hon. member is reflecting on my ruling. I do not think we can go into that. If the hon. member has a point of order, I can hear it, but I will not allow him to reflect on my ruling.

Mr. Malone: Madam Speaker, what I am saying—and I wanted to come to this in my next sentence—is that you obviously have ruled; I cannot challenge that, but I submit that you had to rule the way you ruled, in accordance with the rules we have in Parliament.

However, I do not believe that that takes away from the fact that there is a general feeling that there has been a privilege given to people in the media which has been denied to Members of Parliament. It is therefore necessary—

Madam Speaker: I am sorry. I have to call the hon. member back to order because he is still arguing the case. I assume he really does not have a point of order. I will have to recognize the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn).

Mr. Malone: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: I have recognized the hon. member for Mississauga South.

Mr. Malone: I have not come to my conclusion.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Mississauga South.

Mr. McKnight: I think you have now.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, on the point of order, I was there at the time with my colleague, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), and there was indeed a telephone call made to the deputy secretary of the Treasury Board, who ordered his officials to make sure that the hon. member for Capilano and I were excluded.

Madam Speaker: Order. I think we have heard that argument. The hon. member has to recognize that he is still arguing the question of privilege.

Mr. Blenkarn: I have not argued yet.

Madam Speaker: The question is being argued. I am awfully sorry, but I think I will now have to hear the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae).

MR. RAE—ALLEGED DISCREPANCIES AND MISLEADING ANSWERS BY MINISTERS—MINISTERS' RESPONSIBILITIES FOR RIDINGS

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I gave notice to the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and to the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) some time ago that I intended to raise the matter of the discrepancy between the answers which the Minister of Finance gave to me on Thursday, February 19, and answers given to me on Wednesday, February 18 by the Solicitor General with respect to the question of the appointment of ministers of the Crown responsible for individual ridings.

Privilege—Mr. Rae

Your Honour will recall that on February 18 I raised in the House the question of a letter addressed to a constituent of mine by the Solicitor General in which he described himself as the minister responsible for the riding of Broadview-Greenwood. I then asked a question the next day of the Minister of Finance with respect to the responsibilities of individual ministers and, as recorded at page 7455 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance said:

> First of all, Madam Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that the Government of Canada does not believe that any minister has been given responsibility for representing, in this House of Commons, any riding other than the riding for which he has been elected. That is the view of the Government of Canada.
> What I would like to tell the hon. member is that ministers for various regions of the country have special responsibilities within the cabinet for representing the interests of those regions.

There then followed an exchange in which the minister reiterated at several points the fact that there were appointments made with respect to regions but that there was no attempt on the part of the government to usurp the functions of individual Members of Parliament. It seems to me that the answer which was given by the minister is in direct contradiction to the answer given the day before by the Solicitor General, and in fact is in direct contradiction to the letter which went out over the signature of the Solicitor General, because in that letter the Solicitor General did not describe himself as the minister responsible for a particular region, he described himself as the minister responsible for a particular riding. That riding happens to be mine, so naturally I have a certain interest in the nature of his correspondence with respect to this question.

That is my first question of privilege. The first point of the argument is that the Minister of Finance described ministers as being appointed to take care of regions, and then he proceeded to give me a lecture in civics and on the fact that there were certain ministers responsible in the cabinet for certain regions, and so forth.

My point here is that this answer is in direct contradiction to what are on their very face accepted as facts. A letter went out. In that letter the minister described himself not as the minister responsible for regions but as the minister responsible for my riding.

My second question of privilege has to do with the nature of the answer given by the Minister of Finance in which he described the duties of these so-called regional ministers, and the duties were that they were to represent at the cabinet table regions which required representation and which individual members of Parliament could not represent in cabinet. He then went on to speak about the case of a large grant in the province of Nova Scotia for Michelin and referred to the fact that the hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan) was not a member of the cabinet and therefore could not be there.

The implication of that answer is that the duty of these ministers is to represent regions with respect to major items of policy affecting those regions.

The second point of my privilege is that this has nothing to do with the subject matter of the letter which went out over the signature of the Solicitor General of Canada. The letter sent out over the signature of the Solicitor General had to do with a multicultural grant under the multicultural grants program, and I cannot believe—and I wait for the minister to contradict me—that the question of what was best for the "region" of Broadview-Greenwood was discussed in cabinet, for the simple reason that the grant had nothing to do with the riding of Broadview-Greenwood any more than it had to do with the riding of any Member of Parliament in this House where the teaching of English as a second language is carried on. It is carried on in most constituencies in Canada and certainly in the vast majority of the constituencies in every urban region in Canada where the absorption of new Canadians is a question of great importance.

• (1600)

The second point of my privilege is that the minister appears to have been misleading the House in indicating, in his answer to the question with respect to these ministers, that their responsibilities concerned regional representation and the work carried out by the Solicitor General, the onerous task of signing a letter in which a cheque for $15,568 was enclosed on behalf of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming), had something to do with the representation of regional interest, when on its very face it had nothing to do with the representation of regional interest; it concerned something very different.

The third point of my privilege is that the minister indicated that these appointments were for the presentation or articulation of regional interest within cabinet. The Minister of State for Multiculturalism, who is the minister responsible for this grants program, is the Member of Parliament representing the riding of York West. The Solicitor General is the member of Parliament representing the riding of York Centre. These ridings are not exactly a million miles away from each other. In fact, they border on each other in northwestern Toronto. What I am saying is that the theory being put forward by the Minister of Finance that somehow this letter was part of the regional responsibilities of the Solicitor General just does not make any sense. The regional responsibilities of the Solicitor General respecting the riding of York Centre and neighbouring areas are exactly the same as those respecting the riding of York West represented by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism.

My fourth point really follows from this. Without asking you, Madam Speaker, to reconsider your decision, for which you gave no reasons last week, other than to simply indicate that, in your view, it was not a question of privilege, I would ask you to take a very careful look at the answer given by the Minister of Finance, as reported on page 7455 of Hansard. I have learned from listening to and watching the Minister of Finance, which is something my job requires me to do, that he chooses his words very carefully.

Mr. Nielsen: It is like watching those black spots.

Mr. Rae: As reported at page 7455, the minister said:

> First of all, Madam Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that the Government of Canada does not believe that any minister has been given responsibility for representing, in this House of Commons, any riding other than the riding for which he has been elected. That is the view of the Government of Canada.

Quite apart from the implausibility of that answer, the fact is that this letter went out. I refer to the phrase "in this House of Commons", because the implication of those words is that the minister is responsible for my riding and for other ridings outside the House of Commons or at least is responsible in some other sense than within the confines of the House of Commons. I do not think Madam Speaker can rule on that question, with the greatest of respect, until such time as the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections has had an opportunity to examine and, indeed, to cross-examine precisely what is the nature of the duties carried out by the Solicitor General in keeping with the letter which went out over his signature.

For those four reasons it seems to me that one of the two ministers involved—the Minister of Finance who answered on February 19 or the Solicitor General who answered on February 18—has not been describing the duties indicated in the letter which went out on February 12. I will not put it any stronger than that; it is not for me to do so. But I think someone is being less than accurate in the description of the duties which were put forward.

In his answers on February 18, the Solicitor General did not say a single word with respect to his regional responsibilities. Apparently the thought had not occurred to him on February 18. The thought came to the government overnight, some time during the night of February 18 and the morning of February 19. The thought occurred to the government that the only way out of this quandary was to say that this was in keeping with traditional regional responsibilities, but this is in no way the nature of the answer given in the House on February 18.

As reported on page 7426 of Hansard, the Solicitor General, in answer to my question of privilege, outlined his own description of his duties. His description of those duties was quite different from the description given by the Minister of Finance a day later.

It seems to me there is a contradiction between these two answers, a contradiction of fact which, in my opinion, has the effect of misleading the House and myself. Neither description accords with the letter which went out over the signature of the Solicitor General on February 12, 1981.

The letter which would form part of a grant program had nothing to do with regional responsibilities, it had nothing to do with politics, but it should have had everything to do with the simple act of making an application to a government. It should have had nothing to do with partisan politics. It should have had nothing to do with whether one is a Liberal, a Conservative or a member of the NDP. There is a discrepancy between that letter which indicated that the minister was taking responsibility for activities within my riding and the answer given on February 18 by the Solicitor General, as well as the new explanation which was invented some time between February 18 and 19 and given by the Minister of Finance on February 19.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I want to enter into this debate on the question of privilege because I must confess or admit that I have been responsible for the setting up of this system of traditional regional representations in so far as my party is concerned.

Some hon. Members: Ah, ha!

Mr. Trudeau: In spite of the "ah ha's" from across the way, it is a time-honoured practice. I recall in the government of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that they ensured that certain regions which did not have many elected members found ways of sitting around the cabinet table by choosing members of the Senate. The whole purpose of cabinet, which forms the government under our parliamentary system, is to ensure that it hears the voices, understands the representations and, hopefully, fulfils the needs of the various regions of our country.

Some ten years ago, following this practice, which I believe dates back to the beginning of confederation, I received nonetheless complaints that because of the distinction between the legislative and executive branch, it very often happened that ridings which were well represented by members of our party or members of the opposition parties still found they did not have direct access to the government, as opposed to the legislature of this land.

I believe that is why the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) was very wise in including the words "in this House of Commons" which were quoted by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) as part of his third point, I believe.

• (1610)

In this House of Commons we are all legislators, first and foremost, and we all represent one constituency in this country. But, under our system, there is also an executive branch, the government, which is sometimes chosen from this side and sometimes chosen from over there, whether we like it or not. Naturally, they are members of a given political party. But their job, over and above their job as legislators, is to ensure that in the execution of policies, and in the selection of policies, the different areas of the country are well heard, well understood and as well represented as possible.

It is on this basis that as far back as nine years ago, I believe, having heard from many people across the country that they lacked this direct contact with cabinet, I appointed a minister responsible for each region, or each province. In the case where there is only one minister from a province, whether or not there are other Members of Parliament, it was a simple matter of saying, for instance, that in the province of British Columbia the Hon. Ray Perrault, Senator, represents that region around the cabinet table—obviously not in this House of Commons, since many able members from the opposite side speak for the particular ridings in that province. But they are not present, unfortunately for us, at the cabinet table. Though we made an attempt to get some of them into our cabinet, none were willing. Therefore, we made sure that there was, at least, a voice from that province at the cabinet table. In that sense there are regional ministers.

The difficulty arises when, in a province, there are several ministers rather than one and, therefore, provinces where there are a considerable number of ridings, particularly Quebec and Ontario where there are 70 and 80 plus ridings. In a case like that, we make sure that the regional minister—and there is one who is senior, in that sense, for each of those two provinces—has the assistance of other ministers sitting in cabinet from that province. For reasons of convenience, we try to distribute the ridings in that particular province so that each minister would have a small number. They were not particularly designed to represent opposition seats, they were to cover all seats. If the House wants, and permits me later, I will be tabling the list of such ridings which are represented by the various ministers.

Once again, in the case of a province where there is only one minister, he represents all of the ridings in that province. When there are several, the House will find that several ministers have divided up the ridings, as it were, and paid particular interest to that particular riding, or those particular ridings.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, I think that the first point made by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood distinguishes between ministers for regions, which he seems to admit are traditionally correct, and have been traditionally recognized, and not ministers for ridings. I would point out that in light of my explanation, the hon. member's first point is probably invalid and spurious, since within a province there can be several regions and within each region there can be several ridings. Once again, it is a matter of making sure that the various regions, provinces and ridings in the country have direct access to the government. I believe this is essentially the point made by the Minister of Finance when he answered the question raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood. If I read Hansard correctly, and I was not present that day, the hon. member's question had nothing to do with a particular letter or the particular action of one of the regional ministers; it had to do with the theory. This theory is based on recognized practice since the time of confederation and some eight or nine years ago our government refined it a bit further to make sure that in provinces with large and numerous ridings there are several ministers to assist each other.

The origins of this practice go back a long time, as I explained, and the reason for it is to permit access to the executive arm of Parliament. But I found it is particularly urgent in times like ours, because of the size of our country, because of the remoteness of our capital, because of the lack of representation of members of a particular region or province on the government side, whether it be our government or the government which was presided over by the Right Hon.

Leader of the Opposition, that ministers carry out these duties and have the electorate understand that all benefits, all good laws and all good policies do not necessarily originate in provincial governments. The federal government is also the government of all Canadians. It is the job—the duty—of ministers, as I hope it would be of Members of Parliament from all parties, to insist on the importance of the federal government and of the national Parliament as being the government and Parliament of all Canadians rather than, as seems to be the increasing tendency, to believe that Ottawa is only some remote capital dealing with esoteric things and peace and war, whereas all the policies which have to do with everyday living and benefits of citizens—

Mr. Keeper: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Trudeau: I have almost finished my remarks, Madam Speaker. The hon. member has a point of order and I will gladly yield to him if he will just permit me to finish.

Mr. Keeper: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Trudeau: That is the point I want to make, Madam Speaker. The NDP cannot wait to hear itself, so let us hear them.

Mr. Keeper: Madam Speaker, there was no discourtesy meant. The reason I rise on a point of order is to inquire whether or not the Prime Minister would be willing to entertain a question with regard to this matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, yes, I would. Perhaps it would have been more appropriate for the hon. member to wait. I insisted that I had almost finished my argument, but I will entertain his question.

Mr. Keeper: Madam Speaker, I had hoped that the Prime Minister would clarify this matter with respect to responsibilities, whether the responsibilities were for ridings or for regions.

I also have two other questions. One was whether or not these ministers would be made known, and the second was whether or not the ministers appointed with duties for regions, as the Prime Minister now says, will be effective. The reason I raise those questions is because I know that in my riding there is the impending closure of a postal station which serves the people of that riding.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Keeper: I hear laughter from some hon. members opposite. This is a sensitive matter. It is a matter of bringing the voice of the people to the cabinet table. Will the Prime Minister not acknowledge that he then has the responsibility to appoint ministers who are effective and who will bring the concerns of the people from the neighbourhoods to the cabinet table?

Madam Speaker: I will allow the Right Hon. Prime Minister to answer, if he wishes.

Mr. Trudeau: The member asks that I make these members' names and ministers' names known. I indicated earlier that if I had the authority of the House I would table the list, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Trudeau: With respect to the hon. member's second question, which has to do with the matter regarding the Post Office—

Mr. Nielsen: Is the Prime Minister tabling the document?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, I will, incessantly.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Trudeau: That is perfectly good English. Members opposite may not know it, but they can look it up in their dictionaries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: As a responsible member, he knows that he does have to raise questions like that in the House of Commons, but then he will want to raise it with the proper departmental minister, which will be the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet), who happens to represent a riding in Montreal.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member wants to make sure that his requests are also handled around the cabinet table by a minister who is from the area, then he will refer to this list and he will read, for example, "Manitoba—Hon. Lloyd Axworthy". If he is interested in getting a solution or redress for his riding, he will address himself to the executive branch of government, as I am sure he has done on other occasions. It will be helpful for him to know that apart from the departmental minister, he might be able to get assistance from the regional minister. I am happy to table this list in order to assist members of this House do their job when it comes to dealing with the executive.

• (1620)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent of the House to table the document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, on that point of order, in view of the interest in it, should it not only be tabled but made an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Trudeau: On making an appendage to Hansard, particularly in provinces where there are several ministers, it remains the privilege of the government to adjust these ridings from time to time; and with a view to achieving the greatest possible efficiency in serving the Canadian people, we reserve the privilege of doing that.

Madam Speaker: Then does that mean that there is not unanimous consent to append this list to Hansard? There is?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, on a point of order—perhaps continuing the one raised just a few moments ago—I guess the government has every right to change these things, as they have the right to change acting ministers; but I would ask for an undertaking from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), if he is agreeable. If there are changes in these political ministers, will he table them in the House of Commons when they are made, having now established the practice, here in the House, of tabling the names of acting ministers? Would he undertake to do so, exactly as we do now with acting ministers who are appointed by order in council?

Mr. Trudeau: Since this list is made public for the convenience of the electorate and the members of the House of Commons and of the Senate, I would be happy, when it is drawn to my attention that there is a change, to make this change known in some way. I do not think that this particular aspect of government practice is a statutory matter. I think it is a matter of convenience. I undertake, in so far as it is practical, and I am reminded of it, to acquaint members of the opposition parties, as indeed my own members, about any change in responsibilities.

An hon. Member: Particularly your own.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Madam Speaker. My point of order—and I think it ties in with the last comment made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—is on this word, "incessant". According to the Oxford dictionary, "incessant" means unceasing, continual, repeated.

I would assume, if the Prime Minister used that word advisedly, and he said that we should consult our dictionary, he means that he is going to be repeating the tabling of this type of document—

Mr. MacEachen: As required, incessantly.

Mr. Stevens: —that it will go on in an unceasing way, that it will be a continual tabling of the document. If that is so, I think the Prime Minister should confirm his position that every time there is a change, without him being reminded, he will follow up what he has committed himself to do today and that is, table the revision to the document tabled today, that is incessantly, if you like, to use the Prime Minister's expression.

Mr. Trudeau: We are into semantics, at this point. What I can say is that incessantly, I will table these bits of information without cease, and—

Mr. MacEachen: Continuously.

Mr. Trudeau: —and continuously, as appropriate. If the hon. member consults his etymology, he will realize that to do something incessantly—

An hon. Member: How about phenology?

Mr. Trudeau: —means that you will do it without cease, meaning that you will continue to do it after you have sat down from speaking on one subject.

Mr. Rae: I wonder if the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would entertain one question. May I ask the Prime Minister one question?

Madam Speaker: Well, I want to remind hon. members that usually one does not enter into debate in the course of a question of privilege. However, the Right Hon. Prime Minister has accepted a question, and is now signalling that he will accept a second one. I do not think that we should indulge in that practice, but I will acknowledge the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae).

Mr. Rae: Madam Speaker, if the Prime Minister will have a look at Hansard for February 18 with respect to the privilege which I raised, I wonder if he could tell us whether the practice with respect to letters going out to constituents in Broadview-Greenwood is the same as the practice for letters going out to a riding held by a Liberal Member of Parliament, or whether the Liberal Member of Parliament takes credit for grants in that riding rather than the minister politically responsible.

Mr. Trudeau: I have had a slight canvass made of ministers on this subject, and my understanding is that there is no absolute, firm practice. I have here one minister who makes announcements and ensures that cheques or announcements or pieces of paper, or whatever they are, are often dealt with through members of the opposition party when they have to do with that particular riding. Other ministers do not do that. I think the essence of it is that each minister acts in whatever way he thinks is more conducive to the public good of Canada.

An hon. Member: Which do you think is better?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member asks which I think is better; and that is the third question, and perhaps the last one that I have time to answer today.

In a better world, I would hope the method the hon. member prefers would be the one that we would follow. But I would point out to him that we are in a very practical world where there are provincial cabinets all across the land and provincial governments which are constantly trying to assert—

Mr. Knowles: Where is that better world?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member does not want to talk about practical politics. In that case, I will tell him that in a better world, we would all be in heaven.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I just want to warn the House with respect to a matter. The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) is here in the capacity of Acting Prime Minister. Traditionally, we have been able not to question ministers of the Crown with respect to their particular responsibilities, such as the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) with respect to the postmaster, etc.

We now have formalized a procedure which, I gather, was heretofore informal. There are now documents that have been tabled and have become part of the record of the House which indicate that certain responsibilities have been granted to certain ministers. I think it is well for the House to understand that what has happened is that, in terms of the question period, the questions with respect to specific subject matters can now quite properly be placed to ministers who have had some political responsibilities. I just think that the House should understand—I hope that was the intention of the Prime Minister—that if I had a particular matter relating to my area—for instance, in that list, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), is very likely the minister responsible for my area—that I have a right, as a Member of Parliament—

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —to question the minister responsible for my area publicly—as well as by letter or behind the curtain, with respect to his area of responsibility.

If that is not the case, then this exercise today, and all the fine words of the Prime Minister, were masking a political boondoggle, and that is all it is.

• (1630)

Mr. MacEachen: I should like to comment on that point, Madam Speaker. I think one could have anticipated that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) would want to expand the question period and make it even more chaotic. What he failed to notice was that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated his method of organizing the government in order to make it a more efficient instrument. This has not changed in any way the responsibilities that ministers occupy under statutes to Parliament. It is under that canon that we respond to the House of Commons. The duties assigned to ministers under this system are duties assigned by the Prime Minister in the way he organizes his government. It seems to me that ministers in the discharge of those responsibilities are primarily responsible to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I have been trying to get the floor for a few moments on precisely the point raised by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) to which the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) has made a response. Indeed, Madam Speaker, you may be a bit disturbed as to other troubles you may have—if you do not have enough already—by the document the Prime Minister tabled today and made part of Hansard. We now have it official that certain of the responsibilities of ministers in the cabinet include various regions. He has told us, for example, that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) is the minister responsible for the 14 constituencies in the province of Manitoba. He told my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper) that if he is not satisfied with the answer he gets from the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) regarding a post office in that area, he can appeal to the minister responsible for his riding.

If I am not satisfied with the action I am getting from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) with regard to the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass I can put my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration in his capacity as minister responsible for the 14 constituencies in Manitoba. I am trying to be letter perfect, Madam Speaker. I do not know whether I should say the minister for the Manitoba region or whether he is responsible for certain areas.

I admit readily Madam Speaker, not only do I admit, but I draw your attention to the fact that this contradicts what we have in the rule book. This is where your difficulties will increase. At page 133 of Beauchesne, fifth edition, citation 361, reads as follows:

A question may not be asked of a minister in another capacity, such as being responsible for a province, or part of a province, or as spokesman for a racial or religious group.

On page 132, citation 359(6) reads:

A question must be within the administrative competence of the government. The Minister to whom the question is directed is responsible to the House for his present Ministry and not for any decisions taken in a previous portfolio.

There is no question in my mind about that rule; it has been there for a long time. I have seen members in this House of Commons from Nova Scotia try to put questions to the Minister of Finance when he held other portfolios. The Speaker always said he had no right to answer questions for his province but could answer questions only in respect of his department. I have seen other efforts to get certain ministers into an issue because it was important for the province or the region. You may tell me, Madam Speaker, and the Minister of Finance may say, that I have read the rule and the rule is there. I have read it, and it has been there for years. We have often been told by other Speakers we cannot put questions to a minister regarding something that is outside his responsibility. But no less a personage than the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has declared today that he has assigned responsibilities to his ministers for regions and responsibility for the ridings.

I know that we can play with these words both ways, but in point of fact, just as the Prime Minister has appointed persons as cabinet ministers with administrative responsibilities, so has he appointed cabinet ministers as persons responsible for ridings or groups of ridings or for regions. That is something new. We have not known that before.

That now being official with a document on the table—it was tabled and put in Hansard—is it not going to make it difficult for you, Madam Speaker, to deny the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James the right to ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration about that post office in Winnipeg, station D? How can you stop me from asking the Minister of Employment and Immigration about problems in Winnipeg North Centre or problems in Winnipeg generally in which he is interested, since it is there on the table that the Prime Minister has assigned him that responsibility?

I put my question rhetorically, Madam Speaker. I do not expect an answer from the Chair today but I make the point that the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) is one that should be allowed.

It is now clear to me that this question ought to be sent to a committee so we can have it straightened out. We can have the Prime Minister come before that committee and give us again the lecture he gave us today. We can go over the whole civic course, the course on how cabinet is run, what cabinet ministers do when they have administrative responsibilities and when it is just for the glory of the Liberal Party or for the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) to be able to send out cheques.

I submit that whether or not the committee finds there has been an error or impropriety, surely this Parliament has the right to know what the picture now is. It is for that reason I support the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood.

If I may speak for you, Your Honour, I think it would be good for your sake to have this matter sent off to committee so we may find out what the rule is from here on. Are we bound by the old rules that we can ask the Minister of Finance only about financial matters or can members from Nova Scotia ask him questions about anywhere in Nova Scotia? Must I stick to employment and immigration matters when I address the Minister of Employment and Immigration or can I ask him questions about Manitoba because he has been assigned those responsibilities?

As I say, at least let us get the matter cleared up. Maybe the result of such a discussion by the committee will put an end to all this and we will be back to what the rules say.

Mr. Peterson: You would never abuse the rules on this!

Mr. Andre: He is not abusing them. We have the right to ask a minister about his responsibility.

Mr. Knowles: I submit the hon. member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) is breaking the rule by getting on the record without being in his own seat. The rules are being severely strained by this new practice about which we have had no knowledge in the past. I think the least that should be done, Madam Speaker, is that you should give the House the opportunity to say yes or no to the motion of my hon. friend. I make the point again that you do not decide that there is positively a question of privilege, you do not decide that the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood is right or that the Minister of Finance or the Solicitor General happens to be right, what you decide is that there is enough of a case for the House to make the decision.

You may well decide that there is a prima facie case for something to be looked into; a motion is put and the government may use its majority to vote it down. I think common sense would say that the matter ought to be sent to committee. I hope you will look at the whole issue in that light.

In other words, Madam Speaker, I am pleading with you not to look at it in the light of a contest between the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood and the minister who represents his riding; I am asking you to look at it in terms of a confused picture which ought to be cleared up. The best way for the House to clear it up is to have the chance to vote on referring the matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I did not think my life had been further complicated by the remarks of the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) because I thought I would abide by our rules whereby a minister may answer questions only on matters pertaining to his or her portfolio.

An hon. Member: Responsibilities.

Madam Speaker: I thought that what the Right Hon. Prime Minister had said to us was that these supplementary responsibilities were for the purpose of allowing members to have a further recourse in their work in support of their constituencies. However, if the Right Hon. Prime Minister had said something else, I will look into the argument. I am obviously going to take this question under advisement. If he has said something else, I will agree with the hon. member that my life has been complicated by what he has just done, but I hope it has not.

● (1640)

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I wish to speak to this question of privilege on a matter that affects my riding of Vancouver Centre, and it relates to remarks made on February 19 by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) I will not quote in full what the Minister of Finance said, but as reported in Hansard at page 7455, he said this:

> —I want to assure the hon. member that the Government of Canada does not believe that any minister has been given responsibility for representing, in this House of Commons, any riding other than the riding for which he has been elected.

The Prime Minister has advised us that this technique of matching ridings is a government technique, that it is a cabinet management tool. I have a document which lists these twinned ridings, one of which is mine. It is not published by the government or by cabinet. It is prepared by the Liberal Party of Canada, dated January, 1981, and it is entitled "Ridings twinned with members". I shall read a portion from it as follows:

The idea of twinning was developed by the national caucus in response to a view that riding associations and members of Parliament could help those areas that do not presently have an elected member.

We are all elected members, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Carney: It is only the Liberal party which will not honour or recognize that we are elected members even though we are not Liberals. In this document, I notice that my twin is the Minister of State for Trade.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member is going into a different question. The question of privilege which we are discussing now is a matter of ministers being given responsibilities for regions and constituencies. That is quite different from the practice of twinning, of which I know nothing, but I have heard about it in this House. However, they are two different practices. Therefore, the hon. member would have to address herself to the question of privilege raised rather than bring in a new question at this point.

Miss Carney: Madam Speaker, I will have to check this list against the list which has been tabled. If this list, published by the Liberal Party of Canada, is the same as that which has been tabled today, I would like to reserve my opportunity to speak.

Madam Speaker: Very well. The hon. member for Pembina. I will hear the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) on a point of order.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I rise to seek some guidance from you. It was my impression that a few moments ago you had decided to reserve your judgment on this question.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Collenette: Are you then going to entertain arguments from every single member from the other side this afternoon?

Madam Speaker: I indicated that I was probably going to reserve on this question, but I did not say definitely that the discussion was over. I do not think I will be able to listen to all hon. members who want to speak on this question, but I will listen to a few as I know the House is quite exercised about this question. In cases like these I think it is prudent for the Chair to hear a number of speakers. I will hear a number, but I am giving notice now that I cannot hear everyone. Perhaps hon. members notice the clock; we must do something about routine proceedings.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, on the point of order raised by the parliamentary secretary and reflected upon by yourself, other dimensions to this same problem have been raised. These emerged when it was raised in the first instance.

I would hope, Madam Speaker, that you will not cut off members who wish to address themselves to those other dimensions so that you have the fullest of information and all of the facts at your disposal before coming to the point on which you will reserve judgment. I, for one, have a very important and additional dimension to add to this whole matter, and it is part of the same question of privilege.

Madam Speaker: I will allow any new dimension to be explored because it is important to hear interventions. The Chair wants to be as fully informed as possible so that it may rule on this question. However, I think I would insist upon making a distinction between a new dimension and a new question.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, the original question raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) was a question of privilege involving one minister sending a cheque to another minister to be sent to the riding. The question of privilege concerned undermining the work of the member. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has sent up a smokescreen entirely hiding the original issue. In my opinion, we should be dealing with that particular issue where one minister is undermining the work of the Member of Parliament for that riding. This is simply a smokescreen. This is a totalitarian, communistic approach and I would suggest the Prime Minister take the paper he tabled and put it where the monkey stuck the peanut because that is all it is good for. We are missing the main point, that of a minister undermining a Member of Parliament. That is the point of privilege, and I think we should be dealing with it.

Madam Speaker: With all respect to the hon. member, I think that is exactly what we are doing. That is the question of privilege and that is the question being discussed.

I had recognized the hon. member for Pembina earlier, I will hear him now.

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, my contribution will be brief. Let me begin by saying I do support the question of privilege brought forward by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood that this matter be referred to the committee.

I want to comment on a few items which the Prime Minister mentioned. I am glad he has finally tabled the list of who are the various regional ministers.

There are a number of questions which have to be answered. It is obvious that these questions can only be answered in the committee, and that is the reason for my support. Who pays for the regional offices which a good many ministers have established throughout Canada? We have our so-called regional minister; Senator Olson, in Alberta. He has a regional office in the Calgary International Airport. In the event the taxpayer is paying for these offices, the taxpayer has a right to know what these offices cost. Rather than reflecting the wishes of a specific region before Cabinet, it is obvious that these offices are being used to pursue ministers' own political aims. By looking at Alberta's representative, and I am referring specifically to Senator Olson, his voice does not reflect that region. He has been rejected time and time again by the electorate of Alberta. My hon. colleague says he has been rejected three times.

The Prime Minister also indicated there was a lack of representation from the various regions of Canada. The basic problem is a lack of sensitivity on the part of this Liberal government for the various regions of Canada. If the government would show that sensitivity, there would be no need for these regional ministers.

In my opinion, it is very important that this matter be referred to a committee so we can find out what it costs for these various regional offices and so we can investigate the matter of the 20 Members of Parliament, which the hon. member from Vancouver brought to our attention earlier. If the purpose of this procedure is to undercut the role of the elected representatives here in the House of Commons, I say that what the government is doing is spending taxpayers' money to undercut the democratic process which has served us well for a good many years here in Canada.

● (1650)

The Prime Minister, of all individuals, preaches to us about being parliamentarians for all of Canada. If there is one individual in this House of Commons who has undercut the role of parliamentarians, it is the Prime Minister.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support this motion, I wish to bring further information to your attention that will be beneficial to you in making a decision. No doubt part of the confusion came about because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that Members of Parliament are nobodies when they are off Parliament Hill. After the last election, he said he would listen to members of Parliament in the opposition. Up to the present time this has not been happening.

My colleague from Pembina (Mr. Elzinga) stated Senator Bud Olson is the minister responsible for the province of Alberta. We who have been elected in the province of Alberta feel we are responsible to the electorate of that province. I am sure that 95 per cent of the people in the province feel the same way.

In one of the weekly papers not too long ago there was a picture of Senator Bud Olson. Incidentally, it is a Liberal paper. The heading was, "Alberta's mad". In the Red Deer Advocate, there is a further bit of information. The article is headed, "Central Alberta oilmen give 'twin' a message for Ottawa". I quote:

> Red Deer's Liberal "twin" MP came to listen to the area's concerns this weekend, and this morning he got an earful.
> Liberal MP Ralph Ferguson, from the Ontario riding of Lambton-Middlesex, was told federal energy policies are forcing drilling equipment, skilled workers and entrepreneurs to leave the country.

The question is who is representing those people. Is it Senator Bud Olson, the MP for Lambton-Middlesex (Mr. Ferguson) or me? That is the question. The government, through individual members, backbenchers and members of the Treasury benches is subverting the parliamentary system by interfering with the duties and responsibilities of elected Members of Parliament in opposition.

I am referring to the twinning process apparently advocated by the Prime Minister for ridings not necessarily represented by Liberals. The suggestion of a cabinet minister twin is not acceptable to the people of Alberta. The way this whole matter could be cleared—

Madam Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member. I have to be fair to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney). I said I had to distinguish between two questions. We have already discussed the one of twinning in this Parliament. I cannot recall under which terms exactly I made a ruling on it. The hon. member may have other points he wants to raise about twinning, and we can hear that in due course. But today we are discussing a question of privilege on the matter of ministerial responsibilities over regions and constituencies, which was raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood. The discussion must remain on that point.

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I will be very brief on the matter. It is not twinning. If you look at the list, it may be tripling. Many of these ministers have three, four and five ridings to look after.

I am interested in this for two reasons. I would very much like to see Your Honour take seriously the suggestion that it is a matter of privilege to all of us which should be dealt with in the committee and rule in favour of that position. The reason is very simple. After today, do I tell my constituents to write to me or the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) who, according to that list, is the minister responsible for my riding? I will have to explain to those who think I am here to help them that the government decided one of their people will do that.

If you find this is not a question of privilege, Madam Speaker, I will then be on my feet to ask how we persuade the post office to send our mail to the ministers responsible because we clearly will not have a role to play.

The government is saying that the members for the constituencies are not the ones who will make the representations on behalf of their constituents to the ministers responsible for departments. If we accept their logic, we should make an appeal immediately and directly to the ministers the government decided in its wisdom would be responsible for our ridings.

The particular point for Don Valley West that hits home is this. The Prime Minister's list indicates a minister of the Crown who shall be responsible for the riding of Don Valley West. That minister of the Crown was rejected by the people of Don Valley West in 1972. He ran in the riding and was defeated. The government is suggesting that the people of Don Valley West should now turn to somebody, they directly and deliberately rejected, in order to get what is rightfully theirs from the Government of Canada. Speaking as a member of this House on behalf of my constituents, I find that offensive.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I will be brief as well. My reservation about this document, of which I have now obtained a copy, is that it defies the basic principle of representation by population. I do not know whether Your Honour has had the opportunity to examine the document which lists ministerial responsibilities for geographic areas. It singles out two provinces, Quebec and Ontario, where ministerial responsibilities are broken down by constituencies. Some ministers have responsibility for four constituencies and others for five. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has responsibility for seven constituencies. All other provinces are represented by one minister.

In the province of British Columbia there are 28 constituencies. The whole province is represented by a minister who does not even sit in this House. He has not been elected.

Mr. Friesen: In fact, he was defeated.

Mr. Oberle: Is it the intention of this government to establish a one-party democracy? Let us not fool ourselves about this practice. This is a pork-barrel strategy to distribute public funds for political purposes. That is what this question of privilege is all about. It does not have anything to do with building a bridge or ensuring that a certain region has access to cabinet. It is about distributing public funds to a group of Canadians in a certain area to which they are entitled, and has nothing to do with politics. Is it the intention of this group of one-party democrats to place themselves in a position in the province of Ontario in the same way they are in the province of Quebec? Are they now saying the rest of the country does not matter? We all know that is their strategy because that is where the population is.

There are 21 constituencies in the province of Alberta. They are represented by Senator Bud Olson who does not even sit in this House. Alberta and British Columbia do not matter; Saskatchewan does not matter. They do not have a minister in this House. The only provinces that matter are Ontario and Quebec. That is where the raw political power is and that is where the pork-barrel has to be rolled.

That is the crux of this argument. It is on those grounds that Your Honour must consider this question. There is no way that we on this side will sit quiet. We will not let you curtail this debate until this matter is referred to the committee where it can be properly debated. If parliamentary democracy still means anything in this country, this matter must go to committee. If any matter had to go to committee, it is this.

● (1700)

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told us today that ministers have regional responsibilities. The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) lectured us the other day with regard to cabinet government and the responsibilities of members, and said that the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) had no understanding of cabinet government. Clearly, they were talking about the executive arm of government. When the Prime Minister spoke, he spoke about executive responsibility.

I think there is very definitely a prima facie case of privilege here, simply because once there is an executive responsibility there also has to be a parliamentary responsibility and, given the present rules, there is no room for ministers to be held responsible here in Parliament for those executive responsibilities which the Prime Minister has now assigned to them.

My constituents are not being heard in that cabinet. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) has been ineffective in bringing forward to that cabinet the concerns and pleas of the people who live in my riding, and the only way I can be assured that he will be effective and responsible, in a democratic sense, for that which the Prime Minister says he is responsible is to be able to question him in this House. So I feel very strongly, Madam Speaker, that we very definitely have a prima facie case of privilege here.

Madam Speaker: I will hear one more member. Does the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) wish to speak on this matter?

Mr. Nielsen: I have another dimension, Madam Speaker, which I will raise later on.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon, then.

Mr. Nielsen: I will defer to my colleague, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I think it is most important and commendable that you should grant an extended debate on this question, because a number of complications have come forward this afternoon and I would like to add to that list by raising a couple of additional dimensions.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came into the House this afternoon and made official a process which was first raised by way of the question of privilege of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). He said to us here this afternoon, Madam Speaker, that he wanted to see a process which would bring government and Parliament to all Canadians, which is as it should be and I think, Madam Speaker, we all agree with that.

We must recognize that we cannot disregard this question of twinning, which is an initiative taken at the partisan level by the Liberal Party of Canada, because it is difficult to determine in this question where politics ends and the responsibility to service the constituents of Canada begins.

Madam Speaker, I would like to submit that there is something wrong about the attitude of the government in the manner in which this initiative has been taken, and I would like to illustrate it by making reference to a situation which occurred in my riding last Saturday. Last Saturday, Madam Speaker, I was invited to attend the sod-turning for a new, intermediate care home facility in my riding, and the sod-turning invitation came from the non-profit society which was initiating the project.

Upon arrival, I learned there was a representative of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation present, but no one had taken it upon themselves to inform me that the federal government was in any way involved in this project. Indeed, Madam Speaker, when the chairman of the occasion on Saturday morning turned to introduce me and invite me to comment, he was rather embarrassed because he did not know whether I was enabled to speak on behalf of the government or not. He presumed that I was not, but he was rather embarrassed at having to introduce the Member of Parliament for that area and I was rather embarrassed to find that I knew very little about this project. In fact, I learned from an official of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation that the project was totally financed by CMHC funding by way of a low-interest loan to the extent of $4 million.

The point I would like to make, Madam Speaker, is that if we are to have this new process, I think it is a question that must be addressed very thoroughly when the matter comes before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. If we are to have this process, then the whole matter of dialogue has to be in the form of a two-way street, because I think, aside from my expectation of the right to question my minister in this House, that minister should also be prepared to come to me and seek advice; and that could make his job, as representative of my constituents, much more simple.

In particular, he should take upon himself the responsibility to advise me of functions he is attending in my riding, as my ministerial representative was supposed to attend two weeks ago when he was invited to speak by the Fraser Educational Foundation on the question of salmon enhancement in the Fraser River, Madam Speaker; to address the members of the Chamber of Commerce in my riding on a subject for which I am spokesman for my own party and to which I am not even invited. The hon. minister, who is not even elected to this House, who speaks for the whole of British Columbia—the House leader in the other place—was to come into my riding, but in fact he never came. He apparently was called back to Ottawa on urgent business and, instead, sent a tape-recorded message via telephone.

The point I make, Madam Speaker, is that I could have been there, I should have been there, and I certainly should have been made aware of the fact that this honourable, non-elected minister in my riding was to be in my riding presenting a speech which, in fact, he never gave.

Madam Speaker, this is the point I would like to make. It is a matter of attitude. I think members of the cabinet, if they really want to establish improved contact with all the constituencies that elect members, from whatever party, to represent them in Ottawa ought to have an opportunity to have access to that minister, and that minister should seek their advice.

I raised the question of the political link a few moments ago, Madam Speaker—I will be finished in a moment—but, in fact, a week or two ago I learned that the former Liberal candidate in my riding had been appointed a commissioner of the North Fraser Harbours Commission. He was defeated, not once but twice, and he has received his due reward. I do not deny this member of the Liberal Party access to a cushy government appointment, but I would at least think I should have been consulted before that former candidate—who happened to have been defeated in two successive federal elections—was granted this appointment to the North Fraser Harbours Commission when, in fact, the north arm of the Fraser River represents one boundary and an important source of commerce within my riding.

Then, Madam Speaker, the previous Liberal candidate to that, who also ran against me and was defeated three elections ago, on his defeat was appointed to a very comfortable assignment with the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs. Madam Speaker, I am the member for that riding and happen to have been fortunate enough to be elected to this side of the House. At the very least I would have expected my views on that individual ought to have been sought, even if the government chose to disregard them.

The Prime Minister speaks of making government and making this Parliament more available to all Canadians, and that is as it should be. But I want to be consulted if we are going to have another bureaucratic tier within the political system. I at least want to believe that it is a two-way street, and I certainly want to have assurance, Madam Speaker, that that minister is not going to have special mailing privileges into my riding, financed by the taxpayers of Canada. After all, the government already enjoys a loaded deck by way of its tremendous advertising budget, some $30 million, we now learn, in relation to the proposed constitutional advertising program.

Will these ministers have an advertising budget, if they are non-elected and not accessible in this House? Do we have some means of questioning them? Will they continue the practice of having their photographs taken and placed on the front page of my local newspaper, handing over a cheque to the people? Why cannot Members of Parliament, of whatever party, be part of the process? Let us not call it patronage, Madam Speaker; let us call it serving our constituency, and let us give the elected Members of Parliament an opportunity to participate in that service and at least to be advised by the appropriate government minister when there is to be an announcement or a sod-turning or an appointment made in the riding for which we are responsible. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Does the hon. member for Yukon wish to speak?

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, I do.

Madam Speaker: On the basis that he says he has a new dimension to this question, I would like to hear him.

• (1710)

He has indicated to me on a point of order that he wishes to bring a new dimension to this problem. I would like to hear it before I determine whether I am sufficiently informed. I do not know what other members who are rising have to say about this question, but I want to note that arguments are being repeated. Since arguments are now becoming repetitive, the judgment of the Chair is that arguments have been presented to the point where they are being repeated and that therefore the Chair does have the views of the members on a particular question and can decide at a certain point that the Chair is sufficiently informed.

I will hear the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) on the basis that he does have a new dimension to bring to this debate.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have several new dimensions I want to bring forward. The first one has to do with cabinet practices. We have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say here today that it has been the practice in government—I believe I paraphrase him correctly—since confederation to establish regional ministers so that regions of more populous areas in Canada can have direct access to the executive, in addition to the access that population would have ordinarily through its own elected Members of Parliament.

We are in accord with the establishment of regional ministers throughout the country for the purpose expressed by the Prime Minister, but this government and this Prime Minister have carried this practice far beyond what has been the normal and proper practice of the appointment of regional ministers for the purpose enunciated by the Prime Minister.

When we were in office we had the practice of appointing regional ministers for each of the provinces and for each of the two northern territories, but that is as far as it went. The practice now being established, as evidenced by the document tabled today, expands that principle immeasurably. It deals with the two most populous provinces—and only those two in Canada—the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and we no longer have regional ministers. The document on its second page is entitled "Quebec regional responsibilities" and beginning on the fourth page it establishes Ontario regional responsibilities but, clearly, a cursory examination of that document will disclose that it is not regional ministers which have been appointed but constituency ministers for each constituency of the province of Ontario and ministers responsible, so-called, for each constituency in the province of Quebec. That goes far beyond the customary practice, which has been established and existed for so many years in cabinet, of regional ministers.

Had the Prime Minister and the government stopped with the first page of that tabled document, we would then be following past, well-established and proper practices, because that first page deals only with regional ministers. That is the proper practice but, having gone beyond that, they have gone far beyond the time-honoured practices of the past and have in fact established an entirely new policy and a new practice.

I wondered why the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) became so incensed and waxed so eloquently when the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) raised the matter last Thursday, but I know now. They were troubled. They knew what they were doing was wrong. That is why the Prime Minister participated today. We never see him in debate in this House. In the past 12 or 13 years I think he has participated in debate about five or six times. That is why he was here. The Minister of Finance could have tabled that letter. Indeed, we all expected him to do so as a result of my questioning of him yesterday, but it was considered important enough, because it was trouble to them, for the Prime Minister to appear here today to do it personally.

Mr. Knowles: The Solicitor General let the cat out of the bag.

Mr. Nielsen: Some cat; some bag. Some bag, indeed, with this system of constituency ministers.

An hon. Member: Carpet bag.

Mr. Nielsen: That is a good name for it, the carpet bag. A new system of carpetbagging has been established now in these two provinces.

I am afraid the second dimension will escape the Chair because no attention is being paid by the Chair to the dimensions I am trying to convince the Chair it should consider. The Chair has heard the first one, and perhaps I should wait until the conversation between the Speaker and the Clerk is finished. I do not want my points to be lost on the Chair.

Mr. Lonsdale: We didn't miss much on the first one. Give us the second one.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member is not in his seat, so I do not know which is his riding. Undoubtedly he is speaking with his constituency office minister trying to get one of those envelope cheques fly out of every so often.

The second point I want to draw to the attention of the Chair concerns the establishment in some constituencies of so-called "ministerial offices" for which Treasury Board has approved person-years, salaries and rents. However, this appears to have been done on a very highly selective basis.

I know there is one in Vancouver. The minister who I believe has been authorized to establish that so-called "ministerial office" is in the other place. He has no ministerial responsibilities except to be the leader of the government in the Senate. I suggest that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) examine the guidelines for the establishment of ministerial offices to determine whether the existence of that office and the expenditure of those taxpayers' moneys for the upkeep of that office fall within Treasury Board guidelines. I do not suggest that, because that particular minister has no ministerial responsibilities being the leader of the government in the other place, but he certainly cannot be considered a minister with ministerial responsibility.

I cannot hear the hon. member opposite. If he wants to interrupt, he should stand so he can be heard.

Expenditures on ministerial offices should be in accordance with Treasury Board guidelines. That is a matter very directly related to this question raised. The other aspect of this is whether taxpayers' money is being properly expended in the establishment of these offices.

Edmonton has such an office. Was that office established so that the minister in the other place responsible for economic development in the country could carry out his ministerial responsibilities in that province? If that is the rationale behind the establishment of that office and the justification for expending taxpayers' dollars, why is there not one in every province? I suggest that is where logic leads, unless logic compels us to the conclusion that the only reason for the existence of that office is political, as is the case with respect to constituency ministerial appointments in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

The city of Regina has such an office. The city of Whitehorse now, for the first time, has such an office, yet we do not even have a minister responsible for that constituency.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, you do.

Mr. Nielsen: No. We have a regional minister, and that is proper. We do not have a constituency minister, and therefore there is no rationale whatsoever and no logic for the establishment of that office. Yet it exists. Taxpayers are paying the rent and for the staffing. Taxpayers are paying for the person-years. For what purpose? For the first time in the almost 24 years I have been representing that constituency we now have two constituency offices. One is authorized by this House, and this House of Commons pays the rent and the salary. It has been there for the last eight years for the Member of Parliament to perform a service to his constituents. Now we have another one; we have a Liberal one called a ministerial office. It performs precisely the same function on the excuse, in a constituency where there are some 1,200 federal public servants, that somehow Yukon citizens lack access to the federal public service and to the federal executive.

● (1720)

The same situation exists in Yellowknife. I am not completely familiar with the circumstances there. The hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) wants to address himself to the added dimension which exists in that territory. This must be given very careful consideration when we are discussing this matter.

Another reason the Prime Minister gave for establishing constituency ministers was that there would be a better flow from constituents to the executive because the ministers lived in those constituencies; they knew what it was all about; they were most closely related to the problems and the aspirations of the citizens or the electorate of the country who live in those constituencies. What utter rot!

The constituency minister who has the constituency office in Yukon comes from Hamilton. He has never lived in the north. Who is better able to represent the views of Yukon citizens to cabinet, to the executive and to this House than the person who has been elected and was elected to do those very things for the last 11 or 12 elections; I forget how many. It is a totally improper use of taxpayers' funds.

I have a further point which I wish to raise.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Nielsen: I am sorry I did not hear the intervention. My third point was the residency given as a justification or an excuse by the Prime Minister for following this totally new practice. Madam Speaker should consider the dimensions I have added. I have expanded the peripheral boundaries of the question originally raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood. If Madam Speaker does not consider these matters and rule upon them as part of the question raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood, then I will feel compelled to raise them as a matter of personal privilege. Because this practice of establishing constituency offices affects me directly, I feel compelled to raise the matter as a personal question of privilege. I say that they are establishing constituency offices and not ministerial offices, because they are performing the exact functions of constituency offices.

The hon. member for Edmonton East or the former minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport—

Mr. McCain: Fun and games.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, fun and games.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski).

Mr. Nielsen: I thank the Chair. That is where the constituency office is located. I do not know where the one in Regina is located, but I believe there is one there. I know where the one in Yukon is located, but I do not know where the one is located in Western Arctic.

My questions on the Order Paper ask the government for information which we never get for months and months—sometimes years. I asked how many other constituency offices similar to these have been established throughout the country. Will all these constituency ministers have the right to establish constituency offices in all these constituencies?

I see the President of the Treasury Board smiling, or is he groaning? They have done it in Yukon and Western Arctic. They will do it in Nunatsiaq. I understand they have done it in Vancouver, Edmonton and Regina. Where else have they done it? How much further do they intend to go? This is a prostitution of the process that brought us here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: I hear more groans. If we were to follow this new concept of the Prime Minister, in his attempt to justify the establishment of constituency ministers, what is the purpose of going through an election to elect Members of Parliament? We might as well not go through that process at all.

Mr. Knowles: Don't suggest that.

Mr. Nielsen: As I have suggested before, what they would really like to do, because they regard this place as a nuisance, is to do what was done in Ghana. A few very short months after democratic government was established there, they decided to abolish the opposition because it was a nuisance. That is my fear as to the direction in which we are headed when the government establishes Liberal Grit constituency offices where they have no business being and where taxpayers' money is not justifiably spent.

Madam Speaker: At this particular point in the debate on this question of privilege, would members not agree with me that they are now in the course of practically exhausting arguments which would be brought forward if a motion were moved to send this matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections?

I must remind hon. members that the only thing they must do, in the course of discussing a question of privilege, is to show me where there is a breach of their privilege. I must say that members have not addressed themselves to that sufficiently, and, after listening to seven, eight or perhaps more members, I must conclude that I have heard arguments mostly on the substance of that question of privilege.

Members ought to know that the motion is not now before the House. I have not yet found a prima facie case of privilege, therefore, the arguments must be restricted to where the privilege has been breached. That has not happened, therefore, members must understand—

Mr. Nielsen: That is a generalization.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry?

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I certainly did not mean to interrupt but I could say that I was being specific.

Mr. Pinard: In your judgment.

Madam Speaker: When consistently, after four or five speakers, no one is able to address himself or herself to the very fundamental question which must be addressed at this stage, that is to say, where the privilege has been breached, members must understand that the Chair is tempted to cut off debate and decide that it has been sufficiently informed. That is what I intend to do. I have heard many arguments from both parties on the opposition side of the House, and very few from members on the government side. But, I have heard arguments, and I will now cut off the debate and proceed to another matter.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I presume it is the intention of the Chair to consider these matters very carefully. If Madam Speaker comes to the conclusion that there is a prima facie case of privilege, I presume you will be so informing the House so as to give either the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood or someone like myself the opportunity of moving the appropriate motion.

Madam Speaker: I thank the hon. member for reminding me of that. It is exactly what I intend to do. I will take the matter under advisement, study all the arguments, and report later to the House.

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—PREMATURE RELEASE OF ESTIMATES

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I think we have disposed of that particular question of privilege, but I should like to raise another which is much more serious that the one that occurred earlier; this is in respect of the lock-up. Madam Speaker will recall that we indicated the importance of Members of Parliament having the same privileges which we believe are appropriate for members of the press, because Members of Parliament have the right to be informed about matters. I think it was made clear that the only right Members of Parliament have is to have these matters tabled in the House of Commons. The fact of the matter is that I have in my hand a photocopy of a wire story which has not gone over the wires, across the country, via Canadian Press, which reveals to the public in complete detail of the estimates, before the estimates have been tabled in the House of Commons.

• (1730)

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Siddon: So much for Parliament!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes, so much for Parliament. Either that lock-up was for something or it was for nothing. I assume the government had the lock-up for something, which was to inform the press of the estimates pending the tabling in the House. It had to be that or else it was a meaningless gesture. I suggest that is what it was for.

Now the government is saying we argued this matter this afternoon on a question of privilege, therefore the estimates would be released. The document is still not tabled in the House of Commons, yet the subject matter has already been released. That is a clear violation of my rights and the rights of other Members of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It is a contempt of Parliament. I think we must consider very seriously the question of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). I think there is an investigation owed to the House of Commons with respect to this matter. Indeed, the President of the Treasury Board must consider his own position within the government, given the fact there has been a release—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I have in front of me the document handed to me. I am sure the Chair will want to look at it in order to consider it. The document deals with the matter of government outlays, the increase in those outlays from 13 per cent to 67.6 per cent—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I want to go through it, Madam Speaker, so that you will be able to understand its importance. The document points out the skyrocketing interest rates on public debt and sharp rises in military spending. It sets forth that the government has reversed a program of cuts in the size of the public service made over the last two years. That information must have been obtained from the estimates and from no other source. It deals with defence spending, which will increase 16.6 per cent to $5.9 billion. It deals with new military hardware which includes fighter jets, patrol aircraft and tanks.

Mr. Beatty: With the stock exchange still open.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes, incidentally, the stock exchange was still open when this went over the wires. Surely that must mean that the lock-up was for something.

Some hon. Members: Shame on you!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I am sorry that I am inconveniencing members on the other side of the House.

Madam Speaker, I think it is a clear violation of the rights of members of Parliament for others to see these estimates before they are tabled. That is why we have a lock-up. That is why the press is set aside, so that these matters can be tabled in the House for Members of Parliament, who are responsible in some way for the expenditures of government and for its accounting.

If you find there is a prima facie case of privilege with respect to this matter, I am prepared to move:

That the matter of the dissemination of details of the estimates through the news media before tabling of the estimates in this House be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, it is a shame to see how the Tories have set a trap for the press.

[Translation]

I cannot accept, Madam Speaker, that after displaying such childish behaviour all afternoon, the members of the Progressive Conservative Party now stand up and say that the estimates have not been tabled on time and claim that since the media reported it, there has been a breach of hon. members' privileges.

Madam Speaker, if someone did not respect the hon. members and this institution today on that matter, it is the members of the Progressive Conservative Party who have been wasting the time of this House since about three o'clock this afternoon. It is a shame to see those members doing what they did this afternoon, under the circumstances. This Parliament has now to assume responsibilities in the fields of economy, energy, the constitution and various sectors in the social area. I am aghast at the behaviour of the official opposition under those circumstances. We could perhaps understand that the forthcoming events during the weekend may have some influence on their behaviour but even so it is irresponsible.

What I want to say on the question of privilege which has just been raised by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is that you stated earlier today that there was nothing reprehensible in the attitude of the government and especially in the action by the President of the Treasury Board when he disclosed the contents of the government estimates in a lock-up with the media. It is a fact, your decision has been made, we have done nothing—

Madam Speaker: I would like to interrupt the minister and ask him not to put words in my mouth. I dealt with the question of privilege which has been raised but I did not pass judgment on a government action.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, in connection with your decision, you stated that there was no question of privilege when the members opposite objected to the lock-up with the media and the failure to notify the members of this House and this is what I was referring to. Now if I do not interpret your decision correctly, Madam Speaker, I beg you to correct me and tell me where I am wrong. If you do not do so, I shall infer I was right. That was my point.

The fact is we did nothing wrong. If now, as a result of the filibustering of the Conservative members the tabling of our estimates is delayed and it becomes a known fact that some aspects of our estimates have been made public, the government cannot be blamed. It is not our fault, even if we held a meeting behind closed doors with the media, since you deemed the procedure was not objectionable but normal. Now who is to be blamed? Well, those who waste our time and who have made the press fall into the trap and take the blame.

Well, Madam Speaker, the facts are as follows: in addition to the lock-up with the press, I am told that the press signed an agreement containing an embargo under which the media agreed not to publish the contents of the estimates until they are tabled. So, if there has been a leak, of course, neither the President of the Treasury Board nor the government can be blamed, nor anyone, to my mind, who respected the embargo. I do not know whether or not the allegations of my colleague from Nepean-Carleton are accurate. I have no reason to doubt his word, but if one or several journalists have failed to respect the signed agreement, well, they can settle their accounts with the Progressive Conservative members who laid the trap for them to fall in; but, as far as we are concerned, we have nothing to blame ourselves for.

As a government, Madam Speaker, we followed the tradition. I mentioned it before: we briefed the media at a lock-up and also, as a courtesy, sometime around noon, the President of the Treasury Board invited to a briefing a few representatives of the Progressive Conservative Party and the NDP. Under those circumstances, the government merely respected tradition. There has been no impropriety. Your decision, Madam Speaker, confirmed that there was no question of privilege when complaints were made ealier today. If, as a result of all that, because of the irresponsible, thoughtless and child-like attitude of the opposition members, one or several journalists violated their agreement with the government, we are not to blame. Once again, if you feel this is indeed a question of privilege, then it is up to the journalist or journalists concerned to settle their accounts with the hon. members of the opposition who made him fall into that trap.

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, the matter we are dealing with is far more serious than the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) would have us believe—

Mr. Knowles: The President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Beatty: Your ruling earlier did not suggest that the government had no responsibility to ensure security over the estimates.

• (1740)

The question of privilege that you ruled on earlier was raised by a member on this side, by my deskmate, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington). It dealt with one matter alone, whether the privileges of Members of Parliament had been breached by their not being allowed into the lock-up that was held for the press. That is what you ruled on.

The question of privilege raised by the House leader for the Official Opposition is very different. What we find now is that as a result of the decision of the President of the Treasury Board, Members of Parliament have been denied the opportunity of gaining information about these estimates directly. However, Canadians from coast to coast, if they had access to the CP wire, have been informed of the contents of these estimates in considerable detail prior to Parliament being officially informed.

I gather that my colleague, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), will be sending you a copy of the CP wire story, but to give you some indication of how long ago this leak took place, you will notice on the top it says, "Advance for release by wire, possibly about 3.45 p.m. EST today." That means that for about two hours now this information has been available to people who have CP wires.

The argument would be made by government members that because there was a reference to possible release around 3.45, the embargo was respected; but, in fact, any Canadian who had access to the CP wire would have access to this information. For example, this copy is off the teletype in PC research. What we have is the ludicrous situation where members of Parliament on this side of the House were specifically denied, because of the decision by the President of the Treasury Board the opportunity to gain advance information about the estimates on the grounds that there was a lot of fear, that security had to be respected, and yet we could learn about it through the CP wire which printed it out in PC research headquarters. Surely this underlines—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Madam Speaker: I would have to warn the hon. member not to link these two questions. First of all, I ruled on the first one. They are not necessarily linked. At any rate, the member cannot refer to a ruling I have already made. But I will hear him on that particular question of privilege. I am interested in hearing his arguments.

Mr. Beatty: Gladly, Madam Speaker, I am simply indicating why the government House leader's misinterpretation of your ruling was so very unfair; and why it is that Members of Parliament, if there is to be an embargo, find themselves left in a very difficult situation if, indeed, the embargo applied only to Members of Parliament, and if the embargo cannot be made to stick.

Surely there is a purpose for the lock-up that was held. It is referred to as a lock-up. The government House leader referred to it as a lock-up; the President of the Treasury Board referred to it as a lock-up.

Presumably, the reason there was lock-up was that the government felt the government's interest would not be served by having premature release of this information. They felt they had responsibility, as they do under the precedents in this House, to table those estimates in Parliament first, before they are made publicly available. Yet what we find here is that it has been made available from coast to coast in Canada prior to being made available to Parliament. There has been no official tabling of those estimates in Parliament despite the fact that Canadians, from one coast to another, now have access to this information.

As my colleague the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, pointed out, on the west coast the stock exchange is still open. Those Canadians, for example, are interested in defence industry stocks. You might very well have noticed the reference in the CP wire story to increases in defence spending for tanks, planes, and other items.

If it is nonsense, and if it is not a matter of concern to this House, why was there an embargo on us in the first place? If there was not any damage that could be inflicted upon the public interest by premature release, why was there a lock-up, and why were Members of Parliament told they could not have access to this information?

There has been a grave abridgement of the privileges of the House of Commons. I think, Madam Speaker, you have no choice but to rule that there is a prima facie question of privilege, and that this matter should be sent to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I feel that the President of the Treasury Board is responsible for actions taken by his officials. He is responsible for the security of this information, just as the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) is responsible for the security of the federal budget. If there was a leak about the federal budget from any source, there would be no question but that the Minister of Finance would be forced to resign. There is adequate precedent for that.

This minister is responsible for security of his estimates. That security has been breached. This minister has a responsibility to tender his resignation.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I hope the transparency of the positions being put forward, and the kinds of games being played are obvious not only to the members of this House, but to the Canadian public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: I think if there has been any breach of the privileges of the House, it has been by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) who gave information to the public and the House which has been the subject of embargo—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: It's already on there.

Mr. Johnston: I would be quite happy to send forward the embargo—

An hon. Member: Don't make a fool of yourself.

Mr. Johnston: —that declaration which appears on the wire, Madam Speaker. I find it shocking and irresponsible that we should be subjected to this kind of childish behaviour by people who should be interested in getting on with the business of this country—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: I have been sitting in this House since three o'clock to table the estimates they want to see. I had lunch with the hon. member from the other side who is the critic so that he would know what is in the estimates. We have followed the tradition that has been followed for a hundred years, as I understand it; and today, for the first time, I learned that members on the opposite side of the House are not prepared to accept their responsibilities as responsible critics and to accept the tabling of these estimates as planned for this afternoon at three o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): A point of order, Madam Speaker. I would certainly appreciate, through you, if the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) would withdraw his last comment concerning members on this side not wanting to pick up their responsibilities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: I am going through you, Madam Speaker—

Mr. Johnston: Did you have lunch, or did you not?

Mr. Huntington: Through you, Madam Speaker, I want to say to all members of this House that I tried, along with another colleague, to get into the lock-up with the press this morning in order to be fully informed in order to perform my function in this House. True, I was invited to a luncheon at the office of the President of the Treasury Board, and he gave me the press kit. It did not give me any answers or comparative statements to last year's estimates, which I need in order to handle myself responsibly here in reply and in a press scrum afterwards.

I would like the President of the Treasury Board to lighten those remarks or apologize for any inference that I do not want to perform my duties to this House and to my country in a completely responsible manner.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Apologize.

Madam Speaker: Hon. members in this House are allowed to express opinions, all of their opinions, and I have nothing to do with those opinions.

The hon. President of the Treasury Board has expressed an opinion about something which we are presently discussing and that is his privilege; unless he uses unparliamentary language. Unparliamentary language is described in Beauchesne, and I heard nothing in the intervention of the hon. President of the Treasury Board that was unparliamentary.

The hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), might not have liked what he said, but it was not unparliamentary, so I cannot comply with his request to ask the hon. minister to withdraw his remarks.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I wish to speak briefly to this point of order since the hon. member has referred to Standing Orders to make his point. What the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) said was that there was no evidence that the Canadian Press wire story has been published. And this has not been denied yet. On the contrary, what the Canadian Press says is not to release the information before the estimates have been tabled. So in order for you to make a ruling the House must have evidence that indeed release has occurred before the estimates were tabled. This essential fact has not been substantiated and even if it were, I would refer you to the remarks I have just made.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): On the same point of order, Madam Speaker, I have been handed what purports to be a press release, and it says, "Advance—for release by wire, possibly about 3.45 p.m.", estimated today.

