Exactly what are the same rights and privileges as are presently accorded? Where are they presently accorded? Are we to assume that we are to take one of the provinces in this country and determine what rights are enjoyed? Let us take the province of Quebec and see what rights are enjoyed there. For instance, can a businessman conduct his business in the province of Quebec in whatever language he chooses?

Mr. McKenzie: No.

Mr. Gamble: Is it suggested by the hon. member for Vaudreuil that that kind of restriction be imposed upon Canadians in every province in this country? Surely not, but that is what he is referring to. What provinces are we to seek out? Are we to oblige the province of Quebec to follow, in the event he chooses the province of Ontario where today one can carry on business in whatever language one chooses, whether it be Greek, Italian, French, English or Japanese? Does he wish now to oblige the province of Quebec to permit all the business in that province to be conducted in any language anyone chooses?

Perhaps the reference is to the admission to professions in any of the provinces in Canada. Are we to take as our guide the admission to the professions in the province of Quebec where proficiency in the French language is required? Is that what he is suggesting, or are we to take the province of British Columbia, where no proficiency test is required other than the test required to pass a normal examination? These people have already passed examinations with respect to their ability in the professions, but now there is a new provincial obligation in Quebec. What exactly are the same rights and privileges accorded across Canada?

Are we talking about mother tongue language requirements for Canadian business corporations before those business corporations can conduct business with provincial governments? This depends entirely upon the provincial government with which you are dealing. If you are dealing with the provincial government of Quebec, then there are certain mother tongue requirements for your chief shareholders or you cannot deal with that provincial government under provincial contracts in that province. Is that what the hon. member is suggesting we impose on Canadians across Canada? I hardly think it is. The hon. member speaks of having exactly the same rights and privileges as are presently accorded by law and common usage to all Canadians of the other official language, but where is it that these suggestions apply?

The hon. member for Vaudreuil is a member of this House from one of the ridings in the province of Quebec, and it is presumably on the basis of his intimate knowledge of the requirements of the law in that province that he speaks. It appears he would like the marvellous provisions of that law extended across Canada, but I hardly think that is indeed what he has in mind. If it is, then I submit that the business community and the professional community in Canada is not prepared for that kind of artificial restriction. It is better the way it is. There is only one province which restricts that kind of freedom. Let us leave it in that province and not extend it across the whole of this country.

There was some suggestion by the hon. member for Vaudreuil that section 16(2) of the constitutional resolution presently before the House is in some way to be equated with Section 133 of the British North America Act. I know that is what he said, but I am sure that is not what he meant. If we read Section 133 of the British North America Act we find it applies to the right to use both languages in the courts, in Parliament and in the legislature of the province of Quebec. Section 16(2) of the proposed resolution provides:

English and French are the official languages of New Brunswick and have equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all institutions of the legislature and government of New Brunswick.

Section 17(2) provides:

Everyone has the right to use English or French in any debates and other proceedings of the legislature of New Brunswick.

Section 19(2) provides:

Either English or French may be used by any person in, or in any pleading in or process issuing from, any court of New Brunswick.

Section 16(2) goes far beyond what is required by the provisions of Section 133 of the British North America Act.

I was intrigued by the comments made by the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail), who spoke of respect for all minorities. That comment is to be contrasted with the remarks made by the hon. member for Vaudreuil, who indicated that there is a convention or agreement between the federal government and the governments of the various provinces granting the governments of the various provinces the rights to control immigration to those provinces. The hon. member then went on to say that accordingly any immigrant who comes to Canada has the right to determine which province and which major language group he shall join, and has no complaint in the event he should join a province where the language he might choose is different from the language used by the majority. That, of course, is to be contrasted with the comments made by the hon. member for Restigouche.

I submit that the statement made by the hon. member for Vaudreuil with respect to agreements between the federal government government and the provincial governments across Canada is inaccurate.

There is indeed an agreement between the federal government and the government of Quebec which permits the government of Quebec to control immigration into that province. But the record should show that no such agreement exists in the province of Ontario. I submit that we should treat all Canadians in the fashion I understood the hon. member for Restigouche to speak of. That is vastly different from the way the hon. member for Vaudreuil would have us treated. In other words, when we are dealing with rights across this country, let us not segregate Canadians who are immigrants and who may not fall into one of the two official language designations we have in the resolution before the House with respect to the Constitution. That is the proper way, not the way suggested by the hon. member for Vaudreuil.

In the event there is to be good will, to which we have heard reference by the hon. member, that good will must establish a basis across Canada on which all Canadians, regardless of their heritage, have common, universal rights with respect to language, rather than rights restricted on the basis of whether those new Canadians—because that is what they wili become—happen to speak a language other than French or English when they choose to make Canada their home.

Accordingly, I have no hesitation at all in suggesting to the House that, because of its inability to deal with and adequately explain the nature of the existing common rights across Canada and in all the provinces, this motion is unacceptable. I doubt whether we should divide Canadians into groups, the privileged groups being the English and the French-speaking mother tongue groups. I regret the creation of underprivileged, second-class citizens as suggested by the hon. member for Vaudreuil who would, with ease and without compunction as to the effect such creation would have upon their rights as Canadian citizens, restrict those rights which should be enjoyed by all Canadians regardless of the other tongue they may speak. The hon. member's reference to Section 23 of the constitutional provisions is one which I reject, and I hope other hon. members of this House will do the same.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NORTH-SOUTH RELATIONS—STATEMENT BY NON-ALIGNED NATIONS—DEVELOPMENT OF CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, I have come here tonight to again urge the government to implement the report of the North-South task force presented to the House more than two and a half months ago with 38 recommendations which, in my judgment, are sensitive to the North-South dilemma today and are sensible with respect to Canada's capacity to play a role in bridging the wide gap between north and south today.

The interim report of the North-South task force dealt with the special recommendation that the four emergency provisions of the Brandt report be implemented. Those four emergency provisions are that an extra $4 billion in official development assistance from all donor countries be put into play each year, that there be a food security program, an energy security program, and a reform of international financial institutions. The essence was that the Brandt commission deemed it so important it urged this in a section of the report called the emergency provisions.

I am very pleased the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) has come here personally tonight to respond to this brief intervention I am making. He is indicating again, as he has before, his concern for the role which Canada must play in implementing its own set of responsibilities in carrying forward a tradition which has been a hallmark of Canadian foreign policy almost since the end of World War II. I urge the minister again to consider that he has before him the North-South task force report which carries the support of all political parties in the House and, indeed, I suggest a wide section of the Canadian public.

I want to speak for a moment about an organization well known to the minister since he was my predecessor as the international chairman of Parliamentarians for World Order, an organization of 550 parliamentarians in some 18 countries around the world. I am pleased to say that we benefit from the strong support of the Canadian Parliament, of both the House of Commons and the Senate and the speakers thereof, and we are able to bring focus on the United Nations issues particularly those revolving around development and disarmament. I regard the work of Parliamentarians for World Order to be so important that I want to draw to the attention of the House tonight a statement made by Parliamentarians for World Order at the council meeting in London a couple of months ago in which the statement revolving around the Brandt commission was adopted.

I will spend a moment telling the House precisely what that statement said in an effort to inform hon. members and to widen that circle of support for concrete, sensible steps being taken to close the North-South gap, particularly in this year of the summits in which special attention is being given to the North-South question. I quote from the statement issued by Parliamentarians for World Order which reads as follows:

> —recognizing that North-South relations, world poverty and the arms race are the great social challenges of our time, calls upon parliamentarians throughout the world to work in their own parliaments and in the United Nations Organization to fully implement the report of the independent commission on international development issues under the chairmanship of Willy Brandt.
> If a small fraction of the $500 billion spent annually on military purposes were to be added to the $20 billion now spent on official development assistance, the possibilities of making much faster progress in solving development problems would be greatly enhanced.

● (2205)

One half of one per cent of one year's world military expenditures would pay for all the farm equipment needed to increase food production and approach self-sufficiency in food-deficit, low-income countries by 1990.

As parliamentarians we recognize that the people we represent must be made more aware of the terrible danger to world stability caused by the arms race, of the burden it imposes on national economies, and of the resources it diverts from peaceful development.

Parliamentarians for World Order welcomes the forthcoming summit meetings of world leaders from both industrialized and developing nations. We believe that these summit meetings could provide a new focus and a new concentration on current world problems and their possible solution. We call on world leaders to launch ideas for a world economic recovery program and for the world's parliamentarians to act to urgently implement the program and to raise the issue in their national parliaments.

Parliamentarians for World Order has decided to campaign in parliaments around the world for the full implementation of the report.

That statement was issued by the Parliamentarians for World Order at their meeting in London.

I urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to take that statement very seriously, to add to it his consideration of the parliamentary task force with its 38 recommendations, and to take steps to ensure that Canada will have a positive, vigorous, sensitive and sensible policy in this year of the summits on North-South relations.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity of replying to the distinguished hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche) who, in addition to representing his constituents with such ability in this Parliament, is also now the international chairman of Parliamentarians for World Order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: That organization is a young one, and I must say that I have some familiarity with it. I wish him well in his task and the attempt to lobby successfully in parliaments around the world with respect to aid for international development and, I believe, on other subjects such as disarmament. I am sure members of this House will listen very attentively to his words and the admonitions of Parliamentarians for World Order.

The government is most supportive of the recommendations of the Brandt commission report and the recommendations of the "Breau-Roche" commission report presented to the House several months ago. In his original question the hon. member cited a New York Times reference to the communiqué of Non-Aligned Foreign Ministers at their recent meeting in New Delhi to the effect that industrialized countries were denounced for their "negative and intransigent attitude" on the North-South question. I believe the response of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at the time was that that did not apply to Canada. Indeed, I assure the House that it does not, because not only is our attitude not negative and intransigent, but in fact world figures such as Mr. Ramphal, the Secretary-General of the Commonwealth, have singled us out for commendation because of the increase in official development assistance which is planned for the immediately ensuing year, and following years as well. In other words, we have reversed the downward trend in official development assistance which has been occurring in recent years. We are determined that we will rise to .7 of the GNP by the end of the decade.

In fact, I assure the hon. member that not only is the Prime Minister very active with respect to North-South problems, as has been evident by his dialogue with a number of countries including Saudi Arabia, Nigeria, Brazil and Mexico, but he has now received an invitation to go to Algeria for the same purpose. I am about to leave shortly for a conference with a number of foreign ministers in Vienna concerning the Summit meeting on North-South, which is to be held in Mexico in early June. That is an extremely important undertaking. Although it is not directly connected to the global negotiations, which are now at a standstill, we hope nevertheless that there may be some indirect effect which will help to get those global negotiations under way.

In any event, we are committed not only to the North-South Summit and to progress in North-South relations but to the global negotiations as well. We hope it will be a major focal point of the economic summit which is to be held here in Ottawa in late July.

With those words I would say that I believe we are on the same wavelength as the hon. member. I am pleased to see that over the weekend his party has resisted the temptation to reject foreign aid and has once again endorsed it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CANADIAN POLICY WITH RESPECT TO EL SALVADOR

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening for the purpose of seeking a clear statement from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) on Canada's response to military intervention in the civil strife which continues in El Salvador. I am pleased that the minister is here this evening and I look forward to his response.

My questions to the minister on February 19 did not yield a satisfactory commitment that Canada is honouring its previous position which it demonstrated most recently by signing a resolution on December 15, 1980, of the United Nations General Assembly on human rights in El Salvador which reads in part:

Considering that the supply of arms and other military assistance will serve to aggravate the situation in that country, the General Assembly calls upon governments to refrain from the supply of arms and other military assistance in the current circumstances.

The minister has told the House as recently as this afternoon that information which he has received since his meeting with the American Secretary of State, General Haig, has convinced him that the increased intervention of the United States government should not be criticized by the Government of Canada. He stated today that Canada has no special interest in El Salvador. Because Canada has no ambassador in El Salvador, the minister says he is satisfied to rely on information made available by the U.S. State Department.

However, he still maintains that he supports a political rather than a military solution to the conflict. I find my credulity stretched to the breaking point. This is not the logic of a government which is truly committed to a diplomatic solution to a long overdue process of social and political reform.

As for the position that Canada has no special interest in El Salvador, I cannot let such an uninformed and potentially inhumane assertion go unchallenged. The minister himself, as well as Members of Parliament from all parties, have received representations from such Canadian-based interest groups as the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, the Canadian Council of Churches and the Interchurch Committee on Human Rights in Latin America. In short, representations have been made by most of the major denominations in Canada, as well as labour unions, human rights organizations and others. Each of these groups, through their representatives in El Salvador, has pleaded the case that Archbishop Romero made to the world before his assassination. He said:

—let the people of El Salvador find a solution to their own problems, without the military intervention of any foreign government.

As former U.S. ambassador to El Salvador, Robert White told the committee of the U.S. House of Representatives as recently as last week:

Military aid to this government is not crucial, and it runs the risk of diverting the attention from the real problem of El Salvador, which is political reconciliation.

On September 23, 1980, the Secretary of State for External Affairs was kind enough to address Parliamentarians for World Order in New York. I was pleased to lead to that seminar a Canadian delegation of six members from all parties and to listen to the excellent points on disarmament which the minister made to that assembly of international parliamentarians. He said:

As legislators, we can play a catalytic role in persisting in our quest for a more just and secure world. As politicians, too, we can provide a much needed leadership in sensitizing the people we represent to the need for perseverance in changing the old patterns, in building new perceptions of humanity in an interdependent world.

We must reject the notion that it is naive to pursue disarmament in a world whose existence is threatened by the armaments of two super powers.

● (2215)

How can the minister possibly justify his self-described reaction of quiet quiescence in the face of American military intervention in El Salvador? What evidence has he received from either the Vatican, through its papal Nuncio in Ottawa, or from the U.S. State Department that could cause him to make such a dramatic and potentially inhumane about face? I suggest to the minister that "quiet quiescence" does not constitute a non-military solution to any conflict. I also suggest that there are comments today in the Toronto Star taken from the Washington Post which suggest very strongly that there is much other evidence.

In face of even the slightest possibility of military intervention in El Salvador, I urge the minister to generate diplomatic pressure together with the governments of Venezuela and Mexico, with both of which Canada has agreed in the past.

In light of the discrepancy between the evidence he says there is between the world churches and the U.S. State Department, and in light of the minister's decision to take the word of General Haig over all the personal experiences of clergy and others, I believe the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence must call expert witnesses from the churches and the media and all interested parties. Now that the estimates have come down for 1981-82, I intend to approach the chairman of that standing committee and its steering committee to see whether this testimony can be made available to Parliament through the standing committee before the President of the United States arrives here to consult with our government. There should be a firm and representative body of evidence placed before the minister and before the government as it negotiates with our closest ally, our good friends from the United States.

I thank you very much for the opportunity to make this further representation, Mr. Speaker, and I look forward to the comments of the minister.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada has been entirely consistent in its position on El Salvador.

We have consistently proclaimed our interest in human rights in the world. In the case of El Salvador, on many occasions through the Organization of American States, through the United Nations and its agencies, and in bilateral talks with the government of El Salvador two weeks ago, we have made representations on behalf of human rights in that country.

We have consistently proclaimed our support for peace in the world and our opposition to the supplying offensive arms to El Salvador by outside sources.

We have consistently insisted on the importance and necessity of a political solution in El Salvador, not a military solution. What we have had no right to do, and have no intention of doing, is to lay down the form of the political solution in that country or to favour one side or the other in the political battle and the military battle which has occurred.

To the best of my knowledge our policy is identical to that of those countries close to El Salvador which have, of course, a very strong interest in that country, such as Mexico and Venezuela.

Let me draw to your attention that in the joint press statement issued by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) and the President of Mexico on May 27, 1980, there was the following statement:

The President and the Prime Minister also discussed the situation in Latin America and the Caribbean—

They expressed the hope that these problems can soon be overcome through the free expression of the will of the respective peoples and without foreign interference.

Similar views were expressed in the joint communiqué issued following the meeting of the Canada-Mexico ministerial committee on January 7 to 9 this year which reads in part as follows:

The two foreign ministers . . . expressed the hope that the existing conflicts in Central America will be resolved by means of the free expression of the will of the respective peoples and without foreign interference.

Similar views were expressed in the joint communiqué issued following the visit of the foreign minister of Brazil, from September 28 to October 1, 1980:

The two ministers exchanged views about the current situation in Latin America and the Caribbean—

They expressed the hope that the countries concerned would be able to overcome their difficulties without foreign interference and in accordance with the wishes of their peoples.

In a joint communiqué issued at the conclusion of the visit of the foreign minister of Venezuela from February 4 to 7, 1981, there appears the following:

● (2220)

Those are the views which the Government of Canada has consistently expressed. We have no intention of conducting a campaign for a particular kind of government in El Salvador. We are not taking the word of any one source. In fact, our position is precisely that. Given our lack of close involvement with El Salvador for generations, we are in no position to pass judgment on the political situation in that country. That has been our position consistently. We believe it is a position which will contribute to the solution of problems in that area, accompanied, as it is, by our willingness to use our good offices in every way possible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

At 10.21 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HEALTH

NATIONAL KIDNEY MONTH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on behalf of the more than 100,000 Canadians who suffer from the serious or crippling effects of kidney disease. I believe this motion will be supported by all members of this House. Whereas the month of March has been proclaimed by His Excellency the Governor General as National Kidney Month, and in view of the outstanding work being done by the volunteers of the Kidney Foundation of Canada through the provision of early detection programs, support for dialysis centres and organ transplant patients, and scientific research into the causes and cures of kidney disease, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Gurbin):

That this House commends those countless volunteers and medical specialists from across Canada who offer hope and even miracles to those who bear the burden of kidney disease, and further, this House urges all Canadians to support the work of the Kidney Foundation of Canada.

Madam Speaker: I am sure the House will want to express its sentiments by applauding this motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

CALL FOR RESTRUCTURING OF POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Len. Gustafson (Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Under the National Energy Policy of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde), the oil industry in the province of Saskatchewan has suffered a severe blow. Saskatchewan oil companies are asked to produce oil at a loss of 25 cents to $1 per barrel. Oil rigs and capital are leaving for the United States, production is curtailed, supply and service companies are out of work and unemployment is the result, affecting the whole economy of Canada. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the Government of Canada in this emergency situation, restructure the entire energy policy of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EFFECT OF GAS TAX ON FARMERS' COSTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the wellhead tax on gas will increase the cost of liquid nitrogen fertilizers by almost $100 per ton and the price of other fertilizers derived from the petroleum industry by a comparable amount, and whereas this has a major impact on farmers' costs of production, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That the Minister of Agriculture insist that his government conduct a change of policy which would include a substantial reduction in the tax on hydrocarbons used for the production of fertilizer and a reduction in the cost of farm fuel.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

RAILWAYS

SUGGESTED MAINTENANCE OF CROWSNEST PASS AGREEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to move the following motion. Given that a majority of western farmers support the Crowsnest Pass freight rates and that the presence of their representatives in Ottawa is causing cabinet ministers and even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to change their minds on the subject, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humboldt-Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse):

That the government make an immediate and firm commitment to sustain the statutory Crowsnest rates and to proceed immediately with a national transportation policy which would eliminate regional inequities and which would find immediate favour with the farmers who have made considerable sacrifices in time and money in order to bring their deeply held concerns to the attention of all parliamentarians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

CALL FOR SUSPENSION OF REGULATIONS AFFECTING CHINOOK SALMON SPORTS FISHING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the sports fishing policy announced by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) as it relates to chinook salmon and the obvious inequity against the sports fishermen, and apparently in favour of an industrial fleet which, incidentally, is destroying up to one million or more immature chinooks each year because of indiscriminate fishing methods, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans implement a 90-day suspension of this policy and during that time engage in consultation and give full disclosure of the scientific facts on which he based his decision, as well as indicate the action he is taking against U.S. fishermen who are also endangering this species.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR REFERRAL TO PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given that this House has never had an opportunity to examine the National Energy Program as a complete package and given that several ad hoc changes have been made or promised by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), including the imposition yesterday of the Lalonde levy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes):

That the National Energy Program be referred to a standing or special committee of this House so that members of the Canadian public can be aware of and assess the impact of this program on Canada's energy, as well as economic future.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Masters (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the astounding revelations this past weekend at the national Conservative convention by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) that arguments made in the constitutional debate have caused him to reject the Vancouver formula and embrace the concept of the charter of rights applicable to all Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Guelph (Mr. Schroder):

That this House urges all Conservative MPs to end their mindless opposition to the Constitution and join the hon. member for Northumberland in supporting the proposals now before the House.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

EFFECT OF NORWEGIAN HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of most urgent and pressing necessity. The Sami nation, or Laplanders, are being threatened by a huge hydroelectric project on the Alta River in northern Norway. They have been involved in sit-ins, hunger strikes, and demonstrations against a project which threatens the basis of their culture. Since Canada has made a great advance in recognizing aboriginal rights in the constitutional resolution, therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That this House urge the Norwegian government to seek a peaceful solution to the conflict which recognizes the interests and wishes of the indigenous people who have traditionally occupied the land in Arctic Scandinavia.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MISSISSAUGA PUBLISHING COMPANY TAKEOVER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, last week the corporate owners of the Toronto Star purchased the control of Inland Publishing Company of Mississauga to concentrate further the ownership of newspapers in the greater Toronto area. As a matter of pressing necessity I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That this House direct the Kent commission, which is examining the concentration of ownership by fewer and fewer individuals and corporations involved in the newspaper publishing industry, to examine and report on the purchase by Metro Span of Inland Publishing.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion. Following the joint announcement by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, assistance under the herd maintenance program to the drought stricken prairies was expected.

Whereas many cattlemen had purchased feed at excessively high prices in order to retain herds; whereas the rains came after the hay crop had been harvested; whereas many applications are now rejected on the basis of rainfall while in the same letter a request is made to provide the review board with information on the rainfall in the applicant's area, thereby indicating that their information is inadequate, and whereas the Minister of Agriculture announced on February 13 a 37 per cent increase in the feed freight assistance adjustment program to Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the minister also announce a similar increase in the funds under the herd maintenance program to cover the areas of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba that had suffered from drought, and thereby provide assistance to the cattle industry similar to that given Quebec, and reduce the level of western alienation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

STATUS OF WOMEN

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF INDIAN ACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, Sunday, March 8, marks International Women's Day, when women around the world will celebrate progress in their struggle against discrimination. In order that Canadian women can truly celebrate this day, and since there is already agreement by all women Members of Parliament, representing all parties, on the necessity of removing one significant piece of discrimination from our federal legislation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That the government show its good faith by immediately introducing legislation to remove Section 12(1)(b) from the Indian Act.

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

COST BORNE BY CANADIAN CONSUMERS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It has to do with the cost to Canadian consumers of Canada's energy policy. I wonder if the Minister of Finance would confirm to this House that Canadian taxpayers are being called upon to subsidize the payment of $46 per barrel for Venezuelan and Saudi Arabian crude and $52 per barrel for Mexican oil, while we are paying only $17.75 per barrel to Canadian producers.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the taxpayers of Canada are not being called upon to pay for the additional cost of imported oil as a result of a deliberate decision of the government of Alberta to undertake production cutbacks. It is solely because of that action by the government of Alberta that this particular additional burden on the consumers of Canada is being placed at this time. At the moment the government of Alberta decides to do away with these cutbacks, the additional cost will be removed.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, I would like to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to the question I put to him. The question I put to him had to do with the difference between the price we are paying, because of Canadian policy, to Saudi Arabian, Venezuelan and Mexican producers, a price in many cases double and almost triple the price we are paying to Canadian producers of crude oil. Will the Minister of Finance justify how the Government of Canada can support a policy which pays more than double the price to foreign producers than we pay to Canadian producers?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I am really surprised at that question from the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. It is obvious that in order to increase the supply of offshore oil we must pay the world price. We also know that we are attempting in this country, as a policy of the government, to run a lower than world price regime. That is the reason, and I understand that even at the Conservative convention at the weekend the Tory party decided, belatedly, to reduce its objective to 75 per cent of world prices. Even the Conservative party now realizes that it is not proper to go to world prices at the present time, and that has been the policy of this government from the beginning.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, what our convention at the weekend did was respond to the producing provinces' latest offer, which the Government of Canada has refused to do. The Government of Canada prefers a double standard which pays much more to foreign producers than it will pay to Canadian producers, with the Canadian consumer and taxpayer bearing the burden.

I wonder if the minister would confirm that had the producing provinces' latest offer to the federal government been accepted, we would now be paying $19.25 per barrel to Canadian producers under the agreement, thereby keeping Canadian money in Canada, creating Canadian jobs in Canada and creating the capacity for Canadians to rely upon Canadian supplies of energy over the next decade.

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I want to confirm that the government of Alberta put a pricing schedule before the Government of Canada last summer as a basis for agreement. If we had accepted that schedule calling for higher prices than presently in effect, it would have cost the Canadian consumer over the next several years an additional $9 billion. We were not prepared to do that.

QUERY RESPECTING ENERGY TAX CREDIT SCHEME

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance in charge of evasion. Since February of 1980 there have been nine increases in the cost of oil and oil products in this country, including gasoline and heating fuel in each case. That includes yesterday's Lalonde levy which was totally unnecessary. Of those nine increases, three of them were related to the wellhead price of oil and went to the producing provinces, the federal government and the companies, and the other six went to the federal government taxation revenue alone. So it is the federal government putting the burden on the Canadian people. In Montreal now the price of gasoline is up 40 cents a gallon, compared to February, 1980. In North Sydney—I have a letter from the minister's constituents—the price of heating oil is up 39 cents a gallon, up 50 per cent since February of 1980. My question to the minister is this: when will he and his government carry out their pledge made in the election last year that "if you vote Liberal, the price will stay down"? If the minister cannot carry out that pledge, when will he bring in relief for the lower and fixed income people in Canada through an energy tax credit or a similar scheme? When will he do that and show some concern for Canadians?

• (1420)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the questions today from the opposition members are even more surprising than the recent events we have witnessed. The hon. member for St. John's West has the unmitigated gall to talk about increased prices—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —when he knows perfectly well—

An hon. Member: Is that an ethnic remark?

Mr. MacEachen: —that the government, of which he was a part, was defeated because of the high price regime it recommended for the people of Canada. We decided on an opposite course which we are putting into effect, which is a lower price regime for the consumers of Canada. That is the situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I would sooner be full of gall than full of deceit, and the minister's course of action is a course of deceit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I might say that 18 cents a gallon looks very good to the Canadian people, compared to 40 cents a gallon and 39 cents a gallon for heating fuel.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: When will the government stop nickel and diming the Canadian people in its deceitful fashion and bring in a policy which is rational, which will not subject them to nine increases over 13 months, and which will solve the energy problems of Canada? When is the minister going to take his obligations seriously? When will he carry out those commitments to the poor senior citizen in North Sydney who writes me about how he has been betrayed by the minister?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I would remind hon. members opposite that this is not the Chateau Laurier or the Civic Centre—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: It is the House of Commons. It is quite amazing to me that the hon. member for St. John's West is up complaining about what he regards as nickeling and diming increases in the price of energy in Canada, and he laments that, his heart is overflowing with sympathy for the constituents of North Sydney, and then he has the effrontery to forget about the activities of his colleagues at the convention to urge that we go now to 75 per cent of world prices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: "Vote Liberal and the price will stay down", they said.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa.

HOUSING

STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON RENT CONTROLS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, having just heard the government express its deep concern about the consumers of Canada, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Yesterday the minister responsible for housing was in Toronto giving the government of Ontario some advice on rent controls. At that time he said that the government of Ontario should get rid of rent controls. Was the minister stating government policy, or was he simply passing out bad advice?

An hon. Member: Both.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would remind the hon. member, as I have before in referring to the Constitution of Canada, that rent controls in present circumstances are under provincial jurisdiction. Therefore, there is no policy of the Government of Canada in that regard.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, then I should like to ask the Prime Minister, if the Government of Canada has no policy on this issue, why is the minister responsible for housing going into the province of Ontario, which has a vacancy rate of less than 1 per cent in rental accommodations, and telling that government, in his view as a minister with national responsibility, that it should be getting rid of rent controls? The Prime Minister cannot have it both ways. Either the minister should be speaking for the government on policy matters, or he should keep his mouth shut. What is he doing?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, it seems to me that there is a very narrow view of Canadian opportunities in the view expressed by the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party. As a minister I told the Leader of the New Democratic Party that rent controls do not come under our jurisdiction.

An hon. Member: Neither does education.

Mr. Trudeau: But surely it would be preposterous for the hon. member to argue, as he does, that no member of this House, including members sitting behind him in his party, would not have a right to express their views as citizens or as politicians in the ongoing election in Ontario. I do not think the Leader of the New Democratic Party has been very shy in participating in provincial issues. I am just saying that when a minister of this government does so, he is not speaking for the government and he is not enunciating federal government policy in provincial matters.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, then I ask the Prime Minister to take the opportunity to show some personal leadership on this subject himself. When the Conservative government in Alberta lifted controls last July, there was a negligible rate of increase in supply of rental accommodations for the obvious reason that rent controls did not apply to new accommodations—and they do not in Ontario—but rents went up by more than 100 per cent. Would the Prime Minister state his personal view on this important matter? As the Prime Minister of Canada, does he favour rent controls or not?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I said that the Leader of the New Democratic Party frequently participates in provincial elections. I do not, and I do not intend to do so at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EFFECT OF TAX ON HEAVY OIL PRODUCTION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. It is supplementary to the questions asked by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. I am trying to understand the reasons for this Lalonde levy. Perhaps I should be more parliamentary and refer to it as the Outremont ouch.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson: Husky Oil and Petro-Canada have both referred, before the National Energy Board, to the very adverse impact of the tax on heavy oil production in this country, a tax which will probably result in an increase in imports of about 50,000 barrels per day, all directly related to the National Energy Program. Is the minister proposing to extend that levy to include the loss of dollars to the Treasury to pay for the imports resulting from the replacement of that Saskatchewan production with imports?

• (1430)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have not given any consideration to that specific aspect of the program, although it is the intention, through this levy, to recover in this way what otherwise would be laid upon the treasury of the country. The hon. member knows that through this levy consumers are asked to pay the additional amount which otherwise would have to be paid by the treasury.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, the minister is trying to make two different matters out of the same thing. One is a loss of production resulting from action taken by the province of Alberta. The other is a loss of production resulting from action taken by this government. Why is there a double standard here? Is the minister proposing any changes in the production tax which is causing this drop in production of heavy oil in Saskatchewan? Or, is he considering any other changes in the National Energy Program? How does he justify increasing this tax on one and not the other, when both are as a direct result of actions taken under the National Energy Program?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, it is not the view of the Government of Canada that the National Energy Program will reduce production in this country. On the contrary, it is our view, because of steadily rising prices for conventional oil, very high incentive prices, and because of very generous grants which will be made available to the industry, production in Canada will rise. If there are production cutbacks and production shortfalls at the present time, it is not the responsibility of the Government of Canada.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AID DISADVANTAGED

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance supplementary to the question asked by the member for St. John's West. The Minister of Finance specifically, and the party he represents, promised in the election campaign that price increases would not exceed $4 in 1980. In fact, on April 1, 1980, there was a 15-cent increase for the Syncrude levy, an increase of 75 cents on July 1 for the Syncrude levy, an 80 cent petroleum compensation fund charge in November, and wellhead price increases of $3, for a total of $4.70. Madam Speaker, to be parliamentary and to use a golfing term, that is a bad "lie" on the part of the minister and the Liberal Party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The minister has refused to consider the fact that under our policy there would have been an energy tax credit of some $500 million paid to Canadian senior citizens, the poor and middle and lower-income earners, and $1 billion in 1981. Will the minister make a commitment now to do something for these disadvantaged people in our society?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, hon. members opposite will have to make up their minds. They cannot complain all in the one question period and bleed about the burden on the consumers from rising prices, even though those increases are less than they proposed themselves.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: That's not true.

Mr. MacEachen: Then, in the same question period, or just a day or two before, advocate that the country go up to 75 per cent of world prices. Just where do members of the opposition stand on the question of oil prices? Do they want to go up to 75 per cent or not?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We stand for the protection of Canadian interests, Canadian producers, and also for the protection of the disadvantaged in our society. We proved that in our budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of the minister the promise he made. He said "Because Allan J. MacEachen and the Liberal Party spoke up for you, the price will come down". That is what the advertisement said. But in 1981 the wellhead prices will go up $2. The petroleum compensation fund charge will be $2.50. The Lalonde levy over the course of this year will be $2.25. Those figures equal $6.75, but do not include the Canadian ownership fund charge which will be at least $1 this year. This is as opposed to $4.50. Will the minister now tell us where he will place the poor of this country with respect to these enormous increases? Why does he not follow our example and do something for the poor in his budget by making changes now?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, as I recollect, the only gesture which the government of which the hon. member was a part made, was to provide for an energy tax credit. As I understand it, the first benefit to the Canadian population from that energy tax credit would have taken place next year, 1982.

Some hon. Members: Not at all.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): This year.

Mr. MacEachen: All right. Hon. members opposite say "this year". I will accept the correction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Let me tell hon. members opposite that we did not wait for a year and a half to help the needy people of this country. We immediately increased the guaranteed income supplement, which is fully indexed, by $35 a month. That is our response, not this hocus pocus of an energy tax credit way, way down the road.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT POLICY WITH RESPECT TO CENTRAL AMERICA

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it deals with El Salvador. Yesterday in the House the Secretary of State for External Affairs told us, "I am not aware that we have any serious obligations in that part of the world." We are well aware of the Prime Minister's basic interest in the North-South question. El Salvador happens to be in one of the most underdeveloped sections of our continent. Would the Prime Minister tell the House now who is enunciating policy in relation to that part of the world?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is confusing two aspects of foreign policy, one has to do with North-South and the other has to do with military aid.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: It seems to me there is a basic distinction, one which even a few Tories will be able to understand.

EL SALVADOR—TALKS WITH UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister. The people of El Salvador are among some of the poorest people in the world. They are a suffering people. Next week the President of the United States will be here. Yesterday the United States informed the world that it was going to send another $25 million in military aid and 20 more military advisers to El Salvador. In light of the human suffering of the people who are trying to dictate their own future, will the Prime Minister tell us what he plans to tell the President of the United States next week?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, following the distinction I just made, I will make two points. In so far as military aid is concerned, we think it is a mistake. But in so far as helping the poor people of the world is concerned, we have a policy which, indeed, has been attempting to bridge the gap between the north and the south. In that sense many of the people of Central America belong to the Third World, and many of them receive assistance from Canada through our foreign aid program. But assisting through our foreign aid program does not mean assisting through the supply of military arms. I repeat, the hon. member should understand that distinction.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION OF TRADE PRACTICES IN OIL INDUSTRY

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the concern expressed today about rising energy prices, is the minister prepared to release the report of the investigation by his department into alleged restrictive trade practices in the oil industry which may have increased costs to consumers?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I want to report that, indeed, the petroleum inquiry has been completed and will be referred to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. The chairman will issue a press release to this effect tomorrow. He has indicated to me that copies of this report will be released by four o'clock tomorrow afternoon. He has confirmed by letter to me today that he intends to conduct a public inquiry under Section 27 of the act.

THE ECONOMY

RESULTS FLOWING FROM OCTOBER BUDGET

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. I was wondering, in his defensive stance respecting the budget of last October, if the minister is aware that the street now says that so-called "smart money" in Canada is increasingly moving south to the United States, resulting in the dollar having fallen two cents since he brought in the budget and Canadian interest rates skyrocketing. In the case of Canadian issues alone, they are now yielding 14 per cent. Trans-Canada pipe even had to pay 16 per cent for new money.

● (1440)

If the minister is aware of this, would he indicate whether he anticipated this fallout from his budget when he brought it in on October 28? If he did, why did he not warn the Canadian public that this would be the consequence of his ill-advised budget?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: You're looking lachrymose, Allan.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member says that I look lachrymose. Well if he looked across the aisle at himself every day, he would look lachrymose also. I try to avoid gazing at his countenance for that reason.

Seriously, I attempted to take into account as many factors as possible in the budget. Looking back on that budget presentation, I would not substantially change any of the decisions which have been taken, because in so far as I can see, the response of the economy has been rather favourable to the budget, including a very strong trade performance for Canada, one of the best trade performances ever, in the fourth quarter—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: —including, in the fourth quarter of 1980, real growth in excess of 8 per cent, and including the publication yesterday of the investment intentions for 1981 which indicate a stronger investment performance—it is already strong in 1981—than in 1980.

In the light of these very positive developments—

An hon. Member: What about jobs?

Mr. MacEachen: —the hon. member ought to be telling me, "Keep going on that strong course that you have set."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

QUERY RESPECTING INTEREST RATES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): I would be very pleased to tell the Minister of Finance to keep going, and resign from office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: It is absolutely atrocious that we have a Minister of Finance who has the nerve to stand up in the House and start boasting about a real growth of a tenth of 1 per cent in our economy last year.

Mr. Crosbie: Shame, shame!

Mr. Stevens: Would the Minister of Finance answer this question? If he is so proud of his budget and its repercussions, is he proud of the interest rate structure in the country which is being felt so sorely by businessmen and consumers from coast to coast? Interest rates are up at least 2 per cent as the result of the misdirected budgetary measures.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The hon. member calls for my resignation. I want to tell him that calling for resignations is not part of the Liberal tradition in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Pity.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member knows perfectly well the reason why we have had higher interest rates in Canada. The minister laid before the House several weeks ago the options facing the government and the governor of the bank as the result of higher interest rates that have prevailed in the United States. He knows that is the reason for these particular rates, and placing the pressure on Canadian rates.

The governor of the bank has stated that we do not need these high rates in Canada for purposes of controlling the money supply. They have been induced by the pressure of foreign interest rates, primarily.

HORTICULTURE

TRADE NEGOTIATIONS WITH AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Madam Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is he aware that in trade negotiations which we believe are presently going on, Canadian officials are offering freer markets to Australia, New Zealand, and other countries for fruit and processed fruit products to the Canadian market in return for freer access of manufactured goods to their markets?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I have no knowledge of such negotiations going on. If the hon. member has facts, I would be pleased to hear them.

Mr. McCain: I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since agriculture has had to make concessions for greater access to manufactured products—as an example, the free access to Canada without duty of grape concentrates for wine-making—it would appear that the same policy is being pursued in negotiations today, and that other agricultural products will pay the price of the Canadian market: they will lose the Canadian market in return for access to manufactured goods abroad. Is the Minister of Agriculture prepared to remain as minister while this historic policy of the Liberal Party continues unabated?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I only want to remind the hon. member through you, Madam Speaker, that we have negotiated higher tariffs for vegetable products in Canada to protect the industry. For instance, the tomato paste industry has had the protection of nearly 33 per cent for over two and a half years, going on three years, and has not done anything to increase that productivity in Canada.

The hon. member asks whether I am prepared to stay on as minister and allow these things to go on. To allow those kinds of things to go on, you want to bet I am prepared to stay on!

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

INCREASE SOUGHT IN LEVEL OF FUNDING

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): My question is to the Minister of Agriculture, as well. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture outlined two major areas of concern to them. The first was to increase the amount of funding available to the Farm Credit Corporation by at least $150 million, and the second was to maintain lending rates of the Farm Credit Corporation at no more than the present level. The minister's response to the CFA is that he is going to try to get more funding for the Farm Credit Corporation, but not to expect interest rates not to go up.

Will the minister explain to the House how he intends to get more funding, from whom, when it will be available, and just how farmers are supposed to be in a position to avail themselves of it if they are going to be faced with intolerable interest rates?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that the amount of money the Farm Credit Corporation loaned last year was over $500 million. We only loaned about 40 per cent of the farmers' needs. The private sector loaned the rest of the money to the farmers across Canada. We loaned that money at 12.75 per cent interest, which was a very enviable interest rate, as far as I am concerned.

An hon. Member: Compared to what?

Mr. Whelan: I have a proposal before the government to raise extra moneys to refinance the Farm Credit Corporation. I do not know if it will be accepted this time; but the many farm organizations that are looking after themselves and using cost-price formulae which take into consideration interest costs are well protected. Whether they be provincial organizations or under the guidance of the National Farm Products Marketing Council, they are looked after. Many other parts of our economy would just love to be under the umbrella we provide for them at 12.75 per cent interest, when many others are paying 15 per cent, 17 per cent, 20 per cent and 21 per cent interest. I think we have done a tremendous job in the Farm Credit Corporation.

Mr. Corbett: I would like to remind the minister that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture represents a good number of farmers across the land, and they are supported by provincial organizations in their requests. The minister knows that they have a good case. The minister is generally thought to be sincere and conscientious in his efforts to support farmers in his portfolio, but surely, if he is to retain his credibility within the agricultural community, he must acknowledge that he has been unsuccessful in presenting the case on behalf of the farmers to his caucus colleagues and to the government.

Will he undertake now to pledge to the farmers his fullest support in the two matters under consideration so that at least, if he is unsuccessful, the farmers will know where to lay the blame?

• (1450)

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, I think if any cabinet minister in any government ever said that everything he or she proposed would be successful, that would be wrong. All we can do is propose things and hope they are accepted in a realistic fashion. Farmers also accept that form of honesty. When the hon. member asks how we can raise money, if you want to give me the rest of the question period, Madam Speaker, I will explain it to the hon. member.

SHIPBUILDING

DEVELOPMENT OF MARINE INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question today is for the Minister of Transport. It follows on the heels of Dome Petroleum's Beaufort Sea operations in allowing a contract to go to Japan to build a barge which will serve as a floating drydock for drill ships in the Beaufort Sea. By signing a contract with the Japanese shipyards we have now lost 150 more jobs in the Vancouver area. Last year the government let a $50 million drydock go to Japan, which cost Canada a substantial number of jobs. The Dome Petroleum group also contracted for crew vessels for the Beaufort Sea, in Louisiana.

My question through you, Madam Speaker, to the minister is this: what is the government doing to prevent this continuous drain of jobs away from Canada to Japan and other offshore shipbuilders? In short, what are we doing to develop a Canadian marine industrial strategy so that those jobs remain in Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, there is no obligation on the part of the company to use Canadian-owned barges, because it is offshore. I remember, and I am not aware of this particular case, that in a previous instance Dome went out of its way to hire Canadians to operate these barges, so I will be in touch with the company to suggest it do the same in this case.

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, the contract is already signed and gone.

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF CO-ORDINATING MINISTRY

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the Prime Minister. It stems from the answer given by the Minister of Transport. Essentially, he says that in this dilemma it is really not his fault, that it is sort of the fault of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who says it is the fault of the minister of energy, who, in turn, says it is the fault of the Minister of Finance.

In order to stop the fragmentation and working at cross purposes of many of these departments in terms of our marine industrial development, would the Prime Minister appoint a minister in charge of marine industries or marine transportation, and provide him with a mandate to develop a marine industrial strategy with the power to co-ordinate the efforts of government to see that the roughly $40 billion which Dome intends to spend and money that other companies intend to spend over the next ten years is spent in Canada for the benefit of Canadians?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I feel that the hon. member is seeing a contradiction between ministers where none exists. I will take note of his suggestion that I increase the size of the ministry. I must say that it is a temptation I am sometimes inclined to give into and I will give it some consideration.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

NECESSITY FOR TAX INCENTIVES

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. In view of the fact the target date for the plan for research and development indicates Canada's spending should reach 1.5 per cent of gross national product by 1985 and in view of the fact that no tax incentives are provided, will the minister reconsider this aspect of his five-year plan and recommend the needed tax incentives that will lower the after-tax cost of research and development?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, when my hon. friend refers to the five-year plan, that is a plan which is essentially a structure of expenditure commitments over the next five years. It does not take into account possible tax changes or tax concessions which might further assist the industry in pursuing heightened research and development activities on their own. Indeed, those kinds of considerations of tax and other incentives which might take place are a matter which are, in a continuing way, actively under the government's consideration.

HORTICULTURE

FUNDING FOR COLD STORAGE CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan-Similkameen): Madam Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In a world increasingly hungry for food the minister is aware of the necessity for the construction of additional cold storage capacity for the crops which Canada produces in such abundance. The minister is also aware of the necessity for increased controlled atmospheric storage if the apple producers of British Columbia's Okanagan Valley are to retain their share of markets in competition with the much better equipped apple producers of Washington state. Will the minister, noting these circumstances, undertake to guarantee sufficient total funding for that cold storage construction in Canada in order to take advantage of this essential marketing benefit?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member had quite a preamble to his question. I am sure that if he had time he would have told the House that the Canadian Horticultural Council passed a unanimous motion commending the government and this minister for the great job we are doing in assisting the Canadian Horticultural Council.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: I am sure he would have also told the House that B.C. growers in that area of Canada because of the controlled atmospheric temperature storage type of system are able to export apples to nearly 30 countries this year. It is because of that tremendous program of co-operation between the producers and the federal Ministry of Agriculture that they are able to do that. I would love to be able to say I could fund it in total, but we pay up to one third of the costs of controlled atmospheric temperature costs, to a maximum of $500,000. The funds that we have provided for this year, 1981-1982, because there are so many requests to participate in this great program, will not be sufficient to go around.

If the hon. member can come up with any ingenious ideas with which I could convince the Minister of Finance and my other colleagues in cabinet, and if he can convince his financial critics to tell us to quit spending money, I will try to do my best to find the funds.

Mr. King: Madam Speaker, I am happy to have the assurance that the minister is going to continue to fund everything B.C. can produce at $500,000 per unit and one third of the capital costs.

What we advocate as national priorities are better spending priorities, not more spending—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. King: —and that cold storage construction would fit into this definition.

In view of the escalating costs of controlled atmospheric storage construction, which have risen by 50 per cent in the last three years, is the minister prepared to recommend that the grant limit of $500,000 per project be increased by an equivalent 50 per cent?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member also knows and is aware that we have advanced money to the B.C. apple producers to the tune of $11 million, interest free, so they can market their product in an orderly fashion, so they can be in a better position to get a bigger return and they will not need so much government financing. They are going ahead and seem quite satisfied with the arrangements that have been made between my ministry and themselves on the proposals for their next three-year building program. I say the hon. member is on the right trail, and we are glad to have him along with us.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

NUMBERS SERVING IN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. It is about the progress being made regarding negotiations between the federal government and the provinces for RCMP policing costs.

Is the Solicitor General now prepared, in the interests of furthering the negotiations, to disclose the numbers of RCMP officers and personnel in Ontario and Quebec so that the cost of their presence there, in these non-contracting provinces, will serve as a useful comparison to help the provinces come to a fair arrangement with respect to their own costs?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I do not have those figures in front of me. However, they are a matter of public knowledge and I will be glad to send them to the hon. member.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the minister's offer, but he and his deputy have refused to make this kind of detailed information available. I am pleased to know he has changed his mind in this respect and I am sure the provinces will be happy.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): May I ask the Solicitor General a related question? On May 10 last year, in response to a question from myself respecting RCMP grievances and the status of officers who are participating in a lawfully constituted association of the RCMP, the minister indicated he was working on the legislation and he was prepared to introduce it. He thought he could do so before the break. That was last summer. He said at the time that he was working on it much more quickly than we had been. Since almost a year has elapsed, could the Solicitor General tell us what the status is of this important initiative as far as the RCMP personnel are concerned?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, it is indeed an important initiative and I have not been able to produce it or take it through cabinet as quickly as I had hoped. It is on course and I anticipate being able to bring it forward within a month.

STEPS TO OVERCOME SHORTAGE OF VETERINARIANS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the uncertainty created by recent press reports regarding the availability of veterinarians to carry out the vital public health functions of the Department of Agriculture, some suggesting shortages of over 200 personnel, can the minister clarify the situation? Is there any serious shortage of these professionals to carry out the essential public health role of his department?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I understand from my officials that there may be 23 vacancies at the present time. I understand they have some volunteers, possibly even one from the opposition, who will join our crew to carry out the inspections. We are looking for as many people as we can get. We understand there are a couple on the other side.

CENTRE D'ACTIVITÉS FRANÇAISES, PENETANGUISHENE, ONT.

Question No. 1,639—Mr. Lewis:

To date, what amount of government money was spent by the Centre d'activités françaises of Penetanguishene, Ontario, to fight their legal battle to prevent a question on the municipal ballots in the County of Simcoe asking municipalities if they approve of the building of a French language secondary school?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): No federal government money was awarded to the Centre d'activités françaises de Penetanguishene, Ontario, to undertake legal action against the county of Simcoe. A grant of $45,000 was awarded to the centre in August, 1980, for cultural activities (see response to question No. 1,568, answered January 15, 1981). The department has no reason to believe that any grant awarded to the Centre d'activités de Penetanguishene has been used for any other purpose than for which it was awarded.

DND CONTRACTS FOR ELECTRON TUBES

Question No. 1,902—Mr. McKinnon:

1. Did the government place an order for $534,423 with Philips Electronics Ltd., file number 5PE.2759265, for electron tubes which are to be produced in Sweden and, if so (a) were Canadian firms asked to tender on the contract (b) is any Canadian firm able to produce such tubes?

2. As indicated in Hansard on December 8, 1980, at page 5,452, that Denlen Electronics Corporation International Ltd. contracted with the government to produce electron tubes, is the company able to produce electron tubes of the type specified in the contract mentioned in Part I?

3. What was the total value of contracts placed by DND for electron tubes for the period November 1 to November 28, 1980 and (a) what is the purpose of the tubes (b) how many are being produced in Canada and how many offshore?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of National Defence and Supply and Services as follows: 1. Yes the subject contract was placed with Philips Electronics and the tubes are being manufactured in Sweden.

(a) Canadian firms were not invited to tender as Philips is the sole manufacturer of this tube in the world;

(b) See 1 (a) above.

2. Denlen Electronics is not a manufacturer. They are the sole Canadian representative for Litton tubes, all of which are made in the United States.

3. $905,009.54.

(a) The tubes being procured have a wide range of application such as ground radars, ground and ship direction finders, avionic and radio equipment and general electronic equipment.

(b) Of the 32 contracts placed by the Department of Supply and Services on behalf of the Department of National Defence $42,789.00 was for tube production in Canada. The remaining procurement value was for tubes purchased offshore.

GIRL GUIDES OF CANADA—COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Question No. 1,940—Mr. Cossitt:

Has the government given consideration to issuing a commemorative postage stamp in 1985 marking the 75th anniversary of the Girl Guides of Canada and, if not, will consideration be given toward honoring this noted organization in such a manner?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Canada Post is aware that 1985 will mark the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Girld Guides of Canada. Every consideration will be given to the suggestion for a Girl Guides stamp when our stamp program for 1985 is being formulated.

INCOME TAX INCENTIVES—HISTORICAL SOCIETIES

Question No. 2,048—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Minister of Finance receive proposals for possible amendments to the Income Tax Act which would offer incentives for the preservation of historic buildings?

2. Is it government policy to be concerned with individuals and organizations dealing with the preservation of our architectural, historical and cultural heritage?

3. Will the government give favourable consideration to making the necessary changes in the Income Tax Act and specifically has the government been urged to do so by various historical societies as well as Heritage Canada?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): 1. Yes, the Minister of Finance has received many representations for amendments to the Income Tax Act to provide incentives for the preservation of historic buildings.

2. The federal government has publicly stated its commitment to policies that would encourage the preservation of architectural, historical and cultural heritage. An interdepartmental Heritage Conservation Committee has been set up to study the various aspects involved in establishing a federal program and make recommendations for integrated federal policy.

3. The government has been urged to provide income tax incentives by various historical societies. The most recent of these is Heritage Winnipeg, whose officials have mounted a public campaign encouraging taxpayers to write to the Minister of Finance in support of the society's representation to him for income tax incentives in respect of historical buildings. The Department of Finance has received many letters in response to this campaign and senior officials of the department have met with officials of Heritage Winnipeg. Heritage Canada's representatives have participated in government-sponsored seminars examining possible approaches for federal government's involvement in a Heritage Building Conservation program. The issue is currently under study and income tax amendments, where necessary, will be considered where indicated in established federal government policy.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, yesterday at the close of the sitting I was referring to the section of the charter dealing with human rights. I believe that Canadians generally have the feeling that their basic rights and freedoms are very well protected in Canada. Although our record is certainly far better than that of most nations, it is not beyond reproach. Our past, and indeed even our present, has witnessed many instances of gross and blatant discrimination where groups and individual rights and freedoms were viciously abused and in some extreme cases were eliminated completely.

Recall, for example, the total genocide of the Beothuk Indians of Newfoundland where in some cases the Indians were considered as being less than human and shot for sport. Consider the thousands of Chinese who were brought into British Columbia during the 1880s and were, for all practical purposes, slaves. This was clearly demonstrated in the Dominion Elections Act of 1885 in which Chinese people were categorized as not being persons.

We have been reminded many times in the past number of weeks of the 23,000 Canadians of Japanese origin who were forcibly moved from their homes along the west coast under the War Measures Act. Many of us today shudder at the recollection of the smashing of the Woodworkers' Union during their efforts to represent working people in Newfoundland.

There was the social political force of the Ku Klux Klan during the 1930s in Canada, again lifting its ugly head today. Under the Duplessis regime there were numerous examples of both religious and political discrimination and persecution.

In recent times the government of Alberta attempted to manipulate the free press in that province and pass legislation abusing the rights and freedoms of the Hutterite people. In British Columbia, there was blatant racial discrimination against the Sikhs since arriving in that province at the turn of the century and, unfortunately, it still remains today. As was indicated in today's question period, the federal government still maintains discriminating provisions regarding native Indian women under the Indian Act.

These practices must not be allowed to continue or to occur again, as the case may be. That is why we support the principle of an entrenched charter of rights.

To those who say, "You're not giving rights to the people, you're giving them to the courts", I can only reply, "What legal system worthy of the name in providing for rights doesn't leave the interpretation and enforcement of these rights to adjudication?" If we are serious about protecting minorities and protecting against discrimination, of course the courts will have to provide protection. Who protected the Hutterites or the Japanese Canadians? Who protected freedom of the press in Alberta or religious or political freedoms in Quebec? Not the legislatures. The dialectical tension between courts, citizens and legislatures is a permanent feature of our democratic way of life, and those who say "keep the courts away from protecting our rights" surely misunderstand the importance of the legal and judicial process in defining liberty itself.

In any case, there is nothing in the package before us that we are presently debating which prevents provincial legislatures and the federal government from respecting the rights of their citizens. What we have here is a safety net, an added protection, some extra security that in case provincial legislatures or the federal Parliament do not respect those rights, there is recourse to the courts.

These are changing times. Canadian society has become extremely dynamic. It is imperative that our Constitution reflect this dynamism in Canadian culture. Therefore, it is imperative that the Constitution of Canada include an amending formula which is flexible enough to provide for our evolving society while still reflecting the federal and regional nature of our country.

The one suggested is a practical amending formula and with appropriate co-operation ought to go a long way towards satisfying the concerns registered over the past number of months. It gives each of our four major regions of Canada a veto on constitutional change. While it identifies four regions, one could easily justify five, eight, or an infinite number of regions, but I believe we can live with the regions proposed as being a reasonable effort to meld population numbers and geographic area. This formula involves the provinces in the amending procedure, a procedure which is designed to ensure that substantial support exists from each of the four regions of Canada for any proposed amendment.

An alternative proposal was considered and rejected. I am referring to the so-called Vancouver formula which would resemble the formula we are presently discussing but would allow any province to opt out of a jurisdictional decision directly affecting that province. Such a formula, in my view, is fundamentally wrong and incoherent. How can a province "opt out" of changes to such federal institutions as the Senate or the Supreme Court? Is it seriously contended that the Criminal Code should apply in Manitoba but not in Saskatchewan, or that provinces should be able to pick and choose what role they would play in Canada's national defence? Where the formula is not incoherent, it profoundly misunderstands the nature of federalism, which surely includes the recognition of integrity within what are the explicitly recognized fields of national jurisdiction. It is hard to see how common citizenship can exist if basic human rights are different from province to province. One could also question the constitutionality of the "checkerboard" or "patchwork quilt" view of human rights.

It will be clear by now that I do not believe that Canada is simply the sum of its parts or a "community of communities". I do not accept the view that the federal government is the agent of the provinces. That surely is to deny the constitutional reality that the Fathers of Confederation formed a federation whose national government has important, independent powers, and the historical, political, and economic reality that Canadians have come to look to their national government for leadership and material assistance. That leadership has not always been exercised with intelligence and restraint. Our federal institutions are in desperate need of reform. We have to find a way of establishing more co-operation in our federation. This will require a new leadership, a new will. The stage has been set for a new beginning, a new approach.

Years ago my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), wrote that Canada needed real symbols before maturing into the thriving, prosperous country it ought to be; it needed a flag, it needed an anthem and it needed a constitution. He saw it then. Canada sees it today. Canada is surely a country whose time has come. It was Laurier who said that the twentieth century will belong to Canada. Let us get on with realizing that dream.

My family came to Canada from Norway at the turn of the century. They moved into the west and settled far from the railway, far from the head of the rail in those days. They came in an oxcart to that flat, not necessarily hospitable, prairie land. It was a challenging prairie, yet what drew them into that environment was a dream. It was a dream of opportunity, a dream of freedom, a dream of equality. It was a dream that this was a place where their rights would be protected and where they could be different and maintain their cultural heritage. This Constitution will help to ensure that those dreams endure in Canada.

We are at an historic moment in Canada. We have an historic opportunity. That is why the Constitution is not "irrelevant", or the private fantasy of one individual. The challenge of constitutional, economic and political reform will be with us long after the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) disappears from the scene. I am increasingly convinced that time is running out, and that all of us have to seize the day, to seize this opportunity now! Let us ensure that the Canada of our children and our children's children will be a better Canada. Let us be a model for the world. Let us make Canada the home of the most challenging and civilized society on earth. Ours has been a proud past; let us act now to ensure a prosperous future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ralph Ferguson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am deeply honoured today to take part in this historic Thirty-second Parliament of Canada, debating the report of a joint committee of the House and Senate which has examined and studied this history-making resolution. As indicated by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) when he introduced his resolution, we have been trying since 1927 to develop an amending formula through federal-provincial consultation. These attempts have failed.

On examination of the reason for failure during this 54-year period of frustration and anxiety, we find that the very diverse nature of our country, of its resources and its potential structure, made the task of amendment extremely difficult. For those who would suggest that the current political differences led to the failure of the last round of talks, let me remind them that on the nine previous occasions when the federal and provincial governments tried to reach consensus, the Prime Minister and provincial premiers were not the same as those we have today.

As we reflect on and examine regional development, we realize that central Canada had approximately 75 years' head start on western Canada in terms of settlement and development, and 38 years' head start within confederation. Now development and economic growth are becoming more active in the west. As this process takes place, the industrial development that follows will provide a balance that can only lead to a stronger Canada economically, politically and nationally. As the various regions of this nation develop their potential, there must be a bond of understanding. We cannot afford to have one region suppressing or taking advantage of another. We must work together, and in this context the principle of equalization as outlined in the proposed resolution is essential to our survival as a nation.

The bond of understanding and compassion for our fellow Canadians cannot be allowed to stop at a provincial boundary but should be extended in a way that will provide equality of opportunity in life, and equality of purpose, to people in all regions of this nation. The bond of understanding and our nationhood must be strengthened. The fact that a nation over 100 years old, a nation of 24 million people, has appealed on 26 different occasions since confederation to the parliament of a nation on another continent for changes to our Constitution is unacceptable in today's world.

Canada is regarded as one of the great nations of the world. Canadians are among the leaders in contributing on a per capita basis to world food aid, yet we make a spectacle of ourselves as a nation that cannot agree to amend its Constitution. Where is our sense of pride? Surely, as a reasonably young but mature nation compared to other countries, we have come a long way in 114 years.

The feeling of outrage expressed by some of those in opposition really cannot be justified. If Parliament were to ignore the democratic system of representation, as we do at the first ministers' meetings where each province has equal input, this body could not justify itself, or justify its actions. Such action is not indicative of representation by population.

To underscore what I mean, may I remind hon. members that in Prince Edward Island, for example, there are about 123,000 Canadians. In the province of Ontario there are over eight million Canadians. The imbalance of population between the provinces is well known, yet each provincial premier for historic reasons has been given equal opportunity and importance at federal-provincial conferences. However, given equal opportunity, the premiers could not reach agreement. Members of this Thirty-second Parliament must therefore accept their responsibility and execute the functions of a democratically elected body, representative of the population of Canada, and bring our amended Constitution home to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ferguson: It is my hope that the members of this House will act as responsible Canadians and respond unanimously, as they did on May 9 last year when the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) presented the following resolution:

That the Parliament of Canada submit an address to Her Majesty the Queen, that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom to provide for the amendment in Canada of the Constitution of Canada.

When we reflect on the discussions and debate during the development of the British North America Act in the years before confederation, we are reminded of the fact that there was not unanimous agreement. In those days it was the members from Canada West, or Upper Canada, who provided the larger part of that majority to proceed. One of the men who worked diligently to bring opposing factions together to draft the British North America Act of 1867 was the Hon. George Brown who, in his younger years, owned property in the town of Bothwell in the riding now represented by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Bossy). A new constituency delineated out of the riding of Kent is now part of the riding I represent.

George Brown came to Canada in 1843 from Scotland at 25 years of age. In Toronto he founded the newspaper The Banner, which was later renamed The Globe. He was the publisher and editor at that time. He was first elected to the legislative assembly of Canada in 1851, and he vocally advocated representation by population and a union of the provinces.

In 1861, weakened by illness, Brown left the political arena for two years, but in the summer of 1863 his health recovered and he returned to the legislative assembly as the representative from the riding of Oxford. He found a deadlock. Cartier's Conservatives in Quebec on the one hand, and the Reformers in Upper Canada on the other, could not agree. Throughout the autumn session deadlock prevailed with no end in sight, but finally Brown, acting as a private member, disclosed a significant new approach. He moved for a select committee to inquire impartially into the sectional problems of Canada and to report on the best means of remedying them. Brown's sole aim at that time was to settle the constitutional impasse. He was appointed chairman of the select committee which was composed of leading members of all parties, and on June 14 the committee reported to Parliament that there was a "strong feeling" in favour of "a federative system".

Lord Monck, Governor General during those confederation years, stated that "George Brown was the man whose conduct rendered the project of confederation feasible". On February 3 Mr. Megarry, the current publisher of The Globe and Mail, described George Brown's efforts to the Royal Commonwealth Society of London in England when he said, and I quote:

Our newspaper, The Globe, was founded 137 years ago by George Brown, who was one of the architects of Canadian confederation. Without him, without his persistent political dedication, the colonies of British North America would never have come together.

I cannot help but look back with a sense of pride on such references to the Hon. George Brown, who once represented part of my constituency and was the founder and publisher of The Globe, a man who believed in Canada and worked to bring about that original union of those four provinces.

But then when I look at the speech of the current publisher to the Royal Commonwealth Society of London on February 3, I find that later on he said, and I quote:

We are only 114 years old as a nation. Relative to other members of the Commonwealth we are still going through our adolescence.

Mr. Peterson: Nonsense.

Mr. Ferguson: That speech must have been read by every Canadian with a degree of dismay. Mr. Megarry was really saying that Canada is an immature nation. The present day publisher of The Globe and Mail is George Brown's successor in one sense only, because he has no faith in Canada and no vision of Canada as a country with one of the best systems of social welfare of any nation in the world. Canada is a nation which provides for its senior citizens and for those in need, a nation which is only one of the four countries of the world which are net exporters of food and a nation which, compared with other countries in the industrialized world, has created more jobs than any other similar country in the last ten years. Canada is a nation which has one of the highest standards of living of any nation in the world and is endeavouring to settle amicably great disputes, the like of which have plunged other countries into war.

When we consider the problems and developments over the years in other Commonwealth countries and even differences of opinion within various regions of the British Isles themselves, then I respectfully point out to this House that Canada is a mature nation. It is mature and able to decide by the democratic process in this Parliament of Canada the content of the resolution before us in this debate, namely a Constitution and a bill of rights made in Canada for all Canadians.

The efforts of that first publisher of The Globe, the hon. George Brown, to bring about confederation and the statements of the current publisher are in direct contradiction. I suggest that inflammatory statements by Canadians in positions of responsibility, including members of this House, can only compound our current problems.

By contrast, on television on February 15 last, Charles Lynch, in referring to the acrimony which has surfaced in this debate—and, unfortunately, in some regions across the land—said, and I quote:

> The bitterness, I think, is largely fabricated by the people who have opposed the measure, by the premiers and by the Progressive Conservatives. I don't see in the measure—it's not that I've suddenly fallen in love with Trudeau and Chrétien, I simply do not see in the Constitution, in the amending formula, the temporary one, in the charter of rights, the things that the alarmists see. I am not offended by anything in the package.

He went on to say:

> As for bulldozing it, I have thought for years now that that's the only way. There's no other way to do it. If they go the Conservative way, the premiers' way, back to the table, you and I have covered enough federal-provincial conferences to know what that's going to lead to. It's going to lead nowhere ... The only person who is sure of how to do it is Pierre Trudeau. And he, in his fourth term and with all the things at his age and everything, is taking a risk that no previous prime minister has ever taken and I think no future one will take. If we don't get it this time, we don't get it at all.

This working veteran journalist leaves no doubt as to his thoughts on this matter and the need to proceed.

I was very proud of this House on May 9, 1980, and on the evening of May 20 I was very proud of the people of Quebec. I sincerely hope that the sense of pride of being Canadian prevails across this nation in the weeks ahead and results in a stronger and better Canada which has control of its own destiny.

The committee's report before the House is the result of substantial alterations made by representatives of both sides of this House and the Senate. There is not the shadow of a doubt that the report before us reflects the wishes of the Canadian people. The committee members have examined a broader perspective than that represented by the ambitions and interests of their own provinces, their own regions or their own constituencies. Indeed, if we follow the adage that history is a good teacher, then if a similar committee achieved success to give us the British North America Act, which was intended to serve us during the fledgling years of nationhood, we must accept the majority report of the joint committee to ensure that this nation is never again faced with a vote which would provide opportunists with an excuse to divide the nation again.

The proposed resolution for a joint address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada ensures future generations fundamental rights and freedoms. This House is respectfully asking Her Royal Majesty to entrench a charter of rights duly debated in this chamber at second reading, in the special joint committee of both Houses and now again at this time.

The entrenchment of this strong charter of rights and freedoms will have far-reaching effects on our society. In that Charter of Rights and Freedoms is a section which affirms aboriginal rights. I am certainly proud of that part which refers specifically to the handicapped. I am proud that these rights are included in the charter. The special needs of the handicapped must be served.

The vast majority of the 100 groups and individuals who appeared before the special parliamentary committee favoured the entrenchment of a bill of rights. Thousands of our concerned citizens from both east and west have voiced approval in no uncertain terms.

I would like to quote from a letter from a constituent of mine dated February 9, 1981. He stated:

> Dear Mr. Ferguson,
> It is my hope that the Government of Canada will proceed in a straightforward manner with the matter of the Constitution. That is, the whole "package", including the human rights section, should be put directly to the House and then to Westminster without the diversion of taking it to the courts and without backing down because some British parliamentarians might not think certain amendments suit their personal view of what Canada might be. The time has come to take the first major step in defining this "Canada" in constitutional terms, including human rights for all. Let Canadians and their government be bold and proud enough to do this together now.
> Although the constitutional dialogue up until this time has been difficult, and some provincial premiers have not seen fit to come to terms with each other or Ottawa, I do believe it has been a creative discussion. But, the time for the process is nearly over and the decision faces us. The only alternative is to miss the opportunity and begin wallowing in words and bad feeling for years to come. This would be no favour to the country.

Other members have had similar representations, Mr. Speaker.

It is with a sense of pride that just a week ago yesterday, Monday, February 23, I was honoured to have a gentleman from central Alberta drop in unannounced to see me in my office. This man, a complete stranger to me, expressed his deeply felt concern and conviction, a conviction as a Canadian by choice who had fought for Canada in World War II. In anguished terms, the man spoke about statements being made by some Members of Parliament and by the media which were intended to instil fear in the hearts of Canadians. As a Canadian who fought for his country, he knew where his duty lay. He asked what he could do for his nation, what he could do as an Albertan to assist in bringing about a better understanding between Canadians. That is typical. That man, though a stranger when he walked into my office, is the Canadian I know and am proud to know. As a true Canadian, I believe he will fight those who wish to instil fear by innuendo or simply because of personal goals and ambitions which they place ahead of the good of the nation.

Mr. Speaker, I have travelled across this nation on many occasions, from the rugged shores of Newfoundland to the Cabot trails of Cape Breton, to Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, to historic old Quebec, from the Great Lakes basin to the prairies, through the majestic Rockies to the Pacific. I am proud to be a part of this great nation and I am proud of its people.

It is in this context, Mr. Speaker, that I request all members of the House to pull together as Canadians, to explain to their constituents that in spite of our problems we still have one of the best countries in the world; and in the words of Gordon Fairweather, the Human Rights Commissioner, we will now have one of the best charters of human rights of any nation in the world.

In my view, the proposed Constitution and Charter of Rights and Freedoms are the tie that will bind Canadians together in their association with each other, cognizant and secure in the knowledge that their individual rights and freedoms will be upheld in the Constitution of this nation.

I therefore enjoin hon. members to vote for the report of the joint committee and the resolution to enhance the well-being of each citizen and strengthen the resolve of nationhood. This historic debate can only strengthen the bond of understanding and the bond of equality but, most of all, it will fulfil our obligations to the Fathers of Confederation and to Canada itself as a great nation in the world.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this historic debate about my country because Canada is a unique country, a country with a very special system of government, a federal system. We are one of only 14 countries in the world where the locus of power lies not in one but in two levels of government.

From the day when my great predecessor from Kingston, Sir John A. Macdonald, first dreamed his dream of a united country from sea to sea, he and his confreres, Sir George Etienne Cartier, Sir Charles Tupper, George Brown and the many others, all instinctively knew that this country, diverse as it is in peoples, regions, resources and cultures, would have to have a special system of government. They knew that they would need something better suited to this complex country than the unitary system of government which operated in Britain from which they had already borrowed our parliamentary procedures. A unitary system such as that one, even though it was dear to Sir John A's heart, would not, he knew, be capable of reflecting sensitively the differing views, and indeed the differing drives, of such a huge, sprawling, tumultuous and potentially explosive country. Canada was and is too unpredictable and too unwieldy a country to be held in check by one single rein of government designed to coerce it into uniformity. Canada never has been, is not now, and never will be, that kind of country.

It was recognition of the leashed up potential, of the greatness which lay in store for it, that led the Fathers of Confederation into the parallel and complementary paths of nation building and province building. It was not done easily and it was not done lightly. It took the divisiveness of the united Canada period, from 1841 to 1864, with its forced uniformity and its subsequent collapse, to make the people of Upper and Lower Canada appreciate that they had to be part of a system where the diversity and strengths of the one province had to be appreciated and respected by the other.

And so, when the new federation was conceived, it was in the knowledge that it would produce two levels of government, one which would encourage Canadians to look to the national government as the expression of their common interests, and the other to the provincial governments as the expression of their particular interests. But these were not to be mutually exclusive. Their interaction was the basis of the federal system.

There were times in those early years when the central government was tempted to tread heavily on the provinces, to take advantage of their vulnerability as they went through a difficult period of adjustment, which saw them relinquish their previous role as semi-independent entities to become fully integrated into the larger union.

That willingness to be part of the larger union did not come about easily. In fact, even as late as 1886, Nova Scotia, through a vote of its legislature confirmed in a general election, was still trying to secede from this "botheration scheme", as it was derisively referred to.

No, the ties to confederation were not woven overnight. They were developed over time by wise legislators, both in Ottawa and in the provincial parliaments, who knew intuitively that the great experiment, so confidently launched by Macdonald and his associates in 1867, could only stay afloat if they all pulled in the same direction.

Yes, there were arguments; yes, there were strongly held conflicting opinions; but over and over again, argument and conflict gave way to the reasoned approach of seeking a solution by consensus. Macdonald knew that. He did not always like to treat with those pesky nuisances, the provinces, but treat he did. Laurier knew it, although at times his heart bled for the hurt that his own native province was caused. Borden knew it, Bennett knew it, and even Mackenzie King knew it, although his battles with Hepburn and Duplessis were legendary. St. Laurent honoured that tradition, as did Diefenbaker. Pearson developed it to a fine art—co-operative federalism, he called it. Clark made it a cornerstone of his government.

Co-operative federalism is not the easiest package in the world to sell. It is something intangible and elusive; it is a concept. Concepts are much more difficult to realize and articulate and to convey to people than cold, hard facts or a face in the window. But the cold, hard fact of this country is that without co-operative federalism and without the two orders of government working together for the betterment of the whole, the country will begin to disintegrate. The face in the window, whether to ourselves or to the rest of the world, must be the face of unity. Otherwise, the glass will splinter, crack and badly distort the image of what once existed: unity, co-operation and consensus.

These are the hallmarks of our federal system. They have been stamped on it year after year since 1867. We have faced some extremely difficult and tense periods during those 114 years, but we have always weathered them because of the ultimate willingness of sometimes seemingly intransigent politicians to set aside their more narrowly defined and based interests, whether centrally oriented or provincially oriented, for the greater good of the country as a whole.

These politicians, whether Canadian prime ministers or provincial premiers, knew it was necessary in the face of deadlock and division to draw back and address themselves once more to the question: How can we restore the crucial balance essential to any federal system, a balance which recognizes the need for both strong provinces and a strong national community? That was the question on which they stood back time and again when it was necessary to readdress.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, perhaps it was easy to ride roughshod over the provinces a century ago. They had new powers which had yet to be tested and which at the time were nowhere near as important as those assigned to the central government. But times have changed and federalism, which is a growing, lively and dynamic system of government, has evolved.

We have been witnessing that phenomenon in Canada, particularly since World War II. Not unlike the other industrialized nations, we have lived through a social revolution which brought massive changes in our education systems, in our health services, and in our attitude towards the needy.

Extensive programs were established to meet the social expectations born out of the last half century. And generally speaking, owing to our Constitution, responsibility for those programs belongs to the provinces. Because some provinces had to face that responsibility which was not theirs before, the balance of federalism was altered. In addition their resources potential was not then fully acknowledged, but it has since become a power lever in the hands of the provinces. Neither social programs nor resources projects held high priority during the first 50, 60 or 70 years of the history of our nation, but once they were established they strengthened the role of the provinces in the federal equation.

[English]

The central government, for its part, moved into new areas and opened up whole new departments of government in Ottawa—DREE, Communications and Urban Affairs. With this shift it was inevitable that there would be greater conflict between the two levels of government. More than ever it was important to work out conflicts and potential disputes between the two levels of government by discussion, understanding, tolerance and hard-won consensus. More than ever it became increasingly important that the central government not be isolated in its thinking from the various regions of the country. More than ever it became increasingly important that there be continuous regional input into the central institutions and the central decision-makers so that their decisions would reflect adequately the diverse nature of this country.

It was obvious to anyone who was giving the matter any serious attention, who was at all sensitive to the very real regional differences in this country, that Ottawa would have to develop new mechanisms to reconcile these emerging differences. Otherwise, there would be increasing conflict between Ottawa and the provinces and between region and region as individual provinces struggled to bring their particular interests to the fore. It had to be the responsibility of the central government to reconcile those interests and those differences to make possible the means which would channel potentially divisive tension into a positive creative force for the nation as a whole.

The Pepin-Robarts report hammered home this vision of the country. Even the federal-provincial relations office in Ottawa appeared amenable to that concept. A few years ago that particular office, under the guidance of Gordon Robertson, a senior mandarin and long-time adviser to prime ministers, seemed to recognize the necessity for parallel and complementary nation-building and province-building. The need to maintain the balance so essential to our federal system seemed to be understood in Ottawa. There was no talk then of unilateral action by one partner in the federation against another. Indeed, in the continual discussions of the past 20 years on the Constitution, no government in Ottawa ever suggested that patriation or the imposition of an amending formula could or should be carried out unilaterally.

We must ask ourselves what makes the federal government of 1981 able to do something which the federal governments of 1964, 1971, 1975, 1978 and 1979—all those years when the Constitution was debated—felt they could not do? Throughout all those years the central government felt it had a moral obligation, one much more important to the well-being of the country than any narrow legalistic approach, to act in concert with its partners in the federal system. That was a commitment to the Canadian way and an expression of belief in 114 years of shared progress, all of which the Liberal government is now willing to jettison or jeopardize by narrowing its view of what makes this country such a distinctive entity. We are being pushed toward a unitary system, a unilateral approach which would ignore the potential of regions, which would subjugate provinces to a lesser role and, indeed, lock them into a caste-system which would turn its back on what we have succeeded in becoming in 114 years of evolving federalism.

But these, Sir, seem to be the Prime Minister's goals. He stated them to be patriation—unilaterally; an amending formula—unilaterally; and a charter of rights—unilaterally. Yet patriation could and should be accomplished with the endorsement of all the partners in the federation. An amending formula could be worked out with the provinces, as it was worked out in principle last summer, if only the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would lessen his rigidity. I venture to say that a charter of rights could be arrived at here in Canada if patience and persuasiveness would only replace arrogance and high-handedness.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: This country has been fortunate in that in times of greatest difficulty our leading politicians have always been willing to walk the extra mile to ensure that federalism works—all of our leading politicians in the past but not, it appears, the present Prime Minister. To the detriment of the country he insists upon saying, "This time we will do it my way." But his way is repugnant to 64 per cent of the people of Canada, to all of the parties in the province of Quebec and to eight of the ten provinces of Canada. Why? Because his way rejects the federal nature of this country.

How long would we have lasted at earlier flashpoints in our country's history if the nation's leaders in those times had been as intransigent and as locked into a personal obsession as the present Prime Minister? More than anything it is the threat to our federal system of government inherent in every aspect of these constitutional proposals which leads me to reject them so strenuously. What the government is proposing is to use its power to make fundamental changes, unilaterally, to the very structure of this country, not just on this one occasion but on an ongoing basis.

I refer, of course, to the power of the unilateral referendum with which the government now seeks to arm itself. Of all the specifics in these proposals this is the most iniquitous, the most injurious to our system. It has been condemned by parliamentarians and the public alike, by those apprehensive about our freedoms and by experts in the field of constitutional law. The referendum proposal has been criticized by Gordon Robertson, whom I mentioned earlier. He spoke of it as, and I quote, "A dangerous way to try to find a remedy to a problem". It is a measure, he said, that could give flesh and substance to east-west divisions.

It is not, however, a new proposal but an objective that the Prime Minister has long cherished. The attempt has been made in the past to insinuate the referendum into our political process. Then, as now, the government pretended it would amount to less than what is really proposed. The manipulation which was attempted several years ago should not be ignored by any member of this House today. In fact, I remind hon. members that in 1978 the government introduced Bill C-9, an act respecting public referendums in Canada on questions relating to the Constitution of Canada. At that time we were told that Bill C-9 would be used only to counter the Quebec referendum when it came. We were assured that it would be used once only. It was said the government needed the same right to consult the people of Quebec as did those advocating separation. That is what was said but that is not what was intended. In reality, what was attempted then, as is attempted now, was the integration of the referendum process into the fundamental political fabric of the nation, at the expense of our tried and tested political and judicial institutions and processes.

It is enlightening to look back now and see the devious route that the Liberal government followed then. For in 1978, at the very time the Prime Minister was meeting with the provincial premiers to review the whole matter of the Constitution, the government, unilaterally, introduced the referendum bill. At the very time when there was supposed bilateral discussion on the entire spectrum of federal and provincial powers, Bill C-9 was proposed, which would have given the federal government the power to override any result of the federal-provincial discussions then under way.

The House can be forgiven a sense of déjà vu. In the debate on Bill C-9, when I pointed out the threat that the referendum posed to our system of federalism, the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) labelled what I had to say as "nonsense". We were told to take the government's word that it would not abuse these new and wide-ranging powers it was seeking to acquire, that we should accept blindly what they proposed.

It is very interesting to note that while the Progressive Conservative Party strongly opposed this grab by the Trudeau government of new powers, the New Democratic Party leader marched joyously along with the government. Indeed, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) saw nothing wrong then with the unilateral use of the referenda power by one level of government against another, as he does not see anything wrong with it today. The Prime Minister at that time was more candid than some of his ministers as to the uses he would make of a referendum. It was not his intention that the new power should be reserved solely to counter the PQ referendum. In a press conference in October of 1978 the Prime Minister said this:

> The questions (in a referendum) could have to do with as simple a thing as patriation of the Constitution, or repatriation of the Constitution; they could have to do with the will of the country to remain united, as they could have to do with anything in between.

I repeated it then and I repeat now, "anything in between". Had the government succeeded at that time in getting that referendum bill through, there would be no area of federal or provincial jurisdiction today on which a referendum, initiated unilaterally by the central government, framed unilaterally by the central government and conducted unilaterally by the central government, could not be used. Such scope is not merely dangerous, it is terrifying. Yet here we are, back once again with virtually the same proposal.

Conditions have not changed significantly in the past two or three years. The possibility of abuse of the referendum proposal remains the same as when Principal Watts of Queen's University, appearing before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs on Bill C-9, stated:

> What is important about the nature of the general bill is that the very existence of the bill—even if it were never invoked—the very fact that such a general bill exists, itself, becomes a potential leverage in discussions with the provinces about constitution reforms.

The very existence of the referendum power in the hands of the central government invokes the spectre of unilateral action on an ongoing basis. It signifies the end of co-operative federalism; and quite possibly, some day, the end of our individual freedoms as well. For with the device of the referenda, we can never be assured that even those rights specified in the imperfect proposals for a charter of rights will really be protected.

We can never know when an occasion such as the October crisis of 1970 may be used by an unscrupulous government to make permanent changes to the Constitution and to our lives. There is nothing definitive about the use the federal government would make of a referendum, nor are there any checks and balances to potential abuses.

We have no direct precendent upon which we can judge these proposals. But we do have the experience of the power grab which the Liberal government attempted with its referendum bill. I did not trust the government's motives then, and I certainly do not trust them now; nor am I assuaged in that mistrust by the proposals contained in the charter of rights.

The most detailed part of this resolution, as we have seen, and the one to which most attention has been given over the past few months, is the charter of rights. I strongly endorse the entrenchment of a charter of rights in the Canadian Constitution—

An hon. Member: Bravo.

Miss MacDonald: —but one that is thoroughly developed in Canada, debated in Canada and passed into law in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: I agree wholeheartedly with those who say that a charter of rights cannot be bartered against this or that regional of specific interest; but I agree even more with those who say that it is such an extraordinary act of faith in our country that it cannot come into being as the byproduct of strife and dissension and bitterness.

Mr. Wilson: The means do not justify the end.

Miss MacDonald: The entrenchment of a charter of rights should be a cause for celebration in one's own country, not a bone of contention because it has been enacted into law by the government of another country.

I am persuaded on at least two counts that we need an entrenched charter to protect our rights and freedoms. First, I shall never forget the traumatic shock I had as an individual when, in October of 1970, the then and now Prime Minister suspended the freedoms of Canadians by the imposition of the War Measures Act. In the heat and acrimony and supercharged atmosphere of that period, it may have been the politically popular and expedient thing to do, but it was the wrong thing to do. A person's rights and freedoms are so basic and so precious that no government leader should arbitrarily have the right to suspend them.

The second reason I support the entrenchment of a charter is that I believe it would offer some degree of security, of certainty, in a society where change and uncertainty and disruption are increasingly the norm. That is very important. But are we presented with such a charter? The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) admits it is far from being a perfect instrument. Why should we, when we come to entrenching something as important as a charter of rights, be satisfied with a halfway measure?

In its initial appearance it was so grotesque as to unite all human rights activists against it. How is it the government was so lacking in wisdom, in judgment, that it was able to put forward such a mean-spirited, negative document? I admit quite readily that it was improved during the committee hearings as a result of the representations of a limited number of Canadians. It could hardly have been made worse. But even yet, it is far from adequate, as the outcry from the 1,000 women who attended a conference on the Constitution earlier this month made clear. They, and others, ask: "Why is it there is no mention in the very first clause of the charter that all rights guaranteed hereinafter should apply equally to men and women?"

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: That was demanded by every women's group which appeared before the committee, and by the thousands who did not have that opportunity. That is the wording in the universal Declaration of Human Rights, to which we are a signatory, yet the government chose to ignore it. It is a sad reflection on the government's concept of equality that women should have to argue that their rights must be protected in this specific article or that specific article, as if somehow we are not equal in all aspects to all other Canadians.

The Minister of Justice has stated that the charter has been improved to protect the rights of women. The rights of women will be fully realized when one does not have to argue for protection but can point to a straightforward, unequivocal statement of purpose that all rights apply equally to men and women.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: No difference. No argument. No compromise.

Mr. Wilson: Where was MacGuigan when we needed him?

Miss MacDonald: But this charter lacks such a statement. I ask the minister, why is it not there?

There are other shortcomings to this charter. I have no assurance from reading it that the discrimination which presently exists against Indian women who marry non-status men and thereby lose their Indian status would be corrected under this charter. Far from it. The proposed entrenchment of certain native rights might make it possible to argue that this long-standing tradition of treating Indian women as second-class citizens is also entrenched. Why does the government not immediately eliminate that possibility by taking the simple step, through legislation, of removing Section 12(1)(b) from the Indian Act?

That proposal has, I know, the support of all women members of the House of Commons and the Senate, and I am sure that if the government would only be courageous enough to introduce a bill to abolish Section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act, it would have the support of the great majority of parliamentarians. That single step would be the best possible indication of the government's commitment to human rights.

I have said that I support the entrenchment of a charter of rights in the Constitution, but this particular charter is being held hostage to a divisive process that could do irreparable damage to our country.

I have heard some hon. members on the Liberal side argue against that proposal. I would say to them that the Liberal government has refused to bring in that kind of proposal for years, and that was something which was drafted by the Clark government. I hoped they would have accepted it, but I am afraid, given the reaction I now see, they would still have voted against it. Ask the people of this country whether or not Indian women should be equal to any other citizen of this country, and they will answer, "Yes".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Why will the government not separate the two and let us get on with persuading other Canadians of the merits of an entrenched charter—arrived at here in Canada, by and for Canadians—a goal which I think can be realized in this country? But that goal can only be realized if the government renounces its unilateral approach to constitutional reform and attempts once more the federalist route we have trod so often in the past.

A balanced system of federalism is as necessary to Canada's survival as the very air we breathe. Today that system is being subjected to a three-pronged assault by the Liberal government's constitutional proposals: first, by the decision to make major constitutional changes unilaterally; second, by the threat to impose an amending formula which would set province against province and region against region; and third, by the trickery of a referendum which could ride roughshod over the other partners in the federal system.

We have seen the results to date of anger, bitterness and divisiveness. Never before in our country's history has a Prime Minister deliberately set out to create such conflict through his lack of tolerance, understanding and compassion for Canadians in all parts of this great country. I would ask the Prime Minister to look to the examples set by all of his predecessors and draw back from this dangerous and destructive course. The partnership of Canada must continue. It must be upheld. This resolution would inflict upon it lasting wounds.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, in this House, I am happy to participate in this constitutional debate. As you are aware, in the previous portion of the debate in this chamber closure was invoked upon those members who wished to participate. Now again through the news media we hear rumblings that this portion of the debate is to be limited. I hope these rumblings are not true. It is imperative that members in this chamber have an opportunity to participate in this debate so that the individual regions can be heard on this very important issue. In reality, that is what our democracy is all about.

I rise to take part in this debate with a certain amount of sadness, sadness because in some respects this debate is so unnecessary. When we view the difficulties we are facing as a nation, we find that these difficulties are not being dealt with simply because of the ideological theories of one man, namely the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). It is because he does not wish to understand the true federal nature of our Canadian way of life that we are dealing with the constitutional issue at this time.

I am saddened also because these economic issues have to be addressed and they have not been addressed since this government once again assumed the treasury benches. I am sure that most members on both sides of the House would agree that these are issues which must be addressed.

Let me begin my remarks on the constitutional issue by paying tribute to the leader of our party who, on October 2, was given but a short 90 minutes after receiving the Prime Minister's text to analyse the issues and to look at the difficulties which this constitutional resolution would place upon the Canadian people, and in that short period of time he homed in on the issues and brought forward our position to the Canadian people. He did all Canadians proud by sharing with them his views on the constitutional resolution at that time.

I wish to pay tribute to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) for the integrity which he has shown in this debate. I wish to pay tribute also to his statemanship and patience in dealing with the resolution which has occupied so many hours of his time.

I wish to pay tribute to you, Mr. Speaker. On two very difficult occasions you occupied the chair when the proceedings were not as they should have been. I remember the evening when closure was invoked and a number of hon. members marched to the Chair to express disappointment at the closure motion brought forward by the Liberal government opposite. I remember the difficulty you encountered by having to name a member on this side, and even though I concur with what the member said at that time, I realize the difficulty in which he placed the Chair.

We have moved as a party to separate this package so that we can have the patriation proposal passed now giving Canadians the authority to amend their own Constitution, and as well a charter of rights which will be dealt with in Canada. This will give provincial legislatures an opportunity to participate in the development of a charter of rights. This approach would remove any intrusion into provincial rights and powers and provide immediately legal authority to amend our Canadian Constitution.

Members opposite might ask why we took this approach. We believe the Liberal government's approach to be illegitimate, unilateral and, therefore, divisive. Our proposals in the joint committee were designed to enhance the legitimacy of the constitutional process by making it consistent with the traditions of Canadian federalism. Our proposals would have generated national pride by having changes to the Constitution made in Canada, and removed the division in the country by building upon existing consensus.

Our party supports patriation. We support the entrenchment of equalization rights in the Constitution. We also support the Vancouver amending formula. We presented a resolution to this House on October 22, which the Liberals and the New Democratic Party voted against, indicating that we should patriate our Constitution immediately.

Throughout this debate, our party has attempted to strike the compromises which are necessary to put an end to the hostility and divisions throughout our country. This resolution presently before us has poisoned the intergovernmental relationships which are so necessary in a country such as Canada. We have the unilateral action of the Prime Minister in bringing forward this resolution, and his double standard for changes in our Constitution, standards whereby we will have unilateral federal action for the Prime Minister's amendments and the application of an amending formula for everybody else's thoughts.

The foundation of our Canadian federation is based on a system of two orders of government with respect for each other. This present unilateral action, this acting alone, causes an atmosphere of distrust, disunity and confrontation. In our Canadian federation our provinces have, and must continue to have, a meaningful role to play. Provincial input is required and necessary. We in our party would like to see provincial input because the Canadian federation is a partnership, a partnership which should have all levels contributing.

Again, I share the view that this resolution is creating an atmosphere which will disrupt any possibility of genuine reform taking place in the coming years. The government's proposal is based on a false premise. The Liberal government's premise is that the federal system no longer works and that progress cannot come from consensus. The basic premise of the resolution before us is that consensus does not work; that negotiation will not result in success. On that premise, the Liberal government opposite feels it is justified in acting alone in the face of opposition, not only from the provinces, but also from the Canadian people. The genius of our federal system is that consensus does work when reasonable governments are willing to sit down and work out a compromise. It is obvious it will not work when we have a federal government opposite wishing to impose its will on other levels of government. That is exactly what the Prime Minister wishes. He wishes the process of federalism to fail so that he could force his own will upon the Canadian population. This was substantiated in the leaked documents which came out of the first ministers' meeting wherein he indicated it would be beneficial to the federal government if the conference failed so they could proceed with unilateral action. The process failed because the Prime Minister sabotaged the first ministers' conference.

Mr. Collenette: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I draw your attention to the fact that no member of this House can impute motives to another member of the House. The hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Elzinga) has transgressed the rules and practices of this House by imputing motives to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I ask him to withdraw that comment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Pembina has the floor. I am sure the hon. member is aware that the kind of language he is using could cause problems in terms of what is parliamentary and what is not parliamentary.

Mr. Taylor: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, the language being used is not half as bad as that which the Prime Minister uses almost every day in question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Elzinga: As I was saying, confederation only fails when its leaders allow it to fail, and the Prime Minister has allowed the system to fail. The Prime Minister says we have been working for 54 years to bring home our Constitution. When we examine the record, we find that to be true. However, during those 54 years only 48 days were allotted to actual negotiations on bringing home the Constitution. Therefore, the argument is obviously false.

Why do members opposite want Great Britain to amend our Constitution rather than bring it home? Why do they ask Great Britain to meddle in our affairs? Let me share with members opposite the reason why. The amendments to our Constitution being proposed in this resolution would not meet the test of the Prime Minister's amending formula; therefore he wants Great Britain to do his dirty work.

In our view, the proposed resolution is politically illegitimate in that it ignores Canada's federal nature. It is unilateral because it excludes from the process of constitutional change the provinces, which are full partners in confederation. As a result, the constitutional measure is divisive now and will be in the future.

The amending formula presented in the resolution is deficient. There is no chance of gaining the consensus required to make it a respected formula. Moreover, the proposed Victoria formula creates classes of provinces, giving some a perpetual veto and imposing population requirements on others. I reject the Victoria amending formula because it does not recognize the equality of the provinces in our federation. It provides to some provinces a perpetual veto regardless of what their population may be in future years. It creates different classes of provinces in the Atlantic region and different classes of provinces in western Canada.

There is obvious discrimination in this amending formula on the basis of population. The amending formula is bad because it is entrenching unfairness into it. Even though it is wrong and unacceptable, members opposite are willing to see entrenched in the Constitution an amending formula which is unfair and inequitable.

The amending formula is one of the most important aspects of the resolution. This Liberal government raises a very thorny issue by putting its blessing on the Victoria charter. Any province which has or has had 25 per cent of the population of the country would have a perpetual veto. The red flag word is "had". Things have changed in Canada since 1971. There have been and will continue to be decided population shifts. If Quebec and Ontario are to be granted a perpetual veto, those provinces which may grow to 25 per cent can justifiably say that they should have the veto now. After all, provinces with 25 per cent now may not have that population in the future, but they will have a perpetual veto.

The people in my area argue with perfect logic that if Quebec and Ontario are to retain a veto, even if they lose the share of their population which gave them the veto, then western Canadians should have it now. It confirms what many of us believe, that this Constitution is being rewritten simply to protect the two old provinces of confederation. We find that discrimination totally unfair. We resent being made second-class citizens.

The government insists on incorporating a referendum into the resolution. This would give the central government unilateral power to change the Constitution without reference to the elected legislatures of the provinces. We reject this proposal. I hope that members opposite will examine their consciences and vote in favour of the amendment we put forward earlier.

The charter of rights and freedoms is deficient in that it does not include the right to enjoyment of property. The exercise of this right has been instrumental in the building of Canada and is a principle valued by the great majority of Canadians. Everyone who has understood the common law has said that a man's home is his castle. Many people emigrated to Canada attracted by the right to own homes, farms and property.

The Liberal-NDP coalition has refused to endorse that right and include it in the charter. One must ask, why have they done this? When the hon. member for Provencher opened the debate for our party, he questioned why the Liberal Party rejected our amendment, based on the Diefenbaker bill of rights, to recognize and acknowledge the supremacy of God. A portion of that amendment read, "affirming that the Canadian nation is founded upon the principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God".

Why do members opposite not see fit to incorporate an amendment such as this in the constitutional package? Many of us believe that the Liberal-NDP coalition has sold out the interests of western Canada. Members of the New Democratic Party say that the resolution is very much improved because of the many amendments they proposed. If we review the record, we find that of the 43 amendments they presented, 41 were defeated and two were accepted. Therefore they can take very little credit for improving the resolution.

Western Canadians do not wish to dismantle this nation. They want to participate in a federation which gives equality to all. However, they should expect and receive fairness from our federal institutions. As I illustrated in my earlier remarks, the amending formula alone makes them very wary of any prospect of fairness on the part of the federal government.

I love Canada and I love Alberta, Mr. Speaker. I want to have the opportunity of contributing to the growth of both. When we examine what has been brought forward in the last few months and the negative impact it is having on the region that I come from, we find it has caused division. The constitutional package has caused division. The energy package has also caused division because it is so similar to the constitutional package in its discrimination against the regions.

I cannot help but be puzzled when I see hon. members opposite indicate sensitivity to the frustrations of Quebec. I sympathize with the frustrations of people in that area but I am puzzled that hon. members opposite show so little sensitivity for other areas when all of the country is Canada.

As I shared with you earlier, Mr. Speaker, one man's obsession is causing the difficulty that we are having in Canada today. When we consider the economic difficulties that the nation faces, we see that this government has given us record high interest rates, a record low dollar, record high government spending, record high government deficits and record high unemployment. Maybe these are the reasons for the constitutional proposal before us. Maybe hon. members opposite hope that the Canadian people will be preoccupied with the constitutional proposal and not realize what a poor job they have done of governing the nation for the last several years.

In his presentation my colleague from British Columbia, who has been my seatmate for years, said that when we examine the wording of this resolution, when we consider who is talking to whom, we realize that by this resolution the government gives certain rights and privileges to the Canadian people. The wording of the resolution is very similar to that of the Russian constitution in which the government states the rights and privileges to be granted to the people. When we compare this proposal to the constitution of the United States, we find that the reverse is true, that the people there indicate to the government what powers they grant to the government. That is the way it should be in Canada. Our powers should be derived from the population. That is not the way this resolution is worded, however. The Prime Minister believes that he is almighty and that he can grant privileges to the individual in Canada. That is not what I believe democracy is and it is not the way that I believe the country should be run.

I have many reservations, Mr. Speaker, and the greatest one relates to the amending formula. I believe that in our nation all regions should play a meaningful role. I advocate that the amending process should be what is known as the Vancouver formula. I also advocate a change in the status of the Senate. We should have equal representation from each province in the Senate and it should be an elected body. The regions would be protected by a second chamber. I wholeheartedly support representation by population for the House of Commons, but it is obvious that if the regions are to have a role to play in confederation, they must be respected.

My parents were immigrants from The Netherlands. They came here because they felt it was a land of opportunity. They worked extremely hard and prospered in their new home because of the rights and freedoms they enjoyed here. As elected members of this House, it is our obligation to ensure that these rights and freedoms are protected. They have a deep feeling of pride in being Canadian and this pride would have been more rich and deep had this constitutional resolution met with a general consensus. What should develop more national pride than bringing the Constitution home to Canada? Instead, it has caused division in the nation.

Let me close by sharing with the House my feeling that in good conscience I cannot vote to support this resolution. I cannot live with myself knowing that it would leave my constituents, my region and my sons as second-class citizens in a nation where all are supposed to be equal.

Most western Canadians want to play a full and meaningful role in the development of this nation. They want to contribute to the growth not only of their region but to all of Canada. But if the policies of this government continue to push us out of confederation, then what will happen to this country is obvious to all.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, I love Canada, I love Alberta and I wish to contribute to the growth of both. I would ask hon. members opposite to allow us who come from the far regions of Canada to contribute to the welfare of the nation as a whole. True patriotism is to criticize constructively the land of our fathers and to construct the land of our children. We want to make a better country and a whole lot better world for our children. This land of our fathers is not as important as the land we leave to our children. This country is, in this sense, precisely the conjunction of virtues that were and are lacking in our historic home. The nation is what we have not been and what we must be under penalty of feeling ourselves erased. By so understanding our country, patriotism becomes for us an incessant activity. Our country becomes a task to be completed, a problem to be solved. It is our duty to complete that task.

Any thinking person will agree that true patriotism is to criticize the land of our fathers and to construct the land of our children. The greatest expression of true love is the desire to help and to serve one's country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the proposed resolution respecting the Canadian Constitution I should like to remind hon. members that this debate is apt to be recognized in subsequent years by historians, academics and our inevitable successors, as a crucial mark in Canadian history.

● (1640)

First, I would like to congratulate the Members of Parliament and those senators who participated in the special joint committee. I think particular congratulations should be bestowed upon the two co-chairmen of that committee.

In addition, I believe congratulations should be conveyed to those witnesses who appeared before the committee, gave evidence and submitted briefs on a variety of topics as they relate to the Constitution.

This resolution before Parliament contains numerous provisions which, by themselves, are not exhaustive but, taken collectively, can be said to encompass all of what John Porter might refer to as the Canadian mosaic.

One important aspect of this constitutional package is the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It is my assessment that enshrining in the Canadian constitution a charter of rights and freedoms is not only an important aspect of this constitutional package but a crucial aspect of confederation.

For a moment I would like very briefly to describe what some of those rights are. The fundamental rights are freedom of conscience and religion, freedom of thought, belief and opinion, freedom of expression, including freedom of the press and, of course, freedom of assembly. The democratic rights are the rights of individual Canadians to vote in elections of Members of Parliament and members of provincial legislatures. There are legal rights whereby everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person. Everyone has the right not to be arbitrarily detained. Every Canadian also has the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure.

There were various amendments to these sections as a result of testimony by a variety of groups which appeared before the special joint committee, including the United Church of Canada, the Canadian Civil Liberties Association and the government of New Brunswick.

Everyone has the right, on arrest or detention, to retain and instruct counsel without delay and to be informed of that right. This is a new addition because prior to this in the common law one did not have the right to be informed that one could have legal counsel. Every individual is equal before and under the law and is entitled to equal protection and benefit of the law without discrimination based on race, national origin or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age, mental or physical disability.

In the charter of rights we have enshrined the two official languages. We have also enshrined the aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal people of Canada. Those rights will now be recognized and affirmed in a Canadian Constitution.

One important aspect of this Canadian constitutional package is mobility rights. I believe it is an absolute necessity to maintain and promote the Canadian economic unit. Consequently, mobility rights ought to be enshrined in the Canadian Constitution. Enshrining in the Canadian Constitution the concept of mobility rights would give to Canadian citizens and persons who are permanent residents certain inherent rights based on the concept of Canada as an economic and political union in which Canadians should be free to move, reside and work without discrimination based upon provincial or territorial boundaries. These provisions would prevent a province from denying people from other provinces the right to take up residence or seek work simply because they are from other provinces. Enshrining mobility rights in the Constitution does not prevent the provinces from applying qualifications for employment as long as they apply equally to similar persons in the provinces.

This concept of mobility rights has been affirmed and recognized by Canadians across the country. Gordon Fairweather came before the special joint committee and said:

I am absolutely delighted to see that mobility rights are to be enshrined ... If the maritime provinces, from where I come, had been restricted in mobility there would have been social revolution in this country and I think it is time that people remembered that ... We are totally committed to this principle and I think that 99 per cent of the people of Canada are.

A spokesman for the Canadian Chamber of Commerce who appeared before the special joint committee said this:

I would like to draw to your attention the concern of the business community of Canada to the subject known as economic union, that ... is the free flow between the provinces of goods, services, capital and labour ... We have a concern that impediments ... between provincial jurisdictions ... are creating economic hardships, not only with the jurisdictions but for Canada as a whole in the development of its export trade.

He also said the Constitution should provide for a reduction of these impediments.

A great many other individuals recognized and affirmed the concept of mobility rights. In "A Future Together" in January of 1979, the Task Force on Canadian Unity said, and I quote:

In a federal union, the regions can expect their economies to perform better as a result of the free movement of labour, capital, goods and services.

The Canadian Bar Association said the following:

The Constitution should provide that all manpower may move freely without discrimination throughout the country.

The Quebec Liberal party has been referred to by hon. members opposite. In its beige paper it said:

The constitutional arrangements which would guarantee the right of all Canadians to establish themselves anywhere in the country, and their right to mobility, will not contradict the confirmation of provincial jurisdiction ... but they will, however, prevent the provinces from passing laws which discriminate between their permanent residents and other Canadians.

I am a Member of Parliament from Atlantic Canada. We in Atlantic Canada have a fair share of the most damaging problems in this country, unemployment and high inflation. It is particularly important that we as a country have mobility rights.

If hon. members were to check with Statistics Canada or some other body, whether it be provincial or federal, they would readily see that the flow of goods and labour between the provinces over a period of time is astronomical. For instance, from October, 1979, to September, 1980, the number of people who migrated to the province of Newfoundland was approximately 11,000. The number of people who migrated from that province was approximately 12,000. The figures I have cover all the provinces. It can readily be seen that the work force of Canada is very liberal with respect to mobility. It too does not want to be restricted.

We cannot speak of mobility rights in a vacuum. I believe we must look to other jurisdictions which have enshrined mobility rights in their constitutions. Why should Canada be different? Such other jurisdictions as the United States, Australia, Switzerland, the Federal Republic of Germany and Indian have all enshrined in their constitutions the concept of mobility rights.

In the days since this government announced its plans to patriate the Constitution we have heard a host of emotional reactions from a variety of sources. Indeed this is proper, for I believe we all look forward to the arrival of our Constitution in Canada after some 113 years. It is an arrival to which I look forward with a great sense of accomplishment. I, like other Members of Parliament and like the members of the Senate, will be a part of that great and historic event.

However, for a moment let us lay aside the emotional aspects of this issue and examine exactly what the patriation of this Constitution means in a practical sense. I believe all of us here and all those across the nation are cognizant of the reasons why the Fathers of Confederation came together over a century ago. They, like us, recognized the potential of a union of the widespread regions of this land. Only today are we beginning to realize that potential fully. It is a potential which is linked implicitly with a strong economic structure governed by a strong national government. They, like us, recognized that this land contains an abundance of resources and wealth which are second to none in the rest of the world. They also recognized that the strength of these resources could only be fully realized when the goods and services abundant in one area of the country could be shared with other areas where those particular resources did not abound.

We are all aware, Mr. Speaker, of the value of this holistic philosophy, a philosophy that states unequivocally that the sum of the individual parts is greater than the sum total of each individual segment. It was this realization, above all else, that prompted the various factions to lay aside their individual goals in order to construct a structure from which all would benefit.

The logic of such an argument is all around us today for us to view and appreciate. Canada is a country that owes its present status to the foresight and courage of those people who were able to lay aside their personal interests in the short term to achieve results that individually would have been unattainable.

In many ways, when I think of our country I cannot help but compare it to a family. Outwardly, a family can be seen as a group of individuals each with a certain set of goals, expectations, interests and talents. Certain members may make their contribution through their skills as intellectuals or educators, others through their ability to manufacture, and still others through their compassion and understanding. All make valuable contributions, and no one trait is more or less important than any other. Separately, each may be able to exist independently, at least for a short period of time. But where, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, does the real strength come from with these individuals? It results from their coming together in a unit that we refer to as a family. It is the family that provides the sense of belonging, the feeling of strength, and the sense of identity.

And what of this family that we call Canada? In my analogy, all the family members have significant and vital roles to play in the development and preservation of the unit. In this country, one member is able to make its contribution through its abundance of minerals, the raw materials needed for manufacturing, while another can provide the expertise for manufacturing these materials, and still another can provide the energy resources needed in the manufacturing. Some members can provide food from the waters that surround them, and others food from the land. Some areas are ideally suited to provide the facilities for exporting our goods, while others are better equipped to provide the goods to be exported.

The point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is that collectively as a nation we possess all the skills, resources, initiative and intelligence that will allow us to achieve our true potential as a great family, a great nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dingwall: What we must guard against, however, is the temptation to count ourselves as part of the family only when it is to our advantage. We cannot be a member who relies on the family unit only in times of need and turns its back in better times. We must not try to lavish our own interests at the expense of other family members. Such an occurrence cannot be permitted for it tears at the very fibre that binds the unit together, leaving it disjointed, ineffective and weak. Hence the need for enshrining in the Canadian Constitution the concept of equalization.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dingwall: There are some who may agree with the points I am making but voice their opposition to the manner in which this government is moving to accomplish the task. I would remind them that this government is exercising the very power that the Constitution sought to establish, a power that would allow for a strong voice, the voice of the people, to be heard above the voices of those whose main concern was their own regional and sometimes selfish interests.

This government, in its move to patriate the Constitution, is bringing this country to a new and exciting period in our history. This move is as important as the original one, made over a century ago, in that it allows us to advance to our next stage of development, a stage that will see us move from adolescence into adulthood.

I have already referred to my concept of this country as being similar in structure and philosophy to that of the family, a family with shared responsibility for the well-being of each other. This notion of equalization provides the vehicle by which this responsibility can be realized. Such a system should not be regarded by any one region or province as a one-way street, with money continually being taken from one area to be pumped into another. Moreover, such a system allows the national government to provide a stimulus in a given area for a certain period of time, a time when that province is able to support itself.

The commitments stated in Section 34(1) of the proposed resolution—to promote equal opportunities, to reduce economic disparities and to provide essential public services across the country—capture one of the most important elements of what it means to be a Canadian, a willingness to share our good fortune and our opportunities so that we can grow strong together.

I should like to remind hon. members that this commitment applies not only to Parliament and to the Government of Canada, but also to the legislatures and the governments of the provinces, although it is noted that this commitment does not alter the legislative powers of the two orders of government.

There is great merit in enshrining in the Constitution the concept of equalization so that sharing will be an important ingredient in the future of our national life. But there can be no doubt about the federal government's current commitment to the principle of equalization. I could go on at some length to describe the current equalization program, but let me simply note that, for the fiscal year 1980-81, this program will require disbursements in excess of $3.3 billion. In Atlantic Canada, the province of Prince Edward Island will receive from the federal government unconditionally, with no strings attached, approximately $85 million to be used by that government for whatever they think necessary. Newfoundland will receive $377 million, New Brunswick $387 million, and my own province of Nova Scotia in excess of $440 million.

Canadians are aware of the provinces which are presently in need of such equalization payments and those from which the funds for these payments are derived. It should be noted that these provinces have not remained the same throughout the history of equalization payments. Indeed, the province of Alberta, to which we now refer as a have province, and whose potential is unlimited, received equalization payments from 1957-58 through to 1964-65. On the other hand, the province of Newfoundland, which has been the recipient of payments since 1957, now appears to be close to an era, which I am certain all members hope to be a reality, when such payments may no longer be necessary.

No one, Mr. Speaker, is capable of predicting the future, but with equalization payments Canadians from all parts of this country are assured of a reasonable standard of public services without imposing an undue tax burden on its residents. This notion of sharing has become a tradition in our country, a tradition that can be traced back to the original goals and ideals of the Fathers of Confederation, and it is a notion to which this party subscribes wholeheartedly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I wish to quote one of Britain's great prime ministers, Sir Winston Churchill, who stated:

The destiny of mankind is not decided by material computation. When great causes are on the move in the world . . . we learn that we are spirits, not animals, and that something is going on in space and time, and beyond space and time, which, whether we like it or not, spells duty.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that, prior to the Quebec referendum, and shortly thereafter, members of this House, and indeed many of the first ministers, made a commitment not only to the people of Quebec but indeed to all Canadians with regard to constitutional renewal. We, as Members of Parliament, ought to seize this historic opportunity to fulfil our duty to the Canadian people. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the time is now.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Items Nos. 17, 18, 22 and 25 allowed to stand by unanimous consent.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING CONSTRUCTION OF CHAIN-LINK FENCES

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East) moved that Bill C-227, to amend the Railway Act (fences), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I enter private members' hour with a bill of my own which I have discussed with the critics of the other parties, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) who in his brief tenure as minister of transport did a first rate job for the country and with whom I have shared many causes in the Thirtieth Parliament on the standing committee on transport and communications, and the official critic of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) who is present today and I think will be participating in the debate. I know I have his approval for this bill. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) informed me that he is quite prepared to allow this bill to go forward to the Standing Committee on Transport. This will mark the first time that a private member's bill has gone forward in this Parliament.

It is very rare for private members' bills to go to committee, but in this case I feel very much vindicated because I have worked on this particular matter since 1977. It came about in rather tragic circumstances, as a result of the death of one of my very young constituents, a girl named Sandra Jensen, who in 1977 was hit by a Canadian Pacific freight train in my constituency of York East.

My constituency is one of those in metropolitan Toronto which straddles the Don Valley system. We have the main lines of both the Canadian Pacific Railway and Canadian National Railways. There have been many injuries over the past, but the death of young Sandra Jensen was particularly tragic. As a result of representations from people in my constituency—obviously her parents and members of the council of the then borough of North York, which is now the city of North York—I brought forward this bill in November, 1977. This is the first time this bill, through the lottery or draw system in the House of Commons, has come up for debate.

I do not think I should bore the House, but I had many a battle over this bill with the former minister of transport, the Hon. Otto Lang, and the president of the Canadian Transport Commission, the Hon. Edgar Benson. We tried to come to some agreement; it was on again, off again. I must pay tribute to the present Minister of Transport who has seen fit to allow this bill to go to committee. As I understand it, there will be support on all sides to permit that today.

Basically it is a very simple bill. It is to require that chain-link fencing be constructed along railway rights-of-way in urban areas upon the petition of a municipality to the Canadian Transport Commission. The current Railway Act provides only for fencing in rural areas basically designed to keep cows off railway tracks. Of course, we do not have many cows in metropolitan Toronto, but there are many railway lines. As I said, the main lines of both major railways go through my constituency. There is a lot of trespassing on those railway rights-of-way. Older people can take care of themselves; they run the risk of being on the tracks. But this bill seeks to protect the Sandra Jensens of metropolitan Toronto and any other urban area where, despite warnings and parental supervision, young pre-school children wander on to very busy railway tracks.

This particular track has some notoriety because it is the same track on which the famous chemical derailment occurred two years ago in Mississauga; it is the same line. Had that derailment occurred 15 or 20 minutes later, it would have occurred in my constituency. Luckily it occurred in Mississauga, an industrial area, so no fatalities occurred. It could have occurred in my constituency or anywhere along the CP right-of-way in metropolitan Toronto, and I would hazard a guess that many hundreds or perhaps even thousands of people could have been injured by that very serious train wreck.

As I said, the current Railway Act provides for cow fencing to be installed along railway rights-of-way, but it does not provide specifically for chain-link fencing. An accommodation can be reached between a railway and a municipality after lengthy negotiation.

I should like to look at the correspondence I have received on this subject. Most recently I received a copy of an August 23, 1978, letter to Mr. J. D'Avignon, the secretary of the railway transport committee of the Canadian Transport Commission. It is quite obvious that the railways are not serious about protecting the young children of urban centres by taking the initiative and co-operating with municipalities in erecting this kind of fencing. My bill makes provision for a municipality—in my case, either the borough of East York, the city of North York or metropolitan Toronto—to make an application to the Canadian Transport Commission to instal chain-link fencing.

The railways argue against this by indicating that there will be many frivolous requests. That is the reason we specifically require an application to the CTC. I am sure there are rural members in the House today who know that to put chain-link fencing along the borders of the wheat fields of Saskatchewan or the farmlands in southwestern Ontario would be an exorbitant waste of money. But in urban areas, such as metropolitan Toronto in particular—and I am sure every other major urban area in the country—there is a need to protect the lives of innocent children.

The Toronto Transit Commission, which runs the electric rail system or the subways in metropolitan Toronto, obviously must put chain-link fencing along its rights-of-way because of the live third rail. But I would submit there is very little difference between a live third rail and a freight train with a hazardous cargo which, on the downhill on the CP track in my constituency, travels at least 70 miles per hour. These trains carry many hazardous and heavy loads; there are curves in the valley and braking is almost virtually impossible. In situations like that we need some protection for young children who trespass on railway rights-of-way. Basically, that is what the bill before us deals with. The city of North York in Toronto has been very supportive of this approach. In fact, there was a resolution of the works committee as adopted by the Borough Council, as it then was, in 1974 which I think succinctly summarizes the problem. I wish to quote from that works committee report:

Fencing along railroad tracks is erected by the railroad companies "for the purpose of keeping domestic livestock from railway property and protected from trains".

● (1710)

That quotation is from the Railway Act. The report goes on:

The city of Toronto contends that more substantial fencing should be erected along railroads by the railway companies through urban areas than the type of fencing required along railroads through farmlands and recommends as follows:

"Whereas Section 277 of the Railway Act provides for the erection of fences to a height of 4 feet 6 inches on each side of a railway, for swing gates at farm crossings and for cattle guards;

"And whereas such fencing and gates are adequate for cattle but not for human beings;

"And whereas the Minister of Transport has advised the city of Toronto that he is not prepared to advocate an amendment to Section 277 of the Railway Act at this time,

"Now therefore be it resolved that the federal government be asked to give further consideration to amending the Railway Act so as to obligate the railways to provide adequate fencing for the protection of the public in urban areas beyond the amount authorized to protect livestock, having due regard for the commercial users of the railways."

I maintain that this will not cost an exorbitant amount of money in metropolitan Toronto, or in any other municipality, since private owners often erect, at their own expense, chain-link fencing to keep, for example, residents of an apartment building, or employees of a factory, from trespassing on the railways. They bear that expense.

In the city of North York I believe that almost half of the railway rights-of-way do have some kind of chain-link fencing. Thus, the cost will not be exorbitant. What I am asking for is the differential cost between the cattle fencing, which is now stipulated in the Railway Act, and chain-link fencing. The differential should be split 50-50, 50 per cent for the effective municipality and 50 per cent for the railway concerned. I believe this will go a long way toward keeping the very busy railway rights-of-way in urban areas safe.

Again, I wish to underline the fact that there have been discussions among the parties with respect to this matter. I have talked with the hon. member for Vegreville and with the hon. member from the NDP. There seems to be a general disposition to allow this bill to go to committee, to hear witnesses and to let the president of the Canadian Transport Commission be brought forth to explain the role of the Commission. The Minister of Transport should come forward to state government policy.

The railways may also come forward and object to providing what I consider to be a useful public service in the erection of chain-link fencing on railway rights-of-way in urban areas. But they would do this at their own peril, although I think that many Canadians, and certainly the mother of Sandra Jensen as well as many of my constituents who are affected by this particular problem, feel that it is almost an uphill battle to take on the railways. It has often been said that the Canadian Pacific Railway or CP investment is bigger than the government. I am sure some of my friends from out west would agree with me.

Mr. Knowles: True!

Mr. Collenette: Here is a case where, over the objections of the railways which have asked that this bill not go forward, the Minister of Transport has taken a very enlightened and reasonable approach and is prepared to allow this bill to go forward to the standing committee and, hopefully, become law.

I congratulate the minister. I congratulate my friends in the Conservative Party, in particular the hon. member for Vegreville. I also congratulate the hon. member for Regina West who has also taken a very enlightened view toward the passage of this bill at second reading stage.

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) for bringing this bill forward.

Transportation is a major and a vital concern to Canadians. In fact, because of the nature of our country, I would argue that transportation is probably the major factor that we need to look at in order to keep our country together and productive. We do have an excellent transport committee. I have had the privilege to be a part of that committee since I was elected to this House. I have seen some of the fine work that it has done and I think that if this bill does come before that committee it will then be in front of a very excellent committee.

Prior to the Christmas break we spent many hours dealing with Bill C-18, which had been before this House and committee for over a period of some three years. We worked long and hard in order to get the bill proclaimed and put into force as quickly as we could. There were some excellent witnesses and some excellent questions asked by members of the committee of witnesses appearing before the committee to develop Bill C-18, which deals with the transportation of dangerous goods.

That is really what we are talking about here today. We are talking about the railways and the safety and protection of individuals, the most important commodity that we have in this country. So in that respect it is an important bill, though I do have a few concerns with respect to it.

Before I get to the concerns that I have with the bill, I would like to add that I think we have an excellent chairman on the transport committee. Although I have not had an opportunity to serve on a large number of committees since I have been elected to this House, the chairman of the transport committee is a very excellent chairman and I know he enjoys the support of all members of that committee.

As I said, the intentions of this bill are certainly admirable. I have had much experience with respect to problems that railways have with livestock on rights-of-way. The hon. member opposite talked about the type of fencing that was required by law to protect livestock and he read from the Railway Act. In some cases this type of fencing does not work since livestock always manage to get through fences, being what they are. I have been at the scene of some very unfortunate accidents to both horses and cattle. It is not a happy situation. I can certainly understand the concern the parliamentary secretary has when he talks about the unfortunate accident that occurred with one of his young constituents.

It is true that a four-foot fence is required by law to keep livestock off rights-of-way. It is not a chain-link fence though, it is simply a barbed-wire fence, which would not be at all adequate when it comes to protecting children from rights-of-way and the kind of problems that could arise with a train coming down the track. As children, I think all of us have fooled around on railway tracks, have heard trains coming, have crossed bridges and done other things which could have gotten us into serious trouble with locomotives and trains. I think in light of these personal experiences we are familiar with the kind of force that trains and locomotives have. We need to do as much as we can to protect children and adults from the kind of awesome force that trains have. I am familiar with some of the problems that arise when animals get onto railway tracks. As I said, I was a part of the committee which studied quite extensively Bill C-18, which dealt with the transportation of dangerous goods.

One of the concerns I have with respect to Bill C-227, which is the bill in front of us, and which the mover of the bill took into account, is that he has apparently had some discussion with municipalities and the people who will be affected by this bill. That is why I feel that, if this bill is to reach the committee, it is important that the committee have a chance to hear from the people who will be affected by this new law. We all know that when it comes to the expenditure of tax dollars, which proclamation of this bill would require, the people who will be required to expend this money have a say in what kind of laws will be governing them. After all, they are the people who will be responsible to the ratepayers for the expenditure of the taxes that are raised. It would seem very appropriate that the committee call before them the municipalities and whatever governmental bodies will be affected by this bill if, in fact, it is passed. Without this action the bill could cause some problem in terms of the municipalities not wanting to comply with it.

Chain-link fencing is not inexpensive; it is a very expensive type of fencing. In view of that, it is even more incumbent on us to get the bill to committee this evening and give it a thorough examination. When you start talking about chain-link fencing going through some of the towns, one must consider that in some of the larger cities you could have almost 100 miles of track. If you wanted to start fencing with six-foot high chain-link fencing, you could end up with a very large expenditure.

The other concern I have is that other avenues of protection of children should be explored so that we do not simply rely on a six-foot chain-link fence, because the human mind, being what it is, can find many ingenious ways to get over, under, and inside that kind of fence. If we are to proceed with this law which requires six-foot high chain-link fencing to be constructed along railway rights-of-way through some of the more populous areas, we should ensure that we are not incurring expense for chain-link fencing when there may be other ways of protecting children and others from getting on to railway tracks as trains approach. These are some concerns which need to be resolved in committee.

Another concern which I believe is slightly relevant to some of the constitutional matters we have in front of the House today is that there could be a procedural problem. The government might pass a law that could be ultra vires in the sense that if it asks the municipalities to do something the federal government is really responsible for, they could tell us that if we are passing that kind of a law, we should be responsible for the expenditure of money. This is a concern that needs to be aired in committee.

I see the parliamentary secretary making some kind of a motion with his head. I do not know if he is agreeing with me or disagreeing—

An hon. Member: Which way are you shaking it?

Mr. Mayer: —but I would say that this is certainly something we need to consider.

I would not want to be in a position of requiring a municipality or city to carry out a responsibility which falls within their jurisdiction. The municipality could certainly say to us that we do not have any authority in this area whatever, that it is purely a provincial, municipal or urban responsibility, and as such it is outside our area of jurisdiction, even though we are all concerned with safety, particularly the safety of children. These are some of the concerns I have regarding the bill.

As I said, we have a very excellent transport committee which has not been particularly active since the first of the year. If the bill does have an opportunity to get to committee, based on what is in front of us—although we do now have the transport department's estimates, and they will require a considerable amount of our time—I think we will be in a position to look at it fairly quickly. All we have done in committee this calendar year, 1981, has been to examine the president of the CNR, Dr. Bandeen. So we have not been particularly active in the transport committee.

I would again congratulate the member for bringing forward the bill, because it reflects the concern we have for the most important resource any country has—its people. We all have a particularly soft spot in our hearts for children, and proposals on how to protect them from freight or passenger trains should be very well received and considered.

With those remarks I will close, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, I just rise for a few moments, so we may be able to adjourn for supper earlier than six o'clock. I have only a few remarks to make. I want to say to the Parliamentary Secretary, to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette) that the intent of the bill is laudable and we agree with it. I only wish that a number of other items were incorporated in the bill: grade crossings, signal systems—a whole host of items on which the government has cut back, particularly in urban centres, right across Canada. As I say, the intent of the hon. member's bill is laudable and we agree with it; but it does not simply relate to the safety and protection of children. The entire history of railway lines through urban centres shows that children and adults have been killed or injured by trains, and on the other side of the coin, people who play around with switches and switch lamps and signals can cause mishaps on railway lines passing through an urban centre or in a railway yard.

I would like to say to my hon. friend, through you, Mr. Speaker, that there have been many more mishaps, damage and injuries on that side of the coin than there have been as the result of individuals being struck or injured by trains because they happened to be crossing, standing or walking on a through right-of-way or in a railway yard.

The subject matter of the bill is one of many major amendments needed to the Railway Act. In the past there were railway right-of-way fences along all trackage across Canada, including the prairies. In my part of Canada they have all been removed. A train might run over some farmers' cows or somebody might waltz on to a right-of-way and may be struck; yet the municipalities, the provincial government, the federal government and the railways—all four levels—have agreed that we do not need those fences now because it is too hard to maintain tens of thousands of miles of only three or four-foot high right-of-way fences.

However, I agree that it is appropriate to have chain-link fences along rights-of-way through thickly settled suburban and downtown areas in cities and large towns in Canada. I hope that the government will allow the hon. member's bill to go to the committee, although there will probably be some fun with it there, and I will not mention anything about rules. I hope also that when the government is considering the bill in committee it will consider other matters which require amendments to the Railway Act.

Federal funding should probably come from the railway crossing fund, which is pretty well non-existent. It is called the UTAP, the Urban Transportation Assistance Plan. If that is where the federal government's share of funding is to come from then the funds provided should be increased. Funds should not be taken away from grade separation or rail line relocation. There should be additional funding. If it is left only to the railroads and the municipalities, I suspect that not much will happen other than prolonged arguments, and nothing will be done about fencing. That is why it is suggested that fencing should qualify for assistance under the grade grossing fund or UTAP, or whatever they call it now; but the funds must be increased.

We have had some bitter experiences in this whole area. Money promised in 1974 for urban transit is now being spent to meet ongoing commitments for grade crossings. Funding for both urban transit and grade crossings needs to be expanded. If this kind of fencing is to be installed in urban centres, it will require additional funds. Otherwise, funds will have to be reduced for urban transit, grade crossings and rail line relocation.

The Urban Transportation Assistance Program has money which is not being spent in the third, fourth and fifth year but held over to the sixth year. Why not spend the money slotted for those five years and then provide new money beginning in the sixth year? We have a ridiculous situation where the money that should be going into grade crossings, grade separations, rail line relocation and urban transit is now being presented to provinces in lump sums with the provinces being asked to allocate those funds to one, two or three major projects. They then have to wait for a year or two for the federal government's share. I wish the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council a lot of luck. I hope he can persuade the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) to increase the funding to accomplish the intent of this bill.

The same thing applies generally in respect of requirements under the Railway Act and the National Transportation Act in the whole area of transportation of dangerous goods and safety in rail transportation. The person-years under the CTC stay the same. The CTC is not able to regulate railroads because of inadequate numbers of staff and inadequate inspectors. Who is going to check to see if the chain-link fences are properly installed and maintained when we do not have enough people now?

The hon. member's bill is designed to solve one of the many problems of a transportation system running through urban metropolitan areas. It applies not only to railways but to trucking companies, airlines and pipelines. There are a host of things still beneath the surface. There are many hazards, problems and dangers. This bill is aimed at correcting one of them; we will agree with that, but I just wish the parliamentary secretary could persuade the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board to bring in legislation dealing with a lot of other similar problems.

I hope the House will agree to approve this bill on second reading. We will be able to go into the matter in greater detail in committee when the bill comes up for consideration, although that will not be likely until after the estimates are out. At that time the minister will have to come in with amendments to the Railway Act to incorporate the subject matter of hon. member's bill.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on this bill. I have some concerns about it, as does the hon. member from the New Democratic Party. The bill appears to give the Canadian Transport Commission authority to order the railway to build a special type of fence if the municipality applies for same. The Explanatory Note in the bill says:

—to empower the Canadian Transport Commission to order the construction of six-foot chain-link fences along railway rights-of-way. The cost of putting up the fence would be shared equally by the railway company and the municipality—

I wonder why the Canadian government is not sharing in this project. If this bill is that important, I wonder why the federal government did not bring it in and pay a portion of the cost. Is it because we do not have the authority to pass a bill which will place some expenditures on the part of the government, although we have authority to provide expenses, pretty high ones, on the part of municipalities?

The grade crossing fund has provided funds for a number of years for this type of thing but the method was changed by the Canadian government. I might say that change was not made with the approval of all the provinces. The grade crossing fund was a very important fund. Much of the work done as a result of the grade crossing fund is no longer being done. There is a most urgent need for something to be done at level crossings. There are far more people being killed at level crossings than on the bare tracks. If we take a look at the statistics, the number of people being killed at level crossings is higher than for any other type of accident, barring a railway wreck where hundreds of people could be killed.

This bill does nothing to restore what we lost when we changed the method of handling the grade crossing fund. Every municipality has large expenses. The importance of preventing people being killed at level crossings is not being addressed by this bill. Instead, the matter being addressed is away down on the list of importance.

To place this type of expenditure on a municipality because we want to protect the people at a busy intersection or along a busy rail line, in my view, is not being fair. Protection of life and limb along the railway was accepted as a national responsibility a good many years ago. At least the government had some responsibility.

Several years ago the federal government then in power came up with the grade crossing fund. Through that fund, hundreds of level crossings were protected. The only way to save lives at level crossings is to instal either an underpass or an overpass. Lights and bells at level crossings are helpful, but people are still being killed at crossings protected by lights and bells. Scores of municipalities in this country today would like lights, bells or gates at level crossings, but they cannot afford them because a large portion of the cost accrues to the municipality concerned, as do all the maintenance costs. Yet here we are working out another way for municipalities to spend money.

In all of the years I have spent involved with railways, I have never had a request from a municipality or an individual to build a gigantic expensive chain-link fence along the whole line of railway. Unless a chain-link fence is installed for a long distance, it will not be effective. Today many people who provide overpasses for pedestrians have to fence a considerable distance. Many are put in by cities at their own expense. In doing that they have to provide these fences for a great distance so as to prevent people from crossing over the tracks. People take chances. They may not see or hear a train coming and they will not go up over the fence. I have seen people jumping over the chain part when nothing is coming because they do not want to exert themselves going up and down the overpass. I question the wisdom of installing this type of fence. You can put in many miles of fence at a cost of thousands of dollars, with the result that municipalities will have additional unasked for expenses.

I do not know of any municipality which has asked for this type of thing. If we want to save lives, let us put our efforts where they will be most effective. Many people are being killed at grade level crossings. In some cases we go part way but not very far. That is because the federal contribution toward an overpass or underpass is becoming less and less. The funding is being spread among many things, all of which may be useful, but does not help with the biggest hazard, level crossings. Lights and bells are not doing the job. They are mechanical, and people are still being killed.

While travelling with an engineer one day I noted that he stopped at the lights and bells because they were not working. He told me they only work 90 per cent of the time because they are mechanical, and not foolproof. Therefore, people are still being killed at crossings with that type of protection.

The Board of Transport Commissioners does not order lights and bells unless an application is made by the municipality. The onus is on the municipality. For many years the province of Alberta shared in capital costs. I understand that the installation of lights and bells today would cost between $25,000 and $30,000. Eight or ten years ago the cost was $18,000. In fact, I have not checked recently so the cost may be even more than $30,000. Many municipalities cannot afford such a cost. In addition, there is a maintenance problem. If we want to tackle the matter of saving lives, let us concentrate on the area where most people are being killed.

These costs should be shared. The municipality has the least money of any government, and it is closest to the people. The federal government does not have authority over municipalities. They are the creation of the provinces. We are dealing with legislation involving the municipalities without their consent. Did the Association of Urban and Rural Municipalities in Canada pass a resolution asking for this? I do not think they did.

We are telling the municipalities that while they did not ask for this we think they should have it. This attitude is much too prevalent in Canada today. This is another example of telling them what we think is best. Before this goes any further, we should determine whether the municipalities want it or not. The municipalities know whether or not it is required. They also know that the greatest hazard is at level crossings.

The federal government is not doing its part. It rationed the grade crossing fund to the point where it is practically useless. Consequently, we are now asked to deal with other legislation to do the job. However, this does not deal with the areas where the majority of people are being injured or killed. Scores of people are injured and killed at level crossings every year in both urban and rural areas.

The federal government should be contributing to this cost. We in the House of Commons should not pass legislation which will place additional expense on the municipalities without agreeing to share in that expense. There is too much of that type of legislation today.

As the NDP member suggested a few moments ago, let us deal with the greatest hazard, level crossings. With the old grade crossing fund, the federal government made a definite contribution. The municipalities knew where they stood. At one time if a municipality built a level crossing, underpass or overpass, the federal government contributed up to 75 per cent of the cost. In fact, at one point it contributed up to 90 per cent. At that time there was a lot of protection and hundreds of lives were saved.

We have now reached the point where the provincial departments of highways do not know what the federal government will do in connection with overpasses and underpasses. That type of protection saves many lives. As I said, lights and bells are not foolproof. It is important to separate the trains from road vehicles; that is the only foolproof way. This costs more money, but how can we put a dollars and cents value on human life?

I see I only have another minute or so. If anything is to be done to save human lives, we should concentrate our efforts where the need is the greatest. In my view, the need is greatest at the level crossings, not along the miles and miles of tracks.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I will only speak for a couple of minutes. It is obvious from the comments of various members of the NDP and this party that there is general agreement with the principle of the bill, but they are concerned about some weaknesses and inequities. With this type of situation, it would be wise to pass it on to committee where witnesses could be called and the concerns of the municipalities considered. The committee could also look at those areas of the bill where members feel it has not gone far enough. Therefore, I feel it would be wise to pass it on to committee and have witnesses called. I think we are in general agreement with the principle. Maybe we can do something constructive in this way.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a couple of comments on this. For a short time, because of a technicality, the bill was in my name. That was straightened out and it is back in the name of the parliamentary secretary who has worked on this problem for a long time. I am happy to extend him due recognition of the hard work he has done on this matter.

I think the hon. member raised a very important question; that is, who will pay for these fences? I did some research when the bill was my responsibility. I phoned Mayor McCallion, the mayor of my municipality, and councillor Margaret Marland whose ward the tracks run through, as well as several school board officials in Mississauga. They all concluded that the question of paying for these fences has both a minus and a plus side.

On the plus side, we would not put up miles of fence. We are not going to affront the railroads by threatening them with miles and miles of fences at the extra cost involved, because the municipalities will share those costs, but they will take on the construction of the fences in a very limited way.

On the minus side, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) is quite right, the cost will come out of property taxes. That is the hardest way to raise public revenues, but as private members we cannot suggest that the government pay for something done through a private member's bill. In order to get around that technicality the hon. parliamentary secretary recommended a cost-sharing program. Again, the hon. member for Bow River is quite right, this is a tough way to raise tax money. The mayor of my own municipality raised that question when I spoke to her.

By and large, the balance achieved in this bill is good. There is a chance for municipalities, the most observant and most sensitive level of government we have, to look at these problems and make applications. They will apply voluntarily; they will start the process and in so doing know that they will have to pay some of the cost. In turn, the railroads will be given some protection and some alleviation of a dangerous problem. The fencing in question will run along parks, near schools, near little bridges and so on. This does not call for miles and miles of fences running through our cities.

This is a good idea, Mr. Speaker. The bill achieves a nice balance in its treatment of the content and the process of government. I want to congratulate the parliamentary secretary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. parliamentary secretary will want to recall a long-standing tradition, that when a private member's bill is sent on to committee the mover of that bill traditionally offers the Chair a cigar. Shall I call it six o'clock?

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

At 5.52 p.m. the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, before I commence participating in the constitutional debate I would like to thank all the members of the committee who sat long, laborious hours. I would like especially to thank the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), who was the leader and carried the discussions for our party.

I am honoured to be participating in one of the most important debates in the history of the Canadian Parliament, as we consider a proposal by the federal govenment to bring home the British North America Act from the British parliament and to establish within this country our own Constitution.

As a Canadian from Prince Edward Island, I am especially proud of the part my province, the cradle of confederation, has played in creating this great country of ours. While we were not one of the original colonies which first joined confederation in 1867, Islanders are indeed proud that we hosted the first conference in 1864. The reluctance of the Island to joint the union of colonies 114 years ago is, I think, an historic indicator of why the provinces today are reluctant to accept the terms of the constitutional proposals the federal government has placed before us.

I believe there are parallels which can be drawn between Prince Edward Island's and the other provinces' request for agreeable terms upon which they could enter confederation and today's constitutional ventures. In 1864 the people of Prince Edward Island were stubbornly opposed to giving up their rights by becoming a province of Canada. They were adverse to any union which would surrender to anybody outside Charlottetown, their capital, control over the domestic concerns of the Island. Prince Edward Island did not want to part with any vestige of its local power.

Islanders at that time were busy, self-sufficient, safe and content on their little island. At both the Charlottetown and Quebec meetings in 1864 Islanders, despite their aversion to union, listened intently and agreed that the federation of all the colonies was desirable, provided the terms of the union could be satisfactory. But debate was not tempting enough. The terms of union did not prove acceptable to Prince Edward Island. Islanders felt that the terms were unfair to the island, especially those regarding their financial arrangements. They wanted the buying out of the absentee landlords of Prince Edward Island, most of whom were in England. They wanted that buying out for the benefit of the tenant farmers. They wanted a guarantee of communications with the mainland. The proposed intercolonial railway was great for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick but meant little to Islanders. None of these terms were promised in the resolution drawn up in Quebec City, despite talk of putting them in, so the island watched and waited, passing up confederation in 1867, but eventually joining the country in 1873 when the time seemed right—and on their own terms as well.

Among other concessions, the dominion government advanced $800,000 to the Island for the purpose of buying out the absentee land owners. The Island received a sum equivalent to $50 per head of its population, and a continuous steamer service between the island and the mainland was established and maintained.

Although Nova Scotia and New Brunswick joined confederation in 1867, they too agreed to the union only when their terms were agreed to. The maritime provinces, then as now, wanted to ensure that the peculiar economic needs of the region would be provided for. They wanted to retain control over matters that would allow them to preserve their local characters and institutions.

Today as we deal with the issue of constitutional patriation, Prince Edward Island and the other provinces do not want to give up or be denied the rights and terms which were agreed to in a spirit of co-operation over 100 years ago at the time of confederation. The failure of the federal government to agree with its partners, the provinces, concerns me very deeply. The federal government is seeking arbitrarily to alter the traditional relationship between the federal government and the provinces as well as substantially change the nature of our democratic institutions.

The Constitution is a public social contract which embodies the terms upon which Canadians agreed to live together in a spirit of national community. It sets forward the basic agreements for Canadians to live together. These agreements must be arrived at upon consent, for without such consent, they are deprived of their own legitimacy. The problem facing Canada is essentially a problem of agreeing on terms which will permit Canadians to live in a state of harmony with one another.

Canada is a federation of both provinces and a federal government and was designed by the Fathers of Confederation in this way, in the knowledge that our nation would be impossible to govern as a unitary state. We are also a country of regions, proud of our individual traditions but also of our sense of national community.

In a country as diverse as ours, Mr. Speaker, there always have been and will continue to be political tensions between certain regions and the federal government. This is inescapable because Canadians have both loyalty to the region in which they live and to the country as a whole. These tensions and concerns which besiege us demand the necessary political compromises. There is absolutely no hesitation or doubt in the minds of Canadians that the Constitution should be our own, passed by our own Parliament and resting in our own country. But we do not want the federal government to act unilaterally on this matter with such far-reaching implications affecting all provinces.

We hope the crisis and turmoil generated by the federal government and its constitutional proposals will help all of us focus on our vision of Canada and what we need to make this a better country. We hope we can work together to build a new Constitution of which we can be proud; a Constitution that protects our individual and cultural uniqueness, provincial diversities and national potential.

Our national institutions, such as the Senate and the Supreme Court, need revising. The division of powers between provincial and federal governments needs to be clarified. Our individual rights could be better protected. All we require is a sincere desire and a process through which we can work together toward these common goals. Ottawa alone has no right to amend our Constitution without the agreement of the provincial legislatures.

My major objection to the government's proposals is the manner in which the federal government is acting alone to permanently change the nature of Canada, overriding the wishes of most of the provinces and of the vast majority of Canadians. To proceed in the manner proposed ignores the objections voiced by the provincial governments. What we have before us is a leader of a regional political party with only regional representation in Parliament imposing, unilaterally, an amended Constitution that will change the structure and basis of confederation.

People have joined together in confederation so they would have control over a common destiny. Now the federal government, unilaterally, is attempting to take away that spirit of compromise and sharing which built confederation, and impose its control over our destiny. Confederation has worked for Canada for 113 years. Certainly it has had its problems, its strains and its tension, but it has allowed Canadians the opportunity to build one of the strongest, most independent and freest countries in the world. One might justifiably wonder how long the proposed new Canadian Constitution would be able to maintain that state.

I was somewhat encouraged when the government accepted changes to the proposed amending formula. Under the original constitutional package, two maritime provinces forming 50 per cent of the population of the region were needed to introduce changes to the Constitution. Because of the Island's small population, this would have left us without a voice, and would have eliminated Prince Edward Island from ever having a say in constitutional matters. The amended proposal would require the approval of any two Atlantic provinces, enabling the Island to unite with any other Atlantic province to introduce changes, permitting Prince Edward Island to have a voice in constitutional decision making.

However, this amendment to the constitutional package, along with the others, is just a marginal improvement; sugar on the pill, so to speak. The concessions are not enough. Prince Edward Island was treated badly the first time under the amending formula. Then the formula was changed to treat Prince Edward Island like the other provinces, so we find it hard to feel that we should be eternally grateful.

A much more fair formula for Prince Edward Island, the other provinces and for all of Canada is the Vancouver formula, one agreed to by all the provinces and the federal government, but one on which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has refused to act. Under the Vancouver formula, constitutional change would require the approval of Parliament and seven provinces making up 50 per cent of the population of Canada. Any proposed changes to the Constitution would then proceed according to the formula. Such a formula would give Prince Edward Island and other provinces with small populations some role in constitutional matters.

Let me give you an example. Suppose six provinces comprising 50 per cent of the population of Canada agree to a constitutional change but they require the approval of a seventh province, irrespective of its population. Prince Edward Island could be that seventh province.

I am not suggesting that Canada should tailor-make its Constitution to meet the particular circumstances of Prince Edward Island, or of any other single province. I am saying, though, that whatever formula is adopted, it should not be unfair to any province. Therefore, the Vancouver formula is infinitely better than the modified Victoria charter.

Before I leave this question of the amending formula, I would like to make a comment concerning the other part of the amending formula proposal; that is, the referendum. The new amending formula is the most dangerous part of the constitutional proposal because of the referendum idea. Through it, Ottawa could impose constitutional changes by referendum. By controlling the rules of the referendum and spending huge amounts of advertising dollars, as it has been known to do, the federal government could manipulate the results. Such action damages federalism and undermines any attempt to build partnership in this country. Any reference to the use of a referendum should be deleted from any Canadian Constitution.

We are a large nation; we have some different values and beliefs in different regions and provinces. We need to have some protection. The proposed two methods of amending our Constitution are simply not acceptable because they do not provide us with the protection we must have.

There were a number of proposed amendments to the joint resolution on the Constitution which the Progressive Conservative party presented to the special joint committee, but which were rejected by the Liberal and New Democratic parties. There are four of these proposed amendments which I feel very strongly about and would like to mention. Most upsetting to me and to many Canadians is the fact that the federal government has denied the supremacy of God in its Constitution. It has rejected the Progressive Conservative proposed amendment which reads as follows:

> Affirming that the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free individuals and free institutions,
> Affirming also that individuals and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values and the rule of law.

The Fathers of Confederation, over 100 years ago, recognized the fundamental fact of the supremacy of God in the affairs of men and nations, as the source from which all human rights and justice are derived. Today, this fact should continue to be recognized. Why in heaven's name would the Liberals and NDP not want a reference to God in the Constitution? I am receiving letters from constituents of mine complaining about the fact there is no mention of the supremacy of God in the Constitution.

The federal government has also rejected the Progressive Conservative proposal that:

> Everyone has the right to have reasonable access to information in the possession of any institution of any government.

We want to enshrine the right of freedom of information in the Constitution of Canada. Freedom of information is the vehicle by which Canadians obtain the right to information. We want to see that right asserted in the Constitution.

Nothing in the Constitution should affect the authority of Parliament to legislate in respect of abortion and capital punishment. The federal government has rejected this proposal. Without such a clause, it is possible that the Supreme Court of Canada could overrule Parliament in cases concerning abortion and capital punishment. In no way should this be allowed to happen. I believe on these two issues members of Parliament, not the Supreme Court, should have the final say so that the views and opinions of their constituents may be reflected. By rejecting the PC proposal, the federal government will be allowing the possibility that the courts could indeed be supreme over Parliament. We in the Progressive Conservative Party, and the people of Canada do not want this.

The federal government has voted against the Progressive Conservative proposal which would clarify in our Constitution that Her Majesty the Queen is the head of state of Canada and the provinces.

Over the years the federal government has attempted to reduce the role of the monarchy and substitute in terms of the status of the Queen that in fact the head of state is not Her Majesty, but rather the Governor General. We in the Progressive Conservative Party are concerned that Canada remain a constitutional monarchy. We believe our proposed amendment would constitute such a guarantee. By rejecting our proposal, the federal government is furthering its attempts to lessen the role of the monarchy in Canada, a move feared by many Canadians who want to retain Canada's heritage, who want to retain the constitutional monarchy.

The proposed charter of rights is comprised of many sections, all of which are of vital importance to the future wellbeing of this country. I would like to focus on the section concerning property rights. Many people came to Canada because they dreamed of and cherished the thought of owning their own land. Our party supported the inclusion of an amendment indicating that everyone has the right to enjoyment of property. On this issue, Prince Edward Island has supported the federal government's position with good reason, but I want to make it perfectly clear that the government of Prince Edward Island is not against people owning and enjoying property. The main concern of Islanders is that property on Prince Edward Island belong to residents of Prince Edward Island.

Prince Edward Island is small and dependent on its land. We value our land highly, as it is the most important of our few natural resources. In the past we have encountered a variety of problems where ownership of our land has been concerned. For more than 100 years we have been vulnerable to massive instances of absentee landlordism. In 1767, parcels of land on Prince Edward Island, which was then St. John Island, were lotteried off and the scandalous system of tenure, which has so aptly been called absentee proprietorship or absentee landlordism, was foisted upon the young colony, destined to throttle the Island's progress for over 100 years and to colour the greater part of Island politics. Land proprietors neglected the terms under which they had received their lots, and none of the conditions by which grantees were to settle their tenants on their 20,000 acre lots within ten years had been adhered to. In 1797, 30 years later, 23 of the 67 lots were still completely empty of settlers. since the majority of the proprietors resided in Great Britain, some lands had already been pre-empted by squatters whose occupancy had no standing in law. Because proprietors had been permitted to escape their quit rent obligations, the island government had virtually no revenue for improvement projects. Isolation, tenantry, farming little above subsistence level, and absentee landlordism were the ingredients of real discontent. Tenant farmers struggled to extricate themselves from their peasant-like status and gain possession of the fields they ploughed, nourished and reaped. It was not until 1875, however, two years after Prince Edward Island joined Canada, that the tenants tribulation came to an end. The compulsory land purchase act was passed, and the productive red soil of Prince Edward Island passed into the ownership of those who tilled it.

Individuals and industries are free to come to the island, buy land and establish industries, but we do not want people from away buying our land and controlling it for mere speculation, nor do we want our prime agricultural land sold for purposes other than agriculture. The provincial government rightly feared that the proposed constitutional feature ensuring the freedom of property rights would prevent provinces from legislating in areas of property rights. Islanders were concerned whether they would have the right to ensure that their land was not held by people from out of the province who were not there to take advantage of it and to ensure that local people were not deprived of their property rights within their province. Prince Edward Island wants to be able to continue legislating its own property rights; it does not want provincial legislation on non-resident ownership of land rendered null and void by a clause in a Canadian constitution, especially a constitution such as the one being proposed by the federal government.

The federal government is succeeding in provoking bitter divisions within the country. Its tactics are divisive. It is entrenching bitterness as opposed to rights. The consensus of Canadians to live together was founded on the principles of consent and political compromise. The great genius of Canadians has been our ability to reach the necessary bargains so that we can live together as one people.

Accordingly, our Constitution must embody a process which will continue to renew political consensus, notwithstanding dramatic social transformations and recurring economic and political crises. Unfortunately, the federal government's approach to this issue has widened the already dangerous divisions that exist in parts of Canada. This constitutional exercise should be an opportunity for all Canadians to renew themselves and their pride in their country, but instead it is dividing them. The fixation of the Prime Minister with patriation is causing more division and more tension. The Prime Minister's apparent haste in bringing the Constitution home to Canada on his terms is unnecessary and very damaging. What we are sending to Westminster is wide-ranging and fundamental constitutional change, not merely a minor change in administrative jurisdiction. It is not a matter that can be or should be dealt with hastily.

The present deliberation over the constitution will affect the framework of Canada for many years to come. The federal government's amendments are not acceptable to most Canadians. If the federal and provincial governments cannot agree immediately, then I can see nothing wrong in simply leaving the Constitution alone until agreement is reached. It has served us pretty well for 113 years and surely we need not rush into ill-considered changes. A twentieth century Constitution must provide the framework for a meaningful new national economic policy. It bears directly on Canada's future as one strong and united nation. An unwise decision could cause permanent regional alienation and dissent. It is a slow and laborious process, requiring perseverance and endurance; it cannot be hurried.

I would like to read a statement voiced some years ago by Senator Eugene Forsey which expressed the view that constitutional deliberations are of vital importance to this nation and cannot be dealt with in haste. He said:

> The first basic fact we must get clear is that our existing Constitution is not a piece or old furniture, or an old top hat, or a Victorian system of plumbing. It is something which grew out of the needs of the pre-confederation colonies, which gave us life as a people, which has shaped our life as a people, which has adapted itself to our changing needs as a people. It has not remained what it was in 1867. It has grown, in some respects almost out of all recognition: a little by formal amendment; much by judicial interpretation; most of all, perhaps, by the development of new habits, new customs, new conventions, new administrative arrangements, especially inter-governmental arrangements. Perhaps it now needs further formal amendment. But let us never forget that, because a constitution is what it is, pervading and shaping the lives of every human being in the community, changing it by formal amendment is an immensely serious business. It is not like getting a new hair-do, or growing a beard, or buying new furniture or new clothes, or putting in a new bathroom. It is more like marriage—in the words of the Anglican prayer book, "not by any to be enterprised, nor taken in hand, unadvisedly, lightly, or wantonly . . . but reverently, discreetly, advisedly, soberly, and in the fear of God." What we are dealing with in constitutional change is not paper or things, it is human lives.

Some time ago I was checking through the library to find the derivation of the word "Canada". According to the information I received, Canada derived from the Huron-Iroquois word "Kanata" which means a village or community. Canada is much more than a village. Canada is much more than a land mass consisting of the northern half of the North American continent. Canada is the people that inhabit this great land mass from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean and from the Arctic Ocean to the Great Lakes. Canada is the attitude and aspirations of all these people. This Canada of ours is being divided by the way the Prime Minister is trying to shove this resolution through this House and ram his ideas down our throats to pursue his timetable.

I would like to quote from an article in The Citizen, it being a paper that does not always follow Conservative policies. More often than not it is quite favourably disposed to the present government and the present Prime Minister. I would like to quote from a column written by Iain Hunter, dateline Vancouver, and published on February 20, 1981.

Prime Minister Trudeau admitted Thursday he is dividing Canadians by pushing through his constitutional reforms.

He's not sorry about it, he declared—in some cases he finds it "exhilarating."

Trudeau told more than 200 cheering Liberal supporters here that if the country breaks apart in five or 50 years because of his unilateral action to patriate the Constitution with an entrenched charter of rights and his own amending formula "then I say it wasn't worthy of living another day".

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Gass: Shame, indeed. When I read those lines I tried to figure out what type of a man is leading this country, a man who can stand and say he is exhilarated when he is dividing our country.

A constitution should be a source of pride and a unifying influence within a political community. A constitution should be and can be, if the federal government will realize its folly and come to its senses, a symbol of our society's democracy and an object of national pride for each and every Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to join in this historic debate on the proposed Constitution and the charter of rights for Canadians.

Since I came here, following the 1980 election campaign, there have been very few matters come before this House which have demanded that we set aside our partisan political views in favour of the importance of the country. In my view, this matter presents one of those few occasions. It is a matter of such importance to the future of our country that it rises above partisan politics, and it should be debated in that light.

Throughout the past year the New Democratic Party has taken an approach to this debate which, in my view, has been both conciliatory and co-operative. As a Canadian I am proud of that fact. As a member of the New Democratic Party I am also proud of the role my leader has played in this debate on constitutional reform. I am also proud of our party's two members who served on the joint committee, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) and the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson). They both worked extremely long and hard on this much-improved constitutional package.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Young: I believe the approach taken by the New Democratic Party has been a constructive one. I also believe there are a growing number of Canadians who would agree with me on this question. However, I also recognize that this debate has been an emotional one, as indeed it should be. It is difficult not to be emotional when, for the first time, we are debating a document which demands that we define what we think of ourselves as Canadians.

As Members of Parliament, we are being asked to set a course for Canada which will finally bring us to adulthood; which will finally bring us to full independence as a sovereign nation state.

I am particularly pleased to have been given the opportunity to be a member of this House when this debate is taking place. Like most members of the House there are many areas of this constitutional package that I could speak to. However, in the time I have available to me I want to address the proposed charter of rights.

During the course of this debate I have heard some people say that a charter of rights is unnecessary for Canadians. To those people I say they are wrong to hold that particular view. Even a shallow look at where we have been in our country, and where we are at now in the area of civil and human rights in all parts of Canada, would show that there is a need for such legislation. I would ask those who question this need to remember how Japanese Canadians were treated during World War II and the shame we feel now about that period in our history. I would ask them to cast their thoughts back to October 16, 1970, when the Government of Canada subjected the people of Canada to the first peacetime invocation of the War Measures Act. With a single stroke the government placed in suspended animation many of the hard-won liberties of the Canadian people.

I also ask those who question this need to look at what a number of provincial governments have done, or have attempted to do, from time to time. For example, the Alberta government at one time tried to strangle those who did not agree with it by passing anti-free press legislation. In the mid-1960s the Ontario government introduced a bill which, if it had been made law, would have drastically expanded the powers of the police in that province. Only public awareness and pressure prevented the government from actually carrying out its intentions. There was also the infamous padlock law in Quebec.

Consider the discrimination that is practised every day against women in our society, against our ethnic population, our aboriginal peoples and disabled and handicapped Canadians. One does not have to try very hard to recognize the need for a universal charter of rights in our country. That need exists now, not at some distant time as others would suggest.

I want to take a moment to talk specifically about this need as it applies to Canadians who are disabled or handicapped. Last month the Special Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped, of which I am a member, tabled its report in the House. At the beginning of my remarks I said that on rare occasions matters come before us as Members of Parliament that rise above partisan politics. In my view this debate on the constitutional package is one of these matters. Another was the work the special committee did when we undertook our investigation of the conditions of disabled and handicapped Canadians. That committee had representatives of all of the political parties in the House. I know I speak for all of them when I say that while we may have had disagreements from time to time on philosophical directions we did not at any time reduce those disagreements to partisan, political levels.

As a result of that attitude, I believe our committee has presented one of the best reports this House has seen in a long time, and once it is acted upon its recommendations will at long last allow this important part of our community to fully participate in the mainstream of Canadian life.

The report of the special committee was presented after we had heard from 643 witnesses who presented us with 630 submissions at 87 meetings held across Canada. The report deals with two major types of obstacles disabled Canadians face every day of their lives.

One obstacle results from the fact that many men, women and children are deprived of good health, or have disabilities which deprive them of using their feet, legs, arms, hands, voices, ears, eyes and minds in a way that other Canadians take for granted. The other kind of obstacle results from attitudes that many able bodied Canadians have toward those Canadians who are disabled. This attitude has tended to develop a disregard for the needs of disabled people when we plan our human and civil rights protections, our health care services, employment opportunities and the various facilities and systems we have to provide, such as housing, education, transportation, shopping, recreation and communications.

During our public hearings we were repeatedly told that disabled Canadians had to be provided with greater protection under our human rights legislation, and it became obvious to the committee that this had to be a top priority for government action.

We came to that conclusion for a number of reasons. First of all, under existing legislation, the only protection against discrimination disabled people have is in the area of employment. Disabled Canadians are not protected from discrimination under the minimum wage laws in many provinces or under federal legislation. Disabled people are not protected from discrimination in the fields of accommodation and transportation, nor do they have equal access to education and communication as do all other Canadians. In simple terms, some two million Canadians are being denied the opportunity of fully participating in the mainstream of Canadian life because they are disabled or handicapped.

Many members may recall that on November 3 of last year I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to amend the charter of rights to include the disabled, and to prohibit discrimination against the disabled and the handicapped in all areas of Canadian life.

I and my colleagues, the hon. member for Burnaby and the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, pressed hard for such an amendment while the joint committee was considering the package now before us, and which now has those amendments included in it. Every group which appeared before that committee, and was concerned about bringing an end to the discrimination that has been practised for too long against our disabled population, argued in support of the amendment. What we are discussing here are the rights of 10 per cent of our population. We are discussing the right of over two million disabled and handicapped Canadians to enjoy life as do other Canadians. We are discussing a segment of our society that has over 60 per cent of its population out of work. We are discussing the right of thousands of children in the country to have access to an education now being denied them because of a learning disability, such as that of autistic children.

Mentally ill Canadians are discriminated against on a daily basis both by society and our judicial system. One only has to look at how the justice system treats people who are mentally disabled and who have been charged with offences. We have over 1,000 Canadians who have been locked away for varying lengths of time by decision of a lieutenant governor.

One individual, Emerson Bonnar, was just recently released after serving 16 years in a maximum security institution in New Brunswick for the criminally insane because he happens to be mentally retarded. It was alleged that he had stolen a purse in 1964. Emerson Bonnar, and more than 1,000 others like him, are locked up in institutions all across this country without benefit of trial. This must stop.

We are discussing an opportunity to give all Canadians, in all parts of our society, the right to fully participate in Canadian life as equals, a right that most of us very often simply take for granted. We in the New Democratic Party have argued for those rights, and I take some pride in knowing they are now included in the charter.

As a member in this House, I am not prepared to accept the proposition advanced by some that the charter of rights should be dealt with after the Constitution has been brought home.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Young: It is being dealt with here in Canada now, as are the other elements of the constitutional package. The suggestion that we are not somehow doing this is utter nonsense, and I rather suspect those who are advancing that suggestion know full well it is nonsense. To suggest that we are asking the U.K. government to make a Canadian constitution which includes a charter of rights is simply not factual.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Young: We are making that constitutional package right now, we are making it here in Canada, and all agree we have that right.

In conclusion, I want to say that we in the New Democratic Party want to get on with the job. We are not prepared to sit back while the provincial governments try to make up their minds whether they want all Canadians to have the same rights, regardless of the area of Canada in which they live. We believe all Canadians should have those rights now. We will not be party to any attempt to deny the granting of those rights, which I am convinced will happen if the charter is not acted upon and dealt with now.

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Mr. Speaker, I rise from my seat to enter this historic constitutional debate. I am not the least bit incredulous that our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would perpetrate the greatest hoax, the greatest manipulation, the greatest "con" job, the greatest "snow" job ever foisted upon the citizens of this great dominion of Canada by his unilateral despotic patriation of our very precious Constitution: unilateral patriation by going over the heads of the provinces, an amending formula with veto power to Ontario and Quebec, and a charter of rights entrenched by Britons, not Canadians.

As my colleagues who spoke before, I congratulate the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) for recognizing this duplicity as early as October 2, 1980. I congratulate my colleague from Provencher (Mr. Epp) and his constitutional committee for their ongoing efforts to stop this callous manipulation by the Prime Minister and his trained anvil chorus. I love my riding of Simcoe South and my country, and I want patriation, but not dictatorship.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stewart: Many of my colleagues have pointed out the history of this great Canada: the Quebec act of 1774, the constitutional act of 1791 and Lord Durham's report. They recognized the fact that the Quebec act and the constitutional act gave to French Canadians rights which were the most enlightened of their time. Unfortunately, no one pointed out that the Durham report recommended the union of Upper and Lower Canada and the use of one federal language, English. Had this been adhered to, we would not be having this acrimonious debate in the House today. Now we must all acquiesce to the fact that the Right Hon. Prime Minister, in his master plan, has accomplished two of the three things he set out to do in his hell-bent-for-leather gallop to take Canada to the left.

First, he made closure the order of the day, controlling this House by limiting debate through the use of Rule 75C. Next, he passed the Official Languages Act. It may not be fashionable to speak out against the practice—not the theory or the idealism or the goals—of bilingualism.

An hon. Member: Three parties voted for it.

Mr. Stewart: Bilingualism and biculturalism are aimed at preserving and enhancing national unity. The practice and evidence is that they have had the opposite effect. To voice opposition, skepticism or disenchantment with the contribution of bilingualism and biculturalism to the national unity is to risk being pilloried by those who are blindly and irrevocably pledged to the concept. To speak out against the headlong rush into bilingualism is, alas, to be branded a redneck, to be labelled anti-French; I am not. But I see the Official Languages Act unamendable if this piece of legislation goes through, and I see that as a great risk to unity as does the premier of my province. I would be derelict in my duty as a representative of all of the people of Simcoe South if I did not transmit the majority of their feelings and sentiments to this House. Speaking for the voters of Simcoe South, I think I also speak for that silent majority in the rest of Canada on the issue of bilingualism.

Over a century ago, Lord Durham wrote in his celebrated report that he found "two nations warring within the bosom of a single state". That war, unfortunately, and I say unfortunately, has continued until today. Of course, we have an Official Languages Act. But language has divided this nation. The bilingualism and biculturalism policies of this government have served only to act as an abrasive in English-speaking Canada.

Let us look at reality. The history and the experience of other nations would indicate that it is next to impossible to build a unified nation using two official languages. There must be one common language for basic communication, and in North America, whether we like it or not, figures tell us it is English. This was espoused by the hon. James Richardson, a former minister in that government, who was forced to resign. Bilingualism should be a two-way street. To me bilingualism means English language instruction opportunities for French-speaking Canadians and French-language instruction opportunities for English-speaking Canadians.

I have in my hand a copy of Hansard for March 2, 1981. At page 7773, the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) asked question No. 1,934, as follows:

> What is the budget for the current fiscal year of the Official Language Minority Groups Directorate of the Department of the Secretary of State and what is the (a) percentage (b) per capita allocation of this sum to each official language group?

The answer given by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Stollery) reads:

The budget of the Official Language Minority Groups Directorate for fiscal year 1980-81 is $15,000,000.

(a) and (b)	Francophones outside Quebec	Anglophones in Quebec
Allocation of budget 1980-81 (%)	$ 14,073,800 (94%)	$ 926,200 (6%)
Per capita (1976 Census)	$ 15.63	$ 1.16
Amount committed as of January 15, 1981	$ 13,411,276	$ 895,617

Does that smack of human rights or does it smack of something we want to do under bilingualism? This must be done by moral suasion not by threat of fiat, not by the spectre of being red circled in the public service because you do not speak French. It should not be done by the lack of mobility, the inability to move freely from province to province because you do not speak both official languages fluently.

I placed question No. 1,731 on the Order Paper. It was answered on February 23, 1981, as reported in Hansard at pages 7557 and 7558. The federal government has wasted billions of dollars to produce a functionally bilingual public service, but it has not worked. Part of the answer to my question was that it cost $5,390 for 849 hours of instruction for a public servant. The hidden costs are much higher, such as the time away from the job while on immersion, the costs to pay a replacement to cover while that person is away on language training, the costs of removal expenses for the fortunate few who are chosen to study in total immersion in France, Quebec, or elsewhere, on full salary for one year. The answers provided to me by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston), who I see in the House, are only the tip of the iceberg. What the government revealed in its answer is that it does not really know how much it has cost for language instruction in the public service.