An hon. Member: Eastern standard time.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Eastern standard time, and it is headed: "Highlights of the spending estimates for 1981-82 fiscal year tabled in the Commons Wednesday."

An hon. Member: What's the department?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is what I have here and I am going to show it to you, Madam Speaker. As I understand it, your duty with respect to the question of privilege which I moved is to see whether there is a prima facie case of privilege; it will be up to the House to decide whether it goes to a committee or otherwise. That is the duty.

• (1750)

I think it is the duty of a Member of Parliament, notwithstanding what the President of the Treasury Board says, when there is a possibility that the privileges of members have been breached, to raise the matter if he feels he should. I feel that I should, Madam Speaker. I do not accept for one moment the appellation placed upon me by the President of the Treasury Board in a transparent defence of an obvious breach of the rights of Members of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, in supporting the question of privilege raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), I should like to mention a few things that have gone unstated so far. Frankly, I find it amazing that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) faced with this serious infraction, should turn and accuse Members of Parliament for sharing what is already public information. How can that minister more effectively show the contempt in which he holds Members of Parliament. To say that we cannot share the same information—

Mr. Blais: It was not published.

Mr. Stevens: —that the press gallery is sharing at the present time—

Mr. Blais: Prove that it was published.

Mr. Stevens: It was published.

An hon. Member: Prove it.

Mr. Stevens: The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) has asked how we can prove that it was published. If this matter is referred to the appropriate committee I will be able to tell that committee that if any member of this House had gone to the proper print machine at Canadian Press they would have seen what I now have in my hand as copy coming off the Canadian Press machine. I personally took ten pages of the information that was put out over the Canadian Press wire and had it copied on our own facilities in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stevens: The fact is that this is information any member attending the press gallery could openly get. For the President of the Privy Council and the President of the Treasury Board in their desperation to say now that perhaps it was not published, is absolutely ludicrous.

Not only was this information published but it was published with this lead: "Advance—for release by wire, possibly about 3.45 p.m. EST."

Mr. Pinard: Read the last line.

Mr. Evans: Read it all.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I would point out to you that the Toronto Stock Exchange did not close until four o'clock, so this was actually out on the wire at least 15 minutes ahead of the closing of the Toronto Stock Exchange. It reads in part:

OTTAWA (CP)—Highlights of the spending estimates for the 1981-82 fiscal year tabled in the Commons Wednesday: Total government outlays will increase 13 per cent to $67.6 billion—a spending rate of about $129,000 a minute . . . Interest charges on the national debt—$137 billion as of April 1—will cost the average taxpayer $795 in the fiscal year.

It goes on to say:

The public service will climb by 1 per cent to 315,680 persons.

Mr. Pinard: You are announcing it.

Mr. Stevens: Here is where it gets very interesting. It goes on to say:

The annual spending predictions tabled in the Commons by Treasury Board President Donald Johnston are up from $59.9 billion a year ago and work out to about $129,000 a minute.

I want to emphasize that this is a wire that has gone out from coast to coast saying that the minister has already tabled the estimates for 1981-82 in this House.

Mr. Pinard: It was not published.

Mr. Stevens: The press release goes on to say:

The hefty blue book of spending plans—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I just informed the House that it was important for hon. members speaking on a question of privilege to discuss the privilege. I do not think I need have the hon. member read the full press communiqué to the House. In the interest of saving the time of the House I would ask him to discuss the privilege, and not necessarily quote so extensively from the press communiqué, unless he feels it is very pertinent to his question of privilege.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker—

Mr. Blais: A point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I can't hear.

[Translation]

Hon. J. J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, on a point of order. You have indicated that the hon. member should confine his remarks to the matter under discussion.

Quite simply in order to reinforce your decision, I would like to indicate to the hon. member that with regard to the documents he is now reading to you, he has failed to give you the most important words, the last ones, which are addressed to all Canadian Press editors and I quote.

[English]

It says the House is still debating the questions of privilege and there is no indication when the advance copy on the estimates will be released.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I want to draw your attention to the fact that on all the documents read to you by the hon. member the following words are to be found:

[English]

"Guard against premature release."

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, the combination of both indicates that there has not been any release under the agreement between the government and the press.

[English]

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) as the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) is rising on a point or order.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker, I am rising on the same point of order simply to ask the minister a question. I should like to ask him, through you, if he is an editor of Canadian Press because—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order. It is debate. The hon. member for York-Peel was speaking on the question of privilege and I will have to continue to hear him because that was not a point of order.

Mr. Oberle: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: It was not a point of order.

Mr. Oberle: Was his a point of order?

Madam Speaker: Neither. The hon. member for York-Peel.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, a point of order.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Lonsdale) on a point of order.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, the reason I referred to the wire story saying "tabled" was because that showed how this question of privilege is clearly in order. Surely the interruptions—

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Timiskaming on a point of order. I am sorry, but I have to advise the House that when someone gets up on a point of order I must recognize and hear that hon. member, at least until I realize it is not a point of order. I hope this one is.

Mr. Lonsdale: Madam Speaker, I am referring to the point raised by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais). The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), and the hon. member who spoke previously on the question of privilege, have not brought any evidence that their privileges have been breached because there is no evidence—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Madam Speaker: Order, order!

Mr. Lonsdale: There is no evidence—

Madam Speaker: I am afraid that is argument and I cannot allow it. The hon. member for York-Peel.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, surely even members on the government side will see how ludicrous their argument is. They asked how we know it had been published and then they stood up reading from it a few short moments ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stevens: The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) rose on a point of order saying he wanted you to know certain other sentences that were in the wire story going coast to coast. Then hon. members stand and ask how we know it has been published. Clearly the wire story not only refers to the minister tabling in this House, which has not occurred, but it goes on to say, "The hefty blue book of spending plans for the fiscal year 1981-82 beginning—."

Madam Speaker: Order. It is now six o'clock. Will hon. members allow me to say, "Thank God." After all, I have been four hours in the Chair.

The House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

METRIC CONVERSION

SUGGESTION FARMERS BE PERMITTED TO USE IMPERIAL MEASUREMENT SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Merci beaucoup, madame le Président. I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas farmers across Canada do use, and want to continue to use imperial measurements, pecks, bushels and tons, to measure their products, and the Canadian Wheat Board is endeavouring to impose metric tons on the farmers, which makes the producers foreigners in their own country, therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker):

That the government permit farmers to continue to use their imperial measurements, and if the Canadian Wheat Board wants to use metric let it do the conversion in its head office but issue all measurements to farmers in imperial bushels and tons.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMPLOYMENT

COMMITMENT TO PROVIDE JOB-TRAINING PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The CNR has refused to honour its commitment to the CBRT & GW Local 14 in Halifax for the training of employees in other job areas. This refusal to honour the training provision is an example of the lack of concern that the government has for jobs in this country, and particularly its lack of concern for the future of our youth. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish):

That the House insist that the Liberal government live up to its commitment to provide job-training programs and that it provide the youth of this country with a hope for their future which they are presently denied.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR RELATIONS

B.C. TELEPHONE COMPANY DISPUTE—SUGGESTED ROLL BACK OF RATE INCREASE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the foreign-owned B.C. Telephone Company has refused to end the 14-month dispute with its workers despite the excellent efforts of federal mediator Bill Kelly, and since, because of the current strike lockout the company is in a position to rake in massive profits while its wage bill is sharply reduced, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles);

That the cabinet use its powers under the National Transportation Act to roll back the February 2, 1981, CRTC granted rate increase until B.C. Tel ceases its blackmail demands of still further rate hikes and agrees to sign the Kelly settlement package.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

AID SOUGHT FOR SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Sydney Steel Corporation provides direct and collateral employment for thousands of persons, and is the backbone of the economy in Cape Breton in Nova Scotia. The failure of the federal government to date to fulfil its election promise of financial assistance to revitalize the steel plant has endangered this employment, demoralized the work force, and threatened the whole economy. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House direct the government to honour its promise to Sydney Steel Corporation and to Nova Scotians by providing the financial assistance required to revitalize the steel plant in accordance with the business plan submitted to the government.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

* * *

THE PRIME MINISTER

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. A recent article in the Brazil Herald describes Prime Minister Trudeau's visit in true form. In an entirely unprecedented situation, the Prime Minister is reported to have thoroughly embarrassed Brazilian soldiers by handing them bars of German soap while they were lined up to present military honours. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That this House direct the Prime Minister to come clean, make a formal apology to the Brazilian government, and that he promise this House that in the future he will make diplomatic exchanges with Canadian soap, not foreign soap, and, above all, not soft soap.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

METRIC CONVERSION

APPLICATION TO AGRICULTURAL CHEMICAL CONTAINERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the agricultural chemical industry is being forced to convert to the metric system so that future chemical containers will bear only the metric application measurements without equivalent imperial units shown for comparison and ease of conversion, and whereas miscalculations of the metric measurements could mean misapplication with disastrous results for farmers and the possible loss of an entire crop, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That this House take the necessary action to ensure that equivalent application rates in imperial units be displayed on all agricultural chemical containers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

WHITE MOTOR CORPORATION—DELAY RESPECTING FARM MACHINERY DIVISION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I want to raise the following matter. White Motor Corporation's continued delays in reaching a decision to sell its farm machinery division is causing great hardship not only to the approximately 1,100 workers laid off in Brantford, but also to its Kelowna, B. C. truck plant employees and its dealers across the country.

Close to 75 per cent of its export production has already been lost, and production for its Canadian market must be commenced immediately or that too will disappear. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House unanimously endorse the sending of an urgent message to the president of White Motor Corporation in the United States informing him that the Canadian Parliament expresses extreme concern over the potential job loss if further delays are encountered and asking that an immediate decision be made.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

CUTS IN SOCIAL HOUSING BUDGET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Frank Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Having regard to the fact that the government once again has misaligned its priorities in that commitments made respecting social housing programs have been betrayed, and that programs to which the government was committed under Section 40 of the Housing Act have never been delivered effectively in rural and northern areas of our country, and since energy and other input costs not considered by the program made it prohibitive for most northerners to participate, for whom the program was intended, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That recent spending cuts in the social housing areas announced by the minister responsible for housing should not affect any programs that fall under Section 40 of the Housing Act and that such programs instead be strengthened in a manner which will account for the peculiar circumstances in the north with respect to high fuel and energy costs and other factors contributing to excessive and disproportionate living expenses.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DISPUTE INVOLVING VETERINARIANS IN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. This morning most of the veterinarians employed by the health of animals branch inspecting slaughter houses and abattoirs serving Ontario and Quebec decided, for some reason, to be sick. A number of poultry and meat processing plants are unable to operate.

Because of the ineptness of the Treasury Board in organizing a proper contract with inspection staff, our food supply is now endangered. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid).

That the President of the Treasury Board who has shown incompetence in handling labour relations with air traffic controllers, postal workers and now with veterinarians, immediately submit his resignation, and that this House direct the Prime Minister to appoint someone competent to handle this portfolio so that Canadians can depend on essential services.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

REPRESENTATIONS MADE BY UNITED STATES AND EUROPEAN COUNTRIES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: After a while you get used to all of this.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: My question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and has to do with energy matters. He will have seen reports that the United States and perhaps member nations of OECD have expressed concern that the federal government's energy policy might breach certain international agreements. The minister will recall that on December 18, in a correction to an answer he had given me to a question, he said that American representations were "in the nature of comments and requests for clarification, and that successful discussions have since taken place with U.S. officials which reassured them." Does that statement stand that U.S. officials have been reassured, or have there been new developments to cause that statement to stand no longer? Can the minister tell us whether foreign representations regarding our energy policy were received as early as November 7, 1980?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think it is fair to say that U.S. reaction to our energy program has sharpened in recent weeks, perhaps as a result of U.S. domestic pressures, perhaps as a result of the forthcoming visit of the President. In any event, we have received notice from the United States and indications from the European community of concern about some aspects of our National Energy Program. I should say that with respect to the two principal international instruments in question, on the Declaration of International Investment of the OECD, the Minister of Finance specifically entered a reservation in 1976, or rather an interpretation since it was a non-binding declaration, in which he said at that time that we would not be constrained with respect to the problem of foreign ownership in Canada by this declaration, and with respect to the GATT, the other instrument under which our action could be challenged, we said that we will not use the "buy Canadian" provisions in Bill C-48 in such a way as to contravene our obligations under the GATT.

Mr. Clark: I thank the Secretary of State for External Affairs for that information which indicates that American concerns at least have sharpened since that day in December when the minister thought the Americans had been reassured. The minister made reference to European nations, and to various of the other international obligations to which Canada is subject. Can the minister tell us specifically which other countries, whether in Europe or elsewhere, have made representations to Canada suggesting that our National Energy Program is in breach of the GATT, the International Energy Agency requirements, OECD requirements, or in breach of any other treaty or obligation to which Canada should be held? Can he tell us which other countries have indicated that kind of concern?

Mr. MacGuigan: To the best of my recollection, the questions have been asked by the United States and the European community speaking as a whole.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the minister indicated that was to the best of his recollection. We would naturally like him to verify his recollection and make clear to us what objections have been received. I again emphasize that we are not concerned simply about IEA or OECD, but any obligations which Canada might have under any bilateral or multilateral treaty or undertaking which might be breached by this policy.

In light of the change in attitude by the Americans with regard to the very real importance to this country of having Canadian control over the Canadian energy industry, and the interest in this House in knowing exactly what parts of the program are at issue, will the minister confirm that ministers of the government have received letters from the United States? Will he agree to table those letters in the House of Commons so that everyone in this Parliament will know what is at issue between Canada and the United States and between Canada and other countries which might believe that Canada is acting in a way that breaches obligations?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I do not believe that we would be at liberty to table such documents. We will have to find some other way of making the issues well known to the members of this House and to the Canadian public.

The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has also mentioned the IEA. I might add, with respect to our international obligations there, that of course there may be some concern on the part of other countries that one of the effects of our national energy policy will be to give a certain advantage to Canadians trading abroad. We believe that, if that is the case, it is the same thing as natural advantages which other countries may have in the international trading sphere, and it is a consequence which we are prepared to endure.

PETRO-CANADA

INSTRUCTIONS RESPECTING ACQUISITION PRACTICES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister, I know, is aware of the fact that a $400,000 profit was made on the sale of shares by four officers of Petrofina just prior to the Petro-Canada acquisition announcement. This illustrates the kind of profit that can be made if there is a degree of speculative activity surrounding these takeovers that Petro-Canada will be entering into in the years and months ahead.

The minister referred in a vague way, in answer to another question that I put to him some days ago, to "standing operating instructions to all Crown corporations ... and to Petro-Canada in particular." My question to the minister is, would he now state what those procedures are, would he table them in the House, and would he make it clear that these are procedures that we would hope would avoid the types of leaks which have resulted in these large profits being made by people associated with takeovers and would avoid having the price of shares driven up in anticipation of a takeover offer being made by Petro-Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I know of no written instructions; they are standing instructions which are to follow the normal business practices in all aspects of the laws of the land. I have indicated that on the basis of past experience with previous takeovers, and my examination of what has happened in this particular case, Petro-Canada behaved in the best of ways in dealing with this particular issue.

If there has been speculation and then some profits made by some members of the management of Petrofina, or people of that nature, obviously this is a matter over which I would not have particular control. It is a matter that has to do with the seller and the management of its own operations.

I want to assure the hon. member, as I have indicated, that any specific information would be drawn to the attention of the proper authorities, if he has any. Some information has been tabled by Petrofina before the Ontario Securities Commission. It is examining this at the present time. In addition, I have referred this additional information to my colleague, the minister responsible for consumer and corporate affairs, to ensure that the provisions of the Canada Corporations Act have been respected by Petrofina Canada.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, the minister referred, and I quote, specifically to "standing operating instructions ... to Petro-Canada in particular". I have asked the minister to table the standing instructions to Petro-Canada in particular which will avoid these speculative leaks in the future, because Petro-Canada is a company that will be making these takeover bids, takeover bids that have been done sloppily, as this one has been, and it will cost Canadians a lot of money in the future.

My supplementary question, Madam Speaker, is this: has the minister, since these shares were sold pursuant to share options which had been exercised by the officers of Petrofina, received a report relating to the issue of these share options? Can the minister assure the House that the options which were exercised in January were not issued after early September when the negotiations started with Petrofina, but were issued prior to that date?

● (1425)

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member who has had some experience in this regard that the price paid by Petro-Canada for Petrofina was felt to be appropriate in the circumstances and was judged so by most investment analysts. If there has been any profit taking by some members of management in this regard, it will have been profit-taking at the expense of other shareholders of Petrofina. This is a matter which is properly for the securities commission, the stock exchanges, and the corporation branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to examine under the Canada Corporations Act also. This will be done.

With respect to the specific question asked by the hon. member, I have indicated to him that I know of no written instructions as such. The standard instructions are that Petro-Canada run its operations like any other business would do. I am not just confident but convinced that Petro-Canada managed its negotiations in the way these things should be managed in any business deal or in any business negotiations. I am quite convinced that there has been no leak of information from Petro-Canada in this regard. I have checked this matter personally. If there is additional evidence which can be brought forward, I will obviously have it investigated thoroughly, but there has to be some evidence, which is more than just vague allegations, to charge that anything improper might have been done by anybody having anything to do with Petro-Canada.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DELAY IN PAYMENT OF PENSIONS TO WIDOWS OF VETERANS—REQUEST FOR REMEDIAL ACTION

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. My colleagues decided that this question should be our first one today in order to indicate our concern that there should be no further delay in the introduction of legislation respecting veterans and their survivors.

In view of the fact that many widows are having to wait four, five or six years for pensions to which they are entitled by a law passed by this Parliament last July, can the minister now say when he will be bringing in legislation to eliminate or shorten the phasing-in period in that legislaiton?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence and Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, I appreciate very much the concern of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre about the veterans' question. I can assure this House that I am just as concerned that some improvement can be made to the present system for pensions. I can assure the hon. gentleman that I am examining this question today with my officials in the ministry. We will have a meeting next week with Legion officials to see what their preferences are with respect to improving the lot of veterans.

The following three questions will probably be debated: accelerating the phasing-in of widows' pensions over six and a half years and less; increasing the WVA single rate to persons under age 65; and extending the aging veterans program to include war veterans allowance recipients. These three major questions will be discussed at these two meetings, and I can assure the hon. member that I will be as diligent as possible in trying to introduce legislation in this House, provided our financial capabilities are there.

ADJUSTMENT OF BENEFIT RATES

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to hear about next week's meeting and the attention which is being given to these matters. Will the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs also put on that list the need to adjust the 100 per cent basic rate of the disability pension so that it will automatically stay in line with the average take-home pay of the five categories in the public service designated in 1972, and will he also consider the possibility of reviewing the rates of compensation for former prisoners of war?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence and Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that we will look at these two questions in addition to the ones I just mentioned. I appreciate the collaboration of hon. members every time we present legislation in this House. I am sure that regardless of what we present in the future for veterans, hon. members will not be disappointed. As usual, this government will look after them.

• (1430)

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, may I ask the acting minister when he makes his representations to cabinet to remind his cabinet colleagues that the Canadians about whom we are talking did not exercise restraint when they were called to serve their country and that the present so-called restraint policies should not apply to these veterans or their survivors?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, judging by decisions this government has passed with respect to veterans, I do not think a member of cabinet, the present and previous members of cabinet of this government, have ever exercised restraint as far as improving the lot of our veterans is concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION OF MATTERS RELATING TO ACQUISITION OF PETROFINA

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It refers to the question of the alleged profits made by insiders on the Petrofina-PetroCan deal. The minister has just heard his seatmate, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources say that there is an investigation taking place into this matter by the ministry of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. My question to him is: what date was this investigation started? What is the legislative authority for conducting it? What are the terms of reference of the investigation?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member did not understand correctly what my seatmate was saying.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Nobody ever does.

Mr. Ouellet: What I can confirm, though, is that, at the request of my seatmate, my officials are looking into this matter under the provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act. I will be pleased to report to the House the results of the investigation which my officials will be making under the provisions of the act, with respect to this allegation.

Mr. Lawrence: I do not know what sort of fine point we are entering into here with the minister's language problems, when he says that looking into a problem is not necessarily an investigation of it. My questions to him were: under what legislative authority can there be an investigation? What is it? Who is looking into it? It is as simple as that. What are the terms of reference? What is the problem they are looking into? Who gave them the authority to look into it? What are the terms of reference of it? It is simple enough.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, it is clear, I think, that under the provisions of the act the director of my department's corporations branch must ensure that the law is respected. The hon. member is asking what the terms of reference are. The very provisions of the act require that the director make sure that the interests of all those who hold shares in a company are protected and that all shareholders are treated on an equal footing. If privileged information was given to certain shareholders to the detriment of others it is the duty of the director to seek out the truth and I think that is what he is doing in the normal course of his duties.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

DEVELOPMENT OF NEW BRUNSWICK OIL SHALES

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The National Energy Program underestimates the potential and possibilities of the New Brunswick oil shales in Albert County. It is reliably estimated that there could be as much as 50 billion barrels in those shales, which is as much as the Hibernia field. Should the government give that potential its proper and due recognition, it could have a tremendous positive effect in Atlantic Canada, particularly with regard to security of energy supply and, of course, job creation for the entire region. My question to the minister is: what is the government's position with reference to this very exciting possibility?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I must say to the hon. member that the government is obviously very interested in the development of all existing Canadian reserves of hydrocarbons, particularly petroleum. The matter to which the hon. member is referring, that is whether there are certain reserves to be developed, is well known to the industry and the government and I can assure him that if it is possible to carry out the profitable development of those reserves it will be done of course.

[English]

Mr. Corbett: Madam Speaker, the government has offered Saskatchewan a five-year, $50 million heavy oil research and development program. The Government of New Brunswick has approached the federal government to participate in an R and D program which is substantially more modest than the offer to Saskatchewan. My supplementary question to the minister is: can Atlantic Canada expect a favourable response to its request and the same sort of generous support that the government seems so anxious to give to the west?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Yes, Madam Speaker.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ACID RAIN—EFFECT ON SALMON STOCKS IN ATLANTIC CANADA

Miss Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment. It is now obvious that acid rain from sulphur dioxide and nitric oxide emissions is causing severe damage to Atlantic Canada. It is admitted that acid rain causes fatality to marine life, damage to soils, forests, and damage to structures. We have been told recently by Pat Schnut, chief, chemical hazards, Department of Fisheries and Oceans, that acid rain is causing the loss of 10,000 to 12,000 adult salmon. We have also been advised—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Could the hon. member get to her question, please.

Miss Campbell: We have also been advised that at least seven Atlantic salmon spawning streams are—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Miss Campbell: —so acidic that salmon reproduction no longer occurs. Can the minister tell me what he plans to do to eliminate the effects of acid rain in Atlantic Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, clearly the hon. member is very right to be concerned with this question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, I am glad to see that even members opposite appreciate the seriousness of the situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: The hon. member should know that the government has taken the decision to increase very significantly the funds available for acid rain research. Much of it will be used to develop strategies for combating the impact of acid rain on fish spawning grounds in the Atlantic provinces.

I know that the House of Commons subcommittee on acid rain will be visiting Nova Scotia soon. I hope that the visit will help make people in Canada, particularly people in that region, more aware of the significance of this problem.

Generally speaking, we are pressing ahead as vigorously as we possibly can with the signature of international accord with the United States government to help regulate this problem. It will be a subject of major importance on the agenda of discussions with the President of the United States when he visits Canada in early March.

FISHERIES

REGULATION OF WEST COAST FISHERIES—IMPACT ON KATZIE INDIAN BAND

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The minister must be aware of the controversy and concern which have greeted his new proposed regulations for fisheries on the west coast, especially as they affect the Fraser River and its closure. A particular Indian band, the Katzie band, in my riding near Pitt Meadows, depend on the Fraser gill-net fishery for 90 per cent of their income. They are protesting this closure in the strongest possible terms on two basic grounds. First, it is unfair because it hits one fishery and leaves the others relatively unscathed. Two, it is ineffective as a conservation measure.

As a result of these two basic grounds I have two questions for the minister. What steps does the minister intend to take to compensate these people, both native and non-native fishermen, if he does go ahead and proceeds with the full closure for the 1981 season? Will the minister reconsider placing a moratorium on the implementation of these regulations until the department and the minister himself can resume the consultative process which has not functioned for at least six months?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, the hon. member says these measures are unfair. The fact is that all groups have found that the measures we have taken have been difficult to accept and many groups have protested, exactly as the group mentioned by the hon. member. However, the reality is that the Chinook stocks of the Fraser are very badly in need of protection. That is what we are endeavouring to do.

I have said to the hon. member before that we are trying to find alleviation and alternatives for those who will lose all opportunities, or most opportunities, of being engaged in the fishery. I have not excluded the possible measure of meeting with groups which are very directly affected. Certainly that group on the Fraser is being hampered and hurt, which I recognize.

As for the question of a moratorium or reconsidering, I have indicated if conservation measures can be effected in other ways, aside from the way we have proposed, that I am willing to look at them. The difficulty is that everyone wants to have his group exempted and other groups to pay the costs of conservation. That is not possible.

● (1440)

DISCUSSIONS WITH U.S. AUTHORITIES

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I agree with the minister that conservation measures need to take place, and that some other groups are also being affected, but the department has strangled the Fraser gill-net fishery.

Aside from the years of mismanagement which have taken place, the habitat destruction, the lack of enforcement in terms of illegal fishing, the pollution, or you name it, there are more Fraser-bound Chinook caught by the San Juan and Point Roberts American fisheries than will be saved by cutting off the Fraser for this year.

I should like to know what the minister intends to do to seek some kind of an agreement with the Americans so that they, instead of destroying our Chinook stock, can help save them?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, we have been in communication with the United States authorities on this very question. My hope is that they will respond positively. They have indicated that they understand the Canadian problem. I think it will be a test of their good faith in the coming negotiations on the salmon interception problem and the whole area of interception between Canadian and American fishermen if they respond to the conservation measures we have taken. I will inform the hon. member when I receive an answer.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

VALUE OF LAND AND MINERAL RIGHT GRANTS

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Could he explain to the House if he plans to initiate a study into the present day asset value of land and mineral rights which were granted to CPR in past years?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, mention has been made of that. It will be a decision for cabinet to make.

Mr. McKnight: Madam Speaker, I do not know the pecking order of the minister's cabinet. If it is not government policy and there has not been a cabinet decision on it, why is it that his assistant in the Senate, Senator Argue, was quoted yesterday in the Saskatoon Star Phoenix as saying that he will have it initiated before the end of this year?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, it is traditional in democratic governments when a decision has not been made by cabinet for members of the cabinet to express their views.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DISPUTE INVOLVING VETERINARIANS IN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC—EFFORTS TO REACH SETTLEMENT

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Salary negotiations have reached an impasse between veterinarians employed by the health of animals branch of Agriculture Canada and the Treasury Board. It has culminated today in strike action by veterinary inspectors in Ontario and Quebec closing all the federally-inspected abattoirs in Quebec and most of them in Ontario. In view of the fact that a general strike across Canada would have disastrous results for consumers, the livestock industry, the meatpacking industry and our exports, will the President of the Treasury Board intervene personally, meet with representatives of the veterinary group and bargain in good faith to formulate a salary schedule which will recognize a long overdue inequity to this group of dedicated public servants?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, my understanding is that both parties have been negotiating in good faith. There appears to have been an illegal walkout and I would hope that matters will return to normal in a matter of hours. It is also my understanding that considerable progress has been made through a mediator. I suspect a fair and just settlement will be reached in the very near future.

Mr. Mitges: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. The health of animals branch recognizes that there has been a big problem in recruiting veterinarians for some time. According to the Public Service Commission of Canada there is already a veterinary vacancy rate of 32.4 per cent, caused primarily by a totally unacceptable low salary range. In view of the fact that no apparent effort has been undertaken to alleviate this very serious situation, would the President of the Treasury Board not agree that a starting salary of $17,660 for veterinarians in federal government service is not only a deterrent to recruitment, but an insult beyond any stretch of the imagination to every veterinarian in the country being offered such a ridiculous amount in this day and age after six years of university training?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, this particular group, as all other groups with which we bargain, is subject to our rules of total compensation comparability. I can assure the hon. member that if there are major inequities they will certainly be adjusted during the current negotiation.

With respect to the vacancy factor to which the hon. member made reference, he might direct his question to the Minister of Agriculture. But it is my understanding that there are a number of posts left vacant deliberately and that the Department of Agriculture is seeking to recruit, I believe, something in the neighbourhood of a 5 per cent to 10 per cent increase in those posts; not the 32 per cent to which the hon. member made reference.

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND

IMPROVEMENT OF INSUFFICIENT WATER SUPPLIES

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance respecting his recent speech to the Canadian Club at Montreal last Monday. I should like to draw his attention to the direct reference to the $4 billion western development fund, $2 billion of which will be spent over the next three years as a catalyst for co-operative efforts with the governments and people of western Canada to ensure that potential constraints to longer-term development, such as inadequate transportation services or insufficient water supplies, are addressed on a timely and effective basis.

Would the Minister of Finance enlarge somewhat on that very specific reference to insufficient water supplies in the west? It has a very special meaning for me, and I hope he will respond in some way to that reference.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I was speaking in a general way and focused upon the questions of transportation and water supply as important elements in the future development of the western economy. At the present time detailed work is being done within the government as to the best way in which we can respond to the requirements of the transportation system in the west and the water supply problems. When that detailed work is completed, it will be possible to give the hon. member the kind of information he obviously wants today.

Mr. Crosbie: Double-tonguing.

Mr. Hargrave: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. With respect to the same reference to insufficient water supplies, I should like to ask the minister whether this is a reference to a much needed long-range contingency drought policy which the west is dearly in need of these days. Even though that high profile agency, the PFRA, is working on this, they need much more incentive. Could it refer to that, or possibly could it refer to the challenge of interbasin water transfers from rivers in northern Canada to southern Canada, in the west?

Mr. MacEachen: I thank the hon. member for giving me more detail on his concerns. Obviously it would be difficult to consider water supply programs in the west without concentrating at the same time on the question of drought and its incidence in the west, and both these areas will be addressed in our studies.

RAILWAYS

CROWSNEST PASS RATE—HALL REPORT RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Prime Minister, and it concerns recent statements regarding farmers' support of the Crow rate. Since the vast majority of farmers agree with the solution to the Crow rate which was offered by Chief Justice Emmett Hall in his report on grain handling and transportation, whereby the statutory rate paid by the farmer remains, and the government negotiates with the railways to determine the balance of any revenue required in return for service, is the Prime Minister talking about the same Hall recommendations when he talks about doing what the farmers want on the Crow rate?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I wish I had the illusory self-assurance of the hon. member when he says that he knows what the western farmers want. I met—

An hon. Member: Voting for the Constitution.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, I understand.

An hon. Member: I wouldn't take his word very much at all.

Mr. Trudeau: I met with a group, just a couple of weeks ago, the Western Agricultural Conference, and they were presenting a different type of argument. As I have said in the House before, our purpose is to find out, first, if collectively the farmers and related industries in the west want a change in the Crow rate; second, if they do, can they agree on what a change could be? I do not believe the hon. member has a clear authority to say what they want out there, because, as he knows, the government of Saskatchewan is in disagreement with the governments of Manitoba and Alberta on this particular matter.

Mr. Althouse: I realize that some of the provincial governments are in disarray over this issue, but the Prime Minister was talking, in his—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Sleep.

Mr. Althouse: —replies on the radio programs out in the west, to farmer majority opinion. Chief Justice Hall, in his survey years ago, established what that farmer majority opinion was. If that report is no longer valid, then what absolute end of the line reassurance or absolute authority does the Prime Minister intend to accept, if his own royal commission report was not good enough?

Mr. Trudeau: I am not suggesting that the report is not valid. I am saying that we are hearing different views on that from different groups in the west, and I made it clear that the government would like to settle this matter in a way which could achieve the greatest possible consensus in the west.

ESTIMATES

PROCEDURE RESPECTING RELEASE OF MAIN ESTIMATES

Mr. Bruce Lonsdale (Timiskaming): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council. With regard to the circumstances that occurred yesterday concerning the tabling of the main estimates for 1981-82—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Lonsdale: —as you know, there was an obvious attempt to filibuster, and the opposition knowingly set out purposely to prevent the tabling of those documents. It is difficult to understand how the opposition can knowingly set about to do anything on purpose. However, I would like to ask the President of the Privy Council, in view of the circumstances yesterday, what he is planning to do in terms of reviewing the lock-up procedures, and whether he feels that the opposition's irresponsible attitude yesterday will jeopardize the normal and traditional procedure of advance notice and access to information by the press.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the question is very interesting and quite appropriate. I intend to discuss it seriously with the President of the Treasury Board at the first opportunity and we will see how to proceed next year, that is, whether or not we should further extend the courtesy given to the press.

Personally I am inclined to extend the privileges of hon. members as much as possible. But what we had to debate yesterday was whether in the present context and according to the established practice there was a breach of the privileges or a lack of courtesy based on tradition. You have made your ruling, Madam Speaker, and we accept it.

MARINE TRANSPORT

REMOVAL OF DART CONTAINERLINE COMPANY FROM PORT OF HALIFAX

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport who is responsible for marine transport and for the Canadian National Railways. The minister knows that there are published reports that Dart Containerline is terminating its operation in the port of Halifax, and removing its multimillion dollar business to the port of Montreal. Is the minister aware of this proposed change, and what does he propose to do about the loss of thousands of jobs at the port of Halifax, in direct and indirect employment, and the loss of millions of dollars of revenue, not to mention the $18 million loss to the CNR arising from the discontinuation of this service?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this news is supposed to be confirmed this afternoon by the company, and, indeed, it will be a very bad announcement as far as the port of Halifax is concerned. The Dart company has decided to move container traffic from Halifax to Montreal. Again, this is a very severe blow. I agree with that. However, one would take into consideration, nevertheless, that the containers going for the Atlantic market, will not be moved, and that represents about 15 per cent of the traffic.

A second announcement which I want to make at the same time is that the Polish line is going to use terminal two in Halifax and that will represent 200,000 tons, beginning Saturday. So, there are some compensating factors, and no doubt, Ceres and Halterm will look for more traffic in the coming days.

Mr. Crosby: The minister must know that the ameliorating factors that he mentioned are not connected. The Polish line was already due to come to the port of Halifax, and the local traffic cannot go anywhere else but Halifax because of economic considerations. But I have warned the minister in the House, and elsewhere, of the involvement of CNR in Cast, and it is at the root of this problem.

Will the minister now explain why the CNR refused to become involved in Dart's operation at the same time that they were becoming involved in Cast's operation, but benefiting the port of Montreal to the detriment of the port of Halifax?

Mr. Pepin: The CNR is involved in Cast indeed, but the CNR is also involved in Halterm. There was a time when CNR wanted to get involved in Dart, and was not allowed to do so. But the main reason for this move comes from CP. CP operates from Montreal with smaller ships. It wanted to get bigger ships, and that is the main reason why the transfer of traffic was made from Halifax to Montreal.

LABOUR RELATIONS

WHITE PASS AND YUKON RAILWAY DISPUTE—QUERY RESPECTING EFFORTS TO SETTLE

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The minister will have been alerted, by his alert staff, I am sure, that the rail workers of White Pass and Yukon route went on strike last night despite the recommendations of a conciliation officer.

What steps is the government now taking through his own ministry, or through the Ministry of Labour, or any agency of government, to restore the services of this singular and most vital link to tide water, which transports all of Yukon products out and most of Yukon supplies in?

• (1500)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows this is the direct responsibility of my colleague, the Minister of Labour. As a result of the concerns of many in the Yukon as well as those expressed by the hon. member himself, the Minister of Labour has taken a very active interest in this matter. Certainly his officials and some of the key officials with long experience in trying to resolve strikes, especially Mr. Kelly, the assistant deputy minister of labour, have gone into the matter thoroughly and made the parties aware that the services of some of the most experienced mediators in the country, in my view, are available to try to resolve this strike. I can only hope that the offer of assistance and the resolve on the part of the Department of Labour will be effective in settling this strike.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, can the minister inform us whether there is included in his current estimates sufficient funds to enable him to go forward with his publicly announced $5 million support for the railroad?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, Madam Speaker. I think the hon. member would agree that it is very much in the interests of all Yukoners that this money be made available. As he knows, this is for capital projects which are badly needed; it is not to be used to defray in any way any deficits or operational expenses of the railway.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Rideau Hall
Ottawa
Government House

February 26, 1981

Madam,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Julien Chouinard, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 26th day of February, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to a bill.

I have the honour to be,
Madam,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary
to the Governor General

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I wonder if I could direct a question to the government House leader. Would he be kind enough to inform us whether he can allot next Wednesday, March 4, 1981, as an allotted day.

While he is doing that, could he also inform the House whether the arrangements for the visit of President Reagan to Canada have been completed. I have particular reference to whether the President of the United States will be addressing a joint sitting of both Houses. If so, could he tell the House when that might be.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, next week, unless otherwise decided, we shall continue, at least we hope to, the closing debate on the Constitution. With regard to March 4, I cannot confirm at this point that it will be an allotted day. I am quite willing to discuss the matter later on today with my learned colleague and the House leader of the NDP.

With regard to the details of the visit to Canada of the President of the United States, I am unable to give my hon. colleague of the opposition complete details at this time. However, as soon as details have been confirmed, I shall advise him accordingly; it is quite probable that the President of the United States will address both Houses jointly, but the time and day have yet to be confirmed. As soon as they are, I shall advise my hon. colleagues.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, there are two other items. You will recall the all-night debate that we had in the House prior to the Christmas adjournment. At that time there was an order of the House by unanimous consent, and I am quoting now from Votes and Proceedings of December 18, as follows:

That the House of Commons employees who have worked all night in the sitting that commenced on Thursday, December 18, 1980, and is still in progress, be paid extra compensation for their service, and that the thanks of the House be extended to them.

I have heard from some employees that this extra compensation may not have been paid. I wonder if it would be possible for the government House leader, through the appropriate channels, to make that inquiry and see whether that is the case, and perhaps advise us on the matter.

Madam Speaker: I can tell the hon. member that this is under my jurisdiction and I can tell him that it is well in hand and he will be informed in due course.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I am grateful to you.

My final question concerns the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who is in the House, and it concerns House business. The minister will recall that some inquiries were made with respect to the takeover of Petrofina by Petro-Canada. As reported at page 7611 of Hansard, he was asked whether he would table the results of those inquiries when they have been completed. Have they been completed and could the minister tell us whether he will be tabling that information?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I was in touch with Petro-Canada at the time of the question and again this morning to ask when this information would be made available. I have been advised that I should have it early next week. I will be very happy to table it as soon as I have it.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—PREMATURE RELEASE OF ESTIMATES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, if it is in order I would like to proceed with my comments concerning the question of privilege raised yesterday by my colleague, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). Hon. members will recall that he indicated that if Your Honour found a prima facie case of privilege, he would move:

That the matter of the dissemination of details of the estimates through the news media before tabling of the estimates in this House be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

My arguments today will be designed to show that there is in fact such a prima facie case which would warrant you referring this matter to the House for a vote on whether it should be sent to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. Yesterday, during the course of the debate, members of the government raised the question that perhaps what we were talking about was not in fact published.

Surely there will be no serious suggestion today that many of the essential ingredients of the estimates which we in this House have not yet seen, have been published; in fact, they have been on the front pages of various national newspapers. In short, I do not think I need plead that there is any question about publication. In fact, during question period, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) assured us that in his estimates there was a certain expenditure item amounting to some $5 million about which the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) had inquired. So clearly it is a public document now, but it still has not been tabled in the House.

First of all, what is the nature of this privilege? What has been of such a nature that it has affected the ongoing operations of each member of this House? What breach has been committed by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) whom I see walking out of the House now? Has he been guilty of gross negligence in the way he handled this secret document?

In short, Madam Speaker, my remarks will be designed to show the degree of secrecy that is required with respect to such budgetary papers. I will be showing the nature of the impropriety that has been committed by the President of the Treasury Board. I have used those words very deliberately, Madam Speaker, because from the precedents it appears to be very clear that if that type of situation can be shown, then there is indeed a question of privilege that should be put to the House.

Having said that very clearly, there can be no question that these matters have now been published. However, the specific detail that has been published may not be as clear to certain members.

For example, let me draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that a local television station, the CJOH "Newsline" program aired last night around midnight, gave specific details with respect to estimates which contemplated expenditures in the national capital area. These details were certainly not known to me and, I presume, were not known to any member on this side of the House. Certainly none of us have been able to see the blue book which all of us are waiting to see. It included comments to the effect that the estimates contained an innovation, an additional $26.2 million allotted under the government's accommodation program. It went on to say:

There's a submission already before the cabinet to review the government's needs over the next five years. It means new government buildings so that the purchase and renovation of existing buildings in the country's major centres including Ottawa but there are no details. Among the projects definitely set for this year is a $730,000 letter carrier depot in Orleans.

The reason I am reading this into the record, Madam Speaker, is that this is partly what the question of privilege is about. The reason that these documents are to be kept secret before tabling in the House—and I shall read the precedents into the record subsequently—is to avoid the possibility of an unfair profit being made. Yet here is specific knowledge going out about buildings that are going to be built in the Ottawa area including a $730,000 letter carrier depot in Orleans.

The newscast went on to say:

Numerous energy improvements, what the government likes to call retrofits. The construction of a new virus lab at $1.9 million. A public information centre, $1.7 million, $6.8 million for the Rideau Centre, $12.8 million for the construction of a RCMP services building and $1.3 million for the rehabilitation and retrofit of the Rideau Falls generating station.

● (1510)

All of those items are a breach of cabinet secrecy rules. That is what occurred. Certainly those items, which presumably will be found in the blue book when we see it eventually, are not secret, they are openly being disclosed to members of this House generally. In reviewing the background as to the nature of this question of privilege I would suggest, Madam Speaker, that you consult a brief prepared in 1975 by the research branch of the Library of Parliament when the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections was considering a certain reference concerning one of the members of the House. This brief is entitled "Background Information on Government Secrecy, Financial Measures and Parliamentary Secretaries", prepared by Mr. Hugh Finsten, dated August 8, 1975. I will not read into the record all of the background research which this employee of the library has put into his brief, but I think it is very significant how much he has dramatized the importance of what we are speaking about today, which is this whole question of government secrecy. The author writes:

In the process of developing government policy and legislation, it is a general rule that information on specific matters is not to be disclosed until it is made public, either by the introduction of a bill in Parliament or a public statement by the minister concerned. This permits the government to make its revelations at the most opportune moment.

One aspect of this secrecy which pervades the decision-making process is the principle of cabinet solidarity. The deliberations of the cabinet are held in private and its proceedings are considered confidential. The theoretical basis for this is that "a cabinet decision is to advise the Queen, whose consent is necessary to its publication."

The quotation given is from Ivor Jennings' book on Cabinet Government, Cambridge, third edition, 1959, found on page 267.

To expand on that quote, we find in Mr. Jennings' work a very interesting observation concerning the nature of cabinet secrecy and cabinet minutes themselves. In due course, I will be pointing out that the estimates are a cabinet document. That is the nature of the estimates. That is why they must be guarded with the utmost secrecy. In his book at page 267, Mr. Jennings said this:

The cabinet deliberates in secret; its proceedings are confidential. The Privy Councillor's oath imposes an obligation not to disclose information; and the Officials Secrets Acts forbid the publication of cabinet as well as other official documents. But the effective sanction is neither of these. The rule is, primarily, one of practice. Its theoretical basis is that a cabinet decision is advice to the Queen, whose consent is necessary to its publication. Its practical foundation is the necessity of securing free discussion by which a compromise can be reached, without the risk of publicity for every statement made and every point given away.

A minister who resigns from the cabinet usually desires to make an explanation in Parliament.

I will come to that point a little later. It is customary for a minister, caught in the present position of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), to offer his resignation. I am quite surprised that the minister has not tendered his resignation to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), but perhaps if he is given an opportunity to speak in due course, he will indicate that he is prepared to take that step.

Let me continue with Mr. Finsten's brief as follows:

It is not merely to protect cabinet solidarity and the publication of government policy prematurely that secrecy is maintained. There is also the aspect of private gain resulting from advance knowledge of government policy.

That is the crux of what we are talking about today. For example, Mr. Jennings, in the work to which I have just referred, at page 110 of his book quotes from a decision found in Westminster's Hansard in which the spokesperson, speaking on behalf of the prime minister of the day, put this very interesting comment on the record:

—inasmuch as the secrets of the Government are specially in charge of cabinet ministers, no minister, and particularly, no cabinet minister, must in any circumstances put himself in a position where he is not able to be the complete guardian of those secrets in that there is any possibility of any private interests being served through a knowledge of those secrets.

Clearly, the President of the Treasury Board has put himself in that position. He failed to maintain a position where he was the complete guardian of the secrets which had been entrusted to him.

What is the nature of the oath which the President of the Treasury Board took, and indeed all privy councillors take? Again, I would emphasize when we speak about impropriety, we must bear in mind that what happened yesterday was in direct violation of the oath of secrecy taken by every privy councillor, and presumably by this President of the Treasury Board. The oath, in part, reads:

—you will keep close and secret all such matters as shall be treated, debated and resolved on in Privy Council, without publishing or disclosing the same or any part thereof, by word, writing, or any otherwise to any person out of the same council, but to such only as be of the council, and yet if any matter so propounded, treated and debated in any such Privy Council, shall touch any particular person, sworn of the same council upon any such matter as shall in any wise concern his loyalty and fidelity to the Queen's Majesty, you will in no wise open the same to him, but keep it secret, as you would from any person, until the Queen's Majesty's pleasure be known in that behalf.

In effect, what that oath required the President of the Treasury Board to do was to keep in his custody, and guarantee that custody, the information contained in the estimates until the Queen's message is received by you in this House. Subsequent to the Queen's message being received, then, of course, the minister would have been free to table the estimates and make whatever disclosure, once having tabled the estimates, as he saw fit.

Let us be practical. We all know there have been lock-ups, we all know there have been pre-briefings, but up to this point, whatever the lock-up was, sufficient precautions have always been taken to ensure that no leak occurred, such as occurred yesterday. That is what is so different about this situation and other such situations which occur.

In short, I have determined, after some questioning, that on budget night, for example, it is customary really to have two briefing sessions prior to the budget being formally introduced by a minister of finance in this House. The first is a briefing session for the press on the understanding that nothing is to go out from the press corps until the minister rises in his place in the House and commences to deliver his budget. That is understandable. The press are given an opportunity—and in no way are we saying that they should not be given such an opportunity—to consider the budget beforehand so that presumably they can muster their thoughts, develop their line of reasoning, and write their stories. But the important thing is not to publish it by putting it on any wire or communicating with the outside world—

Madam Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member to ask him to restrict himself to discussing the question of privilege. Whatever the hon. member is complaining about concerning the press does not touch on the privilege. I must remind him that privilege is defined as follows. In discussing the question, we must discuss whether freedom of speech has been impeded, whether it concerns freedom from arrest or molestation or freedom of access. Those are the matters that have to be discussed in a question of privilege.

I ask hon. members to keep very close to that. Otherwise it will be impossible, with the arguments made in the House, for the Chair to look at the question on its merits. Usually members are allowed to speak in order that the Chair can be better informed. In making their arguments, hon. members have a responsibility to stick to the strict question of privilege and not discuss the substance of the matter as though a motion were before the House, the Chair having already recognized that there is a case of privilege.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, granted, in such complicated matters as the one before us today it is difficult always to be sure that our particular points fit into the mosaic to which you were referring. It is important that we understand that to mean that, in addition to the privileges to which you have referred, one of the most sacred rights we have in Parliament is the right to examine the government's expenditure plans.

Our activities as Members of Parliament are being restricted to the degree the secrecy provisions are being broken, as I am demonstrating, and press comment is allowed. Members of Parliament are supposed to have the primary right to see these estimates at the first disclosure from a member of the cabinet. We are denied access to the same information which the press is distributing from coast to coast. I find it hard to see a more clear infringement of the privileges of members of this House.

In order to support my case, I was trying to demonstrate that there are all kinds of precedents to these secrecy provisions and what would be the consequence of secrecy being broken. I am relating the present situation to what happens on budget night. On budget night the budgetary process commences. I intend to put on record where Treasury Board and the tabling of the estimates fits into the whole budgetary process. Your Honour will find, on reading the precedents, that the situation is very clear when a budget is involved. It is less clear in the case of the estimates which, of course, are part of the budgetary process.

Madam Speaker: I will interrupt the hon. member to say this. I would like him to distinguish between the rules which apply to government and its practice as the government and the executive and the rules which apply to this Parliament. What we are discussing now is not the way that privilege is defined for Members of Parliament. The hon. member must prove to me that his own privilege has been breached. The Chair cannot rule on what rules apply to the government. If there is some discrepancy between the rules and what a minister or several ministers might have done, that is not the concern of the Chair. What is the concern of the Chair is whether the privileges of a member of this Parliament have been breached.

Mr. Stevens: I do not want to take the time of the House to repeat the arguments made by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), but very clearly the thrust of our remarks is that there is a contempt of Parliament here. The precedents show that if contempt of Parliament is demonstrated, in fact, or at least in a prima facie sense, there can be no question that there is a question of privilege.

Contempt of Parliament is shown by the fact that estimates were not tabled first in this Parliament and did not go through the normal parliamentary process before being made public. That has not occurred in this instance. As I indicated earlier, there has been extensive publication of the estimates. That is a breach of the secrecy provisions which generally ensure that this type of contempt of Parliament does not occur.

In building my case to show why contempt of Parliament has occurred, naturally I have to point out why it does not normally occur. The reason is that the cabinet minister involved lives by his oath and does not breach the secrecy provisions which he swore to uphold.

Having said that, it is important that we review, as I was doing, the question of what happens in fact on budget night. There are all kinds of precedents to show that if the minister of finance of the day does what the President of the Treasury Board did yesterday, there is absolutely no question but that he should offer his resignation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: The process of this House is, first of all, to make a prima facie case, in the hope that Your Honour will find that there is such a prima facie case. Then, hopefully, the House votes to have the matter referred to the appropriate committee, at which time a complete airing of the matter can take place. That is what we ask.

If we want to refer to the precedents, we find that if it can be demonstrated that there has, in fact, been a breach of the privileges not only of mine but of those of other members of this House, it constitutes contempt of Parliament. I suggest, when we review the various authorities dealing with similar leaks or breaches of security, that contempt goes right back to the British North America Act. For example, we find that Section 54 of the British North America Act requires that measures requiring the spending of public funds must be introduced by the cabinet to this House. That did not happen yesterday. What happened was that the public had access to the spending plans of this government through the media before this House did.

The close control which is normally exercised by the cabinet—and I emphasize that it was not properly exercised yesterday—thus brings financial measures within the shield of cabinet secrecy and cabinet solidarity. Moreover, among the most sacrosanct of government documents is the annual budget. In fact, it is considered so confidential that even the cabinet colleagues of the minister of finance are not made aware of the budget proposals until shortly before its presentation in Parliament, and even then they are often provided only with the general outline.

Madam Speaker, it will be evident that if any information about government activity in the fields of planning, development, investment, etc., becomes known to private individuals, large profits could be made. Why, then, should they be considered any less serious a breach of secrecy than a leak of the contents of the budget?

I would refer you, Madam Speaker, in that connection, to a departmental committee on Section 2 of the Official Secrets Act that is referred to in the United Kingdom, Franks committee. In that document it is stated:

> Governments take particular precautions to maintain the secrecy of the budget, of their fiscal changes and of changes in the bank rate. These precautions include the rigid restriction of who may have access to such information, which is usually the most effective form of protection. These matters are traditionally included in any catalogue of secret, official information.

Madam Speaker, having said that, I would point out that the Treasury Board and, in short, the President of the Treasury Board, is very much a part of this budgetary process. In a document prepared by the Treasury Board secretariat communications division in 1979, this is how the Treasury Board describes its own function. It states:

The Treasury Board of Canada is a committee of cabinet, consisting of the President of the Treasury Board, the Minister of Finance and four other cabinet ministers appointed from time to time by the Governor in Council. The responsibilities of the Treasury Board, which have been delegated to it by the Privy Council, are set out in the Financial Administration Act. To discharge them, the Treasury Board relies on two administrative bodies: the Treasury Board Secretariat and the Office of the Comptroller General.

This document, Madam Speaker, goes on to describe how they function within those parameters. They point out that the Treasury Board was created by the Second Order in Council in Canada on July 2, 1867, and that the Treasury Board secretariat was part, initially, of the Department of Finance. It was part of the Department of Finance until 1966, when it became a separate department through the Government Organization Act.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should stop to recognize that he is debating just as though there was a motion before the House. I would like him, in the interest of the affairs of the House, to keep to the point of demonstrating the privilege. I do plead with him to do that. We have been quite a while on this question of privilege now, and I have no intention of hearing him for a long time unless he keeps to the point that is useful to me, as Speaker of the House, so that I can rule on this question of privilege.

An hon. Member: Do you understand?

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I thank you. If, in effect, you are ready to rule that you think there is a prima facie case, of course we have made our case and I do not have to continue any further with what, I think, is very substantive evidence to show that, judging from the precedents we have been able to review, there is a very clear contempt of Parliament in what happened as a result of yesterday's actions of the President of the Treasury Board.

Without reading into the record specific references, I would refer you to the seminar on the budgetary process held in Ottawa on Friday, November 18, 1977. There they have an Annex "A" that goes through the importance of this whole question to which I have been referring. It goes on for several pages that I think will give you a great deal of assistance concerning what is the United Kingdom experience and experiences in various other jurisdictions.

Our position is that not only was there the publication of these estimates, as I have said, but essentially many newspapers dealt with this matter. I have there the The Toronto Star that had the information from a separate source: they did not use the Canadian Press. Bob Hepburn, of the The Toronto Star, filed his own story. Madam Speaker, we have been given to understand that many papers across the country literally filed these kinds of stories at a time when this House did not have their rightful first-possession of the estimates, as they should have been tabled in the House prior to the minister disclosing the information to the public.

Let me touch specifically on that, Madam Speaker. There is some question as to what is "publishing". The dictionary says that to publish is to make generally known; to make known to a third party; to announce formally; to promulgate. That is exactly what the President of the Treasury Board did yesterday. Going back to one of the initial references that I put on the record, what the President of the Treasury Board failed to do was to guard the secret information that was in his possession.

As ministerial responsibility is ingrained in our system, when there is such a breach, the minister must accept the responsibility, he must resign and there must be a reference, I suggest, to the appropriate committee to find out if, indeed, our prima facie case is established that there has been, in truth, a contempt of this Parliament. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I want to spend a very few moments on this question of privilege to add to Your Honour's ammunition in this respect. My comments are based upon whether or not the privileges of myself, yourself and any member of this House of Commons have, in fact, been breached. I think that is a germane direction to give us and I think it is a very important consideration for us in terms of your consideration.

I hope to demonstrate, by dealing very specifically for a short period of time, that indeed what we have today is a very serious prima facie breach of the privileges of members of the House of Commons and a matter that should be accepted by you on that basis for reference, full deliberation and full discussion and investigation by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Perhaps I could put it in a little different way, Madam Speaker. I think my colleague, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), has made reference to the fact that there has been publication of this information prior to the time when the matter has been formally brought to the attention of the House of Commons. In essence, what has transpired—and I do not wish to dwell on the facts of the situation, but I have to do so to the extent of making my point—is that we in the House of Commons as yet have not received the formal estimates approved by cabinet; so we are not, in effect, on notice. We have no formal or official notice of what exactly is contained in those estimates.

The fact of the matter is that there has been—and this is acknowledged by the President of the Treasury Board—publication of the estimates in newspapers across the country, including the Toronto Globe and Mail this morning, and the The Toronto Star, to which reference was made by my colleague the hon. member for York-Peel. There has been publication through wire services, and although the caution was put on the wire services' copy to guard against premature release, the fact of the matter is that there was, in fact, publication at law. If you examine the legal precedents with respect to the definition of "publication", you will find that publication involves the conveying of information, not in a general sense of newspaper publications but to any other third party, as my colleague from York-Peel has pointed out. What I wanted to do was simply to bring this point to your attention, Madam Speaker, as a point that I think is very germane and relevant to the question of privilege.

We in the House of Commons, as Your Honour will know, have a responsibility that is rather twofold traditionally, historically and in parliamentary terms. One part is, of course, to examine government legislation and government initiatives. The second, and equally important function of the House of Commons, is the control of expenditures of the government. This whole process does involve a number of steps: one is the budgetary process; the second is that involving the tabling of the government's spending plans in the estimates.

While we have changed the procedures with respect to the consideration of those estimates over the years, as Your Honour will note from personal experience, going from a Committee of the Whole system to a system of reference to specific standing and special committees for consideration, the principle still obtains: Parliament must be seized with the initial responsibility of having information at first-hand. Second, having been seized with the government's spending estimates, the House of Commons must then proceed within a specific period of time to pass on those estimates. What makes this privilege more important is this. A great many people watching this debate, may be wondering, why it is so important.

An hon. Member: That's right.

• (1540)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The ramifications of premature publication are enormous in terms of the consequences on the markets of our country and in terms of information relied upon by the citizens of this country on the basis of reports other than the formal filing in the House of Commons.

This is a matter of some historical consequence and importance. The rules do not exist to make the government bow especially to the House of Commons or the institution of Parliament. The realistic situation is that until the estimates are formally filed, they are nothing other than a mere document. People who act on information in documents before they are filed do so at their peril.

I want to make two points with respect to this situation. First, I am sure Your Honour would find a breach of privilege by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) or the government if estimates were never tabled, that is to say, if the minister decided in this television era that all he had to do would be to give the estimates to the press in a lock-up and explain the government's plans for spending and hold Parliament in suspension without going through the process of referring the estimates to Parliament.

That is exactly the point which is to be made in this situation. The hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. McRae) is sitting over there at the back in anguish. No matter what he wants to make of this, that is the point I want to make. If the government decided simply to publish its spending plans in the newspapers, that would be a clear breach of the privileges of every member of this House of Commons. I ask Your Honour to look at that general proposition and at what I contend to be an extension of that argument. Either willy-nilly, by design or by practice the government is giving this information out and publishing it. No matter what members on the government side say, it is the responsibility of the minister to protect the interests of members of the House of Commons in this instance. This information has been published across this country. Members of the House of Commons have not yet been officially presented with this information. It has not been filed. I do not care if it is a matter of one hour, 24 hours or 24 days; the principle is still there. The government has allowed, by neglect or design—and I make no comment on that—information contained in the estimates to be published, and the House of Commons has still not been presented with that information.

The second point I want to make is that members of the House of Commons were denied access to this information before it was tabled. That practice has developed. There is a lock-up before submission. I sometimes wonder whether that particular practice is not in itself against the traditions of Parliament and the House of Commons, but the fact is that in this particular instance Members of Parliament were denied access to this particular information.

I want to ask a rhetorical question. Let us assume that the government, in its beneficence, allowed mere members of the opposition to go into that lock-up. Let us assume that I, as one of those members of the House of Commons, went into the lock-up and looked over the estimates for a period of two or three hours. Let us also assume that some time before the document was tabled in this House I went out and either sold or gave away the information contained in those estimates.

An hon. Member: Who would buy it?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: If I as a member of the House of Commons did that, I do not think there is any question that I would be guilty of a breach of the privileges of members of the House of Commons, and I would be liable to account for that action. I think that is a very valid point. I think we have to develop that particular analogy. What has happened here is that on the basis of its practice, tradition, or whatever we want to call it, this government has allowed the press to get this information. Perhaps we have become a little too lax in the way in which we deal with these very important documents with respect to government expenditure and government budgets, but there are reasons for these things. There are reasons why we have these rules. We do not have them for the sake of making members of the House of Commons larger people on the national stage. There are valid reasons in terms of the operation of government.

One way or the other, there has been publication prior to the time the matter has been formally put before the House of Commons, and I consider that to be a breach of my privilege. Under what basis of curious logic should everybody else in the country be able to have access to and an explanation of the government's spending program and the legislators be the last people to have access to that information on an informal basis? That is an incredible situation.

Mr. McRae: You won't let us.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Now members on the government side want to curtail our ability to speak up on a matter of privilege, and I resent that very much because I have a right, as much as any other member, including the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan, to stand here and question the integrity of the actions of the government and to ask Your Honour to look at the rights and privileges of your fellow Members of Parliament in the carrying out of their functions and duties.

Publication means a number of things. It means that perceptions and points of view are put across through briefings by departmental officials in properly carrying out their functions, but this tends to diminish the ability of the individual Member of Parliament to debate on the floor of the House. I think that is exactly the point Your Honour was asking about. How are the rights of the individual Member of Parliament affected by this action? I simply submit that my ability to deal properly with the spending estimates has been severely diminished by the premature and haphazard publication of regional reviews of what particular rights and benefits will accrue or what obligations will accrue to particular areas of this country. That is where the member of Parliament is affected. This is not a hypothetical discussion or an academic discussion. This is a discussion about the rights of the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan, the hon. member for Saskatoon West, the hon. member for York-Peel and the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) to carry out their responsibilities properly.

Today we still have not had this matter before us, and yet it has been published, or extracts of it have been published across the country.

I will conclude simply by making those two points. One is that there is no question that, by virtue of the fact that the government publishes before it tables, it is in breach of the traditional rules of the House of Commons and Parliament and of the privileges of each and every Member of Parliament. Second, by delivering this information and allowing it on whatever basis, accidentally or by design—I make no distinction here because I do not know what went through the mind of the President of the Treasury Board in this connection—and publishing this information widely before members of the House of Commons are officially in receipt of the information, the government severely diminishes our ability to assess properly and discuss the estimates which are apparently to be tabled in the House.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I do not recall any time in this House when I have been as angry as I have been in the last 24 hours. My anger results from the fact that my rights in this Parliament have been abridged.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Hear, hear!

Mr. McRae: I listened all yesterday afternoon to an absolute filibuster on the part of the opposition so that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) could not get the floor. Then hon. members opposite had the unmitigated gall to say we were in some way responsible for not getting the estimates tabled. I will say it again; I have never been as angry in this House as I am now. Many situations like this have developed. I remember that on February 6, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) came in here and gave notice of a spurious question of privilege. I have seen no record indicating that he raised it the next week. He used about ten minutes of the time of the House just to do that. I was prevented from giving a full speech, which I had intended to give. It is hyprocrisy for the Tory party, the official opposition in the House, to say that we are in any way, responsible for that document not being delivered. That is something I cannot accept.

• (1550)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I rise on the point of privilege which is now being discussed. I will not be lengthy because I do not want to increase the anger of the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. McRae). Even his anger must give way to the privileges of members of this House. It is easy to understand why he has not often been angry in this House. It is because he has not often been in the opposition and been subjected to the contemptible treatment the opposition receives from members of the government.

What I want to refer to first is that we are discussing not only the conduct of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) on this question of privilege but we are also discussing the conduct of the government House leader, who was the one who actually compounded the contempt of Parliament and the breach of privilege by authorizing at 6.40 p.m. last night that the public information on the estimates should be released. He can deny this, of course. If he does deny it, then I will believe him. But I would like to cite one article from the Gazette of February 26. The article reads in part:

Government House leader Yvon Pinard authorized publication of the estimates anyway.

That is exactly—

Mr. Pinard: The hon. member just mentioned that if I were to deny that he would accept my word. I formally deny it.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, naturally I will accept the government House leader's word and say that the Canadian Press, the Montreal Gazette and a host of other news agencies across this country will have to explain why they took the name of the government House leader in vain by stating that he authorized the release and told them to go ahead. In this article from the Montreal Gazette it is stated that the Government House Leader authorized publication. The article then deals with the President of the Treasury Board and it states:

—he regarded the embargo as still in force.

This afternoon in the Senate Senator Perrault said that as far as the government is concerned the embargo remains in effect with respect to detailed information on the estimates, although it has not been observed by certain sectors of the media. Consequently, he could not answer questions on the estimates. This is another strong argument, Madam Speaker, why you should find that a prima facie case exists so that this matter can go to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. Let the facts be established.

Why should every news media say that release of this information was granted to them by the government House leader if he did not do it? The government House leader says he did not do it, so there must be some kind of mix up. Who did it? In any event, we know that due to the gross negligence of the President of the Treasury Board, information on the estimates went out over the Canadian Press wires after 3.45 p.m. We know that the information went to their clients in the news business. We know that it went to certain embassies, including the embassy of the United States of America. That is certainly publication of the estimates.

Your Honour might ask what the difference is if this went out. The difference is, Madam Speaker, that people had information in their hands which was not available to the rest of the world until all of this information was released by somebody, the press in any event, at 6.40 p.m. Therefore, a number of things could happen. For example, do the estimates show that the government will really battle inflation? Is it reducing the deficit for 1981-82 in some meaningful manner? A look at the estimates would reveal that, no, it is not serious about inflation. So, one would have to take that into consideration with what will happen to the Canadian dollar, what will happen with interest rates and that kind of thing. That is the kind of information which went out to certain privileged persons at 3.45 yesterday afternoon, which other persons did not receive until after 6.40 p.m.

I would like to refer to the same article prepared by the research branch of the Library of Parliament which was cited by the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). I am looking now at page 25:71 where the importance attached to financial measures is being discussed. Financial measures do not just include the budget speech which was brought down on budget night, in this case on October 28. Financial measures include tax legislation, changes in the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act, etc. It is the estimates which carry out the expenditure side of the budget plan as presented on budget night. This is all part of the budgetary process. I quote from the article:

> On the spending side, the BNA Act requires that measures involving the spending of public funds be introduced by the cabinet.

I emphasize "introduced by the cabinet". This is the first place they are to be introduced. They are not to be introduced to the public or the media in a secret lock-up held in Room 200 of the West Block. As I understand it, you, Madam Speaker, representing us, the members of the House of Commons of Canada control Room 200 in the West Block. Yet that part of the parliamentary premises was used by the President of the Treasury Board to bring in a certain favoured group of people—the media of Canada or their representatives—to give them information on the estimates. This is part of the budgetary process, part of the financial measures which he was to introduce into the House of Commons. He excluded members of the House and, as a result of his actions, his lack of care and concern, his contempt for the members of this House, at 3.45 p.m. yesterday afternoon this information went over the wires to a number of news and radio stations across the country. At 6.40 p.m. because of somebody's additional negligence—it is alleged to be that of the government House leader who denies it—the rest of the world received the information. Therefore, we want to have the facts established. Is the government House leader right? Of course, I accept what the government House leader says as being correct. But I do not think the Montreal Gazette will. I do not think the Canadian Press will. I do not think they just made it up, so there must be some explanation.

Returning to the document which I cited from before, it goes on to read:

> The close control exercised by the cabinet thus brings financial measures within the shield of cabinet secrecy and cabinet solidarity.

Further on in the document it is stated:

> Today, the budget is not delivered until the stock markets have closed across the country.

The stock markets were not closed yesterday afternoon at 3.45 p.m. when this information went out over the wires. The stock exchange does not close until 4 p.m. in Toronto. It does not close until several hours later in Vancouver.

Mr. Johnston: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Crosbie: A point of order! It is a point of shame when you get up.

Mr. Johnston: Would the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) entertain a brief, simple question?

Mr. Beatty: On a question of privilege?

Madam Speaker: It is not at all usual. I would prefer if the hon. minister would, instead, rise on a point of order, if he has one. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) can answer the question if he consents. It really is not usual procedure.

Mr. Crosbie: I do not want to take much time—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What a joker!

Mr. Crosbie: I would entertain—

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Two members cannot have the floor at the same time. The two hon. gentlemen are standing. I am asking the hon. member for St. John's West if he will entertain a question?

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I will outside. I will try to counsel the President of the Treasury Board outside. I cannot do it in this place because I do not want to be too lengthy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I would like to proceed with my reading of this article:

In Britain, at least two ministers have had to resign as a result of breaches in the security curtain. In the case of Hugh Dalton, Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1947, a "premature and unpremeditated disclosure" was made to a newspaperman shortly before the budget was to be presented.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I do have to be enlightened on this question of privilege. I would ask the hon. member to answer this question. If it is true, and the hon. member is exposing facts whereby ministers have had to resign because of some breach in the rules which apply to members of the government, in the case he is citing, did this hon. minister also resign from the House? What we are discussing here are breaches in the rules of the House, not of government procedure or administrative procedure. We are speaking of the rules of this House. I would like the hon. member to address himself to that point. If the minister he mentioned resigned from the cabinet, that is one thing. But I would like to know if, as a consequence, he had to resign from the House.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, in the particular case of Mr. Hugh Dalton, he did not resign from the House, he resigned from the cabinet, as should a gentleman who understands the parliamentary system. Because his breach of the privileges of Parliament was unpremeditated, he was not required to resign his seat. Mr. Dalton was on his way into the House at that time and he bumped into a newspaperman whom he knew. He just happened to make a remark which tipped off the newspaperman as to a certain tax which was to go up. He was not required to resign his seat.

It would be up to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to decide whether the President of the Treasury Board should resign his seat as a member of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I would hope that they would exercise some discretion or mercy in that respect. I would not want to have the hon. gentleman resign his seat in the House if he now makes a clear breast of the matter and promises not to do it again. But, yes, from the cabinet he should go.

● (1600)

I should just like to conclude my quotation from this document. The following page reads:

It would seem evident that if any information about government activity in the fields of planning, development, investment, etc. becomes known to private individuals, large profits could be made.

That is why this secrecy is so important. It continues:

Governments take particular precautions to maintain the secrecy of the budget, of their fiscal changes, and of changes in the bank rate.

The estimates which are to be introduced to this House are fiscal changes. They are clearly within the rules set out in the document cited by my hon. friend and also in the report of the departmental committee which sat in London in 1972.

Also I should like to refer to a precedent in our own House. Just after I brought down the budget on December 11, 1979, which brought down the House, a question of privilege was raised with respect to an alleged budgetary leak. I should like to refer Your Honour to the Wednesday, December 12, 1979, edition of Hansard at page 2283 where the now Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) raised a question of privilege. He said:

Such practice is based on the principle that no individual, whoever he may be, must know in advance the details of a budget which he could use for personal gains.

I submit that the budget is a budgetary process. The details of expenditures, the total government spending, the amount of the deficit for the coming year, what the interest charges are to be on the budget, what the government's fiscal stance is, are they really practising restraint or not, are they following what they said in the budget, are all part of the same process.

Then the minister alleged that there was a leak of information in connection with the budget in a CTV broadcast. He went on in his remarks to deal with that situation. Then he moved the following motion:

That the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be instructed to investigate the advance knowledge by journalists and others of measures to be proposed in the budget, including proposed changes in corporate and commodity taxes, in advance of the delivery of the budget—

That was the essence of his motion. Here we are discussing knowledge by journalists and others. We know who the others are; there are thousands of others who had advance knowledge of measures proposed in the estimates of this government, a large part of the budget.

Also on that question of privilege, as the minister of finance of the day, I naturally spoke in response to that motion. I said that I did not take any responsibility for any leak of budgetary information, and in fact there was no leak. That was my response to that question of privilege. It was a flat statement of fact that there was no leak, and I would take no responsibility for it because there had not been a leak.

Your Honour's predecessor made a decision, as reported at page 2287 of Hansard. He said:

When the Minister of Finance at any time stands in his place and says, as he has said today, that there is no leak, that he has examined and attempted to discover whether there was and finds none, and therefore does not take responsibility for one and, furthermore, disputes the fact that one in fact took place, that word must be accepted.

That is not the situation here. We have a situation here where the President of the Treasury Board cannot stand in his place and say there is no leak. He cannot do that. There has been a gigantic leak. It is not a leak; it is a veritable flood. The news media of this country was given all of this information before the House was given it. So he cannot say that there is no leak. There was a leak from 3.45 yesterday afternoon and subsequent to that. There was a leak which, the news media alleged, was aided and abetted by the government House leader who, they say, gave them permission to go ahead at 6.40 p.m. with publication. He has not said that he examined and attempted to discover whether there was one and finds none. He cannot say he was not responsible for one. He arranged the lock-up. The President of the Treasury Board arranged a lock-up for the press only at eleven o'clock yesterday morning in the precincts of this Parliament.

I point out that ruling to show Your Honour that we have an entirely different situation. The Speaker of the day went on to say:

> I cannot find on the face of the motion, as I am being asked to find, that there has been a publication—

Your Honour can take judicial knowledge of the fact that it was in every paper of the country, that it was on television news broadcasts, radio broadcasts, and it appeared in The Toronto Star which was brought before the House this afternoon. So, there is no question about publication.

In conclusion, why is this important? Why does this have any importance, apart altogether from the fact that some people might have been able to take advantage of having some advance knowledge, a few hours of advance knowledge, before the rest of the public with respect to this matter? It is important for this reason. It is part of the pattern of conduct which Your Honour has observed in this Parliament since we came back here in the winter of 1980. It is part of the course of conduct by the government. If Your Honour does not stop it, then we on this side of the House cannot hope to have any effect whatsoever or to be treated with any of the normal parliamentary courtesies. We have seen this happen week after week. It is part of a process of making statements outside the House and refusing to make them in the House. It is part of a process which was brought out in a question of privilege by my hon. colleague the other day with respect to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). It is part of a process which was demonstrated in the question of privilege yesterday, which took up 1.5 hours, by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) with respect to the rights of members of this House to represent their districts. One of the traditions of this House is that these financial measures should be introduced here first before they are given to any outside body.

It has become the custom in the last few years to have lock-ups for members of the press to help them inform the public, but it has also been the practice, when the media has been informed so that they can better inform the public, that the members on this side of the House are also informed so that we can carry out our function and respond to the estimates, the budget, or whatever it is, once it is tabled in this House and becomes public knowledge.

But if the President of the Treasury Board can decide that he will enlighten the news media, that he will give his version to the news media and the public of Canada, and he will not permit us to examine what he is doing until he actually tables it in the House, then surely it is a contempt of this House for him to be permitted to have a lock-up of the news media or anyone else in advance of this information being presented to the House.

It is part of a process whereby members of the House are treated with contempt. We are treated as nothing when we are treated as though there were no parliamentary tradition, when we are treated as though the government did not care so long as our question of privilege did not meet the technical qualifications of privilege. Of course, a question of privilege is extremely technical in any event, but as long as they can stay outside the narrow, technical confines of the laws of Parliament, it is in order.

Now we have the President of the Treasury Board, of whom we expect better, a gentleman learned in the law but already flawed by the arrogance of his government in his few short months in office, treating members of the House in that way.

All Madam Speaker has to find is that there is a prima facie case. In my opinion, this is clearly not an open and shut case. I would ask Your Honour to exercise your discretion and send this matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. Let them establish the facts; let them decide what the rules should be. Otherwise, we can forget budgetary secrecy, we can forget that whole process, because anything will go and there will be no rules to deal with it at all.

Madam Speaker: I will now hear one speaker from the New Democratic Party, and then I will decide whether I have heard enough on this question.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, certainly I will be brief, given that this matter has taken a considerable length of time. I must say, like many members who have spoken, that I have been disturbed over the course of the time I have been here by the practice ministers have followed of making important statements outside the House. However, this does not constitute a breach of my privilege. Sometimes I wish it did, but it does not.

What Your Honour has before you is a difficult question. There are three questions to be dealt with, as I see them.

• (1610)

First, is the release of the estimates prior to tabling a breach of our privilege? If you were to decide, upon reflection, that it is a breach of our privilege, the second question then must be: Is the method currently in use to protect the secrecy of the statements adequate? If you were to decide, upon reflection, that the answer to that question is no, then what further action must be taken?

I think those are the three questions which must be answered.

First, I want to say that there is a distinction between a budget, on the one hand, and the estimates, on the other. The reason for the secrecy of the budget documents is to guarantee that no one can profit from prior knowledge of the content and changes in the budget. When you compare that with the estimates, there is some distinction. It is somewhat more difficult to see where profit could be made from prior knowledge of the estimates, since there is no requirement that the government move any bill or motion on the estimates as a matter of ongoing practice. Therefore, the estimates could be introduced to the House at any time. It would be very difficult to present a case that a person who is not connected with the House of Commons, having information of what is contained in the estimates hours or moments in advance of its introduction, could make a substantial profit.

The second point is one which concerns me greatly, and that is the current method used in protecting the secrecy of the budget and the estimates. The lock-up process that we currently have in place is fundamentally flawed and inadequate. I want to suggest to the ministers through you, Madam Speaker, that if they decide to use the lock-up process and give advance confidential information to the press or to Members of Parliament, they must guarantee that these individuals remain in the lock-up until the minister rises.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Deans: That is the practice which is followed in other jurisdictions, and that is the tradition followed in the Mother of Parliaments. Therefore, I suggest that the practice we follow—I, myself, have been involved in adjuring the most recent budget—of inviting both members of the press and members of the opposition to a pre-budget briefing, and then to allow any or all of them to leave before the minister rises to begin the delivery, is a flaw in the system. If the minister believes—and he may or may not do so—and if you, Madam Speaker, believe—and you, of course, will tell us shortly—that the estimate papers are confidential until such time as the minister rises, then the entire process is wrong, and the minister must then accept the responsibility for the fact that the press were permitted to leave the lock-up in advance of his tabling the documents.

However, if you come to the conclusion that the budget is somewhat different from the estimates and that there is no opportunity for individuals to profit from advance knowledge, then the minister—though his action is perhaps unacceptable to members of the opposition, and maybe even members of his own party, in terms of sharing government information in advance, of making it public to the general public—if you were to decide that that is the case, then I can only say that you must rule that there is no actual breach of privilege.

The information that government decides to give to the opposition, and the way in which it is given, is frequently inadequate. The member who just spoke, the former minister of finance, the member for St. John's East—

An hon. Member: West.

Mr. Deans: St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), thank you—is expressing a frustration that many people feel: that ministers do not treat the House of Commons with the respect which it deserves.

I think that in your deliberations, Madam Speaker, you might give some thought to whether or not there are occasions when ministers should bring their statements to the House in advance of holding press conferences, because not doing so adds to the level of frustration and acrimony in the House of Commons. God knows, we do not need any more than we have. It makes the opposition suspicious of the government's motives, and it creates a sense of ill-will which does this country no good.

We are discussing more than a question about the procedure used by the minister. I am annoyed by it, and I think it is inappropriate. It would have been better to have had a proper lock-up with members of the opposition and members of the press present. That would have been the prudent and sensible thing to do.

If a lock-up is necessary, I think that it should extend to the point where the minister rises to table the documents. If that had been the case, this debate would never have occurred.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: He is just incompetent.

Mr. Deans: In the interest of not compounding the matter further, I think that we should stop the debate and let the minister table the documents so that we do not make an even greater mess of an already unacceptable situation.

Madam Speaker: I am going to inform the hon. members now that I feel that this consideration of the question of privilege has taken quite a lot of time; but that is not the point. The point is that I feel that I am sufficiently informed. The arguments are becoming repetitive, which is an indication to me that most of the points have probably been made. I quite understood the points made by five hon. members from the Conservative Party, one hon. member from the NDP, and in the three brief interventions from the other side. That is a sufficient number of speeches, not all of which were short, and I do feel that I have been sufficiently informed. I will take this matter under advisement and consider all of the arguments that the hon. members have submitted.

MR. BLENKARN—DENIAL OF ACCESS TO PRESS LOCK-UP BY DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, earlier today I advised you of a matter which I thought was a question of privilege, and it was in connection with the use of the Houses of Parliament.

Yesterday, I attended at room 200 at eleven o'clock in the morning. Mr. Sproat and Mr. Hardie—who I understand are employees of the Treasury Board, and not employees of the House of Commons—barred my access to a room in this House of Commons. I was then accosted by Mr. Radborn—another employee of the minister of the Treasury Board and not an employee of the House of Commons, who phoned Mr. R. L. Richardson—who is apparently a deputy secretary of the Treasury Board, who then again denied me access to part of the House of Commons.

Madam Speaker, you are in charge of the House of Commons on behalf of Members of Parliament, and clearly you can assign to a Member of Parliament—whether or not that

Member of Parliament is a minister of the Crown—space and facilities in this House of Commons, and Parliament. However, that is not what happened. You may have made arrangements for the use of Room 200 by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) or a member of his staff; but neither the President of the Treasury Board nor his parliamentary secretary—or even a Member of Parliament—were in charge of that room. The only employees of the House of Commons present were the constables who look after the general security of that building. The people who denied me and my colleagues access to Room 200 were public servants who worked for a ministry and who have their offices elsewhere than in this House. The problem is that this minister and this government, in denying access to Parliament, are guilty of the same kind of thing as happened under the reign of Charles II.

● (1620)

Members of Parliament have been denied access to the facilities of Parliament by officers of the Crown. That goes to the fundamental principle of how the House of Commons, Parliament itself, is supposed to operate. The essence of the battle is that Parliament is a separate place; it is not part of the government. The government is a different thing than Parliament. Members of cabinet are often members of this House of Commons or members of the other place but that does not entitle them, other than in the course of their duties as members or as ministers of the Crown, to allow their public servants who run the departments of government to decide what Members of Parliament can or cannot do in the House of Commons. That is essentially what happened yesterday.

Without wasting the time of the House, Madam Speaker, or being accused of conducting a filibuster, I want to say that the essence of what happened yesterday is that Members of Parliament were denied access, and their privilege was interfered with, not by any Member of Parliament or an officer of Parliament who had assigned a particular room to a member of Parliament on your instructions through your service, but by officers of a ministry. That is wrong. That is a breach of the privileges of a Member of Parliament. On that basis, Madam Speaker, I would ask you to find that this matter should be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Madam Speaker: I think I can deal rather quickly with this question of privilege. I would say to the hon. member that whenever he asks me to let him have a room in which to conduct a meeting, to hold a reception of for whatever other reason the rooms in the House of Commons are used by members, he would be perfectly authorized to stop someone at the door in order to avoid having some people crash his party or attend a meeting to which they were not invited. I would have to assume that that person was there under his authority, even if that person was not a Member of Parliament. In the same way I would say that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) who asked me for a room and was given access to it, which is normal for any members of the House of Commons, would have the right to determine to whom to give access to whatever business he was conducting in that room.

If, under the guise of that question of privilege, the hon. member—I would not say he wishes to make me decide whether or not a room of the House of Commons was used—is saying that I would have to rule on who should be invited to the lock-up, I am afraid I have to tell him that that is totally outside my purview.

I can therefore deal quite quickly with this question of privilege. I do not think there is one.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1981-82

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates with regard to sums required for the Public Service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1982, was presented by hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Madam Speaker to the House.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I am certain that my colleagues will allow me to introduce the following motion relating to the tabling of the main estimates.

[English]

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I move, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 59, that the Main Estimates 1981-82 tabled this day be referred to the several standing committees of the House as follows. Because the list is rather long and there is a detailed allocation of the estimates to the committees, if it is agreeable to the House, I ask the list be printed in Hansard as if it had been read.

[Editor's Note: The list referred to is as follows:]

That the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982, Tabled on Wednesday, February 25, 1981, be referred to the several Standing Committees of the House as follows:

To the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs

Veterans Affairs Votes 1, 5, 10, 15, 20, 25 and 30

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my only question with respect to that and on the agreement is whether the minister can assure me that the precedent on the reference follows the precedents of other years and that there is nothing unusual about it because I have not seen a copy of the reference, if he can do that, I am quite prepared to agree.

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Madam Speaker. I am told that it is the usual motion. I will make sure that within seconds or minutes my colleagues have a copy. I am sorry it is not ready. It was not distributed, but we thought we were to table the estimates much later.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the minister can clarify for me if the estimates have been tabled.

Mr. Knowles: Weren't you here?

Mr. Stevens: No, they have not.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the President of the Privy Council. Is it agreed that this motion be accepted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT OF THE TREASURY BOARD

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to be able to make a statement following the tabling of the estimates which has taken an undue length of time. I am sorry that members of the opposition, of the Tory party, have played the role of des vierges offensées because I elected to follow the procedure which is the only procedure followed in the past with respect to the lock-up. I will undertake to ensure that in future the luncheon invitation will be extented to a greater number of members or that some other procedure is adopted in order to avoid the incredible inconvenience foisted upon us by the game that has been played in the past few days.

I find it interesting that the same members who have shown such concern about not attending a press lock-up, declined to accept an invitation from me several weeks ago when I offered to review the new form of the estimates with members of the opposition. Curiously enough, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) did not show up for that meeting, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) did not show up for that meeting, the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) did not show up for that meeting, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) did not come to the meeting and, needless to say, neither did the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) show up for that meeting.

Before I go to the substance of my comments, I would draw to the attention of the House that members opposite were aware last week that I was to table the estimates on February 25. I would point out that no one from either of the opposition parties requested a lock-up with respect to these estimates. The press lock-up has been a tradition. As you know, the press are subject to an embargo. I pointed out yesterday, and I point out again by way of introductory remarks, that the traditional procedures have been followed.

Estimates

● (1630)

The statement which I am about to make bears a close resemblance to some of the material which has appeared in a number of newspapers. It is somewhat with a sense of déjà vu that I approach this task, but I insist that I should not be subject to any copyright infringement.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Dispense with the statement.

An hon. Member: Carry on.

Mr. Johnston: If I may, I will shorten the statement to a number of points in which members of the House will be interested.

For the first time, the estimates are contained in two parts. Part 1, entitled the "Government Expenditure Plan", is the new document of which I spoke when I tabled information on the new form of the estimates several weeks ago. Part 2 is the traditional blue book.

I would point out that the updated expenditure plan to 1983-1984, set out in part 1 of the estimates, provides for the same total spending level in 1981-1982 and the future years as was envisaged by my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), in his budget last October. The expenditure plan I have tabled today reflects a more detailed costing of departmental programs, as a result of the review leading to preparation of these main estimates because the material was not available at the time of the budget. I should note the detailed spending plan is based on the same set of assumptions about the Canadian economy as were presented in the budget. Further, the fiscal plan presented in October provided specifically for the adjustments of detail which have been reflected in these estimates.

Total spending of $67.6 billion in 1981-1982 is 12.8 per cent higher than last year's level. This rate of growth, while somewhat higher than over the past few years, is below 1980-1981 growth. Total spending is forecast to increase by about 10 per cent in the two planning years beyond 1981-1982. I would stress that these increases meet the government's continuing commitment to expenditure restraint. In the budget, the government reaffirmed its commitment to keep the growth in spending to less than the trend in the economy as a whole, and this spending profile set forth in these main estimates honours that pledge.

It is important for members to place the spending plans of this government within the context of the government's continuing commitment to restraint adopted in 1975. You will recall that government spending in the 1974-1975 period increased over the previous year by 28 per cent at a time when inflation was approximately 11 per cent. From that time on, major reforms have been progressively implemented to give effect to a rational policy of restraint to approach spending cuts with what I call the carving knife rather than the meat axe. It is in this spirit that we have initiated and carried forward the improvement in management practices and controls through the office of the Comptroller General. It is in this spirit that we have introduced the new policy and expenditure management system. It is in this spirit that we have tightened up administrative practices so as to effectively address the problem of cost overruns on Crown projects, and it is also in this spirit that we have consistently, over the past several years, held the increase in authorized person-years to less than 1 per cent. In other words, our objective has been, and continues to be, to ensure that the taxpayers' dollars spent by the federal government are well spent, and that taxpayers receive value for money.

Last week, as members know, the President of the United States announced cuts in direct spending of $41.4 billion from the U.S. federal budget which will now be in the range of $700 billion for the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1981, this together with a proposed tax cut totalling 30 per cent by mid-1984. The President has also proposed reforms to reduce regulation and red tape, as well as major changes in the depreciation allowances for business and industry to expedite modernization and research and development.

The U.S. administration has embarked upon what we in Canada already know to be a difficult, painful, and often frustrating exercise. And I cannot help but point out, when considering the President's program, that what the U.S. government proposes to do for three years we have been doing for the past seven.

Mr. Blenkarn: Nonsense.

Mr. Johnston: Specifically, and this is for the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), the indexation of personal exemptions and personal tax brackets introduced in 1974 has had the effect of reducing the revenues of this government in 1980-1981 alone by $7.5 billion. I might add these are the numbers which appeared in the budget of the then minister of finance, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), in December, 1979. Moreover, the changes in depreciation allowances and the new proposals for research and development proposed by President Reagan, bring the U.S. federal tax system in this area very much in line with the one we have enjoyed in Canada for many years. And as far as regulatory reform is concerned, designed to reduce both the cost of government and the cost to the private sector, we are rapidly moving ahead with work programs across the federal government to achieve exactly the same objectives as those proposed by President Reagan. I announced those measures some time ago.

I can assure you that we will continue to apply the policy of fiscal restraint within the parameters and within the philosophy that I have outlined. Let me now turn to a brief review of the highlights of the 1981-1982 estimates.

The 1981-1982 main estimates provide for budgetary expenditures of $64.6 billion which is 11.6 per cent higher than budgetary expenditures in 1980-1981. The 1981-1982 main estimates also provide for loans, investments and advances of just over $1 billion. Total reserves of $3.6 billion have been included in the expenditure framework for 1981-1982 to cover adjustments to statutory and voted programs as well as new initiatives the government might wish to undertake during the course of the year and any other unforeseen requirements. If all these reserves are used for supplementary estimates, total estimates at the end of 1981-1982 would be $69.2 billion. Two adjustments must then be made in reconciling total estimates to planned total spending of $67.6 billion. First, total estimates must be adjusted downward for repayments of previous years' loans that are not offset by new loans. The current estimate of these repayments is $544 million.

Second, since the government cannot legally spend more money than Parliament authorizes and, in fact, always spends less, an adjustment for this lapse of expenditure authority must be made. The current projection of the lapse for 1981-1982 is $1.064 billion.

[Translation]

In summary, Mr. Speaker, these estimates and the Government Expenditure Plan of which they form a part, clearly indicate that this government is meeting the concerns of Canadians in a number of areas. The estimates continue to provide for the indexation of payments to the elderly, to help them cope with the higher costs of living. They include funds to cover this government's commitments in the areas of social needs, regional development, housing, employment development and assistance to native peoples. They provide for assistance to farmers and industry to help cope with the changing economic times. The expenditure plan includes $2 billion in total over the three years to 1983-84 which has been identified to help promote economic development in western Canada. In 1981-82, $350 million of this total is provided for, and specific information on the allocation of these funds will be included in future supplementary estimates. Finally, the estimates and the government spending plan will go a long way toward meeting the concerns of Canadians in the field of energy. The main estimates include about $700 million in spending under the National Energy Program. Other aspects of national energy plan initiatives will be included in future supplementary estimates.

[English]

I would now like to turn to a discussion of the size of the public service, Mr. Speaker. Ministers of the Treasury Board approached the growing demands for increased person-years with fairness but with a determination to keep over-all increases to less than one per cent. I am pleased to report that we achieved these objectives while at the same time not compromising the effective delivery of government services to the public. Members will note that substantial increases in person-years were made in some departments for that purpose. In particular, I would draw your attention to increases accorded the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The 1981-82 main estimates provide for 315,680 authorized person-years. This is an increase of 3,085 or just under one per cent from last year's level, which was our objective. This small increase follows two successive years of actual reductions in person-years and even with this increase we are still below the level of person-years authorized in 1975-76.

I would point our that of the total 3,085 increase in authorized person-years fully 1,373 person-years are for 1981-82 only, representing the requirements for the 1981 census. If one discounts this temporary increase, the total increase is only about 0.5 per cent. This 0.5 per cent rise is a net amount made up of increases in some areas of the federal public service which are partially offset by decreases elsewhere. The increases are largely in programs which deal directly with the public under conditions where the resources must be provided in keeping with the growing demand for services. In order to maintain an acceptable level of services, even after achieving reasonable productivity gains, the number of people delivering them must obviously increase. Examples include Revenue Canada, where the workload reflects the growing number of tax returns, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, where increased demands come partly from provinces and municipalities which contract with the federal government to provide a level of policing which meets their requirements.

As I have indicated, a particularly important area of increased person-year requirements is in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources where 470 new person-years are provided in the first stage of implementation of the National Energy Program announced in last October's budget. Important new initiatives necessitate additional human resources to ensure effective delivery and control of programs to which substantial financial allocations are being made.

Similarly, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans will receive a sizeable increase in person-years. This increase will provide for the rationalization of activities in the areas of fisheries management and ocean science research. This includes a provision to cover work previously done under contract in the Salmonid Enhancement Program.

I would like to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that this government, unlike the previous one, does not intend to implement arbitrary cuts to manage the size of the public service. Such arbitrary measures can cause serious damage to the level and quality of service of some very important programs and are clearly not a viable means for managing the public service.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You are absolutely right.

Mr. Johnston: Instead, this government plans, through an orderly review of all programs, to achieve savings by eliminating duplication of effort and by improving productivity and management.

[Translation]

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on the new document, the Government Expenditure Plan, that I have tabled as Part I of the estimates for the first time today. As you recall, I have released the government's proposals for reform of the estimates. These changes were initiated at the request of my fellow parliamentarians and the general public. The Government Expenditure Plan represents the completion of the first stage in that process.

The document contains a statement of the government's expenditure plan to 1983-84 and an analysis of that plan by policy sector and associated resource envelopes. It places the 1981-82 main estimates within the context of the total expenditure plan and highlights certain aspects of these estimates. Finally, one chapter each year will be devoted to special analyses of expenditure issues that are of current interest. This year, chapter 5 contains a reference paper that explains the different definitions of the size of the public service and analyses historical growth in the part of the Public Service which is controlled by the Treasury Board of Canada.

I would stress, Mr. Speaker, that this is the first edition of the Government Expenditure Plan. I fully expect that the structure and content of the document will evolve over time. As it is intended first and foremost to serve the needs of Parliament, I wish to urge hon. members to study it with care and advise me on changes and improvements that would enhance its value to them and to the Canadian public.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would remind hon. members of the commitment given by the Prime Minister in August, 1978, namely to provide Canadian taxpayers with more for less. The 1981-82 main estimates demonstrate the continuing commitment of this government to that objective.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen)—The Constitution—Query respecting telegram from British Columbia ecclesiastics; the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby)—National Energy Program—Implementation in eastern Canada; the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish)—Drought Assistance—Request for extension of boundaries.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1981-82

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE TREASURY BOARD

The House resumed consideration of a message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1982, presented by Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Madam Speaker to the House.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, we have only been presented with these estimates a few moments ago. Therefore, we cannot give an in-depth analysis at this stage. Even so, we have seen enough to know and to feel a great disappointment that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) is engaged in the same old shell game, the same old con game, that has been going on with this government for so many years in the past.

The President of the Treasury Board said there had been a game played in the last day. The minister hears nothing and he learns nothing. The game played in the last 24 hours has been a game by the President of the Treasury Board who has attempted to tamper with the right of Members of Parliament in ways that have been gone into in detail in the last few hours.

The President of the Treasury Board has learned nothing, and will continue to learn nothing, and unless you, Mr. Speaker, bring him to account nothing can be done, because we have to look to you for protection from the kind of arrogance that was exemplified in that remark.

The minister made a fatal mistake in his statement. He said "these estimates are based on the same assumptions as in the budget". I am quoting his exact words. The budget was last October 28, almost four months ago. He said "the assumptions on which our spending estimates are based are the same as in the budget." Has he not listened in this House for the last couple of months? The assumptions in the budget of October 28 of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) have all proven to be completely incorrect in the last several months.

The minister's budgetary document forecast inflation for this year to be 10.2 per cent. The inflation rate for this year, 1981-82, is already 12 per cent. How can these estimates be based on an inflation estimate of 10.2 per cent, as is the case, if it is on the same assumptions as in the budget? If that is the case, they are completely out of whack already.

• (1650)

Then, Mr. Speaker, there was an assumption in the budget, and the documents that accompany the budget, that the Canadian dollar this year would trade in the area of 87½ cents U.S. Well, what is it trading at today? Just between 83 cents and 84 cents. What was it last week? Down around 82 cents. That is another assumption in the budget last fall which was completely wrong, and that is going to raise the cost of the minister's borrowing outside Canada by a very considerable extent.

Interest rates, Mr. Speaker: what were the assumptions on interest rates in the budget of October 28? The assumptions there were that interest rates were going to decrease quite rapidly in 1981. Has anybody noticed interest rates decreasing rapidly? They have been high now ever since the late fall. Unless there has been some change today—and I did not get a chance today to hear what happened to the Bank of Canada rate—it is now 18¼ per cent at the banks and has not changed for a number of months.

So assumption after assumption of the budget of last October 28 has been shown by events to be wrong; yet this minister says that he has presented his estimates on the same assumptions as in the budget. Well, we can already see that his estimates are pretty well worthless.

Just look at his statement, Mr. Speaker. Examine the statement that the minister just gave. He gave it to the press yesterday and it went to the world yesterday, and we are getting it now and we can comment on it now, 24 hours later. He says that total spending—the first page—of $67.6 billion in 1981-82 is 12.8 per cent higher than the forecast for 1980-81.

It was the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of this government that, in a solemn commitment in Toronto in January of 1980, said that the rate of spending "under our government will not increase more than the real increase in the gross national product". That was his statement. It was proven to be entirely false last year, and this year, on these estimates brought before the House, it is false again. The Minister of Finance says we should change that because it was a trend line. How trendy the Liberal government is! They are always so trendy that they just suit many people up in Toronto, the sophisticated, trendy types, on the trend line of the gross national product. But it is not on the trend line of the gross national product. It is not on the gross national product at all. That is another promise broken.

Nor is the spending, Mr. Speaker, $67.6 billion. The minister there is trying to hide his real spending. What is he hiding? One item that he is hiding is $2.4 billion in spending for oil subsidization under the oil import subsidization program. That is not apparent in the estimates this year, Mr. Speaker. Why not? Because the Minister of Finance imposed new charges on the public, and the public is going to pay into a fund $2.4 billion this year that is going to be spent on the oil import subsidization plan.

So there are only several hundred millions of dollars still appearing in the estimates, rather than the total amount which would be several hundred million plus $2.4 billion. So why is the President of the Treasury Board trying to pretend to the people of Canada that his spending is only going to be $67.6 billion? You have to add to that $2.4 billion in spending on the oil import subsidy plan. That brings the spending, when you add that on, up to $70 billion. And it is not a 12.8 per cent increase; it is a considerably larger increase. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, there is another incorrect statement.

Let us compare this with the estimates of previous years. Last year, in the budget of October 28, the unemployment insurance contributions went up: a very considerable increase. Everybody employed in this country today who pays unemployment insurance premiums is paying more because of the minister's budget of October 28, and the increased sums paid in those premiums are being used to meet the increased employment costs. So additional hundreds of millions—I haven't got the exact figures here now—but a billion, or a billion and a half, or whatever the amount is, has to be added on to the $67.6 billion if there is to be any correspondence with previous years for actual spending by the government.

So it is not 12.8 per cent; it is not 13 per cent; it is not 13.5 per cent: it is something very much in excess of all of that. And the gentleman who is doing all the secret spending—or they try to keep it secret—is now in the House facing us, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). So much for restraint!

Mr. Speaker, this statement of the President of the Treasury Board is so ludicrous, if it was not so serious for Canada. Let us look at page 2 of his statement. I quote him, Mr. Speaker:

> And I cannot help but point out, Madam Speaker, when considering the President's program—

That is the program of President Reagan announced a week ago. What the U.S. government proposes to do for three years we have been doing for the past seven years. Imagine, what President Reagan proposed last week, this government has done for seven years! Mr. Speaker, how does this square with Hansard of Thursday, February 19, when the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) put a question to the Minister of Finance about priorities and suggested to him that, if he wants guidance, he should take a look at President Reagan's economic package which he presented last night. That is at page 7454. The hon. member for St. John's East asked that. He said that if he wants guidance, he should look at President Reagan's economic package. And here is what the Minister of Finance said.

An hon. Member: Is that where you got your ideas?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the untrammelled rabble over there are trying to heckle me, but it will not do any good; rabble can't bother me. At page 7455 of Hansard, here is what the Minister of Finance said:

> I want to tell the hon. member that I do not intend to take guidance, as he has suggested, from the message given last night by the President of the United States in terms of the reduction of expenditures.

Why don't these two get their act together? The President of the Treasury Board is taking guidance right from the President, and he says that for seven years he has been doing what President Reagan is doing; that is what his government has been doing. He said that we are rapidly moving ahead with work programs across the federal government to achieve exactly the same objectives as those proposed by President Reagan; and just last Thursday, February 19, the Minister of Finance scoffed at President Reagan. He said this:

Shall I take guidance and reduce spending on the arts and humanities? Shall I take guidance and reduce expenditures on welfare, as the hon. member suggests? Shall I take guidance . . . that is the kind of guidance I am not taking from the Leader of the Opposition . . . or from the President of the United States.

Who is in control of this government?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Nobody is in control.

Mr. Crosbie: Is it the Minister of Finance, who is anti-Reagan and anti-everything he stands for, according to Hansard of February 19; or is it the President of the Treasury Board, who today trots out President Reagan and says that he has "out-Reaganed" Reagan. That is what he said in his statement here today, that he is rapidly moving ahead with work programs. What are the work programs that he is rapidly moving ahead with that are going to cut our budget just as much as President Reagan is cutting the budget of the United States of America? The people would like to know that, Mr. Speaker. Let us move along; time passes; we cannot spend too much time on this preliminary look.

Mr. Speaker, the government is planning to spend $3.8 billion more next year than would have been spent were we still in office. They continue in their spendthrift ways. I do not know where President Reagan comes in on this. This President of the Treasury Board has had to admit to this serious situation—and it is serious. The public debt of Canada is going to cost us, in 1981-82, according to the estimate—and it is a low estimate because it is based on interest rate assumptions now out of date—$12,350 million. That is more than the entire budget of Canada was less than ten years ago. A huge amount of money!

The taxpayers of Canada are going to have to cough up in taxes this year, or they are going to have to lend to the government, sufficient funds to pay $12,350 million: 19.1 per cent of the government's spending, according to their own figures, and it is actually much higher, is going to go in interest payments and debt charges on the public debt. Hon. gentlemen over there may be able to say that that does not worry them. They are not worrying because they are only thinking of the short term. They never think of the long term. They are not worrying about what is going to happen to Canada in four of five years' time when this is up to 24 per cent, 25 per cent or 30 per cent, where it is headed to if hon. gentlemen opposite stay in office. They are not worried that so much of the revenue taken from the people of Canada has to go out entirely—it does not provide a service. It provides nothing. Just to meet their profligate spending of the last ten years, all these interest payments have to go out. They have had deficits every year since 1972-73, and this year they now say they are going to have a deficit of $13.7 billion. They say their deficit last year was $14.2 billion, and this year it is going to be $13.7 billion. If you apply 10 per cent only in interest to the $13.7 billion they are going to borrow this year, that is some $1.37 billion more in interest costs alone in the year following that, and on and on and on it goes under these gentlemen. But they do not care. They do not worry. They are not worried about anything like that. What are they going to do? Well, the minister talked about a document, or one of his releases deals with federal transfers to the provinces, territories and municipalities. Where the government thinks it is going to save some money next year and the years to come after that is on hospital insurance, medicare, post-secondary education, extended health care programs, equalization. Just look at the figures attached to this document of February 25, 1981, and see what the minister is going to do. The minister is now going to squeeze the provinces. The provinces that this government forced into a position where they could not refuse to come in on these programs are now going to be left stranded and told by the Government of Canada that they have to accept more and more of the burden for these programs that were instituted under the pressure and direction of the Government of Canada. This is where they think they are going to achieve their savings.

With respect to fiscal equalization, Newfoundland got $416.7 million in 1981-82, or that is the estimate. Newfoundland got $79.7 million for hospital insurance, $27.4 million for medicare, $50.7 million for post-secondary education and so forth. All together total cash transfers amount to $730 million. The total altogether across Canada is $13.783 billion. This is where the government says it is going to save the money. It is going to squeeze Newfoundland until the pips squeak because Newfoundland will not do its bidding, and it is going to squeeze the provinces. It is not going to worry about its debt payments or how they are mounting up or whatever else they are going to do. It is just going to squeeze the provinces, and the minister gives us the figures so we can see just what that is going to cost them.

There was a boast. The minister boasts. I am not sure whether he does or not. They have been boasting that they are spending more on economic development. Well, it is significant that they are spending less on economic development. The expenditure envelopes have changed. Instead of spending $7.155 billion on economic development, they are going to spend $6.873 billion. So there is a diminution in their emphasis and priority on economic development.

We have to point this out to show you how quick we are mathematically and how in a quick few minutes I could do this computation. The estimated cost of services for the government in 1980-81 was $4 billion. That is the cost of services performed, people carrying out services for the government, overhead. In the fall, the Minister of Finance projected that the cost for this year, 1981-82, would be $4.5 billion. But now in the document tabled by the President of the Treasury Board that spending is up to $4.7 billion, a 17 per cent increase in the overhead. Already, since October 28 they have had to revise spending on their own services, their own fat cat selves. They spend on the hiring of Liberal consulting firms, the hiring of Liberal lawyers—all these very, very valuable services, the doing of surveys, the carrying out of polls, this kind of service. The spending there is going from $4 billion to $4.7 billion.

The minister wants to try to tell us that he has real restraint in effect in government. We know different, and we will be pointing that out when these estimates go to committee.

What else can I say with this short notice? I have a newspaper here from St. John's, Newfoundland. It came up today, Thursday, February 26. The Daily News says this: "Feds to fund synchrolift". This is the synchrolift in my district of St. John's West that the federal government has refused to fund. It has advised the province and Canadian National that it will not provide these moneys that were supposed to be in the estimates last year and this year. This daily paper printed down in St. John's in the early hours of this morning said they have had a look at the estimates. Tom Sullivan of The Daily News, special from Ottawa, said that there is $11.5 million in the estimates for the synchrolift for the dockyard in St. John's. This will show you how accurate these estimates are because I will make the prediction right now that if that $11.5 million is in the estimates, it is not going to be spent on a synchrolift in St. John's; it will be spent on other little projects, public works projects in Canada, but not on the synchrolift. But if that turns out not to be the case, then I think that this is the one item in the estimates that I can look at and say it would be money well spent and the government would be carrying out solemn commitments and pledges it has made in the past.

It also has to be noted that the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board have to get together because the Post Office is going to have a further deficit this year. The figure is over $500 million. I do not have it right at my fingertips at the moment. Yes, here it is; no, it is not.

An hon. Member: Is it?

Mr. Crosbie: I am sure you will forgive me while I look to get the exact amount. There are so many papers. They have been pawed over by so many people before we ever got them that I cannot find them right at the moment.

An hon. Member: You are always mixed up.

Mr. Crosbie: I ask hon. gentlemen for patience. Here it is. The Post Office is going to cost more to run this year—1981-82—and it is going to wind up with a $557 million deficit. When we look at the budget speech of October 28, we see in that budget speech the statement that they are not including any spending on a deficit for the Post Office for the year 1981-82 because they say the Post Office is going to break even, it is not going to cost the government anything; and that is why the Minister of Finance in his budget speech explains that he has no expenditures under the Post Office, yet three and a half months later, what is to happen? It is going to have a $557 million deficit.

All of this is to say that we cannot take this statement by the President of the Treasury Board seriously. It is a con game. It is a gigantic shell game on the people of Canada. It is a charade. I only hope he comes through with his vastly improved estimates so that people will be in a position to understand them more easily, if they can understand them at all, when they are presented. But to date I am afraid he has been a very, very great disappointment in his position, which he has further added to by his behaviour in the last 24 hours.

So these are our first preliminary comments. My hon. colleague who is our critic on the Treasury Board will have a lot more and a lot more detail as to what is wrong with these estimates when he gets a chance. I assume we are going to have a chance, after the New Democratic Party has made its statement, to ask questions of the minister and get some more detail on this, but it is a disappointing charade. It is bad news for Canada. The spending is up. The debt is up. The government is not meeting its commitments. It is based on the same false assumptions in the budget. It will not help the economy. It will not help the Canadian dollar. It will further depress it because the evidence in here is that the government does not care about inflation and that it has no real fiscal plan. It is just lying there. The government is just drifting. The government is on a gradualist course of action. As I said last night, the government is like shaver soap. It does not sink, it does not float; it is just lying there becalmed in water. The only one doing anything—and he is doing a lot of damage to the economy—is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

It is a great disappointment. I am afraid there is no way we can congratulate the minister on his performance or on the detail he has given us today.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the tabling of the 1981-82 estimates in this House on behalf of the New Democratic Party. I am not nearly as disappointed with the estimates as I am with the conduct of this House over the past 24 hours. I expected to be responding some time yesterday around four o'clock. I find myself responding a day later at five o'clock because of an error in judgment made by the Liberals and because of the activities of the Conservative Party which followed after that.

● (1710)

I would like to say that I am pleased with two other aspects, besides the tabling of the 1981-82 estimates. I am pleased with the new form of the estimates, Part I, which was brought before us today, the government spending plan. I would like to say a few words about the second part, being the new form of the estimates which will be before us in the coming years. I would like to commend the past public accounts committees of both governments for the work they have done in making Parliament more aware so that government is more responsive and accountable to the people of Canada. I am looking forward to the new form of the estimates which are to come before us. As I said, I would like to commend the work which has been done through the public accounts committee, the office of the Auditor General and the new office of the Comptroller General, which has done a lot of work in bringing about the revised form of the estimates.

I am looking forward to the government's expenditure programs, the estimates themselves, once they are revised substantially, and the guide which will go with it. I think these measures will go a long way in serving members of Parliament, so that they can have a more enlightened view of what is actually happening in the government with regard to spending and making the government accountable to Parliament. I think these measures will save a lot of research for members and their office staffs, since the new form of the estimates will be much more understandable than it was in the past.

The expenditure plans, especially in terms of the programs, will make departments sit down and look in an objective way at the programs they are putting out. They will have to justify what the objectives of the programs are and the funding which will go along with those programs. We, as members of Parliament, and the public accounts committee, can check against those expenditure plans of programs in future years by comparing it to the public accounts of Canada. I think that is a big step forward. Those who have worked very long and hard to bring this about should be commended.

I do not think the government can stop in terms of having a revised form of the estimates. I would like to see it proceed further in terms of freedom of information and to have the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) listen to recommendations made by the special task force which was set up this year to deal with regulatory reform. I would like the President of the Treasury Board to give some serious consideration to having permanent staff allocated to committees, such as the public accounts committee, so that there is some kind of consistency with regard to the people who are watching those committees.

I am concerned about the amount of the public debt. It is acknowledged that the public debt is the fastest growing envelope, increasing by 16 per cent. I do not see that the government has its public debt under control yet. That causes me some concern.

I would like to go on to say that the estimates have, in fact, increased the number of person-years by 3,085 for the 1981-82 estimates. I acknowledge the fact that many of these increases are in terms of the National Energy Program and in terms of the census which is to be taken this year.

I would like to say a few words about the National Energy Program itself. I feel there are some good objectives within it. I would like to see Canadians gain some increasing control of ownership within the petroleum industry in Canada. I feel that the political will is not necessarily being carried out in Canada with respect to this program. I fear that the government has placed the oil companies up against the wall and they are rebelling. Even though we do agree with many of the recommendations and objectives of the National Energy Program, we have a great deal of fear with respect to the way in which this program will be carried out.

I want also to respond to the inconsistency between the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the President of the Treasury Board in terms of one supporting the objectives of President Reagan and the other being opposed to them. I would like to reiterate that they should be getting together with respect to their approach to Canada's economy, decide the manner they will take to approach this and be consistent.

I would like to turn to the transfer of payments to the provinces, which was also touched on by the previous speaker. Including the statutory payments paid under the equalization program to the provinces, a large proportion of those payments is paid to eastern Canada as compared to what is paid to western Canada in terms of per capita population. I think this is a good sign. It shows an increase in the economic wealth of the western provinces. For example, 26.9 per cent of the population is contained in western Canada. In that figure I am using the 1976 census figures for the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, which make up this 26.9 per cent. Yet those same provinces only receive 11.3 per cent of equalization payments. The large balance, of course, goes to eastern Canada, that is from Ontario east, including the Atlantic provinces, which are in a worsening economic position.

Mr. Blenkarn: Ontario does not receive equalization payments.

Mr. Anguish: The hon. member says that there are no equalization payments being made to the province of Ontario. I would like to point out that in these transfer payments Newfoundland receives $440.5 million, Prince Edward Island receives $100 million, Nova Scotia receives $ 509.5 million, New Brunswick receives $429 million, Quebec receives $1,707.2 million and Ontario receives $85.5 million. The provinces I have mentioned are the ones I consider to be eastern Canada. I would like to deal with the provinces of western Canada. Manitoba receives $369.5 million, Saskatchewan only receives $2.2 million under the transfer payments. This is the amount that was agreed to under the British North America Act for statutory subsidies. The province of Alberta receives $40.7 million, British Columbia receives $4.1 million and the Northwest Territories and the Yukon each receive $0.3 million. The point I am trying to make is that there is a great transfer of the wealth in this country to western Canada, in terms of the western provinces helping to carry the load for the rest of Canada in the bad economic times we are facing. I am happy to see this. I do not see it as a necessarily negative aspect.

Also, I would like to say that I am concerned about the government and its expenditure plans. It is transferring a great deal of the responsibility for payment of some programs to provincial and municipal governments. It is a cost which they cannot afford to be absorbing. The two programs that come to my mind immediately are the community services contribution program and the costs of policing. The community services contribution program provided a great deal of funding to needy municipalities across this country. This program has not been cut off. At this point in time there will be nothing to follow it up. This creates a void within some of the municipal governments across Canada.

In The Battlefords-Meadow Lake, the constituency which I represent, there are some communities such as Uranium City which will have its payments for policing costs go up this year over last by 95 per cent. In the town of The Battlefords the cost is going up by 91 per cent. I would like to put the federal government on notice that there are some very serious concerns here about policing within many communities. These communities will have to look at alternative forms of policing. They do not want to do this because they are very happy with the RCMP and the arrangements which they have had with them. They may also have to cut back on their policing because of the policy of this government to transfer much of that responsibility over to the provinces and the municipal governments.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out some inconsistencies between what the federal government is trying to do and what is actually written in their document. I refer to the press kit fact sheet number four, which deals with the highlights of the ministry. I would like to turn to the entry under energy, mines and resources and deal specifically with Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. AECL had a budget in 1980-81 of $144.2 million. That budget has been increased in the 1981-82 estimates by $133 million to render a total for 1981-82 of $277.6 million. This is a whopping increase for Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, especially when I know, as a member of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, that this same Crown corporation came before that committee and asked for forgiveness of $893 million because of some management, planning and marketing problems. There is no indication at this point in time that those problems have been rectified. At the same time, the government is allocating an increase of $133 million to the same organization which is asking for forgiveness because of bad management, not necessarily now but certainly in the past. The things which enter into this are outstanding loans and bad planning, for example, with respect to the Glace Bay heavy water plant that is not promoting sales at the present time. That plant is stocking reservoirs of heavy water for future prospective sales and no marketing strategy has been outlined. Also the Laprade plant in Quebec is in a partially completed state and will never likely be used. AECL has mothballed it at a cost of several million dollars.

• (1720)

I should like to raise further questions on these matters when the minister is entertaining questions in terms of the estimates for this year. All in all, I do not see these estimates as being quite as drastic as do members of the Conservative party. Our party is concerned about the federal deficit and that there is a lack of control on the purse at this time, but I am very enthusiastic about some of the things which are happening in terms of improved accountability and improved information to Parliament respecting the revised estimates and the work of the office of the Comptroller General who, I feel, is doing a good job.

With those comments, I should like to close. I look forward to asking the minister some questions on the topic of the 1981-82 estimates.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. We are on statements by ministers. In the circumstances, there are no hard and fast rules. Accordingly, perhaps it would be advisable if I indicated what I think might be a reasonable procedure, but of course the Chair will be guided by the mood of the House.

First, I want to recognize the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) who is the Treasury Board critic. Because he was unable to be here earlier, I would expect to recognize him for three or four questions.

Following that, my hope would be that hon. members might feel it satisfactory to deal with the matter by asking a question and a supplementary. As I said, it is not a ruling, it is a suggestion of the Chair, and matters will proceed in accordance with the mood of the House.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I had to give a speech off the Hill at four o'clock and missed the privilege of replying to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) before this time.

I should like to refer him to page 2 of his prepared statement in which he compared the management direction of the Canadian government with the route upon which the United States administration has embarked. I notice that he tried to point out that the Canadian direction will be in line or parallel with the difficult task undertaken in the United States.

Recognizing that the President of the Treasury Board is a noted author of a book entitled: "Fiscalamity" and another book written in 1977, and recognizing his skill with the use of words, does he not feel he has gone too far in the third paragraph on page 2 of his statement? In actual fact, another way of putting it would be that the American deficit is 7 per cent of spending, whereas the Canadian deficit is 21 per cent of spending. In the United States, interest on debt as a percentage of revenue is $1 of tax out of $10 of revenue, whereas in Canada the interest on debt as a percentage of revenue is $1 of tax out of $4 of revenue.

In light of that information, I find a great deal of trouble reconciling or being sympathetic with his words in that paragraph, particularly when the direction in the United States is toward a balancing of its budget. If one looks at the projections in the estimates tabled by the minister, that does not seem to be the direction in which we are going. That is my first question.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would draw to the attention of the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) the fact that my comments indicated that we have practised restraint. I pointed out in my text that the spending in 1974-75 was in the neighbourhood of a 28 per cent increase. Since 1975, the government has consistently applied a policy of restraint. Moreover, if one looks back to 1978 and to August, 1978, one will see that the exercise undertaken at that time was very similar to the one which has now been proposed by President Reagan. I suggest that the cuts, in terms of what is discretionary, are almost in the same order of magnitude. Going beyond that, with respect to the tax cut aspects of the United States package, I believe Canadians take for granted that they have indexation in the personal income tax system in terms of exemptions and brackets.

Mr. Blenkarn: What has this to do with the estimates?

Mr. Johnston: I am saying that there was a tax cut each year for the past seven years in this country. In response to the ad hoc intervention of the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), it has a lot to do with it.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I thank the President of the Treasury Board. I hope he will read his answers to these questions and blush a little.

Also I note in the estimates under Petro-Canada an item of $100 million, yet Petro-Canada purchased Merit, a downstream distributor of oil, in Burnaby, British Columbia for $10 million and recently entered into an extravaganza with Petrofina for something like $1.4 billion. If the advice I am receiving from rather substantial economists in the land is correct, that $1.4 billion will turn out to be $2.4 billion by the time financing and interest costs are included, and perhaps it will cost the Crown corporation a further $1 billion per year.

Would the President of the Treasury Board please tell us where the authority is and the vote is for the purchase of these corporations in which Petro-Canada is involved? Is it a loan or a grant, other than the $100 million of equity? There was $80 million in the previous estimates and $100 million in the new estimates. That is a total of $180 million, yet we are getting into billions of dollars of acquisitions on the part of Petro-Canada.

Are contingent liabilities being created which are not shown in the estimates and in Crown corporations? Are we truly moving toward getting Crown corporations under control, or are we really avoiding the true nature of the debt which is being created through these estimates?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I draw to the attention of all members in the House, particularly the hon. member for Capilano, that we are looking at the main estimates. There is no provision in this document, in the main estimates, which reflects the Petrofina acquisition. Obviously supplementary estimates will be tabled during the course of the year, but in any event the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) indicated in the House the procedure for the acquisition program.

With respect to the other question as to whether or not Crown corporations are under control, I would say that the answer is yes, very much so. As I have said before in the House, I hope we will be bringing in a comprehensive, omnibus Crown corporations bill in the very near future which will basically follow up on the legislation and improve versions of the legislation tabled several years ago.

● (1730)

Mr. Huntington: Madam Speaker, I gather that the President of the Treasury Board is saying that the Petrofina purchase will be brought in on the supplementaries under the $1 vote. I wonder if he could help me with my concern that once that $1 vote is accepted, no change can be made and we are then really into contingency account financing.

If I could then move to the matter of the public service, the estimates show that it has now increased by 3,053. I am wondering if the minister could clarify a problem that I am having with that figure. His predecessor had reduced the public service by some 5,000, and yet he is showing only an increase of 3,053. Is it true that the actual increase is probably closer to 8,000? Also, can the minister explain the productivity figures of the Public Service Commission of Canada whereby their person-years have been reduced by 200. Even Statistics Canada figures show an increase of 1,300. The President of the Treasury Board is probably going to tell us that these are temporary. Is that not a way of misleading the House? If some of us forget, in the next estimates, that the 1,300 person-years shown by Statistics Canada are there on a temporary basis for the purpose of the census, what kind of control will we have over temporary person-years? Does the President of the Treasury Board really think that that should remain in the person-year category when it is strictly a temporary category? I am a little confused in this area. Is the figure of 3,053 an actual figure in light of the reduction that took place in that interim period?

Mr. Johnston: The fact sheet, No. 6, I think, is quite explicit in terms of what is taking place. As I indicated during my earlier remarks, the increase is being held at less than 1 per cent, as a result of very deliberate decisions—by ministers of the Treasury Board, and of exercising that policy of restraint over the size of the public service.

If the hon. member looks at the increases that I have indicated he will see a temporary increase, because of the census. This temporary increase is reflected in two departments. It is reflected in Statistics Canada to the extent of 1,000 person-years. It is reflected in the Department of National Revenue, which also has a role to play with respect to the census, in the neighbourhood of 305 person-years. These are, indeed, temporary person-years.

The hon. member can rest assured that in the future, the Treasury Board ministers will very carefully police the requirements of these two departments to ensure that the obligations with respect to these temporary person-years are honoured. That leaves an increase which would be called a permanent increase of approximately one half of one per cent. These are spread over a number of departments. I indicated that the principal increases in that regard are in the department of my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), who requires additional person-years, obviously, to implement this very major National Energy Program. They are also found in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. Our colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc), put forward very forceful and very convincing arguments which I am sure would be accepted by the member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), were he here, to the effect that additional resources were required in that sector.

Some additional person-years, are taken up in the Department of National Revenue, for the purposes of enforcement and for the purposes of processing more tax returns which are, I suggest, areas of necessary increase. I believe I earlier made reference in my comments, to the RCMP where additional person-years are required in order to honour obligations to meet the requirements of provinces and municipalities, in large measure.

I think that the person-years we have agreed to and have authorized in these main estimates have been well justified by the ministers from whom the requests have come. However, I would again emphasize that we have looked at these very carefully. We are concerned this year, as we have been in past years, with uncontrolled growth of person-year authorization. I believe that the ministers of the Treasury Board took a very responsible and fair attitude toward the requests of their colleagues.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): I have a couple of short supplementary questions for the minister with respect to actual cuts. On page 46 of the summary, the chart for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation shows an increase. But when we actually look at the figures which are set out in the estimates, it shows that there were actual reductions in the level of expenditure for the next year over last year.

I would like to ask the minister how he accounts for that discrepancy? We have all recognized that the government is abandoning its responsibilities in the field of housing, but I suppose it would be unbecoming for it to admit that is what it is doing. I also recognize that there is this contradiction between the President of the Treasury Board's (Mr. Johnston) desire to be a clone of President Reagan and the parent policies of the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). But I would like to ask him how he accounts for the fact that item 23(4) of the estimates shows an actual reduction of over $100 million in the CMHC budget, while the little brief profile shows an increase.

It seems to me that there is something misleading in this and I would like the minister to indicate which of these documents is telling the truth.

Mr. Johnston: I have not had the opportunity to study this particular question in detail, nor do I think that this is the forum in which specific questions on individual departments should be asked. We are not sitting in Committee of the Whole or in the committee on miscellaneous estimates. If the hon. member would agree, I would be happy to try to find an explanation for the discrepancy to which he refers.

Second, with respect to his allegation of being a clone of President Reagan, I never suggested that I was a clone of President Reagan, nor did I suggest that we were implementing his policies. I said we have in the past, and we are continuing, to exercise a policy of restraint.

I noted that many of my colleagues seem to ask, "Well, where are your tax cuts?" We have had tax cuts for seven years. "Where is your restraint?" We have had restraint since 1975. That is the point. We are not trying to follow or in any way support the policies of President Reagan. This has to do with the fact that the government, since 1975, has consistently followed policies of over-all restraint.

Mr. Rae: I referred to a specific area because I was trying to demonstrate that there is a fundamental contradiction in the line being followed by the President of the Treasury Board. On the one hand, he is saying "We are a government that is doing all good things for all of the people," and, on the other hand, the government is cutting down on expenditures for programs which provide housing for the Canadian people.

An hon. Member: That is not so.

Mr. Rae: That is exactly what the President of the Treasury Board has done. All I can say is that it took me some time to look at the estimates and at one or two of these figures. In other areas, such as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the provision for the so-called "Industrial Restructuring Program" shows that that money has been taken out of other items of the budget. This means that the real, new additional expenditure is not as large as has been made out by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). We notice that there are capital cutbacks and expenditures in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

• (1740)

These are just examples I have chosen, going through the estimates in the time available to me. I think we are entitled to know that the government is speaking out of both sides of its mouth at once. It is saying to the Canadian people that it will continue to provide programs when in fact it is cutting back. It holds press conferences to announce brand new programs to provide brand new ideas in terms of industrial assistance when in fact the money is being taken from another item in the department's budget. I think the Canadian people are entitled to know that not only does the government not have a clear idea of what it is doing but even as it does it, it attempts to mislead the people on the true input of the proposals.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I did not interpret that as a question but rather as a declaration or debate. I am quite happy to respond to specific questions. I suggest that this is a reconciliation that can be made in the economic development envelope if we are talking about the statements made by the Minister of Finance in October and some modifications made since that time which are largely due to loan repayments into those envelopes or to different costing of some of the programs. The over-all expenditure limits are identical to those established by the Minister of Finance in the October budget and the changes within the envelope structure, I would suggest to the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), who is obviously not interested in my point of view—

An hon. Member: He is walking out on you.

Mr. Johnston: —now that he is preparing to leave.

Mr. Rae: I am interested.

Mr. Johnston: The fact is that the statements that have been made by my colleagues are correct. I see no conflict. If the hon. member wishes to sit in committee and review the items with the ministers responsible for the various ministries, I am sure they will be delighted to accept questions and supply the necessary details.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. A considerable number of members wish to rise. I want to remind hon. members that we have royal assent at 5.45 p.m. or shortly thereafter. The President of the Treasury Board raised a point which I take to be quite in order, and that is that this is an opportunity for questions and answers, not for debate. I presume that hon. members are agreeable to short questions and short answers.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have two very short questions. Would the President of the Treasury Board table information from the compensation analysis branch on the number of people actually employed in the civil service to January, 1980-81? We could then compare that with the budget or with the allocation of 315,680 members of the civil service allowed in the estimates. I would point out that there is sometimes a difference of as much as 25,000 persons. Would he explain briefly how the numbers are rationalized and if he has some system of keeping control on what are necessary employees and why there is such a discrepancy between the authorization and the amount necessary.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, there are frequently misunderstandings with respect to the force or strength of the public service. It is in part for that purpose I would say to the hon. member that we have prepared Chapter 5 in Part I of the estimates, which I think gives an adequate explanation of the different criteria used.

Let me point out a mistake which is often made by members of the public and of this House. The 315,000 does not represent people; it represents person-years. That means, for example, that if you employ one different person each day in the year, that is one person-year, theoretically. In fact, that is what it is. It is all measured in terms of person-years. The purpose of that and why it is used as a measure of control is fully explained in Chapter 5. It gives management more authority, more flexibility. It does not at all represent the physical number of people on strength at any given point in time. That is an important point to remember. It also refers to the people who are subject to Treasury Board control.

Other universes are used, for example, by Statistics Canada in terms of the size of the public service, which is a different yardstick. I suggest that my explanation is not nearly as complete nor as concise as that set out in Chapter 5. It was in response to the confusion that has arisen over the years that Chapter 5 was included in the estimates this year.