Bilingualism should mean that not only Anglo-Canadians learn French but unilingual French, or English Canadians, should not be discriminated against because they speak only one language. It should mean that the Kelsos of this world are not banished because they are unilingual. This was pointed out only yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie). It should mean that unilingual Canadians are not forced to ride on the back of the bus because of an accident of birth, language or geography. It should mean that unilingual security guards and protective staff, who we see in this House, are not made second-class citizens because they speak one tongue. It should mean that every Canadian is able to communicate with his government in his or her language. It should mean that Anglo-Canadians in Quebec should be accorded the same rights that Franco-Canadians are seeking elsewhere in Canada. It should mean that the federal policy be administered sanely, not rammed down the throats of Canadians, and not in such a fashion as to force a backlash against our French partners in confederation.

Think of what might have happened had those federal billions of dollars been used in language instruction in the public schools, instead of having been wasted trying to make 45, 50 and 55-year-old civil servants bilingual. Today we might have had a vastly different Canada. French and English now have never been more alienated.

I do not want rough justice for members of a majority of the Canadian population, those whose mother tongue is English, just as there should not be rough justice for those whose mother tongue is French. I want real rights. I fear this document in respect of all our rights.

I respect Quebec, and I respect the French language and culture. We all spoke in this House to keep Quebec in confederation. I want to see the growth and development of a vibrant, bilingual Quebec. I do not want to see hyphenated Canadianism. If we are ever to be a united country we must build on the basis of equal partnership for all Canadians, not only a partnership of two founding races. If we are not a united country we are a divided country. If we are divided we will never achieve our destiny and we will continue to be two nations "warring within the bosom of a single state".

If this nation is to become truly bilingual, it must be done gradually through attrition. If that is the way it should be, so be it. But let it evolve under Parliament and provincial legislation, not through grass-bound, granite-etched pronouncements in a constitutional document such as the one proposed.

Many Canadians do not want to become bilingual. They do not need to become bilingual. They do not feel the need to become bilingual and they are probably not capable of becoming bilingual. This should be their choice. We must respect the right of the individual to that freedom of choice. Bilingualism must remain a matter of personal choice, not of entrenched legislation from on high.

Canada is now badly crippled because of the mailed fist of the federal government's Official Languages Act, national standards which are unacceptable in most of the provinces and territories. It is essential that we learn to distinguish between individual bilingualism and national bilingualism because the one creates unity and the other causes division.

Individual bilingualism is not only accepted, it is welcomed and sought after and is, in fact, essential to the achievement of national unity. National bilingualism is unnatural, undesirable, unwelcome and it is one of the central causes of national disunity. We must all try to remember that we are nation building, not province building, and that if Canadians are to achieve their destiny as one people, Canada must ultimately be united by language, not divided by languages.

An hon. Member: You have got them yapping now.

Mr. Stewart: But the coup d'état, the coup de grâce is the bringing home of our Constitution with a veto-included amending formula and the most imperfect charter of rights one could imagine. This charter will give the people not more rights but less. It comes through grovelling at the feet of Westminster to include the charter and amending formula.

If it is so great, why is the Prime Minister setting time limits on debate? Why were time limits set for the constitutional committee? Why is everyone not accepted who wants to speak? The answer is that 64 per cent of Canadians, at last count, were opposed to his actions, and more are jumping on the band wagon every minute.

This is not merely something to oppose as an opposition member of Parliament. It is the very soul of this nation for which we struggle. By the unilateral patriation of the Constitution, we are alienating Canadians and Britons alike. The whole process is dead wrong. The Right Hon. Prime Minister, with his majority can make his unilateral operation successful, but western Canada has indicated clearly that the patient may die. Confederation was the result of a consensus of the provinces, a partnership and a desired interdependence.

An hon. Member: Quebecers will remember you.

Mr. Stewart: It united bankrupt provinces, and to the surprise of the world was the basis of fewer than two million people building a railroad some 4,000 miles from sea to sea.

• (2100)

By this same British North America Act, our French Canadian brothers were able to retain their language and their culture, which they have to this moment. Had we not been cemented together by this act, I am sure we would not be a united nation today, but rather a conquered appendage of the United States. I can imagine how much bilingualism there would then be. This language right seems to be much on the Prime Minister's mind and that of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), but I would remind them that my premier says no to entrenching. Is it as Shakespeare would say, me thinks they protest too much. Is the real purpose of the charter of rights to entrench?

The British North America Act did not enshrine our differences, it protected them. This was done though Clause 7 of the Statute of Westminster, as pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence). Now the time has come to change that Constitution. I would like it clearly and unequivocably understood that not only do I champion bringing home our Constitution with its equalization rights, but so does my leader and, unanimously, our party. I want our Constitution home just as I wanted and strived for our own official national anthem. I withdrew my private member's bill, C-220, in favour of the government's Bill C-36, and I had the great honour of being the sole speaker on behalf of my party, by agreement of our House leaders, on making O Canada our official national anthem.

In 1867 the provinces gave up the right of individual powers to form a strong federation. They formed a partnership which still had strong individual powers yet equally strong central powers. It was a federation, a partnership and a good one. This must continue. We must not go down the slippery road to republicanism, as stated so eloquently by Premier Lyon of Manitoba.

We have heard a great ado made of human rights by the leader of the party opposite. I ask, is there any federal party in this House which has more claim to be proud in that field of endeavour than the Progressive Conservative Party? I have in my hand a copy of the Canadian Bill of Rights introduced by the late Right Hon. John Diefenbaker in 1960. It is a code by which my party lives. Of course, this bill of rights is not in our Constitution, but to me it can be in or out as long as it is interpreted properly. The most perfectly written bill of rights is contained in the constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and one can just ask a citizen of Afghanistan how it is interpreted.

Again, unequivocably, I assert that I, my leader and my party are solidly behind the bill of rights for all Canadians, if that is what they want. But what is the rush? As one of the too often silent majority, I want to shout out for my rights for a change. As one of the approximately 70 per cent English-speaking people in this country, I want to talk about the saviour of "mon pays". How about my country, my Constitution? I am here to warn the Canadian people that this proposal is wrong and that I will fight this wrong. This whole process of constitutional change is wrong.

I am angry and I cannot take it any more. Fellow Canadians and, more importantly, Liberal backbenchers, do not take it any more. We are being wronged by this document. My constituents are being wronged. My country is being wronged; wronged by a deceitful document prepared by a Prime Minister who has worshipped at the throne of Machiavelli, Marx, Chairman Mao, Laskey and Castro and makes no bones about it. The only hope we have of change is a revolt of the Liberal backbenchers. From what I hear from over there, I don't think there is much hope.

The Prime Minister has the audacity to present this document to us, an effrontery to our country. He has the audacity to ask us to trust him in amending our Constitution; ours, not his Constitution. It has been said that Moses did not write the ten commandments, he just delivered them and led his people out of bondage. Well, the Prime Minister is leading us into bondage. We heard about his just society. What we have now is just a society.

In his book "Federalism and the French Canadian" the Prime Minister stated in reference to strong central government that:

> It would certainly be an advantage if the federal government consulted the provinces about matters that affect them even if these matters are entirely within federal jurisdiction.
> I do not see why we could not establish permanent consulting bodies to ensure that our trade, tariff, customs or monetary policies really reflect the opinions of people throughout the country and that no province feels undermined by the exercise of central power.

Why the change of heart? Why not then apply this to constitutional matters. Does this sound like a man who held up the first ministers' conference. Does this eschew trust? When I asked the Prime Minister about this statement, he said it was written ten or 15 years ago. Yet, in 1977 when asked if he wanted the book abridged, the answer was an unequivocal no. This is the same Prime Minister who recently, while in British Columbia, stated that if Canada did split apart because of his unilateral action on the Constitution, "Then I say it is not worthy of living another day." Big deal! Well, I say balderdash to such despotic arrogance by the man who would alienate the demographically fastest growing half of this country for one last power fling.

A few days ago my colleague for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) caused an uproar in the House by referring to the Prime Minister in prose which Mr. Deputy Speaker termed "an unparliamentary expression". Apparently, it is unparliamentary to use the four letter word which begins with "l", ends with "r" and has "i" and "a" sandwiched in between. Far be it from me, as one of the new boys in this House, to question the wisdom of my elders and those who have gone before me in Parliament.

In our deliberations, I assume we are guided by Beauchesne's rules and forms and the sections which deal with offensive language and personal attacks by one member upon another. Beauchesne delicately refers to this as any "irregularity in the warmth of debate". Is it unparliamentary to say that the right hon. gentleman's words and actions are at variance with the truth? Is it unparliamentary to say that the House and the people of Canada have been misled? Or, could one get around the rules of the House by couching the barb in semantics; by speaking with less than candor, with tongue in cheek?

In another era in Parliament a former member for New Brunswick once said that a Liberal member of the treasury benches has as much regard for the truth as a tom cat had for a marriage licence. I am not a member of any Canadian Bar Association, but it seems to me that the only defence against libel or slander is the truth. I read some rather damning and direct statements written by one Geoffrey Stevens in February issues of The Globe and Mail. Yet, I see no movement to summon Mr. Stevens before the bar of this House to answer his accusations, and Mr. Stevens used the most unparliamentary prose. He wrote on February 2 that "clarity and truth are incidental byproducts". In another column he made reference to "Liberal lies, deceptions and evasions." In yet another column he wrote:

—the perception that Mr. Trudeau has sinister, ulterior motives is widely held. That's understandable, given the way he has lied, bullied the provinces and tried to browbeat the British.

Mr. Stevens stopped short of asking his readers if they would buy a used car from the Prime Minister. He wrote that:

Today, Canada is marked by a lack of trust among regions, between regions and the centre, between the people and their elected leaders.

Mr. Stevens concluded his column by saying:

By a single act of statesmanship—withdrawing his charter and giving Canadians an opportunity to approve it—Mr. Trudeau would demonstrate that he is not trying to pull a fast one, that he believes his constitution is worthy of public support, that he trusts the people, that they can trust him.

What trust can there be when The Globe and Mail contends that:

Mr. Trudeau misrepresented his constitutional plans to the government of Britain and that he and his ministers have been misleading the Canadian Parliament and public about Britain's position.

I wonder how some of the Liberal backbenchers are able to look themselves in the face while they are shaving in the morning. How can they remain mute and obedient trained seals in the face of the true facts, in the face of the truth?

The truth is that the Prime Minister's polls show that some 64 per cent of all Canadians in every province of Canada are opposed to unilateral action and amendment of the Constitution in Great Britain. The truth is that six of our ten provinces are attacking the federal position in the courts, that eight provinces are against it and I hope that after March 19 my own province makes it nine. At any rate, I ask the Prime Minister if eight troopers are marching down the street and one is out of step, who is at fault?

The truth is that a committee of the British House of Commons has stated it would be improper for Britain to amend the Constitution without the broad approval of the provinces. The truth is that the Prime Minister has been less than forthcoming about what he and his ministers told the British Prime Minister would be in the constitutional package and about what guarantees she gave concerning its passage through the British Parliament. That is very simple.

Why, then, are the trained seals on the government side of this House afraid to tell this Emperor Nero that he is fiddling while Canada burns? Why are they unwilling to do what is right instead of what his right hon. highness wants? Is there no one over there who will bell the cat? Why is that? Is a cabinet post or the job of parliamentary secretary worth the sellout of conscience?

I did not come to this House for personal position or gain. I now want to warn Canadian in general and members of the opposition in particular again against the three Ts—the trauma of the Trudeau treatise, this insidious plot to change our great Canada into a watered down republic.

Does fear of the Liberal Party prevent backbenchers from speaking their minds on this issue? Are backbenchers afraid of the living death that has befallen some of their colleagues like Turner, Basford and others who dared to speak out in opposition and in defiance of their leader and the Prime Minister? Are they afraid of limbo, of Coventry, of purgatory? Will no one on the Liberal side stand up against the Prime Minister and tell him he is wrong—dead wrong? Will no one tell him that he has gone too far? Is there no one who will oppose him in our steady march toward a presidential system of government? We must suffer power at any price because of one man's vanity. Let each government member ask himself or herself if he or she would buy a used car from that man. If Shakespeare were over on this side he would look across the aisle, aghast, and I am sure he would intone, "You blocks, you stones, you worse than senseless things."

An advertisement in The Globe and Mail of January 23 inserted by the National Citizens' Coalition—

Some hon. Members: "Quote".

Mr. Stewart: Yes, quote as follows:

The Constitution

FEDERAL LIBERALS:
STOP MR. TRUDEAU
HAS MR. TRUDEAU OUTLIVED HIS USEFULNESS?
YOU MUST KNOW THE MAJORITY OF CANADIANS—

1. Don't want his changes put in the BNA Act before it is brought back to Canada. (64 per cent against it in Gallup Poll).

2. Don't want his French-English bilingualism made official coast to coast.

3. Don't want his cutbacks in oil production.

4. Don't want his increase of more and more nationalization of industry which does away with competition.

5. Don't want to keep picking fights with the U.S.A.—our best customer and military protector.

6. Don't want Ottawa trying to bully the provinces.

7. Don't want government to encourage Canadians to live beyond their means.

8. Don't want to pay for fully indexed pensions for the civil servants and MPs.

9. Don't want to leave our children an immense national debt.

After all, he got elected, not on any of the above issues, but on the issue of cheap gas which has proven to be a deception.

If you are unhappy with the federal government, let your Liberal MP know. Armed with letters—even a backbencher will be noticed by the party.

YOUR LIBERAL MP HAS MORE POWER THAN YOU MIGHT REALIZE.

I had not realized that. It continues:

The Liberals have 145 seats, and the combined opposition have 133, therefore the abstention of 12 Liberals could force an election or a change in leadership.

That is not the case now. Since they got in bed with our friends on my left it is going to take about 20 hon. members opposite to see through the hoax and vote against this crazy package, but that is all. On the back of this advertisement under the heading "Somebody's lying about oil!" it continues as follows:

Ottawa says western provinces get 43 per cent of the oil revenue. Western provinces say it's only 28 per cent.

Who's telling the truth? British Columbia energy minister Mr. R. H. McClelland (Dec. 9/80 Globe and Mail) has asked Ottawa three times to produce the formula for Ottawa's calculation of 43 per cent. He has received no answer.

If the federal government and the Western provinces cannot agree on the basic figures for our National Energy Program, why is it being rammed through Parliament before they understand each other?

Is this a good deal? Why are we paying Mexicans the world price for oil, more than $40 a barrel while we pay our own Canadian producers less than half, $17.75 a barrel?

The National Citizens' Coalition contends that the federal government is intentionally depressing the value of oil companies operating in Canada so that it will be able to buy the companies at bargain prices—then to be run by the civil servants, like the Post Office.

I ask hon. members if they remember the right hon. gentleman who campaigned against wage and price controls and then imposed them a few months later? That is the man who wants to re-do our Constitution. Do they remember the right hon. gentleman who proclaimed the War Measures Act, suspended the basic legal rights of all Canadians, suspended habeas corpus and incarcerated several hundred Quebecers for long periods without charges being laid, when a few people with $10 and a "Saturday night special" were huddled in a cellar somewhere?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Order, please. The hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) has the floor.

Mr. Stewart: Remember the right hon. gentleman who allowed the first secret trial in Canada when even the charges were laid secretly? I presented a motion under Standing Order 43 requesting an apology to my old friend Peter Worthington, The Toronto Sun editor who was also charged. That appeal for an apology was to no avail.

Remember the right hon. gentleman who promised cheaper oil and gas at the pumps and now has given us the highest gas prices in history, higher prices than were ever contemplated in the Crosbie budget? Remember the right hon. gentleman who has always said that he would prefer a republic to a monarchy and now is trying to give us one? Remember this right hon. gentleman—

Mr. Evans: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order under Standing Order 35. I think it is quite clear that this speech has been one flagrant violation of Standing Order 35 after another. According to Beauchesne's it is quite clear that the imputation of motives to members as being other than honourable is contrary to the rules. On page 115 Citation 326.(2) reads as follows:

Words may not be used hypothetically or conditionally, if they are plainly intended to convey a direct imputation.

I would suggest that also includes the reading of material, quote or unquote, that has the effect and intention of imputing motives that are simply and factually not true.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This is a question that has been raised before in the course of the debate. The Chair has attempted to bear in mind remarks that have come from both sides of the House and on occasion has asked the hon. member concerned to rephrase his remarks in such a way as to stay within parliamentary usage. I am sure it is the intention of the hon. member not to violate the rules of this House, and I invite him to take note of the comment that has been made.

Mr. Taylor: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) on a point of order.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. The actions of the Liberals have imputed more motions, more notions, disgraceful and sarcastic—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Bow River is not raising a point of order, as he knows.

Mr. Taylor: It is as good a point of order as theirs was.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has observed that there has been a certain latitude on both sides of the House in this debate. The hon. member who has the floor has indicated that he has taken note of the matter.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I recognize and respect the Chair. I might say that I made my remarks with tongue in cheek.

It will take a long time to overcome the hostility of the provincial governments which was brought about by the constitutional and energy policies. It will take a long time to recapture the trust of western Canada. The National Energy Program is supposed to be for Canadianization, and that is something all of us desire. However, it is nothing short of confiscation draped in the robes of a nationalization known as Petro-Can which really stands for the Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau ruining our Canada. Our symbols of nationhood—the flag, the anthem and the Constitution—should unite us. Instead, we are divided as never before. Trust has dissipated and vanished into the air because of the irresponsible and suicidal actions of this government. In another idealogy this type of government would be called a dictatorship. The Liberal Party of Canada has fallen on very dark days.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think the excesses referred to in Standing Order 35 are quite clear here, and I ask that the hon. member be brought to order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have been listening to this point, and the Chair is paying careful attention to the remarks being made.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, the Liberal Party of Canada has fallen on dark days. The once great party of Laurier, King and St. Laurent has been reduced to a mouthpiece for a retreaded socialist, the last of the so-called—but misnamed, in my opinion—wise men. The Liberal Party has been taken over physically as well as ideologically. That is unfortunate. The sheep are content to bleat away as they follow the wolf, to abandon their principles and desert their party's beliefs and tenets. As once stated very aptly by the late Sir Winston Churchill, "They are sheep in sheep's clothing".

If we let this government have its way we will lose the important rights we now have, the rights which distinguish a democracy from a dictatorship. The most basic of rights is the individual's guarantee of the enjoyment of property without fear of confiscation by the state.

In a radio broadcast on September 1, 1944, Pope Pius XII stated, and I quote:

> Private property is a natural fruit of labour, a product of intense activity of man, acquired through his energetic determination to ensure and develop with his own strength his own existence and that of his family, and to create for himself and for his own an existence of just freedom, not only economic, but also political, cultural and religious.

The Virginia bill of rights, the parent of all American bills of rights, in June, 1776, stated, and I quote:

The Constitution

> That all men are by nature equally free and independent, and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot by any compact deprive or divest their posterity, namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.

Our right to property was first asserted in the Magna Carta and has steadily been reasserted in the courts and in statute law. It was reasserted in John Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights and in the United Nations charter of human rights.

Another right we will lose is individual freedom from being imprisoned for mere political opposition. This is not the Soviet Union or China; this is Canada, yet under a section of this proposed Constitution the War Measures Act is incorporated in the new Constitution. Under it, if a government wishes, one can be sent to prison for mere political agitation. The government does not have to wait for one to act or to make an actual treasonable move. If the government even "apprehends" an insurrection, the government can move.

"Apprehension" is defined in the dictionary as a state of mind or a thought or feeling as opposed to reality. "Apprehension" can be committed by placard carriers, people who voice strong political opinions—such as myself—and even strikers. If you end up in the slammer a victim of an apprehended insurrection, do not expect due process of law or a speedy trial. Habeas corpus, our guarantee of a speedy trial, is gone, and it was gone once before under the War Measures Act. It is replaced now in this proposed Constitution by a new law which allows the government to decide what is a "reasonable time" to bring a person to trial.

The government is even permitted to hold off elections if two-thirds of Parliament agrees with the "apprehension" that there is or could be an insurrection. I am alarmed at this assault on the rights of the individual and at this harsh approach to our most fundamental of rights.

The Barrie Banner, a local newspaper in my constituency, is not well known as a Tory newspaper or for its all-out support for the Member of Parliament for Simcoe South. An editorial in that newspaper on February 18 states: "Package won't do". It goes on at great length to tell why the police chiefs of the country feel that way. The editorial reads in part as follows:

> It seems increasingly evident that the government's constitutional package does not represent the will of the people, although patriation in itself is supported by all of us who think it's time we wrestled out of the outdated relationship we have with Britain.

We all agree with that. It also say that the police association, and I quote:

> —is concerned that the legislation will be "so protective of civil rights that crime flourishes, while law enforcement is repeatedly emasculated."

The article ends as follows:

> We will never know how important our involvement proves to be, but the next generation surely will.

In reality this so-called charter of rights is doing for our rights what Jack the Ripper did for door to door selling.

Over the years the present Liberal government has attempted to reduce the role of the monarchy and also to substitute, in terms of the status of the Queen, the Governor General as our head of state. When Members of Parliament take their oaths, I remind them that they affirm fidelity and allegiance to the monarchy; otherwise, they cannot take their seats in this chamber. In 1931 under the Statute of Westminster Canadians chose to retain the monarchy. In other words, Canadians wanted to retain the constitutional monarchial system of government and to be members of the Commonwealth of Nations.

The Constitution is no ordinary law. It is a fundamental document respecting our nationhood. It must serve not only the needs of today but also serve the needs of our children. Because the Constitution is so fundamental to this nation, it should not be arbitrarily imposed by any one individual or government. The Constitution should be brought home so that we Canadians can change it here for ourselves.

The position of the Conservative Party on the Constitution reflects the will of the Canadian people. After all, it was our party under the leadership of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker which gave Canadians their first charter of rights.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I will close, if my time is up, by saying to the backbenchers on the opposite side that it only takes 20 of them to tell the Prime Minister they will vote against his unilateral patriation of the Constitution unless he calls the provincial premiers together one more time to seek unanimity on an amending formula and a charter of rights acceptable to all in this House; in short, a co-operative federalist country with the greatest future in the free world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak on behalf of my constituents of Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington in this Canadian constitutional debate.

As a nation Canada may not have achieved all it might, but when we look about, we see that conditions could have been much worse. That is why I am concerned about the present government's attitude regarding unilateral change. Change leads to further change, and anyone who thinks the proposed changes being espoused are timeless is only fooling himself. However, change is inevitable and, if done properly and in an orderly manner, will be respected, even if not agreed to by all.

As a nation of nearly 114 years we have seen what looked like disastrous events at certain times, but as time passes we have found they were only incidents in the development of our nation. The unknown in this great country which holds so much promise is of concern to me. Our way of life, to a considerable extent, is new in human history. Under our present system of government we have moved toward eliminating poverty, and we have cut down illness to a degree which has not been seen elsewhere. We have spread opportunity for education throughout the country. We have maintained a high degree of harmony between freedom and order under the present division of federal and provincial powers.

As a Conservative I take a conservative view of what we are today and what we must do to make the future better. We must take a progressive step in maintaining a spirit of nationalism. I do not believe we can legislate or order the will to continue as a nation. Because of this belief I have taken the view that conservatism is not a rationalization of what exists but a rationalization of what will exist, and I pray that what will exist is a conservative order. One must first make what one is to conserve.

Having respect for the past, because of what our forefathers did and because of what that has enabled us to do, does not mean adopting it and becoming slaves to it; just as we should not change for the sake of change.

Canada has grown out of a wilderness, in a harsh climate, through the heartache of fate and beside powerful neighbours and natural barriers, but under a system of democracy which has served the test of time.

As we look back to our ancestors with very deep gratitude for all their industrious endeavours—the results of which we have inherited—we give them credit for their wisdom in laying the foundation on which we may from time to time revise to meet new challenges. As we try to improve the system they left, we may find ourselves even more appreciative of their foresight in not providing an easy way of changing our system of government.

The men and women who established this nation in 1867 were brave and wise people. They were not philosophical theorists like Plato who framed his Republic. They were not gifted with second sight to show them that within 114 years the population would increase so much, that our natural resources would be so vast and important to our standard of living, and that transportation by land, water, air and pipeline would revolutionize our way of living. Neither did they know of the electronic communication system which would become commonplace. What they did was to construct, within their scope of knowledge, with a spirit which was idealistic and with hands that were practical, a foundation on which many races and cultures could find firm footing as one united nation known as Canada.

We have reached our present standard of living because of our heritage, which is our past that we put into the present for the purpose of review. From our past we inherited the ethic of hard work, making do with what we had; then by improving it while attending to the business of today and preparing for tomorrow. From our more remote ancestors we have inherited the humanistic spirit of the Greeks and the Renaissance, emphasizing the dignity of men, the Roman and Anglo-Saxon rule of law to provide for peaceful change in our society, and the democratic faith in liberty, God and equality to make it a truly modern nation.

Many contributions have been made to this nation by people fleeing from oppression. Love of our country involves knowing what went into building this nation, what it is and what it may become. Canada's past has been favourable, in that order has prevailed without civil war and major disaster, so our future also can be bright and prosperous. The greatest danger lies in the belief that our present well-being justifies complacency. The future of Canada will rest on whether we approach change on the basis of a thorough understanding of our foundation and of our expectations.

We have inherited in trust a potential for greatness which must be passed on to future generations. Just as John Cabot was an explorer, so are we, but in spirit and expectation. We must continue to explore democracy's mandate to make this bountiful land better; by discovering new ways of living with others. The spirit of exploration, whether it is exploration of the surface of the earth or of the principles of living, includes developing the capacity to face trouble with courage, to meet disappointment with cheerfulness and to accept success with humility. Our patriotism and faith in democracy requires a spirit that holds the community together by giving its citizens a sense of sharing something as unique as the Canadian flag. Although it is debatable whether the present design is best, it is now generally accepted as Canadian.

We may have different personal traditions, cultures, religions, backgrounds or earning powers, but we all believe ourselves to be vital parts of the Canadian society. This does not mean being patriotic in the sense of believing that our country, province or county, is superior to all others just because we were born here or live here. True love of one's country is not the emotional luxury of vanity expressing itself in flag waving, but a sentiment expressed by a firm stand in the name of one's country's principles. It is living together, sharing of goals in common, enthusiastic planning of effective means to reach goals, an aggressive and efficient team action to make goals become realities.

In our democracy, we should seek a spirit within individuals, not a piece of governmental machinery to hold people together. The picture of a democratic country is one of self-reliant individuals who want to be allowed to do their own work, but who are also closely bound together by the great common aim that everyone seeks to devote himself to his country's good.

When looking at Canada's constitutional patriation, one finds it is necessary to cut through attitudes and prejudices which have built up for generations, and to look at the facts as they are and then to join others to fix what is faulty and to expand what is good. This approach brings together people of all races, languages, political parties and even religions in the realization of their ability to change this large and diverse land. History shows that the break-up of Canada into smaller states would be like blowing out candles in a castle until all is dark. It is clear that prosperity results when pious, law-abiding and industrial people develop a civilization, but civilization will fall apart in the midst of petty bickering.

Culture is more than the ability to perform or to admire the arts; it is the superiority of thought, the enjoyment of beauty, efforts to raise oneself and others to a higher level. It implies openness of mind, a sensitive appreciation of human values and the development of the potential which each individual has within him. Canada needs leadership in church, university and the community, and we need governments with vision and with the unbiased ability to engender in Canadians a strong national feeling and a wish for individual advancement. Certainly Sir John A. Macdonald and John Diefenbaker had this ability. It is not so much a new ideology that is needed, as an earnest spirit which will sustain the people of this great nation in seeking a good life in this wonderful land.

I myself cannot define, and I doubt whether anyone else can, exactly what should be contained in a Constitution or charter of rights simply because the rights which it should contain can be argued endlessly. A charter of rights would give people a feeling of security and be an integrating force which would bring people together. However, it must not be taken for granted that in itself it will forever guarantee freedom to individuals. There are many examples where this is not the case. A nation such as Canada is unique and is in itself an ethnic and cultural entity tied together by such forces as language, history, technology and outlook.

Many countries in the world today have written constitutions using all kinds of grand wording and slogans and containing elaborate bills of rights. There is more to creating a just and workable constitution than putting it into words. Attempts by many countries to translate into chapter and verse a system which has taken our system many centuries to develop has led to disappointing results. Great Britain has no written constitution, yet it enjoys constitutional government with limited and accountable rule. Many would argue that the fundamental laws of Great Britain, along with a basic national consensus, are in reality more real constitution which is more frequently observed in practice than most other written and codified constitutions.

The supreme laws of Britain and Canada are perhaps most aptly described in Rousseau's words: "Not graven in tablets or brass, but on the hearts of the citizen".

A national constitution could be described as an official grouping of principles and rules which set out the sources, uses, purposes and restraints of public power. To this end, constitutional studies should look beyond written documents to constitutional practices, judicial interpretations, general laws, customs and tradition.

In Great Britain, over centuries of time, concern for maintaining the fundamental rights which we take for granted today grew together with the growth of democratic government. Britain has no written constitution, and no declaration of the liberties of the individual exists in British law. The principles set out in such historic documents as the Magna Carta of 1215, the Petition of Right of 1628, the Habeas Corpus Act of 1679, the Bill of Rights of 1869, and the Act of Settlement of 1701 form a basis for the English constitution within which the government must show due regard for the rights and liberties of the citizen.

The basic rights in these conventions may be defined as the right to personal security, the right to personal liberty and the right to own private property. Under the British system, a person is free to do and to say what he likes provided he does not break the established rule of law. If his freedoms and rights are infringed, there are remedies in the courts. Under the British common law system, everything in general that is not specifically prohibited by law is lawful. Napoleonic law or codified systems of law such as in the U.S.S.R. work in the opposite fashion; everything that is not specifically mentioned is forbidden. We should be proud of our heritage and fine system which has worked so well, and be ever watchful of change for the sake of change. Why would anyone really want to change such a good system as ours?

We in Canada have followed the British system of government and it has served us well. A democratic society which respects the rule of law is the envy of people around the world. We have, as in Britain and Australia, a tradition of constitutional practice characterized by understanding, a sense of fair play, adherence to the rule of law, a vigilant opposition, a free press, public opinion and ultimate accountability through the free and secret ballot. To change such a workable and respected system for the sake of change and for the unknown requires proof that our system is not acceptable and assurance that we would be better off with another system. I do not feel such a case has been made by the present government for such unilateral change.

The Soviet Union has a written constitution which guarantees human rights. But all the rights and freedoms in that document are not worth the paper they are written on because the Soviets do not honour them. There is explicit and extensive abuse because of a one-party system and no free or secret ballot. I visited the Soviet Union and spoke to the common person there; believe me, I would not leave Canada with its unwritten constitution for the U.S.S.R. and its written constitution.

There is a vast difference between written rights and actual rights. In comparing constitutional practices in various countries, we see there is in practice little relationship between declarations of rights, written guarantees of rights and freedoms and the actual rights of citizens. Australia and Great Britain make no declarations, yet there are few infringements of rights, thanks to such checks as the government, the opposition, the judiciary, freedom of the press and the citizenry.

In contrast, countries such as the Soviet Union, Argentina, Brazil and Czechoslovakia have in their written constitutions general statements and specific guarantees of fundamental rights and liberties, but we hear reports that these countries do not respect them, and we hear of many abuses with little check on arbitrary executive power.

These comparisons indicate the inadequacy of written constitutional guarantees of human rights. Governments and citizens must respect what constitutes any constitution, written or unwritten, if it is to work. It seems clear that written constitutional guarantees alone are neither necessary nor sufficient to guarantee the exercise of fundamental human rights. Where rights already exist in practice, through traditions, conventions and respect for the rule of law, writing them down may not be necessary. Where such rights only exist in theory, writing them down will not help.

We are one of the few countries in the world without a written constitution, yet we have rights and freedoms in Canada second to none. We have inherited our system from Great Britain, and it has served us well. Instead of all this talk about "Brit-bashing", we should take the time to remember from where our fine system of democratic government came. We have inherited a system that serves Canada as an independent nation well.

Any changes to such a fine system of government should be changes for the better. Changes imposed on partners in our federal system of government with which they strongly disagree would not seem to be changes for the better. Consensus in a federation is certainly necessary. I approve patriation of the BNA Act to Canada, but any changes to that act should be done in Canada by Canadians as partners in our system.

Our tradition and our workable and proven Constitution should not be unilaterally changed. Relations with our traditional ally, Great Britain, should not be unnecessarily strained when this is not necessary or desirable. The federal government should not forget that the union of the various provinces created Canada.

We do not need another country to change our laws for us. We do not need to create problems for Great Britain by the federal government trying to shift the heat across the ocean on an issue as important as the one created by the present government. This is not fair to anyone and should not be seen as a self-serving opening for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his government to drive in a wedge and weaken our strong relationship to both Great Britain and the monarchy.

The Statute of Westminster, 1931 recognized the autonomy of the various dominions and ended whatever discretionary right the British government still had to legislate on behalf of the dominions including Canada.

We are in favour of a charter of rights, but do not favour unilateral imposition of such a charter in the face of strong opposition from a majority of the provinces and of Canadians. This indicates a denial of Canada's federal nature, since the provinces are partners in the Canadian federation. Therefore, work remains to be done to create a true consensus on a charter of rights so that it is accepted rather than imposed.

The best protection of fundamental rights and freedoms commences with the concept that rights originate with individuals and are not conferred upon people by the government. For a charter of rights to be successful and to command respect, it should reflect this basic principle. When a suitable and acceptable charter of rights can be arrived at, I feel such a charter should have a preamble which recognizes the supremacy of God, the essential worth of the human person and the special importance of the family in our society. These fundamental values were in the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights. We as Canadians should ensure that such stable institutions which helped build a strong Canada are included for all to see. I also feel an agreed-to charter of rights should ensure Canadians the right to the enjoyment of property, as this too has been of great importance in the building of our country.

The Vancouver amending formula accepts the equality of all provinces and has the necessary characteristics of flexibility and a reasonable national consensus before any amendments are approved. It better reflects the reality of the federal nature of Canada, composed of different yet equal partners, and provides a safeguard from undue centralization.

I feel this refusal to accept God and reference to property rights is just another dilatory tactic for the government to amend and introduce these concepts, to manipulate the people into a false sense of passion for partriotism so that other important and far-reaching changes will be accepted without question about the long-term loss of individual rights. It would not surprise me in the least if the government introduced these measures affecting God and property rights at a convenient time to try and divert attention from other controversial aspects of its package.

The Constitution should be the result of broad consensus if it is to be respected across the country. We cannot run the risk of spawning secretive or semi-secretive organizations and movements as a result of unfair, arbitrary and unilateral constitutional proposals. Some countries send arbitrary dictates out from the centre of government to try and control the people, and we hear of the unfortunate results of such arbitrary action.

We in Canada are fortunate to have freedom of religion and worship and freedom of assembly in order to practise our different religions. The Fathers of Confederation founded Canada recognizing the supremacy of God, the importance of the family and private property, and the respect for moral and spiritual values. Just like property rights, people have fought and died over religious beliefs for centuries because of the strong feeling they instil. The Diefenbaker Bill of Rights recognized the importance of this quality of Canadian life in its wording.

My riding of Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington is one of the oldest settled areas in Ontario. In 1784 much of the area was settled by United Empire Loyalists who left the United States because they chose to face hardships and the unknown to retain their way of life. These people through conviction, faith and hard work settled the area and worked to build what became the nation of Canada. Because of their faith, through their hard work, and through the work and faith of other groups across Canada the social fabric of our nation was created. It is because of the strong beliefs and hard work of our forefathers that we have such a great country today. We are not an atheist state, as some communist countries profess to be. Canada was built on high principles, strong heritage and religious beliefs.

You cannot do a good job on such an important document respecting the concept of Canada when what you are trying to do is change the concept of Canada in a unilateral fashion. The government should slow down and listen to reason, because reason is the future of a strong Canada based on a workable system through the broadest possible consensus. There is no reason for personal ambitions or arbitrary deadlines in an issue as important as the Constitution of our country.

Canada is composed of ten provinces and two territories. The federal government should not forget this fact. We have one of the largest countries in the world. Due to geographic expanse, by definition, many of the component parts of Canada differ greatly with respect to climate, topography, resource allocation and living standards. People in different parts of Canada have very real and different problems to face as a result of their location and heritage. This is an asset for any country. It adds strength and colour to the Canadian mosaic.

Powers and responsibility in the BNA Act are given to the federal government and others are given to the provinces. Powers of a more local nature were generally granted to the provinces in order to have a government in touch with and in understanding of the various unique provincial concerns in different areas across this vast country. On the other hand, the federal government was given powers over matters of a larger and more national concern. This system has served us rather well over the years as the various powers set out in the BNA Act were interpreted and utilized.

The basic premise of Canada is that it is a federation of provinces, each with its own sovereign government, united together in a federal state with a sovereign federal government. The provinces and the federal government are partners in confederation. They entered confederation with an agreement to define their roles in this country. They are partners in Canada. They are all integral and important components in confederation. No one part is a background of fluctuating importance, but every province, along with the federal government, is an active partner with something to contribute. It is important to realize that it was the regions of this British North America that created Canada and not the federal state that created the provinces. This is important to a strong partnership, something which the federal government does not seem to understand.

Federal-provincial relations have suffered greatly under the present government. It seems the federal government goes out of its way with unpopular legislation to trample the interests of the provinces. This is no way to treat a partner, and certainly not a proper atmosphere to create in the midst of the government's push for constitutional change. This is a federal state, not a unitary one. If the federal government continues to try to write the provinces out of confederation we could be heading for a unitary state; that is not the Canadian way. The provinces realize this and they are standing up for their rights, their future, and because they are good Canadians, for Canada's future.

We in the Progressive Conservative Party are in favour of patriation of the BNA Act to Canada. Patriation could be done quickly to get our document of nationhood where it belongs without bothering to trouble any other country with our own concerns. Once home it should be amended by Canadians using an amending formula agreed upon between the federal government and the provinces.

One aspect of our present federal arrangements which I feel is imperative to maintain is our constitutional monarchy. Any attempt to alter or downplay this tradition, which is one of the main reasons our country is the best place to live in the world, will only worsen the division which exists. The monarchy is too deeply rooted in our culture and history to be removed from our political experience. There is no room in Canada for a threat by cunning people, or government, to upset political order and remake it according to their desire. I am opposed to any efforts to reduce the role of the monarchy. I support the retention of Her Majesty as the head of state in Canada.

The Loyalists took pride in their love of God and the monarch. They stood up for what they believed in to protect a way of life they cherished for future generations. I am honoured to be a descendant of such a group of people. I appreciate the Canada they strove to create. I do not forget or take for granted their sacrifices. I think we owe them and other pioneers the decency and respect to preserve the tradition and way of life they helped pass on to us.

No system of government is perfect, Mr. Speaker, but I, for myself, feel that our system is one of the best. I am proud of our heritage and tradition respected here and around the world. Let us remember where we came from so that we can better know where we are going. The government seems to have lost sight of this, but the people of Canada have not.

I think that with the concerns of many over the issue of women's rights and opportunities for women, we tend to forget the capable and highly respected standard set over the years by our gracious head of state, Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second. With estimates of somewhat over half our national population being women, their place as equal human beings is certainly established in Canada and should be ensured for the future. There are differing views put forward concerning the need for the rights of the unborn child and I would suggest that our time would be better spent considering all aspects of this issue.

For the people of a country to make the constitution work they must respect what it stands for. To command this respect it must be just, fair and inspiring now and into the future. The people must trust their government to lead them into that future with promises, rights and freedoms the Constitution promises to uphold.

The present government has made and broken many promises in this and previous Parliaments. It has consistently refused to deal with such serious matters of concern to Canadians as high interest rates, inflation and unemployment. There is no comprehensive industrial policy to help Canadian business and industry plan and grow for the future. Canada's standard of living has slipped and our economy has seen better days. The present government, under the Prime Minister, has had more than enough time to deal with these matters.

Canadians are now being confronted with constitutional proposals put forward by this same government which has done so little for Canadians over the years. How can Canadians put trust and faith in such proposals from such a government? The answer is they cannot. How can Canadians respect a government which tries to get a foreign country, for which Canadians have long-standing respect, do its dirty work and then, at the same time, blame that country for every little thing that crops up? Great Britain deserves better treatment than this, Mr. Speaker. We owe her that much.

National unity, our economy and energy self-sufficiency are all suffering because the government will not listen to Canadians. In Canada we have great potential, with energy sources, raw materials and human resources that any country would be proud to possess, yet the federal government cannot digest reality. Mr. Speaker, the present government with its myriad of ivory-tower, short-gain programs is harming Canada, a country about which I feel very strongly.

The government should listen to reason on the constitutional issue and patriate the BNA Act to Canada, with an acceptable amending formula, with the provinces in Canada to make amendments in Canada. This would be the better course for Canadians. Patriation could be achieved quickly and the government could get on with the real issues facing Canadians, providing leadership, support and direction so that industry and business can plan for the future.

The present government has been nipping away at the Canada we know and love for some time now. Little changes here and little changes there gradually over time are taking their toll. I, along with many other Canadians, do not like what I am seeing and I am concerned for the future of our country.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES—QUERY RESPECTING INCREASES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Mr. Speaker, my comments tonight centre on a question and answer, as recorded in Hansard of February 24 at page 7606, between myself and the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen). At that time I was questioning the Minister of Finance concerning some statements that appeared to be quite misleading in his address to a luncheon meeting of the Canadian Club of Montreal on February 23.

My main exception was that he indicated the government was following the trend line with regard to expenditures of the gross national product in this country. A very observant person would know that is simply not the truth. The government has not been following the trend line as it has represented. It has been allowing expenditures to grow in the country at a substantially faster rate than the trend line.

I remind hon. members of the rather startling growth we have seen in Canada in expenditures. In 1968, total federal government expenditure was approximately $12 billion. At that time national revenue was roughly equal to the expenditure level and we were able to show a position where the net national debt was only $16,759 million. On a per capita basis, the net debt was $792 and in total, 21.2 per cent of the gross national product was reflected in our net debt.

I mention this because it is important to realize that not only has the government been allowing its gross expenditures to increase at a faster rate than the growth in the gross national product, it has not succeeded in obtaining the revenue to balance the budget. The net result is that the net debt in 1968 was about $16 billion. By 1970 it was still under the $17 billion level. By 1979, it grew to $55 billion, or $2,360 per capita. This represented, as a percentage of our gross national product 22.2 per cent, or about 3 per cent more than it had been, for example, in 1970.

There can be absolutely no doubt, now that the estimates have been tabled in the House that what is proposed, for example, is to take the expenditures, which we feel are unduly high in the current fiscal year, to some $82,275 million in the fiscal year 1984.

I think the government should start to level with the Canadian public now. Perhaps for a few years, both Canada and the United States were, if you like, similar to those attending a party: we both got a little drunk. We got drunk in our irresponsible attitude in handling affairs of the people in the United States and Canada. In the United States, the responsible government of President Reagan has now taken power. It has given every indication that it plans to straighten out the country; but there is absolutely no such indication here by the Government of Canada.

I know you do not attend parties, Mr. Speaker, but those who do realize that if everybody else is somewhat drunk, perhaps one can get away with more than usual. As soon as the other countries attending start to sober up, Canada will obviously be the drunken country at this world party.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this government is leading us into higher inflation and higher interest rates as a result of its total irresponsibility in handling our affairs. The government is drunk; it is drunk first with the craze for power, but it is drunk beyond the point of realizing how it is putting our nation into a situation which will be very difficult to rectify.

How quickly we forget that in 1970 the interest on our public debt was $1,675 million. That is what we spent in that year in interest costs. As hon. members know, in the current year, the year beginning next month, we are told that total debt costs will be $12,350 million. What further evidence should this government need that what it has been doing in the line of expenditures, incurring greater and greater deficits, is something it cannot continue to do without an obvious steady increase in our debt charges?

If we look at the 1981-1982 estimates, we find those debt charges are projected to go up to $16 billion by 1984. It is not long ago that the total federal budget was less than $16 billion. It was certainly a lot less than that when the emperor, the man who pretends to be a prime minister today, took power. It is time we got some answers.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have often noticed that hon. members select their analogies from situations with which they are most familiar. I hope that is not the case with the hon. member opposite tonight.

Mr. Kempling: He does not drink.

Mr. Evans: The hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) expressed some confusion the other day, and even more tonight, about the government's commitment to keep federal spending within the trend growth of the economy.

Mr. Stevens: That is not what you said.

Mr. Evans: I will try to clear up this confusion.

The confusion stems from the comparison the hon. member made between the 16 per cent growth of budgetary expenditure over the nine months ending December 31, 1980, with his own estimate of actual GNP growth of 12 per cent in 1980-1981.

First, the hon. member should be aware that the government's commitment is with regard to the growth of total outlays; in other words, the sum of budgetary expenditures plus loans, investments and advances. Total outlays grew 14.4 per cent over the same nine-month period ending December 31, 1980. This is significantly less than budgetary expenditures.

Second, the hon. member uses a 12 per cent estimate for GNP growth in 1980-1981 when he should have used trend GNP growth. In a year of cyclical weakness such as 1980-1981, actual GNP growth would be significantly less than trend GNP growth. Our current estimate of trend growth would be in the 13.5 per cent to 14.5 per cent range. This is composed of 10 per cent inflation and trend real growth in the 3 per cent to 4 per cent range.

Mr. Stevens: What was the real growth last year?

Mr. Evans: It should be noted that, while the growth rate in total outlays for the nine months ending December, 1980, was 14.4 per cent, it is still expected that the growth of total outlays for the fiscal year 1980-1981 will be 13.2 per cent as estimated in the budget, and well within trend GNP. The slowing in the growth of total outlays in the last three months of the fiscal year is expected to result from decreased net petroleum compensation payments, among other factors. Thus, the government fully expects to live up to its commitment to restrain the growth of its spending to less than trend GNP, even in this year of cyclical weakness.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES—UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION—NOTIFICATION OF POTENTIAL HEALTH HAZARD

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, tonight the subject I wish to address concerns urea formaldehyde, an insulation product which has been used in roughly 60,000 Canadian homes. This substance has quite a long history. It has been the subject of study in both Europe and the United States. Because of some of the very serious side effects of this product, when improperly installed in homes as insulation, concerns were raised in this country and in this House.

● (2210)

I had occasion to raise this matter last spring, in the summer and in the fall, asking for government action. These requests for action in the committee, and in the House in one case, stemmed from the province of Saskatchewan where the minister of consumer affairs raised the matter with the government in writing, asking that the product be dealt with under the hazardous products provisions. When no action came from that, I was asked if I would meet directly with the ministers concerned and raise the matter, which I did.

The case arose as a result of a family in Saskatchewan which had to be moved because of the fumes, or the formaldehyde gas concentrations in the house. The house was longer habitable.

It was obvious that the situation involved much more than that one case. The answer we continued to receive from the government was that it was still studying the matter. While the government was studying it, people were insulating their homes with this substance under the CHIP program and under other government subsidized and encouraged programs such as the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program. In short, the government was encouraging and paying people to insulate their homes with this material.

Finally on December 12 the minister decided to ban the material. It had been linked to cancer. Certain concentrations of formaldehyde gas was linked to cancer in rats. The minister imposed a ban and a temporary study group continued to look into the problem. Nothing in particular happened. Apparently they are still awaiting the results of that study group.

The government was asked what it was going to do about those Canadians who had experienced the problem. In answer to a question in the House, the minister said these people should contact their doctor, the department of health, energy mines and resources, or the National Research Council.

I contacted those groups. None of them were aware of what to do. No testing equipment was available. Physicians who had come in contact with people suffering the symptoms were not aware of the cause. I would like to cite a case in my riding.

After reading a column in the paper describing the symptoms, a woman came to my constituency office and stated that two years previous her doctor had asked her to leave work because of some allergy symptoms she was experiencing. As she remained in the home longer, the symptoms got worse. Neither she nor her doctor were aware of the reason. She lost her job and experienced several years of poor health because of this material. It is now clear that is what it was. The point is that the physician was not aware of the facts. There was no testing equipment available to place in the home. At that point, none of the departments the minister recommended had any information.

The minister has two responsibilities, the first being to study this, get the final report and put the ban in place permanently. Second, with regard to those already harmed, all physicians in Canada should be informed of the symptoms of this exposure. Testing equipment should be made available to be used in the homes in my riding where this material has been used, as well as in every other region in this country, in order to determine the level of formaldehyde gas and if these homes are habitable.

A list of every home in Canada in which this material has been placed should be obtained. The symptoms should be described to these home owners, they should be advised how to have their homes tested, and their physicians should be informed as to what must be done. This information is available. Every insulating contractor who has obtained government funding is listed, and there is a list of the people who installed it.

The minister has a responsibility because the government encouraged that this material be placed in the homes. It should provide a funding program to assist people remove the material from those homes that are not habitable as a result of the use of urea formaldehyde.

● (2215)

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the points raised by the hon. member have been discussed within the department. He points out quite correctly that part of the problem envisaged as a result of the use of urea formaldehyde in homes led to a decision by the minister last September to set up a non-government expert committee to review all the available data on the use of urea formaldehyde as a foam insulator. As time passed we realized some problems were arising largely as a result of the release of formaldehyde from the urea formaldehyde foam being used for home insulation. At the very beginning, most of the problems were related to symptoms that resembled the common cold, such as eye and nose irritation.

It was only when we had access to toxicological studies emanating from the United States that we found in laboratory models where there were 15 parts per million of formaldehyde in the atmosphere; cancerous tumours resulted in about 1 per cent of cases. The studies in the United States also found that there were some homes in the United States in which the parts per million of formaldehyde amounted to roughly half the scale used in the laboratory model. In other words, when we realized that the safety factor was one half of the laboratory scale model, there was no choice for the minister but to place a temporary ban on the use of this material. The hon. member correctly pointed out that this was done on December 17.

I think the hon. member made some valid points about how we should inform the Canadian public of a situation that could exist in their homes at the present time. The minister has informed me that a pamphlet is being made ready for distribution to home owners who are affected. It will outline the steps the department feels should be taken if any of the symptoms are evident in the home.

The minister has also instructed her staff to prepare a special pamphlet for distribution to all physicians in Canada. It is hoped that both these pamphlets will be ready for distribution in the next two weeks. In this way we can at least inform the public about the inherent dangers that could exist in homes where urea formaldehyde has been used.

The hon. member raised the question of the availability of equipment to test for parts per million of formaldehyde in the atmosphere in these homes. I have been given to understand that some provinces already have that equipment. If the hon. member would contact me tomorrow, perhaps I could tell him which provinces have the equipment to test the homes for the presence of formaldehyde in the atmosphere.

Once these steps have been taken, and it is hoped the final report of the committee will be ready in three weeks, I expect the government will make recommendations to deal with the other problems which may arise as a result of the banning of the product.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 10.19 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

BALTIC EVENING ON PARLIAMENT HILL

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette):

That this House, in recognition of the contribution to Canada of Canadians of Latvian, Lithuanian and Estonian descent, welcomes their honorary consuls and representatives of their respective communities to the ninth annual Baltic evening on Parliament Hill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I take it the House wants to express sentiments toward this community, but I do not think this is a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VISIT OF UNITED STATES PRESIDENT REAGAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on an important matter.

Every member in this House is pleased that the President of the United States of America is visiting Canada next week and will be addressing jointly members of this House and the Senate on March 11. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House, through the unanimous passage of this motion, welcome President Reagan and wish him and his government well, and furthermore encourage him to meet with world leaders, particularly President Brezhnev, in the very near future to initiate negotiations for arresting aggression wherever it occurs in the world; to renew détente and establish a rationale for limiting the world's arms race and to reaffirm world peace and fundamental human rights as the first priority of international relations.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

COMBINES

PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of some urgency under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that after eight years of investigation the government plans to hold a public inquiry into alleged price fixing by major oil companies, the timing of which so conveniently and so transparently shifts public focus and blame away from the government over its oil price levy earlier this week, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland (Mr. Lawrence):

That the government be condemned for not instructing that appropriate charges be laid against any oil companies found to have contravened any existing laws of Canada and that the minister make a statement on motions as to why prosecutions have not been instituted.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ASTRA TRUST

CALL FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas eight people were charged yesterday with conspiracy to defraud the public of $35 million in the collapse of Astra Trust and associated companies; and whereas the collapse of Astra was the first collapse of a federally-chartered financial institution since the depression; and whereas the justice committee of the Ontario legislature has determined that officials of Astra used political influence to gain their federal charter, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That the federal government set up a public inquiry to determine why Astra received a federal charter, how it operated, why it collapsed, who was responsible, what compensation should be paid to its victims, and ways of ensuring such a collapse is not repeated.

REQUEST THAT COPIES OF MARCH 3 HANSARD BE DISTRIBUTED TO ALL FRANCOPHONES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on an important matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

Considering that the member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) has clearly stated the position of his party, the Progressive Conservative Party, on linguistic and constitutional policies; considering also that it is the first time this position has been so clearly stated and that it sheds light on the disagreement among the Progressive Conservatives about the French fact in this country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery):

That additional copies of Hansard for March 3, 1981, be printed and made available to all French-speaking Canadians.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

POLICIES AFFECTING ATLANTIC CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Canadian National Railway Company has adopted policies applicable to Nova Scotia and the Atlantic provinces which threaten the economy of the region. These policies include the removal and the reduction of rail passenger service through VIA Rail, the transfer of ferry responsibility through CN Marine, drastic reductions in the CN Express service, the subsidization of the CAST shipping group of Montreal and the sale of the CN hotel to business interests outside the region. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That this House direct the Minister of Transport to institute an immediate independent inquiry into the activities of the CNR board of directors and management affecting Atlantic Canada and to report publicly on the result.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

AVAILABILITY OF GRAIN HOPPER CARS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, in light of the fact that 16 communities located on the CPR rail line between Provost and Camrose, Alberta, have endured with extraordinary patience inadequate quotas for the shipment of grain and gross lack of availability of grain hopper cars, and since there has been apparent discrimination in the spotting of these cars in favour of some communities to the neglect of others, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

That this Parliament request that the government take heed of this matter, seek the counsel it deems necessary and recommend a plan of action which gives a satisfactory result.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

ENLARGEMENT OF COVERAGE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter which, given government business today, is quite urgent.

Whereas even the inadequate occupational health and safety provisions of Part IV of the Canada Labour Code apply only to certain federally-regulated industries, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That this House advise the government that it would support an amendment to the Canada Labour Code to bring all people, otherwise covered by sections of the Canada Labour Code, under the umbrella of Part IV of the Canada Labour Code.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION GOVERNING CIGARETTE ADDITIVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of various reports, including the recent study by the Toronto Star, which indicates that cigarette smokers who have switched to lighter brands may be in much greater danger than they think due to the increased consumption on their part, and particularly due to the added danger of cancer-causing additives, more of which are to be found in such brands, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare be instructed by this House to bring in legislation enabling the government to obtain and publish the names of additives in cigarettes and other such substances as are now to be found in various products but which are presently trade secrets because competition is a higher value in our society than human health.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES—REFERRAL OF REPORT TO RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES COMMISSION

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs I feel I have no alternative but to ask the Prime Minister a question arising from the report of price fixing in the oil industry which, you will appreciate, Madam Speaker, none of us have seen because it is only to be released later this afternoon. I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell the House who made the decision to refer this long awaited report, which apparently contains accusations of collusion and price fixing resulting in billions of dollars of presumably illegal profits to the oil companies. Can the Prime Minister tell us who made the decision to refer this to a minor tribunal for a further public inquiry, which may well take another two years? Was this a governmental decision, was it a decision of the director of the bureau of competition policy, or was it recommended to the government by its legal advisers?

An hon. Member: Jim Coutts.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I expect the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to be arriving incessantly in the House.

An hon. Member: Imminently.

Mr. Trudeau: My answer is somewhat subject to the details he may want to bring, but my belief is that it is the director of the combines investigation branch himself who, along with legal officers, recommended that it would be better to refer this matter to the restrictive trade practices tribunal since, as the House knows, it is not always easy under the present Combines Investigation Act to be successful in pressing criminal charges. It is for that reason that we have been attempting to improve the act.

DELAY IN PUBLISHING REPORT

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question must also be directed to the Prime Minister who, I am sure, can explain to the House the reason for the unconsiderable delay in publishing this report, because I am sure the Prime Minister is aware that, more than a year ago, the Clark government had appointed independent outside counsel to advise on what action should be taken on the findings in the report. Those counsel were expected to report to the government within six months, but more than a year has passed since then. What is the reason for this delay? Has the timing more to do with an attempt to ram a bad energy policy down the throats of the Canadian public?

Were the original counsel replaced by the present government and, if so, why?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it seems to me it ill behooves the hon. member to be criticizing the minister for not being hawkish enough when it comes to applying the Combines Investigation Act against a particular industry. The House will recall that it was those hon. members opposite who, not so long ago, were attacking the minister rather ferociously, accusing him of being somewhat hawkish as regards the sugar industry. He certainly did not have the support of hon. members opposite.

Mr. Lawrence: If I remember rightly, that was an illegal action as well on the part of the minister.

QUERY RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Now that we have the minister here, I wish to put to him my final question about the inevitable delay in the procedure now being followed by the government in the matter of the oil pricing report and the very genuine anger that it will create among the general public who, according to the report, have been ripped off to the tune of several billions of dollars on their gasoline and home heating fuel oil bills over the last several years. To the hard pressed car and home owner this is no small matter—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Lawrence: In the light of these reported illegal massive profits to the oil industry and the oil companies, the government must surely now be ready to announce some new regulations, new legislation, a new pricing policy, to ensure that the average Canadian, the person on the end of the hosepipe, is getting a fair deal. My question to the minister is, where is it?

• (1420)

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member, who was the former minister responsible for my department, does not know the responsibility of the Director of Combines and Investigation. The question he asked today is very surprising because it is clearly written in the law that it is the option of the director to decide what route to follow. Indeed I support the director in the decision he made.

Mr. Lawrence: Madam Speaker, I am afraid I was not getting through to the minister. I was not asking him about the past, but about the present. The people have been ripped off by the oil industry; something must be done. What will the minister do in respect of new regulations, new legislation, or a new pricing policy?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have given the hon. member an opportunity to ask an extra question. I would expect him to be extremely brief.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I thought he was.

Mr. Lawrence: I always am, Madam Speaker. Where is the new pricing policy which will prevent further actions of this type taking place over the next two years, while this matter is dragged out by the government for a further length of time?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, I think that the hon. member is jumping to conclusions. He ought to know that pursuant to the act the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission will hear the evidence submitted by the Director of Investigation and Research; but it will also ask the companies involved to express their views. Quite aside from that investigation which is going on, the Canadian government wants to improve free competition in this country, not only between oil companies but in all sectors generally, and to ensure that competition is fair and correct. We have stated that we would soon introduce amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, and I am impatient to see whether the members of the Progressive Conservative Party will lend us their support when the bill is introduced.

[English]

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I want to express our disappointment that the government did not provide members on this side of the House with such an important report in advance of today's question period. It is a discourtesy to the House to have to rely on second-hand information.

Can the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs assure the House that the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, which he said he will introduce in the next session, will prevent this kind of consumer rip-off from ever happening to Canadian consumers again?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I would like to refer to the comments of the hon. member who first voiced his concern because he had not received the documents he wanted to have. I can assure him that at the same time this afternoon at 4 p.m. all those documents will be made available to all members on both sides of the House, to the news media in the press gallery, and to all interested parties. This seven-volume report will not be made public before 4 p.m. this afternoon because the chairman of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission wanted to follow a procedure whereby documents such as these are not released to the public before the stock markets close.

[English]

POSSIBLE RETURN TO CONSUMERS OF OVERPAYMENTS

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, as a former member of the parliamentary press gallery, I know about seeing government documents in advance. I just say it was a discourtesy to the House that the press gallery should see it before we did.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Will we consumers just have to lay back and enjoy another two years of being ripped off through price fixing or, if indeed the allegations of wrongdoing are true, will the government arrange to let Canadian consumers get their money back?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am quite surprised to see that all of a sudden the spokesmen for the Progressive Conservative Party should pose as the great defenders of the consumers. For years they have been known to protect the interests of companies, particularly oil companies, but now that the report of an investigation made under the act is to be referred to a commission or a tribunal, those Conservative members draw conclusions even before the facts are known and condemn the oil companies. I hope their former friends will figure out where they stand and realize that, depending what day it is, they are on one side of the fence or the other.

● (1425)

DELAY IN INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question also relates to this eight-year investigation into a billion dollar rip-off perpetrated by the oil companies. I would like the minister to explain to this House, if he would, why it has taken more than 12 years for the Liberal government to bring legislation before this House which would protect the Canadian people from this kind of rip-off? Frankly, I do not believe he will be able to deliver that legislation within the time-frame.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I realize that the hon. member is new in this House. He does not remember that in 1975 a Liberal government not only introduced but got through a bill to amend substantially the Combines Investigation Act. Unfortunately, due to the slowness of the parliamentary process, which tends to hinder rapid progress, we have not been able to complete the second phase of the act. The questions that I am being asked show that the Progressive Conservatives and the New Democrats now agree with my objectives.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

[English]

Mr. Skelly: Unfortunately, Madam Speaker, another interpretation might be that the government did not have the jam to put the required parts together—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Skelly: The movement here to refer this question to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission is one which is sidestepping the issue. What we really need is protection through strong legislation. I would again ask the minister to give us a date for this legislation. It is more important than many of the issues which are facing the House right now. We want a date.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, this new commitment voiced by opposition members makes me more confident than ever that we will be able to achieve passage of the second phase amendments to the Combines Investigation Act. I shall discuss this matter with my colleague who is responsible for the business of the House who in turn will try to arrange, together with the other House leaders, an appropriate date to introduce these amendments. I hope that hon. members will recall the representations made today when the bill is introduced and that they will help the government ensure prompt passage of the bill.

[English]

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, I hope that the date will be tomorrow, when the minister begins discussions with the House leader.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSSIBILITY OF NEGOTIATING COMPENSATION FOR CONSUMERS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. Since the Canadian people have been skinned over the last decade to the tune of billions of dollars, will the minister undertake to negotiate compensation for the Canadian people, by having the oil companies provide restitution for the money which they have stolen? If the minister will not do that by negotiation, is he prepared to lay before this House legislation to compel the oil companies to make restitution? There is a sense of justice involved here and the consumers must be reimbursed. The moneys recovered could go into the oil import compensation fund to offset the price increases we are facing now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as a first step, I would appreciate more support from the hon. member's party for the additional taxes I am placing on the oil and gas industry—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —rather than constant attacks from them about what I am doing.

DETERMINATION WITH RESPECT TO LAYING OF CHARGES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, perhaps I could put my question to the Minister of Justice, dealing with the petroleum inquiry which for the first time in more than ten years has now been referred to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. Would the Minister of Justice first indicate if the Department of Justice was consulted with respect to whether charges should be laid in connection with this matter; were outside counsel consulted; and if such was the case, was it determined by the Department of Justice that no formal prosecution should continue against the companies involved?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, the Director General at the Department of Consumer Affairs decided yesterday to refer the whole file to the commission involved. There will be a quasi-judicial inquiry. As for the Department of Justice, it has been involved through legal advisers, and it finds the procedure recommended by the director quite acceptable.

[English]

COURSE ADOPTED FOLLOWING COMPLETION OF INVESTIGATION

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, perhaps I could ask the minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs a twofold question, as the Minister of Justice did not answer my question. Was the minister advised directly by his director, or otherwise, by the Department of Justice, that criminal charges were not warranted in connection with the petroleum inquiry? Second, would he now inform the House—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Stevens: —of the outcome of the uranium inquiry, one concerning the apparent involvement of the government in price rigging itself?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Perhaps it would be useful for me to remind the hon. member that the director of combines has three courses of action he may follow. One is to terminate an inquiry, report to the minister that he has terminated the inquiry, and cannot find reasons to pursue it. It is obvious that the director did not follow that course.

The second course of action is to refer his findings to the Department of Justice, and ask it to lay charges based on the evidence that he has gathered during the inquiry.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Was that done?

Mr. Ouellet: The director has not followed that course.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Why?

Mr. Ouellet: Instead, he decided to follow the third course of action which was open to him—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You have no evidence.

Mr. Ouellet: —and to refer his findings to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

The director has three courses of action open to him, and it is in his discretion to decide which one of the three he follows. Under the law, he decided to follow the third one.

In relation to the second question of the hon. member regarding the uranium inquiry, this inquiry by the director is not completed. Obviously, when it has been completed, his findings will be made public.

REASONS FOR ADOPTION OF THIRD OPTION IN CONNECTION WITH FUTURE PROCEEDINGS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, the director reports to the minister. Can the minister tell us why the director chose that third course, and whether he will pass that information on to the House?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Yes, I will take the request of the Leader of the Opposition under advisement. I will talk to the director and ask him why he preferred the third option, and not the second.

Some hon. Members: You don't know?

Mr. Clark: Would the minister tell the House whether there was any consultation between the director and the minister or any of his colleagues in cabinet, or parliamentary secretaries, before the director made that decision?

Mr. Ouellet: I am happy to be asked this question. I was expecting it. I am glad to say that the government has not followed the bad example of the previous government. We did not consult other departments or ministers before deciding to proceed with the decision of the director. In other words, we did not consult other colleagues on the course of action taken. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was not consulted, as the previous government had wrongly done when it consulted the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Clark: Did the director consult the minister before the director exercised his discretion?

Mr. Ouellet: The director, according to law, indicated his intention to me. He did not ask me which of the three courses of action he should follow as it is his responsibility to decide himself. He decided to go to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. He informed me of his decision, and I accepted it. I understood that it was the course of action he wanted to follow, and I supported him in his decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RAILWAYS

IMPLEMENTATION OF HALL COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING CROWSNEST PASS RATE AGREEMENT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I have a couple of questions for the Right Hon. Prime Minister, to assist him and help his government in not fouling our Crowsnest—that is spelled f-o-u-l.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —"ing".

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Justice Emmett Hall said that the Crow rate is essential to unity in the country. In view of the fact that his recommendations are widely supported by farmers, the government of Saskatchewan, and other farm organizations, would the Prime Minister now agree that the time has come to make a decision in support of implementing the Hall Commission recommendations on the Crowsnest Pass rate?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member returns to the same kind of allegation which a fellow member of his party made the other day—that the people support a particular course. I answered the other day, and I repeat that I met a group called the Western Agricultural Conference, which represents many thousands of members, and they advised a contrary course. That is why, on this side of the House, the government is attempting to ascertain what seems to be so clear in the member's mind, which apparently is not even clear in the minds of the provincial governments out there, since some of them support re-opening the Crow rates, and others, particularly in Saskatchewan, support the contrary position. That is why the Minister of Transport, in particular, is busily engaged in trying to ascertain the sentiments of the people in the west.

Mr. Benjamin: This is one of the main reasons why there are no Liberals west of Winnipeg.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You do have the NDP.

Mr. Benjamin: I mention that the dissension on the Crow rate comes from a minority, private interest commodity groups, including the Grain Exchange, James Richardson & Sons Limited, and Pioneer Grain Company, Limited.

An hon. Member: Lloyd Axworthy.

Mr. Benjamin: I would ask the Prime Minister, in view of the fact that not only did Mr. Justice Hall hear briefs from over 1,400 people in 160 days, but a further survey held very recently of 1,200 prairie grain-producers showed the overwhelming majority said we should implement Mr. Justice Hall's—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should be much briefer in his second question. I would ask him to co-operate with the Chair.

Mr. Benjamin: The WAC presentation is something less than Emmett Hall's recommendation. In view of the pandering that his minister and others have done to minority groups, will the Prime Minister, while considering WAC, implement the recommendations of Mr. Justice Emmett Hall instead and get the matter settled once and for all if he wants to really do something about unity in western Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I really find it difficult to accept the assertion of the hon. member that he is speaking collectively for the west, because I met two weeks ago with members of the Western Agricultural Conference. They represent many more members than the National Farmers Union with which I met yesterday and hold a contrary view. He knows that the Saskatchewan government holds one view and that the Manitoba and Alberta governments hold the contrary view.

If the hon. member is correct in saying that that is why we do not have more Liberals in the west, because we are trying to help the west arrive at a consensus on this, then what he is saying is that the NDP do have some members because they are playing to ambiguity, and are often sitting on the fence on this particular matter.

CONSEQUENCES OF ADOPTION OF RESOLUTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, my question is for the hon. Minister of Justice. As it has been reported yesterday on the news and today in the newspapers that the Quebec justice minister has referred to a report by three lawyers to the effect that the resolution now before the House would affect several Quebec laws, I would like to ask the minister whether his department has conducted such studies in the past, even though according to the report, Quebec laws contained some inequities that might have to be corrected. Can the minister tell the House whether studies have been conducted in this regard and whether there are actually irregularities which caused problems for Canadians and Quebecers?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, when we have a Canadian charter of rights applicable to all Canadians, the federal government as well as the provincial governments will have to ensure that all statutes are in keeping with this charter. The Department of Justice knows that we shall have to amend several statutes in this Parliament in order to delete from them some discriminatory provisions. And if there are unfortunately 100 Quebec statutes which contain discriminatory provisions, I hope that the provincial government will be more than willing to act rapidly to remove from them every discriminatory aspect.

PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES—REASONS FOR NOT INSTITUTING PROSECUTIONS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I should like to turn to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs with respect to the report of the director on price fixing. It seems to me that there is a principle of natural justice involved here. The government cannot try to avoid its responsibility by simply saying it accepts the recommendations of the director. There is a question here of an almost Star Chamberish attitude on the part of the government in that it declares that the people are guilty and then allows them two years in which to prove they are innocent. Why does the government not now proceed with the prosecution and get this matter before the courts? The courts are open, the courts are independent, so why can we not now have an adjudication within the proper judicial process? Why does the government not initiate such action at this time?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I do not know if the hon. member was present a few minutes ago.

Mr. Stevens: Answer the question.

Mr. Ouellet: The type of questions that were asked by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth and the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham earlier implied that the facts gathered by the director of combines had to be taken as a reality, have to be accepted—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is what you said.

Mr. Ouellet: —and be taken as if the case were completed. The government did not do that. The government allowed the director to go before the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission to present his evidence and allowed the companies to present their own point of view and have the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission render decisions on the evidence presented before the tribunal. I submit that we have not jumped the gun but that it is the colleagues of the hon. member who have jumped to conclusions rather quickly.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, the minister cannot attempt to shift the responsibility from himself to the opposition. That will not work; it will not wash. The minister knows that the director must make a report in his annual report on whether there was sufficient evidence to warrant prosecution. That report will be handed down today, but the minister did not have the courage to bring the matter before the House by a statement on motions. He did it outside the House.

In view of the fact that the report that will be brought down today—which mysteriously got into the hands of the press—indicates that the director finds details of collusion amongst the oil companies to fix prices, and makes specific recommendations on how the practice can be halted—that is in the report and the minister will have read it—what is the purpose of now referring the matter to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission? What will be gained and what will be the conclusion if the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission does not have the ability to adjudicate on this issue?

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member is prejudging the case before it is presented.

An hon. Member: No.

An hon. Member: You are.

Mr. Ouellet: I submit to hon. members that they should first of all read the report and access for themselves the evidence gathered and then, maybe in the days to come, put questions on a document that they will have received and on which everyone will be in a position to speak, and not speculate in advance as the hon. member is doing.

MARINE TRANSPORT

WITHDRAWAL OF DART CONTAINERLINE SERVICE FROM HALIFAX—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport respecting the withdrawal of the Dart Containerline Service from the port of Halifax. The minister now knows the havoc created by this action. He knows that Nova Scotians are blaming the CNR and himself for the action and he knows he is being accused of aiding the Cast shipping group in favour of the port of Montreal to the detriment of the port of Halifax.

When did the minister tell the National Harbours Board, when did he tell the port of Halifax and when did he tell his colleague from the city of Halifax, the Minister of Labour, about the impending action? Why did he not inform the public so that it would know what was transpiring and could take action against it?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend mentioned so many events that I do not know with respect to which one he wants me to tell when I was involved. If it is the Dart decision, I was informed the same day that everybody else was, as he was. This is the situation.

This morning I had a very useful conversation with Premier Buchanan on this subject. We agreed to meet next week to look at all aspects of this case, that is, the freight rates, the CN investment in Cast, the National Harbours Board port charges and, the ice-breaking activities of my department. We will meet on Tuesday, I think, when he and I and our officials will look at every aspect of the matter so that we will at least have the facts on which to comment. Sometimes it is useful to have all the facts.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, I will take the minister at his word when he says that he did not know in advance about this. I will say to him, however, that he should check with his officials at Canadian National Railways because they knew of the impending action many months ago when the Dart Containerline Service officials consulted with them, asked these questions, and put this problem to them.

I want to know what the minister is prepared to do now by way of equalizing the treatment of the port of Halifax and the port of Montreal, bearing in mind that the Government of Canada, according to Dart Containerline officials, spends $20 million on clearing the St. Lawrence River for the benefit of the port of Montreal and spends no such amount of money for the benefit of the port of Halifax.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, my hon. friend has just repeated in his second question the elements that I said the Premier of Nova Scotia and I would discuss. The least he can do is to suspend his judgment for a few days. I presume that at the end of that meeting we will issue a communiqué of some kind to establish what are the facts.

Of course, I was in touch with CN as soon as I heard the news about Dart. The president of CN assured me that he had been assured repeatedly by the participants in this movement that the rates for freight were not a cause of the decision that was taken by Dart. Similarly, the National Harbours Board chairman, to whom I speak almost every day, has assured me that the charges in the port of Halifax are lower than those in the port of Montreal. We are trying to establish all these facts and I will present them to my hon. friend after the meeting with Premier Buchanan.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DESIGNATION OF AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS AS ESSENTIAL WORKERS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. It arises out of Treasury Board's proposal to designate Canada's air traffic controllers. Can the minister explain to the House why Treasury Board chose to ignore the warnings of a six-member Transport Canada committee which stated that designation of all of Canada's air traffic controllers would seriously impair and jeopardize Canada's air traffic services?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, all matters were taken into account at the time the decision was made to seek designation of, I believe, between 1,700 and 1,800, air traffic controllers. That matter is still pending. I do not think the decision was taken without full knowledge of the facts and without due regard to all considerations, particularly the safety of the public.

IMPACT ON SAFETY OF TRAVELLING PUBLIC

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport why he chose to ignore the warnings of his departmental officials on this very important matter inasmuch as the President of the Treasury Board stated in a letter to the president of the Air Traffic Controllers Association that the Minister of Transport has endorsed the position taken by the President of the Treasury Board? It would appear that the actions of the Minister of Transport are clearly not in keeping with the objective of providing safety and security to Canada's air travelling public.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): In order to answer the question, Madam Speaker, we should have the complete document before us so that we can analyse it line by line. The document states that safety would be endangered if we followed a certain course of action because the union people would be angry, not because the system would be inadequate. I am sorry I cannot go into the details, but I will be happy to look at the document that I have received. As the President of the Treasury Board said, the decision was based on a number of factors, and that was one among many.

WARNING ISSUED BY DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Transport is responsible for the safety and security of air traffic services. Given the statements made by his officials, the six-member committee, surely that must cause some anxiety and apprehension in the mind of the minister. If not, it certainly should.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): I quite agree, Madam Speaker. The decision was not an easy one to make. There were four options. One was to operate a limited system. That, of course, offered quite a lot of security but also disadvantages in terms of the economics of the country. Another one was to designate the 1,700 controllers. That involved safety factors, which we examined. It is not that long ago since the hon. member was minister of transport, and I am sure he remembers how difficult these decisions are, how balanced they must be.

ENERGY

OIL COMPANIES' SHARE OF INCREASE IN PRICE OF GASOLINE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I wish to return to the matter of oil prices. If the minister filled his gas tank on Sunday, as did many Canadians, he found that gas costs two to three cents a litre more. Will the minister confirm these figures, that of the increase, .7 cents was due to the regular increase with the 1981 price coming on stream, .5 cents was due to the Lalonde-Lougheed levy the other day, and 1.5 cents was due to the oil companies charging for so-called increased production costs? Will the minister confirm those figures, and the fact that the oil companies have piggybacked an additional 1.5-cent increase on to the .5-cent increase which came in as a result of prices going up?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I want first to tell the hon. member that I filled my gas tank only on Tuesday in order to avoid any leak about what was coming.

Mr. Lawrence: You mean the government car?

Mr. Lalonde: My own. I want to confirm to the hon. member that several oil companies did take advantage of the increase arising from the $1 increase in January. They doubled the amount of the increase. I wrote to my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and asked that the protection of consumers division examine this matter and advise whether the increases were proper in the circumstances. As far as the total price is concerned, I remind the hon. member that at the present time in Toronto, for example, the price at the pump is still 9.45 cents a gallon less than it would have been under the Conservative budget had it passed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: That is not a sufficient answer. As far as the Canadian public is concerned, both the Conservatives and Liberals are parties of high prices.

Mr. Malone: Only the NDP are cheap.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

QUERY RESPECTING NATIONALIZATION OF OIL COMPANIES

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, since he is full of gas today. Will the minister confirm that because of the complicity of his government and previous Liberal and Conservative governments, the Canadian public, as shown by the report he is going to release this afternoon, has lost the equivalent of over $80 billion to the oil companies through overcharges and poor marketing practices? Will the minister tell us, if he is not prepared to bring in legislation, restitution, or prosecution, whether he is prepared to advocate to cabinet public ownership of these companies?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I am happy to report that the mail is moving. I received a letter from my colleague and, at his request, my officials are looking at the matter.

Second, I want to assure the hon. member that the evidence gathered by the director will be presented, and obviously challenged and thoroughly discussed, before the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. The figures he refers to as rip-offs are figures that were allegedly gathered by the director of combines. Obviously they will be tested and the commission will make its findings. We will have to wait until the commission reports before we can be certain of these allegations. If they are true and the commission finds that the consumers of Canada have been ripped off, the government will take its responsibility and act accordingly.

I remind the hon. member that even before the report was made public the government had gone a long way toward Canadianizing this industry. It is to the credit of the government that it has already begun moving in this direction.

GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING INQUIRY FINDINGS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the concern of the House is whether the government has indeed taken its responsibility with respect to this matter and with regard to the course of action it has taken. The minister is no doubt aware of Section 15 of the Combines Investigation Act which says that the director may, at any stage of an inquiry, including the beginning of an inquiry as is the case today, refer any record, etc. to the Attorney General to see whether an offence has been or is about to be committed against the act, and for such action as the Attorney General of Canada may be pleased to take. The obvious question is whether this has been submitted to the Attorney General and, if so, when. If it has been submitted and advice was obtained by the director, what was the advice? What is the state of affairs? It appears to the House that the minister is most inconclusive with respect to the intentions of the government on this matter.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the hon. member referred to Section 15 of the act. The director decided to act according to Section 47. He exercised his option and the matter is now before the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The question is whether that is the appropriate option under the circumstances, and what will be the outcome. It appears in his report that there are many actions started which are ultimately dropped. If an offence has been committed, the companies should be charged. The minister has not answered my question. The question is whether the Attorney General of Canada has given his advice to the director and/or the minister, but particularly to the director, as to the appropriateness of the action. If he has not, will the minister undertake to look into this matter and report to the House so that we can have the whole picture?

● (1500)

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, the director has decided to refer the matter to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission under Section 47 of the act and the hon. member should know that it is a proper course of action for him to take. That is his own decision. That does not preclude the possibility of referring some aspect of his findings to the Department of Justice at a later date.

Mr. Nielsen: Nor does it now.

Mr. Ouellet: It does not preclude this at all. But the decision of the director to go before the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission at this time is a decision which I respect, and I support him in his decision. If at a later date it is decided to refer the matter to the Department of Justice, it will then be the decision of the Attorney General of Canada to decide whether or not prosecutions will be laid before the courts.

Mr. Clark: Why has that not been done?

Mr. Ouellet: I am not going to intervene on this question in advance. It is a matter possibly to be dealt with at a later date.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (NEPEAN-CARLETON)—PREMATURE RELEASE OF ESTIMATES—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: I have before me from Wednesday and Thursday last a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) alleging that the premature release of information from the 1981-1982 estimates constituted breaches of privilege of the House.

I want to be clear on this point. The hon. member was not referring to the fact that the estimates were released to the press in a lock-up held on the morning of February 25, 1981, because that was the subject of another question of privilege by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) upon which I ruled that day. Nor was the hon. member referring to the minister's briefing of opposition critics, which I understand took place at the luncheon also on Wednesday. The premature release to which the hon. member refers is a wire story which was available on Canadian Press wire at about 17.30 on Wednesday which, in turn, derived from a press advance which was annotated for release "possibly at 3.45 p.m. eastern standard time on the same day."

I do not think we need go into arguments with respect to the facts. There was a lock-up; there was a press advance; there were print and electronic media stories on the contents of the estimates for some hours prior to those estimates having been tabled in the House. These things are not really at issue. What is at issue is whether or not the premature release of the estimates constitutes a contempt of the House and, therefore, a breach of parliamentary privilege.

In the course of the consideration of the matter on Wednesday and Thursday last, many assertions were made, particularly to this effect. Much argument was offered on the substance of the issue. Analogies were drawn between the estimates, on the one hand, and the budget, on the other. The issue of cabinet secrecy was discussed. There was also reference made to one of our own precedents of December 12, 1979.

Certain hon. members drew attention to the Dalton case, now a well-known British precedent on the issue of budget secrecy. The House should note that while an inquiry was undertaken by a select committee, the issue was not dealt with at Westminster as privilege.

Again, the hon. member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) offered an argument based on the conventions of cabinet secrecy. I have examined that argument carefully but I could not find in it any link between those very important conventions and the law of privilege. No matter how important the principle of cabinet secrecy may be—and I acknowledge the force of the hon. member's argument in that regard—the Chair has no duty to uphold that principle as it has to uphold the law of privilege.

Furthermore, the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) asked me to consider the consequences of a situation in which estimates were never tabled but simply published in the press. I do not know that I can consider that hypothetical case, except to refer the hon. member to his own assertion that—and I will quote his words—"until the estimates are formally filed, they are nothing more than a mere document. People who act on information in documents before they are filed do so at their own peril."

Finally, it was alleged that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) failed to take proper precautions in connection with the lock-up to guard against premature release. I cannot become involved in that argument. The minister must take his own responsibilities as, I am sure he does, and I do not sit in judgment upon the manner in which he or any other member fulfils his responsibilities.

In conclusion, I have simply dealt with the arguments offered by members in attempting to assist the Chair in finding whether or not a prima facie case of contempt had been committed. No argument was offered relating to the specific privileges set out so clearly in Chapters V, VII and VIII of the nineteenth edition of Erskine May, or those citations in Chapter X dealing extensively with breaches of privilege and contempt.

Therefore, I must conclude that a prima facie case has not been established as a result of which I could allow priority to the motion offered by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton.

Privilege—Mr. Rae

MR. RAE—ALLEGED DISCREPANCIES AND MISLEADING ANSWERS BY MINISTERS—MINISTERS' RESPONSIBILITIES FOR RIDINGS—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: Again last Wednesday the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) on a question of privilege raised the matter of what he felt was a discrepancy between the answers which the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) had given to him on February 19 and the answers given to him by the Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) on February 18 respecting an earlier question of privilege which the hon. member had raised on February 18 relating to the appointment of ministers of the Crown responsible for individual ridings.

While the debate ranged over the field of representation within the cabinet of provincial, regional and constituency interests, I am charged with the responsibility of determining whether any statement of facts constitutes on its face sufficient evidence of breach of privilege or, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) put it, "whether there is enough of a case" that I should give the matter priority and ask the House to decide whether it should be sent to committee.

Everyone who participated in the debate seemed to agree that there was a tradition, and indeed a necessity, for the interests of regions to be represented in the cabinet. The concern of the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood, however, is that there was a representation contained in a letter sent to one of his constituents by the Solicitor General stating that he was responsible for the riding of Broadview-Greenwood in the cabinet, and that the Solicitor General gave one explanation of that letter while the Minister of Finance gave another. The hon. member in effect says that there is a discrepancy between the two statements and that there yet remains what amounts to interference or implication that the Solicitor General represents the riding of Broadview-Greenwood in the cabinet.

There was a full debate from all sides on this matter and during his intervention the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated that the only intention was to continue the tradition that the interests of regions of Canada were represented in cabinet, including those regions not represented in Parliament by the government party.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood will appreciate that while some forms of representation could amount to a breach of privilege or contempt—for example, May's nineteenth edition at page 147 tells us that to represent oneself to be a parliamentary agent without possessing the necessary qualifications would amount to contempt—before any representation could be considered by the House as privilege, there would have to be evidence of something being done quite clearly improperly. It is trite to say that while a member is elected to one riding, he represents the whole country. Can one deny that each member of the government represents all of Canada in cabinet, even though his or her departmental duties normally relate to a particular department? How that representation is done, however, is another matter. What has happened here is that the choice used in this case has occasioned the hon. member to raise what is really a grievance rather than a matter of privilege.

During the course of debate on the matter it was suggested by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and for that matter the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that when the Prime Minister was advising the House that hon. members could get assistance from the regional representative in the cabinet, apart from departmental ministers, the Prime Minister may have somehow changed the form of the question period and that henceforth members may not only direct questions to the departmental minister but also to the regional minister in order to get some kind of assistance.

I must state very clearly in this regard that members will appreciate that, even if a document is tabled or if a statement is made in the House, this does not in itself alter the rules of the House, and that those rules will continue to be applied during question period as was traditionally done according to rules and practices of the House of Commons.

PRIVILEGE

MR. RAE—ACCESS TO INFORMATION RESPECTING PUBLIC FUNDS

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I gave Your Honour notice this morning about the matter, which is related to one on which you have ruled, but, since you did not specifically rule on the submission I intend to make with respect to the householder sent out by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), I want to raise it with you and ask you to consider it.

I have in my hand a copy of the parliamentary householder going out under the name of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre. On the inside of the cover page there is a picture of the hon. member. It says, "John Evans presenting a government multiculturalism grant."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: My first conclusion from that was that the minister politically responsible for the riding of Ottawa Centre was clearly falling down on the job since in my riding it is the minister responsible for Broadview-Greenwood who does the handing out of cheques and not the individual member of Parliament. My first conclusion was that clearly there is a minister who is not doing his job in Ottawa Centre. I think it should be drawn to the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that some of his ministers are not living up to their political responsibilities.

I want to raise this question in all seriousness in the context of a decision which was referred to Your Honour, but to which I have not seen Your Honour refer, and that is the decision of Mr. Speaker Jerome given on December 10, 1979, as recorded at page 2180 and 2181 of Hansard, with respect to a related question.

Mr. Stollery: He was fired a week later.

Mr. Rae: The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) says he was fired a week later. I think that shows the respect for occupants of the Chair held by members of the Liberal Party.

I simply want to refer to that judgment and the problem in that case and relate it to the problem in this case. I remind Your Honour that the problem in that case was that the government of the day had established a series of committees which were House committees but which were composed entirely of members of the governing party. Members of the opposition were denied access. Those committees were partially paid for out of public funds.

I want to refer Your Honour to some things Mr. Speaker Jerome said. He said that while he would not rule on the actual question of privilege, he did want to refer to the practice which was involved. He referred specifically to the practice. He said:

> I refer to the practice of supporting from public funds a committee composed of members of any one caucus.

Then he went on to say:

> The support of public funds, where applied to parliamentary activities, ought, I think, to apply across the floor of Parliament, particularly so since—

Then he went on to say something else, but the critical point was that the support of public funds, where applied to parliamentary activities, ought to apply across the floor of Parliament.

Furthermore, on page 2181 Mr. Speaker Jerome is reported to have said, and I quote:

> —in my opinion the greater wisdom would be to ensure that in every case where this is done, where public funds are used to support such a committee even if it is an informal committee, such a committee consist of members of more than one party in the House. I think that is a wise practice to follow.

It seems to me that by analogy something is happening here which reflects on my ability as a Member of Parliament to have access to information with respect to public funds, that members of the governing party have a privilege and a right which is denied to me as a member of an opposition party, that members of the government party are being publicly funded, that the publicity for these activities is being publicly funded and that the publicity for these activities is directly related to householders sent out under the guise of being non-partisan publications which are supposed to provide information. All Members of Parliament distribute them, and yet the kind of publicity that is granted to hon. members opposite is not granted to members of the opposition parties.

I want to make quite clear why I resent that implication and also why I think you, Madam Speaker, have an obligation to provide protection to members of the opposition when they find themselves in this position. I think Your Honour has an obligation, if not to comment on whether a question of privilege is involved, to follow the ruling of Mr. Speaker Jerome and at least comment on the wisdom of a practice whereby members of the governing party are given a right and a privilege with respect to public funds and parliamentary publications which is not granted to any member of the opposition.

Mr. Nielsen: Denied.

Mr. Rae: Not only has it not been granted but, the last time he was involved in this House with this question of privilege, the Prime Minister explicitly said he allowed that kind of thing to go on. He says it is a practice which he regards as a good practice. The Prime Minister gave two reasons for saying it was a good practice. He said it was a good practice because it was important that the presence of the federal government be known when grants are being handed out.

I want to put clearly on the record why I reject and resent that argument as much as I reject and resent anything I have heard about this since I have become a Member of Parliament. That argument implies that to be a good federalist one has to be a Liberal. That is something which goes to the very heart of this country. There are no second-class Canadians in this House of Commons, there are no second-class patriots in this House of Commons and there are no second-class federalists in this House of Commons. I think a remark like that by the Prime Minister goes to the very core of what it means to be a federal Member of Parliament. There is no reason in the world why the governing party should be able to take unilateral credit for grants and programs which are under the authority of the Parliament of Canada while other Members of Parliament are denied that same right.

The Prime Minister says this is the real world. Let me tell him about the real world of politics in my constituency. The real world of politics in my constituency is that when there is an opening of a senior citizens' building I am not allowed on the platform because I am not a member of the governing party. That is the real world of politics. Do hon. members not believe that the residents of my constituency resent that implication and resent what happened?

Mr. Mazankowski: Suffer.

Mr. Rae: That is why it seems to me if Your Honour is not prepared to find that there is a question of privilege involved here, Your Honour should at least very carefully consider the nature of the practice involved whereby public funds are being used in a totally partisan way and whereby members are told that the only condition under which they will be allowed to take the federal case to the people of Canada is if they happen to be members of the Liberal Party of Canada. That is a corruption of the political process, but it is also an insult to every opposition member of the House.

With respect to this particular question of privilege, Your Honour has a specific case here in which we are told that the practice with respect to the information which we receive as Members of Parliament regarding grants given out in our ridings is different for a member of the Liberal Party than it is for a member of the opposition.

With respect to the wisdom of the practice, I remind Your Honour that when this same practice was brought to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), she fired her assistant who was said to have been responsible. I would simply like Your Honour to consider very carefully and comment on a similar practice whereby a multiculturalism grant is given out in the riding of Ottawa Centre, and it is the hon. member for Ottawa Centre who takes the credit for the fact that the grant is going out, but when a multiculturalism grant is given out in the riding of Broadview-Greenwood, the Member of Parliament for Broadview-Greenwood is not even told it is happening. If that is not a discrepancy, an abuse of process and a practice which affects my rights, not as a member of the New Democratic Party but as a Member of Parliament, then I suggest I do not know what is. If we cannot appeal to Your Honour to comment on the wisdom of this practice and to see that this kind of abuse does not go on, to whom can we make such an appeal?

Madam Speaker: Is the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) rising on this question of privilege?

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes I am, Madam Speaker. I listened with open ears to the argument just made, and I have to cast my mind back to about a year or so ago in order to judge the crocodile tears of the hon. member and his complaint about being left out of the decisions of the Liberal Party; decisions on which he may be left in now. But I do not want that recollection of mine to detract in any way from the importance of the issue he raises and which was raised before.

You will recall, Madam Speaker, I had undertaken to write you about the judgment of Mr. Speaker Jerome telling you about the practice which had been adopted on another day on a matter which he considered improper at that time on the basis of precedents, although he was wrong. He felt compelled to comment on that alleged impropriety in order to protect members of the House. There were other members of the New Democratic Party who were involved at that time. I was going to bring that comment by Mr. Speaker and that precedent to your attention, Madam Speaker. However, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) has saved me the necessity of doing it by mentioning precisely the precedent and the judgment to which I referred at that time.

The practice to which he referred is one which should not exist in the House of Commons. I do not know whether that is the grant which is alleged to have lain around in the office of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) before he was ready to present it. I understand it had come through the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), as the political minister, and was lying in the hon. member's office. Although this may not have been the same grant, it was one of the cases. This is the kind of practice that should be frowned upon. The Speaker's role—and I say it with respect—is to keep order, but it is also to protect the proprieties which should exist between members of the House of Commons. No government, regardless of its stripe, can make fish of some members and fowl of others. That is the kind of practice being referred to by the hon. member.

The precedent which I wanted to draw to your attention, Madam Speaker, has now been referred to, and this will save me the necessity of making the argument. I think that anyone who listens to this debate would be moved to suggest that, although such conduct is not illegal—no one would ever argue that—it is most inappropriate and should be condemned. I say with respect that it should be condemned from the Chair.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I rise to try to clarify to some extent the accusations which have been made, both by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) with regard to this case. It is not the only case, because I have done this on a number of occasions, and I will tell you, Madam Speaker, exactly what I have done.

In dealing with my constituents I come from time to time across a group of people who tell me they have made an application to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming) or to another minister for a grant under a particular granting program. They want to know what the status of that grant is and when the cheque will be coming if it has been approved. I come back to my office and call the minister involved, asking him whether he has received a grant application, whether it is in order, whether it has been approved and, if so, when the cheque will be issued. In the case to which reference was made relating to the picture, I was asked to do that. I then committed myself to my constituent, who is a member of that organization, to check into the matter. I called the minister's office and the minister said that, yes, in fact, the grant had been approved and the cheque was being processed now. I asked him where the cheque was because those people were badly in need of the funds—it was an organizational grant for some $41,000—and I asked whether we could get the cheque to them as fast as possible. The minister said that he was preparing to present that cheque but, if it was urgent, I could deliver it to them. I said, "Yes, please", and then I called the organization and said, "Will you please pick up the cheque in my office, or we will put it in the mail", to which the organization said clearly that they preferred to have it sooner rather than later and not risk it being sent by the mails—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: As a result, the secretary—not the president or any other official of the organization—was sent to my office by the organization, and I delivered the cheque on that very same day it had been delivered to me by the minister—

Mr. Nielsen: With the cameras and the press present.

Mr. Evans: At the same time I called our own caucus research people and asked that a photographer be sent there for that purpose.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: The point is that if you are concerned about your constituents, then you make it a practice of finding out what are your constituents' needs, and if they have a concern, you look into it for them. I did just that, and I have no regrets whatsoever. In fact, I will continue to do the same thing in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I would just like to speak for a moment on this subject and refer to a statement by the hon. member from the NDP who said that if this is happening it is a corruption of the political process, or something to that effect. Naturally I would agree with those remarks. Apparently it is happening because he has produced evidence in one case, and I am sure there are others who can produce similar evidence. However, I believe in fairness—and this is probably the first time I will have said anything good about members on the other side of the House—

An hon. Member: Easy.

Mr. Cossitt: I must be sick today. Perhaps what is done in my constituency could be adopted as a model for other constituencies. For example, the Minister of State for Trade (Mr. Lumley) came down to speak to the chamber of commerce in my constituency last week and announced the allocation of grants for the city of Brockville and the town of Gananoque. He then made the statement that these grants were due directly to representations made by the member for Leeds-Grenville. I thought that was being very fair. I would like to say that there are two sides to this coin.

An hon. Member: They are afraid of you.

Mr. Cossitt: In any event, I suggest that if all ridings could be treated the same as mine in this regard, there would be no complaints, but apparently they are not. The answer is that if all cheques for these grants could go through the sitting member, regardless of his political affiliation, that may well resolve the problem. For example, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin)—whose attention was drawn to this—was involved in a similar situation. She made a statement at that time that in the future she would forward cheques through the sitting member regardless of politics. Someone cut that off somewhere along the line. I think if that practice were followed, and the other ministers did the same thing, no one would have cause for complaint.

I agree with the member for the NDP that we are all here because the people in our own ridings elected us. We are here, whether we are Liberal, Conservative or NDP, to represent all the people in the riding, and when a cheque is presented, it is not a Liberal Party gift, it is not a government gift, it is a grant which is allocated, supposedly, regardless of the politics which exist in that riding. That is the way it should be.

Perhaps I should sit down now. I said too much that is favourable about the government, which I never should do.

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, I will not prolong this discussion for long, but, since I seem to be involved to some degree, it might be useful if I participated in the discussion for a moment.

I would like to argue, if I may, that, of course, this may well be an airing of a grievance by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), but it is not a legitimate question of privilege. I do not believe, and I think the case has been made by others on similar questions of privilege in recent weeks, that the members' privileges to perform in this House and to perform for their constituents are being abrogated.

I wanted to make something clear which I think has been passed over. As the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, I must make decisions on all grants and contributions. It is finally my neck on whether I decide in favour or against on the establishment of policy, subject to cabinet concurrence, and so on. As such, when any grant or contribution goes to any particular group of Canadians or to a constituency, I am responsible. I could lose my job, I could be fired or I could be criticized by any member of the House if I have not performed that duty in a proper manner.

If I am responsible for the decision making on that grant, surely I should be responsible for the decision on how that grant reaches a group of Canadians. I am subject to grievances, concerns or attacks here for the way I do that. However, it seems to me natural enough, as a minister in a government on this side of the House, if I cannot deliver a grant to a particular group, to ask a colleague to do it. It is very foolish and very naive if someone suggests that that is inappropriate.

I take on the responsibility. We are political parties in this House. I am open to criticism at any time by someone from another party that I do not have the right to deliver that cheque or ask somebody to do it on my behalf. However, I want to put that into context because I think there has been some misunderstanding. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) pointed out earlier in a similar discussion with the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood, different ministers have different approaches to this particular issue. I am just trying to be open and candid about my approach to my particular responsibility.

There was a misunderstanding in my office of policy in the sending of cheques. If I or a colleague on my behalf delivers a cheque, particularly when an event is taking place, and it is done with a note, as is the practice in my office, it seems to me it is done in a non-partisan manner; I am sure I will hear some hee-haws on the far side to some degree. But it is done on my behalf. We wish them well; we hope they will be successful; we ask them to live up to Treasury Board requirements in accountability.

Some hon. Members: Hee-haw!

Mr. Fleming: As predicted, they have reacted, Madam Speaker. At any rate, it is my view of my ministerial responsibility that if those cheques cannot be presented by me—and I am often invited to do that—or a colleague on my behalf, then I should send them directly. It was a misunderstanding in my office which allowed that incident to happen in the Broadview-Greenwood riding.

In the case of a colleague who came to me, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), he asked that I accelerate the presentation of the cheque. Was it going through all right? Were there problems? They needed their money; the event was coming up; he pressed me on that. I telephoned and asked, "Is there any problem? Where is it?" It was brought over.

Mr. McKnight: And you gave him the cheque.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, I gave him the cheque, or he called them and they gave it to him in the office.

I make no apology for my colleagues; I am responsible. I do not expect hon. members on the other side to lean over backwards in kindness to me in carrying out my duty. I expect them to be vigilant. Some may be surprised that I say so, but there are elements of politics, party controversy and confrontation in this House. I am a member of the government. I am one of the representatives of this particular party on the government side of the House at this time. I am responsible for the decisions I make on grants. I am open to any criticism by any member. If I live under those conditions, I think I have the right to select who I believe can best represent me when there is a cheque to be presented; I had to make a decision on that matter.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I should like to take just a moment to underline the terms in which the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) addressed this issue to Your Honour and to underline the fact that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) agreed with that position.

Neither of these members has argued that there is what we would call a prima facie case of privilege on which Your Honour would have to rule in that respect, but they have argued that there is a clear analogy between what has been done now and what was done in the latter part of 1979 which produced the statement of Mr. Speaker Jerome.

He said clearly that he did not feel he could call it a question of privilege, but that there was something upon which he needed to comment because it was a case of public money, money voted under the authority of Parliament, being used in a way to bring advantage to one political party. I would urge very strongly that Your Honour study that decision or statement by Mr. Speaker Jerome and give some weight to the suggestion that there is a strong analogy.

I am very sorry, as we all are, that the Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole House is away from Parliament because of illness. I wish he could be in on this discussion because it was he who raised the question of privilege in the first place, back in 1979. It was supported by quite a few others; a lot of time and thought were put into it. Most of us think that the comments of Mr. Speaker Jerome were very well put and that perhaps similar comments should be made again.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I see that you are about to make a ruling. Since my colleagues opposite acknowledge that there is no question of privilege involved, I would simply ask that you settle the matter so that we may go on to the orders of the day. There is absolutely no basis for a question of privilege. They have referred to a ruling made by a former Speaker of the House. With all due respect, I must say that the Standing Orders are there, but it is not up to the Chair to make them. Madam Speaker, your responsibility is to apply them. The grievance has nothing to do with a rule or a practice and I submit that we ought to proceed with the business of the House.

Madam Speaker: Indeed I was about to say that I will take the matter under advisement. I only want hon. members to note that those who rose in this debate referred to a practice. But our practices are not always the object of specific rules for the House. Just the same I will review the matter. However, a practice is something which lends itself to very different interpretations and the House will understand that I would be in a very bad position to give an interpretation of it in light of the Standing Orders of the House.

However, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) recalled a precedent of the former occupant of the Chair. I believe I remember that precedent. It has to do with public funds which allegedly were spent for so-called parliamentary committees or caucus committees. He commented at length on the way we should look upon the expenditure of public funds for the establishment of parliamentary committees or caucus committees. I am not sure an analogy can be drawn between the two situations, but since the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood is usually so logical in his arguments I cannot simply dismiss the serious argument he has made before the House. Therefore I will examine this question.

As regards that part of the intervention of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) wherein he urged me to reflect upon a comment made by my predecessor, I want to say to him that the first time he spoke about that I was somewhat ill at ease because, after all, I had just made a ruling and I had the impression that under the request to reflect further upon a precedent or a ruling made by my predecessor, the hon. member was very careful but I had a vague impression that he and some of this colleagues were questioning one of the rulings I had made.

Again today he has asked me to reflect and comment. I want to tell him right away that I will refuse to comment on hypothetical situations. And if in a given circumstance my predecessor deemed appropriate to make comments rather than a ruling, personally I would hesitate to comment on situations which are not clearly put to me for a ruling to be made. Still, the comment which was made will certainly assist me in the consideration of the question of privilege which has just been raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood.

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, it is not my intention to comment on your remarks and your ruling in any adverse way. I am rising on behalf of my colleague, the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker). There should be no misunderstanding in the mind of the Chair, as there is none in mine, that he was addressing himself to a specific question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). It was specific enough; it was not a hypothetical matter.

Second, he invited the Chair to comment on the propriety of the specific question raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood, as your predecessor had occasion to comment and did in fact comment upon a similar question which was raised. There should be no misunderstanding, which perhaps the Chair might have had, about the intention of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton when he made his presentation on this specific matter.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, naturally I concur with the statement made by my colleague, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). I want to make it clear, Madam Speaker, that I was not asking you to reconsider a judgment which you had made just previously. I listened to the judgment. I suppose many counsel who appear before judges from time to time can be unhappy with the decisions but not disagree with them. Or, perhaps I wished the Speaker might have decided otherwise, but I recognize the rules of the House of Commons, that your word is supreme in these matters. My comment was not directed at your previous ruling. I want to make that absolutely clear.

Madam Speaker: I want to reassure the hon. member that what I was saying in French was and perhaps there was something lost in the translation while he was asking me to reflect on a commentary that is, the last time, I was a bit uneasy. I was referring to that in order to tell him now that, in general, I would not be inclined to comment on hypothetical situations. I am not referring to this one today. It is clear to me that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton was speaking precisely about the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood.

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Supplementary Estimates (C) of sums required for the service of Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981, and in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, was presented by Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Madam Speaker to the House.

Mr. Stevens: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I was wondering if the President of the Treasury Board could indicate if he intends to make a statement with respect to the supplementary estimates which have just been tabled.

Mr. Pinard: That is not the practice, no.

Mr. Johnston: No, Madam Speaker. There is no lock-up and no statement with respect to these supplementary estimates.

Hon. Yvon Pinard (President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Orders 58(15) and 59, I move:

That the Supplementary Estimates (C), 1980-81, tabled this day, be referred to the several standing committees of the House as follows:

Madam Speaker, since this is a very long motion which has been shown to the other House leaders, and which merely follows the allocations made with the Main Estimates and the previous Supplementary Estimates, may I suggest that Your Honour put the question as if it had been read?

Madam Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker—

Madam Speaker: Is the hon. member for York-Peel rising on a point of order?

Mr. Stevens: No, Madam Speaker. I am rising to speak on the motion. The reason I wanted to speak on the motion is that we have not seen the Supplementary Estimates today. Unfortunately, that is due to the fact that we had no lock-up, that we had no previous opportunity—

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Is the hon. member not aware of Standing Order 59 which says—

Mr. Stevens: We have a Speaker's ruling. She is hearing me.

Mr. Knowles: The standing order says this should be decided without amendment or debate.

Mr. Stevens: No. I have been recognized.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member sought the floor on a point of order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is probably quicker than I to recognize that the hon. member was debating. If he is debating I am afraid I cannot hear him.

Mr. Knowles: He said he was not on a point of order, that he wanted to speak to the motion.

Madam Speaker: Is the hon. member for York-Peel now rising on a point of order?

Mr. Stevens: Yes, Madam Speaker. My point is that if we review the motion which is now before the House proposing that various things be referred to standing committees, the one item which is not referred to is the Treasury Board estimates, because presumably there are no Supplementary Estimates (C) touching on the Treasury Board. I think this is most unfortunate because it will mean that we have no opportunity now to question the minister. He has declined to make a statement in the House. Presumably these are the last estimates he will be tabling with respect to spending for 1981.

The thrust of my point of order is simply to request if the government, through the House leader or perhaps through the President of the Treasury Board, would consider having a special reference made, for example, to the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee of his Main Estimates so that we could have a final, if you like, discussion and inquiry with him in respect of the 1981 fiscal year estimates.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, the alleged point of order raised by my colleague is actually a question, a request on his part for us to consent to include in Supplementary Estimates (C) an item which would allow him to question the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) in committee. I remind him, Madam Speaker, that the procedure established for the consideration of supply provides that the main estimates be sent to the various committees for three months. We have just tabled the main estimates for the coming fiscal year. So, if the hon. member wants to ask the President of the Treasury Board questions relating to the estimates for the year which is about to end, I think he has had ample opportunity to do so in the appropriate committee. In fact, since we have had two elections in less than a year, he has had nine months instead of three to do so. Now, we are not forced to do so; as he has said himself, no item relates to the Treasury Board in Supplementary Estimates (C) and we do not have to include such an item. We will consider his request, but as I said, he has had more time than usual in the last year. Even though we have complied with the Standing Orders, I will nevertheless discuss his request with the President of the Treasury Board and report to him in due time.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, if I may speak again on the same point of order, which is prompted by the House leader's comments. He says he will accept my word that the Treasury Board estimates are not referred to in Supplementary Estimates (C) which have just been tabled. It is not my word, it is his own motion. If he has not read his own motion I find it most amazing that he is proposing it.

My second point, Madam Speaker, is that the estimates he is referring to are next year's estimates—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It is becoming increasingly obvious that the hon. member is entering into debate. His point of order is not justified.

I must ask the House if it is the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion of the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): On a very short point of order, Madam Speaker. Can the President of the Privy Council assure the House that the references are in accordance with the usual practices and that there is nothing unusual about the committees to which the various items would be transmitted?

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Madam Speaker. In so far as I know everything is in accordance with usual practice. I assume my colleague had the opportunity in advance to look at the motion, and with his experience he would know that it is in accordance with practice.

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FEATHERBED FILE

Question No. 22—Mr. Cossitt:

What are the names of all persons who authorized the commencement of the Featherbed File including any person in the RCMP, the public service or any government branch and the name of any person who ordered the file to become dormant or made the decision that it become dormant in 1974-75 and specifically, did the fact that the file was first raised in the House of Commons by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville at the approximate time the file became dormant have any connection with the state of dormancy?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): The names of all persons who authorized the commencement of the Featherbed File including any person in the RCMP, the public service or any government branch are kept confidential for reasons of national security, pursuant to the government's policy on access to information. The name of any person who ordered the file to become dormant or made the decision that it become dormant is also kept confidential for the same reason.

The fact that the file was first raised in the House of Commons by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville had no connection with its state of dormancy.

No. Co-ordination is the responsibility of the head of post who is held accountable for the programs of departments in his or her area of jurisdiction. Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand? Stand.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask when we might expect an answer to No. 681. This question has been on the Order Paper for several weeks. It should not be a difficult question to answer. I would like to get this information in connection with studies carried out in Banff National Park at a reasonably early date.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I will try to get the information as quickly as possible. I cannot guarantee any particular date for any given answer, but I will do my best.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that notice of motion No. 40 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DIAND—COPIES OF REGULATIONS FOR PUBLICATION OF TENDER CALLS

Motion No. 40—Mr. Herbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all regulations and instructions in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, concerning the publication of tender calls for construction work, including all references to the amount and form of deposits that may accompany such tenders.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Briefly, Madam Speaker, I would like to refer to motion No. 38, which is a notice for the production of papers in regard to an air crash some years ago, which I put on the Order Paper for very valid reasons; the accident resulted in the death of a minister of national defence.

I was advised subsequently that the papers were missing, both by the National Archives and the Department of National Defence. Subsequent to that, I was contacted by the Privy Council office, which said that they had apparently been located. The papers are quite voluminous. The Privy Council office has made photocopies and is prepared to furnish them to me, but has pointed out that to do so would require that they be translated into both official languages, which is estimated to take approximately eight months and would obviously cost the taxpayers a great deal of money.

It is not my intention that this should happen, and the Privy Council office has suggested that if I am prepared to withdraw the motion, it would furnish photocopies of all the papers to me without having to go through the procedure of having them tabled in the House. So if the parliamentary secretary could assure the House that that meets with the approval of the government, I would be quite prepared to withdraw the motion later today.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, this is the first knowledge that I have had of any arrangements being made between the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt) and the Department of National Defence. I will consult with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne), because any document to be tabled in the House must be tabled in both official languages, as you well know, Madam Speaker. However, if a compromise can be worked out between the hon. member and the department, then I am sure that will meet with the satisfaction of all members. I will get back to him later.

Mr. Cossitt: It was not the Department of National Defence, although I realize that the ultimate responsibility might lie there, but it was the Privy Council office which made the proposal and dealt with my office. I suggest that the parliamentary secretary talk to the appropriate officials in the Privy Council office who have proposed this solution.

Mr. Collenette: Yes, I will undertake to do that. It is obvious that the hon. member has better access than I to some officials in the Privy Council office.

The Constitution

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise with regard to motions Nos. 42 and 43 which were filed January 21, regarding correspondence, telegrams and communications between cabinet ministers and/or their present staff and Amax Limited, and any correspondence, telegrams or communications exchanged between Mr. John Aird and cabinet ministers and /or their past or present staff regarding permits for Amax Limited at Alice Arms.

I recognize that some of these documents do in fact exist. There has been a substantial period of time enabling them to be put together and presented to me through the House. My concern is that the mining company now proposes to start dumping on April 1, just a few weeks from now. The Chairman of the scientific panel that was struck by the government, Dr. Winston Mayer, has now resigned, and it is extremely important that these documents be provided as soon as possible. I wonder if I could get a date? I had filed to have them provided by March 2, 1981. I think a couple of months should be sufficient time. I wonder if I could have some direction as to whether or not those will be available prior to the mine starting to dump on April 1.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, I am not aware of any of the circumstances arising from this notice of motion for the production of papers, only the fact that it is on the Order Paper. As I said in reply to the hon. member opposite, who questioned me about getting answers to questions, I cannot guarantee any particular answer will be given on any given day because of the time it takes to prepare such answers; but I will look into this particular matter.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings-Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to conclude my remarks of last evening on the constitutional debate.

Since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his government have been in power, and this has been much too long, Canada has suffered. Our economy has suffered. We have massive unemployment, inflation and high interest rates. We have had metric conversion and gun control imposed on us, along with a bilingualism policy not necessary in many areas of Canada. We have had an energy program imposed on us that reduces greatly our chances of energy self-sufficiency and leads us steadily down the road to socialism. We are still waiting for a budget to deal with the real issues facing Canadians.

We hear the need for the government constitutional proposals from a party that has done much to cause division and bad feelings across this country, from a party that cannot be said adequately to represent the various regions of Canada yet seems intent on forcing unpopular programs on the people. We hear reports of public deception by the Prime Minister and his government when they are apparently less than candid with the people of Canada. Many Canadians fought and died for our country and our system and they and their ancestors and the free world allies would likely be a little skeptical if they were told their system needed change by someone who perhaps did not take the opportunity to really stand up for his country at the time.

Mr. Speaker, the present government, on its record, has not earned the right even to consider unilateral patriation of an amended Constitution. The provinces and the people of Canada have had enough abuse from the present federal government, and any attempt by it to do something so controversial with something so very important must be viewed with suspicion.

Canada is a lot of things to a lot of people. It is our home. Few of us would want to leave here for anywhere else in the world, and at the same time many from other countries want to come and do come here to live in Canada. Canada is renowned for freedom, fair play and respect for the rule of law. Canada is ten provinces and two territories with a host of people from all backgrounds spread from sea to sea. We have an abundance of resources and much hope for the future. We have come a long way and we have a bright future ahead. Much of what we have today and our potential for the future stems from what we had in the past. That is a good system, an enduring system that is based on a constitutional monarchy and a democratic parliamentary system of government.

All of the good qualities that make up Canada did not happen in 54 years or 114 years, but evolved over centuries with the help of precedent, borrowing from systems that have been proven over time. We enjoy our rights. Through the parliamentary system, the common law and the Crown, we must ensure our time-honoured system of government prevails to serve us for the future. We must protect our system from slipping toward a socialistic system of government, as some feel we are heading towards. We must ensure that Canada does not become a unitary state as some feel we are heading towards. We must oppose these ideologies and work to preserve and improve the parliamentary federation we have now.

We must not forget that the government serves the people; it is not that the people serve the government. At least, that is how it has been in Canada and the free world and is exactly what we should work to preserve. Rights are not granted by any government but are created with the individual human being as inalienable rights. The people always have these rights regardless of how different governments approach them.

We have inherited a strong heritage in our system that respects and enforces rights and freedoms and, whether written down or not, we must ensure that we continue to observe these in the future. We must guard against those whose ideologies are suspect and who want to change Canada, whether for their own self-interest or the interest of a larger over-all philosophy in opposition to that of our traditions.

This can be done gradually under a smokescreen of rhetoric and charisma and that is exactly what Canadians must not be fooled by. Look back and look ahead and then look at the last 12 or 13 years our country has been under the spell of the present Prime Minister. Think of the self-imposed rush to change our time honoured Constitution and ask, "Why?".

Mr. Speaker, we cannot be in a blind rush to let the present government do any more real or potential harm to the future of our country. I am pleased to be part of a system which wants sincerely to maintain and build a better Canada by building on our present system and its strengths, not by unilateral and divisive change for the sake of change.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, I strongly support this resolution and I am very pleased that we are, at long last, bringing our own Constitution under our own control inside Canada. I believe that most of my constituents support this course of action as well. I am, therefore, honoured to take part and to make my contribution in this debate today. I believe in a strong Canada and I believe we need a strong federal government to have a strong country.

During Quebec's referendum campaign almost a year ago, a most impressive array of prominent people made pledges to people there about Canada's future. Members of Parliament, provincial premiers, municipal and local leaders, volunteer associations and service clubs, churches and schools, and private citizens all joined together to tell referendum voters that Canada is a vibrant country, a country ready to change, a country ready to remove irritants and a country ready to restore to everyone the full benefits of national unity.

Our debate today is a natural continuation of that campaign and of those pledges. We are acting on those promises. We are recognizing in these initial steps that we need the symbolism of self-control in our political life. We need the protections and the limits contained in the charter. We need the flexibility and the promise for change represented by the amending formula.

People in my part of Canada do not automatically associate this Constitution with that referendum, but, once reminded, they recognize we did indeed make promises that we must now fulfill. We know that honest people who voted with the majority for Canada now want us to hold up our end of the bargain. We also know that there are others who voted with the minority against Canada who are waiting in ambush in case we stumble or fail.

In a broader sense, people everywhere know that our work now is summing up a long and sometimes tedious history, a history of debate going back 50 years. Let us look at this summing up. Let us look at what we are offering. Our governments will continue to follow the guidelines contained in the old BNA Act. We need to alter these relationships very soon to get rid of the irritations created by an old fashioner document. We are not doing that, however, at this stage. Those refinements can come in the future after specific concrete negotiations. It is enough for now to settle on these familiar foundations.

These needed changes will happen soon, however, because we will be able to negotiate knowing that amendments are possible. The formula we are proposing offers everyone adequate safeguards. On the one hand, changes will be so politically challenging that the federal government will be forced to find suitable compromises. On the other hand, we will have enough flexibility to ensure that every provincial government sticks to the point during the negotiations and seeks the same compromises and the same balances. This gives us the chance to focus our future negotiations and to know that change is possible. Each side has some clout, so neither side can risk negotiating in bad faith. We have the opportunity to bring renewal and progress to our federation, to adapt to the future in good faith.

I believe in a strong central government for Canada. The alternative proposal for an amending formula put forward by the official opposition would greatly weaken the federal government.

Our formula allows debate, decisions by each province, regional and provincial approval, and then approval and application right across the country. Their formula would allow different proposals to have a different impact in different provinces, the famous checkerboard effect. Some critics have made a strong, emotional case for this idea and have argued that everything from traffic laws to pension reform is already in a checkerboard across Canada. That argument, especially with those kinds of examples, avoids the real point in this debate.

There are some rules that have to apply to everyone in Canada. We are looking at the fundamental rules of the game, not at minor regulations like automobile speed limits or negotiable government programs like pensions. The constitutional rules are so important that everything else stems from them. They must be the same everywhere. They cannot be ignored anywhere.

I cannot support, for example, any checkerboard or any opting out plan that can turn on or turn off my personal rights in different provinces. My freedom to worship is not a light switch that can be flicked on or flicked off by a provincial legislature. A handicapped person needs protections just as much in Ontario as in Manitoba. A woman's rights do not change just because she happens to be on the west coast instead of the east coast.

When we describe the charter of rights in this resolution, we are talking about fundamental freedoms. We are telling all of our governments, in city halls, in provincial legislatures and in this Parliament, that there are boundaries beyond which governments cannot go. We are saying that governments, not individual people, are limited. The charter we want must apply everywhere, not just in a few places with those who happen to find agreement convenient.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fisher: We need to keep our principles straight. We need to go back to our bedrock; our freedoms are too easily threatened. Protection is needed. That is why our charter is not going to be checkerboarded across Canada; our rights cannot be checkerboarded. Canadians, not just some Canadians, not just a few Canadians, all Canadians, enjoy the same rights.

As I mentioned a moment ago, we have a responsibility to act now. We also have the authority to act. We have heard a lot of rhetoric uttered about the process that we have used and about its effect on our goals. Some people have argued that we must have much greater support from the provinces for our actions. They seem to feel that the provinces are our equals, or that they are somehow even greater in importance than the federal government. They claim that our initiatives, our process, will tear confederation apart. I believe the opposite. I believe that we must act now. Our actions on this resolution can only strengthen our country. The federal government must be more than just one extra voice among the different governments in Canada, especially on constitutional matters. Action on the Constitution is our obligation. The final decision belongs here, in the Parliament of Canada.

Of course, we do have a partnership in confederation. Our provinces do have independent and respected roles to play. They do touch parts of our lives that should not be affected by the central government. Their views, accordingly, must be heard in a fundamental debate such as this. When the provinces refuse to act, however, or when the partnership breaks down, then we must act ourselves.

We should see each government's role properly, not in some artificially inflated fashion. The provinces cannot extend their independence into a veto. They cannot demand that we turn our consultations, our interdependence, into the last word in the debate. Alone, or as a block, the provinces can give us valued insights. They cannot, however, simply add up all their jobs and all their claims and then conclude—as they have done—that the final word and the final decision is theirs. This Parliament must still receive more than provincial advice. We must take that advice. We must then add it in with other reactions and consider a wide variety of national pressures. We must use our own judgment and come up with our own answers.

In this debate, the provinces have been challenged to change federal actions by offering a better case. They have had plenty of opportunity to participate in the changes that are happening. Instead, they lost sight of the great national need and they pressed only for the sake of their local satisfactions. They saw the same marvellous opening to act as we did, to create change at long last, but they suggested only more delays as their alternatives. They have been given their chances over the past year, and over the past 50 years to improve our national life. Now, when we act and accept this opportunity, we are being called arrogant, insensitive and one-sided.

Well, we were elected, to all sides in this House, to take this responsibility and not to abdicate it or to assign it away to some poorly defined coalition, whether that coalition be a premier's group or a collection of private individuals. The job is ours to do. In fact, if we do not act, if we back away from the job, then we will be signalling a terminal weakness in the federal government. We will be seen as unwilling or unable to act and to lead the country. We need a strong central government in Canada. We need federal leadership.

I believe we have assumed our responsibilities and that we have acted very, very well. When federal leadership has been needed, we have provided it. Members from all political parties can point to some aspect of this Constitution with pride in their contributions. Contrary to our critics' views, this process has succeeded.

We have brought this discussion to the whole country. Through debates in this House and in the committee, constitutional change has become a truly national issue. There has not by any means been agreement, but everybody has had a full opportunity to be heard either here or in committee. Everybody has had a voice, and television has helped to take these voices to the public and to make them extra effective. Judging by my mail, opinions have become well informed and very firm. People who write or who stop to talk to me on this issue feel their views are worth expressing and that we are listening. I want to repeat, in conclusion, how pleased I am to be a part of this debate.

We are taking the first steps to give ourselves the proper tools for our government. We are bringing our Constitution to Canada, giving it the vital limits in the charter and making it possible to bring renewal in the future.

We have to start using this tool right away. At the beginning of my comments, I referred to the Quebec referendum as a great motivation and a great commitment to satisfy. I could, as easily, have added remarks about remote northern territories, about clashes between the resource and the consuming provinces, about disparities between the rich and the needy regions and about dissatisfactions and imbalances between populated and rural areeas. We obviously have to go now to those people who have deep differences and deep grievances and start to repair our national unity.

We have taken these first steps and, in doing so, we have made the next, bigger steps easier ones to take. We know how change will happen. That clears away the debris and lets us focus on what change is best for all. We must shape our institutions and our governments to fit our new needs. In the past, we have been paralysed by our lack of proper tools. Now that we have given ourselves the equipment, we have to get on with the rest of the job.

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, like others, I am very proud to be taking part in this debate. I have felt for a very long time, in fact pretty well all my life, that one of the most important gaps in the Canadian Constitution, the British North America Act, has been the lack of a charter of human rights and freedoms binding on both federal and provincial legislatures. Therefore, when the constitutional proposals were introduced last fall, it was with particular pleasure that I noted there would be such a charter in this proposal.

It was, however, very discouraging when reading the fine print of the charter to discover how hastily conceived it had been and to what a large extent it had neglected the real needs of many Canadians. Indeed, in my speech in the House of Commons on October 23, I pointed out in particular that the charter, whatever its intent, did not guarantee women's human right to equality. It had used the very same phrases, such as equality before the law, that had been used in both common and civil law traditions and in the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights, which had been interpreted to mean equality in the administration of the law but not equality in the law itself and the very substance of the law. There were other deficiencies in the original proposals. That one, however, was so enormous that no woman in the country, or indeed any other group which had not hitherto been equal, could feel equality was being guaranteed.

Over the past several months one of the most exciting developments has been that Canadians have spoken. A very large number of Canadians have spoken to the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada, or have written submissions to it. When people say that this Constitution, and particularly this charter, is not being made in Canada, I really have to laugh. Not only is it being made in Canada by this Parliament, even more important than that, all the amendments introduced in January by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) were proposed and pressed by the people of Canada and their various important groupings, both provincial and nationwide.

Perhaps those of us in Parliament and in the legislatures tend to forget that a democracy consists of more than us, that there is perhaps not just two orders of government of vital importance in our democratic society, but a third order. This third order intervenes usually between elections, because the people themselves fundamentally guide us at elections. This order consists of groupings of individuals, economic groupings, cultural groupings, groupings based on ethnicity, religion or sex. These are powerful, dynamic and democratic groupings of people whose points of view we, as legislators and parliamentarians, ignore at our peril. It is from this part of our democracy we have been hearing in the past several months.

The wisest thing the government did was to allow television coverage of the constitutional hearings and an extension of time for briefs to be presented, both orally and in writing, to that committee. The authors of these briefs and submissions, these representatives of Canadians, are the ones who have had more to do than any of us with making this charter much stronger and better than that originally proposed. It is a very good one. These are Canadians who have done this. Even I was taken aback by the strength of their voices, particularly in the case of the briefs concerning women's human rights to equality and by the general agreement among all the groups on what amendments were needed. We are not talking about just a few Canadians having been heard, we are talking about groups representing thousands and thousands of Canadians.

May I remind the House that on the issue of improving the charter, so far as women are concerned, excellent far-reaching briefs were heard from the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women; the National Action Committee on the Status of Women; the National Association of Women and the Law; Indian Rights for Indian Women; the Canadian Committee on Learning Opportunities for Women; the Canadian Abortion Rights Action League; the Native Women's Association of Canada, and many more. These were just some of the groups who appeared before the committee. They represented women, and men too in some cases, not only as national organizations but as the umbrella group for many provincial and liberal associations.

In the written submissions, we heard from a large number of provincial status of women action committees, committees of women for constitutional change, many business and professional women's clubs: The Catholic Women's League, Federated Women's Institutes of Canada, the National Council of Women of Canada, and through it the provincial and local councils of women; the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, several provincial advisory councils on the status of women and, in some cases, municipal ones; the Vancouver Status of Women submitted an excellent brief; Women for Political Action; many branches of the YWCA as well as the National YWCA; several university clubs; a number of research centres; and a number of women's centres, including one very close to my riding, namely, the Port Coquitlam Women's Centre. This is only a partial list of the voices heard of Canadian women who wanted to see the charter entrenched but who wanted to see the best possible one entrenched. They did it. It is their charter, just as it is the charter of groups for other parts of the charter who were heard, whether it was the disabled and the handicapped, the aboriginal peoples, or representatives of our multicultural fabric. They too are responsible for, and share in, the creation of this amended charter, so I hope we will not hear any more about this charter not having been made in Canada by Canadians.

There was significant improvement in almost all 50 clauses of the government's constitutional proposals when the Minister of Justice brought his amendments forward in January. There were very significant improvements; there is no question about that. There is equally no question that further clarifications could be made. Further strengthening of certain clauses in the charter could be achieved. Again I am talking today primarily about those parts affecting women.

A number of valuable clarifications and strengthenings were proposed by the ad hoc conference on Canadian women and the Constitution, about which hon. members have heard a great deal. There was a tremendously successful meeting in Ottawa the weekend of February 14 attended by over 1,000 women. I will not go through all the groups in Canada that have endorsed the recommendations of that conference, but once again there are literally dozens and dozens of them. This reflects the keen interest and participation in the creation of this charter of Canadian women.

I hope all hon. members will read very carefully the further suggestions made by the ad hoc conference. These are all now available to all hon. members. I hope hon. members will look particularly at three of the suggestions because the women themselves would like to see them highlighted in the charter.

The first suggestion is that there be a general statement, either in Section 1 or perhaps in Section 25, that the rights and freedoms set out in this charter be guaranteed to men and women equally. This should be an overriding statement, making it clear, in case there is any doubt in Section 15 or anywhere else, that the rights apply fully, completely and equally to women and men alike. This is important for all women but, perhaps I should say, particularly important for native women. It is something on which I think there is agreement on all sides. I know it is one of two amendments we proposed in the constitutional committee which the Conservatives were willing to support.

I am therefore very hopeful that if the Conservatives do not propose it as an amendment, or if we do not get the opportunity to propose it as an amendment, the Minister of Justice will bring it in.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Jewett: The two others I would like to mention were not supported by either of the other two parties when the New Democrats introduced them in the committee. However, I think several members on the government side were willing at any rate to look at them very seriously. One is the use throughout the charter of the word "person" rather than "any individual", "anyone" or any of the other words being used. The word "person" should be used throughout the charter.

The other one has to do with Section 15(2), the affirmative action section of the equal rights provisions. The suggestion is that affirmative action programs which are to be allowed—indeed, encouraged—should relate to disadvantaged groups. It is not necessary to include individuals. In fact, it might be dangerous in some ways if we did.

The whole purpose of Section 15(2) is to ensure that the equality rights set out in Section 15(1) do not prevent any law, program or activity which has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged groups. However, unfortunately it says "disadvantaged individuals or groups" and thereby makes it possible that a single individual, as happened in the famous Bakke case in the United States, could get some advantage that the group of which he was a member already had in abundance, and thereby prevent an individual in another group from being able to be advantaged by an affirmative action program. One has to look at the condition and situation of a group as a whole, and if a group as a whole is advantaged then the fact that a single member of that group is not should not give him or her something special. When one looks at the group as a whole and discovers it is disadvantaged, then it is the group as a whole for whom the affirmative action program should be undertaken.

I stress this because the women I have talked with and with whom other Members of Parliament have talked as well—and there are many from all over Canada—feel that to ensure that the intent of the charter is carried out so far as women are concerned and, indeed, other disadvantaged groups are concerned, it is vitally important to make this deletion from Section 15(2).

A moment ago I mentioned that the New Democratic Party had during the course of the committee actually introduced all but one of the amendments which are now being proposed by the ad hoc committee on women and the Constitution, and we would be more than happy to introduce them all again, but this may be procedurally extremely difficult to do. If it is, I can only urge the government, and specifically the Minister of Justice—I am afraid I have given up on the minister responsible for the status of women—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Jewett: —with all the power at my command to seriously consider highlighting those three amendments I have mentioned and to look seriously at the others as well.

I am somewhat comforted because hon. members will remember that on February 20 in the House I asked the Minister of Justice about this possibility. He said, "It is not possible to have a perfect charter." These are the points of the women. Then he said, "If there is a possibility of more improvements, we will do our best to study all aspects of them". On an earlier day, on February 16, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that the additions, clarifications and further amendments are "probably very sensitive and worth-while additions." I say to the government: do not wait until the Tories support these amendments. I do not think they are going to do so, except for the one I mentioned first. They are paying lip service to them. Quite honestly, I have found no evidence that they are going to support them, let alone introduce them, although I encourage them to do so and I hope they will.

Unlike the people of Canada who have spoken, there are many parliamentarians and members of provincial legislatures who think we should wait until we have the Constitution back home with an amending formula before we start working on a charter of fundamental rights and freedoms. I become very upset when I realize that what these proponents are asking for is nothing. We will never, or not for 100 years perhaps, get a charter protecting our fundamental rights and freedoms if we wait until later. Women of Canada have said to me and to many others that if this is thrown into the battleground of federal-provincial conferences, we do not believe the 11 first ministers are going to give us our equality; we have no faith in it at all.

For example, if we look at what has happened in the United States we find that women there have been trying to get an equal rights amendment since 1924 and have not succeeded yet. Nor do I think that a constituent assembly is likely. I would like to see it, but I think it is unlikely it will come about. It is certainly not part of the Canadian historic tradition.

I would also like to make the point that at least some of us who read Canadian constitutional law believe the question of fundamental rights and freedoms is not part of Section 92(13) on property and civil rights. A charter of rights and freedoms is not a matter which can vary from one part of the country to another. It is something that is not strictly under provincial jurisdiction. The most important cases in the 1950s and 1960s—I am thinking of the Jehovah Witness case, the Roncarelli and the padlock law case—which had to do with civil liberties, freedom of speech, freedom of worship and freedom of assembly, or some aspect of our fundamental freedoms, denied that those freedoms were part of property and civil rights, and therefore under provincial jurisdiction. All those cases saw those rights as something that all Canadians must have, regardless of where they live. That being the case, we should look at the few cases there are concerning our rights and freedoms in Canadian jurisprudence.

In some ways, I suppose, it could be argued that it is amazing there are any such cases, since we have not had a charter of rights. Even the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), I think, is coming to the position that rights and freedoms are not something that you have, maybe, in Quebec but not in Alberta, or vice versa, they have to be everywhere. There are a few significant cases from which it becomes clear that substantially it is no infringement of provincial jurisdiction at all. I wish we would stop talking as if we thought it was an infringement of provincial jurisdiction to have a charter of rights and freedoms entrenched in our Constitution.

Another argument one sometimes hears is that, with a charter of human rights and freedoms, we are replacing legislative supremacy by judicial supremacy. There is no doubt there will be more litigation, but may I remind the House—I am sure that members do not need this reminder, but may I do so anyway—that the courts have been interpreting our rights and freedoms under the common law, or under the civil law in the province of Quebec, for years and years. It is not a matter of the courts not interpreting our rights and freedoms all this time; they have been doing so under common law or under statutory law. As I pointed out a moment ago, even under the BNA Act, in a few monumental cases they have been interpreting our rights and freedoms. We are not going from something called legislative supremacy to judicial supremacy. There will be more litigation, there is no question, but the important thing which this charter has made a major effort to do since the people of Canada were heard from is to ensure that a clear signal is given to the courts about what freedoms and rights we want to have protected, and, above all, in the area in which I am particularly interested, a clear signal has been given now, I think, that we want equality for men and women in the very substance of the law itself.

Miss Jewett: A moment ago, I spoke about the people who say "wait until later" and I argued that we will wait forever. There is a lot of talk about the amending formula. No doubt it is somewhat more flexible than the rule of unanimity which, of course, would be a complete straitjacket, as we all know. The proposed amending formula is somewhat more flexible. It asks for an amendment to the Constitution to be supported by regional majority, and it divides Canada into four regions. Personally I think it is still pretty inflexible. Any region will be able to veto any amendment. As I say, it is not as bad as unanimity, of course, but I do not see how anyone can think it will result in very many amendments.

● (1650)

That may well be as it should be. But some people would argue that a federal system, particularly relating to the division of powers—and the charter has nothing to do with the division of powers—should not be too flexible; it should be really tough to get an amendment. I think it will be very tough, indeed, and I do not see much likelihood of many amendments getting through quickly. Therefore, those who are putting all their hopes on amendments coming through are misplacing their hopes.

I should like to say a word or two about the amending formula. A good many of my constituents are very interested in and concerned about the amending formula. As I understand the Constitution, the proposed amending formula, whereby there must be a majority in each of the four regions to support an amendment, is not necessarily the last word. If the legislators, premiers and all of us come up with a better alternative formula during the two years after the proposals are patriated and when unanimity is required, it is my understanding the people of Canada could then choose between the regional majority formula and whatever alternative was presented.

I, for one, will work very hard to have a five-region formula established in Canada. I know I will have lots of support from my British Columbia and northern colleagues in the New Democratic Party. We in British Columbia feel very strongly that British Columbia is a distinctive region and that we constitute a fifth region of this country. If there is to be a different amending formula, as an alternative to the one proposed now, many of us will work toward having a five-region formula. I do not know whether we will have the support of other provinces. If we are to present an alternative to the one in the constitutional proposals which we are patriating, certainly it must be agreeable to the other provinces. It is our job as representatives of British Columbia to see if we can make it possible. In any event, I remind the House that there is an opportunity in the two years following the patriation of the Constitution for us to get cracking, put forward our alternative amending formula and try to do a selling job on other parts of the country.

In conclusion, I emphasize how important the whole process has been, particularly the hearings of the constitutional committee which allowed, permitted and encouraged Canadians in all walks of life to have an input in the charter of human rights. As Canadians I think we can all be incredibly proud of that achievement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Jewett: It is for this reason we all know in our hearts that this charter, particularly the amendments as a result of the input of the people of Canada, and the amendments we still hope will be made, is a charter created by Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, may I first be allowed to say how happy I am to see the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) occupy the chair, and I hope that the people of the Madawaska Republic will appreciate the fact that it is the duty of their representative to make sure that our standing orders are being observed.

I will now come to the heart of the matter, Mr. Speaker. I feel privileged to have the opportunity to discuss today in the House a matter of the utmost importance for our country, for all its inhabitants and perhaps still more for our children. This great debate on the Canadian constitution began some years ago. We have now reached the stages of implementation. A great many things have been said throughout the years, but very few things have been done. This government has now decided that the time has come to set in motion the appropriate mechanisms which will enable our count to renew itself and to continue to be one of the finest countries in the world. It is obvious that this debate could be lengthy. Presently, we are considering an amendment dealing with the referendum introduced by the official opposition. This amendment, as many others which could be moved by that same party, is only an excuse to extend the debate.

I cannot say that I have any complaint about that, Mr. Speaker, because as the debate proceeds we get to know the different positions held by the various parties in the House. The clearer the positions, the better we can see what hon. members really have in mind. This is important, because a country consists of a group of human beings living in a specific geographic area, goodwill and good relations rather than confrontations are essential among its inhabitants whatever their differences may be. I have to add, however, Mr. Speaker, that I am extremely disappointed by comments I heard in the House because they pained and shocked me but the more I consider them, the more they pain me rather than shock me. I am referring to the statements made last evening in the House by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart). I would like to quote a few. Here is what one can read in the official English version of Hansard on page 7858, and I quote:

> Many of my colleagues have pointed out the history of this great Canada: the Quebec act of 1774, the constitutional act of 1791 and Lord Durham's report. They recognized the fact that the Quebec act and the constitutional act gave to French Canadians rights which were the most enlightened of their time. Unfortunately, no one pointed out that the Durham report recommended the union of Upper and Lower Canada and the use of one federal language, English. Had this been adhered to, we would not be having this acrimonious debate in the House today.

I shuddered when I heard those first words, but when we think about it we realize that there is room for interpretation. So I said to myself that perhaps the hon. member did not mean what he said. A few lines further I read another sentence and that one meant a lot of things:

> The bilingualism and biculturalism policies of this government have served only to act as an abrasive in English-speaking Canada.

I heard those words spoken here in the House where 284 sitting members represent millions of Canadians in the best interest of each and every one of our fellow citizens, and in all serenity. I heard those words spoken here in this House.

An hon. Member: Unbelievable!

Mr. Gimaïel: It is sheer nonsense!

Did one French-speaking member in this House recall all the hardships which francophones have had to put up with in this country over the past 100 years? Canada is a beautiful and great country because there were men who could understand one another. Some francophones have made tremendous sacrifices to be Canadians. That is why our country was built in harmony and with understanding and mutual respect, and I know that anglophones as well had a part to play, I know that there were anglophones who worked hard to build this country. I also know that they have shown respect for their French-speaking fellow citizens, but I think that in the debate we are holding now there is no room for nasty political partisanship, particularly when it smacks of racism, if we are to concentrate on building the country. I would be interested to hear the hon. member for Simcoe South say that he was voicing the opinion of all his constituents when he spoke in the House last night. I am sure that such is not the case and I would point out to him and to some of his colleagues that when he has the floor in the House he is not expressing the views of the Progressive Conservative Party but those of hundreds of thousands of people whom he represents here. That is his job and that is what he is paid for. I want to quote another sentence, and that one does not leave room for interpretation:

> National bilingualism is unnatural, undesirable, unwelcome and it is one of the central causes of national disunity.

We hear those words which bring us back to the days of Lord Durham who had been sent to Canada by England so he could look after our problems. As a member of the House I am asking myself what do the people I represent here want me to do. Do they want me to build a new country or to try to initiate a power struggle throughout Canada so that English- and French-speaking Canadians will be for ever arguing with one another? That is not what the people want.

I come from a 100 per cent francophone constituency, where the people are proud of what they are, proud of this individuality, proud of their language and of their property, proud of their culture. However, above everything else, they love their country. What they love most of all is to be able to get along with those with whom they live. What they love most of all is the peace that they can offer their children. What they love most of all is the peace they have enjoyed all their lives. Mr. Speaker, it is not with such speeches that we can provide this security for Canadians. Since the beginning of this debate, the positions of each party have become quite clear. The New Democratic Party said: Fine, we agree to patriate the Constitution and we agree with the charter of rights—indeed, they worked quite hard to have this charter amended—ans we also agree on the amending formula. However, there are certain things that we would like to see and that we feel are important for those we represent. We would like certain things in the area of energy, and so on.

I respect such a position as it is based on the wishes of the population. However, I am having serious doubts about the position of the Progressive Conservative Party. First of all, we have been told that the Conservatives were against unilateral patriation. Then, we were told that they wanted patriation, but without the charter of rights and without the proposed amending formula. We were told that they wanted to amend the charter of rights and were opposed to patriation. They also proposed amendments to the status of women and many other provisions. Then, they asked which formula was the right one. They said it was the Vancouver formula. Last weekend, it proved to be the wrong one, since a two thirds majority is sufficient to have an amendment passed. This formula includes the two third majority rule as well as opting-out and opting-in provisions, and we saw at the last Tory convention the results of a two third majority with opting-in and opting-out provisions. It is clear that their party is out of whack. But let us be serious. In this context, I must conclude that everything the Conservatives now put forward as their position is simply aimed at obstructing our work.

An hon. Member: They are divided!

Mr. Gimaïel: On a point as serious and as basic to our country as language and the bilingualism policy, I am asking one thing, and it is simply this: If the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Simcoe South does not reflect that of the Progressive Conservative Party—

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Gimaïel: —I ask the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to do what his predecessor, the Hon. Bob Stanfield did in the case of the then hon. member for Moncton, and to expel the hon. member for Simcoe South from his party!

● (1700)

[English]

I would like to say this to hon. members in English. I would like to ask the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to do what is necessary, as the former leader of the opposition, Bob Stanfield, did when he expelled the member for Moncton because he did not support the view of the party with respect to the bilingual policy in Canada. I ask the Leader of the Opposition to do the same thing with the member for Simcoe South, if he was not expressing the view of his party. I ask him to do no less than that. Then we will know the truth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gimaïel: If he does not do so, this means the member for Simcoe South expresses the view of his party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Gimaïel: I am pretty sure, however, that he will not do that, and I should like to explain why. First of all, is not the hon. Leader of the Opposition the man who, during a visit to Chicoutimi, signed the famous petition which the Quebec separatist government had been circulating throughout Quebec for the past six months?

[English]

Is he not the man who signed the petition the Quebec government made and circulated throughout the province for the last six months? Yes, they did it in Chicoutimi. The Leader of the Opposition did that.

Is it possible for us to say at this time that this party indeed has a policy promoting a bilingual and united Canada? No! In this respect, I should like now to direct my remarks especially to my own constituents. As residents of the Lac-Saint-Jean riding, you have certainly heard Quebec Premier René Lévesque make the following statement: "We are indeed lucky to have the Progressive Conservative Party fighting for our interests in the House of Commons." If that is what you mean when you talk about fighting for the interests of Quebecers in the House of Commons, Mr. Lévesque, just keep on babbling and try to convince everybody that you yourself are fighting for Quebecers.

I, for one, can tell you that I am proud to be here to represent my constituents and to help build our country instead of trying to break it up as you are doing, Mr. Lévesque. Let me tell you that I need not associate with people who make speeches such as this one to convince the people of the Lac-Saint-Jean riding that I am working for them. Mr. Speaker, I feel the time has come for Quebecers to be told the truth about what is going on with regard to the constitutional renewal we are now launching. In Quebec, we have been accused of selling out the province, of betraying Bill 101, of changing the Constitution unilaterally, of everything imaginable. That has been said about the 75 Members of Parliament from Quebec, all the while insisting that we are acting like sheep. That is important.

There is one thing I want to tell the people of Quebec right now, and especially the people of my riding and that is that, as hon. members of the Government of Canada, we are not really changing the Canadian Constitution but preparing the context needed or desirable to change it in fact. This means, in simple terms, since I am an ordinary man, that we are in the process of asking the British government to send us back our Constitution so that 11 first ministers, the ten provincial premiers and the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) can sit around a table and discuss what changes are necessary so that our country can better meet the needs of the Canadians of today and those of tomorrow. At the same time, we tell our friends on the other side of the river or the ocean: Enshrine a charter of rights in that Constitution. You may say: But why a charter of rights? Very simple. Renewing a Constitution is renewing a country. It may even mean changing all the rights, all the laws that govern Canadians.

In that context, as representative of the 80,000 citizens who live in the riding of Lac-Saint-Jean, I shall never accept that 11 first ministers, even if they are great Canadians, including the Right Hon. Prime Minister, should play around with the Canadian constitution and change it without first making sure that the fundamental rights of the people I represent are protected by a charter of rights enshrined forever in the Constitution. Of course, that is not perfect. But those who tried to achieve perfection at one fell swoop, do you know what they do in life? Nothing at all. Perfection cannot be achieved at first go. In addition, both a referendum formula and an amending formula will be included in the Constitution to prevent any systematic deadlock. We are not going to spend another 20 years of our life quibbling over that, wondering where we are going, what we are going to do. We have to find a solution to the Canadian constitutional problem. Our Constitution just has to be renewed because, as we know, when it was drawn up, there were no television, no airplanes; transportation even by road was much slower.

So many things have changed in this country. And so quickly. That is all we are about to do. To those who shout rape and treason, and those who come up with all sorts of arguments saying that we are betraying Quebec, I say that for the first time in the history of Canada, the rights of francophones to education in their own tongue, to their language, recognition of the French fact will be enshrined in the Constitution of Canada and no one, no prime minister, no government can change that without the consent of the Canadian people. Is that not a step forward?

I have seen very frustrating things happen in my riding, among others. We have all heard of the notorious petition which I mentioned earlier, the solidarity movement or whatever, which has been going around Quebec for the past six months. The signatures were to be gathered within a month and sent to all of us members from Quebec, challenging us to act according to the will of the people. I have seen how they operate. The people responsible for this petition tried first of all to go everywhere. When that did not work they went to the schools, but that did not work either. They asked the FTQ to help them and, like any good union they agreed and said, "Yes, Mr. Minister, we will do it." The FTQ had people sign it. But that did not work either. People were forced to sign. They were told to sign. No, thank you. Sign. After trying ten times, people signed. People were also told that if they did not sign, they were not genuine Quebecers. How great! What does that mean? That seems to imply that there are two classes of Quebecers. I am beginning to wonder about those two classes of Quebecers. I will give you an example.

If I had to choose between being a fake Quebecer like the Minister of Justice who went to Washington two years ago and addressed the World Bank, in French only, and being a genuine Quebecer like the Premier of Quebec, Mr. Lévesque, who two months after being elected delivered a speech entirely in English in New York, I would choose the former. He spoke two words in French: Saint-Félicien and Baie James, two projects, by the way, which he considered as political balloons before coming to power. I personally prefer being a fake francophone who speaks French in Washington than a genuine one who speaks English in New York. For sure. If being a fake Quebecer means deciding, like the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) did with his colleagues, to purchase F-18 fighters which will bring $1.5 million to Quebec, I prefer being a fake Quebecer rather than a genuine Quebecer like René Lévesque who buys $11 million worth of buses from General Motors in the U.S. rather than from Bombardier, in Québec.

I would rather be a fake Quebecer in that context. We do not need arm-chair Quebecers any longer. The drawing room days are gone when the intellectuals, the intelligentsia, were luring everybody in the province of Quebec, saying we all were going to rebuild this country, and perhaps by putting everything aside we were going to build another country which would be much better, a much better home to live in. Even if we have to keep outside in the cold for another ten years there would be nothing to it. We are going to build another country afterwards. Those days are over; all that silly talk is over. It is time now to act. Now we have people who sit down and discuss.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) is often blamed for not having held consultations. But I saw what happened last summer. After Quebecers had given their answer to the referendum held by the Parti Québécois, after Quebecers had said no, one of them, the same one who built Bombardier, the same man who built Canadair, stood up and said: "Let me deal with that, Pierre. I do not like the subject, I have never wanted to build a career around it but let me deal with it. I shall go and see the premiers, we shall see what they are made of." He went around and met the premiers and what answers did he get? Mr. Sterling Lyon, the Premier of Manitoba, came to Ottawa and said he did not want a charter of rights. In 1980, a charter of rights, ugh! There is no use for that, it is simply insulting the people. There is no need to protect the rights of the citizenry but the rights of the provinces should be written into the Constitution. Let us protect ourselves, but the citizenry needs no protection.

We have to understand what is happening. We want an answer from Alberta but we just had it. The best way to be a Canadian is to say to the Canadian people: You need oil? We will no longer sell you any because you are not paying us the right price.

I remember reading in history books that if eastern Canadians had reacted in the same manner in the past Canada would not be the strong country it is today, it would not have survived.

A fact remains, it is impossible to believe that the premiers meant business at the bargaining table. They did not. Their political strategy was quite simple, namely to attack the Canadian government, to debate the constitution issue in order to focus public attention away from the provincial opposition, to be on hot lines or appear before the TV cameras with representatives of the Government of Canada because when people have to vote they can only vote for them because their opponents are the provincial parties, never the Liberal Party of Canada. But in this great debate, the provincial parties have not had their say because such were the rules of the game. That is over now. We have now come to the bottom line. We are now creating the necessary conditions in which a change can be made.

Later, the provincial premiers will come and sit with the Prime Minister of Canada and will build a new country on behalf of all Canadians. And in this regard, I can assure you, my constituents, that my deepest thoughts are for you and most of my work here is directed toward safeguarding your interests. That is why I attended more than 15 sittings of the committee on the Constitution and why I want to watch closely what is happening, because whatever happens in Canada in the years to come, whatever changes are made to our Constitution, I can swear to you that nobody will ever fiddle with your basic rights, nobody will ever deprive you of what your fathers and ancestors have fought for, because the responsibility you have invested in me is precisely to protect those rights, and this is what I am doing along with my colleagues. On their behalf, I simply say to you that if we vote for this resolution, it is because our country's future is built on success, on change, and because we, as your representatives in Parliament, are ensuring that your interests and those of your children are protected.

In this regard I say to the government which is now involved: Go ahead! This country will be more beautiful because some honest and stouthearted men have worked on behalf of the anglophones, the francophones and the native people as well as of all the others who have built this country and helped to make it even more beautiful and more honest. I would ask my colleagues in the opposition to think more about their constituents instead of being concerned with an as yet undefined position for which their party is trying to drum up support.

[English]

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to rise on this occasion and take part in this debate. I know that Mr. Speaker will take it with appropriate good humour when I say I have been waiting this afternoon for some time. I must say that this has given me the opportunity to hear three very interesting speeches, two from my friends and colleagues on the government benches and one from a British Columbia friend and colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett). I think hon. members will agree that in all the speeches there was a combination of thoughtfulness, passion and certainly a very great amount of conviction. I see some of my friends on the government side nodding in assent.

The hon. member who wins the prize for passion this afternoon, of course, is my friend the hon. member for Lac Saint-Jean (Mr. Gimaïel) who certainly left us in no doubt about what he thought on this subject. I am not sure whether my hon. friend dealt with some of the other matters of very great concern but he left me in no doubt about his feelings which are very sincerely held.

I may be forgiven if I point out that the speech of which he complains sounds suspiciously familiar, and I had a chance to look at it. It is similar to speeches made by the former member for Crowfoot who later, because it was politically advantageous to the Liberal Party, was brought into the bosom of the Liberal cabinet. I know that my good friend will not mind if I point that out. It may give him a chance to make another speech.

The speech of the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) was restrained and concentrated on one aspect of the debate, the charter of rights, as did the speech of the hon. member for New Westminster. That is a legitimate subject in this debate but, while I think the charter of rights is very important, and I am sure hon. members will agree that with other hon. members I worked very hard to make it a better charter of rights than it started out, it is not the only aspect of this debate.

Before I get into that subject, Mr. Speaker, I want to mention a couple of other matters that give me great pleasure. The first is to offer my congratulations to the co-chairmen of the joint committee on the Constitution on which I had the privilege and responsibility of serving. I think especially of the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal) who throughout the proceedings exhibited a great deal of competence, justice and fair play. In fact, he was so objective I thought when it came his turn to speak in the House he might adopt some of the views we had expressed to him. We found that he had other things on his mind, however, and cut off from the constraints on his almost quasi-judicial position, he managed to find something to say in support of the government's views on this particular measure. That did not surprise me but I think it ought to be recorded that while I do not agree with what he said after he ceased to be a co-chairman, with others I compliment him on his very fine deliberations on behalf of all of us as co-chairman of that committee.

I want also to pay a tribute to one of my colleagues, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp). I think all hon. members will agree that he conducted himself throughout the proceedings of the constitutional committee with dignity, competence and a measure of patriotism to which all of us aspire and can understand.

I want to say something else because there are honest views held in this chamber and in this country which are very different views. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) had the courage on October 2 last to say that not everybody agreed with the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) package and had the courage to say no. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition has been proven right in that fundamental decision over and over again during the weeks of deliberations that have taken place. Certainly he has been right about the reaction of the Canadian people.

One of the things that plagued this consideration of a new constitution has been the fact that many members of the public have been critical of politicians for acting like politicians, for being partisan. A letter which appeared in The Globe and Mail on February 24, 1981, had this to say:

> Much of the debate in the House and elsewhere is blatantly partisan, and (possibly wrongly with the more sincere presentations) gives the appearance of being more concerned with the paramountcy of different levels of government than it is with what a new constitution will or will not do for the people of Canada.

The citizen who wrote that letter has every right to his opinion but I have to say in answer to that citizen and others who have written in a similar vein, being equally critical of all sides, that these deliberations were placed in a highly partisan cockpit. That was the decision of the government. It was a stacked deck. The package was imposed unilaterally in early October on the Canadian people and was not a consequence of 53 years of discussion and deliberation.

It behooves members of the Liberal government who claim that this is something we have been discussing for 53 years to go through the record and see how much has been discussed for 53 years. They will find very little. It is true there have been discussions about an amending formula but until recently we never heard about a referendum, a charter of rights and other things being discussed. The elimination of the power of the Senate as the last defender of the provinces was never discussed. The shibboleth that this has been going on for 53 years and has to be settled by July 1 is just that, a shibboleth. I would ask all fairminded members on the government side, and there are many, to keep that in mind. I would ask them to pay attention to the fact that although it is true there were meetings, the public was not involved in those meetings until this party, with the help of some members of the New Democratic Party, opened up the proceedings to television and radio.

Most of the discussions that have taken place between the federal government and the provinces were held in secret, as were the documents. It is a mistake to say that we have been debating this publicly for all these years.

Mr. LeBlanc: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I happened to be the press secretary who opened federal-provincial conferences to television with Mr. Pearson in 1968. Since that time most federal-provincial conferences have been held in front of the television cameras.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, may I answer the minister by saying that some parts of them have been public.

Mr. LeBlanc: Most of them.

Mr. Fraser: Some of the key parts were not, however. Why are all the arguments taking place about what was agreed upon and what was not? Most of it, or a significant part of it, was not done publicly. Until a few months ago, most people would not have known what the Victoria formula was all about so let us not pretend the Canadian public has had a long period of involvement.

Let us look at the atmosphere which existed when discussion on the resolution began. As I said, it was placed in a highly partisan cockpit. The wonder is that hon. members rose to their duty and the occasion, and that it was as civilized as it turned out. Remember, and I say this to the public which is watching, this was a highly partisan operation.

In the first place, it was created by closure in the House of Commons. That is not a very good way to start a debate about the way we ought to improve the basic laws under which we live. At first, radio and television coverage was not allowed. It was only allowed after tremendous opposition on the part of the Conservative Party and some members of the New Democratic Party. The committee was not allowed to travel. If some members from central Canada wanted to know how people in the west really feel, why did they not travel? I would hate to think it was because someone did not want them to find out. They would have learned a lot. Some of them have not learned yet.

• (1730)

Mr. Fraser: The members are not travelling now. They are sitting in Ottawa. If anyone thinks people in western Canada believe that Ottawa is listening to them, they are wrong.

Then there was the ridiculous time limit of December 9. After a tremendous battle, that was extended. This must be the strangest committee or joint committee which has ever been established. They voted to limit the number of experts on the subject being discussed who could appear before the committee. This has been a highly partisan debate. If anything, it has been a highly partisan structure.

Let us look at what the other place is doing. The Senate began its debate, because it is controlled by government members, before the House of Commons finished its debate. That is surely a most extraordinary bit of conduct on the part of the Senate.

Mr. Evans: It is not unusual at all.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. member says it is not unusual. I cannot imagine a debate on the fundamental laws of our country taking place here and proceeding at the same time in the Senate. That is incredible. The debate should have taken place here and then the Senate, exercising its prerogative, could have taken a look at what we had done.

Mr. Blais: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fraser: You will have your chance to speak later.

Mr. Blais: The hon. member is suggesting that the joint resolution ought to be dealt with first in the House of Commons and then in the Senate, seriatum. Is he implying that in terms of the joint committee, of which he was a member, he wanted the Senators excluded?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): That is not a point of order.

Mr. Fraser: It is not even a good question. I will go down the list of the Senators from the province of British Columbia. Senator Bell was asked to vote on whether the senate should proceed while we were still debating. That Senator was not there. Senator Lawson said it was perfectly all right to go ahead with the debate. So did Senator van Roggen, Senator Williams, Senator Perrault and Senator Austin.

Mr. Evans: I rise on a point of order. Unless I am mistaken, I believe it is out of order to refer to proceedings currently going on in the other place.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. member just proved my point. Apparently we in this chamber are not allowed to make reference to what is going on in the other chamber because it is going on at the same time. You want to close us off with closure, close us off with no TV and radio, and time limits and now with a procedural rule, you put us in a Catch 22 position. The hon. member just proved the point I am making.

An hon. Member: We only get 20 minutes.

Mr. Fraser: Somebody on the government side says they only get 20 minutes. That is something worked out by their House leader. If they are complaining about the time they are allotted, they should complain to their own people.

Let me give another classic example of the partisanship which existed. What happened on the question of property rights? The committee was clearly promised by a minister of the Crown that a property rights amendment by the Conservative party would be allowed. That was overruled a few days later. If anyone wants to know how partisan this has been, they can look at the words of the Prime Minister when speaking in Vancouver. Despite all the efforts of the NDP, even though they were misguided, to try to co-operate with the government, the Prime Minister said this:

> "We've managed to split the NDP right down the middle between those who love freedom and justice more and the Liberals less . . . and those who hate Liberals more and love freedom and justice less".

An extraordinary statement in an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press said:

> That statement stinks of everything that is wrong with Mr. Trudeau's approach to the Constitution: its arrogance, its narrow partisanship and its sheer dishonesty.

I think I made the point that the debate on this resolution started off in a partisan manner. It has maintained a considerable degree of partisanship since. If this is going to be done by one party with a majority, rather than go through any kind of forum, it will be partisan. I am sorry if the public is upset about it, but the public ought to know why this is so.

What is the real issue in this debate? The issue is whether what we are doing is being done in the right way another, if so, is it the right answer. Mr. Justice O'Sullivan, one of the dissenting judges in the Manitoba case, said this:

> —the Attorney General of Canada ends up in the proposition that a political party, if it forms the majority of both houses of the Canadian Parliament, has the power to amend the Constitution of our country as it pleases.

That was basically the position of the government lawyers in the court. In addition, it is the position in this, the highest court, with the vast majority of government speakers. Somebody referred to the province of Quebec and the promises made to that province during the referendum. Was that the promise made to the province of Quebec? I ask hon. members on the government side, especially those from the province of Quebec, whether that province was told during the referendum debate in that province that the federal government would come to the House of Commons and ask for the right to unilaterally change the Constitution of Canada? There is not a member in this House from the province of Quebec who can answer yes to that. They know the answer is no. Of course, Quebec was never told that. If that had been the basis of the campaign a few months ago to keep Quebec in confederation, the vote would have gone the other way.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): What did Ryan say?

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Ryan did not appear before the constitutional committee. He did speak to the press gallery, pointing out how dissatisfied he was with the process and how wrong it was. He said something else that was interesting, and which cuts through to the problem in this debate. He said that western separatism is more dangerous than Quebec separatism.

When I returned to the constitutional committee a few hours later, I was asked to comment on Mr. Ryan's statement. I said I would. I said we had been here for a half a dozen years telling everyone that, but nobody would listen. The difficulty in terms of understanding between the centre of this country and the west is that until Mr. Ryan said there is a danger with regard to western separatism, nobody asked a western member of Parliament about it. That is the problem.

Some say that other problems in the country should not arise in this constitutional debate. However, when I hear people on a phone-in program in Ottawa advocating that we send troops to Alberta to take the oil, then I say there is trouble in this country.

Mr. Justice O'Sullivan went on to say:

> What is proposed by the resolution which is the subject of this reference is that the majority of both houses of Parliament should invoke this legally unlimited power of the United Kingdom Parliament not only to "patriate" our Constitution but also first to change the Constitution in fundamental respects before patriating it.

● (1740)

Was that ever said to the people of Quebec during the referendum? Of course not, because one could not have held an audience if it had been said and certainly hon. members opposite could not have won the referendum, although I am glad they did. The government did not do it by publishing these things. It talked about change and addressing the needs of the French-speaking people of Canada and the province of Quebec. That was legitimate. But these kinds of statements were never put because any Quebecer worth his or her salt knows that is the very thing which has always concerned the people in the province of Quebec; that a federal government can move unilaterally to change the rules, because that puts Quebec, which is a minority and which has special things to be protected, in a position of very grave difficulty.

Mr. Justice O'Sullivan went on to say:

> —but I find it difficult to understand how the Attorney General of Canada can assert that the Imperial Parliament remains supreme and sovereign over Canada, bound only by a "convention" which has no force of law and which it can legally disregard as it pleases.

Did anybody during the Quebec referendum tell Quebecers that the general principle, enunciated by Prime Minister St. Laurent, that right hon. gentleman, also contained in the government white paper of 1965, that no major amendment which affected the powers and the distribution of powers in this country ought to be made unilaterally by a federal government, was going to be changed? That was never put to anyone in Quebec. If anyone can find a speech where any leading member of any party, and certainly in the government party, went to Quebecers and said that was what they intended doing, then I will apologize publicly. But that was not the thesis upon which Quebec was told to vote "no."

Mr. Justice O'Sullivan continued by saying this:

> To hold that the United Kingdom Parliament has still the legal power to alter the fundamental structure of our confederation without the consent of its constituents would be to decline to give effect to constitutional principles and practices that are by now well settled.

I could go on.

That is what the issue was all about. I happen to believe that Mr. Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights should have been entrenched. I happen to believe that some rights should be entrenched. I also happen to believe that if changes are to be made in the fundamental laws of Canada, we must respect our partners. Respecting our partners is not to ignore them or for the federal government to decide it is right and they are wrong. I ask hon. members to give me an explanation of why the government is in trouble in the west.

Here is an article by Mr. Gordon Gibson. Mr. Gordon Gibson, just so hon. members on the government side will remember, worked in the Prime Minister's office for some years. Three times since then he has run as a Liberal candidate in British Columbia and has been defeated. I have the highest regard for Mr. Gibson. I was one of those who had to run against him. Then he was elected to the British Columbia legislature and became the leader of the B.C. Liberal party. He is also the person who made promises in writing that if the Liberal government was successful in the 1980 campaign there would be no export tax on B.C. gas.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Remember that promise.

Mr. Fraser: He is the one who was betrayed by the minister of energy—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): And the whole government.

Mr. Fraser: —only a few weeks later when I raised the matter in the House. This is what Mr. Gibson said only a few weeks ago:

> What sort of mentality could plan to impose a new constitutional system—the very basis of our rules for living together—impose it through a procedure rejected not only by most provincial governments, but by an overwhelming majority of the people as well?

My goodness, why is it that the Liberal government wrings its hands and wonders why it cannot elect anyone in the west? That article is by the former leader of the Liberal party in British Columbia.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The betrayed leader.