Mr. Blenkarn: It was stated in the budget that the public borrowing for interest charges this year would be $10,250 billion. The minister has $10.4 billion for his supplementary estimates. For the last ten or 11 weeks the government has been borrowing at very close to 17 per cent interest on treasury bills and rolling those over at least at $1 billion per week. Has the minister a Supplementary B for further interest costs for this year, and how does he recognize his cost of interest for next year at $12.35 billion when the budget showed $12.265 billion? How does he rationalize this?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my commentary, the entire plan of the main estimates, including the public debt costs, is based on the budget assumptions of the Minister of Finance for the Canadian economy. He has not indicated any intent to revise his projections at this point. It is sheer speculation to say what he might opt to do. Any substantial revisions to these numbers, as the hon. member suggests, would be included in supplementary estimates.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to follow up on a question posed by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington), who spoke of our public debt and related it to the U.S. situation. We are paying roughly—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I want to remind the hon. member and all hon. members that statements have been made in response to the minister's statement. Statements are over. The only thing remaining now is the tradition of questions and these have to be brief. We have questions now, not statements.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, I was not attempting to make a statement. I just wanted to give the background to the question so that I could get a full answer from the President of the Treasury Board. Could he give the House an opinion on the point at which our national debt becomes a burden? The U.S. is paying $1 out of every $10 tax dollars collected to service interest. We pay $1 out of every $4, and it seems that we may get to the point of paying one out of every three tax dollars to service debt. Does the minister have an opinion on the level at which this becomes prohibitive in terms of the functioning of a productive economy?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, with respect, I think that is more properly a question which should be addressed to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, would the minister answer a question regarding the impact the reduction of federal moneys for the RCMP will have on municipalities and some provinces? Crime is increasing. The increased costs to municipalities will be as much as 95 per cent or 100 per cent in some cases. This will result in reduced policing and will give criminals a better chance to operate. Could the minister advise the actual amount of money being cut from the RCMP budget and whether there is still room and time for negotiations regarding this formula?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that this exercise is not an examination of the estimates before committee. I would think that question ought to be put to the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan). I would like to be in a position to respond to all questions with respect to all departments of government. I think that exercise today would be impossible for me to undertake. In fact, it would always be impossible for me to undertake. The questions with respect to the RCMP should be directed to the Solicitor General.

● (1750)

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question will be brief. In view of the very large federal government deficit, in view of the transfer, perhaps 25 per cent of federal funds, to provinces, and in view of the OECD projections as well as the recent statement in the seventeenth annual review by the Economic Council of Canada that there will be an over-all government surplus in this country in the next two or three years, in spite of the large deficit which the federal government will incur, can the President of the Treasury Board tell me whether he is looking at the resolution of this strange phenomenon whereby one government has large deficits and other governments have large surpluses?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I do not like to be regarded as someone who likes to pass the buck—

Mr. Knowles: You pass a lot of them.

Mr. Johnston: —but the negotiations of the various transfer programs are properly the responsibility of the Minister of Finance.

The point which the hon. member makes is one which the Minister of Finance has made in speeches outside and inside this House and I believe it is one with which we would all concur. I would point out that if the hon. member looks at fact sheet No. 5 on federal transfers to the provinces, distributed with the budget papers, the hon. member will find the projected transfer of funds to other levels of government in the 1981-1982 year, consisting of cash transfers and tax points, totals $18.882 billion, or just under $19 billion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): There has to come a point when the Chair has to make some decision as to what is or is not appropriate in view of the fact that these matters are going to committee in due course. I cannot recognize the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish) on the grounds that he has already been recognized once. My understanding is that traditionally he is not permitted to have a second opportunity to ask questions. However, I will reconsider that point.

I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on his feet. I will recognize the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) for one supplementary. In my view, other than the matter related to the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake, I think that ought to be adequate for this discussion under statements by ministers. I said earlier that was not a ruling and I will take advice from members if they feel there is a need to go further. However, we are expecting royal assent any moment, and I thought we might tie that in with the completion of the questions.

Estimates

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We have been talking on these estimates for a while now and I realize that we have had a long statement by the minister and we did have time allotted for a reply by each of the official critics of the other parties. I hope that we do not prolong this debate any longer and that when we do come back from the Senate, we could get to orders of the day. In my view, this seems to have been a most lengthy time period for a statement by a minister and questions thereon.

ROYAL ASSENT

[Translation]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Madam Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the Honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Madam Speaker, with the House, went up to the Senate chamber.

● (1800)

And being returned:

Madam Speaker informed the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber, the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

Bill C-54, an act to amend the statute law relating to income tax.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1981-82

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE TREASURY BOARD

The House resumed consideration of a message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982, presented by Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Madam Speaker to the House.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). It concerns the notice I gave during my response on behalf of the NDP caucus and has to do with Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. I mentioned that, being a member of the public accounts committee, I know that AECL is asking for forgiveness of $893 million of debts they have incurred from a total of $1.2 billion. There is no end of reasons why they got into this problem, such as three heavy water plants, one partially completed at Laprade, one at Glace Bay and one at Port Hawkesbury, which they operate only to build up funds.

What did Treasury Board take into consideration to approve an additional $133.4 million in excess of their 1980-81 budget? How can Treasury Board justify approving that kind of increase when at the same time AECL is in debt to the tune of $1.2 billion?

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the question is one that would more appropriately be asked in committee of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) who has responsibility for AECL. With respect to the $800 million-odd write-off to which the hon. member made reference, that decision was made on the recommendation of the Comptroller General of Canada in keeping with the over-all policy decision with respect to loans outstanding to corporations where there is no likelihood of repayment. It is deemed to be good accounting practice for the government to write off such liabilities. That is the reason for the change of status of that amount. With respect to the expenditure program of AECL and the necessity of increased capital, that question should properly be put to the minister responsible in committee.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of a general nature. We heard about the western development fund in the throne speech and reference to it by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) in a speech in Montreal recently. I do not want to ask the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) for specifics, but I would like some kind of indication as to whether that kind of fund has been allowed for in his estimates and if we can look forward to some announcement on the start of the expenditure of those funds. Many of us have written to the appropriate ministers asking for some kind of information on how these funds will be allocated. I would like an indication whether the expenditure of this money is allowed for in the present estimates. Can we look forward to some of these programs being announced under the western development fund in the near future.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, the expenditure plan identifies $2 billion in total over a period of three years to 1983-84 of which $350 million is allocated to the year under consideration, 1981-82. The details of the expenditures in respect of that $350 million will be brought forward through supplementary estimates. The details are not included in these main estimates.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) mentioned there have been tax cuts since 1975. I wonder if the hon. minister can reconcile the fact that, with these tax cuts, there will be increased borrowings and increased deficits.

● (1810)

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I think that is a question for the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), but it seems to me to be very easy to reconcile. If you take the year 1980-81, in which the tax cuts that I referred to contributed to lost revenue of $7.5 billion, had that revenue been received it would have gone a long way towards reducing the deficit.

Mr. Dave Dickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I have two very brief questions. In the amounts of moneys to be voted for transfers from the Department of Finance to the provinces, some $3.9 billion, I notice that the effect of the passage of Bill C-24, the Fiscal Transfers Act, has not been taken into account. I wonder if the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) could give us a rough estimate of the difference that would make, the reduction in that estimate that would be brought about by the passage of Bill C-24.

The second question, Mr. Speaker, is as follows: The President of the Treasury Board refused to tell us, when questioned by the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), what his estimate of the additional funds needed for the servicing of the public debt might be, in light of higher interest charges that prevail today and the low value of the Canadian dollar, which will affect the amounts of money needed to make interest payments on foreign loans.

I would like an assurance from the President of the Treasury Board, although he refuses to make this information public, that there are people within the Public Service of Canada who are studying these matters and have, indeed, made these estimates, because it would appear to me that a great deal more public funds are going to have to be voted by way of supplementary estimates for this very reason.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the first question, I am not unable to answer that, nor do I think it would be appropriate. I am here basically to answer questions in respect of the main estimates, which take into account the legislation as it exists at that time: it is a snapshot taken at a period of time.

With regard to the second question, the Department of Finance has responsibility for developing the kind of information to which the hon. member makes reference, and when that is conveyed to Treasury Board the appropriate adjustments are made. I would point out, however, that the spending plan provides, or the expenditure framework, provides for a total of $3.6 billion for the 1981-82 year. This is designed, of course, to provide for adjustments both to the statutory programs and to the voted programs; so that is where any adjustment would have to be made in terms of the public debt brought within the expenditure framework ceiling.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is of a general nature and relates to statements made last year by the President of the Treasury Board before certain committees, particularly the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, and having to do with the reforms that were to be made to the presentation of the main estimates.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister if he still intends to present the members of this House, or a committee of this House, with the pilot projects he alluded to last year. I think one dealt with the service side of Supply and Services, and the other with the question of services. These were to be given to committees, or we were hoping the miscellaneous estimates committee would get one of these so we could interest ourselves in this new format, this new presentation. This was a promise made by the minister last year, and I am wondering if he can inform the House when he intends to table these new pilot projects.

[Translation]

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, hon. members may recall that a few weeks ago I tabled in the House two pilot projects for the two departments in question. Although I did not then refer those two projects to committee, I have the impression that the public accounts committee is or might be studying at least one of those projects if not both. We still have three other pilot projects. I hope that I will be able to table them in the House perhaps within three weeks and that several committees, including the one chaired by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), will have an opportunity to make an in-depth review of at least one of those special studies. Again I would like to insist on the fact that today I tabled for the first time Part I of the main estimates which gives us a general idea of government spending. It is the first time we have done it that way; so, to a certain extent, this is an historic day, perhaps for many reasons. But in any event I hope all hon. members will have an opportunity to give us their comments on the contents of this new project.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed Bill S-15, an act respecting the Royal Canadian Legion, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,371 to 1,390 inclusive, 1,393 to 1,398 inclusive, and 1,401 to 1,413 inclusive.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

DIAND—INDIAN RESERVE PROJECT COST OVERRUNS

Question No. 1,371—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's Water Supply Project at Pukatawagan?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the project and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. $1,692.

2. No. A new revised total has been submitted to the Treasury Board for an additional $419,856.

3. (a) Yes, the project was stopped in February, 1979, and is presently being held in abeyance. If new Treasury Board approval is received, upon allocation of additional financial resources, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will complete the project using intense financial control and strict supervision.

(b) The directives outlined in chapter 148 of Treasury Board Administrative Policy Manual, cost control of projects will be implemented for each such project, namely: (i) a project manager to be appointed for each project which may require contract or project approval by the Treasury Board; (ii) the department to be responsible for complete and adequate project documentation; (iii) reliable estimates of cost that include all direct and related costs, that reflect contracting risks, contingency allowances for identifiable risk areas, inflation cost indices and which specify the base-year dollars in which the estimate is expressed is to be provided along with the source of the estimates for each project; (iv) each submission for project approval to include a statement to the effect that the department will not, during the course of the project, exceed the estimate provided in support of the project approval submission without the prior approval of the Treasury Board; (v) a reporting system to be established in order that immediate advice is given where there is evidence of a potential cost overrun.

In addition, the department has established a project control system, and is now ready to start initial implementation of a computerized project accounting system in response to the cost control directive. Also, a capital management branch has been established in the Indian and Inuit Affairs Program with one of its primary objectives to ensure that all aspects of cost control are adhered to and that all capital dollars are cost effectively spent.

Question No. 1,372—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's Planning and Water and Sewer System Project at Canoe Lake?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the poject and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Nil,

2. Not applicable. Project not yet in construction stage.

3. The project will be carried out in accordance with cost control procedures as outlined in the response to question No. 1,371, part 3(b) answered this day.

Question No. 1,373—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's New School Project at Sandy Bay?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the project and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Nil.

2. Not applicable. Project is not yet in construction stage.

3. The project will be carried out in accordance with cost control procedures as outlined in the response to question No. 1,371, part 3(b), answered this day.

Question No. 1,374—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's School Addition Project at Pukatawagan?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the project and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Nil.

2. An overrun of some $1,109,000 in the final cost for project completion is anticipated.

3. This project was initiated and approved prior to issuance of the Treasury Board directive on cost control, December, 1979. To the extent possible at the stage of construction, the cost control procedures outlined in the reponse to question No. 1,371, part 3(b), answered this day, were followed and are now in place.

Question No. 1,375—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's New School Project at Cross Lake?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the project and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Nil.

2. Not applicable. Project is not yet in construction stage.

3. The project will be carried out in accordance with cost control procedures as outlined in the response to question No. 1,371, part 3(b), answered this day.

Question No. 1,376—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's New School Project at Poplar River?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the project and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Nil.

2. No overrun anticipated.

3. This project was initiated and approved prior to issuance of the Treasury Board directive on cost control, December, 1979. To the extent possible at the stage of construction, the cost control procedures outlined in the response to question No. 1,371, part 3(b), answered this day, were followed and are now in place.

Question No. 1,377—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's New School Project at Lake St. Martin?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the project and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Nil.

2. No overrun anticipated.

3. This project was initiated and approved prior to issuance of the Treasury Board directive on cost control, December, 1979. To the extent possible at the stage of construction, the cost control procedures outlined in the response to question No. 1,371, part 3(b), answered this day, were followed and are now in place.

Question No. 1,378—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's New School Project at Jackhead?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the project and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. $41,928.

2. No, total cost overrun is $190,000.

3. The project has been completed. It was initiated and approved prior to issuance of the Treasury Board directive on cost control, December, 1979. To the extent possible at the stage of construction, the cost control procedures outlined in the response to question No. 1,371, part 3(b), answered this day were followed.

Question No. 1,379—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's School Addition Project at Easterville?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the project and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. $198,870.

2. No, total overrun is $308,000.

3. Project has been completed. It was initiated and approved prior to issuance of the Treasury Board directive on cost control, December, 1979. To the extent possible at the stage of construction, the cost control procedures outlined in the response to question No. 1,371, part 3(b), answered this day were followed.

Question No. 1,380—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's Water and Sewer System at Fond du Lac?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the project and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Nil.

2. Not applicable. This project has been postponed.

3. When the project is resumed, it will be carried out in accordance with cost control procedures as outlined in the response to question No. 1,371, part 3(b), answered this day.

Question No. 1,381—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's Multi-Purpose Building Project at Big River?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the project and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. $179,000.

2. Yes.

3. The project has been substantially completed. It was initiated and approved prior to issuance of the Treasury Board directive on cost control, December, 1979. To the extent possible at the stage of construction, the cost control procedures outlined in the response to question No. 1,371, part 3(b), answered this day were followed.

Question No. 1,382—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's Carcross/Skagway Road, MI 50-85 in the Yukon Territory?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the project and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. $700,000.

2. Yes.

3. Work is complete. This project, as well as the Liard and the Dempster Highway projects, was started before the new Treasury Board policy on procedures for cost overruns was formulated. Therefore, a large part of the overrun can be attributed to cost escalation, a factor not considered in the original estimates. Now, as a result of the above-noted policy, all projects started after July 27, 1979, have an allowance for this significant cost escalation factor. Steps taken to prevent further cost overruns include adherence to the Treasury Board policy which as well as allowing for cost escalation establishes procedures for ensuring better cost control. For further details see response to question No. 1,371, part 3(b) answered this day.

In addition to the above, DIAND is, along with Public Works Canada, continually seeking means whereby costs can be kept to a minimum while at the same time, building safe, quality highways. Areas under consideration include seeking methods and procedures for more efficient filed investigation as well as less costly designs.

Question No. 1,383—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's Liard Highway MI 21-158 Project in the Northwest Territories?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the project and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Nil.

2. Not applicable.

3. See response to question No. 1,382, part 3 answered this day.

Question No. 1,384—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's Dempster Highway Project in the Northwest and Yukon Territories?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the project and, if so, what are they?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Nil for the total project although there have been cost overruns caused by unforeseen soil conditions on individual contracts on this highway.

2. The department cannot predict whether there will be a cost overrun as defined in the new policy but steps are being taken to ensure against it.

3. See response to question No. 1,382, part 3 answered this day.

Question No. 1,385—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's Elementary School at Whycocomagh, Nova Scotia?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

3. Are steps being taken to prevent further cost overruns on the project and, if so, what are they?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. $394,500.

2. Yes.

3. Project has been completed. It was initiated and approved prior to issuance of the Treasury Board directive on cost control, December, 1979. To the extent possible at the stage of construction, the cost control procedures outlined in the response to question No. 1,371, part 3(b), answered this day were followed.

Question No. 1,386—Mr. Greenaway:

1. What is the present amount of the cost overrun for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development's Elementary School at Eel Ground, New Brunswick?

2. Is this the final cost overrun on the project?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The questions as enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In the absence, at the moment, of the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), whose time will not be lost as a result of this, I will now recognize the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne).

Mr. Gauthier: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I merely wish by means of a point of order to seek advice from the Chair on the debate now in progress in the House.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I would like, if I may, to explain my point of order to you and ask for your indulgence and direction. According to the traditions and the customs of this House, bills are usually amendable at the report stage, and it is at least my understanding that the Speaker gathers these amendments, sometimes informs the House that he or she has before him or her a certain set of amendments, some of which are grouped together, and before passing on the suitability of the amendments informs the House that she or he has reviewed these and that they will be taken according to the relevance and substance of the amendments.

● (1820)

We are here dealing with a resolution about which some backbenchers—and I am one of those—would like to get some instructions and information from the Chair regarding the procedure at hand. There has been a series of speakers on the amendment moved sometime ago by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) when he spoke in this House. I understand that the speeches to date have been on that amendment. I also understand that every member of the House is entitled to speak for 40 minutes on this amendment, and while we are discussing that amendment no other amendment, except possibly a subamendment, may be entertained.

Some of us do have amendments. I suppose Your Honour will appreciate that some of us are not experts as to the receivability of these amendments and, since it is a custom and practice to do these things with respect to a bill, I wonder if it would be possible for you, Mr. Speaker, to accept, or if it is possible for members of the House to accept by unanimous consent, that some of us may be allowed to table our amendments to this resolution. This would be for the purposes of informing our colleagues that we intend to move these amendments eventually. Possibly Your Honour could look at them as to their relevancy and substance, and perhaps group them together until some of us get together on issues we feel strongly should be incorporated in this resolution.

For example, I would like to move an amendment to include Ontario under section 133 of the BNA Act. I do not actually have any difficulty in doing that expect that the Table, the legal advisers of the House and everybody tells me there might be difficulty in respect of the receivability of this amendment. To avoid waiting too long I would like to ask for the Chair's advice, or perhaps for the unanimous consent of the House so that many of us here on both sides of the House who have amendments could have the benefit of tabling them, having them published in the Order Paper and having the benefit of the Chair's advice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): We might begin by the Chair indicating that in some sense the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) is requesting either information or possibly a ruling, but in another sense he is asking a hypothetical question. The Chair ought not to get involved in that because we would not be into debate, but into form of consultation as between hon. members and the Chair. I think there are other methods which may be more valuable to the hon. member with regard to how we might proceed.

I do appreciate the point he raises. I simply confirm to the hon. member that there is an amendment at the moment standing in the name of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). That amendment is related to the referendum section of the resolution before the House. Accordingly, any further amendment would have to be, under our Standing Orders, a subamendment to that amendment. If it were not related to that amendment, then the Chair would have to find that it would not be receivable.

I understand the difficulty of the hon. member, which is why I continue, when perhaps I might or should not. The matter which the hon. member really did not raise is the question of relevance. If hon. members were to insist that members rising in debate address themselves to the matter before the House, then they would have to address themselves to the amendment, and accordingly if the Chair felt the mood of the House were to insist on relevancy, the Chair would have to persist in bringing to the attention of hon. members that they must address themselves to the question of the amendment put before the House by the hon. member for Provencher.

However, that has not been our tradition. This is the difficulty all occupants of the Chair have had. The difficulty has been whether we are to insist on the rigid application of the Standing Orders or whether we are better guided by the mood of the House. My impression is that hon. members want the Chair to be guided by the mood of the House in that regard and not to insist too much on relevancy. That being the case, unless the Chair is given some indication of the mood of the House, the Chair will continue to permit hon. members to address themselves in a very wide-ranging way to such subjects as they see fit relating to the Constitution.

I point out to the hon. member that he may wish to attempt to lead his colleagues to an instruction to the Chair to be more rigid in the matter of relevancy. Whether he will succeed is for the hon. member to work out.

That leaves us with the question of other amendments and whether they might be receivable or groupable. Since the Standing Orders prohibit receiving them unless they are in the form of a subamendment to the existing amendment, I need not worry about their being groupable, because I cannot receive them unless they are in the form of a subamendment to the existing amendment.

There is an exception, and that is why I think the hon. member has raised a very interesting question. It may well be the view of all hon. members in the House that it would be in the interests of the House to be informed of other amendments which might be brought forward. In such circumstances it may well be the wish of the House that some proceeding be permitted which would—and I think it would have to be by unanimous consent—permit and, in fact, even encourage hon. members who have amendments to bring them forward. That then would be followed by the whole business of relevancy, grouping and so forth.

The Chair is not in a position to make a ruling in that regard, but in so far as it may be of assistance to the hon. member, I certainly would say that I understand the desire of the hon. member to see an opportunity somewhere in the system to overcome this problem of relevance, which is in fact prohibiting other hon. members from putting forward amendments. I understand that, so there seems to me to be two options open: One is for the House to instruct the Chair to insist upon relevancy; the second is for the hon. member to seek unanimous consent for some method which would permit other amendments to come forward in this process.

Mr. Gauthier: That is what I am doing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair cannot make that choice for the hon. member. Because I think his point is very well taken I did go on at some length, but I think that is all that needs to be said at the moment. I should go on and recognize other hon. members in debate. I see there are other hon. members rising on the same point of order. I will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I shall be very brief. Indeed, I shall simply make a suggestion to the hon. member who raised the point. My suggestion is that he discuss the matter with his House leader.

Mr. Gauthier: I have.

Mr. Knowles: The question of how this stage of debate would be handled was discussed among the House leaders. Various suggestions were made. The one we are now following is the one the government chose.

I make the point that we are not debating a bill, so the normal report stage procedure does not apply. We are not even debating a report from a committee. We are debating a brand new resolution put down by the government. I make that suggestion to the hon. member, because I also was concerned that at least it might be possible for hon. members who wish to make amendments down the road to give notice of them, but I do not see that there is any way that the Chair can provide that. However, perhaps there could be another discussion among House leaders.

What I suggest to the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) is that he speak to his House leader about it. He, of course, will tell the hon. member that we have already discussed it, but there is no law against discussing again something which has been discussed before.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) had not said it, then I would, and I will repeat it. The discussion as to how this aspect of this resolution was to be handled was a discussion which took place among House leaders over a long period of time. This was the choice which was made. In fact, as my friend has said, the choice was made by the government. You know, Mr. Speaker, on reflection it was not a bad choice.

I can understand the position of the hon. member with respect to his amendments, but the rules of the House are designed, as we have seen from time to time, to protect the rights of hon. members, depending upon the matter with which we are dealing. Given the foundation for the rules and the reason for the rules and given the choice after long discussion, I think it might be better if the hon. member found another way to publicize what he wants. I would certainly be interested in knowing what he wants, and there would be another way outside the procedures of the House to deal with that, which would certainly allow the hon. member to make the point he wants to make.

If he had a statement he wished to issue I would be delighted to receive it. I must say that as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was speaking I recalled the discussions we had. We had lengthy discussions with respect to the procedure that would apply. I see nothing thus far which indicates that the decision taken by the government with respect to the procedure to be followed is unwise or should be changed.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I wish to confirm the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). I was present at those discussions. If I am correct, this was a matter which was discussed over a period of months. The government chose to follow this course of action in consultation with the other parties. I think this has been quite apparent, but I would suggest this kind of discussion should really take place in another forum. I hope we will not unduly delay the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) who has been seeking the floor for the past two days to speak on the resolution.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not want to interrupt the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne).

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): You cannot interrupt me when I have not even started.

Mr. Lewis: I would like to reflect back on your comments, Mr. Speaker. As I read Hansard for Monday, the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) was not finished and wanted to go on. The Chair has now recognized the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi. You made some reference, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member for Burnaby temporarily not being in the House. Am I correct in saying that since you have recognized the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi, I will be the next speaker to be recognized?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): No.

What I was referring to is a situation which sometimes occurs in the House; that is, where an hon. member has the floor then some intervention takes place, such as rising for dinner or something of that nature. There is often some confusion about that practice, to the extent that some hon. members feel that if the hon. member who had the floor prior to the recess was not back at the very next available opportunity in order to resume his remarks then he lost his opportunity. The fact is, that is not correct, he has not lost his opportunity. It is somewhat of a peculiarity of our rules, but he can come back at any given moment and pursue the remainder of the time allotted to him.

That was the reference and the explanation. Simply as a courtesy I did not want to leave the hon. member for Burnaby, in his absence, feeling he had been cut off. In a moment I will be recognizing the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi.

More specifically, I cannot promise to recognize any hon. member. For the sake of the peace of the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) I will assume he will be the next to be recognized.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to have this point made clear. Is there some right now for the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) or, indeed, any member of this House, to be absent for two or three days and pick up where he left off? Is that what you are saying, Mr.

Speaker? I want to make the point that this is a departure from what I understand the rules to be. I do not know of any rule—subject to correction, naturally, from the Chair or the Table—that allows a member to carry on beyond the next available opportunity. Therefore, as I understand it, the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) will be next followed by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis), at least with respect to this amendment. The member for Burnaby can speak on other amendments. I know of no right to reserve the time for him to speak at some later date. If there is such a right then it may have to be argued later, as I do not want to take up the time of the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi. I think the Chair would certainly have to point me to an authority.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I think the matter can be handled easily. I am relying on my recollection. It is a very clear recollection I have of an incident where this occurred before and, in fact, what I indicated is what happened. But it is not a ruling. I am simply indicating my purpose for making the earlier comment. The Chair will undertake to ensure that I have not lost track of myself, or of the procedures. Over the dinner hour I will verify what I have indicated. If I am wrong then either myself or the next hon. member in the Chair will make sure the matter is corrected. As hon. members can see, I am relying on my memory with respect to a previous occasion.

I now recognize the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, since I waited what seems like a week and a half to start, if I do not finish before the dinner hour I will come back in about a week and a half to finish.

This is an historic debate, Mr. Speaker, and one in which I am proud to participate. I want to take this opportunity to thank my constituents for having afforded me the opportunity to participate. Many of those who have participated in this debate have congratulated and thanked the co-chairmen of the special joint committee for the work they have accomplished. I want to add my voice to those who have gone before. I want to congratulate all members who gave so much of their time and talent to this great task. I simply want to say "thank you" to all of them.

I said at the outset that this is an historic debate, so I sought some appropriate sentence with which to begin my remarks on the motion before us. At his inauguration John F. Kennedy said to his countrymen, "Let us begin anew, remembering on both sides that civility is not a sign of weakness and sincerity is always subject to proof." Therefore, in my remarks, I shall try to be civil and I will grant to all concerned in this debate the opportunity to prove their sincerity.

However, I do believe it is time to begin anew—time for Canada to take her place in the list of nations which are truly independent and truly sovereign. No longer should we have to go begging to some other nation to amend our Constitution or ask some other nation to be the custodian of our individual rights and freedoms. I do not want to spend much time on the process, but rather on the substance.

I want to say I have no qualms of conscience about the Government of Canada wanting to remove the last vestiges of colonialism from this nation. Neither do I have any qualms about asking Great Britain to divest herself of any custodial charge over our Constitution, our rights and freedoms. Nor do I agree with those hon. members opposite who claim that any provincial legislature can speak for all Canadians, rather than the Parliament of Canada. I am proud that my party and my leader have taken both the initiative and the determination to make my country, at long last, truly independent—truly a nation.

We have heard a great deal about the need for consensus. Like motherhood, consensus is difficult to oppose. However, the arguments we continually hear in this place and in the press would lead one to believe that consensus is solely the responsibility of the national government and that the Government of Canada alone is responsible for achieving that consensus and any lack thereof is solely the fault of the national government. We have seen the continuous and constantly changing positions of the provinces making increased demands on the national government. Premier Hatfield, the dean of the premiers, has stated before the committee that consensus is not now possible and that it is never likely to be possible. But he correctly points out that this motion before us provides a two year period to achieve this consensus if all the players are truly serious. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan), himself a former premier, recently had this to say:

> I was on the other side of the table as a provincial premier for eight years and I participated in a number of conferences dealing with patriation of our Constitution.
> I saw the provinces demand more powers given by the federal government to the provinces before they would agree to bring home the Constitution.
>
> I took part in the conference at Victoria, where we came closer than at any other time, before or since, to total agreement on bringing it home. In the end, Quebec disagreed and asked for some power which the other provinces wouldn't agree to. But the significant thing is that this September, when the provinces failed to agree with the federal government after the negotiations had continued all summer long, not one of the issues on which the disagreement occurred had even been a provincial demand or under consideration or on the table nine years earlier in Victoria. And so if we continue to negotiate for another ten or another 20 or another 30 years, there will always be new premiers, there will always be new demands, and there will never be the possibility of total agreement.

● (1840)

So much for the demand by some for one more first ministers' conference where supposedly all differences will be automatically forgotten, where there will be a love nest, and everyone will get together.

I should like to deal now with the substance of the motion, in particular with two or three items. First I should like to deal with language rights. Early in our history we decided against the melting pot theory of nationhood and opted, instead, for the maintenance of the language and culture of our two founding nationalities. The BNA Act and Section 23 of the Manitoba Act guaranteed language rights within the provinces of Quebec and Manitoba. The Official Languages Act of 1969 gave all Canadians the right to communicate with and be served by the Government of Canada in either English or French. While the federal government would like to see constitutionally guaranteed institutional language rights at the provincial level, it will not impose such rights over the opposition of the provinces.

The charter provides minimum guarantees in attempting to achieve the widest consensus possible from provincial governments. Thus, when the provisions for institutional language rights at the provincial level, included in the draft charter tabled at the first ministers' conference in September, received virtually no provincial support, apart from New Brunswick, the provisions respecting the provinces were withdrawn. However, the status quo is preserved and both Quebec and Manitoba remain bound by existing constitutional rights. As New Brunswick officially requested that these rights apply to that province, this is being done. In addition, the amending formula has been modified to facilitate the opting-in of any other province to any or all of the language provisions listed in Sections 16 to 20 inclusive of the charter.

I should like to quote some comments of Premier Blakeney. He said:

> I do not object to the constitutional entrenchment of French and English language rights. The right to use French or English, or the right to receive some government services in either of those languages, is not, after all, a right which we claim as humans. It is an essential fact of Canada, an essential element of the Confederation bargain, and, as such, is an obvious candidate for inclusion in the Constitution.

The minority language educational rights reflect the unanimous agreement of the provincial premiers in 1978 to the principle that children of the French or English-speaking minority in each province should be entitled to primary and secondary education in the minority language where numbers warrant. The rights provided by the charter are minimum guarantees and do not preclude the provinces from providing greater rights, as some of them do now, such as allowing immigrants and citizens to send their children to minority or majority language schools as they may choose. For instance, this happens in New Brunswick.

I keep referring to the province of New Brunswick because hopefully we, in New Brunswick, are enlightened with regard to language rights.

The federal government agrees that ideally the rights should be extended to all residents of Canada. Although it might be preferable to provide for freedom of choice in language of education, the charter is designed not only to safeguard the interests of the majority, but also to protect the basic rights of the minority. If the majority language group in any province wishes the right to have their children educated in the minority language, they have the democratic means at their disposal to ensure this result.

The minority language education provision is being implemented on the basis of the premiers' Montreal agreement of 1978. This clearly specified the entitlement on the basis of "where numbers warrant". Thus, this qualification remains, but it will be a matter for review by the courts. When they determine that the minimum numbers have been set too high, they can direct that they be lowered so as not to render the right ineffective. The charter assures the right to minority language education, but it does not get into the details as to how this will be provided.

I should like to refer to the comments of Mr. Alex Paterson, Co-President of the Positive Action Committee, before the special joint committee. He said:

> We have seen what happens when a province like Manitoba wishes to take the fate of its minorities into its hands. It will wipe out with a stroke of the legislative pen a protection for its minority. Everything we can do to strengthen these protections for minorities by entrenching them in the Constitution will give more reason for the minorities to feel secure and expose them less to the mercy of their provincial governments.
> It cannot be left to the discretion of the individual provinces to decide. This is a right we wish every Canadian to have no matter in what province he resides. For that reason we think it is essential that rights of these kinds be entrenched and it is not in fact an invasion of the powers and competence of the particular provinces.

Now I should like to turn for a moment or two to the area of equalization. First and foremost, I suppose one should ask the following question: Why should the principles of equalization and regional development be enshrined in the Constitution of Canada? The commitments stated in Section 34(1) of the proposed resolution—to promote equal opportunities, to reduce economic disparities and to provide essential public services across the country—capture one of the most important elements of what it means to be a Canadian: a willingness to share our good fortune and our opportunities so that we can grow strong together.

I should like to remind hon. members that this commitment applies not only to Parliament and to the Government of Canada, but also to the legislatures and the governments of the provinces, although I emphasize this commitment does not alter the legislative powers of the two orders of government.

There is great merit in enshrining in the Constitution the concept of equalization so that sharing will be an important ingredient in the future of our national life, but there can be no doubt about the current commitment of the federal government to the principle of equalization. All provincial governments have supported enshrining the principle of equalization in the Constitution. Not only do all provincial governments in Canada support the principle of enshrining equalization in the Constitution, and not only has the federal government agreed to amend Section 34(2) in line with the preferences of most provinces, but I believe there is agreement among the three parties in the House for Section 34.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You are absolutely correct.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): When the joint committee considered this section of the proposed resolution on January 30, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) commended the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) for the amendment he introduced to Section 34(2). He said:

> But now what he has done is he has enshrined the principle of equalization payments. I commend him for that; it is a wise move; something that has been going on in this country for a long time; a good thing—

[Translation]

For his part, Senator Tremblay stated: "I would just like to say that for once I am pleased with a government proposal, without any reservation".

[English]

I was glad to see the nods of agreement of members of the official opposition when I indicated that they agreed with section 34 of the resolution.

The importance of the equalization transfers varies from one receiving province to another, but with the exception of Saskatchewan, it represents a large share of total provincial revenue. This share is around 25 per cent in the Atlantic provinces; more than 15 per cent in Manitoba; more than 10 per cent in Quebec; around 2 per cent in Saskatchewan.

So, we ask the question: Why are these rights necessary? I am referring to both language rights and equalization. They are necessary; first to maintain and enhance the special character of Canada; second, to guarantee that no Canadian who finds himself in a minority position will become a second-class citizen, and they are necessary in New Brunswick, for example, to ensure that Acadians have the same rights, privileges and opportunities as the rest of us. They are necessary to ensure that the valiant struggle of our Acadian brothers and sisters over more than two centuries, will not have been in vain.

[Translation]

• (1850)

For two centuries, the Acadians had to fight for their rights, especially for the right to be educated in French. For example, they had difficulty finding text books in French. That was the situation up to recently and it certainly was not acceptable. With this charter they will have the right to be educated in their mother tongue without having to experience the adverse conditions of the past.

[English]

The basis for this solution lies in this charter but it is not in and of itself, the solution. The real solution lies in education and job opportunites, in the sense of justice and fairness of those, like me, who belong to the linguistic majority. In vain shall they struggle if we pay only lip service to principles. In vain shall we all struggle if dedication to principles is not translated into determination for action to eradicate economic disparity and to promote—with our money as well as our mouths—equality of opportunity. For as long as an Acadian must learn English to find employment, so long shall he be chained. For as long as he must move from an Acadian community to find a job in Fredericton or Saint John or even Moncton, so long shall he and his children be assimilated, just as surely as if he had moved to the U.S.A.

I commend the government and the Premier of New Brunswick for the right decision they have made on linguistic and minority rights. I regret that the government and Premier of Ontario do not have the same sense of justice. But espousing principles is not enough. I now call upon the government and the Premier of New Brunswick to ensure that those areas of New Brunswick where the minority lives will receive a fair share of the economic activity and growth of the province. And I pledge myself anew to that goal and to work for its achievement.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to say how happy I am that native and aboriginal rights will be enshrined. Our past treatment of our original peoples is perhaps our greatest national shame. We must endeavour to eradicate that shame and restore their pride and sense of worth, because in a very real sense they did not lose these characteristics, we have destroyed them. Our paternalism was never justifiable and can no longer to tolerated. Our past insensitivity and arrogance must end now. I want to live to see the day when our Indians, Inuit, and Métis will once again be able to proclaim their pride of citizenship and sense of human worth and dignity in this great land of ours.

Let us look at the positive side of this Constitution as far as this country is concerned. All great and united countries have their own constitution. It is the guiding light of all true democratic nations.

The opposition and certain provinces have been saying that our attempt, as a government, at patriation is creating disunity. They must realize that it is their negativism toward the resolution and personal attacks on the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that are causing disunity in our country. I hope they will forget partisanship and join with us in making this a glorious event for Canada; a unifying force.

It is time for Canadians to stand up and say they are Canadians first—not westerners first, not Quebecers first, not Acadians first, not British subjects first, but rather Canadians with a rich heritage—Canadians first. The Constitution will go a long way to ensure this; it is the real key to national unity in Canada.

And so, Mr. Speaker, let us here resolve to get on with the task; to end the acrimony and division so that, in a spirit of brotherhood, and with the help of divine providence, we may achieve our natural potential to become the greatest, the freest nation on earth, and the model by which all others will have to judge themselves. If we have that resolve, that determination, then in the words of Tennyson, "Some work of noble note, may yet be done."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I want to recognize the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) but, before I do so, I have to confess that unfortunately the Chair made a mess on its own doorstep and has to clear it up.

During the last few moments I have reviewed the statement I made earlier about the rights of hon. members to continue their access to the floor and debate if there has been some time intervening beyond the normal hour for rising at dinner or at ten o'clock. There is not even a vestige of a doubt; it would not be possible for me to have been more wrong than I was. Consequently, by the process of rubbing both digits of my I.Q.

together, I want to assure the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) that he has lost his opportunity to seek the floor again. I regret that I misadvised hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of the riding of Simcoe North to take part in this historic constitutional debate. Simcoe North was one of the ridings represented in the House of Commons at the time of confederation, 114 years ago. At that time it was called North Simcoe and was represented by Thomas D. McConkey, a resident of Barrie. The original copy of the British North America Act which is lodged in Britain was handwritten by Robert A. Kent, a resident of Medonte township in Simcoe North. At that time he had a dual function as a clerk of this House and also the legislature of the province of Ontario. He had a reputation for outstanding penmanship.

I appreciate this opportunity to speak to the proposed resolution because I was one of the members not permitted to speak at second reading when the Liberal Party invoked closure, cutting off debate in this House. It will not be forgotten by the Canadian people that the Liberal Party cut off debate at a point when more Liberals than Conservatives had spoken. In any event, the proposed resolution has now come back from committee, somewhat improved from the original disaster, but far from acceptable.

I wish to pay tribute to the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal) who handled his duties with dispatch and fairness. The disaster from the other place who served as co-chairman shall go unmentioned in recognition of his contribution.

Our committee members, under the leadership of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), made a noteworthy contribution to the proceedings. Canada and the Progressive Conservative Party were well served by their efforts. I also compliment the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) who represented his party so well and in the final analysis proved to be a man of principle. His partner, the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), the Emile Zola of the NDP, needs no further recognition, much as he may crave it. We on this side were pleased that we were able to bring television to the committee hearings. We regret what it did to the Liberal members of the committee.

Confederation is a partnership entered into freely by the partners operating in accordance with a partnership agreement known as the British North America Act. Partnership decisions are reached after consultation and discussion. They may not need the consent of all partners but they do need a majority. It is normal that no one partner should have a veto over decisions unless at the time of the decision that partner holds over 50 per cent interest in the partnership.

It is not unusual for one partner to have certain decision-making powers which he or she exercises in the interests of the partnership. That type of decision-making power must be exercised wisely, after consultation and an effort to reach a decision. Arbitrary decisions without consultation invariably lead to an unhappy partnership and dissatisfaction with that one partner.

May I call it seven o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being seven o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until eight o'clock this evening at which time, if he is present, I will recognize the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis).

At 7 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The debate was interrupted at seven o'clock. The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) had the floor.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, before the supper hour, I was drawing an analogy to the British North America Act and the Government of Canada as a partnership. I would like to carry that argument on, if I may.

In this case, the federal government is suggesting that it is legally, morally and politically proper for the federal government, acting alone, to amend the partnership agreement without the substantial agreement of the provinces. With respect, I disagree. I suggest it is legally improper for the federal government to decide on its own to patriate the British North America Act without the substantial agreement of the provinces.

The Manitoba court of appeal was asked if it was constitutional convention for the federal government to request that Britain amend the Constitution of Canada, as affecting federal-provincial relations, or the powers, rights or privileges granted or secured by the Constitution of Canada to the provinces. The court decided that there was no constitutional convention requiring that the federal government seek the agreement of the provinces.

I suggest that the court applied itself to the situation surrounding individual amendments, such as the unemployment insurance amendment of 1940, and the 1951 amendment regarding old age pensions. In these cases, there was general agreement that these were social measures which would benefit all Canadians. I suggest that the court does not address itself to the fact that the resolution which we are now debating completely revamps the British North America Act. It contains changes and additions such as a charter of rights and freedoms, referendum revisions, mobility rights, equalization payments, and an amending formula.

I am not debating or promoting the merits of some of these provisions, but I suggest they produce such sweeping changes that they will completely change the nature of the partnership, which is confederation. There is no legal justification to allow the federal government to rewrite the British North America Act completely or substitute something which is entirely different. Surely, the partners; the provinces, must be consulted.

I suggest that it is morally improper for the federal government to decide, on its own, to patriate the British North America Act, without the substantial agreement of the provinces. The federal government hopes to pass this with a majority in the House and with a majority in the Senate. Britain will then be asked to approve a piece of legislation, when it comes back to Canada, which cannot be changed by Parliament using the same method. Other legislation passed by the House and the Senate can be amended or repealed by a civil majority.

There is no moral justification or principle for what the Liberal Party suggests. I am not surprised by the lack of moral justification for what they are doing, but I suggest to them that the end does not justify the means. By its actions, the Liberal Party is guaranteeing bitterness and acrimony across Canada.

I also suggest that it is politically improper for the federal government to patriate the British North America Act on its own. The Liberal Party has no political mandate on its own. A political party achieves a mandate as the result of campaigning on a platform, or making a promise and then being elected to office. Once elected, that party has a political mandate for the people to do what it promised to do.

The Liberal Party was elected to office on the promise that it would not raise the price of energy. One year and eight price increases later, the price of gas has gone up 28 per cent, and the price of home heating oil has gone up 36 per cent. The Liberal Party forgot about the promise the day of the election, if, indeed, it ever believed it.

How does that promise, followed by that performance, translate into a mandate to completely change the British North America Act? The Liberal Party proposes to change the very foundation upon which this country has grown and prospered for 114 years. Such a proposal demands more than a mere five-vote majority in the House of Commons. It demands a substantial agreement of the elected representatives of Canada, federally and provincially. It demands a consensus throughout Canada, from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Victoria, B.C.; from Windsor, Ontario to the Arctic Circle.

The Liberal Party is proceeding with its rock-hard, "My mind is made up, don't change my mind with facts" majority of 74 seats from Quebec, joined by what might best be called "political groupies" from Ontario and the Atlantic provinces; and two lonely members from Manitoba, representing the west. Stick around, they are dropping like flies.

● (2010)

How does it pretend to represent Canada? In fact, public opinion is running 64 per cent against what the Liberal Party proposes for Canada. This brings me to the subject of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) actions with reference to this bill.

The Prime Minister berated the provincial premiers for their failure to deal with the patriation of the Constitution and the bargaining which went on. Who will forget his manufactured indignation when he suggested with disgust that the provincial premiers are bargaining fish for rights? Since he made that statement, he has made a few bargains of his own. He bargained for Saskatchewan's support by allowing his partner, the Leader of the NDP, to introduce an amendment respecting natural resources.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The little red rump.

Mr. Lewis: Unfortunately, he did not cut too good a deal because the Premier of Saskatchewan has rejected this legislation. He bargained for Senate support by allowing an amendment giving this appointed body veto power when he was faced with Senate revolt. I want to be here when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) stands on principle and votes for that. But none of his bargaining looked as bad as the treatment of his Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan). Speaking for the government on a Friday, the Solicitor General gave a commitment to support an amendment enshrining property rights in the charter of rights and freedoms. The following Monday, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) reneged on that promise. As a result, the reputation of the Solicitor General was sullied and shattered and members on all sides were saddened to see what happened to this minister of the Crown.

On various occasions it has been suggested that the Liberal Party was fulfilling a campaign promise made to the province of Quebec during the referendum campaign by bringing forward this bill. If this legislation was supposed to fulfil that promise, it is indeed strange that the Parti Québécois, the Union Nationale and the Quebec Liberal Party are all opposed to what the federal Liberal Party are doing.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): So are the polls.

Mr. Lewis: I understand the polls today reflect that same sentiment in the province of Quebec.

Be that as it may, I would point out that this House made no commitment during the referendum campaign. During the time of the referendum, this House and the country were treated to the spectacle of Liberal cabinet ministers from Quebec reciting the litany of things they were doing for that province, and the governing of Canada ground to a halt.

The Liberal party has a duty to all the provinces, not just one. It has a duty to all of the people of this country, not just the people of one province. It has a duty to create a positive attitude in this country, but its actions have poisoned provincial relationships. I implore the government to think of the future of this country and not of the magnificent obsession of one man. I implore the government to seek the approval of the majority of the provinces before it proceeds.

Patriation of the British North America Act has been stalled because no agreement has been reached at first ministers' conferences as to an amending formula. I say to you, Mr.

Speaker, that prime ministers and premiers of every political party since confederation are to blame for not coming to grips with this issue and deciding it once and for all.

The amending formula which this act proposes provides that amendments may be made by the House of Commons and the Senate which are approved by six out of ten provinces including: every province that at any time before the issue of the proclamation had, according to any previous general census, a population of at least 25 per cent of the population of Canada;—that might just as well read Ontario and Quebec—two or more of the Atlantic provinces and two or more of the western provinces that have in the aggregate, according to the then latest general census, a population of at least 50 per cent of the population of all the western provinces.

The amending formula proposed by the government enshrines a hatred for Ontario and Quebec throughout Canada. What relevance does the general census of 1870 have to the 1980s and the future of Canada? Having 25 per cent of the population of Canada in 1870 is a pretty flimsy excuse for giving a perpetual veto to Ontario and Quebec. The people of Ontario seek to influence the affairs of Canada but we want to do it based on reason, not on the 1870 census. The people of Ontario seek to travel throughout Canada, to work and to live everywhere in this great country. We do not need a perpetual veto based upon the 1870 census. We do not want special status. We seek to go as equals, not preferred people. We want to go in peace and in harmony.

Let us look at what the United States does. In the United States amendments to the Constitution require the approval of Congress, the Senate and three quarters of the States. That amending formula allows for expansion, for growth and for population shifts without giving veto power to any one state. It is positive in its thrust whereas the formula proposed by the Liberals for Canada is negative.

In 1790, the first census in the United States showed that Virginia, the largest of the 13 states, contained 20.5 per cent of the population of the United States. If Virginia had been given a veto in 1791 it would today control amendments to the Constitution with 2.3 per cent of the population of the United States, although 13 states now have larger populations.

The Vancouver consensus provides for amendments to be made with the assent of Parliament and two thirds of the provinces, with at least 50 per cent of the population subject to an opting out proviso. That amending formula makes much more sense. All provinces are treated equally. No one province is singled out for special treatment. It is positive in its thrust. I agree that the opting-out formula may result in some checkerboarding but, as has been so ably pointed out in this House, Canada is a diverse country and checkerboarding is not new. Besides, the Vancouver amending formula, by definition only, allows for three provinces to make such a decision. It is my opinion that the Vancouver formula will allow us to change the Constitution more readily to meet the demands of the future.

In an excellent article entitled, "The Living Canadian Constitution" by Alan C. Cairns, published in the Queen's Quarterly Winter Issue, 1970, the author made the following point:

A constitution is not merely a piece of paper. It is a set of relationships between governments and between governments and peoples which has become embedded in the evolving habits and values of successive generations of Canadians.

I submit that we need an amending formula which recognizes the evolving habits and values of successive generations of Canadians and can react to them.

Finally, speaking as a Member of Parliament from Ontario, I would make one further point with respect to the amending formula. If this government intends to plunge ahead with the unfairness of the amending formula contained in the bill, I say please spare Ontario the grief of special status and, change it to read: the province of Quebec; two or more of the Atlantic provinces and three of the five provinces west of Quebec. We in Ontario believe in the equality of all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: The people of my riding, Simcoe North, want a constitution made in Canada by Canadians. We reject the theory that the Liberal Party, without a mandate, should be asking Britain to amend Canada's Constitution. We reject this government's effort to make Britain a fall guy in this affair. Since the passage of the Statute of Westminster, Britain has been the trustee of the British North America Act. It has not had the right to amend the act except at the request of the Parliament of Canada.

● (2020)

It is a fundamental concept in law that a trustee shall conduct itself in accordance with the terms of the trust and that the trustee shall not suffer personal harm from acting as trustee provided it conducts itself in accordance with the terms of the trust.

Thanks to the diligence of the media and questions pursued in this House by our party, it is clear that the government told Britain it would do one thing in June and then did something else in October. If anyone is to suffer from deception, surely it should not be the innocent party.

Britain should not be embarrassed internationally because of Canada's internal differences. That is hardly fair. It is a traditional course of action for the Prime Minister to cover a failure of reason by picking a fight to divert attention. He has been doing it to the west for years. Now is the time to take the course of honour, not deception with Britain and with Canada.

The concept that Canada should not embarrass Britain internationally goes hand in hand with another theory. Canada is a sovereign nation. If we manage our own affairs, we control our own destiny. Whether or not we agree with what the Liberals are doing, I join my colleage, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), in suggesting there should be no meddling in our affairs. When the Constitution gets there, it should be passed as presented, quickly, with no amendments.

Briefly, I wish to discuss the charter of rights and freedoms. I want to talk about the concept of such a charter, the content of the proposed charter, the mechanism for change and two specific improvements.

My ancestors and the ancestors of many of my constituents fought the lords and kings of England to establish their rights. They came to Canada as free men and women. They did not consider it necessary to draft a bill of rights. They considered that the individual had all the rights and freedoms necessary. They were prepared to delegate away certain rights and freedoms to the government in order to operate an orderly society.

Mr. Blais: Tell us about Penetanguishene.

Mr. Lewis: The minister asks me about the town of Penetanguishene. The situation there has split the community. The minister is not in agreement with many members of the Liberal Party in that community who feel that the community does not need a school which is going to split the community. The riding president of the Simcoe North Liberal Association told me that. I appreciate the minister raising the matter.

The Criminal Code is an example of such a delegation. It defines crime and stipulates punishment for citizens who commit crimes. Elected representatives of the people decided to take away an individual's freedom if he or she could not live within the rules of society. In certain other instances, rights were affirmed by documents such as the Magna Carta written in 1215 which enshrined the writ of habeus corpus confirming that the state must appear in open court and show just cause why an individual should be deprived of his or her freedom. I submit that the individual has all the rights and freedoms and, through his or her elected representatives, may delegate away certain rights.

I understand the concerns of my constituents who have come to Canada from other countries where the individual's rights and freedoms are not as sacred as they are in Canada. These people are concerned about the protection of their rights because they were deprived of them, in some cases by governments in countries which have a bill of rights. In no way should they feel that any individual right is threatened in Canada. There should be a certainty to rights. For that reason, I am personally prepared to support a charter of rights and freedoms.

If we enshrine our rights and freedoms as defined in 1981, we must be sure that the charter contains all the rights and freedoms now considered to exist and allow for quick, easy amendment to improve the charter. No one in this House is a Solomon who can state unequivocally that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms contains all the rights and freedoms that presently exist or should exist. The values and attitudes of society change. That is the nature of things. I have suggested to many audiences that anyone writing a charter of rights and freedoms in 1900 would not have included the proviso that women have the right to vote. Would such an amendment have passed in later years if it had to go through the government's proposed amending formula? If the amendment was considered premature by one province or another, it would have failed. Rancour, disappointment and discontent would prevail.

I am also bothered by the fact that my rights as an individual are to be determined by a judge, not an elected representative. As a lawyer, I have great respect for the judicial system, the judiciary and the rule of law, but I do not want to tell a citizen that a constitutional amendment is required to assert the rights which he thought he had. Government should be of laws, not of men. Rights not defined in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms should be capable of definition or improvement by elected representatives, not judges.

I appreciate that the point I am now about to make is not constitutionally fine tuned. I ask the government to consider some method whereby the charter of rights and freedoms could be amended by a vote in Parliament, improving and expanding the rights contained in the charter by a simple majority of Parliament. But if rights or freedoms are being reduced, they must be subject to the amending formula.

In the spirit that it is the duty of the opposition to suggest improvements, I wish to comment on two possible amendments to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

It is a glaring deficiency for the proposed charter of rights and freedoms not to contain a guarantee of an individual's rights to own property. The Progressive Conservative Party has proposed that everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived thereof, except in accordance with the principles of natural justice.

The Liberals and NDP have rejected protection for an individual's property rights. That is a glaring error. The right to own property and not have it taken away except by natural justice is a fundamental right of all Canadians. That right should be enshrined. We do not seek to prevent government from expropriating a citizen's property where it can prove a specific need that is fair and in the interests of society. But we are concerned that by omitting entirely any reference to property rights, the Liberals will be inviting a judicial interpretation that citizens have no right to own property. Socialists will rejoice.

I wish to put on record a letter I received from the Midland-Penetang District Real Estate Board. I quote:

> Our board and its 86 members cannot condone and further condemn the Liberal government's action of refusing to entrench property rights in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.
>
> Property rights as presently provided for in the Canadian Bill of Rights should be included within any Canadian charter of rights and freedoms.
> We do acknowledge and commend the efforts of your party regarding the necessary inclusion of property rights within the charter of rights. Our board further endorses the Conservative party's wording of this proposed amendment.

In today's society, a person's privacy faces countless intrusions. Property ownership preserves a feeling of privacy. It allows us to "get away from it all" with a sense that we are retreating to something which is "ours" and cannot be confiscated by the state. That concept is precious to Canadians. It is a concept of personal independence. It also fosters a sense of permanence. Mark Twain once said, "Buy land, they stopped making it".

Surely the Charter of Rights and Freedoms should be expanded to include this basic concept enshrining the right of every Canadian to own property.

• (2030)

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret that the Liberal Party and its members do not understand the necessity for an affirmation of the principle of the supremacy of God in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms; because it is God, and it is not one political party, not any one man, it is not a charter of rights and freedoms, to whom Canadians should look for guidance. Faith in God gives meaning and purpose to human life. That principle should be enshrined in the charter of rights and freedoms.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment on the unseeming haste of the government in this matter. I reject the suggestion that there has been a 54-year delay in settling the matter of constitutional reform, just as I earlier criticized the premiers and prime ministers who have not applied themselves to this important subject. I am, however, in favour of telling the provinces to get on with their proposals. Instead of press conferences and premiers' meetings, they should decide on an acceptable amending formula, introduce the appropriate resolution in the provincial legislatures and give some finality to those things which they are so free to talk about at press conferences. There should be some finality to the provinces' position.

I would also suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if they applied a similar process to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, all Canadians would benefit and we would then truly have something of which we can all be proud.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis) has stated, we in this House of Commons cannot play the role of Solomon. We all come here with different perceptions of Canada, and I think it is time for each one of us, in his or her own way, to share with the others his or her vision of Canada.

I remember from the play "Cyrano de Bergerac" where the hero was once asked to write something which was flattering but untrue, and he stated in the play: "A man should neither utter nor write a word which he first has not heard in his own heart." Tonight, Mr. Speaker, I share with all of my colleagues in the House words that I have heard for the first time in my own heart.

With the return of the landmark constitutional resolution from committee, it is at last appropriate to speak of Canada entering the early minutes of a new era; in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, a splendid new era. The yeoman work of creating a new constitution has now been completed. Oh, there will be more debate and perhaps some important amendments; but with this major body of philosophical and technical work complete, it should now be possible for all of us to begin exploring the vital prospects that flow from constitutional renewal.

In our quiet moments, Mr. Speaker, many of us have wistful yearnings for a new way to articulate our nationhood. There are ordinary people everywhere in this country who feel something for Canada. They have been seeking a way to describe vague, but powerful, stirrings virtually bursting for release and each, in his or her own way, has wished to pay this amazing country its full due. But, somehow, in 113 years of confederation, we have not quite found the right words.

The Canadian nationalist, the person moved by an explicit love of this country, has been the exception, rather than the rule, through much of our history. Since the first European explorers staked claim to this part of North America, people living here have been inclined to focus attention outside of Canada. We have been shaped by foreign symbols and events, many of them from the distant past. With each generation, this focus has been less appropriate; and with each generation a sense of unease has increased for the substantial body of Canadians, like me, with deep roots in this country.

There have been no words to describe our place, those of us who were born here, maybe two or three generations of us. This is our land. There have been few symbols to which we could attach our meanings; the 69 years before we could proclaim our Canadian citizenship; the 97-year wait for our own distinctive flag, which is to your right, Mr. Speaker; and the 113 years without an official anthem served as much to underline this point as to correct it.

I have discovered, Mr. Speaker, that the stirrings that I feel—the stirrings that I share with so many Canadians—are those of the nationalists. I am a Canadian nationalist. I am not an Ontario nationalist, or a Quebec nationalist. I am not a western nationalist, and I do not put the maritimes before everything else.

My nationalism is reserved for what distinguishes all 23 million of us, from Swedes, or Frenchmen, or Britishers, or Americans. I am not talking here about the sort of nationalism that isolates a people, that makes them arrogant or narrow-minded or exploitative. That is the nationalism of ideologists. I am talking about the sort of nationalism that makes it possible for a people to reach out, to be magnanimous, secure in the knowledge that they have something unique and precious to give to the world.

This nationalism flows from a feeling of belonging, from a sense of national commitment. It hinges on the ability of thoughtful citizens to capture the inspiring essence of nationhood in words and in symbols. Without a sense of national commitment, without a pride that rises above local boundaries, what remains? The answer is painfully clear because it is currently being demonstrated in our beloved Canada. What is left is competition for spoils fostered by wealth that has not been committed to greater common ends. Without a sense of national commitment we could vigorously exploit our material treasure for a thousand years, and still be impoverished.

I want Canada to excel in spheres in which we are particularly gifted. I want us to produce goods better than anyone else. I want us to celebrate the forms of artistic expression that best reflect our soul. I want us to pioneer new branches of knowledge and to develop an even more humane social system.

The principles that will make those ends possible are now clearly stated in a constitution that will soon be entirely our own. I believe that the great symbol of a home-forged constitution embodying our most cherished conceptions, our most prized rights, is a great breakthrough. In swift chain reaction, it will urge us toward a quiet but a profound revolution of spirit. Let me look briefly at the elements of the constitutional resolution that I believe will be the active ingredients in this revolution of spirit.

[Translation]

To my mind, one of the most important aspects of this resolution is that it guarantees that all Canadians will be free to settle where they want in this country. How can we have a nation if its citizens are not free to move around as they wish? Only if we can look for work, put our children in schools where they will not feel out of place and become home owners and build in any area of the country will we consider ourselves citizens of a great nation. Otherwise, we shall only be residents of hostile and restricted feudal kingdoms.

Physical obstacles to travel have virtually disappeared. We can go nearly everywhere in Canada in a single day, and in most cases, much more quickly. The only real obstacles are psychological and legal. The psychological obstacles reflect fear, apprehension and uncertainty, fuelled by perceived regional divisions. The Constitution we have been offered can only eliminate such perceptions by guaranteeing unequivocally the freedom of movement and communications. The legal obstacles are those which give special employment and ownership rights to local residents. These are certainly the most insidious obstacles, as they discriminate between citizens from one area and those from elsewhere. This can be the cause of serious divisions and great bitterness. Without mobility rights, there can be no question of the national commitment to which I referred earlier. For this principle to prevail, all Canadians must feel at home everywhere in Canada. This will promote an enlightened nationalism.

● (2040)

[English]

The ideal with regard to language rights would be for each person in any part of this country to choose freely which of the official languages he or she wants to use, but in reaching this ideal there must be no hint of compulsion. This, as much as anything, will be the test of our wealth of spirit in the post-patriation period. If some provinces object and say that meeting this challenge of spirit will be inconvenient, that it will involve extra expense or that it may enrage some sections of the community, then that too will be a measure of our spirit.

The third principle, that of equalization, is also to be formally recognized in the Constitution. This is a mechanism operating largely outside the glare of publicity, but it too mirrors and emphasizes the principle of mobility, in this case a mobility of opportunity. You see, the freedom to move from one place to another is the flip side of freedom to remain in one's ancestral home without penalty.

Some have argued that without protection against movement each new discovery of wealth will mean a disruptive migration of Canadians from one region to another, but this need only be a fear if Canadians do not share equally the riches they jointly own. Equalization ensures a fair distribution of wealth through the mechanism of transfer payments. This enables Canadians with strong emotional attachments to their homes to enjoy continued residence without punishing tax burdens or confined horizons. To such Canadians equalization is the tangible evidence of the neighbourly concern of their compatriots in other provinces.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is well said.

Mr. Parent: In my view it is right that individuals should have rights which cannot be arbitrarily tampered with by government.

Mr. Epp: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parent: In a sense this puts the individual above government, but it also gives the individual greater responsibility.

Responsibility and spirit are linked. What person could freely declare himself in love with his country if it offered him no fundamental rights and gave him no personal responsibility for exercising and protecting them?

[Translation]

I am therefore in favour of entrenching basic rights in the Constitution. I am also in favour of an amendment procedure which ensures the participation of a great majority of Canadians to any constitutional reform. Indeed, as far as the Constitution is concerned, as it is so essential to the articulation of our national spirit, the greatest number possible of citizens must be involved as directly as possible. When we have finally patriated our Constitution, we shall have a solid legal instrument to protect and promote our rights and freedoms. However, as I said earlier, it is perhaps the symbolic aspect of the Constitution which is the most important.

[English]

This is not to say that we are currently without home-grown symbols. As I mentioned, our flag and anthem are now recognized around the world as distinctly Canadian symbols.

Mr. Blais: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parent: Niagara Falls, the Centre Block we are in now, Lake Louise, the old quarter of Quebec, the Vancouver skyline: all of these have high recognition value and symbolic content. Our current leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) are all three united by a vision of a fully independent and responsible Canada. They differ on details.

With the patriation of our Constitution it is my belief that we will draw more fully on symbols and visions like these in forging our very own identity as Canadians. A Canada transformed by a revolution of spirit will not be a Canada without disagreement. Passionate argument in the open over matters of consequence and aimed at peaceful resolution is one of the glories of our system here in Canada. Indeed, I see the vehemence of the debate over the Constitution as an awakening of passions rooted for all of us on all sides of this House in a deep love for this country. Who would want to argue in so lively a way over something worthless? And, to be sure, argument will not end with the passage of this resolution. Circumstances change, attitudes change and constitutions change. Nothing that is truly alive is cemented immovably in time.

The hon. member for Simcoe North mentioned that in 1790 the state of Virginia had 23 per cent or 25 per cent of the population of the 13 colonies. He pointed out that in subsequent years all the other 12 states became more populous than Virginia and that under our Constitution "Virginia" would always have a veto power. I believe this Constitution will change before 200 more years pass. It took us 114 years to get this one turned over.

Mr. Lambert: Why put it in there?

Mr. Parent: I believe what we should be looking at is not only a country that is growing but also a country that is flourishing, a country of which we and our children can well be proud of being part.

Argument will be required to establish the shape of that document in the years to come, but we must remember that argument is not the heart of the matter; it is merely the mechanism. Commitment and respect and love of country are the heart of the matter.

Outside this country there are no hyphenated Canadians. There are simply Canadians. There are no French Canadians, English Canadians, Hungarian Canadians or Japanese Canadians, but Canadians. That is how we are looked upon outside this country.

Is there a separatist sickness stirring in the west? I was out west, and I can tell hon. members that there are feelings of anger and frustration. I experienced them first-hand, but if there really is this separatist sickness, as our global neighbours look on us what is this compared with our united pursuit of excellence in all fields?

● (2050)

Is there a premier in Quebec who would like to build a fence around his portion of Canada? Outside this country he barely merits mention compared to the heroes and remarkable people who live here; the Ken and Pat Taylors, the Terry Foxes, who right this minute is fighting for his life, the Karen Kains and the Legers of today, or the Frederick Bantings, Norman Bethunes, Billy Bishops, Marshall McLuhans, and the Nellie McClungs of yesterday.

Where are the Rocky Mountains; not in British Columbia or Alberta but in Canada. Where is Niagara Falls? It is in Canada. Where is the Beaufort Sea, the St. Lawrence Seaway and Louisbourg? They are all in Canada. They are in provinces, but they belong to all of us. They are here in our Canada and, by God, they are ours.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parent: Inside this country it could be the same. There is no need to reduce our cultural richness to averages. We do not all have to sing the same song. There is good reason to acknowledge the qualities unique to Canada which transcend political boundaries and political parties and make us one with our fellow citizens. Such are the qualities of the enlightened love of nation of which I speak. We perhaps back away when we speak of love of country. Perhaps these are words which should not be used by parliamentarians. Perhaps we should use the jargon of the bureaucrats in order to hide our feelings and not let anyone know what this land means to us. For me this love of which I speak, this nationalism, this love of country, is a statement which I have carried with me all of my adult life.

Each and every Canadian has the power to contribute mightily to this revolution of spirit. Let us not waste such potential by dividing our energies and battling among ourselves. Such is the importance I place on the constitutional resolution. It has been the unique opportunity of this Parliament to give it shape. Now it is our historic duty to give it a permanent place in the very soul of the Canadian nation.

Some three years ago, Mr. Speaker, I was at a dinner which was attended by the present Speaker of the other place. I take the liberty to name him—the Hon. Jean Marchand. At that dinner he was asked if he had his whole political career over again what changes he would make. He said if he had it all to do over again he would take one hour out of every week and he would speak to one of us, one of his colleagues, and we could tell him about our Canada and he could tell us about his. Perhaps if we did take one hour out of every week, we did talk about our Canada together, sharing our Canada without yelling at one another, and if we could truly sit down and listen to one another, perhaps then there would be the Canada that all of us visualize. After looking carefully into my own heart and to my own soul this is the significance I have of Canada, a Canada founded and growing and flourishing under God. Indeed, I believe that God is watching over and looking after Canada. I now ask myself a rhetorical question after these few minutes of sharing and I ask you, all of you, my colleagues, is my vision of Canada so very much different than yours?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Parent). He ended on a note which many of us on this side in the official opposition subscribe to. In the few remarks he made toward the end of his speech he recognized that there is a God. We in this party believe in the supremacy of God. We believe the concept should be entrenched. We will welcome him to join with us in opposition when the final vote is taken on this constitutional resolution which is not complete.

Practically everyone in Canada is in favour of patriation. Not everyone, indeed a vast number of Canadians, are not in favour of unilaterally entrenching this particular bill of rights in the way this government is proceeding. The entrenchment of the Senate veto and the formula for amending the Constitution by the provinces are matters which I oppose. I oppose the referendum proposal in the constitutional resolution. I oppose the veto to be given to the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec. It is a fence those two provinces are building around themselves. If you lived in any one of the other provinces in Canada, Mr. Speaker—and we have eight others—you, too, would subscribe to the theory that somehow we are secondary Canadians by the entrenchment of that veto for the two provinces. The failure to recognize certain Metis organizations, the failure to put the property rights, in fact, the failure to meet with and consult with the Metis and the insistence that certain Metis organizations and certain Indian organizations must belong to particular organizations before they will be heard, causes me to stand and oppose this resolution.

The absence of the supremacy of God is another reason which causes me to be in opposition to this particular bill of rights. In fact, I see nothing in this constitutional resolution but a divisiveness which will be in place forever and a day. Nothing short of separation or revolt will extricate Canadians from the mess we are in today.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it nine o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being nine o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, pursuant to the Chair's decision of Thursday, February 19, 1981.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ABOLITION OF THE SENATE

The House resumed, from Thursday, February 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles, that Bill C-243, to amend the British North America Act, 1867 (abolition of the Senate), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

• (2100)

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hour has come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles: It is time for the senators to realize that they have had their day.

The debate we have just interrupted, because it is time for private members' hour, is one in which, despite the differences we may have, we are all agreed that we want control of our own affairs here in Canada. One way or another, we hope we will soon enjoy that situation. It is perhaps significant we have turned from that debate on the patriation of the Constitution to another question which relates to the desire of Canadian people to control their own affairs. We do that in this democratic country by having a Parliament representative of the people in which we speak for those people and make laws on their behalf.

However, I suggest, as I have suggested a good many times in the last several decades, that it is not a democracy as long as there is a part of this Parliament—that other place—in which there sit men and women who have not been put there by the people of Canada, are not responsible to them, and in that sense do not represent the people of this nation. They are fine men and women. I number many of them as my friends, and some of them manage somehow to treat me as their friend. After one has said that, and after one admits they do good committee work, that they have produced some excellent reports on a number of subjects, and that about 25 of them work pretty hard at the job—

An hon. Member: Twenty-five?

Mr. Knowles: I am being generous. It is still a fact that according to the estimates tabled today we are spending about $20 million a year to maintain an institution which is completely undemocratic.

Every member of that other place is appointed to it on the recommendation of the prime minister of the day. Once a person gets into that place, he is responsible to no one. Certainly he is not responsible to the people of the province from which he comes. He is not even responsible back to the prime minister who recommended his appointment. I think the time has come for us to take the position that we are a grown-up democracy and, just as we want our Constitution in Canada, not residing in some other country, we want a Parliament which is thoroughly democratic.

Of course there are arguments on this subject both ways. I have presented the arguments on our side of the proposition a good many times. The bill usually gets talked out. One always hopes that maybe this is the night it will not be talked out. I see my friend over there. Where did you come from?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I ask the hon. member to address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Knowles: You are quite right, Mr. Speaker; I know where you came from. I noticed my friend across the way who usually defends the Senate; I see he is here tonight. Maybe he has had his say and there might even be a willingness on the Liberal side of the House to let the subject matter of this bill go to committee to see if we cannot find some better way than letting a group of unelected people have a continuing veto over the decisions made by elected members of the House of Commons. Of course there has been the notion that there needed to be these elderly people to have sober second thoughts in case the democratically elected people made mistakes.

An hon. Member: We do.

Mr. Knowles: We do; we can make mistakes in this House, but when we make mistakes, we have to go back to the people and let them be the judges. But their honours in the other place do not have to go back to anyone. They are there; it used to be for life, but now it is until age 75. There is just no way I can buy that as consistent with the principle of democracy. I hope, in these days when we are thinking about the constitutional set-up of our country, we will give serious consideration to the proposition that the other place ought to be abolished.

I know there are some who say it would be a reform to put it on an elected basis. That is something which can be considered, but in my view we have enough conflicts in this country already between the executive and Parliament, between the federal government and the provinces. This makes me feel that if we had two elected Houses, each with full moral authority, the chances are we might never get anything done. I go all the way and say let us abolish the Senate completely.

I used the word "reform" a moment ago. There have been some attempts to reform the Senate. Supposedly it was an important reform a while ago when their honours were given terms to the effect that they had to retire at age 75 instead of being there for life. That was really no reform. In fact, it cost us more money. Now we have to pay the ones who retired their pensions and then pay the new ones their full senatorial salaries. But, there has been kicking around for a number of years a proposal which was a bit of a reform, namely, a proposal that the senators have only a suspensive veto, that they not be permitted to veto a thousand times what we might pass in this House. That idea of a suspensive veto actually got into the constitutional resolution which we have been debating in other hours. It was Section 44 until it was put out. I want to register my strong objection to the government's action in yielding to the blackmail from some senators and cutting that Section 44 out of the constitutional package; it ought to have stayed. That is, indeed, another reason why we should abolish the Senate tonight. Let us show the senators what we think of the blackmail they gave the Government of Canada.

I do not want to take too long because I want a few others to have a chance to speak before we do the trick and finish off the Senate. That leads me to something I would like to say is very important at this juncture. With the removal of Section 44 from that other resolution, there are some people who are saying—some of them are some of our friends—that the Senate is being put in a position to veto its own reform or veto its own abolition which is a stronger position than it has ever had before. When that idea was spread around, of course some people asked me how I could agree to the constitutional package since I am so strong for the abolition of the Senate. I want to take a moment or two to point out that there is no truth to that assertion at all.

From the year one, which happens to be 1867, the Senate has had the veto over any bill put through the House of Commons. Even with respect to my bill we are debating tonight, if we were to pass it and send it to the other place, they would have the right to say yes or no to it. You heard what they said to the government about Section 44 in the package. They would probably say no. That has been the picture since the beginning of our nation's history. The Senate has a veto over any bill.

There is another way in which the Constitution gets amended. That is the one with which we are very familiar these days; that is, by the sending of a resolution from the Parliament of Canada to Her Majesty to be placed before the Parliament of the United Kingdom. I emphasize that what has to be sent is a resolution from Parliament, and that means a resolution from two Houses. That means that there is no chance at all of our sending a resolution, from this House of Commons alone, to Westminster asking for the abolition of the Senate.

That has been the case from the beginning of time, so their newly stated opportunity in the proposed Constitution to veto anything that is desired by this House, or desired as an amendment to the Constitution, is not something new.

I also point out that since 1931, when the statute of Westminster was passed, it has been clear that the Parliament of Westminster agrees to a resolution to amend the British North America Act only if it has the request or the consent of the Parliament of Canada. I heard those words just a few moments ago from another member who was speaking, and those words are there. It has to be on the request or with the consent of the Parliament of Canada. The Parliament of Canada consists of two Houses, so there we are.

From 1867 to the present, and particularly since 1931, the Senate has had a veto power over any move that might be made to reform it or to abolish it. The slightly different wording which appears in the constitutional package is not an increase, by one iota, of the strength and the power of the Senate. I have heard it said that surely if the House of Commons and ten provincial legislatures or governments wanted the abolition of the Senate, Westminster would do it; and that is a pretty far-out hypothesis, that the ten provincial governments would take that view and the House of Commons as well. But I submit that even then, the Parliament of Westminster would have to look at the statute of Westminster and say to itself, "This resolution came from one House, not from the Parliament of Canada".

When I talk in these terms, some people say, "Well, can we ever get rid of the Senate?" We can, when we have a government that has the will and the guts to do it. In this very country, we abolished, long ago, the Upper House of the province of Manitoba, we abolished the Upper House in Nova Scotia, and not many years ago the Upper House of Quebec was abolished. In none of those cases did those who were the members of those Upper Houses like it, but it was the will and determination of the government. Sometimes it was a life pension for those who held their positions; but when a government has wanted to get rid of a second chamber it has been possible to do so. I think that is what we need in this country: a government that believes in democracy to the extent of saying that all of our law-making, all of our representing of the people of Canada, shall be done by men and women elected by the people of Canada, sitting on their behalf in a representative democratic institution.

As I say, that was a bit of a digression, but I thought it was important to make it. I regret very deeply that Section 44 was struck out of the resolution. I regret very deeply that the government yielded to the blackmail from the Senate; that some of them might vote against the package. I do not believe for a moment there would have been enough to do it, but the government was too scared and backed down. I regret all of that, but I want to make it clear that if the present constitutional changes are made, we will still have the right to fight for a totally democratic Parliament, we will still have the right to work for the abolition of the Senate; and if we do not make it in the next 45 minutes, I shall be back at it again next year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, will you permit a very brief question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Will the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) accept a question?

Mr. Knowles: Gladly.

Mr. Herbert: I wonder why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made no reference to Bill C-60 and the Supreme Court decision when he said a government that had the will to do so could do so.

Mr. Knowles: I thought the hon. member was trying again to raise the point of order he raised the last time; but with respect to that question, if he argues that two years ago the government had the guts, I will go along with him, at least to make my point. If the government had the will two years ago to try to change the Senate. What has happened to that will today? Why has it backed down, with respect to Section 44?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Blackmail.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I enjoy the opportunity to speak on this particular bill. When I made my maiden speech in Parliament back in 1974, I spoke on this very same bill as introduced in the Thirtieth Parliament. I must admit that I have matured in my views over the years, and I have gone away from the blatant defence of the status quo that I presented when I made my maiden speech.

However, in saying that I believe my views have matured, I must say that I completely disagree with the bill before us which requests total abolition of the Senate.

In beginning my remarks, let me suggest it is certainly impertinent to discuss this question, at a time when we have a constitutional resolution before the House; a resolution which has an impact on the structure of government, the powers of the legislatures, of the fundamental constitutional direction of this country. But I realize there is no malevolence on the part of my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It is the luck of the draw. You, Mr. Speaker, ruled last week, that it was very much in order to proceed with this bill at this point in time.

I would like to underscore one serious point the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has made tonight, which does have some bearing on the constitutional revolution—resolution—

An hon. Member: Revolution.

Mr. Collenette: A slip of the tongue.

An hon. Member: It is an important bill.

Mr. Collenette: —before the House, and that is on the powers of the Senate, as they may be, after the deletion of Section 44 in the resolution on the Constitution, because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is absolutely correct. What the government has done by deleting that clause in the resolution affects or it enhances, in no way the power of the Senate. The power of the Senate, under the British North America Act, is total and is absolute. I think very few people in this country realize the full dimensions of power that the Senate has at its disposal. Unlike the House of Lords in the United Kingdom, which saw its power limited by the Parliament Act of 1911, when, as you may remember, the prime minister of the day might have been Lloyd George, Henry Campbell Bannerman—I am not so sure. I think it was Lloyd George.

An hon. Member: Asquith.

Mr. Collenette: Asquith. My friend for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) is a great historian, so he knows the facts.

Mr. Asquith, the prime minister at the time, went to the king and said, in effect, "Look, Your Majesty, if we are going to have the power of the House of Lords continue to frustrate general social legislation"—and you must realize that that was the period of the great Liberal social legislation which heralded old age pensions, which, incidentally, the CCF, in this country, and the Labour parties stole from the Liberals in Great Britain; "if the House of Lords is going to impede that legislation, then, Your Majesty, we feel this is wrong, and that the power of the House of Lords should be circumvented." The king said, "Yes, I agree with you," and used the royal prerogative to threaten the creation of more peers so there could be a different colouring to the House of Lords. As a result of the Parliament Act of 1911, the power of the House of Lords was significantly curtailed.

● (2120)

In fact, today the House of Lords enjoys more of the suspensive veto powers that we have been proposing in this House for many years. We proposed it in the Thirtieth Parliament with Bill C-60. We thought it would be wise to limit the absolute power of the Senate and to institute a six-month veto, as well as change the method of appointment of senators.

There is a little bit of mischief going about in the country, perpetrated by the Premier of Saskatchewan, to the effect that what the government has done with the constitutional resolution, in deleting Section 44, somehow enhances the power of the Senate and encumbers Canadians with some anti-democratic demagogue. That just is not the case because what the government has done is to maintain the status quo.

My friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre may deplore that. At least he is a man principled enough to stand in this House and say that is the truth. I admire him for that because in a sense he is challenging the assertion made by the Premier of Saskatchewan who is a member of his own party.

The one aspect of Senate reform that I should like to deal with briefly is the fact that senators themselves have advocated reform. When I sat on the special joint committee on the Constitution that studied Bill C-60 in the Thirtieth Parliament I did not see an obstructionist Senate that wanted to preserve its absolute veto for all time. Indeed, I found a group of eminently respected individuals who cared about this country and felt that perhaps their absolute powers should be curtailed to within a general scheme of parliamentary reform.

Incidentally, they disagreed with the procedure I described last Thursday when we debated the procedural aspects of the admissibility of debating this bill tonight. They disagreed that the House of Commons had the right to initiate a bill to amend an appointment to the Senate and, of course, the Supreme Court agreed with their assertion and struck that down.

At the time, the senators agreed that there should be significant reform of the upper chamber. I find it rather ironic that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, coming as he does from the great CCF populace stock of western Canada and having been in this House since the early forties, should take the position that he does, given the fact that one of the great historians of the CCF and the NDP, Mr. Frank Scott, has matured in his views, as I believe I have in my views. He started, like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, many years ago from the position that the Senate should be abolished. In 1970 when another committee was studying the constitution, he said:

> There have been about sixty new constitutions written since the end of World War II and in a great many of them there is a second Chamber . . . it is not an idea which is fading away gradually and I would think that there could be now some legitimate place for a Senate that had some regional representation.

That was the genius of Bill C-60 which, unfortunately, has not been fully appreciated by the public. In order to give the regions a better balance, a better impact upon national policies, the government proposed that the Senate would be appointed according to proportionate representation. Half the Senate appointments would be made by the federal parties represented in the House of Commons—not by the incumbent prime minister as is the case at present but by the leader of the opposition or the Leader of the NDP if they were ever to divest themselves of their emotional, philosophical hatred for the Senate and agree to work with a reformed senate. The other half of the appointments would have to be made by parties in the provincial legislatures; not the premiers of the provinces but the parties themselves, the leaders of the opposition; the Liberal, the New Democratic Party, Socred and all oppositions, perhaps even the Parti Québécois. It would be based on the strength those parties had in the legislatures.

I believe that was the real genius of Bill C-60. It got around the very dicey problem of proportionate representation in the House of Commons, a proposition which may be resurrected. The government is fully committed to electoral reform, as was stated in the Speech from the Throne last year. I hope all members will contribute to that debate.

I should point out that when we talk about electoral reform we are not just talking about proportionate representation in this House. Proportionate representation can be achieved in the upper house.

Mr. Knowles: Are you still committed to Senate reform?

Mr. Collenette: Despite the abhorrence of my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I think the Senate has historically discharged its responsibilities with great dignity and wisdom. The Senate, which has the right to reject any bill whatsoever as often as it sees fit, has very rarely used this power. In fact, I believe it has not declined to pass a bill unless it has been endorsed in a general election. This was done with a naval bill in 1915. If I have my facts right, the Senate pronounced upon that bill.

There is great arbitrary power in the Senate but it is used sparingly. I would say that we are doing senators an injustice if we rile against the privilege which they have had for years but which should be changed. We all recognize that it should be changed but for other reasons, not the rhetorical, philosophical rantings and ravings of members of the NDP who approach this subject from an emotional rather than rational point of view.

Today in Canada we have need of another chamber that can review legislation at a more leisurely pace. Every day of the week we hear members speak of the pressures that we in this chamber are under to deal with the Constitution, the energy program and economic issues. Members of Parliament come before the members' services committee saying they are overburdened and that they need more staff. That may be the case. I am sure there is an element of truth in it but I think there is a need for another body that can be more reflective of the regions. I do not mean a body appointed solely by provincial governments. I do not want any bundesrat in this country. That was the proposal made by the official opposition and I remember the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) speaking at great length and with vigour on the positive aspects of the German system with the bundesrat.

I would take great umbrage at the kind of provincial governments we have in this country today, provincial fiefdoms, appointing senators who would then have a veto over the work of the House of Commons. That is the real danger in Senate reform. We must be sure that this blatantly and patently false decentralist theory of confederation is not perpetuated by a Senate which becomes the mere puppet of provincial governments.

An hon. Member: It is a puppet of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) now.

Mr. Collenette: I shall not go on at length Mr. Speaker, except to say that—

Mr. Knowles: I thought you said you had matured.

Mr. Collenette: I think I have matured but obviously that is a very subjective viewpoint. I will leave it to other members to make their judgment on that.

In November, 1980, the Senate itself issued its report on certain aspects of the Canadian Constitution. This report was the work of the people who are in that place now, the people who will be asked to pass the constitutional resolution. In viewing Senate reform they showed a remarkable attitude of self-sacrifice. They are willing to give of themselves, to reform their chamber in accordance with the realities of modern-day Canada. In no way do I subscribe to the almost despairing view of some hon. members opposite, especially those in the New Democratic Party in western Canada, who say the Senate will never allow any constitutional amendment to pass which will have an impact on its own future. I reject that quite forcefully, Mr. Speaker.

In conclusion, I should like to welcome the sentiments of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. This evening he made a very bold intervention which has an impact on national politics, and I hope that impact will not be lost on members here. He disagreed with the statements made by the Premier of Saskatchewan who has been dillying and dallying about supporting our constitutional resolution for these many months. But I do take exception to his almost irrational view that this federation, made up of a number of constituent parts, can only be served by the members of this House. That was not the intention of the Fathers of Confederation and hopefully it will not be the intention of all of us who are working together, irrespective of party, toward building a better Canada through constitutional reform.

• (2130)

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate tonight about abolishing the Senate and, although I am not the greatest protector of the Senate, I think we can say thank heavens we have the Senate today, we now know there are some responsible Liberals in this country. They are speaking out in the Senate and will oppose this Liberal-NDP coalition constitutional package. I will go into details about that in a moment by putting on the record some comments made by these responsible Liberals in the other chamber.

I do not support the way the Liberals have run the Senate over the last number of years. Their full-time national party organizer is a member of the Senate. I do not approve of that at all. There are members in the Senate of other parties who work for their particular party when an election is on, but they are not there full time working for their party as are certain Liberals.

I must give some credit to the Senate for the work they do in their committees, some of which travel across the country. One study in which I have taken some interest is the one on the economic conditions in Canada. The Senate committee involved went into great length about the exodus of capital from this country and our political climate. Their report showed that starting in 1975 there was a massive exodus of capital from Canada because of the nationalization of the potash industry by an NDP government and outlined the damaging effects that had right across the country. It set off a signal in the United States for people to be very careful sending money up here for investment purposes. The trend of investment money leaving Canada started in 1975. Many people think that nationalizing an industry is a wonderful thing. It is not a wonderful thing because it scares investment out of the country; it does not attract investment. This study on what happened when an NDP government nationalized an industry in Canada was excellent.

Very good studies have been done on the poor and the aged by the Senate. Although these excellent studies have been done, it is unfortunate the Liberal government ignores most of them. They just gather dust on shelves. If the Liberal government would just pay a little more attention and read some of the works which different committees of the Senate have compiled over the years, we would probably be a lot better off in this country. Not all senators are party hacks.

The Bank Act has been strengthened because the Senate finance committee did excellent work in that area. There is a lot of brain power in the Senate. Members of the Senate pick up a lot of things we miss. They are not all sitting there gathering cobwebs. Many of them are men with high principles.

It is interesting to note that Senator Lafond and Senator McIlraith are sounded out as opposing the government's constitutional package. However, I want to quote from the Senate Hansard for February 24, 1981, when the Hon. Eric Cook spoke. He is a lifelong Liberal who can no longer stomach what is going on in this country. What he said was this:

> I am opposed to the resolution because I am opposed to the federal government's unilateral action notwithstanding the disapproval of the majority of the provinces and the majority of Canadians.

Of course, we thank heaven we have about four NDP members here who have seen the light. The news media says they are men of principle. They are now going to vote against the government's package. I do not think it has anything to do with principle at all; they got a message from the electorate back home. More power to them that they read the message from the voters. I fully support that.

Senator Cook went on to say:

I quote from Professor Peter Browne, a distinguished member of the Department of history of Carleton University:

"Most of the witnesses before the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution concentrated their criticism on the provisions of the proposed charter of rights. As a result, some of the ambiguities, contradictions, restrictions and omissions have been identified, and may be remedied. What has still not been adequately discussed, however, is the underlying question of whether the ultimate responsibility for defining our basic social values should be transferred from the federal and provincial parliaments to the Supreme Court."

As a matter of fact, I was just discussing this very subject with my colleague, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) who happened tonight to be in the company of some judges who gave him a real insight into the dog's breakfast we will get into if this is left up to the courts. That is the point Senator Cook made in his speech. He went on to say:

There are, indeed, many good and sincere people who seem to fell that if we have a charter of rights, and pass over to the courts the duty and responsibility of enforcing and interpreting it, this will prove to be a panacea, a universal remedy or cure for all our ills. Furthermore, they feel that the charter of rights must be placed beyond the power of Parliament, a legislature or the elected representatives of the people to repeal or amend. Those who subscribe to this theory argue that the court can and will do all that is necessary to protect and safeguard all our rights. Will this indeed be the result?

He gives an example of a Supreme Court case of a number of years ago. Canadian people do not realize what will be involved to protect their rights. People will have to fight in the courts for years. It will be great for the legal profession. Mr. Justice Berger in the United States has pointed out that because their bill of rights was entrenched in a charter the United States judicial system today is an absolute jungle. Lawyers are getting smarter and smarter all the time and are finding more and more loopholes in the law. It goes on and on and on, and lawyers are making hundreds of thousands of dollars handling these cases. It does absolutely nothing at all for the person on the street. I shall now read the example which Senator Cook gave in the Senate of February 24. It just goes to show how involved and complicated it is when these things get into the courts. He said:

The last time there was a case before the Supreme Court of Canada dealing with human rights under the Constitution was in the year 1928. At that time the Supreme Court of Canada was asked to decide the meaning of the word "persons" in section 24 of the British North America Act, and whether "persons" includes women. The court ruled unanimously, with not one dissenting voice, that "women are not 'qualified persons'" within the meaning of Section 24 of the BNA Act, 1867, and, therefore, were not eligible for appointment by the Governor General to the Senate of Canada.

Did the court endeavour to reflect public opinion in 1928, and did it look to the future in order to decide this question, or did the judges look to the past to find some legal precedent on which they could hand their hats? Did they look at the state of public opinion in 1928, and did they endeavour to decide what should be the best decision for the future? A reading of the judgment indicates that they searched the past, and Chief Justice Anglin quoted with approval the words of Lord Esher of England, spoken in 1889.

Lord Esher had quoted with approval the words of Mr. Justice Willes, which Mr. Justice Willes had written in 1868, as follows:

I take the first proposition to be that laid down by Willes J., in the case of Chorlton v. Lings. I take it that by neither the common law nor the constitution of this country from the beginning of the common law until now can a woman be entitled to exercise any public functions. Willes J. stated so in that case, and a more learned judge never lived.

● (2140)

Can you imagine an ordinary person going into court, fighting for his rights and having to listen to a legal harangue like that in order to explain his rights. I look after people's rights every day of the week, as do all members in this chamber, without having to hire lawyers and go to court. I can take a matter up with a cabinet minister, speak on someone's behalf here or in committee. I do not have to go to court and have a bunch of judges deal with it.

Senator Cook went on to say:

In view of this record, why should we think that the courts will be pioneers in safegarding human rights?

We need to keep the Senate, at least for the time being. As long as we have this group of Liberals and New Democrats, we need some responsible Liberals in the other place to look after our rights. Thank heaven a few more of them are speaking out. Senator Cook went on to say:

Fortunately, the women's rights case had a happier outcome. The judgment was appealed to the Privy Council in London and the court held:

Of course, that went on for years and years in the courts. May I check one thing, Mr. Speaker. Is ten o'clock the cut-off?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): To put it more accurately, the hon. member's personal cut-off time is ten minutes to ten.

Mr. Knowles: Speeches are 20 minutes in this hour. In the Senate they have unlimited time.

Mr. McKenzie: Before I close I want to put a few more of these juicy quotes on the record. The senator takes our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) to task for threatening Britain with grave consequences. I quote:

Also, I have to point out to Prime Minister Trudeau that there are many Canadians who still have a deep affection and regard for the British, and we do not appreciate Mr. Trudeau's quite uncalled for rudeness. This conduct might ensure that Mr. Trudeau will get attention in the media, but he does not speak for many Canadians when he seems to try to be rude and to browbeat Westminster.

Three cheers for that Liberal in the other place.

So I say to the Prime Minister: Please, please, speak more kindly, out of respect for our feelings, if not for the feelings of the British.

Senator Cook gives many other examples of why the Liberal package will not work. While it is nothing but windowdressing, if any Canadian thinks his lifestyle will change because this bill of rights is passed, he had better think again because Liberals are politicians first.

I will give a classic example of what will happen. The contract for the new fighter aircraft will not be divided equally across the country. The Quebec and Ontario Liberals are already squabbling among themselves as to who will get the bigger part of the contract. Quebec will receive 48 per cent,

Ontario 39 per cent and the rest of the country 12 per cent. Will the bill of rights change that? Of course it will not.

I am glad to see the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) in the chamber this evening. I will be dealing with them in committee in the near future to try to get a little more justice across Canada. They talk about human rights and protecting the individual. They are not kidding me. They will look after their votes before looking after anyone's rights.

Mr. Blais: How about Bristol Aerospace? How about the increase in Manitoba over the last year?

Mr. McKenzie: Bristol Aerospace is one of five aerospace firms in Manitoba to receive any part of the NFA contract to date, and it was a very small portion. I recently met with members of the other aerospace firms. They are very concerned that they will not even get a slight smell of any contract. The bill of rights is nothing but windowdressing.

In conclusion, thank heaven we have some responsible members in the other place to protect us from the Liberal Party and the half dozen or so remaining NDP who support them in trying to ram this thing through.

[Translation]

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat reluctant to speak about the abolition of the Senate because I have not been a member of this House for very long. I would be tempted to share the views of my colleague for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) because when we are outside the House and hear people talk about the Senate often enough the impressions they give us are rather incomplete and somewhat tinged with negativism. I know that when people in my riding talk about the Senate the general impression is often that perhaps it is the most magnificent golden age club in the country, enjoying as it does permanent New Horizons projects and rather plush precincts. But people think like that because they are on the other side of the fence.

I think that perhaps the Senate is an institution whose operations ought to be completely overhauled because the fact is that it was established or at least set up at a time when institutions were very different from what they are nowadays.

We know that in the early days after the establishment of the Senate—and I have no intention of giving a lecture in political science to my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre who is probably much better informed than I am in that field—but at the outset the purpose of the Senate was to cool down the zeal of the elected representatives before the courtesans of kings and what not, so that now the role of the Senate compared with that of the elected House surely needs to be modernized if senators really want to meet contemporary requirements.

In that sense I suggest that the Pepin-Robarts report does make significant and challenging distinctions. Instead of endorsing outright the bill introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, instead of abolishing the Senate altogether, perhaps it would be interesting to see what could be done with that institution. Of course the problem there now may be that the senators are usually appointed by the parties.

Because of this, there might be a power imbalance. However, one might view senatorial appointments more objectively if senators were chosen among outstanding men and women in various fields in Canada and appointed for five or seven-year periods like appointees to certain Crown corporations. It would probably be interesting to see some kind of continuity between the work of elected legislators and related studies made by those appointed rather than elected.

In other words, it would be quite easy for the House of Commons to agree unanimously to the appointment to the Senate of some well-known men and women for a given period, which is how some provincial legislatures appoint an ombudsman. Such appointments would have to be approved by a simple majority or else by two thirds of the members of the House. These people would act as senators for a given period, whether it be five, seven or ten years, and try to improve the bills that we often pass rather hastily because, in this day and age, we have a tendency to legislate quite a lot and very regularly, which may be overlooked, and it would be a good thing to have such a regulatory mechanism. When we consider the role of the Senate and the critical review of legislation, this could be a great improvement. First of all, there would be more time to analyse measures, and second, this could lead to better legislation, as we have seen in the past.

The second important point concerns investigations. Because of the nature of its responsibilities and its role, the Senate could be asked to conduct investigations. Even among present senators, there are some, as the previous speaker said earlier, who have a great experience of life, and it is wrong, in my opinion, to condemn them offhandedly by saying that they are just a club of senior citizens and that they are not effective. What is not effective is the operation of the Upper House, and the same can be said about the House of Commons, where all members have been elected, because many changes certainly need to be made. The operation of this House is certainly not really effective if we consider the work that our constituents expect of us. We should take it for granted that those who have been elected have some experience and give them very specific responsibilities.

The first definition that I gave earlier is the possibility to make critical analyses of measures with a view to improving them, the second would be the capacity to conduct investigations, and the third would involve regional representation, a most important aspect. Proportional representation was mentioned earlier. This is an extremely bad idea. The philosophy behind it is quite valid, but I believe that we should go further than proportional representation as concerns the Senate. I come from an extremely vast territory. I am the only member for an area of 600 miles by 1,250 miles. It seems to me that it would not be a bad thing if we had a senator to represent us, as long as it was a hard-working and useful person, well regarded by this House as a whole. I believe that even the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who also represents a very large region, would like to have senators who could represent his constituents and his region. This would make exchanges here in Ottawa possible and would also double, I think, our work and action.

For instance, considering the amount of work which would be needed to develop ridings the size of the Manicouagan riding, I think that regional senators would be helpful, because they would greatly increase the amount of work done. That is a factor which would need being looked into as far as representation in the Senate is concerned. Another factor is the need to protect the rights of our minorities, those of the handicapped and those of people with a difference. I suggest that the Senate could play an interesting part in this respect, because I realize, having been here for the past two years, that when we legislate, we proceed in a piecemeal fashion. There is, of course, a logical follow-up with regard to the various bills based on centres of interest; on commitments in certain areas; this is why the senators could be responsible for an over-all view of the legislation. And also have as a main task to check some very specific aspects of our Canadian life, and in that sense, the protection of minority, native and handicapped people's rights could become part of their job description. Of course, we might look more fully into the whole matter, but that is not to say it would be better to abolish the Senate than to try to give it a much more worth-while role.

A well-conceived and modernized function of the Senate would include another important role, that of ambassadors of the Government of Canada: they could go out in the field to see what is going on, they could help with research, they could complement the members' work. I, for one, think that in the other place we have extremely valuable resources that could be maximized if we gave them in fact the means to do a good job and provided, of course, they wanted to use them. In the Senate, as elsewhere, there are people who are more or less effective, and it rests with them to enhance their prestige and make their work outstanding.

Some senators—I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will recognize that—have accomplished rather outstanding work throughout the years, and have produced very satisfying work from the point of view of giving it careful thought; they certainly improved some bills and without their contribution we could not have reached, I feel, the same degree of perfection.

After two years of experience in this field, taking into account the speed with which we legislate, the number of bills we study and introduce, I think it is not a bad idea to have a second house whose role it is to analyse, to reflect upon and to put those bills into perspective, acting, of course, as an extension of our own House. On the other hand, the interesting aspect of the proposal of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is that, as he said so aptly sometime this week, he managed to witness the exodus of, I believe, two thirds of the senators who were sitting in the other place when he first came here. So, without abolishing it, to some extent the hon. member did, in fact, see the disappearance of two thirds of the representatives or—

[English]

Mr. Knowles: All but for two.

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Oh, very well, it is more than I thought. So, as can be seen, he succeeded as an elected representative in superseding the institution itself, because from the time he came here to the time he still has to do, I suppose that the whole Senate will have been reformed in its own elements. What remains to be reformed now is rather the operation. So what has to be done, as a chamber, is to find formulae that are interesting and satisfactory to Canadians as a whole. Mr. Ryans' tan book also proposed the abolition of the Senate, but those measures in my view are too drastic for the time being. What we have to do here is to find a genuine role for that institution. I know that basically the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre probably asks us to have the political will to change the Senate. I rather feel that his proposal is put forward with the real intention of asking legislators here to work out a real change in the operation of the Senate, and then he will most probably recognize it would be an error to abolish the Senate now. And for all those reasons, I feel rather inclined at this stage to vote against the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in order to ask for a further study of the Senate as it now stands, and as it could be, and what real benefits we all could derive from it, we as legislators here and Canadians as citizens. My feeling is that the nation would be the better for it, and at this point in time where we are discussing the institution, the hon. member's proposal may be either too early or too late. However, this will be a most interesting discussion to consider at the conclusion of studies, to see what can be done with that institution.

I referred earlier to specific roles that could be given to the Senate, and I would like this discussion be taken up in committee with the hon. member, as well as with other members, to see what could be done. Certainly there are people in this country with tremendous experience that we should select in terms of the House rather than in terms of a party. And if they were given a specific role from the start, those people would be an asset to us, and everyone would benefit. Mr. Speaker, it being ten o'clock, I will conclude here.

An hon. Member: It is not ten o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair has no choice but to admit that it is not yet ten o'clock. The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen).

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make one very short point, and then I will turn the floor over to the parliamentary secretary.

The point is that in the six and a half years I have been here I have listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on, I think, almost any subject which could be raised in this House. He is the acknowledged expert on rules. I have enjoyed listening to him. He has raised this matter of the Senate before.

What puzzles me is that there has been almost deafening silence from the hon. member on the Constitution. He has taken one aspect of the Constitution—namely, the Senate—and has talked and talked and talked. He has not talked about how the rights of Manitobans would be denied by the constitutional proposal or about how the rights of Manitobans would be emasculated by the constitutional proposal. He has not talked about the fact that the New Democratic Party in Manitoba is against the constitutional proposal. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has spoken in this House on almost every topic, but he has maintained a deafening silence on that particular topic. I look forward to hearing a 40-minute speech with regard to his views on the constitutional package.

Mr. Knowles: That debate isn't over yet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): On the matter of the consideration of the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) with respect to a bill to amend the British North America Act, the fact is that the hour provided for private members' business has now expired.

Mr. Knowles: The senators can sleep another night.

Mr. Collenette: They will never expire.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Before I recognize the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen), I note there is a possibility that some hon. members might be convenienced if the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) were to debate his matter first.

Mr. Friesen: I am a very tolerant person, sir.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In that event I recognize the hon. member for Halifax West.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—IMPLEMENTATION IN EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, on February 17, 1981, I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) when we in Altantic Canada, and particularly those of us on the east coast and in Nova Scotia, could expect to see the implementation of the National Energy Program and its various projects and programs listed in the document introduced in this House on October 28, 1980. The minister assured me in a very quick response that the government would implement the National Energy Program. I was not at all satisfied with his answer, and I am sure the people in Nova Scotia and on the east coast of Canada would not be satisfied with his answer because, since the National Energy Program was introduced in this House on October 28, 1980, we have seen not one tick of action on the part of the Government of Canada in the energy field.

We on the east coast have been well aware for some time of the energy problem because we were the first to experience the bad effects of shortages of supply and increases in price. The reason for that is that a great amount of our energy supply is foreign. As a result of the actions of OPEC, prices increased very dramatically in the period following 1972. We have lived with the problem of increasing costs of energy supplies for almost a decade. It was only in October of 1980 that the government finally came up with some attempt to solve the problem.

However, in the few months which have elapsed since October of 1980 we have not seen any action, so my question to the minister was then, and is now, what specifically the Government of Canada is doing.

In the weeks before the question was raised by me on February 17, 1981 we heard complaints that oil rigs were leaving Canada, jobs were being lost in the energy industry and that the government's program of Canadianization of Canada's oil industry was a failure. We heard denials from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources time and time again in this House with respect to the reduction of the activities of energy producers. In fact, quoted on many occasions statistics were to show that the level of development activity in Canada was just as great in January of 1981 as it was in January of 1980. But, in point of fact, in Nova Scotia we were informed that those graduates of job-training programs who were intended to be absorbed by this great development in the oil industry in Canada were finding that there were no jobs available to them. In fact, the director of manpower training programs on the east coast publicly admitted that the job training programs had been deferred because of the cutbacks in activity on behalf of the companies and industries engaged in this development. Indeed, this was proof positive that there was a dramatic effect on exploration and development as a result of the National Energy Program. We wanted to know, and we still want to know, exactly what the government is doing in terms of specifics to implement the National Energy Program.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, very clearly, that there is great difference between the energy program as it applies to eastern Canada and as it applies to western Canada. In western Canada it is the problem of the effect of the National Energy Program on the activities of the oil industry which has played so vital a role in the development of that part of Canada. On the east coast, which is supposedly the beneficiary of the program, we have found that the consumer is no better off now than before the program was announced.

There are a number of items of very special interest to us; first, the natural gas pipeline extension to the east coast which is tied up in National Energy Board procedures. We were told that the matter would be heard in January. It is now near the end of February and the matter has not yet been heard. No approval has been granted and not one inch of pipeline has been constructed to the east coast. We were told there would be coal development under the National Energy Program. It is the end of February and the assistance for the development of the Donkin and Prince mines in Cape Breton, which have been delayed for almost three years now, is only now being announced. Tidal power, which is so important to the long-term future of east coast energy supplies and our ability to export energy to the very important regions of the northeastern United States, is not even mentioned in the National Energy Program.

The very day I asked the minister a question he expressed interest in tidal power. I am not sure he knew just what it was but I hope he will find out, since tidal power is very much a part of the future of the east coast. We have the offshore development, which I have mentioned many times in this House. In fact, the federal-provincial dispute is impeding the development of offshore resources. I have no better proof than an article which indicated an exchange between the Newfoundland representatives and representatives of Mobil Oil. I want to know some of the answers. I want to know how the government will implement the National Energy Program.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, these nocturnal exchanges with the member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) are becoming something of a tradition in this House. I am glad to have a further opportunity to discuss with him measures being taken in the Atlantic region under the National Energy Program.

Of course, we recognize that the Atlantic region is totally dependent on offshore oil supplies. The National Energy Program, therefore, provides this area with a variety of special measures over and above those available to other regions of Canada.

For example, the federal government is prepared to act to resolve regulatory issues in an expeditious manner so that construction of the natural gas pipeline to the Atlantic region may begin as soon as possible. In the National Energy Program the hon. member opposite will recognize that the federal government has clearly stated it supports the gas pipeline to the maritimes. To ensure its financial feasibility the government has initiated the following measures: One, the city-gate price of natural gas in maritime communities will be the same as in Toronto; two, a contingency fund of up to $500 million will be available to assist in financing the pipeline if it is necessary; three, grants of up to $800 will be available to consumers converting from oil heating to gas heating; and four, grants will be available to distribution companies to assist them in developing gas markets.

In the area of conservation, special programs for the Atlantic provinces will provide grants to industrial and commercial firms to help finance the operation of their energy conservation investments.

Another important initiative for the Atlantic provinces is the utility off-oil program designed to reduce the amount of oil used to generate electricity in the Atlantic region and, consequently, reduce current and future electricity costs. The lowest cost alternatives are conversions of some existing oil-fired plants to coal, increased use of hydro power from Quebec, and regional use of power from the Point Lepreau nuclear station in New Brunswick.

Another program will be directed toward the increase of coal for the energy supply of Atlantic Canada by supporting the development of new coal utilization technologies up to the commercial application stage. Closely associated with the coal utilization package is a coal research and development program.

I could cite a number of other examples of initiatives under the energy program which will ensure a secure energy future for the people of the Atlantic region.

THE CONSTITUTION—QUERY RESPECTING TELEGRAM FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA ECCLESIASTICS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I rose in the House to ask a question on the Constitution as it affects group rights. I pointed out to the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien) that he had received a telegram from the archbishop's office of the archdiocese of Vancouver signed by all the bishops of British Columbia and the Yukon. In part it read as follows:

> In our opinion the imbalance between individual and collective rights in the proposed Canadian charter poses a threat to many groups and societies including the church and church-related societies such as schools, hospitals and social agencies.

The point, in fact, is that these people are correct in their view of this major omission in the Constitution. I think it points out the fact the government, in its haste to try to ram this Constitution through Parliament, made certain that many of the groups would not be able to appear before the committee. There were probably hundreds of groups and individuals that did not even bother to apply to appear before the committee because they knew there would not be time and, therefore, they would be rejected.

But, the group was right, the major focus of the Constitution is on the individual. It sounds very democratic to focus all of one's attention on the individual, but if one looks very carefully at that document, the focus is on the individual as an existential entity, as though he is a little island separate from every other individual in the country. The fact is that seventeenth century writer John Donne was absolutely right, that no man is an island. We are all part of the main; we are all joined to each other. If one tries to separate or divorce one individual from every other individual in society, to focus only on the rights of that individual and to emphasize his rights as an individual only, one ends up with chaos; one ends up with anarchy. If every individual in the country demands and demonstrates on behalf of his individual rights, he will override the rights of the group; it ends up in chaos.

The constitutional proposal does nothing, not even in Section 2. I point out to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Irwin) that not even Clause 2, which supposedly gives rights to an individual to belong to associations, does anything.

• (2215)

It just will not work. It will not wash. If we are going to have this kind of a constitution, there must be an entrenchment of the rights of the groups in our society. Ironically, the proposal allows individuals to vote, but gives no rights to the association.

The most important institution we need to protect in our society is the family. Take a look around the world. Any totalitarian society you look at makes certain that it can disintegrate the family wherever possible. They take children away from the family as soon as possible so there are no family loyalties of any great depth; and thus the disintegration of that society begins. This proposal rejects entrenching the rights of the family.

My colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) introduced a resolution in committee to include the rights of the family in the Constitution. It was rejected by the Liberal-NDP alliance. Second, all other institutions in society, whether they be churches, independent or public schools or hospitals, are support-systems to the family. It is through the family, and through these group institutions, that we pass on to our children and our children's children those values which we think are important. If there is no provision in these proposals to entrench the rights of these institutions, then we are in deep trouble. Other provinces have done so. If the minister will read the telegram from British Columbia, he will find that the British Columbia bill of rights has provision. I would read the Saskatchewan bill of rights:

12. (2) Nothing in subsection (1) (freedom of education without discrimination) prevents a school, college, university or other institution or place of learning that enrols persons of a particular sex, creed or religion exclusively, or that is conducted by a religious order or society, from continuing its policy with respect to such enrolment.

Why is there so much hurry? We have time. We do not have to get it done by the end of March. We should take enough time to entrench everything in this Constitution that ought to be entrenched. Thank you.

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, my one regret tonight is that I do not have an hour. I heard the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) telling us all the things we should entrench in this Constitution; yet the position of his party is to support nothing. They support patriation; at least, in October, they had the courage to say, "Patriation with amending formula". As of last week, they did not really have the courage to support an amending formula.

Mr. Friesen: Be honest, Irwin.

Mr. Irwin: I will be honest. Go to the speech of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). He says we have a package; the first is a Canadian package and the second is the patriation package. The patriation package is the amending formula. The Canadian package is everything else.

Freedom of association does not talk about the collective rights of the union. When you vote against freedom of association you are taking away their rights—aboriginal rights, collective rights. Talk to the natives, when you vote against their rights. Talk about the English and French, minority language rights in the schools. Explain to the Francophones of New Brunswick, Ontario, the Anglophones of Quebec, that you will vote against their collective rights.

I say that the hon. member does not have the courage to vote collective rights or individual rights. I think we should put this to rest.

I have heard the name of God mentioned today, all day, by the hon. member. The fact is that it was a Liberal who put the name of God in the National Anthem; it was a Liberal who put the name of God in the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights at the parliamentary committee, on the last day, as mentioned by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson). It was God—it was a Liberal who put—

Mr. Friesen: A Freudian slip.

Mr. Irwin: It was the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who put the name of God in the preamble to the Constitution, and that was turned down by all the other premiers this summer.

You say you are going to support God. Where do you say that, in Section 1? That is part of the Canadian package. So, you are saying, put the name of God in section 1. Make it the subject of the Vancouver formula, and let all the premiers opt in on the name of God. How silly can you get? That is where it is: in Section 1. You say, "We are for the opting in of Section 1. Each premier can decide whether he wants the name of God put in or not, but we will not vote on this matter. We will not vote on this; freedom of religion in Section 15." That is your position. You will not support Section 15 in the Bill of Rights which deals with freedom of religion, because it is part of the so-called Canadian package. The hon. member should either be for these rights, he should stand up here and say, "I am for them", or he should be against them. He should not come into this House and say, "I want property rights and I will let the Hon. Sterling Lyon decide if we are to have them, or I will let the Hon. Brian Peckford decide if we are to have them."

• (2220)

That is the position, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member must either be for them or against them. Within the next month he should decide whether history will record that the Conservative Party of Canada stood for rights or whether it stood for nothing in 1981.

DROUGHT ASSISTANCE—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF BOUNDARIES

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, four months ago I addressed a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Ostiguy) about the problems we have experienced with the herd maintenance program. At that time about 20 farmers in the Pierceland area of my constituency contacted me because they were outside the drought area. The program has changed somewhat since that time. They have now been considered. The government listened to our plea that they be included because they were affected by the drought just as much as some of the people within the area. We have now been assured they will be considered under the appeal process that was set up and that they will receive some funding.

The question I put to the parliamentary secretary tonight may not fit the answer he has prepared. I would like him to give the matter some thought before answering my questions about the herd maintenance program. If he does not feel comfortable answering this evening I hope he will respond at a later date, possibly by telephone or by letter.

Now that these people have been considered to come within the appeal process, it will still be a very long time before they actually receive any funding. Some other people who did come under the herd maintenance program were rejected for other reasons.

Last week in Regina I met with members of the appeal board. They are livestock producers so they can appreciate the problems farmers are having and they are trying to clear up the mess the government has got us into. A drought committee of some kind studied this problem for almost five years, I understand, in case difficulties ever arose. They have risen now and the program has proved to be totally inadequate.

The appeal board indicated to me that 35,000 appeal application forms had been sent out. Of these, 30,000 people replied. These were grouped into four categories. The first category comprised those who had been turned down because of lack of precipitation; the second were those who had been turned down because of low crop yield; the third, which concerned the greatest number of my constituents, were those who were adjacent to the drought area, and the fourth were the individual special cases that were being reviewed.

Because of the volume of applications received, the herd maintenance appeal board will not be able to deal with all of them until nearly the end of April. It is rather strange that, as part of the program, the producer is required to hold 70 per cent of the breeding herd until March 1, 1981. Some farmers and ranchers will not know if they qualify for the funding even after they have kept the herd all winter. I think this is unfair to producers who in many regions have had to buy feed because of poor precipitation or yield. They should not have to suffer this hardship.

For this year we have been assured that at some point those producers will get compensation if they qualify under the appeal process of the herd maintenance program. Will this drought committee function between now and next year? We may be facing another drought in western Canada because of lack of moisture and precipitation this year. I know that in many parts of my constituency the snow has now almost gone. Unless there are some heavy snowfalls between now and the spring, and if there is a lack of moisture subsequent to that when the rains start in the spring, western Canada will have a serious problem in its agricultural sector next year.

• (2225)

Does the government intend to carry on with this committee? If the government has learned anything, what will it do differently about a program in the future in place of this present disastrous program? I do not want to condemn the government for what has happened. I hope, however, that the government has learned some kind of a lesson. Hopefully we will not have to face a drought next year but the next time there is a drought in any part of Canada I trust that a program will be in place to ensure the situation is taken care of.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer briefly my colleague opposite, the member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish), who inquired about the eligibility of those 20 farmers under the herd maintenance program and I should like to point out to him that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), during a short visit in the west last week, stopped at his Regina office where all the cases are being reviewed. It is understood that this is being done according to specific criteria.

I would like to say to the hon. member that the program is designed to provide livestock producers who had to buy feed for their herd with the necessary funding. We now understand each other. Although the hay crops were not generally good in Saskatchewan the farmers in areas who had more than 60 per cent of precipitation or whose grain crops were higher than 80 per cent of the regular production usually are eligible for the cattle feed program.

In areas which received more than 60 per cent of normal precipitations from November 1, 1979, to May 31, 1980, as recorded by Environment Canada, people will not be eligible because they will have had enough rain.

In the area of Pierceland, which is in the riding of my colleague, the rainfall was above 60 per cent. Applications from producers outside the drought zone, including Pierceland, were automatically sent to the appeal office for checking. The managers of the program were responsible for making recommendations to the office concerning the eligibility of the applicants and local conditions. The managers recommended that all the applications for aid coming from the area of Pierceland be dealt with with fairness and the appeal office will soon issue guidelines for processing those cases.

Naturally, as I have just said, farmers should receive an answer from the board within the next few weeks, and that of course, follows the representations made by the hon. member, as I recall, when the funds were being considered during the visit to Regina by the Minister of Agriculture. As we all know, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture held a convention here in Ottawa last week where this issue once again was considered. So I want to assure the hon. member that the Department of Agriculture will give fair consideration to all requests made by farmers.

Now, will there be another drought next year? Let us hope not, Mr. Speaker. The west has known several while in the east we had heavy rainfalls. But we cannot plan the program for the years ahead without knowing whether or not there will be a drought.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted.

[English]

If there were more membes present, I would be inclined to welcome all of those who have come to the city of Ottawa to participate oin the political involvement of Canada. Even in the absence of so many members, we wish them well.

Mr. Knowles: There are still four of us here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Regardless of their purpose and affiliation, they constitute the very elite of Canada, and we welcome them.

This House stands adjourned until Monday at two o'clock in the afternoon.

At 10.30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—CANADIAN GOVERNMENT POSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, on February 6, 1981, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) and the foreign minister of Venezuela agreed that there should be no foreign intervention in El Salvador. On May 27, 1980, the President of Mexico and the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) jointly expressed a commitment to "the free expression of the will of the respective peoples of Latin America without foreign interference." Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House direct the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make a clear statement of Canada's position regarding the military intervention of the United States, or any other foreign government, into the present civil strife in El Salvador.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) appointed the minister of housing as the regional minister responsible for the interests of the constituents of Durham-Northumberland and Peterborough ridings. During his anointed reign we have lost the Parks Canada regional office to another minister in Cornwall, the Dash-8 assembly plant to the minister's own elected region of York, and the Eldorado nuclear plant in Durham-Northumberland to a Liberal cabinet minister in Nickel Belt. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence):

That the regional cabinet minister, the minister of housing, has shown a blatant political bias and a conflict of interest between his elected constituents and those whom he was appointed by the Prime Minister to represent, and that this House calls for his immediate resignation as the minister responsible for the ridings of Peterborough and Durham-Northumberland.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

CHARTER OF RIGHTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I am confident that all members of the House will unanimously support the following motion which I will move under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the new constitutional position outlined by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) on Friday evening, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar):

That this House congratulate the constitutional spokesman for the Conservative Party for stating for the first time that the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada favours binding the provinces to a charter of rights.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR EQUALIZATION MEASURES CONCERNING OIL FOR ALL CANADIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of this House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas the Alberta Premier, Mr. Lougheed, has acted despotically in reducing unilaterally by 104,000 barrels a day oil production in his province and whereas Mr. Lougheed has systematically refused all the offers of the Canadian government concerning oil prices, even during the seven months when the Progressive Conservatives were in power, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis):

That the Canadian government refer to the provisions of Section 92, Subsection 10, paragraph (c) of the British North America Act and declare the oil sector to be for the general advantage of Canada, thus allowing the federal government to act in the interest of all Canadians.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

CALL FOR ABOLITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Whereas the Canadian Association of Oilwell Drilling Contractors, in their convention, recited a litany of negative statistics arising out of the National Energy Program, including the loss of 131 oil rigs that are leaving or have left Canada and that are worth $1.2 billion, with an economic activity loss to Canada of $2 billion, therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko):

That this House urges the Liberal government to stop using the National Energy Program as a smokescreen for political purposes and scrap the National Energy Program in the interest of Canadian unity.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ENERGY

DISCLOSURE OF TAX MEASURES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the government's oil and gas policies, especially the recent purchase of Petrofina, will place an additional tax burden on all Canadians, not only oil and gas users, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That in future, before burdening Canadians any further, the whole issue of Lalonde levies, and Trudeau taxes in the energy field be openly and honestly divulged to Parliament, and not introduced through the back door.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

CALL FOR RE-NEGOTIATION WITH ALBERTA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources' (Mr. Lalonde) continued stubbornness and inflexibility at the negotiating table have caused a reduction of Alberta crude oil delivery to eastern Canada, and whereas the contemplated federal tax will increase the cost of gasoline at the pumps and will serve only to subsidize the cost of imported foreign crude, increasing the flow of Canadian dollars out of our country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That this House direct the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to end this ridiculous deadlock immediately by putting a new energy proposal forward to the province of Alberta so that Canadian money will remain in Canada to develop our vast energy potential, thereby securing Canada's self-sufficiency in oil by the 1990s.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ALBERTA CUTBACK IN OIL PRODUCTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and regrettable necessity. In view of the action of the Premier of Alberta reducing oil production and thereby cutting off millions of Canadians from their natural resource, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin):

That this House condemns the reprehensible action of the Alberta government which has shown that one part of this country has the ability to hold all Canadians up to a form of ransom.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

SUGGESTED STUDY OF VANCOUVER ISLAND PIPELINE PROJECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas a group of companies have proposed construction of a fertilizer plant, methanol, and petrochemicals and possibly LNG facilities associated with the northern route pipeline to Vancouver Island, whereas this northern route project would create between 1,000 and 2,500 jobs directly in that area, and whereas the B.C. government by cabinet order has chosen an alternative which will make extremely poor utilization of the resource at high cost to residents, I move:

That the federal government before paying any subsidy conduct an inquiry into both proposed projects to determine which will provide maximum utilization of that resource and maximum benefit to the people of British Columbia and Vancouver Island.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

PROPOSED CONDEMNATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, since today marks the ninth increase in gasoline prices since the Liberals regained power in February, 1980, and since the government continues to practise a program of purchasing foreign oil at world prices, which includes Mexican Maya oil that requires 1½ barrels of Maya to equal the equivalent amount of gasoline from one barrel of western sweet crude, and in view of the fact that the failure of the federal government to reach a domestic pricing agreement has caused Canadians in every region of Canada the loss of thousands of jobs, an increase in our national debt, increased our tax burden, and dramatically increased the price of gasoline and heating fuel, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott):

That this House condemn the government for its irresponsible energy program which was conceived for self-serving political reasons and defies any concern for the nation's requirements or consideration of our country's abundant energy potential.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PENSIONS

CALL FOR LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE BENEFITS FOR WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett), I move:

That this House calls on the government to make a firm commitment to introduce legislation to provide women who work at home with pensions equivalent to those available under the Canada Pension Plan, and to provide pensions now for unattached women between the ages of 55 and 65 who are not in the labour market, such legislation to be introduced in time to be passed in this session of Parliament.

AGRICULTURE

POLICIES AFFECTING FAMILY FARMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The economy of this nation is in a shambles. The policies of the government have maintained interest rates at levels which are intolerable for most businesses and disastrous for the family farmer. In view of this situation I move, seconded by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain):

That the government adopt policies which will significantly reduce the negative impact the agricultural community is facing and destroy the shameful neglect that this government has shown toward the family farmer.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

IMPACT STUDIES—REQUEST FOR MAJOR CHANGES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who will now know that two independent economic analysts, Data Resources and the Royal Bank's Global Energy Group, have released detailed reports which indicate that the government's National Energy Program is going to result in losses in Canadian oil supply, in Canadian real economic growth, in Canadian real wages, and in Canadian jobs, losses that are both permanent and avoidable. The minister will also know that these findings are similar to those from the Economic Council of Canada report.

In light of the mounting evidence of the dangerous economic effects and energy effects upon Canada of the National Energy Program, is the minister now prepared to announce that he will make major changes in that program?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, what is clear from some of those studies—and particularly another study by the Alberta Energy Conservation Board, to which the Leader of the Opposition has not referred—is that a serious problem arises from the lack of agreement at the present time between the producing provinces and the federal government. The Alberta Energy Conservation Board study, in particular, indicates that the major impact of loss in terms of self-sufficiency during the eighties would come from the decisions of the government of Alberta in not approving the tar sands plants, and from reducing supply to the rest of Canadians.

That is the major impact on energy security in the country over this decade. I hope that through discussions and negotiations over the next few months, we will be able to resolve those differences and ensure energy security in this country. However, I remind the hon. member of this study of the government of Alberta which indicates that it will have to bear the brunt of the responsibility for the shortage that we may have during this decade.

An hon. Member: Black is white.

Mr. Clark: The minister has answered a question that he was not asked. All of us agree that the intransigence of the federal government has led to a failure of agreement with the producing provinces, which is one of the causes of problems right now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The point of these three major independent economic studies is that it is abundantly clear that elements of the government's own National Energy Program—having nothing to do with agreement with the producing provinces—are going to cost us Canadian oil, cost us Canadian jobs, cost us Canadian security, and cost us increases in real wages in this country.

In light of that devastating economic impact upon the people and the security of Canada, I repeat my question to the minister; will he consider making major changes in those parts of his program which all economic analysts agree are going to do damage to Canada?

Mr. Lalonde: The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is still over-stating matters. He refers to "all economic analysts". I have just referred him to a very authoritative study made by the government of Alberta itself, the Alberta Energy Conservation Board, which has indicated that the impact of the National Energy Program, compared to the impact of the Alberta government decisions, was very small.

• (1420)

It is clear that we need to have agreements, and soon. So far as intransigence is concerned, I remind the right hon. member that we have already made several adjustments to the National Energy Program affecting industry. Most of the studies to which my right hon. friend is referring do not include the changes we have already included since October 28. I also remind my right hon. friend that I have written to the government of Alberta suggesting early meetings and that I have been turned down by that government, which says it wants to receive reports from its officials. The Government of Canada has shown a lot of flexibility since October 28.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REQUEST FOR DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION OF CERTAIN ELEMENTS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the minister knows full well that the changes which have been made to the National Energy Program to date have been minor and relatively insignificant. He also knows full well that the economic studies to which I have referred indicate that it is the program itself which is causing the problem for Canada's future.

Let me ask the minister a question about one of the agencies of the federal government reporting to him, the National Energy Board. The National Energy Board is now conducting a study into the supply and demand situation in Canada. After the National Energy Program came down, that board asked for revised estimates by the companies which were doing exploration. All of those estimates indicate that Canada will be in much more trouble as a result of the National Energy Program than we were in before. Since it is important that the House of Commons and the people of Canada be given the full facts from an agency like the National Energy Board, I ask the minister whether he will delay passage of elements of the National Energy Program until there has been a report by the National Energy Board on the supply and demand situation in Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have already indicated to the hon. Leader of the Opposition that the Canadian government has shown a lot of flexibility during the negotiations, that it has already substantially amended the Canadian Energy Program in that it offered to have with the Alberta government discussions before the regrettable cutbacks of last weekend were implemented.

As for the review undertaken by the National Energy Board, the hearings have now been completed. I would like to remind the Leader of the Opposition that the views expressed before the commission were far from unanimous, as he stated himself, and that the board is now preparing its report, which I am certain they will want to release as soon as it is completed. In the meantime the House is dealing with other matters, such as the constitutional debate. I must advise the hon. Leader of the Opposition that when legislation is ready to be considered by the House, this legislation will be introduced without delay.

[English]

ROLE OF NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, the report from the National Energy Board is not expected to be released until May at the earliest. In view of the fact that there is nearly a unanimous opinion on the part of the people who are appearing before that board with respect to the negative effects of the National Energy Program, would the minister advise the House what the role of the National Energy Board is in hearing these changed submissions as a result of the National Energy Program if it is not to have some impact on the National Energy Program? Is the minister going to allow all this good work to go to waste and force the House to hurry the passage of this legislation before getting the true facts on the table as a result of these hearings?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, most of the presentations—I would say, as a matter of fact, all the submissions—which have been put to the National Energy Board are already outdated because changes have been made to the National Energy Program, whether they be changes dealing with exploration expenses or with eligibility with respect to incentive grants. These changes are quite significant in terms of their impact on the industry, and in that sense all the representations which have been made are, as I said, out of date.

The National Energy Board will have to reach its own conclusions on the basis of the evidence it will receive and also on the basis of its own research and its own work. When this report is ready, obviously it will be made public, and everyone will be able to reach his own conclusions at that time.

As far as the National Energy Program as such is concerned, as I said there are some negotiations which still must be carried out with the provinces, and I certainly do not intend to delay those negotiations until we have received a report from the National Energy Board, any more than I intend to delay consideration by Parliament of any piece of legislation which would appear necessary.

CABINET CONSIDERATION OF PRICE CHANGES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The minister has just said he is going to ignore totally the most important energy advisory body in this country by rushing this legislation through and ignoring the very good work which has been done here. I do not know how the minister can say with a straight face that changes have been made which make those hearings past history. There has been no change in price; there has been no change in the production tax; there has been no change in the excise tax on natural gas. Those are the three primary reasons which are causing the changes in the exploration and supply outlook in this country.

My next question relates to the matter of price. Mr. Blair, of Nova corporation, one of the most balanced observers of the National Energy Program, said last week that he was recommending to the government a $10 a barrel increase in 1981 and 1982. This is being currently discussed, I understand, by cabinet. Would the minister state whether the cabinet is considering price changes of that magnitude?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, my friend should certainly not be surprised that the industry should always be asking for more money. There is nothing new in this. It has been doing this for as long as one can remember.