Mr. Fraser: There has been a lot of talk about a checkerboard. My party has been accused of offering a process different from that proposed by the government respecting a charter of rights because that process would create a checkerboard. I do not have to tell hon. members why there is a checkerboard. I am not talking about different places where stop signs or speed limit signs are put, I am talking about much of what goes on in this country. I am reminding hon. members that the British North America Act was a checkerboard. Whenever we put up a proposal to get people to agree to the charter of rights which has come from the committee, and will probably come from these proceedings, hon. members opposite say we should not do this by persuasion, that we should not go to the public and to the legislatures to get agreement. We are criticized because there is a possibility of a checkerboard. In fact, the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam, a very distinguished lady, said she has given up all hope that it will ever come about.

Let me remind hon. members on the government side that they have left the biggest checker on the board, and let me remind them what it is. In order to gain support in central Canada, in the province of Ontario, the Liberal government has left half a million francophones outside the protection of Section 133. There is no use running away from it. If hon. members want to talk about a checkerboard, just look at that. I would suggest that is a black spot. I do not agree with unilateral imposition. But if members opposite are going to criticize our formula because it may take a little longer, and it may not happen all at the same time, then in fairness they better look long and hard at what they are doing themselves.

The question is this: How do members opposite explain to francophones in Ontario that Manitoba, Quebec and now New Brunswick will be protected by Section 133 but the largest single majority of francophones outside of the province of Quebec will not be? If the Liberal Government wants to talk about a checkerboard, let me talk about a checkerboard.

What about immigrants coming to the province of Quebec? They are not going to be treated in the same way respecting the education of their children. I can live with a lot of differences in this country, but I think it is pretty hard to live with what gets to be near hypocrisy when the only criticism hon. members opposite can make about us saying we have a little more faith in our fellow Canadians than they have, and we think we can get it with a little time and persuasion, is that there will be a checkerboard. They have got a checkerboard.

On the question of the checkerboard and the rights, our proposal is that we take a little more time. The argument put forward by the government is that the premiers would never agree to anything. I ask hon. members opposite how they know that? I can see it on their lips already. They will say the premiers have not agreed to anything for 53 years. But that is not true. All kinds of changes have been made, many of them by agreement and consultation.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Eighteen.

Mr. Fraser: We have lived together as a country for 113 years. We have lived together, not as the Dominion of Canada, but we have lived together before that and we have done a lot of things by agreement. To come before the public and say there is no possibility of ever getting agreement again shows an extraordinary lack of faith. The hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam said that for two years the New Democratic Party would like to work on something which they could present as an amending formula, and that they would like some amendments with respect to women and the charter of rights. There are a number of things she wishes will come about and she hopes that everyone will agree. Does that not indicate the thought that we will be able to make changes as time goes by? That just contradicts her position completely.

My hon. friends from British Columbia have a dilemma. The hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), unfortunately is not in the House right now, but he is a very strong defender of rights—so am I—and I understand how he feels. He said he did not like the amending formula but he would go ahead anyway because he wanted those rights very badly.

Yet that apparently is the position of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen), the hon. member for Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands (Mr. Manly), the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell), the hon. member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke (Mr. Parker), the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose), the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell). That is the New Democratic phalanx. They have ganged up with the senators from British Columbia to defend British Columbia interests by selling them out on the amending formula.

Let us take a look at what that amending formula does. Section 41, which is now section 45, gives eternally and for all time an absolute veto on constitutional change to the province of Ontario and to the province of Quebec.

Before I go any further, let me make something clear. I am prepared to put a veto in the hands of Quebec on some things, but I am not prepared to put a veto in the hands of the province of Ontario, no matter what its population will ever be and enshrine forever first-class and second-class—even third-class—status among provinces. If hon. members think this is not bothering people in western Canada, then they have not been listening. It is, and it is serious. That amending formula is seen by westerners as, first of all, unfair; and second, armed with the referendum, unnecessary.

Hon. members might ask, "Why is it unnecessary?" They want to break a deadlock. Let me tell hon. members why. Let us assume for a moment that the Victoria formula is fair. I do not think it should create first-class and second-class provinces, but let us assume it is fair. Why did the government put it there? The government put it there because it thought that to be a fair way of deciding how to make changes. But then the federal government came along and said, "If we do not get our way by putting it through Section 41 (which is now Section 45) we will have a referendum and go over the heads of the provinces because there is a deadlock". For the life of me I do not understand what my friends on the government side mean by a deadlock.

If we have an amending formula which calls for passage by so many legislatures of different provinces in different regions, and if that is a fair proposal, why not live by the result? Why come along with a further amending formula which says that if the federal government does not get what it wants under that so-called fair system, then it will go over the heads of the people with a referendum? I just cannot emphasize too much how that particular provision and that approach are offensive to western Canada and, quite possibly, to other places. For the life of me I do not know why they are necessary.

I can argue about the Victoria formula or some other formula. I prefer a formula which does not make first-class and second-class promises. I can live with a veto where there are cultural matters to defend when a minority population is involved, but how can the government and the NDP members from British Columbia ask us to go along with something which makes second-class citizens of British Columbians, changes profoundly the balance of power in this country and puts in the hands of the federal government a referendum which only the federal government can use?

Ten provinces could come to the federal government and say they have decided what is in the interests of this country, but they cannot adopt it because the federal government will not let them. I ask hon. members to think about this. If Section 45, the Victoria formula, is fair—and I do not think it is—and if the government thinks it fair, why does it need a referendum? That referendum proposal is causing an awful lot of trouble out west because it is seen as giving a central government power it never had before and power it does not need unless it is after something.

An hon. Member: Resource control.

Mr. Fraser: I want to point out something else. My hon. friends in the NDP from British Columbia make much of the fact that they do not like the amending formula we have proposed. They say there would be too many formulas and too many things left unanswered. My point is that my friends in the NDP are not voting for our formula, but apparently they are prepared to vote for the government's formula.

Let us take a look at what the federal government formula does. It is not just Section 45 and the referendum; it is more complicated than that. There are too many formulas in the government proposal. Let us take a look at Section 36, which requires unanimity for two years. Let us take a look at Section 45, which is the Victoria formula. There could be a provincial alternative to the Victoria formula and another formula for tabling of that alternative. I refer hon. members to Section 42(1). There could be a federal alternative to the Victoria formula, and we would have no way of knowing what it was. I refer hon. members to Section 42(3)(a). There could be a referendum to decide between the federal proposal and the provincial proposal. Again I refer hon. members back to Section 41. There could be a permanent alternative formula and amendment by referendum. In that respect I refer to Section 46. If we look at the sections carefully we see there are six amending formulas contained in the government proposal.

Some of my friends on the government side look at me incredulously. I ask them to get themselves a lawyer or, if they are lawyers, put on their glasses and read the sections because that is what they show.

My hon. friends, especially my friends in the New Democratic Party, say they cannot go along with the Conservative amending formula because it might take too long. Just look at the delays involved in the government proposal. Unanimity would prevail for two years. Again I refer to Section 36. At the end of that two-year period failure to agree on an amending formula would result in recourse to a referendum. Just so that it will be on the record, I refer hon. members to Section 42(3); that referendum would be held within another two years during which time unanimity would still prevail. After the referendum had determined which formula would apply, the federal option or the provincial option, then six months would pass before the successful option would be proclaimed and put into place. That opens up the potential of four and a half to nearly five years of delay. How can NDP members from the province of British Columbia vote for that proposal and say they will not vote for ours?

Their argument was ably made by the hon. member for Burnaby, and this afternoon by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam. They do not care whether this leaves British Columbia in a second-class position. They do not care whether that provision of a referendum is driving the west away from the centre—and Quebec too, if we listen to what Mr. Ryan and Mr. Levesque say. The hon. members to whom I have referred do not care about that kind of division. They have so little faith that we could ever come to some agreement on a charter of rights they are prepared to go along with a formula which sells their province out. They will pay the price. Mr. Nystrom makes no mistake, not by a long shot. Mr. Nystrom and three others understand the west.

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Mr. Fraser: I am sorry. I mean the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom). I apologize to the hon. member and to other hon. members. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville saw what this is. He pointed this out in the first speech he made in the House weeks and weeks ago. I ask that people listen to some of these members.

I would like to read some comments into the record. This is directed not only to government members but also to members of the New Democratic Party. Let me read what Stephen Lewis said. Mr. Lewis is the very respected former leader of the New Democratic Party in the province of Ontario. He said:

> But at the final level there are those who argue, from Joe Clark to Allan Blakeney, from René Lévesque to Lorne Nystrom that Pierre Trudeau's dogmatic unilateral insistence is doing such terrible damage to the country that the constitutional package just isn't worth it, not even with the charter.

He went on:

> In personal terms, that is the roughest argument for me to cope with. I detest the petty provincialism of a number of the premiers.

He is tough on them.

> I see nothing particularly noble in the ruckusness of the federal Tories.

He does not pat us on the back.

> I am even disappointed in . . . Premier Blakeney. But as bad as all of that is I do believe that the federal Liberal behaviour is even worse, that we are doing irreparable harm to our country. I have been told by those whose opinions I revere that one year after the new Constitution is proclaimed the scars will have healed and pride will take their place. With all my heart I want to believe that—but I don't, I just don't. The wounds have run too deep.

I am a westerner, but not one who just wants to be an alarmist. I am asking my friends to listen. I am asking them to make the changes which can make this package a Canadian package made in Canada, and which will unite our country and not divide it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED EMERGENCY DEBATE—MOTION UNDER S.O 43

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. This one really is urgent and pressing. There is a major crisis on the west coast.

The cost of the ordinary home in Vancouver has practically doubled in the past 12 months. Interest rates on mortgages—first and second—make it impossible for the average citizen to afford monthly payments, much less accumulate a down payment. As a result of the government's failure to respond to the massive move of people from east to west, Vancouver is now in a crisis situation. Particularly since a national housing conference is taking place today in Ottawa I move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Patterson):

That this House immediately have an emergency debate on the housing crisis facing not only Vancouver but also the country as a result of lack of action by this government.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

LACK OF SERVICE IN CALGARY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Kushner (Calgary East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The residents of Whitehorn, Temple, Falconridge and Castle Ridge are being shortchanged and treated as second-class citizens by not being provided with mail delivery of any kind. A year ago studies were promised to resolve this pressing problem. The minister has shown no concern or interest in doing his job, is not doing his job, and has not been to this date. Now he is shunting the problem off to a Crown corporation; effectively, it will be buried for another year or so.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That this House condemns the Postmaster General for failing to ensure that the residents of Calgary are provided with letter carrier service and requests the minister to take immediate action to provide these residents in Calgary with the same level of service provided to those living in other parts of the city.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East): Madam Speaker, I want to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Considering the report released yesterday by the Director of Investigation and Research that the major oil companies have combined to fix prices and engage in monopolistic practices, considering that the present combines laws requiring a criminal burden of proof are so inadequate that few convictions have been rendered in the area of monopolistic practices, considering that during the past ten years the government has tabled three bills to strengthen the Combines Investigation Act but none have been passed in this House, and considering that yesterday great interest was shown by all parties in amendments to strengthen the Combines Investigation Act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia):

That this House endorses the government's intention to bring forward as soon as possible amendments to the Combines Investigation Act to deal effectively with monopolies, mergers and price-fixing.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

S.O. 43

SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF MINISTERIAL DUTIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas over 1,000 women recently met in Ottawa to discuss issues pertaining to them with special emphasis on constitutional matters, and relayed those concerns to the government, and whereas the minister responsible for the status of women has now exposed his real feelings toward women by calling them "tiresome", by saying he "couldn't care less" and by branding women's legitimate representations to him as "a form of mischief and should be treated as such", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper)—and I am glad the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is here to hear this:

That the Prime Minister relieve the Minister of Employment and Immigration from his cabinet duties pertaining to the status of women immediately and apologize to the women of Canada on behalf of the government for his minister's chauvinistic behaviour and attitude toward a group he supposedly represents but obviously despises.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTION MINISTER BE STRIPPED OF DUTIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, in a similar vein I hope to get unanimous consent this time for my motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that repeated calls for the resignation of the minister responsible for the status of women are becoming "pretty tiresome" and that, frankly, the women of Canada "couldn't care less" about the fate of the minister responsible for them, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That the Prime Minister immediately, and in recognition of International Women's Day this Sunday, strip the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Jewett:

—of all his responsibilities relating to women.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

LOBBYING OF BRITISH MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, Robin Sears, the national director and federal secretary of the New Democratic Party, has been appointed "ambassador" and/or lobbyist to the British Labour party by this government in its co-ordinated efforts with the NDP. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

● (1410)

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs, on motions, report to this House as to, first, the arrangements whereby Robin Sears is making representations to British Members of Parliament with the assistance of our High Commissioner, second, what salary, benefits or other arrangements is Robin Sears or the NDP receiving from the government for Mr. Sears' activities for and on behalf of the government, and, third, whether Mr. Sears is making representations for both viewpoints held by the NDP to British members or are his representations only on behalf of the Liberal party wing of the NDP.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Quebec wing of the New Democratic Party, the Saskatchewan NDP, and the Alberta NDP have each adopted a resolution opposing any form of unilateral patriation, †therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That this House urges the Leader of the New Democratic Party to get out of Trudeau's bed—

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

GARRISON DIVERSION PROJECT—EXPRESSION OF CANADIAN CONCERN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion respecting a matter of urgent and pressing necessity that directly affects next week's discussions between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the President of the United States, a motion for which, I understand, I have unanimous agreement. One of the high priority matters on the agenda of those discussions is the Garrison diversion. It is reported that Garrison has just received approval from the administration in Washington for new funding of some $4 million. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael), and the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this House express to the government of the United States, through the Secretary of State for External Affairs, its strong concern that important funding decisions on Garrison are being made in Washington before the start of discussions between the Prime Minister and the President that are to deal with this fundamental and serious issue.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES—MEASURES TO COMPENSATE CONSUMERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that each man, woman and child in Canada over the last 15 years, while successive Liberal and Conservative consumer and energy ministers stood by, has been bilked out of $2,500, and in view of the fact that these practices have escalated since 1973, and indeed continued last weekend when the oil companies piggybacked increased costs when oil prices went up, and in view of the fact that the people of Canada are demanding their money back, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House direct the Government of Canada to present immediate measures to Parliament to ensure that the people of Canada will get their money back.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

CONDEMNATION OF ADVERTISEMENT ATTACKING BILINGUALISM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter to which there may be favourable disposition on all sides of the House. In view of the fact that today an advertisement has appeared in the Globe and Mail which equates unity with a unilingual speaking Canada, and in view of the fact that the same ad says that official bilingualism as proposed in the constitutional package will become the central cause of permanent division, and in view of the fact that federal bilingualism is a policy endorsed and practised by the leaders and members of all three parties in this House, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That this House unanimously condemn the spirit and the letter of this backward advertisement which ignores the rights of millions of Canadians.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES—GOVERNMENT'S POSITION RESPECTING COURT PROSECUTIONS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General arising out of those matters under combines investigations, the restrictive trade practices of the oil companies.

Yesterday the minister made it pretty clear to the House that he had no intention at all of taking any action arising out of the report of the director, save and except to move on toward another inquiry about an inquiry which has already taken place. He indicated in the House of Commons that he had no intention of taking the advice of the Attorney General of Canada with respect to the prosecution of offenders as had been found in a report, which was about the most strongly worded report I have seen since coming here.

As the minister has had overnight to reconsider his position, is it still his position, notwithstanding the strong evidence and strong wording of the report presented yesterday, that the government will not move quickly and expeditiously to the courts to bring these alleged offenders to justice?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I want to correct the impression the hon. member has given. I never said yesterday that we were not going to do anything but refer the report to the commission. In fact I indicated in answering a question that it was still possible a charge would be laid. That option was possible. If he looks at Hansard, he will find in my remarks yesterday that I indicated it was an open avenue which could be explored and that a decision could be made in that regard at a later date.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I suppose the proof of the pudding is in the eating. I assume the minister is conferring with the Minister of Justice. Has he officially conferred with or officially apprised the Minister of Justice of the contents of the report and asked for the inquiry by the Minister of Justice to which he is entitled, to see whether or not there ought to be prosecutions? Has this been done by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, I repeat what I said yesterday. The Director of Investigation and Research has the responsibility for an inquiry. He is the sole person who decides what course of action should be taken. If, on the merit of the evidence he gathered, he decides to go to the Attorney General of Canada and to ask for a prosecution, this is an avenue he could follow. If he prefers—and this is according to the law—to go to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, he can. It is entirely his own decision. Now that we know the contents of the report, now that the report of the director is public and has been referred to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, the hon. member is asking whether as a minister I will consult the Minister of Justice to find out, independent of the matter being referred to the Restrictive Trade Practice Commission, if some charge could be laid arising out of specific aspects of the report. My answer is yes, this is a possibility.

There is nothing that prevents the government from looking at the evidence gathered, assessing it and deciding, after due consultation, whether or not a charge could be laid. But that is not the prerogative of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The entire inquiry was in the hands of the Director of Investigation and Research. He did his job and he made a reference to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, in accordance with the law.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Surely the minister is not saying to the House that the director, having chosen the course of action he did, is beyond at least having a discussion with the minister, to be initiated by the minister, with respect to the advisability of the director making the referral under Section 15 of the Combines Investigation Act? Surely that is not beyond the right and power of a minister of the Crown responsible for an agency, and for which he reports to Parliament? Will the minister do that? That is question No. 1.

Second, will he in fact not say that he may discuss matters with the Minister of Justice, but that he will discuss matters with the minister with a view to seeing whether there is any substance to very strong allegations with respect to those companies? If there are, will the minister then lay the appropriate charges? Surely that is the responsibility of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, if he is to do anything at all with respect to this matter besides sit in his seat.

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, if you will permit me, as I undertook yesterday, when answering questions by the Leader of the Opposition, I checked with the Director of Combines and Investigation and Research and asked him precisely why he did not ask the Attorney General of Canada to lay charges. His answer was that he believed there are several solid reasons to follow the course which he has decided to follow. The fact that the focus of a criminal trial will be on several narrowly defined legal issues and would largely overlook, if not entirely ignore, the major structural problems which the director's findings have revealed, is the basic reason why he did not go to the courts.

The second reason is the fact that the type of remedial measures available to a court of criminal jurisdiction would be very limited, that is, imprisonment or a fine.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Or deterrence.

Mr. Ouellet: The third reason, which is very important, is the fact that even the limited relief available from successful criminal prosecution will be withheld for years pending the final resolution of the judicial process. This was another reason why the director preferred to go to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission rather than to the courts.

Finally, the director told me that the reference to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission is his preferred choice but that it does not preclude the laying of criminal charges at another time.

These are the four reasons for the director going to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. I hope the hon. member and the members of his party will not wish to deny the public of knowledge, at this time, of the findings of the director.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): We know the findings. We have had the findings.

QUERY RESPECTING REFERRAL OF REPORT TO RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES COMMISSION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, of course the minister omits to mention the fact that we have the findings of the director. Everyone in Canada knows exactly what the allegations are. So the minister, in effect, unintentionally I am sure, misleads the House.

The director's report, released yesterday, states that in Section 47 the inquiry will have a significant role in placing the importance of competition in the petroleum industry in the forefront of public debate. The minister apparently agrees with the director's assessment. The minister has said that public awareness will have a very strong deterrent effect in the future, and that during the inquiry the activities of those oil companies will be up front. That is the reason why the minister agrees when the director says it must go to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

● (1425)

Will the minister stand in his place and say that is the sole purpose for referring the report to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission?

An hon. Member: He just gave four reasons.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, my answer is absolutely no. I have just given the House the answer that has been supplied to me by the director. Yesterday, in answering the Leader of the Opposition, I undertook to talk to the director and ask him the reason why he preferred the option of going to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

My position as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is not to agree or disagree with the finding of the director's inquiry, but to concur with the course of action taken by the director. I agree with the director that at this time it is good that he has decided to go before the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The minister has avoided answering the question. He has not told us why he thinks it is a good reason to go to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. He answered why the director did not want to proceed with prosecution. I have quoted the director as to why he wanted to go, and it is highly unlikely. The fact is that this whole access is going to delay relief and changes in the law—because that is all the commission will do—Mr. Stoner said all they can suggest is changes to the legislation. That was the purpose of his hearings.

A Section 47 investigation is currently being conducted into the relationship between Bell Canada and Northern Telecom. The RTPC had four years of hearings, sat for 224 days, travelled the entire breadth of the country—

Madam Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member please proceed with his question?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I will simply ask him the question. What concerns me is that nothing will happen if Northern Telecom and the Bell Telephone matters are any indication, for an immense period of time. Why and how can the minister have this unconscionable delay before taking any action, if he is waiting for the recommendation of that commission?

Mr. Ouellet: I think that the answer is very simple. This director referred one matter to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, that is, the Bell Northern inquiry. Previously, two other large inquiries were referred to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission—

An hon. Member: Who has ever heard of them?

Mr. Ouellet: —the bid depositories and also the ophthalmic goods. The time that the commission took to deal with these questions was two years for the bid depository and three years for the ophthalmic goods, and it is expected that within the three and a half years the Bell Northern inquiry will be completed.

In comparison, when the director dealt with the sugar cases, he went to court and it took 11 years to go through the process.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It took you one minute to get in trouble.

Mr. Ouellet: In assessing the various routes he could follow, the director made his decision, and preferred to go to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission rather than go to court at this time.

AMOUNT GARNERED BY COMPANIES SINCE 1973

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs as well. The minister knows that the report documents the greatest rip-off in Canadian history, for the period from 1958 to 1973 which cost every man, woman and child $2,500. It says that the monopolistic practices of these companies have continued since 1973. Considering that there have been additional price increases in excess of $30 billion, will the minister confirm that in addition to the $2,500 from every citizen in Canada, there have been other rip-offs of billions of dollars, and could he give us a precise amount since 1973?

● (1430)

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, it is very difficult for me to start to speculate on figures. What we have in front of us is a report of an inquiry that went pretty deeply into analysing the operation of the companies. It has come forward with a set of recommendations. It has come forward with findings that will be assessed by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission and that will allow the companies to respond. I think in all fairness, for justice to be done, it is natural that we allow the accused a chance to present their own defence. At this time I would not want to speculate on things that have not yet been investigated by the director during his inquiry. I think we have sufficient evidence in front of us to allow the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission to hold hearings and report to us in the near future.

Oral Questions

ACTION TO HALT PRESENT PRACTICES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the report makes two points that have absolute and clear relevance to the present. The first is that the practices are continuing, and the second is that the report says that not only are the practices continuing but the dominance of the majors is even greater today then in 1973. Considering that there were massive rip-offs up to 1973, and they are continuing—there is no reasonable ground for supposing anything other than that—why is the minister not taking some action now to stop the continuation of these rip-offs?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I want to remind the hon. member that the government took its responsibility in initiating an energy policy for Canada. The very reason that this party was so much in favour of Petro-Canada and that we so vigorously opposed the Conservatives when they wanted to dismantle Petro-Canada, was that this government and this party knew it was important to have a player there, to have a window on this industry, an honest broker in the field, to make sure that the consumer would be protected. In this way we will at last know what is going on in the industry. I think the government has already started taking its responsibility in this regard, not only to protect the consumer but to make sure that this industry is Canadianized.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the minister took a long time to give a completely irrelevant answer, and he knows that. It is totally irrelevant. The Canadian consumers who are being gouged right now want to know not what effect Petro-Canada will have in the future, we know all about that, but what benefit they are going to get now from this government that is just setting up the oil industry to take whacks at, and is getting political gain, but not doing anything about the price gouging.

Just 48 hours ago the oil companies raised their prices between two and three cents per gallon more than they needed, piggy-backing increases, thus adding millions of dollars of windfall profits to their already excessive profits. Will the minister do two things now? Instead of just talking about what would happen in the future, will he call in the heads of the oil companies responsible, the big four in question, and say to them, "We, the Government of Canada, want you to roll back that two or three cents increase and, in addition, roll back a few more cents to make up for the 25 years of gouging"?

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, in answering a question yesterday I indicated to another member of the New Democratic Party that this question has been brought to my attention by my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and that my department was looking at these recent increases by two oil companies. I want to assure the hon. member that we will indeed be looking at this question and will take any remedial action that can be taken under the circumstances.

COMBINES ACT

QUERY RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Considering the criminal burden of proof which is provided under the Combines Investigation Act for predatory pricing and monopolistic practices, is it not a fact that there have been very few convictions for charges under the present law? Also, is it not correct that under the present law there are not adequate remedies for what has been pointed out in the report of the director? In view of this, when will the minister bring in amendments to the present legislation? Will he do it in this session?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I fully agree with the hon. member that it is urgent to amend the competition legislation. I have already told the House that I want to introduce those amendments at the earliest opportunity. Yesterday I suggested that the parliamentary leaders meet to discuss this topic and, should both sides of the House be prepared to proceed rapidly, I would be the first one to hail such an agreement.

THE ENVIRONMENT

GARRISON DIVERSION PROJECT—SUGGESTED TOPIC FOR DISCUSSION BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND U.S. PRESIDENT REAGAN

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister about the recently announced additional funding for the Garrison project in North Dakota. I was glad to see that the motion presented under Standing Order 43 which was moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Lisgar, was adopted. In addition to the $4 million, another $3 million has been left over from the previous year, so that means there is an additional $7 million to be spent on the Garrison project. We are concerned that each dollar spent adds impetus to the completion of that project. Would the Prime Minister not only raise this issue with President Reagan when he is here next week, but raise it as a priority item when we get to that part of the agenda which deals with things that are of mutual concern to our two countries?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Madam Speaker, I have indicated before that this will be very high on the agenda but I am happy to have the unanimous support of this House to a motion moved by the Conservative Party and supported by the Liberals—

An hon. Member: And the NDP.

Mr. Trudeau: —and presumably the NDP. We are all concerned about this.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: They never say no.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am sure that this position of the entire Parliament of Canada will be very important in my representations to President Reagan.

Mr. Mayer: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. Many from both parties in opposition have made suggestions about some things we should be doing to represent our concerns about Garrison to the Americans. We know now that the new Secretary of the Interior, James Watt, apparently will be more favourably disposed toward the completion of the project than was the Carter administration. I wonder if the Prime Minister and the government will accept some of the suggestions we have made, for instance, with regard to sending an all-party delegation of our legislators to the U.S. capital to persuade them on our behalf, or if he has any other new initiatives that he could announce. This is clearly a federal responsibility but I think a lot of us would like to see the federal government assume some of its responsibilities in this regard.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, the federal minister of the environment intends to meet with the Secretary of the Interior of the United States in the near future. If, as a result of my discussions with President Reagan and the meeting I have just indicated, it appears to be useful to exercise further representations with the United States Congress and administration, I will gladly consider the recommendation of the hon. member.

HOUSING

COMMITMENT TO NON-PROFIT SOCIAL HOUSING

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works who is responsible for housing. On February 18, 1981, I asked the minister what action the government was taking on high interest rates. The minister pointed out that the government had increased the annual commitment for non-profit social housing from 25,000 starts to 30,000 starts per year. One week later CMHC announced that the commitment for social housing had been cut back by cabinet. I would ask the minister if it is not true that at the same time he was bragging about increasing social housing starts he already knew they had been cut back by cabinet?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the allocation of 5,000 additional social housing starts last year is just that, an allocation for starts. Those projects will come on stream this year and it is expected that with those starts coming into the marketplace this year, where it is anticipated that the market is in a rebound position, the general effect in the market, the impact of those additional starts from last year, means it is possible for the corporation to stand back and observe the market for a little while further.

Mr. Lewis: I am interested in the rebound because CMHC recently revised its 1981 estimated housing starts downward by 9,300 units. That reduction is entirely for multiple unit dwellings. An official of CMHC has attributed the lowering of the forecast to continuing concern about mortgage rates. How can we rebound up when CMHC says we are rebounding down? What action does the minister plan to take to stimulate this market?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, when I was referring to rebounds, I was comparing the projections for starts in 1981 to those of 1980, and to the two previous years before that. I think the hon. member will agree that by all standards, all projections show starts in 1981 will be ahead of those in 1980. That is what I meant by a rebound.

In terms of multiple starts, the province of Ontario, for example, has built upon the MURB provision, which was introduced in last fall's budget. By a subsidy of $4,200 per unit in the multiple area the province of Ontario has indicated and identified a responsibility in the market which we perceive will be another increase in the multiple market. I wish that some of the other provinces, where there has been difficulty—for example, the difficulty in British Columbia which was identified today in a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43—would also follow that lead and attempt to build on the work and the leadership which this government has shown.

PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES—RELATIONSHIP OF IMPERIAL OIL COMPANY WITH GOVERNMENT

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, my question today is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The report clearly identifies that the problem we face today in large part is the responsibility of Imperial Oil. Imperial Oil is a ringleader in the unconscionable sting that has been placed on Canadian people for about $89 million. Every minister of consumer and corporate affairs since 1973 has known about this. Could the minister explain to this House, with the knowledge those ministers have, why Imperial Oil was allowed to have a special relationship with the government in advising the government on confidential energy policy? In addition, why did the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs approve the appointment of the president of Imperial Oil to a special committee which gave advice on competition legislation in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, I cannot speak for my Progressive Conservative predecessor. I have no idea what happened when the Tory government was in office, but I can assure the hon. member that, as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, I did not receive or ask for the advice or guidance of Imperial Oil.

[English]

SUGGESTED TRUSTEESHIP FOR IMPERIAL OIL COMPANY

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, the old response clearly is "I do not know what is going on," and it is absolutely true.

I have one other key point to address to the minister. I think the Liberal Party is setting up a travelling road show to bash the Tories in the province of Alberta. We feel that the minister has a responsibility to consumers in Canada. Therefore, I ask him this: in addition would he fulfil that responsibility by placing Imperial Oil under trusteeship and imposing a condition that the legislation will be in this House immediately? Also, will the government, either through negotiation or legislation, set up a procedure for restitution for the Canadian people?

An hon. Member: What do you think, Marc?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: Exxon-can.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I wish to reassure the hon. member that no one at Imperial Oil was consulted or invited to give advice in the development of the energy policy. That energy policy was developed by the Government of Canada for the benefit of all Canadians, and it appears to have been vindicated by some of the allegations which are in that report. I hope in the future we will get the support of opposition parties in the implementation of that policy as soon as possible.

NON-PARTICIPATION OF GOVERNMENT IN MONTREAL ECONOMIC SUMMIT

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and has to do with the Montreal economic summit. Can the Prime Minister explain to the House the total absence, the non-participation of the Canadian government in the current economic summit in Montreal, knowing as we all do that most of the economic serum injected in the bloodline of the city of Montreal comes from the federal government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Madam Speaker. I am sorry I am unable to offer reasonable explanations for the absence of the federal government. Given the harbour facilities and the various accommodations of the federal government in and around the city of Montreal, including Mirabel, it is obvious that the participation of the federal government was important and should have been taken into account, considering our efforts to promote the city of Montreal. I can only think, as does the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, that it amounts to electoral posturing rather than an endeavour to boost the interests of the residents of Montreal.

HOUSING

SHORTAGE OF DWELLING UNITS IN VANCOUVER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works, the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and responsible for the housing crisis in Vancouver.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cook: An average of 2,500 people have been and are arriving in British Columbia each month. That means 2,500 people arrived last month and 2,500 will arrive this month. The vacancy rate is four tenths of 1 per cent. Actually it is a minus figure as many people have been forced to double up, move into substandard, unsanitary or illegal basement rooms. It is no longer a news story in Vancouver to find people living in automobiles or tents. I repeat, 2,500 people arrived in British Columbia last month, 2,500 will arrive this month, and 2,500 people will arrive next month. What is the minister doing to help alleviate this shortage of housing? What does he plan to do on an emergency basis, either in the short term or the long term, to lessen this severe situation which is the most severe in Canada? What will he do now?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, in response to the very real concerns expressed by the hon. member opposite, I visited Vancouver on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of this week. I met with the mayor and with provincial officials to ensure that a number of the federal government's and CMHC's initiatives were taking place. For example, I had the opportunity, along with the mayor, of looking at some of the site locations for the new projects which were recently authorized under the increased social housing starts for the city of Vancouver.

In addition to that I had a meeting with the mayor to review the site location for B.C. Place. In co-operation with the developers of B.C. Place, the provincial minister of housing and officials of CMHC, we have identified a need and an opportunity for introducing what we hope will be lower than market housing in that project. I can assure the hon. member that we are concerned. We have been able to respond in reallocations of budget. With the co-operation of local officials, and of the provincial minister, I am hopeful, as I said, that with possible provincial add-ons to our MURB program that we can address that problem.

Mr. Cook: Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for a fairly detailed answer but it does not deal with the present crisis. When he talks about MURBs, that is long-term planning. I am talking about short-term planning. In terms of anything firm, all I have got from this minister is 800 social housing units this year. Out of that 800, does the minister really feel that is sufficient for a population which is moving into the province at the rate of 30,000 people a year?

Mr. Siddon: Answer that one.

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, the hon. member is either not aware of the response of CMHC in terms of social housing, or his figures must be confused. On Monday and Tuesday of this week I had an opportunity to walk through sites which have a total of 3,000 social housing units which were designated last year and are presently being constructed.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is ten to a room.

Mr. Cosgrove: I ask the hon. member to check his facts before he wishes a reaction to occur upon us, although it is a very serious situation.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

PROCEDURES GOVERNING SALE OF REPOSSESSED DWELLINGS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my questions are for the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The minister will know that in Mississauga his department has control over 900 repossessed townhouses and condominiums.

Mr. Kempling: Send them out to B.C.

Mr. Blenkarn: The minister knows that these units are selling, that the market is improving, but they are being sold for $10,000 to $20,000 below their cost. One of the problems is that they are being sold for cash. The purchasers have to arrange their own financing. Will the minister undertake to the House that these houses will not be sold wholesale to speculators and investors but will be sold directly to owners and occupants so that the speculators will not again rip off Canada?

● (1450)

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): I am very pleased to respond to the hon. member. The first objective of sales by the corporation is to ensure that the sales are to home owners, people who will occupy and use the property for home owner purposes. The hon. member will recognize that when the market was difficult some two years ago, and his government authorized an additional $200 million to Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to address the problem of the mortgage insurance fund, that market was different and the procedures were different. I would like to assure him that we are addressing the home ownership question.

Mr. Blenkarn: With the high interest rate policy of the government, interest rates up again today, and at 17 per cent or more for 11 weeks, the minister's policy is to sell these houses for all cash, with purchasers having to arrange their own financing. It is exceptionally difficult to get realistic interest rate financing on the market. That is the reason the minister is taking low ball prices for these properties. Will the minister rearrange the sales program so that CMHC will take back vendor mortgages at realistic interest rates for people who intend to occupy these homes?

Mr. Cosgrove: As I already indicated to the hon. member, Madam Speaker, in view of the tightening and improved market, the corporation is looking to achieve the best prices it can to replenish the mortgage insurance fund. I cannot respond favourably to the hon. member's question or his request that we possibly take a lower interest rate than would normally be possible or, indeed, that we take vendor mortgages. Our objective in this exercise, as I indicated, is to replenish the mortgage insurance fund which had a $200 million advance by the hon. member's government in 1979.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

QUERY RESPECTING LEGISLATION COVERING STATUS OF WOMEN

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In November, 1980, the Canadian government replied to questions of the United Nations Human Rights Committee regarding discrimination against Indian women with specific reference to the case of Sandra Lovelace. The government indicated that it was preparing legislation to end such discrimination and to give Indian bands power to pass non-discriminatory bylaws concerning membership. Can the minister tell the House when this legislation will be introduced? Can he inform us what process of consultation is being followed with Indian organizations, particularly organizations which specifically represent Indian women?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, dealing with the latter part of the question first, I announced several months ago that I have power under the present Indian Act and that if the chief and band council, by band council resolution, ask me to exercise my powers under the Indian Act to give exemption to this alleged "discriminatory feature" of the Indian Act as it applies to a status Indian woman marrying a white person and losing her status, I would do so. That option is now there for chiefs and band councils to exercise, if they so wish.

With regard to the first part of the hon. member's question as to when we are going to attack the whole question of the discriminatory section of the Indian Act, may I indicate, as the Prime Minister did earlier, that we wish to give ample opportunity to the Indian people to consult and let us know when they will be ready, within a reasonable time, for us to deal with this aspect of the alleged discrimination, mainly because it involves complex questions dealing with membership, as the hon. member knows. Certainly the Indian community is well aware of the constitutional resolution now before the House. After the three-year period involved, we will automatically do away with the discriminatory feature in the Indian Act.

Mr. Manly: The Canadian government in its response to the United Nations specifically said that it hoped this legislation would be prepared and tabled in the House by mid-1981. What process of consultation is being followed now with Indian organizations so that this legislation will represent their views, specifically organizations which represent Indian women?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the constitutional resolution now before the House includes a clause which will do away with discrimination based on sex. That clause is to be operative three years hence, giving the provinces time to gear up their legislation to deal with the rationale for that. The Indian people have had the constitutional resolution before them for months. They have made appearances before the constitutional committee. They are well aware there will be a law entrenched doing away with discrimination of this kind, to be effective three years from now. Therefore, they have been richly consulted with regard to that aspect of the resolution.

Innumerable Indian organizations appeared before the constitutional committee to give their views on this particular section and on the whole Constitution. This consultative process has been open to them. They are aware of the section. They have been aware of the parliamentary committee where they can make all sorts of representations with respect to it. One need only read the record of the constitutional committee's proceedings to see the tremendous availability for consultation there has been.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

DELAY RESPECTING RIDEAU CENTRE DEVELOPMENT PROJECT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the very popular Minister of Public Works in his capacity as minister responsible for the National Capital Commission. It deals with the long awaited and much needed Rideau Centre development in my riding. My question is prompted by several comments made by developers, contractors, suppliers, and citizens concerning press reports that the Rideau Centre development has been put off once more. Can the minister confirm that there will not be a loss of $5 million per month as reported in the press? Can he advise whether there is any truth to the fact that the lawyers representing the developer, Viking Rideau and a hotel, Western International, are having difficulty reaching agreement, and that is basically the reason why it is being delayed?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to respond to the question of the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier. I want to express my optimism that although there have been additional delays on the project, I remain confident that the problems are temporary and the project will go ahead. We feel very positive about the project. For example, the announcement of this project with the convention centre has encouraged other developments in the city of Ottawa. It will be good not only for the city, but the region generally. In direct response to the question, the newspaper reports are accurate. There are some legal difficulties between the major parties involved, the developer and the hotel, and the federal government, at the request of the major developer, changing the program from a lease to a sale has encountered some delay in legal implementation as well. Hopefully it will proceed.

Madam Speaker: Some answers to questions today were quite long, and justifiably so. I did not think it in the interest of the House to intervene, but the House will probably agree that I should extend the question period for a while.

HOUSING

STEPS TO ALLEVIATE SHORTAGE ON EAST COAST

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works, who is responsible for housing. The vacancy rate for rental housing in St. John's, Newfoundland, is down to 2.5 per cent and now equals the national rate. Housing starts are down over 10 per cent on the east coast, which is greater than the national average. Mortgage interest rates are up 5 per cent. This puts great financial pressure on renters on the east coast and across Canada. There are three million of them.

We have heard about MURBs, which are not successful in the long-term. We have heard about social housing, which is not proceeding in Nova Scotia. What more can the minister tell us about what he will do for the east coast? Let us remember that much of what he has told us is about provincial initiatives such as those in the province of Ontario. Will the minister tell us what the federal government will do for the east coast?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I should at the outset indicate for the record that the social housing component of CMHC is a national program. The allocation of the 25,000 social housing units is on a proportionate basis in all of the provinces from coast to coast. This is in response to needs on the east coast as well as those on the west.

Second, the MURB provision is a national policy. It is a tax policy of the government which applies everywhere. If it is not by itself sufficient to engender action and response to the points raised by the hon. member, I have no hesitation in saying that some provinces have felt that they can, with their resources, add to those expenditures of the federal government. I would recommend that that be considered by the provincial ministry.

REQUEST FOR MEETING WITH NOVA SCOTIA MINISTER

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, perhaps I could ask the minister to contact the regional office of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation in Halifax and ask about the status of the social program in Nova Scotia and about how it is proceeding.

In order to help the area to take a positive approach, will the minister meet with the minister responsible for housing in Nova Scotia and with other maritime housing ministers in order to establish some additional programs to resolve the problems in the housing field?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I have a meeting arranged with the minister for Monday.

FISHERIES

IMPACT OR REGULATIONS ON SPORT FISHING IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It arises out of the recent regulations the minister has announced which impact very heavily on the sports fishing and recreational community in British Columbia, as the minister well knows because of the thousands of letters he has been receiving. The minister initiated these regulations without reference to the sports fish advisory council or to his own ministerial advisory board. He has produced no scientific evidence to justify the measures he has announced.

As he is a man who has a great deal of regard for the concept of fairness and equity, I wonder if the minister might tell this House how many of the Fraser River chinook salmon are caught by the sports fishery of British Columbia, what percentage are caught by the industrial seine fishery, and what percentage are caught by interception by U.S. fishermen in Puget Sound and the San Juan islands area.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I do not have in front of me the arithmetic the hon. member requests. I can obviously look and make sure that his office receives a copy. In fact, I was looking at that information in a report which was sent to me last night.

Certainly it was in an effort to be fair to all groups that I felt that conservation measures should affect all groups. There should not be one or two groups which are completely excluded from conservation measures. In fact we have approached United States authorities to explain that the situation regarding the Fraser chinook was very serious and that we were hoping they would also implement measures to accommodate the Canadian interests. They have not rejected this approach. In fact, I thought their reaction was rather positive. I am waiting for confirmation from them.

ECONOMIC EFFECT OF REGULATIONS—REQUEST FOR SUSPENSION

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, the sports fishermen of British Columbia are particularly annoyed by this rather ridiculous one-fish-per-day rule, which essentially cripples the sports fishing industry, which includes guiding and tackle operations, tackle manufacturers, and all those who benefit from the sports fishery.

Is the minister prepared to announce a 90-day suspension at least of the one-a-day chinook salmon regulation so that he can meet with the sports fishery advisory committee and so that there can be full disclosure of scientific facts with respect to the potential effectiveness of this measure? Before reimplementing these initiatives will the minister announce action against the industrial seine fleet and the American fishery at the same time?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would not want to drag a red herring across this problem. The information is available to all interest groups, including the sport fishery advisery groups. I accept that perhaps we did not at the very last minute consult adequately, although discussions on bag limits, etc. have been going on for months and months. In fact, I have had very prolonged discussions with sports fishermen's representatives in the past six months. A meeting was scheduled for yesterday. I have not yet seen a report on this. There will be another meeting with another sports fishing group later this week.

I will repeat what I said ten days ago to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich: if the sports fishing community can come up with alternatives which are perhaps slightly better adapted to what they identify as their needs, and yet make sure that conservation of the wild chinook stock does take place, then obviously I am open to suggestions.

I do not think a 90-day moratorium is the right approach. There was a suggestion—and I am looking at the possibility—that we might look at a shorter moratorium, but then the onus would be on all users to come up with alternative suggestions.

Interestingly enough, not too many people have wanted that problem to be dumped on their laps yet.

AIRPORTS

TEN-YEAR PLAN FOR TORONTO INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. On November 21 in this House I asked the minister when he planned to introduce long-range planning for Toronto international airport, a ten-year plan. On that day the minister announced it would be released in January. It is now March 5. The people in Brampton, Mississauga, Etobicoke, and Toronto are wondering where this long-awaited plan is and what is the hold up.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, unfortunately there will be a short delay. The master plan will be concluded in the coming weeks. I wrote yesterday to all members from the Toronto area asking them for suggestions as to the best way of bringing the plan to the attention of the public. The short answer is that we will be late by three or four weeks.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, I think the minister means by three or four months. He is eight weeks late now, so I think that is what he is referring to. Will the minister assure the people of Toronto that this delay will not preclude them from making proper representations to the ministry on the plans as presented?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, to make it short, I can give that solemn assurance.

EQUAL RIGHTS OPPORTUNITIES FOR WOMEN

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. In light of the fact that this Sunday is International Women's Day, and since it has been nine months since the Canadian government was found guilty by the Canadian Human Rights Commission with respect to providing equal pay for work of equal value to 3,000 members of the general services group of the PSAC, would the President of the Treasury Board not agree that it is time the government now acted? Would he also not agree that by having only Mr. John Campbell and one assistant looking into all complaints of inequality in government pay scales, the government is really just giving token recognition to equality in the public service?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I do not agree with the remarks of the hon. member that we are paying token lip service, or whatever the comment was, to this very important and fundamental principle. I indicated earlier to the House that the matter referred to by the hon. member is very complicated because of the difficulty involved in establishing a firm basis for compensation. I hope we have solved that problem. The hon. member is right that it is time the matter was settled. I want to assure him, however, Madam Speaker, that all settlements will be retroactive in any event, so ultimately no one will suffer through these delays. The important thing is to establish a firm and fair basis to give effect to the principle found in Section 11.

So far as the staffing of departments is concerned, I will look into the matter that has been raised. I have committed Treasury Board to moving ahead in trying to ferret out areas where there may be a contravention of this fundamental principle. I would point out that so far as the number of complaints that we have received is concerned, they are all being dealt with and they are not that numerous.

Mr. Murphy: I thank the minister for his answer. I have a supplementary question for him. As there are only 14 people involved in the three government departments that have any affirmative action programs at all, as there are only two people at present looking into equal pay for work of equal value complaints, and in view of the fact that it has been over nine years since the Treasury Board issued a directive stating that department managers are supposed to be hiring and promoting women within their departments, does the minister not think that, unlike the minister responsible for the status of women who could not care less, this is tiresome? Should the Treasury Board not make sure that all government agencies act to make sure that there is equality within the public service?

Mr. Johnston: Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Treasury Board and on behalf of my colleague to whom reference was made, may I say that my colleague has been instrumental, along with the Secretary of State and my own department, in moving forward on these three pilot projects which are independent of the equal opportunities program which already exists and, I suggest, has moved forward relatively effectively.

We have been attempting, as I have said before in the House, Madam Speaker, to identify across Canada, starting with three departments, what is known as systemic discrimination, not only against women but against handicapped people and against native people. This is a form of unconscious discrimination which undoubtedly has an impact in preventing women from moving ahead in the ranks of the public service at a rate which we would find acceptable. There has been no lack of resolve and no withdrawal from that very firm commitment, and I resent any suggestion that we have in any way departed from what I think are very ambitious pilot projects which have been undertaken. When those results are known, which I expect will be very soon, the hon. member can rest assured that we will make a concerted effort to apply the principle across government. As I suggested before, we regard it as a mistake to take on additional person-years and bloat the public service without first knowing exactly where we are going.

An hon. Member: Enough.

Mr. Johnston: We should know that in a very few months.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, could I ask the government House leader to tell us the legislative intentions of the government for today, tomorrow and into next week?

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, today we will go on with the debate on the Constitution and conclude five months of debate. Tomorrow we will deal with Bill C-55, the Canada Student Loans Act amendment, through all the stages. Then we will deal with Bill C-34 and with the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Transport. If we have any time left, we will start debate, and if possible conclude it, on Bill C-58, the Canada Elections Act.

[Translation]

Next Monday, Madam Speaker, will be an allotted day, and I understand that the New Democratic Party will sponsor the motion. Then on Tuesday, we shall resume debate on the Constitution. We shall thus begin the sixth month of debate on the resolution and the constitutional issue. Wednesday morning the President of the United States will address the House at 11 a.m. Since we expect everything to be over around 12 noon, this will not affect our regular sitting hours. We shall, therefore, sit as usual on Wednesday and, of course, the following day. Next week, Madam Speaker, after Monday, the constitutional issue will again come before the House.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I want to thank the government House leader. It is because of our desire to ensure that there is adequate time for all hon. members to speak on the Constitution debate that we are agreeable to putting some legislation through quickly, legislation which could have gone to Committee of the Whole, and send it to committees of the House. We are agreeable, for instance in respect of Bill C-55, to go through all three stages, and we are agreeable generally to the program that the government House leader has outlined because we want to reserve as much House time as we can for that portion of business which the government obviously regards as the most important, namely, the Constitution.

I want to ask the government House leader about one other bill which we discussed, and that is Bill C-60 respecting the National Energy Board Act. There had been a discussion with respect to that bill and the government was to consider its position on the bill. Has my friend had an opportunity to do so?

While I am on my feet, Madam Speaker, I should like to have it confirmed that the agreement has been that next Monday will be an NDP allotted day. I hope they will bring up the matter of the price gouging by the oil companies because we look forward to participating in that debate.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, with regard to the last part of the question concerning Bill C-60, I have not had the opportunity to discuss the matter with the minister responsible. I will speak to him and I will try to bring the bill in front of the House as soon as possible.

My colleague mentioned his desire to allow more members to speak in the Constitution debate. I agree with him on the importance of that debate and if he wishes to accept my proposal that the length of speeches be reduced to 20 minutes and that we sit additional hours, I hereby make that offer to him. I propose that we reduce the length of speeches to 20 minutes and that we allow the House to sit from six to ten additional hours a week, thus allowing more members to participate. If my colleague is serious and sincere in his desire to allow more members to participate in the debate, he will accept my proposal. In fact, I understand—and this has been made public in the House—that two or three weeks ago when we resumed debate on the Constitution his party refused additional hours of sittings.

Since he has mentioned today, three weeks after that refusal, that he wishes more members to participate in the debate, I am willing to oblige him and I hereby once again make the formal offer that speeches be reduced in length to 20 minutes. If my colleague wishes to settle for 25 minutes, I will agree to any length of time below the unacceptable 40-minute time limit which deprives many members from participating, not only in the Constitution debate but when debating any government bill. Because of the large number of members in the House, 40-minute speeches have become unacceptable. That is why I make what I believe to be a reasonable offer. Also, if my colleague wishes the House to sit during meal hours from 6 p.m. to 8 p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays and even from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. on these days, we are willing to agree to that.

I think the NDP should also be seized of this offer which I am making formally at this stage. If the official opposition House leader, who just now mentioned his desire to allow more hon. members to participate in the Constitution debate, is serious in what he says, he will accept, if not the total, then part of this generous offer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my friend's generosity is overwhelming and I want to thank him. I want to say that I have been following the course of the debate very carefully and I want to thank the government for its forbearance in putting up only one speaker a day for about 20 minutes—

An hon. Member: Two speakers.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes, two speakers a day for about 20 minutes each. I think that is very generous of them. As a result of their generosity and of the fact that there seems to be, as we go on, a shortening of speaking time, I have no doubt at all that there will be ample House time for all Members of Parliament to speak on the Constitution package. I want to thank the government for its generosity because I think that at last the light is dawning upon them that indeed the Constitution is important. However, notwithstanding the fact that members are entitled to use 40 minutes in making their speeches, most of them are not using that time. The government is applying itself quite appropriately to allowing members of the House of Commons to speak, those members who wish to speak and were denied the opportunity before by the government's act of closure. I hope this change of heart on the part of the government will be continued and that there will be no need hereafter to negotiate in public with respect to House leaders' matters.

● (1520)

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I hope our example will be followed by members of the Conservative Party and that they will voluntarily limit themselves to 20-minute speeches as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I should like to make a comment or two with respect to the matter under discussion. First, may I say to the President of the Privy Council that I was somewhat surprised when he said the New Democratic Party should also be seized of the offer. I do not quite know what "seized" means in that context but, as he knows, the last time this matter was discussed on the floor of the House of Commons I indicated our party was prepared to go for shorter speeches and for additional hours in the week so that as many members as possible might speak. Although we hold our House leaders' meetings in camera, some of these things have got out. He also knows that whatever the others have said at our meeting, I have said that we are prepared to agree to 20-minute speeches for the rest of the debate on the Constitution and that we are also prepared for additional hours.

We think the suggestion of adding ten hours per week is a bit much. We have suggested six, but we are prepared to negotiate the number of hours. Like the President of the Privy Council, we are prepared to negotiate 25 minutes if that is what it must be; certainly it is better than 40. At any rate, we are asking that this matter continue to be considered.

I should also like to express the hope that some time soon there be an understanding under which we could have a vote on the amendment of the hon. member for Provencher which is now before the House. As has been indicated, there are a number of members with amendments they would like to make. It has been suggested that the Progressive Conservative Party has other amendments; we have two or three we should like to make. But if we continue debating the amendment before the House, it could be spring or summer before we get a chance to put up other amendments.

I say to hon. members who are making their main speeches that they could make their speeches just as well on the motion with another amendment as they can make it on the motion with the present amendment. I am not asking for a House order. I am just expressing a hope, as I have expressed privately to members to my right, that they might soon let the vote come on the amendment of the hon. member for Provencher. It seems to me this would give a chance to this party and to other members in the other parties to get amendments before the House. Otherwise, as matters stand, as long as that amendment is there no other amendment can be moved.

Here we are again discussing these things in public, but it got started that way. I hope we can come to some understanding. We are prepared for shorter speeches and for a few additional hours during the week.

While I am on my feet dealing with House business, I should like to refer to a couple of other matters. First, I believe, having discussed the matter with my colleagues, that we can do a number of things tomorrow along the lines suggested by the government House leader. We may not get all of that work done, but I think we can do fairly well. I join with the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton in expressing the hope that Bill C-60 might be brought forward very soon. We understand that all it does is to make changes in the arrangements for expropriation of land out west where the pipeline is being built. We want to see those changes; we could pass that bill quickly.

The other bill to which I should like to refer is Bill C-42 to turn the Post Office into a Crown corporation. Some of us were quite concerned for a few weeks that the failure to get the bill through might result in a letter carriers' strike. Apparently that will not take place. While there is some time available, I would hope that we might get Bill C-42 before us. The crucial thing about the bill is that when it was in committee the Postmaster General said that he was willing to accept the amendment to the bill proposed by the representative of the workers. When it was not possible to do that in committee because the matter had not been before cabinet, he made the offer to put that amendment down at report stage. I hope that will now be done. We have a little time, since apparently there is to be no strike. The Postmaster General promised in committee to take that amendment to cabinet for cabinet approval and to put it on the Order Paper. It is another bill with which we could deal rather quickly. As for Bill C-60, if it is put on the list we can deal with it very fast; but we also want to see action on Bill C-42.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I take note of the suggestions of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre concerning Bill C-60. If they want to deal with it through all stages tomorrow, I am in a position to tell them that I will bring that bill up for discussion. I am willing to discuss that later on this afternoon.

I could accept the replacement of Bill C-58, dealing with the Canada Elections Act, with Bill C-60 so that we could deal with the bill before the end of the afternoon, after dealing with the student loans bill and the Judges Act.

The hon. member referred to the Post Office bill. It is a very important bill and we do not intend to delay it either. We would like to have much more time, but I want to talk with the Postmaster General to clarify the situation concerning the amendment about which the hon. member just talked. I hope to be in a position to announce when we will definitely proceed with report stage and third reading stage of that bill later on, but prior to that I would like to have a House leaders' meeting to negotiate a reasonable length of time to dispose of that bill.

Finally, once again I welcome the formal acceptance of the NDP to limit speeches and to extend the hours. I take note of this. I am willing to continue discussions with the Tory party so that we can reach an agreement on the matter as soon as possible. But I understand, from the reaction of my colleague, that this agreement is not for today. Let us hope that it will be for tomorrow or within the next few days.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, there could not be any agreement today to the suggestion of my hon. friend. But the President of the Privy Council and the House should note that there is agreement today to clear other matters on the Order Paper as quickly as we can in order for us to have the time to debate the Constitution matter. This has been my position from the outset, and it remains my position. Naturally discussions continue between us in the friendliest possible manner.

When Bill C-60 is reached later in the day—and I gather that is his intention—we would be prepared to agree to greatly limit speeches. In fact, ten minutes per speech and one speaker per party would be satisfactory to us.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I listened with interest to the proposal of the government House leader in terms of reducing the length of speeches and adding hours so that we would have time to debate the important constitutional matter before the House and to the reply of my House leader on behalf of the New Democratic Party. But I express some concern in terms of what the House leader of the Conservative Party had to say. As I understood it, there was no commitment to reducing the length of speeches or adding to the number of hours available for debate during the week. I should like to ask the House leader of the Conservative party—

Mr. Nielsen: He is the official opposition House leader.

Mr. Broadbent: The official opposition House leader, right. That is wonderful, a very perceptive comment.

Mr. Nielsen: Get it straight.

● (1530)

Mr. Broadbent: It is a precise comment, which is rare for the hon. member, but I appreciate it. It was even truthful, which is almost—no, I had better watch my language!

In any case, I would like the House leader of the Conservative Party to indicate to the House if his party will be prepared to indicate tomorrow, or Monday at the latest, an answer to two questions. One, is the Conservative Party prepared to shorten the length of speeches to 20 minutes and increase the number of hours?

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Broadbent: Second, is it prepared to have a vote quickly on their amendment so that the House can get on and discuss other important amendments as they affect the native people of Canada, the women of Canada and the Senate of Canada? Or do they really plan to conduct a filibuster?

Madam Speaker: I want to say that it is most unusual that a question should be asked of a member. I do not think I can allow that. If the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton wishes to make a response, it is up to him.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I think one of the most distinguished people in Parliament is the House leader for the party of the member for Oshawa, and perhaps he should learn a few parliamentary manners from that hon. gentleman. It would serve him well.

Mr. Cossitt: Madam Speaker, on the same point of order, I would like to ask the government House leader a question with respect to Bill C-38, which I realize may be low on the priority list of the government's legislation. I have had a number of inquiries from constituents who are concerned as to when this bill may come up for second reading. The bill deals, among other things, with making it possible to garnishee public servants' wages, so that they are not on a level other than the ordinary citizens of Canada; in other words, so that they do not have extra privileges over and above that accorded other people. I know there are a great many people concerned about this bill, certainly in my constituency. I am wondering if the government House leader might indicate to the House when this bill will be called for second reading.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, this is another good reason for the hon. member to advise his party to agree to shorter speeches and extended hours, which would allow us to deal with more bills which are on the Order Paper. In fact, there are over 35 of them on the Order Paper which could be dealt with expeditiously. It is a good start for tomorrow. I hope that we will be able to come to grips with all 35 of those bills within a reasonable length of time. Bill C-38 is one of them.

MR. FULTON—ALLEGED MISLEADING MINISTERIAL STATEMENTS—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: On February 12 last, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) raised a question of privilege concerning misleading statements made by certain Ministers of the Crown. I have now reviewed with care the arguments presented by the hon. member and the remarks made by the ministers involved.

In his presentation, the member referred to a number of questions and answers in the House which started back in July, 1980, and which he pursued until February of this year. It is obviously an important matter, one which is of great interest to him. The fact that he also raised it during the adjournment proceedings and twice as a question of privilege is a clear demonstration of his concern. I am sure the House has noted that.

Essentially, the hon. member for Skeena is taking objection to a certain permit granted to Amax Ltd. which, in his view, does not comply with the provisions of the Fisheries Act and, consequently, he asked for a public inquiry into the matter.

The hon. member for Skeena claims that he has been misled by the ministers who gave him conflicting information in answer to his questions. He raised a question of privilege to this effect on January 23, after the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) had told him that:

—a panel of experts has been set up to look into the matter, notice of which has been communicated to the Nishga tribal chief, Mr. Gosnell.

The hon. member stated then:

I have taken the time to check, and in fact no panel has been set up, and no notice has been communicated to Mr. James Gosnell, president and chief of the Nishga Tribal Council.

In an effort to clarify the matter, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development said:

Subject to checking, it was my information that the scientific panel was constituted. It may be in the process of being constituted, which is apparently at variance with what was said yesterday.

It seems to me that the hon. member for Skeena followed the appropriate course of action open to him in order to deal with his concern when he asked questions during question period and followed them up with an adjournment debate. Obviously, he is not satisfied with the answers given to him by the ministers, but the Chair is not in a position to insist on any other answer nor to comment on the quality or the substance of such answers. The hon. member has expressed his dissatisfaction by way of a question of privilege, but he has not persuaded the Chair that his privileges as a member of this House have been breached. What he has established, however, is a difference of opinion between himself and certain ministers of the Crown as to the interpretation of certain facts. I hardly need to refer hon. members to Citation 19(1) of the fifth edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, which reads as follows:

A dispute arising between two members, as to allegations of facts, does not fulfil the conditions of parliamentary privilege.

I therefore rule that, in this instance, a prima facie case of privilege has not been established.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION RESPECTING STUDY OF OPERATIONS OF NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, there is an agreement I forgot to mention. It is very short. After consultation with my colleagues it is agreed:

That the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development be empowered to study any aspects of the operations of the Northern Canada Power Commission;

That it be an instruction to the committee that it appoint a subcommittee for the aforementioned purpose;

That the subcommittee be empowered to adjourn from place to place within Canada; and

That the subcommittee be empowered to employ expert and technical staff that shall be authorized to accompany the subcommittee.

Madam Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MR. COSGROVE—QUESTION ASKED BY MR. BROADBENT RESPECTING RENT CONTROLS

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I served written notice of my intention to raise a question of privilege this afternoon. It is my first opportunity to address the matter since returning to the House from a trip to British Columbia. It arises out of a question addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), the Leader of the New Democratic Party, on March 3. His words were as follows:

Yesterday the minister responsible for housing was in Toronto giving the government of Ontario some advice on rent controls. At that time he said that the government of Ontario should get rid of rent controls.

I have three points I would like to bring to your attention, Madam Speaker. As I have indicated, I was not in Toronto on that day; I was in British Columbia, in the city of Vancouver. Second, at no time did I give advice to the government, any member, or any servant of the government of Ontario on the matter of rent controls. Third, the information provided to the hon. member in preparation for his question probably arose from a newspaper report published in Toronto.

Finally, I would like to indicate that, contrary to that report, it is not my intention to address the question of rent controls at the national housing conference this weekend. It never was my intention to do so, it is not my intention to do so and it will not be my practice. I am there to listen.

I have indicated three reasons why I have raised this matter, Madam Speaker. If the Chair recognizes that there is a prima facie case of privilege, I would be pleased to provide the appropriate motion complaining of the same.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): I was listening to the minister with care, Madam Speaker. I have not yet been able to determine from Hansard my question concerning this subject. I am quite prepared to accept the minister's claim that he was not in Toronto. As I recall, I did not say that he was in Toronto. If I did say it, I take it back. I was taking a quote from the Toronto Star for Monday, which is surely the essential point.

What I think would be useful in terms of the substantive issue of rent controls, which presumably the minister responsible for housing is interested in, is whether he is now telling the House that he does not favour abolition of rent controls. Will he make it very clear what the government's position is with respect to that issue?

Madam Speaker: No, I do not think I will allow the hon. minister to reply. This question is obviously not a breach of the privileges of the House. The statements were made outside the House and there is a different interpretation as to those statements. The minister has made his point, as has the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent). I think the matter should be closed.

MR. SKELLY—QUESTION RESPECTING COMPETITION POLICY

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, I did send you a note concerning a question of privilege arising out of today's proceedings. I believe the situation resulted from questions to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) and the responses of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). I think it was a matter of misleading through inadvertence or misunderstanding.

● (1540)

My question basically asked the minister to explain why the president of Imperial Oil had been placed on a board that was advising the government on competition policy, and he said they had not. I have submitted to you two documents which show that William O. Twaits was a member of a committee which provided advice. The recent report says that that was one of the central documents in influencing competition policy. So I think that was a misunderstanding, and if the minister would confirm that the president of Imperial Oil was there it would clear it up. The point was that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs knew of the role of Imperial Oil in this matter prior to this situation.

Then somewhere out of the machine dropped the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and I think his statement was also misleading by misunderstanding the question. My questions were directed strictly to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. His officials have been aware since 1973 that Imperial Oil was a prime mover in this investigation, of bilking the Canadian public. However, the document, which the minister denied wholeheartedly, on page 33 indicates there were several documents in the possession of the government in which Imperial Oil has been asked by the National Energy Board and the government to provide confidential information on such matters as licence restrictions and energy policy.

The minister certainly misunderstood my question; but if you find that I have a point of privilege, I would like some clarification to confirm that the president of Imperial Oil, after the investigation began, was asked to sit on a committee advising the government on competition policy, and that Imperial Oil, years after the investigation commenced, provided special advice, as the report puts it, on confidential energy policy. This is a matter of record, and either the ministers are right or the people who investigated the matter are wrong. If you could find my privilege, Madam Speaker, I would appreciate clarification of these two points.

Madam Speaker: After listening to the hon. member, I do not think there is a privilege in the question he is now raising. It is clearly a different way of interpreting a report. The hon. member is not satisfied with the kind of answer he received from the minister, but the Chair has no way to redress a situation when one member is not happy with an answer that he has received from another member. The proper way to pursue the hon. member's concern is to continue his questioning during question period, or at other times, to get clarification from the hon. ministers to the questions to which he is seeking answers.

Mr. Ouellet: Madam Speaker, on the point of order—

Madam Speaker: I am willing to recognize the hon. minister, but I was looking at him in a certain way so that he would realize that he cannot go on discussing the question of privilege. If he rises on a point of order, I am willing to accept that, but I have already made my ruling. I did not realize that the minister might want to reply, but because this is clearly a debate, there therefore is no question of privilege.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

REPORT ON STATE OF COMPETITION IN THE CANADIAN PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the release yesterday by the Director of Investigation and Research under the combines investigation branch of the report on the state of competition in the Canadian petroleum industry, and its revelation of shocking evidence of price gouging of the Canadian consumer, costing each Canadian man, woman, and child some $500, and its detailed accounting of predatory and monopolistic business and trade practices, thus requiring the Government of Canada to take urgent and immediate action to put a stop to the biggest consumer rip-off in Canadian history.

Madam Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) has given me notice under the terms of Standing Order 26 within the time prescribed. The hon. member seeks to move the adjournment of the House to discuss the matter of price gouging by the petroleum industry as indicated by the release of a report yesterday.

I might mention at the outset that during yesterday's question period a substantial number of questions were posed to the government on this very subject, and today the hon. Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) did indicate in his answers that the matter had been referred to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

It has been ruled by my predecessors on several occasions that matters of this nature, having been referred either to the courts or an administrative body, are not proper subjects for debate in this House under the terms of Standing Order 26. Furthermore, the provisions of Section 5 of this Standing Order are very clear, in that the Chair "shall have regard to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within reasonable time by other means." I have not been convinced that the publication of a report, even on a very important subject, constitutes an emergency contemplated by this Standing Order.

The House is well aware that the main estimates and supplementary estimates, tabled recently, are now before the various committees of the House. Also, we are presently in a supply period which provides an opportunity for members to discuss a subject matter of their choice.

Therefore, for these reasons, I regret that I cannot accept the hon. member's application for a debate under Standing Order 26.

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to participate in this most historic debate this afternoon. In so doing, I join the thousands of Canadians who are following our deliberations in the media, and who have discussed this important issue with their friends and neighbours. Hundreds more Canadians have participated directly in the committee process, making significant contributions to the final package we have before us.

We can point to the experience of the committee and claim that the parliamentary system of government works well for and with Canadians. Representing groups of Canadians from across Canada and Canadian society, witnesses before the committee found that body receptive to their feelings, resulting in certain changes to the resolution. Most notable among these are the strengthened aboriginal rights. Of the 72 total interventions by groups or individuals, fully 69 of these approved of the ultimate formula we have before us. Forty-one of the 54 interventions were in favour of entrenching minority language education rights in a Constitution, a principle favoured by all provincial premiers as recently as 1978. No one appearing before the committee disagreed substantially with the final form of legal rights.

Much of the credit for the fine work of the committee is due to its joint chairmen, and I would like to join my colleagues in offering my congratulations to the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal) and to Senator Hays. Under unprecedented media scrutiny they performed magnificently, due in large part to the excellent spirit of co-operation among the committee members. Fifty-one members of the other place took part in the work of the committee, joining 132 members of the House of commons who participated in the committee's deliberations at one time or another.

Before going further, I would like to take this opportunity to dismiss a notion being stated by some members of the Conservative Party. Specifically, they charge that requesting action on this resolution from the parliament at Westminster is an act of colonialism. The Conservatives, while favouring a charter of rights, want this charter enacted in Canada. Frankly, that is exactly what is happening, and I am certain that some members opposite know full well that charges of colonialism are absurd. In addition to the almost 300 witnesses who appeared on behalf of more than 100 groups in Canada, a total of 35 pages were appended to the joint committee's report to Parliament, listing the hundreds of written submissions received by the committee.

The substantive amendments, the unprecedented participation of 183 parliamentarians in the work of the committee, and the appearances and intense lobbying by groups and individuals from across Canada, demonstrate clearly that this resolution is a Canadian document, made by Canadians, in Canada, for Canadians. It represents the will of the Canadian people.

As the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) told the joint committee:

> It is the popular will that we have a charter of rights and freedoms for the Canadian people, embedded in a constitution.

As members of the Parliament of Canada, we should be cognizant of the fact that it is here, in this Parliament, that the will of the Canadian people is expressed. By passing this resolution, we are proclaiming, once and for all, that it is the people who are sovereign, their rights supreme and unchallenged.

So long as most of the provincial governments are willing to hold the rights and dignity of the Canadian people hostage in exchange for greater provincial powers, these rights will continue to be considered secondary. Some provinces argue that discussions on a charter of rights should take place at the same time as talks on resource ownership or communications jurisdiction.

Hon. members know full well that to proceed in this fashion would effectively hold back the charter of rights forever. The two senior premiers in the federation have stated that unanimous, or even near-unanimous, agreement is impossible in a world of competing political ideas. That is why Premiers Hatfield and Davis, both Conservatives, support the position of the federal government in this debate. They speak from the experiences gained in frustrating talks dating back to 1971, when a glimmer of hope was seen at Victoria. They know, as I do, that since 1927 13 first ministers' conferences, 17 conferences of federal-provincial ministers, and countless meetings of officials have failed to reach agreement on patriation and an amending formula.

Surely, as a Parliament accountable to all the Canadian people, we have a responsibility to seize the political will to end this deadlock once and for all. To persist in holding the charter of rights for ransom, as is the case now, would be to tell the Canadian people that their rights are secondary to communications jurisdiction, or to a reformed Senate.

Some argue that unanimity should be the formula for constitutional change, knowing that it is a formula for failure. What sort of unanimous agreement can we expect if Premier Lyon continues to oppose a charter of rights in a new Constitution? What kind of unanimity can we hope for if Premier Peckford blocks a charter of rights until there is agreement on control of offshore resources? Will we continue to tell the Canadian people that their right to hold and express beliefs is only as important as the number of cod caught on the continental shelf?

What, exactly, did Premier Peckford say about a charter of rights? In a document placed before the first ministers last September entitled "Towards the Twenty-First Century—Together", the Premier of Newfoundland stated, and I quote:

> The people of Canada—as elsewhere—live in an age of continuing, almost radical change. Today there is not the same surety as yesterday that values enshrined in the heart and conscience of a people will be universally respected.
> The entrenchment of democratic rights and fundamental freedoms is a means of giving explicit constitutional recognition to values which have served Canada well . . . Newfoundland, therefore, supports a charter of rights which will entrench the democratic rights and freedoms of Canadians.

To those who argue that legislatures should be supreme in determining and protecting the rights and freedoms of Canadians, I ask: Where were those rights and freedoms protected when we stripped citizens of their rights merely because they were of Japanese origin? Tell the Jehovah's Witnesses about the kind of protection given them by Premier Duplessis and his legislature during the 1940s and 1950s. Try to explain to Chinese Canadians that they were not even considered as persons in the Election Act of 1885.

These points illustrate one of the deficiencies of the Vancouver consensus as well. If, as under the provisions of that amending formula, provinces may opt out of constitutional obligations, the results would be disastrous. Alone among truly democratic nations, our citizens would be unsure of their rights from one provincial jurisdiction in the country to the next. We would have, as has been said often, a checkerboard of rights across Canada. Canadians travelling from one end of the country to the other would be playing Russian roulette with their fundamental rights. We need only look back to the actions of the government of Alberta during the early years of the Social Credit regime, where that government sought to stultify legitimate political opposition through repressive press laws.

Some will say that these are isolated incidents in our history, and fortunately they are. However, to hide our heads in the sand by patting ourselves on the back for our tolerance is to forget that Indian women are still discriminated against. As a group generally, women must still struggle to achieve some level of equality in the workplace and elsewhere. It is too easy for most of us to adopt an "I'm all right, Jack" attitude when it comes to providing services to the physically or mentally handicapped. Through my personal experience as a member of the Association for the Mentally Retarded, I am acutely aware of the frustrations of people who know that their contribution to Canada is stunted by a society structured to conform to an arbitrary standard of ability.

Some of the interest groups who came to my office represented aboriginal peoples who have grown dismayed by the erosion of their culture and the lack of participation they feel in the building of our country. They sought an affirmation of their rights within a strong and forward-looking Canada. All Members of Parliament share this view, as shown by the unanimous support for amendments strengthening aboriginal rights.

Mr. Speaker, people can deny the rights of others too. We know that throughout Canadian history immigrants were encouraged to come to Canada to escape religious discrimination, or the insidious discrimination that poverty brings. They saw and continue to see that Canada holds the promise of a bright future for them and their families. In all parts of Canada their industry, vision and imagination have added to the diversity and strength of this country.

What is the Canadian way of life, Mr. Speaker? Certainly it is not some narrow perception offered by a few fringe spokesmen. With few exceptions the Canadian way of life has been one of tolerance, enriched by the contribution of people from all over the world.

It has become a truism that Canada is a nation of immigrants, for, with the exception of the aboriginal peoples, Canadians can trace their roots to the four corners of the world. Canada owes its development as a peaceful and tranquil nation to its own people, be they new Canadians or people whose families have been in Canada for generations. It is for this reason that the enshrinement and recognition of Canada's multicultural heritage in our Constitution is so important.

What is easily forgotten is that politicians and political interpretations are transitory. With respect, I would point out to those who oppose this resolution that, as much as anything else, we are building the future. We are building a modern Canada. We would need a knowledge bordering on the divine to forecast the future, and while we would sincerely wish for orderly development, we are scarcely equipped to predict the endless possibilities for the future.

Equally transitory is public opinion and the social conditions which will rapidly change the face of future societies. For many people, Orwell's "1984" looms as an ominous year, demanding the vigilance of the people in order to protect their own rights. It is significant, then, that in advance of the change that is sure to overtake the future we as a Parliament affirm the rights and dignity of the person.

What are the rights that we seek to enshrine in a new Canadian Constitution, Mr. Speaker? Legal rights will ensure that the citizen is given the best possible protection from arbitrary justice. In attempting to build a sense of mutual trust between the citizen and the law, we seek to make clear rules that will inform the alleged offender of the charges and possible punishment that he or she faces. We want to embed in the Constitution the principle that persons may retain counsel promptly to assist the offender in seeing that justice is done.

The new Constitution will effectively outlaw unreasonable search and seizure, keeping Canadian law in line with the provisions of the United Nations covenant, to which Canada is a signatory.

The Constitution will make clear that no one will be prevented from voting in or contesting an election for the Parliament of Canada or a legislature of any province. This democratic right will ensure that one of the most fundamental principles of Canada is clearly spelled out, and that all citizens share in the governing of Canada.

● (1600)

The charter of rights contains provisions for fundamental freedoms that will guarantee Canadians freedom of expression, thought, conscience and religion. Canadians will be entitled to associate with people they choose, and to assemble peacefully with fellow citizens.

In a society which values democracy, freedom of the press is one of the most sacred principles that society can hold. Freedom of the press, therefore, is one of the fundamental freedoms this resolution seeks to enshrine in our Constitution.

Let me make it clear that in adopting this resolution, Parliament is not "granting" rights to people; we are merely affirming fundamental rights that we accept as a given fact of life in a democratic society.

By including the aged and mentally or physically disabled among the categories of people who may not be discriminated against, we are saying that all people in Canada may participate in the task of building our country. Finally, we are correcting an injustice that has gone on far too long. It would be unforgivable if we were to allow this situation to persist.

Among the rights we seek to enshrine in the Constitution are the rights of all Canadians to share in the boundless wealth and opportunity we have in Canada. For many years Ontario shared without complaint its tax dollars to aid in the development of other parts of Canada. Now, as the situation shifts, other areas of the country are able to share the responsibility of delivering the promise of Canada to all Canadians. A child from a less advantaged part of Canada must never lose out on that promise because he or she chooses to remain close to family roots. It is essential that the quality of government services be equal and that job opportunities exist everywhere in Canada, regardless of where a Canadian chooses to live.

Equalization is a principle that is vital to the continued survival of Canada as a nation together. Though regions formerly in need of assistance have found sources of wealth, opportunities will never be completely equal in Canada. But across this vast land, the quality of life may be more important than resources lying underground or in the offshore, more satisfying than life in the industrial cities of central Canada. If we can preserve the beauty that is tradition, if we can save the heritage of families and communities remaining together at home, then equalization will be seen, not just as an economic leveller, but as a builder.

Just as important as equalization is the right of Canadian residents to seek employment and residence anywhere in Canada. Mobility rights are an important guarantee of that opportunity. For many years Ontario's strong industrial base provided Canadians and people from all over the world with the opportunity to pursue a rewarding livelihood. Ontario's cities, towns and countryside are enriched by the contribution of peoples from around the world and across Canada who choose to make Ontario home. Once again, the shift in economic opportunity makes it essential that Canada is home to all Canadians.

The western provinces now welcome our sons and daughters to share in the boom that this region is experiencing. For its part, Atlantic Canada stands on the threshold of untold wealth, due in large part to the action of this government to assert Canadian sovereignty over the 200-mile limit.

Mobility, like free speech, is a fundamental right. Anything which would hamper this right flies in the face of the ideals which are Canada. Enshrining this right in the Constitution of Canada tells Canadians that all of Canada is theirs. The mere accident of birth in one area or another has never prevented an individual from sharing in the boundless promise that is Canada. It must never do so, for without the right of mobility for all of its citizens, Canada is a pointless, balkanized collection of communities out of touch with itself.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to give my support to the principle of enshrining minority language education rights for our two official languages, where numbers warrant.

If a constitution is to reflect the make-up of a country, it must have an amending formula which provides for orderly and fair amendment. For that reason, I favour the position advocated by the government. The Victoria formula, as amended, gives all regions, and indeed all provinces, a large measure of protection which will ensure that their interests are not tampered with by a small majority in the country. By requiring the approval of the two most populous provinces, the support of two provinces in western Canada representing 50 per cent of the population in that region, and by needing the endorsement of two provinces in the Atlantic region, amendments under the Victoria formula will represent a consensus from all regions of the country. Of course, the provinces and the federal government have the two years following patriation in which to arrive at a formula by unanimous consent. While this has not been successful in the past, one would hope that the urgency to achieve greater consensus on an amending formula will spur the first ministers to closer agreement.

I spoke earlier of the nightmare that Canadians would face with the Vancouver formula. This formula is really a cop-out, requiring no commitment by the provinces to respect rights in a uniform and consistent pattern across Canada. If we are to remain as one country, we must assert once and for all that Canadian citizenship is one citizenship for all Canadians.

One of the people who came to my office in the past few months represented a group who wanted to ensure that this was not the end of the line for constitutional change. I made the commitment then, and I do so now: there is much, much more to be discussed at the first ministers' conferences which will be constitutionally required under this resolution. Family law, questions relating to interprovincial and international trade, reform of the Senate, Supreme Court and regional representation on federal government bodies, and the divisions of power, are but a few matters for discussion.

But, Mr. Speaker, all of this means nothing if the people of Canada do not have fundamental rights embedded in their Constitution. We must stop comparing the rights and dignity of individual Canadians to regional representation on the CRTC, important though it may be. Let us stop the horse trading, bartering equality of men and women for a reformed Senate. Let us not wait until the question of offshore jurisdiction is settled before telling the aged and the disabled that, finally, they are part of the process of building Canada's future.

In this Parliament we are answering the most important question facing Canada since 1867. What comes first, the rights of the people or the rights of governments? Let us answer, loud and clear, "the people come first!" Now is the time to break the deadlock.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to speak on this very important resolution and on the amendment which was brought forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp).

First, I want to commend our leader in the Constitution committee, the hon. member for Provencher, as well as the hon. members from our side who made a great contribution to that debate. I have a special commendation for the co-chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal). I also commend other hon. members who have spoken on this topic.

I find this is a distressing time for me. I am compelled to comment upon the arrogance and single-minded actions of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) regarding the patriation of the Constitution. I feel it is necessary to draw attention to what surely will be the tragic consequences of these actions. I feel just as strongly that I must apologize to the residents of my riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka and to millions of other Canadians. In fact, all of us in this House should apologize to Canadians everywhere who feel, as I do, that there are other more pressing problems facing this nation, such as inflation and unemployment. These are the matters we should be talking about and doing something about.

It is important that our Constitution be in Canada, but because the Prime Minister and members of his government have now arbitrarily placed this matter before us, we must challenge their approach and their methods. Surely we in Parliament have a very important responsibility, a responsibility to deal with those issues more urgently affecting the daily lives of the people of Canada.

A recent Gallup poll illustrates just how low on the level of priorities stands the issue we are now debating. Fifty-five per cent of those polled cited inflation as the most important problem facing the country today, and 15 per cent cited unemployment. Fewer than one in ten expressed concern over energy problems, national unity or problems connected with government.

Canadians want the Constitution brought home, I will admit that. However, another Gallup poll showed that 64 per cent are opposed to the government's unilateral position and high-handed decision to bring it home on the basis it has outlined. What they want now is for the government to get its priorities straight.

The Constitution is not going to feed a hungry family. It is not going to put a roof over the heads of people to keep them warm. It will not find or create jobs for anyone. It will not make us all one big happy family. The Constitution is important and can have an effect on living conditions, but let us not forget that we already have a Constitution and we still have inflation and unemployment. The Constitution is a declaration of principles. A proper application of those principles will put this country back on a sound and stable economic footing.

I would be much happier if we were now dealing with real problems rather than ones that have been created artificially. Regrettably, the constitutional debate is before us. I have some important points to bring forward in this regard. This is a fiery time in Canada's history. It is not a time for hasty or politically expedient decisions by any governmental body.

What we are discussing is not just an ordinary law. We are discussing the fundamental source of the law of the land, the country's Constitution. Let there be no doubt about it, the outcome of this debate will have monumental consequences for the future of this country. We are talking about the future of Canadians for generations to come. We are talking about the survival of this country as a federal state.

What this government is attempting to do is wrong. I know it, the members on this side of the House know it, the Canadian people know it and the British know it. Everyone seems to know it except the Prime Minister and his puppets. I suspect that, if the truth were known, a good many of them also know it. Despite the fact that the majority of people on both sides of the Atlantic oppose the Prime Minister's constitutional plans, he is determined to have his own way. I am reminded of a song which the great entertainer Frank Sinatra made famous, and probably made a great deal of money from, entitled "I did it my way". That seems to be the theme song of the Prime Minister. The time has come for Canadians to stand up to the arrogance of this administration and to yell out loud and clear, "enough is enough!"

This government is uncaring, indifferent and ruthless. It is not worthy of the confidence of the Canadian people. Canadians deserve better. They deserve a government they can trust, a government willing to act in accordance with their wishes and concerns.

It is with respect for the wishes and concerns of Canadians that I say this resolution before us must be rejected. It must be rejected if we value the foundation upon which this country was created. We pride ourselves on being a secure, independent nation. Why, then, is the Prime Minister forcing the British Parliament into a corner, demanding that the British do something we should be doing ourselves? To place the British Parliament in such a position is an embarrassing and regrettable move. What should or should not be included in the Canadian Constitution is a matter for Canadians to determine, but only after the Constitution has been patriated, not before.

The government's constitutional package must be defeated for three very important reasons. The legality of the government's actions is highly questionable, the government's move to amend the Constitution unilaterally is a violation of the true meaning of federalism, and the government does not have the support of the majority of the Canadian population. These are three sound and solid reasons for the immediate and absolute rejection of this resolution. If the people do not want it done this way, if some of the provinces are taking the issue to the courts and if members of this Parliament oppose the move, why in heaven's name does the Prime Minister not back off?

The Premier of Saskatchewan has now bolted the government ranks. It has been said that Blakeney now makes the score eight to two against the Trudeau package. However, that should be ten to two because we must not forget the territories. This is certainly worth considering.

Never have we had a Prime Minister who has caused more divisiveness. When we look back we see some who were far from good, but this Prime Minister has put us on more of a collision course than all the other prime ministers combined. We have region against region, province against province, French against English, and to what end? Is it so that one day we may replace the Queen and pass the crown on to an emperor?

The time has come, not to bestow a crown, but to bell the cat who so arrogantly and flippantly suggests that, if the nation is destroyed over the issue of patriation, it was not worth saving in the first place.

Are we to sit submissively and allow one man to decide whether this country is worth saving, the very man who is pushing this country to the brink of destruction? Are we that placid? Are we that timid? I think not.

The dividing tactic used so effectively in the past is now being recognized, becoming fully understood and being acted upon. There has developed a groundswell of citizens in this nation who are coming forward and volunteering to place the bell around the cat's neck. Indeed, there are many who have a strong desire to hit him over the head with it. There is no man or woman in this country who should have the power to single-handedly determine what is best for the others. No one man or woman should be allowed to assume such power.

This is particularly true of a man who consciously excludes any reference to a higher authority. This omission, in itself, is highly revealing. The charter of rights, the one that has been proposed by this government, makes no mention of the fact that this country was founded upon the conviction that God and not the government is supreme.

The Fathers of Confederation went back to Psalm 72, verse 8:

He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.

The Fathers of Confederation, the men who created this nation, had no trouble accepting the supremacy of God. They did not find the acknowledgement of God a threat to the way in which this country was to be governed. They were simply stating and reaffirming the obvious.

As one of the witnesses appearing before the Constitution committee so eloquently reminded us:

—we were made in the image of God, and that our basic human value comes from that affirmation and that we live constantly in the presence of God.

● (1620)

We do live in the presence of God. We swear solemn oaths in His name. Prayers are held each day in this House before we begin debate. Many members attend weekly prayer breakfasts. The Canadian anthem now asks that God keep our land. Easter and Christmas are times we celebrate with humanity and gratitude. The Bill of Rights of the late Right Hon. John Diefenbaker opens with these words:

The Parliament of Canada, affirming that the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free men and free institutions—

And so on. The government rejected this party's amendment that those words be contained in the government's charter of rights. I believe that any charter of rights which is ultimately incorporated into the Canadian Constitution should make reference to the fact that this nation was founded upon a belief in a supreme being. The charter of rights before us makes no such mention.

Not only does the absence of any reference to God in the proposed charter of rights upset and offend many Canadians; they are also distressed about the lack of mention of a more wordly nature. I speak now of property rights. I have been in the real estate business for many years and I know how important it is to many Canadians to own their own land. People in this country have always worked long and hard—and will continue to do so—and saved money so that they could own a piece of Canada they could call their own.

During my many years in the real estate business many new Canadians came to the area I have the honour to represent from the great city of Toronto. These people were from European and other countries where they had never had a chance to own any land whatever. I naturally assumed they were interested in buying summer cottages on lakes, but that did not interest them in the least. They wanted bigger pieces of land. They ended up buying 100-acre pieces of land with nothing much on them. There might have been roads to them and scrub bush, but that would be all. Some of those lots were purchased for $700, $800 or $1,000. I can see how astute those people were because those lots are now worth ten times or more what was paid for them.

Mr. McKinnon: They had a good real estate agent!

Mr. Darling: That could be correct.

Property rights are a basic desire which creates strength in our nation. That basic desire is inherent in the spirit of free men. It is a basic desire which cannot and should not be denied. This government did agree at one point to accept our recommendation that property rights be enshrined in the charter of rights. Then for purely political reasons the government decided not to honour its commitment. The reason for the abrupt turnabout of the government is very clear. The reason was very opportunistic. The government needed the support of the New Democratic Party. The New Democratic Party informed the government it would not support the government's constitutional package if property rights were included, so what has been proposed is a charter of rights with a fundamental right excluded. Perhaps the government should correct the title of its charter; it should be the "charter of partial rights". The government's proposed charter of rights is not acceptable because partial rights are not acceptable.

The very fact that so many Canadians have spoken out against the charter only reinforces the position taken on this side of the House that patriation of the Constitution with an amending formula acceptable to the provinces should be the sole act of Parliament at this time. Only when this is accomplished should the issue of a charter of rights be dealt with. If the constitutional package is divided in this manner, we will avoid the unnecessary difficulties which are now developing in our relationship with the British parliament.

There is no question that the British would be more than willing to respond favourably to Canada's request. For the life of me I cannot understand why the Prime Minister is forcing the British in this way. Why does he want to make enemies outside the country? He has enough of them right here at home!

The amending formula is a perfect example. Back in 1867 when the British North America Act came into being and this country was born, the Fathers of Confederation decided that this country would be a federal state. Two levels of government were established and each had responsibility and authority over those matters falling within specific spheres of jurisdiction. It has been a working relationship which has served this country well for 114 years.

What the government now proposes through its amending formula and referendum procedure is a dangerous move. It is a move which will do nothing more than continue to divide the nation and undermine the federal state system. It is a move taken by the government with the conscious knowledge that it pits region against region, province against province and minority against minority, all because one man wants his way.

There has been the suggestion that those members of the government who are uneasy and privately opposed to letting the Prime Minister have his way on the issue are keeping silent because of the "gold watch" syndrome. A departing employee is given a gold watch from his firm and fellow workers for his years of service. The Prime Minister's gold watch, it is said, will be the patriation of the Constitution and the charter of rights.

Mr. Ellis: A very expensive watch!

Mr. Darling: What my colleague says is quite right. I urge hon. members opposite to consider very carefully what they are doing. If this is what they are doing, they will have to face the fact that there will be no one in the country able to repair this watch when its mechanism falls apart, as it surely will. All the Prime Minister really deserves is a simple watch, probably a Timex. I would be only too happy to supply him with one, especially if it would hasten his retirement.

It has been said that humour lessens pain and that we only laugh when it hurts. Well, it hurts. It hurts me and many other Canadians to see this magnificent nation of ours in such turmoil. It hurts to see what is happening to Canada because of that impregnable barrier of indifference with which the Prime Minister surrounds himself. It hurts to witness the damage he is doing and to know what he wants to do to this once proud and growing land. We will no longer accept the pain, and the time has come to put an end to this headache.

The resolution we have before us must not be passed. It is riddled with injustice. What the government is proposing is destructive. It is time for all Members of Parliament to put their country ahead of party loyalty. We must remember that because of a willingness on the part of all Canadians to co-operate, to sacrifice and to work together for the well-being of the entire nation, Canada, in its short lifetime, has flourished. The Canadian people have not stopped caring; they still believe this country is worth caring for.

Canadians who realize how fortunate they are to be living in such a magnificent country care very much. The riches of this nation are not measured only in terms of forest products, oil, wheat, minerals and other products we use and export; the great wealth of this country also includes its human resources, people who take silent and undemonstrative pride in calling themselves Canadians. It once was fashionable to call such people the silent majority. Well, that silence is being broken. The people who care are now making themselves heard.

The voices of a great many people in this country are being raised in anger about the fact that the government is setting in motion changes to the fundamental structure of this nation which will have grave consequences for the future. There is anger at the fact that such changes are being implemented with complete disregard for the will of the majority.

There is anger that such changes bypass and ignore many concepts Canadians deem important to what may be termed the Canadian identity. The Canadian identity is not as elusive as many people may think. We know what it means to be a Canadian. It means we are part of a nation of free and proud people who treasure that freedom and pride and who work not only to maintain but to assist others less fortunate in the world. It means we are part of a community of nations, the Commonwealth, whose head is Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth the Second.

Recognition and acceptance of the monarchy is not a threat to Canada's freedom or pride. The monarchy serves only to enhance both. The monarchy does not imply a subservient role. The monarchy only serves to reinforce our position of prominence and stature in a community of nations. The monarchy does not seek to intrude; the monarchy only seeks to provide a link for the common good.

Over the years, the Liberal government has attempted, bit by bit, to erode that link. The Liberal government seeks to establish a Liberal identity in place of a Canadian identity. The present resolution before us makes it quite clear. The monarchy is important to Canada and Canadians understand this. Canadians are also beginning to understand that the Liberal government, through its proposed charter of rights, is removing control over certain legislation from the people's elected representatives.

I will speak now about the issues of capital punishment and abortion. This party proposed that there be included in the charter of rights a new section which would ensure that no provision of the charter would be used by a court to determine the issues of capital punishment and abortion, and that Parliament be allowed to legislate with respect to these delicate issues. The resolution before us offers no such safeguard.

These are two issues the fate of which must be decided by the people through their elected representatives. They are moral issues which cannot, and must not, be decided by the courts. By shifting the responsibility to the courts, this government seeks to avoid dealing with matters under its jurisdiction and deprives the people of Canada of a voice in the forum of debate.

The voice of the people of Canada is of paramount importance. It is here in the House of Commons that the Canadian voice is heard and acted upon. All too often the government has turned a deaf ear to that voice and to that of members of the House who enlarge on what is being said, and all too often the Prime Minister orders a limit to debate when what is being said contradicts his notion of what is right and what is wrong for the people of Canada. It is highly possible that he is about to act in the same arbitrary manner over the debate on the patriation of the Constitution.

It is appropriate at this time to remind members of the House that the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) stated categorically that every member of the House would have the opportunity to speak on this issue. I presume such an assurance was not given lightly, and I say to the Deputy Prime Minister and government House leader that we certainly expect that all members of Parliament will have the opportunity to speak. I and my colleagues accept the right to debate the substance and style of the government's constitutional proposal, a proposal the style of which is as damaging as its substance. Because the issue before us is of such grave importance, it is the right of each and every member to have the opportunity to speak. For the Prime Minister and the government to invoke closure at some point during the debate would be an affront to members of the House and to the Canadian people. I would therefore call upon the government—

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have listened with great interest to the point of view expressed by the hon. member during his speech and I have noticed that he has been speaking now for 25 minutes. May I point out that the House leader of the official opposition stated earlier this afternoon, with approval, that hon. members on the government side had limited their speeches to 20 minutes and that only two of their members spoke a day. He stated that this was an example which members on his side would follow.

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Lalonde: I wonder if members on the hon. member's side would listen to their House leader.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on this spurious point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): That is not a point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a legitimate point of order. You should prevent such spurious acts on the part of ministers who should know better. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) is trying to smuggle in a point of debate under the guise of a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. I accept the argument that this was not a point of order. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) has the floor.

Mr. Darling: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the comments of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde).

Mr. Nielsen: I don't.

Mr. Darling: As was mentioned several times here, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources makes lengthy speeches here from time to time, but he has not produced too much. He is probably the member most responsible for the mess in which we find ourselves today. He is responsible for the high cost of energy.

An hon. Member: He is also dishonest.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Darling: Our leader, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark)—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Darling: I am not out of order. Do not worry about that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition had made an agreement with the province of Alberta, but over a year later the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has not produced anything.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Darling: As a result, we are paying through the nose. It is about time he left the House and headed for Alberta. It is about time he came up with a deal and it is about time he started to give in a bit.

Mr. Nielsen: Let him speak to the oil people and the real estate people over there.

Mr. Darling: I know that time and time again all of us have read many comments on this. I will mention the fact that when this resolution was presented to the House by the Prime Minister—I believe it was on October 2—one of the few times in the last few years that he has spoken in the House, our leader walked out. I can still see it. Our leader stated he was against this resolution, and I put my hand up to my face and said "Wow, what is this?" I was very skeptical of the position taken by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, I will admit that to the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Irwin) who is pointing to me.

Mr. Irwin: You were right.

Mr. Darling: I was wrong, as the people of Canada eventually decided, because, may I point out to the almighty Cabinet opposite, 64 per cent of the people of Canada are against the government's unilateral, autocratic, and high-handed way of dealing with this question. Even the great columnists, the $100,000 a year columnists, who were the mouthpieces of the Prime Minister and of some of the hierarchy over there have changed their views.

An hon. Member: Fotheringham and Stevens.

Mr. Darling: Yes, Fotheringham and so on. You can mention all of them. Here is a columnist—

An hon. Member: It must be Lubor Zink.

Mr. Darling: That is right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: Just a minute, before you clap too much.

Mr. Lalonde: What about Bill Davis?

Mr. Darling: Mr. Lubor Zink is not the greatest advocate or admirer of the Prime Minister. We see here the headline "Not the first lie or the last". Here is another article in which the Prime Minister is quoted as having said "I am not a dictator".

Mr. Lalonde: Quote Bill Davis.

Mr. Darling: Here is another one. This is a special one of Mr. Lubor Zink's, and I ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to listen with care. The headline of this article reads "Tyrannical Brat".

In French, Mr. Minister, in French!

Some hon. Members: Encore! Encore!

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, my French is very flimsy, and very vocal.

[English]

I wish I could speak better French. Instead of being taught to speak French in my six years of high school in Toronto, I was taught how to spell the words and to put the accents this way or the other. If I had been taught how to speak French at that time, I would be able to speak it much better now.

Instead of launching into one of his sometimes harsh comments, Mr. Lubor Zink wrote the following article:

On February 9, Le Devoir carried a column which packs more critical punch than anything I have seen printed in English. Even rainmaker Keith Davey will be hard put to dismiss the devastating blast in French as "lunatic fringe extremism," for neither the paper nor the writer can be branded with that iron. Shaped for years by Claude Ryan (now Quebec Liberal party leader)—

No doubt the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources knows Mr. Ryan and has considerable respect for him. The article continues:

—, Le Devoir at one time carried articles by Trudeau's close friend Gerard Pelletier (now Canada's Ambassador in Paris). By any standards, it is a highly respected and influential independent Montreal daily.

Would the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources concede that? No, he will not concede that. The article continues:

It has no use for separatism. Its learnings, if you look hard enough to detect any, are impeccably "progressive."

For those who do not read French or would find it difficult to get hold of the February 9 issue of Le Devoir, I have made a rough translation of a few samples from Jacques Poisson's "Les fantasmes de M. Trudeau" (Mr. Trudeau's delusions) column. I tried to preserve the flavor but both the cadence and the punch are better, I assure you, in the French original. Just the same, everything printed in English about our peerless leader pales in comparison.

"It's becoming more and more evident," says Poisson, "that our Prime Minister is succumbing to domination delusions which may date back to his adolescent dreams. This may explain the arrogant forcing of his will on Britain while he misrepresents that country as a menace.

"He sees himself dominating the British Parliament and the Commonwealth, the French National Assembly, the international francophone community, nine out of ten of Canada's provinces, the Liberal Party, the NDP, North-South relations between the rich and the poor countries—

"Our Prime Minister certainly is a person outside and above all rules. It's not surprising any more than he plays fast and loose with traditions, customs, concepts and the vocabulary.

"It's not unusual for him to twist words to serve his despotic vision of reality. For example, he accuses Britain of trying to interfere in Canadian affairs at the very moment when the British show profound repugnance of Ottawa's mix of supplications and ultimata—

"It is said that our Prime Minister has found pleasure in grimacing behind the back of the Queen, thumbing his nose at heads of states at international meetings, rump-bumping Mrs. Thatcher, and in snickering at the BNA Act."—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has now expired. He may continue only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington)—Small Business—Representations respecting independent retail sector of petroleum industry; the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche)—The Constitution—Query whether charter of rights covers unborn children; the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky)—Communications—AM radio transmission—Proposed change in dial positions.

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Louis R. Desmarais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I believe I can shed some light on the debate because of my status as a French-speaking Canadian raised in an English-speaking province without, of course, presuming that either my personal feelings or political convictions run deeper than those of my esteemed colleagues, whatever their vision of the shape of our country's future. My background as a Canadian whose mother tongue is French, who was born and raised in Sudbury, Ontario, but who has been a Quebecer by adoption for the past 15 years, entitles me to offer a perspective based on live experience rather than abstract considerations.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, let me briefly attempt to answer the basic question around which all subsequent debate must revolve: why does Canada need a new constitution? The reasons—which for so many peoples of the world are self-evident—are, unfortunately, often clouded and confused by our country's peculiar history, traditions, social evolution and development to nationhood. Unlike the great republic to the south, with which we share the longest undefended border in the world, Canada's birth was gradual and discreet, without cannon fire or trumpet blast, battle hymn, slogan or philosophy designed to turn the world upside-down. There are even those who maintain that the British North America Act was, in reality, little more than a trade pact, aimed at establishing harmonious interaction between Upper and Lower Canada, while providing a measure of solidarity against the danger of a takeover by the expanding United States.

But whatever the motives of Westminster, the coming of confederation in 1867 marked the beginning of our gradual drift toward the realization of our identity, our uniqueness, our right to take our place among the sovereign nations of the earth. Now it is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that in the absence of armed conflict or violent rupture, Canadians felt no immediate urgency in establishing a distinctive identity. But as the decades passed, the generations came and went, pressures inevitably began to build for a distinctive flag, national anthem, and finally, for our own Constitution, which would reflect the ideals and aspirations of all the diverse elements which have contributed to the building of our nation.

But why, many still ask, do we have to have a written constitution?

Why not just go along with the provisions of the BNA Act which, they argue, has served Canada well for more than a century?

Why not carry on in the British tradition of reliance on precedent, custom and jurisprudence, instead of attempting to enshrine fundamental principles in law?

Mr. Speaker, the initial answer is that Canada is not a nation-state like Britain or many of its European counterparts. This country is a mosaic, made up of people from every corner of the globe, of widely different origins, customs and backgrounds. Thus, to rely merely on implied consensus, deriving from the common ideals of a homogeneous population, is patently unworkable and unjust in this country today.

Moreover, we must realize that, despite our attachment to elements of custom and tradition, deriving from language and cultural ties with our European ancestors, Canadians are North Americans, we are North Americans who have elected to live within a federation. Thus, in defining our political structures realism dictates that, while we may draw on the experience of another federation such as Switzerland, coupled with what we deem most valuable in the systems of European nation-states, the end result must be a faithful reflection of our own distinctiveness. All very well and good, is the reaction of some to arguments such as the foregoing, but, they ask, why not confine our Constitution to a general statement of principle, a declaration of de jure sovereignty to ratify the de facto sovereignty Canada has already established with past actions, such as its separate declaration of war in the last world conflict.

And it is here, Mr. Speaker, that we get to the nub of current opposition to the government's constitutional proposals. And objections range all the way from global mistrust of constitutional definition of rights under a Canadian charter of individual rights and freedoms, to taking of issue with specific provisions, such as the entrenchment of language rights. In the absence of any specific guarantees, Canada, in fact, tends to follow the British tradition of the primacy of "law, order and good government" when the chips are really down.

So, despite the illusions fostered through the impact of American films, television and the like, but in the absence of specifically defined constitutional guarantees of individual rights, there is a less dramatic but more serious aspect involving infringement.

Recent examples might include imposition of the War Measures Act in 1970 or, in the more distant past, the wartime internment of Canadians of Japanese origin—is deemed bureaucratic expediency at all levels of government.

This lies in the development over decades of a mass of statutory regulations—often constituting a maze of contradictory confusion where personal freedoms are ignored or trampled over roughshod in the interest of what Canadians have to face the reality of just how easily basic human rights can be suppressed or ignored under our existing system.

Most serious consequence of this—as the Canadian Bar Association has pointed out—can be seen in the administration of criminal law. In this area, the Bar Association maintains there are instances where the administration process allows no public debate and, consequently, no consideration of civil liberties involved. As a result, people feel powerless to challenge the system and become either alienated from what they regard as the tyranny of the establishment, or simply bow in resigned, meek deference to authority. Is this how we want our free citizenry to behave? Is this any example to put before the world for a nation which subscribes to the United Nations' Charter of Human Rights and aspires to a role as mediator and peacemaker in today's world? While not going quite so far as to advocate adoption of the United States citizens' basic attitude of resistance and rebellion, when individual rights are suppressed or arbitrary measures become intolerable, I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that we require a drastic change of attitude.

If we are ever to break out of this stifling web of statutory regulations, which may differ not only from province to province, but from parish to parish, if we are to ensure that inequities in administration of criminal law are to be eliminated as far as is humanly possible, we must rid ourselves of the notion that the Anglo-Saxon reliance on decency and fair play is adequate to our needs today.

The reality is that we are a federation, living within a North American context in a very imperfect world.

And we are now, I firmly believe, sufficiently mature as a people to decide exactly what democratic, legal, political, language or other rights we wish and intend to enjoy. And then we should take pride in spelling out these fundamental freedoms in clear and concise terms, so that our convictions are manifest not only to ourselves, but to all peoples of the world.

● (1650)

This brings me, Mr. Speaker, to what is perhaps the most sensitive area of the proposed Constitution—entrenchment of minority language rights. Although the perspective on this question may vary widely in accordance with a host of factors, such as geographic location, ethnic origin, individual goals in life and so on, there can be little doubt today that it remains crucial to the future survival and development of our nation. Over the past couple of decades alone it is safe to say that no other single issue has generated such sustained heat and controversy. Governments have grappled with the problem, some coming to subsequent grief at the polls, following legislative attempts which may have half pleased one segment of the population while infuriating another.

In my own province of Quebec I am reminded of the Union Nationale's controversial Bill-63, a direct result of the St. Leonard language riots of the late 1960s, of Premier Bourassa's equally ill-starred Bill-22 language law and, finally, of Premier Levesque's Bill-101, now a "cause célèbre", the impact and implications of which are still being assessed. Given this record of dissent and disaster, an outsider might well be forgiven for asking the simple question: Why? There is not a simple answer to this question, as any serious student of linguistics well knows. The roots of the matter run deep indeed, drawing their sustenance from the subtle psyche of the people.

But allow me, Mr. Speaker, to offer a more concrete example based on my personal experience. As I mentioned earlier, I was born and raised in Subdury, Ontario. French was the language of my home and I was able to attend elementary school in that language. But when it came time to go on to the secondary level, there was no French school then available in that Ontario town. So my parents were obliged to send me to Ottawa, simply to complete my pre-university education in the tongue they considered theirs by birthright and mine by inheritance. This, you might feel, was no great tragedy in those days, merely a mild trauma common to language minority children everywhere. But Canada was my country. The fact that the language through which I have learned to interpret life had second-class status set me to wondering about the quality of my citizenship.

Again, the Canadian Bar Association has summed up this feeling of alienation very succinctly with the blunt assertion that "constitutional language guarantees are required if Quebecers are to continue to feel that Canada is their country". This touches the very heart of the matter. It is not enough, nowhere nearly enough today, for French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec to rely on the much-vaunted declarations of intent or expressions of good will in this basic area of language.

Where is the intrinsic dignity, the vital sense of belonging, in such an arrangement? Can we create a proud citizenry out of a segment of our population condemned to receive its identity as a charity from the hands of some latter-day Lady Bountiful?

Of course, it is in recognition of this that governments in Quebec have made their agonized attempts to legislate such dignity. For its part, the federal government has gone as far as it can, giving bilingualism force of law in those fields over which it has jurisdiction. But under the present provisions of the BNA Act these areas are clearly restricted, with the result that access to minority language education still depends on the benevolence of the provincial governments. It is for this reason that we propose to entrench minority language rights in our Constitution as part of the charter of rights and freedoms.

What those opposing such entrenchment apparently fail to grasp is that very much more is at stake here than just the sense of identity and dignity of one of this country's two founding peoples. Quite clearly the corollary is that Canada's continued unity itself depends on successful inculcation of this vital sense of belonging. For despite the smokescreens created by the raising of economic and other issues over the recent decades of acute Quebec unrest, the language question is and has been at the heart of the issue.

It has become a truism to point out that, through use of its two official languages both at home and abroad, Canada has managed to maintain a measure of distinctness vis-à-vis the all-pervasive culture of the United States. But if Canada as a whole oft-times fears drowning in this American tidal wave, just imagine the apprehensions of Quebec and our four million unilingual French-speaking fellow Canadians who live there, surrounded by an English language ocean of more than 250 million—the most powerful, technologically advanced and wealthiest society in the world. Just try to envisage the fears, trepidations and uncertainties of the French-speaking Quebecer, and how these fears are increased a hundredfold for his counterpart outside his home province.

Thus there is no doubt in my mind that the language issue has always been, and remains, at the root of any Quebec independence movement, and the continued discrimination against French-speaking minorities in other parts of this land constitutes a major force for national disunity.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that I must make the point here that French-speaking Canadians no longer believe that this is any particular person's fault. They realize that there is no devious Anglo-Saxon plot to eliminate their language.

An hon. Member: There never was.

Mr. Desmarais: The threat stems from a historical and geopolitical accident of circumstances, not necessarily from any ill will in the hearts of their English language compatriots or American neighbours. But this realization does nothing to make the danger any less real. And what thinking Quebecers fear most of all is the nightmare possibility that mere force of geographic and economic circumstances could lead to a gradual degeneration of their language to a folkloric level. They are now aware of instances elsewhere in the world where a language, culture and an entire people have slipped into a sort of twilight zone, providing a curiosity for tourists who come to see the natives "who talk funny".

Again, the modern day science of linguistics has made it abundantly clear that the very quality of our individual thought processes depends directly on the quality and precision of the language we use. All abstract concepts—for example, honour, courage, justice, equity and even love—are intangibles, impalpable ideas which exist only through words and their employment in our syntax. Thus it follows that if this precision is blunted, if this syntax is distorted through deterioration of language, the thought processes themselves inevitably degenerate. And we end up with something less than a full human being.

Now I am not, of course, suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that mere constitutional entrenchment of language rights will solve this problem, any more than will Quebec's Bill-101. I have made the point rather as a form of appeal to those opposed to such entrenchment to endeavour to look at the situation from another person's point of view.

It is, in essence, an appeal—perhaps I should even say a heartfelt plea—for realization that French-speaking Canadians are desperately in need of understanding and support from their English language fellow citizens. And this need, though often concealed beneath truculence and aggressiveness, is as poignantly real today as at any time in our country's history. From one Canadian to another it is, in fact, a cry for help.

In light of the foregoing, it is difficult to comprehend the opposition to the government's proposal for a truly Canadian Constitution. At the Victoria conference of 1970, it should be recalled, all provinces agreed to the principle of entrenchment of political rights in a new Constitution. At the 1977 New Brunswick premiers' conference, all provincial government heads again pledged to set up machinery to ensure access to minority language education facilities across the country, where warranted by sufficient population. This principle was ratified at subsequent premiers' meetings in Montreal and has since, apparently, remained an avowed goal.

At the same time, Premier Lévesque offered his provincial counterparts a formula for reciprocity covering minority language education rights. Now that such reciprocity is, in essence, being proposed in a constitutional charter which would be beyond the whims of any transitory majority, it is difficult indeed to see how the present Quebec government could find credible grounds for objection; nor are there, as far as I can determine, Mr. Speaker, any serious objections to the principle of placing wealth sharing, through equalization, beyond any such transitory tampering.

Thus we are forced to the conclusion that, with a majority of Canadians in favour of bringing home the Constitution, of the principle of entrenchment of basic rights, including language mobility and equalization, opposition is aimed at form rather than substance. Therefore, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to deal with this aspect in the concluding portion of my remarks today.

Now, examination of the substance of such opposition, in addition to the representations heard by our parliamentary committee, makes it clear that even most hon. members across the floor here are in favour of the thrust of the government's proposals. And this, in turn, places responsibility for any move to block our Constitution squarely on the shoulders of dissenting provincial governments. But in this respect I would like to make one pertinent observation. This is that, at the time when the Quebec sovereignty-association referendum campaign was in full swing, all other provincial premiers—some through their very silence—quite clearly indicated tacit consent to the federal government's pledge to initiate immediate steps for patriation and amendment of the Constitution. Some went further and openly supported the promise that, if the No forces were to win—that is, if a majority of Quebecers voted to remain in Canada and give federalism another chance—they would help see to it that prompt constitutional change was forthcoming.

Well, optimistic Quebec voters took them at their word and the referendum result passed into history. And almost immediately, it appears, the hedging began.

Is it really possible, one wonders, that the rest of Canada really believes that one such referendum vote has wiped out any threat to Canadian unity? Can governments and electorates actually convince themselves that Quebec's fears, malaise, unrest and the independence movement itself have now been laid to rest and the remainder of the country can slide back into the "good old days?" It would be tragic indeed, Mr. Speaker, if our provincial leaders once again wore their two solitudes blinkers. But even more distressing—more potentially disruptive and dangerous—would be realization by Canadians that some provinces are now coldly determined to renege on the pre-referendum constitutional reform consensus for purely partisan, regional or electoral interests.

As a Canadian who remains a convinced federalist and has a sincere faith in the basic integrity of his fellow citizens, I would like to believe that such is not the case. Let us take a look at the substance of the objections to the government's proposed machinery for bringing home our Constitution and its subsequent amendment by Canadians and for Canadians. First of all, much is being made of what is termed the government's "unilateral" action in pressing ahead with patriation without obtaining prior unanimous approval of every detail from the provinces.

We have been floundering over this issue for about half a century now and there is no reason to believe that, if we have to wait for total unanimity on every question, we will be any further ahead in another fifty years' time. Thus I strongly suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the notion of prior unanimity—not only in the constitutional area, but in any fallible, human organism—is an elusive and virtually unobtainable ideal. We have allowed this myth, this bugbear, to block and cripple all our previous attempts to give ourselves a constitution of our own. I sometimes wonder just what we must look like here in the eyes of the rest of the world. This must not be allowed to happen again. Now that we have the impetus, we have got to press ahead, or reconcile ourselves to the realization that we are not really the mature people we would like to believe.

But it has become increasingly clear over recent decades, Mr. Speaker, that if we wait for perfection, we will wait forever. Thus, we have no choice but to bite the bullet and act now, while the majority impetus remains the driving force. And all those raising academic arguments against what they see fit to deem "unilateral" action in this respect, might do well to consider that the alternative to "now" is almost certainly "never".

This leads naturally to the second area of objection to the machinery—rather than the principle—of the government's patriation proposals: the amending formula. Recognition of the ever-present factor of human fallibility, of the virtual impossibility of total unanimity and of the need to avoid future constitutional stagnation, provides the basis for the proposed amending formula. But this has been carefully shaped to ensure that regional interests will remain forever protected from arbitrary constitutional change, effected by a simply majority of the country's population. Now this formula will clearly provide veto powers over certain areas of constitutional amendment for each of the country's four major regions. Again, it is a break of the futile ideal of unanimity, which past experience has shown all too painfully, would merely hamstring any future constitutional reform. Thus I submit that a formula along the lines proposed by our government has the dual advantage of providing for effective regional veto powers, while still permitting the people of this country to envisage realistically any constitutional reform clearly destined to enhance the over-all lifestyle of all Canadians.

On the question of the use of a referendum for popular ratification of any amending formula or subsequent constitutional change, I should make it clear that basic human rights must remain unaffected. This means that, as laid out in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, such provisions could never be withdrawn or altered merely by a referendum majority vote. Improvements, however, could always be made. That is, additional rights and freedoms could be added to the charter, in the light of experience and to meet needs not covered in the present proposals. Thus the charter would remain for all time inviolable, protecting our people, while itself protected from any threat from the transient "tyranny of the majority".

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully urge all members to reflect seriously, until we vote on the proposed constitutional resolution, upon the words of the outstanding parliamentarian Lord Acton, and I quote:

The maturity of a society is measured by the maturity with which this society treats its minorities—

In concluding, I appeal to the maturity of all members to get on with the work. Despite our differences and endless debates in certain areas of disagreement, I remain convinced that there is infinitely more to unite than to divide us. Our future, our potential in people and resources sometimes staggers the imagination. What we are striving for now is some sort of common denominator which can bring it all together for the common good.

● (1710)

[English]

Madam Speaker, if there is one thought which I would like to emphasize and to leave with you in concluding my remarks today, let me repeat Lord Acton's words: "The maturity of a society is measured by the maturity with which this society treats its minorities."

Despite our differences and seemingly endless debate in certain areas of disagreement, I remain convinced that there is and has always been infinitely more to unite than to divide us. Our future, our potential in people and resources, sometimes staggers the imagination. It is all there. What we are striving for now is some sort of common denominator which can bring it all together for the common good.

Let us get started. Let us get to work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A very good speech. A very useful contribution.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by congratulating the previous speaker, the hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Desmarais), on his remarks. He expressed in his speech considerable wisdom and the strength of feeling was evident to us all.

My congratulations, however, centre on the fact that he followed a spurious point of order interjected by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) which bothered me a great deal. The minister said to the House that the 147 members who represent the Liberal party would be restricted to 20-minute speeches on an issue that is so important. I congratulate the hon. member for Dollard for taking almost the full 40 minutes to which his constituents are entitled. I think he used the time well to express a point of view which I cannot share in most respects, but which I can honour. I hope future speakers from the other side will take their responsibility to their constituents and to this Parliament seriously and take the time they need to bring to the floor of this House the message that they think they have to give. I hope they will not be muzzled by the wishes of cabinet ministers or the House leader.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Well said.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak as a Canadian from Alberta. I rise as a citizen within this federation, someone who values my freedom, my right to vote for a school board, a municipal or county government, a provincial legislature or this federal House of Commons.

In my province exactly 100 people are elected to serve in the legislature and the House of Commons, 79 in our provincial government and 21 in this House. I rise to report that 99 of those 100 people who represent the people of our province in a free, democratic way are totally and unalterably opposed to the present process and to the consequences of that process.

The hon. member for Dollard talked about national unity and the need for some changes relative to the people who live in the province of Quebec. In my brief intervention before this House today I will talk about the threat to national unity which this proposed constitutional amendment carries with it in my province and in my riding. That threat is real and it must be attended; it must be given consideration before it is too late.

Last night I attended Baltic night, an event which occurs once a year on Parliament Hill. The thrust of Baltic night and the message which is delivered to parliamentarians by the Baltic people centres exclusively on the need for vigilance, on the protection of our freedom. That is the message from Baltic night and it is particularly appropriate that I have the opportunity to speak on the Constitution of Canada the day after attending Baltic night. I had the opportunity to listen to the refugees from unitary, totalitarian states warn us about the dangers to freedom and to see that concern is passed through generations to the young people who belong to the Baltic states.

I rise in this House today to clarify a couple of matters. First, I attended 50 of the 56 sitting days of the committee which met on the Constitution of Canada and for a whole year prior to that I spent at least as many hours outside of that committee tyring to comprehend the nature of constitutions and the impact which they might have on a nation such as Canada. Through that kind of diligence I think one deserves the opportunity to speak in this House.

Second, this debate, in its initial short time in this House, in the Constitution committee itself and now at this phase, has demonstrated a great deal of difference between the members opposite and the members who serve in the official opposition. I believe the difference relates to the fact that members of the Liberal Party will give speech after speech centring on goals. On this side of the House we have no quarrel with the goals, but whether I appear on television with ministers of the Crown, in committee with Liberal members or whether I listen to speeches in the House of Commons, I think it is curious that members opposite seldom deal with the fine print. They seldom deal with the reality of what is written in this resolution. They seldom deal with the nature of Canada and the way we are governed; nor do they deal with the intrusion this particular legislation will make into our lives.

I think of this resolution we are debating today as a secret revolution. That it is a revolution, I have no doubt; and I will expound on that later. The fact that this is being done with a measure of secrecy, though not total secrecy, I also have no doubt; and I shall expound on that also. The revolution occurs in two ways. One way has been talked about a little, but the other way is seldom talked about. The revolution in the way we will be governed in the future will hit anyone who gives this measure serious study. It is a revolution related to the power of the people and to the supremacy of the voters of this country. This resolution will take away those powers from the people. That in itself is a revolutionary concept in its magnitude and repercussions.

It is also a revolution in both its process and its substance which attempts to dismantle the federal system. I wish to deal with both of these in what I hope might be understandable ways, not only for members of this House—and I have found it helpful in achieving my own degree of clarity—but also for those who watch our proceedings from time to time through the medium of television. What I say may help them.

The principle on which this nation was founded, one which continues to this day, is that the voters are supreme. When we elect our school boards, municipal and county councils, our provincial legislatures, or this House of Commons, what we do is elect juries or peers to represent us in a decision-making process. In these forums the majority rules and we are governed. But critical to that is the notion that periodically, every three, four or five years, the voters of this country for each of those bodies have the power and the responsibility to decide whether or not the same people shall continue to govern in their areas of jurisdiction or a different group of people shall govern.

For instance, in the recent municipal elections in the city of Calgary, the latter course was chosen. The entire public school board was changed; half of the separate school board was changed, half of the city council was changed and a new mayor was elected because the voters of the city of Calgary had that democratic right and power to change the jury. I think for those who care about freedom there is nothing more important to protect than that power which lies in universal suffrage in the ballot which all of us enjoy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hawkes: The Liberal Party, aided and abetted by some members of the New Democratic Party, is attempting in secret to take that power away from the people and to give it to a jury of nine people, of which five of the nine shall rule. The government is not changing the process of the selection of the nine. That process today, and in the fine print of this resolution, which will be continued, is the selection of those nine people, largely in secret and chosen essentially by one person. That is the nature of the revolution.

There may be value, and I would assert there is value, in handing over to the courts some additional responsibility. But I think that should be matched by a great deal more care and attention. As we increase those responsibilities, then we need to deal with the mechanism of selection to ensure that we, as free people, retain control of that jury as well. Certainly when we attempt to take away from Canadian voters the power to choose who shall govern them, we should do it with a great deal more care, attention and time than we are devoting to the way we are doing it now.

Do I find this denial of the supremacy of voters to be discrepant through the last 12 or 13 years? I do not. There is a school of thought in philosophy and political science which must be described as an attitude portrayed by those who believe in oligarchies, those who believe that somehow there is an elite class of rulers who somehow have more wisdom and knowledge than others, and that this elite class shall rule. If we look back over the last 12 or 13 years, those years which bring us to this point in constitutional revision, we can see that mind set in operation. The growth to 400 Crown corporations in its basic element represents the fact that we have turned over jurisdiction in 400 areas of our lives to small boards of directors who are not chosen after public examination but are simply appointed.

We get into great debates in this House about patronage appointments, but we cannot have access to information from Crown corporations. These are hot topics for a day or two and then forgotten, but the sum total of 12 or 13 years is the fact that just at the federal level alone we have over 400 of those kinds of groups. That is the consequence of a philosophy which believes in oligarchy.

One of the big issues faced in this House with great frequency in recent times is the energy issue. We argue occasionally about Petro-Canada, its growth, and its development. I ask members of this House how the directors of Petro-Canada were chosen. Do they know their names? What are their qualifications? Are they good at what they do? Hon. members choose to expand that organization and its influence over our lives without the kind of careful consideration that should go into the selection of those people.

How is it that a corporation that is worth $3.5 billion only had a profit of $13 million at a time when other oil companies are being accused of excess profits? Does it relate in any way, shape or form to the method we use in choosing who shall govern? Why do we so willingly give those few people such an expanded role? Have they earned it? Are they subject to recall?

I would like to read the first paragraph of Beauchesne's. Soon after I was elected to this House in May, 1979, I was given a copy of Beauchesne. For those of the general population who do not serve in this House and may not know Beauchesne, it is a book which attempts to tell members of Parliament, new or old, their rights and responsibilities. The first paragraph deals with the principles of parliamentary law and reads as follows:

> The principles that lie at the basis of English parliamentary law, have always been kept steadily in view by the Canadian Parliament; these are: To protect a minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority; to secure the transaction of public business in an orderly manner; to enable every member to express his opinions within limits necessary to preserve decorum and prevent an unnecessary waste of time; to give abundant opportunity for the consideration of every measure; and to prevent any legislative action being taken upon sudden impulse.

That is the responsibility of each and every member who serves in this House. We should put that in perspective and just deal with two of the key points, to "restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority" and "to give abundant opportunity for the consideration of every measure, and to prevent any legislative action being taken upon sudden impulse." If all members, regardless of party affiliation, who accept the responsibility of sitting in this House, were to take those responsibilities seriously, how would we feel about the process in which we are presently engaged? I suggest we should at least be nervous about the extent to which we are discharging that responsibility adequately.

I said there were two aspects to the resolution. One was the denigration of the power of the individual voter. The second was the dismantling of the federal system. Of those two issues, the most difficult to comprehend is the dismantling of the federal system.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) and others on that side indicated that there is no rearrangement of powers in this country. I think I have built a reasonable case to show that the powers of the voters have been diminished. However, those on the other side seem to leave us with the notion that the rights and privileges of the governments elected in the provinces are not seriously affected.

I ask members opposite, and anybody watching us today, to get a copy of this resolution. It will be seen that the provinces are specifically referred to 31 times in the resolution. If their powers are not to be significantly affected, why is it necessary to refer to provincial legislatures 31 times?

A federal system is not built on a principle of decentralization. If you examine the experts and constitutional theory, you find it is built on the principle of non-centralization. It is a form of government which does not exist universally throughout the world, or even universally throughout the free world, but it exists in some countries, not because it is preferred but because it is the best of government for a particular nation and its people.

The Fathers of Confederation and those who up to this point have been responsible for the affairs of the nation were and have been wise in the extent to which they have done their best to pay attention to the fact that any successful federation will adhere to the principle of non-centralization. Within that concept it is important to note that the various political entities, the various kinds of government in a true federation, are sovereign in their areas of jurisdiction. That has been the understanding in this nation until this point, that that sovereignty of jurisdiction exists constitutionally. It does today, and it cannot be taken away unilaterally without the agreement of those who are affected. To do that constitutes a revolution. It runs counter to any basic understanding of what a federation is all about.

The importance of the notion of a federation in a nation like Canada is twofold. This process we are engaged in today demonstrates clearly the importance of protection from arbitrary action by a transitory majority in a single level of government. Where would we be today if we did not have more than one level of government to object to the revolution which is being attempted in this House? The voters of this country need to be protected from the tyranny of transitory majorities, and I suggest that it is our federation and the interplay between the different constituent elements which provide us with that protection. Because of the size of this nation, territorial democracy is an important concept, and those who would deny the importance of that concept invite us all to run the risk of separation of the nation.

The true nature of a federation involves legal jurisdiction, and hon. members opposite, today and on other days, in addressing themselves to the amending formula have talked about its fairness because every region is represented. Where in this federation is there a regional government? In this federation we have ten provincial governments, the government of Yukon, and the government of the Northwest Territories. We do not have regional governments. We have provincial governments. That is the nature of this federation, and those are our nation's states. The provinces have legal jurisdictions guaranteed in the Constitution of Canada, and it is the Liberal government which is unilaterally trying to take those guarantees away from the Canadian people. I suggest that will not wash.

It is interesting to note also that scholars of federations talk not just about legal jurisdiction, but they also talk about the spirit and the practices of a federation. The spirit involves honouring the partnership and acknowledging that we are a federation, and to ignore the spirit is to weaken the spirit and weaken the will to survive. It is like a marriage. A marriage licence is a very simple, straightforward document. Not much is written on it. The terms and conditions are not specified, but those evolve and marriages last and prosper if the partners work at it. They decay and split apart if the need for parnership is not acknowledged and partnership is not worked at.

Today we have a situation in which eight of the ten provincial governments and the governments of both the Yukon and Northwest Territories—ten of the 12 governments which represent the areas of this country—are opposed to these constitutional amendments. I think it behooves all of us to think of that. If that opposition can be overcome by legal means which do not pay attention to the spirit and the practices of the federation, then what will happen to this nation? Are those risks worth running for all parts of this package?

I have said in committee and to the Minister of Justice that this proposal attempts to separate Canadians from their governing traditions, their legal traditions, and their economic traditions. The best word I can think of to describe those who support it is "separatist". Those who seek to separate are in fact the true separatists in this confederation of ours.

In my attendance at the constitutional committee hearings I thought that perhaps with the passage of time and process we might arrive at a Constitution which I felt was supportable, but in my attendance at those committee hearings I was an unwilling participant in a bad process, and we have produced a bad resolution which will not do good things for Canada.

I have sat many times and thought about what would constitute a good process. Perhaps I will just sketch that out briefly for the House. I think a good process of constitutional renewal would begin with an invitation to Canadians in all walks of life—whatever their responsibilities or stations—to submit to some central place their ideas on the constitutional problems which exist in the country, and their suggested solutions. Armed with that kind of input I suggest that a constituent assembly composed of representatives of all Canadians—elected politicians, ethnic groups, women, men, labour, business, academics and others—could consider those statements of problems and proposed solutions and, after some considerable period of time and examination, make recommendations to the partners in our federation. With the moral authority of such a body I think we could end up with a good Constitution.

When I have those thoughts in my head, I run them against my personal experience in this Parliament in dealing with the Constitution of Canada. I read a memo which advised the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government opposite that it seemed unlikely that the partners in confederation could agree to the federal perspective or buy totally what the Prime Minister wanted them to, and in that event it was important to turn the September first ministers' conference into a public relations platform designed to convince the Canadian people that it was the provinces which were to blame and not the federal government.

The next piece of advice in that memo of 59 pages was that the federal government should then move quickly to ram its ideas through, and the federal government was warned that if it took too long, the opposition would grow. I refer to that as the strategy of speed and secrecy. Step one involved closure, the denial of free speech in this House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada after 24 hours of debate. After one full day of debate, closure was invoked. That fits the strategy of speed and secrecy.

Step two was to move the resolution to the committee. In the committee there were 15 Liberals, two New Democrats, and eight Conservatives. The memo advised that this step be taken because it would make it easier to control the committee. We think that committees are masters of their own destinies and that majority rules, but when there are 15 votes for the government and ten for the opposition, we can see that that control is evident. Was that control put to use? I suggest it was.

We started out with a 30-day time limit, no television, no broadcasting, and long hours. People became tired. We fought, and some of those things were amended slightly. However, hidden in the background was the exercise of control over the choice of witnesses and the length of time they had to appear before the committee. There was the warning that closure was everywhere we turned. As one member of this House who sat there for a long, long time, I have no sense of pride. I carry something more akin to a sense of shame that a free and democratic institution like the Parliament of Canada forced me to participate in something which had many elements of a charade rather than a true inquiry.

I sat there and I heard the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) and others in our party move an amendment, and before it was out of their mouths, the Minister of Justice said that the government would or would not vote for it. Before the arguments were heard, before the wisdom of that amendment was apparent, the minister said the government would or would not vote for it, and the 15 members did what the Minister of Justice told them to do.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Hawkes: Then they had the gall to come to the House and say this was a resolution sponsored by the Parliament of Canada. It is not; it is a government initiative supported by government members and by some of their marriage partners from the NDP.

In early October I took great pride in the fact that the leader of this party said on national television that this was a bad piece of legislation. That was on Thursday night. The Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) and the Prime Minister said it was good. But what are the facts, Mr. Speaker?

We have a resolution before us in the House today. The resolution we saw in early October had 59 clauses. The resolution we now have before us has 68 amendments: 67 mandated by the committee and one moved since then which nobody seems to have noticed. What does an amendment mean? When the government agrees to it, it means the government acknowledged the mistake. There were 67 mistakes which the government was willing to acknowledge in a bill which had 59 clauses. Have there ever been in the history of this Parliament 67 or 68 amendments to a 59 clause bill? It was the worst piece of legislation that this Parliament has ever considered, and the leader of our party told Canadians that.

I heard the Leader of the NDP stand up in the House the other day and say that this is the best we can hope to have. But the leader of that party and his caucus proposed 43 amendments to the resolution. They saw 43 mistakes in the bill. Two amendments were accepted and 41 were not—there are still 41 amendments which he identified, and now they call it the best that this country can do. I am ashamed of them.

If we looked around us, we would also find that in the process of federal-provincial consultation there was a 12-item agenda and agreement was reached in large part on such items as communications, offshore resources, fisheries, and family law. They agreed on a different amending formula, they agreed on something different on resource ownership, different from what we find in this resolution. Why is that? Why do the NDP and hon. members opposite sit here so willingly intending to vote for this resolution, when in fact they know that such a large part of what is needed in the way of constitutional revision, such a large part of what was agreed to, does not appear in this resolution? What does appear is a number of things on which there was never agreement or discussion.

I see that my time is running out, Mr. Speaker. When I began my comments, I was wondering whether I would be able to speak for 40 minutes. I see now that I have dealt with only one third of the items I had prepared for my speech today.

An hon. Member: Carry on.

Mr. Hawkes: I suppose that all I can really do in conclusion is to express, as clearly and as succinctly as I can, my belief that the people of my province, the people of most western Canadian provinces, will not, in the long run, want to belong to a federation in which they are treated as second-class citizens. They will not want to belong to a unitary state. They wish to be partners in a federation. They will not be victims.

We are on a very dangerous cliff. I hope that perhaps in the quietness of the caucus, in the quietness of the halls and of the offices, hon. members opposite, before they vote to impose this resolution on all the people of Canada, will take at least a little time to speak with us and will come to our province to meet with our people and to judge for themselves the seriousness of what is facing Canada today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in this debate. I suppose that at some time in the future people will look back and they may even read the comments made by members of the House of Commons and members of the Senate and give some consideration to what was the truth in the views various members put forward of what is likely to happen to Canada as a result of this debate and of this action by the government.

I have listened to many points of view, and I have found it sometimes difficult to determine exactly how much of what is being said is real, how much is partisan, how much is misinformation. I assume it is all said honestly, but it worries me because many of the things that have been said about the consequences of the passage of this piece of legislation could not and will not come to pass. This measure will not destroy confederation. It will not take away the rights of people to have a democracy where they will be able to elect Members of Parliament and where those Members of Parliament will represent them and, in some way or other, deal with the issues and the problems of the time.

I listened with interest to my friend from the Conservative Party who spoke before me as he said that going to the courts was such a terrible thing. Yet every single Member of Parliament knows that every piece of legislation we pass will, at some point, be interpreted by the courts, and the court interpretation will set the precedent which will be the benchmark against which the legislation will be applied. Every Member of Parliament knows that the legislation which we will pass from this day forward, as on any other day, will be subject to amendment in the House of Commons.

The one thing that has not been said by those who suggest that what is happening destroys democracy is that until today, and until this bill finally becomes law, if we wanted to make any change to the existing Constitution of Canada, we could not have gone to the courts of Canada; we had to go to Westminster and ask another Parliament, far removed from the concerns of Canada, with little, if any, interest in the day to day activities of our country, to approve or disapprove of the changes we would like to make. Frankly, I do not think it is all that bad to have the court in your own land, appointed by your own Parliament, make the final decision.

Mr. Andre: It is not appointed by us. That was the whole point of the speech.

Mr. Deans: It is appointed under an act of Parliament, and therefore appointed by Parliament.

Mr. Andre: No, that was the whole point of the speech.

Mr. Deans: The point of his speech was wrong.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): How do you know it is wrong since you did not understand it?

Mr. Deans: The greatest part of the debate I have heard outside the House of Commons has been centred upon why we are doing this right now, why we are not dealing with the economy, with employment, with energy. I think there is a certain validity to that. Perhaps on balance it might have been better to spread out the discussion of the constitutional change over a longer period of time. This would have afforded an opportunity to deal with some of the problems which more evidently touch the lives of the vast majority of Canadians. But given that that was not to happen, it is appropriate that we should be dealing with the Constitution here in Canada and putting to rest, once and for all, the idle argument that this Constitution is to be made in Great Britain. What utter nonsense! What utter nonsense!

● (1800)

The committee sat countless hours listening to representations from Canadians. Members of Parliament and Senators deliberated carefully over the matters put before them. The House of Commons debated at great length the Constitution and the consequences of it. How can anyone say that this Constitution will be made in Britain? Yes, it will be approved in Britain for the last time, but it will be made in Canada by Canadians on behalf of Canadians.

Mr. Andre: Are the premiers involved?

Mr. Deans: When I return to my constituency, the people ask why the Conservatives are so naive and nasty. I say that it is their nature. Also they ask me what it is about this matter that I support. I should like to tell them that any time a discussion took place about the Constitution of Canada during my almost 15 years in politics, the one matter raised most often was that we ought to have our own Constitution, that we should have the British North America Act brought to Canada, since it was made here in the first place, and that it should be located here as a Constitution for this country. Perhaps I am one of the few members of the House who has looked at and read the actual British North America Act in Westminster. Therefore I think we are responding to the wishes of the vast majority by moving to bring the Constitution back.

What good would it be to have the Constitution in Canada with no way of amending it? The argument then centres on how it should be amended. Should we use the amending formula which was worked out in committee? Should we use another formula, perhaps the one proposed by the Conservative party which is supported in part by some of the premiers? I asked myself those questions, and I came to the conclusion that it is better to have this formula, deficient though it may be, than one which allows the provinces to opt in or out of the constitutional provisions and thereby deny Canadians equal access to the rights that are being given, recognized, and written in this Constitution.

Surely it is better to have this amending formula, although it requires some change. Surely it is better to have this amending formula for the next two years and to allow the premiers of the various provinces and the government to come together and look for a formula which has their total support, one which reflects the concerns of western Canada.

Mr. Andre: At least blush when you say that.

Mr. Deans: I say to the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), who speaks often but rarely rises, if what the Conservative Party is saying is true, that there is a willingness out there to find a way to resolve the differences of opinion, then within the next few years that willingness will rise to the top and there will be a new formula, if it has unanimity, which will be acceptable to everyone.

Mr. Andre: Why would Trudeau give up his power? You are an old union negotiator; use your head.

Mr. Deans: Despite the nattering of the hon. member for Calgary Centre, I should like to indicate we have almost agreed unanimously that we want to bring the Constitution to Canada and that we must have an amending formula. We have both those things in place. They are not absolutely perfect, but who would expect that they would be?

Then we hear arguments about the bill of rights. Who in Canada wants to perpetrate the system which exists in terms of dealing with the disabled? Who wants to deny the section dealing with the rights of women? Who in the Tory caucus, or out in the country, wants to deny natives the rights we have been able to negotiate and include in this bill of rights? Who says that we should leave the system as it is? It is not I, not I. I do not want to leave the way in which we deal with our disabled and handicapped as it has been over the last half century or more. I want to see it changed. I want to see some rights. I do not want to leave the question of women's rights hanging in the air for the next 15 or 20 years while discussions take place. I do not want to turn to the natives in this country who have placed so much trust in us, and say that for the sake of expediency and political gain, as the Conservatives have said, "we will back away; we will not guarantee your right to a place at the table."

It is difficult to come up with a constitution; it cannot be perfect. It must be a living document, not one which writes about history. It is a document upon which the future will be developed. It is a document which sets out the accepted norms and the parameters within which the majority of people feel comfortable in our society.

The question as to whether the bill of rights should be entrenched is a difficult one to answer. Although I have never been particularly in favour of a referendum, given the opportunity in the final analysis to have such a referendum, I suppose a bill of rights could be entrenched. We must bear in mind always that this bill of rights is not the final one, that it will change with the times and will reflect the concerns of society as society evolves.

I should like to refer to the report of the Royal Commission Inquiry Into Civil Rights written by former Chief Justice McRuer a number of years ago. He wrote the following about a bill of rights:

> When people demand a comprehensive "bill of rights" declared or defined in some authoritative legal form, what is it they seek? Is it not the age old demand for "justice"?
> To write a bill of rights is to express in general terms the expectation and claim of citizens that the legal system under which they live shall be just.

He went on to write:

> It is to be appreciated that the definition and implementation of a bill of rights cannot be done in one simple operation. Adherence to the standards set out in a bill of rights is a very complex process. It must allow for and promote continuous progress involving legal change, together with adjustment through the decisions of impartial courts and the legislative action of democratic legislatures.

Also he wrote about constitutional law as follows:

> As Sir Ivor Jennings has said, in a sense all law is constitutional law.

This is because it is in fact written within the constitutional framework of the country.

It is interesting to look at the arguments which have taken place here about constitutional law and whether certain things should or should not be included in the Constitution. One argument put forward by the Conservative Party—and I assume it was in good faith—dealth with property rights. But I should like to refer to what former Chief Justice McRuer wrote when he dealt with the matter of property rights. It reads:

> The laws against trespass and violence safeguard the free enjoyment of the ownership of land—

In fact it has been generally recognized in this country that property rights are the responsibility of provincial jurisdictions and that to write some vague reference to property rights in the Constitution can only serve to complicate further an already very complicated situation and to create even further problems in terms of whom has the ultimate jurisdiction to determine the right of individuals to quiet enjoyment of their own property. The fact that we pointed that out and said that this is an inappropriate place to put it cannot, and ought not, be interpreted to mean that somehow or other we are opposed to someone owning a home. I doubt that there is a political party anywhere which has spoken more often, more passionately and more carefully about the need to provide the opportunity for people at all income levels to have accommodation at a price they can afford, to buy a home of their own and to live in dignity. I do not think any party has any more claim to that than we do.

• (1810)

Mr. Deans: When I listen to Conservatives talking about what they put forward, they do not tell you the implications of it. The implications would have been a continuous harangue through the court system trying to determine whether, indeed, it was a provincial or a federal responsibility, whether the Constitution would take precedence over the rights of the provinces. That measure would have served no one. In fact it would have served only to frustrate and aggravate. It would not have made any sense.

So, when I look at those kinds of things I wonder why it is that we have allowed, at least what appears to me to be, a step forward toward establishing the Constitution in Canada with the rights of individuals written so that they can look at them and read them and so that they do not have to rely on something which is called "common law tradition" to determine what it is they are entitled to and what it is they have every right to expect.

When we refer to common law, of course we are not referring to Canadian common law. We are referring to British common law. Canada has not been a nation long enough to have established a sufficiently strong tradition in common law. Thus, when we try to make an interpretation about the rights of individuals, using common law, we are actually basing it on the common law traditions of Great Britain. Great Britain has centuries of history behind it, an evolution of a process which we have never had, an evolution which allowed for all changes that took place through many different systems, through the industrial revolution and through the emergence of the common man or woman into prominence in the state.

We cannot really base our tradition on that because our tradition is a different one. It is the North American tradition. It has a good core in British law but it is not necessarily governed by British law only. Therefore, to suggest for a moment that it is better to rely upon common law tradition than to rely upon a bill of rights, is a matter of opinion.

For many of us, having looked at it, opinion comes down more heavily on the need to say it to people in writing so that they can read it in any part of the country. This enables them to understand what it is that their laws are about and what their rights are. That does not take away for one moment the existing law and the weight of it. It does not depreciate for one moment the laws that we have already written into the books, the laws which have stood the test of time. They still remain. It is not as if you are starting all over again and eliminating all the other laws because you are writing the guidelines. You continue to use those laws. The laws that protect people still remain in place. The laws that give them the rights I have mentioned with regard to property still remain in place.

Therefore, it is not a matter of starting over. It is a matter of having reached a point where the growth of the country indicates that we are now capable, as Britain thought we were some years ago, to stand alone, not to be isolated but to stand alone to develop new friendships and to help strengthen old ones. The fact that we ask of Britain that she give us our Constitution back now does not mean that we do not want to continue to associate with her. It means that we want to have a relationship of maturity, of equality. That relationship will be strengthened by actions on both sides of the Atlantic. It means we will be doing what so many much smaller countries in the world decided they should do for themselves years and years ago, that is, to be masters in their own homes.

I just returned from speaking to the Prime Minister of Barbados, the Prime Minister of St. Lucia, and to some people in another part of the world. They listened with almost incredulity to the discussion that we might not want to be independent, that we are not really sure that we are ready for it yet. They do not believe it—neither do I. I think we are ready. In fact I think it is time.

As I talk to people across this country, all I can find out from them is that they are upset by the constant wrangling. They cannot differentiate between the charges and the countercharges. They do not have sufficient in-depth knowledge of the subject to be able properly to evaluate what is the truth, as I said at the beginning. As I see it, the truth is simple.

We will bring back the British North America Act, which was written here. When we have brought it back we will have a way to amend it. As part of our Constitution we will have decided to put down on paper what the rights of individual Canadians will be—each Canadian, not just Canadians living in one part of the country or another, but all Canadians no matter where they live. The Canadian living in Prince Edward Island, whose family lives in Alberta, will have the same rights as all others. A Canadian living in Ontario or in British Columbia will have the same rights, because they are all Canadians. If they decide to up and move, they can do that. They will not lose the rights that they have, as would be the case if we allow the opting in and out formula, as would be the case if we left it to the jurisdiction of each province to write its own bill of rights.

Surely to God being a Canadian means something. Surely being a Canadian in any part of this country is the same as being a Canadian in any other part. Surely the rights that you have in one part of the country are the same as the rights you have in another part of the country. You cannot have them denied because of the whim of one jurisdiction. That is what this is all about. That is what we are trying to achieve.

If I had my way, and I suspect maybe this will happen, I would have included the recognition of the supremacy of God in the preamble. We supported it. My good friend, the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) spoke about it in committee and he proposed it would be a good thing. I suspect we may see it yet.

If I had my way I would see the amending formula changed in order to correct an imbalance which exists in western Canada as a result of the formula we now have. Maybe we will get that. I do not want to risk a return to the inequities which exist across this country, the inequality which exists across this country in terms of the way individual jurisdictions deal with Canadians. I do not want to run that risk any longer.

In closing I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I have great respect for the views that have been expressed by the many premiers across this country about what would be best for their jurisdictions. I must say that among all the letters I have received I have not received one from any premier. What I will say, because I am a Member of Parliament, is that in looking at it I do not doubt for a moment their sincerity as they speak about what is best for their jurisdictions.

I think what we must understand is that we are not talking about a jurisdictional dispute at the moment. We are talking about the rights of Canadians, regardless of where they live. We are talking about what is best for each of the component parts since, when added together, it is not necessarily best for the whole. That is the dilemma which confronts us. I wait with interest to hear the reasons why what we are doing is wrong, because I hear, from people on all sides of the House, that they support the constitutional package, bringing it back to Canada, having an amending formula, albeit we may disagree as to what it should be. They even support the bill of rights. Well, damn it, if we are supporting all these proposals, what are we fighting about?

One final point comes to mind. When this is over—and God knows that it will be over some day—and we have sovereignty in Canada, which we are striving for, and the Constitution is here, and the bill of rights is printed, and members are shipping them out by the hundreds to their constituents across the country, pointing out the good things contained in them, I hope we will be able to come together as a House of Commons and say to the people of Canada, "Look, in spite of our partisan differences and some reservations, this document is a good foundation upon which to build. If we work together, we can make it even better. It affords a good opportunity to preserve those items which are of value, and guarantees that you will receive a high quality of treatment, no matter where you are".

But what we will say to the people of Canada is, "Alongside the flag and the national anthem, you will have a Constitution which tells you, in the type of language that we can all understand, that being a Canadian is the best thing in the world, and that together we will have a better nation".

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Mr. Speaker, in listening to the concluding remarks of my hon. colleague from Hamilton-Mountain, I can only hope that the day will come when the Constitution adopted for Canada is the right one, and that there will be peace and harmony in the country arising from that document, whatever form it takes.

I reflect back to the summertime and to the month of September when we saw signs around our country admonishing Canadians to work together. I believe one sign said, "Let's work together to build a better country, now." I remember that sign quite vividly, and another sign which said, "A new Constitution: Make it right, make it work, make it ours."

I am sorry to begin my remarks this evening by suggesting that the present government initiative defies these slogans. Is it right to discriminate against some provinces and to favour others through a biased amending formula? Will it work if we set region against region, as some of these proposals do? Can it ever be ours, in our hearts, if the British government is to be blackmailed into passing amendments which are unacceptable to many Canadians and to many provinces—in fact, eight provinces?

Canada is a marvellous country, and we are all very thankful for having the opportunity to live here. We have a country where we respect the differences of one another, and that diversity makes us stronger; interdependency allows the country, collectively, to be much more than the sum of the individual parts. It is a team effort, and not everyone can play goalie and not everyone can play forward, but we all have a part to play in the future of our country.

I love this country as much as every other Canadian and every other Member of Parliament here this evening. I respect the fact that we come from different backgrounds, languages, and geographical locations. We are not all the same. I can only say, "Thank God for that".

I am reminded of a statement made during the confederation debates, in 1856. Sir George Cartier said:

> I view the diversity of races in British North America in this way: we are all of different races, not for the purpose of warring against each other, but in order to compete and emulate for the general good.

I must conclude that no one man or political party has the wisdom to surpass that of all others; that of the premiers; that of the people who are calling phone-in programs and writing letters to Members of Parliament these days, to express their views on the government's constitutional proposals.

I think of the closely knit family, much like the one I know so well, where the parents sometimes get a little bit out of control, but generally we try not to "talk down" to our children. Parents do not order them around, although they might get carried away from time to time; instead, parents attempt to teach by example and speak softly to their children in order to cultivate respect. In that process, the family spirit strengthens, and the family grows in its understanding of all its members, and learns from one another. Parents often learn a great deal from their children.

I would like to see our country come together as a family—a family which has the power to last. My fear this evening is that the process of constitutional reform is not bringing about that family spirit which I consider to be so important.

I would also like to remind members of the spirit of the Constitution enacted in 1867 and reflected in 1871 when my province joined this wonderful country. After all, "constitution" really means the putting together of a country. This is the way British Columbia felt on the morning of July 20, 1871, as reported in The British Colonist of Victoria, under the headline, "Confederation Complete", and I quote:

> Today British Columbia passes peacefully and, let us add, gracefully into the confederated empire of British North America . . . To-day British Columbia and Canada joined hands and hearts across the Rocky Mountains . . . let us join hands in a friendly but firm resolve to begin our new political life a united and harmonious band.

I only wish that were the spirit in the chamber this evening, but I am afraid it is not; and that suggests that there is something seriously wrong—not necessarily wrong with all of the detail in the document we have before us at present, but something seriously wrong in the government's approach to this matter, and it concerns me deeply. After all, Canada has not consented to this process.

I must turn to the preamble of the resolution we have before us, and it states that, "whereas Canada has requested and consented to the enactment of an act of the parliament of the United Kingdom—"

Mr. Speaker, Canada has not consented! Most Canadians have not even been consulted on this matter! Our hon. colleagues to the left and across the way can talk about all of the delegations and individuals who appeared before the special committee that did such fine work for all of us, but the people of Canada have not been consulted and are in fact being ignored in this process, by not being allowed to be involved in deciding this issue.

It was the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) who had the courage on the evening of October 22 to stand alone. The Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) did not stand alone. He hopped quickly into bed with Mr. Trudeau and he has been there ever since.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I am sorry I must interrupt the hon. member, but there has been a developing trend to refer to hon. members by their names rather than by their office or riding, and I would remind the hon. member of the necessity to refer to members by title.

Mr. Siddon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I suppose those notes were appropriate for speaking across the country. I meant the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Now, more than two thirds of Canadians agree with the position the Leader of the Opposition has taken, that the process, at the very least, is wrong, and the approach being taken by the Prime Minister in reforming our Constitution is wrong.

What is the correct course of action? I believe that was laid out very clearly by my leader, the hon. member for Yellowhead, and by our principal spokesman on the joint committee, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), and other members of the Progressive Conservative Party, as that committee deliberated through the months of December and January.

First of all this party has a respect for the federal nature of this country; for the federal-provincial partnerships and division of powers as clearly set out in our existing Constitution, the British North America Act. In a few moments I will elaborate on this and show how the present document changes that arrangement of federal-provincial powers in a very profound way.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, this party believes we should bring the Constitution home and bring it home now. The hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) initiated this process many months ago. I can only ask why it has not been brought home to date, following his motion which was passed in this House many months ago. This party also moved another motion on October 22 urging upon this House the immediate patriation of our Constitution on a very simple basis, so that we might make the subsequent and very important amendments in Canada.

This party advocates a bill of rights and advocates that it be entrenched in the Constitution. But it must be a practical bill of rights, a Canadian bill of rights. We are not prepared to accept a Constitution and a charter of rights on which the Canadian people have not had adequate opportunity to offer their input.

We believe that the amending formula by which this Constitution may be changed in the future has to be fair to all the parts and regions of Canada, by treating all provinces as equal. That is why we put forward the Vancouver amending formula which does not contain the outright discrimination that the government's amending proposal contains. We believe that all amendments to the Constitution in the future must be debated and adopted in Canada by Canadians, not by Great Britain. Canadians should decide on Canadian questions, as my leader has often said.

We put forward the proposal for a constituent assembly which would be given a certain period of time to recommend the appropriate changes to our Constitution, in the assurance that they would have the support not merely of the Prime Minister and his colleagues but of all the provinces and people as well.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we believe that the referendum method which is being proposed as a means of amending our Constitution in the future is contrary to our parliamentary traditions, but, more seriously, it is divisive and threatens the rights of minority groups in this country. I will give some further explanation of this in a few moments.

We have put forward an amendment calling for the deletion of Clause 46. It would delete the use of referenda which could be abused to the extent they would deny rights to minorities and Canadians at large; given a certain spirit and time in the country. Senator Roblin in the other place often says that we must do things in the right way if they are to be done right. I heartily echo that sentiment.

What is wrong with the government's approach? First of all, this government has no mandate from many Canadians. It received no mandate on February 18 last year to change our Constitution in substantive ways. It has a mandate from members who come largely from two provinces, and it has the implied consent of two other provinces, one of which is a common province, the province of Ontario, but the rest of the country is being bypassed in this process. Neither does this government have a mandate from the people of Quebec, as it often claims to have.

I am reminded of statements made by a well-known and respected political scientist in the province of Quebec, Dr. Léon Dion. As reported in the Edmonton Journal on October 3, 1980, the day after the Prime Minister presented his proposal, Dr. Dion said: "It's a sad day for democracy in Canada". He went on to note that the Prime Minister was using his promise made during the Quebec referendum to renew the Constitution as a reason for proceeding on the present path. He said in fact that Quebec had precise demands which were expounded during the referendum campaign and that the Prime Minister's plan for patriation and a bill of rights does not meet these precise demands, and does not meet the aspirations of Quebecers. I think that view is reflected when many of the hon. members opposite return to their constituencies each weekend.

Mr. Lalonde: He voted Yes on the referendum.

Mr. Siddon: The article in the Edmonton Journal continues:

Trudeau's 'stubborn desire to impose his views on the provinces' will create confusion, and might also create more antagonism, Dion predicted. A constitution must exist on consensus, not on force and constraint.

The third reason for believing the government is taking the wrong approach is the pace at which it is moving. The government is in a big rush, for some inexplicable reason. Perhaps this has something to do with the Prime Minister's personal timetable. Especially and above all else, I think the government is perpetrating a fraud and a deception upon the Canadian people. To be more specific, it is perpetrating a power grab on the provinces. That is what unilateralism is all about and it leads ultimately to a unitary state. I hope hon. members will hear me out, Mr. Speaker.

I believe that Canadians are being deceived, fraudulently, in three key areas. First of all, this government is substantially altering the nature of federalism. It is substantially altering the relationship between the provinces and the federal government. I shall elaborate on that in a moment.

Secondly, the government is using the government of Great Britain to enact changes in our Constitution in a manner which would not even pass the test of its own amending formula here in Canada. If it is so confident that this initiative will be widely accepted by Canadians, then for the life of me I cannot understand why the government would not put the question before Canadians, even using its own biased, amending formula, before sending the joint address to Westminster.

Thirdly, the most significant fraud in all of this, I believe, is the sham that minority rights and human rights are being proclaimed as reasons for this initiative. In fact, those rights are being abridged within the text. A referendum mechanism is being proposed which could, in many cases, be used to deny those rights later and to assert the will of the majority, in the face of the needs of minority groups.

I want to turn now to the British North America Act. Clause 55 of the resolution before the House removes the Guarantee of provincial rights which was clearly asserted in Section 91.1 of the British North America Act. Clause 55 of the resolution essentially repeals Section 91.1 of the British North America Act. This section gives to the federal government the power to amend, from time to time, the Constitution of Canada "except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces". In other words, through the use of Clause 55 to repeal Section 91.1 of the British North America Act, the government takes away the guarantee the provinces have enjoyed since 1867. The provinces which joined confederation after that date also enjoy that guarantee. Now it is being struck and the federal government is giving itself the power to change the Constitution of Canada in any matter whatsoever—in any matter pertaining to provincial rights as set out in Section 92 of the British North America Act. This deals with the right of the provinces to borrow money, to manage and sell public lands, to operate hospitals, municipal institutions, to undertake local works, to operate canals, telegraphs and other communications works, to alter provincial responsibility with regard to the solemnization of marriage, and with regard to property and civil rights.

To go further, Mr. Speaker, Clause 55 would deny the provinces the power over education as set out in Section 93, and control of resource ownership as set out in Section 109 of the British North America Act. In many other respects it would alter the powers and privileges that provincial governments have enjoyed since confederation and for which other provinces that joined later have worked and fought. I believe Clause 55 is unconstitutional, Mr. Speaker, as it frees the government to change the Constitution unilaterally. That becomes clear when one reads Section 91.1 of the BNA Act.

We all know now that the amending formula which is proposed creates not only two classes of provinces, but three or four. The western provinces will rank as at least third class. I believe this discrimination threatens the very future of our nation. No member opposite, except to hide behind the premiers at Victoria in 1971, has convinced me there is any good reason for implementing the present biased amending formula. Perhaps it is to secure and maintain their mandate and support from the two most populous provinces, to forget about and to deny completely the future I want for my children, and the development of communities in the less populated part of Canada, from where I come.

The present government is using Britain to do its own dirty work. The government's proposed constitutional amendments would not even stand the test of its own amending formula here in Canada. The resolution could not be passed in Canada. For one thing, whether or not there was a referendum, at least two of the western provinces would reject these proposals outright. There is a very good chance, and I am sure our colleagues from Quebec could confirm this, that Quebec, either through an act of the legislature or a referendum, would reject this act if the proposed amending formula were applied as the test as to whether it should proceed to Westminster.

Quebec would reject it because of the language rights situation in Ontario and Quebec. Therefore, the Prime Minister is asking the British parliament to prostitute itself by enabling, with the principal support of only two provinces, himself to accomplish his personal goals, even though two thirds of the Canadian people object to the process being put forward. Surely this had to be a form of dictatorship.

This act, which is being perpetrated, has the potential to become a major embarrassment to the parliament in Westminster. It could well be that Westminster might be blackmailed into passing this legislation, only to subsequently learn that it has been a party to something illegal, if and when the Supreme Court of Canada finds that the cases being brought by the provinces are right and proper and that the federal government is acting in an unconstitutional manner.

On the question of minority rights, and I have alleged that this is a sham perpetrated on all of the special interest and underprivileged groups in our nation, I believe these groups are being deceived into believing they will get certain rights which they do not already enjoy. However, in so far as the rights of minority groups are concerned, many of those rights as set out in the resolution are qualified by a limitation clause which empowers the Supreme Court of Canada to restrict those rights in any way it deems to be proper. Once those rights have been delineated and interpreted by a ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada, minority groups will have no further recourse to this Parliament, to their provincial legislatures or to seek redress in any other way for a perceived injustice arising out of a misjudgment by the Supreme Court of Canada.

In spite of the fond notion which comes from one or two of the members opposite, that Canadians should have the opportunity to litigate rather than to lobby, in fact they will not have the opportunity to litigate because once those decisions are rendered by the Supreme Court of Canada it will be virtually impossible to have them altered. It is not a matter of litigating or lobbying. Canadians will not be able to lobby because we Members of Parliament will not be able to help them. Neither will they be able to litigate, even if they had ample financial resources at their disposal, because the court will have made its determination.

For the sake of these various minority groups, I want to refer to Clause 6 of the resolution which contains the so-called mobility provisions. It has a limitation. Section 6(3) reads as follows:

> The rights specified in Subsection (2)—

That is the right to move from province to province and enjoy and seek employment, are mitigated by what follows. We read on in that Section 6(3)(a) that those rights are limited by:

> (a) any laws or practices of general application in force in a province other than those that discriminate among persons primarily on the basis of province of present or previous residence;—

These people are being led to believe they can move back and forth between provinces and seek employment. But if you read the Subsections of that clause, people will be denied that right, if there are laws or practices in general force which would deny that right. So it is a sham.

Similarly in Clause 7, which reads:

> Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

—we are qualifying everything. We are pretending we are granting people something which, under our system of common law, they have enjoyed in this country for decades.

We could also refer to Section 15(1) which talks about equality. All Canadians are equal under Section 15(1), but under Section 15(2) we are not all equal. Some are more equal than others. Some of us are very concerned about that.

It is not a matter of litigating or lobbying. It is a matter of locking people, in perpetuity—other than through the use of the referendum method, which I will come to in a moment—into judgments rendered by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Even more alarming for these minority groups is the proposed use of a referendum contrived by the federal government to amend those minority rights, if the majority should so choose. The referendum method of Section 46 is completely inconsistent with rights. It is completely contradictory to the spirit of the charter of rights because it can sweep those rights away at a moment's notice. If this country were swept by a wave of national emotion—it might last two, three, four or five years, as the Second World War did—the rights of any minority group could be denied very quickly. The will of the majority could be used to take those rights away. This is dangerous and divisive. This is why our amendment, deleting all reference to the referendum as an amending procedure, ought to be supported by all members in this House.

I want to speak for a moment of the virtues of the parliamentary system, as I see it. When I was younger I could not understand why a referendum or a simple ballot was not the best means of making all decisions in our country. But I have learned in my two and a half years here that there is much more to making important decisions than that. There is the important process of doing our homework, of listening to our colleagues from all parts of Canada and of sometimes tempering our strong regional feelings against what other members bring to my caucus or to this House. Often I will change my mind two or three times before I am sure.

The referendum procedure mitigates against all of that soul searching because people make their decisions on the basis of a moment's whim, a moment's instinct or a two-week campaign. I suggest that is what is seriously at fault with this proposed referendum method. I believe the notion of consensus and compromise is better. This is what I experience in my caucus, whereby members from all parts of Canada give me a much greater appreciation of what our country is really all about. Their views encourage me to tread more lightly than I might otherwise do, especially when a matter of entering into someone else's area of jurisdiction is involved.

This is a lesson which is probably more difficult for members opposite to appreciate, because they do not have enough representation in some parts of the country. As a result, they are not able to sense these important regional feelings which we often try to express from this side of the House. As my good colleague, Senator Tremblay is fond of saying: "The approach of consensus is much more human than the approach of deadlock-breaking mechanisms", which is how this referendum method is being described.

I believe the government is perpetrating an intentional deceit on minority groups. We often hear from hon. members opposite, for example, the minister for propaganda and others, about the Japanese Canadians. We all sympathize for the way they were mistreated during the Second World War. We hear that they somehow might have been saved from discrimination had this charter of rights been enacted. I say that is rubbish. In a fit of national emotion those rights would be denied one way or the other and the dangers would be even more severe, given the referendum method which is included in this resolution.

Mr. Fleming: What do they say? They say they want it. Ask them.

Mr. McDermid: They had it in the United States and it didn't do them much good.

Mr. Siddon: It is not beyond the realm of possibility that, given the current climate between western Canada, Alberta in particular, and the national government, a referendum, if this mechanism were in place, could be used to take control of the resources of that province. It could take control of the timber of British Columbia, the uranium of Ontario or the gold and hydroelectric power of Quebec. That is symptomatic of the divisiveness which this referendum device can introduce to our nation. As a person born in Alberta and resident in British Columbia I can tell you; that is where my bottom line would come. If, through a national referendum, there was a vote to deny the people of Alberta, British Columbia, Quebec, or any other province their natural birthright, as clearly set out under the Constitution of Canada, then I would feel this country was no longer worth saving. I say that quite seriously.

We might also see a time when the referendum could be used to deny underprivileged Canadians of the unemployment insurance benefits or of welfare benefits. I would suggest to you that a majority of Canadians, if given that question to answer, would probably sweep those programs away at a moment's notice. So there is another danger here because a referendum might discriminate against a very significant and important minority group which receives a very important service from this government, such as welfare. We could conceivably have a bad government in Ottawa, as many believe we do at present, which would perpetrate these types of actions upon the people. With the benefit of government advertising this could lead to a situation where the will of majority would sweep away the rights of those important minority groups with which we must concern ourselves.

Let us talk for a moment about the entrenched bill of rights. What should it contain? Should it be simple or complex? Should it be rooted in the system of common law or civil law? Where do the rights of one person end and the rights of the next person begin? These are important questions which have not been clarified. That is why many of us believe the present charter of rights is flawed and premature.

Under the present proposal for a charter of rights, the only rights and freedoms which will exist after the charter becomes law are those which are presently recognized, as set out in Clause 26, and those other rights and freedoms which are clearly delineated in the charter.

This is the civil law approach. It is fraught with danger for minority groups, provinces and all those free individuals and community groups which enjoy certain privileges in this country.

I favour, as I believe most Canadians do, the common law approach, based on a thousand years of history, which grants to every citizen in a free democratic society all the rights in the world, all the rights in the country that they should wish, except in so far as those rights are restricted by law.

All rights are not absolute; of course some of them are. The basic fundamental rights most definitely are; but many of the things we call rights actually lead to areas of conflict. It is a very important principle in every phase of civilization that the rights of every person should in theory end where the rights of the next person begin. That is generally the case for the so-called fundamental rights; rights to freedom of worship, freedom of speech and the others listed under the fundamental rights definition. In reality, however, there will often be an overlap. If there is an overlap, the rights of one person or group will supersede those of another person or group. Then we can ultimately expect discrimination, arguments and ultimately personal conflict because we are setting up various classes of citizenship. I am not suggesting we should not do that in special cases.

I am going to suggest in a moment that affirmative action is important in some cases, but if rights are written down and become too complicated they will lead to trouble. We saw that before the committee, with many special interest groups lining up, wanting to be named in the body of the Constitution.

In cases where special status is perhaps required to redress an imbalance, such as affirmative action for women in the work force, or affirmative action with respect to the use of French language in the House of Commons or in the governments of the land, maybe there is a case for these special rights being accorded. However, we must always remember that if those affirmative action measures ultimately have their desired effect, then one day you will want to eliminate that special status. You will want to do that because you have corrected an inequity, an injustice within society. Such a correction or reversal from special status will be required from time to time and must be accomplished, not by referendum, but by a wise deliberation in the democratically elected Parliament and legislatures of our land.

The proposed charter of rights will in fact entrench permanent discrimination against certain persons and groups, in perpetuity. Those whose rights are abused; those who are given second-class status by a decision of the courts, must have recourse to review by their democratically elected representatives. There is no other way to ensure justice for them.

This charter of rights would perpetrate second-class citizenship upon many Canadians; young and old, men and women with various special interests. Let me give a few examples of rights that come into conflict. There are the rights of smokers and non-smokers in a closed room. There is the question of the rights of the unborn child contained within his or her mother's womb. Who has the right to life; the mother or the child? Who has the final say?

What about the rights of those who happen to know both our official languages and therefore qualify for a better job? What about the rights of the unilingual person who does not qualify for the better job? Those are rights in conflict. On the use of property, should the owner have the right to obtain the highest and best use of his property or do the neighbours have some interest in that question?

There is the question of environmental concern versus industry, of development; the question of the right to strike versus the right to work. With regard to denominational education, should a teacher be able to insist on teaching in a Roman Catholic school even though he or she may not be a Christian? I say no, of course not! That is what this concept of special status would produce. One way or another a determination by the Supreme Court of Canada would fix and entrench into the future of our country for a long, long time, various degrees of discrimination.

What about the rights of the employer as distinct from the employee? We talk about individual rights. The person who may be alcoholic or have some other personal anomalies may not be viewed as employable by the employer. Should the employer be forced to hire that person? What about landlords versus tenants? Does the landlord have any say over who shall be allowed to rent and occupy his premises? These are examples of rights in conflict.

My assertion is that we need a simple entrenched bill of rights which covers the most fundamental rights, and a subsidiary list of special rights. I would not call them secondary rights, but special rights. We must make a distinction between special rights and these fundamental rights, because special rights are there for a special purpose, that is to right inequities; to give special advantage and status to the handicapped, the native people, women in the work force and the francophone minority in a particular province. They would get special status and special rights, but they would not be entrenched and engraved in stone forever and a day.

There must be a mechanism of flexibility which would allow for those special rights to be altered and adjusted with time so as to eliminate inequity, at the point where the other party becomes second-class. The present charter does not allow for this. It is rigid, inflexible and ambiguous.

I believe that the main elements of our Canadian Bill of Rights, John Diefenbakers' Bill of Rights as passed in this Parliament some 20 years ago, should form the main body of those fundamental rights which we enjoy in Canada. That Bill of Rights should be entrenched and the Constitution should incorporate the following words:

> The Parliament of Canada, affirming, that the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free men and free institutions;
> Affirming also that men and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values and the rule of law;

It is hereby recognized that the fundamental rights of every person, as clearly set out in the Canadian Bill of Rights include:

> —the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law;
> the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law;
> freedom of religion;
> freedom of speech;
> freedom of assembly and association; and > freedom of the press.

Those are the sort of fundamental rights that are unambiguous. Such simplicity will avoid a hornet's nest and we will not end up creating anomalies in our society, with some people first-class, and others second-class, in perpetuity. I suggest that this government should consider very carefully some of these questions: The abuses to which a referendum can be put, the question of whether or not Canadians are indeed all equal as we pretend they ought to be, and whether the process the present government is following is right and proper.

In closing, I want to observe that one evening in January I was watching a delegation of Metis from northern Saskatchewan as they appeared before the constitutional committee. One of the witnesses, perhaps inadvertently, said "But if we are named in the Constitution, we are going to be singled out in perpetuity as requiring special status and that will guarantee discrimination against us."

I make that assertion very forcefully this evening. Entrenchment of special status guarantees discrimination. It is not true that the natives all want to see their rights reflected in the Constitution. They want their claims resolved. The Union of B.C. Indian Chiefs has certainly made that clear. It is not true that all Canadians want to have this great gift which the gods across the way are going to give us. They want the kind of standards and values on which our country was founded; respect for God, moral decency, spiritual values and the ability to own property and enjoy freedom.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) who is seeking to be recognized. That will take place at eight o'clock.

It being seven o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At seven o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. When the House rose at seven o'clock this evening, the Chair had recognized the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), who had not yet begun his contribution to the debate. Accordingly, I will recognize him again for the full 40 minutes allowed.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to take this opportunity to take part in this debate which I believe to be vitally important for our country. I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian people are now aware that this debate is of major importance for the future of Canadian federalism. There is every reason to believe that our fellow citizens throughout the country have understood the determining nature of the changes proposed by this government. Up to now, several Quebec members of the government, of course, have spoken in favour of the package deal proposed by the Prime Minister.

For my part, I wanted to take part in this historic debate so that those who follow our proceedings closely may have a true picture of the Quebec reality. I want the dissenting voices of hundreds of thousands of Quebecers to be heard strongly and vigorously in this House. I wish to thank my colleagues of the Progressive Conservative party for allowing me today to accomplish this mission on which I had set my heart. I greatly appreciate this gesture of friendship extended to me and this act of courtesy towards the Quebec people.

I want to make myself quite clear at the outset, Mr. Speaker. I am speaking today not only as the member for Joliette, not only in my new capacity as leader of the Union Nationale Party in Quebec, but first and foremost, I am speaking today in this imposing chamber as a French-speaking Quebecer, a Quebecer who stands by the hundreds of thousands of his fellow citizens who reject the resolution proposed by the Liberal government because it goes against their concept of Canadian federalism.

These Quebecers are not only Union Nationale members, Mr. Speaker. Nor are they only from the Parti Québécois. Many of them are very active supporters of the Quebec Liberal party. I believe it is important that Canadians everywhere understand that the opposition of Quebecers, as confirmed by many polls in the last few months, goes beyond traditional party lines. The reason is very simple for anyone willing to see beyond the partisan rut. The proposed resolution of the Liberal government is even worse that the status quo; it is a definite step backward for Quebec society as a whole and a tremendous insult to Quebec federalists. It is quite obvious that the Liberal government wants to claim ownership of the Constitution. This goes against our constitutional traditions.

Canada is not limited to Ottawa. It includes all the provinces. Until further notice, these provinces have sovereign governments in their own jurisdictions. When an amendment to the Constitution changes these exclusive jurisdictions, the provinces must not only be consulted, but they must also give their agreement. This is the true nature of our Canadian federalism. Instead of trying to agree with the provinces, instead of negotiating in good faith with an open mind, the Liberal government seeks confrontation, stirs up division, and successfully moreover, to better impose its centralizing concept of federalism and it narrow vision of the future.

Members opposite submit that the proposed resolution takes nothing away from the provinces. I say that this is not true, Mr. Speaker. First, it directly erodes the exclusive provincial jurisdiction over education and the language of instruction without the consent of a majority of provinces. Because of its distinctive nature as the only Canadian province with a francophone majority, Quebec cannot accept that its jurisdiction in this regard be curtailed in relation to the present status quo.

This evolution goes against the wishes of most Quebecers who have always fought to improve their condition in relation to the status quo. Second, Mr. Speaker, through the charter of rights and freedoms, the proposed resolution threatens to make inoperative about 100 Quebec statutes. At least, this is the legal opinion expressed by a group of Montreal lawyers at the request of the Quebec government. As recently as yesterday, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) agreed that this was so. He even suggested that it would be a good thing, as though the statutes involved were necessarily discriminatory, when it is quite possible that they do not comply with the provisions of the charter not because they deny these rights and freedoms, but because they reflect a different concept of their application. Third, the proposed resolution represents a step backward for the provinces because of its unilateral nature.

By moving unilaterally, by moving against the explicit will of eight provinces out of ten, the federal government is dealing a very hard blow to all Quebec federalists, who still believe that our federal system must recognize equal constitutional status to both levels of government. Every political party in Quebec, Mr. Speaker, accepts that principle. Indeed, it is important to note that it was included in the recommendations of the late Pepin-Robarts report. That recommendation reads as follows:

> Since we view the provincial governments as equal in stature and maturity to the central government, we have no difficulty in stating that in a restructured, genuinely federal union, the provinces should be recognized as having a constitutional status equal with that of the central government.

Ottawa's unilateral action, if it passes here and later in London, will give a de facto, if not a legal status, a status of legal seniority to the federal government. That unilateral action will automatically destroy the beautiful dreams of equality of constitutional status between the two levels of government. The dice will be loaded once and for all in favour of Ottawa, and there will be nothing left for the provinces to do but to bite the bullet. And fourth, as if this were not enough, this Liberal government changes its bold stroke into a coup d'État. It establishes on a permanent basis unilateral action by the federal Parliament over the heads of provincial legislatures.

In this matter, I come more precisely to the amendment moved by my colleague from Provencher (Mr. Epp), which aims at deleting from the Liberal package the referendum as a permanent means of constitutional change. I wholeheartedly support that amendment. In a British parliamentary system as ours, Parliament is the ultimate expression of the sovereignty of the people. In a federative country like Canada, this sovereignty is also divided between two levels of government. I cannot accept that all of a sudden, without consultation, without previous study, and especially without the agreement of the provincial governments, a procedure such as a referendum be introduced as an ongoing amending formula in order to amend among other things the future division of this sovereignty between both levels of government.

On two occasions, the Liberal government is infringing upon parliamentary sovereignty. First of all, by shifting the responsibility for basic freedoms from the legislative power to the courts. Second, by ignoring the provincial legislatures with regard to constitutional amendments and by consulting the people directly. In addition, with a referendum, the right of veto that can be exercised by a province, whether Quebec or any other one, becomes totally useless. Should this right be exercised, the federal government would still be in a position to give the deadlock of its own making as a pretext pursuant to the rules required by the Canadian Parliament under a statute, to launch a referendum in order to settle the matter.

Let nobody tell me, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment made by the joint committee alters the basic principle of this proposal. The purpose of this amendment is to establish a referendum rules commission with a membership of three, one of them representing the provinces. This does not alter in any way the basic principle, since this commission has no authority to make decisions. Even though the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) may say that those who are opposed to his package deal are stuck in a status quo, no one will take him seriously from now on. Indeed, what he is proposing is worse than the status quo and goes against the concept of federalism now prevailing in Quebec.

Quebecers have understood it, and that is why a majority of them reject the proposed resolution. Mr. Speaker, I say a majority of them. I know that present Quebec members have concealed from the rest of the country the reality of Quebec and the Quebec majority that will not be fooled by the proposal now before us.

An hon. Member: That's true!

Mr. La Salle: And I wonder why they do not have the courage to tell the Prime Minister to his face and the Canadian people that the majority of Quebecers are against this proposal.

• (2020)

But what I do not understand, Mr. Speaker, is why of the 73 Liberal members from Quebec, only one, the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Duclos) had the courage to stand up and say out loud what he thinks down deep and what several of his colleagues think also. Considering the mood of rejection which prevails in Quebec on this issue, should not those who supposedly represent the opinion of Quebecers have the decency to reflect the mood of the people of Quebec and do so without political partisanship? This issue is too crucial, Mr. Speaker, and will have too much of an impact on Canadian federalism to be confined to the narrow limits of party politics. Is it possible that only two out of 74 members of this House representing Quebec dare say what thousands of their fellow Quebecers think? If so, it is shameful and should be forcefully denounced.

I fully agree with the words of wisdom written by Marcel Pepin, editor of Quebec City's Le Soleil. This is what this prominent journalist wrote because of the way Liberal members of Parliament appear so powerless and idle:

> Liberal members of parliament—
> For Quebec of course.
> —must fully realize the extent to which they will be stabbing their province in the back by voting for the Liberal proposal. By doing so, they will be enshrining the principle of federal supremacy whereas in a federation all partners are supposed to be equal. Second, they will be endorsing the legitimacy of a unilateral action when the essence of federalism presupposes agreement between the two levels of government. Third, they will be giving the federal government the authority to alter unilaterally the balance of power between Ottawa and the provinces by means of a referendum whose rules would be set by the central government. And finally, they will be allowing the federal government to unilaterally establish the time-frame of an amending formula. The only ones who can stop irreparable damage from being done are the members of Parliament for Quebec. They must be reminded of their duty and told that their first loyalty is to the people who send them to a parliament which they do not and will never control but which they can still influence.

There is something I would like to ask the members from Quebec. In the last two months I have met thousands of Quebecers and they are concerned because they do not understand why, while you are sitting here, you do not express the views of the majority of Quebecers on this issue. They fully realize that the Prime Minister has decided to create a Canada in his image. But the majority of the Quebec people think that a group of Quebecers could stop this proposal. The greatest service you could do your province and your constituents, would be to stop this Prime Minister before it is too late, before he completely tears this country apart, this country which is yours and mine. What I am asking my colleagues opposite is to show some courage, of course, and also some honesty and to let their heart speak out. I cannot believe that these 73 Liberal members from Quebec, 72 pardon me, there is one who wants to object to—

An hon. Member: 74!

Mr. La Salle: The member for Lévis is not yet elected. I ask them: Please be sensitive to the interests of the voters in Quebec who sent them here to represent them and not to carry out the dictates of an obsessed Prime Minister who refuses to take into account the Canadian reality. What I ask my Liberal colleagues opposite, Mr. Speaker, is to convince their Prime Minister to immediately return to the bargaining table with the provinces.

Patriation of the Constitution and amending formula, which must of necessity accompany it, must come about through negotiations between equal partners. Never should steps of such vital importance to the country be taken unilaterally as is the case in this instance. That is what Quebec public opinion wants: an opinion that has been expressed not only by the government but also by all political parties in Quebec; an opinion that has been expressed by many editors and renowned constitutional experts; finally, an opinion that has been expressed through a petition signed by over 750,000 persons from all over Quebec.

This, Mr. Speaker, is my last speech in this House as the Progressive Conservative member for the riding of Joliette. As I promised and, of course, as the rules would have it, I shall resign, and this I intend to do when the next provincial election is called. Still, I should like to remind my colleagues from Quebec that some of their speeches have made me very sad; I have read several though not all of them. But I should like to appeal to their sense of honesty and objectivity and ask them to tell this House the truth about Quebec, to tell this House that the Liberals in Quebec do not agree with the Liberals here, so that Canadians might be aware of it. The leader of the Liberal Party, who failed to appear before the Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada—the committee would have been happy to see him there—went as close as 150 feet from it, where he stated his opposition to the proposal at a press conference, I believe, in which he delivered a message from his fellow-members from Quebec to the effect that the majority of Quebecers refuse to support this unilateral exercise and the idea that we should become a unitarian state.

After 13 years, Mr. Speaker, I could not leave this House without saying also just how sorry I am to realize that the Prime Minister who is leading the country to its demise is responsible, first and foremost, for the tearing apart of Canada, for the rising tide of alienation, not only in Quebec but in other provinces as well. I imagine he says there are still some Quebecers who have been encouraged to expose this unacceptable resolution the results of which will be unfortunate. It can be felt, it can be seen, but the stubbornness of that Prime Minister, and the lack of courage of those people who should reflect the Quebec views—I am referring to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), who was reprimanded for his extremely interesting study which reflected the Canadian reality and recommended remedial measures which, I think, would have solved some of our problems, a study that was shelved in no time flat, so that the Minister of Transport was unable to support and even respect his signature on that extremely important document which recommended solutions to the problems raised by the Constitution of Canada. The Prime Minister snuffed it, and a pity it is, Mr. Speaker. Still, there are people opposite who recognize the great value of that study which we no longer hear about. Instead, there is only the vision of one man, and his concept of an artificial Canada that does not exist, and that never will as the Prime Minister would like to invent it, and we all know that.

As a Quebecer, Mr. Speaker, I am ashamed to ask a foreign government to legislate on my basic rights. This is most shameful. You can laugh, you have been doing that for the past 13 years and you stoop so low as to ask a foreign parliament to do something that you should do yourselves if you were brave enough, but you refrain from acting because you know quite well that it would be difficult to induce most Canadians, through legally established procedures in Canada, to approve the proposal which you are asking a foreign government to support. It is embarrassing, Mr. Speaker.

I hope that some Quebecers—we are not against the patriation of the Constitution nor against an amending formula—we all agree on that. I urge you to patriate them and you will get our support. I urge you to bring them back to Canada and to amend that Constitution with Canadians by Canadians. This is what we are asking you to do.

Miss Bégin: This is what we are doing.

Mr. La Salle: The minister says: "This is what we are doing." No kidding! This is what we are doing! They say that to the people of Quebec who are unknowingly deceived by such comments, I think that it is sheer madness. I will not say any more.

An hon. Member: What were you doing on May 20?

Mr. La Salle: On May 20, I felt that you were hypocrites, and I was right, Mr. Speaker. I was standing up for Quebec and rejecting a proposal which suggested what I now feel is a constitutional reform of sorts that is a true reflection of the views of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I am being thanked for not supporting such a commitment. Moreover, you forget to mention that the leader of the Liberal Party in Quebec has clearly stated that if he had known that he would be misled as he is now, he would never have chaired the No committee. Those Liberals did not perhaps deserve such a fate and all Canadians should be aware of that.

An hon. Member: What is your position?

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, for those who are still unaware of my position, I support a principle, the protection of provincial autonomy. My position is clear, I wish to keep my province within a Canadian federation respectful of the aspirations of my province and of provincial aspirations generally, respectful of regional identities and based, and I do not hesitate to say so, on the Pepin-Robarts report. I find in this report some very good recommendations which could bring about this national harmony we are seeking. But it is neither through unilateral action such as the one you are taking, nor with intentions such as those which the Quebec government is entertaining that we will achieve it, but by respecting provincial jurisdictions and favouring a wider provincial participation in major national decisions, by convincing the provinces to co-operate in building this country, working together and not going their separate way as they do now.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wanted to send this message to my fellow Quebecers, and I hope others will oppose such an unacceptable measure. There is one among you who has already done so. Those hon. members were ready to stake their seats on the referendum. Well, let them do so, for this is the way you will secure your seats. The people of Quebec are waiting for you. Mr. Speaker, it is not without emotion that I must bid farewell to my colleagues of the Progressive Conservative Party. I salute also my colleagues on the government and NDP benches, as well as the support staff of the House.

For the past 13 years, Mr. Speaker, my electors in the federal riding of Joliette have renewed their trust in me.

An hon. Member: It won't last!

Mr. La Salle: I want to thank them from the bottom of my heart for this demonstration of friendship and faith in me. I want to tell them that I am not leaving them. On the contrary, I want to get closer to them to fight for their interests, certainly in a different way, but always with the same dedication, sincerity and enthusiasm. I consider accepting the leadership of a party in Quebec like a new challenge which is not inconsistent with the actions I have taken in the federal political arena over the past 12 years. I feel that it is a normal development, in view of the political climate which has existed in Quebec for the past few years.

I wish to thank the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) for the trust and support he bestowed upon me from the moment he became leader of the Progressive Conservative Party. That man stood out in the minds of several Quebecers and Canadians as an outspoken supporter of provincial rights and of a renewed federalism in keeping with our constitutional traditions and the Canadian reality such as it is experienced today in the various regions of this large country. To me, Mr. Speaker, he will always remain a politician who deserves our respect and admiration.

Mr. Speaker, during the 20 seconds I have left, I appeal once again to all my Quebec colleagues to ponder over the best way to serve their country and their province. Tonight I detected the same old arrogance I have felt for 13 years, and I forgive them before leaving, Mr. Speaker. But that is the kind of feeling which makes it easier to say goodbye to such people. For years I prevailed upon them to join with those who understood the importance of a real constitutional reform which would respect the integrity of the provinces and of the present-day Canadian reality.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that a majority in this House will succeed in defeating that diabolical scheme which can only tear this country apart. I hope we are going to revert to a better arrangement, and I trust the British government will understand we want our provinces respected and will not yield to the proposal of this government. I think this will be the most positive action we could take for the Canadian people whatever their languages, whatever their walks of life and I think this will be the greatest gesture we can extend to our provinces, and that it will make it possible for Quebec to retain its place within this confederation, a confederation respectful of the rights of all Canadians, within which Quebec will feel more at ease and very happy.

An hon. Member: As the hon. member for Simcoe-South (Mr. Stewart) said, only one language. Tell that to Quebecers.

Miss Bégin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare on a point of order.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, would you allow me, as a Quebecer, as a Canadian, on behalf of all of us on this side of the House, perhaps for the benefit of all those in the galleries who sometimes witness our shouting matches and wonder whether our hate for each other is equal to the pitch of our voices, to point out just the same that tonight we have heard the last speech of the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) who will be leaving this House. After all, the task of all members on both sides of the House is thankless, and whatever we may think, sometimes we get carried away, but one can impute to other members but one motive for their actions, namely that once elected, they came here to do their best for all those who voted for them. I would like to urge all my colleagues to join with me in wishing the hon. member for Joliette all the best, not in his political life, because I cannot go that far, but in his private life.

Mr. Cousineau: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) allow a question from the hon. member for Gatineau?

Mr. La Salle: Certainly!

Mr. Cousineau: Instead of criticizing the Quebec members who are fighting for bilingualism in this country, does the hon. member for Joliette intend to reject and dissociate himself from the position taken by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart) in his speech last Tuesday?

Mr. La Salle: I am pleased to answer that the hon. member did not fight against bilingualism. He discussed the manner in which it has been implemented. There are always two ways to implement something. I have read the hon. member's speech. He condemned the manner in which bilingualism has been implemented not its principle.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order!

• (2040)

[English]

Mr. Andre: Go drown in the Gatineau River.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It would be much easier for the Chair to—

An hon. Member: The only thing you want from Quebec is their vote. That's all you want.

Mr. Andre: Why don't you ask Jack Horner his view, you jerk?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. It would be much easier for the Chair to recognize hon. members who, if they wish to speak, might stand up.

Mr. Forrestall: Do you want me to stand up?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): If the hon. member wants to be recognized, he should learn to stand up. I intend to now recognize the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) unless I have a point of order. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forestall) on a point of privilege.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, one wonders what it is that this House is all about when, on the eve of an hon. member's distinguished career in this House, when he is making his last comments to this assembly, we witness a cheap, cheap, low question such as that posed by the hon. member opposite, among witnesses.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Now the difficulty grows because, if the hon. member has found some fault with comments that have been made by a member on the other side, then I am sure the other side can easily find fault with comments being made now. Perhaps we can settle it in the following fashion:

I am reasonably sure that everybody wishes the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) a brilliant career and a long and happy life, as others have already said.

[English]

That is sufficiently non-political, to wish the hon. member well.

[Translation]

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish to join with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) in wishing all the best to my good friend Roch La Salle who has just made his last speech in this House. I have known the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) for a long time. He was elected to this House in 1968 along with me and many others. He was re-elected in the next five general elections. The hon. member for Joliette has always been strongly motivated and strong-minded, and I want to wish him, on behalf of all New Democrats and on my own behalf, great success in his private life. We have been friends ever since we were elected to the Canadian Parliament, that is almost thirteen years ago.

[English]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I begin my remarks tonight following those of the distinguished member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle). I think the members of this party view his departure with a certain degree of poignancy and regret, because he has been the "Lone Ranger", if I may use a western expression, and we have been able to make the proud boast that the party of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has been represented in every province and in the territories, from sea to sea. With the departure of the hon. member, we can no longer make that claim. However, I am sure that in the days ahead, after we have overcome the madness that has generated this divisive debate, there will come a time when the people of the province of Quebec will come back to that old blue party, the party of confederation; the Conservative Party which made confederation happen and which now is engaged in the most critical debate in respect of the continuation of this nation, from sea to sea, we have ever experienced.

In my 30 years in Parliament, this has been the most extraordinarily confusing debate. It is the first time I have faced a government which is doing everything possible to divide the nation. It is beyond understanding why they should pursue this divisive course.

I sat under Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent, who had the image of the father of the nation, so much so that he was known as "Uncle Louis"; what a contrast between Uncle Louis and the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

I sat under Prime Minister John Diefenbaker, who initiated the policy of co-operative federalism, and when everything possible was done to make this country, which historically has been a difficult nation to govern, function as a united nation from sea to sea. I sat under Lester Pearson, who carried on that same spirit of co-operative federalism; and then, more recently, the right hon. member who led the Conservative government for a short period.

It is a puzzling circumstance which finds me taking part in this debate, and I want to spend the time I have tonight trying to impress upon hon. members opposite that if they persist in this course, they will completely fracture this nation.

It would be different if the government had a mandate and a power base that was representative of the country; but this government has no such mandate. During the recent runoff election in 1980, not one word was mentioned about constitutional affairs. It was sort of a peek-a-boo, Goldfarb oriented election, where the main concern was keeping the leader of the Liberal party out of sight. In 1979, large areas of Canada had voted the Liberal Party out of office because of the right hon. gentleman's increasing unpopularity. So we have a government which has no mandate, its power is located in the two central provinces, using that power to force a constitution through Parliament that is opposed by 64 per cent of the people of Canada—by eight provinces—and what is most important, by the four western provinces and two territories.

As a matter of fact the two territories are not even mentioned in the Constitution. They are going to remain in a state of limbo. Their problem is to get into confederation, not to get out of it. The government is going to endeavour to enshrine in the Constitution the domination of this power base, Quebec and Ontario, in the Canadian body politique in perpetuity because of the veto power of the Victoria amending formula.

I think you will understand, Mr. Speaker, why the feeling of alienation in western Canada has been growing by leaps and bounds. Just before I came into the House tonight I was reading the Brandon Sun from my home town. The city of Brandon and western Manitoba never succumbed to all the problems of alienation there were in the early thirties with the party splintering, that saw the emergence of the CCF movement in Saskatchewan and the emergence of the Social Credit movement in Alberta. My own particular bailiwick in Manitoba never succumbed to that feeling of alienation. When I came to this House the CCF was known as "the crazy Canadian farmers" because it was part of this western agrarian protest.

An hon. Member: And the Progressives.

Mr. Dinsdale: The Progressives were earlier, in the twenties. I am referring to the thirties. The Progressives was a party of the twenties if we want an historic reference.

Last Thursday evening in the city of Brandon 750 people attended a meeting of West-Fed in the Keystone Centre. I would be lucky to get a hundred people out to a meeting, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacLaren: That is easy to understand!

Mr. Dinsdale: I want to tell the hon. member that even when the Prime Minister was out there two weeks ago he did not get that size audience either. The article in the Brandon Sun on February 27, reads in part:

During his speech, Mr. Knutson was interrupted several times by applause from the enthusiastic audience, one of the largest crowds he said he has drawn while criss-crossing western Canada in the one year since West-Fed was formed as a separatist movement.

I want to inform the hon. member for Etobicoke North (Mr. MacLaren) who is from central Canada and does not appreciate the degree of alienation rampant in western Canada at the present time, that what the government he supports—

Mr. MacLaren: I am from Vancouver!

Mr. Dinsdale: —is contemplating through its unilateral action to force a constitution over the united protests of the four provinces will contribute in a special way to the growing alienation in western Canada.

I do not know why the Prime Minister is doing this. Perhaps he anticipates what is going to happen should his Constitution pass by the use of his central Canadian based majority. He is already behaving as if Canada were a unitary state. What would happen if unitary-statism were ever imposed on the Constitution? It causes one to shudder.

The present critical imbalance of power resulted from thrusting Canada into an election six months after the people had voted for a change. The inevitable result was to split the country right down the middle. As all hon. members know, there are no government representatives west of the Red River. It is not the first time the Liberal Party has used the divide and conquer formula. It was used by the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King. He managed to keep his Upper Canada and Lower Canada power base pretty well intact during most of his long reign.

A moment ago I referred to the splintering of parties in Canada during the thirties. An hon. member seated behind me asked, "What about the Progressives of the 1920s?" It is not a happenstance that all the protest parties, all the splinter parties have had their origin in western Canada. During the twenties, thirties and forties it was possible to play these divisive political games without threatening to destroy Canada as a federal state because finance, industry and population were concentrated in the golden horseshoe area of Quebec City, Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton and Windsor. This is no longer true. Economic power has moved to western Canada. Unfortunately, political power remains in Ontario and Quebec. The unilateral action of the Prime Minister who has changed the rules in the middle of the game, is designed to ensure that it will remain there forever.

It is not a coincidence, for example, that in the two-pronged attack on western Canada, almost the same vehemence is given to the government's support of the National Energy Program and that will make it possible for the central government to invade the economic prerogatives of western Canada.

The Prime Minister moves unilaterally, using his majority based in central Canada. Unfortunately, at the present time the numbers in the other place support him, although it is encouraging to note that some very responsible voices in that other place have been heard to warn against the foolishness of unilateral action of this kind. It is becoming increasingly clear from the debates in this House, and reports in the newspapers, exactly what the Prime Minister is doing to Canada.

In a recent visit to British Columbia the message was made abundantly clear. A front page story in the Ottawa Citizen under the byline by Iain Hunter, national editor, put that situation in focus. In part the article said:

Prime Minister Trudeau admitted Thursday he is dividing Canadians by pushing through his constitutional reforms. He's not sorry about it, he declared—in some cases he finds it 'exhilarating.'

How can a national leader find a fundamental division in Canada exhilarating? In my experience in the House up to this time, I have observed that the main purpose of a prime minister has been to find the modus vivendi, some common ground, so that the process of reconciliation can go on, rather than the process of divisiveness. The newspaper article goes on:

Trudeau told more than 200 cheering Liberal supporters—

The hon. member for Etobicoke North referred to the 100 that came out to cheer me. I do not know whether or not there are any more than 200 Liberals in British Columbia. The story goes on:

Trudeau told more than 200 cheering Liberal supporters here that if the country breaks apart in five or 50 years because of his unilateral action to patriate the Constitution with an entrenched charter of rights and his own amending formula—

I am quoting now from the press article:

—"then I say it wasn't worthy of living another day".

In other words, "après moi, le déluge—If I don't get my way, the country is not worth saving."

● (2100)

I have heard of other political leaders in fascist countries who have expressed almost the same thought. I propound the question, why would a national leader deliberately want to create division in Canada? It has taken us a long time to reach the point of unity out of the diversity that we have at the present time. It has resulted from a spirit of tolerance and good will.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but, as he may know, under the extended hours provisions of the House order we are expected at this time to proceed to private members' business.

It being nine o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions, private bills and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Does the House agree to stand all items under the heading notices of motions.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Royal Canadian Legion

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I thought it would be wise to put the motion before the House first.

Mr. Collenette: Before we start with the consideration of Bill S-15, Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties and it has been agreed that all stages of this bill will be disposed of before ten o'clock tonight. The sponsor of the bill, the hon. member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke (Mr. Hopkins), had discussions with the other parties about the length of time that various speakers will participate in the debate. At Committee of the Whole stage questions may be directed to the hon. member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke. I would request a House order to the effect that this bill be disposed of by ten o'clock tonight.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have consulted with the hon. member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke (Mr. Hopkins) who is in charge of this bill in the House. That is the agreement. There is unanimity both with respect to the substance and the timing suggested by the parliamentary secretary as far as he and I are concerned. This is a good piece of parliamentary work and we should have it completed by ten. We consent to a House order so that the Royal Canadian Legion will have its legislation as it expects.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, both the parliamentary secretary and the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) have stated the situation as it is. We gladly agree to the House order for we would like this bill to be given second reading, Committee of the Whole stage and third reading by ten o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): As indicated by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Collenette), I will put to the House the suggestion that the motion by the hon. member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke (Mr. Hopkins), that Bill S-15 respecting the Royal Canadian Legion be read a second time, put through Committee of the Whole stage and given third reading and be through all stages before ten o'clock this evening. Is it the pleasure of the House to proceed in that fashion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It is agreed and so ordered.

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION

AMENDMENTS TO ACT OF INCORPORATION

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke) moved that Bill S-15, respecting the Royal Canadian Legion be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of pride and honour that I accepted the privilege to move second reading of Bill S-15 in the House of Commons. It deals with four important amendments to the act of incorporation for the charter of the Royal Canadian Legion. It is very fitting that this bill should be seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) whose "chief residence" has been the House of Commons for many years and who has been very active on behalf of veterans.

At this time, also, I would be very remiss if I did not state that the House leader of the Conservative Party was very willing to second the motion for second reading of this bill, but he willingly gave that privilege to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Therefore, I sincerely thank these gentlemen, members of their parties, for their co-operation.

The willingness on the part of political parties on both sides of this House to agree to these arrangements tonight is symbolic of the traditional non-partisanship that is practised in Parliament on matters dealing with the Royal Canadian Legion and veterans' affairs. The Royal Canadian Legion supports all veterans and their families, regardless of whether they are members of the Legion and at the same time are exceptionally strong supporters and promoters of the Canadian Armed Forces.

The Legion does not go around bragging about all the good work it does. Instead, its membership simply gets on with completing its many projects, be they of an individual nature, a community-oriented venture or national in scope. One thing that we, Members of Parliament, take great satisfaction from is the close co-operation that exists between the Royal Canadian Legion and the people in the Department of Veterans Affairs.

One thing that cannot be stressed strongly enough is that more than 1,800 branches of the Royal Canadian Legion across Canada take an exceedingly sincere and deep interest in the youth of our nation. The same can be said with regard to their fine treatment of senior citizens. By their many deeds, the Legion members of today are indeed keeping faith with their fallen comrades.

The bill before us tonight proves in a very concrete way that the Royal Canadian Legion is continually renewing itself and is keeping up with changing times, but is doing so without compromising the principles upon which it was built and upon which it has functioned successfully over the years.

The purpose of amending the act of incorporation is to regularize the position of the Legion. Over the years Dominion conventions have voted to admit other groups of people they thought worthy of joining the Legion, never realizing that these groups were not covered by the act of incorporation. This anomaly was brought to the attention of the executive and the convention of 1980 instructed the executive to seek an amendment to the act to cover the many groups which had been accepted into the Legion.

There must be other groups who served in some capacity during the wars and who might in future be proposed for membership in the Legion. This is why the Legion would like Section 4(a) to be changed. The result would cover both those who are in and those who might be accepted at a later date.

The purpose of the second amendment they are seeking is quite clear. In days gone by, they used to have most of their branches in the city core because that is where people used to live. Nowadays people have moved to the suburbs and in many cases branches in the city core have hardly enough members to keep them going and they often wish to amalgamate. The act will authorize them to amalgamate branches.

The third amendment they seek concerns the election of officers at Dominion Command. The fourth amendment that is sought is designed to protect the badge of the Legion.

I can certainly report, Mr. Speaker, that the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs, like his predecessor, the late Daniel MacDonald, supports this bill and, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the late Daniel MacDonald's record during a lifetime of service to his country will always be looked upon as the ideal model for all members of the Royal Canadian Legion to emulate.

• (2110)

The Legion has been a critic of government action—or inaction—from time to time. Certainly there have been occasions when it has objected to the pace of the progress being made toward improving benefits. I know that any criticisms are regarded as genuine attempts to stir Parliament and the public so that justice can be achieved more quickly. Similarly, briefs and resolutions prepared by the Legion are not merely acknowledged and then disregarded by the Department of Veterans Affairs but studied carefully because it is known that the Legion has done its homework and knows its subjects, as any past or present member of our Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs can confirm.

This spirit of dedication and co-operation is a healthy thing for Canada, and when at international conferences of veterans' organizations this country is praised for having the most progressive veterans legislation in the world, members of the Royal Canadian Legion can quite rightly share in that credit.

I also know that the present minister who, as we all know, is a Quebecer, was proud of the way the Royal Canadian Legion rallied around the federal forces during the referendum campaign last year. Once again when Canada needed them, members of the Legion were there.

Tonight we are dealing with a five-page bill, Bill S-15, which brings in four key amendments to the charter of the largest organization in all of Canada. The Royal Canadian Legion—with over 1,800 branches—over 546,000 members—over 315,000 saw active service in two world wars and Korea—there are over 800,000 veterans in Canada. These are the people who taught our nation what Winston Churchill meant when he said: "Courage is the first of human qualities because it is the quality which guarantees all the others". These are the people whose influence on the national life of Canada has lived up to Harry Lauder's statement: "I could tell where the lamplighter was by the trail he left behind him."

We in this House of Commons, Mr. Speaker, congratulate the members of the Royal Canadian Legion throughout their organization across Canada for the many "trails" they have built in Canada, and we know that they, as lamplighters, will continue to influence the lives of present and future generations of Canadians. We thank them and wish them well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be speaking about a veterans' bill again. In reality tonight we are talking about a Royal Canadian Legion bill, and one should be careful to differentiate.

This bill will add some clauses to the charter which will enable people who are not veterans to become members of the Royal Canadian Legion. It is right that this should be done. The veterans are really people who served in World War I, World War II or in Korea. They are getting older, as we all do, and need more younger people to keep the Legion healthy as an institution, among other reasons.

I am pleased tonight to see that the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs is in the House. I have some suggestions I intend to put to the Legion which it might wish to pursue. Possibly the minister will pay attention to some of them and perhaps even solve some of the problems this evening.

I think the broadening of the base of membership in the Legion is a welcome amendment, and the Legion should not lose sight of its aim. It says in the bill that the Legion will now take other persons who support the purposes and objects of the Legion. I have always believed that the principal purpose and object of the Legion was to look after the welfare of the veterans of the two world wars and the veterans of Korea. I hope the Legion will continue to do that.

Also in the bill, before it was amended, the Legion took in members who were members of Her Majesty's armed forces or any auxiliary force thereof whether or not they are still serving. I hope the Legion will take an interest in these ex-servicemen, and particularly long service pensioners. They are very concerned as to what will happen to their pensions.

Recently I wrote to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) on their behalf for an assurance that the indexation of their pensions would continue. The reply from the Minister of National Defence, who is responsible for long service pensioners' pensions, was that he would only guarantee it for this year. He said it would be up to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) with respect to future years. That is rather alarming news for the long service pensioners who have a pension fund of something over $8 billion—at least in theory—to which they have contributed their share, and they believe that the fund is of a size which should be able to take the strain of the indexation of the annuitants' pensions.

Another area for Legion prodding might well be on behalf of the widows of disabled veterans. Their pensions are being phased in over an extended period, which should be shortened for two very good reasons. The first reason is that only one third, I understand, of the widows thought to be eligible in the first phase have actually applied for the widows' pensions. Therefore, there have been and will be unexpected savings in this area. The second reason is that when the Conservatives brought in the veterans' bill we brought it in to provide a breakthrough in widows' pensions; there was a period of restraint when the Progressive Conservative government of the day was trying to reduce the annual deficit. As the Liberals have shown no desire to reduce the deficit, their profligate spending might better go to a deserving cause than to some of their present causes.

Finally, the Legion might wish to pursue the cause of disabled veterans' pensions and their supposed connection to the take-home pay of five categories of civil servants. The pensions are at present below the civil service pay rates and have not been adjusted for several years. I have not been able to see why the adjustment cannot be made on an annual basis. I hope the Legion will actively campaign for this.

The final question I have is about the estimates of the minister. I realize we will not have a stage of this bill during which I can directly question the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs, but I notice in his estimates—and he might wish to comment on this during his intervention—under the heading of assistance in accordance with the provisions of the assistance fund regulations this year there is a drop of $3 million or something over $3 million. The estimates have been reduced from $4,150,000 to $1 million. If that could be explained, I would appreciate it very much.

Finally, it is a pleasure to support this bill, and agree, as we have tonight, to put it through in one hour. It shows the flexibility of our parliamentary system when some bills can take one hour to go through all three stages and when, on the other hand, we have a resolution which might take a year to go through all the stages.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke (Mr. Hopkins) for permitting me to be the seconder of the motion for the second reading of this bill. I am honoured to have a few minutes to speak in its support.

As has already been suggested, there are times when we seem to take an eternity to get certain measures through this Parliament, but here we have ready agreement tonight to put this bill through second reading, Committee of the Whole and third reading, all in an hour or less. That does not set a pattern which is likely to be followed very often, but the fact we are prepared to do that indicates how warm is our affection in this House of Commons for the Royal Canadian Legion. Indeed, I suppose this hour will see members vying with each other to say the nicest things they can about the Legion. When all the nicest things have all been said, they will all be deserved. We are all conscious of the interest this organization has had and the things it has done.

Like others, I should like to pay tribute in particular to the persistence and the continuing effort with which the Royal Canadian Legion has sought to protect the interests and the well-being of its members and of all veterans who have served this country. It was said a moment ago that the Legion could take some share of the credit for the legislation we have on our books for the veterans of this country. I think that share has to be very large one. There is no doubt that over the years the Legion has pressed, intelligently and with good background in terms of research, for legislation to take care of disabled veterans, older veterans, and of those who are in economic difficulties but do not have disabilities for which they could get pensions under the Pension Act and they have stayed with the job.

We are talking about an organization which has been working hard for over half a century, and my contacts with officers of the Royal Canadian Legion make it clear to me that they are just as active as ever. We commend them for the part they have played and we look forward to their continued contribution in this way.

Not only have they helped to raise the standards in terms of benefit, care and health protection for veterans, their families and their survivors, but to the extent they have persuaded governments and parliaments to bring in legislation on behalf of veterans, their families and their survivors, they have aided the cause of the protection of all people in our society. They have done a good job and they deserve whatever tributes are paid to them by members who speak in this hour tonight.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon). I do not want to use this occasion as an opportunity to put pressure on the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs. We do not want to make this into a partisan matter, and I shall not do so. We have other opportunities to make representations to the minister, but since we are talking about a bill on behalf of the Legion perhaps I can say I was delighted when, last Thursday, the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs told me and told the House that some time soon, I believe it was to be this week, he would be meeting with officers of the Royal Canadian Legion to discuss a number of matters.

I do not direct my plea to him tonight, I direct it to the Legion. When he meets with them, I hope they will press very hard for some of the things that need to be resolved. The list, of course, is not as long as it used to be. There is the question of getting rid of that phasing-in period with respect to pensions for widows of disabled veterans. There is the question of getting the 100 per cent pension tied to the average take-home pay of the five designated categories in the public service. There is the question of reconsidering the rates of compensation to former prisoners of war, and a few other items.

We are all pleased that in these days more attention is being given to older veterans, and I believe one of the things that has happened amongst the Legionnaires themselves is that as they have become older and faced the prospect of leaving widows without pensions, they have become more interested in legislation which affects the pensions of widows. A decade or two ago that question was down a few notches on the Legion's agenda; now it is right at the top.

I hope the Legion will be encouraged by the good things being said on their behalf tonight to have a really friendly heart to heart talk with the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs when he meets with them. This is not a speech on veterans affairs, and I am not making an appeal to the minister; I am just telling it as it is.

The last time I had the privilege of being at a gathering of the Dominion Command of the Legion, the minister was there, everything was warm and friendly, and I know that he knows how anxious the members of the Legion are to see still further progress in matters of veterans' legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I have tried to make my comments in terms that befit the spirit of this hour, but I return to the main thing I wanted to say, and we all wanted to say tonight, that we are happy to endorse the bill before us. We are pleased that the Legion has decided that this far away from wars—and we hope we will get still farther away from them—they would like to open up their membership so that people who are not veterans can join their ranks, and all of us in the House tonight extend our greetings and our best wishes to the Royal Canadian Legion.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, it is with genuine pleasure that I speak in support of Bill S-15, an act respecting the Royal Canadian Legion.

Old soldiers may never die, but we cannot hide the fact that there are fewer veterans and therefore an increasing need that other persons who support the purposes and objectives of the Legion participate on an equal basis in the Royal Canadian Legion.

Though so many years have passed, I will not forget the pride I felt when I joined the Royal Air Force Volunteer Reserve and became Airman 1394281. Nor will I forget the tumultuous welcome we received when we landed in Halifax to participate in the Commonwealth air training plan. The warm hospitality continued in Montreal, wide open Montreal, with a 3 a.m. closing and the generously donated Air Force house on Sherbrooke Street, which was so easy to visit from the Lachine Manning Depot. Then we were off to elementary flying training at St. Eugene in Ontario. I see the member in the party opposite who, I believe, was at the school at about the same time I was there. It was there that I got to know so many of the kind people of Hudson, Quebec, the town where my family and I have lived since the war.

It was here at Uplands, Ottawa, that I got my wings and commission and became Pilot Officer No. 136664. Who will forget those wonderful weekends across the river in Hull at the old Standish Hall. Next it was to Summerside, Prince Edward Island, and the not so dry hospitality of a dry island, and I suppose people know what I am talking about. Then it was to Europe for the more serious work. I lost 50 per cent of my buddies in the period when I was on operational flying. In so many ways, the Royal Canadian Legion ensures that we do not forget their sacrifice along with that of too many others who could never return to their families and friends.

The Legion is not just an association for socializing and for swapping wartime stories. It brings together veterans and their families with a common interest in caring for the needs of their sick and disabled comrades.

In my constituency of Vaudreuil, some 1,200 veterans are cared for in the magnificent Ste. Anne de Bellevue Veterans Hospital. The Royal Canadian Legion watches carefully to ensure that the Department of Veterans Affairs gives to these less fortunate ex-servicemen and women the standard and quality of care and attention they deserve. The Royal Canadian Legion branches have also been instrumental in providing housing for veterans. The General Vanier Branch No. 234 in Roxboro, the Churchill Branch No. 91 in Ste. Anne de Bellevue, the Pointe Claire Branch No. 57, and my own branch of which I am a proud comrade, Hudson Branch No. 115, joined together to build a block of 95 apartments with the assistance of veterans' housing legislation.

• (2130)

Those of us who were fortunate enough to survive unharmed the horrors of war, the bombs, the ack-ack, the box barrage, the machine guns and rifle fire, must ensure that our children are occasionally reminded of those frightening experiences, even if it is only once a year when Legion members sell the red Flanders Field poppies for the assistance of veterans and to commemorate the end of the First World War on November 11.

I salute the Royal Canadian Legion and support quick passage of Bill S-15.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is comforting to experience the friendly manner of members of the official opposition and the New Democratic Party in the consideration of Bill S-15. I hope members will be as friendly for the rest of this week, or even the rest of this month.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to take part tonight in this debate on the Royal Canadian Legion. I must say that I am most pleased to do so because I believe the merits of the Canadian Legion are well recognized by all Canadians. I think we must also pay tribute tonight not only to the leaders of the Legion, the executive, but also to all those who work all across Canada, in the towns, cities, and communities, where they try, by all possible means, to give the best possible care and treatment to all our veterans. For those who would wonder how many veterans there are left in Canada, I will say there are still more that 700,000 of them. So, as far as veterans are concerned, they are a significant part of the Canadian population which is worth taking care of, and this is what we have been doing for a long time.

By the way, Mr. Speaker, I excuse the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who were understandably tempted to make some suggestions to the minister responsible for veterans. I suggest they took the opportunity even though they knew that this was a bill respecting the Royal Canadian Legion. I took their comments in good part and I know their purpose in doing so was to try to advise the minister in order to speed up the process and to find means to better the welfare of our veterans.

[English]

I am pleased to participate in the consideration of this bill. The Royal Canadian Legion has great merit and should have the recognition of all Canadians for its work over the past many years. I assure hon. members that I support the bill; this is why I wanted to say a few words tonight.

I thank members of the official opposition and the NDP for supporting Bill S-15. I assure the hon. member for Victoria and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that we are aware of the problems concerning the phasing in of widows' pensions and the allocation to veterans of whatever they deserve. We recognize the impact of inflation upon their pensions. This is perhaps one of the most important things we have to take care of. We recognize their position in regard to the poverty line. In fact, we are aware of all their problems, as are the four agencies which administer the Department of Veterans Affairs. These agencies are attempting to do their job as efficiently and as rapidly as possible, so that the veterans will be given what they deserve.

I do not want to prolong this debate, especially considering the agreement that we pass it in all stages tonight. Again I thank hon. members opposite for their co-operation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we could proceed with the adjournment debate at this moment. If that is agreeable, I should like to call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement to proceed with the adjournment debate at this stage?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) is present. Since his question is the first one on the list, I think it would be appropriate to proceed.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the third member is present as well, the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky), so let us proceed.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

SMALL BUSINESS—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING INDEPENDENT RETAIL SECTOR OF PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, as reported at page 7606 of Hansard for February 24, I directed questions to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe). I asked him what he had done to represent independent oil distributors in the downstream sector of the petroleum industry. His answer was entirely unsatisfactory. In his answer he said:

All necessary action is being taken to ensure a regular supply to the independent distributors in Quebec and we are monitoring the situation daily.

Well, if that answer was correct, why are independent distributors in Quebec so distressed and so short of the raw material they need for their livelihood?

My second question was answered by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). Part of my supplementary question was:

Will there be more or less competition now that Petro-Canada has joined the majors?

In other words, it is the refinery gate price and the cartel at the refinery gate which are strangling the life out of independent producers in Canada.

I am one of the few members in the House—perhaps I am the only member—who took the time and trouble to make a major presentation to the Bryce commission on corporate concentration, as I am very concerned about the ongoing collectivization in Canada in terms of larger and larger corporate entities in the marketplace. Conglomerates and monopolies are strangling individual initiative and the small and medium-enterprise sectors.

● (2140)

What we have here is study upon study, commission upon commission, all delaying the inevitable day of either a fascist state or a communist state. This is so because we are allowing everything to come under the umbrella of large corporations or under the umbrella of state ownership. It is right in the heart of this issue to which I was directing my question.

The independents at large across Canada, the independent distributors and retailers of petroleum products, distribute about 15 per cent on a national average. But it is very interesting to note that in the province of Quebec they distribute over 35 per cent of the product in that province. In that province, particularly as a result of the control that the majors have over the refinery gate price, they cannot get the product they need to survive and expand in a normal way. Now that the state has entered into the downstream sector of the petroleum industry, my questions were directed at whether it would continue to smother and stifle the independent sector or whether it would break the stranglehold and cartel on the refinery gate price which controls the independent sector.

There are independents in Quebec which have been very successful, but while they need 4,000 barrels a day they are only getting 2,000 barrels a day. They are in trouble. They are being smothered and stifled. I hope that with PetroCan entering that aspect of our lives this will open up some of the crude supplies and allow the independent sector in the petroleum industry to expand and grow. The independents are cost-efficient in this area where the majors have not been. I think that has been borne out by the Ontario Royal Commission on Petroleum Product Pricing, and it said so in 1975. From 1974 to 1978 the majors activities did not make a satisfactory return in the downstream sector. It was not until OPEC opened up, as we have just found out from the report of the director of combines, and this has been supported—it was not until that world problem opened up that the majors moved in, in a substantial way, in the downstream sector, and survival and growth of the independents all of a sudden came to a screeching halt. They found themselves in a completely controlled position.

In the few minutes I have left, Mr. Speaker, I would like to reiterate one of the examples I used in my questions to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. This was the example of Petro-Canada purchasing Merit Oil in Burnaby, B.C. Merit Oil Company was one of the companies in the private sector that cracked the monopoly and went into the pay and save and the self-service stations. They gave the consumers that break in life. They became very successful, selling up to 50 million gallons a year. But when this OPEC pricing started and the refinery gate became controlled by a cartel, Merit found itself in a condition of being smothered. Merit asked Imperial Oil, which was one of the four majors supplying it, the others being Gulf, Shell and Pacific to the tune of about 5 per cent to 10 per cent, if it would allow Merit a little more room at the refinery gate price in order to survive. It has been reported to me that Imperial Oil said no, it would allow Merit 13 per cent. When the owner of Merit heard that and when he understood it was the final word from the cartel controlling the refinery gate price, he turned to his lawyer and told him to go and accept the PetroCan offer. That is what is happening to the private and the independent sectors in Canada.

I was asking the two ministers concerned; with PetroCan coming in and state ownership taking over more of the Canadian operations under the guise of Canadianization, how they can Canadianize something which is already Canadian-owned. That is complete nationalization, Mr. Speaker. I am asking if Petro-Canada's entry into this area will continue to nationalize Canadian-owned independents, or will it crack the cartel which exists and break the stranglehold at the refinery gate with respect to price over the independent petroleum distributors in this country? They cannot grow unless something happens.

This problem exists in Newfoundland where an independent cannot sell out and it cannot get supplies at a fair price in order to survive. Irving Oil in the Atlantic will not supply independents. Imperial is not renewing contracts with independents. In Europe and in the United States the independents are much stronger because the governments there want to encourage and strengthen the independents, and as a result there is a far broader section of competition available to protect the interests of the consumer.

I want to know if this government is joining the cartel of the majors through Petro-Canada. Will it control the refinery gate price or will it be using its substantial powers to open up refinery product supply and prices to the Canadian-owned independent companies? The answers of the two ministers have not cleared this question up.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's remarks this evening are timely, given the release this week of the eight-year study entitled "The State of Competition in the Canadian Petroleum Industry", to which the hon. member has made reference. The report suggests that certain developments:

—have considerably enhanced the ability of the major domestic petroleum refiners to restrict the operations of independent suppliers of gasoline and fuel oil.

I am sure all members will await with interest the hearings and the recommendations of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

Mr. Huntington: Put your notes down and just give the answer.

Mr. MacLaren: On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, the federal government has done a number of things to ensure the viability of the independent wholesalers and retailers in the petroleum industry. For example, in response to the tight supply conditions prevailing during 1979, the federal government advised Canadian refiners and terminal operators of the government's position that the vialibity of efficient retailers must be maintained. It requested that the major companies act to alleviate any problems which existed at the time. Government guidelines specifically directed that refiners and terminal operators, (1) not alter substantially their trade class mix, (2) continue to supply customers of record according to current requirements—historical off-takes unless superseded by recently made contractual renewal or cancellations—and (3), not arbitrarily deny contract renewal.

Continuous contact has been maintained with the independent oil distributors. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) and the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Lapointe) have met several times in recent months with representatives of the independent companies. Government officials have been monitoring the market. The market share of the independents has been maintained, in accordance with government policy and guidelines. In fact, the gasoline marketing sphere of the independents increased in 1980.

As a result of the recent acquisition of Petrofina by Petro-Canada, the role of that Crown corporation has become more clearly defined in eastern Canada. Petro-Canada and the government are now carefully examining new crude oil supply possibilities, in the light of this acquisition, with the intent of determining how the independents can be further assisted. The National Energy Program is specifically designed to maintain a strong and vigorous independent sector within our petroleum industry. The recent initiative by Petro-Canada is in full support of this objective.

While an important aim of the National Energy Program is to increase Canadian ownership and control within the oil and gas industry, this will not be done through increasing concentration of power in the hands of a small number of Canadian companies. A concentrated Canadian industry is an unsatisfactory substitute for a concentrated foreign-owned industry. Competition is the consumers best protection. It is the intent of the federal government to promote an increase in the number of Canadian participants within the industry.

THE CONSTITUTION—QUERY WHETHER CHARTER OF RIGHTS COVERS UNBORN CHILDREN

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, I have come here tonight to alert the House and the country to an issue which has not yet received attention. In my judgment, it is a sleeper issue and one which will have profound effects on the life of our country for decades to come. It is the abortion issue as it relates to the charter of rights, which is now before the House.

I want it understood that this brief presentation I am making tonight is not an attack on the charter, as such, and it is not a partisan appeal for any support. Rather, Sir, it is an effort to bring to the attention of the House my contention and my belief, supported by a legal opinion, that within the charter of rights, as it now stands before the House, Sections 7 and 15, contain therein not only the prospect but the likelihood of what will happen as a result of the entrenchment of Sections 7 and 15; that is, that in future any law on abortion will become unconstitutional.

I do not think this is what the public or members of the House want. I think we want a situation in which we can give a political response to the abortion issue, taking section 251 of the Criminal Code into consideration, which allows women to have abortions when the life or health of the mother is in danger. Since that amendment came into the Criminal Code in 1969, abortions have grown to the point where they now exceed 65,000 per year, and it is a very serious situation.

Tonight I only want to focus on what the charter of rights will do. I ask the parliamentary secretary to respond directly to the legal opinion which I will put before him and to draw this to the attention of the minister, because on February 20 I asked the minister whether the words "everyone and every individual", as used in Sections 7 and 15, would apply to the unborn child, and the minister said the government did not intend to affect the abortion question with respect to the charter.

The legal opinion I have is from the distinguished firm of Stephens, French, McKeown & Taylor, in Toronto. It was presented to the members of the all-party committee on pro-life. It is a non-partisan committee, and there are representatives from every political party. One of the co-chairmen is the distinguished hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), who is in the House tonight, and this opinion was presented to members yesterday. I cannot take the time of the House, at the moment, to go through it all.

I would like to point out to the parliamentary secretary and to the House that the operative law with respect to the rights of human beings today, connected to the abortion question, is a case from the Ontario Supreme Court, in which Mr. Justice Robins, in September, 1979, reiterated the law which has been upheld since then by the Ontario Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada. Mr. Justice Robins said:

—the law has selected birth as the point at which the foetus becomes a person with full and independent rights.

It will not be possible under the charter, as it is now written, given the context of the law under which we are now operating, for the foetus to be considered to be a human being and given rights. In order for the foetus to have rights, it must be born, and become capable of asserting its right to life under section 7. That is the part of my contention.

I point out that the only rights and freedoms which will exist in Canada after the charter becomes law are those presently in existence. I have already said that Mr. Justice Robins' decision is the operative court decision. In order to make any change in that, if this charter of rights becomes entrenched, we will require a constitutional amendment. We know how difficult that will be to obtain. It will probably never come in our lifetime, and we will be entering a situation in which, under Section 15, which says the right of the woman is protected, there will be a conflict between the right of the mother and the right of the foetus.

I submit, and I believe a wide body of parliamentarians and the public would agree, that the day has come when the law must say that life begins in the womb, that the foetus is a potential human being, a human being in the process of formation, and should be afforded those rights.

I close by pointing out that if the government is sincere and does not want to upset the abortion question, it will accept an amendment that would specify, as the firm of Stephens, French, McKeown & Taylor has suggested, that everyone, including the unborn, has the right to life, that life begins at conception, and that right is assertable from conception. That is the amendment we seek.

I ask the parliamentary secretary to take this into very serious consideration. He will recognize that I have not given him any kind of a partisan argument tonight; I am giving him an argument which goes to the heart of the charter applied to the right to life.

What do the words "everyone has the right to life" actually mean? The government cannot get out from under by saying that it will not affect the abortion, because if we do not act to amend that charter, we will be entrenching abortion. I suggest that the members of the House do not recognize that this will happen. They do not wish it to happen, and certainly all those Canadians who are very concerned with the 65,000 abortions per year do not want that situation to occur.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ron Irwin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche) for his concern about this very important issue.

During the hearings of the special joint committee, the views on the issue were very divided. The right to life advocates argued that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms should make it very clear that the unborn child has the right to life. The pro-choice groups contended the right of a woman to have an abortion should not be put in jeopardy.

• (2200)

Mr. J. Robert Kellerman, legal counsel, Canadian Abortion Rights Action League—CARAL—speaking of the right of life applying to the embryo or the foetus, stated the following to the special joint committee:

We have already expressed the opinion, and I think it is a fact, that the majority of the Canadian people do not subscribe to that belief. It is a minority view and it is a view which should not be allowed to express itself as if it is an entrenched right in the Constitution of Canada.

On the other hand, Major John J. H. Connors, LL.B., a health services consultant with Alliance for Life, spoke to the special joint committee along the following lines:

Consider, if you will, the stages of life as links in a chain. Canada's pensioners, our infirmed and incapacitated, our labour force, our students, our children and, even younger, our babies, are linked together, because all are human whatever might otherwise be their status. So, too, are unborn children a link in the same chain, similarly human and even more deserving of protection because of their vulnerability. Their very weakness dictates their need of the special protection of being named under section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, which we respectfully request include a provision that everyone, from conception to natural death, has the right to life.

Because this is a matter on which there exist fundamentally differing views in Canada, the charter does not seek to take a position on the rights of the unborn and abortion, believing this is a question better left for determination by Parliament in the exercise of its ordinary legislative jurisdiction which can be adjusted from time to time as social and moral values evolve.

As long as abortion remains an evolving social issue with a divided public opinion it is best dealt with through the flexibility of legislation rather than entrenchment of one view or the other.

The Canadian charter of rights and freedoms enjoys the support of the majority of Canadians because it protects our basic rights and liberties. With respect to the abortion issue, the charter will not in any way alter the right of Parliament to legislate concerning abortions but provide only that such legislation shall be consistent with principles of fundamental justice. The will of the people of Canada, as expressed through Parliament, shall continue to be the arbiter of the abortion question. The charter does not at all affect the current provisions of the Criminal Code respecting abortion; rather it provides a framework within which the question can be addressed by all Canadians.

COMMUNICATIONS—AM RADIO TRANSMISSION—PROPOSED CHANGE IN DIAL POSITIONS

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my remarks to a question I raised on January 28 in this House about the proposed change of the dial position of the AM band. At that time the response of the minister who was dealing with communications, the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) said they were "favourable to maintaining the spacing of ten kilohertz" and that up till then there had been no change in their position.

I also addressed a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan), which he took as notice. In a subsequent letter to me he indicated that the position the government will take at the conference will be that which best meets the requirements of Canadian broadcasters and the interest of the public, while at the same time recognizing the need to co-ordinate and co-operate with other countries in the region. This reply is very non-commital and does not really satisfy my constituents who were making the inquiries.

Since that time I have received a number of resolutions opposing the change on the AM dial from various municipalities such as Dauphin, Grandview, the rural municipality of Gilbert Plains, the rural municipality of Glenella, the rural municipality of Shellmouth and the local government district of Alonsa. Many people have come to see me in the constituency, such as the manager of the local radio station, Hugh Dunlop, who strongly opposes any such changes. Some of my colleagues have passed on representations from radio stations in their ridings where the changes are also opposed. This is indicated in letters to the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) and the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Parker). It is because of these representations that I should like to deal with the subject this evening.

When I met with Peter Nykolaishen the engineer at CKDM radio station, he indicated what this means to a rural station such as Dauphin. In the case of CKDM they would have to purchase new crystals, change their number from 730 to 739, shift the antennae, bring in specialty people to make the changes, and there would be a great inconvenience to the public which has been listening to the station for 30 years. There would also be problems for other members of the staff, such as sales manager, Jack Henderson, who indicated that promotional literature and letterheads would have to be changed, listeners would have to become adjusted to the dial change and for a time would be confused. Small transistor radios may not be able to pick up all the changes that would occur.

Other constituents have written to tell me what the change means to them. The secretary treasurer of the rural municipality of Gilbert Plains, Mr. Drebnisky wrote:

> For example we have a few hundred people in this area alone that like to listen to the CJOB Winnipeg station broadcasts of the Montreal Expos baseball games, Winnipeg Blue Bombers football broadcasts and the Winnipeg Jets hockey games. Daytime listening is fine but as soon as dusk arrives there is such interference from an American station that it is impossible to listen to the broadcasts.

In the south end of my constituency which is close to Winnipeg, the resident administrator of the district of Alonsa, Mr. Hryciuk, writes:

> I would like to state that I know of one station in Manitoba that has problems now and that is CJOB. It happens to be one of my favourite stations and if this same should happen to the great number of our Manitoba and other stations, then I say, let's keep what we've got.

In addition I have letters and representations from organizations such as the Broadcasters' Association of Manitoba. The president, John Cochrane writes:

> Rural listeners will be inundated with an even greater number of foreign signals at night and some of our Manitoba stations' signals will have more interference from these stations.

He goes on to note that 95 per cent of the AM stations will have to change their dial position, that there will be a reduction in the sound quality of stations and that the usefulness of future technical improvements such as AM stereo will be limited.

I have received similar representations from the Arctic Radio Corporation Limited which indicates the prohibitive costs that small stations would face in rural Manitoba. I have also had representations from the Hall-Gray Broadcasting Company Ltd. in British Columbia. This is a problem right across Canada and is one that should be addressed by the department.

On behalf of our constituents we would like to have a clear statement, not merely a neutral statement. We urge the government to actively promote the retention of the ten kilohertz interval spacing on the AM dial at the coming convention.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The selection of a preferred spacing for frequency channels for AM radio transmissions is a complicated issue involving a comparative evaluation of the costs that would be borne by Canadian broadcasters if closer spacing were adopted and of the benefits from such a change in the form of opportunities to establish new or to upgrade existing AM broadcasting stations.

As the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox) said in responding to a question on January 28, our traditional position has been to retain ten kHz spacing. Indeed, it was the Canadian delegation at a conference in Buenos Aires in March, 1980, that provided the crucial support to the Brazilian delegation to bring about an 18-month delay in the decision on whether to adopt nine or ten kHz channel spacing as the international standard. This decision will now be taken at a conference to be convened in Rio de Janeiro by the International Telecommunications Union in November. The sole purpose of this conference will be to establish a frequency assignment plan for the 9,000 AM broadcasting stations currently operating in North, Central and South America, and to adopt co-ordination procedures for the establishment of new stations during the next five years.

In preparation for this conference, Canadian officials, in close consultation with representatives from the Canadian broadcasting industry, are studying all technical and operational aspects of AM broadcasting in Canada, including the channel spacing issue. Indeed, a technical expert from the Canadian Association of Broadcasters was an important member of the Canadian delegation in Buenos Aires. He will continue in this role in Rio de Janeiro in November.

Some members of this House have had an opportunity to discuss this matter with officials of the Department of Communications. For those who have not, I should like to note two important factors.

First, the decision at the ITU conference will be arrived at by means of a vote in which each country, regardless of size and population, will have one vote. If the majority adopts a channel spacing different from that proposed by Canada, we should be forced to conform to the international standard because there would be extensive interference to Canadian broadcasting stations if they were spaced at different intervals from those stations in the rest of the Americas.

Second, we are in close contact with other administrations in the western hemisphere, including the United States. Canadian officials are participating in a series of working groups convened by the inter-American telecommunications conference. We are a member of an eight-country international panel of experts established to study the issue. As part of our participation in these meetings, the Department of Communications has established a Canadian government-industry working group for detailed working level discussions both before and after the international meetings.

I can assure the hon. member that the government intends to finalize the Canadian position in full consultation with Canadian groups which have expressed an interst or concern over this issue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock.

At 10.08 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ALASKA GAS PIPELINE—UNITED STATES GUARANTEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I wish to introduce a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas it would appear that the United States is now having second thoughts about the Alaska gas pipeline, I move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That this House require the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to make a statement on motions explaining his failure to obtain the so-called ironclad guarantees of pipeline construction from the new American administration.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

JURISDICTION OVER CANADIAN WATERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the controversy which exists between France and Canada over the ownership of fishing and mineral rights on Canada's continental shelf between mainland France and the offshore islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon which are now classed as French provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Gass):

That the Canadian government communicate with the French government, emphatically informing that government that the so-called disputed waters, which cover part of the Hibernia and Ben Nevis oil fields, are sovereign Canadian waters and resources.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

OIL INDUSTRY CONTRIBUTIONS TO POLITICAL PARTIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that both the Liberal and Conservative parties buried the oil industry price fixing report for the past eight years, and that the protection money in the form of political contributions paid by the oil majors totalled close to half a million dollars between 1974 and 1977, over $190,000 to the Liberal Party and over $250,000 to the Tory party, rising to $192,504 to the Liberals in 1978 alone, with pay-offs increasing in recent years, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That this House can only draw one conclusion from the fact that the major oil companies have contributed over half a million dollars since 1974 to the Liberals and Conservatives; that the oil industry price fixing report was buried for eight years and was finally brought to light on Wednesday, March 4, 1981, and the conclusion is that while these political donations were initially sufficient to provide the necessary protection, clearly they did not keep up with inflation and the Liberal Party's rising business costs—in particular hyper inflation in the pork market—and expresses its regret at the embarrassment thus caused to the oil majors and their insurance agents, the Liberal and Conservative parties of Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE MINISTRY

DISCLOSURE OF HOLDINGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing necessity. In view of the tremendous discretionary powers available to ministers of the Crown, powers which could make multimillionaires of some Canadians and paupers of others, and given the recent startling allegations of profiteering and price fixing by major oil companies, in which certain ministers of the Crown, or their families, may hold financial interests, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper):

● (1110)

That this House hereby directs all ministers of the Crown, including the Prime Minister, to make a full and complete public disclosure of all investments and financial holdings held by themselves or their immediate relatives, such disclosures to include all those holdings which have been placed in blind trust.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PETRO-CANADA

REQUEST FOR LEADER OF OPPOSITION TO ADMIT ERROR OF PRIVATIZATION POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43, and request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an urgent matter.

In view of the government inquiry which revealed unfair practices on the part of the big oil companies which are, by the way, 80 per cent foreign-owned, in an effort to gouge Canadians to the tune of some $12 billion between 1968 and 1973 which, in terms of current dollars, would represent about $90 billion, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Gingras):

That the half-leader of the official opposition make due apologies to this government and all Canadians here in the House through the information media by recognizing that he was once again terribly mistaken in wanting to disband Petro-Canada in order to clear the coast for his close friends, his financial backers, namely, the oil companies.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, it requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES—REFERRAL OF REPORT TO RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. A Section 47 investigation under the Combines Investigation Act is currently being conducted into the relationship between Bell Canada and Northern Telecom. The Restrictive Trade Practices Commission held almost four years of hearings, sat 224 days, travelled the entire country, heard 230 witnesses to date, generated 34,000 pages of evidence, and received some 2,000 exhibits. Despite the fact the hearings are vitally important to telephone subscribers and the Canadian electronics industry, there has been no visible public debate; indeed, very few Canadians are even aware of the inquiry.

In light of the statement of the director, Mr. Bertrand, that a Section 47 inquiry on price-fixing in the oil industry "will have a significant role in placing the importance of competition in the petroleum industry in the forefront of public debate", with which proposition the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) wholly concurs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House directs the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to make a statement on motions on the reasons for referring the director's report on oil industry price-fixing to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, which presumably has the function to make representations to change Canada's competition law, thereby delaying action for a number of years by the commission which exercises powers of holding hearings in secret.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PASSAGE OF MEAT IMPORT ACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter relating to the Canadian beef cattle industry. In view of the optimistic statement of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) last night to the Canadian Cattlemen's Association that we have no agricultural problems in Canada which we cannot solve ourselves, and in view of the very serious uncertainties and lack of long-term confidence in our Canadian beef cattle industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That the Minister of Agriculture use his well-known high profile influence in cabinet—and with his House leader—to bring the meat import Bill C-46, which is his pride and joy, before the House to receive a quick second reading debate and referral to committee.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUS OF WOMEN

REDUCTION IN GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett), I move:

That this House regrets that the government's contribution to International Women's Week has been, once again, to put in jeopardy women's outreach programs and to cut in half the number of person-years in the Equal Opportunities for Women Office of the public service, and that this House therefore calls on the government to recognize the rights and needs of 51 per cent of our population by indicating its readiness to protect and support both of these important programs.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSING

PROTECTION FOR TENANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Critical vacancy rates across Canada are making it very difficult for Canadians to find decent accommodation. By raising the issue of rent controls in speeches, the minister responsible for housing has made it evident that the Liberal Party favours the discontinuance of rent controls without providing a satisfactory alternative. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That this House condemn the suggestion by the Liberal Party that rent controls be ended and endorse the stand of the Ontario Progressive Conservative minister for housing who refuses to leave Canadian tenants unprotected.

PIPELINES

ALASKA GAS PIPELINE—REAFFIRMATION OF UNITED STATES COMMITMENT

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, not surprisingly I have a series of questions this morning for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In a CP wire story today it is reported that the new Reagan administration in the United States is having second thoughts about the Alaska gas pipeline. Apparently they want to study the whole question anew. They appear to want to make sure that public moneys will not be expended before they wholeheartedly support this project. Costs are now supposed to be in the region of about $25 billion. Can the minister confirm that he has been seeking reaffirmation of the American commitment, and tell us whether his ironclad guarantees of note still stand?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Madam Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Nickerson: I am pleased to see that the minister has been seeking reaffirmation. It shows that he is doing his job to a certain extent, since this does seem to be a very serious problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: But he does not get any answers.

EXPORT OF GAS THROUGH PRE-BUILD SECTION

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, the minister knows full well that the pre-build section of the pipeline going from James River Bridge south, designed mainly for the exportation of Canadian gas, was predicated on a firm commitment to build the entire line.

At the time of the debate on this issue, we on this side of the House—in this party—pointed out the dangers of allowing—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Nickerson: —the export of Canadian gas through the pre-build unless Canada was to benefit from the timely completion of the entire project.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Nickerson: Madam Speaker, here is my question. What position will the Canadian government take toward the export of gas through the already partially built pre-build section if, as now appears likely, the whole line is not to be completed?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, in order to help the hon. member understand the present situation, I remind him that we have, indeed, communicated with the Secretary of Energy in the United States. On February 6 we received the kind of firm commitment to which the hon. member has referred. The letter, in part, reads as follows:

I would like to take this opportunity to state again that the United States government is firmly committed to the completion of ANGTS in conformity with agreements between our countries. We expect the United States sponsors and producers will soon reach an agreement on a tentative financing plan.

That is part of the letter sent by the Secretary of Energy, James B. Edwards.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nickerson: Madam Speaker, if one examines carefully the wording of that communiqué you will see that there are loopholes in it. They have left themselves a way out.

I am concerned about what appears to be deteriorating relations between Canada and the U.S. As we have seen from the communiqué, the minister's ironclad guarantees—you remember this term, "the ironclad guarantees"—now appear to be no more than a passing fancy. There is certainly no contractual guarantee capable of proper enforcement and to which the Americans can be legally held.

● (1120)

As a final question, can we have the personal, ironclad guarantee of the minister—whatever that might be worth—that when the President of the United States visits Canada next week, energy issues, and particularly this one relating to the Alaska gas pipeline, will be accorded top priority in the discussions between the Prime Minister and President Reagan?

An hon. Member: Would you repeat the question?

Mr. Siddon: You wouldn't understand it if it was repeated. You're thick over there.

Mr. Lalonde: The energy issue will be on the agenda, and the question of the Alaska gas pipeline is going to be on the agenda, I am sure; but I would like to remind my hon. friend that the Secretary of Energy of the United States, on behalf of his government, has already given the firm commitment of that government in support of the construction of the Alaska gas pipeline. I am afraid that my hon. friend will have to eat crow before long if he continues along that line.

QUERY RESPECTING COMMITMENT TO COMPLETE PROJECT

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, there seems to be considerable doubt, in view of releases this morning, about the reassurances the minister is giving us. We were induced, when the debate was on last July—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I did not say "seduced", a term with which the NDP is quite familiar.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: We were induced last July to vote in favour of the pre-build on the basis of assurances given by the hon. "Ironside". This is what he said as reported at page 3061 of Hansard:

What was important to obtain from the American government was that firm commitment that they would see to it that the pipeline would be built. Whether they do it by financial commitment, legislation, or other means, that is for the American government to decide. What is important is that we have that commitment.

Does the minister have that kind of commitment now from the United States government and, if he does not, will it be a top priority on the agenda of the talks between President Reagan and the Prime Minister so that that same degree of commitment will be obtained with respect to the completion of the whole of the line?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I must answer, yes, and it is too bad that Secretary Edwards did not write to us in French also, because I would read it in French; but I will read it again in English. The Secretary states that he would like to take this opportunity to state again that the United States government is firmly committed to the completion of the Alaska gas pipeline in conformity with agreements between our two countries.

An hon. Member: Give us a date.

Mr. Lalonde: We cannot have it clearer and firmer than that. This is a statement by the new Secretary of Energy of the United States, on behalf of his government.

I fail to understand what more my friend can ask for, when it would seem to be pretty clear to anyone who can read.

Mr. Nielsen: It seems to me that the minister's political life—speaking about eating crow—depends upon the degree of commitment he achieves after this meeting. The letter from which he quoted is a far cry from the letter which he read into the record of last July 17.

An hon. Member: No, it isn't.

Mr. Nielsen: Oh, yes, it is. I am quoting from a letter that was written by President Carter in his day:

In view of this progress, I can assure you that the U.S. government not only remains committed to the project; I—

That is the President speaking.

—am able to state with confidence that the U.S. government now is satisfied that the entire Alaska Natural Gas Transportation System will be completed. The United States' energy requirements—

And so on.

● (1125)

He assured the government of the day that it would be completed by the end of 1985. Will the minister get the kind of written statement from President Reagan that he got from President Carter?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, these discussions will take place between the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States.

Mr. Nielsen: Let's get it in writing.

Mr. Lalonde: This is the proper way for it to take place. I am sure the issue will be raised in discussions with the President.

Mr. Wilson: Don't you know?

Mr. Lalonde: We have a clear statement by the Secretary of Energy in the United States on behalf of the United States government. I do not see why we would have any reason to question the right or authority of the Secretary of Energy to speak on behalf of the United States government.

I suggest to my hon. friend that he should take the words of the Secretary of Energy, on behalf of the government, on their face. They represent that firm commitment to which my hon. friend is referring.

Mr. Nielsen: I would sooner have it from the President.

PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES—SIX CENTS INCREASE IN PRICE OF GASOLINE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The oil industry, having gouged Canadian consumers of some $12 billion from 1958 to 1973, plus additional billions from 1973 to the present, not content with that some days ago added some six cents per gallon on top of government's announced increase in the price of gasoline. On Wednesday the minister said that he would investigate this. Has he had that additional six cents investigated and, if so, has he found it was warranted? If not, can he assure us that the government will take compensatory action so that the gouging of the Canadian consumer will not continue?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the officials of my department are looking into the matter. I have not yet obtained a detailed report about this.

[English]

COMPENSATION FOR CONSUMERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): That is reasonable to this point. Will the minister do two things? First, will he give us a date by which we will have his report and, second, in connection with past rip-offs, whatever he finds merited or not merited about the six cents per gallon increase which came this week, will he assure the House and the people of Canada that they are going to be compensated in some way? Is he prepared now to outline the way in which that compensation will be implemented and, if not, will he at least say that he agrees in principle that compensation is due to the Canadian people?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the basic difference between the NDP and the government in this respect is that we do not want to anticipate the findings of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. We note, like that party, that this is a very serious matter, but before jumping to conclusions, we would rather wait for the report of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

[English]

ACTION ON INVESTIGATIVE REPORT RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, let me tell the minister through you that the fundamental difference between the government and the Canadian people on this issue is that the Canadian people want their money back.

Let me put this to the minister as a final supplementary question. The minister need not wait. The report makes two specific recommendations. One is that the multinationals should divest themselves of their shares in pipelines, and the other is that Petro-Canada should become the sole importer of offshore oil. Is the minister prepared to give this House a commitment right now that he will act on those two recommendations?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, those are two very important recommendations now being considered by the government.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING DRIVING OFFENCES

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. The Supreme Court of Canada, in the case of John Boggs v. Regina, decided last month that Section 283(3) of the Criminal Code was ultra vires. That section deals with driving while disqualified. The court indicated that because the Code prohibition included suspensions arising for reasons as diverse as failing to keep fuel oil records, it could not be upheld as a valid exercise of the criminal law power. We can take it that it is important to enforce vigorously licence suspensions resulting from serious breaches of the law, for example, impaired driving or criminal negligence. Is the government moving to introduce an amendment which would be sufficiently narrow as to withstand constitutional challenge, but at the same time would operate to keep those drivers who have been proved dangerous off the road?

• (1130)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I think the question put by the hon. member is a very valid one. We are studying the drafting necessary in order to come up with an amendment to the Criminal Code to make sure that these offences can be dealt with by the courts. I hope when the amendment is ready we will have the collaboration of the opposition to close that gap as quickly as possible.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, will the minister ask the government House leader to give this matter priority attention? The matter, I am sure, will receive unanimous consent to pass quickly. It is a matter of serious importance to protect people against those drivers who have been disqualified for driving but who are driving on the roads at the present time.

Mr. Chrétien: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his very good suggestion, and as soon as I am ready I will be in touch with the government House leader.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

EXAMINATION OF RENAULT-AMERICAN MOTORS ARRANGEMENT

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I will try to get a straight answer from him.

An hon. Member: Some hope.

Mr. McDermid: I am going to try.

As the minister knows, Renault of France has bought into the American Motors Corporation and the deal is now before the Foreign Investment Review Agency. Will the minister assure us, and assure the workers at the Canadian plants of American Motors, that any decision he makes will not jeopardize workers jobs because of an overly restrictive government decision?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, the decision will be made not by myself but by the governor in council as is provided for by the act. Also provided under the act the decision will be taken in the light of the necessity of indicating significant benefit to Canada. This particularly involves the interests of workers. Considerations with respect to the interests of the workers will be very important in our efforts.

Mr. McDermid: I find it interesting that all your press releases say you approve of these deals. The assurance that you have given—

An hon. Member: Address the Chair.

Mr. Trudeau: Order, Madam Speaker.

Mr. McDermid: My apologies, Madam Speaker. With respect to the assurance which the minister has given to the workers, is it as ironclad as the assurance he gave to the McDonnell Douglas workers, another 250 of whom have been laid off recently?

Mr. Gray: Madam Speaker, with respect to the matter of American Motors and Renault, we have the leverage of the Foreign Investment Review Act passed by this Parliament. To the extent of the authority given to me by Parliament and the authority given to the governor in council by Parliament, we will operate in a way which serves, to the best of our ability, the best interest of the workers at Brampton and the entire Canadian economy.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

LOW INTEREST MORTGAGES ACQUIRED BY ENTREPRENEURS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister aware of the practices of the Farm Credit Corporation which are allowing entrepreneurs and individuals other than farmers to buy up farm credit loans at the low preferred interest rate, thus denying the bona fide farmer from having this opportunity?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, if I understood the hon. member's question, I am not aware of that at all. If he has evidence, I would like to see it so that I can bring it to the attention of the chairman of the Farm Credit Corporation.

Mr. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Madam Speaker, I have evidence which I will be glad to supply to the Minister of Agriculture. I think this is a very unfair practice where farmers are denied the privilege of buying agricultural land which is slipping into the hands of entrepreneurs and profiteers. These people want to take over the mortgages at low interest rates and they will then probably redevelop and sell the land. In other words, they will take over the farmer's contract at the low interest rate.

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, I do know that there are farmers who have been able to take over mortgages at that rate of interest, which is an enviable one. Sometimes it is an old mortgage which they are liable to carry over. But I know of no non-farmer being able to take over a mortgage as was suggested. If that is being done, it is highly irregular.

DISASTERS

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS TO COMBAT FLOODING ON MILLE-ÎLES RIVER IN QUEBEC

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): On February 24, Madam Speaker, I directed a question to the Minister of National Defence concerning the assistance program for flood victims. Since then, together with some of my colleagues, I have visited the stricken municipalities to meet with their mayors. On the basis of the information I have received, could the Minister of the Environment advise me, following the representations made by members from that area, whether the Canadian government intends to continue urging on the Quebec government the need and urgency to pursue the construction of embankments and dams along the Mille-Îles River and, if so, whether the Canadian government is ready to make additional funds available to carry out the work already started, in order to improve the flood conditions and compensate for the damage caused by the spring flooding?

[English]

Mr. Roger Simmons (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, following the severe flooding in the province of Quebec in 1974 and 1976, the federal government put about $15 million into flood disaster payments in the province of Quebec to individuals who had been flood victims. In 1976, we signed a flood damage agreement. When it expires next March we will have contributed $5.2 million to construct flood control works in the Montreal area and for a feasibility study of increased storage in the upper Ottawa basin.

I am pleased to indicate to the House that this week the federal government has approved an additional expenditure of $2.25 million to complete the flood control works and the study which I have just mentioned.

STATUS OF WOMEN

APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT OF ADVISORY COUNCIL— REQUEST FOR DISMISSAL OF MINISTER

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Can he confirm that the new president of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women is to be Madam Lucie Pepin, the current vice-president, who believes the advisory council must "do things the way the government wants them done"?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not heard this quote before. If the hon. member would be more explicit, I might be able to study the question.

Mr. Wilson: Answer the question.

Miss Jewett: Madam Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister whether he could confirm that Lucie Pepin is to be the new president. Obviously he declines to do that. May I then ask the Prime Minister this question; in view of the statement of the minister responsible for the status of women that he could not care less about what 1,000 plus women think, and since the minister made no contribution whatever to the charter in so far as women are concerned, does the Prime Minister not now agree that the minister responsible for the status of women is irresponsible, insensitive, and must be sacked?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Lashed as well. Perhaps 40 lashes.

An hon. Member: He should be stripped.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am surprised to hear the hon. member make that statement because, when we introduced the amendments to the charter presently before the House, particularly the parts relating to the equality of the sexes, it was done on representations from the minister responsible for the status of women. At the time, the chairman of the council, Mrs. Anderson, said that they had her approval, and that is what the council wanted.

TELEVISION

BROADCASTING OF CONSTITUTIONAL DEBATE— NON-RECEPTION IN CALGARY

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications.

[English]

The minister will know that in January in the city of Calgary the televising of the House of Commons and the constitutional committee disappeared from the screens of cable subscribers to be replaced by a recipe program. Could the minister tell us whether the city of Calgary was singled out, whether other provinces are involved, and whether or not the recipes are being screened as to their Canadian content?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. However, I would like to verify the matter with the CRTC so I can give the hon. member a comprehensive reply. We are interested, as is the hon. member, in ensuring that the constitutional debate is seen widely throughout the country because the more the constitutional debate is seen, the better the opportunity for Canadians to understand this government's position properly.

Mr. Nielsen: Not any other position.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, I would love to have the Canadian people understand the position of this government on the Constitution.

An hon. Member: They already know it.

An hon. Member: Give a recipe for it.

Mr. Hawkes: Could the minister indicate whether or not he is prepared to take immediate action to see that cable subscribers in the city of Calgary have the opportunity to watch the debate which is presently taking place, without facing the additional cost of a converter? Can we have the House of Commons back to replace the recipes, and will the minister use his good offices to achieve that result quickly?

• (1140)

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has completely changed the premise of his question from saying that the people of Calgary were denied coverage of the debate to saying that it is available on cable, but that you need a converter to receive it. Actually his premise is quite different. In any event, I will be pleased to ask the chairman of the CRTC to look into the matter and let me have a report so that I can inform the hon. member.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

JURISDICTION OVER CANADIAN WATERS—QUERY RESPECTING OIL DRILLING RIGHTS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Within the near future it is anticipated that the federal government, through its agent Petro-Canada, will announce that the wheels have been set in motion for the drilling of oil in the Hibernia and Ben Nevis oil fields on the banks off the coast of Newfoundland. I wish to ask the minister, in light of the controversy which has existed for many years between Canada and France over fishing rights in the waters surrounding St. Pierre and Miquelon, whether a similar dispute exists over oil drilling rights and, if so, what steps are being taken to resolve this issue?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, negotiations between Canada and France are beginning with respect to the problems off St. Pierre and Miquelon. In due course I hope to have further information to report to the House.

POSSIBILITY OF OIL SPILLS—STEPS TO PROTECT EAST COAST FISHERIES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I will direct my supplementary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since uncontrolled oil wells and spills are not an uncommon occurrence in the Gulf of Mexico and the North Sea, what steps will be taken when drilling begins to protect the fishing resource in this area and, if a spill occurs, what machinery has been or is the government contemplating will be put in place to provide financial support to the fishermen affected, especially in Newfoundland and in my native province of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his expression of concern in this respect. It is of great concern to the government. There is now before the national resources committee Bill C-48, the Canada Lands Act, which has many provisions dealing with environmental issues and the protection of resources. I hope this bill will receive prompt consideration and support from opposition parties because it provides for some of the most strict requirements in terms of environment of any legislation in the world. We looked at legislation in other countries and tried to put in our legislation the most strict requirements compared to those in other countries. I hope those requirements will be effective in meeting the concerns expressed by the hon. member.

HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM—APPEAL PROCEDURES

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion as one of the ministers in charge of the herd maintenance program. It has to do with appeal board procedures. It was understood that the appeal board would make the final decision on eligibility criteria for applicants under the herd maintenance program. We are finding that producers with little or no crop can be thrown out because of an override by a secret rainfall map, thus making the whole appeal board process useless. Are administrative changes being made now since there is only a short time left for the program? Is the minister now prepared to provide the appeal board with the necessary powers to deal with each individual case on its own merits?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): With all due respect, Madam Speaker, the hon. member has not represented the facts correctly. The appeal board has no right to set the criteria. They have been set by cabinet and Treasury Board, and their role is to implement them.

An hon. Member: Change them.

Mr. De Bané: No, I will not change them because they were drawn up very carefully after consulting a very wide spectrum of the farm organizations in the prairie provinces. There is no way I can transfer to the appeal board the powers that are invested under the administration act with the PFRA. They are there to advise the department and give their opinion, but there is no way I can renege on the responsibilities of PFRA to make the ultimate decision. I hope within the next month the whole situation will be cleared up, particularly in Saskatchewan where there is a problem.

Mr. Althouse: Of the approximately 14,000 appeals to the board, approximately 1,000 were dealt with. The deadline for the funding is March 31. In light of the 13,000 appeals to be dealt with in less than four weeks, is consideration being given to extending the funding of the program to apply after March 31?

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker, I discussed the whole matter with the director of PFRA yesterday. He assures me there is every possibility of completing the program by the end of this month. Second, the number of appeals the hon. member mentioned is substantially higher than my information. Finally, we must not forget that over 24,000 farmers have already received payment.

MARINE TRANSPORT

WITHDRAWAL OF DART CONTAINERLINE SERVICE FROM HALIFAX—ROLE OF PRESIDENT OF CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of a series of questions asked by the distinguished member for Halifax West and others in connection with the move by Dart containerlines in association with Canadian Pacific Steamships Limited from the port of Halifax to Montreal. Does the Minister of Transport consider it proper conduct by the president of Canadian National Railways not to have advised him some months ago when he became aware of this pending move? Does the minister consider that proper conduct with regard to Dr. Bandeen's responsibility to Parliament?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am not sure if the president of Canadian National was aware of the move. I will find out when I see him on Monday. When I spoke to him the day the Dart move was announced, it was my impression that he had not been completely informed of what was happening. That would be normal. Because of the CN involvement with Cast, possibly the Dart people were not too keen to inform him.

Mr. Forrestall: We welcome the initiative taken by Premier Buchanan and ministers of the government of Nova Scotia to meet with the minister early next week, I believe Tuesday, to discuss all the implications of this. I am sure the minister will want all factual data before him at that meeting. Dr. Bandeen has repeatedly assured the minister that both Dart and CP insist it is not because of excessive freight rates that the move is being made from Halifax to Montreal. Have either the president of CN or Dart officials indicated what is the reason? It takes between eight and ten days to move a container from Halifax to Montreal for further distribution. Did the president of CN indicate that the root cause is the delay in moving containers from our region to the central region for redistribution?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, answering that question would be an essay on competitive advantage. The port of Montreal has some advantages, as does the port of Halifax. There is no doubt that the possibility of ships coming to Montreal by river, with cheaper transportation costs, would be an advantage. The purpose of the meeting on Tuesday is to elicit all these factors and to bring about an awareness so that the public will be in a better position to judge what is at stake in these matters.

So it is a matter of freight rates, it is a matter of location, it is a matter of port charges, it is a matter of icebreaking, and so forth. On Tuesday we should give the public a good indication of the complexity of that situation.

CANADA DAY

QUERY RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications. I have in my possession a copy of a letter which was sent to the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications by Mr. Chris Korwin-Kuczynski, chairman of Semaine du Canada. In the letter the chairman of the Canada Week committee asks when the minister will bring in legislation designating July 1 as Canada Day. Since this is a question which is of great interest to at least 99 per cent of Canadians, would the minister please tell this House whether such legislation will be introduced before July 1, 1981? The other 1 per cent are in the official opposition.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question, which I am sure is of great interest to many Canadians across the land. I remind the hon. member that the government introduced a bill proposing that July 1 henceforth be known as Canada Day. I believe that bill was introduced in the House last June. With the help and consent of the opposition parties we at that point introduced a bill giving Canada a national anthem. I hope our House leader is successful once again in obtaining that type of consent from the opposition parties so that this year July 1 can finally be known as Canada Day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTED REMOVAL OF "E" DIVISION FROM VICTORIA, B.C.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice in his role as the Acting Solicitor General. I am sorry to see that the Solicitor General is absent from the House. I have been informed that the government plans to move the headquarters of "E" Division of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police out of Victoria. This means the loss of 208 jobs. Would the minister tell us if the government really intends to go through with this ill-advised move and, if so, why?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of such a decision. I will bring the problem to the attention of the Solicitor General, and he will reply to the hon. member early next week.

PLANS FOR USE OF FEDERAL BUILDINGS IN VICTORIA, B.C.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. It is only two years since the government purchased the building the RCMP is now going to vacate in Victoria. It will make a nice companion piece to the empty CBC building in Victoria the government built two years ago and which has never been occupied. Can the Minister of Public Works explain what the government has against Victoria? Has the government any plans to utilize these two expensive buildings, or are they to serve only as monuments to Liberal incompetence?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I am glad to receive the hon. gentleman's question as notice. I must admit that I am surprised because I have had the opportunity to meet with ministers in the government of the province of British Columbia. As a matter of fact I met with three ministers in concert, and I received no representations from them.

PROPOSED USE OF PRAIRIE FARM EMERGENCY FUND

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. A short time ago he took a swing around western Canada, and while in the province of Alberta he made some comments about his proposal to bring in a bill similar to my Bill C-245 which would make use of some $9 million in the old prairie farm emergency fund, for research and development. Just after his trip he was reported on a program called "Call of the Land", on CHRB High River, on February 9, to have said that this money, referring to the $9 million, "which has been sitting around gathering interest was collected years ago from the old farm emergency fund." I do not think the minister would like to leave any wrong impression in the minds of the people in the west. Would he confirm that this $9 million plus has been sitting in the prairie farm emergency fund since 1972 and has not drawn a cent of interest?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, all the hon. member has to do is check the record to see what I said when his private member's bill was before the House. I said it was a non-interest bearing fund and that it was not bearing interest. I have no knowledge of what was broadcast in High River. That station is generally fair and reports very well. However, I have checked my records, and I found nothing on the tapes I made when I was in that part of western Canada to the effect of what the hon. member says. It seems to me that the report referred to by the hon. member was prepared by someone and put on the air, but it was not in accordance with anything I have said or anything I have recorded.

AIRPORTS

BOUNDARY BAY, B.C.—REQUEST TO REACTIVATE AIR BASE

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. The minister will know that there has long been an urgent need to reactivate the former military Boundary Bay air base in Delta, British Columbia. That plan has long been advocated by the minister's own officials in order to relieve the congestion at the Vancouver International Airport and in particular to provide an alternative for general aviation aircraft. The minister also realizes that the former Conservative minister of transport and the former minister of the environment approved the reactivation of Boundary Bay airfield over a year ago.

I want today to ask the minister why he is dragging his feet. Why have no further steps or initiatives been taken to get on with reactivating this very important airport in order to improve safety and expand air space in the immediate Vancouver area?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I agree with everything the hon. member has said and acknowledge the quality of the project devised by my predecessor. The British Columbia Development Corporation was going to use the offer made to privatize the airport in that fashion. The corporation explored that offer for a period of time, but recently said it could not proceed. My department is looking for another potential acquirer now.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, in view of the importance of this long overdue project to aviation enthusiasts, but more particularly to the aviation industry in British Columbia, I cannot understand why the minister has not called for innovative proposals such as the previous plan, and why he has not called for proposals from various entrepreneurial groups in order to get on with the undertaking of this important project. Instead, he has chosen to negotiate in secret with the British Columbia Development Corporation. Now those negotiations have collapsed and the BCDC has withdrawn from this project.

When will the minister get on with negotiating in public with all those interested parties who would like to undertake an innovative plan for the reactivation of the Boundary Bay airport?

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I was not aware that it was a secret affair. As a matter of fact I thought it was very much in the public domain. I remember going to British Columbia and referring to it with the press, so what the hon. member says is news, as far as I am concerned. As far as I am concerned it was a very public matter, and if nothing else has been done that is simply because there were high hopes that it would develop in the way it was intended, that is, through action by the British Columbia development group. This having failed, my department is now looking for other opportunities, in exactly the spirit indicated by the hon. member.

CANADA DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

RAISING OF LIMITATION ON AMOUNT INSURABLE

Hon. Bud Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance. Representations have come from both sides of the House that the $20,000 limit under the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation should be raised. The minister was kind enough to make known to all Members of Parliament the fact that this is being studied by the corporation, and he expected a report in the near future. Can the minister tell us whether that report will be made before June, or will we have to wait for the loan and trust companies legislation? Will we have that before the summer break?

Mr. Nielsen: Yes or no.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I will not be as laconic as the hon. member for Yukon wants me to be. Given the seriousness of the question put to me I would rather take this opportunity to clarify my thoughts and indicate to the hon. member that I did receive a report from the actuaries of the office of the Superintendent of Insurance and from the CDIC. I apologize but I cannot translate the acronym of the organization which makes recommendations, but I will submit them to my cabinet colleagues. As soon as I get their support I will be pleased to seek the co-operation of the President of the Privy Council and the House leaders with a view to introducing legislation. However, since the trust and loans companies bill remains for me a priority item I might be able, as I also intend to do, to introduce all those measures in one single package.

WESTERN ONTARIO CREDIT CORPORATION LTD.

EFFECT OF STOP TRADING ORDER

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, as the minister knows, yesterday a stop trading order was issued by the Ontario Securities Commission against a company called Western Ontario Credit Corporation Ltd. I have learned that this company owns 34 per cent of the shares of the federally chartered trust company, Income Trust Company, which operates in Toronto and southwestern Ontario.

Can the minister give us the assurance that the stop trading order will have no effect on the business and the reputation of Income Trust Company, and can he tell us whether, when he brings in legislation with respect to trust companies, he might not consider the problems that are created by the fact that we have interdependence and interlinking between mortgage brokerage firms, which are regulated on the provincial level, and trust companies, many of which are chartered at the federal level, and that tremendous problems are created as a result?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, first I will comment briefly on the last part of the hon. member's question. I should like to point out to him that indeed I share his reservations about the interlinking between federally chartered trust companies which also operate under a provincial permit. This question will have to be answered in that legislation.

In addition, concerning the issuance of a stop trading order by the Ontario Securities Commission against Western Ontario Credit Corporation Limited, I might remind the hon. member that, as he knows, the corporation is regulated on the provincial level. Never did the Ontario Securities Commission order involve the Income Trust Company which falls under federal jurisdiction. According to the report I got today from the Superintendent of Insurance, the Income Trust Company is in a sound financial situation and as far as he knows the investigation being carried out by the Ontario Securities Commission does not in any way reflect upon the financial status or the management of the Income Trust Company.

REASON FOR DENIAL OF PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, the reason this is of such concern is that we saw from the affairs involving the Astra Trust company that there was no communication and there was an interlinking which was very serious. With respect to the Astra Trust company situation, I should like to put a question to the minister directly. Yesterday, in the House of Commons, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said:

—the focus of a criminal trial will be on several narrowly defined legal issues and would largely overlook, if not entirely ignore, the major structural problems—

Then he called for a public inquiry in the case of the oil companies. I should like to ask the minister how he can continue to argue that a criminal trial alone will tell the public and the government all we really need to know about the reason that Astra Trust was given a licence in the first place and the way in which Astra Trust was allowed to operate over a period of time when money was passing back and forth between Astra Trust and provincially incorporated mortgage companies, and why a public inquiry is not justified in this case.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member brings up the case of the oil companies and the public inquiry called by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to draw an analogy with the conclusions or the investigation procedure relating to the Re-Mor case. I like analogies. I could carry his analogy further, providing we compare objects of similar nature, for he knows very well that an analogy must be drawn between objects of similar nature. I still believe that common sense will dictate what has to be done to redress the situation in the case of Astra Trust and Re-Mor. In his previous question the hon. member himself gave an idea of the type of solution which is called for. He knows that legislation is forthcoming and that we will be able to take such corrective action. He also knows that what matters is that the people who were victims of fraud will be compensated; this will be done at the federal level by our corporation which will cover them for up to $20,000. Second, it is important that the criminals who made those people lose money be prosecuted. As he knows, criminal charges were laid earlier this week against eight individuals, therefore due process of law is under way.

PASSAGE OF MEAT IMPORT ACT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I am sure the minister is aware of the serious economic difficulties in which Canadian cattle producers are finding themselves. May I ask the minister whether he is actively considering taking any initiatives which may have the effect of alleviating the difficult circumstances, such as the amendment and early enactment of the meat import law, the institution of income averaging trust provisions for farmers, and any program to alleviate the impact of high interest rates, such as the extension of the small business bond program to unincorporated farms? Can he also tell us whether any action is being considered to review and examine the current stabilization program, because action on any one or all of these issues would serve to alleviate some of the difficulties cattlemen are now experiencing?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows that I have great concern for all sectors of the agricultural community, no matter where they may be or what their production may be. We hope that the meat import act will be placed before Parliament, if not next week, then the following week. I have talked to some of the hon. member's colleagues, to his House leader and to our House leader, and it seems that this legislation will get speedy second reading and will be sent to the committee soon. We are looking at some of the other suggestions he has made. I met with the Canadian Cattlemen's Association and I spoke to them yesterday evening. I outlined some of the hon. member's concerns in my presentation to them. If the hon. member wants to read it, he will see some of the measures we are considering.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. ITTINUAR—STATUTORY REQUIREMENT OF MINISTER TO TABLE ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning the conduct of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. According to the provisions of the James Bay and Northern Quebec Native Claims Settlement Act of 1977, section 10:

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development shall, within 60 days after the first day of January of every year including and occurring between the years 1978 and 1998, submit to the House of Commons a report on the implementation of the provisions of this act for the relevant period.

No reports were tabled in 1978 and 1979 and no report has been tabled this year. My point of order—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is not really raising a point of order. I am sure he is pursuing a valid concern, but until now I can see no point of order in what he is saying.

Mr. Ittinuar: Madam Speaker, my point of order is that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) should be called upon to live up to the requirements of an act which was passed by Parliament.

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WADDELL—CANADA DAY—ALLEGED MISREPRESENTATION OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY POSITION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from the question period. The hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis), in putting a question to the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox), said that 99 per cent of Canadians were in favour of Canada Day. Then he looked over at our side of the House and, indicating us, said that the official opposition represent the other 1 per cent.

My question of privilege is that we on this side of the House feel that, while symbols are all right, they are not the sole preserve of the Liberal Party; they belong to everyone in Canada. The hon. member has misrepresented deliberately the position of both opposition parties which, I understand, are in favour of Canada Day. I say to the hon. member, through you, Madam Speaker, that he should not be misrepresenting our position. If he really wants to put some substance behind his symbols, we could celebrate 100 Canada Days—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. It has just been drawn to my attention that the hon. member used the words "deliberately misrepresented"; I did not catch that. I think the hon. member must be more careful in his use of language. The expression "deliberately misrepresented" should not be used in Parliament, and I would ask him either to rephrase his question or withdraw the word "deliberately."

Mr. Waddell: I shall, Madam Speaker. I did not mean to use the word "deliberately." But I would ask the hon. member not to misrepresent our position on Canada Day.

• (1210)

Madam Speaker: I am not sure whether the hon. member has a question of privilege. He has made a point about interjections across the floor. This occurs daily. Some are pleasant, some are unpleasant. It is not for me to determine whether they are or not, and certainly it is not a breach of privilege.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ABORTION

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-632, to amend the Criminal Code (abortion).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Flis: Madam Speaker, I should like to take advantage of Standing Order 68(2) to give a succinct explanation of the provisions of this bill.

The purpose of this bill is to define the exception in the present law that allows an abortion where there is "danger to the health" of a pregnant woman should the pregnancy continue.

The bill is consistent with the intent of the present law as expressed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) when he introduced it in 1969. He left no doubt that the original intention of the legislation was that "therapeutic abortions" would be an exceptional procedure, invoked only after strict compliance with the law: the abortion was to be performed by a medical practitioner supported by a therapeutic abortion committee of medical practitioners in an approved hospital, and it was to be performed only where the health or life of the mother is in danger.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 1,849, 1,881, 1,903, 1,904 and 1,910.

[Text]

MINI-LAND BRIDGE RATES, VANCOUVER

Question No. 1,849—Mr. Wenman:

1. Has the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs pursued the complaint under Section 7 of the Combines Investigation Act concerning the mini-land bridge rate in Vancouver and, if not, is it because of the difficulty in obtaining a conviction?

2. Is there a policy regarding licensing of transportation firms in Canada so as to ensure fair competition and to safeguard Canadian interests?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Transport as follows: 1. Upon receipt of the six-resident application under Section 7 of the Combines Investigation Act for an inquiry into mini-land bridge rates, the Director of Investigation and Research immediately commenced an inquiry into the matter. The director has very recently concluded that the matter being inquired into does not justify further inquiry and, pursuant to Section 14 of the Combines Investigation Act, advised the minister and the applicant of such a fact.

2. The policy regarding licensing of transportation firms in Canada is contained in the various acts governing modes of transportation under federal jurisdiction: the Railway Act, the Aeronautics Act, the Transport Act (for marine) and the National Transportation Act (for solids pipelines). The general test that is employed to determine whether or not a licence should be issued is whether a proposed service is and will be required by the present and future public convenience and necessity. No specific directions "to ensure fair competition" or "to safeguard Canadian interests" are included in legislation. However, the general nature of the public convenience and necessity test allows the Canadian Transport Commission to consider a wide variety of factors which it, the applicant or any intervenor may wish to bring to bear in connection with an application for a licence. National transportation policy (as enunciated in Section 3 of the National Transportation Act) calls for "an economic, efficient and adequate transportation system making the best use of all available modes of transportation at the lowest total cost." This general policy applies to modes of transport under federal jurisdiction.

DND—HERITAGE SILVERSMITHS LTD. CONTRACT

Question No. 1,881—Mr. McKinnon:

Did the Department of National Defence place a $43,270 order for spoons with Heritage Silversmiths Ltd. and, if so (a) how many were ordered (b) are they to be used in an officers' mess and, if not, where will they be used?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Defence and Supply and Services as follows: two contracts have been awarded by the Department of Supply and Services on behalf of the Department of National Defence to Heritage Silversmiths Ltd. for spoons. The details are as follows:

Quantity	Description	Contract Value	Date of Award
16,000	Silverplated Tea Spoon	$25,120	October 31, 1980
60,000	Stainless Steel Dessert Spoon	$18,150	November 4, 1980
76,000		$43,270

(b) The silverplated spoons were purchased for issue to officers' messes and to Canadian Forces Attachés' residences.

CANADA-U.S. SATELLITE COMPETITION

Question No. 1,903—Mr. Beatty:

1. Did the deputy minister of Communications give a speech to the Harvard University Program on Information Resources Policy on November 11, 1980, in which he stated "The opening of satellite competition to the telephone companies in the United States would affect these arrangements. Should that large proportion of Canadian industry that is U.S.-owned be permitted to communicate with their head offices exclusively by U.S. satellites, this would have an important effect on the viability of the Canadian Telecommunications System, and this would have to be taken into account in the formulation of Canadian policies" and, if so, what projections, if any, does the government have of potential effects upon the Canadian Telecommunications System of competition from satellite telephone transmissions across the Canada-U.S. border?

2. Has the issue been raised with the government of the United States and, if so, with what effect?

3. What are the options being considered by the government as indicated by the deputy minister of communications?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the reply to the above question is as follows: 1. Yes. Should the use of domestic satellite facilities for transborder telephone, data and video traffic be approved, the government is concerned that an imbalance favouring the use of U.S. satellites might develop if firms headquartered in the U.S., which would use U.S. systems for their U.S. domestic requirements, were to make use of these systems to serve their Canadian offices as well. This could adversely affect existing arrangements between the domestic common carriers on both sides of the border which ensure the equitable sharing of terrestrial traffic and revenues, as well as the provision of some Canadian traffic carried on Canadian facilities. Until the kinds of systems and services which eventually might be established are known with greater certainty, it would not be possible to develop accurate projections of the likely impact on existing systems.

2. Yes. This question has been raised informally between senior Canadian and U.S. officials. Both sides recognize the need to meet our international obligations under the Intelsat Agreement and to proceed carefully in introducing any transborder satellite services; further discussions will take place at an appropriate time. At present an exchange of letters in 1972 permits such services to be established only under very limited circumstances.

3. The government is studying the means by which such services might be introduced in an orderly manner, consistent with the need to ensure an equitable share of the revenues and industrial benefits for Canadian carriers and the minimum disruption of the terrestrial transborder facilities and intercarrier arrangements that are already in existence.

DCCA—CONSUMER SERVICES BRANCH

Question No. 1,904—Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth):

What issues, projects and subject-matter is the Consumer Services Branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs currently considering either singly, or in co-operation with other departments and what is the status of each investigation under active consideration?

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): The Consumer Services Branch of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada is currently involved in the following areas: 1. Mail Order Sales: Resolution of individual consumer complaints against Canadian Consumer Co. Ltd., Lanover Inc., the Mail Store and Jay Norris Ltd.; ad hoc actions relating to selling campaigns of individual companies; general monitoring of the marketplace; development of broad industry as a prelude to the making of policy proposals.

Co-operation: Working liaison with Quebec Ministère des Consommateurs, Co-opératives et Institutions Financières; liaison with other provinces, the Post Office; the Daily Newspaper Publishers' Association; the office of the Inspector General of Banks; the Canadian Direct Mail Marketing Association; the Advertising Standards Council; the Better Business Bureau of Canada; and the Commercial Crime unit of the RCMP.

2. Motor Vehicle Corrosion: Seeking input from all provinces to determine whether the present level of compliance, by the motor vehicle industry, with the Federal-Provincial Anti-Corrosion Code for motor vehicles warrants further action.

Co-operation: With all provinces. There is also liaison with auto manufacturers and importers.

3. Support of consumer groups: A full review of policies and procedures relating to departmental support of consumer groups is under way. The branch is represented on a small interdepartmental committee examining proposals to encourage and support voluntary groups (including consumer groups) through the income tax system.

Co-operation: Environment, Secretary of State, Health and Welfare, Canadian International Development Agency.

4. Consumer Representation: The branch is exploring the subject of cost awards to intervenors in federal regulatory processes to determine whether a more general use of cost awards would enhance the representation of consumer interests. The Department of Justice is now preparing a preliminary assessment of the laws which are applicable, upon receipt of which the Consumer Services Branch and the Consumer Research and Evaluation Branch will develop proposals for further action.

Co-operation: Consumer Bureau project.

5. Vehicle Problems: The branch is monitoring the progress of action in the United States which seeks to determine whether there is a widespread defect in certain General Motors' automatic transmissions which causes these transmissions to fail (in the owner's assessment) prematurely.

Co-operation: Liaison with Ministry of Transport regarding automobile recall programs.

6. International Year of the Disabled: The branch is in the process of identifying programs and projects for implementation during 1981 through which tangible benefits would accrue to disabled consumers.

Co-operation: To be determined.

7. Tax Rebate Discounting: The branch is responsible for the administration of the federal Tax Rebate Discounting Act. In some provinces, enforcement of the act is shared with, or primarily the responsibility of, provincial offices.

Co-operation: provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba.

8. Summer Programs: Based on past experience with the dissemination of consumer information using students hired under federal employment creation programs, Consumer Services is determining whether its objectives can again be met in 1981-82 using a similar approach.

Co-operation: Consumer Bureau project.

9. Gasoline: The branch is a member of an interdepartmental task force created to examine the matter of lead as a gasoline additive. Participation is on an as-required basis. This task force has met once.

Co-operation: Environment, Energy, Mines and Resources, Ministry of Transport.

10. Market Intelligence: The branch is implementing steps to improve its knowledge of understanding of trends and developments affecting consumers in the marketplace, as a basis for the development and implementation of appropriate responses which protect and advance consumer interests. This project is about to commence implementation.

Co-operation: Consumer Bureau project.

11. In addition to the above specific project areas, the Consumer Services subactivity (which includes both the Consumer Services Branch and staff in field offices across the country) is involved on an ongoing basis in the following areas: dealing with individual consumer complaints and inquiries (some 200,000 anticipated in 1980-81); developing and distributing consumer information on a wide range of subjects for dissemination through the media, presentations, displays and seminars; administration of on-going consumer information programs such as Food Basics, Food Talk, New Parents Kits (Product Safety); administration of the contributions and consumer help office programs; maintaining liaison with other groups in the consumer field such as provincial governments, consumer groups, industry groups and associations, and the media.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications) moved that Bill C-55, an act to amend the Canada Student Loans Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

He said: First of all, Madam Speaker, I would like to begin my comments on this bill which is rather important for Canadian students by thanking the members of the opposition. I had discussions first of all with the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), then with the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose), after which my own House leader met with the other House leaders who agreed that this bill could go through all stages today, and those who will benefit most from this will be the students of this country.

[English]

Bill C-55 proposes amendments to the Canada Student Loans Act. This act, which is well-known to hon. members, enables full-time post-secondary students in financial need to obtain loans to assist them in meeting their educational costs, where they would be otherwise unable to pursue their personal educational goals.

The amount of loan assistance granted to any individual is determined by provincial authorities in accordance with minimum criteria agreed to by all participating provincial governments and, of course, the federal government. The loans are advanced by chartered banks or other designated lenders such as credit unions. The Canadian government pays the interest charges on the loans while the students are enrolled in universities or community colleges and for a six-month period thereafter and guarantees lenders against any loss under the program.

The act was introduced in 1964 and has been amended only once, in 1970, although changes in loan limits have been effected twice by means of appropriations items, the most recent in 1975.

[Translation]

I could perhaps add at this time, Madam Speaker, that this program of course applies throughout Canada, but that the province of Quebec has opted out, which means that while this legislation does not apply to individual students in Quebec, the amounts will be transferred to the Quebec government to finance student assistance programs. This year, nearly $21 million will be transferred to the Quebec government under this program, and since this program was implemented in 1964, over $126 million have been transferred to the Quebec government to be made available to Canadian students who are residents of Quebec.

[English]

I should like to emphasize how much I appreciate the co-operation of all parties in the House which has allowed this bill to be brought forward for second reading at this time. Even though we are all preoccupied with the overwhelmingly important issue of constitutional reform, this bill is an essential piece of business since it will afford many young Canadians, approximately 6,000 per year, across Canada access to student loans to continue their education. In many cases they would otherwise be unable to do so.

One of the most important amendments proposed in this bill arises from the need to accommodate the increase in the number of courses less than the traditional 26 weeks in length which are available to young people as a result of the rapid growth in the number of community colleges and technical and vocational institutes at the post-secondary level. The main effect of this bill is to make students in community colleges qualify for aid under the Canada Student Loans Act.

At the other end of the spectrum the bill also provides for increased loans to students enrolled in courses longer than the traditional university academic year of 32 weeks, thus making it more practical for such students to continue their education without undue financial hardship.

The current legislation provides for a maximum loan of $1,800 in an academic year of at least 26 weeks' duration, as hon. members know. The bill before us proposes instead that loans be available to persons in periods of study of at least 12 weeks' duration. This amendment takes into consideration changes which have occurred in Canadian educational patterns since the initial bill was introduced.

The bill also proposes that the loan limit of $1,800 be expressed on a weekly basis, thus relating the maximum amount of loan aid a student may receive to the length of his or her course and, therefore, to the costs. The proposed weekly loan limit of $56.25 amounts to $1,800 for a 32-week course, the traditional university course length in which the majority of students are enrolled. Since the current legislation entitles students in 26 to 31-week courses and in semesters of 13 to 15 weeks, which form part of a longer course, to $1,800 and $900 respectively, we are providing in the bill that such students remain eligible for loans up to these limits rather than the lesser amounts which would result if the $56.25 weekly limit were to be applied. This is particularly important in certain cases, notably that of students at Memorial University in Newfoundland.

These two proposals will go some way toward meeting the financial needs of both those enrolled in colleges of applied arts and technology and similar institutions in courses between 12 and 26 weeks in length and those enrolled in courses longer than 32 weeks.

I might mention here that some provinces have suggested that the maximum loan limits should be raised substantially to provide more aid to needy students. However, at the same time, student groups generally have indicated strong opposition to any substantial increase in loan limits, insisting that loans should be replaced by non-repayable grants.

Of course, members of the House will be aware that a federal-provincial task force on student assistance was set up early in 1980 to examine the whole question of student assistance in Canada. The report of that task force was received by the Council of Ministers of Education and by myself at a meeting in Fredericton, New Brunswick, on January 27, 1981. The report includes a review of past studies in the area of student assistance, both in Canada and elsewhere. It also includes an analysis of existing student aid programs in Canada, the potential future trends which might bear on student aid in the 1980s, the principles and objectives which should govern student aid, and five program alternatives compatible with those principles and objectives.

The task force does not make specific recommendations, since it is intended to prompt public reaction. The Council and I, when releasing the report, invited comments on it from student groups, other interested groups and the general public by June 1 of this year. This input is expected to be considered by the Council of Ministers of Education and by myself in the fall with a view to considering what changes, if any, may be required in provincial and federal student assistance programs in Canada.

This bill, therefore, while important, does not propose sweeping changes to the program at the moment, but changes that we believe are essential to update the act in light of changing course patterns. Thus, it will not pre-empt any decisions which may flow from the work of the task force.

In addition to the important modification I have mentioned already, the bill proposes several amendments of a housekeeping nature. First, it proposes dropping the current requirement for a 12-month waiting period before applications may be accepted from those with permanent resident status. As members know, the Immigration Act of 1977 no longer permits a student to convert student visa status to permanent resident status while in Canada. Hence, the need for the waiting period is no longer relevant and it has been removed. I am sure this is a modification which will be welcomed by many students in this country who are here from other countries.

The bill also proposes inclusion of specific authority for the governor in council to make regulations respecting the denial of further assistance to those deliberately abusing the program. It also includes authorization for the governor in council to make regulations restricting payments to banks under the guarantee where a bank has failed, without cause, to submit claims for loss promptly, thus avoiding unnecessary accumulation of interest charges against the student borrower. The bill also provides for a change in the minister responsible, consequent upon the transfer of the program from the Department of Finance to the Department of the Secretary of State.

Finally, the bill includes the alteration of the loan year start date from July 1 to August 1 to coincide with the banking fiscal year, thereby facilitating interest payments to lenders.

In closing, I would like to emphasize that the amendments proposed are in some regards very important, particularly as they concern community college students and people in Canada who are here on a permanent resident basis. Many of the amendments are of a housekeeping nature, which are needed to update the legislation and are, of course, important in that respect to many students. I had occasion last spring to review with the National Union of Students the need for such changes as we are now proposing in this bill.

As I have also mentioned, the task force on student assistance has completed its report and interested groups are invited to comment upon it. When that process is complete, consideration will be given to the future direction of student assistance programs at both the provincial and federal levels of government. While some provincial authorities would prefer to see loan limits raised and while student groups oppose such a move, I believe both groups support the technical amendments proposed as a short-term measure.

Hon. members will appreciate that should this bill be acceded to it will be necessary to print and issue with dispatch new brochures to all concerned, together with the necessary modified application forms. The lead time for such printing will be some two months. And if the measures are to take effect for the 1981-82 school year, and I know all members are interested in seeing that it does come into effect as soon as possible, the necessary materials will have to be in the hands of students prior to the end of the current academic year in the spring of 1981. That is the main reason why I have asked members on all sides of the House for their co-operation in seeing that this bill be adopted as soon as possible.

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate on Bill C-55, to amend the Canada Student Loans Act. I can assure the Secretary of State (Mr. Fox) who so ably discussed the bill on second reading, that he does have our co-operation. But there are a few points that I would like to raise at this time. We understand the urgency to have this bill go through all readings today because of the 1981-1982 student year. No doubt these amendments are long overdue. In fact, some of them may not go far enough. However, we must deal with the bill as it is, and we propose to do so.

There are a few points I would like to make concerning student aid. When the program was set up in 1964, the principle of it was to help needy students obtain a post-secondary education. To a great extent I think this program has been successful and it has achieved that objective. As with most government programs, there are cases of abuse. I think that many of these cases could be eliminated if the income verification rate had to be, by law, higher than the present 5 per cent. I know that some provinces have a 100 per cent verification requirement applicable to parents' income and assets before consideration is given to loan applications. But that is not the case in all provinces. I think it is one area that we could possibly look at.

In view of the rumoured and much discussed possibility of the federal government's threatened cutbacks or elimination of federal funding to universities to the tune of approximately $1.5 billion, which has not as yet been denied by the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen) or the minister responsible for social development, I am sure that this act is only temporary. In fact, if that aid does not go to the provinces for post-secondary education, the burden of financing those programs will drop back on to the students and their parents, the provincial governments, or a combination of both. I imagine that we may be taking a long, hard look at this bill next year if that funding is changed with respect to the provincial governments. The fiscal agreement expires in March of 1982, which does not leave the government too much time to come up with a policy which will aid students if those cutbacks are carried out. If the cutbacks are carried out, I am sure we will be looking at a maximum loan of $9,800 in a lifetime. That figure would have to be reviewed, and reviewed rather quickly.

I am happy to see that the amendments will provide authority to relate the maximum repayment period to the size of the debt within the statutory maximum repayment period of ten years. It has been a little unrealistic to allow a student who may have borrowed $500 or $1,000 ten years to repay that loan. I am glad that has been amended within the act, because it has been an unnecessary expense to the government. I am also pleased to see the provisions to exclude students who default without just cause from further benefits, and I think that is a very important amendment.

A couple of areas that I would like to discuss may cause some controversy, but I think I would be negating my responsibility if I did not touch on them. The assessment process should, in my opinion, be universal. All provinces should adhere to the same criteria. Income and assets should be taken into consideration, and I alluded to that earlier. This would probably eliminate some of the abuse of the program, although I must say I am very pleased to note that abuse of the program is not high. However, as a Member of Parliament I have, as I am sure most hon. members in the House have, had constituents tell me that there are some students getting loans within a community whose parents could well afford to help them out with their education. The fact that students are left with a deficit between need and aid reflects the necessity of reviewing the loan limits.

Another concern I have is the loans for offshore education. In 1978 and 1979, the figure reached approximately $4.25 million, primarily going into the United States, with $500,000 for the United Kingdom; $343,000 for Europe and about $150,000 for the rest of the world.

My concern is not the amount of money which is being loaned, but the monitoring of the standards of education from these offshore institutions. It is safe to say, I think, that most of the institutions have standards which compare favourably to Canadian institutions. However, a small percentage do not meet Canadian standards. The provinces, which submit the list of approved institutions to the student loans program, may have difficulty in monitoring standards and ensuring that students educated at offshore institutions will meet and match the requirements of the particular faculty of study in Canada. I think specifically of the medical profession, where students may study medicine at a university or medical school offshore, having used a loan from the program, only to find that they cannot pass the medical boards when they come back to Canada. This type of occurrence should be carefully looked at, either by the provinces under whose jurisdiction this falls, or if necessary, to save frustration and expense, by the federal program, which may have better or more able resources available through their consulates.

The eligible course length change is a long overdue measure. However, even the provision to include 12 week-courses is not, in my opinion, enough. This allows many community college and technical courses to be included, but it does not include apprenticeship programs.

I would like to talk for just a moment about recognized apprenticeship programs where there is block institutional training. In other words, an apprentice will work for a period of ten months, on-the-job training, and then will go to an institution for block training program. For those eight weeks, the student must apply for unemployment insurance. The first lesson we teach a young apprentice is how to apply for unemployment insurance. I think that is very regrettable, and I would ask the minister, in the review of the program, now that loan capabilities have been reduced on a weekly basis, which I think is excellent, to take a look at the apprenticeship program. I would much rather teach an apprentice how to borrow student funding and pay it back to the government than how to apply for unemployment insurance while he is continuing his education. An apprenticeship program is post-secondary education. It is just as important to this country as a university education or a community college education. Apprenticeship programs are very important in this country today, particularly with the critical skills shortage we have here. Therefore, I would ask the minister to look carefully into this area when reviewing the report of the federal-provincial task force on student loans, because this particular act could pertain to apprenticeship programs which have been approved by the provinces, especially with the block institutional training.

Some of the apprenticeship institutional training is done four days on the job and one day in the school. That is a little easier. But in remote areas of northern Ontario, where you take the apprentice away from his job and put him into a college or a university some distance from his home for eight weeks, to put that person on unemployment insurance, to my way of thinking, is just completely unforgiveable in a country like ours. We should not be teaching our young people to claim unemployment insurance.

Having said all that, I would like to say that the Canada Student Loans program is actually one of the best student aid programs that you will find anywhere in the world. However, one of the problems which I have found with the program is that it is not sufficiently advertised. People at the secondary education level do not understand the loan program. Since the government is thinking of increasing its advertising budget by approximately $70 million, a few dollars might be taken from that to help educate those who may not be able to afford post-secondary education and therefore drop out of school. This information should be made available to students before they decide to enter the post-secondary education field.

The federal-provincial task force on student assistance has presented its preliminary report. This task force was put together by the Clark government, and I was pleased to read what is a very good report. My concern is that because this bill we are debating does not take into consideration any of the possible suggestions which may come from the task force, what may happen, as happened with its predecessor, the report and recommendations made by the federal-provincial task force on student aid in 1975-76, is that the recommendations will be shelved and nothing will be done to improve aid programs until a future task force makes the same recommendations, which would be a waste of time, effort and money. If changes are needed, we must make the changes now. I would encourage the minister to assure that, once various interest groups have commented on the report of the federal-provincial task force on student assistance, the necessary legislation and policy will be brought forward to the House as quickly as possible so we can update and make Canada's Student Loans program second to none in the world.

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate. My party agrees that it is very important that the bill before us receive rapid acceptance so we can move on, and so its provisions can be available for those students who are interested in applying for the Canada Student Loans program in the forthcoming academic year 1981-82. As the minister said in his remarks, the bill is far from comprehensive. It is a kind of a patchwork, a bit of a housekeeping measure. He also remarked that since its inception in 1964 there have only been one or two amendments. I regret this, because it is obvious from the number of studies that have taken place and from the concern expressed by students that a great deal more needs to be done. I look forward with great hope, if not great faith, to the changes that may result from the task force report after all the suggestions and comments had been delivered to the minister. I may not be particularly hopeful but I certainly look forward to something more than is before us today.

Student aid really means providing accessibility. Through it we are trying to provide young students and those not so young who want an opportunity for retraining and for greater access to our institutions with the means to do so. A hundred years ago we were fighting for the same kind of accessibility in the elementary and secondary schools. Through full public education we achieved that; it is not without some imperfections but there has been a great deal of success.

I look forward to the time when we can remove the financial obstacles that prevent eligible, capable, meritorious students from proceeding with their education. Then they can make the contribution to the country that many of them are presently prevented from making through lack of access to education. Anything that increases the access to university of capable young Canadians deserves the support of all parties in the House.

I have some mild disagreement with a couple of the remarks of the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid). I do not agree with a means test for parents. I feel it is quite an admirable thing to be an independent young person applying for a loan, and I hope that the hon. member did not mean to suggest that the parents of a young student should be subjected to a means test before a loan would be granted. Many young people are independent. I will use some of the terms that are commonly used by hon. members on that side: they are self-reliant, mature and want to get an education on their own. If I misrepresent what the hon. member said, I will be glad to withdraw it should he indicate that is the case. In any event, I do not agree with a means test for parents as a qualification for a student loan.

I also have difficulty with the suggestion that the payback period should be reduced for smaller loans. I was not at university when loans of this type were made. I can testify, however, that the period immediately following graduation, when I was a young man with a young family starting a career, was the most poverty-stricken time of my life.

An hon. Member: Not now?

Mr. Rose: No, this is not the most poverty-stricken time I have ever gone through. Perhaps it is for the hon. member. I know he is a very successful entrepreneur. It may be tough for him but it is not tough for me. The tough time was just after graduation when I was trying to build a career for myself and look after my family. It would have been very difficult then to pay back even an insignificant loan. I do not think we should make that provision.

On the other hand, I could agree with much of what the hon. member said about the apprenticeship program and the provision for student loans, rather than having an employer teach an apprentice about the great benefits and joys of unemployment insurance. I think he made an excellent point in this regard.

One of the reasons we can support the bill is the reduction in the course length required in order to qualify for loan assistance. This will be of benefit to people in vocational schools, community colleges and a number of technical schools. It is a positive move and deserves support.

The minister mentioned the National Union of Students and how influenced he was by that body. He should know that it has been pushing for a number of years to have provisions included in the Canada Student Loans Act for part-time students, those who may be parents or homemakers who want to take part-time courses, or those who are already working and want to take a night course. I am pleased that the students have finally penetrated the conscience of the government and won a reduction in the period of eligibility. I should like to emphasize, however, that the need of part-time students is very important and I regret that they have not been granted assistance.

All kinds of independent studies have examined this question and I shall list some of them. The Peitchinis report in 1971 entitled "Financing Post-Secondary Education in Canada" was issued by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada and called for assistance to part-time students. In 1975 the federal-provincial working group on student assistance took the same stand. In 1978 the Alberta task force to review students' contribution to the cost of post-secondary education made a similar finding. Over 60 per cent of part-timers attending universities or post-secondary educational institutions are women. If the government is really serious about the retraining of women and increasing opportunities for them in this society, one of the best ways to achieve this would be to include a provision in the legislation for student loans for part-time students.

In his capacity as Minister of Communications, the minister is well aware of the possibilities or probabilities that the technological revolution resulting from Telidon, chip technology, computers, satellites, fibre optics, word processors, and all such interactive technology, will displace something like one billion women in the western world in the next ten years. Even if this is only partly true, it reinforces the case for including part-timers in the bill. The people displaced by this technology will be women and therefore they will need to be retrained.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): A very good point.

Mr. Rose: I agree with the House leader of the official opposition when he said that I made a very good point. I enthusiastically support that comment.

Mr. Pepin: For acknowledging the obvious.

Mr. Rose: There is also the Anisef report commissioned by the Ontario government which pointed out the necessity for more part-time assistance and also dealt with the background of the people attending universities. Over the years we have boasted that we have provided opportunities for higher education to most Canadians. This report, however, establishes that six out of ten children from families of the richest quartile in society, the most affluent 25 per cent, attend universities or receive some post-secondary education, while only two out of ten children from the poorest quarter are afforded the same opportunity. There is a financial barrier there.

● (1250)

An hon. Member: It is Liberal policy.

Mr. Rose: This is made even more difficult if the part-timers are excluded. If hon. members look at the demographics and see who go to universities and from what kinds of backgrounds, they will see that the situation is undemocratic. It is inequitable. We are saying this is the system and how it operates but let us not perpetuate that kind of inequitable operation. I bring that point forward as an extra one in an attempt to urge the minister to look at this matter of part-timers.

The gradual withdrawal by the federal government of student assistance programs somewhat concerns me and my party. The minister talked about $6,000 and changing from an annual maximum to a weekly maximum, and all the rest of it.

Mr. Fox: There are 20 million more.

Mr. Rose: Since 1965, in terms of sharing, total loans and grants to the provinces have decreased. Compared to the provinces this share has decreased from 33 per cent to last year's share of about 18 per cent. I agree the global amount has been increased but the share has been reduced.

Mr. Fox: What about post-secondary education? It is 57 per cent.

Mr. Rose: Since the government moved to the established programs financing act two years ago, not only has the health care of the nation been messed up, but the government has allowed the universities and the provinces to escape the commitment they would have had to have on a dollar-to-dollar sharing basis. Members opposite cannot defend that. What they are doing is denying access. The government is withdrawing funds, as it is from many things.

The minister sounds like Lester Pearson. In 1963, Mr. Pearson promised 10,000 scholarships. But what did we get in 1964? We had the Canada Student Loans program. The government is providing no bursaries at all; it is providing a guaranteed loan. We applaud the government for that in some of our more tranquil moments. But I say to hon. members opposite, do not try to kid us about this. The proportional share to the provinces has declined, and I do not think hon. members opposite can escape that fact. The federal assistance is confined—

Student Loans

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) knows his statistics very well and he knows what the government's contribution is for post-secondary education. But the greatest part of our contribution to post-secondary education is not through the Canada Student Loans Act, although that is a substantial one and one that has been increased by $19.5 million this year. Our major contribution is through the established programs financing act where we pour something like $3 billion a year into post-secondary education in Canada. Over the life of the agreement, our share has risen to 57 per cent of the cost of post-secondary education in Canada.

An hon. Member: Can you keep it there?

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, the support of the federal government of student loans in comparison to the total granting of student assistance funds has shrunk over the years from 33 per cent to about 18 per cent. The point I made about the established programs financing act has nothing to do with what the federal government is spending. The federal government is spending the money and it is not getting the credit for that. But because the federal government has allowed that, has permitted and encouraged that kind of block funding by this act, the federal government has allowed the provinces to escape their responsibilities. I am not blaming this particular minister. I am blaming the act which permits the siphoning off of federal funds intended for education into some other provincial project or priority. I think the minister is over-reacting.

Mr. Fox: Unlike the hon. member.

Mr. Rose: This hon. member seldom over-reacts, even when provoked.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fox: Question.

An hon. Member: Time is running out.

Mr. Rose: The minister's watch is fast. This is a good program. No one is suggesting it is not. But no one is suggesting that it is perfect either. We are just trying to increase the access to post-secondary education for members of low-income families, many of whom do not go to university because they do not want to get into debt for the next decade. Many can afford to go only part of the time. There are many other ways this legislation can be improved. It is good, but it is not perfect.

Let us consider next the task force. It is interesting that we heard about this task force on student aid, a wonderful move by the Clark government, but not one student was a member of the task force. I think it would have been nice to have had a student included. Maybe students were consulted, but students were very concerned there was no student represented on that task force. I think it is important that a student should have been included. Now that the minister has offered students access and suggestions, I hope that what comes out will be a result of their contributions and reflect much of their thinking.

There is a substantial amount now of student unemployment and youth unemployment, amounting to about 16 per cent across Canada. That is bound to have an effect on enrolment. Enrolment has probably peaked. We wonder why, when more students should be going to university, the proportion of the 18 to 24-year-olds attending university has declined. A number of things having to do with the economy has caused this decline. The cost of living, lack of student housing, lack of summer jobs and many other things contribute to a decline in the economy and bring about lack of opportunities for well-trained people. There are many people with university education who are performing jobs well below their skills because job opportunities have not opened up, mainly because of economic conditions.

Before I call it one o'clock, I might say to the minister that we are pleased we can participate and help him pass this bill so that this assistance will be available. We urge the minister to consider some of the remarks made by the various critics of the bill. When a full and comprehensive review of this legislation comes about, I hope the minister will seek advice from all political parties, all other sources, including employers, but above all from the beneficiaries of this legislation, who are the students themselves.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Question.

Motion, as amended, agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): At one o'clock the House had disposed of Bill C-55. As I understand it, hon. members may now be prepared to consider and put through final reading Bill C-34.

JUDGES ACT

MEASURE TO INCREASE SALARIES OF JUDGES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development) moved that Bill C-34, to amend the Judges Act and certain other acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Chrétien moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there is no need for me to speak at length this afternoon because, by its very nature, this piece of legislation should not be the subject of a protracted debate since, in that respect, it is our constitutional obligation here in the House—it is the only group of individuals, excepting hon. members of course, whose salaries are set by the House of Commons under the Constitution.

We already had a debate on second reading. We also had debates in committee and the bill is now back before the House with a few amendments because, in light of discussions in committee, the controversial aspect of the contributions of judges to their pension plan had to be reviewed. On behalf of the government, I committed myself before the members of the committee to appoint a review committee to re-examine the entire question of the pension of judges and the contribution they should make.

[English]

The judges have not had a salary increase for some time. The last one, in 1975, totalled 7.5 per cent. Therefore, this measure is long overdue. The members of the committee agreed that it is very important, if we are to attract good judges, that they should be able to do their job without any financial preoccupation. The committee recognized that the level of compensation for judges, compared to what used to be the level in relation to public servants and professionals, indicates they have lost a lot of ground since 1976. Therefore, this bill is long overdue.

The history of this bill is that the Dorfman committee studied this problem as well as a committee of the Canadian Bar Association, presided over by a member of the Quebec bar. A year ago last December my predecessor, Senator Flynn, made a commitment to proceed quickly, but it took some time before we could proceed. In any event, I think we now have a bill which is acceptable, and I recommend its adoption in this House.

I do not intend to elaborate; the bill speaks for itself. It is very important that we pass it and that the judges be accorded what they deserve for the good job all of them do for Canada. We are all proud of our judiciary. It is efficient, competent and completely independent from the executive and legislative bodies. I hope this bill will tell them that the Canadian people appreciate the work they are doing to maintain justice in our society.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to join in this debate at third reading on a day on which it appears that some items of legislation are moving through with some expedition. I do not propose to delay this process.

Mr. Knowles: Let's call the Constitution!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: My distinguished and learned friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), says we should bring the constitutional proposal forward today. If the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) were able to show the same flexibility and understanding and accept the suggestions of the opposition with respect to the Constitution that he has with respect to the judges bill, we might in fact attain the very objective to which the hon. member refers.

Mr. Chrétien: I accepted many of your propositions in the committee.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I accept the admonition of the minister that he has accepted many suggestions made in committee, but the fundamental changes we put forward have not been accepted. I suppose that is the reason we are engaged in a very important debate in that regard.

Of course, members of the NDP will applaud the fact that those fundamental changes have not been accepted because they are together with the Liberals on the Constitution. However, with respect to the Judges Act I suspect they will beat their chests and say they opposed the government, and that this is an example of a Tory-Liberal alliance. On more important issues the NDP supports the Liberals right down the line with no exceptions. I wanted to make that preliminary point of a non-controversial nature before I got on with this important bill relating to the salaries of judges.

The minister was prepared to make some amendments to this legislation and to allow other amendments. He instructed government supporters on the committee to accept amendments to the pension provisions of the bill. Very simply put, the bill presented by the minister and read the second time provided certain pension provisions. Pension contributions by judges were to be abolished, with the exception of nominal contributions for indexing purposes. At second reading I and other members of my party spoke in opposition to that proposal. We felt it was possibly inappropriate in terms of the precedent it might set and in view of demands and requests being made by other groups in society.

Second, it seemed to me that the salary increases proposed by the Minister of Justice in themselves sufficiently reflected a reasonable increase in the benefits to be paid to judges. The amounts proposed by the government were double those proposed by the minister's predecessor, Senator Flynn. Because of this we felt a pension contribution was appropriate.

The status quo will remain with respect to pension contributions, and the net position, quite frankly, will not be to the disadvantage of judges when we consider tax implications and the deductibility of contributions. The original proposal made by Senator Flynn when he was minister of justice was an increase of $6,500 over a period of two years. This bill provides for an increase of some $13,000 over a period of two years for, if I may use the term, the average judge. The increase will be somewhat more from chief justices and associate chief judges. However, essentially that is the increase under this legislation.

In his remarks at third reading the minister said that judges' salaries are a unique responsibility of Parliament. He made reference to the fact that under Section 100 of the British North America Act the salaries, allowances and pensions of judges of the superior, district and county courts are fixed and provided by the Parliament of Canada.

That leads me to make one observation made in the committee which I again bring to the attention of the minister. That is not absolutely true. A number of other public servants are affected. Their salaries are tied to judges' salaries. Some mention was made in the committee hearings that the Chief Electoral Officer, the Auditor General and other important senior officials who serve Parliament and the people of Canada have their salaries tied directly to judges' salaries. By virtue of the device of tying more and more public servants' salaries to judges' salaries, we may be getting away from the strict meaning of the BNA Act. I think each of these responsibilities should be judged on its own merits.

Perhaps it is now time for us to look at the concept put forward by my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), in terms of an executive remuneration tribunal. Such a tribunal could be established by the government. It could have the responsibility of looking at the adequacy of compensation paid to senior public officials of the type I have mentioned. Perhaps this could be done rather than continuing the present haphazard and casual way of dealing with these matters in terms of trying to find appropriate salary levels for various public officials.

I commend the minister for taking the step of providing for a review of judges' salaries by what I hope will be an effective and independent commission. One of the things we in Parliament can do is look at these matters and make assessments, but it is helpful to have people expert in the field who can spend the time to examine the requirements and adequacy of compensation, particularly for judges, to report to us and be subject to the scrutiny and cross-examination of members of Parliament through our committee system.

The minister has indicated that he would be receptive on two accounts to have the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs look at the report of these people who will be advising him regarding compensation. I remind the minister that during the course of the committee hearings he undertook to establish a committee to examine the whole question of the pension contributions of judges and to report to him. I am sure he will do that before too long. He also undertook to have that committee appear before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs so that Members of Parliament will have the opportunity to examine that committee's conclusions and the bases upon which it arrives at those conclusions.

I am not sure I heard the minister's remarks at third reading correctly, but I think he said judges received their last increase in 1975. If he checks the record, he will see that they received their last increase in 1977. His predecessor, the Hon. Ron Basford, brought forward legislation respecting salary increases. There has been one increase since 1975, and that was in 1977.

The position our party has taken with respect to this bill is that we question the salary increase. We were particularly concerned about the non-contributory pension aspect of it. As I pointed out—the minister also referred to this in his remarks—studies and recommendations have been made with respect to judicial compensation. The Casgrain report was completed and referred by the minister to the Canadian Bar Association, and the Dorfman report was prepared as an advisory report for the Minister of Justice and his department. In addition, there was a third report which was prepared for the judicial compensation committee of the Canadian judges' conference.

In each of these committees suggestions and recommendations were made with respect to increases in judges' salaries. The Casgrain report suggested increases of some $5,000 for each of the years 1979 and 1980. The Dorfman report suggested salary increases of $3,500 on April 1, 1979 and the same on April 1, 1980; and it seems to me that the judicial compensation committee of the Canadian judges' conference concurred in 1980 with the Casgrain recommendation.

What we have proposed in this bill is that an increase in excess of the amount recommended by any one of those committees be made in judges' salaries, so we are not short-changing the judges by any means if this bill is passed. They are receiving substantially more than was recommended by any of these three committees. The second point, however, the non-contributory part of the pension, causes serious concern to members of our party and members of the NDP. Also, I am satisfied that this matter was of considerable concern to a substantial number of members on the government side. There was receptivity in the committee from all sides of the House to the conclusion to which the minister finally arrived. The minister said he would allow the provisions with respect to a non-contributory pension to be voted down and deleted from the bill, but he would have these provisions examined independently and brought back to Parliament once he had received the committee report and had a chance to analyse what might be the most appropriate course to follow.

I have made reference to the fact that my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West, has spoken from time to time about the whole process of determining compensation for judges. Unfortunately, he is not in the House today—he has important business in his constituency—but he has spoken to me about this matter and indicated that he continues to be interested in it. He wishes me to remind the minister that for many years now he has advocated the establishment of a remuneration review tribunal. He understands the restrictions and restraints imposed upon us by Section 100 of the British North America Act which give Parliament the mandate to set the salaries, benefits, pensions and allowances of judges, and so he understands that there are some difficulties with respect to having an independent review tribunal. On the other hand, he is still of the opinion that some method of investigation of an independent nature should be found. He will continue to put this view forward whenever the opportunity to do so arises again.

On second reading of the bill, I pointed out the importance which, I think, all of us understand must be placed on the role which an independent judiciary plays under the two systems of common law which exist in our country. As we continue debate on the Constitution and talk about a charter of rights, which will come sooner or later—one is not sure of the exact time when it will arrive in Canada—one realizes the important role which the judiciary will play.

The role of the judiciary will be very important in terms of the future of our country. It is important to have a judiciary which is representative of the people of our country and which will have the competence to deal, in an intelligent manner, with the interpretation of an entrenched bill of rights. Because it seems to me that when one looks at the experience of other jurisdictions where there is an entrenched bill of rights, one finds that the quality of the judges and their political outlook is very important in the interpretation of the rights of the people of those countries, just as it will be in the interpretation of the rights of Canadians in years to come. Again I say to the minister that the suggestions he has received with respect to the appointment of judges and to the whole process by which judges are appointed must be a consideration in terms of the policy and the practice which have taken place and will take place in our country.

Under our parliamentary system, the Minister of Justice and the government have responsibility for the appointment of judges, as periodically they have to face the voter and justify the kinds of appointments they make to the judiciary, along with other aspects of their policies, during their mandate. But in this instance, when we are moving now toward a system with an entrenched charter of rights, it becomes important for parliamentarians in particular and for the people in the country to know what the attitudes, opinions, and, quite frankly, the philosophy of the judges to be appointed will be, because the courts will be required to adjudicate upon the rights of the citizens of our country.

If we look south of the 49th parallel to see what has transpired in terms of the experience of the U.S. Supreme Court, which is the final court of appeal in that country, as we will have to look at our own Supreme Court, we see that there has been a transformation in the course of the last ten years from what was described as a Liberal Warren court to what is now described as a more Conservative, constructionist court of Chief Justice Berger. I am not commenting at all about the quality of judgments, which remains always high; but if one were to examine the decisions made with respect to the U.S. Bill of Rights and the rights available to U.S. citizens and examine what subtle transformations have taken place of certain of those fundamental rights, it would be important to understand that the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada will be a matter of interest and importance to us because of the fact that the court will have a substantial say in what the rights of the individual citizens are. What I say to the minister is that the quality and independence of the judiciary is important, particularly now when we are moving forward toward an entrenched bill of rights.

Another aspect of this matter to which he may want to give serious consideration is finding a broader basis of consultation with respect to the appointment of judges. With regard to competence, I made some suggestions about the fact that the advice of the provincial law societies is not sufficiently taken into account. The minister has agreed to consider my suggestions, and I compliment him for this on behalf of members on this side.

Law societies are involved in the day-to-day administration of their membership in each province. It would be an important improvement in the consultative process of the minister and his officials with respect to judicial appointments if they relied more frequently on the recommendations of provincial bar associations and law societies. I am not in any way diminishing the importance of the role of the Canadian Bar Association. I am not suggesting for a moment that those people do not have great ability or are not of assistance to the minister.

● (1430)

The minister has often pointed out that he is a lawyer from Shawinigan, so he will understand that the Canadian Bar Association tends to represent the larger metropolitan areas of the country. Often rural lawyers are overlooked because they are not known to the lawyers in the bigger cities. I am not suggesting that there is any sort of conspiracy. The people who are involved in the day-to-day administration of the law societies know the competent lawyers within their provinces. They know better the abilities of rural practitioners or the people who are not involved in larger firms. I simply say to the minister, by way of constructive suggestion, that he should try to create a structure within his office and his consultative process whereby provincial bar associations will be consulted more frequently.

We have reservations with respect to the amount recommended in the bill in terms of total salary increases. We think they are quite adequate, if not more than adequate.

Mr. Knowles: They are too high.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I tried to figure out the rationale. I made some calculations on the back of an envelope in an attempt to arrive at these figures. According to my calculations, if we take a 7 per cent increase and index it to the time of the last increase, we could arrive at the figures which are being presented. There is provision for indexing on the basis of the industrial composite which will keep the salaries of judges moving with inflationary pressures at the maximum rate of 7 per cent. But the government has taken the step, in view of the suggestion of the opposition, to remove the contributory pension part of it.

Notwithstanding our reservations as far as the amounts are concerned, it is appropriate for the bill to receive third reading at this point in time. I appreciate the minister's responding to my request and the requests of other members of the opposition in terms of the deletion of those provisions. Therefore, we will allow this bill to pass. I hope improvements will be possible and that more professionalism will be used respecting the calculation of the salaries of judges in the years ahead.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in third reading debate on this important bill, one which comes before Parliament very rarely. As the hon. member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) indicated, I believe it was in 1977 that the Judges Act last came before Parliament.

As other members have indicated, there are three major elements to the bill in its present form. There is an increase in the number of judges to be appointed; there is a substantial salary increase; and in the original bill there was provision for the elimination of contributory pensions by judges. I should like to deal briefly with each of those elements of the bill.

We support the first element, which is not controversial, that is, to respond to the concerns of provincial attorneys general and increase the number of judges in several Canadian provinces as well as in the two territories.

I spoke of my concerns in my second reading speech on December 1 and also in committee with respect to the appointment process of the federal judiciary, to which the hon. member for Saskatoon West alluded. It is particularly important to examine carefully how the federal judiciary is being appointed. There is no question that there have been substantial improvements in the appointments process in recent years. The blatantly political appointments have largely, but certainly not completely, come to an end.

For example, one need only look at recent appointments in the province of Saskatchewan to see that that day is not yet completely over. I am not suggesting for a moment that politicians should be excluded from access to the judiciary, but I am suggesting that there is a remarkable coincidence between the political stripe of lawyers and appointments to the bench. It is not as bad as it used to be, but the practice certainly still goes on.

One need only look at the recent appointments to the citizenship court of this country. The three most recent appointments were the wife of a former Liberal cabinet minister, the secretary of a former Liberal cabinet minister and a former Liberal cabinet minister. Unfortunately there are still practices of that nature in the federal bench; we want them to come to an end quickly.

We do not believe the present consultative process with the Canadian Bar Association, which in many ways is a big city, old boys' network, is adequate or satisfactory. I emphasize "old boys' network" because members of the House should know that there are no women on the Canadian Bar Association committee. The hon. member for Saskatoon West suggested that our judiciary should represent the people of the country. At the present time the committee of the Canadian Bar Association is comprised of men. There are 17 judges who are to be appointed. There are many qualified women who are lawyers in the country. There are many more qualified women in recent years because the number of women graduates is far greater than it was a few years ago. I suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) that the next 17 appointments he makes pursuant to these provisions should be women. There are qualified women from coast to coast who should be taking these positions. I urge the minister to appoint women to all 17 positions. Also I urge the minister, as I have urged him before, to make his next appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada the first woman Supreme Court justice.

The hon. member for Saskatoon West talked of his concerns about the appointment process. We believe that this process should be opened up, not just to the law societies, as was suggested by the hon. member for Saskatoon West, but perhaps to an independent commission in each province with representatives from the community at large. I am referring to those people who are affected by the day-to-day decisions of the judiciary: representatives of the labour movement and representatives of the community at large, not just representatives of the legal profession. It could be similar to what is known as the Missouri plan in the United States. We must substantially improve the appointments process in this country.

As I said, we want to ensure that far more women are appointed. Historically a Conservative government has never in the history of this country appointed a woman to the federal court bench. We know that must change. We have concerns about the appointments process. I hope the minister will examine carefully these concerns in the months ahead.

The second provision in the original bill was one with respect to pensions. The Minister of Justice was president of the treasury board when the bill which required judges to contribute to their own pension plans was brought in. We know the former Conservative minister of justice wanted to eliminate this contributory pension plan provision. We are pleased to see the Minister of Justice accede to the very strong urgings of this party, of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and others, who have urged the minister to reinstate the fundamental principle that the judiciary should contribute to their pensions just as all other Canadians do. We are pleased to see the minister drop those provisions of the bill in response to, as I say, our urgings and also the urgings of the Conservative Party, as well as a number of members of the Liberal caucus. The minister was responsive in that area and we appreciate that very much. We welcome the fact that the minister resisted a very powerful and yet invisible lobby of the judiciary in this country in doing that. As I say, we welcome the fact that those provisions have been dropped.

I say very frankly to the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the suggestion that there should be yet another committee set up to study this question is simply a waste of the taxpayers' money. The Dorfman commission, the Canadian Bar Association and the Ministry of Justice have examined this question. We have all the evidence we need. I suggest that to appoint a high-priced lawyer to examine this question once again is a waste of the taxpayers' money. I say without any equivocation whatsoever, Mr. Speaker, that there is no doubt that if this provision is brought back to this Parliament, we intend very vigorously to oppose it, as we do now.

The next major provision in the bill is a provision with respect to salary increases. This matter was touched upon by the hon. member for Saskatoon West. I believe that Canadians who are paying their taxes and who are paying these salaries should know just how rich these increases are. For example, a county court judge in Canada will have an increase in his or her salary from the present level of $47,000 a year to $65,000 a year, which is an increase of 38 per cent. A Court of Appeal judge or a Supreme Court judge at the federal level will have an increase in salary from $54,000 to $70,000—a very substantial increase. A Supreme Court of Canada justice will receive an increase in salary from the present level of $64,000 to $81,000. That increase will be effective to almost a year ago, to April 1, 1980. In just a few weeks there will be a further increase under the provisions of this bill. I will give only one example. The salaries of Supreme Court justices at the provincial level will go from $54,000 a year to $74,900 a year.

We believe that this package, in so far as it affects salaries, is excessively rich. We recognize that the judiciary must be adequately compensated. We recognize their important role in Canadian society. But we also say this: frankly, one of the arguments that is made, and perhaps the most persuasive argument, for these very substantial and excessive salary increases is that lawyers are paid very high salaries. We are told that lawyers are paid $80,000 or $90,000 a year, or $100,000 or $200,000 at the senior levels. We are told that we cannot get judges to accept a substantial cut in their pay. Very frankly, what I say the problem is, Mr. Speaker, is that lawyers in this country are overpaid. That is the problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I say that being a lawyer myself, Mr. Speaker. We have a problem here in that the judiciary wants to keep in step with the legal profession. Naturally, they do not want a cut in pay. But in a time when old age pensioners, for example, particularly in the case of elderly women, are living below the poverty line, single parents are struggling to survive, families on welfare are living below the poverty line and 20 per cent of the children of Canada live in conditions of poverty, I suggest that it is intolerable that we have such great disparities in wealth. I suggest that it is intolerable that in this day and age there is such affluence in the midst of such poverty.

While recognizing that our judiciary must be adequately compensated, these provisions are simply too rich. We recognize a salary increase should be provided, but we say that this particular increase is not only too rich but goes beyond the recommendations of the independent Dorfman inquiry. Mr. Dorfman is a very learned former president of the Canadian Bar Association.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): How long ago?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I hear the House leader of the Conservative Party defending these salary increases.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): How long ago?

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): He will have his opportunity to speak in this debate in due course and to defend these increases. We will listen with interest to his position.

The Dorfman commission recommended these increases, extending into the future, at a time when the commission was well aware of the economic conditions facing this country.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, we are pleased with the provisions with respect to pensions.

We have serious concerns about the appointments process in this country. As the hon. member for Saskatoon West pointed out, the role of our judiciary will be substantially enhanced as a result of an entrenched charter of rights. I must confess to some puzzlement at the position of the member for Saskatoon West, who indicated that people from all across Canada would be affected by this charter of rights. I assume that he has now adopted the position of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), who has apparently seen the light and has recognized that it is ludicrous to suggest that a charter of rights should only apply in some provinces and that these rights do not belong to all Canadians. We suggest that a charter of rights must apply from coast to coast. There should be no opting out of a charter of rights. We welcome the apparent conversion of the hon. member for Provencher on that question. I hope that the hon. member for Saskatoon West is joining us in that point of view.

A charter of rights does significantly enhance the powers of our judiciary. We recognize that it is one of the reasons we must look very carefully at the appointments process. We must look very carefully, perhaps, at a role for Parliament in the appointments process to ensure that at least at the top levels of our judiciary, the Supreme Court level, there is some input at the parliamentary level.

We find the provisions for salary increases excessive. We are concerned with the fact that these salaries will be increased by 7 per cent each year. When you are at that high a salary level, that 7 per cent increase means $5,000 or $6,000 a year. This will simply increase the spread between the rich and the poor in this country. Again, we find that unacceptable.

I conclude by saying that we certainly recognize the fundamental role of the judiciary, one which must uphold the principle of the rule of law in this country. We recognize the role of a judiciary which must make decisions on such vital matters as the liberty of the subject, on how to sentence in very complex criminal matters, deciding such important questions in civil matters as who is to have custody of children and what is in the best interests of a child. We recognize the importance of our federal court looking at immigration, taxation and many other matters which directly affect the lives of the Canadian citizen. We recognize the role of the judiciary in determining guilt or innocence. We recognize its role with regard to charging a jury. We have been fortunate in Canada to have a very fine judiciary, one that all Canadians can be proud of.

But, Mr. Speaker, we still have concerns with respect to sentencing policy, for example. I touched on that in my speech at second reading. We still have concerns with respect to the great disparities which exist in sentencing policies. We have concerns with respect to the failure of our prison system, in the hope that the judiciary might become more aware of that failure and be more innovative in their sentencing practices.

While there has been a significant improvement in this bill with respect to the restoration of the contributory element of the pension and the provisions with respect to salary increases, which are simply too rich, and while we recognize the importance of the judiciary, we will be opposing this bill at third reading.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some very brief remarks with respect to this legislation, since there was some distortion left on the record by the hon. member who just spoke. The first distortion had to do with the range of the application of this particular piece of legislation. It applies to federally-appointed judges, superior court judges, but it does not apply to citizenship court judges, which though they are honourable and estimable appointments within the community, are not within the classification of judges being dealt with by this bill. That is the first point.

The hon. member was correct; the bill deals with increases in the numbers of judges in various places. I am happy to note that he was not arguing that this is not necessary in certain areas. Because of changes in the organization of Canadian society and the fact that it is becoming more complex as government intervenes to a greater degree in the lives of individuals, the work of judicial tribunals is necessary and there is bound to be an increase. I make no comment on the workload of judges, except to say that it is increasing in certain areas and in some areas it is not. The federal government has no alternative but to look at the necessity of increasing the size of the bench from time to time.

I am glad to see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) agrees that we should remove the problem of pensions from the bill and have that dealt with in another manner. I think that is in keeping with the atmosphere that ought to prevail in the House when we are dealing with judges, who do not have the right to speak for themselves but depend upon Parliament and this system to speak for them. Therefore, it behooves Parliament and all parliamentarians on every side of the House to judge the issue on its merits and not on the basis of prejudice and possible preconceptions, which might be deemed to be right in the mind of the speaker but are woefully wrong in terms of the work of the legal profession.

That brings me to the question of salaries for judges. The hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), who has just spoken, said that the package is excessively rich. I do not know whether it is excessively rich or not, but from my experience in government I do know that there is some difficulty in attracting the best to the bench. The difference between our lives and the life of a judge is that we in Parliament can take part in the community, can involve ourselves in many organizations, and indeed we seek to do so. We do not have to exercise the same care that a judge must when choosing his associates. We do not have to withdraw from many associations, and we do not lose the right, which other citizens have, to speak out on public matters. A judge loses all those rights. I hear my hon. friend from South Shore (Mr. Crouse) saying a judge even loses the right to vote, the most fundamental right enjoyed by any citizen.

When a person considers whether he will go to the bench, he considers many factors: whether he enjoys the study of law; whether he is prepared to endure the tedium of the law—there are tediums in all professions, but particularly with the bench. He also has to decide whether he is prepared to give up some rights that my friend and I take for granted. I think those are tremendous considerations for any person. He must also consider his family.

We must consider our duty to ensure that the judge, or whatever court we are dealing with, is adequately compensated so that with respect to the vicissitudes of life he will never put himself in a compromising position.

An hon. Member: What about the poor?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Of course, that is important with respect to others as well. I am not arguing the case against the poor; but I am arguing the case in favour of judges. I think that is important.

I spoke briefly about this matter in second reading debate. I think we must remember the bottom line is that the bench must be independent, that it must be seen to be independent, and that there is nothing that should deter a judge from being anything else, regardless of what befalls him. That is why we deal rather generously in terms of pensions. Even if there were no pension plans in place we would deal with it in that manner, because no person appointed to the bench can assure himself that he will always have his health and his ability to work, that he will always be able to stay there for ten or 12 years, or whatever it is.

There are great opportunities, but he loses the right to participate in business and in ordinary daily life. If he goes to the bench and is dissatisfied, as some judges are dissatisfied—

Mr. Knowles: Not the ones I know.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —his recourse is to stay there and be a very bad judge because he is not happy with the life, or to leave. When he leaves, his practice is then restricted compared to what he formerly could do. That is why Parliament has the responsibility to deal with this matter honourably.

With respect to patronage, I do not fault the government for appointing known supporters of its own political party to the bench. I would default the government if that were the only reason for appointments, and if the soundness of the lawyer appointed was overlooked. I would fault it if the appointments were poor. But I cannot fault a government for appointing those who happen to stumble along a political path that I do not follow if they are good, sound and impartial. I cannot fault that any more than I can fault the government which was in office before my government for appointing Mr. Gilbert of the New Democratic Party—

An hon. Member: It was a sound appointment.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —a county court judge. It was a very sound appointment of a very good judge—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —not necessarily because he was a New Democrat, but because he was a good man.

An hon. Member: Lots of talent.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I am pleased that the Minister of Justice saw the talent in the Hon. Paul Martineau when the government appointed him to the Quebec Superior Court. As hon. members know, he was a minister in the Diefenbaker administration, a good lawyer and a sound man. He had a good sense of justice and judgment, as does Mr. Gilbert, a former member of the New Democratic Party.

I do not fault the Minister of Justice for having arranged the appointment of five women judges. I hope that with respect to appointments to the bench, people will not be appointed simply on the basis of sex, but rather because they are sound choices. Then we will be doing justice to women, because we will be appointing the best.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): In the last little while, women have suddenly found the legal profession. They are entering it in increasing numbers, as they are moving into medicine, pharmacy, dentistry and other professions that were thought to be male-dominated.

That is what this bill is all about: it is to provide a basis to ensure that judges are relatively happy in their profession and their future and that they are able to perform their duties with a certain peace of mind. That is not to say that those same rights ought not to be available to other Canadians. My hon. friends in the New Democratic Party and in my own party strive to argue here with the government to improve the lot of other Canadians. That does not end because we have decided today to deal with judges.

Having regard to appointments to the bench, I will not quibble over $1,000 or so one way or another. The government must be always vigilant to see that the best are called to the bench, and that no occupation, no political leaning, would deprive the best from being appointed. If that is done, our bench will be strengthened.

It has been the constant practice of governments generally, as the hon. member for Burnaby wants, to consult broadly others in the community, in the professions, and among organizations. There should be the broadest possible consultation, not just consultation with the Canadian Bar Association which is just one group. There should be consultation beyond the legal profession so that the best people may be appointed.

● (1500)

I did not intend to speak in this debate but I think it is important. I feel very strongly about our responsibility to a part of the public which cannot speak for itself and that is why I rose today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to make some brief comments on this bill. The hon. member was not saying otherwise but I should like to tell him that this party also believes the bench must be independent and must be composed of the best people available. That was the intent of the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson). We are pleased that this bill is being debated today and we expect it will go through, but it is about time. We are happy that it has been changed in the pension provisions. Members of Parliament have to contribute toward their pensions and judges should as well.

The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) was right when he said it is difficult to criticize judges because they cannot reply. They can reply through lawyers who are prominent members of the bar, however. If I say anything that judges object to, I am sure they can take that route as I think they will be listening to and reading this debate today.