So far as discussions in cabinet are concerned, it is not appropriate to reveal cabinet discussions, but in that instance I certainly can tell him that there has never been consideration of any such figure in cabinet.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING U.S. ARMS SHIPMENTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last fall at the United Nations the Government of Canada voted for a resolution on human rights which called for the termination of all military assistance to the junta in El Salvador. I should like to ask the minister to explain the contradiction between this principled position which the government took last fall and the statement he made last week when he said as minister for the Government of Canada:

I would certainly not condemn any decision the U.S. takes to send offensive arms . . . the U.S. can count on our quiet acquiescence.

I ask this question also in light of the fact that the former U.S. ambassador to El Salvador is quoted in yesterday's New York Times as saying:

The chief killer of Salvadorans is the government security forces.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I did not make any such statement last week, and in fact our policy is, as we stated at the United Nations last fall, a policy in which we do not approve of shipments of offensive arms, either from Canada or from other countries, to the states which are torn by internal strife. This has been our policy and continues to be our policy. I might add that, as the hon. gentleman knows, we have also made a continuing series of protests to the government of El Salvador with respect to human rights violations in that country.

Mr. Broadbent: It is interesting that the minister says he did not say it. The only correction which appeared subsequently in the press was that he did not use the word "acquiescence" but rather used the word "quiescence". The minister is nodding his head. If that is the only difference, what the minister said was that he was acquiescing. There is no difference at all in principle between the two assertions, and the minister should know that. In light of what he has just said, I should like to ask him, considering that over the weekend the U.S. increased its military assistance to the junta by providing additional military personnel, and considering that in the U.S. Congress itself more than 50 elected representatives of the American people are organizing an attempt to block all military assistance to the junta in El Salvador, would the minister state unequivocally now Canadian support for the principle of Congressman Studd's bill, namely, that all military assistance provided by the United States should terminate immediately?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, our policy has been, and continues to be, one of opposition to the shipment of offensive arms by Canada or any other country to El Salvador or any other country which is torn by internal strife. We look forward to a political solution, not to a military one, and it is for that reason that we oppose the shipment of arms from any country, and that includes eastern block countries as well, to such countries as El Salvador.

• (1430)

SUPPORT FOR NEW INITIATIVE BY FORMER WEST GERMAN CHANCELLOR

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the minister knows full well in a country where six leaders of opposition parties were assassinated by the government during the last year that regrettably the only resort of the people of that country to deal with a vicious military regime is to take counter military action. If the minister has another proposal which will work and achieve some justice for the people of that country, I am sure everyone in the world would like to hear it.

Will the minister follow up on what he has just said by having the Government of Canada, for example, request that Willy Brandt, former chancellor of West Germany, head of the North-South Commission and head of Socialist International, intervene directly to try to bring peace to that troubled part of the world? Will the government lend its support to such an initiative which might have some concrete results?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, it seems to me if the hon. member's comment suggests anything, it suggests that he welcomes or tolerates arm shipments from the eastern bloc to El Salvador, but not by the United States.

Some hon. Members: Oh, come on.

Mr. MacGuigan: That is exactly the implication of the words he was using.

Mr. Stevens: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: It seems to me he ought to make that clear. Our position is one of opposition to the importation of offensive arms from all sectors into El Salvador. If Mr. Brandt's initiative is being sponsored by his own government and is a matter in which they are seeking the support of other countries, we will certainly give it full consideration. In the meantime, I expressed our position to Secretary Haig when I met him before, and we will be expressing that position again to the United States next week when we have an opportunity of meeting here.

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO MINISTER

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I should like to follow up on the questions asked by the hon. member for Oshawa and the reply of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I noted very carefully the quotation attributed to him wherein he said, "I would certainly not condemn any decision the United States takes to send offensive arms . . . to El Salvador . . . The United States can at least count on our quiet quiescence." He stated specifically that he had not made that statement last week. The report indicated that he made the statement on February 4. Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs prepared to stand in his place and make a firm denial that he ever made that statement?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am prepared to say that there is a great difference between quiescence and acquiescence.

Mr. Broadbent: Explain it.

Mr. MacGuigan: We do not believe that we have either the responsibility or the opportunity of judging first hand the events in El Salvador. The Canadian churches tell us one thing; the Vatican specifically repudiates what the Canadian Catholic church tells us. When I met the diplomatic commission from El Salvador, they told me that they received no arms from the communist bloc; apparently the United States has conclusive evidence that they have. We do not have a resident ambassador in El Salvador. We have no means of judging the internal situation in El Salvador, and we do not propose to do so.

Miss MacDonald: Madam Speaker, therefore I take it the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that "I would certainly not condemn any decision that United States takes to send offensive arms . . . to El Salvador", stands as he put it initially; he did not deny that. He replied that it is not in Canada's interest to put forward any proposals, that he is caught in the dilemma of one group saying one thing and another group saying another, and since we do not have any representation there he just does not know what is going on and therefore cannot put forward any positive proposals. In light of the fact that Mexico, Venezuela, Brazil, and even West Germany, have put forward proposals, what is Canada prepared to do in an area close to home, within this hemisphere, where we have very serious obligations to help maintain peace?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I am not aware that we have any serious obligations in that part of the world, in Central America, which is not an area of traditional Canadian interest.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. MacGuigan: It is not an area in which we have any particular claim to knowledge of what is going on. We are prepared to say, as I have been saying all along, that we stand for a political and not a military solution in El Salvador—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacGuigan: —and that arms should be kept out. We have enunciated that position to all of those who have cared to hear us, including the opposition.

ENERGY CONSERVATION

OIL CONVERSION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR FURTHER DETAILS

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is with regard to the oil conversion program introduced last fall. The minister will know that in the recent Income Tax Act there was a provision for a taxable grant. The minister will also know that the winter is nearly gone now, that many people are not familiar with the details of this program, and that they are about due to file their income tax returns. I wonder if the minister could tell us whether or not there are any details of this program available yet, or when we might expect further information on this?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his consistent interest in this very important program. The discussions with the provinces are almost completed; I should say that they are completed with some provinces. I would like to have them completed with all provinces before making final or comprehensive announcements. But if discussions with some provinces keep dragging on, I would proceed to make announcements concerning the provinces where we have agreements.

Our plan is to have offices operating in every province by April 1. As the hon. member knows, so far as conversion is concerned, all Canadians who converted from oil to natural gas since October 28 are eligible for the grant. As far as electricity conversion is concerned, it is still a matter to be resolved with some individual provinces. But I hope in the very next few weeks I will be able to announce final decisions in that respect.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister knows that many people have had an interest in this program, particularly those with wood furnaces and that type of thing. I think the department has intimated that people will be able to convert to a number of different alternative energy forms and still have their taxable grants in place and honoured. A lot of people have either been misled, perhaps not on purpose, or maybe have information which they felt led them into positions where they are now using wood furnaces and so on. A lot of people will be in positions where either they will qualify or not. I hope the minister will seriously consider that.

My supplementary question to him concerns electricity, which he mentioned. The minister will know that this side of the House is very concerned about self-sufficiency. The fact is that some provinces, particularly Ontario and Quebec, have a surplus of electricity. Particularly in view of the failure to arrive at some conclusions with the tar sands and other forms of conventional supply, does the minister have any programs in mind, through the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, which will take us through electricity and into energy self-sufficiency, apart from the oil conversion program?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, electricity conversion is very much under the direct control of provincial authorities through their provincial hydro commissions. I can report to the hon. member that most provinces, as far as I can see, will be agreeable to allowing for conversion to electricity as well as to natural gas, wood, or other forms of fuel, away from oil. However, in Quebec the government indicated that it wanted to impose certain restrictions. As far as New Brunswick is concerned, we have indicated that as soon as there is a firm commitment for converting from oil to coke, coal or other fuel, we would be agreeable to making electricity eligible in New Brunswick. I hope these discussions will be concluded very soon.

ENERGY

ALBERTA OIL PRODUCTION CUTBACK—MEASURES TO COVER CONSEQUENTIAL ADDITIONAL COSTS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Because of some incredible stubbornness both in Edmonton and in Ottawa, we have a situation today where Alberta has turned down—I think for the first time in Canadian history—the oil taps to eastern Canada. This will cost Canadians almost $1 billion. My question to the minister is one which I think is on everyone's mind today. Exactly what will the minister do to cover these extra costs? Does he propose a new tax? If so, how much would the tax be? If there is to be a tax, when will it come into effect?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the additional cost of the regrettable decision made by the government of Alberta yesterday will be certainly much less than the figure mentioned by the hon. member, at the first stage. However, it will still be in the range of several hundred million dollars. This is a very regrettable expense to add to Canadians' costs at the present time.

At three o'clock today I intend to table a ways and means motion which will impose an additional charge on all oil, imported and domestic, to cover the additional cost of the decision taken by the government of Alberta. The figure will be about 75 cents per barrel, which will be equivalent to roughly 0.5 cents per litre at the pump. I hope the government of Alberta will be agreeable to abandoning its plan later on. As soon as the decision is taken by the government of Alberta to remove this particular cutback, obviously we will remove this additional duty.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I note that the minister and the Liberal Party have just broken their election promise to stop the price of oil from going over $4.50 a barrel for 1981.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: I know that two thirds of my friends to the right are heckling me.

FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATING STANCES

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. It is with respect to the question of flexibility. Last week I proposed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources three possibilities with respect to making changes in the national energy policy. I put them to the minister of energy because I was referred to him. The first one was to change the 8 per cent wellhead tax, in terms of a general corporate tax. The second was to change the natural gas export tax. The third one was to reduce or do away with the western development fund and let the provinces have that money to spend. Is the minister prepared to be flexible in dealing with Alberta so that Alberta can be flexible, in order to get away from and resolve this incredible confrontation which we have in Canada at the moment?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the government has frequently stated that it is prepared to enter into negotiations with the province of Alberta in order to reach an oil-pricing agreement. Obviously any negotiations that are conducted in good faith must be premised on flexibility, otherwise there is no point in beginning such negotiations. I think the hon. member would agree that one does not begin to declare, prior to the negotiations, the type of flexibility that might be demonstrated. It seems to me that it can only be manifested once the negotiations are in place and once Alberta has also said, in this case, that they want negotiations and that they will also be flexible. That is the kind of atmosphere that is required before we can begin the very important work that the hon. member wants us to begin.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—REPRESENTATIONS MADE BY UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I would like to bring the Secretary of State for External Affairs back to the troubled and tragic scene in El Salvador. Obviously the minister's attitude and, I suggest, the attitude of the Canadian government, in respect to El Salvador, have changed drastically—changed overnight—as a result of representations made here in Ottawa by a representative of the United States government who obviously told the minister that the United States had evidence that the Socialist Revolutionary Council was receiving communist arms in its battle against the junta. What proof or evidence did the United States government representative indicate to the minister in support of its claim?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, what changed was our acquaintance with the facts, as a result of my meeting with Secretary Haig. Before that time I had seen the diplomatic commission representing the left in El Salvador. I had received its firm assurances that all the arms they were purchasing were purchased on the open, international market, and that none of the arms were being supplied by the eastern bloc.

Secretary Haig informed me that he had evidence to the effect that the arms which were reaching El Salvador were captured American arms from Vietnam which had been transported by a world communist route including Cuba and Nicaragua. Since that time the American government has sent representatives, not only to Canada but to many other countries in the world, to display the evidence. I have not seen it myself, Madam Speaker, but it has been shown to those in the department. It is based upon documents which have been captured in El Salvador by government forces, and includes letters which show rather conclusively, in the opinion of most observers, the eastern bloc involvement in the supply of arms to El Salvador.

NATURE OF EVIDENCE RESPECTING ARMS USED IN EL SALVADOR

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, as the minister now appreciates, there have also been some independent and apparently authoritative reports from South America, certainly over the last three or four days alone, showing that the only foreign arms now being used in El Salvador are western arms, not communist arms. I was really asking the minister to justify his attitude and action by indicating exactly what evidence was presented to him. Was it photographs of captured arms? What was it? We want to know the fact, too. What was the actual evidence that was presented to the minister which brought about this change in attitude?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I believe the United States has just published a white paper on this subject. I will endeavour to obtain a copy for the hon. member.

The evidence has mostly been captured documents in the form of letters and orders for weapons, that kind of thing, which show the source of the weapons. The fact that only American arms have been captured in El Salvador is exactly the point Secretary Haig made to me. They were American arms which were captured in Vietnam which could not have reached El Salvador if it had not been from Vietnam through Cuba and Nicaragua to El Salvador.

In fact, news reports today say that Nicaraguan government officials have admitted that arms have probably gone from Nicaragua to El Salvador. They have said it was not by official action on the government's part, but they admitted it was probably the case.

EFFECT OF OIL EXPORT TAX ON COASTAL ENTERPRISES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. If the oil export tax in its present form is applied to the tow-boat operators of the west coast—and there are 350 such boats—and if the export tax on oil is applied to the five companies involved in bunkering ocean-going vessels, severe hardship and possibly bankruptcy face these Canadian business enterprises. Will the minister reconsider the regulations and make realistic changes to protect these coastal enterprises?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I will be glad to consider the hon. member's representations, along with representations I have received from other interested parties who have raised the question of this particular tax.

Mr. Cook: The other night I was suffering under the delusion, when I made a speech in this House, that the minister was listening when I gave the facts with respect to this issue. Does the minister not realize that if he does not change this policy he will not be dealing with bunker C and D oil but with exporting not only jobs but tax revenues from this country? If the minister does not know this, then will he please consult with some officials of the Department of Transport who at least have some idea of the idiocy of the energy policy and the finance policy with regard to this export tax on oil and gas?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, if an effort to place equity in the tax system is idiocy, then I plead guilty to idiocy.

IMMIGRATION

ENTICEMENT OF MALAYSIAN STUDENTS TO ATTEND TORONTO TRAINING COLLEGES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs to whom I delivered notice by hand so I hope he has received it. Press reports in Kuala Lumpur allege that the Canadian authorities there, particularly the High Commission, are closing an eye to a questionable education racket practised by private Canadian concerns running so-called pre-university private colleges, primarily in Toronto. The allegation is that, through extensive advertising in the newspapers of that country, Malaysian students are being brought over in considerable numbers to the pre-university training colleges. This is not required as many of the students already have the necessary qualifications.

Has the minister had reports of this particular questionable enterprise? Has he had an opportunity, through his department, to investigate it and, if so, can he report to the House?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I have to apologize to the hon. member if there has been any inefficiency on the part of my office or the mails. I have not received notice of the question yet and I have not heard of this practice. I will have to take the question as notice.

SUGGESTED SCRUTINY OF INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and I am sorry that I did not give him notice of it. Is it the policy of his department to allow students into this country for the purpose of so-called pre-university courses in order to upgrade their ability to enter Canadian universities? If that is the case, does he have knowledge of it and has he scrutinized those institutions which offer the service?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, when there is an application for a student visa, the normal practice is to determine the credentials of the institution concerned. I will be very pleased to look into the case raised by the hon. member if he will give me the information, and will determine how legitimate the institutions are.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED PHASING OUT OF DEW LINE—NEGOTIATION OF NEW CANADIAN ROLE IN NORAD

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. As the DEW Line and other land-based radar fades into relative obsolescence as reported by the United States government, is Canada negotiating a new role in NORAD that will include land-based read-out stations and a share of the scientific and technological hardware available in the space radar market?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, as I mentioned in a statement to the media, there was discussion with the previous American administration about modernization and a new position as far as the DEW Line in Canada is concerned. When I saw Mr. Weinberger during the last three weeks I discussed the matter with him because he is part of the new administration. He said that nothing will be done about the DEW Line without consulting the Canadian government. We will be fully consulted before any action is taken on that matter.

Mr. Wenman: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question relates to the Pine Tree Line. Is the minister planning on phasing out or upgrading the Pine Tree Line? In such phasing out of the Pine Tree Line or the DEW Line, will consideration be given to the sociological impact on the communities of the phasing out, and is there compensation for this from the American government?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, when I had discussions with the Secretary of Defence for the United States, that was one of my concerns, the economic and social impact of modernizing or changing the DEW Line or Pine Tree Line. As I said before, and I repeat, before any action is taken, before reducing any sites on the DEW Line or Pine Tree Line, there will be a full discussion between this government and the United States. Nothing will be done to harm any of these sites before we have an agreement with them.

BANKS AND BANKING

JUSTIFICATION FOR SPREAD IN INTEREST RATE LEVELS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, there is no question that all members of the House would agree that Canada is experiencing very serious financial problems. My question is directed to the Minister of Finance and it relates to Canada's chartered banks. In 1977 the spread betweeen the rate paid to depositors and the rate paid at the prime level was 2.5 per cent. By 1979 that had accelerated to 3 per cent. In the early part of 1981 it stands in excess of 5 per cent. Is the minister prepared to call in the heads of Canada's chartered banks and ask them to justify this 5 per cent plus spread in interest rate levels?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am quite prepared to retrace the ground that I have covered myself in attempting to understand the differential that exists. The hon. member knows that there is a good deal of competition in the financial market at the present time and that other financial institutions are competing with the banks. As a result of the passing of the Bank Act, there will be increased competition facing the existing banks from foreign banks which will be permitted to operate in Canada. I believe that is the best assurance that the banks are operating in a way that does not harm the population of Canada. I have no evidence to support the hon. member's contention that the banks are taking unfair advantage at the present time. I would be prepared to consider any evidence that anyone might produce.

INCREASE IN PROFITS OF CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I think one could certainly question whether 5 per cent or more is fair. One could also question the assumption that we have a very competitive banking system in Canada.

My supplementary question relates to bank profits. In the last three months the profits for business in Canada have actually been down. During the same period, however, bank profits for the three months ending February 1, rose. For example, the Bank of Nova Scotia's profits rose 23 per cent; profits for the Bank of Montreal rose 41 per cent, and profits for the Toronto-Dominion Bank rose 67 per cent. Madam Speaker, we are talking about a 67 per cent increase in profits in Canada's banking institutions. I think we are very interested in recognizing that this money is not necessarily in the productive sector of the Canadian economy. It is not in the job-creation sector.

Will the Minister of Finance assure the House that the profits and performance of the chartered banks will be closely monitored over the next 12 months, as a first step toward ensuring that Canadian consumers and businesses are not overcharged by our banks?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has referred to performance for a three-month period. This would not be a very reliable basis on which to judge the long-term profitability of Canadian banks. I should remind the hon. member that, as I understand it, the principal part of the profits currently being earned by Canadian banks is derived from their foreign operations and not primarily from their domestic operations.

GRAIN

STATUS OF COMPENSATION PROGRAM ARISING OUT OF EMBARGO ON SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Farmers in western Canada are now preparing what will possibly be one of the most expensive seeding programs they have ever entered into, and they are trying to put their finances in place for that purpose. It is hoped that part of their finances will come from compensation to be paid to the farmers as a result of the embargo on grain shipments to Russia. Could the minister tell the House at what stage is the compensation payment program?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member would want me to answer, through you, some of his allegations about the expenses which will confront the farmers. I am sure he knows that every increase of $4.50 on a barrel of oil means a $20 per ton increase for nitrogen fertilizer, which they need. The program is before cabinet at the present time and it is being considered.

Mr. Towers: Madam Speaker, this program has been considered for a long time. I would ask the minister what stage it is at. The Prime Minister said that he is going to study it as well. It could be studied to death.

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, I want to make it clear also that the program does not only cover the grain producers of western Canada but also the grain producers of central Canada. It took a lot of detailed work in order to come to the position where we could make recommendations to the government. I had hoped to do that last November, but the recommendation was made to the government this January. It is being considered by the departmental committees at the present time and I hope it will soon come forward to the government.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

THEFT OF BUILDING MATERIALS IN SASKATCHEWAN REGION

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It deals with the theft or misuse of building materials in the Saskatchewan region. In October 1980 one Patrick McCaffrey was convicted on four counts of fraud involving the theft of building materials. During his trial he alleged that two complete house packages and a semi-trailer load of building materials disappeared. He is also alleged to have given the RCMP a list of 65 people who, he said, had been stealing materials from the department. This was last October. Can the minister tell us what has happened with regard to this investigation?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): No, I cannot, Madam Speaker. Perhaps the hon. member could have given me notice of the matter in this particular case. However, I can assure him I will check into it and I will endeavour to give him an answer first thing tomorrow.

Mr. Greenaway: Madam Speaker, I brought this matter to the attention of the House about two weeks ago through a motion under Standing Order 43. I think it bears out the Auditor General's report that the financial auditing and the accountability of the department are in an appalling mess. Has the minister done anything to see that this matter is being corrected?

Mr. Nielsen: Come clean, John. Where did you put the loot?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, with regard to the financial auditing of the department, the hon. member may know that there are many Indian leaders who are prepared to defend the department's practices, mainly on the grounds that excessive intervention of this kind is anything but allowing Indians a degree of self-government, which is so necessary if we are to correct any of the problems. I believe that is the sentiment of the hon. member himself, and perhaps the hon. member might temper his remarks in that context.

I might tell the hon. member that I missed his motion under Standing Order 43 which he is talking about, but I will check into the matter and give him a report tomorrow.

PRIVILEGE

MR. SMITH—RADIO ADVERTISEMENT—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: Some days ago, the hon. member for Don Valley East (Mr. Smith) raised a question of privilege arising from an advertisement he heard over the radio in Toronto. He also advised the House that this advertisement was currently being broadcast elsewhere in Canada and he read a transcript of it to the House.

The hon. member submits the radio advertisement is a slur on the integrity of members, an affront to Parliament, and constitutes a prima facie case of contempt of Parliament. I tend to agree with the hon. member that the advertisement in question reflects improperly on Members of Parliament and technically might amount to a contempt of Parliament.

As hon. members are aware, the Speaker's role in privilege matters is simply to determine whether a factual situation presented by a member constitutes a prima facie case of privilege. At the time the hon. member raised his complaint he did not offer a motion, but if he wishes to do so now, an appropriate motion could be received by the Chair. Alternatively, if a motion is not now forthcoming, I shall consider the matter closed.

Mr. David Smith (Don Valley East): Madam Speaker, when I first heard this advertisement on the radio, I could hardly believe what was being said. I might point out that a transcript of the advertisement in question can be found on page 7218 of Hansard for February 13, 1981. The second time I heard this advertisement I really got mad. I felt a question of principle was involved and that the matter should be raised in the House because it is something which affects all members of Parliament. The hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) was prepared to second any motion that I might move in this regard. Because the ad has now been withdrawn, I think the point has been made, and hopefully this sort of contemptuous behaviour will not occur again.

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, I was approached by a reporter on the same matter and I made a statement at the time. The company has since withdrawn the ad and it has made apologies to me and to other members of the House through me.

PETITION

MR. STEWART—REINSTATEMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, I have received a petition which reads as follows:

The petition of the undersigned residents of the City of Barrie and the County of Simcoe in the province of Ontario who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefore provide a remedy. That the undersigned are distressed that the Criminal Code of Canada does not make provision for capital punishment for convicted murderers, not only of police officers and prison guards, but for all innocent victims whose lives might have been taken.

May I urge the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to bring a government bill supporting this petition before this House of Commons for a truly free vote.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 906, 1,421, 1,580, 1,934, 2,025 and 2,039.

[Text]

ORDER IN COUNCIL

Question No. 906—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to question No. 53 which states in part, that one order in council issued between April 20, 1968, and May 22, 1979, was classified (a) on what date was it passed (b) for what reason was it classified (c) what was its subject?

2. Were classified orders in council issued since May 22, 1979 and, if so, in each case (a) on what date (b) for what reason (c) what was its subject?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. It is not considered to be in the public interest to provide detailed information about a classified order in council.

2. The one classified order in council referred to in order paper question No. 53 was made between May 22, 1979 and March 3, 1980.

CBC TRANSMITTER OPERATIONS

Question No. 1,421—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to the answer to question No. 71 which stated in part, that citizens in the Brockville and Maitland areas of Leeds-Grenville would shortly receive "technical advice on possible remedies to reduce or eliminate interference" from CBC FM broadcast towers inoperative in the area, will such technical advice involve any expense to those who wish to take the recommended steps and, if so, will the CBC or the government pay such costs and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: it is the CBC's policy to investigate and evaluate reception complaints from people living in the immediate vicinity of new CBC transmitters. Where it is determined that such problems are caused by its transmitter operations, the CBC will take all reasonable measures to correct the difficulties at no cost to the householder.

INTERFERON

Question No. 1,580—Mr. Howie:

Did the government give financial support to the research or development of the new cancer combatting drug interferon and, if so, what amount was committed in the current fiscal year?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, National Health and Welfare and the National Research Council as follows:

Industry, Trade and Commerce: to date there has been no financial support given under programs of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for research or development of interferon. However, a number of inquiries regarding support for research and development in the general field of bio-technology, including interferon-related proposals, are currently under active consideration.

Health and Welfare Canada: no.

Medical Research Council: during the fiscal year 1979-1980 three research projects on interferon were supported. Total cost of these projects: $129,000.

National Research Council: as part of a continuing research project an attempt is being made to see if interferon can be made by recombinant DNA techniques. Approximately $60,000 has been spent during the current fiscal year.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGE MINORITY GROUPS BUDGET

Question No. 1,934—Mr. Herbert:

What is the budget for the current fiscal year of the Official Language Minority Groups Directorate of the Department of the Secretary of State and what is the (a) percentage (b) per capita allocation of this sum to each official language group?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): The budget of the Official Language Minority Groups Directorate for fiscal year 1980-81 is $15,000,000.

(a) and (b)	Francophones outside Quebec	Anglophones in Quebec
Allocation of budget 1980-81 (per cent)	$ 14,073,800(94 per cent)	$ 926,200(6 per cent)
Per capita (1976 Census)	$ 15.63	$ 1.16
Amount committed as of January 15, 1981	$ 13,411,276	$ 895,617

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Question No. 2,025—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What are the names and job designations of all persons connected with the Privy Council Office in any way whatsoever that have contact with or who work on, the answers to questions on the Order Paper?

2. Who is in charge of this group and (a) what is his/her (i) job designation (ii) annual salary (b) to whom is he/she directly responsible?

3. Is Miss Denise Paquette on leave from this section and, if so, for what reasons and on what date is she expected to return?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. Office of the Co-ordinator of Parliamentary Returns:

Mr. Collenette: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, for some time now I have been asking the parliamentary secretary whether we could have an answer to question No. 811. It is a very important question at this time when the government is having to deal with its deficit financing position; it has to do with the expenditure of public funds. Could the parliamentary secretary please answer question No. 811 because it has been on the Order Paper since May 8, 1980?

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I have given the hon. member my assurance that I will be trying to get this answer tabled as soon as possible.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, when I rose to speak last Thursday evening at nine o'clock, I just had a few moments in which to make my introductory remarks. Therefore, I will proceed now without reviewing the comments I made at that time because I have much ground to cover.

I have been a member of this House for the past 23 years and every day before the public is admitted to the gallery, we rise in our places and begin our proceedings with a prayer. That prayer is indicative of the spirit of our country; until now we have recognized the supremacy of God in Canada and the value the family has in our society. The proposed Constitution—if it is to be a new Constitution, and I am told this is the planning for the future—indicates the direction this country is going to take is not one where the supremacy of God will be recognized. In other words, there is no reference to that supremacy.

The other day the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) tried to explain why he is supporting the Liberal government, the government of the day, without reference to the supremacy of God. He said that when the Diefenbaker bill of rights was introduced in 1960, there was no reference to the supremacy of God, and when it went to the committee, that provision was not in the bill. I was a member of the House at that time and it was my privilege to be part of some of the committee work. I know what transpired. I wish to correct the impression left by the hon. member for Burnaby that it was a Liberal member of the House who introduced an amendment which allowed for the preamble to include a reference to God. The Liberal members applauded that statement. It was information they had not had up until that time, and they applauded.

● (1510)

I want to correct that error. The hon. member said we should dig into history. The history is this. The then minister of justice, Mr. Fulton, was concerned about the wording of the preamble. Because it was so important, he wanted members from all sides of the House to participate in drafting the wording of the bill. I looked up the reference. At page 7411 of Hansard for August 2, 1960, the then member for Essex East, Paul Martin, said this:

First of all, there is stated in the bill that the Canadian nation is founded on principles which acknowledge the supremacy of God.

He was chastising the then minister of justice. He stated that he had learned, when the suggestion was first made on second reading, that it was ridiculed by the minister of justice in his usual manner of playing politics. Mr. Fulton replied:

Mr. Chairman, that is not correct. What I was talking about was poetic language. No specific objection was taken to a preamble.

In other words, he was not opposing including the supremacy of God in the preamble. At page 590 of the committee report for 1960, he wanted to make it clear that he had no objection to including a reference to the supremacy of God. He said:

I know we have all been working on a preamble.

In other words, there was an invitation from the chairman to all members to write out a preamble. He stated that all suggestions would be considered at the time the preamble was drafted. On the same page, Mr. Martin is quoted as saying:

It seems to me that the suggestion of the minister that a committee be appointed to consider various suggestions was a wise one.

Let there be no mistake about the intention of Mr. Fulton. He said:

Our department would try to do that job for you, holding the balance between the various points of view that have been suggested.

That should clarify the matter. Because of the importance of the question, the wording was to be such that it would encompass the views of all the parties in the House of Commons.

There is a further point that should be made with regard to when the bill was in committee. We must remember that the rules have changed since that time. When second reading of the bill was being considered, it was considered as a matter of principle; members voted on a matter of principle. There was unanimous consent in the House at that time. No one objected to the way the bill was worded when it was sent to committee. Any changes that came about were with the concurrence of the government.

A large section of our society is now apparently being disregarded. Many people are inspired by the religious training they received when they were growing up. Many still turn to religion in order to instil in their families the belief and moral fibre they feel necessary.

I cannot help but think that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) receives his inspiration while travelling to atheist countries like China and Russia. Therefore, future generations will not have the same recognition of the values we have held in the past. I am sure that many members opposite believe there should be a reference to the supremacy of God but are prepared to go ahead with this Constitution in order to satisfy one man's ego.

This Constitution is incomplete, inaccurate, and does not go in the direction this country desires. This should be corrected before this resolution is dealt with by this Parliament. We should not be burdened with a deadline simply because the Prime Minister has his own personal deadline. If we continue in this direction, to whom will we pray? The Prime Minister? Will he be supreme? If we remove reference to the supremacy of God, there is only one man at the head of this country who is supreme.

This should be a very happy occasion for all Canadians. We are in the midst of constructing a Constitution. The foundation is being laid for the future. When planning the construction of a home, recognition is given to all the requirements. The housewife has certain requirements for the kitchen. The children may want a certain type of room. You try to accommodate everyone within the means available. We certainly have the means in this instance. We should have all the time that is necessary. Why lay the foundation in such a way that it will crumble within a few years?

When building a family home, if all the family requirements are not taken into account, regardless of the cost of the structure the family will not he happy. This is the kind of situation we are creating for future Canadians. We should therefore take into account all the requirements.

I now want to deal with the provinces. On the question of the unilateral action taken by the federal government, an amending formula and the inclusion of the Victoria formula, two provinces are given veto power. We are going to have three different categories of province in this country by the time we are through if we proceed on the present basis.

• (1520)

First of all, the two provinces that have the veto power, Ontario and Quebec—it has been that way up until the present—shall continue to do so. For some reason, these people in that part of Canada have a special choice in the matter. That should not be continued.

If we are to construct a new constitution, we should remove these inequalities; rather, we are putting in greater inequalities. For example, there is the requirement in the veto power that you have two provinces in the Atlantic region, and in western Canada you require two provinces, the total population of which should be what? Fifty per cent.

The city of Regina has a population which is almost twice that of P.E.I., and yet P.E.I. has more strength than all the province of Saskatchewan. What does that do to poor Premier Blakeney? He cannot join up with another province, Manitoba, if he wants to promote his socialism in the country, which the Liberal government is only too glad to promote. Where does that put him? Can hon. members not see why he is rejecting the package that is presented?

Therefore, we have three levels of province. I think this amounts to a castration of the provinces, because you cannot move without the prior consent of that man who sets himself up to be as supreme as God. God is no longer to be recognized. Only the Prime Minister can suggest the timing, the wording; of course, he has the resources of the whole country to promote his ideas. What you are doing is resorting to the castration of the provinces. That should not be perpetuated.

What do hon. members think the citizens of those provinces are going to think in the future? Do they think they will be happy in this family which is called Canada? Forever and a day, we will be reminded of that provision. It should certainly be excluded from the Constitution which has now been drafted.

In this country we have had a Liberal government for 38 of the last 50 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Thank God.

Mr. Korchinski: Somebody said "Thank God". Because we have had a Liberal government which never recognized the requirements of the provinces, we now have five different political parties in Canada that have resorted to other political parties in the province to provide a counterbalance. The Liberal government is only interested in its own preservation in Ottawa, and that is why it is wording the Constitution. Why do you think we have to resort to Social Credit in B.C.?

An hon. Member: What's your reason?

Mr. Korchinski: Why do you think we have had the CCF in Saskatchewan, and now the NDP? Why do you think we have a Union Nationale in Quebec? Why do you think we have the Parti Québécois? Why do you think we have Progressive Conservative governments in other provinces? Only occasionally did provinces resort to Liberals in order to turf out a government which got to be too smug. In places where they have only a two-party system, they resorted to electing a Liberal government. The simple reasons is that they have had to turn to new political parties in order to provide some balance. The government is emasculating the powers of others. What is it doing to the provinces?

Anybody who knows something of the history of school boards knows the power which they had some 25 years ago. A new idea came in: centralize, as the government is doing now. Keep the power in the central unit. Do you know what happened? At one time you were able to hire, fire, and select the kind of education that the community wanted. Today, the only role which one sitting on a school board plays is to make sure that the sewers are not plugged. That is the kind of power that is left to the school boards today, and that is the kind of power the government wants the provinces to have, regardless of the fact that these same Canadians elected these governments to provide a balance. They say, "Well, that Ottawa government certainly doesn't do anything for us; we'll go to another political party. At least maybe we'll have some power then."

That is the kind of situation we are in. We are not only perpetuating this situation, but enshrining it. We are chiselling it in marble to ensure that it stays this way. Is this the kind of future we want for Canadians? Some of us will be gone, but this situation will continue. How do you amend it? You cannot amend it because you have made the formula so restrictive that it is impossible to move without the consent of two provinces. Only by their mercy shall the provincial governments survive. In this Parliament, an hon. member said, "Thank God for the Liberal government."

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Korchinski: Where do you get your strength from? Fifty per cent comes from one province, Quebec; and with the province of Ontario you have 80 per cent of your strength. Adding one more province, New Brunswick, you have 91 per cent of your strength. Are you now speaking for all Canadians?

An hon. Member: No way.

Mr. Korchinski: I say that the government is enshrining this provision to make sure that the Liberal Party stays in office, and it is not speaking for Canadians. An hon. member said "Thank God." Why has the province of Quebec had to resort to the Parti Québécois? Is it because of the Liberal government? Do you think they were happy with it? There are 73 members from Quebec and 52 from Ontario. Adding the seven from New Brunswick accounts for 91 per cent of the members.

Perhaps for the benefit of the record I should indicate that during 38 years the province of Alberta has never had a Liberal government; in British Columbia, in 29 years, there has never been a Liberal government provincially; in Manitoba, in the last 32 years, there has never been a Liberal government; in New Brunswick, for ten out of 29 years there has been a Liberal government. They have a two-party system. Because our Constitution allowed a province to come into the federation in Canada, it also allowed Quebec the option of stepping out. Newfoundland resorted to a Liberal government temporarily for 23 of the last 32 years that they have been in confederation, but they stepped out, too. For eight out of 25 years, Nova Scotia had a Liberal government; again they have a two-party system. Ontario has not had a Liberal government in 32 years. P.E.I. has for 13 out of 22; they also have two-party system. Quebec for six out of 22 years has had a Liberal government. Saskatchewan has for seven out of 20 years.

Why are they doing this to Canadians? Only because of the self-interest of the Liberal government, their self-preservation in Ottawa. That is where the power is, and they want to continue in power.

• (1530)

The other day I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) a question because for the first time under the definition of "aboriginals" in this proposed resolution the word "Metis" was included. The words "Indian", "Inuit" and "Metis" are used. To anyone not familiar with the Metis situation it appears that we have made a breakthrough. I know that the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) says, "Look what we have done for Metis and Indians" and so forth. Only someone who does not know the situation and who is ignorant of the facts would be so bold, because the Association of Metis and Non-Status Indians of Saskatchewan does not belong to the national association. In the province of Saskatchewan the Federation of Saskatchewan Indians does not belong to the national organization. A long time ago that federation decided it did not want any part of that organization. It therefore is alone. There are 85,000 Metis in the province of Saskatchewan. The Inuit have been recognized, and there are 25,000 of them. The Indians have been recognized, and there are 300,000 of them. However, the Association of Metis and Non-Status Indians of Saskatchewan has not been recognized because it is not part of the national organization, nor does it want any part.

What is this government telling that association? "You must adhere to another organization or you will not be recognized." The Metis are saying it was a Friday night massacre. What rights are they being given? Hon. members opposite talk about rights. What kind of rights? They will have a discussion after the fact. The Metis are 85,000 strong in the province of Saskatchewan. They are saying this is a disservice, because up until now many organizations have been backing them up. Now those organizations are saying, "Why should you complain? You are mentioned in the charter." What good is it? It is a disservice to these people because up until now they had the right to negotiate. If the negotiations failed, they had the right to resort to the courts. What are hon. members opposite doing to them? They are taking away the right to negotiate. What kind of leverage will they have? What kind of hammer or clout will they have if we pass this the way it is now without identifying what rights they have?

Since when have the provinces not taken their responsibility? The answer the minister gave me was that no rights will be removed and that the federal government will not assume any responsibility. Since when have the provinces neglected their responsibility? Let us look at some reserves and make a comparison with respect to the way the provinces have looked after them. The houses are bigger. Sewer and water services are in place. Many facilities are better because they are looked after by the provinces. Now we take away that clout and say they can negotiate with the Prime Minister later. They do not trust the Prime Minister because there was no prior consultation. They are told they can resort to the courts. Who will fund them? They have no money. Furthermore, they do not trust our courts. Why should the Association of Metis and Non-Status Indians of Saskatchewan trust the courts when it was the courts that came down with the decision to hang Louis Riel?

It is the same organization which springs from those days which is now talking, but hon. members on the Liberal and NDP benches should not tell anybody, including the Metis and Indians, that they are giving them anything. Up until now they had the right to negotiate and to resort to the courts. The right to negotiate is to be taken away, and these people do not trust the courts. That is the position they are being put into.

Just so there will be no doubt in the minds of hon. members opposite, I have here a telegram from the president of the Association of Metis and Non-Status Indians of Saskatchewan. Because of the time element I will read just part of it, as follows:

> The purpose of this telegram is to express our complete opposition to the so-called "native rights" package to be included in the proposed new Constitution ... We believed our appearance before this committee was the first step in the consultative process with provincial and territorial native leaders which would lead to the establishment of a solid native charter of rights in the new Constitution.
> Such has not been the case ... the Native Council of Canada does not represent us.

That is exactly what I was trying to tell hon. members. I mentioned the membership.

I will read only parts of this telegram because it is so long. I am sure anyone who wants to see this telegram can have copies.

> Your package is not one with which we are in agreement. Furthermore, the process is wrong ... Mr. Prime Minister, will you not heed the cries of the Canadian people, including our membership, and admit that the process leading to a new Constitution is wrong?

That was from Jim Sinclair, the president of the association to which I have been referring.

My time is rapidly running out, but there are a few other things on which I would like to comment; for example, the right to own property. I happen to come from a stock or race of people who were peasants, in many cases, in central Europe and who had no right to property and could not possibly hold property. They came to this country. We did not have a charter of rights. We did not have to set out the right to own property in a charter. These people came to this country because they knew they could own property here. It was a tradition. They had heard about Canada. Canada was free; you could own land.

However, governments became very big and strong. The most vocal people asking for a charter of rights are the socialists. They are vocal because they are the first people to encroach on our rights. Over the years they imposed their demands on the public. They moved their greedy hands into every aspect of our society. They have moved in and infringed on our rights, with the help of the Liberals in Ottawa. We have come to the point where people have submitted to the fact that their rights have been lost. This has happened without our thinking about process.

What we should be doing is enshrining in a charter permission for government to move only in certain areas. Instead, the process has been reversed and the government is saying, "We are going to give you some rights." Who gave the government those rights in the first instance? When people came to this country, they settled in small communities and selected leaders. They selected people to serve on councils. Those councils were given rights. Those rights were given to the councils by people. One by one they expanded and became governments, but the rights were in the hands of the people. Because of the octopus of big government we have now reached the point where people are losing their rights and they need to have a charter of rights.

What we do not realize is that over a period of time governments have become important and the people have no importance. To reassure the people we now have to resort to giving them a charter of rights. If we did not have the type of government we have had, we would not have to resort to this type of approach. The people always have rights. Governments have never had any rights except those rights the people have given them. Now the government says it is giving the people a charter of rights and freedoms. The government says that in the charter it is recognizing the rights of Indians, women, natives and so forth. This government recognizes only one thing; let that be clear. It is making itself supreme. That is wrong. Only a country like Russia can get away with a bluff like that. Article 72 of the Russian constitution reads as follows:

> Each Union Republic shall retain the right freely to secede from the U.S.S.R.

The republics named are the Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Georgian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Armenian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Turkmen Soviet Socialist Republic, Estonia, Latvia and so forth.

A dinner is being put on by the Estonians and Latvians. Do hon. members think they would not like to secede? What good is that type of constitution? This government says it is giving the Canadian people rights, but the Canadian people have always had rights. Because of encroachments by governments in 38 of the last 50 years on the rights of Canadians, we have now reached a point in our history when we have to reassure people in order to keep them from revolt. Because the people are disgruntled. People may wonder about what happened in the United States. I have heard comments about the choice of President Reagan. People are fed up. Why did people vote against some services and for tax cuts? They did so for the simple reason that they are fed up with big governments. That is exactly what we have had here.

It is regrettable that my time is almost up because I would dearly have liked to cover many other points.

Some hon. Members: More!

Mr. Korchinski: I would like to talk about the Vancouver consensus, for example. Let me touch briefly on that. They say it is going to be a checkerboard. Well, Mr. Speaker, do you know where the Prime Minister gets his information? He was in China, he has spent a lot of time in Russia, and everybody there behaves as if they were in the army. When they say "Attention", everybody stands up; when they say "About turn", everybody turns; and when they say "Forward march", everybody marches forward. He wants everyone to be regimented. He wants a society which, if you plug it in, it turns yellow; if you tell it to move forward, it moves forward; and if you tell it to stand at attention, that is what it does.

● (1540)

The next step will be that everyone will have to wear a uniform as in red China. I have never travelled to red China and I have not seen it first hand, but on television you can see that everyone there is dressed in the same uniform. He wants a stereotype society, and never mind the fact that Quebec wanted a language of its own, that Saskatchewan wanted a medicare plan, which it would never have had if unanimity had been required. It was a Liberal provision which required the approval of six provinces before a grant could be made toward medicare. It was the Diefenbaker government which said, "We will provide assistance even if only one province wants it." That is accommodation of the provinces. With its kind of attitude, the Liberal government cannot have accommodation.

I do not want to impose on the time of this House, Mr. Speaker, or on that of any member, but I will say this. What the Prime Minister has done is rejected British Columbia on the gas issue, infuriated Manitoba, mesmerized Ontario, inflamed separation in Quebec, scorned Newfoundland, ignored Prince Edward Island, antagonized Nova Scotia, manipulated Saskatchewan, tranquilized New Brunswick, despised Alberta, and, above all, reached a point where one hon. member has had to rise in his place and say that the Prime Minister has lied to Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think that in determining who is for and who is against this resolution, we will have to mark the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) as being doubtful.

I am extremely pleased to have the opportunity to participate at this stage of this very important debate. Actually, I had not intended to do so; I was content to have my views recorded in the remarks which I delivered at the initial stage of consideration of this resolution. My speech in the House today is prompted solely by certain remarks the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) made in the debate last week. But before I turn to those remarks, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the right hon. gentleman on the endorsement he received from his party on the weekend. I believe that his hard work deserved a better endorsement, but, as I will be saying in the course of my remarks, unanimity is hard to achieve, whether on the Constitution or on other types of endorsement.

In relation to the remarks which the right hon. gentleman made in this debate last week, his views, his premises and his conclusions are so in error, so mischievous, so harmful to our national existence as to cry out for correction. I feel fervently about our country and its future. I have devoted two decades of my life to public service and I have been involved constantly in the serious examination, consideration and negotiation of matters affecting the welfare, unity and survival of Canada. From that experience I have developed a profound belief in the kind of Canada which can best persevere and best serve the interests of our different regions and varied cultures.

My understanding of Canada, however, is so different from that set forth by the right hon. gentleman as to require me to enter this debate to put forth our contrasting views. The Leader of the Opposition has said that the purpose of parliamentary debate is to draw attention to alternative views of our country. I agree that this is one purpose of debate, one justification of our party system, one manifestation of our parliamentary government. As he said, there are two visions of Canada. Ours is very different from his. I would happily place the choice of those two visions before the Canadian people, for the two visions are very different. His is a vision similar to Mr. Peckford's and Mr. Lougheed's. He has spoken of Canada's relationship to the provinces as a community of communities. Mr. Peckford has expressed the same principle of total decentralization of authority in different words. He has said the Canadian government is the "agent of provincial governments."

An hon. Member: Be honest.

Mr. Regan: If they see the Canadian government as being the agent of the provinces, then surely the Leader of the Opposition has shown himself to be the agent general of the premiers.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Regan: There are two visions of Canada. Ours is of a Canada of strong provinces and a strong central government. Ours is of a Canadian government able to provide leadership, to spread opportunities, to equalize opportunities throughout our country, and able to speak for all Canada in international matters.

The vision of the right hon. gentleman is of ten loosely affiliated states with varying rights and standards, constantly squabbling with each other while the Canadian government stands by, an impotent and irrelevant spectator.

An hon. Member: Irreverent?

Mr. Regan: Irreverent also. The vast majority of Canadians, including the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, rejected the two nation theory of our country which would have given special status to one province with different powers from the others. What the Leader of the Opposition now offers, however, is much worse than that which the country rejected and which Mr. Diefenbanker rejected. What the Leader of the Opposition offers is a ten-nation theory which is based on the implementation of the Vancouver formula. The implementation of his theory would bring on a weakened national government, near world prices for energy, interprovincial trade barriers, something like provincial passports to establish your right to work in a particular province, different constitutional provisions in different provinces, and no common standards in health or pension provisions.

An hon. member opposite says "nonsense." I will tell him why it is not nonsense. It is not nonsense because his ten nation theory is one which would set our regions and our provinces drifting apart toward dubious independent futures, just as the ice packs of Lake Superior break up, drift apart and eventually disappear each spring.

The Leader of the Opposition talks of the present process of constitutional patriation as being divisive and he says that this has not been the Canadian way. I will deal with that particular inaccuracy in a moment, but let me first ask, what on earth could be more divisive than the Vancouver formula with which he adorns his position? That particular solution to finding a universally acceptable amending formula provides that, even if enough provinces were to approve a constitutional change, some provinces could opt out of it. More and more provinces could opt out of more provisions as various changes are made. Thus, if you look at the charter of rights, you could have aboriginal rights protected in some provinces but not in others. Discrimination based on sex may be outlawed in certain provinces but ignored in others. Citizens' rights against unfair arrest could be entrenched in one province and unfettered imprisonment for such things as debt could be in vogue in others. I cannot imagine anything better designed to pull our country apart.

The right hon. gentleman also found the existence of different points of view on how the Constitution should be patriated distasteful and surprising. He was concerned about dissension. He contrasted the present process to that followed in the development of medicare in Canada; he picked that particular example. He said that the cause was as important, but that in the case of medicare what he called the Canadian federal process was followed.

His choice of an example of the federal process is apt, but if he thinks it serves his argument, his knowledge of even recent political history is faulty. Medicare is the crowning glory of our Canadian social system. It is the most striking example of the difference between the Canadian and American ways of life, but its birth was accompanied by anything but unanimity. If he thinks all the provinces were happy at its advent, I want to assure him that they were not. It was imposed by federal spending power when, as usual, the provinces were unable to agree, either among themselves or with the feds, on any medicare scheme.

Here are some of the comments of that era regarding the sort of federal process to which the hon. member referred. Premier Robarts said of medicare:

> Medicare is a glowing example of a Machiavellian scheme that is in my humble opinion one of the greatest political frauds that has ever been perpetrated on the people of this country.

In this House a prominent Conservative of that time, Mr. Fulton, said the following concerning the medicare proposal:

> —heavy handed and ruthless, financial blackmail . . . not co-operative federalism but . . . dictatorial federalism of the worst sort.

This was the certain type of "unanimity" which existed on medicare. I could quote the comments of four or five other premiers if time allowed, but I think what it comes back to is simply this: the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has now been corrected on how medicare came about. I am sure he was corrected before I said these words, but medicare is not an exception. How it really came about is what the federal process in Canada is, as is the federal process elsewhere. Because as a government we have moved to end 50 years of deadlock on patriation, he contends that we have given up on the federal system. He argued that we should not have done that, that the federal system has not failed, that we should meet and listen to the premiers disagree among themselves for another 50 years or longer to achieve unanimity, in the same way as six premiers who opposed our proposition recently met in Montreal and could not even agree on an amending formula or on whether or not to go to England.

The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition does not understand that it is not the federal system which has failed; it is unanimity which has failed. The right hon. gentleman held extremely high office for a very brief time indeed. It was the only time he has ever held an executive-administrative position. He never participated in a single federal-provincial first ministers' conference. He never solved an intergovernmental deadlock except by total surrender. I know it is a serious thing to charge a former prime minister with naivete, but I kindly and seriously suggest that he was not in office long enough to learn that the voice of faction is not hushed by the importance of the undertaking. His history was faulty on medicare. Perhaps he does not realize that all of Canada's important national achievements have been accomplished despite dissension, dissension at least as deep and bitter as anything we have seen in the current undertaking.

If one reviews the debate, the public speeches and the outcries at the time of the original confederation, one will learn that Nova Scotia, for instance, did everything, including defeating all those who had voted for confederation, to claw its way back out. What happened at the time of the building of the TransCanada Pipeline which we are awfully grateful to have today? The dissension from that great project contributed greatly to bringing the government down. What about the St. Lawrence Seaway or when the country was establishing a Canadian navy? Battles and dissension occurred in this House and in the provinces until finally the Premier of British Columbia bought two submarines at the start of the war. What about the debate on our flag when I was present in the House some 18 years ago? What about creation of the new western provinces? Dissension accompanied all of these great achievements. The achievements are great after, but dissension is part of the parliamentary process.

The simple fact is that none of these things would have come about if we had acted only with unanimity and without dissension. The simplistic view that the clash of important interests can quickly be resolved by good will alone is a vision reserved for the uninitiated. Good will there must be, but also much more: an ability to evaluate what is vital to federal and provincial interests; fairness mixed with protection of what is vital. Even in his brief time in office the right hon. gentleman should have learned this from his experience. With all this good will which he believes would achieve unanimity in developing a constitution, he was not able to settle with Lougheed, Israel or the Water Street Baron who thrust the 18-cent excise tax on him. He could not even get Flora home to vote. So unanimity was not that easy to achieve. No, he has the wrong vision of Canada.

The federal system is not a system of unanimity. The federal system has not failed; rather, it has built the best country in the world. But unanimity will often fail when there are important conflicting interests. No federal country in the world expects or requires unanimity to make changes, and neither does Canada.

The Canadian government has always had the role of speaking for all Canadians. It has not been a community among communities or a government among equals. If it has been, there would have been no medicare. We must consider our history, as the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has failed to do. Every province created after 1867 came into being without consultation with or permission of the existing provinces. Can one think of a better example of an important constitutional change? The same was the case in relation to the province of Newfoundland. When Newfoundland was admitted, two premiers, including the premier of my province, complained that the provinces should be consulted. Consulted they were not; that was not the process.

The right hon. gentleman talked of past practices, but none dealt with patriation, an amending formula or entrenchment of a charter of rights. The facts are that there have been 16 significant amendments to the British North America Act by Westminster; of these, 13 affected provincial interests. Of these 13, the provinces were consulted on only six. In at least one of those six consultations, the federal government went ahead on its own when consultation did not bring agreement.

Also he raised the question whether enough time has been spent in trying to reach that elusive unanimity. With a flourish, the right hon. gentleman suggested that only 48 days—this was his great discovery—since 1927 have been spent discussing the Constitution. This is either another naive simplification by a man who has never taken part in a first ministers' conference, and therefore does not know how they operate, or a deliberate distortion. Let us assume the former and seek to educate the right hon. gentleman.

I personally took part in every first ministers' conference between 1970 and 1978. In addition to specific constitutional conferences, the Constitution was often discussed, even when it was not on the public agenda. Discussions between governments are conducted through officials and ministers, as well as through the highly-publicized conferences of first ministers. I suggest it is an insult to Mr. Fulton and the late Mr. Favreau, to name only two who worked hard hours on the subject, to suggest, as did the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, that the efforts to reach agreement were not serious and lengthy. There were almost constant meetings of officials and ministers between 1968 and 1971, from April 1975 to October 1976, from October 1978 to February 1979 and, of course, from June to September 1980.

I personally know how much time was spent by me, by my ministers and officials and by our counterparts in other provinces when I was in provincial government. For instance, the right hon. gentleman totally discounted or does not know that the various regions would have regional first ministers' meetings in advance of the first ministers' meetings in counting his 48 days. The time, energy and resources deployed by governments over the past 13 years to try to reach agreement on this subject have been enormous. The failure is due to the rising and often unrealistic expectations of some premiers who feel that each individual must have all of his concerns satisfied in full before movement can occur. Yet as a national government we have given away about as much power to the provinces as we can.

● (1600)

I would like to quote Chief Justice Bora Laskin of the Supreme Court of Canada— He said:

> I know of no federal system in which the constituent units have as extensive a regulatory authority as the provinces of Canada—

Professor Rowland Harrison of the University of Calgary Law School said this:

> The dispute over the control of resources is not so much a dispute about the limits of existing constitutional authority as it is a thrust by some of the provinces for a reassignment of authority.

The Leader of the Opposition said that he would have had an agreement with the provinces. He said that a prime minister who wanted to have an agreement could have had one. Yet in 50 years no prime minister has been able to obtain agreement. I think the right hon. gentleman might have achieved one—

Mr. Lawrence: Victoria in 1971.

Mr. Regan: The hon. member opposite says "Victoria in 1971." I know about Victoria. I was there.

Mr. Lawrence: So was I.

Mr. Regan: As was the hon. member opposite. He knows that at Victoria all ten premiers agreed on the Victoria formula. The disagreement was not on the Victoria formula but on certain other additional demands made by Quebec at the last instance.

Mr. Lawrence: But there was agreement.

Mr. Regan: There was agreement.

Mr. Lawrence: Who queered it up?

Mr. Regan: When I am dealing with big game I will not be drawn aside by rabbit tracks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: The Liberal party of Quebec queered it up, that is who.

Mr. Regan: I want to say this about the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. I think he might have had an agreement since his theory of government by capitulation is the way that agreement could occur, the unanimity could be achieved. In the process, his vision of Canada as a government among equals would have been achieved and, eventually, with all of the different constitutional provisions in different provinces, our country would have been destroyed. His record with respect to fisheries, the offshore, Alberta and lotteries shows that he is prepared to give away almost anything. For those in his ranks who are supporters of the charter of rights, I assure them that he would have given in to Premier Lyon in the same way as he gave in on these other matters and there would have been no charter of rights. Yet, the right hon. gentleman condemns in his remarks our unwillingness to continue negotiating with the premiers in endless circles, like the Vienna Congress in Napoleonic times.

If the constitutional debate causes divisions in the country, those divisions are fed by the right hon. gentleman, for his present opportunities lie not in accord and congenial progress. His chances of political survival have been fed and nourished by the dissension that he causes by this resolution. He has found this issue to be a heaven-sent opportunity to differ and dispute, to pretend and protest. He knows of the stripping of federal powers, yet he is prepared to yield further fisheries to Newfoundland, offshore resources endangering our international claim to a 200-mile limit, super resource powers to Alberta and yield whatever Bennett can think of to B.C.

I want to contrast this, Mr. Speaker, with the position of the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). On this resolution the Leader of the NDP has taken the high road. The members of the NDP have exposed themselves to criticism for going along with the government. What do they gain by doing that? They expose themselves to criticism when they could take the easy course, the comfortable pew, of a party in opposition by opposing and being against whatever the government proposes. But I suggest that the difference is that the Leader of the New Democratic Party, with the proper recognition of principle and an understanding of the importance of strong central government, discharges his responsibilities in a way that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is not doing.

There is one other statement made by the Leader of the Opposition with which I would like to deal. He says, erroneously, that we are destroying the tradition of equality of the provinces. I do not know where he has found the historic exercise of any such principle. It is true that all provinces equally share the same legislative authority. But provinces have never participated equally in the formal institutions of the Government of Canada. They have not been equal in their representation in the House of Commons, nor in the Senate which is, supposedly, the voice of provincial interests. Actually, the Senate is roughly divided four ways, based upon the regions of the country and not the provinces. The provinces are not represented equally in the Supreme Court. They are not represented equally in the cabinet.

Indeed, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, when he was prime minister, did not have Manitoba, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick represented in his inner cabinet. Yet he now speaks in glowing terms of the member from Manitoba who was in his cabinet but was not included in his inner cabinet. Provinces have never been treated equally. I think you could not find a finer example of that.

We should be determined to accord fair and equitable treatment to all provinces, but at the same time let us not distort history and pretend that the premise has been different than it has. Indeed, it is not through our resolution or our formula that different classes of province would be created, as the hon. gentleman suggests. It is by his Vancouver formula that different classes of provinces would be created, some with entrenched rights, some without and some with different constitutional provisions from others.

The Leader of the Opposition reserves his most violent opposition for the proposed use of a referendum, region by region, to break an ongoing deadlock between the provinces and the federal government. I find this very difficult to understand because the way to break a deadlock, until now, has been recourse to the British parliament. After patriation that method will be gone forever. What we propose is somewhat similar to what Australia has. It has not destroyed federalism in that country; rather, their people have shown a judicious ability to balance federal and provincial arguments in the outcome of referenda. I fear his repugnance of resort to the people to break a deadlock indicates that he does not trust the people. Perhaps after last year I can understand why.

The same public elects two levels of government. If those two levels cannot agree, is it not logical to resolve the dispute by going back to those same electors from whom the legitimacy of both governments spring? The Leader of the Opposition says that the aftermath of this resolution will see us looking at the breaking of our federation. I suggest that would be the aftermath of the course he wants to follow. We see a somewhat different aftermath. We see an aftermath of mature federal-provincial negotiations of an evolving constitution without trade-off blackmail. We see an aftermath of an amending formula that makes clear the protection of provincial rights, an aftermath in which the principles of equalization, of language rights and Indian rights are enshrined for all time.

He talks of aftermaths and we provide a solution to a deadlock of 50 years. Surely that is the challenge of government. We provide the protections our people have cried for in a charter of rights, the protections that delegation after delegation pleaded for as they appeared before the constitutional committee. We offer an aftermath of stability, for good fences make good neighbours, as Robert Frost said. Good provisions make good relations. While all the world is moving toward larger units, the Leader of the Opposition would give the Canadian government less authority than the Common Market has over the sovereign states of Europe. Years and years after the late Marshall McLuhan outlined the global village, the Leader of the Opposition wants a country where nothing happens except by unanimity—which means that nothing happens.

Yes, our vision of Canada and of its greatness is different. Our vision of Canada is more, much more, than the sum of its parts. I am confident that our vision will prevail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1610)

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I should like to express my views, very briefly, on the government's proposal to amend the Constitution of Canada. As we know, the debate has been divided into three main parts: first, bringing the Constitution to Canada; second, working out a new amending formula; and third, the inclusion of a charter of rights.

It has been clear from the start of the debate that the overwhelming majority of Canadians want the Constitution brought to Canada, so that has never been an issue. The issue is the plan of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to ask the British government to amend our Constitution for us by changing the amending formula and entrenching a charter of rights. Under his plan, the Prime Minister intends that this country should go cap in hand to the British government and say, "We are not capable of amending our own Constitution, so will you please do the job for us?" That is colonialism of the highest order, and should not be done by a proud and independent nation.

What should be done is this. First, bring the Constitution to Canada as soon as possible, without asking the British government to amend it for us; second, decide in Parliament, with a free vote, which amending formula meets this country's needs in the most practical and effective manner; third, decide in Parliament, with a free vote, which measures should be included in a charter of rights; and fourth, amend our own Constitution.

A free vote on each issue will make it possible for every Member of Parliament freely to express the views of that part of the country which he or she represents, and back up those opinions with their vote. This will be a true expression of the will of the Canadian people, and is the only way that an independent, self-respecting country can do the job which confronts us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mrs. Eva Côté (Rimouski-Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the privilege of rising in this House during such an important debate in the history of our country is a great honour as well as a great responsibility. For the second time in a year, I must ponder on my country and find an answer as much for myself as for my family, my children and all the citizens of Rimouski-Témiscouata who have asked me to represent them here. I do not intend to reflect here the views of each of my constituents, but I think that most of them share my feeling about the nature of Canada and what it should be for our children, namely a free country, a structured, democratic and independent state.

For almost 300 years, Mr. Speaker, we have been working together to build a country. Last May when the referendum was held, like all Canadians residing in Quebec, I heard many of my fellow citizens say again and again that Canada is the country extending from ocean to ocean that we inherited from our forefathers a few decades or centuries ago and of which we must take good care. Throughout that vast territory, one finds a land, a subsoil, rivers and coasts that are rich, fertile and full of resources which have enabled every Canadian from the very beginning to earn a living and to be fulfilled.

Canada is also a hospitable, welcoming, attractive and hearty land that thousands of my fellow citizens have chosen over the years for all kinds of reasons as their new country, and all together, taking one year with another, with sheer love, will, perseverance and tolerance, we have built one of the finest countries in the world, and in so doing, we have developed our national pride. We have adopted symbols which reflect today our patriotism and our feeling of a shared future, thus uniting all Canadians: the Canadian citizenship, the one-leaved flag and the national anthem are surely the three main symbols.

Moreover, in 1968, more specifically on October 17, the Liberal government of the time introduced legislation dealing with the official languages of Canada which finally received royal assent on July 9, 1970. The policy on bilingualism had to be reaffirmed in 1973 through a resolution of the House, and I should like to say a few words about the Official Languages Act. The purpose of this act has never been to compel all Canadians from coast to coast to be bilingual, that is to say, to speak both French and English. Its purpose was instead to grant rights to the Canadian people. As a matter of fact, this act has required the Canadian government to provide all Canadian citizens with government services in one of the official languages, either in French or in English. And that is also a sign or symbol of national unity. We still have, however, a step to take, that is to give ourselves a constitution made by Canadians for Canadians. The proposed resolution for the patriation of the British North America Act which is now before the House includes an amending formula, a charter of basic rights and freedoms, minority language rights as well as the entrenchment of the principle of equalization so as to ensure the sharing of the Canadian wealth.

It is quite clear that we should have our own Constitution in Canada; all Members of Parliament agree on that. However, we do not agree on its provisions and the procedure, and I should like to deal with this, Mr. Speaker. The proposed amending formula would require the 11 governments of Canada to agree to any amendment to the Canadian Constitution within two years after patriation. During this two-year period, these same governments would have to meet and try to agree on an amending formula which would be satisfactory to all of them. If, after two years, the federal and provincial governments have failed to agree on an appropriate formula, the Canadian people would be consulted by means of a referendum. A formula agreed on by all provinces would be submitted to the Canadian people, as well as the formula being proposed now by the Canadian government, whereby all amendments to the Constitution would require the consent of two Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Ontario, and two western provinces, as well as 50 per cent of the population.

The proposed resolution also includes a Canadian charter of rights and fundamental freedoms. We all know that Canada and certain provinces now have a charter of rights and freedoms, but we know as well, and many speakers before me have said so, that the rights and freedoms of Canadians were trampled on various occasions in this country and many of our fellow citizens have suffered serious prejudices at times.

As to the protection of the linguistic rights of Canada's French and English minorities, for the first time we agree in one specific field: French education will be available to French minorities outside the province of Quebec, and the English minority residing in Quebec will continue to get the same services. In other words, all Canadians throughout the country, whether their mother tongue is French or English, will enjoy the same rights and their own language and culture will be respected.

It is true that the decision to guarantee such services to linguistic minorities will have to depend on numbers, but I think we must have confidence in the good faith of the leaders we elect and, should the need arise, the citizens who believe that their rights were violated will have their day in court where judges will rule on legislative measures and actions taken by the provincial administrations. And finally the proposed constitution is aimed at sanctioning the principle of wealth sharing, namely equalization. Let us recall that not so very long ago certain regions of Canada were facing enormous difficulties and they were generously assisted by other regions of Canada which today find themselves in a precarious position.

Before equalization came into being the Government of Canada took steps to help the provincial governments. Among other things let us mention only the advent of medicare in 1966. As the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) said, this proposal on the part of the Canadian government was intended to help provincial authorities throughout Canada offer all citizens the same health services regardless of their financial situation. And even on such an important subject, on something which is so necessary to the welfare of Canadians, it was not easy to reach agreement and we had to wait until 1972 to see all provinces at last join this insurance plan.

If I thought it was necessary to mention the Canadian health insurance plan for which the federal government pays half the costs and which is administered by the provincial governments, and to refer to the equalization payments which are also made directly to those same provincial governments by the federal government and which began after so many years of discussions, it is to emphasize that federal-provincial negotiations are never easy even if the two levels of government say they want to work in the best interests of Canadians. Now what about the decades of discussions whose avowed purpose was to secure a Canadian constitution but which led to a deadlock as a result of local interests and delays?

Should we continue the debates with the illusion that we will achieve unanimous agreement in that field? Mr. Speaker, the year 2000 will soon be upon us and when our children read the history of Canada will they understand our hesitations, even our weakness, in our quest for a solution to that national problem and our will to solve it?

Will they understand that each and every time a Liberal government proposed needed and saving measures for Canadians, the official Progressive Conservative opposition rejected them? In the past, when the time came to give ourselves symbols, reasons to be proud of ourselves as Canadians, for instance, the Canadian citizenship and the maple leaf flag, the official opposition resisted them. Today, after having made every effort to come to an agreement with the provincial governments to have our very own Canadian constitution, which efforts came to naught because the provincial governments think they can better protect the rights and freedoms of Canadians by opposing the proposal, it takes the Liberal government considerable courage—which is nothing new—to go ahead and act, Mr. Speaker. The great pages in Canadian history were written by Liberal governments, led by men of duty and great generosity. Might it be that because of the inability of the official opposition to understand the Canadian fact, to answer the aspirations of the Canadian people and to promote the policies needed for its fulfilment, the Progressive Conservative Party has generally been confined to that role, that of the opposition?

If we all wish our children to enjoy a better future, a just world where everyone will have the opportunity to develop freely and move about without restrictions, a productive and nourishing earth, and if we all wish the heritage which was entrusted to us and which we shall have to leave to our heirs to bear fruit, do we have the right to let certain local special interests prevail over our national interests? Mr. Speaker, I believe that we have reached the point of no return, and I urge sincerely and fraternally all of my colleagues, on both sides of the House, to support this essential proposal.

In closing, I would like to recall the words of the late Right Hon. Jules Léger, who stated the following in his installation speech on January 14, 1974, and I quote:

> What can we wish Canadians in 1980? Clean landscapes with clear waters, welcoming and laborious cities, a fraternal environment where man will have found his true place: the first place, at the centre of creation, within a united and prosperous country, in a world of justice and peace.

Like him, Mr. Speaker, I would go on to say that if, in the years to come, I can be associated with such an undertaking, even in a modest capacity, I will know that my mission will not have been in vain. Like others, I will have done my best to work hard and steadily as a Canadian. And always, while accomplishing this mission, I will have had in mind the question asked by Paul the apostle: "Who gave you superiority over others? What distinguishes you from the others? If you have received everything freely, why boast about it as though you had acquired it through your own efforts?"

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, first I want to compliment the hon. member for Rimouski-Témiscouata (Mrs. Côté) who has just finished speaking. It is the first time I have heard her speak. I know how seldom it is that Liberal backbenchers have an opportunity to speak in this House. I listened to the hon. member very carefully and I compliment her on the sincerity of her remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nickerson: It gives me pleasure at long last to say a few words on the subject of the Canadian Constitution, the Constitution of our beloved country. So far, I think we can all agree on that. Unlike some of my colleagues on the opposite side, I am not particularly dismayed that after a mere 114 years we have not yet found the perfect Constitution. The search for a perfect Constitution is something like a search for the Holy Grail. To the contrary, I am rather proud that our Constitution as written by the Fathers of Confederation and as changed from time to time when found necessary, has served us remarkably well over the years on account of its flexibility, its underlying principles of natural justice and free parliamentary democracy.

● (1630)

Man is a social and political animal who has organized himself into states and nations for thousands of years. He has yet to develop in any country of the world the perfect constitution. As an illustration of this, I would like to read a few quotations from Aristotle who studied this problem several thousand years ago and wrote in some depth on this matter in about 350 B.C. Some of his views are as up to date today as when they were first written. Aristotle, of course, was a constitutional thinker who, in the opinion of many authorities, surpassed in intelligence even the right hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nickerson: Practically everybody would agree that he was superior in his concept of political honesty. The first quotation I have is a definition of "constitution", which Aristotle held to be:

> —the arrangement which states adopt for the distribution of offices of power and for the determination of sovereignty and of the end which the whole social complex, in each case, aims at realizing.

If we examine the constitutional proposal before us in the light of these three attributes, the changes which the Prime Minister would force upon Canadians become quite evident. I am not talking about the matter of patriation. Everybody wants that and it is quite simple to accomplish. The easiest way would have been, when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) moved a motion not too long ago in this House that it be done immediately, for the Prime Minister to have agreed and voted in favour of it. I am not talking about that. What I am talking about are the wholesale changes which the Prime Minister would have the British parliament make for Canadians.

First, with respect to the goal of the social complex, heretofore in Canada that goal has usually been the maximizing of individual liberty. However, under the proposals before us it would become the subordination of the citizen to the state. To put the proposed charter into being would require a whole host of strict rules and regulations enforced by the state upon the citizenry.

Second, with regard to the distribution of sovereignty, the distribution which we have in the present federal system could, and I think would, be markedly changed. The concept that we have in Canada at the present time is that sovereignty is distributed among and vested in each Canadian citizen. Sovereignty is exercised by citizens both at the provincial level, those parts of the country fortunate enough to be organized into provinces, and at the federal level. Each one of us by so distributing his sharing enables the federal system to work reasonably well in a way that best serves our own individual interests.

However, I fear a change to a system where sovereignty becomes vested not in the citizenry but in the state, and where the citizens and the provinces become emaciated and exist solely to support the federal government. That is the case in many socialist republics around the world. If you examine the constitutional practice of states in eastern Europe, you see that they fit into that mould or category.

The same applies very much to rights and freedoms. The concept which appears in the resolution is surely that the state is the fount of all rights and freedoms. This is contrary and inimical to Canadian past ideas, ones that I hold particularly dear; ideas that it is the individual who is inately the possessor of freedoms and it is the state which is to be feared at all times as the incipient transgressor of our basic human rights and freedoms. I will get back to the question of rights and freedoms a little later.

Let me now examine the third attribute, the distribution of offices of power. With the use of the referendum, a similar constitutional device, I fear a change in the way in which power and authority is to be exercised in this country. This fear of what might happen is apparent to the provinces which could stand to lose much of their autonomy and become merely administrative units within the federal bureaucracy. Most of them, if not all, are prepared to go to extreme lengths to stop this Trudeau constitutional steamroller.

We can see how the provinces are reacting to this. They are using the legal avenues open to them. It is not improbable that we will see—I would hate to see it, but it seems the provinces will be forced into it—the provinces having to make a direct representation to the British authorities. It is terrible that the federal government should force them into that predicament.

Apart from the loss of autonomy of the provinces, I fear a loss of independence for institutions such as universities, the bench, the business community, the arts and cultural community. That has been going on for some time. They are becoming more and more under the influence and control of the central government. If we are not careful, we could end up with one large, hierarchical distribution of power and authority instead of what we have at present—a large number of interlocking and autonomous organizations.

My second quote from Aristotle is as follows:

> What is needed is a system of government which the people will accept and feel able to operate starting with what they have already.

Here again, the eminent thinker has pointed to a major difficulty with the changes in the proposal before us. It is unacceptable to the people of Canada and, therefore, divisive. The Constitution should be an instrument of unity for the people of the nation, but those opposite have turned it into an instrument of disunity and divisiveness. Former Senator Forsey, who is not quite as old as Aristotle, never tires of saying that the most important thing about a constitution is that it should be ancient. I agree with him on that score. A constitution should be comfortable and reassuring. It should not be the subject to change by the whim of a powerful ruler. It should be fixed, and constitutional changes should only be made after very careful consideration.

● (1640)

Changes in the useful arts and technology can and should be made quickly. If we find a better way of making an engine for an automobile that gets twice the gas mileage, then we should adopt that way quickly. There is no doubt about that. But when one is thinking about a country's constitution, even if a change appears to be desirable on the face of it, there should be some reluctance in accepting it. Because we must not get into the habit of easy change and habitual tampering with the fundamental laws of the country.

In my opinion, changes of constitutions are to be feared like the devil and avoided like the plague, for this very reason: that anyone who changes the Constitution once has demonstrated that he has the power to change it again in the future; and even if you do agree with the first change, you can never be sure about the second.

I promised that I would return to the question of rights and freedoms. It would be my preference that only a general reference to the various humane and fundamental principles on which our Constitution should be based should be written as a preamble to the Constitution. The Constitution should confine itself largely to outlining the mechanism by which the state is to operate.

By trying to commit an exhaustive list of rights and freedoms to paper, we run the risk of two dangers, both of which are so evident in the proposed resolution before the House at the present time. First, we have omissions made either deliberately or inadvertently. As Canadians, under our existing and largely unwritten Constitution we enjoy all the basic rights and freedoms which free people should have. In codifying these, even if some catch-all phrase is inserted, some are bound to be excluded; and in future, the courts of the country, which will, under this Liberal proposal, become the ultimate arbiters of our rights and freedoms, will surely hold that it is the letter of the law that counts, and any rights not properly delineated in the written form in all probability never existed in the first place.

I think it might take some time for that frame of mind to come upon the courts; but there is always a danger that it might. As an example of a deliberate exclusion in the proposal, we can cite property rights. A number of members have already spoken on the property rights issue. I think it is so important that it bears repeating. We are talking about the right to hold and freely enjoy our own property, and not to be deprived thereof except through due process of law. Of course, our socialist friends opposite and to my left do not believe in this.

An hon. Member: Balderdash.

Mr. Nickerson: It is not balderdash. I can give many examples where members opposite have said that very thing.

An hon. Member: Ask Bill Davis how he stands.

Mr. Nickerson: In their thinking—and they have said this many times—this particular basic human right can be sacrificed in the interest of the supremacy of the state or some other socialist virtue. The right to hold property, to enjoy property, is being deliberately left out of this proposal both by the NDP members in this House and by the Liberal members.

Let us look at something that might have been left out inadvertently. As a case in point, I would like to cite an erosion of a freedom that is continually occurring under the present Prime Minister and has been going on for some time. That is the right to make one's living by engaging in the type of economic activity that one wishes. As an example of this, I—or any member in this House, for that matter—am forbidden by law to make a living as a fish merchant in the Northwest Territories. I am forbidden to buy fish from the fishermen and sell them to retailers or wholesalers, and that is because that particular field of economic activity has been exclusively reserved as a Crown monopoly. The government has taken that right away from us and given it to the Crown as a Crown monopoly.

Similarly, if Petro-Canada were to become the exclusive importer and exporter of petroleum—and that is a course of action advocated by the NDP which has been talked about in the House on many occasions—my right to make a living as an international oil trader would be taken away from me. At this point I do not particularly want to engage in that activity. I am quite happy as a Member of Parliament and expect to be so for many years to come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nickerson: However, should I wish to become an oil trader, my right to do so will be taken away from me if the proposals regarding Petro-Canada are put into effect. My rights would be totally negated in that area.

A second danger is that rights impinge one on another; for example, one's right to free speech, and one's right not to be slandered, an example that is quite frequently given. Limits also have to be attached to all rights; for another example that I give frequently is the right to worship God in any way that you wish. That would seem to be a very basic right and one that should not be touched; but there are obvious limits to that particular right. Obviously, you cannot let people engage in human sacrifice, even if you have a willing victim; we must draw a line somewhere.

Because of the fact that rights impinge one on another and must be limited in some way, the codification, in trying to delineate and define each supposed right and to accommodate all the various views and interpretations put forward, becomes so wordy and complicated that nobody really understands what is said. One ends up with a constitution—if you try to put everything in—about 300 pages thick. A constitution should really be something simple, something that everybody can understand.

For these reasons, rights in the Constitution should only be there in the form of general principles, and definitions of rights and freedoms should be dealt with by formal parliamentary legislation. The proposal that we have before us makes all these errors. In my opinion it goes so far as to be more concerned about the enshrinement of administrative procedures than about the preservation of a Canadian free society.

● (1650)

In talking about enshrining administrative procedures, I would like to give the example of the reference in the proposed Constitution to equalization payments. In 1981 equalization payments are a good idea. We all support equalization payments, but I honestly do not know whether I would want to put that principle into our Constitution. It is an administrative matter which is applicable at this point in time, but do we really want it there for 200 years to come? I do not think so.

I would like now to say a few words about my own part of Canada, the Northwest Territories. I made a brief indirect reference to the territories a few minutes ago when I referred to the people who were fortunate enough to live in provinces, but now I would like to discuss the territories in a little more detail.

Sometimes I sit in this House of Commons with a rather wistful sadness as my friends from Atlantic Canada debate whether the proposed Constitution of the Right Hon. Prime Minister would relegate them to being second-class citizens in their own country when they consider such things as a veto to be given to Ontario and a veto to be given to the province of Quebec in perpetuity. My friends from the prairies consider their fate to be that of third-class citizens of this country. I know full well what will happen to the 75,000 or so souls who make their homes in the two northern territories of this country. I know what will happen to them as a result of the proposals we have before us now. What is contemplated in the draft before us is an entrenchment and an enshrinement forever of the subservient, inferior and less than provincial status of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory. We do not even get a mention in the amending formula. We are to be virtual non-citizens. We are not to be second-class citizens or third-class citizens of this country but virtual non-citizens.

Mr. Mayer: Non-existent citizens.

Mr. Nickerson: Under the proposal before us we will never achieve provincial status. Unlike every other province in Canada, we will never control our own resources. Under these proposals we in the northern territories will never control our own lives.

My good friend, the hon. senator from the Northwest Territories, knows this, and as a citizen of what I consider to be an important and integral part of Canada I was proud and considered myself well represented when Senator Adams spoke out and voted against his own Liberal government when this matter was first discussed in the other House. This shows us that at least one or two Liberals are not like sheep ready to be led to the slaughter by the inconsiderate and incompetent shepherd so full of his own importance that he will tolerate nothing less than blind and servile obedience.

The colonialist mentality of the Prime Minister, which is displayed in his efforts to have the Canadian Constitution not decided in Canada but, rather, to have his version forced upon us by an overseas government, is doubly displayed in his attitude toward the north.

In the United States the attitude has always been that territories are encouraged to become states. This dates back to the ordinance of the congress of confederation of 1787. In the United States that was the blueprint or set of directions by which new acquired territories were to achieve self-government by way of statehood as quickly as possible.

In Canada the exact opposite has been the case. The federal government continues to look upon the territories in the same way as the old Imperial government looked upon the colonies of Canada 150 to 200 years ago.

Let us contrast the ordinance in existence in the United States since the latter part of the eighteenth century, for instance, with an act of this Parliament in 1870—some 100 years later—the act dealing with the temporary government of Rupertsland. That put the federal Government of Canada in a position, vis-à-vis Rupertsland—or the Northwest Territories—exactly the same as that which had previously existed between the British Imperial government and the colonies which are now united to form Canada. As far as the territories are concerned, since 1870 there has not been much of an improvement.

Let us look at the way in which those parts of the territories which are now the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan had to fight every inch of the way to achieve responsible government and then, some eight years later, achieve provincial status. They had to fight every inch of the way against an inconsiderate federal authority, which still exists to this day.

In my opinion, no Canadian Constitution is complete until it lays out the following with respect to the territories. First of all, we need a clear declaration that it is the intent that all parts of Canada should become, as soon as practicable, provinces in their own right. We also need an indication of the conditions under which that status will be achieved. We want to know what are the rules of the game. We know that British Columbia became a province with a population of 36,000 people. Is that one of the conditions? We know that when Manitoba became a province, it had a population of 12,000 people. What are the financial requirements? What are the population requirements? Are there any other requirements which we have to meet? Then we want laid down in the Canadian Constitution the moves which have to be made so that we can enjoy provincial status in the same way as more than 99.9 per cent of Canadians.

Second, within any new Constitution there should be a solemn declaration of trust respecting the lands and resources of provinces yet to be. Just a few days ago Bill C-48 was dealt with at second reading and referred to a committee. In that bill we see that the federal government wants the lands and resources of the north in perpetuity. Under this government's constitutional vision and scheme of things, those lands and resources will never go to the people of the territories as they do in any other part of this country. In my opinion, that view is wrong and it is colonialist. In the estimation of the people of the north the Trudeau Constitution fails in that it looks backward to a colonial past rather than forward to a day on which I and my fellow citizens of the north can enjoy the same rights and privileges as those taken for granted by southern Canadians.

Another issue on the Constitution as it affects the north is language. On behalf of those of my constituents, and there are many, who speak languages which were spoken on this continent thousands and thousands of years before ever a word of French or English was heard, I want to register the strongest objection. On behalf of those people who use every day language, such as Chippewan, Slavey, Loucheux, Dog Rib or Inuktitut, I want to register the strongest objection to a Constitution which relegates their language—which is just as Canadian, if not more so, than French or English—to an unofficial status. Language matters, except, for instance, those which deal with the operation of the federal Parliament, must be left to the provinces and the territories concerned. A Constitution which makes French an official language in the legislative assembly of the Northwest Territories yet denies the same status to Inuktitut is clearly perverse and unacceptable.

• (1700)

Let me say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that I will vote against a socialist, centrally-controlled and bureaucratically-regulated country in which the language preferences of the regions are to be dictated by the federal level. I will vote against a non-Canadian government doing the Prime Minister's constitutional dirty work for him. Let us get rid of what has been described as a grab-bag of nonsense attached to the Constitution. Let us bring back our Constitution as is to this country immediately, and let us have any amendments to the Canadian Constitution made in Canada, by Canadians, with the general consent of Canadians.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Before I recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper), perhaps I could announce the subject matter of the questions to be debated this evening on the adjournment motion.

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche)—North-South relations—Statement by non-aligned nations—Development of Canadian position; the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean)—External Affairs—Canadian policy with respect to El Salvador.

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, I must say that it is a pleasure to follow "no change Nickerson" in this debate. More seriously, I should like to say that this is an historic debate and it is a real honour and privilege for me to participate in it. It is particularly so because these are interesting times. There are no clear and simple answers to the problems we face, and that was demonstrated by the various positions taken by public officials in this country in dealing with the constitutional question. Indeed, it is interesting to be living in these times.

I must say I am proud of the approach which my party has taken to the challenges facing us, an approach which has been both constructive and democratic. When I say it has been democratic, I mean that we respect the views of the minority. In particular, we respect the views of our members from Saskatchewan who are voting against this package. However, we do not confuse respect for the views of the minority with the democratic rights of the majority, and it is the majority of our caucus who are setting this direction and whose case I am putting forward today.

Let me say, furthermore, that our approach is constructive in the sense that we are seeking to improve the patriation package before us. We are seeking to build rather than simply to tear down. There are real temptations to be simply negative and to tear down the package which has been put before the House, particularly because of the way the Liberal government has handled the constitutional process. Their handling of this package has been both abominable and dismal. Shortly after the Quebec referendum, there was a very positive climate in this country for constitutional change, but it did not take long for the Liberal government to dissipate that public good will for constitutional change by its mismanagement of the process.

The first error of the Liberal government was the leaked document on constitutional strategy—a cynical document which was followed very quickly by the intemperate reactions of provincial governments. As a result, there was very little real possibility or hope for constructive action to be taken by the constitutional conference which followed the Quebec referendum. I must point out quite honestly that at least one province, if not more, did not react in the intemperate way in which some others did. I am thinking now of Saskatchewan, which continued to negotiate and to win positive and constructive changes in the constitutional package.

The next step of the Liberals was to abuse the closure rule. I think they would have gained public support for the necessary constitutional changes had they not invoked closure but allowed further debate in the first instance on the constitutional package. Also, the Liberals misjudged public opinion when they tried to give the committee inadequate time to debate the Constitution and had to be dragged kicking and screaming to make a change which would allow for adequate examination of the document before the committee, specifically to extend the time allowed—which was won, at least in part, through the efforts of this party—from December 9 to February 6. I must say that this was a significant and important change in the way in which the constitutional package was handled.

However, the Liberals again misjudged the situation when they excluded television from the committee on the Constitution. However, they were finally badgered into allowing television into the committee, thus allowing the public to observe the constitutional debate there. Now we on this side of the House are demanding a full and fair debate on the Constitution. The government must not take that demand lightly, for it is only a full and fair debate in the House that will give the final version of the Constitution real legitimacy in this country. I challenge the government to seek to win public support for this resolution and to refrain from any further funny business which may erode public support for this package.

In spite of the bungling and mishandling of this matter by the Liberals, there are many good things about the package. For example, there has been an opportunity for citizen input into the resolution and for provinces to continue to negotiate this matter. Certainly the negotiating efforts of Saskatchewan have led to improvements in this package. I believe it is still possible for there to be further improvements in this package by way of amendments in this House if the Tories, for example, would allow members of other parties to put forward amendments, and I hope the government will continue to be open to suggestions leading to improvements in the package to make this a good package for all of Canada.

The reason we have offered support for this package from the start is that it contains some very important principles, such as patriation, an amending formula, the bill of rights, and a promise of a resource amendment. These are good principles. Unfortunately, when the package was put together originally it was seriously flawed. A great deal of work was done by the citizens of this country and by members of the House to improve the package and bring it up to par.

Particularly, I am thinking of the fact that there were many loopholes in the original charter of rights which had to be closed. The first article of that charter of rights would have made the entire charter of rights meaningless. That loophole had to be closed and was finally closed. Also there were loopholes in the legal rights section which had to be closed and were closed. The non-discrimination section of the charter of rights was greatly strengthened by a change in wording which, after amendment, allowed for the fact that laws themselves should not discriminate against groups. Not only was it provided in the administration of the law that there should be no discrimination, but also that laws themselves should not discriminate. I believe that area was particularly important to the women of this country. Certainly it was something for which they fought very hard. Also the original package made no reference to the handicapped. Clearly the addition of the handicapped was significant and important and vastly improved the package.

One area about which I feel most strongly in this package was the reference to Indian, Inuit, and Métis rights; in other words, aboriginal and treaty rights. From the beginning it seemed to me that there was a particularly strong basis for adding a positive entrenchment of aboriginal and treaty rights in this particular package. I say that because from the beginning the package made reference to educational rights, the language rights of the English and French minorities. In itself it showed a respect for the cultural duality and plurality of the country. Also it showed our respect for both historical and cultural differences. Because of those matters, I felt from the beginning that there were very strong arguments for the entrenchment of aboriginal rights in this package. The entrenchment of aboriginal rights in essence is the affirmation of our respect for the differences among ourselves, rather than a denial of or lack of respect for them.

Even though an amendment was moved and accepted which positively affirmed aboriginal rights, there are still some people who are questioning it on the basis that it does not include all of what should be included in a constitution with respect to such rights. In no way is it to be seen as a final resolution of the aboriginal rights question. It is an affirmation of principle which can be useful to aboriginal people in terms of further negotiations to get down to the concrete details of aboriginal rights. It is a starting point by which a government can never again say that there was no such thing as aboriginal rights in this country, as was said in 1969 by the Trudeau government. That tactic can never be used again.

I have read court cases which affect aboriginal rights, and the clear pattern has been to knock down those rights, whether they be hunting rights or whatever. Now the court has the option to look at the Constitution and say, "The Constitution affirms aboriginal rights; perhaps I should give weight to that in the decision before me rather than, as has been done in the past, striking down aboriginal rights."

This amendment is particularly historic because for the first time in Canadian history the representatives and leaders of native people, Indian, Inuit and Métis, have been directly involved in negotiations affecting themselves. If there is to be any resolution of the problems of our native people, it is only through such direct involvement and participation that a resolution will come. I feel strongly that this addition to the constitutional package is significant, important and historic.

There are other ways in which this package has been strengthened, particularly due to the efforts of our caucus and of people in the community. I am thinking now of the equalization formula. When it was originally enunciated in the first package, it made no reference to direct payments to the provinces. Now the constitution package makes that reference so that the provinces across the nation will be assured that they have the capacity to deliver services of a relatively equal nature. It will be a very strong negotiating tool for provincial governments in their dealings with the federal government. This will be particularly so for provinces such as my own, Manitoba, and for Newfoundland and the maritimes which depend heavily upon the federal government for adequate revenues to provide sufficient services to their citizens.

Even though when the package first came out it was seriously flawed, it is now a good package deserving of support. There are still people in the community who are calling for the package to be strengthened further. I would welcome a further strengthening of the package, but it is no excuse or reason not to support the package as it is. We must continue to work to improve it, but we must not use the aspirations of people for futher improvements as a way to try to cut out altogether the support for the package.

To those who are in principle against the entrenchment of a charter of rights, and to those who are against an entrenchment of a charter of rights without provincial approval, I would simply say that if the provincial legislatures, which have been described as supreme, had moved with regard to human rights, had introduced what is called primacy legislation, had done all of what needs to be done in terms of affirmative action, had protected minorities, had changed the social and economic conditions under which minorities in this country live, had protected in legislative form the legal rights of the minorities and all other matters which are dealt with in the constitution package, then there would be no need for action now. It is only because legislatures have not dealt sufficiently or adequately with these matters that we now have need for the charter of rights which is before us today.

Of course, the Constitution package contains more than the charter of rights; of course we have need of more. For example, it contains an amending formula, and there have been significant changes to that amending formula. The use of referenda, which was a pretty free-wheeling power when the package was first presented, has been limited significantly. Now a referendum can only be used as a deadlock-breaking mechanism, when the provinces and the federal government are in deadlock. It can only be used under those circumstances after the governments have gone through the process of federal and provincial negotiation. To those who somehow say that referenda are totally illegitimate and should never be used, I must say that I favour consulting the people, and it will be the Canadian people who will decide any difference between federal and provincial governments with regard to constitutional questions. I feel that is a thoroughly and completely democratic approach, one which in these circumstances will be useful. It is one that is limited and has rules by which one can move to the referendum process.

Some people are against referenda. They say that the federal government could use a trick question to fool the citizens of this country and bring in a constitutional change which would destroy the federal nature of this country. Rene Lévesque tried that and it did not work. He put what could be called a "soft" question to the people of that province. The people of that province saw the meaning of the question and made the decision for themselves. So while politicians will be politicians, citizens will be citizens and they will make the final decisions in a democratic nation.

I feel we must remind ourselves as well that this referendum proposal does have regional balance. While it is only a deadlock-breaking mechanism, it also requires a majority in the regions of the country. There is no way that Ontario would be able to impose a constitutional change on the west. The west has a veto.

There is also another very positive change with regard to the referendum proposal, and that is the creation of a referendum rules commission. This commission was created after a submission by the Premier of Saskatchewan. It was his very constructive contribution to the constitutional committee hearings that brought about this change. While the change does not go as far as he would personally have liked it to go and it is not absolute, it is certainly a very influential and important change. It will be very difficult for a Parliament or for a government to fiddle with the rules as proposed by the referendum commission.

Our positive approach, our constructive approach to the constitutional package, has paid off. It has resulted in a much better package than was originally presented to this Parliament. The positive approach taken by the citizens of this country has paid off. The positive efforts of some of the provinces have paid off, and we have a much better package today than was originally presented to us.

I would like to deal with some further arguments which are used to undermine the package. These are attacks on the package. For example, it is said that the amending formula will create unequal provinces. Let us face the facts, Mr. Speaker. The fact is that if all provinces were to be treated the same, or absolutely equal, then what we are asking for is an amending formula which demands unanimity. That approach is clearly unworkable and clearly unrealistic. It is important to keep the facts in mind with regard to this debate. The fact is that what the amending formula does is to create regions. Any province which acquires 25 per cent or more of the population in the future will thereby become a region with a veto. The west is a region and it has a veto. Thus, the amending formula is workable and fair. It is not perfect, but no one is offering an alternative which is perfect.

We are asked by others to support the Vancouver formula. The Vancouver formula contains no veto for Quebec. In our historical and present situation this would obviously be inadequate and unacceptable. It has no veto for the west. Given the strong feelings in the west today, that would be inadequate. The Vancouver formula also allows for provinces to opt out of rights and to opt out of redistribution of powers. It requires disguised unanimity. The opting out formula is really a disguise for a demand for unanimity, which is clearly and fundamentally unworkable. The formula which is offered by the Conservative Party is clearly a mirage. It is not a real amending formula; it is a "maybe" formula. We must be responsible and realistic, Mr. Speaker. This country needs an amending formula and we have one before us. It has been approved in public debate and we will support it.

Those attempting to tear this package apart have also taken a new tack of late. They have talked about the Senate. They say that this constitutional package is giving the Senate a veto with respect to all constitutional change. I would have wished and hoped in the first instance that the government would have been a little more courageous in maintaining the suspensive veto with regard to the Senate. In other words, the Senate could only hold up matters for a limited period of time. I continue to challenge the government today to reintroduce that suspensive veto, if it can only get up the courage to do so. Simply because the government has no courage is no reason for us to throw the baby out with the bath water. What happens in this constitutional package with regard to the Senate is that there is no mention made of it. What we have with regard to the Senate is the maintenance of the status quo. Since the beginning of history in this country the Senate has had a veto over all constitutional and legislative changes. That technical and legal veto clearly continues, but it does not deprive us of the right to continue to fight for the abolition or real reform of the Senate.

It is rather ironic that the critics of this package at this moment call for us to change the Senate, since it is one of the areas which does affect the provinces. The battle cry has been that federalism is being destroyed by changing things in the Constitution which have an impact on the provinces. If we were to come forward with a major reform of the Senate, then these critics would be up in arms. They would be asking why this was being done without unanimous provincial support.

The most important thing to say about the Senate is that I do not believe that any realistic or responsible citizen could believe that, while the Senate maintains a legal and technical veto, if the legislatures and Parliament of this country were to put forward a full and adequate reform of the Senate, whether that be abolition or reform, they could stop that. The reason the Senate does not exercise its legal veto today, before the passage of this resolution, is because it is essentially an illegitimate body, since it is not elected. The way we gain the legitimate right to make decisions with regard to public matters in this country is by being an elected body. There is no doubt in my mind but that our capacity to reform the Senate remains, given a strong and dedicated government. The argument stating that we should not support this package because there is no Senate reform contained in it is a bogus one. Our capacity to reform the Senate remains. When the government gets up its courage and when the provinces are ready to move, then we will reform the Senate.

One of the further arguments used against this package and against support of it is that somehow we are destroying federalism. I must say that I feel that is an overblown, exaggerated and essentially misleading argument. In this constitutional package we are not dealing with the redistribution of powers among provinces and the federal government. Canada remains a federation. After this package is passed by this House and the parliament in England, there will still be provincial powers and federal government powers. In fact, we are moving to strengthen federalism by providing an amending formula which will allow both the provinces and the federal government to amend the Constitution in the future.

The rights charter obviously affects the powers of the provincial and federal governments by transferring power from legislatures to citizens, not by transferring power from provincial governments to the federal government. Further, it has been recognized that the rights contained in the charter fall within federal jurisdiction. Past Supreme Court decisions recognized that. In essence, we are not doing anything to affect the balance of federal and provincial relationships in this country; what we are doing is providing rights for citizens and limiting the capacity of legislatures and governments to act in an arbitrary fashion.

Another tack that has been taken in an attempt to destroy this package is the contention that we need a constitution made in Canada. Can any citizen doubt that this constitutional package is being made in Canada? Given the long history of federal and provincial conferences on the Constitution, given our experience and involvement in the Quebec referendum, given the debate in Parliament last fall, given the length and breadth of the hearings of the joint parliamentary committee on the Constitution, given the opportunity there has been, and which remains, for the provinces to negotiate changes, surely no citizen who has listened to or read the media, which has been dominated by this question in the last few months, can doubt that this Constitution is made in Canada by Canadians and for Canadians.

I want to deal with another area of criticism of this package, the reference to property rights. I find it ironic that members of the Conservative party say that this package should not be supported because it lacks reference to property rights. It was the provinces that opposed the inclusion of property rights. Surely those who believe that we should not do anything which affects the power of the provinces do not want us to move on property rights which are clearly within provincial jurisdiction. As well, surely we do not want to limit the capacity of legislatures to act in the public interest where necessary. I think of items such as auto insurance in Manitoba. We would not want to leave to chance the opportunity of legislatures and governments to act in the public interest in such areas. Why, then, would we want to leave to chance the opportunity of governments to act with regard to land ownership? Think, for example, of Prince Edward Island. We want that province to be able to protect its land for use by Canadians. We do not want to run the risk that corporations could use our courts to limit the capacity of our legislatures to move in these areas at times when it is absolutely necessary. I am confident that the package is good and that the absence of property rights is entirely justified in the present circumstances.

There is another argument that we must face and that is on the legal question. We are told that we should not move on constitutional change until the legal question is cleared up. I must say, first of all, that when a matter goes to court it is surely a question of public policy whether we go to court by reference or whether we go to court when there is a concrete law for the court to examine. That is a matter of public policy. I, for one, would prefer that the court have a concrete statute before it rather than a hypothetical question. I would take the legal question more seriously if those provinces who challenge the matter in the courts would respect the decision of the courts. After the decision of the court in Manitoba which favoured action by this Parliament for constitutional change, however, the provinces simply dismissed decisions of the court. Clearly they are not so much interested in law as they are in obstruction. If they were interested in law, I am sure they would be willing, if the court were to hold that this Parliament is right in taking action on constitutional matters, to reconsider their position. That did not happen after the latest court decision which held that this Parliament was correct in what it was doing. They did not reconsider their decision.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Ask Saskatchewan. It is going to the Supreme Court.

Mr. Keeper: I feel that the arguments being used against constitutional change by Parliament at this time are essentially bogus arguments. I feel it is very important that people have the opportunity to hear the facts so that they can make a balanced decision with regard to this constitutional package.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I must say that it is time to bring our Constitution home. Surely it is time to demonstrate that we are a mature, sovereign nation capable of making our own decisions on constitutional matters.

We need a charter of rights in order to protect people from arbitrary decisions made by government and legislatures. We need a charter of rights which will embody the rights of every citizen in this country and symbolize the citizenship of every citizen from coast to coast.

We need a reference in the constitutional package to multiculturalism, to language rights and to native rights in order to demonstrate our respect for the cultural and historical differences which are the strength of this nation. These need to be clearly and positively defined in a constitutional document.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the events of the past several months and years demonstrate the need for an amending formula on constitutional matters. We need a decision-making framework within which the provinces and the federal government can come to decisions on constitutional matters and not simply bicker and throw brickbats at each other in front of the television cameras.

If we support these principles, if we support patriation, if we support human rights, if we support the necessity for a decision-making framework for constitutional matters in this country so that we can build our own Canada and our own Constitution, then I feel it is time that we take action to support this package rather than attempt to tear it down and delay action unnecessarily and indefinitely.

● (1740)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member who has just concluded his remarks entertain a question with respect to the role of the courts in this constitutional debate?

Mr. Keeper: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The hon. member indicated that a reference of a matter by the provinces to the courts or a reference by this government to the Supreme Court of Canada was somehow an abuse of the judicial process and that the provinces were not going to abide by the decision of the court. Is the hon. member accusing the provinces of perhaps flaunting a decision of the court? Does the hon. member agree or disagree with the intention of the New Democratic Party government in the province of Saskatchewan to refer the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada to find out whether the package is ultra vires? Does he think the judiciary has no role to play in this debate?

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that a change in the Constitution is essentially a policy question and a political question. Therefore, it is better dealt with by legislatures and Parliament. I was saying that there is a clear policy choice before government as to whether they wish to go to a court with a legal question by way of reference or regarding a concrete piece of legislation with which the court can deal. While I want this Parliament to deal with the policy question, I think it would be preferable in that instance to have a piece of legislation before the court rather than a hypothetical statement by way of reference.

With regard to my comments concerning the provinces, which were to the effect that if those provinces which went to the Manitoba court of appeal had taken into account the weight of that decision in favour of action by this Parliament and had indicated that they would seriously reconsider their position because of that pronouncement by the court, I would have had much more confidence in their stated reason for going further in the courts.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, we are having some legal lessons.

I agree with the many speakers before me who have said that it is a privilege and a responsibility to have an opportunity to participate in this debate. This is an important debate in which to take part and I believe that everyone here has an obligation to speak on behalf of their constituents.

My constituency of Portage-Marquette is in Manitoba. I appreciate having the chance to say a few words about the constitutional resolution we are debating because it would be difficult for me to return to Portage-Marquette and explain to my constituents why I was not given an opportunity to participate. In this connection, I take the government at its word and trust it will see that everyone who wants to participate in this debate has that opportunity. This way members can raise their concerns as well as concerns raised as a result of discussions with their constituents. In my opinion, everyone should be able to participate in this debate because everyone has a particular point of view, not only individual members but also the many thousands of constituents we represent. Therefore, it is incumbent upon all of us who are here on behalf of our constituents to take this opportunity to speak on this important topic.

I want to pay tribute to the constitutional committee members who worked very hard from November until the first part of February. Although many people have paid tribute to this committee before and will again, I think it is worthwhile to comment on the work they did. That kind of committee work can be constructive to many areas of concern to this House. The constitutional committee members certainly deserve the credit given to them.

We need to have faith in ourselves as we proceed. I am sorry the present government, judging by the way it is proceeding, is not demonstrating any faith for the concerns of Canadians from one end of the country to the other over what the constitutional resolution contains. We have eight provincial governments involved in legal actions against what the government is doing. Many public opinion polls point out that only a minority favour the process by which the government is attempting to carry out its constitutional renewal. We have numerous newspaper advertisements attacking the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on a personal basis and soliciting support against what he and the government are doing.

In a country that is supposedly run on the basis of democracy in which everyone should be listened to, one man and one vote, what is happening is unprecedented. I fail to understand why the government is in such a hurry. It is ludicrous that we operate within an artificially imposed time-frame when we are dealing with such an important matter as the Constitution, which underlies everything we do in this country. I fail to see why we cannot take more time to ensure that we do everything right.

The hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper) who spoke before me made some reference to the Vancouver formula. He said that the Vancouver formula does not give a veto to Quebec. I disagree with him totally. An opting-out provision gives the province of Quebec a veto in terms of things about which it feels strongly. In fact, that is the basis of the multiculturalism policy we have in this country.

People talk about the checkerboard problems we would have with the bill of rights, that we would have different rights in different provinces. We have a multiculturalism department set up to see that people's different areas of concern are protected. The hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James said that the argument he had heard so far as to why we should not proceed was a bogus one. Perhaps he should have listened to the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) who spoke eloquently about the native people not being treated as people, that they were treated almost as non-citizens. I fail to see how the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James could have made the statement that it was a bogus argument, particularly in view of his own racial extraction. The hon. member for Western Arctic talked very eloquently on behalf of the native people he represents, people who are more native to this country than I, and yet the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James says the argument why we should not proceed is a bogus one. Nevertheless, the concerns expressed by the hon. member for Western Arctic on behalf of his constituents were clearly sincere and genuine ones. This is something the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James should consider carefully when he talks about bogus arguments; he should understand what he is saying when he makes reference to such things.

I come from an area which has sent two prime ministers to Ottawa, one from Portage and one from Marquette. The first prime minister of the country, Sir John A. Macdonald, very briefly represented Marquette constituency in this House. The distinguished prime minister, Sir Arthur Meighen, whose portrait hangs in the hall outside this chamber, represented Portage in this House. I shall refer to what these two distinguished gentlemen said in the constitutional debates and how apt their remarks are today. Incidentally, the debates took place in 1865 prior to the union of the country and have come to be known as the constitutional debates. Our first prime minister, Sir John A. Macdonald said this:

> But, on looking at the subject in the conference, and discussing the matter as we did, most unreservedly, and with a desire to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion, we found that such a system was impracticable.

The system to which he referred was that of a unitary state. There has been much talk about Macdonald and the fact that he would have preferred a unitary system of government. I believe that is what the constitutional resolution will be leading us to in this country, but our first prime minister realized that a unitary state would not work. That is what he is referring to in this quotation. He goes on:

● (1750)

> In the first place, it would not meet the assent of the people of Lower Canada, because they felt that in their peculiar position—being in a minority, with a different language, nationality and religion from the majority—in case of a junction with the other provinces, their institutions and their laws might be assailed, and their ancestral associations, on which they prided themselves, attacked and prejudiced; it was found that any proposition which involved the absorption of the individuality of Lower Canada—if I may use the expression—would not be received with favour by her people.

That is even more applicable today. Not only are we talking about those regions that originally made up Canada, but additional regions. We are talking about what is now the most important and viable region of Canada, the west. If it is true to say there were concerns over a unitary system of government and what it would do in 1865 when this constitutional debate took place, it is even more true today when we have another very important and vital and growing region of the country wanting to feel part of this country. That is something worth considering.

I wish to refer to part of what Sir Arthur Meighen said concerning the country. Here he was talking at a birthday party marking the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of D'Arcy McGee. He was referring to some of the problems the country had had prior to that time. In this speech, given in Ottawa on April 13, 1925, he said:

> The obstacles encountered have been greater than we had believed, but they have been as nothing when compared with the obstacles and dangers which by our union we surmounted.

That is the truth. There are and always have been many problems in Canada because of the great diversity of geography which makes up this country. The point Prime Minister Meighen was making at that time was that not to have tackled and solved those kinds of problems would have left us in worse peril than we would have been without solving them. He went on:

> —let us look back across the span of two generations and watch the bold, brave figures of the captains of that time; let us learn from their patience and emulate their courage and highly resolve to enrich by our devotion the noble heritage they have handed down.

I wonder whether in 50 years from now history students who study the debate going on in this process will be able to make the kind of remarks Sir Arthur Meighen made on the occasion of the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of D'Arcy McGee. There is certainly some area for concern and question as to whether that will be the case.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) is in the chamber. I wish to take issue with some of the remarks he made in the speech opening the debate on this important issue. The minister spoke very eloquently and with conviction. We all know he is a serious man. He said, as reported at page 7374 of Hansard:

> During this debate we will hear a great deal about process, and I will speak to that issue later, but I want to speak more about substance. Because long after the debate over process is finished and forgotten, Canadians will take pride in the results of the substance of our work.

I find that unfortunate because process is all important in what the government is doing. If people do not have faith in the process, the end results will be badly scarred. They will bear those scars for a long time because our Constitution will be with us for a long time.

This should be a very exciting time for our country. We should be planning for and looking ahead to the future. All of us have occasion to plan. We plan to go on a trip, to take a course to improve our education, to build a house or buy a car. Farmers plan their crops at the beginning of the year. It is a very exciting time because, when we do that, we look forward to the future.

Most Canadians would like this to be a happy time for our country. It is the most important planning we can be doing. We are laying the foundation for the way our country will be governed and the principles on which it will operate for a long time.

That is why it is unfortunate that the Minister of Justice dismisses this concern over process without a lot of thought being given to it. During this planning process or stage of constitutional renewal, unless we take into account the feelings of the people of this country and ensure that there is good will for what we are doing, the fruits we bear from this resolution will be bad ones. That would be very unfortunate.

A very good argument could be made that the reason we are renewing our Constitution is to create good will in the country so that we all can live together in more harmony than in the past. If in the process of renewal we create so much bad will that we destroy the very purpose for which we are doing it, then that is very sad. That is why I take issue with the Minister of Justice when he dismisses process and says it is really not important because the end result will be remembered a long time after the process. There is a lot of bitterness and a lot of doubt about what we are doing. This is evidenced by many people I talk to when I go home to my constituency. It is unfortunate that people are so distrustful of the way the government is proceeding.

Much has been said about the constitutional resolution. We spent many hours in a joint committee talking about the different articles. I would point out that we are not dealing with just a piece of paper. We should be thinking about what it is doing and will be doing to the whole country after it is adopted. The government should be very cognizant of this as it proceeds.

Our spokesman on the Constitution, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), receives literally hundreds of letters every day outlining the concerns which people from coast to coast have about the way the government is proceeding. It is interesting to note that they are sending their letters to the hon. member for Provencher. We have to be proud to be associated with him and give him credit for the way he conveys the image of total honesty to the Canadian public. That is something this chamber should recognize. Many Canadians feel comfortable with him and are sending their letters to him.

When the hon. member for Provencher spoke so eloquently on February 17, he pointed out that the whole proposition on which this resolution is based is false. I refer to the proposition that this country is not working, that it is somehow coming apart and not functioning the way it should and, therefore, we must go through this process of constitutional renewal.

Canadians have become concerned about the process. Many of them do not quite understand the technicalities and the fine points of what goes on in this chamber day in and day out. They do not understand the intricacies of the debate which goes on here as well as the points of order and questions of privilege. However, they sense that something is not right about the way the government is proceeding. It is even more significant when you realize that the majority of Canadians are in favour of their Constitution being patriated. They are in favour of a bill of rights and of having some kind of an amending formula to the Constitution when we get it in Canada, and yet they are not in favour of what the government is doing.

I would point out to the Minister of Justice that the area of concern they have is not only over the content so much as it is over the way the government is proceeding. Therefore, I would argue very strongly that process is very important; in fact, almost all-important in this debate. The government should consider this as they proceed.

There have been many polls taken, and we can quote polls that break down public opinion across the country in terms of different regions; the Atlantic region, the province of Quebec, the province of Ontario, and the western regions. Last Thursday, results were released from a poll taken by the Quebec Institute of Public Opinion during the week of February 12 to 18. The question asked of people in Quebec was: How do you think your Member of Parliament should vote on the constitutional resolution? The results were very interesting. Forty-four per cent of the people who were polled said that they thought their Member of Parliament should vote against the constitutional resolution; 37 per cent said they should vote for it; and about 20 per cent did not register an opinion.

That is a very significant poll, in the sense that we all know the present government has over half of its support in the province of Quebec, yet in Quebec, where they won overwhelming support in the last federal election, there were no issues with respect to the Constitution in the last campaign. That is a subject for another speech all in itself. I find it very interesting to note that 44 per cent of the people in the province of Quebec, in a public opinion poll taken two weeks ago, said their members should vote against the constitutional resolution. That is something that all members opposite should look at very closely and sincerely when it is time for them to decide whether they can support the constitutional resolution before us. As I said, many polls have been taken, but I think this one is very significant. We all know that polls are subject to much interpretation, but when you have a poll taken in the province of Quebec saying that Quebecers are not in agreement with the policy of the federal Liberal Party of Canada on the Constitution, that should tell you something about the manner in which the Liberal government is proceeding on the constitutional resolution.

One of the other areas of concern is what the government is doing in terms of setting a precedent. Much has been made of the way we govern ourselves and the fact that many of our institutions function on the basis of conventions derived over time. Probably one of the most democratic, if not the most democratic country in the world, is Great Britain, and it really does not have a constitution in the sense that we or the Americans do; yet it is considered one of the most democratic countries in the world. Its citizens enjoy as many rights as those of any country in the world because over time they have developed many of their rules based on precedent.

The government, if it proceeds the way the resolution is now drafted, will be setting a precedent of overriding provincial concerns. That is a very dangerous precedent to set, and should not be done lightly. Precedent can become all-powerful or all-governing in terms of our own institution. There is no reference in the British North America Act to either the party system of government we have or to cabinet. Yet we all know that without those two well accepted conventions, which are the result of precedents built up over a time, we would not have the type of government we have today.

I ask the government to consider what kind of a precedent they are setting when they proceed unilaterally to override concerns of the provinces. This is obviously very evident when we have eight provincial governments taking the federal government to court. The federal government ignores what the provinces have been saying. This sets a very dangerous precedent, one that will have very bad implications for the manner in which our country is governed in the future.

In the remaining time I have, I would like to speak of some of the concerns we have for western Canada. Many of us in western Canada do not understand why the Constitution has suddenly become such a matter of priority. I think most of us would say that although we do not think the BNA Act is 100 per cent perfect, it has served the area of the country that I come from extremely well. Manitoba came into confederation in 1870, as did British Columbia. This past year Alberta and Saskatchewan celebrated their 75th anniversary in confederation, having entered confederation in 1905.

Although we have had many concerns over the way we have been treated as parts of this country, I think we agree that the Constitution has not prevented us from doing a fair job. I find it unfortunate that for some reason we have decided on a very urgent and self-imposed time-frame in which to change the Constitution.

In the western part of the country, we are not so much concerned about the Constitution as we are about the way government institutions function, and how they take into account our concerns. I can cite many examples. One could talk about transportation for the rest of the evening; one could talk about tariff policies, and what they do to western Canada, not only in terms of the costs we incur in purchases, but in terms of establishing manufacturing industries. One could also talk about the way government committees, boards and tribunals operate.

A case in point is the International Joint Commission, the commission set up to look at problems which arise from time to time in relation to the large border we share with the United States. The International Joint Commission is made up of Americans and Canadians. Western Canada has a border with the U.S. approximately half the total length of that border. It stretches from the Manitoba-Ontario border right to the Pacific Ocean; yet there has never been a member from Western Canada appointed to the International Joint Commission. The Garrison project, in Northern Dakota, will affect Manitoba adversely, and we have problems in respect of west coast fisheries. However, western Canada has never had a member on the International Joint Commission.

The Canadian Transport Commission is a regulatory body that oversees many of the areas of responsibility of the Department of Transport. It is centralized here in Ottawa, and has had a branch in Winnipeg for a long time. The Winnipeg branch really has not been as much of a branch as it has been a sort of clearing house for information purposes. Approximately two years ago, a western section of the CTC was established in Saskatoon, yet it has not been given the necessary authority to deal with transportation problems which affect western Canada. Matters are so bad that this very important body has not yet been able to locate in proper office space, despite the fact there is a large amount of square footage of office space available in Saskatoon. It has not been given the authority or the responsibility to plan many of the expenditures the federal government makes as a result of railway transportation policies in this country.

I find that to be very unfortunate in that here we have an institution of the federal government which could be very responsive to concerns in western Canada because of its location, yet because of the attitude of the central government it is not given the necessary responsibility. The result is not only alienation, because of our unhappiness with not having the decision-making power located in western Canada, but also inefficiencies of government because the commission in Saskatoon does not have the necessary autonomy. It is in a much better position to make value judgments on many of the transportation issues of the day, being located in an area where those transportation policies will show results. However, we still have directives coming from Ottawa.

• (1810)

In western Canada transportation is a very important issue. In terms of geography we have a very large country, and one of the many things that binds us together is transportation policy. This is particularly so in western Canada where distances are so vast relative to other areas of the country. An air route was recently awarded PWA to allow it to fly from Calgary to Brandon to Toronto. It required a change of transportation policy on the part of the previous minister of transport, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), even to get an application before the Canadian Transport Commission so that Brandon could receive jet service. That policy announcement was made in November of 1979. It took over a year to award the route to PWA, despite the fact that PWA was the only applicant and despite the fact that when PWA did apply it did not ask for a subsidy.

If we had a transportation policy which was genuinely attuned to our areas of concern in western Canada—in all of Canada—it seems to me this important air route would have been awarded much sooner.

I was also disturbed about the make-up of the commission which heard the PWA application in Brandon back in October. I felt that two commissioners from Saskatoon should have been among the three who heard the application, but I was told two commissioners on the panel from western Canada was not acceptable because that might prejudice the board's decision in favour of western Canada. That was a terrible thing to say. I do not understand how three commissioners from eastern Canada judging an issue affecting eastern Canada could not be seen to be prejudiced in favour of eastern Canada.

Perhaps I should say central Canada to keep myself clear with my colleagues from the maritimes. I do not understand how we can have that type of double standard in terms of the way commissioners are selected to make judgments with respect to transportation policy in different parts of the country. I find this a very deplorable attitude on the part of the federal government with respect to transportation policy.

We in western Canada feel very strongly that we would like to be able to make a contribution to the whole country and more of a contribution in terms of the things we can produce for export. We know that there is a very large demand for cereal grains around the world. We will have to work very hard to meet the demand to feed people, yet we are lacking transportation policies which would allow western farmers to export the things they produce. Such an ability would not benefit just our area of the country but the country as a whole.

Many hon. members opposite ask why we mistrust the government so much. They ask why there is so much concern about the resolution as it is drafted. It should be obvious to them why there is so much mistrust. I would like to cite an analogy. We all know that Jack Horner sat for many years in this House as a member of my party. I do not know how many times he was elected, but I believe he served the area of Alberta he came from for years as a member of this House. He was a very popular member. I understand he was a very hard-working member. He obviously did a good job for his constituents, or he would not have enjoyed their support for so many years. Yet when he decided for some reason—I do not think it will ever be known to me—to cross the floor and sit with the Liberal government, he subsequently lost his deposits in two federal elections. He lost his deposits because of the distaste people in his riding had for the policies the Liberal government had been carrying out. It seems to me the Liberal government should be in a position to carry out policies which would be favourably received by all the people of Canada because, as has been pointed out, Liberal governments have been in power here for 18 of the last 20 years. A government in power has the ability to pursue the policies it sees fit. The government of the day has not seen fit to pursue policies which treat fairly what I think is the most important, dynamic, vital and growing area in the country. This has been the case for the past 18 years. If the government had pursued such policies there might be at least one member elected from that area of the country. It should be obvious to the government that if we mistrust it or do not go along with it on matters with which we feel we are fairly familiar, such as freight rates or postal service, etc. it should not expect the people of western Canada to trust it to do the right thing in that region of the country with respect to something as involved as the Constitution. This is a point the government should consider when it is pursuing the constitutional resolution we have before us.

I also do not understand and cannot really find any valid reason why the government should set a self-imposed deadline, and try to meet that deadline. This is a very artificial and counterproductive way to proceed. It was pointed out previously by a speaker this afternoon that a document connected with the first ministers' meeting here in Ottawa back in September had many insidious tones. There has been some concern about the Prime Minister speaking with tongue in cheek, and about his not being totally forthcoming with respect to all of the facts concerning representations he made to the Prime Minister of Great Britain about the opposition of the provinces to the constitutional resolution. If we cannot negotiate in good faith and realize that there really is no reason to be in a hurry except for our own self-inflicted, artificially-imposed time limit, then really we have no good reason to proceed.

The Minister of Justice is still in the House. I do not know whether he is listening, but there is a short article in today's Montreal Gazette under the headline "More support us: Chrétien". The article reads in part as follows:

> "There are more now who agree on the basics," he told a meeting of the Quebec wing of the Liberal national council.
> "They all accept the principle of patriation. They support a bill of rights and more and more people are defending the Victoria amendment formula."

It seems to me that that is a very solid argument in favour of removing the July 1 deadline and trying to get the premiers back to the negotiating table. I should not say trying to get them back to the negotiating table; they have offered to go to the negotiating table, but the federal government has not seen fit to take them up on that offer. If the Minister of Justice is sincere in what he says about more people supporting him, and that coming about as a result of a lapse of time and a "better understanding" on the part of the people about what is happening, I hope he will pursue the offers made by the provincial premiers with respect to going back to the negotiating table. If we do in fact have a constitutional resolution which the premiers cannot support and are not willing to go along with, we will certainly be damaging ourselves in the long run.

We have to act as mature people. We have to be mature when we go into a union or any arrangement to work together. That is what a constitution is really all about. A constitution is composed of ground rules by which we govern ourselves and under which we want to work together in the future. It seems to me if we do not have a consensus approach, as in which this government apparently is not interested—it is using an imposition approach—we destroy faith, maturity and a sense of feeling good about our country. We cannot afford to destroy a feeling of good will when we go into a union, and that is what we are discussing. We are talking about a reunion: a rebirth of our country. I strongly urge the government to consider this in the process. I again point out in the strongest terms that process has to be considered as a very important part of the way we adopt this constitutional resolution.

In closing I will simply say that unless the government is willing to be more flexible, and negotiate with the provinces in a meaningful way, the process by which it will accomplish this constitutional renewal and patriation will cause very severe scars which will take a long time to heal.

The Minister of Justice should pay attention to what the people of Quebec are telling him about how Quebec members of Parliament should vote. If he is serious when he says more people agree with the government, and if he believes that, I hope he will take more time, make some effort, sit down with the provinces, try to agree on an amending formula and settle some of the differences with many of the provinces over the way the government is proceeding with the constitutional resolution.

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour to have this opportunity to address the House of Commons of Canada on the issue of constitutional reform. It is an honour and, more than that, it is a responsibility given me by the residents of Okanagan North, a responsibility which I take very seriously.

Over the past few months, many speakers have commented on the historic overtones surrounding this debate. They have said, and I agree, that we may well be adding a sentence, a page or perhaps even a chapter to the history of this country. However, let us hope the chapter we add is but a continuation of what has been a long and honourable history of our Canadian federation, and I emphasize the word "federation"; a federation which has worked well and has truly served this diverse land with its multicultural population. I hope that, because of the tenor of the document before us, we are not writing the last chapter of a pocket book on the final fulfilment of one man's ego.

The opportunity to join the constitutional debate this evening is a delayed opportunity. I was ready to participate last December when this government used closure to end that stage of debate in the House of Commons. I am certain it is the first time in the history of any democratic country anywhere in the world that duly elected representatives of the people were denied the opportunity to speak on what is the fundamental law of any civilized country, the rules by which we seek to govern ourselves; our Constitution. I understand the government is again threatening closure of this debate if we, the members of this House, do not conduct ourselves according to the government's wishes. It is truly an ironic state of affairs.

This government says it is introducing a bill of rights to guarantee our basic freedoms, but to do so it feels it necessary to deny that most basic right of all, the right of parliamentarians, the people's elected representatives, to freely discuss and debate the proposed legislation before the House.

Closure was imposed in the House on October 23 of last year. That first use of closure provided real evidence that the procedure and the strategy outlined in that infamous Kirby document were actually being followed by the government. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that was a document with a self-fulfilling prophecy. It predicted the failure of last summer's constitutional conference; outlined a plan in the event of failure and concocted a strategy to place the blame on the provincial premiers. During last summer, the premiers were subjected to a form of closure because time after time they were threatened by an imposed deadline.

This process of unseemly and undue haste, this attempt to impose deadlines, has continued during the whole constitutional process. First of all, the government refused to permit television broadcasting. Then, under intense pressure from the Progressive Conservative Party, it reluctantly allowed the Canadian people to see the committee in action by means of complete television coverage. Again the committee began to sit on November 6 of last year and was immediately advised that there was a December 9 deadline, at which time its proceedings were to be concluded. Again, intense pressure from the Progressive Conservative opposition on the government finally resulted in the extension of the deadline to February 13 of this year, which was the date originally demanded by our party. Throughout this process, the government has made every effort to limit discussion and free debate of this resolution. They have attempted to limit the participation of the Canadian people in their own Constitution. Their heavyhanded arrogance has almost made a mockery of the democratic process.

Finally, when the government limited the number of constitutional experts they would allow to appear before the committee, it became abundantly clear they had every intention of approaching constitutional reform in a dictatorial manner, allowing no input from anyone except their own hired hands and their own bureaucrats.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to members of the House, particularly to those on the other side, that we in the west are familiar with the real estate agent who tries to sell you a house or an apartment block in great haste and, in an attempt to do so, makes every kind of deal possible with everyone. We know that in such cases the buyer is well advised to look for termites in the basement of the house the agent is trying to sell him. We also know that when a car dealer tries to sell a used automobile and attempts to conclude the sale in a rush, the buyer is well advised to look for sawdust in the crank-case. Similarly, when a prime minister of Canada, particularly if he is a Liberal, tries to rush through the constitutional resolution, the people of Canada had better take a long and close look at the small print because something is bound to be there that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does not want them to find.

Much of the apprehension, distrust and, indeed, anger at this resolution, which is apparent throughout this country, is due to the unseemly haste with which this document is being rushed through the parliamentary process. Time after time at the committee stage witnesses pleaded for more time. Archbishop Clark in his presentation to the committee admonished the committee to take more time to reflect and to study the document to ensure that it is properly conceived and to allow the Canadian people to have an input into it.

In my own constituency of Okanagan North a group was formed which made a simple request, after a great deal of study that the deadline be extended by six months, and that the committee be allowed to travel throughout Canada. The group collected almost 3,000 names on a petition in support of their request which they sent to the Prime Minister and to the committee. Of course, the Prime Minister ignored this petition, as he did a 750,000 name petition which he received from Quebec, his own province.

At the beginning of this debate, the first time the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) spoke at this stage, he uttered what I consider to be prophetic words; that time does not respect that which is done without it. I suggest to the House that time will indeed deal harshly with this hastily conceived and badly flawed document. As the debate on the Constitution has progressed over the past months it has become evident to me, and I think to many people, because many speakers have pointed to this problem, that the debate proceeded on two completely different philosophies of what this country was, is now, and should become in the future. This debate has gone on in one form or another since Confederation. It involves the very nature and I believe the very foundation of this great country.

Those who support the government's resolution—the Liberal members of this House, the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), some members of his party and of course the editors of Pravda—favour a strong central government and would see Canada eventually become a unitary state. It is clear to those who understand the socialist mind why all socialists, except for the possible exception of the Premier of Saskatchewan, support a unitary state. Obviously the devout goal of all socialists is to ensure that the state owns the means of production, including land. Of course this is only possible in a unitary state with all power in the central government. The Premier of Saskatchewan believes in that particular theory because he bought up most of the land in Saskatchewan. But it is not clear to me why the Liberal majority in the House has adopted this socialistic goal. It is possible, perhaps probable, that the government backbenchers are only slavishly following the dictates of the Prime Minister. Perhaps they are not even aware that the path they have chosen to follow inevitably leads to the destruction of federalism and the formation of a unitary state. The government has now travelled so far down the socialist road that perhaps it is hard for the hon. members opposite to distinguish. On the other hand, perhaps they are aware, being for the most part from the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Perhaps they are aware that historically, Ottawa runs this country for the benefit of central Canada. Indeed those Liberal backbenchers may be more subtle and astute than we think. They may even realize that if Canada becomes a unitary state, nothing much will change for Quebec and Ontario.

The other side of the great debate is espoused by those of us who believe that Canada was created in 1867 as a federal state, and by those who believe that the destiny of this great land, with its immense distances, its linguistic and ethnic differences, its diversity of culture and its extremes of climate, could only be realized in a strengthened and renewed federalism. For the most part these people are Progressive Conservative members of the House.

There has never been any contest in the House over the issue to patriate the Constitution to Canada with an acceptable amending formula. In fact, the Conservative party moved such a motion and it was defeated by the hon. members opposite. There has never been any real contest in this House or elsewhere over the issue of a bill of rights. Certainly I think most people agree that the time for a bill of rights is now. But the contest in this debate since the resolution was first introduced has been in what country that bill should be framed and passed into law. That has been the contest, that has been the concern, that has been the issue. It has been the subject of discussion and debate in committee and in the House. Only to a degree has the contest involved what kind of bill of rights we want. The real issue which has arisen in this constitutional debate is: unitary state or federal government, which shall it be?

The constitutional resolution of the government now before the House contains three elements which, if carried into law, would inevitably lead the country down the road to a unitary state in which provincial governments would become political eunuchs, at best, or, at worst, would disappear altogether. The first element leading to a unitary state is the break with tradition, by asking to change the British North America Act unilaterally in matters affecting exclusive provincial jurisdiction. This action strikes at the very heart of federalism and defies constitutional conventions which have emerged since 1867.