In British Columbia, where I am a member of the bar, there have been some problems recently with judges getting into trouble with the law. I do not want to go into details but I think I should note that people who do not have the privileged position in society that lawyers and judges have, expect judges to be above running into problems with the law. I think judges in my province especially have noted that in the last year.

In the last Parliament I raised the question of the difficulties that arose following the resignation of the former chief justice of the court of appeal in British Columbia and I want to clarify that question. I did not raise the question to deal with that specific matter as, frankly, I think the judge in that case suffered enough. What I wanted to deal with was the discipline procedure for judges. I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) should look into that matter. The judge in question in British Columbia resigned, so no inquiry could be carried out in that case. That may or may not be proper but the public was never really satisfied that no wrongdoing went on. I do not think there was any wrongdoing but I do not know. I would suggest that a prominent lawyer could be appointed to look into the situation—not to deal with the activities of that particular man but to then be in a position to tell the public there was no wrongdoing. I think the public would have felt better, and I know I would, if such a report had been brought forward. I leave that suggestion with the Minister of Justice.

Now I come to the matter of appointments and here I depart slightly from the position taken by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton. We know that when the Liberals are in, a lot of Liberals are appointed to the bench, and when the Conservatives are in government, Conservatives are appointed to the bench. So far this party has not been in a position to make appointments! The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton put his finger on the problem, as did the hon. member for Burnaby, that political people should not be excluded from judicial life but politics should not be the first criteria for appointment. I would suggest to the Minister of Justice that future appointments be vetted by a special committee of the House of Commons so that qualifications could be examined and gross political appointments eliminated.

I think there is a need for reform in the manner of making appointments. As the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton said, women are ready to be appointed to the bench and the government should appoint them. There are other types of lawyers as well, who could be appointed. In the last 10 or 15 years lawyers who have gone into community law, administrative law, and the teaching profession would make fine judges and I think the minister should expand the base of appointment. It is important that we have judges from all walks of legal life.

I wanted to bring up something now that is not in the bill. I refer to conditions in the courts. At the present time we have a strange court system in Canada. A difference is made between county court judges and supreme court judges in the bill. I could never understand the rationale behind that distinction. I do not even understand why there is a federal court. I think a lot of money is wasted by having different courts. We should have one superior court and one supreme court in each province.

The hon. member for Burnaby alluded to reforms that need to be made in the legal system and to different kinds of law. Judges are only part of the system. I practised family and domestic law and know there needs to be reform in the courts in that area. I was pleased that with the co-operation of the federal government we were able to set up a model family court in British Columbia.

I was disappointed that the Minister of Justice did not include the right of counsel as a real right of counsel in the charter of human rights. That is not only the right to have a lawyer if you can pay but the right to have a lawyer if you cannot afford to pay; in other words, legal aid for people who cannot afford a lawyer and the right to that legal aid. I fought and lost a case on that very point in the court of appeal in British Columbia. I hope in the near future in this country we will have the real right to counsel; that means being provided with a lawyer if you cannot afford one. I think any judge would say that it is helpful when both parties are well represented by counsel.

I have made some criticisms of judges, Mr. Speaker, but we have had some great ones. I think of Mr. Justice Hall of Saskatchewan; I think of Chief Justice Duff of British Columbia; I think of Justice Rand from the maritimes; of Justice Laskin from Ontario and I know there have been some excellent judges from Quebec.

I am a member of the bar of the Northwest Territories, Mr. Speaker. There we had perhaps one of the greatest judges of all, an authentic Canadian hero, Mr. Justice Sissons, the first judge of the north, whose area of jurisdiction reached the North Pole. He was succeeded by another great man, Mr. Justice Morrow who unfortunately died last year. I wish to pay tribute to him in the House today.

One of the things that Mr. Justice Sissons said, and this was taken up by Justice Morrow, was that justice should go to every man's house. When he said that, it meant taking justice to everyone in the north. It was a very difficult area to administer but he did it. I think if we carry that tradition on, this country will be well served.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, all hon. members who have spoken have pointed to the fact that judges will have to deal with the charter of human rights.

• (1510)

I want to conclude by quoting words, not from a Canadian judge, but from an American judge, William O. Douglas who used the words "a judge should have courage and humanity in his or her decisions." I say to judges in Canada who will be interpreting the charter of human rights that I hope, as I am sure other members of this House do, they will interpret that charter and deal with the fundamental problems of human rights in this country with courage and with humanity.

Mr. McGrath: Thanks to you there will be no property rights.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a subject which has concerned me for many years. I could speak at length on it, but I shall be very brief. I want to say at the outset that the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) said one thing with which I fully agree, namely, that we should approach this subject on its merits. The difficulty between my friend and me is that we are on different wave lengths.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): But on the same street.

Mr. Knowles: We live on the same street here in Ottawa, but on opposite sides of that street.

I suppose the thing which has bothered me all my life about our society is that those who have get more and those who do not have lose even what they have got. I just do not like it. Time and time again we find the money for massive increases to those in the upper economic reaches. But those who are down lower lose what they have through inflation, through taxes and through the increased prices they have to pay. I hope some day to see this situation turned around.

We have made some improvements over the years. I could make a speech in which I could almost boast of the improvements we have made in social legislation during the decades I have been in this Parliament, but we are still ready first to give more to those who have, and offer only sympathy and concern for those who have not. As my friend, the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) pointed out, this bill is going to push some judges who are now in the lower brackets into the $60,000 bracket. It will push some into the $70,000 bracket and it will push others into the $80,000 bracket. On top of that, there is an automatic 7 per cent annual increase. When you are talking about a salary of $70,000, a 7 per cent increase amounts to $4,900. If you are in the $80,000 bracket, a 7 per cent increase amounts to $5,600.

These figures are more, just by way of an increase, than the total amount which is available to a pensioner who draws both old age security and the full amount of the guaranteed income supplement. Most of our senior citizens, and this means most of the 2 million people over the age of 65, are struggling at or just below the poverty line. We have many others, particularly women, in the 55 to 65 age bracket, those unattached who would be well off if they could get up to the poverty line who are having a difficult time. Then there are the working poor and the unemployed. These are problems which face our society. If we want to call ourselves democratic, advanced and progressive, if we want to have a Canadian identity to be proud of, these are the areas in which we should be working.

I cannot bring myself to believe that it is the right thing in the face of these problems to keep on giving massive increases to those who are at the top. If some hon. members suspect that because I feel that way about the increases in this bill I may have even more to say about certain other increases if they are brought before this House—I need not mention them as every member knows what I am talking about, I can tell them they will hear from me when that time comes.

I agree with everything that has been said today about the importance of our judiciary. I agree with the things that have been said about the place they hold in society. I still think that is worth something. I still think, if I may go back that far, that there was something to the idea in Edward Bellamy's "Looking Backward", who said that those who had to do the dirtiest and the meanest jobs should get paid more than those who had the privilege of doing the delightful and the enjoyable jobs. That is why I say to the hon. member from Nepean-Carleton we are on different wavelengths and, although we live on the same street, we are on opposite sides of the street. I think this is important. While I do not want to spin out this debate, I do feel I should state again that I am opposed to the way we approach these things. I think the suggestion that we will do the other afterward is not enough because it never happens. I am more concerned for the others, and, with all of the respect I have for the judiciary, I am opposed to this bill. I shall be voting no.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This being third reading, is there unanimous consent for the Minister of Justice to be recognized at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. members for giving me the opportunity to speak. I want to congratulate the House leader of the opposition for the remark he made which set the right tone for the debate. There were remarks made by some members which were not accurate. I do not want to make a long speech, but as the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) has said, we have tried to broaden the base for consultation. I would like to refer the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) to an article which appeared in the Vancouver Sun last week in which that subject was dealt with. A reporter from that paper interviewed Mr. Paul MacInnis who was appointed by Senator Flynn to define qualities of judges. I was pleased to keep him on my staff even though he was selected by my predecessor.

As the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton said, belonging to a political party should be neither an advantage nor a disadvantage. I just want to mention that the previous administration appointed Mr. Justice Jerome who was a previous speaker of this House and of a different political affiliation. I appointed Mr. Martineau, a former member for Broadview.

Last week I was very pleased to name a prominent lawyer, Mr. Lorne Clark, from Truro, Nova Scotia, who is not known to be a partisan of my party. He was a close friend of the former leader of the Conservative Party, Mr. Stanfield. I accepted the recommendation of the attorney general in Toronto to appoint a most capable lawyer, Madam Justice Weilder. She was a public servant in the Ontario administration. In Saskatchewan, which has a New Democratic administration, I was pleased to name Mr. Justice Grotsky who worked for the attorney general's department in that province.

One of the first appointments, I had the pleasure to make in the province of Quebec was that of Justice René Hurtubise to the Superior Court of Quebec. He was the president of the Human Rights Society in Quebec and is not known to be political at all. Mr. Justice Laroche in Rouyn-Noranda has been well known for being more blue than red. I did name others and it so happened that they had supported my party, but I hope that is not a deterrent to becoming a judge. As the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton said, we have consultations. I am consulting as much as I can with the attorneys general of the different provinces. I gave them the list of people I am considering. They made their comments. In the final analysis, it was my responsibility and judgment that prevailed. I was glad to hear the attorney general of British Columbia say last week that he was happy with the system I followed. I do not want to boast about what I am doing. I was glad the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton made an intervention. It was a good intervention, illustrating that we are all concerned about ensuring that we have an excellent judiciary in Canada.

TRANSPORT

CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi) moved:

That the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Transport, presented to the House on Tuesday, January 27, 1981, be concurred in.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the transport committee has tabled its fourth report and the chairman, the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne), is now asking for concurrence.

I must commend the committee for doing an excellent job and I wish I had more time to elaborate on that but unfortunately I don't.

Among other subjects the committee studied the activities of the CN and two full days were devoted to questioning the president of this Crown corporation, Mr. Robert Bandeen. Most of the questions had to do with the decision of CN Express to close about half of its 70 offices located here and there throughout the country and, particularly, to close 10—we will see in a moment that this has been reduced to 8—out of a total of 15 in the maritime provinces.

Unhappy about that decision, the committee has recommended, and I quote:

That the government consider the advisability of requiring Canadian National Railways to continue the CN Express Service at the minimum of the 1979 level.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I reviewed the whole question with Mr. Bandeen and his officials. We examined the suggestion made in the recommendation and, as you are probably aware, Mr. Speaker, adjustments were made to the previous decisions, particularly as regards Charlottetown and Sydney.

That is what I now want to go over rapidly in seven or eight minutes in the hope that the House will agree that at least the spirit of the recommendation of the transport committee has been respected.

[English]

Let us look at the facts. First, why the reduction of terminals at CN Express? Notwithstanding CN's numerous efforts over the years at reorganizing, controlling costs and introducing new services, such as Rapidex, volume declined from 24 million shipments in the 1950s to seven million in 1980, a period of 30 years. Second, CN's share of this market decreased to 5 per cent of less than truckload shipments and 2 per cent of small parcels. That is not the massive service that some people talk about when referring to CN Express. Third, financial losses have grown accordingly; $53 million in 1980 and a total of $205 million over the last five years.

What were the options for CN Express? The first was to continue unchanged with the decreasing market share and increasing losses. That would have affected the viability of other operations of CN. However, with the prevailing philosophy with regard to commercial Crown corporations, CN might or would have been expected to turn to the government and ask for a compensating subsidy, as has done with CN Marine.

Having such a subsidy might have been justified in the "national" interest, in the interest of all of us as users of these services. I am not opposed philosophically to subsidies. There are instances when they can be justified.

CN did not think so in this case, and I agreed with them. I ask why? Simply because many of these services that CN is rendering are now performed by other carriers in a commercially viable fashion at reasonable rates. That is the basis of the decision I made.

In recent years we have had almost a cultural change in this sector of transportation. Because of the revolutionary development of highways and of the trucking industry, CN has suffered from fierce competition. In most of Canada, aggressive private trucking firms have taken over the market from CN Express to a substantial extent, and hence the decline to 5 per cent and 2 per cent referred to already.

There are, for example, ten such trucking firms in Amherst, 28 in Sydney and they specialize in certain types of operations. They do a good job. There is no hope that CN Express will ever come back to its past predominant position.

The other option, the one CN took, was to redefine its role in the express business; leave to private truckers what they can do better, that is handle small parcels, concentrate on what CN Express does best, the so-called less than truckload type of shipment, integrate CN operations with local trucking firms to ensure adequacy of service, and cut down the number of outlets or terminals. That is what I as Minister of Transport accepted.

My acceptance was not unconditional. It depended on three conditions being realized. The first was the protection to be given to employees. That has been done to a substantial extent. Acceptable terms have been negotiated with the union and an agreement was signed last November.

As we know, the workers have three choices: retraining, relocation and retirement. Between 80 per cent and 90 per cent of the affected employees will enjoy these options. Most of the others are eligible for severance pay. In the present situation, there are about 5,000 employees of CN Express. About 1,000 will be affected by the policy of redefinition. The numbers change slightly every day as employees avail themselves of the choices offered. At this time 400 have made their intentions known. About 200, half the number, have found jobs elsewhere in CN, 100 have opted for early retirement and 100 have resigned, having found jobs elsewhere. In many cases they will benefit from the severance pay I referred to. Those who joined CN Express recently are not entitled to the same advantages as those who have been employed there five, 10, 15 or 25 years.

The second condition was that the communities would continue to receive express service. This is being done. As we see in their very interesting ads in the newspapers, CN Express takes the responsibility for a system. CN Express takes this responsibility by interlining and contracting with local truck companies. It does so by staying in a certain community when no one else can ensure service, for example in Churchill, Manitoba. In recent advertisements CN has stated: "CN will still be serving all its existing points." But it will be doing so in a way which makes more sense in today's market. CN takes the responsibility for providing service. It then signs contracts with trucking companies to ensure that that responsibility is carried out.

Following the review recommended by the committee two special cases were identified. I referred to them in the House on February 4. The first one is Charlottetown, where we decided to keep the terminal open because closing it would have left the province without any direct CN Express presence. The second exception was the Sydney office which was kept open simply because of the exceptionally poor employment situation in that area at this time. The promise CN Express has made—and for which I presume I am the guarantor—is to keep those two offices open until mid-1983 when the situation will be reviewed again. Instead of ten, only—and I know "only" is not the right expression—eight offices in the Atlantic provinces are closing.

The third condition which I imposed was that the rate structure which would result from the redefinition would be reasonable. Of course, in the future there will be increases, but already a first round of changes have taken place. By way of comment I can only refer to the point that the general picture will not be affected with respect to the express system as a whole. I can only comment on the analysis made by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation commission, a group charged with the protection of the interests of shippers, in which comparisons of 530 rates established that as a consequence of the new program 50 per cent of the rates stayed the same, 30 per cent increased and 20 per cent decreased. If I had more time, I would quote from this analysis at length because it includes some very important aspects.

So there it is. I have almost exhausted my ten minutes. I have tried to explain the circumstances as best I could in such a short period of time, especially as a former academic. I certainly understand the reservations of the committee, and I understand the importance of the recommendations it made to me. I hope I have come out of this in an honourable fashion. I hope also that the public at large and particularly the employees of CN Express will find that they are duly protected either as users of the services or as employees of CN Express. I hope my colleagues in the House will acknowledge that I have paid attention to the recommendations of the committee.

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the minister was here in the House to put forward the position of the government.

This debate is taking place in this House because of a motion put by my colleague, the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), at the committee level. It is because of his concern about cutbacks in CN Express service that we have the opportunity to debate this today.

This is a very important matter. There is a fundamental policy question here. To listen to the minister, one might think that these cutbacks in express service are rational and a move in the right direction. The problem is that the cutbacks result from a fundamentally flawed policy of the government. I refer to a letter which a former minister of transport, Otto Lang, wrote on January 13, 1977, which laid out the government's attitude and policy with respect to the CNR. It quite simply says that the CNR is a commercial enterprise and must be run as a commercial enterprise, and that the real criteria for the operation of this service must be a balanced book and a profit margin. I fundamentally reject that approach. It is the belief of members of my party that the government has a responsibility for transportation services across the country. One of the reasons we have a public corporation such as the CNR is to serve the public and not simply to make a profit.

We should remember that the CNR was first formed from a collection of private companies which at that time were bankrupt. The public brought them together and made a viable enterprise of them in order to serve the people. Now that this corporation is operating efficiently and effectively, the government wants to separate the profit-making parts of it from those parts which require revenues and subsidies, so the government can either turn over the profit-making parts to the private sector or simply justify cutbacks in services. Behind this cutback in service, behind this loss of jobs and behind this loss of services to communities is a fundamentally flawed government policy. First and foremost the policy should emphasize service to the community and to the country rather than treating the CNR simply as a profit-making venture.

As he was speaking, the minister spoke about the losses faced by the CNR. We believe those losses are exaggerated and that the amount of money which is said to be lost by CN Express is far out of proportion. For example, the figure I have here indicates that the loss for 1980 was $51 million. I understand this includes $24.4 million charged to CN Express by other CN departments. It is my understanding that if there were no CN Express, CN would not save this full amount of $24 million. The amount charged to CN Express by the other departments is exaggerated because it includes overhead and other items which would have to be in place in any event.

Not only is the amount of money which supposedly would be saved, if we did not have this express service, exaggerated, but we suspect as well that prices can be raised deliberately and service levels withdrawn in order to discourage customers. For example, let us look at past experience in Saskatchewan. Before the removal of service, rates from Regina to Fort Qu'Appelle went up by some 94 per cent; rates from Regina to Kamsack went up by some 87 per cent; and rates from Regina to Prince Albert went up by some 52 per cent. Before these massive increases CN Express was charging the same as other companies. With these massive increases CN has overcharged and thereby reduced its own share of the market. CN did not take advantage of the full revenue potential for its service that existed. We feel the losses stated by CN for CN Express are exaggerated and out of line.

Another aspect of this matter which concerns us greatly is that of lay-offs. The minister referred to that. He is right when he says he has done something in this respect, and he deserves credit. He is keeping open the two terminals at Sydney and Charlottetown. He has done something to alleviate the situation regarding loss of jobs, but there still is a large employment loss. My understanding is that another 1,100 jobs will be lost. One quarter of those jobs will be lost in Atlantic Canada. That is a considerable loss of employment, particularly at a time when the economy is not creating new jobs rapidly, and that is to understate the matter. These lost jobs will hurt the communities where these jobs have existed until now. They will hurt the heads of households who have to support their families, pay for heating, food, children's clothing and other essentials. There is a human side to this which must not be overlooked.

In light of the fact that this cutback is not justified, it is hard to understand why the government is proceeding in this direction, other than that it chose to treat the CNR as if it were a private profit-making corporation rather than the public utility which it really is.

Another important aspect of this cutback in the CN Express service is that the railways made commitments with regard to the provision of their services. In other words, when they moved from a rail service to a trucking service they made certain commitments about maintaining service. I heard the minister echoing this once again when he spoke just now. He is saying that when we move from the CN Express trucking service to the private sector trucking service, somehow there will be no loss of service. I take these assurances with a grain of salt, particularly in light of the previous commitments by the railways. For example, on December 7, 1971, CP Rail undertook the following:

CP Rail undertakes through the CSC to provide a service equal or superior to the service presently being provided under the station agent system.

The commitment of CNR was as follows:

Right from the day a servocentre goes on stream the service provided to customers from it will be at least equal to that which is available through conventional facilities, and in many cases immediately superior to that now available.

These are commitments made by railways that their service would remain at the same level, and yet now we hear about further cutbacks. When they moved from rail to road, they assured the people that the service would stay at the same level. Now they are pulling back on express services and we are being assured that these will be provided by the private sector. It is difficult to take those assurances seriously.

Finally, I want to come back to the fact that the most important point about this cutback in the CNR Express service is that the government is following a fundamentally misguided policy of treating CNR as if it were a private commercial venture when, in fact, it is a public utility. These cutbacks in express services provided by a public utility are unjustified. They remind us of cutbacks in passenger services and in branch lines.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak briefly on the matter before the House simply to re-emphasize the comments I made when this matter came before the committee. We in Nova Scotia look upon the day of November 5, 1980, when all of us as representatives of that area received the notice from the Canadian Transport Commission, as black Wednesday because it was truly a shocker to all of us, especially to me as Member for Parliament for South Shore. We were informed at that time that the agency positions located at Rockingham, Windsor Junction, Upper Musquodoboit, Chester, Mahone Bay, Lunenburg, Liverpool, Lockeport, Shelburne, Barrington Passage and Yarmouth were to be closed. We were told as well that the station buildings located at Upper Musquodoboit, Chester, Mahone Bay, Lunenburg, Liverpool, Lockeport, Shelburne and Barrington Passage will be put up for sale. I would remind the minister that of that list which I just placed on the record, seven out of the eight places are in my constituency, and of the previous list, seven out of 11 are in my riding. The minister states that this was due to a decline in business. He states that the business was picked up by private companies and that there was nothing he could do about it.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, this points out the obvious fact that somewhere along the line in CN we have faulty management. The management of those operations in that area have to be at fault because in recent years there has been a gradual improvement in economic conditions along the south shore of Nova Scotia. We have had, for example, in Chester, one of the areas where operations have been curtailed and closed down, a gradual improvement of business in the Hawboldt Industries Ltd., a gradual improvement in shipbuilding, and specifically in yacht building for American interests. If the CN express had been on their toes, surely they could have received some of that business.

The same situation applies to Mahone Bay where industrial shipping is building fibreglass pipe which is shipped all over the nation and to the United States. They must bring in much of the material required. Here again, when the original service was established in the area, there was less business available than there is today. In my own home town of Lunenburg, where we have the largest fish processing plant in North America, a plant which only recently added $3 million or more to its operations by expanding its fish processing facility, obviously new business opportunities exist.

Twelve miles farther on into the town of Bridgewater, you will find the Michelin Tire Company which located there some eight or ten years ago. It is a town which has grown from about 4,000 people to over 8,000 people, double the population. Yet here we find a closing down of CN Express. If we go on to Queens County, the towns of Liverpool as well as Brooklyn, we will find located Bowaters Mersey Paper Company Limited, a very progressive company which has been expanding its operations in recent years, adding to its payroll and adding to the volume of business it conducts. Here again you find the sale of the station and a cut down in CN Express.

You could go the whole length of the south shore and see a gradual improvement, such as the location of McCloud Fisheries at Port Houton, and a new company, Polar Bear Fisheries, at Port Hebert, along with the expansion of the marine ship repair industry in Shelburne.

Some day I hope the minister will find time to come to Nova Scotia. Although he is of one political persuasion and I of another, I would gladly make myself available, if he could find the time. I would take him, not on a Cook's tour, but on a Crouse tour of the south shore which, I think, he would find informative and helpful to understanding what is happening there and what he is doing to that area. It is all very well for him to say that some employees have taken early retirement and that CN has been a good employer of these people. No one questions that, Mr. Speaker, but what we are questioning are the actions being taken by this government. The closures to which the minister is agreeing in effect are a betrayal of the terms under which Nova Scotia entered Confederation. The only argument the minister has been able to present to the House this afternoon is that this action must be taken because CN is losing a few dollars in that area. This same government can find millions of dollars to bail out automobile companies, it can find millions of dollars for firms which really have no binding commitment on the government, as has CN and the people in our area, and they expect the government to fulfil its obligations and commitment under the terms of Confederation. At the rate we are going, it seems to me that CN is entirely forgetting Nova Scotia.

Let us consider for a minute what is happening down there. In Halifax there is the pending sale of the Hotel Nova Scotian. There is the closing of express terminals in Amherst, Port Hawkesbury, Yarmouth and Bridgewater. There is a reduction by 50 per cent of the staff of the express terminal in Sydney, a move which is nothing but a minor reprieve from the previous planned closure of that outlet. There are drastic reductions in express service in Pictou County where it appears more than 30 jobs will be lost.

The current cutbacks are not the beginning of this regressive railway tale. During recent years railway lines have been abandoned and stations have been closed. This is causing tremendous concern throughout the entire length and breadth of our province, not just along the south shore. For example, recent warnings have come to my ears from the towns of Oxford and Falmouth. Perhaps I should call them the most recent victims of the policy being approved and accepted by the present minister. This applies to the management of the greenhouses located in Oxford and in the Annapolis Valley near Falmouth, both of which have used CN Express to ship their products to out-of-province markets. With the curtailment of CN Express, it would appear that there is no alternative method for these people to get their products to markets in Quebec, and I believe they ship as far away as Montreal. So, these people join the large number of fresh fish plant operators in my constituency who are concerned about the manner in which they will get their fresh fish to upper Canadian markets. They have used CN Express in the past.

Mr. Pepin: Give me cases.

Mr. Crouse: I repeat my offer to the minister to come down to my constituency and meet these people. If he does not have at his fingertips the cases to which I referred, that is a frightening admission that there is a lack of communication between the massive bureaucracy in his department and the minister at the top of that department. It really frightens me, especially when he says, "Give me cases."

I am also concerned when the minister says that the jobs are moving, that they are not being lost. He told us his department would look after the people who are being laid off, but in no way will that policy follow through to the vast number of citizens whose employment is being affected by this cut-off. In closing, I must say that if this massive, regressive, backward step being taken by CN is not stopped soon, then Canadian National Railways may just as well forget the maritime region altogether.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, after consultations with the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, we have agreed to deal with all stages of Bill C-60 this afternoon, with the hope that one representative from each party will not use more than 15 to 20 minutes and that private members' hour will start around 4.15 or 4.20 o'clock and will last 60 minutes.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is agreeable. In our desire to permit the government to get its program through, we are prepared to agree and to preserve private members' hour. I appreciate the intervention of the government House leader; that is the agreement.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, yes, that is the agreement. We are prepared to confirm it. I have the following qualification to make. The hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake is the member who has the resolution this afternoon. He will not be offended if we have something less than the full hour. In other words, when we start private members' hour, we might then renegotiate the matter. We do not need to stay here until six o'clock; we might get out at 5.15 or something like that.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved that Bill C-60, to amend the National Energy Board Act, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first I should like to thank the House for its co-operation in accepting the proposal to consider this bill in such an expeditious manner. I will try not to abuse the indulgence of the House, but I have a few comments concerning the nature of the bill. It has great significance, and it would be only fair to Canadians if I took this opportunity to put a summary on the record concerning the nature of this bill so that everyone will know exactly what it tries to do.

Therefore, it gives me great pleasure to move second reading of Bill C-60, to amend the National Energy Board Act, which received first reading by the House on February 10, 1981. The purpose of this bill is to modernize the statutory procedures used by pipeline companies under federal jurisdiction to acquire lands for their pipelines.

The provisions of the bill will greatly expand the recognition of the rights of the affected land owners, not only in so far as the amount of compensation they receive is concerned, but also by providing them the right at a public hearing to inquire into the appropriateness of the route selected by the company. It is my belief that the bill I am presenting substantially incorporates all the major recommendations of the Law Reform Commission of Canada expressed in its 1975 working paper on the subject of the various expropriation powers conferred under federal statutes.

Before going any further, I wish to express my indebtedness to the Senate of Canada and to my colleague, the Hon. Senator Olson, for their invaluable work in the preparation of this bill.

● (1600)

Currently, the acquisition of land by pipeline companies is governed by the provisions of the Railway Act. This statute, which has not been significantly amended since 1919, has served its purpose, but no longer reflects the views of our society as to the balance that should be drawn between the public interest and the rights of the owners of private property. The Law Reform Commission has criticized the existing procedure, primarily on the ground that no opportunity is given to land owners to question the detailed route chosen by the pipeline company. It has also been criticized on the basis of a lack of codification of the types of damage which should be compensated for, a feature which is common to modern expropriation statutes, including the Expropriation Act of Canada. The present bill addresses those concerns to a degree which, I suggest, makes it one of the most fair and even-handed expropriation statutes in Canada.

I would now like to briefly describe the features of the bill. They can be divided into three main areas: first, the approval of the detailed route of the pipeline; second, the determination of the compensation payable to land owners; and third, the provision governing acquisition by the pipeline company of the right to proceed with construction where agreement has not been reached with the land owner.

Hon. members should note that all of the procedures contained in the bill will be available, not only to land owners whose property will actually be taken for the pipeline, but also to those owners of neighbouring land who will be adversely affected by the proximity of the pipeline. These owners will be notified of the intention of the company to apply to the National Energy Board for approval of its detailed route, and they will be entitled to file objections with the board. If an objection is received regarding any part of the route, the board is required to hold a hearing in that locality, at which time the land owners will have a right to be heard. The board can either alter the route of the pipeline or it can minimize the damage caused by imposing terms and conditions on the approval which will regulate, among other things, the method and timing of acquiring the land and of constructing the pipeline.

To ensure that land owners receive fair compensation, the bill includes a list of types of damage which must be compensated for. Owners whose land will be taken will be given option as to whether they prefer to receive periodic payments, in the nature of a land rental, with the right to have the amount of these payments reviewed at five-year intervals. This option will eliminate the need which now exists to anticipate, in advance, all types of damage which may be caused to an owner by the construction of a pipeline.

As further protection, the bill ensures that every land owner will be advised of his rights under the statute before he enters into any binding contract with the company. As soon as the company identifies the land that it may need for its pipeline, it will be required to serve a notice on every owner advising not only the amount of compensation the company is offering but also explaining, in detail, the various procedures available under the act for his protection, including the right to dispute the route selected.

The procedure for determining disputes as to the amount of compensation will now be removed from the courts. Once the detailed route of the pipeline has been approved and the company is unable to reach agreement with the land owner, either party may apply to me to appoint a negotiator to assist in the bargaining. If the negotiation is unsuccessful, either party may apply to me to have the matter submitted to an arbitration committee for binding determination. Except in a case where the compensation demands of the land owner are unreasonable, the pipeline company will pay the costs of all of these proceedings, including the hearing before the National Energy Board for approval of the detailed route.

Finally, where the company is unable to conclude an agreement with the land owner, it may nevertheless acquire access to his land for construction purposes by applying to the National Energy Board. At least 30 days before this application, the company must advise the land owner of its intention to apply, and the land owner will be entitled to send written objections to the Board. In granting the company access to the land the Board can impose terms and conditions to minimize the damage caused.

Wherever a company receives such a right of entry the land owner becomes entitled to an advance payment on the compensation which will be payable to him. Any disagreement with respect to the amount or the payment of that advance can be submitted for arbitration.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, once enacted, this bill will apply to all oil and gas pipelines under federal jurisdiction whose detailed route has not been approved by the National Energy Board when the Act is implemented. Moreover, the procedure concerning the determination of the compensation will apply to land owners who have not entered into an agreement with a company and who have not yet been expropriated under the present provisions. Thus, the bill will apply to the northern Foothills pipeline and the Quebec-Maritime gas pipeline extension.

[English]

The Foothills Pipe Line company has indicated that if the bill should be passed into law at some point prior to the completion of the Alaska Highway Gas Project, it would be prepared to make adjustments which further reflect the new approach provided for under Bill C-60.

[Translation]

Consequently, quick passage of this bill will enable land owners affected by the construction of the northern pipeline to benefit from these new provisions. Finally, passage of Bill C-60 will certainly be an improvement and an undeniable advantage for land owners in Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia who will have to part with some of their lands for the construction of a gas pipeline that we have committed ourselves to complete as quickly as possible.

[English]

I trust that the House will agree with me that the bill represents a great step forward in the fair treatment of private parties affected by some of the major public interest projects on the horizon.

The implementation of these new procedures can be expected to produce certain effects on the construction of pipeline projects. First, it will produce some delay in the construction of these projects. Primarily, this will result from the requirement that hearings be held in order to approve the detailed route of a pipeline. The bill contains provisions which will ensure that these delays are no longer than is absolutely required. I would suggest that whatever delays are unavoidable constitute a very small price to pay for a significant improvement in the fairness of these procedures.

The bill will also produce some increase in the cost of pipeline projects. In almost all cases the companies will bear the cost of implementing these procedures. It is expected that there will be some increase in the average amount of compensation paid to each land owner. This will result from the measures taken to ensure that land owners are advised of their rights, and also from the provision for compensation for all sorts of damage, including damage suffered by land owners adjacent to the pipeline right-of-way. I know of many people in the prairies, in particular, who will be very interested in this improvement in our legislation.

[Translation]

I believe that we have to expect an increase in the number of arbitration cases to determine compensation in view of the relaxing of the arbitration procedure and the various provisions under which the company building a pipeline will pay the costs considered reasonable of all the proceedings started by an owner who disagrees with the amount of compensation offered.

The statistical data which I have received from the National Energy Board show that in previous cases of pipeline construction by major companies, very few compensation settlements were subjected to arbitration as they represent as little as 0.6 per cent of the owners involved. This figure might point to the generosity of the companies, but it also probably indicates the lack of understanding of owners concerning their rights or a reluctancy on their part to undertake costly appeal procedures about the amount of compensation granted. It seems to me that the provisions we are proposing here will help to restore the balance between the rights of the pipeline companies and those of the land owners, since the costs incurred in obtaining equitable compensation are no less of a burden for the owner than the damages he sustains.

This bill will also result in an increase in the operating cost of the pipeline once it has been built. That increase will stem from the fact that the companies will have to compensate the land owners for damages caused in the maintenance and operation of the pipeline. That aspect of the matter was somewhat overlooked in the old act, in the sense that negotiations were left entirely to the discretion of the companies and the land owners. No procedure was provided for settling claims by arbitration. I think I can say that the principles of justice and fairness demand that this type of damage not be treated any differently from those that are suffered when the pipeline is built.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore move second reading of the bill and thank all parties for their co-operation in passing this important bill in good time, for I feel sure it will benefit a large number of Canadians in the years to come.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention this afternoon to take up too much time of the House or delay the proceedings. We are very anxious and have been for a long time to ensure that this legislation passes. Farmers in western Canada who will be affected by it really want it.

There are two points I would like to bring to the attention of the minister and I assume he will agree with them. They concern the interpretation of the bill, and have been brought to our attention by the Canadian Confederation of Agriculture which represents the Unifarm in the province of Alberta which, in turn, represents the same constituency as I do. While I recognize there are other members involved, I do think that perhaps the constituents I represent will be more affected by this piece of legislation, because the substation where the division takes place is in my constituency and that is a fairly heavily populated part of the country. Further, it is a beef producing area, so there might be complications.

Nevertheless, I would like to bring to the attention of the minister, and I trust I am correct in assuming this on behalf of Unifarm and Canadian Confederation of Agriculture and the farmers in that area, that when we look at Clause 73(1) (a) (iii) we find that "the inspection, maintenance or repair of the pipeline" shall be considered for reimbursement. There is one word that has been left out. When we go back to the previous clause, it says:

National Energy Board Act

73(1) The provisions of this part that provide negotiation and arbitration procedures to determine compensation matters apply in respect of all damage caused by the pipeline of a company or anything carried by the pipeline but do not apply to

(a) claims against a company arising out of activities of the company unless those activities are directly related to

(i) the acquisition of lands for a pipeline,

(ii) the construction of the pipeline, or

(iii) the inspection, maintenance or repair of the pipeline;—

I think the word which has been omitted by oversight is the word "operations", because there could be something happening during operations which could cause problems—for instance, a leak or some other type of problem. I am sure I am correct in the assumption that the word "operations" should be incuded, because if we read Clause 74(1)(d) it says:

(d) indemnification from all liabilities, damages, claims, suits and actions arising out of the operations of the company other than liabilities, damages, claims, suits and actions resulting from negligence or wilful misconduct of the owner of the lands;

"Operations" is included there, so I trust I am correct in the assumption that "operations" should have been included in Clause 73(1)(iii).

The other point I wanted to bring to the attention of the minister was with regard to the statement by the minister wherein he said that their payments will be reviewed every five years. The concern of the farmers and farm organizations relates to Clause 75.19(2) wherein it says:

(2) For the purpose of paragraph (1)(a), "market value" is the amount that would have been paid for the lands if, at the time of their taking, they had been sold in the open market by a willing seller to a willing buyer.

The point is that the farmers do not want to be tied to that point, "market value", "at the time of their taking", because I trust we are correct in assuming that the market value will be considered every five years, as is provided in Clause 74(1)(b) wherein it says:

(b) review of the amount of compensation payable for acquisition of lands every five years where annual or other periodic payments have been selected;

The point we make to the minister is that when the adjustment is made every five years, the value of the land also should be taken into consideration, because as everyone knows, in these times of inflation, land values have been escalating tremendously.

So with those two points included, and if the minister can give his approval today that my assumptions are correct, I am sure that we will satisfy the farmers and the farm organizations which represent them. I recognize that sometimes these issues have to be resolved in court, and the reason I want to bring them to the attention of the House today is so that during arbitration or a court hearing the debate which has taken place today will be taken into consideration; that there is an understanding that this is how this bill will be interpreted.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to stand as my party spokesman for Bill C-60, an act to amend the National Energy Board Act. This bill is like closing the door after the cattle have gotten out. In this party, we are basically satisfied with the content of the legislation, but we are concerned that the government has waited so long to bring it in.

Last July the government forced us to accept the new pre-build of the pipeline which is going to carry natural gas to the United States. It seemed it could spare no time to get on with the job of giving our gas reserves to the Americans. At that time, Senator Olson was fully aware of the problems that could occur through the expropriation procedures. Senator Olson championed the committee through the Senate to try to bring about changes in the expropriation procedures. He introduced expropriation legislation to the Senate in the spring of 1979, after chairing the Senate pipeline committee.

In his often quoted speech introducing the legislation, the senator described the current provisions of the Railway Act as archaic, and wondered out loud about the untenable position of land owners facing expropriation under that act.

I myself am at a loss to understand how this government, knowing full well the implications of what it was doing, could go ahead with construction of the pipeline without first ensuring that the rights of small land owners in remote sections of this nation were protected. What was the urgency, Madam Speaker? Why could it not have said to us then that it needed one or two hours of House business to put through this simple protective measure? We are responsible people on this side of the House. We would have agreed. We would have agreed to take up two hours of our time to put through that important piece of legislation. The reality is that these Liberals were in such a rush to give away our gas they did not have even the slightest second thoughts about trampling on the civil liberties of a few land owners in southeastern British Columbia. What about the Tories? These Tories are really an incredible bunch. Just recently they have run ads in newspapers in my riding telling my constituents that I am against property rights and that they should all support the Conservatives if they want to keep their homes.

Let the record show who was fighting for the property rights of my constituents last fall when the Liberals sent in the riot squad police to take away the small property in my part of the riding. It certainly was not the Tories. I got up in the House and practically begged some of them to take part in the discussions but they were mysteriously quiet. I warned them that if the government got away with this on the B.C. section of the pipeline, it would not be long before it was expropriating land in Alberta. What was the response of the freedom fighters to my right? It was total, absolute silence. It seems they were more concerned with the property rights of Bob Blair and the Foothills Pipe Lines company than with the property rights of a couple of small land owners in British Columbia. Let them put that in their newspaper advertisements.

In any event, the deed was done. The government, which has absolutely no shame, allowed the police to occupy the lands of my constituents and then told them they had absolutely no legal remedies. This was taking place in November, at the same time as the Liberals, in the constitutional committee, were trying to persuade us that they were the champions of civil liberties.

In the House I was forced to direct my questions to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde) since there was no way I could question the real culprit, Senator Olson. With no disrespect intended to the minister, he clearly did not know anything about the situation and consistently provided me with contradictory, ill-informed answers. As for Senator Olson, he generally refused to answer my phone calls, preferring to have me deal with his assistants. I will never forget being told by one of the senator's assistants that there was no problem in my riding because even though the police had occupied the constituents' property, none of the local people had responded by shooting back! He was clearly proud that the government had managed to avoid getting itself into a military situation with my constituents.

By now the situation in Yahk has calmed down somewhat. The people are relieved that they are finally getting this bill, but are very frustrated and hurt since it is difficult for them to bargain effectively when their land has already been occupied and the pipeline is already in place.

There is, however, one specific concern we still have and I should like to relate it quickly. I believe there should be a provision in the bill which sets down very clearly the width of the right-of-way. It should be defined very clearly in the bill and not fought out through negotiation, mediation or arbitration. But there is nothing in the bill on this matter, and I am sorry about that.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to urge the House to give speedy passage to this bill. My only regret is that the government did not find the time to do this last July. That would have meant a great deal of needless suffering would not have taken place in Kootenay East-Revelstoke.

Finally, I should like to congratulate the four Yahk residents who fought the bulk of this battle. Against the forces of armed riot police, heartless bureaucrats and fancy corporate lawyers, these four men fought until they got what they deserved, Bill C-60. We should take off our hats to these residents of Yahk, British Columbia.

Before I close my remarks, on behalf of these four residents of Yahk, British Columbia, I should like to present the minister with a shirt from Yahk, British Columbia, so that he will longer remember the residents of Yahk.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take the time of the House to reply to some of the remarks of the last speaker because I think they are too contemptible. I should like to take this opportunity to ask the minister a couple of questions. When he swung from English into French I was not sure if I understood one aspect of the bill.

The minister said this bill would apply to routes that had not yet been approved. With the number of rights-of-way involved, the amount of negotiation that has been going on in the country, as well as the advance work on the drawing boards of the engineers which has been going on for some years now, I am a little confused. I wonder if I lost something in the interpretation from the French.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank hon. members for their co-operation. I have noted the specific points that have been raised. With regard to the definition and whether or not this covers operations, I think it is always dangerous for a minister to give a legal interpretation while on his feet. I should like an opportunity to consider this in more detail and then I will be very happy to provide the hon. member with his answer. In order to have it on the record, I will make sure that when the bill is considered in the Senate, the spokesman for the government will clarify the points raised by my colleagues. In that way there will be no misunderstanding and no mistake about the correct interpretation given to the bill.

With reference to the last point raised, I think if the hon. member reads the text I put on the record he will find that it will apply to all pipelines proceeded with in the future for which land has not been expropriated. Even in the case of the prebuild we have a commitment from Foothills that it would be ready to apply some of the provisions of this bill to what has already been built. Even if engineers are working on this type of thing, if the expropriation has not taken place as yet under the old Railway Act, then the new bill will apply.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Earlier the House was willing for the private members' hour to last for 60 minutes from the time it started, but I did indicate we might settle for a little less time than that.

On hehalf of my colleagues, especially the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish), may I say that since it is now 4.30 p.m. we will be willing to have private members' hour end at 5.10 p.m.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, that is agreeable to the government as well.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 4.30 the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motion, public bills, private bills.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT ALLOWING MORTGAGE REDUCTION THROUGH USE OF RRSP

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act to provide that a taxpayer may, as an acceptable investment under the provisions relating to Registered Retirement Savings Plans, reduce the mortgage on the taxpayer's principal residence by paying a lump sum from a self-administered Registered Retirement Savings Plan.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I recognize that only a small percentage of Canadians take advantage of Registered Retirement Savings Plans, but if the government is going to continue with RRSPs, I would like the government to consider the resolution about which I will speak today. I ask hon. members not to talk it out but instead to allow the resolution to go through so that the government can consider the advisability of allowing homeowners to make a large payment annually toward their mortgages and have the payment credited toward a self-administered retirement savings plan.

I will not talk at length; I think the resolution is self-explanatory. However, I want to mention the main advantages of the resolution in the event the government is willing to accept it.

First, there is immediate tax relief in the taxation year to families who are fortunate enough to own their own homes, just as has applied to RRSPs in the past. Second, people who have homes with mortgages held by banks or credit unions would own their homes and have clear title to those homes in a much shorter period of time. For example, if people took full advantage of such a program, they would be able to own their homes outright within about ten years as opposed to the usual 25-year amortization period. The third benefit applicable to this resolution, if it were to go through, is that people would be paying substantially less interest to mortgage companies, which in turn would allow a fourth benefit. This fourth benefit would allow people a larger discretionary income much sooner in their lives than otherwise. It would give them an increased discretionary income and, instead of paying toward a home, which is usually the largest investment the average Canadian makes, that money could be invested in the Canadian economy. That would be a step forward in helping Canadians gain more solid control of their own economy because home owners would be able to invest in Canada's economy after their largest single investment of a home is paid off.

I ask members not to talk out this resolution. I hope the government will seriously consider including individual's own mortgages as part of the self-administered retirement savings plans.

Mr. John Evans (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): On the surface, this proposal might appear both uncomplicated and quite attractive. As the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish) has indicated, it would allow a taxpayer to reduce the mortgage on his or her home by means of a lump sum payment out of self-administered registered retirement savings plan. In a period of high interest rates, such as we are experiencing now, this has a particular plausible and appealing look to it.

If we examine the idea more closely, however, it becomes apparent that the result would be to confer a very considerable financial benefit on a particular group of taxpayers, and, as I will show at the end of my comments, it would provide for a very substantial potential loophole in the tax system. In fact, to use the registered retirement savings plan in a fashion described by the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake would tend to override the basic rationale of the RRSP system.

The purpose of a registered retirement savings plan system is to provide a tax deferral to allow people to save money to provide for their retirement years. Within quite generous ceilings, taxpayers can avoid current income taxation on these savings, in effect the RRSP permits a deferral of taxation until the time the savings are withdrawn from that plan at the time of retirement or at some earlier date. If this occurs during the taxpayer's retirement years, it is likely that his or her tax rate is lower than it was during the working years, and this benefit is added to the considerable advantage of the long-term tax deferral conferred by the RRSP.

This proposal would change the tax deferral notion of the registered retirement savings plan to a tax exemption. I will explain that briefly. For example, if an individual were to have a self-administered registered retirement savings plan of some considerable sum, he would be allowed, under this particular proposal, to purchase a house, put a mortgage on it and then withdraw the funds from the registered retirement savings plan, pay off the house and then subsequently sell it. Since there is no capital gains tax on a principal residence he would be able to avoid tax completely by that particular method. As a result, it would provide a rather substantial tax loophole, primarily to those people who have houses and who have during their life time made enough income to be able to accumulate a substantial registered retirement savings plan.

Mr. Anguish: Try putting safeguards in to prevent that.

Mr. Evans: These are not the people about whom the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake is really concerned. He would be opening up a tax loophole, and, as a member of the New Democratic Party, he would soon be wishing he could find some way to close it.

Registered retirement savings plans are of particular usefulness to self-employed Canadians who do not have the benefit of an employer sponsored pension plan. They are also valuable to others who want to supplement an employer pension plan.

The financial attractiveness of RRSPs is obvious to anyone who has noticed the recent high-powered advertising campaigns of financial firms intended to attract RRSP investments before the March 2 deadline for 1980 contributions. Their value is also obvious in looking at recent Department of Finance studies of the value of federal tax expenditures. Tax expenditures are the various special incentives and benefits which our tax system provides. It is estimated that by 1980, the cumulative total, the total of all tax expenditures or savings which have been conferred through these plans since their inception to the current date in 1980, would be $22 billion in tax deferrals and reductions provided through the deductibility of payments into RRSPs and into registered pension plans. Most of this is accounted for by registered pension plans which would not be affected by the proposal put forward by the hon. member this afternoon, because these registered retirement savings plans are more widespread and have been in place for a longer period of time.

But it is estimated that $4.6 billion of the $22 billion total is attributable to tax deferrals under registered retirement savings plans. With such a valuable tax concession provided by RRSPs, it is only good sense to make sure that this benefit is not abused. One of the most essential safeguards is to ensure that these tax exempt or tax deferred savings do remain in the form of investments rather than being used for current consumption prior to retirement.

For example, consider what would happen under existing rules if a lump sum payment were made from a self-administered RRSP to reduce the taxpayer's home mortgage. If the RRSP did not acquire an interest in the mortgage or the property, the RRSP would be deregistered and the full amount of funds in the plan would be included in the taxpayer's income at that time. If the RRSP did, by some means, acquire an interest in the mortgage or property, the value of that interest would be included in the taxpayer's income at that time. Under both conditions with the existing rules, that would place the entire amount removed from the RRSP into current income. It would be fully taxable at that time at the marginal tax rate of the individual concerned.

These are strict rules, but they reflect the importance of protecting the treasury against abuse of the valuable tax advantage conferred by RRSPs.

Consider what the proposal in this motion would do. It would permit a taxpayer, in effect, to pay for part of the cost of his home and to deduct the amount from his income subject to tax. He could eventually pay off his mortgage and use tax exempt earnings to do it. I suggest this would be giving him a really inordinate advantage, and at the expense of the rest of Canadian taxpayers.

This motion would therefore confer a very preferred tax advantage on a particular group of taxpayers—those having a home with a mortgage on it, and running a self-administered registered retirement savings plan.

We should remind ourselves that not every Canadian taxpayer has a large enough income that he has a surplus available for investment in an RRSP. Among those who do invest in RRSPs, not everyone has the financial ability—or can afford the expert advice—to administer his own RRSP. We have to remember that this proposal applies only to self-administered RRSPs and not those administered by a trust company or some other financial institution. Certainly not every Canadian owns his own home or indeed wishes to.

There does exist one tax measure by which a person can use tax exempt savings to purchase a home. This is the registered home ownership savings plan. It is designed to assist the home buying plans of people who do not now own their home and never have in the past. There is an annual limit of $1,000 in the amount of tax exempt savings that can be put into a RHOSP. The proposal before us today has no such limitation.

If we are asked to provide this proposed tax advantage for home owners we should look at the existing major tax advantages for home owners. Let me refer again to the finance department study of the value of tax expenditure provisions in the present tax laws. Tax deductibility of payments into registered home ownership savings plans was worth an estimated $95 million last year. When capital gains taxation was introduced with tax reform, an exception was made for capital gains on a taxpayer's principal residence. This would lead to the anomaly or tax loophole that I mentioned earlier in my remarks.

I do not dispute this decision, but we should be aware of the value of the exemption from tax on this sort of capital gain: the tax expenditure study estimates it at $3.5 billion for 1980 alone. The same study finds that the non-taxation of the imputed income from the equity of home owners in their own residences was worth an estimated $5 billion last year. It can be argued that this amounts to non-taxation of a hypothetical value.

It is a fact, however, that people who invest in their own home do so in the general recognition that there is a very real benefit in the fact that this particular investment is not subject to taxation. They know that, in contrast, they would have to pay for renting their home with after tax dollars. So it is beyond dispute that our existing tax system provides very strong support toward home ownership, much stronger support than is often realized.

It may be argued that people who owe on mortgages are having a difficult time during this period of high interest rates. But that is a problem which faces many others besides homeowners. Among home owners, it is a problem mainly for those who have to renew their mortgages at increased interest rates that currently prevail. I do not think we should seek a solution to the problem of high interest rates in a measure which benefits only home owners, including home owners who do not have to renew their mortgages under current conditions, but which does nothing for other Canadians in financial difficulties as the result of these interest rates.

The proposal in this motion would discriminate on another count as well. An RRSP is primarily intended to provide retirement income for those who are not covered by industrial pension plans or inadequately covered by such plans. Members of these other pension plans cannot use their plans to pay off their home mortgages, and it would be quite unfair to these people if we allowed RRSPs to be used to reduce mortgage debt and further restricted it to RRSPs that have to be self-administered.

The official opposition, when they formed the government attempted to legislate a tax credit plan to offset mortgage and property tax payments. This party opposed that measure as a highly discriminatory plan, and an economically unwise one as well. The December 1979 budget of the former minister of finance estimated its cost would have been over $1.2 billion for the coming 1981-82 fiscal year, rising to more than $2.8 billion in 1983-84.

The New Democratic Party at that time opposed the mortgage and property tax credit plan of the former Conservative government, primarily because of its discriminatory nature. I suggest to the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake that his proposal embodies the same kind of discrimination.

Finally, I have not attempted to estimate its cost in forgone revenues to the federal treasury, but I have no doubt it would be substantial. At a time when we are trying to work toward a steady reduction of the federal deficit, the proposal today can only be considered to be a serious mistake.

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to see how one can support this motion, either on grounds of equity or economics. On the face of it, the proposal has a nice ring to it—we let home owners retire their mortgages by using their RRSP savings. But if we look closely at how it is done, the approach discriminates, favouring only one segment of the population that would be in a position to take advantage of it. Besides that, we would be creating another new tax expenditure, one which could add substantially to the budgetary deficit without really accomplishing any economic purpose.

● (1650)

There is a certain atmosphere of déjà vu in this discussion. The hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish) is proposing a tax advantage to home owners, though not as generous as the tax credit for mortgage interest and property taxes presented in 1979 by the former Conservative government. But it still discriminates, through its total exclusion of taxpayers who rent their homes. I am reminded of the declaration by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) in that 1979 debate:

> We are not prepared to support a policy which gives to one group at the expense of another.

That is recorded in Hansard at page 1504 of November 20, 1979. Although today's proposal would not give quite as open-handedly, the principle is the same. I do not think my hon. colleague had the honour of being in this House at that time three weeks before "D-night", or defeat night, but this gave him a chance to be elected on February 18 and to express his views. I congratulate him on that.

On the face of it, it might appear that permitting a taxpayer to make lump sum payments against his mortgage from a self-administered RRSP is simply allowing him to use his own savings in the way he wants. However, those savings have accumulated in the RRSP exempt from taxation when they were earned, and the investment income of the RRSP was equally tax exempt.

Huge amounts of income tax revenue which would otherwise have been paid to the treasury have in many cases been deferred for many years, until the taxpayer retires. This has been done to assist taxpayers to save for their retirement years. There would be no justification for the government's forgoing income tax on earnings which are then spent on current consumption, yet that is what is proposed by this motion.

The motion discriminates. As I have noted, in that it excludes Canadians who rent their homes. If a person owned his home clear of any mortgage, he could not benefit from this proposal. To take advantage of the motion he must first of all be able to save enough to buy a home, mortgage it and then he must be able to save enough additional money to make lump sum reductions in the capital amount owing on his mortgage. Unfortunately, not all Canadians are in that position. Finally, he must have the financial skills to set up a self-administered RRSP or, more likely, pay for the advice of a professional consultant to do it. I think we must conclude that this measure would not have a very wide application among Canadian taxpayers.

There is another way in which this measure would discriminate among Canadians. It would allow holders of self-administered RRSPs to use these retirement savings for mortgage reduction. But what of all the other Canadians who have chosen to save for retirement in other ways, through insurance company contracts, for example, or, more likely, through industrial pension plans where they work? These savings, like RRSPs, have benefited from deferral of income tax on earnings put into these retirement plans. They would not be allowed, under this motion, to withdraw their savings for the purpose of reducing mortgage debt.

We must admit that the Income Tax Act does contain provisions which give special, favourable tax treatment to particular groups or favour certain types of activities. That is one of the things which makes the tax law so complex. These special provisions are justified on the ground that they promote certain economic activities which are generally beneficial to society.

Are there similar economic justifications for the proposal before us? Does it, for example, encourage home ownership? I suggest not really, since in order to benefit the taxpayer would have to be a home owner already. We already have the registered home ownership savings plan which encourages taxpayers to buy their own homes. It cannot be said that this proposal promotes savings, since it would not apply until after the savings had already been accumulated under the incentive of the RRSP tax deferral.

To some extent this proposal would be helpful in this period of high interest rates for home owners who are refinancing their mortgages, but it would also benefit those who do not have to refinance mortgages and have the benefit of mortgage contracts at lower interest rates. It would amount to a subsidy for certain Canadians, and that is the important part of my argument, against the pressures of high interest rates, but it would do nothing for the majority of citizens and, of course, it would be treating only the symptom and not the cause of high interest rates. I do not think there is an economic justification for the discrimination this motion would create.

I honestly think it would be a serious mistake to adopt a measure such as this, which would undermine the basic purpose of RRSP savings for retirement and create a huge loophole in that tax incentive system while achieving no lasting economic advantage for society.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a few words. After all, there still are 15 minutes before this 40-minute hour comes to an end.

I have listened with interest to the criticisms put forward by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Evans) and by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau) with respect to the resolution before us as moved by my colleague, the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish). I would be less than honest if I did not admit that some of their criticisms are valid and certainly have to be considered. I would have felt happier about their speeches, however, if they had found it possible to see that there might be something good in this resolution and if, instead of damning it completely, they had made suggestions as to how it might have been limited so as to achieve the purpose I believe my colleague has in mind. I have not discussed it with him and, if I speak for him and say what I should not, I trust he will correct me.

However, I think what he has in mind is that there are older people approaching retirement who have some money in RRSPs and feel it would improve their retirement situation if they could get rid of the mortgages on their family homes, even at the expense of having a little less pension income than that which they could have had from their RRSPs. I would like to see that part of it studied.

My hon. friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, admits there is a parallel between RRSPs and RHOSPs. He points out that RHOSPs are mostly for young families seeking to purchase their first homes. They are of no help to people of 60 or 63 years of age or more who are approaching retirement but are still carrying mortgages. Even if it was narrowed to that area and even if restrictions were placed so that it could not be used for speculative purposes or for getting cheap money to invest somewhere else, I think my friend, the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake, has a point, and I would like to see it looked at more favourably. I would like to see it looked at as something to study rather than something just to reject out of hand.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I hope I will make the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) a little bit happy when I congratulate the hon. member who proposed this bill, Bill C-55.

Mr. Knowles: Resolution.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): This resolution this afternoon. I think any member who looks for ways to reduce the interest burden on mortgages at this time when interest rates are indeed very high should be commended for the effort.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I have done a lot of head scratching and tried to think of some method by which we might be able to reduce that burden and yet be fair to all the taxpayers of Canada. I happen to be one of those who is saddled with a mortgage. I suppose I should not use the term "saddled" because no one forced me to take a mortgage either on my home in Ottawa or on my home in New Brunswick. I did so of my own free will. I mortgaged my future. I suppose that is what life is all about, so I am not complaining about it. But it does make it binding sometimes to have a large mortgage, particularly if you are paying high rates of interest.

• (1700)

In considering this motion today, one is reminded of another occasion on which a proposal was put to the House to provide a tax advantage to home owners. That was in 1979 when the former Conservative government attempted to legislate a personal income tax credit to help reduce the burden of mortgage payments and of local property taxes.

I had a number of problems with the proposal. The first was that it provided the greatest advantage to people who could afford the largest mortgages. Second, I found it difficult to understand why the federal government should be called upon to subsidize the burden of property taxes. It seems to me if there is to be an alleviation of property taxes, many of the provincial governments in this country would want to take a look at what was done in New Brunswick in the mid-1960s with the program of equal opportunity when the property tax assessment was equalized across the province and the rate of property taxation was equalized as well. The rate was based upon the so-called actual market value of your property.

One rate was established for individual residences and another rate was established for business residences, income properties, and those rates were the same all across the province. The individual municipalities could add an additional levy to pay for municipal services, but that levy was paid also on the provincial assessment level applied to all residences and all business properties across the province. As a result, instead of residential property taxation increasing in New Brunswick in the last 15 years, in many cases it has actually decreased. That is particularly true for the provincial portion of residential property taxation. Out of that levy, the basic costs of education, health care and justice is paid by the province so that there is a uniform system of these services.

One of the reasons property taxes are so high in some municipalities compared to others in other provinces of Canada is that the provincial governments in many cases have not taken the initiative to impose a fair system of assessment on properties and have not taken over the responsibility for basic educational, medical, and hospitalization costs and costs of the administration of justice across the province.

The hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish) was not a Member of Parliament when the Tories brought in their ill-fated mortgage deductibility scheme, but he should be aware that members of his own party at that time supported the Liberal party in opposing that bill because of the inequities in it. Both parties saw the bill as unfairly giving special treatment to home owners while ignoring tenants, and giving the largest tax breaks to those who needed them least.

It is a little surprising that the hon. member proposes this resolution which, at first glance at least, looks to be much the same. It suggests that somebody who has a self-administered Registered Retirement Savings Plan can take a lump sum out of it, apply it to his mortgage and still escape income tax on that money. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggested that people approaching their retirement age who had a substantial amount of money in a Registered Retirement Savings Plan might find it to their advantage to put that money on their mortgage rather than to leave it in the Registered Retirement Savings Plan. This is not the reason Registered Retirement Savings Plans were established.

The number of self-administered registered savings plans is small, proportional to all Registered Retirement Savings Plans in the nation. Therefore, if this motion were adopted, we would be creating a piece of tax legislation which would be very, very discriminatory in its application. If we followed the logic of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, we would have the anomaly where the elderly person who took money out of his plan to apply against his mortgage would find out a few years later when he retired that he must sell his house in order to have a retirement income. So, I cannot really see the benefit.

The registered retirement savings plan system is essentially a plan of tax deferral for people who now have sufficient earnings to put aside some money, without paying tax on the principal, in order to build up a retirement fund. It is not possible for everyone to do that. For many people, all their earnings must go to providing shelter, education for their families, clothing, medical care and the various things which are necessary to rear a family. Many people in family situations who pay taxes cannot afford retirement savings plans. Therefore, they would have to pay income tax to subsidize the people who have been granted tax exemptions on the money they have put into their registered retirement savings plans. If we agreed to this motion, they could take out their money, apply it to their mortgage and still receive the tax exemption. Then those who cannot afford retirement savings plans and perhaps are just making ends meet by paying their own mortgages are required to subsidize the people who are making lump sum payments on their mortgages. That is not a very equitable proposition.

It is clear that valuable tax advantages are provided through the RRSP system. In fact, it is estimated that in the relatively brief period this plan has been in existence, over $4.5 billion in tax deferrals have accumulated up to 1980. That is why the tax law is careful to ensure that if any withdrawals are made from these funds for purposes other than retirement the tax deferral is terminated immediately. I believe that is as it should be. If we give a tax deferral for a specific reason, then it should apply only to that reason. If we start making exemptions to the rule, where will it end? Next week there will be another motion so that it can apply, for example, to an educational fund or to the tuition fees of one's son or daughter. It would go on and on, until there was a pot-pourri over which there would be no control.

In my opinion, the motion goes against the very principle of RRSPs when it proposes that a taxpayer be allowed to reduce the mortgage on his home by these lump sum payments.

THE COMMONWEALTH

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY—SUPPORT FOR AIMS AND OBJECTIVES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, today marks the fiftieth anniversary of the Commonwealth, a unique association of 44 countries of different racial, cultural, and economic backgrounds. At a time when the international community is engulfed in a crisis of mistrust and inaction, the Commonwealth has the facility to bring diverse nations together in harmony and good will. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That Canada renew its support of the aims and objectives of the Commonwealth, particularly the dedication of the Commonwealth to upholding human rights, opposing racial discrimination, and resolving the world economic crisis through measures to close the rich-poor gap in the world.

Madam Speaker: Does the House want to manifest its appreciation for Commonwealth Day?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

EAST COAST TREATY—WITHDRAWAL FROM CONSIDERATION BY UNITED STATES SENATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that the lack of a Canada-United States fishing treaty will lead to overfishing and disorder, I move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House views with regret and grave concern the decision of the President of the United States to withdraw from the United States Senate that part of the east coast fisheries and boundaries treaty dealing with fisheries management and quotas, a decision which poses a serious threat to the scallop and groundfish resources off Georges Bank.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUS OF WOMEN

SUGGESTION MINISTER BE RELIEVED OF RESPONSIBILITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, news reports today confirm that the minister responsible for the status of women has been unable to influence cabinet to initiate an independent review of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. He is reportedly getting pretty tired of dealing with women lobbying for changes in the Constitution and for changes to restore integrity to the advisory council. In dismissing these representations, the minister has also cynically observed that the women's movement, for which he is supposed to be responsible, is easily manipulated. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That this House calls upon the Prime Minister to relieve the present minister responsible for the status of women from his tiresome duties and replace him with a person who will have the confidence and respect of women and of cabinet.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. Since, on the eve of his visit to Canada, United States President Ronald Reagan has unilaterally scuttled the east coast fisheries treaty, on top of his approval of $4 million in new financing for the Garrison diversion project, his backing off on commitments given regarding the Alaska natural gas pipeline and his total indifference to the problems of acid rain, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson):

That this House condemn these hostile and negative actions by the United States government and, furthermore, that this House send a telegram to President Reagan telling him that if this is an indication of his goal of a "close and co-operative relationship with Canada", he might as well turn his plane around and stay in Washington.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BILINGUALISM

PUBLIC SERVICE HIRING PRACTICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. During the constitutional debate the need for labour mobility between provinces was a goal of the government. Nonetheless, the federal Department of Transport, as reported in the March issue of COPA newsletter, is refusing to allow French-speaking bilingual persons from either New Brunswick or Ontario even to apply for work in air traffic control in the province of Quebec. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That all departments of the federal government be instructed to refrain from using geography as a basis of hiring practices.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

APPOINTMENT OF GRAIN TRANSPORTATION CO-ORDINATOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, the grain transportation authority was created by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) when he was minister of transport, and served as a catalyst to help Canada achieve record grain exports in the previous crop year. The grain transportation authority has been without a co-ordinator since Dr. Hugh Horner resigned in October, 1980. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

● (1410)

That the Minister of Transport show support for the Grain Transportation Authority by immediately announcing an immediate replacement for Dr. Horner.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

CALL FOR REDUCTION IN IMPORTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, this country is in a mess. We have a series of problems confronting the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: We have an oil company rip-off, an interest rate rip-off, unemployment is at an all-time high, house prices are beyond the reach of the majority of people, and we have a government afraid or unwilling to take any action in one area in particular.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Deans: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the government take action immediately to ensure that the pending agreement which will limit the importation of cars and trucks from Japan into the United States does not result in an increase of exports of automobiles from Japan into Canada and, further, that agreements be sought to reduce the number of exports of automobiles to this country for a period of time necessary to allow our domestic auto industry to complete its restructuring programs.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Recognizing that U.S. President Reagan will visit this capital tomorrow, and noting that the people of Afghanistan, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria, Poland, East Germany, Roumania, Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia and the Ukraine, among others, are currently denied by Moscow the right to choose their own governmental and socioeconomic systems through force of Russian arms, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That this House requests the Prime Minister to discuss this matter with President Reagan this week, including ways in which Canada and the U.S.A. can work effectively toward achieving self-determination for all people now behind the iron curtain.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

CALL FOR CONVENING OF STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development has not met since December 3, 1980, and whereas there are many serious problems of extreme urgency affecting native people across Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, or the Prime Minister, immediately instruct the chairman of this committee to seek a reference from the House to convene regular meetings forthwith.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION ACT

REQUEST FOR AMENDING LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, because it has been over two years since Canada and the United States signed a protocol to amend the Canada-United States Migratory Birds Convention in a way which would recognize native hunting rights, and since this protocol has not yet been ratified by the U.S. Senate, and since the Canadian government has shown little initiative in this area over the last two years, either by pressuring the U.S. Senate to follow up on this promise or in introducing amendments to the Migratory Birds Convention Act in Canada so that Indians may hunt without being prosecuted, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the Minister of the Environment immediately propose amendments to the Migratory Birds Convention Act which would recognize native hunting rights, and that the Secretary of State for External Affairs strongly remind the United States of its 1979 commitment to change that convention, and also that the Solicitor General announce immediately a moratorium on the arrest of native people under this act.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INCREASE IN COSTS TO PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas the federal government originally encouraged and enticed provincial governments and municipalities to sign contracts for RCMP policing, and now that the suggested increases are way out of proportion, some being near the 100 per cent mark, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That the House requests the government to review the scale of increases in order to keep faith with the original bargaining made with the provinces and municipalities, and also to help combat inflation.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FISHERIES

EAST COAST TREATY—NOTIFICATION OF WITHDRAWAL FROM CONSIDERATION BY UNITED STATES SENATE

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question will be directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he has the opportunity to return to his seat.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: I am just welcoming him to his seat.

I should like to ask the minister when was the government first informed of President Reagan's decision to abandon unilaterally the east coast fisheries treaty and, further, what immediate steps the government took, either publicly or privately, to convey to the Americans Canada's profound opposition to this move.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I was telephoned by Secretary Haig—I believe it was on Tuesday evening of last week—to inform me that he would be recommending to the President that the administration not proceed with the east coast fisheries treaty but that it do proceed with the east coast boundaries agreement. I think we did not receive notification of the President's decision in advance or, if we did, it was so close to the time of his decision that in effect the two came at the same time. I believe that was on Friday. We did not receive any effective advance notice of the President's decision, as I understand it, but we did receive advance warning from Secretary Haig that that would be his recommendation.

At the time Secretary Haig called me I expressed our profound regret and disappointment at this move, and said that it was not what we had hoped and expected. He informed me that that was true with his side as well, that he had been very optimistic when we had met that he would be able to get it through the Senate, and that it was with great regret that his special negotiator had informed him, after twice discussing it with all the relevant senators, that it was simply impossible to get it through the U.S. Senate. It was on that ground that the American government decided not proceed.

We did not accept the American action. We told the Americans specifically that we were not accepting it in the sense that we did not agree with it, that we protested against it, and that we were profoundly saddened by it.

POSITION TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I find it appalling that the minister did not make some public outcry, the moment he was informed of this news, as to how the Canadian public felt and would react to this very distressing move on the part of the American government. However, given the fact that his comments to Secretary Haig were not successful earlier on, can the minister say what steps the government is now proposing to take in the next two days at the very highest levels to persuade President Reagan not to proceed with the announced course he has stated with respect to the east coast fisheries agreement, or will the government simply resign itself to accepting the way in which the American government is proceeding unilaterally?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, this was a unilateral decision by the United States without consultation with us. It has been formally announced by the President, and I am not sure there is now any margin for the United States to change that position, especially given the fact that they are only reflecting their belief that they cannot get this through the U.S. Senate and that they cannot get the implementing legislation through either the Senate or the House. We certainly intend to discuss this very fully with the President and to stress especially the importance of conservation of the fish stock, because likely the greatest possible loss in this whole matter is the loss to conservation interests.

It seems that American fisheries officials have not shown themselves capable of adequately protecting fish stocks. This is what troubles us more than any other single thing about the American decision.

We also have their assurance that they will not proceed to enforce U.S. law in the disputed zone against Canadian fishing ships. They will have what is called flag state enforcement, which means we will enforce the law against our ships, they will enforce it against their ships, and either of us can enforce it against ships from third countries. This will avoid the possibility of a so-called fish war in which each side would be arresting the ships of the other country.

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE WITH RESPECT TO TREATY

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, given the situation the minister has now described, what concerns me is whether enough has been done by the government in the past number of weeks to convince the new administration in Washington of the unanimous and intense feeling in Canada against the course it has taken. I cite as an example the fact that on January 17 of this year the Canadian press reported that U.S. foreign relations committee chairman Percy said, after discussions with the Canadian Ambassador, Peter Towe, that he, Senator Percy, felt that treaty changes "can be accepted with reluctance" by Ottawa. He was given to understand that treaty changes can be accepted with reluctance by Ottawa.

● (1420)

I should like to ask the minister what it was in his discussions with Ambassador Towe that led Senator Percy to believe that any changes to the fisheries treaty would be accepted by Ottawa, reluctantly or otherwise, and under what orders was Ambassador Towe acting at the time Senator Percy reached that conclusion?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I do not know the state of Senator Percy's mind at the time he made that statement. In fact our position to the United States all along has been that while we would consider a reduction in the duration of the treaty from one of perpetual duration to one of a limited period of years, say 12, which would probably be long enough to return the capital investment of the fishermen, we would not accept any other changes. In his conversations with me Secretary Haig said that he well understood that the Canadian government would not accept any modifications to the treaty and that that was one of the factors the United States was taking into account in deciding to proceed this way.

The hon. member knows better than most that this treaty was negotiated and signed by the previous U.S. administration, the one with which she was dealing as secretary of state for external affairs. She also had a singular lack of success in convincing the U.S. government to put this treaty through the U.S. Senate.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SETTLEMENT OF MARITIME BOUNDARY BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my questions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs as well. He states that what has happened is a unilateral decision, but in effect that unilateral decision was based on a joint decision taken by representatives of the two countries. In fact the East Coast Fishery Resource Agreement signed on March 29, 1979, following negotiations that began in the fall of 1976, which is a long period of time, was designed to establish a Canada-U.S. fisheries commission to provide for co-operative management, and for access and entitlements to specific stocks of mutual concern. At the same time the treaty to submit the delimitation of the maritime boundary in the Gulf of Maine area to binding dispute settlement, provides for the submission of the case to a five-judge chamber of the International Court of Justice for a final decision on the placement of the boundary.

With that background I should like to ask the minister if, in his estimation, the United States is taking the boundary issue to the International Court in order to settle definitively that aspect of negotiations between our two countries before endeavouring to establish the fisheries quotas for conservation methods, or what is his interpretation of these actions?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the United States government is prepared to proceed with the boundaries treaty, I understand, which in effect underlies the fisheries treaty. When international arbitration is completed, to a large extent that will effectively settle the fisheries question because it will determine the boundary on either side of which enforcement by the relevant country may take place. The U.S. government believes that there will be no difficulty getting that through the Senate, with its reference to international arbitration.

In the meantime, the U.S. administration is undertaking to try some conservation measures through the New England Fisheries Council. We are told that will not be on the basis of percentages of the catch, as we would prefer, but the U.S. Secretary of State says that it will indicate some interest on the part of the United States government in the preservation of the fisheries. That aspect concerns us a great deal. We would like to see extremely effective conservative measures taken so that the result of this flag state enforcement will not be that fishermen from both sides will be allowed to plunder the stock.

Of course, if the United States is not going to be concerned about conservation, we can hardly say to our fishermen that we are going to restrain them. Then it is the fishing resource that will suffer.

REVIEW OF BILATERAL AGREEMENTS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In January, 1977, Canada extended its jurisdiction to 200 miles seaward, and in March of the same year the United States established similar limits. When doing this the United States stated that the principal purpose behind its action was to phase foreign fishermen out of U.S. waters so that the U.S. fishing industry could expand.

• (1425)

My question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is this: since the United States claims that the March 29, 1979, agreement is inconsistent with its 200-mile legislation, as it guarantees Canadian scallop, herring and groundfish fishermen permanent access to large parts of the United States zone, which is not in a disputed area, is the minister now planning to review all of the bilateral agreements covering fishing operations of foreigners within Canada's 200-mile zone in keeping with the promise made on February 25, 1975, by the then minister of state for external affairs, who is now the Minister of Finance, that the federal government would have the right to reserve for Canadian fishermen that portion of the total resource which they have the capacity to catch in any given year?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I completely fail to see how the hon. member's last question affects the previous statement made. In fact, we took the approach that where the line was drawn in fisheries terms was not overly important as long as there was a management of stocks which responded to biology and movement of fish. As long as that possibility existed, obviously our preference was for the treaty as it was negotiated, with great difficulty, because there had to be concessions on both sides. We felt, from the fisheries point of view, that the treaty went a long way to protect the traditional fishing patterns of both Canadian and American fishermen, that it disrupted them as little as possible, and it would produce a management of stocks which would ensure good conservation. I must say the decision which has been announced by the United States worries us from a fisheries point of view in terms of conservation. Certainly I agree with my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that if American fishermen are going to have unbridled access to Georges Bank, then we cannot ask our fishermen to restrain themselves.

FISHERIES

INCREASE IN SCALLOP ALLOCATION TO U.S. FISHERMEN—REQUEST FOR IMPOSITION OF MANAGEMENT PLAN

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. It also concerns the east coast fisheries treaty. On several occasions in this House, through motions under the provisions of Standing Order 43, we have announced our disapproval of the attitude of the United States toward not ratifying this treaty. I might remind the Prime Minister that the scallop allocation to United States fishermen has increased from about 10 per cent in 1974 to over 40 per cent right now, which is taking away much of the income of the Nova Scotia fishermen.

In view of the visit of the President of the United States tomorrow and on Wednesday, would the Prime Minister give assurances to this House and to the fishermen in Nova Scotia that he will ask the President of the United States to impose a management plan on the American fishermen fishing scallops and other stocks on the east coast in the area under dispute? Will the Prime Minister ask the President to impose on those American fishermen a quota which will conserve stocks for which Canadian fishermen, in an attempt to do the same thing, are willing to accept regulations imposed by this government and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it would seem that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have dealt with this matter in their previous answers when they indicated that conservation was one of the main preoccupations of this government, and when they indicated the United States administration had undertaken to negotiate, I believe it is with the New England regional council, to ensure that that council would adopt conservation measures compatible with the maintenance of the fish stocks.

Mr. Miller: With all due respect, Mr. Prime Minister, I will address this question to you.

It has been quite obvious that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Secretary of State for External Affairs in this government, in the previous Tory government and in the Liberal government before that, were unable to get those kinds of assurances from the United States. We were not getting any co-operation on that treaty through normal channels, namely, through the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the Department of External Affairs. I think it is incumbent upon you now, recognizing the failure—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Miller: —of normal channels, that you ask the President of the United States to impose a management plan which will protect those stocks on the east coast. That is not being done now. Will you ask the President of the United States to do something.

• (1430)

Mr. Trudeau: Are you asking the Speaker a question?

Mr. Miller: Will the Prime Minister give an assurance that he, as the Prime Minister of Canada, will request that a management plan be implemented to protect the stocks and income of Canadian fishermen?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I must say the hon. member is misstating the facts when he says that this government and indeed the United States administration had not endeavoured to ensure that the negotiated treaty would be implemented. On the contrary, we had the assurance from the Carter administration that it would do its best, repeatedly, over a period of two years, to make sure that the treaty was ratified. Therefore, there was on the part of the preceding U.S. administration, our government, and the government of the Leader of the Opposition, an endeavour to obtain ratification of the treaty. What happened in fact is that the U.S. Senate has not ratified the treaty. This government is putting forward the importance of maintaining friendship with the United States as the basis of the meeting which will take place tomorrow and the next day.

We are presuming that the United States President adopted this course, not because he wants to see an end to the profitable fishing for fishermen of both countries but because he is seeking in some other way to achieve results that are profitable for both countries. In that sense the House must recognize that it is not the U.S. administration that failed to ratify the treaty for the past two years, but the United States Congress. In that sense this government is once again putting the best possible light on the United States action and we are seeking, in a spirit of friendship, with the visit of the United States President to find a solution to this problem.

Mr. Miller: I would once again request that the Prime Minister raise this with the President.

WEST COAST SALMON TREATY NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I wish to address my supplementary question on a related matter to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It is with regard to the west coast salmon treaty which is now in the process of being negotiated. It will require a great deal of co-operation, trust and good will on the part of both governments in order to become an equitable and fair treaty for both sides. In recognition of the difficulty in getting equitable treatment with regard to the treaty on the east coast, will the minister reconsider the position of the government which guarantees in perpetuity something like 4.5 million Fraser River sockeye and pink salmon to the United States? Will he reconsider the Canadian position on the west coast salmon treaty, which is based on good will?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, in order to help the hon. member understand the previous question, under American legislation the United States Secretary of Commerce can intervene to limit the powers of the regional councils. That is the very question I expect to discuss with Secretary of Commerce Baldridge tomorrow afternoon. If this can be done and if the scallop stocks can be protected through this approach, we might avoid very serious overfishing, which is a threat that now hangs over us.

I hesitate to link the future of the west coast treaty to the problem on the east coast. We have always resisted playing one against the other. This we will continue to resist. I suspect that on the west coast the negotiations are taking place with ongoing and frequent consultation with the regional councils and interested groups on both sides of the negotiations, Canadian and American. In that sense, there may be more hope. The hon. member knows that one of the aims of Canada in the west coast salmon treaty negotiations is to restore the Fraser River to full Canadian control. That remains our aim.

DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES SECRETARY OF COMMERCE

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Since the treaty has been before the U.S. Senate for ratification over the past two years, American fishing activity has stepped up considerably on Georges Bank. Indications are that this is continuing to happen. Given that stepped up fisheries activity by the Americans, and the fact that there seems to be an agreement with the Americans not to interfere with each other in the disputed area, apart from the New England regional council being asked by the President to manage the fishery, which is like asking a chicken hawk to manage egg production, does the minister intend to hold bilateral discussions with the U.S. Secretary of Commerce who does have the authority to enforce fisheries management? We have much more to lose if there is not some management of that resource. It is our fishermen who stand to suffer the most.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I will be meeting the Secretary of Commerce at 4.45 tomorrow afternoon. I will make one slight adjustment to what the hon. member stated. We all stand to lose if we do not have a decent fisheries management regime on Georges Bank.

QUERY RESPECTING NOTE FROM UNITED STATES STATE DEPARTMENT

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. According to a Canadian Press dispatch, a note was sent to the Canadian government by the U.S. State Department last Friday. The note outlined U.S. government objections to the treaty. It is interesting to note it came from the State Department. We thought we had successfully negotiated a treaty with the U.S. government. Will the minister tell this House and the country what was contained in that note which he received on Friday?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am not aware of any such note, Madam Speaker. I will check and advise the hon. member. There were rumours of another note on Friday, but not that I am aware of in that area.

STABILIZATION PAYMENTS TO EASTERN POTATO PRODUCERS

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Madam Speaker, I agree with the importance of the subject matter of the questions asked. However, I would direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. It has to do with the plight of potato farmers, particularly those in eastern Canada. Can the minister inform the House as to his recommendations and the government's decision with regard to the recommendations of the stabilization board on the amount that will be made available to help in the 1979-80 crop year?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the Agricultural Stabilization Board announced a payment that would amount to about 70 cents per hundredweight. The maximum a single producer can claim will be 10,000 hundredweight. A family organization of two or three members could claim a maximum of 30,000 hundredweight. Payments will be made when the farmers apply for them. That covers the eastern region of Canada, the three Atlantic provinces, Quebec and Ontario. Applications must be submitted before the payment can be made to them.

FISHERIES

REQUEST THAT EAST AND WEST COAST ISSUES BE DISCUSSED WITH VISITING UNITED STATES REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In reply to a question a few moments ago, the minister indicated that he hesitates to link the question of the east coast fisheries treaty with the circumstance on the west coast. In view of the devastating state of the scallop stocks on Georges Bank, and the tremendously precarious stituation with respect to Fraser River salmon, in particularly the chinook salmon runs which have been subjected to heavy overfishing, especially by U.S. fishermen and U.S. native fishermen, is the minister prepared at this point to couple these two situations and realize that we can no longer continue to put the west coast on the back burner until the question of the east coast treaty is resolved? Is the minister prepared to deal with both of these issues and address them, square on, with his counterparts who will be visiting here over the next few days?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): As a former parliamentary secretary to the minister of fisheries, the hon. member knows better than his question indicates. He knows that negotiations regarding the salmon interception problem preceded by many years the situation which has arisen on the east coast as a result of the extension of jurisdiction. He knows the problems are very different. He also knows that, much as it might be tempting, it would not be accurate to put all the blame for the overfishing of chinook salmon on U.S. seiners of Point Roberts.

Mr. Siddon: The minister recognizes the problem. He has admitted in this House that negotiations with respect to the west coast salmon stocks have been going on for a very long time, without any serious intent, I might add. Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs assure this House that the subject of the west coast treaty will be discussed during the upcoming discussions with his counterpart, Secretary Haig and, in particular, will he reveal to this House the extent to which he has been briefed on this very important question and the extent to which he is prepared to put positive options on management before the Secretary, regarding both the west coast and east coast treaty, in order that we can prevent overfishing and ensure that we do not destroy both of these valuable resources?

● (1440)

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, that is certainly one of the issues we will discuss with officials of the U.S. government if we have time. Those who are involved in negotiations with the United States on west coast problems feel that these negotiations are going fairly well at the present time.

HOUSING

INTRODUCTION OF SHELTER ALLOWANCE PROGRAM

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and it concerns shelter allowances and rental controls.

The minister announced outside the housing conference held this past weekend that he intends to introduce a shelter allowance program which will cost close to $400 million. We know the minister advocates the abolition of rent controls, and I should like to ask him whether he intends to plan to use shelter allowances as a means of doing away with rent controls and, in addition, who will benefit from these shelter allowances? How does he intend to prevent rent gouging by landlords if there are no rent controls?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, part of the question by the hon. member dealing with rent controls was directed to the wrong minister. It should be directed, so far as my province is concerned, for example, to the minister for housing for the province of Ontario. I realize there is some controversy. This was an item on the agenda of the all-sector conference and there are a variety of opinions on the matter of rent controls. I appreciate from a Globe and Mail report of Friday last that there is some question about what is the position of the Conservative Party in this regard, but I would submit that the hon. lady should address her question to the minister with jurisdiction.

Mrs. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister who was very vocal, according to my copy of the Toronto Star of March 2, about ending rent controls.

We know that in some instances shelter allowances are certainly needed by low-income people provided rents are controlled. However, shelter allowances will not build affordable housing and we need many more housing units. Therefore, will the minister tell us where the $400 million will come from in his budget? I hope this will be additional money. Will he assure the many concerned housing groups represented at this conference and across Canada that this money will not be taken from the budget, particularly that portion which is so desperately needed to build non-profit housing and also for community service grants?

Mr. Cosgrove: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the opportunity of making reference to the all-sector conference on housing held here over the weekend. She gives me the opportunity of pointing out in response to a specific question that there were approximately 20 items on the agenda of what was an all-sector conference. Many people had the opportunity of commenting on many of the suggestions made, including one of the suggestions in my remarks to the effect that shelter allowances could be an additional and useful instrument in the response of governments generally to housing problems in Canada. The idea or proposal was introduced in my remarks in that framework, that is, to elicit response from the provinces and from all the sectors involved, including the non-profit sector to which she has referred.

BILINGUALISM

PUBLIC SERVICE HIRING PRACTICES—RESTRICTION OF CANDIDATES TO PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Transport.

The principle of mobility has been a long held goal of the government. However, the Department of Transport has now restricted applicants for the position of air traffic controller in Montreal to the "geographical boundaries of the province of Quebec". Will the minister tell the House how he can possibly rule out candidates from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or Ontario who are bilingual, and particularly those whose first language is French? Is this not the worst form of discrimination and contrary to all federal guidelines?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I was also quite shocked when I was made aware of that situation and I want to agree with my hon. friend on that matter. I am told, however, that this is not uncommon. I have asked my officials to look into it further and to suggest ways in which it could be changed. I will report to my hon. friend as soon as I have a decision on that.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORTED REMOVAL OF "E" DIVISION FROM VICTORIA, B.C.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Solicitor General. Last Friday I asked the Acting Solicitor General about the government's plans to move the headquarters of "E" Division of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police out of the city of Victoria. I understand the Solicitor General has informed the media that this projected move is by no means certain. However, RCMP senior officers have said the move is on. Would the Solicitor General clarify this matter, please?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member would tell me which members of the RCMP were saying that, I will get in touch with them and tell them the move is not on, not finally settled, and will not be until I have had an opportunity to discuss this with the provincial attorney general.

Mr. McKinnon: Certainly, Madam Speaker, the minister's request is about the last one I would answer. Will he get in touch with the mayors of the various municipalities affected? He will find a letter on his desk today or tomorrow from the mayor of Victoria requesting that the decision be deferred until there has been discussion with municipal officials. It also points out that "we have not had the benefit of any consultation with your local officials aside from a simple announcement that such a move is to take place". Will the minister assure the House that there will be impact studies done on this move before it takes place or is rejected completely?

Mr. Kaplan: Madam Speaker, I will not undertake that there will be specific impact studies undertaken, but I will tell the hon. member that a policing analysis was done of the situation, and from the point of view of cost and efficiency the RCMP is satisfied it would be preferable to operate its B.C. headquarters in Vancouver. That is not a decision which will be made until I have consulted on the matter with the attorney general of British Columbia.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RIGHT OF PUBLIC'S ACCESS TO PARLIAMENTARIANS DURING STATE VISIT OF U.S. PRESIDENT REAGAN

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I am more aware than some of the very real security problems that will be encountered round Parliament Hill tomorrow and Wednesday with the impending visit of President Reagan. I would direct my question to the Prime Minister. I apologize for directing it to him but, as the House will appreciate, the Chair cannot be questioned in this House.

In view of the instructions issued that no one, but no one, is to be allowed access, not only to these buildings, but to the grounds, tomorrow and Wednesday, unless they have a parliamentary identification card, who is to preserve the right of the Canadian citizen and taxpayer to have easy access to members of Parliament and their offices over the next two days?

An hon. Member: How about members without identification cards?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I will take notice of the question.

ROLE OF ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the Solicitor General will tell us if he or the RCMP has issued any instructions actually to keep people out of the parliamentary grounds tomorrow and Wednesday?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): I am not aware of any such instruction, Madam Speaker. I can assure the House that the RCMP does have a mandate to be responsible for the security of visiting heads of state and their suites. They are aware of that responsibility and they will be exercising it.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STATEMENT ON NATIVE PEOPLES MADE BY CORRECTIONAL SERVICE SPOKESMAN—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister or the Solicitor General. On February 23 the Prime Minister agreed to look into and report to the House regarding statements made by Mr. Paul Croft, who was a spokesman for the correctional service, and who, when asked how many natives worked for his service, said he would not be able to give that information as it would be violating human rights, but when asked how many natives were serving time in prisons said 840 were inmates, or almost 9 per cent of the federal prison population were natives. Is the Prime Minister now ready to report on that very hypocritical and blatant statement?

• (1450)

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, we do not know how many natives are working for the correctional services of Canada because under our human rights policy we are not allowed to ask applicants for employment with the correctional services of Canada their ethnic or racial background. So, we have no way of knowing from our records exactly what number are working for the correctional services. Obviously there are a number, but we have no statistical data which would show the precise number.

As far as inmates are concerned, human rights employment legislation is irrelevant. We have programs directed toward native people who are inmates in correctional centres, and to their needs. We have very full statistics on that. When we are asked about statistics on inmate populations we can produce it, but we do not have statistics about the racial background of employees of the correctional services of Canada.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, I have never been in prison, so I did not know information as to racial origin had to be put on an application to get into prison.

Oral Questions

INDIAN AFFAIRS

TERMINATION OF SPORT AND RECREATION PROGRAM

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport. He will know that over 100 people will lose their jobs and that many native communities will be deprived of much-needed sports programs as a result of the government decision to cut off funding for the native sport and recreation program. Could the minister advise the House as to which department the money allocated for this program has now been directed, for what other programs will this money be spent, or will it now be spent to beef up the import compensation program of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, as the House has previously been informed, the program to which the hon. member referred was an experimental program rather than a permanent one. The difficulty encountered in relation to my department was due to the small nature of the department and the fact that we do not have people in most centres across the country. It was impossible to have the program monitored and constantly followed. Consequently, there was a decision that the money could be better spent to the advantage of our native people through some other program. The determination of that program and what department would undertake it would be one which would not fall under my department.

THE ENVIRONMENT

SUGGESTED DISCUSSION OF ACID RAIN PRECIPITATION IN CANADA—UNITED STATES TALKS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that acid rain emissions in Canada have been considerably reduced—in the Sudbury region they have actually declined by over 80 per cent since 1970—but in the United States emissions have climbed alarmingly, and all forecasts strongly indicate there will be much higher SO_2 emissions this year and in subsequent years, will the Prime Minister assure the House he will tell, not ask, President Reagan of the United States to reduce drastically acid precipitation now?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the subject matter will certainly be discussed with the President of the United States.

Mr. Blackburn: Madam Speaker, I strongly suspect that we may lose out in that discussion. What sanctions does the Prime Minister have in mind to use against the United States in the event that the United States under President Reagan refuses to go along with the clean air memorandum of intent of August 5, 1980? For example, would he threaten to reduce or cut off hydroelectric power to the United States?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, contrary to the hon. member's party, we are going into these meetings with the President of the United States with the presumption that many of these problems can be settled, as they should be, between neighbours; not by threat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

EFFECT ON MARKETING OF CANADA-UNITED STATES IMPASSE

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, I have a brief question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, returning to the important matter of the fisheries treaty between our two countries. I should like to ask him about the effect on marketing if this impasse continues. Unless there is some solution, is it his view that present conditions could lead to overproduction and a consequent weakening in Canadian markets as far as our fishermen are concerned? Is this a likely consequence?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I wish the situation were such that scallop stocks would continue to be as healthy as they once were. The reality is that there has already been overfishing by the American industry, and we have responsibly held back our fishermen.

As I said, if we have to unbridle our fishermen, I am afraid that scallop prices on the contrary will keep going up as stocks become scarcer. In the long run no one will really benefit from this situation.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I should like to ask the minister another brief question. In his opinion, where does he feel the leverage is in this respect? Since the Americans take so much of the production of our fishing industry, particularly on the east coast, is the leverage with us or with them if the conditions as far as the treaty is concerned cannot be resolved?

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, I am afraid the answer would be too long for question period. The reality is that there is almost a philosophical difference between the Canadian fishing industry—fishermen, the processors and government—and the American ones. We believe in rather tight regulation of stocks and tight conservation measures. This does not appear to be the philosophy on the other side. Hopefully it will become that, otherwise the stocks will be ruined.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. On December 19, 1980, the chairman of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence tabled the committee report on NORAD. Does the minister concur with its recommendations? Has he briefed the Prime Minister prior to his discussions with President Reagan?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that we will have discussions with the President or the U.S. Secretary of State. We agree entirely with the SCEAND recommendations and they will be brought forward for signature when the President is here.

Mr. Wenman: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. The last three recommendations in the report indicate the change in nature of the NORAD relationship as technology moves from land-based radar to space-based radar. Recommendation No. 11 suggests that Canada should participate in this new technology. Is it the intention of the Prime Minister to discuss the changing nature of NORAD and, in particular, to place a new emphasis upon Canada's participation in the development of space based surveillance systems?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member just mentioned, it is true that research and development are part of this agreement and that the name has been changed to that effect, changing the wording to "aerospace".

TRANSPORT

APPOINTMENT OF GRAIN TRANSPORTATION CO-ORDINATOR

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It concerns the grain transportation authority which was set up by his predecessor. The minister will know that the Grain Transportation Authority has been without a director since the previous one resigned on October 15. Has he had a chance to consider a replacement? Is he in a position either to announce who will be replacing Dr. Horner, or to give us some kind of a timetable as to when we might look for a replacement?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the institution is continuing; Treasury Board has approved the necessary money to continue it. Mr. Radke is acting co-ordinator on an interim basis, and I am looking for the pearl who should be placed in that job.

Mr. Mayer: Madam Speaker, if the minister's predecessor could not only negotiate guidelines for the transportation authority but name a director in five months, it would seem reasonable that the minister could find a replacement for him in five months.

I thank the minister for his reassurance that he is supporting the Grain Transportation Authority. Is he in a position to announce what type of goals the entire transportation system can be looking at in terms of increased exports? Very early on in his ministry, the previous minister announced that he would be looking at a 20 per cent increase, and I have not heard any announcement of any increases by this minister. Could he give us an idea as to what kind of increases we should be anticipating?

• (1500)

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, I look at the figures every day. Unloading in Thunder Bay and Vancouver on the west coast is up 4 per cent or 5 per cent over the previous year. This gives an indication of the success of the grain industry at this time.

I am not aware that the Minister of State responsible for the Wheat Board has indicated any percentage, but I will discuss it with him and I will bring that to the attention of the House.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WADDELL—ALLEGED DIPLOMATIC NOTE RESPECTING ENERGY POLICY

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, in answer to a question from one of the Conservative members, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) made reference to diplomatic notes. This was in the context of fisheries notes. What was omitted from his answer was that there may have been another diplomatic note.

While there are rumours about there being a diplomatic note from the government of the United States protesting the national energy policy, I wonder if the minister, in answer to my question of privilege, could clear up for members of the House whether he was referring to that other diplomatic note?

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid this is not a question of privilege which can be raised at this time. If the hon. member has queries with respect to answers which have been given in the House, he can ask questions during subsequent question periods.

CNR PENSIONS

Question No. 1,981—Mr. Knowles:

1. How many retired employees of the Canadian National Railways are in receipt of pensions of less than $25 per month?

2. How many are in receipt of a pension of $25 per month?

3. How many are in receipt of pensions of (a) $25.01 to $29.99 per month (b) $30.00 to $39.99 per month (c) $40.00 to $49.99 per month (d) $50.00 to $59.99 per month (e) $60.00 to $69.99 per month (f) $70.00 to $79.99 per month (g) $80.00 to $89.99 per month (h) $90.00 to $99.99 per month (i) $100.00 to $124.99 per month (j) $125.00 to $149.99 per month (k) $150.00 to $199.99 per month (l) $200.00 to $299.99 per month (m) $300.00 to $399.99 per month (n) $400.00 to $499.99 per month (o) $500.00 to $599.99 per month (p) $600.00 to $699.99 per month (q) $700.00 to $799.99 per month (r) $800.00 to $899.99 per month (s) $900.00 to $999.99 per month (t) $1,000.00 to $1,499.99 per month (u) $1,500.00 per month and over?

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

1. 250.

2. 747.

3. (a)	166	(k)	2,782
(b)	123	(l)	4,733
(c)	256	(m)	633
(d)	353	(n)	3,064
(e)	280	(o)	2,429
(f)	329	(p)	1,907
(g)	233	(q)	1,453
(h)	281	(r)	1,141
(i)	1,239	(s)	817
(j)	866	(t) and (u)	1,828

In a number of cases, the amount of pensions paid by Canadian National Railways do not represent the total pensions payable to employees for railway service. Pensions payable by CN to international employees (service in both Canada and the United States) relate to their service in Canada only. Such employees also receive annuities respecting eligibility for which CN has made contributions payable under the U.S. Railroad Retirement Act or the Social Security Act for service performed in the United States. For example, in the group receiving pensions under $25 a month, in 1980 there are 28 former international employees who receive U.S. railroad retirement or social security annuities in respect of CN service rendered in the United States. In addition, there are various pension agreements between CN and other companies, such as Canadian Pacific Limited and the Ontario Northland Railway, where each company issued separate cheques for its portion of the total pension. Only the pension payable by CN is in this statement. Also, since the passing of the Pension Benefits Standards Act by the federal government on October 1, 1967, there are 120 employees who have terminated service with CN and are receiving rather small compulsory deferred pensions for service performed only from October 1, 1967. The balance of those receiving small pensions are employees who elected for early retirement—before age 65—with reduced basic pensions—$25—and employees who had very short service and very small contributions.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—AMERICAN MILITARY INTERVENTION IN EL SALVADOR

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to protest publicly the American military intervention in support of the junta in El Salvador, and calls on the Prime Minister in his talks with the President of the United States to urge an end to this military involvement on the side of a regressive regime which denies civil rights and is fighting those who wish to establish a democratic government.

He said: Madam Speaker, today, just ahead of the visit of the President of the United States, we are involved in what could become one of the most significant political events of the new administration in the United States. The El Salvadorean situation has all the elements of intensifying not only the crisis within that country but, indeed, could go well beyond that and raise very serious difficulties in the modern world, not only in this hemisphere but everywhere on the planet.

In opening my comments, I want to say that I intend to spend a good part of my time talking about the actual situation in El Salvador, its recent history and its modern reality. For quite plausible reasons I think the people of Canada are not well informed about what is actually taking place in that unfortunate land to the south of us. In so doing, I would like to make it clear that my sources of information on what I am about to say are not, in the main, from Canadian sources, but rather are from American sources. They are from publications like Harpers magazine and The New York Times, from American church leaders as well as from Canadian and El Salvadorean church leaders, from Canadian trade unionists, and finally from a report prepared by the president of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights.

What is a common characteristic of these groups or individuals? First, all of them have been known historically to oppose authoritarian regimes, whether they are regimes on the left or on the right. They are the people who, in the past, have not hesitated to condemn the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan and, in the present circumstance, they are united in condemning American involvement in El Salvador. Just as they were right in the former case, they are certainly right, as I will argue, in the case of the Americans. What I want to stress is that all of these groups, whether church leaders or editors of important American publications, have on their side a distinguished commitment not only to liberty but to the pursuit of truth. Both characteristics are very important, as we will see in this debate on this important situation.

First, I want to say something about the nation of El Salvador. It is important for us to know that it is not only a small country geographically but that it is small in population, somewhere in the neighbourhood of five million people. It is also important for us to know that in that land some 2 per cent of the people own 60 per cent of the arable land. The peasants who make up the vast majority of the population own almost none of the arable land. In terms of income distribution, 8 per cent of the population receives more than 50 per cent of the national income. In terms of employment opportunities, work, which gives dignity to the daily existence of most men and women, is almost unavailable on a continuing basis for most of the population. In fact, only some 16 per cent of the economically active population is employed throughout the year. For 1979 unemployment averaged 25 per cent. These are some of the crude statistics which describe the present reality of El Salvador.

The history of El Salvador which has led to the present political circumstance which we are debating today is that for nearly 100 years El Salvador has been economically and politically controlled by a handful of families which compose the oligarchy. These families are the owners of the best quality land, which in its production is dedicated not to meeting the needs of the people, in the main, but to serving export markets for coffee, cotton and sugar. This handful of land owners employs a peasant class which is subjected to what can only be described as highly exploitative conditions in terms of modern industrial, northern European and North American experience. Anyone who describes their circumstances in any other terms is misleading.

The traditional oligarchy held direct political power up until the early 1930s. In 1932, as a result of a peasant rebellion which resulted in some 30,000 deaths, the military dictatorship which has oppressed the people up until today was installed in power. Over the past 50 years military government has been followed by military government, serving the interests of the oligarchy, keeping the majority of people out of the political process and systematically blocking all moves in a democratic direction. I will have something more to say about that in light of the observations made by the present American ambassador to the United Nations.

After the Sandinista victory in Nicaragua just a few years ago it was clear that this experience would have far-reaching implications in the region, particularly for those struggling for democracy against tyrannical regimes. Nowhere was this more immediate or apparent than in El Salvador where, on October 15, 1979, a group of young military officers ousted the military dictator, General Carlos Romero. The formation of a civilian military government was announced, and hopes were immediately raised everywhere that the attainment of genuine democracy would not encounter the bitter and bloody resistance which had occurred in Nicaragua. This was particularly the case when a leading social democrat, Manuel Ungo, was nominated by 14 popular organizations to join the five-man ruling junta. Another social democrat, Hector Oqeli, was appointed deputy minister of foreign affairs.

Hopes that the promised, much needed reforms could be implemented were soon dashed. The security forces began new acts of terrorism. The stated objective of the new government had been the democratization of the country, including serious political and economic reforms. However, it soon became evident to the people and the democratic civilian sectors of the government that powerful forces long established in El Salvador would remain opposed to these democratic goals. The rightist sectors of the army grew stronger and eventually displaced the democratically-oriented elements of the army which were in the junta. Once again, repression against the people and violation of human rights became commonplace in El Salvador. At the same time the oligarchy and its allies within and outside the government opposed and blocked, as I have said, all attempts at democratic reform. This included assassination of leaders of other political parties.

Then in January, 1980, almost all the civilian members of the government resigned. The hopes that the regime which came into existence just a year and a half earlier had awakened in the land were completely crushed. During the past year the junta, now consisting of only the most reactionary civilians and the military, has continued to exist only by means of military force. The junta has pretended that serious economic reform has taken place. In fact, the so-called reforms have been no more than cosmetic. Instead of genuine human reform, since its beginning in January of last year the current government has provided what has been characterized as "reform by death". That is to say, the fundamental objective of the regime has been the extermination of all opposition through indiscriminate repression and violence on an almost incredible scale.

Robert White, the former United States ambassador, said in an article which I read yesterday in The New York Times the following: "They have killed at a minimum 5,000 or 6,000 kids just on mere suspicion". This inhuman objective of eliminating in a vicious way all opposition was covered up by the so-called reformist agrarian proposals which have been, according to OXFAM and many other groups, a sham. This totally insubstantial land reform policy was matched by another alleged reform of the banking system which, in reality, has left the credit structure of the nation completely unchanged.

What have been the results of such action? They are pretty obvious. They are what one can expect at this point in the twentieth century with a regime of this character. With all peaceful means of change blocked by the military, the opposition parties and other organizations, including church groups, reached the conclusion that popular insurrection was the only means of obtaining freedom, genuine human rights and democracy for the people of El Salvador.

The United States once had a distinguished president by the name of Thomas Jefferson, and of all people in the world the people in the United States should understand that if an oligarchy controls a nation and tyrannical forces are in charge, the only alternative to such violence and tyranny organized by the state is violence in the hands of the people themselves. That is a regrettable truth, but a truth nonetheless.

The systematic and indiscriminate violence of the junta has continued, but to face this the Democratic Revolutionary Front was created. I want to say something about the front. The front was organized to co-ordinate the efforts of more than 40 organizations ranging from moderate priests and professionals to social democrats, dissident Christian democrats and, yes, some Marxists. The leader of this movement is Manuel Ungo, now in exile in Mexico. Its program is not to set up an extremist, leftist state of an authoritarian kind; quite the contrary, its stated objective, reflecting its heterogeneous composition, is the creation of a political democracy with a mixed economy internationally non-aligned with any of the great powers. That surely is a commendable objective for an oppressed people.

At last count in El Salvador, at least 15,000 people have been killed, the majority victims of the armed forces and their semi-official death squads. There have been humane killings, although, of course, that is totally objectionable; but there have been indiscriminate killings on the part of the other side as well. That happens in a civil war. But there is no doubt at all as to what is the principal source and the principal agent of this conflict: it is the junta on the right. Mutilated corpses of the victims of the military regime remain in the streets of the capital. The most peaceful of people in the nation have been murdered. Monsignor Oscar Romero, archbishop of San Salvador, was gunned down right at the altar of his church last March because of his support for the legitimate aspirations of El Salvador's poor.

More recently, on October 4 the mutilated body of the spokeswoman for human rights, Maria Magdalena Henrigues, was found on the outskirts of San Salvador. One of the most gruesome incidents was the murder last May of more than 600 peasants by Salvadorean national guardsmen as the peasants attempted to flee across the border into Honduras.

The reality is that El Salvador is in a state of bloody civil war produced by a right-wing regime. This fact is obscured by the present United States government, which keeps portraying the present junta as representing moderation between the violent extremes of the left and right. The reality is quite different. The junta is part of the extreme right and is bereft of any popular support in the country. It lacks any shred of moral legitimacy and is thus inherently unstable. As William LeGrande and Carla Anne Robbins remarked in a recent issue of Foreign Affairs:

> What Washington appears to be incapable of grasping is that in El Salvador, as in Nicaragua before it, the centrist forces which the United States perceives as its allies have joined with the very forces which the United States regards as its natural enemy—the radical left. The centrists are no longer in the centre . . . The recently unified left and centre left opposition includes everyone but the government and the far right.

That is the reality in El Salvador, whatever the current American state department would like everyone to believe. I regret to say that the people most zealously deploying the carefully contrived "moderate and reformist" image of the junta are supporters and advisers of the newly elected President of the United States, who announced in the presidential transition period that the Carter administration had been sponsoring social reform in El Salvador instead of "sticking to basics". As Alexander Cockburn in the current issue of Harpers magazine says, under these circumstances "—the basics are familiar enough: first find your dictator"—which is defined as firm leadership—"and then stick to him"—define that as constancy to our allies—"however many people he kills."

● (1520)

Since President Reagan's election, military aid to the Salvadorean junta has been increasing on a regular basis. On March 3 it was reported that a total of 54 American military advisers had been sent to El Salvador and that $50 million in military aid has been pledged to the junta by the U.S. government. As a result of this military aid, including lethal weapons, the junta has been able to increase its capacity to kill peasants, dynamite organs of the Catholic church, and murder trade unionists. The military operations that the junta launches against the population, especially the rural population, have resulted in thousands of Salvadoreans abandoning their homes and becoming refugees. The churches have established seven refugee camps in the principal cities which house more than 3,000 displaced persons. In neighbouring countries, the number of refugees grows every day. In Honduras alone it is estimated there are more than 10,000 refugees. In Costa Rica there are 3,000. It has not been possible to calculate how many refugees are in Guatemala.

Instead of supporting such a regime, all democrats and certainly all democratic governments, including the Government of Canada, should join in their condemnation and mount pressure in the international community to bring peace and democracy to this troubled land.

Regrettably, and I mean that, because there has been a shift in U.S. policy, President Reagan's new policies extend well beyond El Salvador. The new American ambassador to the United Nations, Jean Kirkpatrick, recently explored a line of reasoning that has to disturb all of us. In the article entitled "Dictatorships and Double Standards", she presents arguments of the following kind in support of right-wing authoritarianism. First, she wrote:

> Traditional autocrats . . . do not disturb the habitual rhythms of work and leisure, habitual patterns of family and personal relations. Because the miseries of traditional life are familiar, they are bearable to ordinary people—

She also writes, justifying a preference for right-wing authoritarianism over left-wing authoritarianism, that:

> Although there is no instance of a revolutionary 'socialist' or communist society being democratized, right-wing autocracies do sometimes evolve into democracies—given time—

Regrettably, history does not accord with the ambassador's academic simplifications. In reality, the opposite has been the history of right-wing regimes throughout Latin America, as she should well know. Somoza firmly ruled for more than 45 years. El Salvador has had more than 50 years of military rule, as I have just sketched in.

What characterized these regimes and similar ones throughout Latin America is not a movement, as she suggests, toward democracy, but the systematic repression of all the ordinary people and civil libertarian forces in those countries that wanted to create democracy. That has been the real history, whatever the ambassador might say. The only equivalent to the new American apologetics for right-wing regimes in Latin America is the kind of double-think attacks one finds now in Pravda on the solidarity movement in Poland. They are fully equivalent.

Those of us who believe in democracy must not get into the shallow game of "preferring" left-wing or right-wing repression. Repression is repression is repression, and I am disturbed that the new administration in the United States is about to wage a propagandistic battle in support of foreign policy steps designed to prop up, in a material way, right-wing regimes. The United States moves in support of the junta in El Salvador seem to me to be illustrations of a new, over-all foreign policy which completely abandons President Carter's commendable, if at times flawed, commitment to human rights.

A report in yesterday's New York Times is illustrative of this new direction in American foreign policy. The lead paragraph, not of an editorial but of a news item on about page 6, reads as follows:

> The Reagan administration is moving rapidly to improve relations with South America's right-wing military regimes through invitations to military leaders from Chile, Brazil, and, in a few days, Argentina, for talks here.

What has Robert E. White, former U.S. ambassador to El Salvador, said about military support for such right-wing regimes? He said this:

> To the extent that you emphasize a military solution in El Salvador, you are going to be buttressing one of the most out-of-control, violent, bloodthirsty groups of men in the world.

He warns that this kind of action is precisely the kind which will foster left-wing authoritarianism. He describes this new direction of the Reagan administration as a "disaster". Mr. White, the former U.S. ambassador in El Salvador, is right. We must do everything we can and so must the free world, to help the people of El Salvador; not prop up those who tyrannize them.

I want to turn immediately to the position of the Government of Canada, Mr. Speaker, and I will be brief. I could quote at considerable length the vacillating positions taken by the Government of Canada on this very important moral and practical issue of foreign policy. All I will say, however, is that the government has moved from acquiescence, on the one hand, to mild disapproval, on the other.

I should like to say on behalf of my colleagues that surely it is time for the Government of Canada to send a clear public message to the new administration in the United States which would consist of the following points. First, there should be no outside military intervention on the part of anyone in the terrible civil war that is going on in El Salvador. It should be left to the people in that troubled land to settle their own fate. Second, particularly the United States, as the world's first mass democracy, must not militarily prop up vicious regimes like that which operates in El Salvador. Finally, in a constructive mood, instead of acquiescing or being mildly critical, Canada should offer its services to join with other non-major powers like Mexico to play a mediating role in helping to bring both peace and democracy to El Salvador.

It is time to get off the fence. It is time to take some initiative to bring peace to this troubled land.

El Salvador

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, for weeks now, indeed for months, our nightly newscasts and our newspapers have been filled with reports of the fighting, the brutality and the fear that characterizes El Salvador. A year ago, outsiders paid but little heed to this tiny Central American country. There were few who discussed it but many do so today, for today the world knows that El Salvador is a country in distress. It is a country whose people are locked into a class war, the great majority of whom are struggling for that kind of life which will offer them the opportunity for dignity and for hope. It is a country where fewer than 2 per cent of the population own more than half of the arable land, a country where the great bulk of the population live in abject poverty, their annual income a mere $600. It is a country which, as we know from history, has time and again expressed its desire for a democratic government, only to have those desires frustrated when elections were either disregarded or aborted.

● (1530)

These factors ought to remind us that El Salvador is not simply a pawn in the context of the United States and the Soviet Union. It reflects the problems of Third World countries, where people are seeking the twin objectives of economic development and political stability. As such, El Salvador should remind us that we are looking not just at a small country, but at an entire region of potential instability which could encompass not only Central America but the whole of the Caribbean.

All this makes more extraordinary the comments of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan). In response to a question I posed to him last Tuesday, as recorded at page 7767 of Hansard, he said:

—I am not aware that we have any serious obligations in that part of the world, in Central America, which is not an area of traditional Canadian interest.

I would say to you, sir, that of course we have in that part of the world interests which are historic, geographic, economic and indeed moral. It is typical of this government to take such a narrow view of foreign policy. It leads to a failure to distinguish and analyse the consequences for Canada of situations like that in El Salvador. We ought to know by now that there are direct consequences for us. We need only recollect the human tragedy and the great difficulty caused by the flow of refugees from southeast Asia and the need for collective action to provide humanitarian relief to them.

Was southeast Asia also an area in which Canada had no interest? We have all the elements in El Salvador of a situation which could well produce a stream of refugees. It is estimated that already 60,000 people have fled that country to seek refuge in neighbouring states. I will be interested to see how the Secretary of State for External Affairs responds in the eventuality that an increasing number of El Salvadoreans become political refugees looking to countries such as Canada for assistance.

Then there is a broader sense in which Canada cannot remain indifferent to conflict in the western hemisphere. It has the potential to widen the rift between the United States and our European allies. It is clear, for example, that in the present situation West Germany is strongly opposed to the United States policy of injecting more arms into the conflict. I ask the minister, does the Canadian government have no interest in the potential that exists, as Vietnam did, to divide the alliance? It is obvious that we have both an interest and an obligation to explore any and all ways in which we can exercise a restraining influence, contrary to what the minister says.

I am already well on record as being opposed to military intervention by the United States in El Salvador or by any other power. The people of El Salvador are looking for a political solution to their problems, not a military one. Even members of the government of that country have said that there is already enough military equipment at the disposal of the junta. It is wrong for the United States to treat the problem as if it were solely in the context of East-West relations or to overdramatize the Soviet threat in El Salvador. There can be no doubt that some of its citizens are terrorists and insurgents and communist sympathizers, but their numbers are relatively few and their military might weak. We have only to look at the results of their recent military campaigns to see their very weakness.

We should also remember that there are extremists on the right who bear the responsibility for hundreds, perhaps thousands, of deaths and for human rights abuses. The present government, which lacks a popular basis of support and is becoming increasingly the captive of the right, had initially put into effect some social and economic reforms, but tragically all of these are now being held in abeyance. What is important for us to realize is that the great majority of the people in El Salvador lie between the extremes of right and left. Motivated to improve their conditions, they have found a response to their efforts in the support and encouragement they have received from church groups of all denominations, particularly Catholic bishops, and from non-governmental organizations from many countries.

The majority of the population in El Salvador is not looking for arms but for aid to reach its objectives. The great fear I have is that if additional military equipment and force of arms are used against them by a government which lacks credibility, they could be pushed further and further to extremes. The civil war could escalate rapidly if the right and the left factions were further armed one against the other. In that case, the strength of the large majority of people would be lost and that, above all, is what we must seek to avoid.

The government should make it plain that it believes the United States should do nothing to aggravate the situation, and neither should any other country. Until a short time ago, I would have thought the Liberal government more or less shared these views, even though the Secretary of State for External Affairs had indicated his unwillingness, as he put it, "to lead a public crusade" against United States military involvement in El Salvador.

Earlier statements and actions had indicated, so I thought, Canada's strong backing for non-interference. For example, a joint communique of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Brazilian foreign minister on October 1, 1980, stated:

The two ministers exchanged views about the current situation in Latin America and the Caribbean . . . They expressed the hope that the countries concerned would be able to overcome their difficulties without foreign interference and in accordance with the wishes of their peoples.

Again, the Secretary of State for External Affairs will recall meeting with the Mexican foreign minister. They issued a communique on January 9, 1981 which stated:

The two foreign ministers . . . expressed the hope that the existing conflicts in Central America will be resolved by means of the free expression of the will of the respective peoples and without foreign interference.

I would draw the minister's attention once more to the vote taken on the resolution at the United Nations on December 15, 1980, a resolution for which Canada voted. That resolution reads:

Considering that the supply of arms and other military assistance will serve to aggravate the situation in that country, the General Assembly calls upon governments to refrain from the supply of arms and other military assistance in the current circumstances.

What we voted for at the United Nations was "to refrain from the supply of arms and other military assistance in the current circumstances". What, then, are we to make of the comment by the minister, after consultation with officials of the Reagan administration—a comment he has refused to deny—that:

● (1540)

I would certainly not condemn any decision the United States takes to send offensive arms . . . the United States can count on our quiet acquiescence—

Or quiescence, as he later corrected. His previous so-called commitment to non-intervention makes all the more appalling the minister's declaration on February 4. I find it very difficult to understand, in light of the previous statements by the minister when he met with foreign ministers from Brazil, Venezuela and Mexico and when he instructed the delegation at the United Nations to vote for non-interference, that he would make the statement he did on February 4, that he would not condemn any decision the United States takes to send weapons to El Salvador. I believe that is wrong, as I believe it is wrong for any nation to send arms to El Salvador.

Not only does it repudiate Canada's approach at the United Nations, not only does it repudiate the expressed views of the Canadian government taken jointly with the governments of Mexico, Brazil and Venezuela, but the Secretary of State for External Affairs' attitude of quiet acquiescence demonstrates that he is incapable of making independent judgments, based on Canada's interest, when faced by American foreign policy-makers.

A foreign minister must be able to distinguish between requests for solidarity that are inevitable and those that are unnecessary. As Secretary of State for External Affairs at the time, I sought to lend full support to the Carter administration in response to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. I was convinced that we ought to condemn that invasion. In fact, although the government of which I was a part was much criticized by the official opposition in Ottawa at that time, we sought positive ways in which to communicate to the Soviets our determined opposition to their behaviour. That behaviour threatened detente and made a general conflict more likely, and I would say that in the case of Poland we have a similar need to impress on the Soviets our unshakeable opposition to any military intervention. I wish the minister would be stronger in his statements to this effect.

But a foreign minister must be able to distinguish between Afghanistan and El Salvador. Nothing that has been said here this afternoon removes the minister's statement of February 4 from the record, or explains his failure to address the underlying issues.

What can Canada do? I ask that because I think it is important that we not merely raise criticisms but that we try to offer constructive suggestions to help resolve the increasing conflict in El Salvador. In the short term, it may be possible for this country to contribute to the improvement of the situation by engaging in extensive consultation with El Salvador's neighbouring states to obtain their views on the present situation, and to determine whether there is the possibility of an international role to insulate El Salvador from external interference.

Second, the Canadian government should explore the possibility of international action through the United Nations or another appropriate international body. The purpose would be to establish the degree of outside intervention in El Salvador and to monitor the situation while the conflict continues. Such an international body could have a stabilizing effect and be the start of a process leading to a political settlement not only in that troubled country, but in that very troubled part of the world. In exploring this possibility, we might be able to associate ourselves with such countries as Brazil, Venezuela, Mexico and West Germany, all of which have been willing to provide good offices to help stabilize the situation.

These are the short-run possibilities. In the long run what we must realize is that these conflicts will never be resolved as long as the underlying causes are ignored. It is senseless for the government, through the minister, to say that we have no interest in El Salvador while, on the other hand, it prides itself on promoting the North-South dialogue. Until we are willing to treat the basic issues of health, nutrition, housing, education and employment, we will continue to be faced with the tensions that today beset El Salvador and elsewhere in Central America.

There is a strong case for increasing Canadian aid both to Central America and to the Caribbean since these are areas which will most affect us if they are to become more and more a region of conflict and instability. One of my major interests as minister was to focus the attention of my department on the Caribbean and Central America, an interest the present minister does not appear to share.

For these reasons, I would like to see the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) convey to President Reagan our disappointment that the United States does not intend to place a high priority on foreign aid and the North-South dialogue. He should assure the President that Canada is willing to play its part and more, but that we look for greater commitment and leadership on this critical issue from the United States, which is, after all, the wealthiest and most powerful state.

In all of this we should remember that the people of El Salvador have an absolute right to determine their own future without foreign intervention. Our task is to help create the circumstances in which the parties in El Salvador can continue their own negotiations. What we can hope for in that process is for a government that will represent the will of the people of El Salvador.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the fundamental problem with the motion before the House today is that its drafters are people with an obsession with black and white, and a permanent feature of their obsession is obviously that black is always to be presumptively deemed the colour of the American side and white that of the fighting left.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: You didn't listen to my speech.

Mr. MacGuigan: I am speaking about the motion. The hon. gentleman may have tried in his speech to disguise the heart of his motion, but his motion is in exactly the terms I am describing. In my view, a debate conducted on the premises of today's motion would be more suitable for a high school auditorium than for this distinguished chamber.

The motion identifies the government of El Salvador as a repressive regime "fighting those who wish to establish a democratic government". Opinions may perhaps differ as to the character of the regime but not as to the character and motivations of those fighting against it. As Robert E. White, the former U.S. ambassador to El Salvador, quoted fulsomely by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), said in a colloquy, sponsored by members of the Congress for Peace Through Law on February 26, which was printed by the New York Times yesterday:

> The ultimate enemy of western civilization and of the U.S. in El Salvador is a Marxist-Leninist group dedicated to the overthrow of the government by force, and the elimination of all U.S. influence from that region.

Another participant in the colloquium put it this way:

> Even though the political leaders of the left, like Guillermo Ungo, have impeccable democratic credentials, the men with the guns—according to Mr. White—are committed Marxist-Leninists.

According to the simplistic pieties of this motion, however, the men with the guns are "those who wish to establish a democratic government".

It would appear that the Leader of the New Democratic Party does not wish to condemn the use of these guns or the supply of such guns to the revolutionary forces in El Salvador which were being supplied months before the United States began to supply arms there. On the contrary, he seems to condone it or perhaps even commend it because he argued in the House on March 2 that the left-wing forces are somehow morally justified in military action against the government of El Salvador.

• (1550)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is bad enough to listen to the banalities of the minister, but I wish he would stick to the truth. I said categorically in my statements—and I want the minister to reply to this and abandon the text written for him and respond to the debate—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a point of order he should state it.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister just said, as I was coming back to the chamber after checking one of his other inaccuracies, that I was giving support to one side in terms of military intervention. The minister nods indicating that is what I said. If he had listened to my speech he would know I said categorically that all people outside should stay out on both sides.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased the hon. gentleman takes that position today but he implied something else in the House on March 2, and that is what I was quoting.

We have our differences with the United States on El Salvador and we are prepared to express them, but our differences are not over rejecting the violence, whether from the Marxist-Leninist left or from the extreme right, or over halting the importation of huge quantities of arms from Cuba and other communist countries through Nicaragua into El Salvador. Our differences are principally with respect to the provision of American military assistance to the government of El Salvador, which we believe is neither desirable nor necessary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacGuigan: I am obviously getting to those hon. members, Mr. Speaker. They obviously do not like hearing the truth.

We have expressed our disagreement with the American government on this point both privately and publicly, but we believe in doing so in terms which are appropriate to the cause and not wildly inflated because of some paranoia of the left. President Reagan has insisted that sending American troops to El Salvador is "not in our reckoning at all". Secretary of State Haig has warned right-wing extremists in El Salvador that a rightist coup would have serious consequences to the continuation of U.S. aid.

In light of the full circumstances, therefore, as we see them, we are prepared to contest the U.S. policy of military aid but not to protest it; we are prepared to pronounce on it but not to denounce it; we are prepared to criticize it but not to condemn it. As the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) has said, one must distinguish between El Salvador and Afghanistan. It is unfortunate she was unable to make that distinction and would denounce this action of the U.S. in terms of the kind which she and others used to describe Soviet action in Afghanistan. In other words, we believe in seeing the situation in El Salvador as it is and also in describing it as it is, not as idées fixes might describe it.

In turning to a fuller exposition of the position of the Canadian government, it might be useful if I were first to provide the government's perspective of the nature of change affecting Central America as a whole and the extent of Canada's ties, capabilities, and interests with this part of the world before dealing with El Salvador in detail.

The countries of Central America are undergoing a difficult process of change from traditional regimes to new species of political, social and economic organizations. In certain states change is being accompanied by increasing violence and instability.

It is interesting that those over there on the left suggest I should not lecture them. We have just been subjected to another lecture from that side, so why should we not have our say over here?

Economically, the impact of external influences, in particular oil price rises, increased costs for other imports, fluctuating prices for principal export commodities and the reduction in economic activity in industrialized countries have slowed economic growth throughout Central America in recent years. Internal political and security problems are now affecting economic performance. In Costa Rica, the only state in the region with a long-standing tradition of democracy, the rising costs of social services have led to severe fiscal constraints. The governments of other Central American states, dominated by right-wing military dictators throughout most of their history, neglected the social sector until recently and have not had to face the same economic problem.

These states are now paying dearly for this neglect. Unresolved social problems are at the heart of pressures for political change and constitute the single most important cause of regional instability. It is no coincidence that the highest levels of instability in Latin America are to be found in Central America where general standards of health care, nutrition and literacy are among the lowest in the hemisphere. It is likewise no coincidence that hemispheric instability is centred in the region which has the highest rate of population growth in Latin America, with a population expected to grow from its present level of 20 million to 40 million by the year 2000.

While conditions differ among states, unequal income distribution, high rates of population growth, unemployment and unresolved agrarian problems are the most serious socioeconomic problems throughout Central America. The income distribution problem is probably the most important. Gulfs between "haves" and "have nots" have widened in recent years as the increase in wealth derived from growing national economies has not been passed on to the populations who have suffered losses in real income through inflation. The problem in Central America is one of growing expectations as populations seek to obtain a larger share of the benefits of economic growth.

El Salvador

This lack of government attention to basic human needs has in large part generated the internal pressures for change in El Salvador and Guatemala and was the major stimulus behind the overthrow of the Somoza government. Attention to the social needs of populations in Honduras and in Panama has led to greater stability in these states.

Politically, as recently as two years ago, all states of the area except Costa Rica were governed by military dictatorships allied to conservative oligarchies. Since that time dramatic changes have occurred in those states which formerly opposed even moderate change. In Nicaragua, popular discontent developed into a struggle led by the Sandinistas supported from abroad and resulted in the downfall of Somoza.

Turning to human rights, with some exceptions a tradition of respect for human rights, whether political, social or economic, has never existed in Central America. On the contrary, political violence, both in support of the traditional power structure and perpetuated against its representatives, has been a constant of regional political life for decades.

New leaders are emerging in both the military and economic establishments of all countries who recognize the need to modernize societies, to steer their states through a period of complex transition and to effect social and political justice. They are opposed by representatives of the traditional power structure and are often victims of right and left-wing extremists—from the former, the right-wing extremists, for betraying their origins, and from the latter, the left-wing extremists, for threatening to remove the basis for revolutionary change. In both El Salvador and Guatemala, the actions of both left and right have eliminated many leading moderates. In Nicaragua, gross violations of human rights did not occur following the overthrow of Somoza but limitations have been placed on press freedoms and elections have been postponed until 1985.

What is the nature of Canada's involvement in the region in these circumstances? Central America, unlike the neighbouring Commonwealth Caribbean, has not been the focus of traditional Canadian interest and bilateral political contacts have been infrequent. Canadians have had little in common with the ruling oligarchies and have regarded with repugnance the violence and widespread violations of human rights which have characterized the Central American political scene.

Commercial and economic development ties have been and will remain of some importance. Economically, Canadian investment in Central America is of significance, totalling about $300 million for the region. However, over $250 million of this investment is concentrated in one industry, nickel extraction, and in one country, Guatemala. Investors are now being discouraged by political uncertainty. Central America also constitutes an important market for Canadian businessmen, with annual exports totalling over $100 million, much of which is labour-intensive manufactured goods.

● (1600)

In development assistance terms, despite the absence of close political ties, Canada has recognized the pressing needs of the region and has been a leading aid donor in Central America, providing more than $60 million in bilateral aid since 1972. In terms of concentration, Honduras and El Salvador, as the poorest of the area, have received the largest portion of the funding.

El Salvador and Honduras are program countries. Guatemala is a project country, and Costa Rica and Nicaragua are eligible for mission administered funds only. Cabinet has agreed that Nicaragua will become a project country effective April of this year. At the present time, the assistance to Guatemala which started in the wake of the 1976 earthquake is being allowed to run out, given the growing levels of violence in that country, and planning for new projects has been suspended in El Salvador as a consequence of the civil war.

What does this mean in terms of Canadian policy toward the area? In contrast to the neighbouring Commonwealth Caribbean, where Canada has long been regarded as a major outside power, Canada has no special expertise or capability in Central American affairs and is not as well placed as regional states, such as Venezuela or Mexico, to exert a positive influence on the evolution of the area. Canada's interests, while important and growing, are likewise not of the same order of importance as our interests elsewhere in Latin America, such as in Mexico, Venezuela and Brazil. While naturally sharing the concern of the international community, we therefore have no more obligation than other states in taking a leading role in resolving the conflict.

Turning now to deal specifically with El Salvador, Canada has never had major bilateral ties with that country; and has no resident ambassador there. However, in recent years we have been involved in providing development assistance in recognition of the pressing economic needs of its population.

The basic problems of El Salvador, which has the highest population density and the lowest per capita income of any country in Central America, relate to the critical need of the people of that country for opportunities of economic development and social justice which have been denied them for many decades by a series of authoritarian governments.

Canada, like many other countries, welcomed the overthrow of the dictatorial regime of general Carlos Romero in 1979 and its replacement by the government of progressive civilian and military leaders. This government adopted a number of social and economic measures which it believed would bring about needed social reforms. For example, it nationalized the banks and foreign trade. It also took initial steps to introduce a much needed land reform and adopted other measures in an attempt to provide a government which would be more attentive to the political, social and economic needs and aspirations of the population.

The new civilian-military junta was not very successful in accomplishing its worth-while objectives. It encountered increasing opposition from extremist right-wing elements both within the government security forces and outside the government, often financed by expatriate supporters of the previous regime who objected to the reform program, and also from left-wing forces who felt either that the reform movement was not moving forward fast enough or who saw it as diminishing their own political influence. During the course of 1980 both these right-wing and left-wing opponents of the civilian-military junta government resorted to increasing intimidation and attacks on the government. They perpetrated an escalating number of murders, assassinations, tortures and other atrocities which have shocked the conscience of the world.

In December, 1980 the civilian-military junta underwent an internal reorganization designed to enable it to proceed more successfully with its political and social objectives and Mr. Jose Napoleon Duarte, a respected Christian democrat, was made president. In 1972, in one of the few honest elections in El Salvador, Mr. Duarte emerged as victor but was prevented from taking power by a military coup. He is widely believed to be the best person to lead a reformist government at the present time. President Duarte has pledged to turn over 40 per cent of the land to small land owners, to proceed with other social reforms, to hold free elections in 1982—three years earlier, I might add, than the leftist regime in Nicaragua—and to grant an amnesty to left-wing guerrillas. President Duarte's government has dismissed a number of military officers accused of human rights abuses and has very recently ordered the arrest of a notorious right-wing retired major who has alledgedly been advocating a right-wing military coup. Unfortunately President Duarte's government has experienced the same attacks from the left and the right, with the result that the human tragedy and loss of lives in El Salvador continues unabated.

When considering the current situation in El Salvador, it is important to put developments into the historical context which I previously outlined and to remember that, despite its failings and weaknesses, it is still the legal government of El Salvador and is recognized as such in the United Nations by Canada and by all other governments. While there are conflicting views held about the ability of the Duarte government to achieve its objectives of political, social and economic reform, we consider, as do many other governments in western Europe and in Latin America, that in the present circumstances it may nevertheless still be the most feasible channel through which the people of El Salvador can achieve democratic solutions to their political, economic and social problems if its extremist opponents on the left and the right can be brought under control.

The consistent position of the Government of Canada has been to deplore the senseless violence in El Salvador and to urge that the people of El Salvador be allowed to settle their political and economic difficulties peacefully and democratically without outside interference. These sentiments were shared by other governments and were endorsed in the communiques I mentioned in the House on March 2, which the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has paid me the courtesy of reading this afternoon. That is exactly our policy.

In late 1980 and early 1981, the level of violence in El Salvador continued to escalate and the revolutionary forces mounted increasingly concentrated armed attacks on the government with the apparent intention of overthrowing it by armed force. Prior to this time the government of the United States had supplied the government of El Salvador with a modest amount of non-lethal military equipment, such as communications equipment, uniforms, etc. However, when it became apparent that the revolutionary forces had obtained substantial quantities of arms, many of them of a sophisticated nature, and were bent on the overthrow of the legitimate government, the outgoing Carter administration authorized the supply of lethal military equipment to enable the government of El Salvador to deal with the threat to overthrow it.

On January 26, 1981, I met in Ottawa with two representatives of the revolutionary side who told me that their arms were acquired by purchase on the international arms black market with funds which had been acquired by bank robberies and kidnapping of businessmen and foreign diplomats, including the ambassador of South Africa who was subsequently murdered by his captors. In this context it is worth noting that these revolutionary forces have been responsible for 28 assaults on foreign embassies in the last two years, as well as armed attacks on the Salvadorian foreign ministry and other government buildings. The Swiss chargé d'affaires was killed in 1979; the French ambassador was kidnapped within hours of his arrival in San Salvador and was held for 30 days; the Costa Rican embassy has been occupied three times in the past year and a half. The record and conduct of extremist right-wing elements, both within and without the government security forces, is equally bad. They are believed to be responsible for the assassination of Archbishop Romero, just a year ago this month, and the brutal murders of priests, Salvadorian politicians and American churchwomen.

Subsequently the United States government published a white paper on February 23, 1981 indicating that the United States had obtained incontrovertible evidence that massive amounts of weapons and military equipment of western origin, presumably to disguise their source—some of which have been specifically identified as being U.S. weapons left behind in Vietnam—had been provided to the revolutionary forces in El Salvador by a number of socialist bloc countries and funnelled through Nicaragua, with the apparent co-operation of some officials of the Nicaraguan government. We have no reason to doubt this evidence, which is also accepted as valid by many other governments.

Miss Jewett: And no reason to accept it, either.

Mr. MacGuigan: The current political and military situation in El Salvador is obviously highly fluid and we are not in a position to make assessments on the basis of first-hand information. However, our policy is not confused. On the contrary, it has been clear, concise and consistent. Throughout this period it has been the Canadian government's policy not to supply arms to either side in El Salvador or to any other country in Central America. I might say that there was a grievous error recently in the Toronto Globe and Mail in which it stated to the contrary. The information was obtained as a result of a reporter reading the wrong column in a series of statistics, but the newspaper has never bothered to correct the record. The policy has thus been consistently implemented, and press reports to the contrary are quite inaccurate.

We do not believe that the problems of El Salvador can be resolved by military measures. We urge all other governments to follow the same policy and refrain from supplying offensive weapons, the use of which only causes increased violence and suffering for the people of El Salvador. We strongly support the traditional principle of international law, which is one of opposition to any interference from the outside in another country's domestic affairs.

We also believe that the problems of El Salvador can be solved only through political discussion and negotiation by the Salvadorian parties directly concerned. I explained this to the representatives of the revolutionary forces when I met with them in January. I also explained it to Secretary Haig in Washington. I have explained it to the House, and I have explained it many times to the Canadian news media. It will serve no useful purpose to engage in public denunciations. I can assure the House that we will continue to make our views in this regard known in bilateral contacts with the United States and in the appropriate multilateral fora, as we have done in the past, as and when appropriate.

We fully share the sentiments of hon. members with respect to the killings, atrocities and abuses of human rights in El Salvador and, like all Canadians, we deplore them. Bilaterally, we have made frequent representations to the government of El Salvador. Multilaterally, we have been among the most active of all states in fora such as the OAS and the United Nations in seeking to mobilize international opinion in favour of a greater respect for human rights in the Salvadorian conflict. During the current session of the UN Human Rights Commission we are actively working for a constructive resolution which will call for a restoration of respect for human rights and an end to all arms supplies to all parties in El Salvador.

As for the future, we believe that there is an urgent need for a political settlement which will enable the moderate democratic elements in the government of El Salvador and in the revolutionary forces to coalesce. Canada welcomes the first signs of a willingness to negotiate on the part of the government. The president of El Salvador, Mr. Duarte, has recently indicated that his government is prepared to have a dialogue with the revolutionary forces, and it is now up to those forces to respond. We have no illusions that the process will be easy, since the more extreme elements on both sides will resist making the concessions necessary for a lasting solution. In the interim, the revolutionary forces should cease undermining the efforts of the government to introduce its reform package, and both sides should take immediate steps to stamp out mindless violence.

Having made those points, it should be remembered that historically Canada has not had strong or important links with El Salvador. It is a country near our part of the world but hardly a neighbour. However, the human tragedy of El Salvador has engaged the attention of all countries.

In this situation, what are our responsibilities? The first is to try to inform ourselves so that when we discuss these issues we at least do so knowledgeably. Even this is not easy. Much of our information is indirect and partial. It is refracted through the prisms of particular points of view before it reaches us. Views conflict and there is even conflict about matters of fact.

In the circumstances, the views of countries near El Salvador or with more important interests in El Salvador than Canada are more important to us. We note that some of these countries, whose views we respect, have taken a stand close to our own. There has yet been no initiative to refer the situation in El Salvador to the United Nations, nor is it being dealt with in the OAS. A number of countries have said, as we have, that the flow of arms from whatever source should cease, and that political and economic solutions to El Salvador's problems should be sought. But no government—not Mexico, Venezuela or the Federal Republic of Germany—contrary to the words of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, has yet gone beyond this to launch a political initiative in order to bring an end to the internal strife with the aid of some outside mediator. Therefore, it hardly seems prudent for Canada to put itself in such a role, if that is what the opposition is advocating.

Some hon. Members: Why not?

Mr. MacGuigan: Indeed, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, in her capacity as secretary of state for external affairs, came to the same conclusion concerning Nicaragua as I have with respect to El Salvador.

Miss MacDonald: No, indeed I did not. We sent aid.

Mr. MacGuigan: I recall her words on the radio program "As It Happens" on July 6, 1979:

—we are not in a position to carry out any special relations with Nicaragua . . . I am not advocating that Canada jump in with any kind of a force or with any kind of a heavy hand to try to straighten out an internal, very difficult problem in Nicaragua, nor would I either in Nicaragua or in other countries.

Miss MacDonald: I certainly was not advocating force.

Mr. MacGuigan: In short, we have no more responsibility in the matter than any other sovereign state and, in practice, a good deal less knowledge and standing in relation to the problems of El Salvador than a number of other countries. Any sensible Canadian policy has to take these limitations into account. Sheer outpourings of moral indignation are not much help. They may ease the conscience but they do not advance the solution.

I think it is clear that there is no substantial ground whatsoever for this House to support this motion. I urge members to see the motion for what it is, namely, a calculated attempt to create tension between the Government of Canada and the government of the United States which will not add one iota of practical assistance to the real sufferers in this issue, namely, the people of El Salvador.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate as a friend of the United States and, more important, as a friend of the millions upon millions of people throughout the world today whose economic and social rights are being grossly violated. I hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) will not accuse me of moral outpourings of rage when I add to the words already spoken on the floor this afternoon about the real human tragedy that is at the heart of this motion.

I said I was a friend of the United States. I lived in the United States, Mr. Speaker, for ten years; indeed, three of my children were born in that country. I have travelled extensively through it and I feel that I have had the opportunity of understanding a great people. It is precisely because of that understanding and that friendship that I have for the United States that I am so opposed to continued American military involvement in El Salvador.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: But I say to the movers of the motion that it is a defective motion since it merely addresses itself to the question of the United States abstaining from or getting out of military involvement in El Salvador. It does not go on to make positive statements or recommendations, or even express a positive idea of what should be done in El Salvador in order to speak to the reasons why the Americans feel that they must prop up a regime for which the real contempt of this House should be expressed. I hope that in the few moments I have I will indicate a much more positive role for the United States to play in El Salvador and in that larger community of interest, the developing countries today, where 800 million people are grievously suffering from a lack of basic human needs.

● (1620)

El Salvador has suddenly been catapulted into international prominence. Do hon. members think the picture I have in my hand, which illustrates an article in the New York Times Sunday magazine entitled "The Agony of El Salvador", in which the corpses of two women are shown with their hands tied behind their backs, is the work of people who care about the suffering inside El Salvador? The residue of the famous 14 families of El Salvador has become its wealthy landowners. Listen to the New York Times description of this country:

And some 60 per cent of El Salvador's population is rural—

We already know there are five million people in that country, which is smaller in size than Vancouver Island.

—living in isolated valleys or mountain hamlets. Wooden-yoked oxen draw carts that ride on solid wooden wheels. Hundreds of thousands of peasants live in hovels made of packed mud; naked children with swollen bellies and open sores wander among the grunting pigs, garbage and flies. Their mothers and sisters trudge for an hour or more to the nearest well for water, carried in gourd-shaped plastic containers balanced on their heads.

A distinguished Canadian journalist, Hugh McCullum, the editor of the United Church Observer, went to El Salvador. After recounting the statistics of low caloric intake, high infant mortality and high percentages of malnutrition and illiteracy, Mr. McCullum says this:

The pattern is brutal exploitation, in which wealthy landowners have branched into industry and banking, even though they have now left the country with their profits, while the soldiers and police are used to ensure a steady supply of land, and a cheap and docile labour force.

That is at the heart of the situation in El Salvador and has led to a radicalization of the poor. When they became radicalized and aggressive, it was too much for the regime known as the juntas. It claims to have some validity since Duarte himself was elected in 1972. Irrespective of the legitimacy of the regime, it has had to react against this gradual coming together of the poor, who are helped by some of their own leaders. They rebel against 2 per cent of the people of the country owning 60 per cent of the land and against the conditions of misery into which their children are born.

The internal reforms which have been brought to El Salvador by the Duarte regime have clearly not lasted because they were not undertaken with conviction. The attempt to nationalize the banks and the sugar cane industry has fizzled out. Some people in El Salvador have been helped to improve themselves, but the reform never became a sign of hope to the people in El Salvador because it was immediately met by a wave of repression, goon squads employed by the wealthy and a paramilitary organization of the government.

Do hon. members think that it was the landless people who live in misery who shot Archbishop Romero while he was saying mass in his own cathedral in San Salvador, or who murdered nine priests, or who brutally slayed four American missionaries? Those killings can be laid at the door of the extreme right, the fanatics who want to stop any social reform which would benefit the wide masses of the people in El Salvador.

The Canadian Catholic Conference of Bishops has undertaken an in-depth survey and study of El Salvador, and I quote two major findings:

The vast majority of the victims of repression come from the poorer sectors, and proof can be established that they were murdered either by extreme right commandos or by the military;—

That is the first of the major findings. The second is this:

The junta systematically persecutes all progressive organizations claiming to do so in order to protect its centrist position against the extreme left. Yet, it does nothing to stop the actions of the paramilitary extreme right, let alone uncovering the real leaders behind them.

Along comes Ambassador White, relieved of his ambassadorial post representing the United States in El Salvador by the new Reagan administration, who says the policy of the American government to use military intervention to shore up this regime which is largely responsible for a wave of killings—which now total 13,194 over the past couple of years—is a policy of madness. Moreover, he says that these so-called leftist forces are only about 2,000, that there is not the slightest possibility that they could upset the ruling government and, in fact, that the ruling government had this situation well in hand.

Why, then, do we see the new American government pouring funds into, and augmenting its military advisers—now up to about 50—in a country in which there is no real threat that the government will be overthrown? Of course, we know that the reason is to stop communist advance in Central America. I applaud a stopping of the communist advance anywhere in the world, but to try to stop the communist advance by loading the problem on to the backs and shoulders of the poor in El Salvador is not the answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: Ambassador White said during his debate with Ambassador Kirkpatrick, the United States ambassador to the United Nations, which took place last week:

The important thing to realize is that this present government stopped the leftists cold, without receiving one rifle from the United States. Now is not the time to emphasize military assistance. Now is the time—when the leftists have been defeated—to emphasize a political solution.

● (1630)

To the extent that you emphasize a military solution in El Salvador, you are going to be buttressing one of the most out-of-control, violent, bloodthirsty groups of men in the world. They have killed—at a minimum—5,000 or 6,000 kids, just on the mere suspicion that they were involved with the leftists.

Archbishop Hickey, testifying before a House subcommittee last week and speaking for the American Catholic bishops as well as from his own experience in El Salvador, said that the situation there "is not principally a matter of guns, but of justice." He said that American bishops oppose military aid to El Salvador and find it "particularly ominous" that military advisers are being sent. He also said:

It is risky to the point of being reckless. It confirms the worst suspicions of Latin Americans that we are preparing for an invasion of El Salvador.

Again, referring to Pope John Paul's comments in the Philippines about human rights for workers in the course of his most recent journey, Archbishop Hickey said:

I can assure you that if some of those things that were said by the Holy Father were said in El Salvador by the simple catechists, by the local parish priests, that person would be in danger of his life.

In the issue of March 2, The Christian Science Monitor carried an article by Geoffrey Godsell who put his finger on the core of the situation. The lead paragraph reads as follows:

The Reagan administration has clearly chosen El Salvador as the best of the options available to send a signal to—and even test—the Soviet Union.

Today we find ourselves debating this issue. I believe that it is absolutely essential for the United States to hear from its friends around the world. As the closest neighbour, and I venture to say the closest friend, I believe that Canada ought to be able to speak frankly to the Reagan administration and I hope that the Canadian government will do so when President Reagan is here. I believe that we must be much more forthright than we have been in the past and that we ought to accompany our criticism of the present involvement in El Salvador with a plea to the United States that it is absolutely essential that it play a leading role in acting to redress the great conditions of misery that are producing the El Salvadors of the world. El Salvador will not be alone because 800 million people live in the same kind of conditions as are found there.

I think we must encourage the United States to resume the role it has played over the years. If we look back at the Marshall Plan we remember that, following the end of the hostilities of World War II, the United States was very concerned that western Europe should not fall into the hands of the communists. In order to help western Europe, it sent over massive amounts of economic and social development aid. Those are the signals that the American government ought to be sending today.

In the North-South dialogue the United States has already given early signals that it is very cool to the issue and shows a lack of any element of concern. An illustration of that was the cutback in its foreign aid budget. The United States must be encouraged by Canada and others to play a leading role in the North-South Summit. If it indicates that it is not interested in attending the North-South Summit, I say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and to others who play a leading role that the United States should be encouraged to attend; indeed, I say that pressure should be mounted to hold the summit in Mexico irrespective of the position or the United States.

Finally I come to the position of Canada. I listened carefully today to the Secretary of State for External Affairs as he recounted our involvement through our international development program in Central America. Our financial involvement in El Salvador and Nicaragua is minimal relative to the total CIDA budget. As host to the economic summit which will deal with the North-South question, I find it strange, when speaking to the problem of poverty in the world, that we should do so little about El Salvador. Even today I believe that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has not spoken as forthrightly as increasing numbers of Canadians would like our government to speak. They want it to say clearly that it opposes intervention by any government in El Salvador, that it opposes the sale of arms, the transfer of arms or gun-running by anybody. We believe that a political solution can and should be worked out through the United Nations.

The minister said that we would not take an initiative beyond that which our major partners in the west would take. Why not? Why cannot Canada raise its voice at the United Nations? Why cannot we propose an international commission for El Salvador? Why cannot we emphasize human rights, indivisible? Why cannot we emphasize development throughout the developing world? Why cannot we emphasize that this country will pay special attention to those who are most oppressed, those who live in regimes that are beneath contempt in their treatment of human life?

May I close by saying that if we are truly serious about fighting communism—and the United States is using this as its excuse—then I think we have to emphasize that the only way to make our world a safe, secure and stable place is to emphasize social reform and justice for the downtrodden people of the world.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—AMERICAN MILITARY INTERVENTION IN EL SALVADOR

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Broadbent:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to protest publicly the American military intervention in support of the junta in El Salvador, and calls on the Prime Minister in his talks with the President of the United States to urge an end to this military involvement on the side of a regressive regime which denies civil rights and is fighting those who wish to establish a democratic government.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, it is clear from the way the motion before us is worded that it requires us to think about two aspects of the role that Canada should play in relation to what has been happening in El Salvador, and at the same time, to make an attempt to understand what is going on in that part of the world.

It seems to me that it is important for those of us in this House and elsewhere who are interested in what is happening in Central America these days to understand the nature and the dynamics of the forces operating in that part of the world. We must also endeavour to make the people in Washington understand what is involved here, in their own best interests. That may sound presumptuous, put in those terms, but I am convinced that it is essential to make an extra effort at understanding.

Before I develop that thought, Mr. Speaker, I should like to address myself to that part of the motion that deals with civil and human rights and put on the record, very briefly, Canada's role so far in relation to El Salvador.

● (1640)

First, it can be said that our concern about the situation in El Salvador predates the present controversy. We have been pursuing all the avenues available to us in the human rights field. We supported the resolution of concern at the Copenhagen international conference last summer. We have brought the full measure of our concern at the violence and human rights abuses in El Salvador to the attention of its government. At the present time, Canada is working with other delegations in Geneva to ensure that the Human Rights Commission will adopt a resolution calling for an end to the violence and violations of human rights by all elements in El Salvador and for an end to the supply of armaments to all parties in that country. The resolution calls for a peaceful political solution to the problems in El Salvador and for the appointment of a special rapporteur to inquire into the situation.

Next, Canada is responding to the plight of the people in El Salvador who have fled their country. The United Nations refugee commission is assisting those in asylum in the general region, and Canada has recently increased its contribution to the regular budget from $2.5 million to $4 million for such purposes. Canada has also responded with a $250,000 contribution, which represents roughly 10 per cent of the Red Cross current appeal for assistance to El Salvadorians.

No matter what steps we take to help the plight of people affected, and no matter what short-term recommendations we may be able to put forward this afternoon in this House, one fact remains clear. What is developing in El Salvador cannot be looked upon in isolation from a trend in other parts of the world where there is a concentration of power in the hands of governments which grasp power for themselves through non-democratic means, and where governments have failed over the decades, maybe over the centuries, to achieve the level of social justice that we have in our western democracies.

The situation under debate here this afternoon in the long run could be another Cuba, if the extreme government in power now in El Salvador were to be replaced in the future by another extremist government of a different stripe. Already in Nicaragua we talk about a second Cuba. It could well be that other countries in Central and Latin America are destined to follow the fate of Cuba. It was only two or three decades ago when the United States witnessed, I suppose to its own dismay, the replacement in Cuba of a government headed by Batista with that of Castro. It would be desirable that we make an effort to understand why and how it happened. I can understand the fears and the concerns of the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche), but nevertheless I urge him as I would urge anyone to attempt to understand why countries develop and accept totalitarian regimes.

We cannot look at El Salvador in the context of what has happened just in the last few months. We have to ask ourselves why El Salvador is going through its present troubles. Is El Salvador facing a situation whereby the neglect of basic reforms, such as social reform, redistribution of wealth, land reform and other forms of basic human justice, get overlooked for such a long period of time that sooner or later people do catch up with their governments?

It is becoming fairly evident in a number of countries that the populations are beginning to disagree with established oligarchies of one stripe or the other which came to power through some exercise, of violence, probably with the support of some power abroad. It could well be that the entire Central American region, not just El Salvador, is in danger. If that were the case, then the consequences could be serious. This troubled situation may even occur as far north as the location of Mexico's oil reserves. Will we then be able to justify our concern only within the confines of the El Salvadorian situation? Obviously we cannot do that.

It seems to me that we have a gigantic task before us. We have to explain to our American friends how the situation in El Salvador evolved. We must explain that beyond considerations of power there are considerations of a social nature which have to be taken into account. The propping up of one government, as the experience of Cuba teaches, is not sufficient in the long run to ensure that a government will remain in power. The lesson which the West must have learned from the Cuban experience is one which is as valid today as it was 25 years ago. We cannot look at these events in isolation. They cannot be separated from the inadequacies of social reforms, the redistribution of wealth, the absence of the democratic means of change and the absence of democratic parties as we know them. So long as these countries are looked upon as areas for security not as an area where the security of one nation is at stake—because there are also basic fundamental social shortcomings, to put it mildly—we will not be dealing with the roots of the problem. We may be running the risk of dealing only with the symptoms, which is something we may be doing in this debate today.

The new President of the United States is facing a situation where he must demonstrate that the United States is in control of the situation and is in a position to counter certain influences from Cuba and from other parts of the world. In the long run this exercise will not be effective if it ignores the necessity of dismantling the unjust division of wealth and the menace created by unjust governments which take power and manage to remain in power. For the Americans to retain our support, it will be necessary for them to demonstrate to us and to other parts of the world that the United States is prepared to approach the situation in Central America with this kind of sensitivity to the social forces at play.

There is a certain dynamic in the El Salvadorian situation which is dangerously reminiscent of what has happened in other nations which have fallen prey to extremist governments. Therefore, it is useful that we have this debate today in the House. It gives us an opportunity to look at the situation against a much broader background. The background I would attempt to describe is a framework within which we can place a number of nations that are coming of age. They now have access to international means of communication such as radio and television. They are becoming aware of how different life can be under different circumstances. They are also the object of propaganda competitions by various systems of government throughout the world. They are fertile ground for all forms of political activism which may not be so much local as imported. They are quick in taking root and developing momentum.

● (1650)

In that category you can place a number of nations, particularly if you look south toward Central and Latin America. We may be witnessing another step along the road of changes in power distribution whereby certain nations upon which the West has been able to count for a long time can no longer be taken for granted. The move toward establishment of certain basic principles, such as redistribution of wealth in very poor countries, may be such that it cannot be stopped by intervention from abroad.

Having listened to descriptions by other members, how can we accept the inequality of social conditions in a country like El Salvador? How can we accept the steps taken by the government there to maintain its power? Conditions such as those are repugnant to Canadians, yet we look at the situation with a sense of helplessness.

Because of the distance from Canada and the differences in culture, language and the like, we know that in the long run the solution must come from within that country. If the super powers are directly or indirectly involved, they can, if they wish, tilt the balance in their favour, but in the end, it will not bring about solutions of a lasting nature.

I am not saying that the situation in El Salvador and similar situations throughout the world can be resolved by outside forces. However, it will help if democratic countries such as Canada assist those countries to evolve and to adopt political parties such as we have. It would help if we supported the moderates in those countries, even though they are supposedly difficult to find. We should try to replace the conflict between ideological systems and goals of a social and economic nature. Otherwise, even though our intentions may be good, we will only be dealing with the symptoms and not with the root of the problems that have evolved over decades and indeed centuries.

The motion before us asks us at the same time to condemn and to urge. I doubt whether one could be effective by first condemning and then urging. One's intervention is considerably eroded if one indulges in condemnation and at the same time tries to convince one's neighbour of the correctness of their assessment. I would support the approach of placing full emphasis on and 100 per cent effort behind the act of urging.

While I disagree with the mover of the motion in this regard, the Leader of the New Democratic Party has done a service to this House by putting this motion forward on the eve of the arrival of President Reagan. It allows us to air our views on this issue. We can put forward the thought, which I believe reflects the majority in this House, namely that we should try to convince the Americans that what is at stake here is not just a power play, that the proper approach is improved social development.

I cannot state strongly enough the argument I have been trying to define this afternoon, namely that what we are witnessing in El Salvador is not just a beginning, as it was not in the case of Cuba. We are witnessing a development which may have repercussions and a similar pattern of evolution in neighbouring nations in that part of the world.

We will regret it years from now if we do not register the importance of understanding the plight of the people in these countries. In essence it permits violence and conflict within their midst because of social and economic conditions that are unacceptable to any civilization. We feel very deeply about this.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment briefly on the remarks this afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan). It struck me as rather strange that, during a debate on a very sensitive, pressing and serious subject, the minister would use the occasion to indicate to Canada and the world that we have no business intervening in the affairs of Latin America or, indeed, South America. It is strange he would take that posture considering the very positive position taken when this party was the government with respect to the situation in Namibia. The minister said that because of our lack of expertise in Latin America, we are the last ones who should intervene. On other occasions we have intervened with a force and compassion that at times was scarcely human. Did we know more about that other situation than the current situation in Latin America? Certainly the answer is clear: we did not know any more, yet we took a positive role, produced positive results and made a significant contribution.

It surprised me, indeed shocked me, that the minister would so underestimate the capacity of professional Canadian diplomats and non-governmental people, as well as concerned members of this chamber and of others, in their attempt to lend stability to another part of the world.

I want to move to a perhaps slightly different vein, a slightly different route from that which has been followed by my colleagues in this debate to this point in time. Let me address myself to the question whether or not Canada and Canadians have a legitimate interest in that part of the world.

Surely we have a legitimate interest wherever in the world the rights and liberties of people are being trampled and cast to one side. Surely there is no doubt that the absence of morality, and the broader question of human privation and human suffering, demand the intervention of not only Canadians but every human being in order to alleviate, ease and correct the situation. Surely Canada falls into that category.

We have another interest as well. There is conflicting data before us provided by the debate taking place about whether the United States should continue to intervene militarily through the provision of arms, lethal weapons systems and whatnot. That is not an aspect of the debate I particularly want to get into, except to say that I share the concerns of the distinguished former secretary of state for external affairs, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), who has said, as have others, that the motion before us is somewhat deficient in that it criticizes and condemns only one side. The Leader of the New Democratic Party was quick to correct that by saying he had without equivocation included both sides. After following the debate in recent weeks and days in this Parliament, I find myself closer to the interpretation placed upon that by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, although I accept his clarification of what he intended.

The question is resolved depending on where you sit. It is too easy and shallow to make a decision based upon information you want to accept and interpret in support of your own particular point of view. The need for critical information grows. As this conflict grows, not only in El Salvador but as it grew in Nicaragua and as it is growing throughout the world, so grows our requirement to know and understand more about what is going on there and what is going on in the Caribbean basin, among the Commonwealth countries, those small, beautiful island nation states in that part of the world. It is important that we know and understand more about what is going on there, just as it is throughout South America. As the need for accurate and informed information grows—and it grows with urgency each passing day—so do Canada's responsibility and moral obligations grow to establish or achieve a method of collecting, analysing and acting upon accurate information. In that proportion our responsibility grows. We must do this because the luxury of failing to do so is no longer in our interest.

Perhaps to go beyond that, not only is this luxury as portrayed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs staying out of that part of the world one that we can afford no longer in our own self-interest in terms of trade, but it is a luxury we can no longer afford in terms of human privation and morality.

For the minister to argue, as he has in recent days and again here earlier this afternoon, that El Salvador is not a country of historic interest to Canadians is to admit a colossal and profound ignorance of historic events and a total misunderstanding of the interrelationships between Latin America, the island nations of the Caribbean and North America.

What happens in Latin America happens swiftly, as it does in the Caribbean and in South America. Let there be no misunderstanding about that. What happens there affects the entire intra-American basin.

Without debating the allegations flowing from both sides and the centre of that torn nation, or drawing a parallel with other revolutionary regimes throughout the Caribbean basin, Latin and South America and elsewhere, let me make three brief points.

First, there remains little doubt that we cannot of our own volition assess accurately what is going on and base actions of persuasion as a people, or as a mediator in the form of an informed and enlightened nation, unless and until the government takes the type of positive action suggested not only by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands but as well by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle), the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean) and, perhaps along another path, by my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche). That suggestion must be followed.

Secondly, we must be careful in whatever approach we take to the problems in Latin and South America so as not to equate diplomatic measures with moral approval of all of the activities of either side, or with any of the sides or points of view, in these struggles for changing internal order. I think that is fundamental. We must not abandon people because we object to the activities in whole or in part of their governments. It is the people of the Caribbean, of South America and of Latin America with whom we have long, honourable and historic ties.

Finally, we must always remember that if we lose this identity and association with people, if we confuse it with diplomatic niceties or with our objections to the activities of certain regimes which can be described as horrendous, then in fact what we will have lost is security in a friendly part of the world.

We may not, without fear of question, any longer turn a deaf ear or blind eye to events in this part of the world. To those countries in the turmoil of change, to those countries with economies torn by the difficulties of change, to those countries with the internal capacity to earn dollars ravaged by security concerns and rising costs of energy, to those countries that find it difficult to fit into trade patterns and so on, we must always demonstrate in every way possible that their trust and confidence in a democratic way of life can be relied upon.

Today more than ever it is important to expand and nurture our relations with all neighbours to the south. I should like to elaborate further on the minister's denial of Canadian interests in that part of the world; I am sorry he is not present in the chamber at the moment. For example, does the minister believe for a minute that because El Salvador is on the Pacific coast, there is no direct linkage with its neighbours, good or bad, to the east? Is he suggesting that there is no relationship with Cuba? We have heard enough in recent weeks with respect to Cuba and the movement of arms through Costa Rica.

In that connection, and at the risk of embarrassing a very dear friend, I speak with first-hand knowledge of the movement of arms from Cuba, through Panama, into Costa Rica and on into El Salvador. Is the minister suggesting that there is no relationship with Cuba, given Cuba's relationship with Grenada? I find that hard to understand. Of course, Grenada is still closely linked, although it has suspended the option of consulting with the people as democracies are wont to do. Nevertheless, Grenada still enjoys Commonwealth ties. Do we not have an interest? Of course we have an interest.

Is the minister suggesting that we have no interest in Panama or the canal? Does he not know where El Salvador is in relationship to the approaches to the canal? Of course he does. Is the minister suggesting that we have no interest in Costa Rica or Guatemala, with their democratically-elected governments? Is he suggesting that we have no interest in these nations? What about Honduras or Nicaragua? Surely the minister was not telling the House that we have no special interest in the OAS, of which El Salvador is still a member, though I do not know for how much longer. Is he suggesting that Canada is not the most active observer with respect to the OAS? Of course we are.

Surprise must be registered in the area of trade. Surely it is not necessary to tell the minister and the government that Latin and South American countries are increasing their trade with Canada, and Canada with them, at a far greater rate than with the United States. They are buying more and doing more business with us on a percentage basis than the United States.

For example, exports of metals, electrical equipment, telecommunications, prefabs, road building equipment, etc., from Canada to El Salvador increased from $13.5 million to some $15.6 million. One might say that is not very much, but let me put it in another context. Imports to Canada from El Salvador have virtually doubled. I should like to keep this in the context of Latin American countries in which the good professor has indicated that we have no historic interest. Of course we have an historical interest. Between 1968 and 1972 we have done $520.8 million worth of business with Latin American countries, a growth rate of 10.9 per cent. During the same period, our growth rate with respect to exports from Canada to the United States rose by only 9.5 per cent. The growth rate is there, the business interest is there. The growth rate has not come about by disinterested Canadian businessmen sitting in Canada and waiting for things to happen. We have a very serious interest in this matter. In fact, in the next two to two and a half years, foreign investment in these countries will rise from $1.6 billion to something in excess of $2 billion. We have large interests, we have small interests; we have humanitarian interests, we have economic interests.

We did not hesitate to donate $57,000 for medical clinics and ambulance services in El Salvador by way of aid through the International Red Cross when it was apparent that it was needed. We had no hesitation in giving somewhat similar aid to Nicaragua, some $67 million to protect prisoners of war and their families, not to mention that we respond whenever there is an earthquake, a hurricane or flooding; whenever there is need, we respond. We have a long, honourable history of response. It does not augur well for the minister to indicate that we must stay out of Latin America because we have no interest or historical ties in that area. We must remember the assistance of countless non-governmental organizations and their diversified programs, the financial contributions to multinational institutions and so on. These efforts speak not only loudly for the humanitarian concerns of Canadians, but they also reflect clearly our interest in this area of the world. This interest goes back well over 100 years in a very active sense and in excess of 270 years in particular instances.

At least the government should follow its own lead. The minister knows my strong support for whatever efforts he can make in the Caribbean, Latin America and South America. I commend him for his efforts in recent months. Through his own initiative he has committed the government to closer ties with that part of the world, to expanding and increasing all forms of aid.

Let me conclude by indicating that no matter how far the Secretary of State for External Affairs may go, he will not have gone far enough until he has reached 25 per cent to 35 per cent of our total aid package.

• (1720)

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I was very glad indeed to hear the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) say that the New Democratic Party had done a service by bringing this resolution before the House today. I found that his whole speech and approach on behalf of the government was a good deal more illuminating and thoughtful than was that of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan). However, I would like to say to the hon. member for Davenport that he did to a certain extent misread the motion which we are introducing today when he suggested that the motion was both condemning the United States for something and urging it to do something. If you look at the motion carefully, Mr. Speaker, you will see that what we are condemning is the hon. member's government. The motion reads quite clearly:

> That this House condemns the government for its failure to protest publicly the American military intervention in support of the junta in El Salvador—

The motion then goes on to urge the government and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in his talks with the President:

> —to urge an end to this military involvement on the side of a regressive regime which denies civil rights and is fighting those who wish to establish a democratic government.

For the Secretary of State for External Affairs to say that the motion is "a calculated attempt to create tension between the Government of Canada and the government of the United States" would be laughable were it not so sad. The minister does not seem to realize that there are people, not only in Canada but all over the United States, in Latin America—Mexico and Venezuela particularly—and throughout other countries who are horrified by what is happening in El Salvador and by the escalation of American military aid to that junta. Perhaps this is what the minister meant when he said that he and his government had no expertise in this area.

Over the last weeks we have seen this concern raised in every city in Canada. It will be raised again in Ottawa tomorrow. Canadians cannot support this repressive regime any longer or the military aid which has been given to it. As I said a moment ago, it is not only Canadians who are concerned, but Americans in every city in that country as well. Some 52 congressmen are concerned. Indeed, within his own party President Reagan is now being challenged by the Republican minority leader of the House subcommittee on appropriations, Representative Conti, who has challenged the El Salvador military aid policy.

I wonder if the minister knows that three pieces of legislation will soon be brought before the American Congress in attempts to change American military policy. The first of these is House of Representatives resolution number 1509, which is an amendment to the foreign assistance act of 1961. The amendment attempts to limit military aid, sales and credits.

Second, there is concurrent resolution No. 67 condemning all foreign involvement, including U.S. involvement, in El Salvador. It calls for a negotiated settlement and an end to U.S. military aid pending a review of that aid by the House committee on foreign affairs.

Third, there is the Ottinger resolution, which attempts to limit the President's powers to commit U.S. military personnel to foreign adventures. Senators Kennedy and Thongas said Friday that they will propose legislation this week in an effort to end U.S. military involvement in El Salvador.

The opposition to the U.S. government's policy in El Salvador is far stronger in the United States, in journals and magazines, as well as in the Congress of the United States, than it is on the part of the Government of Canada. The minister says that the motion is a calculated attempt to raise tension between Canada and the United States. Are all these criticisms of American policy which emanate from the U.S. Congress and the press not also of concern to him? With the minister's expertise in mind, does he not have any idea of the constituent elements in the democratic revolutionary front? Does he not know that it is an extraordinarily broad-based group with about 40 groups within it? Of course there are some communists in it; but there are also social democrats, socialists, conservatives, small businessmen, many Catholic priests, as he knows, and a large section of the church in El Salvador, the peasants organizations and labour unions. You cannot find any organization, in the labour movement, except one CIA-backed one, which is not supporting the democratic revolutionary front.

When Secretary Haig came to Canada and told our minister about the way he saw the situation in El Salvador, the minister accepted totally what he was told, without asking for any proof or evidence of the enormous volume of arms being sent in by Cuba, Nicaragua or the Soviet bloc. Indeed, the State Department has not yet published the evidence. It keeps telling us that it has evidence, but it seems very reluctant to publish it. Apparently, even the leader of the junta in El Salvador has not seen the evidence, since he has said nothing about it, not even to say that it exists. We need to know what it is.

A great many of us, including the minister I am sure, were led to believe a lot of "evidence" during the course of the Vietnam war, evidence also collected by the Central Intelligence Agency—evidence that turned out to be shoddy and untrue. Why do we not all say, "Let us have an investigation. Let us see what this outside intervention amounts to. Let there be a fair and impartial look. Let us not automatically accept something when we have not even seen the grounds on which it is based."

None of the documents has been made available. The leaders of Mexico, Venezuela and, indeed, every western European country that the State Department sent representatives to visit, were very skeptical. Surely, as one of the best friends the United States has, it is our duty to raise our voices when we feel and think that the United States is pursuing a policy which could lead to another Vietnam. Surely it is not something from which we should hide. It is not something that we hope someone else will do. The point made by the minister that it is not Canada's concern, that we somehow can have no positive influence—as we can in Mexico, Brazil and Venezuela—is absolute nonsense. El Salvador is part of our hemisphere. El Salvador is closer to Ottawa, I believe, than Vancouver and has always been part of our hemisphere. The United States ambassador to the UN, Jeanne Kirkpatrick, says that what is happening with the American involvement is different from Vietnam because it is in this hemisphere. On television the other night she said that the difference is that it is taking place in this hemisphere. That is all the more reason for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to speak urgently, frankly and strongly of the opposition which we share with many elements in American society and government, with west-European countries and with many in Latin America itself. It is also our duty to look once again at the savagery of the right wing forces in El Salvador which have been encouraged directly or indirectly by the junta which governs the country.

We cannot simply dismiss 12,000 violent deaths. Even the former U.S. ambassador to El Salvador, Mr. White, said that 80 per cent of the deaths were the responsibility of government troops or troops under government protection. As compassionate human beings, we cannot turn a blind eye to that, as the minister seems to be doing. More military aid from the United States will mean more violence. As others have said this afternoon, the solution must be a political solution, even though Secretary Haig, according to his remarks the other day, seems to have turned his back on that possibility.

The government has fallen into the trap of wanting badly to get along with the President of the United States, hoping that the fisheries treaty can be restored, hoping that money will be provided for the northern part of the pipeline, and hoping that the Americans will not mind too much about the government's national energy policy, and it has almost succumbed not just to the temptation but to how it sees reality, namely, that what the government of the United States says and does will automatically be approved by the Government of Canada. This is not only doing a disservice to Canadians, but it is also doing a grave disservice to our friends in the United States who are themselves critical of American government policy. But then they turn around and find we are supporting, with a pull of our forelock, what the American administration wants every time. All of us have friends in the United States, and we know they are distressed by our actions and attitudes these days.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) mentioned today in the House that the NORAD agreement will be signed while President Reagan is here. That is an agreement about which there has been absolutely no discussion in the House of Commons. The minister's answers this afternoon clearly did not address many of the serious questions raised by the standing committee, particularly about the role Canada might play in aerospace—rather than just air space—a matter which NORAD does not even cover in the present agreement. In fact, the present agreement does not cover any of the urgent matters relating to American military strategy.

In the course of making known our strong feelings about the military intervention in El Salvador, I suggest to the government that we also make known our strong feelings about certain developments in American military strategy generally, particularly the doctrine the Reagan administration has announced respecting nuclear superiority. We should pause before we sign that agreement. It does not have to be signed until May. I suggest there be a much more careful examination of all military developments emanating from the U.S. administration. Many, if not all, of them are basically outside the NORAD agreement, and we have absolutely no say about them at all. This was even admitted by the commander-in-chief of NORAD, General Hartinger at Colorado Springs when he agreed that effectively we did not or could not have any say. When asked why our presence is valued, he said it is to show the rest of the world that we share American military strategies. Well, we do not share the American strategy nor, as I have pointed out, do great numbers of Americans share American strategy in relation to El Salvador. That is why we brought this motion forward today and why every speaker so far, including speakers from the government side, with the exception of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, have urged that a military solution in El Salvador is no solution.

Mr. MacGuigan: I urged that too.

Miss Jewett: Every speaker has urged that and has urged the minister to protest loudly and take back his statement he had no objection to Americans using offensive weapons in El Salvador and to withdraw it completely.

Mr. MacGuigan: I made no such statement.

Miss Jewett: We should all impress upon the Prime Minister—in case the Secretary of State for External Affairs has not done so—the importance of emphasizing in his meeting with the new President of the United States, that we do not necessarily share American strategic values or American military values. Above all, we do not share their escalating intervention in a country racked by the very terrorism which, when he first became secretary of state, General Haig said would become the top priority in American foreign policy. Yet that terrorism in El Salvador is, in effect, today supported by the American administration.

I hope all of us speaking in this debate will try to show not only concern but also passion about this situation in El Salvador in the hope that the democratic revolutionary front, which does represent the wishes of the people, may become the government of that country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1740)

[Translation]

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil-Papineau): Mr. Speaker, members opposite have repeated today the same criticisms about Canada's policy concerning El Salvador as were voiced in recent days during Oral Question Period and on March 2 during the adjournment debate. They are complaining that we do not have any policy or that our policy is inconsistent or contradictory. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) explained very clearly during the adjournment debate that this government has been following a clear and consistent policy since its election. In his comments today, he gave a more detailed explanation of this policy, and I hope that the opposition members will now understand to what extent their criticisms are unfounded. It has been clearly stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the government is opposed to any foreign intervention in El Salvador and that the population of that country should be allowed to solve its social and political conflicts on its own, by peaceful and democratic means.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that all the members of this House can support this policy and I see no need to dwell any further on this subject. In Canada as in other countries, there are people who are inclined to consider the conflict in El Salvador as a classical example of the political rivalry that exists between East and West. However, in his statement today, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has stated that such were not the views held by the Canadian government. In its opinion, the basic problem in El Salvador stems out of the need for social and economic justice within a population which has for too long been refused any hope for a better life.

Because it has an industrious, progressive and homogeneous population, El Salvador has managed to achieve a certain amount of progress in facing the challenges of the twentieth century, but this country is also a quite eloquent example of one of the most difficult problems of this century, that is, overpopulation. El Salvador is now the most densely populated country and the one with the lowest per capita income in Central America, and its economic and social development has been severely hindered by this situation. Where the political development of El Salvador is concerned, nothing much more impressive is to be noted. In his book entitled "A History of Latin America From the Beginnings to the Present", historian Hubert Herring reports the following:

[English]

In El Salvador presidents come and go, civil wars rage briefly, and moderate dictatorships are the general pattern . . . But the social pattern of El Salvador remains undisturbed. No nation in Latin America presented a greater contrast than between the few Salvadoran families who lived in luxury, sent their sons to schools abroad, and drove fine sports cars—and the masses who are ragged and illfed. The chief families—the 'fourteen families' they were popularly called, although there were more than fourteen—hold the most land and the best land: it was estimated in 1961 that less than 0.1 per cent of the landholders owned some 16 per cent of the farmland, in haciendas of 2,471 acres or more; while at the other extreme about 85 per cent of the farmers, holding less than 15 per cent of the farmland, were hard put to make a living from the meagre plots of 12.4 acres or less, working without machinery or scientific handling of seeds and fertilizers. The great plantations were officially run, but the humble workers on those plantations were lucky to get the equivalent of 50-60 cents a day, plus meagre rations of tortillas and beans. And the military leaders were not ready to break their long alliance with the country's elite, which had been effective in throttling social legislation. They had agreed to keep the poor in their place; and although the poor were beginning to awake—some turning to communism which flourished in a few labour unions—government administration still found it unwise to push social security, public health measures, and agrarian reform.

[Translation]

The early thirties were marked with violence as the economic impact of the world depression led the peasants to revolt and consequently to the brutal repression which made thousands of victims. If I may open a brief parenthesis, Mr. Speaker, I would add that Canada was marginally involved in the events which occurred in El Salvador at the time as two Canadian destroyers, HMCS Vancouver and HMCS Skeena, under Commander Victor G. Brodeur, were dispatched to the coastal town of Acajutla "to protect, if required, foreign interests", as reported in the media at that time. It is also interesting to note that, in his subsequent report to Ottawa, Commander Brodeur stated the following:

[English]

The revolution was entirely due to lack of consideration for the Indians. There are only two classes in El Salvador, i.e. the very rich and the Indians. The very rich are very few and it is noticeable that these few left the country the minute the trouble started.

[Translation]

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the situation in El Salvador had not changed much over the years. Therefore it is not surprising that political and social agitation has become endemic in that small country and that the workers in farms and cities rose against the long domination by prominent families and the military. On October 26, 1960, the world witnessed the first serious attempt to correct past wrongs, something which indeed turned out to be a harbinger of what is happening now. The government at the time was overturned by a group of leftist officers and civilians, but the six-man junta in power proved to be overly radical for most of the El Salvador officers and was in turn overthrown in another coup in January, 1961. Again may I quote professor Herring:

[English]

The new junta, headed by Colonel Julio Adelberto Rivera . . . promised early elections and a speedy return to constitutional government . . . During the first 270 days of the junta's reign, 325 decree laws were promulgated, and they attacked many of the obvious inequities in El Salvador's ill-balanced society. These measures . . . included an income tax decree establishing the top levy of 76.5 per cent on incomes above $70,000. This law also tackled the knotty problem of the flight of capital, by providing tax exemption for money used for private investment in El Salvador, while taxing uninvested capital at a higher rate. The income tax law was a sensational move, evoking throaty charges of 'communism' against the highly respected military junta . . . There was a furious exchange of manifestos between defenders and opponents of the measure. The ruling junta defended its course by saying that its policy was inspired by the obvious ills of the citizenry—'malnutrition, illiteracy, high index of infant mortality, bare feet, semi-naked bodies, filthy tenements, long and exhausting working hours, and wages of hunger.'

[Translation]

The promised elections were held in April 1962. Colonel Rivera was elected for a five-year term until 1967. Professor Herring continues as follows:

● (1750)

[English]

Forthwith the reforms launched by the junta began to take shape. High priority was given to agrarian reform; although densely populated, El Salvador has little available land for colonization; some state-owned land plus some privately held farms would furnish about 135,000 acres to be distributed to some 3,500 families in plots ranging from 5.25 acres to 14 acres; it was not a very bold program but at least it was a beginning. There were various measures for easing the burden on the poor: Sunday rest with pay; minimum wage laws; reduction of rent on tenements; provision for more generous food allowances for workers on the large farms. The new income taxes were enforced with considerable success. Banking laws were reformed making credit more easily available to small farmers. And government operations were honest.

[Translation]

In the 1967 presidential elections Fidel Sanchez Hernandez was victorious with 54.4 per cent of the votes and his administration continued Colonel Rivera's reform program. His policies included an agricultural reform project which greatly upset the conservative businessmen and the rich land owners. Then a great controversy surrounded the 1972 elections when a member of the Christian Democrat Party, El Salvador's current president Jose Napoleon Duarte, apparently rallied the majority of the votes. However, a subsequent official recount gave the majority to Colonel Arturo Molina. He was president until 1977 when the military resorted to similar tactics during the presidential elections and brought General Carlos Romero to power. Riots broke out as a result of that disloyal manoeuvre and the government imposed martial law; before order was restored about one hundred protesters had been killed.

President Romero was an inveterate conservative who associated social reform with communism; supported by the military, the conservative aristocracy resisted the peasants' claims for social and agrarian reform. Violence became commonplace; groups of vigilantes and rightist paramilitary tortured and executed the leaders of peasant groups and other partisans of economic and social reform. Naturally, that violence provoked leftist reactions. The intensity of the struggle between the two factions increased, and President Romero led a fierce campaign against the left and its followers.

On October 15, 1979, 19 years almost to the day after the reformist junta which I have already mentioned seized power, a group of Liberal army officers deposed Romero after a coup d'État whose victims were few and put in its stead a progressive junta composed of two Liberal officers, two members of the Christian Democrat Party and one Independent. As mentioned by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his statement, the new government promised to implement radical reforms in the field of social and economic affairs, the most important of which was an agrarian reform in two steps comparable to that implemented in Mexico. The first stage, started in March of 1980, involved all agricultural operations of over 1,234 acres; some 400 properties representing 600,000 acres, that is, about 25 per cent of all farmlands in the country, were redistributed amongst the peasants.

The second phase, which is to be implemented in 1981, is aimed at all farms of 370 to 1,235 acres. Unfortunately, left-wing groups immediately took advantage of the situation to try and foster a revolution. They launched a terrorist campaign which included the kidnapping and murder of several Salvadorian and foreign businessmen and bankers and, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned in his remarks, attacks on embassies and the kidnapping and murder of embassy staff. This resulted in the closing of a large number of Salvadorian and foreign plants, a 50 to 60 per cent decrease in industrial production as well as a corresponding chop in employment and a worsening of the situation for Salvadorian workers. In the last two years, 28 embassies were attacked by terrorists so that all west European countries, except Italy, were forced to close their embassies there.

It seems clear that as long as the extreme left in El Salvador had taken Romero, the military dictator, as its target, its chances of success were quite good. However, the reformist junta, with its land, business and banking reforms and its promise to hold an election within two years, sabotaged the strategy of the extreme left and destroyed its hopes of coming to power. It is interesting to note that the extreme left rejected the junta's platform without even giving it a chance to implement it. However, leftist attacks were not the only problems faced by the junta. It also faced the opposition of conservative elements within the military and the security forces as well as the opposition of those whose direct interests were threatened by reformist action and who tried to undermine the junta's ability to govern. Then, there was the terrible war of attrition between the armed sectors of left-wing and right-wing factions. The government was caught in the crossfire and became increasingly unable to control its destiny.

Mr. Speaker, I have given the background to the events which have occurred in El Salvador because I think it is important that we keep them in mind when considering the present situation. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs so correctly noted today, we must consider the crisis in the context of the past problems experienced by El Salvador. The tragedy lies in the fact that conflicts between the extreme right and the extreme left have taken unimaginable proportions; violent acts and murders are committed by armed gangsters, soldiers, revolutionaries and criminals on both sides, the government and its supporters being the targets more often than not. We are constantly informed by the media of these terrible crimes and atrocities which fill us all with the greatest repulsion. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has indicated that the Canadian government has brought pressure to bear on several occasions on the Salvadorian government to keep its army, police and security forces as well as paramilitary extremists under greater control, to put an end to these human rights violations and bring the guilty before the courts.

Apparently, President Duarte is trying to exert such control. Unfortunately, his efforts are too few and too late. Maybe the Salvadorian government could not, however, do any more than it did. We must keep on urging it to act more efficiently, and I was happy to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs state his intention to keep the pressure on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

[English]

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to follow my colleagues in the House in addressing the tragic situation in El Salvador and in seeking to encourage the government toward a positive approach which we as a nation might play in seeking an end to the bloodbath which currently is a day by day experience there. We heard from the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) some proposals which we might adopt in terms of being a peacemaker or mediator in that situation. My colleague for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche) reminded us of the quality of human suffering that is part of that tragedy and of our common humanity. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) reminded us of our national interest and the interdependence which we have with the people of the Americas and the people of El Salvador.

This evening I would like, in the few moments that are mine in this debate, to turn my thoughts to the fact that we in Canada have a special interest. I want to take issue with the minister and his comments to us last Monday evening in the House that we do not have the right to comment, that we are not in a position to pass judgment on the political situation there and, therefore, we ought not as a nation take part in a moral discussion about the future of the human family and of our hemisphere.

I am reminded of our Canadian tradition of welcoming refugees, and the political judgment which goes with it, from the actions of governments which have, in many cases, expelled or forced out their nationals. I am reminded of the position of the government on disarmament, and the appointment of an ambassador for disarmament; of the matter of giving priority to disarming, and the moral positions that have been taken.

I wish to remind the House of our Canadian history in relation to the founding and developing of the United Nations and, through it, the setting up of peacekeeping mechanisms. Therefore, it is with a great deal of distress that I find the government is suggesting through the minister that we do not have the right to comment. He is suggesting in this case of real concern to Canadians that, "given our lack of close involvement with El Salvador for generations, we are in no position to pass judgment on the political situation in that country."

I wish to suggest to this House and the government that all across Canada we have a very real constituency of concern. It expects this government to echo our concern for human rights and reflect the deep distress of Canadians at the ongoing, day by day account of the 25 or more people found assassinated each night in the streets.

Let me share with the House a letter which was addressed on March 5 to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with a copy to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) from the Canadian Council of Churches. The letter reads in part:

We, the representatives of the members of the Canadian Council of Churches, wish to convey our serious concern about human rights. We decided to write to you on the eve of the impending visit of President Reagan, whose statements on foreign policy clearly indicate a change in policy and practice on human rights by the United States administration—

As you are aware, the churches in Canada often have intimate and personal knowledge of the situation at the grass-roots level in many countries through their partnership with the churches in those parts of the world. We wish to continue to share this knowledge with our government in order that Canada can play a significant role in creating a more humane world. Precisely because we are not a super power, we are in an excellent position to align ourselves with other nations to work together for the protection of the rights of people who are used, oppressed and sometimes murdered . . . We note with pleasure Mr. MacGuigan's remarks made before church representatives on January 28, 1981 to the effect that human rights are the highest concern for the Canadian government; that it is a personal priority for him as minister; and that Canada will continue to act in defence of human rights on moral grounds, alone if necessary . . . We expect our government to stand firm on the position it took at the time Canada voted in the United Nations for the Resolution 53/192 in December, 1980 calling on governments to refrain from the supply of arms and other military assistance to El Salvador. We know for a fact that the present regime in the country is responsible for deaths of thousands of people—

We sincerely hope, sir, that Canada will continue to play a leading role in the struggle for the world where fundamental human rights take precedence over national security and balances of power.

● (2010)

This is signed not only by officers of the Canadian Council of Churches, but also by senior officers of the Anglican Church, the Baptist Convention, the Christian Church (Disciples), the Coptic Orthodox Church, the Lutheran Church, the Reformed Church in America, the Religious Society of Friends, the United Church of Canada and the Presbyterian Church in Canada.

I want to suggest there is a constituency there which is aware of, and in contact with, the people of El Salvador and is sharing in the situation and looking for the moral support which Canada has traditionally given, ought to be giving at this time and ought to be communicating to her close friends, especially our very close and good friends in the United States.

In October, the United Church of Canada through its publication, the Observer, had an entire issue on "The Heroic Church in Central America". They began that presentation with a letter from the Salvadorian Episcopal Conference dated March 5, 1977. These were the words of the conference at that time:

Even at the risk of being persecuted or misunderstood, the Church cannot avoid raising her voice when injustice has taken hold of society. She cannot remain silent when human rights are trampled upon, whether in institutionalized form or in concrete cases—

The author of that article, Mr. Hugh McCullum, went on in an opening comment to say:

What you do not understand in North America is that people here are prepared to die for the simple freedoms you take for granted—like freedom to live.

The story goes on to refer to the body of information which has been brought into question by the minister as to whether there are facts upon which Canadians build their concern. At one point, editor McCullum lists:

Fact-finding missions of British Members of Parliament, the Organization of American States (OAS), Amnesty International, an American ecumenical delegation, and ICCHRLA—organized visit by Canadian churches, as well as the Salvadorian Human Rights Commission—

It goes on to chronicle the number of groups which have concurred in their evidence of what is the situation there.

Lest we in Canada, at some distance away from Central America as some may feel, think that we are not in communication, let the House be reminded of the communication, dated January 1, 1981, which came ecumenically from Christian groups across El Salvador as an open letter to the Christian community and, indeed, to Canadians as a whole, speaking about their part in this struggle. Since there has been so much discussion about the radical left and the radical right, let us remember that the important element in the community is the vast majority of people who find themselves very often represented by Christian groups concerned with the wholeness of life, whether it be health care, agriculture or medical care. That group writes in its letter:

For years we have been close to the suffering people, to the poor and oppressed; we have experienced their misery but also their hope and their decision for an authentic liberation.

The church there says: "we want to be with the poor", and it makes three points. The first point is:

For 50 years the Salvadorean people has lived under oppression of gravely unjust economic, social and political structures, which in no wise have promoted the common good of the poor majorities—

It goes on to state:

Human rights have been systematically violated under military regimes of national security.

The letter goes on to state:

The Church has also been persecuted—

Later it states:

This government, consequently, is not legitimate. It does not seek nor secure the common good—

Secondly, the letter says to us in Canada:

The Salvadorean people has not chosen armed conflict; but rather conflict has been imposed on it. Over the years it has sought peaceful solutions in elections and used social and political pressure to achieve its aspirations. Everything has proved futile.

The letter goes on to state:

—the United States is not supported by any right to interfere in the destiny of El Salvador in order to determine its future and still less to support militarily the current government.

This is the third point in the letter, Mr. Speaker:

An insurrection for the liberation of a people is not only a legitimate historical reality, but, for Christians, it is also a sign of the times through which God speaks to and calls us. The first thing that a just uprising tells us is that God's patience has run out. The experience of Israel and Egypt is being repeated—

This pastoral letter, which came at the turn of the year to Canada, ends with these words:

With faith in God and in the blood shed by so many Salvadorian martyrs, we would like to end with the prophetic words of Monsenor Romero that we may not falter: "The cry of liberation of this people is a cry that reaches up to God and one that nothing and no one can stop." Over these ruins the glory of the Lord will shine.

I could go on and quote from a letter to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) of February 19 from the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops which again confirms the evidence sent to us by the Christian community there, and coincides with other evidence we have before us.

I could go on and read into the record evidence from the Inter-Church Committee on Human Rights in Latin America which, on December 3, 1980, presented a brief, documenting sources, to the Secretary of State for External Affairs on Canadian relations with the Republic of El Salvador. In that brief, they gave substantive evidence of the broad spectrum of persecution and denial of human rights, and they went on to speak about the effect on Canadians of the assassination of Bishop Romero. They refer to the fact-finding visits and frequent communications which have been a part of our experience and the shared concern of Canadians from Victoria to St. John's.

Already during this debate we have been reminded of our Canadian position which was authorized by this government, that is, to vote in favour of the words that Canada "calls upon governments to refrain from the supply of arms and other military assistance in the current circumstances;".

It is interesting to note that Canada was among 70 which voted for that; there were only 12 who voted against it, including the present government of El Salvador, and 55 which abstained, including the United States.

Ambassador White has already been quoted several times during this debate, but in case one thinks it is only the church community which is concerned, we also have the record of diplomatic reports, and we have already rehearsed in this House the concern of other Central and Latin American nations and the concern of West Germany and France. We have signed declarations with Venezuela and Mexico as a nation about concern for this supply of arms to that area.

We are reminded again in The New York Times of Ambassador White's comments as follows:

To the extent that you emphasize a military solution in El Salvador, you are going to be buttressing one of the most out-of-control, violent, bloodthirsty groups of men in the world. They have killed—at a minimum—5,000 or 6,000 kids, just on the mere suspicion that they were involved with the leftists.

One could also read into the record the testimony of Oxfam, a voluntary agency from the United States, and its comment on the agrarian reform. The minister, in his intervention, laid great emphasis on the slow but steady effectiveness of agrarian reform. Oxfam, U.S.A., reports:

Over 60 per cent of El Salvador's rural population are not potential beneficiaries for the current land reform program.

The current land reform program excludes the poorest and largest section of the rural population—landless rural labourers.

The peasantry, Church, academics, and agrarian experts of El Salvador have been excluded from the design, planning and implementation of the current agrarian reform.

The land reform program has been implemented in the context of increasing and unrelenting levels of violence against the rural population.

● (2020)

They go on to suggest that this program should not be given the credibility which, in debate, some seek to give it.

One week ago tonight, Mr. Speaker, in raising questions on El Salvador following question period, I proposed that the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence be called and that expert witnesses from the news media, international and Canadian, voluntary agencies, from the business and church communities be called in order that the division of opinion which has been raised by the minister, and the suspicion that there are divisions between the Vatican and the bishops, be tested in order that we can continue a positive and affirmative approach as Canadians for human rights.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, to be with those who think it is important that Canada light a candle rather than curse the darkness of our world. We have an enviable record as a peacekeeper and peacemaker. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has suggested that Canada take the initiative by contacting neighbouring states, and that we take the initiative to see that an international body, either through the United Nations or through other groups, be invited and encouraged to seek a political solution.

I believe it is important for Canadians to respond, in the wake of the visit of the President of the United States, with their concerns. I believe that telegrams, telephone calls and letters ought to be sent to the Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs saying that Canada ought to continue its stand on disarmament and political solutions, and continue to stand for human rights in our world.

I want to suggest that if we are not prepared to initiate some international mechanisms which can bring forth that information, then let us ourselves, as Canadians, invite from all parties in this House those who will go along with representatives of the voluntary agencies, churches and the news media, and let us send a task force which will return and report to this House and to the Canadian people as to whether it is just a simple issue of left versus right, or whether this is a legitimate rising of expectations by people who want their freedom and their rights. Let the task force examine the great body of evidence from the voluntary agencies, the international news media and the churches, or whether we are being tempted to think that, because there are communist elements and right-wing elements, somehow these are dominant and the great interests of others are lost.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me suggest to you that we as Canadians have a proud tradition of seeking peaceful solutions and we would wish to be seen, in our conversations with our closest ally and friend, pressing them to pursue that direction in the world of human affairs.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) has put before the House an important matter, and I think the thoughtful tone of the speeches today has indicated how seriously it is taken on all sides of the House. We see in our time the most appalling violations of human rights and incredible savagery by governments against their own nationals. Unfortunately we see this in dictatorships of the left and the right; no ideology has a particular claim to morality.

In the case of El Salvador, on March 2 the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) listed a number of steps that have been taken by Canada in pursuit of our general commitment to work constructively with other nations for human rights. On many occasions, through the Organization of American States, the United Nations and its agencies, and in bilateral talks with the government of El Salvador in mid-February, the Government of Canada made representations on behalf of human rights in that country.

We have consistently proclaimed our support for peace in the world and our opposition to the supply of offensive arms to El Salvador by outside sources, whether from communist or non-communist countries.

We have consistently insisted on the importance and necessity of a political, not military, solution in El Salvador. We have made it clear that we do not see ourselves or any other country imposing that political solution on that country, or favouring one side or the other, that this is a matter for the nationals of that country to resolve themselves.

This same position has been taken by countries very close to El Salvador, such as Mexico and Venezuela. On pages 7817 and 7818 of Hansard, there are listed accounts of a number of initiatives, which I will not repeat now, of joint Canada-Mexico, Canada-Venezuela and Canada-Brazil communications, all expressing the hope that El Salvador could achieve peace, democracy and social justice, and also expressing opposition to any kind of foreign intervention. So, Canada's position is clear and consistent.

The NDP motion before us offers no proposals or recommendations to bring about an end to the violence in El Salvador, except to protest a decision of the United States government to supply military equipment. The motion is one-sided because concern has not been expressed about the receipt of arms by left-wing guerrillas and their use in contributing to the violence and tragic loss of life.

The motion also calls on the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in his talks with the President of the United States, to urge an end to American military intervention. The Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs have already explained many times publicly that our government's policy is one of opposition to military intervention by any country, whether it be the United States or a communist-bloc or any other country. This has been the government's policy for many months, stated many times and was repeated today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

If the New Democratic Party wishes to have a resolution passed which might play a constructive role in bringing about a settlement of the tragedy of El Salvador, why does the motion not call on the Prime Minister or Secretary of State for External Affairs, in addition to discussing the matter with the President of the United States, to appeal to the leaders of the revolutionary groups in El Salvador? The Secretary of State for External Affairs has explained that he made Canada's position clear to representatives of the revolutionary force whom he met in Ottawa a few weeks ago. I understand that some hon. members opposite also met with those representatives at that time, and I hope that they conveyed to them the need to follow the road of peace and negotiation.

● (2030)

In the House on March 2 the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) said:

—the only resort of the people of that country to deal with a vicious military regime is to take counter military action.

This remark puzzles me greatly. I find it difficult to understand a politician apparently recommending that people should continue to exercise violence, whatever the provocation. Surely as politicians we should try to negotiate and to find solutions by words, not by military action.

Canada does not have an embassy in El Salvador. Sometimes it is difficult for us to be clear about the exact situation inside that country, but we can look at the chronology of some of the events which have taken place in El Salvador since the Romero government was overthrown on October 15, 1979. These events have been reported rather extensively. At that time the new government promised social reforms. On October 25, 1979, the composition of the cabinet was announced. Two days later, left wing violence, rioting and looting began, with two government ministries occupied by leftist forces. The question that comes to mind is: Why, after only two days, did leftist guerrillas decide that these promised reforms would not be forthcoming and that it was necessary to begin to respond by violence?

Throughout November, bombings and violence continued. On November 28 left wing revolutionary groups kidnapped the South African ambassador. Throughout December and into January, 1980, violence increased to the point that the British embassy felt it had no alternative but to close. In February 1980, revolutionary groups occupied the Spanish embassy. During that month, the German government announced its intention of closing its embassy. The violence continued throughout February and March and a state of siege was declared on March 6. On March 24, Archbishop Romero was murdered while saying mass, and even his funeral on March 30 was disrupted by fire bombs and shootings. The leftists blamed the military and the rightists, while the government blamed the leftists, and the state of siege was extended for another 30 days.

Nevertheless, some reforms were pursued; at the end of April, sharecroppers and tenant farmers were given title to the land they worked.

The violence continued throughout the summer and autumn of 1980. On October 9, the South African ambassador, still a hostage of the left wing forces, died. Ten other assassination attempts were made; some successful, some not. On November 27, six leading members of the opposition were murdered. On December 4, the bodies of four American churchwomen were found in a shallow grave near the airport. On December 13, the junta was reorganized and Napoleon Duarte was named president. On January 10, the "final offensive" of the left wing began with widespread fighting and the calling of national strikes.

Nobody in the House denies that much of the violence, the murdering and the torturing, as far as we can see, was caused by right wing forces. The Secretary of State for External Affairs and other members have spoken plainly about this; but the resolution would seem to imply that the killings were caused only by the El Salvador government. While it is not easy to be clear about what exactly is happening, it is certainly clear that violence begets violence. Clearly no one is blameless in this terrible situation. The House should not be asked to approve a resolution which fails to take into account that there are, as always, two sides to a story, both of which in this case make very unpleasant reading.

The resolution before us also indicates that the left wing forces are the only ones wishing to establish a democratic government. The record would lead one to question this. The government of El Salvador has taken some steps to institute reform. In so doing, it has antagonized forces on the right and forces on the left. We all agree that the progress made has not been as swift or as significant as we would like to see, and I am sure that the people of El Salvador would like to see. But, despite the necessity of dealing with a continuing series of armed attacks, occupations, murders, assassinations and strikes, the government of El Salvador has been able to implement, albeit haltingly, some of its promised reforms.

There is no evidence to suggest that given a period of peace and tranquility, the government of El Salvador might not proceed to implement its reforms. If left wing sources are as determined to establish a democratic government, as the resolution would have us believe, why have they been so active in seeking to achieve power by brutal force against a regime which has publicly declared its intention to establish reforms?

No one on this side of the House has any illusions that the present government of El Salvador is perfect; far from it. Its imperfections are clear for all to see, but its imperfections are admitted by its leaders. They admit that greater efforts must be made to eliminate those imperfections. We have not heard that the leadership of the revolutionary forces admits any imperfections, but, as far as we can see, they urge their followers to greater violence. The revolutionary forces have shown no great desire to work for a ceasefire and no willingness to negotiate toward a democratic settlement.

The president of El Salvador publicly expressed his willingness to negotiate with responsible leaders of the revolutionary forces. I hope those leaders with take up that challenge and seek to settle the differences in El Salvador with ballots rather than bullets. When the Secretary of State for External Affairs met the revolutionary leaders and sought their views, I understand they said that they were interested only in a discussion with the United States and that the discussions were only to persuade the United States to stop all military and economic assistance to El Salvador, so that revolutionary forces could overthrow the government.

It is hard to reconcile that view with the statement contained in the resolution of the New Democratic Party that the revolutionary leaders wish to establish a democratic government.

The Canadian government's policy has been clear and consistent throughout. We all care very deeply that there should be peace in that unfortunate country and that this senseless killing should stop. I certainly support the government's policy of objecting to the supply of military equipment by any and all countries to any and all parties in El Salvador. I support the government's position in using every opportunity to urge the government of El Salvador to put an end to abuses of human rights and to work toward a peaceful, negotiated settlement of the difficulties.

I support the Canadian government's activity in making its view known to other countries by discussions through diplomatic channels, but it is hard to see that the course suggested in this resolution would do anything to help matters.

• (2040)

This resolution contains two rather contradictory elements, one in which the Government of Canada is condemned for failing to protest publicly the American policy while, at the same time, we are asked to urge an end to military involvement on the part of the United States. It is difficult to see how, in the course of a state visit from an ally, our neighbour and friend, we can both urge and persuade, if that is what the NDP would have us do, while also prejudging and pre-empting the discussions by making public statements beforehand.

The resolution before the House is a flawed resolution, but it has served a useful purpose today by making us all think more deeply about the tragic state of affairs in El Salvador. It has made us think about the tragic denial of human rights in many other countries and the need for us to be vigilant and to use the international forums to express our convictions on every possible occasion.

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I believe that tonight I am part of an historical moment in our country's history. I am proud to be able to speak for my party on this resolution. I have been in the House of Commons for almost two years now and up until tonight there has not been a debate on external affairs. This is true of the party which sits opposite and true of the party to my right. The people of Canada have not had an opportunity, through their members, until tonight, to speak about any subject whatsoever as it relates to the external direction of our country.

Mr. Whelan: You could have taken your day.

Mr. Ogle: I am happy tonight to have an opportunity to speak not only for Canadians, who I believe have not had their right fulfilled to hear about where our country is going externally, but at the same time to speak for millions of people who are not able to speak of conditions which they themselves no longer control—the oppressed people, millions of them all over the world who would like to have the opportunity to stand up in a free assembly like this and speak to the subjects which are keeping them, their families and, for all they know, their future families, in a state of slavery.

As a member of this House, I am happy to have the opportunity tonight to be able to speak freely. At the same time I believe I also speak for many friends of mine who are Americans, who no longer have this same ability to get up and, in a very clear way, criticize what is happening to part of our continent, as the member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche) put it. In a particular way I would like to speak for the poor, the oppressed, the people who are living in slums, the people who are living in hide-outs in jungles, and the people who can no longer speak for themselves because of the frustrating oppression which has kept them in those places.

I would like to begin my remarks by reading into the record a message which was prepared by a wide sector of church groups in El Salvador. I feel that it is interesting for us tonight to give pause for a moment to say what the words "El Salvador" mean. "El Salvador" means The Saviour. The people there have a Christian tradition of almost 400 years. The capital of their country was called Holy Saviour and their country is called The Saviour. In this letter they are asking for salvation in a very special way. The letter reads as follows:

> The people of El Salvador is living a critical and decisive hour of its history. It is deciding its future and destiny as a people. It is deciding to liberate itself from oppression, to regain its dignity, and to organize a society that will be fraternal and just for the poor majorities. In these moments the Salvadorian people is preparing itself for an insurrection as a last resort to obtain that justice and peace for which it has so yearned and which have so many times been denied it.
> We as Christian, men and women religious, clergy, who work in the diverse areas of pastoral ministry, education, social development, and humanitarian aid, want also to accompany the people in these moments, acknowledge the justice of its cause and its struggle, and recognize the legitimate right which moves it to insurrection.
> For years we have been close to the suffering people, to the poor and oppressed; we have experienced their misery but also their hope and their decision for an authentic liberation. We have attempted to serve them according to the Gospel, but they also have showed us the ultimate truth of the Gospel—the love of God as the good news of the kingdom for the poor. In this hour of insurrection, full of suffering and hope, we want to be with the poor, we want to explain our option, and we want to see in the insurrection of the people the very signs of the times, the word that God addresses us as Christians.

I will not read the whole letter. It was prepared on January 1 of this year by the Archdiocesan CARITAS of El Salvador, the Conference of Men and Women Religious of El Salvador, the Federation of Centers of Catholic Education, the Archdiocesan Pastoral Council, the Baptist Assembly and the Christian Student Movement and others on an ecumenical base in El Salvador.

Tomorrow our country is welcoming the President of the United States. President Reagan is beginning a term of office. He, like many others, is beginning without a great deal of experience with respect to the responsibilities he must carry out in that role. I believe I state what many others believe—he does not have a great deal of experience in dealing with international matters. He has come out, or seems to have come out, of a life in which things were, to put it very simply, black or white.

If I can refer to his past history, it is not unlike a few poor cowboy movies on which one side there are white hats and on the other side there are black hats. You know from the beginning that the side with the white hats is all right and the side with the black is all wrong. It can be likened to cowboys and Indians, or G.I.s and Japs. It was so easy then, when the situation was clearly right or clearly wrong.

But places like El Salvador, Central America, Latin America and other countries in the developing world are not blacks or whites. They encompass a complex reality of all kinds of things—economic, social, religious and cultural. There, things do not come out black and white; they come out very grey. It requires a great deal of prudence and sensitivity to be able to make good judgments there. However, if one is moved by love and if one has a sense of justice, then those decisions will come with time, with listening and feeling. But it just cannot be said that they are right wing, left wing, communist or capitalist. Those names do not work. They are talking about the majority of people who no longer have the power to do anything except let the power of history flow over them or who finally say "No, I would rather die than let that happen."

I think the debate on El Salvador we are having tonight pinpoints another important reality of what our country and other countries are becoming more deeply involved with. It is the North-South reality. They are two little code words which do not seem to mean much to many people, simply because they are still new code words. The North refers basically to those countries which are more or less economically developed. The South refers basically to those countries which are in the process of development. In general, the North is above the equator, and the South below.

● (2050)

El Salvador is part of the South. It is one of the countries struggling to develop. It is not unlike other Latin American countries in which there has been institutionalized oppression of the poor. Its mode of developing will be different than that in other countries, but it must be respected. It cannot be opposed from an outside power, whether from the left, right, or anywhere else. The people there will have to make the decisions which will finally free them from the oppression of poverty which has put them in this situation.

El Salvador

Our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has indicated by his words and actions that he is very interested in this question of North-South. I trust that he is telling us the truth because it is the most important question now facing our planet. However, I would like to advise the Prime Minister that in the question of North-South, it is not only important to be able to talk about the situation but it is also important that we appear credible in the situation. We must be authentic, credible and serious.

The Prime Minister has made several tours to various developing countries preparing for the North-South encounters of this coming summer. I do not believe those trips were well prepared. I believe the trip to Brazil, for instance, was not well prepared. If we are not credible, there could be a problem.

One of the witnesses who appeared before the North-South committee task force was Maria Helena Moreira Alves, a Brazilian social worker who is now studying in the United States. She explained to us in committee that during his trip to Brazil the Prime Minister did not see the right people. It is true that he saw government officials, but he did not see leaders of the church who are much closer to the reality. He did not see people in the labour movement or those in the very vital Brazilian press who write about how they see real development.

The Brazilian problem, although much larger than the El Salvadorian problem, has many of the same aspects. From my own personal experience, I now know that the situation of 30 million to 40 million Brazilians is worse than it was 15 years ago. The "economic miracle", as they call Brazil, did not finally help the poor. The poor are now no longer eating the minimum of rice and beans; they are now down to eating rice and are no longer eating meat. They do not think in terms of great concepts of economic growth; they think only in terms of how much they can purchase by the end of the week at the market.

Therefore, I ask the Prime Minister in his visits and in whatever he does, not only to be present but also to be credible, and not to tie on a quick North-South visit through Africa and Brazil at the tail-end of a ski trip. He should make his efforts appear to be serious from the beginning so that the people who have never had the benefits he has can see that he is interested in them.

On the question of whether El Salvador is part of our responsibility—and we have spoken about that in the House this week—I would say it is part of our responsibility because it is our neighbour. If we do not have the ability to handle our responsibilities now, then I would seriously say that we must find a way to obtain it.

On December 4 of 1980, I wrote to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) a private letter which reads as follows:

> I hope that you will be able to find a way in which Canada can protest against the whole situation and bring to bear some pressure that will amount to having the rights of the people protected. I know from some former correspondence and conversation with you that you feel that Central America is not really within the zone of Canadian influence. I hope that the position will change and that Canada will make a much greater effort in creating a policy which will show our support to the democratic forces which are being suppressed in these countries. Present groups of delegates from these countries indicate how important they believe Canada is in their struggle.
> I would suggest that you make a tour of that particular part of the world, with a strong emphasis on future contacts in Central America. I would like to see the question of human rights violations tackled in a more practical way.

I think we are at a stage in our history at which Canada can now begin to set up new relationships with our neighbours. We can now determine what kinds of relationsips they will be, whether they will just trail along behind a super-power which decides the future of those countries or whether we can go in as a neighbour and say that we want to be their neighbour and friend and that we would like to help. That would not be interpreted or understood as a power play to control the future of those countries but rather as our desire to see them develop in the way they want to develop.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ogle: I would like to say much more, but I must close my remarks. Two years ago in February I attended the Latin American bishops' conference at Puebla, Mexico, when the Holy Father Pope John Paul II made his first visit to speak to the bishops of Latin America. While there, I was with the press corps and was standing beside Archbishop Oscar Romero when he gave a short press conference before he left to go back to San Salvador to bury one of his priests, who had been killed the previous day in an ambush by government troops. I can only remember it as being a highly emotional moment for myself and many who were standing there because we knew we would never see him again. He was going to stand tall for his people. In the following year, he came to terms with stress. A week before he was finally shot down by a long-range pistol bullet as he celebrated mass he said: "They can kill me, but the clamour for justice among the people they cannot silence".

I would like that to be my final thought and suggestion to my friend, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and to the government: let us stand tall as people in Canada. I know Canadians will support that. Stand tall, because the clamour for justice among the people will not be silenced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join in the remarks tonight for just a few minutes to comment on how proud I am of the speeches which were made by individuals within my party, particularly the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) and the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle).

● (2100)

I was also pleased to hear some of the things said by members of the Conservative Party who spoke today, particularly the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean) and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). I am pleased to associate myself with their remarks because they have expressed a feeling that I have about this country and about Canadians. That feeling arises from actions taken in the short history of this country in support of the rights of others. Throughout our history, many selfless acts of support for others have been recorded. Indeed, in former times members of that party opposite, as the government, took positions that have made Canadians proud of their country.

I was shocked, however, at the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) this afternoon who set out the role chosen by the government. I think it has lost an opportunity. Some hon. members opposite pointed out that they could not support the resolution. That is valid and I can accept their opposition to a motion which condemns the government's failure to act. But I felt that they failed to address head-on the question of the suffering, the termination of human rights and the murders going on in a very small country in central America. There was an implication that this country does not have an interest or expertise in that area of the world. There is a great deal of compassion in this country, however, a great deal of courage and a willingness to assist the people. There is also expertise and knowledge but there seems to be an argument regarding distance which is felt to justify this position.

I think there is an important and profound role that we could play in such cases. Two countries seem to be in jeopardy at the moment, and we should speak out about them and the oppression they suffer. The first is El Salvador. Some hon. members said today that 5,000 to 6,000 children have been killed because they were suspected of being opposed to the regime. That kind of thing cannot be tolerated.

It is my understanding that El Salvador was run by an oligarchy of 14 families. They controlled the country for their own purposes. Some hon. members used an unfortunate description in their remarks today; perhaps the department wrote some of the speeches, they were so factual. They tended to point out what a great place El Salvador is and to make much of the improvements that have been made. I do not know who coined some of the phrases those hon. members used, such as "highly respected military junta". There might be a line of thought that says, "yes, Hitler did put everybody to work" or, "yes, Mussolini made the trains run on time." I do not think that it is a wise choice of terms, however. I do not think I can identify, nor should the government identify, with some of the things that are taking place in El Salvador at the present time, and I am a little confused by the position the government has taken in the last few weeks.

I have in mind a scenario that goes something like this: that at some point last month the Secretary of State for External Affairs was invited to Washington to have talks with General Haig. General Haig said, "Look, I would like Canada to make a strong statement in support of the United States supplying arms and of the U.S. role generally in Central America." Then the minister came home and made a statement about acquiescing to the United States sending in arms and advisers. To my way of thinking, that was wrong. There was an immediate vociferous reaction in this House.

Next day, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, a little more clearly, that he felt the Americans were making a mistake. As an observer of Canadian-American relations over the years I have seen, as we all have, what has happened when Canada has tried to stand up to the United States. I wonder whether there was some instant reaction to the Prime Minister's statement that he felt the United States had made a mistake because, shortly afterwards, the fishing treaty was shelved, money was released in the United States for the Garrison diversion, the Alaska Gas pipeline was called into question. Today, again, we heard the acquiescent speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and tonight we have heard a range of presentations from the government side that point out all the positive things that have happened in El Salvador.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, it is one of the most destructive governments ever. As Canadians we should stand up and this government should stand up and condemn its activities. We should call for arbitration or mediation of the dispute and call for a halt to the supply of arms and military advisers.

The other country in Central America which I feel is in some jeopardy, and which has come through what El Salvador is going through today, is Nicaragua. I am particularly concerned about this after what occurred in Chile due to American influence. In that country, whether the Allende government was right or wrong, 30,000 people were murdered by a military dictatorship. I think we can lay the responsibility for that dictatorship in the hands of the United States.

In Nicaragua today, there appears to be a government which displaced one of the most reprehensible dictators in Central America, namely Somosa. It took a long time to get him out. The litany of death, torture and violation of human rights equals that of El Salvador. Today, however, the United States speaks of boycotts, accuses Nicaragua of shipping arms to El Salvador and speaks of a whole host of reprisals against that country. I feel, however, that the country is going through a process that will lead to improvements and to democracy. Forty per cent of the productive capacity of the country was stolen or destroyed by Somosa in reprisal; thousands of people were killed; the country was destroyed by Somosa, but today a five-man junta is rebuilding the country. It is going through the process of reconstruction and is committed to holding elections in 1985. Today I heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs condemning that process, saying El Salvador had committed itself to an earlier period for the election.

I submit that if we were to assist in that reconstruction process, if we were to support a government that is going through an evolutionary period and has overcome the violent revolution and wants to get on with rebuilding, probably the elections may come sooner.

It is my understanding that illiteracy stands around 70 per cent. Fifteen days after the junta came to power, it began a crusade against illiteracy and four months later thousands of young people went into the countryside to teach the people of Nicaragua to read and write. In some Indian areas, they invented scripts for languages that did not have written form. The next crusade was to improve health. In Nicaragua, people do not die of cancer, a luxury disease, they die of diarrhea.

They do not have a knowledge of standards of health and sanitation, and the next crusade is to improve standards of health and sanitation.

In the meantime, the United States started talking about boycotts, about intervention, about serious reprisals against the country—200 million people stomping on two million in a country just decimated by a vicious civil war and before that by a vicious dictator. This is one of the most outstanding examples of bullying and blindness in a long time.

When our friend, Mr. Reagan, visits us this week, we must convince him that what is needed in Central America is assistance in this evolutionary process of democratization. The greatest role we can play is to assist Nicaragua to restore its productive forces. We must assist with crusades for literacy, education, technical advancement and health. We must help to improve the lot of the people. Not only will Canadians—and Americans if they participate—win tremendous respect and support, but it would prevent a very tragic mistake from occurring which would draw more and more extremist forces into the Americas. It is interesting to think of the possibilities of an example such as Nicaragua. Certainly El Salvador is a different case.

I saw the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) sitting in this chamber tonight. He is going through a buy-back procedure to take fishing boats off the Canadian west coast. I understand Somoza stole and destroyed every fishing boat in Nicaragua along with many of the factories. I wonder if the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Fisheries might be prepared to offer to the government of Nicaragua those vessels we want to remove from the Canadian fishing industry so we can assist that country. I wonder whether the government of Saskatchewan and other sincere people in the country might want to supply food to the Nicaraguans to help them.

When Mr. Reagan comes to Canada, we should try to help him understand our point of view. We should not fear standing up with courage and conviction as Canadians to explain to him how seriously we view these matters and how much we would like to participate with the Americans in the evolution toward democratization and improving the lot of people in Central America at this time.

I have heard people explain their contacts with the United States during this debate. I would like to explain mine. I have American friends and part of my family is American. My mother was born in the United States, and most of my cousins and my uncles and aunts live in that country. When I see the President of the United States, I reflect back to my grandfathers who fought in an active theatre of war in Europe. My father and uncles all fought in an active theatre of war in Europe. In my generation, I and my two brothers are the only members of the family since the turn of the century who have escaped serving in an active theatre of war. My cousins in the United States and my mother's family were not so lucky; they wound up in Vietnam fighting in an active theatre of war with very tragic consequences. It tested their concern as Americans. They did not believe in what they were doing. They saw their country torn apart by a tragic mistake.

The acquiescent speeches given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs over the last few weeks remind me very clearly of the Vietnam experience and how timid and reluctant we were until the end to come out and say it was a mistake. By that time, most of the people in the United States had figured out it was a terrible mistake.

I do not see it as a thing of that magnitude. All I see is two million people who are very depressed and in poverty-stricken circumstances being turned back to the 1930s and the old military dictatorship and the banana plantations, with the support of the U.S. marines. We should not support that turning back of the clock even though it is at a different level. We should invite Mr. Reagan to join with us to stop the flow of arms into Central America to begin the process, which our leader, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), has suggested, of trying to reach a political solution to the problem of El Salvador and then becoming involved in Central America, in the development and enhancement of the lives of those people.

I do not mind the criticism of the resolution we have put forward, that is a point of view, but I would like to hear a different approach from that of government members in the kinds of speeches they are making, things which might track along the remarks made by my colleagues from the Conservative Party and my own party. I think Canadians want to hear something concrete. I have received a great deal of mail from members of churches in my community, members of trade union groups and people from all walks of life who want to see the government move in that direction. I know other members are receiving letters. This is a serious enough issue to which the government should respond in a way to meet the desire of Canadians and the way I think is traditional in Canada.

Mr. Jim Schroder (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, this is a motion which cannot be dismissed lightly. It focuses on a problem which concerns people and their basic needs. It falls short because it does nothing in a positive way to get at the root cause of the problem. How much better it would be if we were discussing Canada's role in world development and the North-South dialogue and encouraging the President to follow Canada's leadership in this respect.

I would like to put my credentials before the House when talking about our American friends. My wife is in the gallery tonight and she is an American.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schroder: The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) has provided the House with a very extensive and detailed explanation of the current situation in El Salvador. As on previous occasions, he has made it very clear that the government has had a consistent policy throughout, which is shared by many of Canada's friends and allies. That policy can be expressed very simply. First, Canada does not supply military equipment to El Salvador. Second, Canada thinks that it is wrong for other countries, be it the United States or a communist country, to supply military equipment to El Salvador because the use of weapons and military activities will not bring any real solution to the problems of El Salvador. It will only increase the human suffering which has already reached unimaginable proportions. Third, we think there should be a political settlement in El Salvador which would permit the democratic elements among all parties to coalesce and form a government which will provide the people of El Salvador the opportunity to develop their future in peace and social justice.

I would like to draw to the attention of the House a resolution which was put forward at a meeting of the Latin America and Caribbean Committee of the Socialist International in Panama City on March 1. According to my information, that resolution noted that the reasons for the conflict in Latin America, which lie in unjust socioeconomic structures and the long denial of the democratic life for this people, were not being assessed accurately. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, in his remarks today, has shown that the government is fully aware of the underlying socioeconomic causes of the conflict in El Salvador, and this government and many other governments are aware of their importance.

The Socialist International resolution also expressed the opinion that the people of El Salvador alone must determine their own fate and have the right to self-determination free of intervention from another outside country. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has made it abundantly clear that the Canadian government's position is identical and that Canada's position has been expressed publicly over many months since this government took power.

The resolution of the Socialist International declared that one must work actively to find a political solution to the current crisis which the people of El Salvador are experiencing, and to render possible the establishment of a democratic and pluralistic regime. Here again, the resolution of the Socialist International reflects our government's policy.

The resolution also appealed to the parties of the conflict to work actively with freedom and justice to promote the freedom of the people of El Salvador and stability in Central America and the Caribbean. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, in his speech today, expressed the same sentiments when he said that we therefore hope that the democratic elements on both sides will be able to cease hostilities and negotiate an acceptable solution.

In this context, I think it is particularly interesting to note that the Socialist International resolution, which I have mentioned, made absolutely no reference to the supply of arms by the United States or by any other country. It is also interesting to note that in his address to the twenty-sixth congress of the Soviet Union, Mr. Brezhnev did not even mention El Salvador.

The resolution before the House calls on the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to urge the President of the United States to end what is described as military intervention on the side of "a regressive regime which denies civil rights and is fighting those who wish to establish a democratic government." This government's policy is clear. It is against the supply of arms by either side. The Secretary of State for External Affairs made that clear to those concerned in his discussions with them. Therefore, not only is there no need for public denunciation, but, what is more, there is no need for public denunciation on only one side, as the resolution requests. This could be quite unacceptable and without any utility whatsoever. I suggest instead that our approach should not be that of casting the first stone; but rather to invite the U.S. to join with us in the real task, the most difficult one, one that will cost us, but the only one that will work, that is, to talk about world development and how it affects these countries.

The World Bank in its world development report said that the worst aspects of absolute poverty include not only low income but also such things as malnutrition, frequent child death, disease and ignorance. That can be helped by human development programs, but less obviously, there is a very complex interdependence between the different facets of human development, just as there is between human development and increases in income. Health, nutrition, education and fertility all affect each other. What is most striking, partly because they are least expected, are the powerful effects that education, especially female education, has on fertility, child health and nutrition.

As this suggests, human development is a circular process, one which can be vicious or virtuous, according to circumstances and policies. It has its own momentum. What is done or not done today influences powerfully what can be done a decade or more ahead.

Nothing can make widespread misery and poverty disappear overnight. Human development, while necessary, is not the entire answer. There must be effective policies, active and enlightened support from the rest of the world, and even then progress will be excruciatingly slow.

My friends on the North-South task force, the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche) and the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle), will agree that people are a country's most valuable resource. As Franklin Roosevelt once said, "we can't always build the future for our youth, but we can build our youth for the future".

Brandt offers the world a choice, to create a future of peace and prosperity or have chaos thrust upon us. Underneath the daily headlines of confrontation, a new world of co-operation is possible and a third wave is struggling to be born.

There is a great well of compassion and love for all humans in the American people. When visiting in Washington last year, I had the chance to wonder about the great American dream on a global basis. I found the answer I expected. The dream encompasses one of freedom and economic advancement for individuals, even in the least developed countries. Nurtured by having water, basic needs and health care, who knows what heights they may scale and what kind of development they may be able to achieve?

Another interesting thing my friends opposite would agree with is that America has always been a very generous country. In the old days, people received postcards from their friends in the United States showing the Statue of Liberty. It read:

Give me your tired, your poor
Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free,
The wretched refuse of your teeming shore,
Send these, the homeless, tempest tossed to me
I lift my lamp beside the golden door.

When the President is here, we should appeal to him to follow our leadership in encouraging world development. He should be encouraged to attend the mini-summit in Mexico City, and be encouraged to be prepared to talk North-South when he comes to Canada in July.

As a newcomer to the House of Commons, I was very pleased to have had the opportunity to travel with the task force to one of the poorest countries in the world. I look at El Salvador in comparison with a country like Bangladesh. I was impressed by one area I visited where we saw an integrated rural development program which encouraged women to be active. It lent the women money so they could start their own business of husking rice and making handicrafts which they could sell. After listening to what was like an an old-fashioned religious testimonial from these ladies, they told us, in answer to questions, what they thought of the program.

I was reminded of a fact this afternoon when one of my colleagues mentioned that world population is a problem in such countries as El Salvador, Bangladesh and almost all countries in the Third World. One of the women being helped to become more self-sufficient said that for the first time in her life she did not have to beg, she was no longer poor. She told us she had two children, her husband had had a vasectomy and they were not going to have any more children. In that country, the government is trying by law to sterilize 100,000 people a month with the hope that later on this number will be quadrupled. There is no chance of solving the population problem by decree. What I am saying is that if we approached this as a world development process by providing education and allowing these people some freedom, they will make the choice voluntarily, and make it gladly.

I agree with the comments that the government of El Salvador has shown an unfortunate inability to cope with the excesses of the extreme right wing. I also share the view of my hon. friend that our government should continue to urge the government of El Salvador to put its house in order. I am glad that President Duarte appears to share that same objective and seems to be making some progress. I wish him well and hope his objectives can be achieved as quickly as possible. At the same time, I call upon the opposing forces of the left to lay down their arms, put an end to their share in the killing and bloodshed, and enter into a dialogue with the objective of bringing peace to the people of El Salvador.

It is a plain and unavoidable fact that to Canadians our dealings with the United States are by far the most important of our international ties. The United States is our closest neighbour, our predominant trading partner and our closest friend. As the hon. member opposite, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), said to the Empire Club in Toronto on October 4, 1979:

I am also not sure that we really have paid as much attention as we should to our nearest neighbour and closest partner, the United States . . . Our relations with the U.S.A. are so enormously important that they just must be our first priority. Have we really been as attentive, as co-operative and, yes, as tough as we should be in this regard?

With regard to Canada having a role to play in El Salvador, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Government of Canada do have an opinion which has been clearly expressed, in some cases publicly and in other cases privately, as should be the case. It is clear also that we have an interest in the matter. This has been clearly expressed in considerable detail today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

What the Secretary of State for External Affairs was attempting to say in his earlier remarks is that our bilateral interests in El Salvador are not nearly as significant as they are in many other countries, even those close by such as the Commonwealth Caribbean, and, therefore, we do not see it necessary for Canada to make public pronouncements on the pros and cons of the developing situation in that country, or to seek to promote our role as mediators.

The accurate situation is that many countries in the world are in the same position as Canada in that we do not have a primary interest in the area and are not in a position to make great public statements. It would seem that even countries which are closer to the area and have a more direct interest have found it appropriate not to make such public statements.

In respect to an international fact-finding mission, I would point out that, as far as is known, the government of El Salvador has not asked for such a mission. It would be presumptuous, and not at all consistent with the basic premise of international relations, as well as an interference in the domestic affairs of other countries, for Canada or any other country to suggest that such a mission be established and intrude itself into El Salvador. Such a mission would be unfounded. If the government of El Salvador requested such a mission, that would be a different thing. So far, no such request has been received. It is also significant that neither the Organization of American States nor the United Nations has proposed such a mission, or even contemplated it.

I have a great deal of respect for my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon East, and I was very gratified during the question period on March 1 to hear that hon. member ask the Prime Minister how he could equate Canada's interest in respect of the North-South dialogue with the fact that the United States was planning to extend additional military assistance to El Salvador.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to speak on this motion regarding El Salvador. As

I do so, I wonder what suddenly qualifies me, or any member of this House, as an instant expert, both in the analysis and the solution of the problems of that country. I have not heard that country mentioned in the House of Commons this year, except in the past few weeks. It seems suddenly as though this week, because the President of the United States is coming, or because of intensive reports of repression in the area, these concerns are raised. I know from talking with Canadians in non-governmental organizations that these problems did not begin overnight, or even last week or last month. The difficulties in El Salvador have only now caught public attention for a variety of international and political reasons.

Having regard to this instant expertise of members of the House of Commons tonight, I wonder what is the source of the information being brought forward. As I watch the news from the United States on my television set, I note one type of reasoning and one type of program where intervention is justified and rationalized. As I watch the news from my television station in Canada, I note a condemning attitude, and an expression of great concern over some of the problems faced by that country. As I read the material coming across my desk from one source, namely, the Department of External Affairs, I note one argument condemning the position taken and another defending it, and so I find it hard to know who and what to believe. There is a lack of information. Quite frankly, when we start hardening the line and taking sides, we start judging and condemning on the basis of very little information.

I have been a member of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence for some seven years and I would like to know where this issue has been. Is the issue now before that committee? Has it been the subject of study, and are we in fact acting upon such a fact study or on information gleaned by our own information-gathering source, or are we again jumping to conclusions on the basis of information we have received through the media, as we have done in respect of so many international events and crises?

I think all of us had better start by being cautious about our sources of information. Let us not become instant experts, as far as judgments are concerned, and let us be careful about condemnation. It is very easy to look back in history and determine what we should have done and what we should have said. On many occasions, better judgment and a little less haste to judge and to jump in would have been in the interest of all.

I do not know whether I should believe when we are told that communists are running guns in the area in an attempt to overthrow a right wing government, socialists, or whoever they are. I do not know whether the Americans are just trying to escalate an East-West crisis or whether the Soviet Union is trying to escalate such a crisis to test the Americans and the new President. I do not know about all these things, but I know the end result of this kind of international intervention.

We have seen the end result many times in many places. I wondered about the end result of France, the United States, the Soviet Union and China being involved in Vietnam. I wondered what this has meant to the people of Vietnam. I visited Vietnam and I know what this has meant so far. The international involvement has meant more troops, more guns, more death, less food and less social progress. That is what that international interference has meant.

• (2140)

In this modern world we see again and again the superpowers seeking ground other than their own where they can play their political science games of war, of experimentation and push and pull to see who will go the farthest. What a shame it is that El Salvador is seemingly becoming a victim of the international giants' power play.

I think it is dangerous to condemn either side at this stage, but it is not dangerous to condemn the results of this international power play in the area. What was the result in Cambodia? Twenty-five to 50 per cent of the people lost their lives, loss of freedom and social structure, and loss of food, and water in a country that had exported food. It is now one of the most impoverished countries of the world.

What of Ethiopia and Somalia, two of the poorest countries in the world, suffering again through the struggles of the superpowers? And what will we as Canadians bring to this debate in Parliament?

Well, it seems to me that what we are bringing, to start with, is condemnation. That is what this motion talks about. It talks about condemning, about judging, and it gives me great concern that members of this House, who badly lack information, are asked to pass on a motion of this sort. I think this motion is irresponsible in that it is escalatory, in that it promotes confrontation and anger—

An hon. Member: Wake up, Bob.

Mr. Wenman: It is not a matter of waking up. Maybe you need to wake up. Perhaps the ones who need to be awakened are the ones who need to look at the whole international situation.

People point to another Vietnam. I am not sure that the situation in Vietnam, looked at in retrospect, might not have suggested a different course of action. When I compare nations in southeast Asia, and that is the comparison that seems to be made, where there is, in fact, basic democracy, basic freedom, multiplicity of parties, in some cases a parliamentary system like our own, I see prosperity and peace there although I see the problems there too. But then I look at Cambodia, Laos, and Vietnam, and it does not take much to judge which system is the superior of the two.

I am not going to stand here and condemn the United States offhand. The United States is a bastion of democracy and freedom, and I support the basic values of the United States in that direction. However, when it comes down to the question of escalating the cold war militarily and socially into a hot war situation, that is another matter. I do not want to see that in the area. I do not want to see the United States moving in in a bigger way, nor do I want to see the Soviet Union, through Cuba or whatever other satellite, moving into the area.

Instead, I think we have to see our position for what it is, and it surely somehow relates to what Canada will bring to the debate and what its attitude will be.

I think the attitude of Canada has to be that which is in our tradition. I think, instead of coming down on one side or the other of that east-west conflict, we should take the attitude that is being fostered in our parliamentary committees where in fact, knowledge and caring is being found. We have had a committee sitting hour after hour after on North-South dialogue. We need to redirect our effort from confrontation to peace and compassion and the reality of longer-term programs that will bring peace and stability to that region. We need to start caring about human rights, and we need to express concerns about human rights in El Salvador. I commend and support those hon. members who have said that. We need to express concern about human rights in Cambodia, Vietnam, Laos, Ethiopia, Somalia, wherever there is this east-west conflict the results of which we must share.

Now, it is very easy to say that Canada perhaps does not have an interest in the area or that we somehow do not really have an involvement there through our traditions or our practice. We might not have that involvement now but perhaps we should have it and anyway, whether we like it or not, if the east-west confrontation continues, we will be involved.

Hopefully, our involvement will not be a military one but rather that of a country with compassion and freedom. In trying to pick up the results, regardless on which side, the east, the west the right or the left, we will pick up the tragedy that will result from war in that region.

We know only too well in this House that there are no winners in any war. No war is ever won. The people involved directly suffer the most, anyone involved suffers in any kind of war. There will be, in fact there are already, losers in this war. I understand we are already starting to see the fallout of some 60,000 refugees and, again, it does not matter who wins, there will be refugees from the right wing, there will be refugees from the left wing. The refugees of the world are created by this east-west conflict. And who in the world will then be called upon to accept the refugees, to help them? The United Nations will be called upon to do so and so will Canada but, before these people become refugees, we must consider peaceful participation in the affairs of El Salvador, of South America and of the North-South community of nations. That is where the matter stands, and that is where we should be looking now.

Instead of condemning one side or the other, why not propose perhaps an international monitoring system that will supervise both economic and social support programs? Why not bring in this type of a program instead of political and military solutions one way or the other? We do not have involvement in the area. In fact, we know the need is there. It is clearly identified in almost any sphere by any group, it does not matter whether it is left, right or centre. The need for stability is demonstrated there, stability that can provide the infrastructure to deliver aid programs and, beyond the aid programs, an infrastructure that can deliver development programs. I wish that were the tone of the United States, of the Soviet Union and of Canada. This debate, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, has not provided that tone because the very nature of the motion is that of confrontation.

I am concerned about the disparities which I hear about, the stories that the area is wracked with terrorism, violence, oppression, torture and murder. Ten thousand people were murdered there last year alone, many thousands more were left homeless by the fighting. Yet, I am encouraged that in the midst of this, reform is also taking place. It is time for us to participate in making reform a reality and to move toward development and stability in the region. Whether it be a communist, a fascist or a democratic system, people prosper from strong and stable economic, social and political structures which deliver services.

Let us not look to confrontation with the President of the United States; let us look to supporting the President and encouraging a redirection in aid programs to that area. We should work toward an international monitoring of the military and political situation, and above all, we should supervise the distribution and control of arms.

In conclusion, I wish that Parliament, with its reputation for peace and humanitarianism, would come to the aid of El Salvador rather than joining with or condemning one side or the other.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, having read very quickly the motion moved by the New Democratic Party, I feel the very least that can be said is that it gives an incomplete description of the situation in El Salvador. I also believe that this motion is rather naive as it does not take into account the various implications and ramifications of the situation prevailing in that country, while on the other hand, the motion seems to me slightly pretentious as it purports to be based on a thorough knowledge of the factual reality in that unfortunate country.

Mr. Speaker, no one questions the fact that in Central America as in the Latin American continent as a whole, socioeconomic conditions are so horrendous that they literally make visitors to these countries sick to their stomachs. I had the opportunity to live for two years in South America and I can understand the feelings of exasperation and frustration of a working class exploited by oligarchies with the support of governments which to say the least tolerate those inequities. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, these problems must be solved by the people of those countries. In the case of El Salvador, the last thing to wish for would be a massive presence or intervention by any foreign interest.

Mr. Speaker, the motion gives the impression that we are living in a world where there are only good guys and bad guys, where everything is either black or white. In other words, unfortunately, this motion does not consider all the hues of the complex situation now existing in El Salvador. For instance, this motion assumes naively, to say the least, that the United States, our southern neighbours, are the only country to provide military aid to one of the parties in the conflict. It also suggests, quite wrongly, that it was basically the United States of America which decided to become militarily involved in El Salvador. Absolutely nothing is said about interventions by other interests, countries or ideological groups. There is complete silence in that regard. What about Cuba? No, Cuba is completely out. Even though the Nicaraguan territory has been used, this is completely ignored in the motion.

Mr. Speaker, when the Canadian people have given a group of men the responsibility to govern their country, and when these men have decisions or judgments to make about situations outside our borders, I believe the least we can expect is that they should be quite familiar with the facts. I think that unfortunately, as far as the situation in El Salvador and the rest of Central America is concerned, we have to be extremely cautious, otherwise we might make judgments which will not serve the interests of Canada and the free world, or even of the people in countries like El Salvador who deserve a better fate.

I would like to close by quoting the words of the former American ambassador to El Salvador, Mr. Robert White, who has, on several occasions, publicly opposed the military aid given by his own country to the junta which governs El Salvador. Mr. White, who saw the situation first hand for a few years and who witnessed the events in that country, wrote the following—I say all this, Mr. Speaker, to show that everything is not either black or white and that it is not only a fight between the good guys and the bad guys—as I was saying, Mr. White stated the following, as reported by The New York Times on March 7, only two days ago, and I quote:

[English]

No leader of the leftist forces, whether it be Ungo or (Roman) Nayorga or (Hector) Oqueli, has ever—and I have asked that they do so publicly—made any effort to stop the leftist forces from murdering, kidnapping, assassinating. The left takes bus drivers out of their vehicles and guns them down in front of the people. The day that Dr. Ungo condemns that, he starts to gain some moral authority in my eyes. The government of Napoleon Duarte, on the other hand, and many of the moderate military officers, have explicitly condemned the excesses of the security forces. They have tried and thrown out a large number of enlisted people and have transferred a number of officers out of the line of command.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude in pointing out that conditions are not as simple as we are led to believe, that the United States have to assume their responsibilities in the face of strategic interests and on behalf of world peace and also because we cannot allow the setting up of another Cuba on the doorstep of the United States we can deplore such conditions, but if we have to ask the American government to stop such arms shipments we should in the first place make sure that arms shipments from other sources do not reach El Salvador.

PUBLIC SERVICE—DISPUTE INVOLVING VETERINARIANS IN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC—EFFORTS TO REACH SETTLEMENT

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, on February 26, as reported on page 7700 of Hansard, I directed a question to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). Because of a totally unacceptable salary range, the Health of Animals Branch of Agriculture Canada has been having a rather difficult time recruiting veterinarians. This salary range is a discouragement to veterinarians to make a career for themselves in government service.

The starting salary for veterinarians in the federal service is not only a deterrent to recruiting, but a direct insult to the veterinary profession. To every veterinarian in the country, to be offered such a ridiculously low salary range after six years of university training, is an insult. That is the main reason why we have a serious shortage of veterinarians in the federal service today. What irritates me more is that no apparent honest effort has been made by the government and the Treasury Board up to now to alleviate this very serious situation.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) stated last week, in response to a question from the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), that there were 23 veterinary vacancies is his department. However, what the minister did not say is that there is an additional 198 veterinary job vacancies in the federal service that would be open and pursued if only personnel was available.

The Government of Canada has chosen to ignore this ever-increasing and ever-alarming vacancy rate in the federal service, which has increased over the past few years. If this shortage of federal veterinarians is not acted upon very soon, the health of Canadians will be in jeopardy. Not only will it have an effect on the health of our people but it will have an effect, as well, on the safety, security and economy of our country. The consequence of the consumption of uninspected or inadequately inspected meat and meat byproducts, which make up more than 40 per cent of the Canadian consumers' dollar, can be not only injurious to health, but could even be fatal. The threat of food poisoning through the consumption of meat and meat byproducts requires a constant inspection monitoring system, as is carried out by the Veterinary Meat Inspection Department of the Health of Animals Branch. To do the job right would require adequately trained veterinary personnel. There can be no disputing the grave consequences of a breakdown or reduction of services by members of the veterinary science group.

In view of this, I find it extremely alarming that the government has chosen to ignore the vacancy rate which has not only existed for several years but has increased over the past three. However, to give the President of the Treasury Board his due, I was encouraged by his reply to my question on February 26 when he said:

I can assure the hon. member that if there are major inequities they will certainly be adjusted during the current negotiation.

I believe the minister is a sincere man. I hope he will recognize the work of this dedicated group of veterinarians in the public service and correct a long overdue inequity. This group of veterinarians is not only dedicated but, on the whole, a very patient group. But patience, no matter how persevering, does eventually have its breaking point. A very low morale results from being constantly ignored in fruitless attempts for a better deal.

I appeal to the President of the Treasury Board to thoroughly consider all the injustices and inequities to which federal veterinarians have been subjected for so long and to come up with a favourable solution so that we can recruit desperately needed veterinanians into the federal service where they could have a very enjoyable and fulfilling career, which is certainly not the case at the present time.

Mr. Serge Joyal (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate to answer the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) and to set straight some facts he referred to in his intervention of February 26 last. He pointed out, and here I am quoting one of the figures he mentioned in his remarks, that the starting salary for a veterinarian hired by Agriculture Canada was $17,660. With all due respect for the hon. member, that figure is not correct. The current starting salary for a veterinarian who goes to work for Agriculture Canada is $22,863 and that amount is now being negotiated, so it may be adjusted along with the full salary scale applicable to veterinarians.

In his comments on February 26, 1981, the hon. member also said that the veterinary vacancy rate in the department was in excess of 30 per cent in the section which includes meat inspectors. After checking with the Department of Agriculture it would appear that the vacancy rate for meat inspectors is 17 out of 287, which works out to about 6 per cent. Those are the correct figures. I see that the hon. member is shaking his head in disbelief. Those are the figures provided by the Department of Agriculture. If the Professional Institute of the Public Service which is negotiating for veterinarians has different figures to set forth I am certainly prepared to receive and review those figures on behalf of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston).

The hon. member also stated that the negotiations are dragging on. In that respect perhaps we might recall a number of facts. First, the negotiations got under way in November 1980, and continued through January, 1981. They reached an impasse on salary and other related issues in mid-February, particularly on February 6, 1981, and as a result a conciliation officer was appointed; he got the parties together and was able to work in close co-operation with them between February 23 and 26. On February 26, 117 of the 156 veterinarians in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario did not report for work because of illness. Of course, nobody is fooled by this diplomatic illness, if I may call it that. It was a form of strike action that the 117 veterinarians from Ontario and Quebec took that day. Therefore, Treasury Board will certainly not pay sick leaves benefits unless proof of illness is duly submitted. Otherwise, the Department of Agriculture has no choice but to apply the disciplinary action which is warranted in such case.

Therefore, since the twenty-sixth, the conciliator has been waiting for a go-ahead from the parties involved. Considering the progress made with the help of the conciliator, there is a good chance that negotiations will resume within a week and that all parties will come to a satisfactory settlement.

HOUSING—SHORTAGE OF DWELLING UNITS IN VANCOUVER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak tonight because of a question put to the minister responsible for CMHC on March 5, 1981. His answer—at least to me—was somewhat misleading. I do not blame the minister because I feel he was trying to give a very straightforward and honest answer to the question, but the manner in which it was phrased may create in many minds—certainly in many minds in Vancouver—a conception which simply is not true.

The minister also suggested that I check my facts. I have checked the facts thoroughly, and I bring to the attention of the minister and the House that on Thursday when I spoke about 800 housing units being allowed for a population of 30,000 people moving into Vancouver this year, was accurate. Actually, in rough figures—and as well as we can determine—888 units have been allowed in 1981.

● (2210)

The minister speaks of 3,000 units, but in terms of the housing crisis, there were actually 2,200 units allocated last year. We might say that those 2,200 units were for the 30,000 people who moved into Vancouver in 1980, not in 1981.

Considering the exploding population and the very serious housing crisis on the west coast, the actions of CMHC have not been adequate, in my view. With the greatest humility and the greatest respect, I would ask the department and the minister to go over the figures again. They should look at what is happening on the west coast and at the continuing tragedy in the housing situation. If the minister does not take action to change his priorities, the situation will worsen in 1981.

Some facts and figures may be useful, Mr. Speaker. In 1979 there were 12,827 housing starts on the west coast, and 3,576 CMHC loans; in 1980, 16,780 starts and 2,440 CMHC loans; at the end of January, 1981, 1,492 starts and 10 CMHC loans. In 1979, 3,054 units were approved by CMHC; in 1980, 2,117 housing units were approved by CMHC and perhaps the most tragic figure of all, with an anticipated 30,000 new residents in the greater Vancouver area in 1981, 888 units were approved by CMHC.

Let me break down the figures for 1980, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is important to understand how much they contributed to the alleviation of the severe housing crisis on the west coast. In 1980, 333 units were constructed for provincial use, mostly for senior citizens, and no one disagrees with that. There were 498 intermediate units for seniors' care; 446 hostel beds for halfway houses, battered wives, etc; 28 reserve housing for Indian reserves in the province, and six rural native units.

The two areas where some help has been given are the 621 units for the Greater Vancouver Housing Corporation and the 1,689 co-operative housing units, roughly 2,200 units in all. I believe that is what the minister referred to when he answered my question. But those figures refer to last year, Mr. Speaker, not this year. Last year, 30,000 people moved into the lower mainland. This aggravated the shortage, caused doubling-up and the opening of many illegal suites, unsanitary conditions and basement accommodation. Another 30,000 people will move in this year. As I said to the minister, only 800 units are available for 30,000 people—perhaps I should say 3,000 for 60,000 people, if the minister wants to add the 1980 starts to the 1981 figures. It is a deplorable situation, and I think CMHC could and should do much more.

The answer I received from the minister last Thursday would show that he feels although the situation is severe, 3,000 units is not bad. I think 3,000 units is a drop in the bucket considering the number of people coming from Ontario and the rest of Canada to the lower mainland.

I suggest to hon. members opposite that some of the people who will not find accommodation at the coast or who will not be able to afford it, may be the sons and daughters of voters in their ridings. If I cannot make the point, then I hope those young people will write to their moms and dads telling them the problems they have run into when trying to get housing. Perhaps they will look at what we have said tonight about this issue and realize where the blame lies. Something should be done about this.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in responding further to the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook) about the British Columbia housing market, I should like to emphasize the fact that the government has made a number of important moves to help alleviate the situation. In addition, there is every indication that the housing market is responding to the high levels of demand.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that last year the government increased the national allocation of 25,000 social housing units by some 5,000 additional units. Of these, British Columbia received a total of 1,569 additional units. Also, a further special allocation of some 1,100 units was made in December, 1980, to the Vancouver area. In other words, the federal government provided an additional 2,669 units over and above the regular 1980 allocation in response to British Columbia's pressing needs. Most of these non-profit and co-operative housing units will be coming on stream this year. I am pleased that this assistance has been made available and I am confident that it will go a long way in meeting the need for social housing in British Columbia. Furthermore, 3,730 non-profit and co-operative units have been allocated to British Columbia for 1981. This represents an increase of some 70 per cent over last year's original allocation, in direct response to British Columbia market conditions.

I should like to underline the fact, Mr. Speaker, that starts have increased dramatically in the province, in response to demand.

Once these units come on stream, they will be an important factor in alleviating the situation. In 1980, total starts in British Columbia were some 37,500 units, up more than 10,000 from 1979, an increase of 37 per cent. We are forecasting a record year for housing in British Columbia this year with an estimated 38,000 housing starts. As the hon. member is aware, the government also reinstated the MURB program in the last federal budget. This was in direct response to the tight rental situation in major market areas in Canada. It is expected that the reinstated program will result in 10,000 new units of which a large portion will be built in British Columbia. I might also add that the building industry in the province is operating near capacity.

PARLIAMENT—COLLECTIVE BARGAINING RIGHTS FOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to follow up on a question which I asked of the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on February 18 last concerning the extension of collective bargaining rights to employees on Parliament Hill. At that time I pointed out that recently the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada recommended to Parliament a charter of rights, which would have granted a number of rights to all Canadians, including the full freedom of association. I pointed out as well that at this time we are denying freedom of association and the right to full collective bargaining to some 3,100 employees on Parliament Hill, namely, employees of the House of Commons, the Senate and the Library of Parliament.

Some 13 years ago a special committee on the public service recommended that this basic fundamental right of collective bargaining be extended to all employees on Parliament Hill, and that we live up to our obligations undertaken pursuant to certain conventions, for example, of the International Labour Organization.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was a member of that committee and he has been pursuing this matter diligently for years since that committee reported. Two years ago, the then government House leader, now the Minister of Finance (Mr. MacEachen), promised the House that the government would consider very seriously amending the Public Service Staff Relations Act to extend the right of employees of Parliament to choose collective bargaining.

● (2220)

Since that time no action has been taken whatsoever. What is the effect of this denial of collective bargaining rights and the denial of recognition of the right to full collective bargaining to employees on the Hill? What this means is that employees can be hired and fired at will.

Only too recently one of the major bases for hiring on Parliament Hill was the connection that the prospective employee may have had with particular Members of Parliament in office at the time. Therefore, there can be hiring and firing at will.

There is no grievance procedure whatsoever for employees in the offices of Members of Parliament. Only recently was there a grievance procedure established, and it is not a written grievance procedure open to other employees on Parliament Hill.

There may be unreasonable working hours or working conditions. For example, security guards on the Hill have been told that tomorrow every guard must work whether or not he or she was scheduled to be off. They do not know whether that time will be made up. These are completely arbitrary working conditions.

Working conditions may be unhealthy or unsafe. We need only point to the example of the print shop and the deplorable conditions existing there. There is no control whatsoever over basic working conditions. There may be arbitrary discipline or other problems with respect to promotion, salaries or other working conditions. As we know, salaries are handed down from on high. There is no opportunity for employees on the Hill to bargain collectively.

There are still employment ghettos on the Hill; women who are working as cleaning ladies and men working as maintenance staff. Surely in this day and age our Parliament should be setting an example and not perpetrating these kinds of sexist hiring practices.

I gave the example of the lack of grievance procedure for employees who may be sexually harassed. My reason for raising that example was simply to illustrate the fact that there is no appeal mechanism available to an employee if he or she feels there is a legitimate grievance of that nature.

When I raised this matter in the public accounts committee with Madam Speaker, she said quite properly that this matter should be raised with the government, that employees on Parliament Hill had no collective bargaining rights and that she as Speaker had no power to extend these fundamental rights to employees on the Hill.

It was a fine example of buck passing on February 18 when in response to my question, instead of suggesting that we should have this kind of legislation to bring Parliament into the twentieth century, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said we should go back to the Speaker.

The Speaker says she has no jurisdiction and the Prime Minister refuses to accept the responsibility of the government to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act to allow the right to choose. That is all we are talking about, the extension of the right to employees of the Senate, House of Commons and Library of Parliament, to choose collective bargaining for themselves, not the imposition of anything upon them. As I said before, in the present day we here on Parliament Hill are, in many ways, in the backwater of labour relations.

I urge the government to move forward and accept the recommendation made some 13 years ago by the committee, which examined this whole question very carefully, to live up to the commitment made by the then government House leader some two years ago to amend the legislation to permit the 3,100 employees on Parliament Hill full collective bargaining rights.

I would like to refer to one argument that is sometimes raised with respect to the right to strike. The government will know that essential employees can be designated. If Parliament is sitting and employees are deemed to be essential, those employees can be designated as indeed employees were designated during the strike of the clerical staff. I therefore suggest that that argument is without foundation.

In conclusion, I urge the government to seriously consider the fact that in this year where we are extending the freedom of association to all Canadians through a charter of rights, we should clean up our own house and extend the fundamental right of freedom of association of collective bargaining to the 3,100 employees on Parliament Hill.

● (2225)

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) knows full well the government is committed to improving and protecting the rights of individual Canadians, as witnessed by the constitutional resolution now before the House. Indeed, that hon. member has participated at committee during the study of this resolution, and I am sure, as a supporter of that resolution, he recognizes the efforts the government is making, as are all members of this House, to protect fundamental freedoms and liberties under the constitutional amendments which will be going forward very shortly from this Parliament.

The government believes in general that the collective bargaining system represents the most fair and the most publicly acceptable method of determining wages and working conditions in both the private and public sectors. Obviously the public service at large is organized, and it has been Liberal governments over the past few years which have been in the forefront of labour legislation, leading the way in the field of labour legislation, leading the way in the field of labour relations in this country, both in respect of its own employees in the public sector and in those industries which come under federal regulation.

I should point out, however, that there are a number of ways, in both the common law and through statutory provisions, by which the rights of unorganized employees can be and are protected in Canadian society today.

It is also recognized that Parliament in the relation between its employees and employers, represents a unique case involving a number of complex and special factors. I understand the hon. member for Burnaby wants to include the staffs of members of the House of Commons and of the Senate in any proposed organization or collective association in order to cover all employees of the House, such as the protective staff, Hansard, etc. Perhaps that is a good idea. It is certainly being studied at the moment by officials of the government. In order to provide an accurate and comprehensive basis on which the matter can be considered further, we should allow those studies to take their normal course. Then Members of Parliament should have a full opportunity to debate whatever recommendations come forward from the government.

What concerns me about the hon. member's presentation, and this concerned me a few days ago when he directed essentially the same kind of question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), is that there is almost smearing or innuendo in the comments he has been making, both publicly, off the Hill, and in this chamber. I hope I have the hon. member for Burnaby wrong in this regard and that he is not engaging in these kinds of tactics because this smears not only those in managerial positions on the staff of the House of Commons, but also Members of Parliament, both in the House and in the Senate. I would ask the hon. member, in making what could very well be, and probably is, a rightful case for association, not to use examples which could undermine the basic principle he is trying to bring forward in this House and in Parliament.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

At 10.29 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Today Canadians from coast to coast are joining together to welcome to our nation the President of the United States of America, the Honourable Ronald Reagan. Accordingly, parliamentarians should put aside their complaints and grievances, subdue rancour, and truly represent the friendly spirit of the Canadian people toward our southern neighbour. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling):

That this House recognize the interdependence and common interests of Canada and the United States of America by extending our warmest welcome to the President and by expressing our hope that good faith and mutual trust will govern our future deliberations.

REAFFIRMATION OF BELIEF—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, I rise with some indication from both the government side and our side that this motion would receive the consent of the House. I hope that the members of the New Democratic Party, who I know espouse the doctrine of freedom of speech, can see their way to do likewise.

My motion is in regard to the incident occurring today in front of the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings during addresses made by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chénier):

That the House reaffirm its belief in the rights of all Canadians to demonstrate peacefully and freely in promotion of their personal views but at the same time this House deplores the attempt by certain minorities to drown out the right of the President and the Prime Minister to exercise freedom of speech in the same manner as cherished by such minority groups and, finally, the House assures the President of the United States that this is in no way typical of Canadian hospitality and it commends the Prime Minister of Canada for his impromptu remarks at the conclusion of the ceremony admonishing those who performed a regrettable act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

BANKS AND BANKING

RECENT HIGH PROFITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, bank profits for the first quarter of the banking year are dramatically higher. In the case of the Royal Bank they are up 76 per cent and in the case of the Bank of Commerce they are up 69 per cent, while industrial corporation profits show a decline of 7.2 per cent, as reported by Statistics Canada on Friday. Clearly, bank profits are up because of the government's high interest policy. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That the Minister of Finance, on motions, explain to this House why he is maintaining his high interest policy to the benefit of the big banks and to the detriment of productivity in industry and to the detriment of the ordinary people of Canada, and why the banking business is now more profitable than the oil industry or, indeed, any other business in Canada, and if the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will be publishing a seven-volume report detailing how the banks, in league with the government's high interest policy, are so profitable.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

CHILE—PRESIDENTIAL CEREMONY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Madam Speaker, as I, too, rise in the same light as our tribute to freedom of speech and democratic institutions, I am certain that members to my right will support the following motion.

Considering that on September 11, 1973, the late president of Chile, Salvador Allende, gave his life in La Moneda Palace defending the democratically elected government of Chile against the military coup headed by Augusto Pinochet, and considering that since that day the Pinochet regime has systematically suppressed and brutalized the Chilean people, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle):

That this House requests that the government instruct its ambassador in Santiago not to attend the ceremony to take place March 11, 1981, which will illegally instal the dictator Augusto Pinochet in La Moneda Presidential Palace and condemn the attempt by the Chilean junta to institutionalize its reign of terror in an imposed constitution.

RESPECT FOR PROCEEDINGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In the past few days, we, as well as the Canadian people, have witnessed a deterioration and a glaring violation of the respect which should characterize this House. I refer to the racist, hollow and entirely unacceptable comments made in violation of our most basic rights and freedoms last week by members of the official opposition, the member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) and the member for Simcoe-South (Mr. Stewart) and others, who deplored among other things the fact that Lord Durham's report had never been enforced so as to make English the only compulsory language in Canada.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant):

That following such comments, the Leader of the Official Opposition show himself in his true colours and make it clear to all Canadians whether he stands with the 50 per cent of moderates within his party, those who act according to their conscience, or with the racist extremists. Does he agree or not with such comments? If not, let him prove it by expelling—

Whereas last week the Canadian ambassador to the United States said that Canada still offers foreign energy firms a warmer welcome than they can find almost anywhere else in the world and whereas on Friday the United States state department sent a strongly-worded communiqué to the Department of External Affairs protesting the very mild national energy policy in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant):

That this House instruct the Prime Minister to inform the President of the United States that the United States should recognize Canada's right to own and control its own resources, especially in the oil and gas field, which assets are owned by foreigners to the tune of 84 per cent and that it is not in Canada's best interest to take part in a continental energy policy.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, who was supposed to be here, but who probably could not get through the security. I will address my question to the Acting Prime Minister. A year ago today the government instituted the floating Bank of Canada rate. At that time the Minister of Finance said that the government would consider special assistance for home owners if interest rates soared under the new floating rate approach. At that time the Bank of Canada rate was 14 per cent, and today it is 17.16 per cent. The prime bank rate was 15 per cent at that time, and today it is 18.25 per cent, or 3.25 per cent more. It has certainly soared. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said that he was pleased with the new approach to interest rate policy.

My question to the Acting Prime Minister is this: is the government still pleased with this floating interest rate policy? Also, in view of the fact that rates have soared, will the government now institute special assistance to home owners to help them with these soaring interest rates as was promised by the Minister of Finance on behalf of the government last year?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that, as indicated in the budget, the Minister of Finance is far from being satisfied with current interest rates in Canada. However, the hon. member should also bear in mind that those interest rates reflect the inflationary pressure on the over-all economy. He knows very well that interest rates are one factor in the fight against inflation and that if all economic agents join forces to combat inflation and we manage to reduce the inflationary pressure we will end up with lower interest rates and everybody will be more satisfied.

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: I wish to direct a supplementary question to the same Acting Prime Minister, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: His answer made just as much sense as the Minister of Finance would have made. Would the minister answer the question about assistance to home owners in view of the promise made by his minister last year? Would he also answer this? The prime bank rate in Canada is still 18.25 per cent although the U.S. bank rate has come down from December when it was 21.5 per cent to 18.5 per cent, a drop of 3 per cent, but the Bank of Canada rate and the prime bank rate have not dropped. In these circumstances will the minister now direct the Bank of Canada to reduce the Bank of Canada rate correspondingly, or will the government continue its policy of propping up the Bank of Canada rate and Canadian interest rates? Would he give us a clear answer to that?

[Translation]

Mr. Bussières: With respect to the first point, Madam Speaker, I thought the hon. member was aware of the connection between the fight against inflation and the interest rates so that if on the one hand the government launches a massive attack against inflation and on the other hand makes grants to help not only home owners who need them but also small businessmen, agricultural producers and all groups in society who suffer from this high interest situation, we would thus be cancelling what we want to achieve as a first step.

Second, the hon. member knows very well that the rates set every Thursday during the auction sale are flexible and reflect the expectations and apprehensions of the market with respect to the inflationary push so that those rates mirror Canada's current situation. The hon. member may recall that not so very long ago our interest rates were way below those which our neighbours to the south had to cope with. Now, of course, the situation has changed and the rates continue to reflect the over-all condition of Canada's current economy.

[English]

ACTION CONTEMPLATED BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, the minister is a master of befuddlement, "on the one hand and on the other hand". It was a straight question. May I point out to the minister that the Bank of England dropped its bank rate today from 14 per cent to 12 per cent? We are asking the minister to drop the Canadian rate now from 17.16 per cent because the U.S. rate has fallen 3 per cent in the last few weeks while our rate has not fallen at all.

● (1420)

The minister is aware that bank profits are at a tremendous peak. There has been a 76 per cent increase in profits for the Royal Bank of Canada. The reason given is the spread between the prime bank rate and the rates paid by banks on borrowed money. The United Kingdom has just introduced a special tax to provide an $880 million payment from the windfall profits of the English banks made because of high interest rates. I ask the minister whether he is contemplating such a similar tax, or any action at all, in connection with the difference in the spread? Is the minister contemplating a decrease in the Bank of Canada rate? These are the questions. Never mind giving answers "on the one hand or the other", and telling us you are fighting against inflation. We want to know—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I am quite amazed not at the questions but at the comments of the hon. member. The one he has just made clearly indicated that he is not interested in understanding the general situation. He is interested in statements, in other words his rhetoric and his style, and he does not want to understand anything and try to have them explained to him. I regret that the hon. member who is a former finance minister now refuses to understand the current situation and would want the government to answer him in the same rhetorical terms he uses to put his questions.

MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES

REQUEST THAT MINISTER ATTEND COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, in the absence of most of the inner cabinet perhaps I could put my question to an outer cabinet minister, the President of the Treasury Board.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kempling: How far out can you get?

Mr. Stevens: As we all know, the President of the Treasury Board absolutely flubbed the introduction in this House of the main estimates of his department. Could the minister indicate why he has chosen to turn down the request to meet with the miscellaneous estimates committee last night, today and Thursday, bearing in mind that when the request was made the minister was free on all three occasions?

Mr. Siddon: Explain that one.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I thought the hon. member was rising in his place to apologize for his curious behaviour of two weeks ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: With respect to appearing before the miscellaneous estimates committee, I will be delighted to do so. Last night was not possible. I was advised that the committee meetings were cancelled today and that the Tory party was having a caucus on Thursday morning. I have since spoken to the chairman of the committee who advises me that to the best of his knowledge the committee will be meeting on Thursday morning. I will be delighted to attend because I have been waiting a year to receive an intelligent question from the hon. member for York-Peel.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INCLUSION OF ONE DOLLAR ITEMS IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, may I put my supplementary question to the same minister? It touches on Supplementary Estimates C which were introduced in this House, on which the guillotine will fall, as we know, within two weeks. Would the minister tell us whether he is aware that he has included 30 $1 items in those Supplementary Estimates C, totalling $868 million of expenditures or guarantees to be incurred on behalf of the Government of Canada? If he is aware that there is over $868 million included in the $30 worth of items, would he explain to this House why he thinks that is fair disclosure to the House and to the people of Canada? Is that not really a shocking concealment of the expenditures of the government?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the hon. member for York-Peel is always shocked by everything he does not understand.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1425)

Mr. Johnston: I will verify the hon. member's arithmetic, as I normally do, and I will be happy to respond to any specific questions on Thursday morning before the miscellaneous estimates committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF FORMER GOVERNOR GENERAL MICHENER AND OF PREMIER BUCHANAN OF NOVA SCOTIA

Madam Speaker: It is with great pleasure and gratitude for the honour he does to us that I draw the attention of the House to the presence in our gallery of a former Governor General and former Speaker of this House, His Excellency Mr. Roland Michener, and Mrs. Michener.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: I also draw attention to the presence in our gallery of the Premier of Nova Scotia, Mr. John Buchanan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EL SALVADOR—CANADIAN INFLUENCE ON INTERNATIONAL COMMUNITY

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I will direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. It is further to the situation in El Salvador, which was debated seriously and well in this House of Commons yesterday. I feel that the members of this House and the people of Canada would give strong support to the positions that we proposed with regard to stopping military assistance to that country. I wish to ask the parliamentary secretary how the Government of Canada is going to influence the international community in a positive way to bring about a political solution in El Salvador, as other countries such as Mexico and West Germany are proposing?

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is right in saying that we had a serious debate on the problems in El Salvador, but I would like to point out that it is certainly not by attacking our neighbours and best allies, the United States, that we will make a useful contribution toward improving the present situation in El Salvador. In this regard, Madam Speaker, I believe that the motion introduced yesterday was unfortunately unbalanced and rather incomplete, which prevented us from agreeing to it. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has made it clear on several occasions to representatives of the El Salvador government, both to the Salvadorian ambassador in Ottawa and through our own ambassador in Costa Rica, that we greatly deplore the violation of human rights in that country. Unfortunately, as long as arms reach that country from other sources, we cannot attack the American government exclusively on this matter.

[English]

CUTBACK IN CANADIAN AID

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Madam Speaker, I was not attacking the American government. I was asking for positive responses from the Canadian government with regard to establishing a peaceful zone. I understand from this morning's news that the government has cut back on its aid to El Salvador. In the recent past there were similar circumstances, in Zimbabwe for example, where the people were rising up to control their own future. Will the parliamentary secretary explain how Canada will approach its very serious role in North-South relations as it relates to aid to that country?

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the hon. member says that he is not attacking the American government, but that was essentially the purpose of the resolution or motion introduced in the House yesterday. As for any cut back in Canadian assistance to El Salvador, Madam Speaker—I would like to have a bit of silence, Madam Speaker. If the hon. members do not want an answer, I shall simply sit down and shut up. As for our reduced assistance, I must point out that we are critized when we maintain our level of assistance in similar situations. Canada will continue to play its role through the usual channels, and these are not problems which can be solved through spectacular debates in a public forum.

• (1430)

[English]

Mr. Ogle: Madam Speaker, I am afraid the parliamentary secretary has the wrong page in his briefing notes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Oral Questions

CANADIAN ROLE IN CENTRAL AMERICA

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): During the debate yesterday it was brought up many times that we Canadians did not in a sense have any role or any expertise in that area. As a last question to the parliamentary secretary, will he now please tell the House how the government plans to have us acquire that expertise and that role in that area, just as we would if we had a sick neighbour down the street we did not know but would have to help?

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, in view of the wording of yesterday's motion, I had concluded that the New Democratic Party believed that it had this expertise and that it was well aware of the facts. As for the briefing notes, I must point out to the hon. member that not having any, I could not therefore have the wrong page.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MEASURES TO SETTLE STRIKE

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. In spite of his commitment several weeks ago to end the CBC journalists' strike, in spite of a major shift in the position of the union and in spite of several courageous efforts at mediation made by the Department of Labour, the CBC management's position has not changed and the newspersons are still on strike. Could the minister advise the House of the steps he intends to take to settle this strike, especially when one considers that the government is seeking our approval for a 12.4 per cent increase in the estimates of the CBC, while the CBC management will not budge an inch from its 8 per cent raise offer to its journalists, and when one considers also that the CBC management will refuse to make a final offer until the union agrees to recommend it to its membership without first looking into it.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows well the nature of the system under which the CBC operates. From time immemorial, the parties on both sides of the House have reaffirmed the basic concept that CBC should be free from all government interference and able to conduct its broadcasting business independently from the government as far as content and labour relations are concerned.

On the other hand, the hon. member is ill informed. Before asking such questions in the House, he should know that the CBC management's position has changed over the weeks and months. Although an agreement has not been reached, the fact remains that the money items include a lump sum offer of $2,300 to each of the 180 newspersons and that the special mediator appointed by the Minister of Labour has explored all possible avenues of settlement. For the time being, the union has turned down the salary offers, but the CBC management is willing to return to the bargaining table and to continue negotiating in the hope that a settlement will soon be reached.

● (1435)

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary to the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications.

The minister knows full well that this strike, the longest in the history of Radio-Canada, is reducing coverage of the constitutional debate in Quebec, that the rest of Canada is less aware of the fact that Quebec is opposed to the constitutional proposals and that, should the strike continue, it will prevent practically any coverage at all of the provincial elections in a large part of the province.

Madam Speaker, will the government assume its responsibility for giving that service, because as Quebecers and francophones across the country become increasingly aware of Radio-Canada's persistent resistance to setting this strike they are led to believe that the government wants the strike to continue, and that, for political reasons?

Mr. Fox: Madam Speaker, this is the first time I have ever heard a spokesman of the opposition ask the government to intervene directly in the daily operations of Radio-Canada. If that is the new position of the Progressive Conservative Party, Madam Speaker, that is, to put an end to the principle which anglophones in this country have always known as the——"arm's length principle". I am astounded that hon. members of the opposition would ask this government to cast aside the arm's length principle which has always been one of the basic principles of this government in dealing with culturalism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I do not know what has happened to the House today, but I wish it were a little bit quieter. I recognize the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

COVERAGE DURING ANTICIPATED PROVINCIAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, there are very many of us who have long memories about the arm's length relationship with the CBC; we remember the words of the Prime Minister who was going to put on the lid and shut the doors of the CBC, and we remember the words of the minister, now the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs—

Some hon. Members: Question.

[Translation]

Mr. Clark: And my question to the Minister of Communications concerns—

An hon. Member: The strike.

Mr. Clark: The strike, yes, but—

[English]

My question to the minister has to do with how long the government expects this strike to continue, and particularly, since there are rumours of an imminent provincial election in Quebec, whether it is in the plans of the government to take action to ensure that there will be coverage in the province of Quebec of all sides in an election campaign, or will it consign the people of Quebec to the same news blackout during an election campaign to which its actions consigned the people of Quebec during the constitutional debate?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, as I said last week in reply to a question from another member from Calgary on cablevision coverage, I think it is this side of the House which suffers from lack of coverage because if the Canadian people, especially francophones in Quebec, could actually see how weak the arguments but forward by the Hon. Leader of the Opposition and his party are, it would be much to our advantage, and in that sense we are most anxious to see the strike come to an end.

QUEBECERS' RIGHT TO INFORMATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary, Madam Speaker. For the sake of national unity I will point out to the minister the distinction between Calgary and Edmonton; there is a slight difference. I think that the basic question here is whether the people of Quebec will be able to benefit from the services of the CBC French network during such crucial time as a provincial election. We had a situation where the residents of the province of Quebec were denied the right to watch on television the debates of the constitutional committee as well as events with great significance for their future. So the question now is whether the federal government which is responsible for the CBC French network is prepared to go along with another delay which could deny Quebecers the right to watch the provincial election debates on the CBC French network.

Hon. Francis Fox (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, as I said earlier in answer to the Leader of the Opposition, we are continuing negotiations with the union to which the CBC French network is not party. The Minister of Labour has appointed a mediator whom the Leader of the Opposition knows very well. We have been trying for a long time to settle that strike. The latest salary offer from the CBC even included a lump-sum payment of $2,300.

I would say to the Leader of the Opposition that his remark about the difference between Calgary and Edmonton could be checked with the hon. member who put the question to me last week, and I would tell him that that member does indeed represent a Calgary and not an Edmonton riding.

[English]

INQUIRY RESPECTING SETTLEMENT DEADLINE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Labour. I would like to ask whether the Government of Canada has a deadline for the settlement of this strike and, if so, what is that deadline?

• (1440)

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the right hon. gentleman is fully aware that under the powers of the Department of Labour it is not possible to have a deadline, that the role of the department is to provide expert mediation services to the parties to help bring about an agreement, and therefore if he is asking whether we are considering legislating an end to the strike and removing the right of collective bargaining, we are not considering that. I can assure him of that.

However, I do assure him through you, Madam Speaker, that the negotiations are continuing, that our mediator is very much involved, and it is true that the union membership turned down an offer by the CBC last Friday. I believe it will be necessary for both parties to move further than they have for an agreement to be achieved. I think it is appropriate in particular for the CBC to improve its wage offer, but there also may be some further movement required on the part of the union. I believe that with some give and take an agreement is possible, and I hope that it can come very soon.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

CONTRACTS SIGNED BY DOMESTICS PRIOR TO IMMIGRATING

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister, I am sure, has received representations from groups acting on behalf of women who come to work in Canada as domestics in which it is made clear that many of them are not paid the wages or benefits which they were promised before they arrived.

Is the minister or his department giving consideration to including in the contract which is signed a provision which would permit domestics to claim from their employers the wages and benefits the employer agrees to before the domestics arrive?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that a few months ago we commissioned a major study on the question of domestic workers by Miss Mary Eberts, a well-known lawyer in this area and Toronto. That report is now complete and it is my intention to release it in a matter of two or three weeks, after I have had a chance to review it.

My colleague, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, has organized a conference dealing with the problems of immigrant women, and we will be discussing that issue and those problems during that conference. We will have an opportunity to present the paper and at that time we will be able to look at the very serious problems affecting domestic workers in this country.

REFUND OF CANADA PENSION PLAN CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, the minister will be aware that many of these domestics have unemployment insurance and Canada Pension Plan premiums deducted from their wages, that very few of them can collect unemployment insurance, and that when they leave the country very few know that they are entitled to a refund of their CPP contributions. Is that report going to deal with that question and will the minister make clear to these people when they come to this country what their rights are with regard to unemployment insurance benefits and the Canada Pension Plan?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would be glad to tell the hon. member that that specific issue is dealt with in the paper. There are a number of solutions proposed in the report, and once we have had an opportunity to make it public and get some response, then we will take corrective action.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

PROVISION OF INCENTIVES

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology.

In view of the fact the Japanese have become the world leaders in trademark applications, with the latest figures for 1977 indicating that Japanese applications account for about 25 per cent of the world total, will the Minister of Science and Technology create the same climate of incentive in Canada for research and development to compete with Japan and the world in trademark applications, in the hope of increasing our competitive position in world trade?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, as the hon. gentleman I hope is aware, we have recently indicated to the public and Parliament the kind of five-year track of spending we believe is required to increase our research capacity in the science and technology fields.

We also have currently under study a variety of other approaches, tax measures and other means of trying to encourage the kind of research and development we wish to see take place in the private sector, and I will certainly be interested in the ideas which he has put forward stemming from other countries which we might usefully adapt to our own situation.

STATUS OF WOMEN

APPOINTMENTS TO ADVISORY COUNCIL

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, my question is to the minister responsible for the status of women and relates to the arm's length approach the government always takes.

The minister announced on Friday the appointment of six members to the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, to fill vacancies which came about in January when several members resigned to protest his political interference. He also elevated to president a loyal supporter in Doris Anderson's place. After all the public discussion on the appointment process, why did the minister not heed the concerns of women's groups and consult more widely, or does he find it too tiresome to do this?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, we have obviously heeded the concerns because we appointed extremely well qualified people, and if the hon. member would care to look at the qualifications of those who were appointed he will find that not only do they represent a good cross-section of points of view of women in this country—

Mr. Clark: Of the Liberal Party.

Mr. Axworthy: But also represent very well the strong feminist activities in the regions from which they come.

Mr. McLean: Madam Speaker, the question did not relate to the qualifications but to the process, and neither the national action committee nor provincial advisory councils were consulted.

Having received many representations calling for an independent, external review of the advisory council to restore its sagging credibility, news reports now suggest that the cabinet has decided there be no immediate review of the council because it might be politically embarrassing. Will the minister tell the House when the government will end this elitist, patronage-oriented process? Will there be a truly independent review of the council?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, we might come to an end of some things as soon as the hon. members opposite end the kind of inflammatory language they use with respect to that council, which does not help any situation. And I would indicate to the hon. member that, just as his own research is obviously unreliable, we have some unreliable leaks in the government service as well, because the fact of the matter is we are discussing with women's groups, including the advisory council, the question of a review. It was raised with the council yesterday and I will await their discussion and recommendations, which I hope to have any day now.

GRAIN

COMPENSATION TO FARMERS FOR EMBARGO ON SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport in his capacity of answering for the Canadian Wheat Board. Farmers in Canada are becoming sick and tired over the continuing promises for compensation on the limited grain embargo imposed on the Soviet Union, in which Canada participated. Has the Canadian Wheat Board yet indicated to the government the level of compensation that should be paid, and if so, has the matter been brought up before cabinet?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this question comes under the authority of the Minister of Agriculture and I pass it on to him.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, a study of the losses that grain producers may have suffered has been submitted to cabinet for decision. We are honouring the former government's commitment.

Mr. Murta: Madam Speaker, the minister has indicated the study has been submitted to cabinet. Given the fact the government is not stalling or fudging or hedging on this particular issue, can he indicate to the House when farmers in Canada will likely know the amount of compensation the government is going to pay?

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, I would hope soon.

IMMIGRATION

RUMOUR OF GENERAL AMNESTY FOR ILLEGAL IMMIGRANTS IN QUEBEC

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Having been associated closely in the past with the general amnesty program entitled "Opération mon Pays—Operation Canada my Country", and knowing that in Quebec we are on the eve of a provincial election, can the minister inform the House if there is any truth in the rumour of a general amnesty for illegal immigrants in Quebec, following a request of the Quebec minister of immigration who is now encouraging illegal immigrants to visit Quebec immigration offices for a special screening test?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I have not yet received any official communication from the minister of immigration for the province of Quebec. We contacted his office and we were told that he did not in any way issue a call for general amnesty. He was simply prepared to take illegal immigrants on a case by case basis to see if there were any grounds for humanitarian consideration. However, I will be meeting with the minister of immigration from that province tomorrow. But I can tell the House that we certainly have no intention at this time of any general amnesty; because it really does not solve the problem of illegal immigrants in the country.

AGRICULTURE

STEPS TO COMBAT SPREAD OF ANIMAL DISEASES

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture to whom I sent notice. Under the Animal Disease and Protection Act, all animal products from other countries must be destroyed or returned to the country of origin in order to avoid bringing disease into Canada. A similar act exists for plants. Unfortunately, due to a dispute between Agriculture Canada and the Air Traffic Association of Canada as to who will pay the cost, incinerators have not been built to take care of wastes from commercial international flights at prairie airports. Could the minister tell the House if his department has an agreement with the Air Traffic Association of Canada regarding the building of these incinerators? If so, what is the nature of the agreement, and when will incinerators be built?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I have been informed by my officials that progress has been made. The airlines are responding to our complaints. At the moment we consider the progress satisfactory. CP Air is building one, and the negotiations at Calgary, Edmonton and Winnipeg are proceeding as we hoped they would. They seem to have accepted the idea that they are responsible for this. It is food that has not been consumed on airlines travelling to some country other than the United States of America.

SHORTAGE OF VETERINARY INSPECTORS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Another area in which there are financial considerations or a lack of personnel for the protection of consumers and farmers from disease organisms from outside the country is that of veterinary inspection. There seems to be a number of available vacancies. Without getting into the problems which exist now between the department and existing veterinary inspectors, is the problem of providing an adequate service a simple one of not enough money, or is there a shortage of adequately trained personnel to fill the positions which are now available?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, I believe it is a combination of both. There is a shortage of moneys and there is also a shortage of properly trained personnel.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

EMERGENCY PLANNING TO DISTRIBUTE GASOLINE RATIONING COUPONS

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Postmaster General, I should like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. I assure him that this party and people across the country are very interested in energy self-sufficiency and are aware of the government program for emergency energy rationing.

Is the minister aware of the directive which has gone to local post offices across Canada asking them to prepare for the distribution of coupons for gasoline rationing?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of that but I will inquire. I would find it quite normal, if we are to be prepared for any eventuality, for the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to be ready for such a possibility.

Mr. Gurbin: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. I should like to assure him that this is not just a casual preparation for any eventuality; this is a specific directive which has told people in post offices across Canada that their workers, as of April 1, 1981, will be asked to work 14 hours a day to distribute these coupons to people for gasoline rationing.

Will the minister inform the House of the total effect of this? What does the government really have in mind? Does this mean that we have an emergency energy situation and that the National Energy Program has indeed been a failure?

An hon. Member: That we know.

Mr. Pepin: Madam Speaker, it is the characteristic of an emergency not to be expected. But I will find out further, and I am sure my hon. friend will have his answer in the coming days.

GRAIN

COMPENSATION TO FARMERS FOR EMBARGO ON SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. It is supplementary to the one posed by the hon. member for Lisgar with respect to the compensation to which western grain farmers are entitled as a result of the embargo on the U.S.S.R.

The minister has been putting off the decision and the announcement. It was originally planned to be given by August 1, 1980, at the end of the crop year. It was put off, and at the beginning of December the minister said that it would be a few days. Will the minister make a commitment now that any compensation determined by cabinet will include an interest rate from the end of the last crop year equal to the interest rates that western farmers carry on their supplies and costs? Will he make a commitment that they will be entitled to receive interest on this long overdue compensation?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows as well as I that it not only includes western farmers, it includes commercial grain farmers in any part of Canada. It is an important factor also in the central part of Canada because, for instance, the province of Ontario produces more commercial grain than the province of Manitoba. So, it affects them similarly.

I cannot say what the decision will be. The submission has been made, but the hon. member is so wrong. The crop year only ended on August 1. How in the world could we have all the figures calculated by that time? It took longer than we thought. We thought we would have them ready for November 1. We did not have them by late November or December 1. We did not have them until some time in December, and I believe they were considered in January. They were considered at that time interdepartmentally, and not too many days or weeks ago they were submitted to cabinet. They are being considered in a very concentrated and determined fashion at the present time.

I wish I could tell the hon. member that interest rates and all that will be considered. But he is fully aware that in the last year one and a quarter crops have been delivered. So, a tremendous amount of grain has been moved. When we were talking about making the payments to them, many farmers said that they did not want them before January 1, that they wanted them after that because they did not want to pay too much income tax. So, the shortage of money is not as the hon. member said.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, in the speech from the throne at the start of this session the Prime Minister and the government gave Members of Parliament from western Canada a special mandate to speak on behalf of western grain farmers. That is what my colleagues and I on this side of the House are trying to do. But, all we get from the government is double talk, double track, and double cross.

Would the minister make a commitment that a statement will be made and that payment will be forthcoming to western Canadian farmers before the end of this month? It is a simple question. I would like an answer.

Mr. Whelan: Madam Speaker, if everything goes as smoothly as we hope, well, that could be possible.

DETAILS OF PROGRAM

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Is my understanding of what he just said to the hon. member for Saskatoon West correct, that the government is considering paying compensation for the embargo to grain farmers for grain produced and consumed in Canada?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I never made any mention of grain being consumed in Canada or being sold outside Canada. The hon. member will have to wait and see our submission and how we figured it out. It will all be made public once a government decision is made.

AGRICULTURE

HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM FUNDING

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. It concerns his responsibility for the herd maintenance program in western Canada. I understand the minister still carries some responsibility for that program. Madam Speaker, we have been told that snow was a criteria for rainfall. The appeal board has advised the minister that snow should be removed. I am asking the minister how the cattle producers of western Canada can feed their cattle on Liberal promises and snowballs, after March 31 when funding has been cut off?

● (1500)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows how fat an animal can get on snowballs and Liberal promises. But he also knows how fat they can get on Conservative wind, as far as that goes.

Some hon. Members: Order!

PRIVILEGE

MR. RAE—ACCESS TO INFORMATION RESPECTING PUBLIC FUNDS—RULING BY MADAM SPEAKER

Madam Speaker: On Wednesday last the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) raised a question of privilege with respect to the matter of distribution of grants in constituencies represented by members on the government side and by members of the opposition. I might point out that this is a political, not a procedural, problem. Several members of the House have acknowledged that it was not a question of privilege, as I think the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood did. In the course of his remarks the hon. member asked me to comment on the wisdom of a practice which appears to discriminate against opposition members.

I was also asked by members to comment on a ruling of Mr. Speaker Jerome, dated December 10, 1979, which was referred to on several occasions. In this regard I want to say that I agree with the principle of that ruling, which stated in part that:

—the support of public funds, where applied to parliamentary activities ought . . . to apply across the floor of Parliament.

I have no hesitation in stating that I have no quarrel with this part of the ruling, and I will apply it when it has relevancy.

In his ruling Mr. Speaker Jerome offered certain comments which were also mentioned in the House last Wednesday. Whatever reasons Mr. Speaker Jerome had for commenting, not ruling, on the wisdom of a certain practice, the comments are separate and apart from matters of order or privilege.

As I said in my observations of last Wednesday:

I would hesitate to comment on situations which are not clearly put to me for a ruling to be made.

In other words, I shall do my duties as required under the rules to determine questions of order or privilege. But I would be going beyond my duties of applying procedural rules if I were to comment on my predecessor's remarks or on matters not procedural. That, of course, I cannot do.

MR. FLIS—PATRIATION OF THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to table 4,000 petitions from constituents and others supporting the proposed resolution to patriate the Constitution with an amending formula and a charter of rights and freedoms, including in that charter of rights the concept of multiculturalism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SOCIAL SECURITY AGREEMENTS

Question No. 1,645—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Minister of National Health and Welfare announce on October 21, 1980, that a Canada-France Agreement had been signed on social security and that a similar agreement was signed with Italy in January, 1979, and, if so, are negotiations taking place with other countries at the present time in a similar vein and, if so, in each case (a) what is the name of the country (b) on what date did negotiations commence (c) how are they progressing and what is the anticipated date of conclusion?

2. Are the United States and Great Britain involved in such negotiations and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Doug Frith (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The Minister of National Health and Welfare announced on October 21, 1980, that an administrative arrangement had been signed, defining the provisions for the administration of the Canada-France Agreement on social security which had been signed on February 9, 1979. This agreement will enter into force on March 1, 1981. A similar agreement with Italy which had been signed on November 17, 1977, entered into force on January 1, 1979. An agreement is to be signed with Portugal in December, 1980, and it is expected to enter into force in early 1981. Negotiations in a similar vein, or preliminary contacts with a view to such negotiations, are currently under way with other countries as follows:

(a) Greece.

(b) A preliminary information meeting was held in Ottawa from October 14 to 16, 1980.

(c) Consensus was reached on the general parameters of an eventual agreement and on a timetable for preparing a draft of such an instrument. The signing of an agreement is anticipated for the spring of 1981.

(a) Belgium.

(b) No formal negotiations have yet taken place, although a preliminary information meeting was held in Ottawa in July, 1978.

(c) Further discussions are required to develop mutually acceptable provisions of an agreement.

2. Technical discussions were held by U.S. and Canadian officials in Ottawa in October, 1979, and in Washington in July, 1980. The conclusion and signature of an agreement and the necessary administrative arrangement will hopefully take place early in 1981. A first meeting concerning a possible agreement took place between British and Canadian officials in London in July, 1977. Since then there have been numerous contacts and communications at the official, ministerial and prime ministerial levels in an attempt to persuade the British side to commence formal negotiations. On October 22, 1980, in London, the Right Hon. Patrick Jenkin, Secretary of State for Social Services in the government of the United Kingdom, indicated categorically to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that, for financial reasons, there was no possibility at all for an agreement and no scope for keeping the door open for negotiations on an agreement in the future.

OLD AGE SECURITY RECIPIENTS

Question No. 1,970—Mr. Knowles:

1. How many persons in Canada, and in each province, are in receipt of the Old Age Security pension?

2. Of the recipients of the Old Age Security pension, how many persons in Canada, and in each province, are in receipt of the Guaranteed Income Supplement?

3. Of those receiving the Guaranteed Income Supplement, how many persons in Canada, and in each province, are receiving the full amount?

4. What is the average amount, in Canada and in each province, being received as a Guaranteed Income Supplement by recipients of the Old Age Security pension?

5. Do the answers to the above questions take into consideration persons living outside of Canada who are in receipt of the Old Age Security pension and, if so, how many of such persons are there, and if they are considered as belonging to the various provinces, what is the number for each province?

DSS is unable to determine the final amount to be paid to the contractor until the negotiations have been completed and will not therefore know whether or not payments will exceed $2,430,000 until the contractor's fees have been firmed up.

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Madam Speaker, I rise to participate in this historic debate which will have an effect, for better or worse, on the people of Canada for all future time.

The focus of this debate is on the proposed resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada as amended by the parliamentary committee, but in truth the proposal must be seen and understood within the broader Canadian reality. It is within this broader reality that I wish to direct my initial remarks. If time then permits, I intend to deal with certain specific clauses which, in themselves, are rather disturbing.

The broader Canadian reality is the product of Canada's huge size geographically, our cultural differences, our different historical time-frames and our different mental attitudes. In short, what is this Canada that we all love and care for, each in our own way?

Never in all recorded time has such a huge geographical area remained as one country for as long as Canada has already lasted. We read about the greatness of China, Egypt and the Roman Empire, but in fact none ever covered such a large area nor developed the stable form of government and society which we have here in Canada. We are one of a kind. All others survived for their limited life spans only with a great deal of civil violence, oppression and wars. Even our great neighbours to the south endured a civil war and killed over 600,000 of themselves. That civil war occurred a mere 120 years ago. Other empires sanctioned slavery and oppression to hold themselves together.

The unique contribution of Canada and Canadians to world political evolution is our way of resolving deep conflicts of interest by political compromise rather than unilateral, political or military action. The process of political compromise started with the Royal Proclamation of 1763, continued through the Quebec Act of 1774, the Constitution Act of 1791 and, finally, the British North America Act of 1867. Each of the above statutes marked a major point of departure from prior constitutional practice and reflected a political compromise which kept the whole together and defused the political dissatisfaction of the time.

For example, the Royal Proclamation of 1763 recognized the political reality of Canada along the St. Lawrence—60,000 French-speaking Canadians and virtually no anglophones. The Quebec Act of 1774 recognized the political reality of the coming American revolution and kept French Canada separate. The Constitution Act of 1791 recognized the political reality of the United Empire Loyalists and their unique political and social history as distinct from the French-Canadian history. But the 1841 Act of Union joining Upper and Lower Canada was an attempt to create a unitary state, thereby anglicizing French Canadians. It was a unilateral act with no political compromise; it failed.

Then, 26 years later, we had the dialogue of the Fathers of Confederation resulting in the BNA Act of 1867. It is interesting to note that the act of 1841 was unacceptable to Quebecers and resulted in a 26-year deadlock. I fear that this present resolution will cause a similar discord and deadlock until all provinces and territories are recognized as being equally important.

In political reality, the BNA Act decreased dramatically the powers of the central unitary government which governed between 1841 and 1867. The BNA Act of 1867 was the greatest devolution of political power ever. Under that act Canada has physically expanded, has developed industrially and is developing socially into an honourable society. It has developed into a powerful industrial force and into a respected member of the world community to which millions want to emigrate.

At the same time we have preserved the unique features of our history—the 376-year history of Quebec and Nova Scotia, as well as Alberta's 76-year history. I was struck last year while sharing Nova Scotia's celebration of its three hundred and seventy-fifth year and Alberta's celebration of its seventy-fifth year by the fact that Nova Scotia celebrated its seventy-fifth year in 1680. That was before the American revolution, the French revolution and the industrial revolution. Is it any wonder that we have somewhat different attitudes in Canada?

• (1510)

Returning now to the constitutional proposal, we are today debating three subjects with major differences of opinion, three conflicting ideas for the future development of this nation. One concerns the amending formula, one concerns an entrenched charter of human rights and the last one concerns a referendum. The Liberal Party has one view of Canada as reflected in its position on the amending formula, the charter and the referendum, while my Progressive Conservative Party has another view. We are locked in a struggle for the hearts and minds of our fellow Canadians.

In other countries with less political maturity, the differences would have already produced civil violence. It is a source of great pride to me that such has not occurred here, even though I sincerely believe that the Liberal Party is pressing too hard on these three issues and on the energy issue as well.

The proposal also contains one idea that all parties agree with—patriation, or the transfer of power to Canada itself to change the Constitution in the future. On that we all agree, and had the government accepted the Progressive Conservative proposal of last December, the British North America Act would right now be here in Canada and we would not be facing this serious conflict. Nor would we be facing an international incident with the United Kingdom.

With respect to the amending formula, we have since 1867 developed a number of conventions under which the BNA Act has been amended. There have been about 20 major changes and many more minor changes. In 1965 the then minister of finance, Mr. Favreau, summarized in this House those conventions as follows:

1. No act of the United Kingdom Parliament affecting Canada is passed unless it is requested and consented to by Canada.

2. The sanction of Parliament is required for a request to the British Parliament for an amendment to the BNA Act. The procedure is usually a joint resolution of the House of Commons and the Senate.

3. No amendment to Canada's Constitution will be made by the British Parliament merely upon the request of a Canadian province: the U.K. government will not intervene in the affairs of Canada, except at the request of the federal government representing all of Canada.

4. The Canadian Parliament will not request an amendment directly affecting federal-provincial relationships without prior consultation and agreement with the provinces.

The conventions developed out of political compromise, and for 16 years since 1965 both levels of government have honoured those conventions. However, in 1978 the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) brought forth a unilateral proposal which would have completely altered the Senate and many other constitutional rules as well. Fortunately, the Supreme Court found it to be ultra vires and it died.

Now we have another unilateral proposal which again contains many clauses which fundamentally change our constitutional way of life. But this time the government is not prepared to wait until the Supreme Court has ruled. If the government really believes we are sovereign, then why not wait until our own Supreme Court has ruled? Alternatively, why not put the proposal by way of a referendum to the people of Canada, asking whether they want the amending formula the government proposes? I would be delighted to campaign in western Canada against the Liberals and New Democrats on their actions to deny western Canadians equality with central Canadians.

Hon. members know that I have spoken on earlier occasions to the historic disadvantages suffered by western Canadians. I speak of the transportation inequities, the tariff inequities, the regulatory inequities and others. I submit that the combination of punitive taxes on western petroleum energy, while leaving totally untouched the energy of central Canada—even though that energy is being exported in great quantities—with the amending formula which makes all regional provincial governments less than equal will increase an already disturbing level of western alienation.

Canada has succeeded only because our predecessor politicians took the time to listen and respond with a political compromise which worked and was accepted in the circumstances by the majority of Canadians in each region. For example, the rest of Canada has responded generously to the aspirations of Quebec. How else could Quebecers, with only 26 per cent of the population, have a separate pension plan, a separate tax system, a separate radio and TV system, a separate civil law system and official bilingualism? Earlier governments dominated by non-Quebecers did respond, but I sense with regret that the present government, dominated by Quebecers, is not responding to the hopes and aspirations of westerners. To the extent that they fail to listen and understand, they will retard and even destroy Canada. The government, and the Prime Minister in particular, have taken a calculated risk that westerners will swallow the energy takeover and taxes, the amending formula, the referendum clause and the entrenched charter rather than separate. The Prime Minister might be right, but I say that there will be a long-lasting sense of injustice which will harm federal-provincial relations for many years.

If the Prime Minister is wrong and western Canadians choose to take their destiny into their own hands and central Canada refuses to be reasonable, then we will face years and years of bitter discord. Do not be surprised, Mr. Speaker, when you see sabotage of oil installations and pipelines. We need co-operation in Canada to solve serious problems relating to industrial changes, energy deficits and world peace.

With respect to the question of an entrenched charter, we should not forget the present situation concerning human rights in Canada. I have listened to several members opposite, and they leave the definite impression that Canadians are getting something "extra special" from this proposal. That impression is erroneous. In fact, Canadians have right now all the rights proposed together with one in particular which is omitted from the proposal and to which I want to return later.

The basis of our present human rights lies in several sources: first, the common law tradition extending back to the Magna Carta; second, the various human rights bills, such as the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights, the Alberta bill of rights and other provincial statutes; third, the universal declaration of human rights to which Canada subscribes; fourth, the United Nations covenant on civil and political rights; fifth, the United Nations covenant on economic, social and cultural rights; and sixth, the optional protocol under which Sandra Lovelace is successfully proving that section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act is discriminatory.

The issue is not the existence of human rights in Canada but how those rights are adapted and altered in the future. Under our present law, if a citizen feels his or her human rights have been violated, he or she can raise the issue with the existing human rights commissions, and there is also access to the courts. If people are unsatisfied, they can lobby their provincial or federal legislatures and obtain changes. A review of Canadian human rights history shows a slow but steady and progressive improvement.

I believe that an entrenched charter is unwise within the context of our Canadian society and particularly in relation to our system of representative, responsible parliamentary government and our judicial system. I sense that an entrenched charter will change dramatically the process by which our own unique Canadian society has evolved and will continue to evolve in the future, particularly with respect to human rights.

It seems to me that the great value of our present system of responsible government is that it permits each generation to strike a new balance which is appropriate to its particular time and place. The focus of that process in Canada has been provincial legislatures and this federal House. The agencies of enforcement have been the human rights commissions and the judicial system. On balance, and especially if we contrast the position of human rights in 1867 with today, we see an enormous change which I think all would agree has been progressive.

For example, in 1867 women were denied the vote which they now have. Men without property were denied the vote which they now have. The poor of 1867, the mentally handicapped of 1867, the physically handicapped and the native peoples of 1867 all were viewed in an entirely different light compared with now. In 1867, we did not have electricity, cars, airplanes, TV, stereo, or satellites. Our view of the world, science and religion has changed incredibly since then.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that had the Fathers of Confederation entrenched their view of human rights, of democratic rights and of legal rights in a charter, we would be labouring today under a very different type of society and possibly would have had change only by civil violence.

In fact, under our system of responsible, representative parliamentary government we have been able to change and adapt our institutions quickly enough to preserve the whole. I am of the opinion that an appointed judiciary slows the process of change and also, by virtue of its past Canadian mandate restricting it to legal interpretation and enforcement, will impair the process of future change. There is also the potential problem of an appointed judiciary which decides to become activist and political, as in the U.S.A. If they make a mistake it cannot be easily corrected. If Parliament makes a mistake, it can be changed by future parliaments. An entrenched charter will change our attitudes and practices to the point where we will be narrow, technical and legalistic in our attitudes rather than fair, reasonable, tolerant and open. We will be adopting the minimum legal standard required rather than the much higher moral standard under which we should all operate.

Therefore, before entrenching a charter of human rights we should take a serious look at our method of selecting judges in the context of federal-provincial relations, in the context of their sex and even their ethnic balance. To impose suddenly and unilaterally an entrenched charter on our existing system with no genuine examination of the probable effect on other systems is most unwise. Mr. Speaker, just as the huge deficit of $137 billion piled up by past parliaments is now seriously hampering this Parliament, so will our present action of entrenching a charter based on today's values hamper future generations. Better to leave rights in a statutory bill of rights, like that of John Diefenbaker.

In fact, we are displaying an enormous ego to believe that we have the answers for all time. Several members have argued that our treatment of the Japanese during the Second World War and the Chinese before that justify an entrenched charter. The treatment of both was a tragedy, but in reality they were also treated badly in the U.S.A. with its entrenched charter.

In Russia and many other countries with beautifully written, entrenched charters we find the most barbarous and vicious tortures ever designed by mankind. On the other hand, here in Canada with our representative, responsible democracy with no entrenched charter, we have a sense of fairness and justice and, on balance, a rapidly improving sense of human rights.

The reality of human rights is that they exist in people's minds and are protected by individuals standing up and insisting on the value of human dignity. Right from the beginning people in this nation stood and spoke against the treatment of the Japanese Canadians and, earlier, the Chinese Canadians.

If our government was oppressive and putting people in jail without trial, or if our police or military forces were out of civil control, then I would be arguing strongly for a change. But they are not, and the reason they are not is that we are individually and collectively committed to being a civilized society with a system of government that has grown and adapted as our sense of human dignity and rights has grown and adapted. The focus of that change and the changes which should occur in the future should be in the provincial legislatures and in this House where we are subject to review by the people every four years.

The beauty of John Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights is that it sets out the basis for our values. Mr. Speaker, let me read those values, and I quote:

> The Parliament of Canada, affirming that the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free men and free institutions:
>
> Affirming also that men and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values and the rule of law;
> And being desirous of enshrining these principles and the human rights and fundamental freedoms derived from them, in a bill of rights which shall reflect the respect of Parliament for its constitutional authority and which shall ensure the protection of these rights and freedoms in Canada:
> Therefore—

It then goes on to enumerate specific rights. But, Mr. Speaker, in this proposed entrenched charter did the Liberal-NDP coalition accept the PC amendments to include the right to own and enjoy property? No, they did not. Did they accept the PC amendment referring to the dignity and worth of the human person? No, they did not. Did they accept the PC amendment referring to the family? No. Finally, the Liberals voted against a PC amendment acknowledging the supremacy of God. Shame! The NDP sent a member to speak against the amendment, then sent others to vote for the amendment, but I submit only when they knew the Liberals intended to defeat the amendment.

Since then, has the Leader of the NDP insisted on the supremacy of God clause? Of course not. Their philosophy does not accept the concept. What hypocrites! They make the pharisees look like angels.

Under the proposed entrenched charter, an aggrieved citizen will have no choice but to engage a lawyer and go to court; and if that citizen loses, there will be no remedy except a constitutional change, which will be virtually impossible. Also, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if ordinary citizens genuinely realize the enormous legal cost involved in the use of our judicial system. An entrenched charter will do for us lawyers what the Liberal government tax reform did for chartered accountants. We will be creating a new class of high priest, the constitutional lawyer. This will concentrate wealth in still another level of privileged class. It is ironic that the NDP members who purport to stand up for the ordinary Canadian are in fact injuring those very people they purport to protect. The same argument applies to their stand on energy and fiscal policy.

The right to own and enjoy property goes to the root of what being a Canadian is all about. Except for our native community, we are all immigrants to Canada within the last 400 years. Most of our ancestors came for the opportunity to work hard and make a better life for themselves and for their descendants. The right to own property was vital. John Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights confirmed and acknowledged that right.

The form of property ownership has changed over the last 50 years as we ourselves have changed from a predominantly rural to a predominantly urban society. In the past, ownership of property meant land, but now it means shares in corporations. At the root of our PC policy to have each and every Canadian owning directly a few shares of our national oil company was the desire to have each citizen receive a direct dividend from their oil resources. Each citizen, wherever he or she lived, would directly own and feel a part of western Canada, the Beaufort Sea and High Arctic, the Atlantic Hibernia play as well as several international plays. People would excitedly wait for the quarterly and annual reports to learn of the current status of their property.

People ask me why the Liberals and New Democrats voted against property rights. The reason is clear, at least to my mind; property rights prevent them from nationalizing companies in which Canadians own shares. You will recall that when PetroCan bought Pacific Petroleum for $1.5 billion, some $430 million went to Canadians who were forced to sell their shares to their own government. An entrenched right to property would block such forced sales, because the enforcement clauses in the various corporation statutes would be null and void. Let there be no doubt as to the long-term intention of the Liberal-NDP coalition: they are preparing to nationalize industry generally.

The Liberal-NDP position means that future Canadians will once again have to fight the same battles as the English did in 1215, the Americans in 1776 and the French in 1790. What a waste!

The referendum clause which permits this Parliament to bypass provincial legislatures and even change provincial powers is not consistent with our Canadian constitutional history. It must be changed, and I sincerely ask members opposite to vote for our amendment presently before the House.

In summary, it seems to my mind that the amending formula, the entrenched charter, the referendum clause and the specific omission of clauses respecting property, the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the person, the attempt to rewrite history and more, all signify a regressive step in our national evolution. The end does not justify the means today any more than it did in 1841. The attempt to rewrite history by changing the names of the various British North America Acts is an act in the finest of Marxist theory, but it is not part of our Canadian history.

By passing this proposal, we will be condemning ourselves and future generations to discord and dispute, because forces are gathering in the west which will not accept a secondary status in Canada. We will be equal or we will be separate, sir. That is the concept to which western Canadians are flocking today. They will be equal or they will be separate. These mean and petty attempts to block our equality will simply cause deadlock until they are changed. What a tragedy it is that the very people who should understand most clearly do not.

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that the present debate on the proposed new Constitution is taking place in the Senate and in the House of Commons during the month of March. For it was on March 8, 1867, that the British North America Act was passed by the House of Commons in Great Britain, 114 years and three days ago. The BNA Act was proclaimed in Canada on March 29, 1867, and Queen Victoria declared July 1 as the day of confederation.

Today we are trying to shake off the last vestiges of our colonial status. Canadians from coast to coast are agreed that this last vestige of colonial status must end. Canada has reached the crossroads in its history. The time has arrived for Canada to thank Great Britain for being the guardian of our Constitution and to request the British Parliament to amend the BNA Act for the last time. Canada has reached full adulthood.

In this House on February 17, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) reminded us that now is the time in Canadian history to act, we have waited long enough.

As chairman of the special parliamentary committee on the proposed national trading corporation, I have learned from Canadian manufacturers and exporters that our feeling of Canadian nationalism and patriotism for our country does not flow into commercial and economic fields. For example, do hon. members of this House know what the big trading slogans are in the successful manufacturing and exporting countries, such as Japan and West Germany? They are their national symbols: "Made in Japan," and "Made in West Germany". Members of the special committee have come to realize that each nation acts as one when producing and exporting goods and services. Each country is not a divided nation, but united and extremely efficient when it comes to dealing with other nations. Can we as Canadians say the same when certain provinces want increasingly to act alone with their industrial and export strategies?

By bringing the Constitution home, we will bring to Canada the powers to master our own destiny. It is with this same feeling of patriotism that we can begin to generate the necessary capital and human resources to take control of our industries and natural resources from foreign domination. It is only then that we can begin effectively to plan to increase our economic clout with other exporting nations.

Countries around the world are hungry for made-in-Canada products and equipment. They want Canadian management, engineering and construction expertise. Patriating our Constitution with a charter of rights and an amending formula will give us the maturity to export goods and services under a national symbol, under a Canadian identity. Canada will then achieve the self-concept it requires. "Self-concept" is defined by psychologists as "What is my perception of myself, and how do I think others perceive me?" Canada's "id" or ego has not been the healthiest over the last century.

Unfortunately, we are still perceived by many countries as a colonial state, a consuming country, a country which has not achieved complete sovereignty. Patriating our Constitution with a charter of rights and with an amending formula will enhance Canada's self-concept to the level of a true national identity. So that when someone asks our children and their children, "Who are you?", they will proudly respond, "I am a Canadian"; "Je suis Canadien".

Canadians have done much already in assisting Canada to achieve a national identity, a national self image. The Canadian Citizenship Act, the Canadian flag, the Canadian national anthem, are but a few examples of this maturation.

[Translation]

In my opinion two stages in the development and maturation of Canada are still misunderstood.

[English]

The first stage is for this Parliament to designate July 1 as Canada Day. The second stage is for both Houses to give unanimous consent to patriate the Canadian Constitution with an amending formula and a charter of rights.

On October 29, 1980, one day after the House of Commons committee on the Constitution of Canada was struck, I wrote a letter to the chairmen of the committee, and I sent a copy to all members of the committee. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) tried to take me to task in this House on that but I want to assure him that my intentions were very honourable.

The letter read:

In view of the fact that I have been receiving many representations from Canadians of non-English and non-French-speaking backgrounds, I request the opportunity to appear before the committee as a witness. The purpose of my appearance would be to suggest, on behalf of over 7 million Canadians, an amendment to the proposed Constitution, namely, the incorporation of cultural rights, including heritage linguistic rights, under the charter of rights and freedoms.

Three weeks later I wrote to the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) recommending that the concept of multiculturalism be brought into the proposed resolution. On November 27, 1980, I wrote again to the special joint committee suggesting amendments to the proposed Constitution which would reflect the cultural pluralistic society of Canada. In addition to the above actions, I lobbied in caucus and sought the support of every cabinet minister to ensure that multiculturalism be given appropriate attention in the proposed Constitution.

Why was I pressing for this change to the proposed resolution? I was motivated by the thousands of representations made to me regarding this particular amendment. On behalf of the ethnocultural groups and the 4,000 individual Canadians who made representations to me to ensure in the Constitution that the rights of all cultural groups are protected, I wish to thank the government, both opposition parties, the Senate and the special joint Constitution committee for agreeing to Section 27 of the proposed resolution, which reads:

This charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

Placing multiculturalism as a separate section in the charter of rights ensures that, in intepreting such provisions as Section 14, right to interpreters, Section 15, equality rights, and Section 22, preservation of third language rights, the courts will have to be conscious of the importance of these rights as they relate to cultural groups.

● (1540)

I would like to congratulate the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism, Canadian Citizenship Federation, Canadian Federation of Civil Liberties and Human Rights Associations, Canadian Polish Congress, National Italian-Canadian Congress, German-Canadian Committee on the Constitution, Council of National Ethnocultural Organizations of Canada and many other groups and individuals who made such excellent presentations to the special joint committee on the subject of preserving and enhancing the multicultural heritage of Canada by entrenching the concept into the Constitution.

Expressions of appreciation regarding this amendment are already being communicated to the capital. Dr. L. G. Polymenakos, president of the Greek community of metropolitan Toronto, said this:

The Greek community is in full support of this amendment, and are extremely pleased that the government has adopted such a basic form of human rights.

I quote the Lithuanian Community Association of Toronto:

We are pleased that this amendment has been included in the Constitution, as opposed to the preamble.

I wish to read a telegram from the Canadian Polish Congress:

Resolved, that the annual meeting of the Canadian Polish Congress (Toronto District) held on March 7, 1981, at Toronto and representing 50,000 Canadians of Polish origin . . . expresses its thanks to the federal government for introducing an amendment to the Constitution which recognizes the concept of multiculturalism in Canada.

[Translation]

That Canada should be recognized as a cultural pluralistic society is a fait accompli and an enviable achievement which all Canadians strive for. Canada must consider both reality and the aim to achieve.

[English]

We have heard from the official opposition and from the premiers of the provinces about the idea of patriating the Constitution first and then allowing Canadians to decide what should be in the charter of rights. We heard this a moment ago from the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker). They said that we should not impose upon the parliamentarians of Great Britain the task of deciding what should be in the Canadian Constitution.

I would like to ask those critics to assess the process that the proposed resolution for a joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada went through. Are they suggesting that hon. members and senators who worked so hard on the Constitution committee are not Canadians? Are they saying that the 97 groups of witnesses who appeared before the committee are not Canadians? Such critics are insulting the 323 Canadian groups and 639 individual Canadians who made written submissions suggesting various amendments, many of which have been accepted by the joint Senate and House of Commons Constitution committee. I submit that all of the above people are Canadians. Therefore, the proposed resolution before us with some 58 amendments will be a truly Canadian Constitution—a Constitution written in Canada by Canadians, for Canada and for Canadians.

I would like to respond to the ill-informed critics who have charged that the proposed Constitution with its Charter of Rights and Freedoms is the obsession of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Hon. members of the official opposition have been writing letters to members on this side of the House stating that the Liberal members have little courage to do what is right for Canada, that we are afraid to stand up to the authoritarian discipline or "captivating sorcery of our leader."

I have in my right hand 4,000 signatures from Canadians who support the proposed resolution to patriate the Constitution with a Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In my left hand I have 31 representations opposing the inclusion of the charter of rights. The people of Parkdale-High Park and other Canadians have spoken in this chamber today. They have told me how to vote, not the Prime Minister.

The Constitution package before us is not a "Trudeau package". The Charter of Rights and Freedoms in a patriated Constitution is what all the backbenchers and ministers on this side of the House have been pressing for. This is what the Canadians who elected us have been thirsting for for over 50 years. Thank God we have a leader who is sensitive to the wishes of the majority, a leader who does not dictate but leads. The Prime Minister is only as good as his ministers and his backbenchers who are elected by the people of Canada to govern wisely the affairs of the nation.

Canada's democratic government is far stronger when we have constructive criticism from the two opposition parties. One of those two parties has given this Parliament positive criticism. The other party, unfortunately, has stooped to an all-time low in attempting to bring disunity to this country. I draw hon. members' attention to the householder of the hon. member for Okanagan-Similkameen (Mr. King) and to this letter from the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon). I wish to make it clear that I have high respect for both of these gentlemen and that in no way am I attacking their personal character. What I am objecting to is their actions which turn one Canadian against another.

I draw the attention of hon. members to the cover of this householder, paid for by Canadian dollars and sent to everyone in that constituency: "Are you ready for second-class citizenship?" To suggest that bringing home our Constitution with a charter of rights will somehow make some Canadians second-class citizens is unparliamentary.

I have also a letter from the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta, a very friendly letter addressed "My dear Jesse" and signed, "Yours very truly, Tom". I quote:

A country can only be constituted by a bringing together of individuals and regions, in a spirit of good will.

Let us see some of that spirit of good will from the official opposition, because to date we have not seen it.

Otherwise the constitution and possibly the country is doomed to failure.

It is this doom and gloom which is demoralizing our country. I draw attention to the last page of the Householder, supposedly a letter from a constituent in Okanagan-Similkameen:

Mr. Prime Minister:

I am a Canadian, as loyal and dedicated as you. Do not offend me by questioning my devotion to my country. Do not offend me by taking me for granted.

Let me read from the letter attached to the one received from the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta:

I am a loyal and dedicated Canadian. Do not offend me by questioning my devotion to my country. Do not offend me by taking me for granted.

If the official opposition is receiving thousands and thousands of letters from constituents objecting to the charter of rights, may I ask why they keep using one and the same letter? The Prime Minister's office as of today has received approximately 6,000 letters concerning the Constitution. Out of that number, 600 to 700 have dealt with the charter of rights. They have been mainly in support and involve other issues, such as property ownership and including a reference to God in the preamble. These are the things to which people have been addressing themselves.

An interesting sidenote, Mr. Speaker: last year the Prime Minister's office received approximately 10,000 letters concerning the seal hunt issue alone, showing that the proposed Constitution is not causing as much concern as the official opposition and the premiers of the provinces would lead us to believe. I give credit where credit is due and I give negative criticism where negative criticism is due.

I am somewhat disappointed with all three parties represented in this House, with the special joint committee on the Constitution, with the Senate and with Canadians in general. All the discussions, recommendations, petitions, and debates that we have heard on the topic of a new Constitution for Canada have been offered in a spirit of individual, group and regional interests. The whole process in arriving at a proposed resolution to be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada has been a very selfish one.

Will Canada guarantee my democratic rights, my mobility rights, my legal rights, my rights of equality, my linguistic rights or my cultural rights? Will the new Canadian Constitution guarantee my fundamental freedoms of conscience, religion, thought, belief, opinion, expression or peaceful assembly and association? The answer to all the above questions is yes.

Not one Liberal, Conservative or NDP member, no premier and no Canadian has asked the question: What can I do for Canada? What is my obligation as a Canadian citizen to my country? What are my responsibilities to my great nation? How am I showing my patriotism and allegiance to my country? Is it my duty to defend Canada in time of war?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Flis: Therefore, I see a very important element missing from the proposed constitutional resolution before us. The package before us is a one-way, selfish ticket. It clearly states what the Constitution will offer Canadians, individually and collectively, but the new proposed Constitution, moulded by Canadians, does not entrench Canadian citizens' obligations, duties, allegiances and responsibilities to their country.

I recommend, therefore, that on this historic occasion this House entrench a preamble to our Constitution. Such a preamble should include, among other things, the obligations, duties, responsibilities and allegiance of every Canadian citizen to his or her country, Canada. The principles we stand for as Canadians should be stated eloquently and in a style that can be committed to the hearts and memories of generations of Canadians. The preamble should be one of the most significant parts of the Constitution and could serve to educate the young as to their obligations to their country.

What is lacking in this country today is what the people in Poland have just rediscovered; the strength, the power and the force of solidarity—"Solidarnosc", as they say in my heritage language. One week ago today, Mr. Speaker, a member of the solidarity union of Poland sat in your chair, unknown to you. As he sat in that chair I explained to him how our Parliament functions. He sat there with tears in his eyes and said, "God, this is freedom!"

We need solidarity in this House during this debate. The various levels of government must practise solidarity in sharing the wealth and poverty of this land. Canadians individually and collectively must display this spirit of solidarity. In addition to the spirit of co-operation and solidarity, Canada requires from its citizens and non-citizens alike an attitude of intrinsic and extrinsic patriotism.

As the proud member of Parliament for Parkdale-High Park, Mr. Speaker, I should like to end my contribution to this historic debate by saluting, on behalf of my constituents, the Canadian flag in this chamber to your right, thus displaying my patriotism to Canada, a country which my parents adopted only 51 years ago.

[Editor's Note: At this point Mr. Flis saluted the flag.]

Mr. Flis: I pledge allegiance to this flag and to the country for which it stands—one country, one nation, indivisible for all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, a short number of months ago I was one of those denied the opportunity of speaking and participating in the early rounds of this debate. This is a debate on a matter which touches the lives of so many Canadians; a debate in which, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated when introducing the resolution, all members were invited to participate; a debate which involves a fundamental document of our nationhood, one which all of us say is intended not only to serve our needs of today but which must endure so as to serve the needs of the generations of our children of tomorrow.

It does not matter that my words are those of a backbencher, that they be repetitious or even immaterial; we as members of Parliament should not be denied the opportunity of expressing our own points of view, or those from the parts of the country from which we may come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): This is why I welcome the opportunity of participating in this debate today. Already we have a document that is rigid in form and in substance. In spite of what my hon. friends may say as a result of the number of communications they may have received, such as the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis) whom I follow, the Prime Minister has indicated there will be no free vote on this resolution in this House.

I have noticed that the pages of Hansard have not been filled with joyous recounts by hon. members from the province of Quebec. Even at this late date, as I rise in support of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), I would remind those opposite that although this government is made up of members basically from one region, it is the Government of Canada that has a duty and a responsibility to all of the provinces and all the people within those provinces to act in the general interests of Canada. This makes it even more important for the government to be sensitive and to take some soundings of the wants, feelings and needs of that great part of this country from which this government has no representation.

Polls are not new to this government. Let us ask the members of this government to read the results of polls. Better still, they should listen to the opinion makers of that western area of ours, be they provincial legislators, members of the press or members of this House of Commons.

One often asks oneself why this government insists on brinkmanship. In those early months of 1980 I heard and applauded those members who went into the province of Quebec and talked about a renewed federalism. In my naiveté, perhaps as a new member, I really thought they were talking about a redraft of the Constitution, one which would right the wrongs of the past, bring justice where injustice prevailed and provide equity and equality for all Canadians, the key to which was still federalism, and the purpose of which was greater strength, harmony and unity for all Canadians. The substance of that charter of renewed federalism I thought would be the product of the deliberations of a constituent assembly of Canadians, that the preamble would be one recognizing the supremacy of God and the dignity and worth of our people, as well as the spelling out of a way of life as we would have it be.

What do we have? Certainly we have a better document than the one proposed some four months ago, but it is still a document of illegitimacy born out of political opportunism and political compromise rather than the high principles of self-help and consensus which wed the four colonies of British North America together in the first place, subsequently joined by each of the other provinces under terms and conditions negotiated and agreed upon. It is still a document of unilateralism, divisive in its nature and in its process. It is not a document that finds common ground of understanding between and among its partners to confederation, but one that will continue to antagonize and be an affront to the provinces. It is still a document that runs the perils of doubt and uncertainty, that flies in the face of public and popular opinion.

• (1600)

We all know that a document of this kind should stem from the people. It has to be an expression of their philosophy and of their willingness to be governed by an accepted statement of values and principles. How many times has it been said that a certain law is not worth the paper it is written on, or that the law is an ass? Such statements can only be made where those laws never did have, or have lost, the respect of the people. We have been told goodness knows how many times that we are the servants of the people and that what this government has forgotten is just that. As was so ably set out by my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher, laws and lawmakers must never just command, but rather in a democracy they must command respect not only for themselves but for what they are doing.

It is worth noting here from Table I to Appendix D of the joint committee's report that, of the opinions expressed concerning the proposed resolution as a whole, 18 groups and 54 individuals expressed themselves as being in favour of the resolution while 30 groups and 197 individuals disapproved of the action now being taken by this government.

Support for the government's resolution has continually eroded from the time it was first introduced last October. It is because of the awesome nature of our task that history will look kindly upon the decision of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) who, from the outset, proposed to support the creation of a new made-in-Canada Constitution and to oppose the notion of arbitrary and unilateral action by a majority federal government.

One of the things that has disturbed me since coming to this House is the reckless regard we have for truth and credibility. Too often we have been told the end justifies the means and it disturbs me, as it does the people of Canada, that this government is promoting a constitutional package in its main resolution with little explanation as to need, substance and content.

Speech after speech is given in glowing terms as each refers to a charter of rights—but not particularly this one. At last, they point out, we will be free of that last vestige of colonialism, but there is little reference to the amending formula proposed. Patriation has become the government's method, but alteration is its goal. In this resolution, Canadians would be given the patriation they have indicated they desire, but they will also be given a proposal that breaks the equilibrium maintained by our two levels of government until now, one in which they have functioned in a complementary fashion, which is the very essence of a federal regime.

Let me refer to Table II of Appendix D to the report before us. The numbers are small, limited as they were by the time frame imposed, but the percentages are significant. Recognizing that there is almost universal acceptance of patriation, only 23 groups and 42 individuals making submissions to the special joint committee approved the government's action of unilateral patriation with changes, while 33 groups and 92 individuals opposed such action—almost two to one. Is this responsive or even responsible government?

On the opening day of this debate the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) remarked, and I quote:

> Canadians will take pride in the results of the substance of our work.

Another quote, given on February 25 last:

> With all my heart I want to believe that—but I don't. The wounds have been too deep.

These are not my words, though I believe them. They are the words of a former NDP leader in the province of Ontario, Mr. Stephen Lewis. We have been told over and over again we have had 53 or 54 years of failure. That sounds like more of the distorted political advertising of this government. Slough off the success story of those years, the great gains in social living made by our people through agreement and compromise, and forget that in 1931 it was the lack of an amending formula that halted the complete establishment of our sovereignty. It is worth keeping in mind that for the last 13 years the chairman of those federal-provincial conferences, the one person who has participated in each of them, has been our own Prime Minister. If there was failure, who must share, perhaps to the greatest degree, responsibility for that failure? Who had the greatest opportunity to make it work, if he wanted to do so? Process, particularly if that process has to do with the amending formula, if it has to do with making changes in the Constitution of tomorrow, is even more important than substance, as was shown in 1931. The way in which change is to be brought about is the very essence of the opposition to this proposal. The necessity of an acceptable amending formula was in the past and, I submit, is now the most critical subject we have to consider in this constitutional reform. Process cannot be set aside slightly. The amending process is our protection for the future. Process, in this instance, is substance.

I listened to the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Roberts) quote George Brown as he commented 116 years ago on how he prepared to gather these countries together—"countries" was his word for colonies—into one organized government. What the hon. Minister of State for Science and Technology omitted to do was to point out that that plan of government clearly and specifically set out the federal and provincial jurisdictions. George Brown went on to emphasize, and I quote:

> And we take especial credit to ourselves that the system we have devised, while admirably adapted to our present situation, is capable of gradual and efficient expansion in future years to meet all the great purposes contemplated by our scheme.

The process of amendment as proposed does and can alter substantially the fundamental nature of federalism in this country.

I am not going to deal at length with the number of amending formulae presented to this House, but let me emphasize again that we on this side of the House say that any amending formula written into the Constitution must have two distinct characteristics. First, it must be fair and equitable to all people in all provinces; second, it should reflect the federal nature of Canada.

● (1610)

It is clear that a patriated Constitution must contain an amending formula. This is why a simple amendment to the Statute of Westminster will not suffice. We on this side of the House take the position that the essence of an amending formula is consensus and that the consensus should be the widest one possible. We offered the Vancouver formula as one having that kind of support, but it was rejected by the government in favour of the Victoria formula.

If one listens to government supporters, one would think that the result of the Vancouver consensus would be something new—a more divided country than ever before. They talk of a crazy quilt and a checkerboard; then they talk about opting out. Diversity is in our make-up; it is nothing new. It has been present since 1867 and even before that. It started with the British North America Act, with linguistic rights and the retention of the civil code for people in the province of Quebec. That special consideration of diversity continues today.

Various provinces entered confederation under different provisions. As we developed our social service programs, these varied from province to province. This has been part of our history and tradition. Are we the worse for it? No, there is a diversity in our make-up which has permitted provinces to move in accordance with their separate wants and priorities, each within its time and circumstances. It has allowed the people in our regions to grow and enjoy as they would choose, not as they would be required or forced to do.

While the term "opting out" is perhaps not a very apt one, what is meant by it? In what areas might they opt out? Put simply, those areas subject to the opting-out provision would be those touching upon the rights and privileges already granted to the provinces under the BNA Act, under which they have been operating for the last century or more. It is taking away something they already have.

How much different is that from the Victoria formula, which encourages such comments as the one reported at page 7445 of Hansard:

> But one essential fact remains for us members from Quebec, namely that the government of Quebec and all Quebecers maintain their right of veto and that in future no constitutional change can be made without their consent. I consider that this right of veto is a prerequisite condition for anyone who acknowledges the specificity of Quebec.

Those same words could be used for Ontario or for a combination of any two Atlantic provinces. It throws a population veto out of balance when one considers that the population of British Columbia exceeds that of all the Atlantic provinces together. If the Vancouver formula is bad, the Victoria formula is worse. It makes classes of provinces, gives some a perpetual veto and perpetuates seeds of ongoing discord. Is this the equity, fairness and justice that Canada wants written into its Constitution? No, Mr. Speaker.

The future of Canada will remain secure only if we allow Canadians in various parts of our country to have their regional identities, to maintain their traditions and to live up to their own values within Canada. If we want to strengthen and maintain Canada, the government should follow such a course.

The people of St. Catharines and indeed the people of Ontario are not seeking any special status or privilege, even knowing the province of Ontario has the right of veto in the government's resolution. Public opinion polls taken within the province show that they, too, want to bring the Constitution home and then to participate, in a capacity equal to all other Canadians, in the drafting of a Constitution made in Canada by Canadians for Canadians. They are prepared to participate as equals. Our fear is—and I fervently hope that such will not be so—that that opportunity may be lost forever unless we change the present animosity, alienation, confrontation and indifference to the alternative course of action of appreciation, harmony and understanding. Only then will each of us as Canadians from our various regions be able to share in the joy and pride which go with the symbols and institutions with which we identify as Canadians. Unless there is a feeling of pride and participation, the risks and divisions contained within the proposed Constitution will live for many years to come.

It has been said often that unity does not mean uniformity. It has never meant uniformity. Nor does uniformity give unity. One can find unity in the diversity of the country, for it has been the Canadian way of life and has made Canada the envy of the world. The major purpose and duty of the government is to remove regional unfairness and disparity and to promote equality across the land, just as it adopted the provision of equalization and wrote it into the Constitution. This has been accepted by all.

I should like to turn to the showpiece of the government's constitutional initiative—the Canadian charter of rights and freedoms. It is the showpiece because it is the part of the package to which most people can relate. The hon. member for Parkdale-High Park and other speakers on the government side indicated that the charter may not be perfect. Then they went on to say, "but nobody has to be perfect." This is merely a continuation of the wrong premise from which this package stems. If we are to have a charter at all, as Members of Parliament do we not have a responsibility to draft the very best one possible, especially if we are building, as the hon. minister pointed out in introducing the motion, a better Canada? In fact, he said:

> We have the occasion, after the traumatic experience of the spring, to build for our children and the children of our children a better Canada.

Does this not mean that we must develop and draft the most perfect Constitution possible?

Property rights are sadly missing from the government's package. Since coming to this House I have heard members speaking rhetorically about looking upon the Rockies, gazing over the Pacific coast, the coves of the Atlantic provinces or the wheat fields of the west. They have said, "These are my Rockies, my beautiful landscapes, my forests and my grain fields, mine for me to enjoy because I am Canadian and they are Canadian." That is like saying: "They are mine to enjoy, that is right, but please do not touch; they are beautiful, but they are beyond your reach." How can you say, Mr. Speaker, that they are yours when you cannot even own a little piece of them, or just a corner of them?

● (1620)

For a brief moment it seemed that common sense would prevail and that the government would support our position on property rights. But then, common sense and another good Canadian tradition was displaced by political expediency. The family home, the family farm and the family business are basic to our Canadian way of life. New Canadians have come here with that single motivating thought. Indeed, I say to the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park that in Poland the people are struggling to gain the right to own and occupy a single piece of land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): The right of ownership is one which is to be denied in this Constitution—or perhaps not confirmed is a better way of putting it. We have heard it mentioned, and I think it was almost spoken with praise, when government members referred to the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights. They said, "We are the party of rights and entrenchment." I agree with that, but the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights had the property rights proposal contained within it. Today's proposal is one that remains silent and muted, leaving a serious gap, far from a perfect charter of rights, one that we might expect to have. Not only is this charter not perfect, it is not even as perfect as we can make it.

I was born and raised on the prairies of Saskatchewan. Like many others, I served my country in time of war and in peace. I am a Canadian. Any Canadian Constitution which does not give me the same rights as all other Canadians to live, work, invest and do business and, indeed, to hold and enjoy property in any part of this country is deficient and discriminatory.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): Rather than have this charter be of the people, for the people, the approach taken is that the government grants rights and individual freedoms. We on this side of the House do not subscribe to that view but, rather, to the view that the citizens of our country have rights simply because they are people, human beings created in the image of God. They have certain inalienable rights. No government, no matter what the system, particularly the democratic system under which we live, should take those rights away from us. The right to own and enjoy property is one of them.

What this government seems incapable of understanding is that it is one thing to give people a Constitution, but it is another to give them one which they respect, a Constitution they can respect because they have had some part in developing it or in the process of the drafting or adoption of it. There are many such processes which can be accepted. But I submit that such a charter and, indeed, a Canadian Constitution should be the subject and the result of the deliberations of a broad cross-section of Canadians. Only then will we be able to say that we have a Canadian Constitution made by and for Canadians.