Secondly, the proposed amending formula of this government makes it inevitable that the federal system will disappear and that a centralized unitary state will emerge. The perpetual veto of Quebec and Ontario in the amending formula, aside from the fact that it unnecessarily creates second-class provinces and, by implication, second-class citizens, confirms the charge so well expressed by another member on this side of the House that the Prime Minister conceives this country as consisting of Upper and Lower Canada and those provinces in the so-called outer Canada; those people living in provinces outside the central area.

The constitutional resolution before us also proposes a referendum as a means of an amending formula, and it allows only the federal government to initiate and control the referendum process. This is another major proposal which will lead inevitably to a unitary state. This fact is recognized throughout the country in all provinces where the concept of federalism is held essential; in fact in all provinces outside central Canada. That is why there has been so much violent opposition to the introduction of this resolution in its present form. That provision was the one which Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan could not swallow. It was, so to speak, the chicken bone in his throat which finally forced him to join the other western and eastern provinces in rejecting this proposal.

Why are we so disturbed that this resolution, as drafted and placed before the House, will eventually result in more centralization of power in Ottawa and eventually a single unitary state? It is fair to say we are disturbed because our present federal system of government is uniquely and ideally suited to the needs and requirements of this great country. We in this country today have a form of government which really was not foreseen by the Fathers of Confederation. We have a federal system which has been molded over the years by experience and by changes made to meet the circumstances of the times and conditions of our unique country. Today we have a system of federalism which is well tuned and finely honed to meet the peculiar and challenging requirements of a country so large and diverse as Canada, even though that system might not suit the centralist tendencies of the present government.

When the Fathers of Confederation first met and eventually worked out the details of the British North America Act, they sought to avoid—at least some of them—what they thought were dangers in the decentralization which took place in the United States. In 1867 they felt there was a grievous error in the way that country had developed since its beginning, and as it was emerging in 1867. Therefore, some of the rules and regulations they laid out in the BNA Act were designed to specifically give certain rights to each province and certain rights to the federal government.

However, history has no respect for experts and today we find both the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States considerably changed from what they were in 1867. Today in the United States we find that the government in power is centralized in Washington. The power of the states has almost disappeared. Today there is also the thought by people who have examined the workings of that government that the government in Washington is out of control. They say the government is ungovernable and unmanageable. The new President of the United States has been saying recently that there must be more decentralization, that more power and more responsibility must be given to the states if their problems are to be solved.

In this country we are saying there should be more centralization. We must surely have learned by the experiences of other countries such as Sweden, England and the United States, where centralization has made governments grow to such an extent they are no longer manageable.

Over the years in this country we have seen a somewhat different story, in spite of the drift toward centralization which occurred during the depression and the Second World War. At those times provincial governments recognized the need for more power in Ottawa in order to prosecute the war more efficiently. After peace arrived in 1946 the succeeding years saw more responsibility being taken by the provinces. This can be seen in the spending studies issued by the government recently.

In 1867 grants and subsidies from the federal government represented about 80 per cent to 90 per cent of the revenues of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. At that time grants and subsidies represented between one half and two-thirds of the revenues of the then provinces of Ontario and Quebec. A number of years later, in 1920, we can see that the provinces were collecting 65 per cent of the revenue and the federal government only 35 per cent. Through experience Canada had become a much more decentralized country by 1920.

If we again look at those statistics for 1945 we see that the federal government's tax levy reached almost 72 per cent and that provincial and municipal levies reached only about 28 per cent. Those figures show a dramatic shift of power in those years from the provinces and municipalities to Ottawa. Again, this was because Canadians felt it was necessary to shift the power in order to prosecute the war successfully, which, of course, we did.

Going over the statistics, looking at 1978, we see that the provincial share of revenue has risen to almost 55 per cent. As soon as the threat of war was over, the people of this country again felt that in order to fully satisfy the needs and desires of citizens in each part of the country it was necessary to decentralize the power, and so they did. These statistics show that the people who raised most of the money were the provinces and the municipalities, since, so to speak, that is where the action was. This indicates that the people of this country instinctively followed the old political rule of subsidiarity, which means that rules and laws should be made at the level where their impacts are felt most. I think that is a political rule this government seeks now to forget.

My suggestion, Mr. Speaker, is that over the years the Canadian Constitution has proven to be a highly flexible document. This recently-issued report highlights the fact that the BNA Act has proven adequate to enable Canada to handle the change from a rural society of many years ago to what is now essentially an urban and industrial community. Our Constitution has enabled us to make this change easily. I believe we all know that during that period of change there was a tremendous growth in governments at all levels. In spite of that growth the present system is highly flexible. It is very responsive to the needs and requirements of individual provinces. Our present Constitution has been a success since it has resulted in a decentralized system. Only Switzerland, considered to be the most decentralized country in the world, is more decentralized. Our system is one in which both the provincial governments and Ottawa are strong and well equipped to fulfil their particular functions. Neither Ottawa nor the provinces are autonomous. Autonomy has given way to interdependence. That is as it should be. That is why I oppose the imposition of this constitutional proposal, as does my party and many millions of Canadians. It proposes to break up a system which has worked well in the past and which will work well in the future.

In a country such as Canada there must be co-operation and ongoing consultation. This country is just too big, too diverse to be run solely from Ottawa as envisaged by these proposals. The future must see the continuation of the trend to develop major national policies by consultation and discussion and not in a unilateral fashion, as has been evidenced by this constitutional process.

This House should be aware that western Canada will never again tolerate the system of centralized government in Ottawa when the voting control of that government remains in the hands of Ontario and Quebec on every issue, and in particular on those issues which fundamentally affect the basic interests of western Canada. We have seen the results of that kind of effort in the rise of alienation and in the increased feeling of separatism which presently exists in western Canada.

We all know this is a far better document because the Conservative opposition, led by our leader, was successful in prolonging the debate on this subject, thereby allowing greater participation by the people of Canada. However, it is still a flawed document. It is flawed because the way in which it is drafted purports to confer and grant rights. I would like to speak for a moment on this issue.

As has been said many times, and expressed far better than I am able to by speakers from the Progressive Conservative Party, fundamental freedoms are best protected and preserved by the recognition of the principle that rights originate with human beings. The freedom and dignity of the individual exists and derives from the nature of the human being. All governments can do is to confirm and protect those rights.

We should ask ourselves, what are we doing when we attempt to develop a constitution? What are we doing when we attempt to devise that most basic of all laws? Are we not simply attempting to devise a set of basic rules governing man as a social person and governing the relationship of man to man? In building that set of relationships should there not be an affirmation of the basic principles upon which our western society and our nation has been built?

In the constitutional committee the member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) expressed this when he said, "Constitutions are made up of values, interest and beliefs of the people . . . It cannot do so unless the fundamental source of the principles upon which that society rests are articulated clearly . . . The fact of the matter is that our rights do not come from the government, but from other sources, from tradition, from God . . . The essential kernel of western democratic faith is such that dissent is allowed from government and dissent has come by an appeal over governments to God. That is the history of our tradition—" That is what the hon. member said, and I agree.

The definitions of our freedoms and rights in this country had some of their beginnings in the common law of England which at the end of the twelfth century was already set toward the making of a free and democratic society of responsible men and women. The design is clear in that most famous of documents, the Magna Carta, of which Archbishop Stephen Langton was the architect. The famous words of that charter embody the following formula:

> No free man shall be taken or imprisoned or disseised of his free tenement or outlawed or exiled or in any way destroyed unless by lawful judgment of his peers.

The Magna Carta, as wrested from King John, was hailed as a great bill of rights. Yet it bestowed nothing on the English people. It merely recognized their rights, chiefly the freedom of free men and women.

This tradition continued and appeared in the American constitution in the now famous passage, which reads as follows:

> We hold these truths to be self evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

This charter before this House bestows nothing on the Canadian people. It merely recognizes and attempts to protect rights already existing. That is why the Progressive Conservatives moved that the preamble to the John Diefenbaker bill of rights be introduced into this charter. That preamble read in part as follows:

> The Canadian nation was founded on principles that acknowledged the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free individuals and free institutions.

I personally, and there are many across this great nation who agree, cannot accept a charter which does not express clearly and identify the source of all rights and freedoms as deriving from the nature of the fact that we are human beings.

There are other flaws in this document, flaws due to the process and haste which has characterized the passage of this resolution. Where are property rights? During the committee hearings the hon. member for Provencher proposed the following amendment:

> Freedom from unreasonable interference with privacy, family, home, correspondence and enjoyment of property.

These basic rights have been accepted in our tradition for hundreds of years. They appear in the Magna Carta. They were present in John Diefenbaker's bill of rights, yet the Liberal majority at the direction of the New Democratic Party retreated from the position of acceptance to one of rejection and refused to allow the charter to guarantee the right of Canadians to own and enjoy property. "A man's home is his castle", but not in Canada under a Liberal and NDP government.

If we are to have a charter, then let it be the very best we can compose, working together. Such a charter, for example, would commit this confederation to ensuring, so far as humanly possible, equal opportunities for all citizens, including equality under the rule of law for rich and poor alike, and equal protection against discrimination of all kinds, including discrimination because of sex, age and economic means. For example, women should be safeguarded against discrimination because they are women, or because they are elderly women, or because they are elderly women without the wherewithal to live free from want and fear in their retirement years.

In this instance I agree with those who say that an adequate charter should include some recognition of economic and social rights, as well as political, legal and civil rights. After all, the 1948 United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights and later international covenants, which Canada has formally endorsed, list various economic and social rights, including the right to a standard of living adequate to the health and well-being of every person and family.

Further, I concur with an observation made by the B.C. Federation of Labour in its recent submission to the constitutional committee when it said that for most citizens social and economic conditions have more day-to-day significance than civil rights and political freedoms which are established. That, to a large degree, is like people in western Canada and people in all parts of Canada wondering why we spend so much time on this Constitution and why the government has not spent more time bringing forth solutions to end inflation, high interest rates and unemployment.

There is another point. In at least two provincial codes, or charters or rights, there already exists an equivalent or implicit recognition of economic and social rights. The British Columbia code prohibits discrimination on any ground except where reasonable grounds can be demonstrated. Quebec's charter of rights and freedoms prohibits any discrimination because of social condition. I suppose social condition would include insufficient income for basic human needs. It should never stand in the way of senior citizens, most of them elderly women, who have given so much to their country.

Such discrimination is intolerable. More Canadians would recognize this unacceptable state of affairs were such lack of opportunity and financial discrimination prohibited in any future, much improved charter of rights.

This Constitution is also flawed because it does not adequately deal with collective rights. The Federation of Independent Schools has correctly pointed out that as the charter now stands, section 15 might well endanger the ability of certain organizations to provide services to their constituents. The charter should be changed to include an exemption clause, as they suggest. As it now stands, the charter may take away rights that currently exist.

Finally, I believe that the right to life is inadequately guaranteed in the charter. First, and I have said this earlier, the charter should make clear that the right to life is an inherent right belonging to all human beings because of their humanity. It is not a gift of this charter.

My own persuasion is that the charter should clearly protect the right to life of the unborn. However, I realize there are those in this House who strongly object to the mention of such a proposal, and it would not likely be enacted.

Therefore I would urge this government to adopt the Progressive Conservative proposal that the charter clearly confirm that the issue of the right to life of the unborn and the issue of capital punishment should be decided by the Parliament of Canada, and that nothing in this charter would prevent that.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to call it seven o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. He cannot call it seven o'clock.

Mr. Taylor: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member started at 6.21.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member started at 6.20. It being seven o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At seven o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, all of us are very anxious to speak in this debate. Some of us are getting short notice but I am here tonight and I will do the best I can to make a contribution.

One of the most interesting things so far with regard to the whole constitutional package and the Bill of Rights is the number of responsible Liberals left in the country who are speaking out against the manner in which the government is trying to patriate the Constitution. I want to quote from a recent article in the The Gazette under the heading "Four Liberal senators balk at BNA bill." It reads:

> At least four and perhaps as many as eight Liberal senators will break party ranks to vote against Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau's constitution reform resolution.
> In a series of interviews, the . . . senators said they are deeply concerned by the legal, ethical and political implications of the resolution and warned that Trudeau's action could destroy the country.

Of course, destroying the country would not bother many members on the opposite side. That is the program they embarked upon many years ago. They have balkanized this country, they have put it into bankruptcy and they have left us at the mercy of OPEC. But what else is new?

The article continues:

> Echoing Progressive Conservative arguments, the senators criticized the proposed charter of rights and Ottawa's determination to move unilaterally against the wishes of eight of the 10 provinces.
> One of the senators said Trudeau was "mad" and two others accused him of steamrolling over critics, including those in its own caucus.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was in Brazil in January, we read that he arrived there in his running shoes and in a seersucker suit. The honour guard was standing at attention with their guns on their shoulders. What does our Prime Minister do? He hands them bars of soap. When you read reports like that of the Prime Minister cavorting around this world, it is no wonder some Liberal senators are calling him mad.

We read on as follows:

> Some claimed that more than a dozen of their colleagues would vote against the package, but party insiders believe only four have made such a decision.
>
> They include George McIlraith (Ontario), former solicitor general and government leader in the House of Commons, Eric Cook (Newfoundland), Paul Lafond (Quebec)—

Mr. Lafond is a personal friend of the Prime Minister and one of his first appointments to the Senate.

The article continues:

> —and Jean-Paul Deschatelets (Quebec).

Four other Liberal senators—Andrew Thompson (Ontario), Ann Bell (B.C.), Daniel Lang (Ontario), and Henry Hicks (Nova Scotia)—are now leaning toward opposition.

I guess they like to sleep at night. Also, one of the best contributions to the debate so far in the Senate was that of the Hon. Eric Cook, a Liberal senator and former judge; as reported at page 1838 of the Senate Hansard for February 24, 1981, as follows:

I am opposed to the resolution because I am opposed to the federal government's unilateral action notwithstanding the disapproval of the majority of the provinces and the majority of Canadians.

I read part of his address the other night. There are a few other points I want to put on the record tonight. Senator Cook said:

Fifty-four years ago I became a law student, and one thing I have learned for certain during that long period is that judges are often traditionalists but not often reformers.

Senator Cook was referring to judges handling our human rights. He goes into great detail on how time delaying and costly it can be for a Canadian citizen to go through the courts to protect his rights. He refers to the Liberal Party's constitutional package as a "dog's breakfast". Senator Cook said:

For us to adopt the attitude, however, that the Parliament of the United Kingdom has to pass blindly any "dog's breakfast" we send over is neither reasonable nor rational.

Senator Cook continued by saying this:

I would agree that the U.K. Parliament should not endeavour to amend or improve any measure we send over, but I most firmly believe that any independent or self-respecting parliament can certainly reject it. To put the case clearly, suppose our charter of rights contained provisions repugnant to human rights. Must the United Kingdom pass that? Of course not. The answer would be, "Pass it yourselves, if that is what you want; but we will not." However, if it may be rejected because it lacks merit, it may also be rejected because it lacks a reasonable degree of support, because it is being imposed by a minority of sovereign partners on majority of sovereign partners, and by a minority of the population on the majority of the population.

A Liberal senator said that, one who has been around for many years and who has a lot of experience. Protecting people's rights, both basic and human rights sounds great. It is really a motherhood issue.

● (2010)

However, when we look at how the Liberal Party has become involved in protecting people's rights, we see there is a lot to be desired.

I wish to refer to a recent case that went through three different courts and ended up in the Supreme Court. A federal civil servant with the Ministry of Transport was placed in a very unfortunate position. Because he was not able to learn the French language, the Liberal government leaned on him to get him out of his job. He was threatened and harassed and told to move from Montreal to another city.

This civil servant took his case to court where it took five years to prove the Liberal government was wrong in harassing him. Where was the Liberal government that protects people's rights? The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bockstael) sits there with a big smile on his face. He thinks this is a big joke. He nods his head. It is a big joke, harassing individuals.

Mr. Bockstael: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not think it is in order for the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) to make those remarks. If I choose to smile at something one of my colleagues has said to me, it should not be inferred as making light of what the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine is saying.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I am glad you did not recognize that as a point of order. The parliamentary secretary has not spoken about this individual. My point is there are laws to protect individuals such as this. He should not be removed from his position because he cannot learn to speak the French language. I repeat, after having been harassed by the Ministry of Transport and being forced to move to another city, he had to spend five years in the courts defending himself. Where was the Liberal Party which looks after the rights of people? They were nowhere to be found.

An hon. Member: Where were the Conservatives?

Mr. McKenzie: This case was recently brought to my attention. Therefore, I am now speaking on it. I am sure that no Liberals will speak on it. Neither civil servants nor anyone else should be threatened with dismissal for not being able to learn to speak French or English. No unilingual Canadian should be threatened the way Mr. Kelso was threatened in Montreal. He took an aptitude test which showed that he could not learn the French language. Not everyone is capable of learning a second language, and they should not be harassed because of it. I do not see anything in the Liberal package, and I am sure we will never see anything, to protect these people. This is nothing but windowdressing. There is another one smiling and snickering.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKenzie: We should return to the merit system in this country, not quotas for jobs and threatening individuals who cannot learn another language.

I hope Mr. Kelso will be fully reimbursed for his legal fees, every red cent. When I was in touch with this gentleman, he told me he was going after his legal fees. I hope the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport will ensure that he is fully reimbursed after having spent five years in the courts in order to save his job. He should also be paid his additional costs for transportation back and forth from Cornwall to Montreal to visit his lawyer. We will see how many Liberals speak on that matter.

I will be pursuing this matter in committee if Mr. Kelso is not fully reimbursed. He was reduced to the role of a second-class citizen because he could not learn another language. That is the great Liberal Bill of Rights. Justice, my foot!

I quote from a Globe and Mail report on Mr. Kelso's case:

Noting that Mr. Kelso had been told to accept within two days or be dismissed, he ruled that this threat of dismissal was illegal. It would be intolerable if employees were forced to risk disciplinary action to preserve their legal rights, he said. Rights are not extinguished by obeying the employer's instruction while at the same time contesting his decision.

After five years that was the ruling of the court.

There is another case which was brought up a number of years ago. I thought the matter had been settled, but it was again recently brought to my attention. It involved a question of the rights of an individual, entrenchment, and so on. I quote from the February 15, 1981, Toronto Star:

Five years after he was fired from Canadian National Telecommunications, Bernie Maguire is no closer to learning why he failed a security clearance.

Maguire knows about the document that got him fired, but he can't see it for security reasons.

And even if Maguire got the information he wants from his security file, he was told he would be charged under the Official Secrets Act if any of it was made public.

Today, Maguire, 28, is a bus driver in Edmonton.

"If I have any hope at all of getting back into electronics, the dismissal has to be cleared up," the former radio technician said in an interview. "I'm not giving it up."

He was fired from CN Telecommunications because of a hidden security test he could not find out about. He still does not have the matter cleared up five years later. CN Telecommunications comes under the MOT. We will see whether the parliamentary secretary looks into Mr. Maguire's case. He now drives a bus because he got the boot from CN. They would not tell him why. This bill of rights is a big joke for the Liberals. They are only interested in Ontario and Quebec.

Now we will get a little closer to home. A recent headline read "Commons guards riled about Sauvé's remark."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKenzie: There are approximately 260 uniformed security guards on Parliament Hill. Approximately 52 are unilingual English. They have been informed they can no longer be on duty at any main entrance or in the galleries. Instead, they are being relegated to walking the corridors. They will not be promoted. Where is there any justice in that bill of rights?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The matter to which the hon. member refers could be discussed before an appropriate committee of this House. Because this matter refers to the jurisdiction of the Speaker, I suggest the hon. member avail himself of that committee.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, it was discussed before the appropriate committee of this House, the public accounts committee, on Thursday, February 12. This is public information. I am not raising anything new. The statement was made that for "humanitarian reasons" these 52 unilingual English uniformed security guards will be kept on staff. What an insult. Where is the justice there? What are the Liberals going to do about these English-speaking Canadians who are being treated in this way? It is a terrible crime.

● (2020)

The particular Liberal that raised this in committee stated, "If there is only one who does not speak both languages, it is too much." All of these unilingual English security guards, uniformed guards that have been here for years—some of them are sergeants—are not supposed to be here. He wants them all put off the staff. Where is the justice in the Official Languages Act? Why did the Liberals introduce that phony resolution in June, 1973, and then introduce Clause 6 or Clause 7 so that we can protect these individuals because they are not supposed to be treated this way? Where is the fairness?

The Conservative Party has gone along with your bilingual policy to promote bilingualism and teach other languages in the schools. All we get is a bunch of Liberals yapping and yelling there. They think this is a big joke. If they had their way, they would kick the 52 unilingual English right out of here.

An hon. Member: Look who's talking about fairness. Look what you do to Joe.

Mr. McKenzie: So, we do not hear any Liberals speaking—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. Mckenzie) has the floor.

Mr. McKenzie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Geronimo.

An hon. Member: Wait till Joe gets you.

Mr. McKenzie: Yes, that is about the size of the contribution we will hear from the Liberals; yelling "Geronimo", and, "Joe". The bill of rights; what an utter fraud. What an absolute farce, Liberals concerned about a bill of rights. All they are concerned with is their votes in Quebec and Ontario.

An hon. Member: You were the farce on Friday night.

Mr. McKenzie: We will have no comment from the Liberals on the injustice to that air traffic controller, or Mr. Maguire or the 52 unilingual English who are being abused right here, where we should be practising justice toward all Canadians, regardless of their ethnic origin or what language they speak.

An hon. Member: Even Joe Clark.

Mr. McKenzie: Yes, even Joe Clark will speak up for these people. It certainly will not be any Liberal.

Also, we get an example of what the Liberals are saying in Quebec. I want to read from a recent Montreal Gazette article which says:

Another group of Quebec Liberals has come out against the party's plan to allow children to attend English-language schools in Quebec simply because their parents' mother tongue is English.

Do you hear any Liberals speaking on this? No, of course not. There is nothing like this in their bill of rights to protect the English in Quebec; not one word. Do you hear them saying anything against Bill 101, or anything else?

An hon. Member: You have to read it.

An hon. Member: He can't read.

Mr. McKenzie: Some Liberal says I cannot read. I can read. I read only too well, Mr. Speaker. I have never been taken in by a Liberal in my life.

I want to talk about some other parts of this constitutional package, namely, property rights in respect of which the Liberals have been skating all over the place, because they were afraid they would lose the support of the NDP. They were concerned that they were not going to be able to confiscate property and nationalize industry.

Another section we are very concerned about relates to the affirmation of the sovereignty of God, and free institutions. This is in the same wording as Mr. Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights, which was accepted back in 1960. We are very concerned about freedom of information, which is not clearly defined in the constitutional package, and privacy of the home and family. The Liberals are trying to get into everybody's bedroom and livingroom. The Vancouver formula should be recognized, with the Queen defined as head of state.

We believe we should split the package in two. The Canadian package should be done in Canada by Canadians, as has been pointed out by prominent Liberal senators in the other place.

I would also like to quote from a recent Globe and Mail article with regard to the NDP and their position:

> Federal New Democratic Party Leader Edward Broadbent may believe that he has done what is right in throwing his support to the federal government's constitutional resolution; but the damage to Canada could be great. The damage to the NDP almost certainly will be.

I hope they are right on that point.

Let me give another example of rights, and we only have rights when it suits the government. Let us look at the new fighter aircraft contract. This so-called Liberal Party is supposed to be recognizing all parts of Canada. After they agreed on one fighter aircraft they would be purchasing, the Liberals immediately announced that 48 per cent of the industrial benefits of the NFA contract would be going to the province of Quebec, 48 per cent of the profit—

An hon. Member: A point of order.

Mr. McKenzie: Thirty-nine per cent—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette).

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I am as tolerant as the next one, but I do believe the comments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) certainly transgress the limits of the resolution, and do not deal, in any way, even with the constitution. It is one thing for him to speak on the amendment dealing with the referendum of his own party provided by his own member from Manitoba, but he is not speaking on anything to do with the resolution. It is the old diatribe we have heard in this House since 1972. Mr. Speaker, I do think you ought to call the hon. member to be relevant.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must call attention to the fact that the hon. member has the floor on the resolution and the amendment which is before us, and which we are currently discussing.

Mr. McKenzie: That is right. The amendment calls for justice and rights.

An hon. Member: No, it does not.

Mr. McKenzie: Justice and rights, in fair distribution of the NFA contract across Canada. Right at the start—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) on a point of order.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member does not know what the amendment is, I will tell him. It is to abolish the use of the referendum in the resolution. That is what is before the House now.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is not a point of order.

Mr. McKenzie: I am sorry you must put up with these interruptions, Mr. Speaker. To give you an idea of the injustice and the many things that are not contained in the bill of rights and the constitutional package, I would point out, in a recent news article on the distribution of industrial benefits across Canada, which has to—

An hon. Member: Having nothing to do with the resolution.

Mr. McKenzie: —do with constitutional matters, and fairness, and individuals' rights, provinces' rights, it is pointed out that:

> Ever since Canadair bid on only one of the four Hornet contracts, Quebec cabinet ministers and Liberal MPs have been warning their colleagues what Premier René Lévesque and his Parti Québécois will say if Quebec's share of the pie appears to be falling short.

Mr. Lévesque does not have to worry. These Liberals will look after their power base, and they will see that 48 per cent or more goes into Quebec. They do not have to worry about Mr. Lévesque.

An hon. Member: Thirty-five per cent.

Mr. McKenzie: I have a letter from the Archbishop's office, the archdiocese of Vancouver. I hope the Liberals are not going to call this a point of order. It is about the constitutional package.

An hon. Member: Talking about the referendum.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: It is about time.

Mr. McKenzie: Well, I am glad I am getting a hand from the Liberals. We hope to be hearing from them about Bernie Maguire, Mr. Kelso, and what they are going to do about the 52 unilingual English. The uniformed security guards on the Hill will be very interested in hearing your comments about that.

The Archbishop's office is very concerned about the package and at the constitutional committee hearings it pointed out:

● (2030)

The Undersigned Roman Catholic Bishops of British Columbia and the Yukon wish to express their deep concern over inadequacies in the proposed Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

We share the conviction that there is a potentially harmful imbalance between individual and collective rights. While we endorse and support the objective of guaranteeing individual rights, both those that flow from civil law and those that are anterior to it, we hold it to be equally indispensable that there be at the same time and in proper balance the objective of guaranteeing collective rights.

The proposed charter of rights as presently it is worded leaves us with the impression that the great importance of collective rights is not understood or recognized.

They are perfectly right there, and there is no intention on the part of the Liberal Party to recognize them in any way at all.

Another denomination is speaking out against the package. I want to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), who led the fight to tell the Canadian people what the Liberal Party is up to.

Mr. Rossi: That is not what you said a couple of nights ago.

Mr. McKenzie: The Canadian people did not fully understand what this was about. They understand it now. I was not getting any mail a few months ago, but I am getting lots of mail now about what is going on in the country under this so-called Liberal government.

I would like now to read from the Canadian Churchman as follows:

Archbishop Ted Scott is convinced the federal government has taken a wrong turn on the road to a Canadian-made constitution.

The Canadian primate said so forcefully last month in a two-hour dialogue with Senators and Members of Parliament who make up the joint parliamentary committee on the Constitution of Canada.

The Anglican leader said unilateral federal government action is not the best way of reflecting the aspirations of Canada's diverse parts.

Of course, this has been highlighted by a number of Liberal senators in the other place who have been around here much longer than many of those who are sitting here tonight yelling and shouting.

I would like to quote another very respected gentleman in Manitoba, a former Liberal premier of Manitoba. Mr. Douglas Campbell was premier of Manitoba for ten years, and he appeared at some constitutional hearings in Winnipeg back in January. The article I am quoting reads in part as follows:

Campbell charges Trudeau misleading Canadians in bid to patriate constitution.

Douglas Campbell, former Liberal premier of Manitoba, yesterday accused Prime Minister Trudeau of misleading the Canadian people in his attempts to bring home the Constitution.

This very respected gentleman and a member of the Liberal Party for some 60 years says the Prime Minister is misleading the Canadian people. Other prominent Liberals in the other place are saying the Prime Minister is mad. Thank heaven some Liberals are speaking out against this ridiculous proposal. Mr. Campbell went on to say:

"I don't think Mr. Trudeau has given the information that the public has a right to expect," Campbell told the legislative committee holding public hearings on constitutional reform.

Campbell, premier from 1948 to 1958, condemned Ottawa's bilingual policies, bill of rights, amending formula and haste.

He urged the Manitoba government "to use every legal means" to halt Ottawa's unilateral course.

Campbell said Trudeau has "been less than frank"—

Mr. Campbell is being very polite.

Mr. Rossi: That is something you aren't.

Mr. McKenzie:

—in implying the provinces have delayed patriation.

"There is the implication that the provinces have in some way held up patriation," Campbell said.

"The big holdup always was how do we amend it once we get it home."

Campbell said Ottawa has forgotten that in the past the provinces and the federal government agreed unanimously before any changes were made to the Constitution.

In those days the premiers and the prime minister met on a regular basis, and they discussed things properly. Nothing was rammed down their throats. Mr. Campbell is referring back to those days when we were making progress and when we had responsible government in this country. Mr. Campbell went on to say:

"Only since Trudeau showed up has there been a move from unanimous consent," he said.

The federal government also has suggested that those who oppose the entrenchment of a bill of rights oppose human rights, Campbell said.

Actually, a bill of rights would undermine democratic principles, he told the committee.

"It is not the job of the Constitution to legislate."

Campbell said Trudeau's attempts to legislate bilingualism have created resistance in the west to the French community.

"I think the program is being oversold," he said.

It is nice to hear some prominent Liberals speaking out, especially those who are in the other place today.

I would like to finish by reading the comments of a great historian in Winnipeg, a gentleman by the name of Eric Wells, former editor of the Winnipeg Tribune and a broadcaster who has studies Canadian issues for many years. I just want to read the comments he made on radio station CJOB on February 6. Mr. Wells said:

The parliaments of the United Kingdom and Canada are on a collision course, and we are nearing the end of the line—the British connection is going to go.

What began as a relatively minor constitutional adjustment to be made by Canada's Parliament has been fanned into a major conflagration and there appears to be no way to avoid the consequences.

Unless—unless Canada withdraws its demand for a Canadian charter of rights to be passed by the British House, or unless the British parliamentarians cave in and take their orders from Ottawa.

In view of the threats made by Prime Minister Trudeau the Canadian demand will not be withdrawn, nor should we expect that British parliamentarians, who defied the divine right of kings, will now surrender that principle to Ottawa's divine politicians.

The scenario has degenerated into a sordid hoax, all of it cooked up in our capital city. The most disgraceful distortion is that the British are reviving colonialism in questioning the substance of the Canadian demand.

All the British are suggesting is that we Canadians should pass our own laws in our own parliament. We must be slow learners. Our Canadian Parliament has become the black sheep of all the parliaments spawned by Westminster.

Our Prime Minister jokes about the British dilemma. He scowls on TV mocking the Brits with the words: "The Empire strikes back . . ." And his ally, Ed Broadbent, insults members of the house by calling them "Colonel Blimps and colonials" when they show concern about the obscene burden we have inflicted upon the British.

That's the way we're winding up the British connection, and what a lousy way to close the family album. In our parliament our politicians vandalize our heritage with cheap shots.

That is what we hear from the Liberal Party tonight when I raise the legitimate concerns of Canadians and refer to the way they have been abused by the Liberal Party. All we get is cheap shots from the Liberals who are in the House tonight.

Mr. Rossi: Look who is talking about being cheap.

Mr. McKenzie:

No wonder the British are puzzled, we don't even show good form.

We certainly have not seen good form here tonight. I hope before the debate is finished we hear what the Liberals will do to help Mr. Bernie Maguire. I hope we will find out if the Liberals will fully reimburse Mr. Kelso for his court costs and all the additional costs he had to incur to save his job because he could not learn to speak another language. I hope to hear from the Liberals about what they will do about the 52 unilingual uniformed security staff on this Hill. I hope to hear what the Liberals suggest in order to save their jobs and allow them to be promoted. That is my final point. A resolution was passed here in this House in June of 1973 to protect unilingual civil servants, but it only covers federal civil servants. It does not cover House of Commons staff nor the employees of Crown corporations. I would like to see the Liberals bring forward proper legislation so that these individuals can be protected by law. Then we will know if the Liberals are really concerned about human rights and basic rights. I hope we hear from them before this debate is closed.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize the previous speaker for his very intellectual, constructive and thoughtful contribution to our constitutional debate! I found his contribution to be very motivated, and I will have a difficult time following it!

I appreciate this opportunity to participate in this constitutional debate. I join in this debate with a great deal of respect and humility. This issue is one of the great issues of recent times. It is an issue whose time has definitely come.

● (2040)

I have respect for those colleagues who have played such a contributory role in the process up to this point, colleagues from all parties who, in their own way, have served the people of Canada very well. I want to recognize especially the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) and the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) who have fulfilled their responsibilities in a most admirable style and who have made a profound contribution to the constitutional debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: I also have respect for the institution of Parliament and the opportunity it provides for all of us to participate in this crucial debate, and a decision which will touch the lives of all Canadians in profound ways for generations to come. From this stems my humility at being a part of this historic process, a historic process of paramount importance to the future of Canada and the future of Canadians.

We are now in the final stages of a debate which began, not four months ago, not four years ago, not 40 years ago, but 54 years ago when, back in 1927, J. S. Woodsworth introduced a motion to patriate the Constitution. That same motion prompted the calling of the first constitutional conference which essentially began the process we now see culminating here.

In 1947 it was T. C. Douglas who introduced Canada's first Bill of Rights and, like his colleague, J. S. Woodsworth, he too was, before his time, presenting ideas and concepts which today, decades later, we find to be valuable and certainly worthwhile advancing. The 1960s saw the beginning of Quebec's "quiet revolution", the awakening and the recognition by the people in the province of Quebec, to the fact that they had been facing injustices for years and that the time had come for the wrongs to be righted. In 1965 we saw Canada finally obtain its own flag, its own symbol of independence and autonomy. In the 1970s we saw the rise to power of the Parti Québécois and the issue of duality emerged clearly as a central theme in Canadian history. At the same time, in the 1970s we saw the centre of economic gravity in Canada shift from central Canada slowly westward, emphasizing the serious regional splits and diversity within the country. Last year, in 1980, we saw the country adopting its national anthem. We had a song to sing when the time was appropriate. In 1981, we hope to see the final steps being taken toward a Constitution for Canada.

Step by step we have won our autonomy, our independence and our sovereignty, and today we are at the close of a historic period, but let us also recognize we are about to embark on a new one. In a sense, this is the beginning, the first step toward the formation of a society of greater social and economic justice. What happens from this stage onward will be the real test of our commitment for a renewed and better Canada. Social, economic, cultural and regional changes in Canada have necessitated the need for a new Constitution. The Canada which we see in 1981 is quite a different country from the one which existed in 1867. The fabric of society has changed significantly, the demography of Canada has changed significantly, and the economic structure of Canada has changed. It is a different country requiring a different constitution.

It is important to say that the constitutional debate is not a red herring, as many have suggested. It has been suggested that it is somewhat less important than energy or the economy. No, it is very much a part of the fundamental difficulties facing our country. To fail to patriate our Constitution with an amending formula including the principle of equalization and a charter of rights would certainly threaten the very fabric of our country today.

There is no question that these are difficult, emotional and challenging times. Writing a constitution does not come easily. Nothing of value comes easily, and I would suggest that the most rewarding experiences of our lives are emotional, challenging and difficult experiences. Sir John A. Macdonald and the Fathers of Confederation did not have it easy. To do nothing is easy. To do nothing, as we did in 1931 when we decided to leave our Constitution in Britain since it would be too difficult to agree on an amending formula, was easy. To bring the Constitution home to Canada is a real challenge, and to include in it the principle of equalization, a charter of rights and an amending formula is something my party has proudly advocated and worked toward for years.

The original proposal brought before the House included the basic principles we had sought for decades and, while our first reaction was to support it, the first draft presented to Parliament had many serious and obvious flaws. It needed to be changed in an effort to adequately meet the needs of Canada in the 1980s and in the decades to come. It was at that point that the NDP, unlike the other opposition party, decided to put partisan differences aside. This was not a typical piece of legislation which the opposition felt an obligation to oppose. We decided to be a positive, constructive opposition party as the Whigs and Tories were in 1864 when they came together to address the need for a constitution in Canada. Here were politicians with strong and passionate differences who said this was too important a matter to let partisan politics interfere with their decision making. I suggest that was a decision which this House should have made and which certainly the Tory party should have made at the outset.

We sought to improve the resolution by providing serious and constructive amendments and criticisms. It has been said that we were asking the British parliament to do our work. I would ask members of the Conservative Party and all members of the House: what on earth have we been doing for the past six months? During the constitutional committee debate over 100 members of the House of Commons participated in one way or another, 914 individuals expressed their opinions regarding the proposal, and 294 groups made their views known. We asked that the debates be televised so that Canadians across the country would have an opportunity to listen in on the committee discussions and respond more appropriately to Members of Parliament. We asked that the issue be fully debated in the House of Commons, and to that of course we still hold. I personally have received over 200 pieces of correspondence and many more phone calls. I have participated in more than a dozen constitutional workshops and forums in western Canada. No one can seriously suggest that this is not a Canadian-made resolution, made by Canadians for Canadians. My disappointment is that it could have been handled much better. The principle of participatory grassroots democracy could have been included and all 282 members of the House should have had the opportunity to play a much more involved and integral role in the process, but unfortunately that is behind us and we failed in that respect.

Because of our positive and constructive approach we feel that real progress was made. We feel that we as a positive opposition party have accomplished a great deal, and again I must congratulate the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville and the hon. member for Burnaby, as well as others, who played such a critical role in achieving a better Constitution for Canada.

One of the items we feel we can legitimately share in the responsibility for achieving was a clause providing equality before and under the law in substance as well as in procedure. This is especially relevant to the 51 per cent of the population who are women in Canada. In my mind it is a clear signal to the courts of Canada to recognize women's rights.

We were successful in achieving non-discrimination rights for the handicapped in Canada. Now 700,000 individuals will have a better future because of the constructive criticisms and approach of the members of my party. We were successful in achieving educational rights for linguistic minorities. We were successful in achieving resource control for the provinces of Canada and explicit recognition of Canada's multicultural character. We worked hard with the native bands and organizations across the country to achieve an affirmation of aboriginal and native rights within the Constitution. This does a great deal to guarantee the historical and collective rights of Canada's original peoples. It would be an embarrassment for all of us if that clause had not been included; it would have been difficult for any of us to visit Indian reserves anywhere in Canada.

I was particularly moved by my colleague who spoke on behalf of the Inuit people of Canada. He explained in his speech that his great grandfather took along many of the European explorers and showed them the way through the various Arctic Islands, only to have these explorers run up on to the beaches, plant flags and claim they had found these islands for the first time. What does that say to an individual who has lived on those islands for perhaps thousands of years? What about the Indian people in my own part of British Columbia who have lived along the river valleys for 12,000 or maybe 20,000 years only to have Simon Fraser or Thompson discover them? This is the kind of thing which does little to recognize the role Canada's original peoples played in our history. I am proud to say that with our help the affirmation of aboriginal and native rights is now firmly entrenched in the Constitution of Canada.

We would like to see other changes. We would like to see the abolition of the Senate and a clarification of both women's and Indian rights within the Constitution. We would also like to see the recognition of collective bargaining rights and political rights. But these are changes we will work toward before this process is through and as it unfolds during constitutional discussions in following years.

Yes, we were prepared to make some compromise in the best interests of Canadians. For those who say compromise is a dirty game, let me say that were it not for the constructive, determined and progressive efforts of our party, many of the 59 changes to the original resolution would not have occurred as they did.

As a western Member of Parliament, I am proud of my party's amendment which secures for the provinces the right to manage, own, tax and control the non-renewable resources, the forestry resources and the hydro resources within their boundaries. These rights are key building blocks on which to create a sound, secure and diversified economic future for western Canada, as well as Canada per se. This is especially important for some provinces, particularly those in the west, since the ability to direct and develop the sale of depleting resources is absolutely crucial.

During the first 100 years of confederation the west, richly endowed with natural resources, was forced to forgo the development of a manufacturing base. Manufacturing was largely focused in central Canada and was nurtured by almost a century of strong protective tariffs. The resources of the other provinces now deserve comparable protection. Many provincial governments have been apprehensive about past judicial decisions on their traditional right to manage and control the resources within their own boundaries. Therefore, a constitutionally entrenched affirmation confirming provincial ownership and management of resources is a key element of a fair confederation package.

The amendment of the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) will help to ease the apprehension of many people in resource-producing provinces concerning their ability to use their resources to help build their economic future and to ease their uncertainty about the equity of the confederation bargain. The amendment gives the provinces the right to control the level and nature of exploration of non-renewable resources. It offers them the right to regulate the way and rate at which forestry, non-renewable and electrical resources are exploited. The amendment would permit provinces to institute resource management and conservation schemes as they deem necessary. It allows provinces to develop electrical generation projects in ways and at rates they see fit. Provinces would be able to regulate the movement of their resources within Canada, so long as it did not contravene federal legislation. Provinces would also have the right to set resource prices and levy direct and indirect taxes on the resources sold in Canada, as long as the provinces did not discriminate in the prices charged or the availability of resources to all Canadians.

These rights would apply fully to non-renewable resources, resources generating electricity and forest resources. I believe this amendment will help to allay the fears, particularly of western Canadians, that when they seek to regulate their resources their ability to do so will be halted by the complexity of federal powers. It will help to renew their conviction that the Canadian federation can be constructed fairly in ways which allow all partners to develop fully in the best interests of their people.

I should like to take a few moments to look at the four main parts of the present resolution: patriation, equalization, a charter of rights and an amending formula. I think one can gloss over quickly the section on patriation. There is no question that a few months ago this House voted unanimously for the patriation of Canada's Constitution. This must be done and as far as I am concerned, the sooner the better.

However, the topic of equalization is a very important one. The concept of the rich parts of Canada assisting the poor parts of Canada is a matter of profound concern to social democrats. Disparities exist between regions of Canada which result in unequal opportunities for Canadians at the present time. Young people from the outports of Newfoundland may not have the same opportunities as youngsters growing up in metropolitan Toronto. People from some parts of the western provinces may not have the same opportunity as those people coming from other parts of Canada. Equalization is a concept that we all use when we raise our families. Certain parts of the family are always prepared to stand by and assist other parts during times of need. In that spirit, the concept of equalization is something about which we feel extremely strongly.

Perhaps the most important section in the resolution before us is the charter of rights. I believe passionately in the protection and the existence of human rights. They must be entrenched in the Constitution to provide legal protection for all Canadians, not subject to the whim of provincial governments nor, for that matter, to the whim of federal governments. There are those who protest that protection by parliaments and legislatures has been a safe enough protection of individual rights in Canada, but I do not think history bears this out.

May I call it nine o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being nine o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

EQUALITY OF MINORITY LANGUAGE RIGHTS

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to ensure that the official language minority groups, being the English mother tongue residents of Quebec and the French mother tongue residents of the other provinces and territories, be accorded exactly the same rights and privileges as are presently accorded by law and common usage to all Canadians of the other official language.

He said: Mr. Speaker, one may wonder why I would be speaking today on a motion concerning language. I should point out that this motion was put on the Order Paper earlier. In fact, it was put on the Order Paper on April 30, 1980, long before the discussions on constitutional reform resulted in the presentation to the House of the proposal which is presently under discussion. I find it quite appropriate that I should have the opportunity this evening to discuss a subject which has been a favourite of mine since I came to this chamber some eight or nine years ago. It obviously ties in with the constitutional resolution which is presently being debated. Thus, I shall be making frequent references to that resolution.

Only through an amendment to the Constitution can Canadians be definitely assured that certain common basic minority language rights will be observed throughout the country. Reciprocal arrangements cannot guarantee protection against alterations as a result of short-term political or social changes, or against withdrawal at any time by any province which may consider that its commitment is no longer desirable. Although reciprocal arrangements have been discussed since 1977 none currently exist. The charter of rights gives effect to the principle of minority language and educational rights agreed to by all provinces in 1978.

I cannot help but make reference here to my colleague seated beside me who has some very specific opinions and who may not have the opportunity to express them tonight. I will be making some reference to them myself in a little while.

On October 16, 1980, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that it is not only the federal government which is responsible for bilingualism, but that every province which has jurisdiction over education should be concerned with that. He went on to say:

We have been funding substantially education systems in the provinces to the extent of an amount in excess of $2 billion a year... The spirit in which we helped bilingual education specifically, or education in the other official language, was that the provinces themselves be prepared to accept some responsibilities, and it is in that sense that we hope the provinces will continue to show interest in the matter and that the federal government will not always have to continue supporting them in areas which they claim very strongly are within their jurisdiction.

It is abundantly apparent that we have not been able to obtain agreement on almost any matter in connection with the constitutional proposal, least of all when it comes to education and language rights.

I would like to make a point here with respect to some allegations which have been made by members of the opposition. It has been alleged by several members, in recent writings of theirs, that members of the government party are in some fashion muzzled, that in some undefined way we do not have the freedom to express our own opinions. I want to go on the record right here and now as saying that during my nine years as a Member of Parliament, attempting freely to express my opinions, on not one single occasion has either the Prime Minister, the leader of my party, or the Quebec leader ever suggested to me that I should not freely do so. I want to make that very clear.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Herbert: I suggest that the so-called authoritarian discipline to which members of the opposition party often allude is, in fact, a jealousy which comes from the fact that the party which presently forms the government is a party bound by freely discussed common goals and objectives. In that free discussion we sometimes have our dissenters. I suggest that maybe this type of bonding that we have on this side of the House is something which is unknown to members of the official opposition.

What bothers me somewhat is that too many Tory MPs will not speak openly against individual rights, language rights, provincial sharing and measures for the common good. Surely every Conservative MP must know in his or her heart that a charter of rights will never be incorporated into our Constitution after patriation. They do not seem to admit that.

Mr. Stevens: Why?

Mr. Herbert: For once they ask why. The obvious answer to that is that there is one premier who says under no conditions will he ever admit to having a charter of rights in the Constitution after patriation.

Mr. McKinnon: Are you certain he is immortal?

Mr. Herbert: The only way they have of suppressing the rights of the minorities and less favoured citizens is to construct what I consider to be a phony issue. They imply that the most important decision in our history is not being made in Canada by Canadians.

Mr. Stevens: True.

Mr. Herbert: I say openly that members of the Tory party are lacking the courage to openly say what they are thinking, that individual rights must always be subservient to state and provincial interests. That is not my point of view.

Mr. McKinnon: Rubbish!

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I would like one of the members of the official opposition to tell me what is the essential difference between a charter of rights incorporated after patriation and a charter of rights which is included with patriation. Maybe if they would explain it to me I could better understand it.

Mr. Stevens: The one is Canadian. You wouldn't understand that.

Mr. Herbert: I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that maybe I speak from a somewhat disadvantageous position, in the sense that I am adopted by this country, a fact of which I am proud.

Mr. Stevens: You are still back in England.

Mr. Herbert: As an immigrant from an English-speaking country I am well supported by a constituency which is two-thirds French speaking. In the discussions which I have had with my constituents they seem to be of one accord with the actions of the government in trying to enshrine in our Constitution protection for everyone, including the subject under discussion tonight, the protection of minority language rights.

Citizens of Canada, whose first language learned and still understood is that of the English-speaking or French-speaking minority population of a province, will have the right to educate their children in that minority language at the primary and secondary school levels, wherever the number of children warrants the provision of such educational facilities. We have had lots of discussions about that term "numbers warrant." I will make specific reference to my colleague and good friend, the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) because, as he is possibly aware, it is here that we part company to some degree. We have discussed this on several occasions. One can stick on principle and one can say on principle that one should apply the constitutional provisions right across the country, in all provinces. Note that I say "in all provinces", not just the province of Ontario. I feel that if we are to worry about the rights of the francophones in the province of Ontario we must be equally concerned with the rights of the francophones in the other English-speaking provinces, for example, British Columbia.

● (2110)

From a purely practical point of view it might be extremely difficult to stick on that particular principle. I have often suggested that there have been considerable strides made in the nine years that I have been in this House. Maybe the progress has been slow, too slow, but there have been considerable advances and surely no one can deny that. It is my sincere hope that the action that is presently being taken with the support of the premier of the province of Ontario will continue and that after the current election is over, whoever forms the government of the province of Ontario will see fit at that time to exercise the right to enshrine in the Constitution the equivalent rights for the minorities in Ontario which are presently applicable only to the English in Quebec and the francophones in Manitoba.

I want to make a brief reference to something whilst we are talking of language. This is something that has bothered me considerably and it is the part the federal government has played in bringing some fairly considerable sums to the provinces for second language education.

Since 1970 the federal government contributed $1.3 billion to the provinces for education in the official languages. This enables Canadian students to learn, as a second language, the other official language of Canada. We had an agreement which expired March 31, 1979, and which was extended for a year on the same basis as the original agreement, which transferred some $95 million to Quebec in the past year.

The Quebec Federation of Home and School Associations in the province from which I come has been somewhat concerned that there has been no accountability for federal funding provided to the provincial governments for second language training. The federation proposed to the federal government that under the previous agreements, accountability regarding distribution of the funds by provincial departments of education to the schoolboards has not been required and that the provinces have resisted providing an accounting of the funds received and the manner of their distribution for the purpose designated under these federal grants; that taxpayers were entitled to an awareness that their contribution to federal funds be allocated in such a manner that the intent of the program be fulfilled; and that the placing of these moneys received for the purpose of minority language education into provincial general revenues could be termed misappropriation and the federal government should be ever watchful as to the proper expenditure of taxpayers' moneys. As a result, the Quebec Federation of Home and School Associations requested the federal government to require accountability from the provinces as to the distribution of federal grants for the purpose of minority language education as a condition for release of public funds.

This brings me to one of my favourite subjects and that is the problem we have in placing funding in the provinces in areas which are recognized as being of provincial responsibility. I think it should be recognized by everyone that no matter what we put into the Constitution, the good will needed to make it operational will still rest with the provincial legislatures. I have always maintained that no matter what might appear in the law, the provincial governments will still have the ultimate control via the financing of education.

The article to which we have been referring in the Constitution makes English and French the official languages of Canada. They will have equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all institutions of the Parliament and Government of Canada. The purpose for this section was to exclude the possibility of a government seeking to advance one language at the expense of the other official language or to advance one and justify reducing the other. The educational rights of French-speaking citizens outside Quebec are to be guaranteed in clause 23.

Clause 19 of the constitutional proposal provides as follows:

(1) Either English or French may be used by any person in, or in any pleading in or process issuing from, any court established by Parliament.

(2) Either English or French may be used by any person in, or in any pleading in or process issuing from, any court of New Brunswick.

This clause confirms the right to use both English and French in all courts established by Parliament. It derives from Section 133 of the BNA Act. Subclause (2) confirms the right to use English and French in the courts of New Brunswick. Of course, these provisions already extend to the provinces of Quebec and Manitoba by virtue of section 133 of the British North America Act and Section 23 of the Manitoba Act, 1870. Clause 21 simply states that the existing language protection provided by the present Constitution, for example, the protection set out in section 133 of the BNA Act and section 23 of the Manitoba Act, 1870, would continue.

The constitutional proposal which is presently before this House in very large measure takes care of the proposal in the motion I have presented this evening and which I put on the Order Paper in April last year.

I would have been happy to see an extension of section 133 right across the country. From a purely practical point of view I believe we have to compromise. Is it a compromise on principle? I have to fight with my conscience but I will say in all honesty that certainly in the province of Quebec we have never had any fear for the protection of the English language; at least, we had no fear until the present premier of the province decided to make things a little bit more difficult for the English.

I have looked at the situation where the present provincial Liberal party is discussing the two alternatives, what are commonly called the "Canada clause" and the "international clause." For those who have followed discussions in Quebec, this deals essentially with the so-called inequality that might apply to immigrants. To that I can only say, and I will put this on the record as my last statement, that since the federal government has concluded an agreement with the provincial governments which effectively passes control of immigration to the provincial governments, then as long as the control of the immigrants entering the province of Quebec is in the hands of the provincial government, surely the provincial government need have no fear that the number of francophones will be watered down by the entry of too many speaking the other official language, English. I put this on the record because I want to allay the fears of some of my francophone colleagues in Quebec who are concerned about this particular aspect.

I can only say that I appreciate this opportunity to speak on a matter very dear to my heart, namely, the protection of minority rights. I am most appreciative of the attitude of people in the province of Quebec toward the anglophone minority. But I say with real conviction that an immigrant entering this country has that freedom of choice and should not expect to have the same privilege when he enters one province as he enters another. For example, if he enters Quebec, he should recognize it as being essentially a French-speaking province. If he enters other provinces, which are essentially English-speaking provinces, he should be prepared to speak the first language of that province.

I appreciate being able to talk about minority languages. I know many members want to speak tonight and I would like to give them that opportunity. I doubt whether this motion, in view of the constitutional proposal, will pass. Nevertheless, I commend it to all.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) for bringing this motion forward, but the language issue goes far beyond what is contained in his motion. I want to refer particularly to a matter he raised at the Standing Committee on Official Languages a couple of weeks ago. It concerned an air traffic controller at Dorval who was forced to leave his position because he was unable to learn the French language. He had to spend five years in the courts before he was able to return to his position, only after it was found that the present government removed him from his post illegally. The hon. member for Vaudreuil is well aware of that case because he raised it in the standing committee. However, he was more concerned about having bilingual air traffic controllers handling incoming air traffic. I want to point out to the hon. member for Vaudreuil that there are other duties in an air traffic control tower which a unilingual English or a unilingual French person can handle. Air traffic controllers do not have to be abused in the way Mr. Kelso at Dorval was by the present government.

When Bill-101 was introduced by the present government in Quebec, as I recall we requested that it be referred to the Supreme Court. The Liberal government refused to have that bill referred to the Supreme Court to find out whether it was legal. The government has still not done that to this day. When we read what the leader of the Liberal Party and what Bill-101 say with regard to English-speaking Canadians in the province of Quebec, we have to question the sincerity of this motion and the sincerity of the Liberal Party in protecting the language rights of individuals across the country. If the Liberal Party was so concerned about language rights and about individual Canadian's rights, we could start protecting them right here in the House of Commons. Speaking tonight in the constitutional debate, I referred to the 52 unilingual English uniformed security guards who can no longer appear at the main entrance or in the gallery because they speak only English.

I want to refer now to the language resolution which was passed in the House of Commons in June, 1973, particularly Clause 6 and Clause 7. Clause 6 states:

that unilingual incumbents of bilingual positions may elect to become bilingual and undertake language training, or transfer to another job having the same salary maximum, or if they were to decline such a transfer, to remain in their positions even though the posts have been designated as bilingual;

I would like to see that clause become law to protect all unilingual civil servants. Unfortunately, this resolution only refers to federal civil servants. It does not cover the House of Commons staff, but it should. It does not cover Crown corporations, but it should. If that were made law, we would still have these people at the main entrance or in the gallery instead of having them walking down corridors because they speak only English.

I would like to see the hon. member for Vaudreuil pursue this particular point.

Clause 7 states:

that employees who, as on April 6, 1966, had at least ten years of continuous service and who, since that date, have been employed continuously in the federal public service, will be entitled to apply for any job that has been identified for future designation as bilingual without having to indicate their willingness to become bilingual—

I would question whether anyone in the civil service, anyone on the House of Commons staff or with any Crown corporation could do that today. Therefore, I would be most interested to see the hon. member for Vaudreuil make those two clauses law. He is not even listening to the debate tonight, so I really cannot take his motion seriously. I think the motion is rather facetious.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, maybe the problem is that the hon. member was not pronouncing my constituency in a fashion that I could recognize it. Perhaps that was the difficulty.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I apologize. I have difficulty in pronouncing the hon. member's constituency of Vaudreuil correctly. However, he knows perfectly well what I mean. That was a great answer he gave. He has great fun with private members' hour and motions, slowing them up and causing us no end of problems. I think this is nothing but a facetious motion he has presented here tonight.

I would ask the hon. member for Vaudreuil to consider looking at Clauses 6 and 7 in this resolution which the Liberal Party refuses to make law, introduced in June, 1973, if he is so concerned about individuals, language rights and what have you. I will toss that out to him and to the other members of the Liberal Party who are having great fun tonight laughing at English-speaking Canadians who are being abused and not being given the opportunity to learn a second language, or who cannot learn a second language. The Liberal Party thinks it is a big joke that they are being abused and are having to go through the courts to protect their jobs. I ask the hon. member to bring this matter to the attention of the caucus, and take a look at Section 7 of this phony resolution presented in 1973. Perhaps then we can take the motion more seriously. In the meantime, I cannot take it seriously after the way I have seen the hon. member conduct himself here in the House tonight.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin my remarks by expressing my appreciation to the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) for bringing this motion forward. I also want to recognize the good work of the parliamentary secretary who is concerned with this motion. His incentive and obvious natural ability to muster together Members of Parliament to contribute to this motion should be recognized.

I realize the debate got off the rails a bit a few moments ago when we heard about a particular name being mentioned in a certain fashion, but quite apart from that type of exchange, I think that opportunities for members to debate in this House should not be used in a personal way but should be directed more to the subject matter at hand. The subject has to do with a commitment by this government that all Canadians would have equal opportunities and rights. That commitment was kept. This is not something which came up in the last 24 hours, six months or year. It is a commitment we heard from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) even before he became Prime Minister of this country.

• (2130)

There have been many exchanges in the historic debate on the resolution with respect to patriation. As the hon. member who introduced the motion said earlier, it is timely that we debate this motion now. It gives us an opportunity to remind ourselves and, more importantly, all Canadians, of the continuity of our Prime Minister, the cabinet, the government of the day and this party. There has been no change in the momentum, order of deliverance or position by the Prime Minister.

On each occasion he has been consistent in the fact that if there is anything that can be done during his term of office to entrench language rights in a Canadian Constitution that will be there forever, he will do all he can to protect the rights of Canadians, especially those of minority groups.

I come from a province which has demonstrated in the past and continues to demonstrate its natural ability to embrace Canadians in this fashion. Therefore, it is appropriate that I take part in this private members' debate this evening. Before the resolution package there was a willingness and spirit of co-operation by both French and English New Brunswickers to provide the necessary legislation to guarantee government services, including those of the courts, and educational rights. I want to express my appreciation to those who made it their duty to ensure the protection of those rights.

On this subject, I have clearly indicated support for my party, as have those who supported me in elections over the past six years. I give my full support to the Prime Minister and the government in this serious attempt to protect all Canadians, not only with respect to language rights but general rights, individual rights, native rights, rights of the handicapped and all others.

Perhaps the hon. member for Vaudreuil is a bit ahead of himself in introducing this motion. He admitted throughout his speech that he is satisfied and convinced the government is doing what is right. The resolution package is broad enough and, where numbers warrant, provides adequate protection so that those wishing to achieve proficiency in the other language will have the proper facilities. I am sure the hon. member agrees that even though we can legislate all these rights, we cannot adopt a laissez faire attitude. We must clearly define the goals and objectives in terms of rights and protecting individual needs.

I live in northern New Brunswick. I wanted my three sons to have the opportunity of learning the other official language. It was not easy in those days. I was told they would have to attend immersion courses. I did not agree with that. It was necessary to expend a lot of energy to get the school board to permit them to attend a totally French language school so that they might become fluently bilingual. I am delighted to be able to report tonight that the system worked for me and my family. My three sons completed their elementary schooling in the French language. They did not attend immersion courses or something else which did not interest me. They are, as I said, fluently bilingual. That was some 15 years ago. It convinced me that the system can and does work. Leading into the eighties, I can see where there have been some struggles. We have had to be forceful in putting forward our case to protect our rights, especially with respect to language. We have been successful. I was very confident in putting forward my own personal experience in this regard.

I want to restate, for the benefit of all Canadians, that the government has certainly carried through on all its commitments and promises. If there was ever a clear example of a political party or a government keeping its promise, I think the evidence shows it is the present administration, and the administration we had leading our government for more than a dozen years. They have been consistent in their commitment to ensure that one day we would be able, with the Immigration Act and the Citizenship Act, to have our own flag, and our own national anthem, more recently proclaimed, in 1980. After all that, we are now getting to the last major planning and that is the patriation of the Constitution.

Canadians have become aware of the fact that the government was serious about proceeding with patriation of the Constitution. There are many people who became very emotional and went off in different directions. Now that they have had an opportunity to examine what they want for the future of their own families, they are very quietly accepting the position of the government and supporting the excellent document which has been brought back to the House from the joint committee.

It has been my impression that there has been a decided shift in the attitude of Canadians across the country with respect to the resolution before the House. With all the months of hard work by members of the House and the Senate in the joint committee, and with the concluding work taking place in the House prior to the resolution being sent over to the British Parliament, we can be justifiably proud of the fact that, not only in terms of those who have contributed to this historic debate, and apart from all the rhetoric and accusations that fly across the country and the floor of the House, this is a political party, whose leaders and administrators of the government of the day have been consistent in their position. They have been consistent in what they have offered Canadians across the country and in their words and actions. That consistency is borne out by the fact that we see the final days of the work necessary to patriate the Constitution.

I am satisfied we can give assurance to the hon. member for Vaudreuil this evening, that not only will rights be entrenched in the Constitution when it is brought back to Canada, but with the amending formula people in every sector of the country will have equal opportunity, through the democratic process of bringing in appropriate change when there is agreement that change is necessary.

I want to conclude by again thanking the parliamentary secretary and the hon. member for Vaudreuil for giving me this opportunity to participate in the debate during private members' hour this evening. I wish to state again that I am satisfied the Prime Minister and his cabinet have kept their word and their commitment to all Canadians, but in particular to the people of New Brunswick and the constituency I represent, in that we are seeing the results of the action taken to bring back that document which will forever protect our rights, particularly with respect to language.

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, I would not have taken this opportunity to rise with respect to the motion of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) had it not been for a couple of occurrences during the address of my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie). The first related to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Vaudreuil when he questioned the pronunciation of his riding, obviously indicating that the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine was not sufficiently fluent in the language with which that riding identifies itself to be recognized as having an opportunity to address the hon. member who made the motion. I am reminded of a motion placed before the last Liberal general meeting in Winnipeg—which I hope was defeated—which provided that in the view of the person making that motion, and presumably seconding it, only bilingual persons should qualify for membership in the House of Commons. Quite frankly, if that comment coming from the hon. member for Vaudreuil was a harbinger of events to come, then it might be appropriate for hon. members opposite to stand in their places when the occasion arises, indicating that is indeed their position.

Mr. Herbert: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. My reference to pronunciation was simply because the hon. member who was speaking said that I was not listening, and I wanted to draw it to his attention, that I certainly was listening.

Mr. Gamble: The record will show the reasons he gave were rather apparent. He made reference to his mispronunciation.

In any event, the other matter which gave me concern was the levity which prevailed in the government benches when some mention was made, again by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine, of the fact that there had been some injustice done to a unilingual Canadian public servant, and that injustice happened to be done to a unilingual English-speaking public servant.

I hope members opposite will recognize that the vast majority of the population of Canada is unilingual either in French or in English. That kind of reaction is hardly commendable in the House of Commons. If there is to be a privileged class established—a bilingual class—in Canada, then I would suggest members on both sides of the House recognize that it would be appropriate, until that class makes up the majority of the population of Canada, not to refer jokingly or laughingly to the unhappiness or ill consequences that befall Canadian citizens who speak only one of our two official languages. If you are laughing, it is for a purpose, I presume.

I would like to now direct my attention to the motion itself. The motion is so badly drafted it scarcely merits the attention of the House. I draw the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. member who introduced it did not take the trouble to read it. I will just do that, if I may.

● (2150)

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing legislation to ensure that the official language minority groups, being the English mother tongue residents of Quebec and the French mother tongue residents of the other provinces and territories, be accorded exactly the same rights and privileges as are presently accorded by law and common usage to all Canadians of the other official language.