The Fathers of Confederation set a monumental task for themselves. They structured a nation from the wilderness. They established two levels of government which were to act as partners in the building of a new nation. Their task was to form the union and they did their job well. It is now our task to hold it together.

The Government of Canada and the provinces have long held that through confederation each of them has benefited. The greatness and diversity of this land and its people should never be undermined or reduced, for in that act of diversity lies the very strength of this nation. At times it will cause conflict and perhaps not promote rapid change, but that is a necessary concession which must be made to the greater good of all.

Change in the structure of Canadian politics has always been gradual. Change in Canada has not been the birth of conflict and violence. Canadians are a patient people. They will not accept change if the result of it is contrary to their wishes. We should bring the Constitution home and we should do it now. As Canadians we should gain the independence in form which we have enjoyed so long in fact. Then the opportunity will be ours, as a mature and responsible nation, to make the kind of change the people of this country would propose. That is what being independent really means. That is the Canadian mosaic. The Canadian people themselves may not be perfect but they deserve the chance.

Let me say here that no matter what form the resolution might take as it goes from this Parliament to Westminster, be it good, bad or indifferent, it is my hope that it would be endorsed there and returned to us, as Canadians, to work out our own future, to work out our own salvation as we see fit, in accordance with our own responsibility as a sovereign nation. But the fault will lie with this government if it embarrasses this country and Great Britain by the package it is submitting.

History will judge our actions with respect to this resolution. I can say without equivocation that I am proud of my leader and of my party for the stand they have taken. I am convinced it is the position of the majority of Canadians since it is, as Mr. Diefenbaker would say, "on the side of right."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to participate in this debate. I will be taking a conciliatory approach in my remarks, one of building and working together, an approach which I would like to see all members in this House take, as other members of my party have taken.

I would like to emulate one of my colleagues, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie), who loves to read the prophets. I would like to quote a phrase from the great prophet Isaiah who said, "Come, let us reason together." That is the encouragement that I wish to give.

In the course of this debate there has been division and rancour, but our party has taken the approach of reasoning together. Division, of course, is not unexpected. As the leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), stated, there was division in 1867 and there has been division in other countries. I do not find that human nature changes when it comes to expressing strong opinions.

I have been a bit disappointed by the arrogance and unreasonableness displayed by the government in some respects. We must not be arrogant or unreasonable in return; I think we ought to reason together. We can do this by looking for common ground, things that we can agree on and ways in which we can reason together. I think we have found some of these areas, and patriation is one of them. Every party agrees that the Constitution should be patriated. As an analogy, look at the way we grow up. As an adolescent we probably had a learner's licence to drive a car and when we grew older we were able to have our own driver's licence. This is what the patriation of the Constitution is about. We are saying we are past the stage of adolescence, we have reached adulthood, and let us have our own driver's licence.

I would like now to deal with the charter of rights. It is true there is not unanimity with respect to whether or not we should have a charter of rights in the Constitution. We in the New Democratic Party have always favoured, in terms of policy, a charter of rights. In 1947 the government of Saskatchewan under Tommy Douglas passed such a bill. As I look at members in our own party, I know there are those who have been fighting for a charter of rights for a long time. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has been fighting in this House since before I was born on issues such as a charter of rights. Therefore, I am happy that I can now stand with my generation and say that we do want a charter of rights. In fact, even the Conservative party with its Bill of Rights in 1960 indicated it favoured a charter of rights.

● (1630)

What about equalization? Everybody agrees that we ought to have equality of the human condition, whether in the area of health, education, or on such a vital matter as housing. I suggest that we examine where we can reason together. We feel equalization is important because our country is like a human body. We cannot cut off an arm or leg or undernourish any part of the body; every part of the body requires nourishment. Equalization ensures that there is this economic nourishment for every part of our country.

Resources is one other area of agreement. Before agreeing to send the resolution to committee, we in the New Democratic Party said we wanted to see some of the grievances of the west addressed. I refer here to my part of the country—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. I am pleased with the role my leader played in taking the initiative and adopting the attitude that we could reason together. To the credit of the government, it was willing to participate in this reasoning together to see that we did get acceptance of amendments such as resource control amendments.

I want to focus for a moment on some matters of agreement on which we have reasoned together and on why we can support this present resolution. Section 56 provides that which every province has wanted: control of their resources. At the initiation of the debate on the resolution in the House of Commons on October 7, 1980, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) said this:

> —changes are absolutely necessary in the area of resources so that there may be access to indirect taxation . . . There must be a clarification of resource ownership.

This was stated before the committee had an opportunity to examine the amendment in detail. I am happy to say that this amendment was granted. The area of resource control was dealt with in the Constitution.

Therefore, I concurred with great pride when my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa, pleaded with some members of this House who failed to recognize the importance to western Canadians that this particular resource concession held for us. We are all aware of the fact that there have been Supreme Court decisions which have caused great concern amongst the provinces in western Canada. This amendment addresses that particular concern. Under this Constitution provinces will be able to levy indirect taxes on their resources. I feel this is a major concession. It is something we want for all Canadians. I underline the fact that this resource amendment is very critical. We are happy to see that provision in the Constitution.

I would like to deal now with the charter of rights and discuss fundamental freedoms. Everyone in the country, regardless of province, would say we deserve these. Maybe I could just underline one of them to focus in on the discussion. Much has been made of the question whether God is recognized in the Constitution. Section 2, under fundamental freedoms, says that everyone has the fundamental freedom of conscience and religion. It is true that man does not live by bread alone. Part of my view of Canada is that we should all have freedom of conscience and religion.

We have a religious heritage in this country. On March 23, 1980, when I spoke on the national anthem bill, I made reference to the fact that Sir Leonard Tilley had referred, in the initial discussions, to Psalm 72:8. At that time people were wondering what the name of our country should be, and he said that Psalm suggested the name "the Dominion of Canada." Referring to this Psalm, he said, "His dominion shall be from sea even to sea, from the river even unto the ends of the earth." There has been this recognition from the beginning.

While I am disappointed that the Liberal members on the committee did not vote to include the supremacy of God amendment, I would just like to point out that in 1914 Mackenzie King said:

> With the Greek, let us measure our contribution to civilization in what we give to the humanities. With the Hebrew, let us believe that God continues to work through the centuries and that He may work for continents as well as men. With the founder of our faith, let us believe that all life is sacred and all human life but the reflected image of the Divine.

My colleague, the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), spoke in the House on February 23 and, in referring to the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights, correctly said, and I quote:

> It was a Liberal member who introduced an amendment on the last day of the committee hearings to entrench that in the Constitution.

That Liberal member, a former high commissioner to London and Member of Parliament for Essex East at that time, Paul Martin, said in the committee:

> It would seem to me, and I am open to correction, that in a bill of rights entertained and introduced by a country composed as we are of people who acknowledge the existence of God, we should not hesitate to confirm that fact in some way in this preamble. In the preamble which I put forward, reference to the diety is made twice, at the beginning and in the final paragraph.

My hope is that at some time in the future, if we do have a preamble, some form of recognition of what we believe in will be included in the Constitution. For the moment, I must say that I am happy with the entrenchment of freedom of religion in every province because it is important to my constituents. In my constituency there are two Hutterite colonies. I know the history of the persecution which they experienced in Europe, Russia and even in the United States. They were forced to come to Canada for refuge. They came to Manitoba and even to constituencies such as mine, the constituency of Dauphin. I feel very happy to be able to go to them and say, "You are welcome in my constituency; we are encouraging you to practise your religious freedom, something you have desired all of your lives." I feel good about being able to say that this freedom is entrenched in the Constitution. This applies to Hutterites in Saskatchewan and Alberta as well. This freedom cannot be taken away by any amending formula because it is included in the charter of rights.

Similarly, when my born again brothers and sisters in Christ quote John 3: 16 and tell me how they have a personal faith in Christ, I can say to them, "We are not setting up any barriers in the Constitution; we are entrenching this bill of rights in the Constitution." I can even say to some of the Mennonites in my constituency who do not vote or will not vote because of their belief and conscience, "You, too, have freedom of conscience; you, too, have freedom of religion." I think it is important that this be recognized regardless of what has been said in the House to date.

Let us take a further look at the charter of rights and some other matters which have been mentioned. With respect to aboriginal rights, I am happy to see Section 33 in the charter of rights. I must concur with my colleagues, the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper) and the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), when they say that if the recognition and affirmation of aboriginal rights were not included in the Constitution, many of us would have great difficulty going to the Indian reserves in our areas to try to answer questions which might be asked. In my constituency there are some seven Indian reserves. I can go to the north, to Shoal River, to Ebb and Flow, to Crane River, to Pine Creek, to Sandy Bay, to Valley River or Waterhen—any of these Indian reserves—and I say, "Yes, we have recognized aboriginal rights in the Constitution."

● (1640)

People ask me why I favour aboriginal rights. There are a number of reasons but one of the main ones can be found in Proverbs 23, verses 10 and 11. Solomon said:

Remove not the old landmarks and enter not into the fields of the fatherless:
For their redeemer is mighty; he shall plead their cause with thee.

I am very happy that there can be an affirmation of the contribution to our country of our native people, whether they be Inuit, Métis or Indian, in the charter of rights.

Let me turn now to Section 15, which I think is very important. It deals with the rights of the disabled. The marginal note reads "Equality before and under law and equal protection and benefit of law." The section provides that there shall not be discrimination based on mental or physical disability.

My colleague, the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Young), worked hard on the special task force and on the committee when it dealt with this matter. I have had a lot of personal experience in working with disabled people. For three years I was a supervisor of group programs with the Society for Crippled Children and Adults in Manitoba so I know the battles that must be fought to make sure that the disabled are accorded their rights. In fact, if anything was the catalyst which led me to become involved in politics, it was this. I had to run five times before getting elected, of course. As an administrator and supervisor I found that I was unable to do anything for the disabled, because when I wanted to tackle a program I came up against regulations which did not recognize equality for the disabled. It was the desire to have input and to make sure that the disabled receive due recognition that first involved me in the political scene.

When we think about the matter logically and philosophically, we realize that all of us have a certain disability. For example, I cannot swim; even though I have taken pre-beginner swimming lessons a few times I still cannot swim. There were many Monday nights at the Misericordia Hospital in Winnipeg when the disabled took swimming lessons. They now swim far better than I can. We all have disabilities in one form or another. It must be recognized that people who may be physically disabled are not necessarily mentally deficient. A lot of them are much brighter and more intelligent than I ever will be, Mr. Speaker. I am very happy to see this section in the resolution. We recognize the importance of the disabled and their rights should be entrenched in the Constitution.

The next matter I want to deal with is multiculturalism. Section 27 of the resolution states:

This charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

It is fitting that we recognize the importance of multiculturalism in this year, 1981. It was on October 8, 1971, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced for Canada "A policy of multiculturalism within a bilingual framework" and called for "a vigorous policy of multiculturalism". At that time there was unanimous agreement in the House on this issue. This year, 1981, is the tenth anniversary of the inception of the multiculturalism program, so it is appropriate that in the Constitution Act of 1981 we recognize and affirm Canada's multicultural reality.

At least one third of the Canadian population is of neither English nor French descent. While people of British and French origins form the two largest groups in Canada, a significant number of other ethnic groups, numerically and quantitatively, form part of the population. The German, Italian and Ukrainian communities are respectively the third, fourth, and fifth largest in Canada.

According to the 1971 census, there are 44 different ethnic groups in Canada's 22 million people. These ethnic groups have contributed to the building of Canada. As a rule, people are wont to consider only the two founding groups. The aboriginal people have been mentioned in the Constitution, and rightly so, but in addition we must always remember the others who helped build the country by the sweat of their brows.

A large number of Italians came to this country to help build the CPR. Some 15,000 Chinese from Canton and Hong Kong also came to help build the CPR. The record shows that in 1900 a Chinese person coming to Canada paid a head tax of $100. By 1903 that had gone up to $500. There were prohibitions for these people who came to help build our country, but they came just the same and they worked hard.

I was very happy to see people from various ethnic organizations participate in the committee hearings and share their vision of Canada with us. I should like to mention one or two people who appeared at the hearings and whom I had the opportunity to question. Professor Lupul of the Ukrainian community spoke to us of his vision of Canada. He said this:

A new Constitution is like a new house. In it there must be a room for the whole family. We are part of the Canadian family and have been so for almost a century. In our new constitutional house there must not only be room for all of us, but we must enter it through the front door together, culturally equal.

That is what entrenchment of the charter of rights means to people of ethnic background. It makes them culturally equal. It allows us all to enter this new Constitution by the front door.

Some people feel that entrenchment of this equality in the Constitution is more important than a preamble. A preamble is desirable but it is symbolic. It is nice to have it and to see ourselves reflected in it, but as one witness said, it does not really mean anything. It is the specific provisions that are important. When you say there is a cultural right, it means that everyone has a right to their cultural and linguistic heritage; then if you have a problem you can go after a legislature or present your case in a court. We now have this important recognition in the charter of rights.

The Constitution must not only reflect the Canada of today but the Canada of the future. When I think of the ethnic groups in this country and the contribution they have made to it, I am happy that Section 27 has been included.

As I said in committee, I regard multiculturalism as a renewable resource much as energy or the oil in Alberta. In terms of trade or diplomacy, it is useful to have as our representatives abroad Canadians who can understand and speak Chinese or any of the languages of the other 44 groups listed in the 1971 census. This is important because language reflects who we are, our concepts and our way of thinking. If I can speak another language then I know that in another country I can be understood and perceived with all the cultural information that language holds. If I have to learn another language when I am older, I may not have that facility. I would not be sure that I could come across exactly the way I want to.

I think the inclusion of Section 27 in our Constitution recognizes and taps this potential which we have as Canadians. It is important we keep this in mind when we think of the charter of rights and the recognition that it has had.

In regard to multiculturalism, I want to make a personal reference to indicate to hon. members why this is so important to me. I have a Ukrainian heritage and I am very proud of it. My grandfather came from the old country. He was a homesteader in the Pine River area. He literally worked the land with the sweat of his brow. My parents followed in the same tradition. When I think of my mother, my dad, Michael and Terry, I think of them as true builders of the west. My father and my mother had to work hard to buy their farm. They bought the farm by picking seneca roots and berries. This farm they bought was for sale because of delinquency in taxes. Not many of us have had to scratch or work that hard to make sure that our children, our succeeding generations, have the luxury which we members enjoy in this country today. My parents had to struggle with the language. In fact, my dad learned English by reading the English bible. When he could not understand the English, he would go to the Ukrainian bible for help. His dictionary is thumb-worn. He had to look up almost every word in order to learn the language and be able to communicate in the way he would like.

Our education and the possibilities we have we take literally for granted. I feel I can go to my parents and say to them, "We, as your children, appreciate the contribution you have made to Canada; section 27 recognizes your heritage and the contribution which you have made to our country."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewycky: My constituency has a large number of ethnic groups. We try to foster the Ukrainian heritage. Dauphin is known as the home of Canada's National Ukrainian festival. For the last 15 or 16 years people from across the United States and from as far away as the down under countries have been coming to Dauphin to participate in its Ukrainian festival. They have come to learn a little about the heritage we have in Canada. Some of my American friends come to Dauphin. They tell me that they are happy to come to a place like Dauphin because they can get a little spiritual and cultural renewal and find out something about their roots. Everyone is talking about roots right now and we have the opportunity to find out something about our roots. I am happy to say that ethnic groups from my area have felt free to participate and to contribute to our multicultural heritage.

Since Dauphin was given constituency status there have been some ten Members of Parliament representing the area. I am the tenth Member of Parliament from Dauphin. Our seventh Member of Parliament, Fred Zaplitny, was the first person of non-Anglo-Saxon or French heritage to represent the riding. I recognize how he contributed to the political life of Canada at that time, and I am proud to go to his son, Rick, and tell him, "Look, Rick, in section 27 we recognize the important contribution people with an ethnic background have made." I will be happy to go to Pine River this summer when it has its eightieth anniversary. Most of the people from this community have Ukrainian backgrounds and I will be able to say to them, "We recognize the contribution you have made to Canada through Section 27 of the charter of rights."

In conclusion, I beg all members of the House to take the words of the prophet Isaiah seriously when he said: "Come, let us reason together." Let us find this common ground. I think the New Democratic Party has been spearheading the way in trying to point out areas of common grounds, such as patriation, the charter of rights and equalization. We have spoken about resources. In specifics, we have talked about rights for the aboriginal people, for the disabled and for women. We have spoken about the need for the recognition of multiculturalism. In view of that, I am happy to say that I can support this resolution.

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in this debate, I must first congratulate the joint committee for the amount of work it did in bringing us this far in considering the resolution. I wish particularly to compliment the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal) for doing an extraordinarily good job as co-chairman. He certainly became a television star, among other things, but more impressive to me was the calm and cool way in which he presided over what could have been a very fractious committee.

The other bouquet I want to hand out is to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), who presented our side of the case with such clarity and with a steady sense of what was proper to present to such a committee and what was not. He gave a very stirring speech in the House a couple of weeks ago when he introduced the amendment we are now discussing.

I suppose every debate in the House has its high points and its low points. To date, I would suggest that the low point was a speech given by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Regan) on March 2. Although he was given an opportunity to participate in one of the most important debates of this generation, he thought only of the opportunity to deliver a speech filled with self-serving remarks about his own public service, coupled with cheap shots directed at the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), who was not present in the House at the time.

It is with great concern that I rise today to add my voice to the voices of other members opposing the proposed amendments to the Constitution. Like my colleagues, I want the Constitution to be patriated. Unlike members opposite, I want it patriated without change except for the addition of an amending formula. The changes can be made in Canada by the people the changes will affect.

This Constitution affects the very survival of Canada, the identity and values of Canadians. It determines the economic welfare of the country. It affects all problems in Canada because it is a document which establishes the power distribution between our two levels of government and it sets the rules of all manner of business. It is something so important and so essential to our nation, I wonder how the government can pursue the course it has chosen when the effect of what it is doing will be felt by every citizen of Canada and future citizen of Canada. How can the government move so quickly and unadvisedly?

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. It now being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills, private bills and notices of motion.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING POLLING HOURS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra) moved that Bill C-237, to amend the Canada Elections Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He said: Mr. Speaker, anyone living in British Columbia has experienced the outrage, or at least the irrelevance, of turning on the television or radio at eight o'clock on election night to find that a majority government has already been elected.

In this electronic age it is probably impossible to prevent the news from leaking out in advance of eight o'clock, the time the polls now close. Even though there is a prohibition on broadcasting such information in Canada before eight o'clock p.m. on election night, there are occasional slip-ups across the border. United States television signals are available to residents of western Canada close to the border. They can find out in this way, accidentally or otherwise, that as far as they are concerned the election is over. Anyone who wishes to get this information in advance has only to telephone a friend in the east at six o'clock Vancouver time. He can find that the election is over, or whatever the result happens to be.

This may not appear to be serious, but there is, in close ridings particularly, a winner's syndrome, if I can call it that. It is something that would force the person who wants to have a voice in the government, and who sees that the only way he can get that is by having a government Member of Parliament, to spread the word to a number of friends to hold back from voting. They could then go en masse to the polls later in the day and swing an election in a way that it really was not intended to go.

My proposal in Bill C-237 is for what I call a national election clock. The polls would open at the same instant everywhere in the country and close at the same instant. There are seven time zones in Canada. I am ignoring the most westerly one, the Yukon time zone, because there are so few electors there and it is a very small time zone.

Under my proposal, the polls would open local time in the Newfoundland time zone at 12.30 p.m. and close at 8.30 p.m., from 12 p.m. to 8 p.m. Atlantic time, from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m. eastern time, from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. central time, from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. mountain time and from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. Pacific time. That is the same instant across the country. The polls would close at the same instant, according to my proposal, exactly eight hours later.

At present the polls are open for 11 hours. Any of us in this House who have visited polls on election day will have observed that there is a very slow period of voting during each election day. In fact, probably not more than 25 per cent of the voters in any particular poll arrive before four o'clock in the afternoon; in other words, in the first seven hours. Eight hours, as suggested in my proposal, would be an adequate amount of time to allow all voters to come within a reasonable period of time to cast their ballots.

This would improve the working conditions on election day for the approximately 200,000 people in all of the political parties and all of the polls who are now required to be on duty from early in the morning until late at night. It would be better for poll workers.

The results of the election would become available at the same time all across the country. I often have complaints from my friends in eastern Canada who say they have to wait until midnight or one o'clock to find out whether I have been elected. My proposal would take pity on those people in the east and allow them to retire earlier, having the information about who in the west has won. There has only been one time in the last ten years when the vote was very close. The decision was actually made in the west in 1972. The vote was not decided until the count got over the mountains.

There are two other bills that have been presented, one in the other place and one here, Bill S-11 and, Bill C-626, which have identical proposals to amend the Canada Elections Act. They are identical to each other, not to mine. The difference is that while they respect the opening at different hours across the country, they provide that the polls be open for 11 hours in each case. Therefore the polls in the Pacific time zone would have to open at seven o'clock in the morning, quite an unreasonable hour. In Newfoundland the polls would not close until 9.30 p.m. which I suggest is too late for them to be open. Under my proposal, no one would have to stay up late. The polls would close at the same instant and the results would be available to all Canadians at the same moment.

I was not content to restrict my bill to the election clock; I proposed to deal with one or two other problems. One complaint that has come to me often in elections is that people have moved within the riding. They cannot vote at their new place of residence. Canadians being quite mobile, they move at all times of the year. This can be a particular problem in rural ridings, but even in a city an individual might move eight miles across town. He would lose his vote unless he were willing and able to make that trip back to the place where his name was on the polling list.

To overcome that problem, I propose in Bill C-237 that transfer certificates be issued within a riding to enable a person whose name is on the list in another poll to vote at a different poll within the same riding.

One feature of the bill is that it would provide for all absences to be covered. Under Section 46(1) of the existing act, proxy votes can be obtained for people who are going to be absent from polls for varying reasons. One section reads:

(a) his absence from the polling division in the course of his employment as a fisherman, mariner, member of an aircrew, member of a forestry crew, member of a topographical survey crew, prospector or trapper,

(b) his illness or physical incapacity, or

(c) his absence from the polling division while a full-time student duly registered at a recognized educational institution in Canada during an academic term,

I have had some personal experience with students and those who must be away for one reason or another or because of illness and physical incapacity. The procedure is quite cumbersome. Canadians are often denied their vote because they are unwilling to bear the cost, get a medical certificate from a doctor or because the registrar of an educational institution cannot be reached in order to obtain a certificate of that kind. Canadians travel in this jet age. Trips are often planned months in advance. We do not know when an election will be held until two months or so in advance.

Under my proposed Clause 4, voters absent from the riding on polling day or advance polling days are eligible for a proxy certificate. Other countries have provisions to accomplish that. In the United States, citizens can attend at U.S. embassies abroad and cast their ballots on voting day. Canadians who are absent because of holidays, business trips or who are unable to get to the poll because they are ill or are students would easily obtain a proxy. That is what my proposal in Clause 4 would provide.

● (1710)

There is a fifth and final point proposed in my bill. Under the current Canada Elections Act we have a list of special electors; the Canadian forces electors, the public service electors and veteran electors. There is a fourth class, if I could call it that, which I would term special external electors, those Canadians who have gone abroad for temporary periods of work. I do not refer to those on vacation or at schools, but rather to those people who have gone abroad, perhaps engineers working on Canadian pulp mills abroad, pipeline consultants, Canadians working overseas for CIDA or the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, or even some Canadians who go overseas for periods of less than five years to work for Petro-Canada, Bell Canada or other companies. This would mean they could be away from Canada during an election period and would otherwise be disenfranchised. Canada has shown its flexibility in that we now have three special categories of electors on the list; as I mentioned, the forces, the public service and veterans. I am now proposing a special electors' list which would cover that kind of worker who is absent from Canada for a long but still temporary period of time.

I would not expect the House to accept this bill without some support. I have had some lengthy correspondence with the Chief Electoral Officer in this regard. He has given me some commentary on the proposals. I cannot say he is either fully for them or fully against them, but he does indicate he has reviewed the drafts and has set out his comments in a letter I would make available to the committee which refers to this bill. At this time I think I should allow other hon. members of the House to comment on this proposal, but I would be glad to bring those comments to the attention of the committee should this bill get to that stage.

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the first and perhaps the main proposal contained in this bill reminds me of an experience I had on Monday afternoon, October 14, 1935. That was the first election in which I was a candidate. I do not see many hon. members suggesting that they remember that date, but I was a candidate in that election. I had voted for the first time in the election of 1930 but it was 1935 before I ran as a CCF candidate in what was then the constituency of Winnipeg South Centre. With all of the enthusiasm and hopefulness of a 27-year-old candidate I was sure I was going to win.

About five o'clock in the afternoon of election day the newspapers appeared on the streets of Winnipeg saying "Liberals sweep Nova Scotia". We still had two or three hours of voting in Winnipeg and, of course, there were several more hours farther west. Whether that had any effect on the voting one will never know, but at least that was the first year in which we had this concern. The radio was also reporting the same sort of thing. It was as a result of that experience in 1935 that the government shortly after brought in a bill which Parliament passed, between the 1935 and 1940 elections, prohibiting radio stations from broadcasting election results until the polls were closed in the area in which the radio station was located.

Things have changed a great deal since then. This seemed a very simple matter to solve at that time. Now with networks and easier access to long distance telephones, with the United States radio and television stations giving out the information, the ban against pre-publication of the results does not have very much effect.

Accordingly, I believe the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) is to be commended for bringing in a bill proposing we do something about this. I hope I am not publishing results before they are announced, but I believe the government is going to indicate its willingness and readiness to have the subject matter of this bill referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. If that proposal is made we shall certainly give it our support. In other words, we think the proposal of the hon. member should be looked at to see whether his idea or something like it might be feasible.

The first reaction some of my colleagues had to this proposal was that it would be shortening by too much the number of hours available for voting. That could be overcome by adding a couple of hours, still preserving the principle that the polls should open and close at the same instant right across this vast country.

Another way in which the matter might perhaps be dealt with would be to require that ballot boxes not be opened in the eastern part of Canada until the polls in the west had actually closed. That idea is also subject to criticism in some respects. I have heard of others and we have received letters suggesting still other ideas. My friend recited the experience of the 1980 election when even in Manitoba the first television results from the east let us know that the game was over so far as the outcome of the election was concerned. The fact is that it would be desirable to find some way by which the possible influence of knowing the early results could be counteracted.

This idea, along with others, could well be the subject of study by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I believe it is almost a tradition in this place that within a year or two of an election we reconsider the Canada Elections Act. The Chief Electoral Officer and the government bring forward suggestions and private members make proposals. I believe we should look at what has been put before us now in that light.

Something got me off the track when I started to say that the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra was particularly concerned about the 1980 election when it seemed to be all over by the time we got to the Red River Valley. I can remember other elections, cliff hangers, in respect of which we had to sit up late at night in Manitoba to see what happened in British Columbia before we knew what the result would be.

I think it is not beyond our wit to find some way in which to vote as a nation from coast to coast. I have seen other ideas besides this one and the one I suggested. Certainly we would be prepared to agree that the subject matter of this bill be referred to committee. The same applies to the other suggestions by the hon. member. When that committee meets there will be quite a few suggestions, and these are all in line with the general practice of reviewing the Canada Elections Act within a year or two of the experience of a general election.

We thank the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra for bringing these ideas before us. If I am right in my prediction that we will have a motion to refer the subject matter, we shall support it.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in commending the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke) for bringing this bill forward. Most private members' bills deal with a singular issue and are very short, but this is a bill with a number of clauses. It has been extensively well researched. It has been well thought out and we have no hesitation in joining the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in that the subject of this bill should be referred to committee.

• (1720)

Obviously we are not in a position to allow the bill to proceed past second reading because, as the hon. member points out, it is a tradition following a general federal election that this matter is considered in great depth by members of this House upon a report made by the Chief Electoral Officer, and he has informed me that he will be bringing forward later this year his report based on the last election.

The value of this bill is that the Chief Electoral Officer, being a servant of this House, is in a difficult position in making recommendations for changes in voting procedure or behaviour. It is really the initiative of members of this House that should dictate any changes in the Canada Elections Act; he has only to advise.

I see merit in the substance of this bill. I am not committing the government to any of the changes in this bill, but the situation as outlined by both the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre concerning the polling hours is perhaps something members on all sides should deal with because it does cause a problem.

My hon. friend from Vancouver Quadra talked about the 1972 election as being an exception whereby the western results made a difference. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could remember earlier ones. I certainly remember the 1979 election when, yes, the fate of the Conservative government was decided, but it was not until we got the results from Manitoba that we realized that it more likely would be a minority government. So in that sense the votes did very much count in Manitoba. We hear a lot about votes not counting but obviously all votes count. Nevertheless, it must have a profound effect on the voter in western Canada after the polls close in eastern Canada to have the results either by cable television, which is not subject to the regulations now in force concerning broadcasting, or, as the hon. member said, from U.S. outlets. So I think there is something in the point made by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra although I am not necessarily agreeing with what he has proposed. We can certainly deal with this when it gets to committee.

The other sections dealing with proxy voting, special voting rules, mobile voting places, etc., are also very worthy of study because there have been several comments made by government employees overseas that they have been disenfranchised for one reason or another. We are talking about a lot of people, but even if it is only one person, we are perhaps denying a right of Canadian citizenship, notwithstanding where that person may reside, because of service to the Government of Canada. This also applies to the Canadian Armed Forces personnel. Perhaps there could be some changes made there.

Without prolonging the debate any further, Mr. Speaker, I once again applaud the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra for bringing this bill forward, and if all hon. members agree I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery):

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:

"Bill C-237, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, be not now read a second time but that the order be discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Collenette) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Shall the motion, as amended, carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Accordingly, the order is discharged, the bill withdrawn and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised that we were able to gather a quorum this quickly after the dinner recess, considering the other attractions in town this evening with President Reagan's first visit to Canada. However, before dinner I started to point out the effects of the Liberal initiative to bring the Constitution back to Canada, particularly the process the government has recommended to Parliament.

I should like to go into the history of this by pointing out that hon. members on the government side are fond of telling us that the search for an amending formula has been going on for some 54 years. That would put it ahead of the search for Chloë in the Louisiana swamps. Each day during those 54 years has not been spent actively searching. Not only is this a false impression, but I want to point out that there was very little mention to the constitutional issue through long periods of time, particularly during the 1980 election when the current government received its mandate from the people of Canada.

The real impetus behind the resolution we are considering this evening comes from the May, 1980, Quebec referendum in which the majority of Quebec residents voted for renewed federalism. They turned their back on sovereignty-association because of the federal government promises of a better deal for Quebec. The extent of the double cross of Quebec is now becoming more and more apparent, particularly to the people of that province. I am sure most hon. members opposite are well aware that a recent poll indicated that 44 per cent of the people of Quebec are now opposed to the Liberal-NDP resolution, 37 per cent approved and 19 per cent are undecided. The 73 Liberal Members of Parliament from Quebec should be considering why they are moving on this unwanted course which breaks another Liberal promise. That course is now being opposed by both the government and the people of Quebec.

The government seems to have taken advantage of the confidence expressed by the people of Quebec in the federal system in the May, 1980, referendum by coming up with a resolution which reflects its own lack of faith in our federal nature. The government may deny this, but it can be proved by looking at what other authorities have to say about federalism and the unilateral act the government is now contemplating.

Let us look at the 1965 white paper on amending the Canadian Constitution, which said:

● (2010)

In a federal state, there are particular considerations that add to the importance of . . . built-in certainty and stability. A federal system is one in which the powers of all legislatures and governments are limited, not only by definition but by their relationship to each other. The very nature of the federation requires that the rights and powers of its constituent units be protected.

This is from the 1965 white paper which had the foreword signed by the Right Hon. Lester Pearson. In its introduction, former Prime Minister Pearson wrote:

In any federation, the two most critical questions are the distribution of powers between the two levels of government and the manner in which the Constitution can be changed. A federation is necessarily a delicate balance between conflicting considerations and interests. It is to be expected that the most delicate of all questions should be the way in which such a balance might be altered.

Our present government is approaching this question with all the delicacy of the proverbial bull in a china shop. The United Kingdom's consideration of the changes to be requested in our Constitution has resulted in the Kershaw report, which says:

The federal character of Canada's constitutional system affects the process for amending that system. For it would be inconsistent with that federal character to treat the Canadian federal government of Parliament as having the power to secure the amendment of all parts of that system on its own initiative, regardless of the will of provincial governments and legislatures affected by those amendments.

Finally, let us have a look at what our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) formerly thought about federalism. In the 1960s he said:

Federalism is by its very essence a compromise and a pact . . . It is a pact or quasi-treaty in the sense that compromise cannot be achieved unilaterally. That is not to say that the terms are fixed forever; but only that in changing them every effort must be made not to destroy the consensus on which the federated nation rests.

The white paper in 1965, which would bear reading by everyone interested in this subject, proposed the following clause as part of its amending formula:

No law made under the authority of this part affecting any provision of this act or Section 51A of the British North America Act, 1867, or affecting any provision of the Constitution of Canada relating to (a) the powers of the legislature of a province to make laws,

(b) the rights or privileges granted or secured by the Constitution of Canada to the legislature or the government of a province,

(c) the assets or property of a province, or

(d) the use of the English or French language,

None of this is to come into force, or no changes are to be made to any of these provisions unless concurred in by the legislatures of all the provinces. These were the amending proposals of the 1965 white paper. It goes on to say:

Paragraphs (a) to (d), and especially (a) and (d), could be said to represent essential conditions on which the original provinces united to form the Canadian confederation, and on which other provinces subsequently joined the union. Changes in these basic conditions—such as in the powers allocated to provincial legislatures—could alter their status in relation to Parliament, thus changing the conditions on which the provinces entered confederation.

The 1965 white paper noted that the BNA Act "left Canada without any clearly defined procedure for securing constitutional amendments from the British parliament." However, it went on to say:

> Certain rules and principles relating to amending procedures have nevertheless developed over the years. They have emerged from the practices and procedures employed in securing various amendments to the British North America Act since 1867.

What are these principles? Once again, there are four of them which are outlined in the white paper:

> The first general principle . . . is that although an enactment by the United Kingdom is necessary to amend the British North America Act, such action is taken only upon formal request from Canada.
>
> The second general principle is that the sanction of Parliament is required for a request to the British parliament for an amendment to the British North America Act.

So far so good.

> The third general principle is that no amendment to Canada's Constitution will be made by the British parliament merely upon the request of a Canadian province.
> The fourth general principle is that the Canadian Parliament will not request an amendment directly affecting federal-provincial relationships without prior consultation and agreement with the provinces.

That is what this government is not doing. We have a government here which is abiding by the first three rules but which is ignoring the fourth. It is superfluous to have rules if they are ignored when it is inconvenient. What state would this country be in if Canadian citizens decided to ignore the laws they did not like?

While our government seems content to overlook the historical precedents of our federal system, the United Kingdom is probably not. The Kershaw report notes:

> —the U.K. parliament retains the role of deciding whether or not a request for amendment or patriation of the BNA Act conveys the clearly expressed wish of Canada as a whole, bearing in mind the federal nature of that community's constitutional system.
>
> In all ordinary circumstances, the request of the Canadian government and Parliament will suffice to convey that wish. But where the requested amendment or patriation directly affects the federal structure of Canada, and the opposition of provincial governments and legislatures is officially represented to the U.K. authorities, something more is required.
> We think that it would not be inappropriate for the U.K. parliament to expect that a request for patriation by an enactment significantly affecting the federal structure of Canada should be conveyed to it with at least that degree of provincial concurrence (expressed by governments, legislatures, or referendum majorities) which would be required for a post-patriation amendment affecting the federal structure in a similar way.

The Canadian government is making a lot of fuss about the United Kingdom government interfering in Canadian affairs. That is because the British are trying to tell us something which our government would like to keep quiet. By making enough indignant noises, the government hopes to cover up the British message and stop Canadian questions.

If the Prime Minister has his way, we will have a Constitution which has been amended by another country, and which does not have the support of the provinces. What will this mean to Canadians? It will mean that the patriated and amended Constitution will lack legitimacy. That is to say, unless the overwhelming majority of people living under a Constitution regard the document as valid and properly based, they will not consider themselves bound by it. And what modern-day sovereign country would accept a constitution legislated outside of its own borders? Even the amending formula will be externally legislated without Canadian support, which means that it will lack legitimacy and, consequently, so will any future amendments.

Gordon and Janet Leckie have been writing articles on the Constitution. They put forward the following:

> A country with no written constitution may live and work effectively. A nation with an iron-bound constitution may live and work effectively. But a society with a constitution whose legitimacy is disputed will live and work in acrimony, at best, and in conflict, at worst.

The only way to avoid this disaster is to bring home the Constitution with an acceptable amending formula and then amend it in Canada. No adult nation should, or would, do otherwise.

● (2020)

The amending formula to be entrenched in the Constitution, according to the government's wishes, is the Victoria formula, and it is now totally unacceptable. It completely ignores equal status accorded to all Canadian provinces. While British Columbia may oppose an amendment, it is powerless to prevent it without the help of another province. If, on the other hand, Ontario opposes an amendment, the amendment is defeated. Quebec is given the same power. Thus the whole of Canada will be held hostage to the desires of either of the two central Canadian provinces.

While the current government reason is that extending a perpetual veto power to Quebec will ensure that province's special place within the federal system, it does so by taking away from the other provinces. This will increase the resentment toward Quebec and the feelings of alienation on the part of the western and maritime provinces.

If the power of the House of Commons and the power of constitutional change is to lie in central Canada, the west and the maritimes must be assured of having a counterbalance. The only place for that counterbalance to exist might well be in the Senate. In the resolution before us, the Senate is given a veto over all constitutional amendments, but no change in Senate composition is included in this resolution. Without Senate reform, the power of government still lies in central Canada. Current membership in the Senate has Canada divided into four regions: Ontario, Quebec, the maritimes and the west. Each of the regions is allocated 24 seats in the Senate, plus Newfoundland which is allocated six. The Yukon and Northwest Territories have each been given one. This is just a further example of inequality. Ontario as one province has 24 seats. The west has 24 seats divided among four provinces. Senators are appointed at present by the federal government, and although they must come from the designated regions, the appointments, as we all know, are often made as a reward for party services. Consequently, the senators do not truly represent their regions. They will not necessarily defend their regional rights and interests.

If we look at other federated states, we see that this inequity does not exist. For example, in West Germany, the Bundestag is elected on the basis of population like our House of Commons. But in the budersrat, the upper house, the landers, or provinces, themselves exercise authority to protect their rights and prerogatives. Delegates appointed by the six smallest provinces, ten in total, with only 26 per cent of the whole population of Germany, can muster a majority in the upper house. The same arrangement exists in Switzerland.

Consequently, if Canada had the constitution of West Germany, instead of only 54 per cent of our senators coming from the west and the maritimes, 71 per cent would come from these regions. If we had the constitution of the United States or Switzerland, 80 per cent of our senators would come from the less populated areas. With control of the upper house, the west and the maritimes could be assured of receiving a more equitable treatment in all matters that concern them. As it stands now, all our legislative power is concentrated in the House of Commons, which is dominated by the more populated provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Now we are faced with a Constitution which will ensure even more power being concentrated in those two provinces.

The amending formula to be entrenched combines, with the absence of Senate reform, to produce a totally unacceptable situation. What is worse, there is no hope of improvement if this resolution is passed. On February 17 the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) said:

> —what we are doing today is the start of the process, not the end. Much reform has to be undertaken in Canada in future in terms of constitutional powers.

He gave Senate reform as an example. But how can the west and the maritimes hope for improvement when they have had no say in the amending formula chosen by the government that will be used to reform the last place where they can hope for fair play? The reason the amending formula must have the consensus of the provinces is that it will be used to make future changes that will affect the provinces.

Mr. Irwin: P.E.I.?

Mr. McKinnon: Yes. I wish to comment on the process regarding the entrenchment of a charter of rights, that is, the process that is being followed to entrench it.

On November 7, 1980, the Prime Minister said:

> I am convinced that there would never be an entrenched charter of rights. Particularly, there would never be entrenched educational language rights if it weren't done now by the national Parliament the last time, as it were, that we had a possibility of proceeding in this way to amend the Constitution. In other words, once we have a constitution in Canada, whether it be with the Victoria formula or any other formula, we will never get anything saying that all Canadians are equal—

So instead of having long philosophical discussions about a charter of rights, we are being subjected to what one man considers to be right. The heck with the rest of the country! We are to be treated like little children who do not know what is good for us. Well, I for one hope I know what is good for me, and I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I do not need the Prime Minister or his sycophants in the Langevin Building to give me instructions in morality.

The essential function of a charter of rights is the protection of every citizen from injustice, and it should result from a calm, unhurried discussion. Instead, in Canada we are having an emotional, partisan, hasty argument involving pressure groups which are trying to gain a privileged position by having their particular interests entrenched. A charter of rights is intended to provide common rights for each and every individual citizen. It is not intended to protect special groups. If equality for all citizens is the essence of a charter of rights, how can the wishes of some groups be approved and others denied?

I would like to quote the testimony given by Professor Peter Russell of the University of Toronto to the special joint committee which reads as follows:

> I suggest to you that there are three qualities which should characterize the process of defining the rights and freedoms which are so fundamental to Canadians to entrench in the Constitution.
>
> The process should be considered, it should be reasonably popular and it should be as unifying as possible. The process of entrenchment should have those qualities because it involves the creation of a higher law, the law of the Constitution which will limit all Canadian law-makers in the future, and those who fashion constitutional guarantees designed to limit the powers of transient majorities must express and try to express the enduring will of our nation. They must not themselves be simply, and no more than, a transient majority.
> By these standards, I judge the means being used now to entrench a charter of rights and freedoms in our Constitution as seriously deficient. The charter has been drafted, I say, in haste, at least pretty quickly, by some government officials. It is being put through this federal Parliament, sometimes closure has been used, deadlines have been and are being applied without permitting the Canadian people sufficient opportunity to consider and discuss all of its important implications. It is to be made part of our Constitution not by a constitutional act of Canadians but by a foreign legislature and in the teeth of some bitter opposition from a majority of provincial governments.

By entrenching a charter of rights in our Constitution, we are handing the protection of citizens over to the courts. That is another problem. As the Hon. James Richardson, a former Liberal cabinet minister, told the special joint committee:

> The essential weakness of written constitutions is that they are inflexible. The courts that interpret a Constitution must look at what the Constitution says, and not at the political and social reality of the times in which the judgment is being made.

—Parliament responds to social and political realities. Parliament responds to human needs in a way that a court can never do, because a court is not being directed by human needs but by the dead hand of a written constitution.

As more senior members of the House will realize, it was not often that I agreed with the Hon. James Richardson during his tour here, but I do agree with that quotation.

The Ontario royal commission's inquiry into civil rights—the McRuer Report of 1969—supports this view. The report said:

● (2030)

We do not think it is consistent with a true concept of democracy for a court of appointed judges to be able to make a law with far-reaching effects touching the lives of everyone in the country with no power in Parliament to alter it. In the last analysis, in such cases the power of final decision may rest on one man casting the deciding vote in the court of last resort.

Canada already has an Official Languages Act passed in 1969 with support from all parties. As Gordon Leckie has stated:

Which will seem more legitimate—a 'constitutional right' foisted on us reluctantly by the United Kingdom, or an act passed by our own Parliament? Obviously, Canadians will not feel bound by a rule, technically 'entrenched' or not, which has never been approved in a mandate from the whole people.

I agree with Mr. Leckie. Entrenchment will not achieve the protection of human rights. One has only to look at the Soviet Union's entrenched bill of rights to understand this fact.

An hon. Member: We are tired of the Soviet Union.

Mr. McKinnon: Do you know it off by heart, gentlemen? Just think what wonderful rights they must have because they are entrenched in a bill of rights which says:

Citizens enjoy in full social, economic, political and personal rights and freedoms proclaimed and guaranteed by the Constitution . . . citizens are guaranteed inviolability of the person—

An hon. Member: You are the fifteenth person to say that.

Mr. McKinnon: Human rights flow from the fact that we are human. The government does not confer them upon us. And when we take it upon ourselves to write down what rights we have, we must remember that by any omission, we are also establishing what rights we do not have. For example, property rights. They have been omitted from this resolution and thus from the rights of Canadians. The legitimacy of even those rights that have been included is in doubt because they impose obligations on the provinces in fields within their jurisdiction—for example, minority language rights.

There is no doubt that the Constitution could be patriated or brought home, and quite easily. It would, however, require the Prime Minister to exhibit a little flexibility and a modicum of trust in the intelligence of his fellow Canadians. The Prime Minister wants his way; he wants his charter and his amending formula to be applicable to Canadians forever. Tempting as it is, I am afraid it would not be productive to attempt to question the Prime Minister concerning his yearnings for immortality, his wish to have only his own ideas in the charter and the Constitution, and then to leave them almost impossible to amend. It reminds me of a discussion I had very early in my public life when I had supported some good measure on a school board and mentioned to a colleague that the measure had gone through fairly easily. He replied, "You will be surprised at how much good you can accomplish in public life if you don't care who gets the credit." What a pity the Prime Minister has never been able to share the credit for initiatives.

Until now, every worth-while initiative taken by the Prime Minister has come to naught. Despite his not inconsiderable talents, his record is one of failure after failure. When he first ran as a prime minister in 1968, it was under the slogan "A Just Society" but that dream ended in 1970 when he imposed the War Measures Act. Then came his "third option" phase, and it too has disappeared with little trace. Next came his Holy Grail, the contractual link with Europe. Again, failure. Next came his initiative for francophonie or a French-speaking Commonwealth which is at present deadlocked by differences among France, Quebec and Canada. Recently he has tried to make some progress as a self-appointed leader of the North-South concept. We saw him go to Austria. He got lost in Austria, then he lost Algeria.

An hon. Member: He is still lost.

Mr. McKinnon: This was despite the considerable help of a rather large group of people who were trying to get him to the right place at the right time. Considering the Prime Minister's and Canada's track record in this area, which is one of diminishing contributions, it should not have surprised the Prime Minister that his sudden conversion has been looked upon somewhat skeptically.

These are the great initiatives of the Prime Minister during his long term of office; each of them was well-intentioned but each has failed. Recently a biography on the Prime Minister was entitled "The Northern Magus". I regard him more as a Canadian Hamlet, the melancholy prince who meant so well but hurt so many, the contrast between thinking and acting being a primary conflict in both their characters. I believe it is the reputation that he has built as an underachiever that drives him to this desperate attempt to leave a monument in the form of a patriated Constitution and entrenched charter of rights. I say desperate, because he seems not to care if he breaks every tradition, if he divides the country, if he deceives the head of the government of a friendly country. Nothing seems to matter; he must have his monument.

The fact is that at this stage of his political life he has little to leave behind. Other than a great reputation for slick campaigning and his recognized ability to use the leverage of his tribal vote in one area into winning enough seats to maintain power despite his sorry record, this is not really much to leave behind.

Mr. Peterson: What a crybaby!

Mr. McKinnon: What a waste of talent, because he has considerable talent and he wasted much of it.

Mr. Peterson: I know! Should we abolish the electoral system in Canada?

An hon. Member: Don't talk from your seat. Stand up and talk.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McKinnon: The hon. member who speaks so often from a sitting position has not really contributed. I give the Prime Minister full credit for being one of the best and one of the slickest campaigners the country has ever seen.

If this resolution passes in its present form and the amended Constitution and charter of rights are patriated with the divisive amending formula included, that will be the Prime Minister's greatest failure. I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite that this country, this party and parties on all sides of the House really want to bring the Constitution home. Only a misguided genius like the Prime Minister could manage to have the country quarrel about how to bring it home when we all want that. He has managed to come up with the one way to alienate all of those people who desire it. I regret that and I look forward to the day when this country, not with this Prime Minister but with another, will be able to heal the grievous wounds the right hon. gentleman has left as his legacy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ray Chénier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we are engaged in a debate in this House which gives each member, that rarest of opportunities, the opportunity to participate in the conception and birth of the most basic and important statements of our nationhood: the Canadian Constitution.

Each of us represents a part of Canada, a collection of Canadians who together form the national will. We assemble in this chamber to make decisions which, we feel, after all due and proper debate, are in the best interest of the nation. We are here to do a job, mindful of the feelings of our constituents, but mindful also that they are but part of the Canadian family. One of the intriguing characteristics of Canada is that although this land is almost unimaginably vast, most of us have close relatives or friends in other parts of Canada. And we all know that we are essentially the same sort of people and that our acceptance of Canada as our enduring homeland is never questioned.

We are a population blessed with enormous wealth from our resources, both in industry and natural; a strong and proud democratic tradition; a belief that we should share the bounty of our land with those who do not enjoy its full benefit, and, above all, a population which has learned the lessons of tolerance and understanding, and those lessons have been learned with some pain.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to participate in this historic debate to express vividly and clearly my support for the proposed resolution concerning a new Constitution, a truly Canadian Constitution. I believe that thanks to the efforts of the three parties this Parliament has been successful in drafting a text which all at once is noble, just and futuristic. It is without hesitation or fear that I will tell my voters and the rest of the Canadian people that parliamentarians are making a courageous and great stand in this debate. I know that the native people with whom I work more closely because of my duties as parliamentary secretary, as well as the disabled and the handicapped whom I met as a member of the Task Force on the Disabled and the Handicapped, understand the scope of the achievements contained in this resolution.

• (2040)

[English]

I support this resolution for many reasons, but I must mention one which surely is on the minds of all members, be they in support of it or in opposition to it. I fear that should we fail now, should we abandon the momentum built up after years and years of debate and indecision, we may fail completely and forever.

We have the duty to rise to the occasion, to look behind the narrow and selfish pressures besetting this process and see to it once and for all that we sever our final colonial links and grasp firmly the promise and challenge of the future.

I must confess that I am alarmed by the tactics and arguments advanced in this debate by members of the Conservative party who even have the gall to compare our democracy with that of the U.S.S.R.

An hon. Member: The same bill of rights.

Mr. Chénier: In particular, I find it extremely distressing that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has demonstrated quite clearly that he is prepared to sacrifice the tremendous achievements in this resolution in order to preserve his own political future. It is the Leader of the Official Opposition who has been racing about the countryside telling Canadians that this Constitution will mean the end of Canada. The desperate words he has used in making his case would be alarming were they not so misguided and self-serving.

Let me quote from the speech of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition in this House two weeks ago. We must, of course, understand that the prospect of political mortality may have distracted rather than focused his thoughts. Nevertheless, what he said is on the record for all Canadians to see what the Leader of the Opposition feels about this resolution. He said:

The aftermath of the adoption of this resolution will have us looking around at the breaking of our federation and perhaps at the breaking of the nation itself.

It does not take too much interpretation to see that the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting that giving the provinces at long last a formal and essential role in amending our Constitution, which this resolution does will result in our country falling apart. I must say that if the Leader of the Opposition thinks Canada will come tumbling down because the provinces are at last formally involved in all future amendments to the Constitution, then indeed he has but scant faith in the integrity of Canada or the degree of commitment of the provincial governments to the concept of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chénier: The Leader of the Opposition says that we must try again and again to achieve the impossible.

Mr. Blenkarn: Why don't you try?

Mr. Chénier: He feels, in advancing his doctrine of naive and weakened federalism—

Mr. Blenkarn: You know, you might get an agreement.

Mr. Chénier: —that it is only because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does not give in to every demand of the premiers that we have failed to attain an agreement with the provinces on an amending formula.

An hon. Member: Thirty five per cent.

Mr. Chénier: He says it is the Prime Minister, and not the system, who is to blame for the 54 years of impasse in obtaining patriation.

Mr. Blenkarn: It was certainly his for the last 12 years.

Mr. Chénier: He, not the Prime Minister—and I would surmise that the hon. member over there who loves to attack our native people in Canada is also an agent of divisiveness and disintegration—is prepared to see Canada—

Mr. Taylor: Aren't you a Canadian?

An hon. Member: Take your head out of the sand.

An hon. Member: Quebec will remember you.

Mr. Chénier: —become a land where, by crossing provincial boundaries, a person may lose or gain basic rights.

Mr. Blenkarn: That is absolute nonsense.

An hon. Member: Are you talking about yourself?

Mr. Chénier: I see some members on the other side must have imbibed Mr. Reagan's liquor tonight.

An hon. Member: Didn't the government supply that?

Mr. Chénier: As the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) points out quite perceptively, if it had been Donald Duck—

An hon. Member: Donald Duck?

Mr. Stollery: Why don't you shut up?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The parliamentary secretary has the floor.

Mr. Nielsen: He should be careful about what he says.

Mr. Chénier: If it had been Donald Duck proposing the resolution before us, there would not be the level of agitation from the ranks of the Tory opposition or the dissenting premiers.

I am confident that if we can skim off the froth of bitterness from the Tory position in this debate, we will see that they, too, see the great merit and worthiness of the task at hand. We heard some of their members mention that to the Young Conservatives two weeks ago. Others said it outside the House on a Friday evening, also about two weeks ago.

Mr. Nielsen: Groucho.

An hon. Member: Thirty five per cent.

Mr. Chénier: We know that they do support patriation and the charter of rights as well as the other provisions in the resolution. I do not believe their fears about this resolution are justly founded. They have taken a position that is impossible to reconcile with reality, but that is their problem and they will have to deal with it in the future.

An hon. Member: What did Pearson say?

Mr. Chénier: My only wish is that they could have put the interests of all Canadians ahead of their difficulties as a political party.

Mr. Taylor: Look who is talking about the west.

Mr. Chénier: I do not want to dwell on the negativism of the opposition with regard to this resolution. I believe this is a time for celebration in Canada, not a time in which to incite divisiveness among our people. We have before this House a resolution which frees us from the enormous difficulties of determining our national will through the constitutional process and makes great strides toward creating a Canada which proudly states its belief in the integrity of the individual.

If we look beyond the criticism of the opposition and examine with fairness what is really being undertaken here, I believe all Canadians will agree that we are strengthening and preserving the Canadian tradition of mutual understanding and co-operation, not tearing this country asunder as the opposition would have us believe.

Mr. Taylor: I am a Canadian. I do not agree.

An hon. Member: Who says you are a Canadian?

An hon. Member: Everybody from Alberta is a Canadian. Don't you know that?

Mr. Chénier: Let me elaborate briefly on the provisions in this resolution.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, all Canadians went through a very traumatic period last spring when the forces of federalism regrouped to fight against those who would divide us and to reaffirm the national will. We also recall that the provincial premiers each in turn visited Quebec to tell Quebecers that their future is more secure within Canada. All provincial premiers and the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada made a commitment to renew federalism through a genuinely Canadian constitution. That is a promise we are about to honour.

This resolution will enable Canada to discard an archaic and steeped-in-colonialism process with a view to amending its constitution. As a result Quebec will be protected by a right of veto in the amending formula against any encroachment upon its rights as a people made unique by their language and their culture. I will point out that the Progressive Conservatives who pose as the champions of Quebec would take that protection away from this unique province——As well, the west, the maritimes and Ontario will be able to block any intrusion seen as not in its best interests through the use of a veto. When the population of the provinces in the west, of British Columbia or Alberta, is great enough, they will have the same power.

[English]

Mr. Taylor: Under that Constitution, we would still be in the same position. There is a veto power on everything. You had better read the Constitution.

Mr. Chénier: The integrity of each region is protected by this resolution, and one must admit it would only be the most bizarre and unusual circumstance in which the jurisdiction of the provinces might be threatened by the provisions in this Constitution.

The proposed amending formula would ensure that in the future no central government would be permitted to intrude in areas of provincial jurisdiction. Moreover, should there arise a matter of compelling national interest which may affect the provinces, a referendum obliging a double majority vote would ensure that no central government could act without the proper sanction of the people of Canada.

● (2050)

As for equalization, I am sure all hon. members agree that Canada is a nation built on sharing among individuals and among the so-called have and have-not provinces. This Constitution will ensure that this tradition remains.

The provision of mobility right guarantees is again at the core of the concept of Canada as a nation of diverse regions but of people of kindred spirits. Canada was built by Canadians able to travel throughout the country to seek work. I think of northern Ontario where people from all over the land came to seek work in the mines or forests. What kind of Canada would it have been if workers from the maritimes or Quebec had been turned away because they were not residents of Ontario? I find it troubling that the European Common Market has fewer barriers to the mobility of workers than there are in Canada. Surely we must protect the right to live and work anywhere in Canada before this principle is further eroded.

Mr. Taylor: We have it right now.

Mr. Chénier: It is sad to hear the hon. member say we have it right now because it does not exist in all provinces.

I come now to the charter of rights and freedoms. I have no hesitation in stating that this Parliament, through the efforts of all parties, has succeeded in producing a statement of rights and freedoms unmatched by any in the world. The charter reflects the values and duties of a modern society which recognizes the essential dignity and equality of all human beings. It is a charter that is far more just symbolic because the protections extended will indeed require action by the legislatures and courts in order to catch up with the principles Canadians share. This charter has the dual purpose of correcting long-standing injustices as well as establishing new standards for our treatment of special groups of Canadians, such as the handicapped and disabled whose situation has been articulated publicly only in recent years.

This charter puts our rights as citizens and human beings beyond the reach of any future capricious government, be it federal or provincial. That is important because we know that statutes or rights, such as the federal or provincial bills of rights, are not immune to legislative action and have been overridden in numerous cases. Clearly if we mean business in the matter of rights and freedoms we must state so unequivocally.

In addition, this charter would ensure that the protection of basic rights applies uniformly right across Canada.

Mr. Blenkarn: Like property rights.

Mr. Chénier: I really cannot understand why some provinces would want the right to tamper with what is probably the next best thing to an ideal statement of rights. What other reason is there than to reserve for the provincial legislatures the power to invade those rights at some time in the future? If changes need to be made to this charter, the amending formula will provide the instrument to make those changes, and they will apply to all Canadians.

I am sure that once the dust has settled and the wrangling over procedure we have experienced here has been put behind us, the entrenchment of this charter of rights in our own Canadian Constitution will stand as a magnificent achievement by Canadians. This charter was indeed created by Canadians, including the people on the joint committee and the hundreds of groups and individuals who submitted evidence. To say that the British Parliament will be imposing measures on Canadians is clearly one of the sillier arguments of the opposition, and they have some really silly ones.

I must say that while I am very proud that we are to have such a charter of rights, I am somewhat disturbed that the generous feelings in this document have not been met in other quarters by the same response. I would like to spend just a few moments on this area.

Mr. Blenkarn: Tell us about property rights.

Mr. Chénier: The poor hon. member has his mind stuck on property rights tonight. He seems to have a problem with it.

Mr. Blenkarn: Do you not think anyone has the right to property?

An hon. Member: Quiet, it's past curfew time at the city pound.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Chénier: During the public hearings, Mr. Speaker, there was a tremendous openness of mind and heart and one group after another as well as one individual after another expressed not only their tolerance but also their understanding of the unique character of our country. Their testimony will be the basis of the Canada Act. The vast majority of those who appeared before the committee expressed support for sections 16 to 23 on official languages, language of communication with the federal government and certain provincial governments, and I repeat, certain provincial governments, language of instruction, and language to be used in court proceedings and in government documents.

At least 12 groups and individuals, besides the ACFO and the FFHQ, spoke of language and strongly suggested that Section 133 of the BNA Act be extended to Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, the Council of Quebec Minorities, the Canadian Federation of Municipalities, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Italian-Canadian National Congress, among others, and also, of course, the Commissioner of Official Languages have one by one argued that Ontario should grant its French speaking minority the language rights it has been asking for for so long.

I am both saddened and disappointed by the fact that Ontario does not officially recognize bilingualism in the province. It seems to me that now is the right time, and I find it unfortunate that Ontario has not yet reached the maturity that Canada in general has demonstrated since the Official Languages Act was enacted.

Mr. Speaker, it has been over 100 years now that language rights for French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians in Quebec and Manitoba were entrenched in the British North America Act. After 114 years, the new Canada Act will confirm that status quo in terms of languages, and will guarantee new equal linguistic rights to the citizens of New Brunswick. That is all! After so many years of evolution and progress, the most important francophone minority outside Quebec, the Ontario francophones, will still not have managed to see their rights protected.

I am disappointed, Mr. Speaker, with the attitude of the government of my province. Still, I accept that the federal government should not impose official bilingualism on that province: that is not part of our government's approach. Despite my deeply felt disappointment, I fail to understand the lack of popular support for our efforts and those of national and provincial groups who have pleaded the case for a bilingual Ontario.

In my riding, for instance, 43 per cent of the people are French speaking and live in large numbers in seven main communities. Still, representations were made to me only once in favour of enshrining the linguistic rights of our minority, and even in that instance the representations were almost anonymous in that they were just signed "a group of concerned citizens."

That lack of enthusiasm saddens me, Mr. Speaker, because there can be no better time for claiming our rights. Even now, it is not too late to do so; otherwise, the francophone minority of the riding of Timmins-Chapleau will have missed a unique and historical occasion of ensuring that the rights of their children are protected.

We must not forget that once these rights are entrenched in a truly Canadian Constitution, no new provincial government can take them away from us. In my opinion, popular support for a bilingual Ontario has still to be assessed. The results of the poll which appeared on February 28 in the Toronto Star showed that at least 52 per cent of the people in Ontario would accept institutional bilingualism in my province. Premier Davis and his Conservative supporters therefore have no longer any reason to hide behind the argument that such a policy is not agreeable to a majority of the voters.

I believe that we, the members of the francophone minority who are scattered throughout Ontario, will find it hard to live with our lack of pride if we do not make an effort in the next few weeks to urge the Ontario population to indicate to Mr. Davis the urgent need to entrench once and for all our linguistic rights in the new Canadian Constitution. I invite my colleagues—

• (2100)

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question; perhaps after his speech?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the parliamentary secretary accept a question?

Mr. Chénier: I would like to complete my speech, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

I invite my colleagues the hon. members from Ontario, whatever their party, to show Premier Davis their support for our rights. It seems that Mr. Davis is the one who needs to be convinced. We were told for many months last year how useful it was to have Conservative governments in every province. This now seems less useful when we need the help of the members opposite.

We are running out of time and there is lobbying to be done, no longer by national groups or Quebec members—they have shown us their generosity and I thank them for their efforts—but it is now up to us, the citizens of Ontario, to tell the Premier of our province, our provincial representatives and all the candidates in the provincial election, the Canadian government——and above all we must convince the English majority in Ontario that our language rights in Ontario must be guaranteed in our new Canadian Constitution.

[English]

An hon. Member: Why not put an amendment?

Mr. Chénier: It seems that the hon. member who has the floor over there, Mr. Speaker, does not understand what I am saying. I am asking the province of Ontario to take the lead. Ontario's citizens must be convinced that such French-language guarantees in health and legal services, in education, in our own school boards and other services dispensed by the province of Ontario will take nothing away from the English majority. On the contrary, it will affirm the same rights enjoyed by the English minority in Quebec for more than a century. Where is the justice there? Above all, it will demonstrate once again the maturity of our country and of our province in respect of an understanding and appreciation of our cultural and linguistic differences, although we are of the north.

There is one thing which still amazes me when we talk of rights and guarantees. I notice every day the struggle of some local groups in my constituency who to this day feel that such things as official languages and language rights do not apply outside this chamber or outside the law books. For example, a community college board has been arguing for months whether to approve and display the French name of the college along with the English one in order to attract more of the 43 per cent French population it should serve. To this day the matter is not resolved because members of the board have not understood that such decisions should be spontaneous, and not deliberated to death, to express immediate understanding and acceptance of our important French-speaking minority, and that minority in my riding, I repeat, amounts to 43 per cent.

[Translation]

It is not too late for this minority to speak out. Acadians did so collectively in New Brunswick and Premier Hatfield has served them well. The rights of Acadians will be entrenched in our new Constitution. There is still time to rally public opinion in favour of a bilingual Ontario. I shall continue to speak of this noble and historic resolution proposal to various groups in my constituency. I urge all Ontario members to do the same. Let us shake public opinion! With the mandate of our constituents, we shall then be able to tell the Ontario premier, whoever he may be, that the Ontario people want to ensure that the new Canadian Constitution will guarantee once and for all the linguistic rights of the francophone minority.

[English]

In conclusion, I should like to say that Canada will be a better place as a result of this resolution. We will have our own Constitution with an amending formula which respects the principles of federalism without entrenching paralysis, a formula which respects the special needs of Quebec as well as protecting the interests of the other regions. We will enjoy the protection of an entrenched charter of rights which will enable any Canadian to seek justice through the transient prevailing attitudes of the legislatures. I would reiterate that this charter applies equally to both federal and provincial legislatures. This charter in all its beauty takes the custody of our basic rights and freedoms out of the hands of government, which have shown in the past they are capable of legislating in a discriminatory manner, and places that trust with independent courts.

This is a vibrant time in our history, a time of great debate on the future viability of our nation. I firmly believe the provisions of this resolution go a long way toward resolving the many inherent problems of a federal system such as ours. Rather than divide us, I believe that, once the storm of debate has passed, Canada will emerge as a paragon of democracy and, above all, a free and completely independent nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chénier) would entertain a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the parliamentary secretary wish to accept a question?

Mr. Chénier: Mr. Speaker, I would rather have other speakers address the House.

Mr. Nielsen: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chénier) would accept a question from me in the eight minutes of his remaining time?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to accept a question?

Mr. Chénier: I would repeat what I said before, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I first want to take this opportunity as a member of this House to welcome President Reagan to Canada today. I, like most Canadians, am distressed at the lack of courtesy displayed by a very small minority in front of the assembly today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: We have a very serious topic before us and I expected to speak seriously tonight. On May 9 of last year I moved a motion to effectively patriate the Canadian Constitution with or without the unanimous consent of the provinces because I felt it was legally possible, and was fully supported by precedents. In my opinion, patriation is the one great final step toward the evolution of a national cohesiveness.

I know the process being followed is producing division, but the nation can stomach considerable stress and strain, and it is constantly proving this. It proved it last May 20. This is a durable nation.

On the passage of that resolution I said:

Mr. Speaker, every member in this House has been humbled today by the passage of a motion stating that the Parliament of Canada submit an address to Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth, that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a bill to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kingdom to provide for the amendment in Canada of the Constitution of Canada.

Then I said:

Parliament must pursue this objective with haste. This is the beginning of a dream that so many of us have cherished for so long; a dream to make this nation whole, to give this nation a distinctiveness, a wholesomeness, a Canadianism that is our own, and sovereignty as a nation and as a people.

● (2110)

Let us hope and let us pray that this process which has begun here today will not falter and fail. Let us all be determined that we shall succeed in patriating our Constitution with provincial unanimous agreements, but without, if necessary, for the Parliament of Canada can patriate the Constitution with a built-in formula of unanimity for the subsequent amendment of the Constitution in Canada. The question is, has Parliament got the will to do it?

Let us also be determined that we shall succeed in adopting a less rigid formula for amendment so that we can preserve what is good in our Constitution and yet change with some ease what needs changing to keep pace with the evolution of the Canadian identity and the Canadian reality.

That is what I said last May 9. While discussing that motion, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the two House leaders of the opposition said that we should first consult with the provinces and discuss patriation and the amending formula, and we have. We were all party to those deliberations on national television last September, each of us has his own version of the villains and heroes of the drama. I watched the drama on television and recorded it. Three dominant themes emerged from that conference. The first was that politics, rather than statesmanship, prevailed; the second was that massive growth of provincial governments and their extensive involvement in their economies and redistribution of wealth was pervasive, and all provinces wanted to protect, enhance and extend such involvement, and I was a member of a cabinet which, for seven years, extended this area of involvement dramatically.

The third theme was that honest differences existed over the concept of the Canadian federation. Some saw the nation as moving steadily towards increasing isolation and separation of Canada's two linguistic solitudes; whereas others saw the nation moving increasingly toward the intermingling of these two solitudes.

Mr. Speaker, the conference was doomed to failure and it has failed. The national government subsequently reacted and brought forth a package addressed to the Queen to patriate the Constitution and entrench a charter of rights and freedoms. It is a complex package and has been subjected to the intense public hearing process of the joint committee on the Constitution. Our party sponsored 22 amendments, of which seven were accepted. We have been constructive in committee, from my point of view, the hearings were a remarkable process of participatory democracy in Canada. Indeed, they were probably unique in that regard in length and involvement, and all who participated are to be congratulated.

The nature of our constitutional process today is that the federal Parliament can make any address it wishes to the British Parliament for amendment of the BNA Act. We are the only country in the world with such a process. Nothing in the Constitution or in law compels the federal Parliament to consult with or get agreement of any or all provinces, irrespective of some well-known principles. The British Parliament makes the final decision, and thus far has not refused any request by the Canadian Parliament. Indeed, as things now stand, the British Parliament could attempt to unilaterally change the BNA Act, but such a suggestion is preposterous.

What has been suggested is the possible refusal by the British parliament of a request from this Parliament for patriation and/or amendment, and such a proposition is also preposterous. It would also be tantamount to unilateral action by the British Parliament in dealing with the Canadian Constitution, and I think such action is unthinkable.

I am satisfied that the rights and powers of the Canadian Parliament to patriate are part of that umbrella of powers given to it by the very process of confederation itself. We, of course, all know that since 1907, and particularly since 1930, a principle or convention has gained increasing recognition and acceptance, the principle that the Canadian government will not request a constitutional amendment of the British parliament when such amendment directly affects federal-provincial relationships without prior consultation and agreement with the provinces. However, such a convention is not entrenched, is not a right, it is in doubt, and one court has now ruled against its existence. This we must change at the earliest opportunity.

The veto rights of provinces over constitutional amendments must be codified in the Constitution at the earliest opportunity, and I say now, before divisiveness in this country is allowed to increase. We have a dangerous amending formula which must be changed or regional fractiousness will reach new heights. So, in my view, we must patriate now and entrench the veto rights of the provinces alone or in combination.

Any amending formula is an improvement over the unilateral formula now in place. I have, therefore, taken a stand but it has been consistent. In a recent letter to the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) and all members of the Progressive Conservative caucus, I stated I am a Canadian before being a partisan politician. I have often been emotionally moved when speaking about human rights of minority peoples, including my own ancestors, who experienced the shame and anger of discrimination. How, then, am I to vote on this parliamentary resolution to entrench a charter of rights and freedoms and patriate the Constitution from Great Britain? How will each of us as parliamentarians, men and women of conscience, vote? Shall we be guided by the principles and content of the resolution or by the process? Each of us must make our own decision, and we must put people before party, country before province and conscience before convenience when making that decision.

An hon. Member: Bravo, bravo!

Mr. Yurko: My party has chosen to base its collective decision on process. Most of my colleagues have rejected unilateral action by the federal Parliament in both patriation and entrenchment of rights.

I do not agree with most of my colleagues, and have stated so publicly and honestly. I am in agreement with Premier Davis and Premier Hatfield and all their supporters, Conservatives in Canada.

I have chosen to base my decision to support the resolution on the principles and content of the resolution rather than the process. In doing so, and in announcing that decision, I have received much correspondence. Canadians wrote to me. For every letter against my position, I received no less than three upholding it. What did these letters say? Well, those who supported me stated, first, the time to patriate was now so that we could then go about building a nation. Second, they said that unanimous agreement by all the provinces was improbable and illusionary. Third, the entrenchment of basic human rights was mandatory, and fourth, they expressed a real concern for the continued unity of this nation.

Those against my position fell into three categories. First, a genuine concern over provincial disagreement with the process and different provincial constitutional status and the lack of a reference to God; second, a genuine hate for the Prime Minister, particularly because of his past record; third, raw ugly bigotry against the French fact in Canada and its further entrenchment and extension. Most of the letters in the third category were not signed.

In the positive letters, the concern for continued national cohesiveness or unity was pervasive. This wonderful, emotional and moving concern for the country reminded me of why I entered politics in 1968 after working for almost seven years in the United States. In 1968, I made my first speech in a constituency which was contested by a skinny fellow, the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski) who won the nomination. Therefore, I reverted to provincial politics. I said in that speech:

> The very foundations of our nation are quivering. Unstable because of the lack of a common Canadianism. We live in a land divided—divided by geography—divided by origin—divided by wealth—divided by beliefs and divided by desires.
> There is growing in our land a fungus—a fungus called "separatism". We have two varieties—an eastern kind and a western kind. Each of us must recognize that this fungus must be eradicated from the face of our nation. We all sense this need for servitude under only one flag—with only one anthem—to recognize only one "Canadianism". A "Canadianism" which is broad enough and flexible enough to embrace all our cultures, and more than one language if necessary, all our beliefs and all our hopes. A "Canadianism" which will result in a nation of power. A powerful nationalism which will be a moving force in the international community. To the development of this type of "Canadianism" I will dedicate my efforts if elected.

For 13 years I have pursued and will continue to pursue the commitment I gave on my first attempt at political nomination.

The concern for national unity, for a national cohesiveness, and for the evolution of a Canadian brotherhood is as keen today as it was 13 years ago.

We all witness in our country bickering over wealth, over power, over prestige, over preservation and over prominence. The fungus of separatism has grown substantially during the last 13 years. We have had to deal with a serious attempt, through a democratic referendum, at separation called "sovereignty-association". Canada won that round, thanks to the work of many, including many from this House. Why have we not been able to deal effectively with the problems of the nation as they evolve and intensify? I maintain it is because our Constitution resides in another country and we have not yet found the way to change it step by step when it needs amendment to meet the reality of a growing complex society which is increasingly becoming interdependent.

We have continued to bicker and quarrel and seldom agree as a quasi-federation of ten provinces with a central national Parliament. The Canadian Constitution must be patriated now; it is timely. Further delay will only increase national divisiveness and turmoil. Perhaps much of the fault for increasing divisiveness can be directly attributed to the failure of this national Parliament and the enormous growth of provincial governments since the war. This resolution cannot fail; it must succeed.

There has been much fractiousness in this House. I was not used to such fractiousness in the other assembly in which I served for ten years. Questionable accusations abound in this place, yet we set ourselves up as an example for the nation, as the moulders and builders of a country. What an example to be broadcast daily across our land! Partisan political gamesmanship in this House is pervasive, constricting and an anathema to both statesmanship and national evolution. This is true on all sides.

The discord and fractiousness between regions, between provinces and Parliament is no more and no less than a reflection of the discord in this place. We have not yet found a common cause, a common direction, or a common destiny as a nation. We are not even a nation in law because our Constitution still resides in another country, but we have become a nation in spirit, the spirit of universal brotherhood where peoples from virtually every land in the world can live, work, play, fraternize and worship separately, yet together. It is that exciting spiritual realization that stimulates us and makes us tremble with anticipation. It is that excitement which has been captured in the content of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms embodied in the resolution before this House.

We as a civilized society have suddenly and collectively recognized that fundamental human rights exist and are inalienable. As a nation and as a people, we wish to enshrine them now in our most fundamental law, our Constitution; enshrined in our Constitution as a symbol of our brotherhood and forever as a restraining hand against collectivized discriminatory action, particularly those of governments in our pluralistic society. These rights are not given by government. They are recognized to exist, so we enshrine them here. That is a great leap toward freedom.

It is governments which set the tone of discrimination as evidenced by many examples, such as discrimination against Japanese peoples during the Second World War and restriction of peoples with Austrian-Hungarian passports during the first great war, many of whom were my ancestors who came to this country 20 years before that time.

Therefore, I support fully and with great exhilaration the entrenchment of a charter of rights and freedoms in the Canadian Constitution. The argument that somehow it is colonial or inappropriate to ask for and effect such entrenchment in the British parliament, when we have effected some 21 amendments using a similar process, does not overwhelm me. I—and I am sure most Canadians—would be honoured to have Britain do it for us. I would think it would be an act of great honour and privilege for British parliamentarians. What finer final gift could Britain give the Canadian pluralistic society than the entrenchment of such a charter!

In my view it would cement for all time a friendship, a kinship, a bond, between mother country and its offspring which has grown to manhood. What greater final gift could we Canadians receive from Britain, that wonderful society where parliamentary democracy was incubated and blossomed, that gave the world a true understanding of collective and individual freedom!

The British Parliament would be acting without precedent and committing irreparable harm to Canadian-British relations if it attempted to resist, or delay, or modify, or reject the entrenchment of the charter of rights and freedoms before patriation of the Canadian Constitution. Such action would result in a form of Commonwealth impeachment and would downgrade the lofty esteem of the monarchy, particularly so in the eyes of the ethnic community. I, for one, would regret it immensely.

The people of Canada, through the hearings of the joint parliamentary committee, through past massive petitions and through the electoral process, have demonstrated positively that they want fundamental rights entrenched in the Constitution, irrespective of what some provincial premiers contend.

• (2130)

All ten premiers on two occasions, in 1977 and 1978, unanimously agreed to extend bilingual educational rights to all provinces where numbers so warrant. Therefore, such agreement supports entrenchment in the Constitution. I want to say that six of the premiers at those conferences were Progressive Conservatives.

The extension of duality promotes and enhances our diversity. Oneness would accelerate homogenization and rapidly destroy our diversity, as it has with our neighbour to the south. The melting pot process would prevail with oneness. Multiculturalism lives because duality is alive. It is duality which promotes and enhances our diversity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: Bilingualism kindles the desire for, and extension of, multiculturalism. It is the very essence of bilingualism and multiculturalism which provides diversity and gives us an exciting national fabric that makes for a new nationhood, even though some ferment must be endured. The very technology which has propelled the English language to the forefront in world commerce, communication and near-universality, is now giving way to a new universal language. It is the language of electrons and optics, a language which at the push of a button can instantly translate signals into any and all languages and thus preserve, enhance and propagate many languages and cultures. Technology which began as a mass homogenizing process of languages and cultures has now become the salvation of all languages and cultures. Canada being so advanced in technology is the very first world nation which is using and will, use technology to create a multilingual and multicultural society. It is unity and diversity in practice that we are witnessing in Canada at this very time.

The charter is not perfect, but it is a significant step forward, matching the action of all other federations formed since 1867. I would like to have included in the preamble a reference to God and family and the worth of the individual. However, I am distressed over accusations in the debate in regard to the inclusion of a reference to God in the Constitution. My belief in God is secure; it does not need to be enshrined in secular documents. It is now enshrined in the greatest of all constitutions—the Good Book. I wholeheartedly accept its inclusion in the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights and I would be delighted to see God enshrined in the preamble to the Constitution. What distresses me is the postulate that somehow we on this side are somehow more godly than members on the other side of the House, or that they are more godly than we, or that one person here in his or her judgment is somehow more godly than someone else in this House. Time will bring forth a constitutional preamble and God will be in it, if He so wills it to be.

I would also like to see the right to own property in the resolution. But this will come eventually with provincial consent. To force it into the Constitution now over provincial objections would be a massive interference into provincial powers and it would surely provide the provinces with sufficient additional ammunition to perhaps defeat the resolution in Britain. It would certainly enhance their case. If anything, the resolution should have in it a provincial property ownership opting-in clause for provinces. In 1972, we essentially enacted the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights containing the right to own property into the first law of Alberta. I can vouch for the fact that our experience has shown that it is not overly difficult to live with it on the provincial level. The British parliamentarians would break faith with the people of Canada if they tampered with this parliamentary resolution from the Canadian Parliament.

Let me now deal more specifically with patriation and the process contained in the resolution for evolving a final amending formula in Canada.

Could you tell me how much time I have left, Mr. Speaker?

An hon. Member: Fifteen minutes.

Mr. Yurko: Let me state that our PC caucus has laboured under the partial illusion that the Vancouver amending formula was agreed to last September by all the premiers and by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) speaking for the federal government. I wrote to all the premiers in Canada, since I was a member of a provincial government for so long. The Ontario minister of intergovernmental affairs wrote me a letter which has become quite famous. He ended with this statement:

> In sum, our discussions held out the potential for consensus but it was not achieved in fact. The explanation lies not in the ill of any of the participants but in defects inherent in the formula itself.

One premier who does not support the patriation resolution also replied to my letter. He said:

> There is no question in my mind that there was a considerable consensus in favour of the Vancouver formula by officials, ministers and first ministers. You will recall at the September first ministers' meeting seven premiers specifically stated they supported the Vancouver consensus, while two indicated a willingness to consider it seriously. Quebec, which has traditionally maintained the position that there should be no decision on an amending formula until discussion on the division of powers is completed was willing to consider this subject.

Perhaps the provinces could agree on the Vancouver formula and offer it as an alternative to the Victoria formula for the people to decide, as is possible in this resolution. Nevertheless, patriation now with the Vancouver formula is unilateral patriation, regardless of how one looks at the matter at this time. Furthermore, the Vancouver formula is, in my estimation, structurally unsound and would soon destroy this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: Patriation must be done with the unanimity formula in place, as was stated in the resolution which was passed on May 9. Such a procedure is contained in the resolution for a term of two years.

Let us now briefly examine the referendum clause in the resolution and the legitimacy of the warnings of the dire consequences predicted as a result of this amending procedure. Our leader, Premier Blakeney, the four breakaway NDP members, other premiers and many caucus members see the referendum as an insidious destruction of federalism. In my estimation, this is exaggeration of the wildest sort, to predict such a result from the use of the referendum clause. But how much of a constitutional fixation is the referendum procedure? It is a way of bypassing the provinces, as some say, but then is that not what the procedure for constitutional amendment is today, according to the Manitoba Court of Appeal? If all the premiers see it as a threat, then they are surely in favour of revising it; and would not revision take place just as soon as a national Progressive Conservative government is elected? If this resolution is so divisive and the people are massively against it, would not the national PC Party, my party, win the next election in a landslide and change this part of the Constitution with the unanimous consent of the provinces? Of course we would. We would change it before it was even used for the first time.

The lament that the use of a peoples' referenda on constitutional change may—and it is a vastly exaggerated may—change the very nature of our federation is a spurious argument. I believe that the use of a peoples' referenda, initiated by the people of Canada or by federal authority, to be appropriate and desirable as an instrument of constitutional change in the Canadian federation. Indeed, I believe that the peoples' referendum tool is not only a needed process for breaking federal-provincial log-jams, but it should be a fundamental right of the people of Canada. I believe that the umbrella, or sovereignty cap, over the Canadian federation, which has many parts similar to the declaratory powers, peace, order and good government provisions, and which is now being shared between the British parliament and the Canadian Parliament, with a common monarchy, should not be totally transferred to the Canadian Parliament and the provinces on patriation. It should be shared by the Canadian Parliament and the provinces with the Canadian people through a process other than the electoral process. That is why I believe it necessary for the Canadian people to have the means to initiate constitutional change directly rather than acting only as a referee to break log-jams. That is why I included a peoples' referendum clause in the resolutions I introduced in both the Thirty-first and Thirty-second Parliaments.

But such referenda must be used with great caution and great wisdom—and not often—so the rules of implementation and acceptance of the results must of necessity be laid down in a non-partisan way by a non-partisan process. Reasonable amendments have been made to the resolution in this regard, but we could go even further.

The process in the resolution for patriation and evolving a Canadian amending formula is simple: first, the amended Constitution is patriated with the unanimous consent formula in place; second, a two-year period during which the unanimous consent formula will apply and a search for a less restrictive formula will go on; third, the provinces will establish their alternative to the federal formula if they can reach agreement; and fourth, a national referendum to choose between the federal option, which is the Victoria formula, and the provincial option.

In regard to this process for evolving a permanent amending formula in Canada, surely the provinces in two years can meet almost continuously to evolve a provincial alternative to the federal option which is the Victoria formula which, in 1971, did receive the unanimous approval of all ten provincial governments. Indeed, if I was a leader of any provincial government in this nation, I would appoint a minister for full-time duty on this alone for two years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: The least that can be done by the province is to evolve some meaningful amendments or alterations to the Victoria formulae. The Victoria formula is a regional formula with four regional "veto" powers. It must be revised to give it a selected narrow provincial "veto" component and a national "veto" component. The provincial veto component must be the protection of provincial resource ownership and boundary integrity in accordance with an amendment I proposed, which was as follows:

No constitutional amendment affecting changes to the resource ownership rights of any province or provinces, or changes to the physical boundaries of any province or provinces shall become law unless such changes have been approved by the legislative assemblies of the province or provinces specifically affected.

The smaller provinces simply cannot be held to ransom in this regard by powerful regional partners. They must have some protection in the most narrow of areas, which is the protection of their very areas and the resources they own.

The national veto component should be that any combination of provinces having 25 per cent of the population of Canada shall have a veto on a constitutional amendment. Not only those that had reached 25 per cent of the population of Canada but any combination of provinces having 25 per cent of the population should have a veto.

Stated positively, any constitutional amendment must have the approval of provinces whose population is equal to or greater than 75 per cent of the total Canadian population. This is perhaps the appropriate way to overcome the Victoria formula limitations on a rapidly growing west. Otherwise, the west could have over 50 per cent of the population of Canada in a couple of decades and still have only one veto.

I expect that amendments similar to these will be the bargaining position of the federal government and the provinces during the two-year period after patriation. Such changes add to the possible veto of the eight smaller provinces but do not take anything away from Ontario and Quebec regional veto powers in the Victoria formula.

Let me say in conclusion that once we were a community of communities, a nation in which each individual community was almost a self-contained entity. I remember this well because the culture and language of a community of people was not really threatened except by the autocratic dictates of the provincial school board. I remember well when Foster Hewitt and his Saturday night broadcast penetrated our communities. This was followed by an explosion of technological encroachment: transportation, television, electricity, gas, and so forth. The communities soon lost their identities to integration, interdependence and homogenization. In less than 50 years, Canada moved from a community of communities to a highly integrated, highly interdependent, regional structure. Some provinces were natural regions and therefore undertook regional responsibilities. Other provinces were too small and too sparsely populated to become regions unto themselves, and so they had to be interlinked with other provinces for rational growth and identification and progress. In fact, in some cases, the very essence of provincial status became questionable. In other cases, the very physical size of provinces suggested new regional identification.

The very nature of the political freedom we enjoy as a result of confederation prevented needed integration of some provincial entities. In the growing west, historical grouping of provinces prevented some realignment of regions. The accelerated pace of growth and settlement of the west and north will cause future regional re-definition.

Canada has become literally five regions within which provincial entities increasingly inhibit growth and evolution rather than enhancing it. But the future of Canadian nationalism will not be restricted for too long by this inhibiting process. Rationalization will be forced by technological integration. Constitutional accord or discord based upon regional well-being and regional aspirations is inevitable and therefore forms the very basis of the amending formula being proposed as the federal option, though it needs improvement.

This nation, Canada, will increasingly evolve, and its interdependence will increasingly grow as a co-operative quasi-economic and social federation of five natural regions. Within these regions, provinces shall co-operate and compete, shall integrate transportation and energy and other systems and shall evolve somewhat different and unique social and cultural systems. And over-all, all these regions shall form the umbrella of a reorganized national Parliament.

I have almost finished, Mr. Speaker.

The relationship of the national umbrella and the regional well-being, aspirations and growth will be dynamic, changing and challenging. This, then, is, and will continue to be, the essence of Canada.

Patriation of the Constitution and the entrenchment of a Charter of Rights and Freedom is a giant leap, and a mandatory one, toward this vision of Canada, a vision which is destined and pre-ordained and beyond the simplistic rationalization of most of us.

Patriation of Canada's Constitution is the decisive stepping stone toward eradicating the fungus of Canadian separatism—both the eastern and western varieties. We are the most fortunate of all peoples on earth. We have been given a legacy by our pioneering parents, grandparents and great grandparents, which is unmatchable. Let us build on this legacy. Let us not fail them and break this country apart for, if we do, they shall not sleep, and neither will we.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure and honour for me to take part in this debate. It is perhaps one of the most important debates in our history. It could quite conceivably change our lives and our way of living. It is a very important debate indeed.

There is no question that as this debate on the Constitution progresses, and as it becomes more complex, there is a danger of losing sight of the major issues in this see-saw battle, with its myriad of recriminations from all sides of the House. Regardless of the changes that may be made in the constitutional document, and whatever may be included therein, it will not be worth a pinch of salt unless there is a desire and a will, not only on the part of the federal and provincial governments, but among all Canadians in all regions and provinces of Canada, to co-operate and together make the Constitution work.

● (2150)

As it now stands, Mr. Speaker, I cannot see this working unless the federal government relaxes its unilateral stand, starts bending a little, giving a little and not being inflexible in its deliberations on the Constitution resolution.

The government is saying that some of the changes it has undertaken in the Constitution are mandatory in order to keep faith with the people of Quebec and to keep Quebec in Canada after Quebec's positive referendum last May, not to secede from Canada, but to remain an intractable part of our great federation. But, Mr. Speaker, if the government is keeping faith with the people of Quebec, as it insists, surely it should have the support in this endeavour of at least one provincial party in that province for its constitutional proposals. But the fact remains, Mr. Speaker, not one provincial party in Quebec is backing the government.

Canadians all across our great land, Mr. Speaker, look upon the Constitution with worry and apprehension, because they know and understand that the constitutional resolution was not one that found birth through good faith and that it was not conceived through a reasonable level of consent by the provincial governments and the people of Canada.

With the government acting in a unilateral way, and acting contrary to the prevailing wishes of most of the provinces and adopting measures very much contrary to the wishes of the majority of the Canadian people, a constitution, illegitimately conceived as this one has been conceived, will carry no weight and literally will not be worth the paper it is written on.

Others before me in this debate, Mr. Speaker, have mentioned the constitutions of other countries like the U.S.S.R and the United States, which theoretically and in glowing terms, guarantee the rights and privileges of their citizens, but these same constitutions have faltered in several instances when the practicality of enforcing such rights was called upon, as was so eloquently expressed by a number of colleagues who spoke before me in this debate.

A constitution and bill of rights, Mr. Speaker, should serve to unite a nation and its people and to articulate its ideals—ideals, that are a vested interest and have input from a majority of its citizens.

Once a level of agreement has been reached on its terms, then and only then will it have the credibility and constant support and approval that is needed.

The only way, Mr. Speaker, that I can perceive this government's action regarding the Constitution—as it has been also perceived by an ever-increasing number of Liberal senators in the other place—is that it is both unconstitutional and mischievous. I believe the only sensible action the government can take in the national interest, is to meet again with our provincial counterparts with a view to at least reducing the package to simple patriation with an amending formula made-in-Canada by Canadians and to working a consensus approach that will be amicable and agreeable to most Canadians.

It is my firm belief, Mr. Speaker, that if the constitutional crisis reaches Westminster, then to have our Constitution amended in Britain, surely is one way of reducing Canada to colonial status.

I believe that Canada is a mature country, inhabited by mature, well-thinking citizens, who, I believe deplore, as I deplore and regard as unthinkable, the idea that we should condescend to have another country do the work that is Canadian. It is our duty and responsibility to change our own Constitution; we must not shirk that duty and responsibility and ask another country to do the work for us. If such a responsibility is shirked, Mr. Speaker, and not acted upon, then surely the supreme sacrifice paid by fellow Canadians in two world conflicts and the Korean War to keep Canada free and democratic and to gain its independence as a sovereign nation, was all for naught.

If we are truly free and sovereign, Mr. Speaker, then let us take our responsibility firmly and settle our constitutional problems here in Canada by Canadians for Canadians. Somehow, Mr. Speaker, considering all the other national problems in our country, I strongly suspect a very false sense of urgency in the action of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of trying to push through his constitutional package.

It reminds one of the similar false sense of urgency one finds in matters undertaken by people who try to push through a deal that would not meet the test of honesty, the scrutiny and thoroughness of investigation which would bring to light glaring pitfalls and perils that perhaps would not be apparent from a hasty examination of documents.

A constitution, Mr. Speaker, is the most important document in any sovereign country. It not only must have wide acceptance by its citizens, but before that happens, every detail and working part of that constitution must be thoroughly gone over, dissected, redissected and improved upon in order to gain the acquiescence, respect and confidence of its citizenry.

I feel quite strongly, and many Canadians feel just as stongly, Mr. Speaker, that Canada has no need of a patriated Constitution at this time. I do not believe that most Canadians have ever felt or expressed such a need. I believe that for the last 114 years, the BNA Act has served us well. It has provided Canadians with what it promises—peace, order and, on most occasions, good government.

As Canadians we are free to do what we choose. The fact that our Constitution rests in Britain is a matter that can be attended when the right time comes. The right time, of course, will be when the great majority of Canadians agree on how patriation should be achieved. According to the last poll, Mr.

Speaker, Canadians are not in favour of patriating the Constitution under the terms unilaterally set by the federal government.

The government has been saying all along that it is acting in response to urgent public demand. This is no longer the case; the opposite is true.

Canadians realize that there are other pressing problems of a higher priority that they are anxious to have resolved before patriation of the Constitution is even considered.

I say with respect, Mr. Speaker, that it is unfortunate that our Prime Minister wants a patriated Constitution as his monument before he steps down. It has been said that he will do anything to go down in history as a father of his country and, as others have said, will even put his country "through the boredom, conflict and agony of this incredible constitutional season."

I believe today, Mr. Speaker, that the national priorities for positive action that should be taken by governments and all of us in this House are to try to solve such issues as high unemployment, two-digit inflation and downward economy. Above anything else, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe we have a constitutional crisis in our country, as some would wish us to think.

There is no question that we do have a crisis, Mr. Speaker, but what it is is an economic and unemployment crisis that has been literally swept under the carpet, out of sight and out of mind, in the hope that somehow it will all go away. It would be wonderful, Mr. Speaker, if things were as easy as all that.

We all know that this wishful thinking has resulted in little or no concrete action being taken on these national concerns which are causing, Mr. Speaker, not only a national crisis, but family crises, family breakups, inflationary prices and a continuing lower standard of living for all Canadians.

These are the real crises, Mr. Speaker. These are the crises with which we should be dealing and to which we should be giving our undivided attention in an effort to solve them. We should not be sidetracked by fake constitutional crises that will not put one slice of bread on the table, that will not build one affordable house for Canadian families lacking in suitable accommodation, and that will not put clothes on the backs of Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mitges: May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

Adjournment Debate

MARINE TRANSPORT—WITHDRAWAL OF DART CONTAINERLINE SERVICE FROM HALIFAX—ROLE OF PRESIDENT OF CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I am here this evening to pursue a little further the disastrous result of non-intervention by the present federal government with respect to the move of Dart Containerline from the port of Halifax to the port of Montreal. My colleague, the hon. member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby), and I have raised this matter in the House on a number of occasions over the last ten days since the announcement of the move was sprung upon us. They are concerns which flow from factual data about this very serious move on the part of Dart for, after all, Dart accounts for approximately 30 per cent of the traffic volume through the port of Halifax going up river to Montreal. Earlier today, the Premier of Nova Scotia, Mr. Buchanan, and his minister of development, Mr. Thornhill, met with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). The reports from that meeting are somewhat optimistic from the point of view that the minister has now indicated he is prepared to examine the impact of subsidies on river ports and the inequity which might arise from that respecting the ports of Halifax and Saint John. That, at least, is a step in the right direction.

What is required, what I am asking of the government, is for a full-scale inquiry in two parts. One part should be undertaken within the ambit of the Canadian Transport Commission having to do with rates, rate charges, the growth in rate charges and the justification for rate increases in recent years by Canadian National. The second part should be undertaken by the government itself because it is a matter of policy and has to do with the full investigation and revelation of the dollars and cents being spent in the principal ports on the St. Lawrence River versus the dollars and cents being spent in the development of the two principal east coast ports.

The purpose of that inquiry will be to determine whether inequity is built in by reason of government policy in these areas. Having said that, and recognizing the difficulty of the minister with direct intervention in precluding the right of private enterprise to decide where it will operate from and under what circumstances, it seems to me there is still, notwithstanding the optimistic notes from this afternoon's meeting, every reason to believe this move and its disastrous effect on the port of Halifax-Dartmouth can be, if not completely avoided, at least alleviated. I am hopeful that is the case. I am hopeful that a positive tone from the Minister of Transport will have that result. Failure to have that result will be worse than the impact on the port of Halifax, not on the opening of the seaway alone, but of taking advantage of the opening of the seaway by government to effect year-round transportation into the port of Montreal, which took away the very active winter season for the ports of Saint John and Halifax. If we fail in this, some horse trading can be done. In this connection I shall list some things for the benefit of the parliamentary secretary, who is kind enough to be here this evening, and expand on this very serious question.

The least that can be done is that a full CTC hearing be held, including a comparative analysis of the inequities which may be built in and arising out of freight rates or deliberate government policy on the one hand by the CTC and on the other hand by a commission set up by government. The minister has this authority, and he has a moral obligation to direct CN to give the type of assurance that we do not have at this time, that in fact the move by Dart is not caused directly by the rate structure or by undue delay in moving containers from the port of Halifax to the port of Montreal.

Is the fact that it takes seven, eight, nine, or ten days to move a container at the root of the difficulty? The minister can direct Canadian National to lower its rates by one-third. Indeed, some have suggested it can lower them by 50 per cent of the current rate charged for containers and still realize a profit. Mr. Neeling is one authority for that. There are many others. Second, it should guarantee five day or even three-day delivery on containers from Halifax to Montreal. Third, it should divest itself of its interests in Cast.

Three or four years ago I appeared as an affected person, and as a Member of Parliament, the first to do so in the history of that august regulatory agency, arguing that CN should not invest in Cast. Of course, I was laughed at. We now see the serious consequences that could flow from that conflict of interest.

Fourth, it should direct CNR to offer to the government of the province of Nova Scotia or another party its shares in Halterm to remove any doubt or suspicion of a conflict of interest by the national railway. The federal government can offer to repay the province of Nova Scotia its investment in the second container pier and its investment in Halterm. It should order or assist in an inquiry into this and ascertain from the railway, CP and Dart, that the reason for moving is that it is no longer economical to operate there. It should determine the answer to that question once and for all.

I see my time has just about run out. I ask the parliamentary secretary to convey to the minister and his colleagues in cabinet the importance of moving at the earliest possible opportunity on the oceans industries park. That might help fill the economic gap. I would appreciate whatever comments the parliamentary secretary can make on this very serious matter.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for this opportunity to bring the House fully up to date on this matter. The minister met yesterday with Dr. Bandeen, and today with Premier Buchanan, Mr. Thornhill, his minister of development, and the mayors of Halifax and Dartmouth.

First of all, it should be made clear that CN was not a party to the discussions between Dart and Canadian Pacific which led to the move by Dart. The discussions were on a private commercial basis, and since CN was not aware of their content, Dr. Bandeen could not have informed the minister before the public announcement was made.

During yesterday's meeting, Dr. Bandeen assured the minister of CN's continued commitment to the port of Halifax. As the House knows, CN helped pioneer container traffic in Halifax over a decade ago, and remains a partner in the Halterm container facility. In fact, CN intends to do some aggressive marketing to ensure a satisfactory level of business at the terminal, and to replace its lost rail traffic. Ceres, the operator of the new container terminal at Fairview Cove, remains optimistic for the future of the port.

With regard to rail freight rates, Dart has stated that these were not a factor in the decision to move from Halifax. Certainly there have been substantial increases in the last decade, about 172 per cent in the rate from Halifax to Montreal. But compared with an increase in the rate from Montreal to Toronto of about 200 per cent, and an increase in the consumer price index of 216 per cent over the same period, the increases do not seem excessive. Dr. Bandeen told the minister that he is prepared to go to Halifax and discuss CN's plans for the port with Premier Buchanan.

The benefit Montreal receives from ice-breaking services has also been raised. It is difficult to allocate ice-breaking costs because of other purposes, such as flood control which ice-breaking serves. But even if the estimated cost of $17 million is allocated solely to commercial tonnage in the four winter months at Montreal, the cost per ton is only $1.60. Nonetheless, the minister has indicated he is prepared to look at the issue of cost recovery for ice-breaking services.

In spite of Dart's decision, which was based on purely commercial considerations, the government and Canadian National remain fully committed to the port of Halifax and are convinced it has a major role to play in the Canadian ports system. I wish to tell the hon. member that I will bring his recommendations to the minister for consideration and possible implementation.

THE ENVIRONMENT—GARRISON DIVERSION PROJECT—SUGGESTED TOPIC FOR DISCUSSION BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND U.S. PRESIDENT REAGAN

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to speak further on a question I had the opportunity to place before the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last Thursday concerning the Garrison diversion project in North Dakota.

The effects of that project are well known, not only in Manitoba but here in the chamber and I do not wish to proceed into some of the problems and concerns we have in Manitoba about that project. It is a very large irrigational and recreational scheme designed to provide irrigational and recreational water in North Dakota.

In the process, there is a distinct possibility, if the project is completed, that the diversion will transfer water from the Missouri basin to the Hudson Bay basin. That water then will flow into the Souris River, the Assiniboine River and, therefore, into the Red River and then into Manitoba's lake system causing very severe damage to Manitoba in terms of the quality of the water and the fishing industry there.

This project has been under way for some ten years. Each year there seems to be an additional allocation of funds to it by the United States government. With each additional allocation of funds, the project becomes closer to completion. As this occurs, there is the added possibility that the total project will in fact be completed. When that happens, we in Manitoba will suffer very severe consequences.

We have the provincial government of Manitoba involved. It has sent notes of protest to United States officials. We have had local officials involved in the person of the mayor of Portage La Prairie, and we have had local groups formed in Manitoba to travel to North Dakota to let the Americans know about our concerns. I might add that there is a considerable amount of opposition to the project in North Dakota because this project will cause some detrimental effects in the United States.

What concerns me is that either the federal government is not doing what I think it can or should be doing or, if in fact it is representing our interests to the Americans the way it should, it is not letting us know.

There is a considerable amount of public opinion in terms of concern about the Garrison project, a concern which is increasing day by day. I should like to quote briefly from three newspaper articles which have appeared since the beginning of the year. Before doing so I should like to say that I raised this very issue on January 13 following a question I asked in this House on November 19. I received what I consider to be a very favourable reply from the parliamentary secretary. I very much appreciated that reply and sent a clipping of my remarks on the topic along with that reply to a local station in Portage La Prairie. I might also add that I felt I received a very favourable reply from the Prime Minister last Thursday. In the meantime, the project proceeds.

On January 15 the Brandon Sun ran an article which said:

In Bismarck Thursday Mr. Olson said the Garrison water diversion project must proceed on schedule until claims that it would ruin Manitoba's fishing industry are proven.

Mr. Olson is the governor of North Dakota.

That leads us to some very serious consequences in terms of the attitude of the governor of North Dakota. We realize that if the project is further advanced and we do in fact receive polluted water and some foreign fish species and fish diseases, it will be too late to turn the tap off or turn the waters back. Once the fish come, they will be with our water systems in Manitoba literally forever.

On January 23 the Winnipeg Free Press ran an editorial which said, again speaking of Governor Olson of North Dakota:

The more serious of the governor's charges, from the Canadian point of view, is his perception that there has not been a Canadian objection to the diversion that could be classified as "official".

• (2215)

I think this is not entirely true and I do know that Manitoba has sent official protests. I took the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at his word when he said he was going to raise it with President Reagan on his visit here today. I think there has been some official protest raised, but the perception is that they have not been official enough for the governor of North Dakota to recognize.

The article goes on to read, again referring to Governor Olson when he suggested that:

Manitoba should be willing to accept the damage to its water represented by Garrison in return for permission to build hydro lines across North Dakota so that Manitoba power can be sold to Nebraska.

Clearly this is unacceptable to Manitoba because what they are suggesting, if in fact the governor speaks for his area, is that there be some kind of linkage in terms of allowing Manitoba hydro to be transferred across the northern United States, that that be linked with Manitoba accepting a certain amount of water damage as a result of the Garrison diversion project.

As recently as March 5, there was an article in The Globe and Mail which read in part:

Last Dec. 1, U.S. officials sent a note to Ottawa proposing that consultations on the project begin on March 2. The date passed this week without a response from Ottawa, but Canadian officials said yesterday that they plan to agree to begin consultations soon.

This again is very disturbing to us because we have seen a change of administration across the line. They have a new secretary of the interior, and it appears the present government has not seen fit to be in contact with this new administration. So I would urge the parliamentary secretary tonight—and I congratulate him for seconding the motion, which received unanimous consent in the House last Thursday and I know he is concerned about it—to take this matter very seriously because we do not have much time left to stop construction of those parts of the dam that are going to cause irreparable damage to Manitoba.

I would hope, if the parliamentary secretary is not going to accept some of the proposals we have made in terms of what we think the government should be doing, that the government would be prepared to announce some initiatives to convey the kind of message that we think needs to go to the Americans concerning the Garrison River diversion project.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the government is seriously concerned about the potential adverse effects of the Garrison diversion project on Canada and has, as promised on numerous occasions, made these concerns clear to the new United States administration. In fact, this very day, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and President Reagan will have had an opportunity to discuss the issue. The concern of the government was evidenced by our support of the recent motion under Standing Order 43, expressing the strong concern of this House that important funding decisions on the Garrison project were being made prior to discussions between the Prime Minister and President Reagan on this issue.

We have welcomed and appreciated past United States assurances that U.S. obligations under the boundary waters treaty will be honoured, and we trust that these will be reiterated by President Reagan while he is here. Nonetheless, we cannot but be concerned by the authorization of new funds, no matter how small, for a plan that has not been modified in any way to take into account Canadian views or the conclusions and recommendations of the IJC.

The government agrees with the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) that every additional expenditure adds impetus to completion of the project. This is a viewpoint which we have expressed to the United States on a number of occasions, pointing out that Canada considers that any new construction on the Garrison project, in the absence of significant project redesign, would appear to be leading inexorably toward completion of features that would ultimately result in violation of the boundary waters treaty.

● (2220)

The government continues to take every opportunity to reiterate its viewpoint to U.S. authorities. As we informed the hon. member for Portage-Marquette on another occasion, the suggestion that a delegation representing all parties in the House go to Washington to emphasize to the U.S. Congress the united position of all Canadian political parties on this issue is a possibility which the government is seriously considering. We appreciate the willingness of members of the House to act in support of the government's efforts, and we recognize the value of a joint approach. The government considers, however, that any such approach would have to be carefully timed and geared to an appropriate specific occasion in order to have optimum impact.

Discussions are currently under way between the Department of External Affairs and the U.S. state department to set up consultations on this issue and to determine an appropriate and mutually acceptable agenda. The government still considers, as we have stated in the past, that government-to-government consultations offer the best potential for satisfactory resolution of this problem.

We would not hesitate, however, to call upon interested members of the House to form an all-party delegation to make Canadian concerns known to Congress, should the government determine that such a move would be a useful and effective means of pursuing Canadian interests.

FISHERIES—EFFECT OF TANKER TRAFFIC ON WEST COAST FISHERY

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on November 25, I raised the threat posed by increased tanker traffic on Canada's west coast. I questioned the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) about the stance of his department toward that threat. This evening, on the eve of President Reagan's address to the Canadian Parliament, I am pleased to have an opportunity to raise this important issue in connection with our relationship with the United States.

Everyone in British Columbia agrees that a super port in the Strait of Juan de Fuca threatens our fisheries, our beaches and our tourist industry. Time and again the government indicated its opposition to such a super port. But how effective has its opposition been?

To be effective, opposition to this super port must be based upon adequate information, and it must be backed up by political will. These are precisely the two areas in which the government is lacking. The government lacks adequate information and political will. While we know an oil spill will have disastrous consequences on our fisheries, we lack specific information on the way this would happen in specific cases.

Last fall, I prepared a submission to the National Energy Board in which I opposed the proposal of Trans Mountain Pipe Line to build a super port near Port Angeles, Washington. But as I went through the environmental studies included in the Trans Mountain submission, I found time and again the statement that adequate information was not available. We lack adequate data on which to base our opposition. It is for this reason that in the past I have asked both the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) to prepare independent studies on this subject. We would like to have the vast resources of our federal government brought to bear on this important question. We believe that our coast is under threat, and we would like some help to deal with it. We have not found that help forthcoming.

This brings me to my second point. The federal government's opposition to increased tanker traffic not only lacks an adequate information base, it lacks political will. British Columbia has seen many situations where the good wishes of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans have not been backed by the political will which ensures that the fisheries are protected.

● (2225)

Ladysmith Harbour, one of the finest shell and oyster producing areas in the province, is being destroyed by log storage and the use of toxic chemicals in local mills. The Cowichan estuary, in spite of Department of Fisheries promises, is being parcelled out and given over to increased industry, which will destroy this vital feeding ground for young salmon. The Chemainus estuary is being considered for dry land log storage.

This winter there will be a lifting of the moratorium on offshore drilling on the Pacific coast, which will open our coast to the possible kind of megadisasters which we have seen in the Gulf of Mexico. The government has clearly failed to protect fish habitat because it has lacked the political will—not because it lacked the knowledge, it knew what was happening, but it did not have the political will to do anything about it.

This spring the minister finally realized the crisis in the chinook salmon stock on the Pacific coast. These stocks have been declining over the past decade. In place of reasonable conservation measures introduced over a period of years, the government was afraid to look at the situation. When it finally realized that it had a crisis on its hands, the government announced drastic measures which hit the sports fishing industry twice as hard as reasonable measures would have done five years ago.

There is a lack of political will in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. When we look at our government, we see that there is a total lack of political will in terms of standing up to the United States. The United States cancelled the maritime fishing treaty and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) tries to look at that action in what he calls the best possible light, in a spirit of friendship. But when we are being pushed around by a bully in the guise of a friend, the best possible thing to do is to recognize what is happening and to stand up to it. In a letter to the Prime Minister I asked him if he would raise this issue with President Reagan. I hope that he will.

My question this evening is with respect to what the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, or what any other department of the government, is doing to make sure that we do not have this increased tanker traffic on our coast. What is the government doing to help us meet this threat?

Mr. George Henderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's concerns, it is, first of all, important to point out that this government is very well aware of the potential risks associated with the trans-shipment of hydrocarbons along our coastlines. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans, in particular, has consistently expressed concern about any proposals which would increase the volume of oil shipped along Canada's west coast.

Given this awareness on the part of the government, and in recognition of the need for an objective examination of Trans Mountain's proposal, the National Energy Board has just completed a comprehensive round of public hearings on the question, to which the hon. member has already referred.

In view of these quasi-judicial proceedings by the National Energy Board, I believe the House will appreciate that any statements I make in reply to the hon. member must be of a general nature. Ultimately, the National Energy Board will present its recommendations to cabinet for approval. For this reason it would be improper for the government, or any member of the Privy Council, to make public any strong opinion on the proposal now under consideration.

With respect to the statement contained in a publication of the Trans Mountain Pipe Line. Company, asserting that their proposal has attracted support from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, I can assure the House that the minister responsible for that department has at no time said that he supports the Trans Mountain proposal.

As part of his responsibilities under the federal Fisheries Act for fish habitat protection, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. LeBlanc) has requested and received copies of all plans relevant to the interests of fisheries from Trans Mountain Pipe Line. Departmental specialists are in the process of assessing the project with respect to the potential risk to the fisheries of the west coast and their conclusions will be made available to the company in due course.

I would point out to the hon. member that there are many complex aspects to the proposal submitted by Trans Mountain Pipe Line. The fact that it would increase the volume of oil shipments along the west coast in one that fishermen and the fishing industry continue to view with some apprehension. On the other hand, the company has included a so-called "hook-up" concept in its proposal. This concept would provide a pipeline hook-up to supply crude to Puget Sound refineries, thereby eliminating the need for tanker traffic deep into the sound among the Gulf Islands. This idea may have some merit and it must be carefully assessed before any final conclusions are made. The National Energy Board will be listening to the facts and opinions on all aspects of the proposal prior to making a recommendation to cabinet.

For legal reasons, it is not appropriate for any minister of the Crown to present testimony before the National Energy Board. Accordingly, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans has not presented a formal submission to the board.

Individual specialists from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans were subpoenaed by an intervenor, and they presented expert testimony in their own behalf as private citizens before the board. The public hearings commenced on November 25 in British Columbia; and I understand they came to a conclusion in Ottawa on March 6.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ADDRESS BY UNITED STATES PRESIDENT REAGAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, today the House was honoured by the visit of the President of the United States of America. So privileged were we by his presence and by the content of his speech that on four occasions members of the House of Commons, the Senate, the diplomatic corps, and distinguished Canadians present in this House and in the galleries, awarded the President standing ovations. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That those members of the New Democratic Party who were among those who sat defiantly with their arms folded in indignation at the presence of another head of state be censured for their deplorable and unacceptable behaviour.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

KU KLUX KLAN

REAFFIRMATION OF CONDEMNATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I hope we will shed any partisan considerations, as we did yesterday for the motion by my friend, the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville (Mr. Cossitt).

In view of the unfortunate incident yesterday at Don Mills Collegiate Institute in my constituency in which a member of the Ku Klux Klan was permitted to address a senior history class, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker), and supported also by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House reaffirms its condemnation of the Ku Klux Klan, as passed unanimously in this House on July 14 last on a motion by the hon. member for Boadview-Greenwood, urges all provincial departments of education and local school boards in Canada to take note of this condemnation, and reiterates its belief that the principle of freedom of speech does not give licence to preach hate against any racial minority group in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

YEAR OF THE DISABLED

SUGGESTED ACTION FOR INDUSTRIALISTS AND MANUFACTURERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I believe all parties can enthusiastically support this motion.

Whereas 1981 is the Year of the Disabled and throughout Canada a number of disabled citizens for various reasons require only one shoe or one glove but find it necessary to purchase a pair of shoes or gloves in order to satisfy their need, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart):

That this House urges the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to encourage Canada's shoe manufacturers and textile industries to make these goods available to Canada's handicapped people on a direct purchase basis so that they may purchase only one shoe or one glove.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ACID RAIN—CALL FOR REDUCTION BY UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that 50 per cent of the acid rain falling on Canada is from American sources, that some crop yield losses in southern Ontario as a result of acid rain are now approaching 10 per cent, and that the assessment of Dr. Leonard Hamilton of the Brookhaven Institute of New York is that 5,000 Canadians died last year as a result of acid rain, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong):

That this House calls unanimously upon the President of the United States to take necessary action to reduce the output of those American sources of acid rain which affect Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE MINISTRY

ACID RAIN PROTEST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the apparent instruction by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) to withdraw from participating with protesters during President Reagan's visit to Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone):

That this House agrees with the Prime Minister's action in directing the Minister of the Environment to remove himself from the acid rain protest, thereby avoiding the curious spectacle of the minister's advertising his own incompetence and ineffectiveness.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AGRICULTURE

HERD MAINTENANCE PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the confusion which still exists with respect to the herd maintenance program, to the extent that some recipients of the benefits of the program are now being asked to refund payments that they have received, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That the minister in charge and senior officials administering the program be required to appear before the Standing Committee on Agriculture to give an account of their actions and explain the reasons why the plan has become such a fiasco.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE CONSTITUTION

REQUEST THAT MEMBERS MAINTAIN QUALITY OF DEBATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 concerning an important matter.

Considering that Canadians had lost hope that the level of the constitutional debate would rise, and since the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) reassured us by voicing noble sentiments and solid arguments in his speech last evening, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Dion):

That all speakers in this constitutional debate draw inspiration from the speech of the hon. member for Edmonton East with a view to maintaining this significant debate at the high level it deserves.

GRAIN

COMPENSATION TO FARMERS FOR EMBARGO ON SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, over a year ago the federal government announced an embargo on grain sales to the Soviet Union. There was agreement that grain producers should not bear the cost of lost sales and, since the embargo has cost grain producers many millions of dollars in lower prices and lost sales, I move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the federal government immediately make compensation payments to grain farmers to compensate them for their loss of income as a result of the grain embargo.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LAW OF THE SEA

UNITED STATES DECISION TO REASSESS POSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, since the Canadian delegation to the United Nations Conference on the International Law of the Sea expected, as did the rest of the world, that this year would see the successful conclusion of the treaty on the Law of the Sea, a treaty that would provide security for all countries and which, in particular, would ensure that the future exploitation of the world's renewable and non-renewable resources would be carried out in order to protect the common heritage of all mankind and not simply to address powerful, private economic interests, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That this House deeply regrets the decision of the United States government to reassess its commitments at the United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, in particular its decision to review the fundamental concepts of the common heritage of mankind, since these decisions will delay indefinitely the conclusion of a meaningful treaty on the Law of the Sea and threaten to sanctify the triumph of private greed over public good.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROPERTY RIGHTS

LEGISLATIVE PROVISIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent importance. To my knowledge no political philosophy or party in this House advocates confiscation of private property without appropriate compensation and/or access to due process of law. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson):

That this House categorically reject any legislative initiative or policy direction by government which advocates or incorporates into the laws of parliament retroactive expropriation by government, or Crown corporations of government, of property deemed to be private property without due compensation and/or access to due process of law.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROTECTION AGAINST PERSONAL VIOLENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that crime in Canada is on the upswing, particularly in cases of rape and muggings, often resulting in severe beatings and death of victims who in most cases were not able to defend themselves against such vicious attacks, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart):

That the law of Canada be changed to make it legal for Canadians to be issued a permit to obtain Mace, a small cannister spray containing tear gas, to be legally carried and used for self-defence, and be used only under circumstances where a person feels his well-being is in jeopardy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for such a motion?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PIPELINES

ALASKA GAS PIPELINE—UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT COMMITMENT

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it concerns the Alaska highway natural gas pipeline. The minister will recall, as we all do, that in 1979 the builders of the American portion of the pipeline said that they would need government guarantees, in all probability, to build the U.S. portion. You will also remember, Madam Speaker, that his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, told Parliament on July 17, 1980, as reported in Hansard at page 3061:

What was important to obtain from the American government was that firm commitment that they would see to it that the pipeline would be built. Whether they do it by financial commitment, legislation, or other means, that is for the American government to decide. What is important is that we have that commitment.

Today in this House, President Reagan specifically referred to "completion of the project based on private money". In other words, no government guarantees.

Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell the House whether the Government of Canada has the unqualified commitment of the government of the United States that the pipeline will be built?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is as capable of interpreting the statements of the President of the United States as we are. We all heard what he said here this morning. What he told us, in addition to what was said here, is that the United States is just beginning to look at all of these policy problems, and their administration will be in a position to give fuller expressions of their views in several months.

NATURE OF UNITED STATES GUARANTEE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, some months ago we had guarantees. A little before that they were ironclad guarantees. Now we have, according to the words of the President of the United States uttered in this chamber not many hours ago, a very clear commitment that the Government of the United States would see this proceeding only by way of private money, in other words—without any question of interpretation—without government guarantee. Nothing could be clearer than that.

I presume the Government of Canada had discussed this matter at some length when it saw that the gaurantees which the minister of energy said existed did not exist. I presume the Government of Canada discussed this at some length. Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs answer my question? Does the Government of Canada today have a firm guarantee from the Government of the United States that the pipeline will be built? Yes or no? It is a simple question.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, my interpretation of the words of the President, which we all heard, is that we do have a firm guarantee. I believe there is no difference in the commitment, as he expressed it, from the commitment we have had. The U.S. administration is only at the beginning of a review of many aspects of its policy, and we will have fuller statements of U.S. policy, and the means which the United States intends to follow to achieve these, in the months to come.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, what is the nature of the firm guarantee?

Mr. Fulton: A handful of jelly beans.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, the other party seems to be having its own private joke over there.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): They are a joke.

Mr. MacGuigan: We heard the commitment which was given by the President here today that the United States would proceed with the pipeline, that it was a national objective for the United States.

Mr. Clark: Madam Speaker, what we heard was that the United States would proceed with private money. What the minister of energy has been saying was that the United States would give government guarantees. What he has been saying has now been denied by the President of the United States.

An hon. Member: Listen to the facts.

Mr. Clark: We would like to know what the position of the Government of Canada is.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS—STEPS TO RESOLVE DISAGREEMENTS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Let me ask a more general question then, since the minister seems to have difficulty with a specific question. If we can judge from the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs yesterday and from the tone of the remarks of the President of the United States earlier today, while there remain disagreements on some specific and important questions, there is a general willingness to resolve those disagreements which are outstanding between our two countries. Could the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us what specific steps have been put in place to ensure that we will be able to resolve the disagreement on the fishery question, to resolve the acid rain problem, the Garrison, the Skagit Valley and auto pact disagreements? What specific steps have been put in place?

An hon. Member: Get it in writing, Joe.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, it would take me a long time to outline the specific steps in each of these areas because there are different forums of consultation for which provision has been made with respect to many of those problems. In fact we did hear assurances and commitments from the President in a number of areas which have not previously been made by his administration. With respect to environmental problems, he undertook best efforts to clear up the water and air environment to our satisfaction. With respect to Garrison, he gave us a stronger undertaking that they would not proceed in any way which would imperil the quality of our waters.

FISHERIES

CONSERVATION OF STOCKS ON GEORGES BANK

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Secretary of State for External Affairs who will recall that in response to a question I put to him on Monday about the cancellation of the east coast fisheries treaty by the United States, he replied:

> It seems that American fisheries officials have not shown themselves capable of adequately protecting fish stocks. This is what troubles us more than any other single thing about the American decision.

Given that concern which the minister expressed about the American action, what specific conservation and management arrangements were arrived at during the past two days with the minister's American counterparts to see that the fisheries stocks on Georges Banks are not depleted in the near future? Was the authority of the Secretary of Commerce, for example, guaranteed, seeing that he has the authority to enforce fisheries management?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I had discussions on that matter of a fairly detailed nature with both Secretary Haig and Secretary Baldrige. I believe my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, also had discussions on the same matter with Secretary Baldrige. What the United States is undertaking at the present time is to place a management plan before the New England Fisheries Council and to use all of their efforts, both themselves and through Congress, to attempt to have that plan satisfactorily implemented on the east coast.

Miss MacDonald: I am sure the minister is aware that the Secretary of Commerce has the authority to enforce fisheries management. I asked whether that guarantee had been given during their discussions.

LAW OF THE SEA

RECONSIDERATION OF UNITED STATES POSITION

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I would like to raise another matter which I am sure was discussed during the past two days. It concerns the alarming news out of Washington that the President has dismissed his principal negotiators at the Law of the Sea conference and, indeed, has indicated that the United States wishes to reopen many areas of that very complex negotiation. Since this action by the United States conceivably threatens Canadian interests in its 200-mile economic zone, will the minister tell us what are the specific areas that the United States now wants to renegotiate, and what steps are the various ministers and the Canadian government as a whole taking to protect Canadian interests in this issue and to see that the Law of the Sea Conference is brought to a successful conclusion?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, although this is a multilateral and not a bilateral issue, Secretary Haig and I had quite an extensive discussion on it this morning. The American position is that at the present time they are not objecting to any part or any aspect of the proposed Law of the Sea convention nor to any aspects of the negotiations. They are in effect reserving their position on the whole matter to give their administration time to examine it, without any indications at this time what their final conclusion will be. The changeover in personnel which the hon. member referred to is indeed extensive, as often happens with American administrations where the changes go far beyond changes made here when there is a change of government. As a result of that, Secretary Haig will be starting tomorrow with meetings aimed at this very point to try to resolve their policy in the reasonably near future.

PIPELINES

ALASKA GAS PIPELINE—UNITED STATES POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs who has chosen to interpret vague language by the President of the United States to mean that the Alaska gas pipeline is going to be guaranteed. Is the minister aware that just a couple of hours ago, in an interview, the United States Secretary of State said that if private financing for the pipeline were not available that problem would have to be faced at the time? In light of that assertion, will the minister admit that not only is that not a guarantee, it is the opposite of a guarantee? It is no guarantee at all. He said the problem would have to be faced down the road.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I was sitting next to Secretary Haig when he was answering those questions. He was being asked about the way in which this commitment was going to be interpreted by the United States. As I understand it, he said he was not going to get into the various hypotheses that could occur as to whether or not private financing would be readily available. He certainly also assured us that the government would take whatever steps were necessary to make sure that any Congressional facilitation was taken, to the extent that that is under the control of the administration generally, to advance the agreement in every way possible.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, I also listened with care to what he had to say. He was saying that if any government regulation would seem to be interfering with private financing, if that was an inhibiting factor, then the U.S. administration would try to clear it up. That is, and again I repeat, anything but a guarantee of the project. In fact it turns it entirely back to the private sector.

In that connection, since President Carter a year ago refused to give guarantees to U.S. private financing—

An hon. Member: No, he didn't.

Mr. Broadbent: He refused to give public guarantees to private financing because the situation was very precarious at that time, and considering that at this very moment we are exporting less through pipelines in Canada to the U.S. than then was the case because the demand has been reduced, is there any reason the minister now has for believing the private sector will be any more interested today in raising the money for that project than it was a year ago?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, the way in which the money is raised is a matter for the American administration and for U.S. promoters. It is not a matter for us to decide. I understand the American position has always been that they intend to see that the pipeline is built by private funds, so I see no difference in statements now being made and statements which were made formerly.

RESULT OF UNITED STATES STANCE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the minister knows that in a letter produced a year ago President Carter did not in any sense guarantee the project, and the wording was very carefully crafted to avoid that commitment. Considering what the minister has just revealed in his answers to the Leader of the Official Opposition and myself, will he not agree that we will have a western portion of the pre-build completed in two months, a Canadian pipeline produced to export Canadian gas to U.S. markets, without any guarantee that the original purpose of the pipeline is to be implemented, namely, a pipeline designed to carry U.S. gas from the far north to U.S. markets? In short, has the minister not sold out completely on the issue?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, what I am saying is that I do not believe there is any difference in the kind of commitment given today by President Reagan and by Secretary Haig in our discussions and the previous commitment given by the United States administration.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—TALKS WITH UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Last year the Canadian deficit rose nearly $4 billion as a result of the obsolete U.S.-Canada Auto Pact. It is quite clear that the government has been totally ineffective since it returned to office over a year ago in its attempt to improve the situation. I would therefore ask the Prime Minister to inform this House what priorities this issue received in talks between himself and President Reagan this week and, more important, what immediate, positive developments in the Canadian auto industry can we expect as a result, keeping in mind the $4 billion deficit in this country, a deficit which is growing?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it seems to me that the two questions are linked, and I would answer by saying quite a high priority.

• (1430)

ENCOURAGEMENT OF CANADIAN PRODUCTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, since the Prime Minister does not want to reveal what his discussions with the President were, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on a related matter.

Last month the sale of imported cars rose by 30.4 per cent, as the minister knows. In 1980 alone the sale of Japanese imports rose by 151.3 per cent. In view of the fact that this party, along with the interest groups, has come up with some positive recommendations and suggestions for the minister to consider over the last year or so, only to have him issue press releases like this one, indicating over and over again, like a parrot, that more discussions and consultations must take place, I would like to ask the minister what immediate and specific action the government intends to take to ensure that Canada gets its fair share of both parts manufacturing and assembly of vehicles in the auto industry. We do not want any more rhetoric about—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Madam Speaker, we have taken concrete action in the past year to assure additional activity in auto parts and auto manufacturing generally in this country, which will mean the preservation and extension of thousands of jobs for workers, My hon. friend is so tied up with his own rhetoric that he keeps forgetting, or does not bother listening to the definite information I've been providing in this regard. We will be continuing our efforts in this manner, and part of those efforts will be working with the United States to take steps which will help bring about the return to health of the North American auto industry, with our particular focus being on the Canadian industry and the workers and communities connected with it.

THE ECONOMY

QUERY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT'S FISCAL STANCE

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, I would like to put my question to the Minister of Finance, whom we all noted in this House following in a very pensive way the speech of the President of the United States. He undoubtedly noticed that the President indicated great alarm at the size of the deficit in the United States and indicated that they were taking serious steps to correct that. Bearing in mind our deficit on a per capita basis is now projected at four times the deficit the Americans anticipate, and as a percentage of spending is five times as high as in the U.S., would the minister indicate whether he has taken any fresh look at his own figures to determine if what he set down last October is now satisfactory, bearing in mind how our continental partner is trying to put its fiscal position in a more responsible stance?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have listened carefully, perhaps pensively, as the hon. member says, to the words of the President, both in public and private, and I have had discussions with Secretary of the Treasury Regan and, as a result, I have absolutely no intention of changing the fiscal stance of the Canadian government.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, again I direct a question to the Minister of Finance who has indicated, I think very clearly, which end of the baby he prefers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Perhaps he could indicate to the House why he feels it is satisfactory to have roughly a 14 per cent per year spending increase in Canada, at a time when the United States is attempting to get its spending increases at the federal level down to 6 per cent. Would he at least tell us what significant insight he has that would indicate his 14 per cent is satisfactory, when clearly the Americans have seen the error of their ways and are going to get down to something that is looked upon as a more responsible, or to use the President's word, sensible level of 6 per cent?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, the hon. member will realize that the projected rate of growth for government expenditures in Canada for 1981-82 is 12.8 per cent, and the projection is to reduce that rate of growth until it reaches 10 per cent in 1983-84.

I believe that is a responsible and gradualistic approach which I have defended frequently in this House. I believe that if this government projected a rate of increase of expenditures for 1981-82, the results would be extremely disruptive and harmful to large segments of the Canadian population, and that is why I have opted for a gradualist approach in reducing the rate of growth in expenditures, in reducing the deficit and fiscal requirements.

The alternative, it seems to me, is to undertake the kind of disruption that I would not recommend either to my colleagues or to the House of Commons, nor would I attempt to defend it before the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC RESPECTING CONVERSION OF THE USE OF ELECTRICITY

Mr. Jean-Guy Dubois (Lotbinière): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In a document dated February 11 and entitled "Information, Corporation of Master Electricians of the Province of Quebec", mention is made of the proposed grants for converting to electricity, but there is a warning. It states that the practical application of the federal project should of course be compatible with the Quebec government energy policy. Besides that statement it is also reported that according to reliable sources the project will not be implemented before 1982. I would like to ask the minister if indeed that statement is true or, if not, whether he can say when the project will come on stream and what are the terms of the agreement with the Quebec government.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I must reaffirm to the House and the Quebec public that the program has been in force since October 28 last and that all conversions to natural gas will be eligible for the $800 grant announced in the budget. As for switching to electricity, I have had very recent discussions with my Quebec colleague and we expect to reach agreement in the coming days. Quebecers converting to electricity would also be eligible for a similar grant of at least $800 under the agreement, provided that the people who make the switch isolate their homes and also keep their old system, oil heating for instance, so they may in time switch to gas should gas become available. Bearing in mind those two conditions, Quebec government officials told me they would accept conversions to electricity.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

APPOINTMENTS TO FILL VACANCIES

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. As he well knows, the International Joint Commission has served as a valuable tool for the maintenance of good Canada-U.S. relations in boundary water pollution problems. Indeed, it was the IJC that lent weight to Canada's opposition to the Garrison diversion during the 1970s. Did the Prime Minister learn from his discussions in the last couple of days when the President intends to appoint the three American representatives to the commission, and could he tell us when his government intends to fill the two Canadian vacancies on the commission? I would remind him that the IJC cannot function until these positions are filled.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is correct, the IJC cannot function until it can sit with four members, which means there has to be at least one member on the other side and three on the first side. The prerequisite is failing in the United States, and we still have some vacancies on the Canadian side, too. We did discuss this matter, and we both indicated our intention to fill these positions very soon.

Mr. Sargeant: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the Prime Minister for that answer. Could he tell me now if, in his discussion with the President, he received any new assurances concerning future Garrison diversion construction? And further, could he tell us if the President simply reiterated the stand of former President Carter, or whether President Reagan proposes any new initiatives in this matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I would repeat what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said in an earlier answer, that the President gave unequivocal assurances that none of the money now allotted to that diversion would be spent in any way which could affect waters flowing into Canada. That is what we requested, and that is the firm commitment we received.

THE ENVIRONMENT

GARRISON DIVERSION PROJECT—PROTECTION OF CANADIAN INTERESTS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is in connection with the Garrison diversion. Since the minister indicated that further construction will not take place, presumably in the foreseeable future, until further negotiations take place between the two countries, can he indicate to the House what the government intends to do at the present time to ensure that Canada's interests in the Garrison question are protected?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, there was a United States note of December 1 which, I believe, is still considered operative by the new administration. Under that we are to have talks beginning later this month as to the details of Garrison. But I would correct the hon. member in one respect. The U.S. administration did not say that no works would take place, but that no works which would have any effect on Canada's interest would take place.

Mr. Murta: Madam Speaker, I suggest to the minister that that has been the position the American government has basically taken all along, that nothing will happen which will affect Canadian waters. Certainly from the point of view of Manitoba that kind of assurance is not good enough, because at some point the linkage will take place and water will flow north into the Manitoba water system.

I thought—and probably I will take this back—that there was some progress with the administration, but there does not seem to be any progress at the present time. Nevertheless, as we all know, Congress plays an important part in the general outcome of the decision. Is the minister now prepared to pick up on what the Prime Minister indicated last week, that he is ready to accept an all-party parliamentary delegation to Washington to lobby Congress on this very question, and to impress upon members of Congress the importance of this entire question to Manitoba and to Canada?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, I have an open mind on that and will certainly be pleased to conduct investigations into whether it would be a useful step at the present time. It might be useful, first, to begin these detailed discussions with U.S. government officials, which I believe will take place this month, before we make a final decision on an approach to Congressmen. But at some point that may well be a useful step to take.

ACID RAIN—CHANGES IN UNITED STATES POLLUTION CONTROLS

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment. As he will know, on the eve of President Reagan's visit to Ottawa this week the United States Environmental Protection Agency announced plans to weaken substantially pollution control standards for new and expanding industries in that country. Since such sweeping changes to the U.S. clean air act would drastically increase acid rain in Canada, will the minister indicate what steps the Government of Canada plans to take to oppose those changes?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, in a continuing way we are making representations to the United States government in relation to that problem. I will be visiting Washington at the end of this month to continue those representations.

Mr. McMillan: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. The Canada-United States memorandum of intent on acid rain signed last August committed both countries to enforce vigorously existing environmental regulations. Does the minister believe that the plan to weaken the U.S. clean air act signals to Canada that the new Reagan administration does not intend to honour the provisions of the memorandum of intent?

Mr. Roberts: No, Madam Speaker. In the discussions with American officials, and again today in this House as the President spoke to us, the desire of the United States to live by that memorandum was affirmed. We believe—and I was encouraged by his words—that the United States will maintain the progress we made with the previous administration toward an international accord on air quality standards. I have every reason to believe that the schedule which was laid out will be maintained.

NORTH-SOUTH RELATIONS

QUERY RESPECTING UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT COMMITMENTS

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The North-South dialogue between the developed and developing nations is deadlocked and needs a political push at the highest level for a breakthrough. This could occur at the anticipated North-South Summit in Mexico in June and at the scheduled economic summit in Ottawa in July. Did the government secure a commitment from the American government, during the visit of the past few days, that President Reagan will attend the Mexico North-South Summit and that it agrees that the North-South issue will be foremost on the agenda in Ottawa?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we did not seek commitments as such. We certainly raised all aspects of the North-South question with the United States. The American reaction, especially on participating in the Mexico Summit, tends to be rather positive at this stage.

Mr. Clark: Tends to.

Mr. MacGuigan: It would not be appropriate for us to negotiate that with them. Their official will be in Mexico City tomorrow to carry on discussions with the Mexicans on that point. I suspect they will be giving this matter full consideration in the very near future.

Mr. Roche: Madam Speaker, the minister did not make any mention of the importance of this issue in the economic summit which will be held in Ottawa.

WORLD BANK ENERGY PROPOSAL

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): In order to maintain our credentials in the advancement of the North-South issue, it is imperative that the Canadian government establish a new policy. Since energy is a critical issue for developing countries, is Canada prepared to back the new energy affiliate proposed by the World Bank? Is consideration being given to locating the energy affiliate of the World Bank in Canada, particularly in the province of Alberta?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we are one of the strongest supporters of the new energy affiliate, so I can assure the hon. member that we are doing everything we can in international discussions to advance the idea. Of course we would like nothing better than to provide Canada as a home for that institution if it gets off the ground. It is somewhat premature at the moment, when there is not widespread commitment to it, to discuss where it will be or what form it will take.

PIPELINES

ALASKA GAS PIPELINE—UNITED STATES FINANCING

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It follows an answer he gave to the hon. member for Oshawa. I should like to read one line from President Carter's approval of the Alaska pipeline in 1977. He wrote:

> The aforesaid producers of Alaska gas may not be equity members of the sponsoring consortium, have any voting power in the project, have any role in the management or operations of the project, have any continuing financial obligation in relation to debt guarantees associated with the project.

Unless this directive is changed, there cannot be any private financing. Would the minister indicate to the House whether he asked President Reagan if he is prepared to change this provision and, if so, when will it happen?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, we did not discuss any documents of that kind with the President of the United States. Indeed, the hon. member, who was well taught in law school several years ago, is as capable of interpreting that document as anyone else.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacGuigan: The discussion in this area was of a more general nature, but we were very heartened by the assurances we received.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I was not well taught; the minister was my professor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: The blind leading the blind.

Mr. Nielsen: That explains a lot.

QUERY RESPECTING UNITED STATES REACTION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to another professor, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On Friday the United States government withdrew a memorandum protesting our energy policies. In his speech this morning, the President eliminated a section of his text dealing with energy. In light of those two puzzling moves, would the minister of energy tell us whether President Reagan or any of his officials expressed reservations about Canadian energy policies and if so, would he tell us what were those reservations?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I noted no expression of reservation at the meetings I attended. Nonetheless, we agreed that in matters of mutual interest, including energy, we would carry on our conversations at the official level. Those conversations have been going on for quite a while. They will continue, but I have not noticed any expression of reservation.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment. It concerns the five-year cyclical meeting to be held in Paris this month by ministers responsible for science and technology in member countries of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. Can the minister explain to the House why it is that Canada's Minister of State for Science and Technology is not planning to attend this conference, particularly since the theme of the conference this year links science and technology to industrial strategy?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I would very much like to attend the conference. Unfortunately, there is a meeting of the executive committee of the Council of Environment Ministers, of which I am the chairman, being held at the same time in Regina. Therefore I must be at that particular place. My colleague, the Minister of Communications, will be representing the Canadian government at that important conference in Paris.

Mr. Huntington: Madam Speaker, since it is my understanding that communications is not to be a high priority issue at that conference, and in light of the fact that the conference is cyclical and held only once every five years, is the minister saying that his priorities are mixed because the government is not placing a high emphasis on this important area to Canada and Canadian industry? Will the minister advise the House if he will extend an invitation for observer status to a member of the official opposition?

Mr. Roberts: Madam Speaker, I do not agree with the assumptions in the hon. member's question. There will be many representatives from Canada there, including the chairman of the National Research Council, representatives of the National Science and Engineering Research Council and representatives of the Ministry of State for Science and Technology. We will be ably represented, not only at the official level but, as I indicated earlier, by the Minister of Communications.

The involvement of the Ministry of Communications on the scientific side is quite extensive. There is no doubt on my part that this is an important meeting and that we will be ably represented.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS—RATIFICATION OF TREATIES BY U.S. SENATE

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister, President Reagan, and a few others witnessed this morning the signing of two treaties by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and Secretary Haig, on behalf of the United States. My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the minister have any commitment that the U.S. Senate will ratify either one or both of those treaties?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think that even if the United States administration were to offer a commitment at this point that the Senate would do something, we would treat that with a certain degree of skepticism. Obviously, we could not have an assurance of that kind. All we have are assurances that the administration will do its best to secure that agreement.

With respect to the boundaries treaty, there have been soundings in the Senate which have indicated approval of that by the senators.

CANADIAN POLICY IN FUTURE NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question relates to a story which appeared in a number of Canadian papers dated February 5, out of New York by Associated Press. In that story the Secretary of State for External Affairs is quoted as indicating that in future negotiations with the United States on any treaties, Canada would first demand that the U.S. Senate adopt a resolution committing itself to ratification of the treaties. Is the minister now swallowing those words, or is he disputing the quotation? Or is the minister changing his policy? Just what is he doing?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I apologize if I misunderstood the hon. gentleman in the first instance. I guess I did not hear the first part of his question. I take it he was referring to the two treaties which were signed this morning. If that is his concern, our policy did not take effect for those treaties because they were already through the process at that stage.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacGuigan: I want to tell the hon. member, and other hon. members, that with respect to the prospective west coast fisheries treaty concerning tuna, we are seeking and requiring exactly that kind of assurance from the U.S. Senate.

FISHERIES

UNITED STATES POSITION WITH RESPECT TO EAST COAST SCALLOP FISHERIES MANAGEMENT

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. On Monday the minister assured the House that he would ask the Secretary of Commerce if he would be prepared to intervene, as he is permitted to do under American law, and put some pressure on the regional councils to restrict the increasing scallop fishery on the east coast. Did the minister raise that issue? Does he have some assurances—not the assurances that the Secretary of State for External Affairs gave us earlier in the day—and some firm commitment from the Secretary of Commerce that there will be a restriction on the scallop fishery to protect those stocks?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): In my conversations with Secretary Baldrige I made it clear that, independently of what had happened in relation to the fisheries treaty, the fact remains that the stocks which could be subject to arbitration are stocks which are not independently and fully in the interests of the United States or fully in the interests of Canada either. For that reason they cannot be considered to be national stocks.

I made the point that the requirements of conservation were overriding in this situation. I asked the Secretary to make sure that the management plan, which was discussed in the President's letter to Senator Percy, I believe it was, be put into effect. The Secretary undertook to have consultations with his own officials and with the regional councils and that our officials and his would be speaking in the days to come. I hope that we are able to effect a conservation plan which has nothing to do with, or is quite independent of, the other issues in this situation.

Mr. Miller: Madam Speaker, I do not think that we can really assure the Nova Scotia fishermen that there are really any guarantees that there will not be a continuing escalation of the fishing effort there.

NEGOTIATION OF WEST COAST TREATY

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): I would now like to ask the minister a question with respect to the west coast. I am not attempting to link one to the other, in terms of negotiations, but I think there is a linkage in terms of the attitude of the U.S. toward both the east coast and the west coast fisheries.

In view of the fact that many of the negotiating teams under the Carter administration have been dismissed by President Reagan, did the minister raise the issue of the west coast treaty? Will Dr. Lee Alverson, who is well respected and largely responsible for the progress with respect to that treaty, be retained as the American negotiator? Did the minister receive assurances that, indeed, those negotiations will lead to a fair and equitable treaty for the Canadian fishermen as well as the American fishermen?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, the issue of Dr. Alverson's mandate was not discussed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLICY RESPECTING SIGNING OF TREATIES WITH UNITED STATES

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, if I heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs correctly in response to the questions put by the hon. member for Durham-Northumberland, he just made a rather significant statement on policy. In response to the questions put by my colleague with respect to the process to be followed in treaty ratifications, the minister said that in that instance, if it were a new treaty, a guarantee that the U.S. Senate would approve it would be sought beforehand. That was the specific nature of the question and answer. If I heard the minister correctly, my understanding is that the policy of the government now when it enters into treaties of a general nature which require Senate approval, is that it will be requiring specific Senate approval before a treaty is signed. Would that be a correct interpretation of the policy of the government?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I do not intend to go so far today as to announce a new policy for all treaties with the United States. Certainly, our disposition at this point is that in a case where there is a question, because of the nature of the negotiations, that there might not be subsequent ratification by the Senate, to seek some kind of assurance from the senators in advance either in the form of a resolution, in the form of letters or in the form of direct assurances which are funnelled through the Secretary of State, to seek assurances from the U.S. Senate before the treaty is signed that it will be ratified by the Senate.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, that is a very interesting response. The minister uses the term "assurances" and previously he used the term "guarantee".

Where such treaties with countries other than the United States require some form of ratification by legislatures in those other countries, will it be the intention of this government to follow the same kind of policy as it intends to follow with the United States?

Mr. MacGuigan: Madam Speaker, there certainly is no problem of this kind with any other country, and we have no plans to apply such a test to other countries. Our problem is peculiarly with the Senate and, in particular, the foreign relations committee of the United States Senate.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton),—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46 and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, when I called it ten o'clock last night, I was talking about the real crises in our country, such as family crises, family break-ups, high unemployment, inflationary prices and a continued lower standard of living which all Canadians are experiencing today in Canada. We should not be sidetracked in our efforts to solve these crises by fake constitutional crises that will not put one slice of bread on the table, build one affordable house for Canadian families lacking suitable accommodation, or put clothes on the backs of Canadians. These are the real crises to which Canadians want us to address ourselves, not this fake constitutional crisis which we are being forced to railroad through.

The people of Canada elected us in good faith to represent their wishes and aspirations and to help Canada and Canadians grow and prosper. However, in my estimation the government has shirked its responsibilities and duties and has not lived up to its mandate.

Surely, the people of Canada deserve better than to have their desires and aspirations relegated to the bottom of the pile in priority by a government which is so imbued and obsessed with its own importance and with trying to make its mark in history that it does not want to be concerned about anything else but the Constitution.

I believe that when future generations look back to this particular time in our history, they will look back with amazement, incredulity and wonderment that so-called intelligent men and women were really responsible for such a fiasco, one which could have been very easily prevented by the use of common sense and good will instead of the use of deliberate confrontational tactics by the government in all its deliberations regarding not only the constitutional resolution but many other areas as well. Good will and common sense would have gone a long way toward resolving many of our national problems, achieving a better understanding and resolving our economic woes. It would have brought about a better understanding of the diverse cultures and traditions which make up our great country and far greater unity in our great country and its regions, from one end of Canada to the other.

Hopefully, when future generations do look back at us, they will look back more in pity than in disdain, although it will be hard for them to understand how their ancestors let such a fiasco get its start and get out of hand, progressing so far before the alarm finally went off. One thing about which I am certain is that it will make very interesting reading.

I could go into considerable detail regarding the many sections in the constitutional resolution with which I do not agree and which I believe should be changed. However, many of the changes which should be made in this resolution have already been emphasized quite well by numerous speakers who preceded me in this debate.

Having said that, I would be remiss in my duty as a member of Parliament representing all my constituents if I did not draw the government's attention to an area in the constitutional proposal pertaining to legal rights, a subject which is very close to my heart. I refer to section 7 which states:

> Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

As glowing as this section may sound, one aspect is missing. It does not in any way extend protection to the unborn foetus; the wording "Everyone has the right to life" pertains only to those who have been born and not to the unborn foetus. In other words, in the proposed Constitution a foetus is not legally recognized as a living person. This decision was handed down by the Supreme Court of Ontario, which defined life as beginning at birth. In essence, this could almost result in abortion on demand, which would increase quite substantially the present disgraceful abortion rate in Canada of 65,000 per year. The decision by the Supreme Court of Ontario could quite conceivably be concurred in by the Supreme Court of Canada, which would be an unspeakable disaster.

The people of Canada have replied, in numerous questionnaires, that the vast majority are against abortion on demand, but this is what we will have if the government does not act to change this section of the constitutional proposal to include, in unequivocal terms, the concession that a foetus is indeed a living person and should be protected in the same way and fashion as outlined for everyone else.

I believe that if the government enacts this change it will be giving a great service and will find itself in accord with a great percentage of the wishes and desires of the Canadian people who abhor the practice of abortion, as I and many of my colleagues in this House abhor it, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, I have no problem in classifying abortion as premeditated murder, unless the life of the mother is honestly at stake.

So I ask the government again, Mr. Speaker, to give thought to protecting the lives of those who are in no position to speak for themselves. Foetuses are human beings, Mr. Speaker. It is up to us to protect them. Let us protect them, Mr. Speaker, for all time guaranteeing their status and rights and by enshrining their recognition and rights in our Constitution. As fellow human beings, Mr. Speaker, they have the right to life, peace and happiness and the Constitution will guarantee their rights against any possible changes or contemplation of changes in the future.

I again implore this government—and I cannot emphasize this too strongly, Mr. Speaker—to show compassion and humanity and change this section of the proposed constitutional resolution. This will save thousands upon thousands of human lives which today, without thought and without regard, are being destroyed for ostensibly nonsensical reasons. This act is perpetrated by so-called medical therapeutic abortion committees which in most cases have shirked their responsibilities by taking the path of least resistance and have rubber-stamped their approval for abortion, which I firmly believe makes them accessories to murder.

If they have a conscience at all, Mr. Speaker, I believe they will regret to their dying days their part and role in the wholesale slaughter and murder which they initiate on a continuing basis as members of abortion committees in the great majority of our hospitals across Canada. If the government decides to exclude the unborn from the protection of the law, Mr. Speaker, and to entrench this exclusion in its charter of rights, then that is done in full knowledge of its abominable consequences. Let there be no doubt about it, Mr. Speaker; legalized abortion is in fact the legalized killing of human beings, even though these human beings have not been born.

It is no secret, Mr. Speaker, that the 1969 amendment to the Criminal Code which allows an abortion to take place for reason of mental health or where the life of the mother may be endangered has proved to be a failure. The therapeutic abortion committees set up to police this amendment, Mr. Speaker, rubber-stamp practically every case for abortion that comes before them, with the exception of pregnancies which are too far advanced.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, there are many doctors who resent the brazen killing of life by some of their colleagues and who have spoken out against this abominable practice. They should be greatly commended.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is a terrible travesty that, in spite of ten years of outcry and the killing of more than half a million unborn lives, the government up to now has proceeded to ensure that this process be made irreversible by incorporating it in the proposed Constitution. I am again asking the government, Mr. Speaker, to reconsider this terrible injustice and change the proposed Constitution to include fellow unborn humans so that they will have the same protection as other human beings.

I would like to quote from an article in the January 26, 1981, edition of the Western Catholic Reporter which reads as follows:

All people of any religion or non-religion should stop voting for any politician who condones legal abortions no matter what the party.

We do not vote for known crooks no matter how brilliant they may be.

We do not vote for those who condone legalizing violence against unborn life, no matter how many times they appear at church.

Still quoting the article, Mr. Speaker, it continues:

If you want to know which MPs accept legalized abortion, watch for the coming vote on the charter.

And as a final note of confirmation of the government's intentions, I will quote this piece of evidence from the same periodical:

Upon receipt of the text of Mr. Chrétien's amendments to the charter on his speech of January 12, the following note was found among the section by section explanations: Section 15.1 " 'everyone' is replaced by 'every individual' to make it clear that this right would apply only to natural persons"—

Thus the intention of the government is perfectly clear. It does not intend to do anything for foetuses, unless it does a complete change of heart.

I fervently hope, and many Canadians hope as well, this will indeed be the case, Mr. Speaker, that the government will have a complete change of heart and reverse its attitude regarding unborn human beings and guarantee their rights as well in the proposed Constitution.

Before concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to dwell for a moment on one other aspect of the proposed charter of human rights, or, to be more correct, on one aspect that is omitted from the charter of human rights, and that is, the ownership of property. The ownership of property is conspicuous by its absence from the charter.

This omission from the charter, Mr. Speaker, has resulted in a considerable amount of anguish, disbelief and anxiety among all segments of our population across our land. In many cases it took considerable hardship and hard work to assemble the required capital to buy property in the first place, and now people find that their ownership can be jeopardized and taken away from them in any number of ways, contrary to their own wishes and desires.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, not enshrining property rights in the proposed Constitution is a glaring omission, and the government must admit it is a serious error of judgment on their part to omit this very important right from the proposed charter of human rights. Such an omission, Mr. Speaker, will have serious consequences for a very large section of our population. Such an omission, Mr. Speaker, has to be rectified, and property rights must be included in the Constitution. To ignore this, Mr. Speaker, could be considered a direct affront and disservice to all the people of Canada.

If the government really believes in the democratic principle, it will know that it was elected to serve the people and not the other way around. That would be the undemocratic way, with the people subservient to the government. That is something which Canadians abhor and disdain and they will not tolerate it for long.

Mr. Mike Landers (Saint John): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this historical debate and to read into the record a letter I received from a constituent whose view of Canada is totally compatible with my personal view. The letter, dated May 16, 1980, reads as follows:

Dear Mike,

You may remember that we met several years ago before an election when you were touring the Ridgewood veterans wing of the Saint John regional hospital.

I am writing to you as my member of Parliament from Saint John, New Brunswick, in hopes that you will do everything in your power to expedite negotiations between the federal government, the other provinces and the province of Quebec as soon after the referendum is over as is possible. I am assuming that Mr. Claude Ryan's forces are going to be successful. And I feel very strongly as does my family that we not only want Quebec to stay in confederation, but we want them to know that they are as equal as any other Canadian in every way, shape and form. We want them to know that as a founding people of this nation that their culture and aspirations can be met and protected in our confederation of Canada. We want them to know that it enhances our culture and will make for a stronger Canada if their hopes and aspirations can be met within our union. There is no need for any bad feeling among anglophones and francophones. This country has plenty of room for us all to flourish in peace and prosperity.

I had the good fortune to study medicine at the University of Ottawa in the late 40s and early 50s—then to practice among the Acadians in Shediac, New Brunswick for five years. They are wonderful people and it is my hope that they will be able to develop in every way in a united Canada.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Mr. Ryan so he will know the feelings of the Creamer family of Saint John, New Brunswick. While we do not intend to sell our own English heritage short we do not intend to sit idly by and watch our French Canadian cousins lose all the things they hold dear.

Yours very truly,
(Dr.) Roy Creamer

What I would like to ask Dr. Creamer to do is keep writing.

Mr. Speaker, not all of my constituents are as fair and broadminded as Dr. Creamer. The worst comment—and when I say worst, I mean the slimiest comment I have heard since the introduction of the resolution on the Constitution in Parliament—was from a constituent who, to protect the narrow-minded and ignorant, shall remain anonymous. His comment was to the effect that anybody supporting the resolution was, "a French Canadian papist". The only reason that I would condescend to even repeat such a dastardly remark is to point out that there are some prominent New Brunswickers whose ancestors would be quite surprised to hear their descendants referred to as "French Canadian papists".

Three New Brunswickers who have given solid support to the resolution on the Constitution come to mind immediately. Imagine the look on the faces of the English protestant ancestors of Premier Richard Hatfield to hear him being referred to in the manner previously described. Imagine the look of astonishment on the faces of Gordon Fairweather's English Anglican ancestors, or the look on the faces of the British Anglican ancestors of the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. McCauley).

● (1520)

Turning to the substance of the resolution, a Canadian charter of rights and freedoms will guarantee that Canadians are entitled to the following rights and freedoms with respect to all matters of federal, provincial and territorial responsibility: fundamental freedoms, which include freedom of conscience and religion; freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of information, and freedom of peaceful assembly and of association.

With respect to democratic rights, which comprise the right to vote in the election of the members of the House of Commons and of a legislative assembly, the charter will include the right to stand for office in either of these institutions; the requirement that no House of Commons and no legislative assembly continue for longer than five years except in extraordinary circumstances; and the requirement that there be an annual sitting of Parliament and of each legislature.

With respect to mobility rights, the charter will enshrine the right of every Canadian to move freely from one province to another to establish a residence and to seek a job anywhere in Canada, as well as to enter, remain in or leave the country.

Regarding minority language educational rights, the charter will provide that citizens of the English-speaking or French-speaking minority of a province have the right to educate their children in that minority language, wherever numbers warrant.

Finally, respecting legal rights, the charter will include the right to life, liberty, and security; the right to equality before the law; protection against unlawful search or seizure, detention and imprisonment; protection against denial of counsel, undue delay of trial, and cruel or unusual treatment or punishment; and the right to the assistance of an interpreter. Also included are non-discrimination rights, which protect citizens from discrimination on the basis of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age or sex.

Hon. members may ask themselves why there is a need to entrench rights of Canadians in a Constitution? As a Canadian first, but as a Canadian of Irish Catholic descent, I am all too familiar with the British penal laws which reduced Irish Catholics to chattel status without human rights. Under these penal laws, no Catholic was permitted to own land; no Catholic was permitted to vote; no Catholic was allowed to hold public office; no Catholic was allowed to work in the civil service; no Catholic was allowed to own a weapon; no Catholic was allowed to own property of value over 5 pounds; no Catholic was allowed to be educated in or out of Ireland; no Catholic could earn more than one third of the value of his crops; and no Catholic was permitted to practice as a lawyer, doctor, trader or professional. The Catholic religion was largely forbidden, with no facility to train new priests, and foreign-educated priests were outlawed. All Catholics were compelled to pay a tithe to the Anglican protestant church. This brought on secret masses, and priests, returning from the continent, were hunted down, hanged, drawn and quartered in the diamonds of Ulster townships. We all know what long-lasting effects these dastardly laws had, and are still having in Ireland today.

If the joint resolution before the Canadian Parliament were taking away rights the way the penal laws did, then I could understand why the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) would be opposed to it.

Some hon. members opposite may still think that the penal laws were appropriate. And no doubt, there may be a fringe element of Vancouverites who believe that no Canadian of oriental extraction should be permitted to own land. There may be a small ill-advised segment of Albertans who believe that no native person should be permitted to vote.

If one believes the media coverage, there seems to be a minority of Torontonians who believe that no Pakistani should be allowed to hold office. Some misguided Quebec separatists may believe that no anglophone should be allowed to work in the Quebec public service. Yes, there may even be the odd Haligonian who might believe that no black should be allowed to own a weapon. I know that hon. members may find it hard to believe, but there may even be a closet bigot or two in the fair city of Saint John who might believe that no francophone should be allowed to own property over a certain value.

It is because extreme right wingers continue to reside in Canada, or, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) refers to them, red-necked yahoos—although no doubt they are few in number—that we are entrenching human rights and freedoms in our new Canadian Constitution.

In closing, may I point out that a substantive measure in the resolution, of the utmost importance to the Atlantic provinces, provides that the Parliament and Government of Canada will be committed to the principle of making equalization payments to the poorer provinces. Both orders of government will be committed to promoting equal opportunities for Canadians, furthering economic development to reduce disparities, and providing essential public services at a reasonable level to all Canadians.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this important question because I believe that passage of this proposal, patriation of the Constitution, and entrenchment of a bill of rights will have important beneficial effects on the people of this country. I say this, however, making it quite clear that I have not been flooded with masses of letters, telephone calls or personal representations on the subject, as so many members in this chamber have said they have.

Mr. Paproski: Talk to Nystrom.

Mr. Orlikow: It has become apparent during the debate which has gone on in this chamber since last October that this bill and the support or opposition to it cuts across all party lines. As I listened to some of my Conservative friends, one would think that, because the New Democratic Premier of Saskatchewan opposes the position taken by the majority of the New Democratic members in Parliament, we are the only party in which there are divisions on this subject.

I point out to my Conservative friends that the Conservative premier of the largest province of this country, namely Ontario, supports the proposal before Parliament and is in opposition to the position taken by almost all of the Conservative members of this Parliament. I point out for their information, in the event they do not know, that the leader of the Liberal Party in Quebec, Mr. Ryan, who will probably be the next premier of Quebec, opposes the constitutional proposal we are debating now which was put forward by the Liberal government.

It should not surprise anyone to learn that there are some differences of opinion in our party and that the Premier of Saskatchewan opposes the constitutional package before us. I want to say to members of this House that in supporting this constitutional package before us, we are saying that when this is passed, it will bring important improvements to the people of Canada. We are saying also that this proposal is not perfect. We are saying that had we been drafting the proposal, were we the government, it would have been considerably different. I am certain that it would have had in it some provisions about spelling out the economic rights of the people of this country, for instance, the right of every person in this country, who wants to and is able to work, to have a job so that we do not have the kind of unemployment we have today.

In supporting this proposal and the idea that our Constitution should be patriated, and in supporting the idea that in the Constitution there should be an entrenched charter of rights, we are following the policies laid down by our party and by the CCF before it. The first convention of the CCF was held in Regina in 1933. At that convention, the party adopted a manifesto which has become well known in Canada as the Regina Manifesto. I want to put on the record some provisions from that manifesto because I think people are entitled and want to know that our position is right in line with the position we have followed for many years. Let me quote from the Regina Manifesto of 1933 as follows:

> —the amendment of the Canadian Constitution, without infringing upon racial and religious minority rights or upon legitimate provincial claims to autonomy, so as to give the Dominion government adequate powers to deal effectively with urgent economic problems which are essentially national in scope;

The convention resolution from which I just quoted looked to the patriation of the Canadian Constitution and the entrenchment of a section spelling the fundamental freedoms of the people while seeking "collaboration of the provinces to incorporate them in the Canadian Constitution". All the party resolutions urged that provincial consent for this change be sought, but never called for unanimous agreement for patriation or any other aspect of constitutional change.

However, it has become obvious that a majority of the provincial governments are now, and are likely to be in the foreseeable future, opposed to entrenchment of the bill of rights in the Constitution. If we have to wait until we have approval from the provinces, we are not likely to achieve either patriation of the Constitution or an entrenched bill of rights, for which our party worked for so many years, in the foreseeable future. If we are to patriate the Constitution and get a bill of rights, much as we would have preferred to have it done in co-operation with the provinces, we have to do it unilaterally.

Let me give another example from Frank Scott, one of the founders of the CCF, former dean of the law faculty at McGill University, a renowned expert on the Constitution and one of the leading civil libertarians during the past 40 to 50 years. He has spoken and written frequently on the question of bringing the Constitution back to Canada and on the desirability of entrenching the bill of rights in the Canadian Constitution. It is in part because of the arguments that he has advanced over the years that I am so enthusiastic in my support for both the patriation of the Constitution and the entrenchment of a bill of rights. Let me quote a couple of paragraphs from what Professor Scott has written:

> The insertion of a bill of rights in our own Constitution, and support for the proposal of an international bill of rights, seem to be logical parts of a good domestic and foreign policy for Canada. Perhaps a growing recognition of the international importance of cultural liberty for minorities will help us to reduce our internal conflicts over such issues.

In the Canadian Bar Review, 1949, he wrote:

> To define and protect the rights of individuals is a prime purpose of the Constitution in a democratic state. In Canada today many people are feeling that this purpose is not being adequately achieved . . . it is not surprising that natural law concepts are being re-examined and put forward in the form of a bill of rights for Canada, designed to shield the individual from abuses of governmental power, while at the same time a more positive role for the state in securing the economic basis for personal freedom is also being stressed.

I respect the views of those who oppose entrenching a bill of rights in the Constitution. Some who take that view do so because they have been impressed by the fact that in Great Britain people have had freedoms and property rights as much as in any democratic country without any bill of rights. Their rights are protected through common law. They were successful in protecting the rights of their citizens for hundreds of years.

In recent years, several million people have come to Great Britain from former colonies, mostly non-white people. There are reports almost every day in the newspapers of prejudice and discrimination against those people. I am certain that those people now living in Great Britain have come to realize that they need protection from an entrenched bill of rights such as the one we are discussing at the present time.

Let us look at the experience in the United States, a country with a large and diverse population which includes people from many different racial, religious and ethnic backgrounds. For many years they had open, and indeed admitted, legal discrimination. There were segregated schools, buses and restaurants. Between two and three million non-white people living in the south and southwest were not permitted to vote. Their Congress was not able to deal with those problems because of the divisions in that country. Discrimination in those and other fields in the United States was not banned by law until the United States supreme court dealt with some of the problems. The United States supreme court outlawed discrimination because their constitution and interpretation of their bill of rights showed that that kind of discrimination was illegal.

The first major decision handed down by the Supreme Court was reported in The New York Times on May 18, 1954, headlined "High court bans school segregation 9-0". The story began:

> The Supreme Court unanimously outlawed today racial segregation in public schools.

In explaining its decision, the court found that:

> The fourteenth amendment provides that no state shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws". The fifth amendment says that no person shall be "deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law".

That is the kind of provision which is in the charter of rights and constitutional proposal before us.

Some Canadians say we do not need this kind of law because we have never had discrimination. Those who say that have very short memories. I will not repeat what other members have already said regarding the discrimination we have had in this country. I will just mention a few examples. There was the padlock law in the province of Quebec in the 1930s; the expulsion of Japanese Canadians from British Columbia during World War II; the attempts to gag the press by the Social Credit government in Alberta; and the use of the War Measures Act by the Trudeau government in 1970 to arrest and incarcerate about 450 citizens of Quebec in October, 1970, few of whom were ever charged in court, and none, to my knowledge, ever convicted.

If we had had a charter of rights in our Constitution, those who had been incarcerated could have gone to court and demanded that they be set free. It is my belief that an entrenched bill of rights would give a substantial degree of protection to Canadian citizens, even when they hold views which are unpopular to the majority of the people of Canada.

It is easy to grant democratic rights to those people who agree with us. That is easy and comfortable. But, it is a great deal more difficult to grant those rights to people who disagree with us, particularly in times of emergency when, as sometimes happens, almost everybody agrees that something should be done. That is when the few who disagree really feel the wrath of governments.

I want to deal with the proposals before us at the present time. In my view, what we are dealing with is substantially different from the proposal the government made last October, different because of the agreement of the government, after a great deal of pressure, to allow extensive hearings of the committee on the constitutional proposals; because of the many representations made by dozens of organizations in which they outlined the inadequacies, as they saw them, of the resolution as originally proposed; and because of the work of many members on the committee who were not satisfied with the original proposal but who thought that, if they only opposed it and did nothing else, the package would probably pass in an imperfect manner. The groups which made representations and the members of the committee who wanted seriously and honestly to improve the package did a great deal of work, as a result of which it has been substantially improved.

I am told that over 50 amendments have been proposed. I understand from my reading of them that 49 improved the package while only one is a retrograde step. Let me deal first with the retrograde step and then with a few of the improvements.

The retrograde step in my view, and the view of members of this party, is the elimination of that clause in the original proposal which would have limited the authority and power of the Senate. Members of this Parliament will not be surprised when I say that, along with other members of this party, I believe the Senate should be eliminated or that we can do very well without it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: Having that view, I support any idea which would reduce the power and authority of the Senate. To say the least, I was unhappy with the decision of the government to take that clause out of the original proposal. We opposed that removal and, if we have an opportunity, I am sure we will move an amendment on this subject.

We must be clear on one thing. Even though that clause has been eliminated, the effect is that if we pass this constitutional proposal, the Senate will have no more power than it has had until now. After the constitutional proposal is passed, before any amendment to the Constitution can be put into effect, it will require, as has been the requirement up till now, the approval of both Houses of Parliament. That means, to my regret and the regret of members of my party, that any such amendment will require the approval of the Senate and the House of Commons.

Some people suggest we will never get this situation changed. We have been through crises and minor incidents in the past as a result of the Senate expressing its disapproval regarding some things we have done, but eventually the Senate has always gone along. I have no doubt that the Senate, for which I have little use, would bow to the will of the people of Canada, given a substantial and overwhelming majority of consensus on the part of Canadians as expressed through their members of the House of Commons, even if it meant that the Senate would be eliminated.

Let me mention just a few of the improvements in the constitutional package before us. First of all, there is the amendment with regard to resources and the power of the provinces to manage and direct those resources within the provinces. The BNA Act gave the provinces the right to their own resources. Recently, however, judicial decisions based on a narrow interpretation of the law have overturned provincial attempts to manage and tax their resources for the general benefit of the people in the provinces. These decisions have blocked the provincial right to raise new revenues from resources and regulated their right of development, especially when those resources were being sold outside the province or provinces.

I will not refer in any detail to the court decisions made in several instances in respect of the province of Saskatchewan, except to say that at least they have created an area of uncertainty for the provinces. The resources amendment now included in the package gives important powers and reassurances to the provinces. I asked the attorney general of the province of Saskatchewan whether the resources amendment which we had proposed, and to which the government had agreed, represented an improvement to that province, and he assured me it did.

I am from the province of Manitoba which, as far as we know, does not have any resources with great world demand. We are increasingly a have-not province. Believing, as I do, that all the people of Canada, regardless of where they live, are entitled to certain minimum standards in the provision of basic services, I accept the idea that any federal government must have the financial ability to help those have not provinces. My province is a have-not province. Therefore, I am happy the government agreed to amend the original clause dealing with equalization benefits, making clear the reference to equalization payments to the provinces.

Originally, the amendment would have allowed the federal government to bypass the provinces and pay equalization benefits directly to individuals. This would have endangered a major source of revenue to a poorer province such as Manitoba. I am, therefore, happy the government agreed to strengthen this equalization amendment. I do not want the people of my province to be dependent on the good will and charity of the Premier of Alberta or the Premier of Saskatchewan. I want the federal government to have the power and authority to help people in all parts of this country.

I am particularly interested in the charter of rights. This embodies a principle of major importance to the people of this country. I was happy to hear what Professor Walter Tarnopolsky of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association had to say when he appeared before the committee dealing with the Constitution. Let me quote him in part. He said:

—without a bill of rights, the only protection for minorities is the good will of the majority. No doubt people, like the Japanese Canadians, native people, Jehovah's Witnesses, and others could give us examples of how the majority, at one time or another, did not recognize them as human beings equal in dignity and rights.

Then he went on to say:

—particularly for opposition politicians, reliance on a written bill of rights is a much more effective weapon to oppose legislation which is deemed to be excessively oppressive or arbitrary, than a mere claim the legislation is oppressive or arbitrary.

So when we look at the amended package, here is what it provides in the way of fundamental freedoms:

(a) freedom of conscience and religion;

(b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication;

(c) freedom of peaceful assembly; and

(d) freedom of association.

I would remind hon. members that this clause is very much like the one adopted by the 1961 NDP convention, so my enthusiasm for it is not surprising.

● (1550)

Very impressive representations were made to the committee by representatives of the disabled. A representative of the Coalition of Provincial Organizations for the Handicapped told the committee that:

—of most importance to disabled people in Canada is that disability or handicap should be included as grounds protected from discrimination under Section 15(1) and we recommend this amendment to you.

The charter now says:

15 (1) Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

In other words, the committee accepted the proposal of the representatives of the handicapped.

As for women's groups, the then president of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, Doris Anderson, told the committee:

The Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women supports entrenchment in the Constitution of a charter of rights and freedoms which guarantees women's human rights to equality.

As I have already said, Section 15(1) states there shall be no discrimination on the basis of sex.

Mr. Speaker, I am particularly interested in the discussions in committee with reference to native people. I have been interested in the subject for many years and, of course, large numbers of native people have moved to Winnipeg in recent years. I was looking at a brief sent to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro) just a couple of weeks ago by the Winnipeg Indian Council and they estimate that there are 12,000 status Indians in Winnipeg. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and I probably have more status Indians in our constituencies than does any other member. The conditions of native people in this country are a disgrace and a disaster.

I would quote from a book entitled "Indian Conditions: A Survey 1980" put out by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, which was sent to Members of Parliament. In that book you will see that the mortality rate for native people one to four years old is 3.1 per thousand, and for non-Indians it is 0.8. The rate of suicide is almost three times the national rate. In 1974, 55 per cent of Indian reserve population were receiving social assistance as compared to a national rate of 6 per cent. In 1977, one in three Indian families on reserves lived in crowded conditions. I could go on but I think hon. members who are interested know what the situation is.

The rights and freedoms of Canada's native people were not included in the original constitutional package. Very strong representations were made by native groups, status and non-status Indians, to all parties represented here and to the constitutional committee. The president of the National Indian Brotherhood, Delbert Riley, said this to the committee:

We are opposed to any amendment of the Canadian Constitution which affects our special constitutional position, without our consent. The Royal Proclamation of 1763 provided that constitutional or political change would occur by a process of negotiation and agreement. That, to us, is a fundamental constitutional principle, and one that should be recognized in any amending formula.

I do not have to tell hon. members of this House how much discussion there was on that question, or how reluctant the government and many members were to do that, and yet the charter now includes the following:

> The guarantee in this charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed so as to abrogate or derogate from any aboriginal, treaty or other rights or freedoms that pertain to the aboriginal peoples of Canada including
> (a) any rights or freedoms that have been recognized by the Royal Proclamation of October 7, 1763; and
> (b) any rights or freedoms that may be acquired by the aboriginal peoples of Canada by way of land claims settlement.

My colleague, the hon. member from Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar), moved the following amendment which was accepted unanimously by the committee:

> Rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada:
> 33(1) The aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada are hereby recognized and affirmed.
> (2) In this act, "aboriginal peoples of Canada" includes the Indian, Inuit and Metis peoples of Canada.

The inclusion of those amendments is of tremendous importance to the native people of this country. We have seen in many parts of Canada provincial hydro organizations building dams and power stations, flooding land on which native people have lived for hundreds of years and doing it almost unilaterally without any real agreement, certainly no legal agreement, with the native people concerned.

Now, I do not say that because of these clauses the problems of the native people are automatically solved, but when differences arise between native people and government or private organizations, they now have a clause in the Constitution which they can use in negotiations, and if negotiations are not successful, they can use this in testing their rights in the courts. I say for that reason alone they are worth while.

In dealing with multiculturalism, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to try to emulate the eloquence of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Lewycky) yesterday. I represent what has been called an ethnic constituency because we have members of almost every racial, ethnic and religious group in this country. Apart from Anglo-Saxons, we have Ukrainians, Poles, Czechoslovakians, Jews, Russians and Germans, in the thousands. In the years since the end of World War II, we have had people coming from Portugal, The Philippines, Italy, Greece, China, Hong Kong, the Caribbean, Africa, India and Pakistan.

An hon. Member: What about the people from Sweden?

Mr. Orlikow: If I have omitted any groups, I apologize. I am of ethnic origin. My father came to this country 75 years ago. He was 14 years old then, and he went to work in order to bring the rest of his family here. He did very well in this country; he was proud of the fact that he had never gone to school in Canada but was able to send three sons to university. I know, as he knew, that for many, many years ethnics were considered second or third-class citizens.

It is not many years ago that ethnics were not able to get work in department stores in Winnipeg and in most other cities. It is not many years ago that one would not find ethnics working in Canadian banks. It is not many years ago that some of our universities had quotas; only certain groups could get into medical college and only certain numbers. That prejudice and discrimination is disappearing, but it has not gone completely. One has only to walk around my constituency or any other constituency to see the buildings owned and operated by various ethnic groups and to see how they change as the population moves.

Ethnic groups are very proud of the way in which they have been able to maintain and develop the cultures and languages they brought with them to this country. They recognize, as the spokesman for the Ukrainian Canadian committee said before the constitutional committee, that there are two official languages, English and French. They are proud of the fact that they have been able to maintain, promote and build their cultures and languages. It was made clear by the spokesman of the Ukrainian Canadian committee that the inclusion in the Constitution of the section which spells out the multicultural background of the country is an important recognition of the fact that they are first-class citizens. I welcome that section.

I should like to refer to one more section in which I am particularly interested, the one which deals with the legal rights of Canadian citizens and their rights regarding search, seizure, detention and imprisonment. The original resolution indicated that everyone has the right not to be subjected to search or seizure except on grounds and in accordance with procedures established by law.

I have already referred to what was done under the provisions of the War Measures Act. Many civil liberties groups were very concerned about the freedom it would give police forces as it was then written, so they welcomed the amendment which restricted the following clause:

> Everyone has the right not to be arbitrarily detained or imprisoned.

There have been some improvements in the constitutional package which I think have made it much more effective than when it was brought forward in October of last year. I am happy to support this constitutional proposal because of the improvements that have been made, because it brings the Constitution back to Canada, and because it entrenches a bill of rights which is of tremendous importance to the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I will try to make eight basic points which concern me about the constitutional resolution. One thing which perhaps worries me more than anything else is the fact that I consider it a threat to our basic structures which protect our freedoms. Since Bill C-60 was tabled in the Thirtieth Parliament, I have advised my constituents of my concern; I sent them an extensive riding mailer in July, 1978. I have seen nothing in the debate and in the proceedings of the committee which has dealt with the resolution package to change my opinion.

In my opinion, there is no democratic mandate for this resolution. I believe it is changing our style and form of government. Where in the rhetoric of the last election campaign did Canadian people, even those voting in Quebec and Ontario, give the Liberal Party of Canada a mandate to change the Constitution unilaterally through the Parliament of Westminster; to emasculate the powers of western provinces so that the population centres of Ontario and Quebec could control western resources, making the west a colony forever; to expropriate and nationalize the energy industry as it is doing with its energy policy; to change the parliamentary procedures in place to protect people from excessively centralized powers which can only lead to an executive form of democracy; to entrench a charter of rights which contains questionable wording and has serious omissions?

Where, in fact, was the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the last election on these very issues? His handlers were allowing his body to be seen, but his thoughts and ambitions were well hidden from public scrutiny and debate. The Liberal Party of Canada, the party of entrenched power at any cost, at any level of morality—one year ago it was 18 cents—are now playing games with structures affecting our basic freedoms. With this constitutional resolution, the Liberal Party of Canada, in my opinion and in the opinion of other colleagues who have spoken, is fanatically seeking to achieve power objectives before the public can express its will in a democratic fashion.

This is the reason for time allocation, for the threat of closure and for the great rush to put this matter through the legislative processes before July 1, 1981.

They love to say that it has been in the process of negotiation for 53 years.

Mr. Pinard: Fifty-four years.

Mr. Huntington: I am now told that it is 54 years. They do not tell us that in those 54 years it has been discussed for approximately 48 days at the official level, or less than one day a year. They do not tell us that the extremely important and dangerous entrenchment package was not part of the discussions over that period of time. They try to belittle the fact that elected representatives of the people are worried about issues which were not part of those negotiations. They do not tell us why they want to entrench aspects which go beyond the protection of our basic freedoms. Rather, they work on a shallow perception of a docile population. They do not tell us why they are removing the right to property; they sneak it into the terminology.

The constitutional resolution is, by all the rules and precedents of a representative monarchial parliamentary democracy, illegal because it is a coup d'état. It changes the very form of our government.

The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) in his speech on February 19 and 20, as reported at pages 7499 and 7581 of Hansard, ably pointed out the following:

> The Liberal government is giving the citizen rights. It is now telling the citizen what he or she can do.

I urge those members who have not read his speech to do so. This Liberal party charter assigns rights in the same manner and employs the same language as communist charters. As any thinking person knows, rights assigned and given by rulers can also be denied and taken away by rulers. I see an hon. member opposite shaking his head. I suggest that hon. members opposite take off their blinkers, get out of the tunnel and open up their minds to what they are doing to this country.

● (1610)

The U.S. constitution, on the other hand, comes from the citizenry, and the powers of government are by the people, for the people. It is not a government of the majority telling them what their rights will be.

As my colleague, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta said as reported at page 7519 of Hansard for February 20, 1981:

> The government is presenting a proposed charter which purports to give rights to citizens. It is presenting an illusion; it is a fraud. It is not entrenching the rights of citizens; it is entrenching the power of the state.

In my opinion, the people of this great country had better wake up and shake off their apathy before it is too late. The priorities in this debate are not in order. Apart from economics, our national problem is regionalism. It goes right through our country; it is in our cities and our provinces. Federally, the structure of our Parliament does not address this problem, but rather creates it.

Before this resolution is passed, it is my belief that we should discuss the form and structure of our government. The structure of our present government needs amendment. The British parliamentary form of government has great strengths and great weaknesses. Its strengths lie in the fact that it is of a very slow and cumbersome nature. It acts like a huge sponge which absorbs the forces of change within a big, cumbersome and complicated society. It absorbs these forces, and down through the ages it has been able to protect man's freedom better than any other form of government yet devised. This House turfs out those of us who fail to continue to relate to our constituents on the emotional level, and that is one of the great strengths of the system. It allows us, as it should to debate the great ideologies of change of our times.

A key principle and an aspect that is not widely understood is that we are a monarchial parliamentary system. Therein lies the power to demand delay for more mature thought on these forces of change. It is during national crises of arrogance and lawlessness that constitutions are tested. If those constitutions fail—and history is full of examples—nations are destroyed. The power to demand delay for more mature thought has to exist, which is most desirable and in the public interest since governments with parliamentary majorities which have been too long in office have a natural human tendency to abuse power and, perhaps, to go beyond constitutional limits.

Under the royal prerogatives, the sovereign has four instruments with which to procure this essential element of freedom. It has the right to veto legislation, the right to dismiss a government, the right to dissolve Parliament, and the right to order a general election. Had the Italian constitution allowed the King of Italy these powers, the world might have been spared the fascist regime of Mussolini. It should be voted that in all countries of the former British Empire in which the monarchy has been replaced with some other head of state, countries such as South Africa, India, Pakistan, Ghana, Nigeria—and I ask: Is Canada the next?—there has been a steady decline in freedom from arbitrary government, in the application of due process of law and in respect for the Constitution.

I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the people under these regimes enjoy markedly less security, both psychologically and materially. I say this in all sincerity, since I was brought up to understand that when I uttered the prayer "God save the Queen" I was, in fact, asking God to help us govern ourselves better. Yet we find today not only reference to the Crown being minimized in Canada but even reference to God being struck from the proposed Constitution by the socialists. I am not one to run and stare at the Royal Family, but I am a Canadian who knows from experience how delicate and precious our freedom is. I know from history how it is earned and how easily it is lost through apathy and indifference. I say to colleagues and fellow citizens: please, let us understand the safeguards which underlie the foundation of our freedom before we carelessly toss it all away.

On the other hand, I must say that the structure of the British parliamentary system has failed us and other former members of the Commonwealth because it represents centres of population. It does not carry the checks and balances necessary for less populated regions to feel and remain a part of the whole. Bangladesh is a recent example of this. The same is also happening in Canada today.

In Canada, Parliament is controlled by the province of Quebec with its 75 seats in this House, and the swing power is in the province of Ontario. The rest of us in the outback regions of this land have the feeling that we really do not matter. The successful strategy of the Liberal Party is to play to the Latin vote in Canada. In every federal election, the Liberal Party starts with 100 Liberal seats out of 282. The other regions, races and ideologies within the country, struggle to overcome that handicap.

To new Canadians who came to this country to participate in its freedom, its opportunities, its welfare benefits and its historical adherence to the principle of private property, I say: beware, new Canadians, of the propaganda to which you are being subjected. If you doubt that this resolution on the Constitution is nothing more than a vehicle to socialize this once proud country, just look at the National Energy Policy which plays one region against another, nationalizes industries under the guise of Canadianization, and has yet to address the problem of oil self-sufficiency within the land.

In my opinion, we in this country are dangerously close to one-party rule. The arrogant audacity of this resolution tells us that we are a frustrated and confused people; we are alienated, when we once had a great sense of nationhood; we are now divided, and our sense of nationalism has been deliberately removed from us over the last 15 years. We are being told that there is racial antagonism in the land; we are changing our form of government without full comprehension of what is ahead; and we are dangerously regionalized. Surely within these issues lies the challenge which must be resolved if, once again, we are to become a strong federal nation.

Our parliamentary structure serves only the population centres, for that is where political power is rooted. We understand that. Our Senate is not structured, or used, to give regional balance. Therein lies one of our failures. Of course, I disagree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who wants to abolish the Senate. One of the problems we have in the provinces is that there is not a balance between the regions and the elected assembly which represents or gives power to the population centres. Instead of fooling around with a document of political revolution, which this resolution is, we should be addressing the faults in our structure which are causing the degree of regionalism from which we suffer today. The party caucus system locks behind closed doors the great interregional debates from which understanding and consensus flow. Those great debates in search of consensus are not part of the House of Commons. They are not part of the Canadian awareness at large. Instead, they are buried in the dangerous game of backroom regional party politics.

All three parties are experiencing the tension and strain of this dilemma, for one of the aspects of political power in Canada is caucus solidarity. But if we are really and truly representing the ideals, wants and emotions of our regions, how can we have total solidarity in caucus? That is one of our dilemmas.

Members from Ontario know that the politics of their region is to support the Liberal government because the people in Ontario have been sold a bill of goods which says that their sharing means that the resources of the outback, the west, must be available at half the world prices.

Meanwhile, a customs union forces every Canadian, no matter where he or she lives, to pay 130 per cent to 160 per cent of world price for all capital and consumer goods to protect the industries and the payrolls at the centre and heart of the country. We in the west simply do not see that as being fair or even falling within the ambit of fair sharing. It is raw power politics which causes intense regionalism.

The vast majority of people in the west are not being bamboozled by twisted rhetoric and Machiavellian strategies. These regional tensions and views would be out in the open if the Senate was an elected Senate and if it represented the regions on an equal basis, with full powers to veto abused power from this House of Commons.

The caucus system of achieving consensus has been under debate for centuries. In my opinion, the caucus system fails the minority regions of the country.

In search for an answer to this problem, I have ventured to suggest that we must work federally from a four-region concept. The other day I noticed that the NDP wanted to work from a five-region concept. I have given that up. As much as I would like to see B.C. become a region, in my opinion it will not work.

I am not alone in my feelings. Back in 1965, there was a paper on an Atlantic union. In 1970, there was a commission of three of the Atlantic provinces on an Atlantic union. They tried to address the same problems. It is not a new problem.

Quebec has gone through an emotional experience with a referendum and does not feel it is a part of the whole. It wants to participate as an equal in the whole. Ontario is a troubled region of the land today. It sees power drifting out. It has obsolete industries and it wants to catch up. It is wondering what is happening to this country. The other region is composed of the western provinces. If we were four regions, we could talk and deal with each other as equals, and we could solve some of this regional inequity. At least with this base the regions could participate as equals rather than be divided, isolated and made to appear as ten fractious fiefdoms. The way it stands at the moment, under the amending formula proposed in the resolution the Atlantic and western provinces are given second-class status compared with Quebec and Ontario. In the west, the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba are reduced to third-class status. Is that fair sharing? This is not the way in which to build a strong federation with strong and vital regions.

In my opinion, it is essential that the Atlantic and western regions participate in the decisions of the federal government as equals with Quebec and as equals with Ontario. We know that Quebec wants to participate as an equal. So do we in the west.

With regional inputs to the council of decisions at the federal level, much of the sense of isolation, frustration and alienation would be removed.

I do not know whether the regions should sit in the House of Commons and caucus as regions or if the Atlantic and western regions first need to caucus in their own assemblies from which they would then elect members to the federal Parliament. However, I do feel that our federal dilemma, caused by a misuse of parliamentary structure, could be resolved as a first priority by a constitutional constituent assembly. It is wrong for the leader of a party with a parliamentary majority to be imposing unilaterally a new style and form of government with entrenched rights which reach well beyond those essential to our freedom and individual dignity.

As this government initiative stands, we will have government by and for the population centres. Those who think we can have a strong federation, or even a strong federal state with the degree of freedom we have enjoyed over the past three and a half decades, should really try to understand the depth of division and alienation which exists within the country. An imposed move towards a unitary state is not Canadian. That approach is foreign.

A few months ago, I went into the office of a chartered accountant who is in his late thirties. He is a very busy man. On his desk was a copy of a book from the Life series "Prelude to World War II". I asked him what a busy man was doing with a book of that nature on his desk. He told me that he was startled to learn of the horror and brutality which existed in Germany in the thirties. I was literally shocked. I realize I am getting on, but I did not know I had gone this far. I suddenly realized that we who have lived through the prelude to World War II and who fought to defend our freedom and sense of decency and human dignity are a rapidly diminishing percentage of the population. That is why I am concerned about our basic freedoms and structures. That is why I am concerned that we are taking these structures for granted and that apathy is accelerating.

The situation in Germany started with inflation. I am not implying, Mr. Speaker, that you are as old as I am. Oh, you are older, Sir. It started with inflation in a representative democracy which worked into a direct democracy. Direct democracy soon became leadership democracy, which then turned overnight into a dictatorship. The provinces and neighbouring countries were eliminated, and Germany became a unitary state. It was nationalism at its worst. Essential to that process and maintenance of power was a propaganda system. One of the most powerful men in Germany through the thirties and into the Second World War was the minister of propaganda. Even as a young person, I found this power over the minds of people to be frightening. The same thing is happening in Canada today. The perceptions of our people are being manipulated by strategists and social engineers using the Liberal Party of Canada as their vehicle to impose a socialist unitary state. All legislation submitted to Parliament is designed with a political strategy to serve this end, and this has been going on for years. Seldom do we see an issue addressed alone; it is always in the company of a diseased hooker which attempts to influence the emotions and perceptions of the people at large. As a recent example, Bill C-57 slipped through this House in two and a half hours at second reading. Part I of that bill attacks the very fundamental heart of a free press. We on this side always appear negative, but it is our function as the official opposition to watch what is going on and to make the government justify its legislation.

If hon. members doubt that as an example, how many are aware that an innocuous clause in the omnibus bill in the Thirtieth Parliament dealing with weights and measures made the imperial Canadian standard measure illegal in this country? Not one member in this House understood the meaning of that word until recently. Laws are written without addressing essential definitions such as, what is news, what is advertising? As a result, we face reckless confusion.

• (1630)

This bill came to the House and attacked the independent newspaper structure of the land right after the major newspapers in the land had fallen to the ownership of two separate central capitalistic bodies. What is happening in this land? The National Energy Policy used the catch phrase "Canadianization" when in fact it is nationalizing and confiscating private rights and properties. An example of this is Merit Oil which is an independent, wholly Canadian-owned company.

Why is PetroCan buying an independent wholly Canadian-owned company? Why was it on the market? It was on the market because the monopoly structure and cartel at the refinery gate did not allow it enough room and freedom to operate within the marketplace.

The most recent first ministers' conference was held under the umbrella of a strategy designed to make the premiers look bad. A leaked document was proof of that. A litany of words was listed for the delivery of impressions to an unthinking and apathetic public. Mob manipulation has become the order of the day in Canada, I am very sorry to say. As I said, not one member of the House of Commons recognized that little clause which changed the nature of weights and measures in Canada.

In the Thirtieth Parliament, we became alarmed at the degree of corporate concentration which had taken place. With a great flair, the Prime Minister appointed the Bryce Commission on Corporate Concentration. What has happened since its report came down? The rate and magnitude of corporate concentration has accelerated. It is without restraint or bounds in this country at the present time.

Today, in Canada, we are rushing in both directions. On the one hand, corporate concentration is taking place, and on the other, there is rapid and accelerating state confiscation and state ownership of the means of producing goods and services.

As was demonstrated in Germany, excessive corporate concentration of power leads to a fascist state. As was demonstrated in the U.S.S.R. and other socialist countries which have gone too far, excessive state ownership and control over the means of production leads to a communist state. In both political situations, man loses his freedom. When capital and property are removed from the people and concentrated excessively in corporations or the state, we lose the essence of a free economy. When we lose the element of freedom in the economy, we lose freedom. When people allow themselves to be manipulated into an egalitarian society by intellectuals and elitists, they are no longer free. People who are equal are not free. We are not born equal.

As I mentioned, our parliamentary system has great flexibility. It has built-in safeguards for second looks. Historically it has allowed for the forces of change through legislative debate and law. This resolution on the Constitution attacks the heart of these safeguards. It turns this duty and function over to the courts. Our courts and legal system address words, not issues. Our legal system is operating at the extremities of reasonable interpretation. Why should we turn over this vital function of our legislative assemblies to deal with issues to the word merchants in the courts?

There is a Machiavellian morality to this resolution on the Constitution. It delivers us into a structured society. It removes power from the people and delivers that power to the state. It uses the language of totalitarian societies in the wording of its rights. The state gives the rights to the people—it is not a Constitution by the people and for the people. It removes the right to private property, and I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is something that I am here to defend. It carries the potential of eliminating the political power of our second level of government. It creates a unitary state with control at the centre, and the power of the centre is anchored permanently in one province. It creates different classes of citizens depending on the province or region in which they live and work. It does not address the national problem of regionalism but, rather, aggravates it. It attacks the very structures that have allowed change to take place and leave man with his freedom.

A new Constitution must come from a constituent constitutional assembly which represents all aspects and has inputs from society. Only then can Canadians feel secure and enjoy rights that will survive the abuse of power. This resolution must be defeated preferably in Canada.

Today the Right Hon. Prime Minister, in his address to this House, said, "... the people are the architects of its change, not the victims of the change." These words came from a brilliant political strategist who admits that he is capable of changing the course of the ship of state in the middle of the night while the people are asleep.

I have not spoken to the amendment on the resolution, Mr. Speaker, because I refuse to play with tinker toy amendments when the basic issues within the resolution carry such a threat to my freedom.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased and indeed honoured to rise today to speak in support of this historic resolution before the House of Commons and the Senate. It has been almost 53 years since we in Canada began our attempt to patriate and have our own Constitution in Canada. It is four months since this government, after a great deal of thought, a great deal of soul searching and a great deal of effort to reach agreement with the ten provinces, assumed the responsibility it has as the national government with a mandate to break the constitutional deadlock that has existed for the last five decades.

On October 2, 1980, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that building a country to match a dream is a long and painstaking process. But as each generation has made the sacrifices, so each has reaped the rewards. He said that every generation of Canadians has given more than it has taken and that now is our time to repay our heritage. He said that our duty is clear; it is to complete the foundations of our independence and our freedoms.

I had the honour in the last few months to be a member of the joint Senate and House of Commons parliamentary committee on the Constitution. Every member of that committee worked hard. I believe that members of all parties, when dealing with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in particular, approached their duties with honest and open minds and with the desire to give back to the people after all the debate had taken place, after all witnesses had been heard and after all the expert testimony had been analysed, the best charter of rights and freedoms possible at this point in our history.

I am proud of the work that the constitutional committee was able to do. I believe it is clear to everyone that the resolution before the House has been substantially improved, especially in the amended charter of rights, and that it is far superior to the bill presented some four months ago. The bill now before us was amended a total of 50 times at committee stage.

● (1640)

In saying this, I want to acknowledge the contribution made by the opposition, Conservative and the New Democratic parties who, in some instances, were the authors of a number of very important amendments or improvements. I speak in particular of the charter of rights and freedoms.

Because of the all-party work which went into the drafting of that charter, I believe it is fair to say that there is near unanimous support in this chamber for the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Mr. Malone: That is false.

Mr. Tobin: There must be very few people in this chamber who would deny Canadians the provisions of the charter. I speak now not of the process but of the content of the charter. I would find very little disagreement on that point.

Mr. Malone: You just got it.

Mr. Tobin: Nearly every Member of Parliament supports legal rights for the handicapped in this country, for example. Every member would support new legal rights for Canadians. Every Member of Parliament would support the equalization formula or many of the other provisions in the charter of rights.

There are those who would argue that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, those privileges enjoyed by Canadians, are important, are paramount, but second only to the whim or the disposition of provincial governments and provincial politicians. That is the argument put forward by the Conservative Party. We in the Liberal Party, and I am pleased to say the vast majority of those members of the NDP, cannot accept the shallowness of that position. We believe that the rights, freedoms and privileges of individual Canadians are paramount, and superior to the disposition or the whim of any politician or any government in this country. That is a fundamental difference.

The shallowness of the kind of argument being put forth by the Conservative party about the process, while it claims to support the content, is so self-evident that there is no need for me to carry on about it any longer. Some members of the Conservative Party have been so uncomfortable, and I am desperately trying not to be partisan—

Mr. Crosby: Don't try.

Mr. Tobin: —that I applaud Mr. Yurko. I do not mean to embarrass him by doing so—

Mr. Nielsen: Order. His riding is Edmonton East.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The practice is to refer to hon. members by their constituency.

Mr. Tobin: I applaud the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko) and I do not mean to embarrass him or to be cute by doing so. As I say, some of his colleagues have been uncomfortable with the shallowness of the argument which says they believe the charter is good but the process is wrong, and they have gone on to say: "Look, besides that, we have had a long tradition of freedom in this country. This is tolerant land. Therefore, we do not need a charter of rights and freedoms. We can trust Parliament to look after the rights and interests of Canadians."

For the most part, I would agree with that. Our country's record, if we look back through our history, has been excellent, especially in comparison to many of the other so-called democratic countries in this world. While it has been excellent, it has not been perfect. It has not been unblemished. We need only to look at some of the activities which occurred during World War II. Neither Parliament nor the legislatures protected the rights of Japanese Canadians who found their rights arbitrarily taken away and in many cases never returned.

We are talking about the rights and freedoms of individual Canadians. Whatever the government, be it Liberal, Conservative, NDP or whatever, I say no government should have the power arbitrarily to remove people's rights.

Again, I say the argument which the Conservatives would make that somehow we can trust the Canadian Parliament to protect the people of Canada does not hold water if we look back through our history. To make such an argument is to suggest that the rights and freedoms of the individual Canadian, the single man, the single woman or child, is his or her right only as long as it is the will of the majority or the will of Parliament that he or she should have rights. That is not good enough. I say we hardly have our eyes open to what is happening in this world when we make that kind of a suggestion.

Just today we had the President of the United States here in our chamber. We were honoured by his presence. Hon. members do not have to look at the most extreme examples of the oppression of rights in this world; they need only cast their eyes south to the problem there with which President Reagan will be struggling soon. In the country to the south of us, in the last few years we have seen the rise of paramilitary units and groups. I watched a special program on the American network the other night which showed a group of 155 people who were armed. What do they stand for? They stand for the extreme right, neo-Nazi, Ku Klux Klan extremist groups. They say a war is coming. They say they are going to do battle with the blacks in the U.S. The only way that kind of extremism will be controlled in the United States, the only way that kind of thing will be challenged before it can mushroom, is through rights entrenched in the American constitution. The present rights in themselves are not enough.

I look at my own country. I am sad to say I look at my own province of Newfoundland and at what the Premier of Newfoundland has proposed in recent months. We have a government in Newfoundland—I pray there are no others in Canada, but I fear there may be others—which proposes to pass laws saying the first qualification to work in Newfoundland on certain developments is that the person be born in that province. If that first requirement is not met, the individual would be told he or she is not qualified to work in Newfoundland.

In this charter of rights we have mobility clauses. These will guarantee Canadians the right to live, work, pursue happiness and to raise their families anywhere in this country. But if Premier Peckford has his way, that right will not be extended to Canadians as far as Newfoundland is concerned.

I have a younger brother who could not find work in Newfoundland. He is now working in Edmonton. I have another younger brother who will complete a course in the college of trades this spring. He may not find a job in Newfoundland. We are glad that my younger brother can pursue a job anywhere else in this country. He, too, may end up out west. The fact that I have two brothers who have to go out west is the kind of shortsighted argument that Premier Peckford would use to justify saying that no one but Newfoundlanders shall work in the offshore industries of Newfoundland. That may appeal to people, perhaps even my brother, the day he boards a plane to leave home. But that kind of shortsighted vision, if allowed to grow, will destroy and balkanize this country and will turn us into ten banana republics.

I find Premier Peckford's position hard to swallow. I cannot accept it, especially in light of what he himself said in his paper "Toward the Twenty-First Century—Together", dated August 18, 1980. In that paper, we read that:

> The entrenchment of democratic rights and fundamental freedoms is a means of giving explicit constitutional recognition to values which have served Canada well.

He continued:

> Newfoundland, therefore, supports a charter of rights which will entrench the democratic rights and fundamental freedoms of Canadians.

Only mobility rights entrenched in a Canadian constitution can put an end to the kind of threat with respect to mobility which Premier Peckford and his government represent.

● (1650)

What did some of the people who appeared before the constitutional committee have to say about mobility? Mr. Gordon Fairweather, the chairman of the Human Rights Commission said:

> I am absolutely delighted to see that mobility rights are to be enshrined ... If the maritime provinces, from where I come, had been restricted in mobility, there would have been social revolution in this country and I think it is time that people remembered that ... We are totally committed to this principle and I think 99 per cent of the people of Canada are.

Mr. Edward Hearn, a Newfoundlander representing the Newfoundland branch of the Canadian Bar Association, said this:

> One of the ... legitimate objectives of the Constitution of Canada is the integration of the Canadian economy. The free circulation of goods, services, capital and workers has not always been adequately protected under the BNA Act. We are strongly in favour of improving and protecting the Canadian economic union.

The Task Force on Canadian Unity said:

> In a federal union, the regions can expect their economies to perform better as a result of the free movement of labour, capital, goods and services.

I only regret that the mobility clause at this time does not include capital, goods and services. As a start we have guaranteed the mobility of individual Canadians to move about this country.

The premier of the province of Newfoundland was quoted while speaking at the National Press Club just across the street here in Ottawa some time ago as saying that the central government has only that life and authority delegated to it by the ten provinces. I do not know that if there are other premiers who share Mr. Peckford's view, but that kind of vision for Canada, if it were universally accepted, would not result in a community of communities but in ten balkanized little states, each to the detriment of the whole, protecting what they see to be their own self-interests.

When I see that kind of a statement by a provincial premier, especially the premier of my province, then if we were to accept that concept, I wonder who Premier Peckford would have arbitrate what he perceives, and indeed what I perceive, to be the difficulties and the differences he has with the province of Quebec on the question of hydro development. With that kind of perception, I wonder who Premier Peckford would have arbitrate the fisheries conflicts which arise from time to time, not between Canada and the United States, but between the maritime provinces.

There is one other matter I want to speak on, namely the referendum provision. There are those who oppose the resolution because they do not like the process and do not want to offend the premiers and provincial politicians. There are those who are upset about the referendum procedure.

There was a referendum not too long ago in my province. Let us review what is in the referendum procedure. The government has already stated it does not intend to impose an amending procedure of its own devising immediately, but rather a two-stage approach to the adopting of an amending formula as proposed which will provide opportunity for all governments in this country to work out an amending formula together.

During the first two years following proclamation of the Constitution Act, 1981, the general amending formula will require the unanimous consent of Parliament and the ten provinces. First ministers will meet at least once a year during that interim period in a constitutional conference. A key item on the agenda of the conference will be a search for a general amending formula.

If unanimous consent on an amending formula is secured, Part V of the act as amended by Parliament and the provinces will come into force and we will have reached agreement for the first time after 53 years of deadlock. If agreement is not possible during the interim period and seven or more provinces representing at least 80 per cent of the population can agree on a provincial alternative for the general amending formula, a referendum will be held. The people will be asked to decide. They will be called upon to choose between the provincial alternative and either the Victoria formula or another alternative approved by the Senate and House of Commons. Two years in which to reach agreement is a very reasonable and rational position. If agreement is not reached and the provinces and the federal government each present one position, the people of Canada, in the most democratic way possible, will decide what the general amending formula should be.

I want to speak for a moment about referenda. One of the big arguments is that referenda are divisive, that they result in province battling province, father battling son, neighbour battling neighbour.

Mr. King: Your Prime Minister said that.

Mr. Tobin: I agree that referenda are divisive. Of course they are. Elections are divisive. There was a referendum in Newfoundland 32 years ago. I cannot talk personally about it because I was not there. I am not proud to say that I am 26, but being 26 I am proud to say that I am the only Newfoundlander in this House of Commons who was born a Canadian. Having been born after 1949, I was born a Canadian.

Let me say what a referendum means to me. My father, mother, grandparents, older friends and many of my constituents have told me about the great battle of confederation, and a great battle it was. There was a lot of debate and the result was very close. Only 52 per cent of the people of Newfoundland voted for confederation in the referendum. For many of the older people, the scars have still not healed. However, for the vast majority of those in Newfoundland, the scars have healed.

What does a referendum mean to me and what can it mean to future generations of Canadians? I know from reading history that previous to making the final decision on where its future lay, my province went from democratic government to responsible government to government by commission. There was a turbulent history because we, as a country or dominion, had not decided where our future should lie.

There was a referendum held. It was divisive and it hurt. What did it accomplish? It gave to my generation, those born after the referendum and those being born today, for the first time in history, stability for our province. It gave us a sense that we had a future, that we belonged, that we are part of a greater whole, a sense that we live in a land of opportunities and that five years down the road there will not be an appointed or delegated governor or commissioner to run our land.

Although the referendum was divisive, to those of my generation it was a great gift, given to us by our forefathers, our parents, and our grandparents. When they gave us that gift of liberty and stability, for the first time they gave it with the sense that we had a responsibility to preserve and project that new but rich heritage. I suggest that the way I can do that best as a young Newfoundlander, as a Member of Parliament and as a Canadian, is by ensuring that this gift passed to me is passed on to my children. I can do that best by supporting this resolution before the House, with a charter of rights and freedoms which provides for the individual in society—not for provincial premiers, not for political parties, not for government and not for any particular language or racial group—those basic freedoms, rights and privileges that allow the individual to pursue happiness and a rich life in a rich and generous country.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF GOVERNOR OF FLORIDA

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. At this point I should like to call to the attention of the House the presence of a distinguished visitor in our gallery from the United States, the Honourable Robert Graham, Governor of Florida.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to join in the debate on the constitutional resolution now before this House.

Let me begin my remarks on the constitutional proposal of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) by stating in very clear terms that I, like others, have come to bury Caesar, not to praise him. I say this unashamedly and in good conscience because I made my views known to him in a letter delivered the day before Parliament reconvened and before this constitutional resolution was introduced in the House on October 6, 1980. I said to the Prime Minister, and I repeat it now in this House, that the greatest impediment to constitution reform and change is the Prime Minister himself.

Reform and constitutional change is not only a matter of principle but has become and continues to be a matter of personalities, indeed, a conflict of personalities—conflict between the Prime Minister and the majority of provincial premiers, conflict between the Prime Minister and parliamentarians in the United Kingdom, conflict between the Prime Minister and the British High Commissioner and other diplomats and, most importantly, conflict between the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the House of Commons.

This Prime Minister does not accept as a matter of personal choice and preference the two basic and founding principles of our Canadian constitutional system. The first principle is that Canada is a federal state governed by both a national government and a provincial government for each of our ten provinces. In contrast, Canada is not a unitary state with a single, centralized government, as is the United Kingdom.

The second principle is that the form of government in Canada is a parliamentary democracy in which the Prime Minister is first among equals and holds office only with the consent and concurrence of his parliamentary equals. Again in contrast, our government is not of the republican form wherein the head of state is elected to hold executive office, with the powers and duties of that office separate and apart from the authority of the legislative component, as in the United States.

To put the matter in more mundane terms, the Prime Minister of Canada or, indeed, of any nation governed by the British parliamentary form of government is not justified in assuming he has, as a person and as an office holder, the support of the people, or to assume, as the Prime Minister did, that he "only had the people behind him".

Let us talk about the people of Canada who the Prime Minister of Canada has behind him. What the Prime Minister has behind him and beside him are 142 Members of Parliament, or a clear parliamentary majority in the House of Commons, who proved by their election that they had the support of a plurality, not a majority, of those who voted in their respective constituencies. Indeed, if one counted Canadian noses one would find it very difficult to establish a mandate based on support of the population for the Prime Minister, or for any of his predecessors other than the Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker. Everyone agrees that the former right hon. member for Prince Albert won a tremendous personal mandate in addition to an overwhelming parliamentary majority.

Let us count the people behind the Prime Minister. First, there are just under 24 million people in Canada. Second, there were only 15.8 million registered voters. Third, only 69 per cent of the registered voters, or 10.9 million, voted. Fourth, only 4.8 million of those voters voted for the Prime Minister's party, only 1.3 million more than the 3.5 million who voted for the Progressive Conservative Party. The end result is that if the Prime Minister has a mandate it is from less than 20 per cent of the Canadian people.

Let us not confuse election success with the support of the people. Many of us are well aware that we were elected by a plurality of voters and not the majority. We are well aware that we must earn popular support and work hard to maintain it. Popularity among Canadians, either nationally or in any federal constituency, cannot be assumed from election results. I firmly believe that no one in Canada should know that better than our Prime Minister. He assumed wide and national popularity from an election victory when his party received 44 per cent of the votes of those who voted, 30 per cent of the votes of the total electorate but, most importantly, a minute 20 per cent of the votes of the Canadian population.

The Prime Minister now knows the real answer. Over 65 per cent of the Canadian population is opposed to the constitutional proposal. This result was established and confirmed by scientific polls, the very polls upon which he formerly based his assumption of broad support.

I have said, and I repeat, that Canadians are not opposed to the principle of constitutional change and reform. They are opposed to the person who demands that this change be made now in the United Kingdom Parliament, not in Canada by Canadians. That person is the Prime Minister of Canada.

I have taken some pains to qualify and characterize the popular support for the constitutional proposal. My conclusion is based on sound facts. The Prime Minister has the electoral support of 20 per cent of the people of Canada according to the 1980 election statistics. According to the scientific polls, as I have said, 65 per cent or more of the Canadian population oppose constitutional changes beyond simple patriation. This is the sum and substance of public support for the constitutional proposals.

Let me record the fact that I am well aware many Canadians from coast to coast want change. Many Canadians, particularly those whose origins are outside the British Commonwealth system, want constitutional guarantees and safeguards. Many want rights and basic freedoms enshrined in a bill of rights or a charter of rights. But it would be a cruel deception to offer those well-meaning Canadians a piece of paper, a mere written document approved by the parliament of another country—words with no spirit, statements of right which have no concurrence or that do not stem from a consensus within Canada. That forces us to consider the process and procedure for constitutional change in Canada, and whether the traditional process and procedure has been honoured in the proposal for constitutional change.

● (1710)

An hon. member referred to the shallow argument about process and said that our arguments were not directed to the substance of the proposal. That member and, I am afraid, many members do not understand the meaning of constitutional process. They do not understand that it is equally as important as the substance of the constitutional provisions because it is that process that brings about within Canada the consent and concurrence of the people which is the support for the provisions sought to be enacted. Without that support, consent and concurrence the proposals and provisions are shallow and meaningless and will not be accepted by the people.

On a recent occasion in this House my colleague in the adjoining constituency of Halifax (Mr. Regan) made some remarks about the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and his arguments on the Constitution. Let me say very clearly that I was ashamed of my colleague from Halifax but very proud of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition in the stand he has taken on the constitutional proposal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosby: Because he took that stand when the Prime Minister said he had the people behind him, when it appeared the proposal would go through and would be endorsed and accepted by the people of Canada. He took that stand on principle because what the Prime Minister was doing was wrong, and today it has been proved to be wrong. It does not have the support of the people, and it is the Prime Minister and his supporters who will suffer for that mistake.

Canadians have heard the Prime Minister say time and time again that his proposals for constitutional change evolved from the frustration of years and years of federal-provincial disagreement and inaction. He says that over 50 years of effort failed to produce agreement, that the only effective method and process for constitutional change is unilateral action by the Government of Canada which will exercise its control and authority over the Parliament of Canada.

Certainly proposals have been considered and rejected, but what in specific terms has the Prime Minister done to bring about constitutional reform? Between 1968 and 1971 federal and provincial ministers met seven times in constitutional conferences and produced the Victoria charter which was rejected by the province of Quebec. Apart from these meetings the only real initiatives the Prime Minister promoted or permitted are the following: the establishment of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada in February of 1970; the creation of the so-called Pepin-Robarts Task Force on Canadian Unity in July of 1977; the constitutional amendment bill introduced in this House on June 20, 1978, Bill C-60. Apart from first ministers' conferences, these were the only real catalysts for constitutional change launched by the Prime Minister in the 1970s.

We know the conferences failed. Some of us suspected the last effort in September of 1980 was intended to fail in order to justify the unilateral proposals now before Parliament. That is why we are considering this important proposal in an atmosphere of suspicion and mutual distrust.

Let us examine some aspects of those three initiatives, because I think we will see quite clearly that the thrust of the proposed constitutional reform is very different from the changes discussed in those three initiatives. The special joint committee began its work in 1970 and tabled its report two years later. A feature of the report was Senate reform but the proposals were not dramatic. The proposal was that the Government of Canada make all future appointments to the Senate, but that one half would be of persons nominated by the provincial governments. Distribution of Senate seats would be changed to increase representation from western Canada and review of judicial appointments by the Senate was rejected. Also, the Senate's veto over legislation was to be reduced to the right of a six-month suspension of legislative measures. The role of the Senate was to be largely investigative and advisory. The joint committee did not advocate major changes in the Supreme Court of Canada although the report advocated a consultative process with respect to appointments.

The second area of initiative was the Task Force on Canadian unity. After much fanfare and publicity the task force tabled its report in this House on January 25, 1979. Those who remember the establishment of this task force know that it followed the election of the Parti Québécois. There was implicit in its creation the implication that federal government institutions were not responding to the needs of Canadians, particularly those in Quebec, and the task force was intended to direct attention to the revitalization of those institutions. The report contained a long list of 75 recommendations with three areas of special interest, the Senate, the Supreme Court of Canada and the House of Commons, and reflected its concern with revitalizing federal institutions.

As for the Senate, the task force recommended a council of the federation, the real purpose of which was to institutionalize and integrate into the parliamentary system the process of federal-provincial consultation. In other words, the council of the federation would reflect the concerns and interests of Canada's provinces. Its membership would include 60 voting members appointed by the provinces with non-voting participation by the federal cabinet. It would also have the authority to review judicial appointments to the Supreme Court and some federal boards.

As for the Supreme Court, the task force rejected the idea of a separate constitutional court but said the Supreme Court should be composed of five judges from Quebec and six from the common law jurisdictions in the other provinces. Consultation with Quebec and other provincial authorities would be required before appointment to the Supreme Court and the council of the federation would review those appointments. The judges would be separated for some purposes but would jointly deal with constitutional questions.

The most controversial recommendation of the task force related to the House of Commons and involved proportional representation. This complicated proposal was intended to relieve problems of regional representation and the distortion that occurs when one party wins all the seats and no representation is given to the opposition parties from that region. Needless to say, these major proposals respecting the Senate, Supreme Court and House of Commons remain sterile recommendations of a spent force, even though the co-chairman of the task force now sits in the highest council of the Canadian government and from time to time holds the office of Acting Prime Minister. One wonders, Mr. Speaker, what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) now thinks of his government's constitutional proposals.

The third initiative was Bill C-60, introduced in this House June 20, 1978, which proposed important changes with respect to federal institutions. The primary thrust for constitutional change was the Senate. The proposal was to replace the Senate with a house of the federation consisting of 118 members, 59 of whom would be appointed by the House of Commons and 57 by the provincial legislatures, with two members appointed by the Government of Canada for the Northwest Territories and Yukon.

• (1720)

The concept involved was to take into account the preferences of the electorate expressed at the most recent provincial or federal election. This concept would be implemented by each provincial legislature naming its quota of members after a provincial election, and the House of Commons and the federal government would make their appointments after a federal election.

The house of the federation could delay but not veto the legislation. But it would have authority to affirm or veto judicial appointments, including appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada, subject to an overriding power exercisable by the House of Commons.

Another feature of Bill C-60, the constitutional amendment bill, was the proposal of an 11-person Supreme Court of Canada with four judges from Quebec. The bill proposed a nomination process for appointment involving federal-provincial consultation and a joint nominating council if a dispute arose. The monarchy was to be retained, although the role of Her Majesty the Queen was clearly nominal and the prerogatives and functions relating to the Crown would be exercised by the Governor General.

One other parliamentary initiative which should be mentioned is the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs established in January, 1980. This committee considered an elected Senate, the house of the federation proposal of Bill C-60, and the council of the federation proposed by the Task Force on Canadian Unity. But the point of all these exercises was and still is the necessity of involving the provinces in the process of constitutional change.

This brings me back to my original point which I want to underline. The Government of Canada has ignored in its constitutional proposals the pith and substance of proper constitutional reform. The process and procedure whereby the duly constituted federal authority and the duly constituted provincial governments agree and concur on constitutional change. Only constitutional reform which attracts this kind of concurrence and agreement will benefit the people of Canada.

It may be asked what is the proper procedure for constitutional reform and change. The traditional process and the process honoured by parliaments and governments of the past was to obtain the concurrence of the provinces to any constitutional change affecting the provinces. If one reads the Statutes of Canada and the appendices to those statutes, one will see illustration after illustration wherein the Government of Canada sought the consent and the concurrence of the provinces of Canada affected by changes in the British North America Act. There are amendments to the British North America Act which deal with the extension of the boundaries of provinces. That amendment was made to the British North America Act only after consultation with the provinces and with their consent. Unemployment insurance was the result of a consultative process. There may be cases in which the provinces were not consulted in respect of amendments to the British North America Act, but in each case the provinces were not affected in the manner in which they will be affected by the constitutional proposals now before the House of Commons.

I do not think there is any doubt in the minds of members of Parliament on this side of the House, and I do not think there is any doubt in the minds of Canadians, that the provinces of Canada must be consulted with respect to constitutional change and that only constitutional change which comes about as a result of the consent and the concurrence of the provinces will be effective in Canada. It is much more than a question of process. Hon. members on the other side do not understand that they will enact constitutional changes not only to their peril, but to the peril of all Canadians.

Why should there be provincial consent to and concurrence in constitutional change? It is absolutely necessary in order to have the basic support for the constitutional provisions when they are enacted. I could give a hundred examples, but let me say that in my career I had occasion many times to deal with law in its application to people. Even though a law is carefully written, appears to observe proper standards and is intended to benefit people, that law in its application can result in great injustice and unfairness if it is not properly administered. Yet the Government of Canada in its constitutional provisions is asking the provinces properly to apply, implement and administer a law with which they have not concurred, a law which they have had no opportunity to review and examine. That kind of law will not accomplish whatever the Prime Minister thinks it might accomplish.

I must say that it is not necessary to have complete unanimity; no one has suggested that. The more agreement one has to the enactment and application of a law, the more effective the law will be, whether it is a constitutional law or any other law.

I want members in the House to reflect upon the fact that there is no magic to the constitutional provisions contained in the charter of rights. They are no different from any other words on pieces of paper. They have to be applied by the same people who apply the laws in Canada, they have to be observed by the same people, and they have to have the same spirit and backing as any other law of Canada. There is nothing magic in the House passing a law under the guise of a constitutional amendment, a charter of rights which will go forward to the parliament of the United Kingdom to be rubber-stamped and then come back to Canada. When it comes back to Canada, there will be no magic to its enforcement; it will have no greater force than the people who support that law.

The matter of the constitutional proposals and their application to Canadians has been much discussed in Nova Scotia. Early in the constitutional debate, in November, 1980, I had occasion to participate in a public forum sponsored by the Council on Canadian Unity. The Minister of Labour was present at that meeting, as well as representatives of the provincial legislature. We debated the need for and desirability of constitutional change. I am proud to report to the House what I said on that occasion, that the fight has just begun, that the constitutional debate would be escalated in Canada and that the constitutional proposals would be exposed for what they were—the product of one man with the apparent loyal support of his party in this House, not the product of a Canadian consensus.

At that point in time it was not an easy thing to say because it appeared that the constitutional proposals would be rushed through the House before Christmas, that they would be sent off to the parliament of the United Kingdom for endorsement, brought back to Canada and enacted in great fanfare and celebration on July 1, 1981. That was the proposition put forward by the Prime Minister in the House. Today we see that schedule has not been continued. The Prime Minister has admitted the difficulty we confront in this proposal. He has delayed the debate, and it is obvious he was mistaken in the first place because, as a result of the delay in the debate and the continuation of the consideration of the constitutional provisions, no amendments were brought forward. Changes were made which the last member who spoke admitted were valuable changes that made the charter of rights one of the best pieces of legislation in the world.

This brings me to another point. Members of the government party have stood up time and time again and called the charter of rights the best constitutional provision in the world. I had occasion to deal for one year with a group of students who studied the constitutional provisions of the world. They are written in many books; I have one or two to which I should like to refer. For example, there is a reference in a constitution to a society in which the rule of law, fundamental human rights and freedoms, equality and justice—political, economic and social—with be secured for all citizens. That is the constitution of Bangladesh. I could quote provisions from the constitution of Haiti which would indicate that things are perfect and all rights are preserved in that nation. I can quote a constitutional provision from Sri Lanka which ensures mobility rights to all persons in that country. Guatemala has provisions which would rival the charter of rights now before us.

• (1730)

So my message to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this House is that it does not matter what you put in a constitution if you do not have the spirit of the people behind it. If anyone wishes to come over to my seat, I can show them the constitution of El Salvador, which is of so much concern to my friends to the left. They think, and they have the audacity to say in this House and elsewhere, that they know how to solve the problems in El Salvador. Mr. Speaker, my friends to the left do not now how to solve the problems in El Salvador or anywhere else in this hemisphere.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosby: The gang of four is rising up because of disputes in that party; they cannot solve their own problems. But that does not bother them. They are prepared to solve the problems in El Salvador or anywhere else where they think socialism can take over and destroy the country, as it has destroyed the economies of so many countries in this world. We are not fooled by that talk. We are not afraid to stand up for the free enterprise system and endorse a system of government which responds to human challenges, honours incentive and respects the work ethic. There is nothing wrong with that.

As I have said, in the province of Nova Scotia there has been much consideration given to this constitutional debate. I was very proud of the Premier of Nova Scotia, the Hon. John Buchanan, when he appeared before the constitutional committee to state the position of the province of Nova Scotia. He said:

> —we Nova Scotians believe that we have a special stake and a special responsibility in what is happening to Canadian federalism at the present time. Apart from our native peoples we are first among Canadians, . . . we were one of the four original provinces in that federation of 1867 and we brought to that federation a great deal—a great deal of history, of law, of government, of purpose and not least of all, we brought to the union of 1867 our commitment to serve in a constructive way in the new federal state that had been created.
> We feel that we have special responsibilities to preserve and to protect the understanding of 1867.

That is what the Premier of Nova Scotia did when he came before the constitutional committee; he came to protect and preserve the confederation which was established in 1867. He did not come to that committee to debate any minute points of constitutional law, of what the rights of the government were in relation to the enactment of constitutional law and what right the government had to ask the Parliament of the U.K. to pass a law. He came before the committee in the interests of preserving this confederation. I was proud of him. What his message was when he came was simply this: the provinces must be consulted in relation to constitutional reform. There must be a process whereby the provinces can have the opportunity to consent to and concur in constitutional changes. Without that consent, without that concurrence, the constitutional changes are a threat to the Canadian confederation. You'd better believe that, Mr. Speaker.

Reference has been made many times in this House to the British North America Act. I wish to comment very briefly on the existence of that act, because sometimes it occurs to me that people are not quite certain about what is involved. The BNA Act is a statute of the parliament of the United Kingdom which was passed in 1867. Over the years it has been interpreted by the judges in Canada and formerly by the Privy Council in order to meet the needs of the Canadian economy and of the Canadian people as we have grown over the years. It has been regarded as a "living tree", something which has lived over a period of 100 years since confederation. It is flexible. It allows for change. It allows Canadians to develop their economy and their individual interests. It is not a document to be trifled with or to be put aside for some draftsman in the Department of Justice to determine what is an appropriate constitutional provision for the people of Canada.

There have been many battles under the BNA Act with regard to interpretation of its provisions. None is more important to the people of eastern Canada, in particular to the people of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, than the dispute over offshore resources. This is a provision which, if it could be solved by the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada, would give rise to an economic development on the east coast which would ensure our prosperity for the future. But it is not being resolved. In fact, in this constitutional provision it is being totally ignored. If we had constitutional changes and reforms of that kind before this House, we would see great co-operation from members like myself, since that is what we need.

We need the kind of constitutional changes which will permit development of Canada, which will permit people on the east coast to develop the economy and resources which exist for the betterment of the people. Instead we are faced with a constitutional provision that guarantees equalization. It guarantees the same kind of federal hand-outs that have been received in the past, which have done nothing for the area and which have only maintained us in our poor economic state. At the same time the Government of Canada ignores those kinds of constitutional changes which would guarantee economic progress on the east coast, particularly in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland.

One must ask: Where are the real interests of the government? Is it really trying to change things in Canada or is it just sloughing off its responsibility? Is it creating a constitutional argument, a constitutional debacle which will take people's minds off real concerns, which will take us away from real solutions to the problems and we will simply become a debating society with no purpose, no objectives and no goals?

I think it is a shame, Mr. Speaker, that we in this House, and others elsewhere across the country, must enter into a constitutional debate. Many people have said this to me time and time again. All I can say is that it was not of the making of the Progressive Conservative Party. We believe in constitutional change and reform. But we believe in a Canada that involves the provinces and the people of Canada in the decision-making and which does not simply force upon people something which members of this House could not possibly know whether or not Canadians are willing to accept.

I have mentioned several times that many Canadians have joined in this constitutional debate. I want to honour Mrs. Norah C. Biron, of Green Cove House, Shore Road, Port Maitland, Nova Scotia. She wrote what I think is a very instructive letter to a Halifax newspaper. She comments on the constitutional proposal and indicates a genuine perplexity with the attitude of the Prime Minister with respect to constitutional reform and change. In her letter to the editor she quotes the Prime Minister as saying:

> Policitians who spend their time and energy complaining about the Constitution are simply trying to find excuses for not doing as good a job as they should. Canada's real problems are not constitutional ones but concern housing shortages, the cost of living and other social problems; those who blame the Constitution for their troubles are deluding themselves in thinking that constitutional changes alone will work some sort of miracle on this continent.

Mrs. Biron was quoting what the Prime Minister said in 1967. She asked in her letter what he is saying now. He apparently has changed his tune. He apparently thinks that changes in the Constitution will result in a better Canada. Well, I do not agree with him. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, he is wrong with respect to a great many of these provisions. He may be wrong on the enshrinement of the so-called legal rights. If he were to consult with Chief Justice Berger of the Supreme Court of the United States he would be told that there is a reign of terror in U.S. cities and that it is related to the constitutional provisions. I can say that because I worked for five years in legal aid. I have defended many criminal offenders, many of whom were charged with murder. I know that at this stage of our development it is highly questionable whether we ought to be giving more rights to criminal offenders in this country than they now have, bearing in mind the reign of terror that Chief Justice Berger says exists in the United States of America and its principal cities. If hon. members do not believe me, they should take a walk through New York City some night.

There are provisions for handicapped persons. I stood in this House under Standing Order 43, and asked the government to change the constitutional provisions to provide for handicapped persons. I wonder if the government really knows what that involves. Is it prepared to finance, for the provincial governments, the programs and the educational system which handicapped persons need? Handicapped persons may have learning disabilities, for example, and they are being denied special training programs. Will the government on the other side of the House really help handicapped persons, or will it merely put a few words into a sterile constitutional provision?

I said I welcomed the opportunity to speak on the constitutional proposal which is before this House and the people of Canada. I hope that by now the people of Canada recognize the true intent of this constitutional proposal and recognize that without the consent and concurrence of the provinces and without the consent and concurrence of the people of Canada it will be a meaningless exercise, a sterile provision which will not help anyone and will cause great division and distortion in the country. Of course the blame will lie at the feet of the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, there are times when I wonder about the intelligence, the sense of duty, the motives and even the loyalty of people who are elected to membership in this House of Commons, which is part of the Parliament of the world's most blessed and beautiful of countries, our Canada. I wonder about their sense of devotion to a country with a proud history, which needs no apology, and a magnificent future, which needs, not meddling, but planning.

I wonder about the quality of Members of Parliament who sit here complacently watching escalating inflation beset our senior citizens and breadwinners, watching our students graduate to unemployment levels where only one in every seven is able to find work, watching our Canadian dollars flow out of the country to pay oil workers in Venezuela and Mexico and to help those countries to become rich at our expense, and watching this government neglect the research and scientific and technological development of the world's richest nation so that our main source of jobs and revenue is through the sale of our valuable resources to foreigners, while our country grows relatively poor and theirs grow richer.

Is it any wonder then that I am reluctant to enter this unnecessary debate when less than 10 per cent of the Canadians surveyed rate it as a low priority issue? This debate, which has wasted a year of Parliament's time, is on an issue which, instead of uniting the people of this vast and diverse land, has divised us all the more. What a legacy this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will have left to Canada's posterity! This is a debate which I enter out of a sense of compulsion. I enter it reluctantly because it is not necessary. The British North America Act and the common law have served us well.

This debate is divisive because it pits region against region and Canadian against Canadian. It is counterproductive. It emphasizes differences instead of cementing similarities of purpose. It is dishonest in that it masks the real issues with which governments should be dealing, and it has used up a whole year in smoke-screening, unwillingness and inability of the government to deal with and solve the real problems of the country.

A member might well ask himself why he should enter into acrimonious debate which can only serve to divide further this wonderful country of ours when the Prime Minister of Canada has clearly indicated that he will not change his mind, no matter what any of us say, on unilateral patriation and on the charter of rights, even though one in every two Canadian is opposed to these actions, even though eight out of ten provinces are opposed, and even though six provinces feel it necessary to take the matter to the courts.

So just what purpose is there in my taking up the valuable time of the Parliament of Canada to speak out against this undemocratic and unCanadian action by the Liberal Government of Canada, which ignores the wishes of the people of Canada whom the government is sworn to serve? Well, let us have it clearly understood: a government is put in place to serve the people of a country. The people do not serve the government. This Trudeau Liberal government, in securing its mandate in the last election, declared it would serve the people in matters of lower cost energy, lower inflation rates, and by instilling a greater sense of unity in a divided country. It made no mention of constitutional change and therefore has no mandate from the people of Canada to carry out these drastic and divisive changes to our Constitution.

If the government believes itself to be right in its views and actions, but if those actions are contrary to the wishes of the majority of the people, then democracy fails. There are many times when complex issues are resolved by Members of Parliament, the representatives of the people, without the direct involvement of the people on complex issues. However, the Constitution of a country cannot be one of those items. The Constitution by which a nation will govern itself into the future is a document which must come from the people and reflect their views and beliefs. It cannot be the unitary and arbitrary act of one man or one political party dancing to the tune of one man. If one man or a small group of people feel they know better than the clearly expressed wishes of the majority and if that small group imposes its will contrary to the wishes of the majority, then democracy is replaced by oligarchy or, even worse, by dictatorship.

My purpose, then, in rising to debate is simply to sound a warning to those who will listen that this government has no mandate and little public support to act as it is acting in relation to the present Constitution of Canada. It is intolerable and inexcusable for this arrogant Prime Minister to say that it does not matter what Canadians think. He will not change his mind on this matter, which is critical to all Canadians and even to unborn generations. Let the Prime Minister take part in this debate—I hope he will—and tell us all why he has such an obsession to give the people a new Constitution, when they already have one, and to amend it in a way that every second Canadian opposes.

Just what is wrong with the present Constitution? We have a partnership agreement with the provinces which has served us well and has built a great nation over the past 114 years. Can it be that the traditional French bitter mistrust of anything British has blinded the Prime Minister to the fact that the British North America Act—which was really designed by Canadians, aided and bolstered by the common law, which was patriated not only to Canada but also to the United States from Great Britain centuries ago and has constantly been amended and updated by Canadians—has successfully protected Canadian rights, Canadian lives and Canadian property right up until the present? The common law, linked to the British North America Act, has bound Canadians together and to the land they love for over a century.

Can the Prime Minister explain how written words or even words chiselled in stone can better protect the rights of a citizen when a government—any government in any future day—can do away with those written words just as easily as the Prime Minister did away with the rights of Quebec citizens under the War Measures Act, for example? It is not that the War Measures Act was wrong or right but simply that it happened, and it can happen again any time a government decides to call an emergency, in spite of golden constitutional words to the contrary.

● (1750)

We are all aware of the world's finest, most flowery constitution, that of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and how it protects the rights of its citizens! I would like to read a few words from it for the benefit of the Prime Minister, although that may be unnecessary, as his inspiration for his own charter of rights may have originated there. Article 2 of the U.S.S.R. charter says:

All power in the U.S.S.R. belongs to the people.

That is great stuff. Article 34 says:

Citizens of the U.S.S.R. are equal before the law, without distinction of origin, social or property status, race or nationality, sex, education, language, attitude to religion, type and nature of occupation, domicile, or other status.

Article 50 reads, in part:

—citizens of the U.S.S.R. are guaranteed freedom of speech, of the press, and of assembly, meetings, street processions and demonstrations.

I wonder what the result would have been in Russia had the recent demonstrations by dissidents in front of Parliament taken place there?

Article 54 states:

Citizens of the U.S.S.R. are guaranteed inviolability of the person.

Article 55:

Citizens of the U.S.S.R. are guaranteed inviolability of the home.

Article 56:

The privacy of citizens, and of their correspondence, telephone conversations, and telegraphic communications is protected by law.

So says the charter. And article 57 says, in part:

Citizens of the U.S.S.R. have the right to protection by the courts against encroachments on their honour and reputation, life and health, and personal freedom and property.

We are all aware of the rights of Russian citizens and the worth of written guarantees. So much for a written constitution!

The BNA Act and the common law have been effective and flexible in protecting Canadians for 114 years, not because of written guarantees but because we Canadians believe in rights and freedoms. If changes are needed from time to time, Parliament can enact new laws to cover any deficiencies, and Parliament does enact new laws every day; every year 100,000 or more new laws emanate from this place.

What does the Prime Minister hope to achieve by switching Canada over to the republican system of government? Does the man who took the guillotine to Parliament in this important constitutional debate wish to become the Charles de Gaulle of Canada and arrange to impose his will on Parliament as de Gaulle was able to do to the Parliament of France for so many years?

What can be said in favour of a new Constitution—new, but still within the parliamentary system incorporating a written charter of rights? In fairness, it must be said that from time to time both the central government and the provinces have been guilty of enacting legislation contrary to the rights and interests of some group or other of Canadians. Examples which come to mind are the Japanese Canadians who were discriminated against in the last war in the same way as Japanese Americans who were protected by a written constitution; the Quebec discrimination against workers from other provinces, a deplorable action by a provincial government which denies the spirit of confederated rights, as well as repeated failures to live up to rights and treaties of native peoples which were not corrected by charters but by intelligence and good will.

The Trudeau charter would attempt to prevent such unfair legislation in future by making it unconstitutional. This is admirable and is deserving of support and careful consideration. But we cannot afford to slap a Constitution together. We must create a just and meaningful Constitution, not an instant one created quickly enough to be passed by Britain, but bad enough that it will have to be passed by Britain because it could not be passed in Canada.

I could applaud such motives and even such actions, if I believed that by just the writing of words, all would be corrected in Canada; that the morning after the proclaiming of the Trudeau Charter of Rights and Freedoms, all Canadians would march arm in arm into the golden dawn. That is not the way life is. Russia certainly has not achieved excellence or individual freedoms by writing a wonderful constitution. Our respected neighbour to the south has not achieved a more hallowed society through the enactment of a ringing constitution. In fact, they have amended their constitution some 26 times in an attempt to reflect changing attitudes.

That is exactly what federal and provincial legislation and the common law have done so well in this country ever since confederation. Why then has the government taken a whole year of time away from valuable economic and social planning if there is so little to be gained from all this discussion? It is a discussion which the people of Canada hold in little regard, and well they might, with inflation of 12 per cent occupying their real concerns in raising their families or in supporting their retirement, or with unemployment staring a million Canadians in the face in a country rich enough in resources to sustain zero unemployment but so poor in government ideas and resolve that it foists an unwanted year of unnecessary debate and bitterness on people who believed that by electing a Liberal government they would get cheap energy and a unified country after the Quebec referendum.

The government promised to keep the increase in the price of gasoline below 18 cents per gallon. It failed to keep that promise, and gasoline rose over 20 cents per gallon in a year.

With a mandate to fight inflation, which it promised to do on behalf of senior citizens, this government has failed by letting inflation rise to 10 per cent in 1980, 12 per cent today, and rolling to a predicted 15 per cent by the end of this year, 1981.

With no mandate to change the Constitution of Canada, no promise to do it, or not to do it if Canadians do not want it done, the government says it is going to do it anyway. Is that responsible government? Is that a government Canadians can trust to deal honestly and capably with our most sacred trust—a constitution for Canada?

You may well ask, just how did this sudden constitutional urgency come about? And why must such important work be subject to an early deadline? There are two reasons. Canadians had rejected the Prime Minister and his Liberal government in 1979 because of its terrible economic mismanagement of the country. Suddenly, the emperor who had quit was the emperor again, and a last ditch opportunity presented itself.

Then the Quebec referendum took place and Canadians rejoiced that Quebecers had opted for confederation, little realizing that Canada's arch socialist would use the occasion as an excuse to change Canada's Constitution under the guise of national unity. As a reward for staying in Canada, he would give Quebec the rest of Canada—as a French socialist republic.

So, with no election mandate and with no demand from Quebec to do so—in fact both political parties opposed the Constitution—this arrogant Liberal government plots to tear down the historical contract under which Canada was built.

I say "contract" because Canada's Constitution, the BNA Act, is a contract, a contract which is the very underpinning by which Canada came together and by which Canadians live. It is a contract entered into by two partners, the provinces on the one hand, and the federal government on the other. While a contract may be broken by either partner, it cannot be the instrument by which one partner can take over the rights and privileges of the other, without consent. Such a takeover would be illegal, and that certainly is the provincial view. Is it any wonder that eight of our ten provinces oppose this Liberal plot? Is it any wonder that two out of three Canadians, 64 per cent of us, are opposed to the unilateral action of an undemocratic government?

In the last Gallup poll, when asked the question if they "preferred to have the Constitution amended by the British parliament to incorporate a bill of rights, and then brought to Canada", four out of five Canadians responded "no". Four out of five Canadians are directly opposed to the very action which this obviously undemocratic government plans to take.

This government, and every one of its members, was elected to represent and enact the wishes of the majority of Canadians. The majority of Canadians are saying, "No, don't change our Constitution in Britain", and the majority of Canadians are not stupid. They, too, have been reluctantly watching the developments of this constitutional debate and they have heard how their rights are being put in jeopardy, not made stronger.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to explore a couple of the rights which have been written, but I see that my time has run out for today. With your permission, may I call it six o'clock and continue tomorrow?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order. It being six o'clock, the House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. tomorrow, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

APPENDIX "A"

ADDRESS of
RONALD WILSON REAGAN
President of the United States of America to

Both Houses of Parliament in the HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA on Wednesday, March 11, 1981

The President was welcomed by the Right Honourable P. E. Trudeau, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Jean Marchand, Speaker of the Senate and Honourable Jeanne Sauvé, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Speaker of the House of Commons): May I call this meeting to order?

Mr. President, we are grateful for the great honour you do us in addressing this joint session of the Senate and the House of Commons. I now invite the Right Honourable the Prime Minister to introduce our distinguished guest.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Madam Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. President and Mrs. Reagan, distinguished American visitors, honourable members of the Senate, members of the House of Commons, Excellences, Mesdames et Messieurs:

Mr. President, yesterday I welcomed you to Canada. I repeat that welcome now because in this chamber Canada's democracy finds its ultimate expression. Here, in a special way, we speak on behalf of the people of Canada, and here the people of Canada are honoured to receive you, Sir.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Nations do not choose their neighbours; geography does that. The sense of neighbourhood, however, is more than a product of geography; it is a creation of people who may live as far apart as California and Quebec. It is what makes neighbours of Canada and Mexico, for instance. Canadians have noted this sense in you, Mr. President, and they know that it gives a particular meaning to your visit to Ottawa.

[Translation]

Our being neighbours is not simply a matter of geography, it is a state of mind. Beyond North America lies the New World which we inhabit by your side. We share the dreams which have made this continent a beacon in the night and a haven of hope for mankind. We share the courage and the love for work which have enabled us to build side by side two great federal states stretching from the Atlantic coast to the distant shores of the Pacific. Our accomplishment is dear to us. We are intent on preserving our heritage, but at the same time we gladly agreed to share with others the prosperity and freedom we found in this land.

[English]

It is right that we should celebrate what we hold in common. At the same time it is necessary that we remember and respect what makes us different.

More than 200 years ago our paths diverged, although our goals remained the same. You created a great republic with a presidential system. We evolved as a constitutional monarchy, under a parliamentary system. You placed yourselves from the outset under a written constitution that you continue to revere today. We are only now finishing the work of writing ours and bringing it home. You fought a tragic civil war. We have recently undergone the experience of a referendum that involved no violence, but nonetheless touched the very fibre of this country.

The differences of history affect our relations today, because they affect our perceptions, our approaches, our priorities. You, Mr. President, would perhaps agree with Thoreau where he says of the United States government:

This government of itself never furthered any enterprise, but by the alacrity with which it got out of its way. It does not settle the west. It does not educate. The character inherent in the American people has done all that has been accomplished.

The character of the Canadian people, Mr. President, has also made Canada. But here in Canada our own realities have sometimes made it necessary for governments to "further enterprise". Those realities and that necessity are still with us today.

[Translation]

Mr. President, you are visiting Canada at a particularly turbulent time in our history. We are in the process of completing the construction of our country. As an American you will appreciate the challenge which we must face. We are attempting to improve our democratic system and to cement our unity. Undoubtedly the din of our labour will reach your ears. However, I can assure you that our stormy but productive discussions will pave the way for a stronger Canada. Indeed, if I may recall a humorist's description of a megalopolis, we have decided that at the close of our current debates we will be "more than a confederation of shopping centres".

In the years to come the United States will be looking at a dynamic neighbour to the North. But putting its own house in order Canada will grow confident in itself. We will establish more clearly where our interests lie and we will pursue them with renewed vigour. One thing will remain unchanged, however: our deep friendship for the United States. In fact, Mr. President, the relations between our two countries will grow at the same time as Canada will grow. Of course, as neighbours we will hold frank discussions. But we have always spoken clearly to each another and our openness was based on mutual respect, as befits two sovereign and equal countries linked by deep friendship.

[English]

Mr. President, you take on your awesome responsibilities at a time of stress and crisis in international affairs. The world badly needs the courage and wisdom of the United States, that courage that it can provide under your leadership, Sir. I speak for all Canadians when I say we are ready to work with you in the cause of stability, security, and humanity.

Your task, our joint task, will not be an easy one. Many people fear that the world has become too complicated, that events have spiralled beyond the control of individuals or governments. They are tempted to give up, to opt out, and to hide from reality and responsibility. That way lies oblivion.

I believe we must neither cower before reality nor oversimplify it. Yet complexity should not obscure plain truth. On this most favoured of continents we cannot simply turn our gaze inwards and ignore poverty, ignorance, and injustice elsewhere.

To the east, Mr. President, we face a system that seems ill-designed to respond to change and growth. Nevertheless, the Soviet Union and the eastern European states may come to accommodate themselves at least to the dynamics of their own region. If, for example, the Polish people are able to work out their own destiny within a framework accepted by their neighbours, then they will have matched revolution with a no less remarkable evolution. Through courage and restraint they will have begun the process of making their reality more Polish and their system more responsive, more adaptable, and ultimately more stable.

In the west, Mr. President, we have a long familiarity with the pressures of change. In the past decade our economies have undergone a severe test as trusted assumptions have been found wanting. In the 1970s we were buffeted by the rule shock of rapid energy price increases. We were forced to recognize that the old monopoly of economic power was coming to an end. And yet, for all the strains upon us, our political and economic framework has survived, survived at least as well as the chicken and the neck to which Winston Churchill once referred to this chamber.

Each of the western countries has met the challenge of change in its own way. Since all of us have our own distinctive economic strengths and weaknesses, our solutions have had to be diverse. We have found no simple answers; we have fashioned no single way. With co-operation and consultation, however, we have been able to complement our various approaches.

At another level, though, we do have a single approach. Let there be no doubt about our unity in the defence of our most precious heritage—that democracy which is envied by those who rightly crave it and feared by those who wrongly deny its force.

As to North and South, we are not dismayed by the complexity of the problems. The poverty of the developing countries does not have to be permanent, nor is it unalloyed. The gap between the two groups is neither racial nor unbridgeable. In the growth of the oil producing states, in the vigour of the newly industrialized countries, there is convincing evidence of the dynamism and potential of the developing world. In the unity of the "south", there is not so much an identity of circumstances as an idea, a point of view, a shared sense of injustice. The poorer peoples are at the mercy of circumstances that leave them out of balance, often out of hope, and too often vulnerable to opportunities who come poaching in troubled waters. The industrialized democracies have not only a human duty but a strategic obligation to help developing countries in their struggle, their survival, and their success.

Mr. President, humanity will prevail. We in the new world can never be pessimists, for we are in a very real sense the custodians of the future. You have reminded us of this, Sir, on both sides of the 49th parallel. You have done so by evoking a past in which both our peoples have been the architects of change, not its victims.

I wish you well in your task and comfort in your burden. May part of that comfort come from the assurance of Canada's abiding friendship for your country and for your people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ronald W. Reagan (President of the United States): Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Madam Speaker of the House of Commons, honourable Senators, members of the House of Commons, distinguished members of the diplomatic corps, ladies and gentlemen:

I came to this great capital of this great nation by crossing a border not which divides us, but a border which joins us.

[Text]

Nous nous sommes souvent serré la main par-dessus cette frontière et nous le faisons une fois encore aujourd'hui.

Des voix: Bravo!

[English]

For those of my own party who accompanied me, I have said that we have often shaken hands across this border and we are doing it once again today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: Nancy and I have arrived for this, the first state visit of my Presidency, in the spirit expressed so well by a Calgary writer and publisher some 60 years ago. He said that the difference between a friend and an acquaintance is that a friend helps where an acquaintance merely advises.

We come here not to advise, not to lecture. We are here to listen and to work with you. We are here as friends, not as acquaintances.

Some years ago Nancy and I both belonged to a very honourable profession in California. And as I prepared for these remarks today, I learned that among those in the motion picture industry in Hollywood it has been estimated that perhaps as many as one out of five are of Canadian origin.

Many of those whom I counted as close professional colleagues, indeed close personal friends, did not come from America's heartland as I did, but from the heart of Canada, as did most of you in this historic chamber.

Art Linkletter, Glenn Ford, Raymond Massey, Walter Pidgeon and Raymond Burr are but a few of your countrymen who are celebrated in our entertainment industry.

I believe I know the very special relationship between Canada and the United States. But with all respect to those few I have mentioned, I can do better than that. A young lady once came to Hollywood from Toronto. Before long, little Gladys Smith was embraced by our entire nation. Gladys Smith of Toronto became Mary Pickford. And I know you will forgive us for adopting her so thoroughly that she became known the world over as "America's sweetheart".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: America's sweetheart was Canadian.

Affinity, heritage, common borders, mutual interests—these have all built the foundation for our strong bilateral relationship. This relationship has grown to include some of the strongest economic links among the nations on this earth.

Some 16 per cent of America's total world trade is done with Canada. Our joint trade amounts to about $90 billion Canadian, annually. This is greater than the gross national product of some 150 countries.

It's estimated that three quarters of a million United States workers are employed in exports to Canada and, in turn, Canadian exports to the United States account for one sixth of your gross national product.

Not only is the vast bulk of this trade conducted between private traders in two free economic systems, but more than half crosses our borders duty-free. Our seaways, highways, airways and rails are the arteries of a massive, interconnecting trade network which has been critically important to both of us.

Thus, while America counts many friends across the globe, surely we have no better friend than Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: And though we share bilateral interests with countries throughout the world, none exceeds the economic, cultural and security interests that we share with you.

These strong and significant mutual interests are among the reasons for my visit here. Already I have shared with Prime Minister Trudeau very helpful discussions across a range of issues, to listen and to ensure that these important ties shall not loosen.

I am happy to say that in the recent past we have made progress on matters of great mutual importance. Our governments have already discussed one of the largest joint private projects ever undertaken by two nations—the pipeline to bring Alaskan gas to the continental United States. We strongly favour prompt completion of this project based on private financing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: We have agreed to an historic liberalization of our trade in the Tokyo Round of the multilateral trade negotiations.

We have continued our efforts, begun with the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement of 1972, to protect our joint heritage in the Great Lakes. We want to continue to work co-operatively to understand and control the air and water pollution that respects no borders.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: During my visit here, I have had the pleasure of participating in the conclusion of two other important agreements. We are renewing the North American Aerospace Defence Command Agreement for five more years. For more than two decades now, NORAD has bound us together in our common defence with an integrated command structure symbolizing our interdependence. This agreement represents continued progress in our relations and mutual security.

Second, we have concluded an agreement regarding social security benefits for those of our citizens who combine work in both nations. With this new agreement, those people who are employed in both countries can be eligible for the combined benefits, and the workers will be eligible for those benefits in whichever country they choose to live.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: Our deep and long time bilateral economic interests lead me to depart from the norm today and give to you a report on America's progress toward economic recovery.

Five weeks ago, I reported to the American people that the U.S. economy faced the worst economic mess since the great world-wide depression. We are a proud people, but we are also realists. The time has come for us to face up to what I described as a potential economic calamity.

I raise this issue today because America holds a genuine belief in its obligation to consult with its friends and neighbours. The economic actions we take affect not just us alone but the relationships across our borders as well.

As we examined America's economic illness, we isolated a number of contributing factors. Our federal government has grown explosively in a very short period of time. We found that there had grown up a maze of stifling regulations which began to crush initiative and deaden the dynamic industrial innovation which brought us to where we are. We saw unbelievable deficits, this year alone reaching up to nearly $80 billion, including off-budget items.

We found that these deficits got in no one's way because the government found it easy to fuel inflation by printing more money just to make up the difference.

The American taxing structure, the purpose of which was to serve the people, began instead to serve the insatiable appetite of government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: If you will forgive me, someone has once likened the government to a baby: it is an alimentary canal with an appetite at one end and no sense of responsibility at the other!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: Our citizens were being thrown into higher tax brackets for simply trying to keep pace with inflation. In just the last five years, federal personal taxes for the average American household have increased 58 per cent. The results: crippling inflation, interest rates which went above 20 per cent, a national debt approaching a trillion dollars, nearly eight million people out of work, and a steady three-year decline in productivity.

We decided not just to complain but to act. In a series of messages and actions, we have begun the slow process of stopping the assault on the American economy and returning to the strong and steady prosperity that we once enjoyed.

It is very important for us to have our friends and partners know and understand what we are doing. Let me be blunt and honest. The United States in the last few years has not been as solid and stable an ally and trading partner as it should be. How can we expect certain things of our friends if we don't have our own House in order?

Americans are uniting now as they always have in times of adversity. I have found there is a wellspring of spirit and faith in my country which will drive us forward to gain control of our lives and restore strength and vitality to our economic system. But we act not just for ourselves, but to enhance our relationships with those we respect.

First, we are taking near revolutionary steps to cut back the growth in federal spending in the United States. We are proposing that instead of having our national budget grow at the unacceptable rate of 14 per cent per year, it should rise at a more sensible 6 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: This enables us to maintain the kind of growth we need to protect those in our society who are truly dependent on government services.

Just yesterday, I submitted our proposed budget for the coming year, and then immediately crossed the border.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Reagan: With extraordinary effort we have isolated some 83 items for major savings and hundreds more for smaller savings, which together amount to $48.6 billion in the coming fiscal year.

Our second proposal is a 10 per cent cut across the board every year for three years in the tax rates for all individual income taxpayers, making a total cut in tax rates of 30 per cent. This will leave our taxpayers with $500 billion more in their pockets over the next five years and create dramatic new incentives to boost productivity and fight inflation. When these personal cuts are combined with tax cuts to provide our business and industry with new capital for innovation and growth, we will be creating millions of new jobs many of them, ultimately, on your side of the border.

Our third proposal is to eliminate those unproductive and unnecessary regulations which have slowed down our growth and added to our inflationary burdens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: We shall do this with care, while still safeguarding the health and safety of the American people—and, I might add, while mindful of our responsibility to have equal regard for the health and safety of our neighbours.

Finally, we will be working closely with our federal reserve system to achieve stable and moderate growth patterns in our money supply.

As I said, America's program for economic recovery is designed not merely to solve an internal problem. It is viewed by my administration as part of an essential effort to restore the confidence of our friends and allies in what we are doing.

When we gain control of our inflation, we can once again contribute more helpfully to the health of the world economy. We believe that confidence will rise, interest rates will decline, and investment will increase. As our inflation is reduced, your citizens and other world citizens will have to import less inflation from us.

As we begin to expand our economy once again and as our people begin to keep more control of their own money, we will be better trading partners. Our growth will help fuel the steady prosperity of our friends.

The control we regain over our tax and regulatory structures will have the effect of restoring steady growth in U.S. productivity. Our goods will go into markets not laden down with the drag of regulatory baggage or punitive levies, but with a competitive edge that helps us and those who trade with us.

Such new sustained prosperity, in an era of reduced inflation, will also serve world-wide to help all of us resist protectionist impulses. We want open markets. We want to promote lower costs globally. We want to increase living standards throughout the world. That is why we are working so hard to bring about this economic renewal.

There are, of course, other very important reasons for us to restore our economic vitality. Beyond our shores and across this troubled globe the good word of the United States, and its ability to remain stable and dependable, rely in good part on our having a stable and dependable economy.

Projecting solid internal strengths is essential to the west's ability to maintain peace and security in the world. Thus, our national interests, our bilateral interests and our hemispheric interests are profoundly involved in truly international questions.

That's why we must act now, why we can no longer be complacent about the consequences of economic deterioration. We have entered an era which commands the alliance to restore its leadership in the world. And before we can be strong in the world, we must be once again strong at home.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: Our friend, our ally, our partner, and our neighbour, Canada, and the United States have always worked together to build a world with peace and stability, a world of freedom and dignity for all people.

Now, with our other friends, we must embark with great spirit and commitment on the path toward unity and strength.

On this side of the Atlantic, we must stand together for the integrity of our hemisphere, for the inviolability of its nations, for its defence against imported terrorism, and for the rights of all our citizens to be freed from the provocations triggered from outside our sphere for malevolent purposes.

Across the oceans, we stand together against the unacceptable Soviet invasion into Afghanistan and against continued Soviet adventurism across the earth.

And toward the oppressed and dispirited people of all nations, we stand together as friends ready to extend a helping hand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: I say to you, our Canadian friends—and to all nations who will stand with us for the cause of freedom—our mission is more than simply making do in an untidy world. Our mission is what it has always been—to lift the world's dreams beyond the short limits of our sights and to the far edges of our best hopes.

This will not be an era of losing liberty; it shall be one of gaining it.

This will not be an era of economic pessimism, of restraint and retrenchment; it will be one of restoration, growth, and expanding opportunities for all men and women.

And we will not be here merely to survive; we will be here, in William Faulkner's words, to prevail—to regain our destiny and our mutual honour.

Sometimes it seems that, because of our comfortable relationship, we dwell perhaps a bit too much on our differences. I, too, have referred to the fact that we do not agree on all issues. We share so many things with each other; yet, for good reasons, we insist on being different to retain our separate identities.

This captured the imagination of Ernest Hemingway when he worked as a writer for the Toronto Star Weekly in 1922. Hemingway was travelling in Switzerland and he noted that the Swiss made no distinction between Canadians and citizens of the United States. He wondered about this and asked an hotelkeeper if he didn't notice any difference between the people from the two countries.

"Monsieur", he said to Hemingway, "Canadians speak English and always stay two days longer at any place than Americans do." As you know, I shall be returning to Ottawa in July and, if you don't mind, I'll plan to stay as long as everyone else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: I am not here today to dwell on our differences. When President Eisenhower spoke from this spot in 1953, he noted his gratitude as Allied Commander in World War II for the Canadian contribution to the liberation of the Mediterranean. This touched my curiosity, and even though I had participated in that war myself, I did a little research.

In the Second World War there was something called the 1st Special Service Force, a unique international undertaking at the time. This force was composed of Canadians and Americans distributed equally throughout its ranks, carrying the flags of both nations. They served under a joint command, were taught a hybrid close-order drill, and trained together as paratroopers, demolition experts, ski troops and, then, as an amphibious unit.

The 1st Special Service Force became famous for its high morale, its rugged abilities, and tough fighting in situations where such reputations were hard-earned. Alerted to their availability, General Eisenhower requested them for special reconnaissance and raiding operations during the winter advance up the Italian peninsula. They were involved in the Anzio beachhead campaign in Italy and were at the spearhead of the forces that captured Rome.

The 1st Special Service Force made no distinctions when it went into battle. Its men had the common cause of freedom at their side and the common denominator of courage in their hearts. They were neither Canadian nor American. They were, in General Eisenhower's term, liberators.

So let's speak no more of differences today. Certainly your Ambassador, Ken Taylor, didn't when he first sheltered, and then spirited, six Americans out of the centre of Tehran and brought them to their freedom.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reagan: Their daring escape worked not because of our differences but because of our shared likenesses.

A final word to the people of Canada.

We are happy to be your neighbour; we want to remain your friend; we are determined to be your partner; and we are intent on working closely with you in a spirit of co-operation. We are much more than an acquaintance.

Merci. Thank you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean Marchand (The Speaker of the Senate): Mr. President, Mr. Prime Minister, Madam Speaker of the House of Commons:

To receive you in our capital and our Parliament represents for us, President and Mrs. Reagan, not only a great joy and singular honour, but also the visible assurance that our traditional ties of friendship hold strong despite international upheavals whose shock waves have not spared our own continent, forced as we are to march more and more in step with even the most far-flung regions of an increasingly interdependent world.

On behalf of the Senate of Canada, I would like to transmit our heartfelt gratitude that you have chosen, at this very earliest stage of your mandate, to reinforce the foundation of a unique relationship based not just on a common interest shared by our two peoples, but also on a common spirit and aspiration. While recognizing our differences and respective sovereignty and in full appreciation of our respective stature and resources, we know that we are natural allies and that only blindness, or at least a lack of vision, can threaten this bond.

[Translation]

By seeking common ground in our national viewpoints, we will not only be doing ourselves a mutual service, but also contributing to the betterment of life among our brothers in other nations. If our roles are sometimes different, they are nonetheless complementary and our goals must be the same. To paraphrase an old maxim: "We who imagine we can do without the world deceive ourselves greatly; but those who fancy that the world cannot do without them deceive themselves even more." Long live the United States of America, long live Canada, long live peace between men and between nations.

[English]

Thank you, Mr. President.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Mr. President, you have accorded Canada the distinction of being the recipient of your first official visit as President of the United States. We are touched by this honour which strengthens our awareness of the long-standing ties which link us to those we call our neighbours to the South.

Our peoples, diverse in their origins, share a history which has brought us together on a vast continent, one which both your people and ours have explored and developed. Our cultural influences derive from the same sources and unite us in a common civilization. We have, since our beginnings, built on the strength inherited from our pioneers, who were led by many different circumstances, political and economic, to the North American continent.

It goes without saying that an unfailing friendship exists between us. We applied ourselves to the task of building a prosperous country, inviting those elsewhere who sought adventure or aspired to live in freedom to come and settle with us.

From such a sequence of events, varied and often dramatic, the United States and Canada were born. While many similarities unite us, the differences we manifest are the signs of the distinct personalities which finally gave our countries their identity.

[Translation]

When we look to the United States, we see a people that is industrious, dynamic, bold to the point of recklessness and that for a long time has been known for the scope of its discoveries and the uniqueness of its achievements. You explored space, walked on the moon and amazed the world by making dreams come true. This is proof of the spirit, enthusiasm, genius and perennial youth of America. Throughout the world, people look to you not only for inspiration but also for help and advice.

[English]

For our part, we have profited from your energy and dynamism. Our destiny, no matter how we view it, is closely tied to yours in our pursuit of individual freedom and the promotion of the social and economic betterment of our peoples. The contacts between us are many and varied. Both our countries wish to maintain their respective identities while working together, each in a different way, to build a universal civilization. Your culture, your arts, your literature, your science and your technology are marvellously impressive. Our lives have been enriched by them and they have inspired our own efforts. Your example is an encouragement to us, as Canadians, to marshal our physical and intellectual resources towards the creation of a society which reflects our essential Canadian character.

Mr. President, we have listened to you with great interest. We have paid close attention to your comments, mindful of the fact that you mean to lead your country along the paths which appear to you to be the best; and that you will do so with boldness, honesty and sincerity.

As has always been the case in the past, we shall be happy to find ourselves at your side in meeting the challenges which face us all. We shall co-operate with you, and with other countries, whenever the need arises, in promoting universal well-being and protecting the peace of the world.

Mr. President, Mrs. Reagan, in expressing our thanks and appreciation, we ask you also to accept our assurance of the respect and friendship which we feel for you and your country.

I now adjourn this meeting.

THE ECONOMY

SUGGESTED INTRODUCTION OF NEW BUDGET—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of some urgency. President Reagan, in this chamber yesterday morning, drew attention to measures his government is taking to cut growth in federal spending, decrease personal income taxes, and eliminate unproductive and unnecessary regulatory structures which stifle economic growth. In light of the fact this country suffers from identical pressures to its economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek):

That this government take immediate steps to bring down a new budget to meet the same kind of urgent and pressing economic problems created by this government by reason of its profligate spending and total lack of control over the economy in general.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Recently the British Labour Party urged the parliamentary labour party to vote against the constitutional resolution in the British House of Commons. Whereas four members of the federal NDP have stated that they will not support the constitutional resolution in this House of Commons, along with NDP Premier Blakeney's opposition to the package as a whole, and because, on the other hand, the secretary of the federal New Democratic Party, Mr. Robin Sears, has urged the British Labour Party to support the constitutional resolution, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson):

That this House urges that, prior to the NDP stating their final position on the constitutional resolution, Mr. Broadbent, the Leader of the NDP, convene a meeting of Socialist International to include "the four horsemen" from his own caucus, the Premier of Saskatchewan as well as himself, so that the position of Socialist International can be clarified in order to avoid any misunderstandings to the British and Canadian public.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BANKS AND BANKING

INCREASE IN PROFITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that profits of eight major chartered banks soared to $459 million during the first quarter of 1981, with the Royal Bank pocketing a 76 per cent increase in profits, the Bank of Commerce 69 per cent, and the Bank of B.C. winning a 218 per cent bonanza, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae):

That this House urge the government to stop this blatant profiteering by Canada's chartered banks and force them, as a condition of doing business, to allocate a significant portion of their profits for a mortgage assistance fund which will reduce mortgage interest rates to help young Canadians purchase a first home.

Madam Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

CALL FOR REDUCTION IN IMPORTS OF FOOTWEAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Normand Lapointe (Beauce): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 in connection with an urgent matter. In view of the increased imports of footwear in Canada; in view of the conclusion of the Anti-dumping Tribunal to the effect that in the absence of quotas, the share of the market taken by the domestic producers would have continued to decline, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) look fully into the possibility of taking special steps to protect other than rubber footwear in countries with low salaries, in order to allow Canadian industries to proceed with their restructuring.

[English]

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

CREATION OF ECONOMIC SLACK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, in view of the unprecedented and alarming numbers of bankruptcies and near bankruptcies among energy-related small businesses in western Canada, directly as a result of the federal government's energy policies, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That this House request a statement from the Prime Minister and the minister responsible for energy, confirming the policy of creating deliberate economic slack and uncertainty so as to place the federal government in a position of dominance in its avowed aims of socializing the oil and gas industry.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUS OF WOMEN

REVIEW OF COMPOSITION OF ADVISORY COUNCIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, the continuing internal conflict within the Advisory Council on the Status of Women was illustrated yesterday by the announcement of two more resignations and two transfers from the highly qualified research staff. It was also confirmed that a former employee will sue the council. At this very time groups representing women from all walks of Canadian life are calling for a constructive and objective review of the advisory council in order to restore its credibility. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

● (1410)

That this House demand a full, external and independent review of the composition and function of the advisory council.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

METRIC CONVERSION

SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, the United States Congress has decided at this time to take the advice of the American Metric Commission not to proceed with metric conversion in retail stores in the United States.

The steering group for scale conversion in Canadian food stores met recently in Canada and they unanimously agreed that they should not proceed with metric in the retail food stores in Canada, not being in concert with the United States. Since the Metric Commission insists on full speed ahead and damning the torpedoes, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington):

That this government introduce at once legislation prohibiting the Metric Commission from proceeding with its course of forced metric conversion in the retail food sector without first obtaining either the consent of the retail merchants in Canada or the Canadian consumers.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CONSTITUTION

RIGHT TO LIFE OF UNBORN CHILDREN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Recognizing that Clause 7 of the proposed charter of rights purports to guarantee "everyone the right to life" but that in the recent case of Dehler v. Ottawa Civic Hospital, on which leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada has now been denied by that court, our courts have indicated that unborn persons are not recognized as protectable persons, and fearing that the entrenchment of the proposed wording would render it unconstitutional for the Parliament of Canada to enact legislation to protect unborn Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges):

That Clause 7 be amended to read as follows:

Everyone, including unborn human beings, has the right to life. Everyone has the right to liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PETRO-CANADA

ACQUISITION OF PETROFINA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Madam Speaker, whereas it has come to light that in the takeover of Petrofina by Petro-Canada the officers of Petrofina have made over $400,000 in share trading, so much money that one wag has called it the "lotofina" takeover; and whereas the insiders' report for the end of January will show that Mr. Dodd, a vice-president of Petrofina, made $40,000 two business days before the public announcement, bringing this total now close to $500,000, therefore under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That since the minister of energy will do nothing about this situation, this House refer the matter to the national resources committee to investigate so that we can see if this is just another case of getting lucky.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

DISARMAMENT

SUPPORT FOR WORLD REFERENDUM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the unanimous agreement of UN member states in 1978 that mankind must "proceed to disarmament or face annihilation", and in view of the statement by Prime Minister Trudeau in the 1980 Speech from the Throne that "the issue of disarmament is no less than the survival of humanity on this planet", and in view of the fact that the arms race continues at a cost of $500 billion a year in spite of massive nuclear overkill potential, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour):

That this House support in principle the concept of a world referendum on balanced disarmament, so the people of all nations can express their support for the establishment of a concrete, gradual disarmament process.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ACID RAIN—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the United States Congress is now considering sweeping changes to the U.S. clean air act—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The Chair is unable to hear what the hon. member is proposing. Could we have order?

Mr. McMillan: In view of the fact that the United States Congress is now considering sweeping changes to the U.S. clean air act, some of which would drastically increase acid rain in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That this House urge the Canadian Minister of the Environment to make vigorous representations to the U.S. government, in particular the U.S. environmental protection agency, to protect Canada's interests in this vital area.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES—REPORTED WINDFALL PROFITS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It relates to a double standard which the government is following in relation to oil profits and oil pricing. On January 1 the government introduced the petroleum compensation charge on all oil delivered to refineries after that date, but it did not apply the charge to the oil which the refineries had in inventory at that time. At the same time, the oil companies increased the prices equivalent to $2.50 a barrel. That resulted in an unearned windfall profit on 70 million barrels in inventory at that time at $2.50 a barrel for a total of $170 million. In view of the concern that consumers have about the cost of oil in this country and the profits made by the oil companies, why did the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources acquiesce in these windfall profits at the expense of consumers in this country?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I note with gratification the interest of the official opposition for the consumer rather than for the oil companies these days. I must tell the hon. member that I do not agree with his conclusion.

Mr. Wilson: Madam Speaker, that is the sort of answer I expect from the minister when he has not done his homework. I hope that the next time he is asked a question about a $170 million rip-off by the oil companies to which he has acquiesced, he will have a better answer than that. Let me draw his attention to the fact that in the wellhead increase in the price of oil, there is a delay of two months, in the last increase from January 1 to March 1. Surely the minister is able to exercise his moral suasion on the oil companies to enforce a delay with regard to implementation of the petroleum compensation charge. There will be two other examples of this kind in the next two years. The total amount will be some $350 million more if the minister does not take action now. May I ask the minister why he did not take action on January 1 to stop that rip-off?

Mr. Lalonde: I repeat, Madam Speaker, that I disagree with the hon. member's analysis. I will take note of his representation, but I must tell him that his analysis of the situation does not correspond to the one we have made.

Mr. Wilson: I would have thought that if the minister had a better explanation for it, he would have told it to us.

PETRO-CANADA

ACQUISITION OF MERIT PETROLEUM—REASON FOR CHANGE IN SERVICE STATION PRICES

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is in relation to another area where I believe the government has been delinquent in encouraging greater competition in the oil industry in this country. It relates to the purchase of Merit Petroleum by Petro-Canada. Petro-Canada was a supplier of product to Merit and, prior to the acquisition when Merit was cut off by a major supplier, Petro-Canada had the opportunity to keep that company in business by increasing its supply. Since then, Petro-Canada has announced it is going to convert the Merit discount stations to full price service stations. Can the minister explain why Petro-Canada did not increase the supply to Merit and why it is moving to convert these stations from discount stations to full price stations, both matters which will affect the consumer adversely?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I will certainly inquire of Petro-Canada, and I will be happy to report to the hon. member as soon as I receive their answer.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF NEW POLICY

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and it flows from the initial question.

The minister has continually referred to a Canadian-owned oil company, namely, Husky Oil Limited, as an example of one which supports our National Energy Program. I obtained the record of the minutes of a National Energy Board meeting of just last month, and I should like to bring this to the attention of the minister. The question asked of Husky Oil was:

> What is the impact of the present economic regime on the viability of development drilling?

The answer by Husky Oil was:

> The combination of the petroleum and gas revenues tax, PGRT, provincial royalties, and the wellhead pricing schedule has, for all practical purposes, eliminated any profit potential of these investments.

Who is telling the truth? Is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources prepared to stand up in this House and say that his energy policy does not need revamping? When will he introduce a new oil energy policy that will bring jobs, employment, and economic growth not only to the west and the east but to central Canada as well?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, what I have indicated in this House has been that Husky Oil indicated it was increasing its investment this year—exploration and development expenditures—compared to last year. The record will show what I said at that time, if my hon. friend wants to check.

As far as the energy program is concerned, some problems have been identified and we have made adjustments to take into account those problems, whether they relate to exploration expenses or the definition of Canadian owned and controlled corporations. These modifications and changes have meant significant improvements in the program in terms of advantages to Canadian owned and controlled companies.

We have indicated quite clearly at meetings with Canadian owned companies that aggressive investors are better off under the National Energy Program than they would have been under a continuation of the previous policy. That is what we want. We want a strong, aggressive and prosperous Canadian sector in the oil and gas industry of this country.

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, the minister is either intentionally or unintentionally misleading this House.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Domm: The fact is to the contrary.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member would have some interest in rephrasing that question. He knows one cannot say that someone has intentionally tried to mislead the House.

An hon. Member: He said "either," "or".

Mr. Domm: Madam Speaker, the minister is unintentionally misleading this House. The fact of the matter is that Husky Oil qualifies its commitment for investment and growth in the future by saying, "if the energy policy was to change." Since the minister shows no evidence whatsoever of changing the energy policy, in view of the recent cuts in oil production in the west, and in view of the lack of revenue because of the Lalonde levy, as it is often referred to, will the minister advise this House whether he intends to offset this loss of revenue to cover the subsidy for imported oil by any other means than the one which is not working, and that is the Lalonde levy?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I will try to reply to the hon. member in French since he seems to have difficulty understanding English. Again I must repeat that several changes have been made to the National Energy Program so as to take into account the peculiar hardships which certain sectors of the industry may have been facing, and that those changes have been translated into sizeable improvements for that industry.

I am still holding discussions with the government of Saskatchewan, where Husky Oil Ltd. has major investments, with a view to concluding an agreement with the province under which Husky Oil Ltd. in particular and other companies operating in Saskatchewan will benefit from considerable incentives to pursue their objectives. As indicated by Husky Oil Ltd., one of several problems is the very high royalty rate levied by the Saskatchewan government. As a whole, however, the over-all parameters and the general trends that have been set in our National Energy Program are part and parcel of government policy, and we are convinced that once again they will enable Canada's petroleum industry to achieve all the objectives we expect from it in the coming years.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

IMPERIAL OIL CORPORATION—QUERY RESPECTING TAX DEDUCTIBILITY OF ADVERTISING EXPENSES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. Newspapers across Canada are today carrying full-page ads by the Imperial Oil Corporation, and I show one example to the minister here. The ads challenge the 12-year study which accumulated evidence demonstrating the oil companies have ripped off some $12 billion from Canadian consumers.

Would the minister confirm that these ads constitute another rip-off of the Canadian consumer, because they are deductible items from expenses the corporation can file, and therefore have to be made up by other Canadian taxpayers?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would not want me to second-guess the conclusions he has drawn.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, just for once we do not want second-guessing. We would like a straight answer from the Liberal minister. That is what we would like.

An hon. Member: Lots of luck.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister did not give us a straight answer because he knows that the ads can be deducted from the expenses.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Criminal seduction.

Mr. Broadbent: Which means the people of Canada are being seduced by these companies. I would like to ask the minister, while making it clear that Imperial Oil or any other company should have the right to advertise, does he not agree that political advertising of this kind should not be underwritten by the taxpayers of Canada but should be paid completely and solely by the companies themselves?

Mr. MacEachen: Madam Speaker, I am rather enjoying the hon. member's effort to convey a point of view in question period but, as he knows, I do not engage in the kind of propaganda outburst that he is exploiting at the moment.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the minister runs a close second to that of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in not engaging in anything in the real world of politics.

PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL COMPANIES—CALL FOR ROLLBACK TO COMPENSATE CONSUMERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Over a week ago this admirable minister, this outspoken advocate for consumers in Canada, said that he would investigate the 5-cent a gallon increase the oil companies piggybacked on March 1 onto other increases in the price of oil. Considering that after eight years of studying corporate rip-offs by the oil companies showing they took at least $12 billion more from Canadian consumers than they ought to have taken, and the only thing the government has done has been to set up another two-year study, would he, at least in the case of these rip-offs that came over a week ago, announce today that some justice is going to be restored to Canadian consumers by the government ordering the oil companies to roll back that increase?

● (1430)

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Postmaster General): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asked that question last week. I would urge him to let the director of investigations complete his work. As soon as the director submits his report, I will be very glad to answer the hon. member in the House.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

IMPACT ON PROVINCIAL REVENUES

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. A budget was brought down in British Columbia on Monday. The price of gasoline was raised 1.6 cents per litre, or 7 cents per gallon, to compensate for the much diminished provincial revenues in the oil and natural gas sector due to increased federal intrusion. Is the minister aware of the secondary results of his National Energy Program? If so, does he intend to do anything about it?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I am only sorry that the hon. member believes the Socred propaganda of that particular government in its budget.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. It is now quite clear that the National Energy Program, which was announced as part of the federal budget, is really a grab for money by the federal government, which takes money away from provincial revenues. In this particular case British Columbia was forced to increase prices on the individuals in that province. Does the minister consider this new federal form of taxation, which taxes only one part of Canada, that is, British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, fair? Does he not realize how much this policy appears to contribute to alienation in western Canada?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, what contributes most to alienation in this country is the type of total misrepresentation put forward by the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, every gas consumer in this country is paying the same amount of federal tax under the last budget. As the hon. member knows, there are many more consumers of natural gas in Ontario than there are in British Columbia. Those consumers pay the same federal tax that the people in British Columbia are paying. To stand up in this House and make the type of allegation that the hon. member has made is totally irresponsible. He should be ashamed of himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DEPARTMENTAL ADVERTISING EXPENDITURES

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It relates to political energy advertising, although it is not the type referred to by the Leader of the NDP. My question involves the expenditure of tax dollars.

In view of press reports this week that the minister's department is authorizing a $3.25 million energy advertising campaign to sell the Liberal energy policies to Canadians, how can the minister justify that expenditure of tax dollars in light of the commitment made last fall by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism that the government would not use tax dollars to sell Liberal policies which have not been approved by Parliament? I ask this question particularly in view of the fact that elements of the national energy policy are before Parliament now, or have yet to be brought before Parliament.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, the hon. member might have a case if the allegation he makes were true, but it is not.

My department has a budget for public information and advertising. There were a number of expenditures approved by this House at the time of the budget concerning programs which would be of great benefit to Canadians in terms of achieving conservation of energy and in terms of achieving energy self-sufficiency. Those programs have been approved. The expenditure of funds allocated under the estimates and under those programs will begin very soon, as soon as we can have the administrative machinery in place.

It is the duty of this House, and the duty of the government, to inform the Canadian public of the programs for which they are eligible in order to achieve the objectives of self-sufficiency and energy conservation. I certainly intend to fulfil my duty under the rules of this House and under the government's responsibility to inform Canadians of the programs for which they are eligible. I think that is my duty as minister of energy, and I intend to fulfil that duty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, it is Liberal propaganda financed by Canadian taxpayers' dollars that we are talking about.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: Madam Speaker, the minister knows, and it is reported that Albertans may receive a highly political message from Ottawa in a brochure arguing Ottawa's energy case.

In view of the lack of concern by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, I would like to put my supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board, who is responsible for government spending. How does the minister justify the expenditure of $3.25 million worth of taxpayers' money on Liberal propaganda at a time when the government is telling Canadian pensioners that it does not have the money which is necessary to insulate them from higher prices?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, once again I will reply in French. I have already said that the department advertising program has to do with the over-all objective of the government to conserve energy and achieve self-sufficiency in energy. The budget has been brought down and the estimates were tabled in the House to earmark huge amounts for ensuring that Canadians will have an opportunity to benefit from programs and grants which will make it possible for them to achieve those objectives of self-sufficiency and conservation.

Our advertising campaign will be aimed at making Canadians aware of those programs so they will be able to benefit from them. My colleague and friend is referring to a newspaper article, so I would urge him to check the facts instead. As for the possibility of a brochure being addressed to Alberta residents, it is clearly stated in that article that it is a suggestion which I am now studying. I would remind him that the Alberta government has sent to all residents of the province a brochure in which the federal policy is very harshly criticized. I have no hesitation whatsoever in arguing that indeed the government has every right to react to that kind of brochure should it so decide. However, I must also remind the hon. member that no such decision has yet been taken.

LABOUR RELATIONS

B.C. TELEPHONE COMPANY DISPUTE—SIGNING OF RETURN TO WORK AGREEMENT

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Labour, or whomever is responding for him. It concerns the length of the deplorable British Columbia Telephone Company dispute. There has been a proposal by labour arbitrators in British Columbia that a return to work agreement be signed between the company and the union and that all outstanding issues, including the suspension of 24 employees, be settled through the efforts of a sole arbitrator, following the return to work of all employees, including the 24 who have been suspended. Last Monday there were 14 summonses issued by the attorney general's office of British Columbia. Although there have been no charges laid, to my knowledge, the disposition of any charges resulting from these summonses could delay the return to work for months. The sole arbitrator proposal has been accepted by the union. Can the Minister of Labour tell us whether he supports this idea of the sole arbitrator proposal, and would he back it?

Mr. Louis R. Desmarais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the labour dispute in British Columbia has been complicated by the inclusion of a clause which said that the whole agreement was subject to CRTC approval of a rate increase. That has now been dropped and federal meetings are under way in B.C. to settle the only outstanding issue in this dispute, which is the return to work agreement. The meetings began the day before yesterday. We are hopeful that an agreement will result very soon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CALL FOR ROLLBACK OF RATE INCREASE

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister, if I could have his attention. The people of British Columbia are fed up with this dispute. They feel that it has gone on long enough. Unconscionable profits are being made because the phone bills continue while the wage package shrinks. There is no service; the service in British Columbia is deplorable. Will the Prime Minister consider positively a proposal to cabinet that the February CRTC rate increase be rolled back and that a rebate be given to the ill-served, ill-considered consumers or, better still, that B.C. Tel, like the telephone companies of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, be brought under public ownership?

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST CERTAIN OFFICIALS IN QUEBEC

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Jonquière): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. A few months ago, the clerical workers in the federal public service clamoured for the decent salaries and improved working conditions they were entitled to. Following this dispute which was settled thanks to the understanding of the President of the Treasury Board, haphazard and erratic disciplinary action has just been taken against many workers, including 38 of the 50 employees of the Canada Manpower Centre in Jonquière. Can the Minister give us the assurance that he has assessed the situation and considered all the circumstances before this action was taken, and that the employees in Jonquière or in Quebec, who seem to have been hit harder than those elsewhere in the country, have not been discriminated against?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Jonquière for his question. The Quebec clerks have not been dealt with more severely than those in other provinces. I can give this assurance to my colleague and to other members of the House.

STATUS OF WOMEN

REVIEW OF COMPOSITION OF ADVISORY COUNCIL

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the status of women. As the minister will know, the council announced that it is ready to conduct an internal review of its operations, having failed to recognize that the capacity and the credibility of the council to review itself have been radically undermined by the resignation of its president and then five board members, by the loss of much of its excellent research staff, and by the launching of a $1.3 million lawsuit. In light of this evidence, and in light of the ongoing public discussion, will the minister agree to appeal again to his cabinet colleagues for an independent and external review of the advisory council?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member examines his statement he will realize that he is in danger of coming down with an acute case of hypercontradiction. On the one hand he previously suggested and argued that the advisory council should be allowed to maintain its independent status. Now he is asking whether we should try to interfere in the decisions of the council. He cannot have it both ways.

An hon. Member: Why not? You can.

Mr. Axworthy: We are trying to stay consistent on our position that the advisory council is an independent body.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: It decides its own opinions on its own judgment, and we respect this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McLean: Madam Speaker, where I come from if a doctor is sick he usually does not prescribe for himself; he gets another doctor to look at his illness.

I have a supplementary question for the minister. If he is not prepared to recognize the sickness surrounding the council at the moment, in light of the fact that six appointments were made to the advisory council last week, with very little consultation, and six more appointments will be made by June, will the minister assure the House that future nominations will be widely sought and that the review the council will do of itself will be made public before these three-year appointments are made?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, again I suggest to the hon. member that if he is talking about sickness perhaps the worst problem is some of those people, including himself, who are surrounding this particular council with their own form of doomsaying and not letting it get on with its job to represent the points of view of women in this country—

Mr. Clark: And the point of view of the Liberal Party.

Mr. Axworthy: —and to deal with the substance of issues. The real heart of the matter is better equality for women. That council has had appointed to it some of the outstanding women of this country who are prepared to sit on that council at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

QUERY RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF RATIONING

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is with regard to the impact of the National Energy Program on Canadian oil production. Is the minister aware of the fact that by the end of April there will be 120 fewer oil rigs in Canada, that investment in Canadian oil production will be 30 per cent less than last year, and that in January and February of this year there was a 15 per cent increase in the amount of oil imports? According to the Canadian Petroleum Association this will amount to something like $182 billion extra over the next ten years to Canadian consumers. Does the minister understand the collision course the government is on, with the need of Canadians for oil? Does he have a rationing program in place now to take care of those needs, and how quickly can he implement it?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, one of the main reasons for the increase in imports recently has been the cutback by the government of Alberta—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: —by 60,000 barrels per day. This is regrettable, but it has taken place.

Mr. Clark: It is not true.

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the energy program is concerned, as I said we have made some adjustments to ensure that the industry will be in a position to make profits and that Canadian firms, in particular, will be able to grow much faster than in the past. We are convinced that this can be achieved.

Also I have indicated that we were willing to undertake further discussions with the producing provinces in order to arrive at a satisfactory arrangement.

Mr. Nielsen: What about rationing?

Mr. Lalonde: I hope these negotiations and discussions will take place.

Mr. Gurbin: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will know that Alberta did not turn down the tap until at least the end of February of this year. The figures I gave him were for January and February of this year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gurbin: The real point that Canadians do not understand is that Alberta is running out of cheap conventional oil. It just simply is not there, and the National Energy Program is doing nothing to provide for its replacement.

ROLE OF POST OFFICE IN DISTRIBUTING RATIONING COUPONS

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Postmaster General. He will know that there is an ongoing survey in the Post Office which is looking at the ability of the post office network to provide for the distribution of gas rationing coupons. Will the minister table this survey, explain it to us now, and tell us how quickly he feels the Post Office will be able to implement gas rationing coupon distribution?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member that we have included a complete program of self-sufficiency for this decade in the National Energy Program, and that self-sufficiency will be assured mainly by the production of the tar sands, heavy oils, and also offshore discoveries in the Arctic. The National Energy Program has all the necessary instruments to achieve that purpose.

As far as the question raised by the hon. member is concerned, I understand that it was raised in the House a couple of days ago. There is no foundation whatever to the notion that there will be a planning of a rationing scheme to be put into effect in this country in current circumstances. What is taking place is a review of the program under the Energy Supplies Allocation Board, which has been in operation for several years, to take care of emergencies, together with other member countries of the International Energy Agency.

What is taking place at the present time is a review of the system involving the Post Office to ensure that if an emergency hits the western world in particular, we as industrialized countries would be ready to face such an emergency. It is just an updating of the program in place under the Energy Supplies Allocation Board.

THE ECONOMY

FUTURE OF GEORGIA PACIFIC MILL IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I apologize for not being able to give him notice. In view of the economic chaos in the building trades created by the government's refusal or inability to combat high mortgage interest rates, will the government take any initiatives in the closing of mills making building products, such as the Georgia Pacific Mill in New Brunswick which is about to close and create very widespread unemployment in the area? This is the result of national government policies which, taken in the context of national interest, impact adversely on the fragile economies of the Atlantic provinces.

I would like to ask the minister if he would discuss the closing of this mill and the related building products trade problem with economic ministers such as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and, in this case, the minister from New Brunswick, and would he also address the question of the adverse impact some of our national policies such as tight money and high interest rates have on the fragile economies and businesses in the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the interest rates which prevail in the country today are basically the result of the high inflation which besets not only Canada but other countries in the world as well. The best way to reduce interest rates over time is to attempt to reduce over-all inflation.

I will, as the hon. member suggests, be pleased to look at this particular problem which concerns him, and discuss it with my colleagues he has mentioned.

Mr. Howie: I thank the minister very much for his answer.

Oral Questions

ENERGY

NEW BRUNSWICK OIL SHALES DEVELOPMENT

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I draw the minister's attention, as I attempted to do a week or so ago, to the large deposit of oil shales in the province of New Brunswick. As the minister is aware, only one square mile of the 2,500 square mile deposit has been investigated, but this square mile leads New Brunswick authorities to believe there could be as much as 15 billion barrels of oil in the shales. These shales are not part of our national energy inventory.

Has the minister received any representations from New Brunswick, has he discussed this with his colleagues or his counterparts there, and will the minister give serious consideration to having a detailed exploration to define and evaluate the oil shales in New Brunswick?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have not received any representations from my New Brunswick colleague or from the government of New Brunswick. Perhaps a letter has been sent to my officials which I have not yet received, but nothing has been brought to my attention. I will certainly consider the representation made by the hon. member, with interest and sympathy.

THE DISABLED AND THE HANDICAPPED

EFFECT OF CRTC DECISION ON HARD OF HEARING TELEPHONE USERS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As the minister is aware, hearing impairment is the largest handicap in Canada. It affects one million disabled persons. Access to telephones is more important to them than it is to the general public and affects their ability to hold jobs or to live independently.

Instead of removing obstacles for these people, the effect of a recent CRTC decision will be to allow the installation of new telephone equipment which is incompatible with hearing aids and further isolates these Canadians from the mainstream of Canadian life.

Considering the minister's obvious concern about the disabled and handicapped community in Canada, what action is the minister prepared to take to remove this obstacle which was not there before the CRTC made this decision?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, I would be pleased to bring the detailed question of the hon. member to the attention of the Minister of Communications as soon as he returns to Ottawa.

ESTABLISHMENT OF TELEPHONE EQUIPMENT STANDARDS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Since the minister is responsible to Canadian consumers generally and since disabled and handicapped people are also Canadian consumers, will the minister agree to establish a standard which would require that compatibility with hearing aids be mandatory for all telephones used in Canada so that all Canadians would have the right of universal access to telephone communications?

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

EXPANSION OF SERVICES OF NATURAL GAS DISTRIBUTION COMPANIES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the urgency of implementing the government's plan for oil substitution and the importance that natural gas will play in this program, can the minister say how soon financial assistance, as promised in the National Energy Program, will be made available to natural gas distribution companies to enable them to expand their services to areas in eastern Canada such as the communities along the north shore of Lake Huron not now served by a natural gas pipeline?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a point of clarification with respect to the previous question by the hon. member from New Brunswick. I would like to advise him that I have been—

Mr. Nielsen: Order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: Then I will answer the question of the hon. member for Algoma if the House does not want me to clarify the previous question.

Under the National Energy Program, large amounts of money have been provided and set aside for the expansion of the distribution systems for natural gas, and also electricity, in cases where it would not be economic to do so purely on a financial basis because of lack of clientele. However, there may be instances where it would be very important to have that expansion of the system in order to achieve our goal of reducing oil consumption in this country.

The decision as to the expansion of the systems will be made by provincial government authorities, and we will be working very closely with them. We have already had discussions with the government of Ontario. These discussions are quite advanced, and we will be quite happy to make our contribution to the expansion of the systems which will be recommended by the provincial authorities concerned.

MARINE TRANSPORT

WITHDRAWAL OF DART CONTAINERLINE SERVICE FROM HALIFAX—HOLDING OF INQUIRY

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport concerning the withdrawal of Dart container service from the port of Halifax. The minister met with the Premier of Nova Scotia this week and heard his concern about the future of container traffic in the port. Can the minister confirm published reports that he will direct the Canadian Transport Commission to conduct an inquiry into the withdrawal of the Dart container service from the port of Halifax, and will he also indicate when that inquiry may take place and what will be the terms of reference for the inquiry?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it would take too long to report on everything which took place, though I think we agreed on most items. There still are difficulties respecting the assessment of freight rates. The Premier of Nova Scotia would like me to look into the way the rates are distributed on the road from Halifax going west. I will. Secondly, he would like me to look into the cost of icebreaking. I said I would. He would like me to cost recover that. I said I might in another cost recovery package.

The main item of discussion was the presence of CN in Cast. In this instance, we had a debate which was similar to a previous debate in this House on the role of Crown corporations. I defended the presence of CN in Cast, as in Halterm. The Premier asked me to start an inquiry. I did not agree to that, but I said that he would have an opportunity to present his case before the CTC because CP Ships must get authorization under section 27 of the act. The premier can present his case in that particular place.

QUERY RESPECTING WHARFAGE CHARGES

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): In a press release dated March 2, 1981, the minister indicated that he had assurances from the National Harbours Board that it would move very quickly to expand container facilities in the port of Montreal for both the Cast shipping group and CP Ships. Now there is a rumour in Halifax that the National Harbours Board will dramatically increase wharfage rates applicable to container traffic.

Will the minister indicate whether this increase in wharfage charges will take place, and will he give us some assurance that no further steps will be taken by the National Harbours Board or any other government agency to aid the port of Montreal in its competition for container traffic with the port of Halifax?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, like many other members of this House I do not like the tone of the question. The premier and I looked at the wharfage charges in Montreal and Halifax and found that they were the same in most instances. By the way, I will give this information to members and also to the press in the coming days so that they can see that there is no discrimination whatsoever against Halifax in the present system. With respect to the port of Montreal, I am on record as asking the province of Quebec to make the proper water lots and the land available to the port of Montreal so that it, too, can be more successful than it is at this time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the government House leader about his intentions for tomorrow and next week with respect to government business.

While I am on my feet, may I ask him to designate March 18 as an allotted day.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, to the usual question, the usual answer—the Constitution. Next Wednesday will be an allotted day.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On March 4 Your Honour very kindly wrote me a letter with respect to the motion I introduced in the House on December 19 concerning extra pay for employees who worked extended hours during that all-night debate. You have made it clear, Your Honour, that we cannot question you from the floor or get answers from you in the House, but in view of the wide interest that there is in this matter, I wonder if arrangements could be made for a copy of the letter which you wrote to me, and maybe you wrote it to others as well, to be tabled or even made an appendix to Hansard so that those who are interested will know the disposition of this matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, in addition to what I indicated a few moments ago to the House leader of the official opposition, we will, of course, proceed next week with the debate on the Constitution, except for Wednesday which will be an opposition day. The New Democratic Party will be sponsoring the motion. However, if we decide to deal with another matter, we will, of course, give the opposition advance notice.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I do not believe my friend is correct with respect to the party that will have that particular day. I do appreciate and thank him for the day.

Mr. Knowles: Madam Speaker, it is true that we had the last one, but this is our other one, a short day. My friends in the official opposition have the final day in the semester. I believe the President of the Privy Council is correct in accordance with our agreement.

I wonder, Madam Speaker, whether you could respond to my request for the tabling of the letter to which I referred and that possibly it may be appended to Hansard?

Madam Speaker: Before doing that, I should like to consult with the Commissioners of Internal Economy to find out whether they agree. I will take the hon. member's suggestion and consider it.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. ELZINGA—S.O. 43 MOTION OF MR. SCHRODER

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to a motion proposed under Standing Order 43 on Tuesday, March 10. This is the first occasion I have had to bring it to the attention of the House. It was moved by the hon. member for Guelph (Mr. Schroder) and seconded by the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Frith). I should like to read the motion:

That this House condemn the three Alberta daily newspapers which are stirring up regional dissension in order to sell more copies—

I rise because I find that this motion in itself misleads the House, and the stupidity of the statement in the motion I object to—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I do not know whether the hon. member was in the House at the time the motion was presented but that was the time he could have debated it. I am afraid he is now debating a motion on which the House has taken a position and that is not possible. One cannot go back on a decision made in the House of Commons. Furthermore, this is not the time to debate that kind of motion.

Mr. Elzinga: Madam Speaker, I explained in my opening remarks that I was not in the House when the motion was moved. I do not know if that would alter your ruling.

Madam Speaker: I am afraid it does not change the hon. member's problem. It could have been debated at that time but since the hon. member was not present in the House on that day I am afraid his chance of debating it has passed. He could use other procedures on other occasions to make the House aware of the problems that concern him.

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. This motion could not be debated in the House at the time because it was turned down by the colleagues of the hon. member for Guelph (Mr. Schroder) in the Liberal Party.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I just said that it was not a point of order, therefore I cannot accept the point of order of the hon. member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski) either.

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING INCLUSIVE AIR CHARTER TOURS

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-633, respecting inclusive air charters.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Herbert: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to discourage operators of inclusive air charter tours from overbooking or otherwise failing to provide the accommodation that is advertised as part of the tour.

At present, the customer is only reimbursed for the value of what he does not receive, not for any inconvenience that results from being stranded.

The bill would impose a penalty of five times the value of any part of the tour omitted, payable to the customer.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

MR. FULTON—DUMPING OF TOXIC MINE TAILINGS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I wish to present to the House today a petition compiled by the Anglican Church of Canada. This petition has been signed by Canadians from all parts of the country. This petition calls on the government to withdraw special order in council SOR 379-345, which approves the dumping of toxic mine tailings into Alice Arm Inlet, in northern British Columbia, and calls for a full public inquiry into the issue.

Members know that I have raised this issue on previous occasions. Many groups are concerned about the possible effects these mine tailings will have on the environment and especially the damage the tailings will do to the Nishga's traditional fishing grounds. Five major church groups have endorsed this petition, as have labour unions, environmental groups and public representatives. The petition is 380 pages long and has been signed by 9,000 Canadians. This clearly reflects the concern Canadians have about this problem and I urge the government to respect the request and hold a full public inquiry into this issue.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton)—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned yesterday I had just made the point that Canadians have been listening to this constitutional debate with some reluctance, and I wanted to discuss some of the rights which would be lost in the course of the passing of a new Constitution in Canada.

One right in particular which Canadians hold dear and sacrosanct, the right to hold and enjoy property, will be lost. Imagine a government which professes to be that of a free and democratic country not protecting the right of its citizens to own a piece of land or a home. This is a country which has been an inspiration to citizens of the world. Estonians, Italians, Czechoslovakians, Japanese, Ukrainians, Germans, Chinese, citizens from all over the world have looked to Canada as a land to which they could come to join with the rest of us in working for and owning a home or a plot of land. In other words, a stake in Canada of their very own. They will have lost this right to enjoy property because it is just not in the Liberal charter and the present laws will not protect them. The present law will not afford protection because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has seen to it that any law inconsistent with the new charter will be inoperative and of no effect.

Since Magna Carta, the common law has guaranteed the right to own property, as do the present laws of Canada. But the new charter does not convey that right. Therefore, since the one is inconsistent with the other, the new charter will prevail and the present right of Canadians to own property will have been lost.

Another serious concern is for the rights of unborn babies. The Supreme Court of Ontario has ruled that a person becomes a person roughly at the time of birth. Entrenching such existing law in this defective charter would deny the rights of unborn children, whose rights even today are jeopardized by far too promiscuous abortion laws. I say correct the law, do not protect bad law.

There are other rights presently enjoyed by Canadians which will be lost also, but time does not permit a long dissertation of lost rights. Some of these rights are very important ones which are supposed to be better safeguarded by the deceptive Liberal charter but which will actually be lost to Canadians.

Let me mention just one more upcoming injustice which could work against any group of Canadians. I refer here to equalization. Much has been said about the need for equalization. We have equalization now. Equalization payments are the means by which Canadians have shared equitably in the wealth of Canada. They are calculated on the basis of revenues and incomes of provinces, figures which can be examined and evaluated by the provinces and from which agreement can be reached as to how much money the provinces will get from the federal government. Under the "divine right of Trudeau" charter, this right will be exclusively that of the federal government, which will be able to distribute provincial revenues at will without disclosing reasons. That should allow even more funds to be channelled to Quebec from the rest of Canada or to any other Liberal provinces.

If hon. members think that such a thing would not happen, that responsible government in Canada would not do such a thing, let us dispel that illusion right here. This very deceptive, undemocratic government is doing that by ripping off fellow Canadians in Alberta and Saskatchewan to provide cheap fuel and fulfil election promises to eastern Canadians. If paying fellow Canadians 40 per cent of the world price of oil just to buy votes, while disregarding the real cost to Canada in lost jobs and foreign oil purchases costing multibillions of dollars a year, is this government's idea of equalization, it certainly is not mine.

What should this government be doing about our Constitution? For one thing, it should bring the Constitution home to Canada at once. None of us disagrees on that. Instead of trumped-up Brit-bashing, the government should simply petition Westminster to send the Constitution home. Instead of blaming the British for safeguarding the rights of the provincial and federal governments of Canada, a task which Canada asked Britain to do—someone back in 1931 was smart enough to think of that; they must have known what was coming—we should be applauding the British for taking their responsibility seriously, which they always do, and from which I suspect they would like to be released.

Second, the government should find an amending formula by which we can change our Constitution when the need arises. Obviously, the best suggestion to date is the formula we call the Vancouver consensus because it gives every province the highest degree of equality, consistent with population. It does not give the power of veto to one province over another. In short, it does not create second-class status for all provinces other than Quebec and Ontario.

Furthermore, there is virtual agreement already among the provincial premiers for the Vancouver consensus. Any statesmanlike prime minister would not admit defeat now when agreement is so near. A truly worthy prime minister would drive hard to obtain provincial agreement in a process of nation building. In actual fact, the Prime Minister declared during the past election campaign that he would prefer to wait until Claude Ryan was elected premier of Quebec before resuming discussions on constitutional reform. Something has certainly rushed him forward. But as an architect and as a nation builder, we would not want to accuse our Prime Minister of that. Instead of being a house builder, he is a home wrecker.

For a few moments let us look at the real builders of Canada, including the Macdonalds, the Cartiers, the Browns and others. Let us look back on the events which brought together the founding provinces of this great country of ours. In the 20 years or so prior to confederation and following the Durham report, there existed a period of political instability. Canada came to the recognition that the world was changing and that she must become more self-reliant. In 1845, Great Britain had adopted a laissez-faire attitude and colonies were not being given the trade preferences they had had. Canada needed markets for her goods. In addition there was a growing desire to expand westward, not only for markets, but to cut off United States western expansion which would have turned northwest.

At the apex of this period of instability, George Brown, a Liberal of the day and a far different Liberal from those of today, made a deal which he considered to be in the best interests of Canada with Messrs. Macdonald and Cartier. He said he would support the Conservatives if they would attempt to combine with the maritime provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to form a federated state which would be big and strong enough to survive against United States expansion.

The result of the 1864 Charlottetown meeting and subsequent Quebec resolutions was the British North America Act, designed in Canada and created by a process of consent. It was a contract, not a conquest. Canada was not born out of revolution or bloodshed. That has not been the Canadian way. It was a contract by consent. The great genius of Canada has always been consent. Even today, in my view, if Quebec or Newfoundland wanted to leave Canada by legitimate means, no one would take up arms against them. We have always agreed. We must always agree. We must not impose; we must have consent.

In 1867 Canadians created this country, this Canada of ours. In 1967 Canadians reaffirmed our confederation with the greatest public outpouring of emotion our country had ever seen. We believed in Canada, its beauty, its culture and its social values. A new Constitution was the furthest thing from our minds. Canadians from east and west only wanted to continue the building of a great nation and a great society entering its second century.

Many of us, in an attempt to aid further the improving bonds between Canadians and Quebecers, elected the present Prime Minister, a man we believed would provide the spiritual and emotional link that would further bond two diverse cultures. Many of us agonized through the Official Languages Act which followed and which time has shown has increased the two-language problem and exacerbated our differences. Many of us sat patiently by while Quebec continued to break out of its economic straitjacket with the help of massive federal funding through DREE programs, Hull and Mirabel, federal government multimillion dollar projects and overly large government purchasing programs from Quebec suppliers.

How has all of this paid off for the citizens of the other nine provinces? The solidly Quebec-based Liberal party, with the complicity of the other members who know which side their bread is buttered on, is continuing to create division in a country which should be coming together with a sense of unified purpose—the building of Canada, a unified people working toward a common goal. This Liberal government, not content that it has gained power on a mandate of deceptive energy pricing and control which has totally divided western Canada from the east, has now set about to divide province from province with a new Constitution.

This is not just the perception of one Canadian. If the Prime Minister would cease this haughty arrogance and pay attention to the views and legitimate aims of the provinces, perhaps we could forge a Constitution which would come from the people of Canada, not one imposed on them by a government which is reflecting the views of less than one quarter of Canadians. A majority of seats in this House is a far cry from a majority of the people of Canada. More people in the last election voted against this government than for it.

After all, it is the provinces which more closely represent the wishes, aspirations and hopes of their citizens. If the wishes of the people and the provinces which represent the diverse needs of Canadians are not represented, that is not diversity, that is simply reality and the reality of differing needs will continue even after a new Constitution has been imposed. In fact, the differences will be all the greater after an imposed Constitution than after a Constitution which has been created by the people through their provincial legislatures.

Canada has always had different economic and social conditions. In early times our maritime provinces, the cradle of confederation, also provided the jobs and livelihood of early Canadians. Later, many maritimers went west to Ontario for industrial and mining jobs, enriching the central part of Canada with their presence and their skills. Still later, many central Canadians moved west to seek opportunities provided there. Quebecers have found careers in all parts of Canada and, of course, many citizens from other lands have found

Canada to be a land rich in opportunity. They came from various backgrounds to seek various opportunities in various regions.

Did these citizens from other lands look at Canada and say, "No, I won't go there; my rights won't be protected by their laws"? Certainly not. They chose Canada because it provided not only opportunity but guaranteed their rights and their liberties under the finest written and unwritten combination of constitutional rights in the world.

I say to the Prime Minister through you, Mr. Speaker, "If your constitutional package, which Canadians say they do not want but which you say they do want, is a sound one, why not put it to the Canadian people in the form of a referendum?" In fact, this highly controversial package contains provision for a referendum as a "tie-breaking" mechanism for deadlocks between the provinces and the federal government, so why not use it? Why would the government not use the very device it is trying to impose on the democratic process in Canada today?

I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, why it should not be used, and why it must not be included in the proposed amending formula. First, it is totally one-sided. Only the federal government would have the right to call a referendum. In a situation where all ten provinces had agreed on an issue, but the federal government did not agree, one vote out of 11, the federal government, and only the federal government, could unfairly utilize the referendum to carry its way. The ten provinces would not have that right.

Second, a referendum can be written, perhaps I should say manipulated, in such a way as to virtually ensure the answer the writer wants. This is totally unfair to the provincial partners and is contrary to the principles of federation, not to mention the undermining of our democratic system of elected representation.

Earlier I said that Canada was built by and on consent—consent of the provinces to come together, to build together and to prosper together as a federation. Now that federation and that democratic process are to be cast aside by a government which does not reflect the wishes of the majority of Canadians, and even worse, which does not care that it does not reflect that majority.

Before democracy fails totally in Canada, I urge the Prime Minister to change his hard, unbending stance, to conduct himself and his office in the parliamentary and statesmanlike way of his predecessors, and try once more to find the magic of consent, the consent which is Canada. Bring the British North America Act home. Find an amending formula of consent. Take the time to devise a charter of basic rights and freedoms here in Canada, based on the intelligence, regional realities and good will of Canadians.

This is surely not too much to ask. It is surely not too great a task. It is the duty of government to find solutions no matter how difficult. The people expect this and would applaud it. If this government is not equal to the task, this most fundamental and important task of nation building, then it should give way to people who believe in Canada, all of Canada, and who can get agreement and consent among all the provinces, just as the original Conservative government of Macdonald and Cartier did, in 1867. I am sure I reflect the hopes of all Canadians.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter this debate to support this resolution. I do so with enthusiasm. I do so because I believe it is a major achievement in fulfilling several of my long-standing political goals, goals which originally led me to enter active politics more than 15 years ago. First is the protection of minority rights through entrenchment, including the protection of minority language rights; and, finally, the movement to greater political independence and unity in Canada through patriation, the amending formula and entrenched rights.

While the original resolution tabled last October generally contained these important goals, I believed at that time that it was lacking and defective on several matters, to the extent that I felt obliged to press for amendments and even to vote for them if they were to be presented in this House. This included matters relating to aboriginal rights, language rights and anti-discrimination rights, among others.

I am pleased to say, however, that through the committee process, through lobbying inside and outside this House and through the work of many people, considerable improvement has been made to the resolution. Many amendments were agreed to and I at this time wish to congratulate the government and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien), who I believe was extremely flexible, extremely objective and who took the time to listen to our arguments and, when the arguments were sound, make the amendments that were necessary.

In the short time available to me today, I can deal with only a few of the many issues and questions relating to this resolution. Consequently, I will restrict my comments, first, to the meaning of entrenchment; second, aboriginal rights; third, language rights; and fourth, the political and legal justification for the process.

First, why entrenchment? Some people that I have spoken to in my riding and across the country do not seem to understand why we need an entrenched charter of rights in the Constitution when we already have a federal Bill of Rights, a Human Rights Act and many provincial laws on human rights. In answer to that question, I should point out with great emphasis that the difference between an ordinary bill of rights, a bill of rights that is incorporated in an ordinary law at the federal or provincial level, cannot prevail over other ordinary legislation, whereas a bill of rights entrenched in the Constitution, as this one is, does prevail over all other legislation, either at the federal or provincial level. I want to read from Section 58(1) because of its importance:

> The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect.

Therefore, a piece of legislation which is inconsistent with what is in the entrenched charter of rights or in the Constitution is ruled invalid.

The second important reason for having an entrenched bill of rights is that an entrenched bill of rights cannot be amended by the ordinary legislative process as other bills of rights can. In other words, it takes more than an ordinary bill with three readings in the House of Commons and the Senate or provincial legislatures to change rights that are entrenched. In order to remove these rights which will be entrenched in the Constitution we would require an amendment to the Constitution in accordance with the amending formula, which means we would need the agreement of the federal Parliament plus six of the provincial legislatures, including Quebec, Ontario, two western provinces and two Atlantic provinces.

Finally, we need an entrenched bill of rights because, despite our good record in Canada, there have been many bad examples of violation of human rights by individuals, by groups and even by governments. I cite again the example of the Japanese Canadians and their internment during the Second World War; the removal of French-language education rights in Ontario and Manitoba earlier in this century; the recent removal by Bills 101 and 22 of English-speaking rights in Quebec; the attempt by the Alberta government during the 1930s to control the press; and attempts by Premier Duplessis in Quebec to control Jehovah's Witnesses and minority political parties. These are examples of which we are not proud but which could never have happened had we had the entrenched bill of rights to which I referred.

Second, I want to deal with the aboriginal rights sections in the constitutional proposal and the significance of those sections. They are Sections 25, 33, 35 and parts of the schedule. Of all these sections, Section 33 is the most important. The provisions of Section 33 represent the first time in Canadian history that any government has fully recognized and affirmed aboriginal rights. This recognition and affirmation is not being made in a mere policy statement, or in an ordinary piece of legislation; it is being made in the Constitution where, according to Section 58 which I just read, these rights will prevail over all other legislation, federal and provincial. This recognition and affirmation of aboriginal rights will prevail over the Indian Act, over mining acts, over hunting and fishing acts, over expropriation acts, over the Migratory Birds Convention Act and over the Northwest Territories Act. As it says in the section, any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force and effect.

Some people have asked what are aboriginal rights. Most of the 19 or 20 aboriginal groups which appeared before the Constitution committee did not want a detailed definition of aboriginal rights in the Constitution, although they wanted them protected, because they felt a detailed definition might limit and restrict them further down the road. They did not know what might happen further down the road.

I can tell the House that in a general way aboriginal rights are all those rights which our aboriginal peoples held prior to the arrival of the Europeans and which they never willingly gave up. These are the rights to those social structures which they had before the arrival of the Europeans; their laws, their customs, their forms of government, their economies, their languages, their lands and their waters, not just their rights to hunt, fish and gather. While those are important, aboriginal rights are not restricted to those things, and not just surface rights to certain lands. Again, that is important; aboriginal rights are not restricted to those things.

With the inclusion of Section 33 in the Constitution, governments will now have to negotiate with the various Indian bands and Inuit communities regarding the specific content of their aboriginal rights in different parts of the country. The Nishga will have the right to force the British Columbia government and the Canadian government to sit down and consider their claims. The Inuit in the northeast and eastern Arctic, the Micmacs in New Brunswick in respect of their fishing rights in the rivers and off the coast, and the Dene in the Northwest Territories will have that right.

In my opinion, if a provincial or federal government refuses to sit down and discuss these matters with an aboriginal group, or refuses to negotiate, that group could go to court and force them to negotiate under this section in the Constitution. If they did negotiate and there was no agreement reached between the aboriginal group and the governments concerned, again the aboriginal group would have the right to go to court, present their evidence and, by virtue of this Section 33, get recognition of their aboriginal rights in specific places throughout the country.

Some of our Indian groups in this country have doubted this process because of their experience with our courts in the past. They have pointed to the many judgments of courts to which they went in good faith but lost their cases when the courts turned them down. Consequently they have some doubts about a constitutional provision whereby they may have to go to court to have their rights decided by judges, even though they be judges of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Let me say to them that there will be a significant difference now. In the past many of the precedents the judges had to use in deciding cases were precedents decided in the earlier part of this century between provincial or federal governments and companies and in which the Indians and Inuit themselves were not at all involved. They did not have the chance to argue their cases and the courts, of course, must decide in accordance with the law and cannot make judgments on the basis of what they perceive to be justice.

With this section in the Constitution I assure our Indian and Inuit people that things will no longer be the same. Every court will have to take notice of that Section 33 and could never render the types of judgments rendered in the past. In judging every case they will have to take recognition of the fact that the Constitution recognizes and affirms the aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada.

I have referred so far in this section only to aboriginal rights. It also states that the treaty rights of our aboriginal peoples are recognized and affirmed. This is also important because it puts the matters in those treaties over and above all ordinary legislation. That means that when a treaty comes into conflict with an ordinary provincial or federal law, the constitutional provision and what is contained in the treaty will prevail. That is extremely important because our Indian people have gone to court time and time again in the past when their treaties came into conflict with provincial hunting and fishing laws, mining laws, oil and gas laws as well as federal laws, and the judges have always ruled that the law in question takes precedence over the treaty. This was, by the way, contrary to the experience in the United States. With rights under treaties recognized and guaranteed in the Constitution, they will now take precedence over ordinary legislation.

While Sections 25, 33 and 35 in this proposal represent a great achievement, in my opinion, for the aboriginal peoples of this country, they are not all that is required. In my own private member's bill, Bill C-212, I have presented several proposals for constitutional protection of Inuit, Indian and aboriginal rights.

One matter that is still left undone—this is not included but I think it should be—is an amending provision whereby we cannot remove these rights we are now putting in without the agreement of our Inuit, Indian and native people. That is very important. We are taking a big step. All political parties on the committee were in agreement with entrenching these rights, and it would be a sad day if, five or ten years from now, with a different composition in this House and with a different composition in provincial legislatures—although they are somewhat similar in provincial legislatures right now—the federal government got together with six provinces and removed those rights without the agreement of our aboriginal peoples.

I understand the national aboriginal associations are now formulating an amendment which would require that these rights could not be affected or removed without the agreement of the aboriginal peoples of Canada. I hope all parties, including the government, will be able to accept that amendment.

Next I want to deal with the language rights provisions in the Constitution. As an anglophone Quebecer, these are of special concern to me and my constituents. Section 133 of the BNA Act provides only minimal protection for language rights. It provides that Canadians can use English or French in the Parliament or courts of Canada, and in the legislature and courts of Quebec. That is all. Many of us believe that Section 93, which specifically protects minority religious education, implicitly protects minority language rights, but that has not yet been decided by the courts and remains unclear. I might say there is a case now before the courts in Quebec brought by the Quebec home and school association against the provisions of Bill 101 on that very issue, but it is not yet decided.

Consequently, with minimal protection for language rights in our present Constitution there is a strong need for the much broader protection the charter gives us. In addition to retaining Sections 133 and 93 of the BNA Act of 1867 and the provisions of the Manitoba Act of 1870, the charter also entrenches the main provisions of the federal Official Languages Act and all the provisions of the New Brunswick Official Languages Act.

Some people may say that since we have a federal Official Languages Act and one in New Brunswick, why bother to entrench these rights. Well, Mr. Speaker, I repeat we must entrench them because we do not know what government will come along in four, five or ten years and what the composition of this Parliament might be. We might get a group of people who are hostile to language rights and who could easily amend the Official Languages Act, or New Brunswick could easily amend theirs. However, by entrenching this provision no majority of this House could take away those rights, and that is why it is important.

The charter also provides for minority language education in all provinces, and some of our citizens do not realize that. That provision, section 23, applies to all provinces, including Ontario, and provides that where the number of children is sufficient to warrant such schools, then minority language education shall be given to all citizens whose mother tongue is English or French. Those whose mother tongue is not English or French but were educated in English or French schools can have their children educated in the minority language school in their province. In other words, a person in Quebec whose mother tongue is English can have his children educated in an English school; if his mother tongue is Italian but he went to an English school, he can have his child educated in an English school; if his mother tongue was German and he never had a chance to go to a school in Quebec but he has an older child who went to an English school in Quebec, he can have all his children educated in that English school.

Now, this guarantee in section 23 is a minimum guarantee. It does not prevent the province from giving additional language rights in education to their citizens or landed immigrants. They can if they wish go beyond this minimum guarantee. I also want to point out that while this is a good provision, it does not provide full freedom of choice. For example, it does not guarantee the right of the French-speaking majority in Quebec to attend English schools.

The reason for that, while we are all sympathetic to that proposition, is that we feel that the French-speaking people of Quebec have the majority in the legislature, and if they wish to give themselves the right to attend English schools, they have the political power to do so. This charter guarantees rights to minority groups, not necessarily to majorities.

Some people of my province have asked whether this charter will invalidate parts of Bill 101. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say it will, and a panel of lawyers advising the Quebec government said just last week that this charter will invalidate sections in over 100 Quebec bills. Let us make clear, however, that this charter will also invalidate many discriminatory sections of provincial and federal laws across this country. In addition, its provisions, while they might knock down some sections of Bill 101, will guarantee rights to the French-speaking minority groups in the other provinces.

Finally, I would like to deal with the legal and political justification for the process we are undertaking. The official opposition and some provinces say they support patriation, an amending formula and entrenched rights, but are opposed to the resolution because they say we should not approach the British parliament without the necessary support of the provinces. I have not heard any consistency in the speeches given by the opposition as to what that necessary support should be. Do they mean unanimous agreement of all the provinces, do they mean a majority of the provinces, or a consensus among the provinces based on population?

Because we do not have the support of all the provincial governments at present does not mean we do not have legislative support in all provinces. If we look at those who will vote for the resolution in this House, judging from the speeches that have been given there is support for the resolution in all provinces of Canada. Nine members of the NDP from British Columbia support the resolution, three from Saskatchewan and five from Manitoba, along with two Liberals, I understand one Conservative from Alberta, and a wide-ranging number from Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. In addition to the official support of the federal government, there are two provincial governments supporting the resolution, including Ontario, the largest province. I want to make it clear that this is not a unilateral act. With that kind of support you cannot call it unilateralism. It is at least a troika and at best a quartet, perhaps a four-party initiative. You may accuse us of not having a majority of the provinces but it certainly is not a unilateral act.

With respect to the legality of the resolution, I want to repeat what many others have said, that all that is required to amend the Canadian Constitution is a joint resolution of the House of Commons and Senate. It is true that on many occasions the federal government consulted with the provinces and tried to get their agreement, and that sometimes they did not proceed without that agreement; but this was never the law and never became the law through custom or precedent. That has recently been decided by the Manitoba Court of Appeal and it is now before the courts in Quebec and Newfoundland.

Since 1867 there have been approximately 25 amendments to the BNA Act. In four of those amendments provincial consent was neither sought nor given. In three others the majority of provinces agreed but there was some significant provincial opposition. In two others there was a minority of provinces supporting the federal government. As far as I can see, in only three principal amendments were all the provinces behind the federal government, so the record is a very mixed one. It is clear, however, that the only legal requirement is a joint address of the Senate and House of Commons.

Now, the question remains whether a political, not a legal, requirement has developed over the years, or some kind of constitutional convention which demands the agreement of the federal government plus a number of provinces—and I say "plus a number" because it is so vague. If such a political requirement has developed, what is it? Is it that we must have unanimous agreement of all provinces? Must we have a majority or some kind of consensus? If the political requirement that might have developed is that we need the agreement of all provinces, I say that is unreasonable and wrong and should be discarded. Even if it is that we should have a majority of the provinces, it is wrong, unreasonable and should be discarded, because it would mean that a majority of the provinces from one part of the country could override the interests of another part of the country. For example, all the provinces east of Manitoba could get together and outvote, by their majority, the provinces of the west; or the provinces of the extremities could get together and pass an amendment against the wishes of Quebec. That is wrong.

Consequently, we have adopted an amending formula which appeared to be the best of all those proposed in recent years. One might say that what we are trying to do is revolutionary. It may not be a bloody revolution. It may not be a legal revolution. But, in a sense, it could be a political revolution. I say "in a sense" because it might be argued that we are going ahead with this resolution despite the fact that we do not have a consensus or agreement among all the provinces.

If that is the case, it does not bother me, Mr. Speaker. Revolutions, quiet and unquiet ones, have been necessary in the past to advance independence, national unity and the protection of human rights. It was necessary in the United States in the eighteenth century. It was necessary in the United Kingdom in the seventeenth century. It was necessary in France in the eighteenth century. History has judged many of these revolutions to be beneficial and necessary.

I will say, and I am willing to bet, that history will judge that the provisions of this resolution, even if they are deemed to be a revolution contrary to a developed custom, will have been beneficial and necessary for Canada and for the long-term good of the Canadian people. I believe that within a few years there will be unanimous agreement among our people that it was a good thing to do and it was important that it be done.

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, I, too, am proud to join with my colleagues and participate in this historic debate. I am also pleased and proud to support the joint resolution which is before us, although I must admit that I feel somewhat intimidated because of the immensity and complexity of the legal, political and social questions with which we are dealing.

I have never been much of a constitutional buff, Mr. Speaker. Constitutions are such difficult, abstract things that I doubt if debating them will ever become a national pastime. Despite efforts of the official opposition and the provinces to hype this matter up, I get as many letters complaining about poor postal service as I do about the so-called constitutional controversy. That is not to say that constitutional questions are unimportant. They are incredibly important.

My constitutional experiences, first here in this House, later in Room 200 and now back again in this chamber, have taught me a number of valuable lessons, some of which I would like to talk about at this point. First, there exists a vast array of public groups who feel that their fundamental rights and freedoms have not always been protected by our present Constitution and that the Constitution needs to be amended in order to provide us with a charter of rights and freedoms. The groups ranged all the way from natives to Japanese Canadians, to the handicapped, women's groups and civil libertarians, to name only a few. Many of these people, and more, demand an entrenched charter, and they are opposed to waiting for one any longer. The hooker, though, is that a constitutional amendment is required to add such a charter to our Constitution. Unhappily, as everyone knows by now, the provinces will not agree on an amending formula and they have not been able to agree for over 50 years.

So here is our constitutional Catch-22—no provincial agreement, no amending formula; no amending formula, no charter; no charter, no unified protection of rights allowed to Canadians right across our nation.

For those who complain about the proposed amending formula giving regions unwarranted veto powers, what we now have, and have had, is a practice through federal-provincial conferences which permits every province, large or small, to have a veto—and that has been our problem. I believe those in the Conservative Party who counsel us to bring the BNA Act home as is and add a charter later with the help of the provinces are either mischievous, naive or stupid. The most effective way to deny Canadians a charter for another 50 years is to take that advice.

The second point which can perhaps be dealt with in fewer words but which is no less important, is that from some of the items we have read and heard, such as "Canadians should not be asking the British to amend our Constitution" and "Let us build our Constitution here", one would almost conclude that this whole debate is taking place thousands of miles away in far-off and mythical Albion. Before Christmas I asked myself, "Where am I?" I answered, "In Room 200." Then I asked myself, "Where is Room 200?" I answered, "On Parliament Hill." I said, "Well, where is Parliament Hill?" I answered, "In Canada." "What are we doing here?", I asked myself. I answered, "We are building a Constitution." Now again today I pinch myself and ask myself, "Where am I?"

Some hon. Members: In the House of Commons.

Mr. Rose: Where is the House of Commons?

Some hon. Members: On Parliament Hill.

Mr. Rose: Where is Parliament Hill?

Some hon. Members: In Canada.

Mr. Rose: What are we doing here?

Some hon. Members: We are building a Constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: So we are all engaged here in the very important work of building a Constitution by Canadians in Canada. There is no doubt about that.

Let us hear what former prime minister John G. Diefenbaker had to say with regard to Britain's role in constitutional amendments. I quote from Volume II of his book "One Canada":

> There are those who argue that the British North America Act and its amendments are a foreign piece of legislation. Nothing of the kind! All the terms of the BNA Act were determined in Canada by Canadians at one or other of the two conferences held in Charlottetown and Quebec. This was a statute of the British Parliament in 1867 because it involved a union of the British North American colonies. Its subsequent amendments were all made in Canada by Canadians, then perfunctorily passed by the Parliament at Westminster; British statesmen would be pleased if they could rid themselves of this obsolete responsibility.

When we have completed our work here I say: Let us help the British rid themselves of this "obsolete responsibility" by going to Britain one last time. The British government will pass this package and send it home unaltered—and no alliance of fox-hunting Tory peers and their colonial sycophants are going to stop us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: Emerging from both the first point concerning the intransigence of the premiers and the second point about the fact that Canadian MPs have spent months working on our new Constitution is another important point. It is one which concerns the shift away from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the provincial premiers as exclusive players in the constitutional drama to a widened stage including, for the first time since I have been active in politics, MPs and senators as crucial players.

As a member of Parliament I would like to say that I have grown both angry and impatient at watching endless federal-provincial conferences from the sidelines. Premiers have no cause, nor right, to claim that they, simply because they are premiers, represent the views of people or areas in some more superior, genuine or authoritative way than I or my colleagues do in the House of Commons.

I would like to quote the distinguished House leader of the opposition on this very point, as reported in "Parliamentary Government on the Subject of Proportional Representation as it Relates to Parliamentary Reform." The hon. member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker) had this to say regarding the appropriateness of an MP to speak for the area he represents:

> People pushing for proportional representation seem to be saying that an MP in an opposition party is not an appropriate spokesman for his province—whereas of course he is. I feel that we ought to put more emphasis on the abilities of MPs to speak for their areas, whether they sit on the government or the opposition side, and proportional representation simply does not address that problem.

The point here is not to debate the merits or disadvantages of proportional representation, but, more important, to debate the right and duty of an MP to appropriately represent a particular region. Therefore, I am pleased to have the support of the distinguished Conservative House leader when I assert that I, as the member for Mission-Port Moody, have not only the right but the responsibility to work for the acceptance of the constitutional package before us, even though our "14-points-behind" Premier of B.C. opposes the move.

Similarly, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who intends to vote in favour of the joint resolution, speaks as surely for Manitobans as does the erstwhile Premier Lyon who is fighting patriation. Or let us take the case of the hon. member for Nepean-Carleton, who fights this resolution with every means known to rules experts, despite the fact that his fellow Conservative, Ontario Premier Bill Davis, supports the constitutional package enthusiastically.

Essentially, what I am saying is that as an MP I welcome the opportunity to make a contribution to constitution building. For too long I think the House of Commons has been ignored, while year after year the premiers have fiddled and failed. Of course a provincial consensus of a positive kind from a great number of premiers would have been preferable to what has been described as unilateral patriation. Does anyone listening actually believe that an agreement among ten premiers and the Prime Minister is possible on this question or on many others? I do not.

● (1600)

If we want our Constitution brought home, I believe we in the federal Parliament are taking the only course left open under current conditions. Some people disagree and say that what we are doing is not only immoral but illegal. Some provinces will go, and have gone, to court in order to prove it. Before the Quebec Court of Appeal at this very moment is an action to prevent patriation of the Constitution on the ground that the charter of rights "interferes with provincial powers." Naturally I have no idea how the case will turn out, but it seems to me that it is the duty of a federal state to protect the rights of its citizens with a Charter of Rights and Freedoms, rights and freedoms which do not vary from province to province but apply equally in all parts of our federation.

I agree with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) that is both inconceivable and unacceptable for native people, women or the handicapped to enjoy certain rights in one jurisdiction of our federation and be denied them in another. The charter must apply to all provinces and territories; it must protect all citizens in Canada. If the charter of rights is deemed an interference, then I think it is about time we interfered.

If we must wait for the provinces to bring in tough civil rights legislation, we will never get a charter because most provincial governments are so right-wing they spend most of their time talking about individual freedoms and have no time left to consider individual protections and rights. Most provincial rights codes are weak-kneed and toothless.

Mr. Friesen: Will the hon. member entertain a question? Is the British Columbia civil rights code toothless?

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I will entertain a question at the end of my speech.

The Constitution

I should like to refer again to the belief of the late Mr. John Diefenbaker in a charter of rights. Mr. Diefenbaker said:

> A bill of rights for Canada is the only way in which to stop the march on the part of the government toward arbitrary power, and to curb the arrogance of men "clad in a little brief authority"—

He continued:

> Some say that it is unnecessary and our unwritten constitutional rights protect us. They have not in the past. They cannot unless you and I have a right to the protection of law in the courts of the land. There are others who claim that the Parliament of Canada cannot pass laws to preserve the constitutional freedom of Canadians. If that be true, then Canadian citizenship is a provincial variable. There will be nine kinds of Canadians in Canada whose freedoms will be based on the home address of each of us. If that contention be true, Canadian unity is a meaningless term.

We Canadians have much to be proud of. We suffer from serious shortcomings when it comes to respecting individual rights, and we have done in the past. Of course we are far superior to the repressive regimes in many parts of the world, including South America, Eastern Europe and the Far East. We must remember that most Canadians applauded the deportation of the Japanese in 1941, even though at that time we were dispersing Canadian-born citizens who were charged with no crime. Most of us stayed silent while Jehovah's Witnesses were being hassled throughout Quebec under the Duplessis regime. As one of the 16 who voted against approval of the government's invocation of the War Measures Act in 1970, I received hundreds of letters following that vote condemning me for opposing a measure which, with the stroke of a pen, removed all civil rights not just of Montrealers but of Canadians right across the country.

Again some argue that when a crisis inflames passions no charter of rights, no matter how perfect, would have protected, for example, the west coast Japanese or prevented invocation of the War Measures Act of 1970. They would say that the panicky state of public opinion at the time would have overridden any written entrenchment of rights and freedoms. Perhaps this was so. However, along with the present entrenched rights comes an avenue of appeal and remedies available to those abused, if only after the fact.

Section 24(1) guarantees against infringement of individual rights and freedoms and offers the protection of the courts if such infringement occurs. This recourse to the courts is new and an important forward step.

Unfortunately, when the Japanese dispersal occurred in World War II, 20,000 of these people were stripped of their land and property. There existed no section 24 which would have guaranteed these Canadians of Japanese ancestry access to the courts to recover their stolen wealth and property. Back then, they had no recourse but to accept the thefts and try to forget them.

Similarly, the 500 or so Quebecers incarcerated in the October, 1970, round-up and who were never charged or convicted had no legal remedy against arbitrary arrest and imprisonment. We have it now in this charter.

When a long-time author and vice-president of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, June Callwood, recently was asked in Maclean's "How do you feel our rights have been abused?", she replied:

In its whole history, the Canadian Civil Liberties Association has only won one case—and it's being appealed. I maintain that the attitude of our Supreme Court puts us slightly to the right of Vlad the Impaler. Just in the past few years, they've eroded our right to be silent when arrested, upheld a municipality's right to forbid demonstrations that might lead to "tumult" and allowed illegally obtained evidence to be used against people. Their attitude generates a nourishing environment for the intimidation of writers, broadcasters, all kinds of journalism. It's very reactionary and it's nourished by acceptance at the bottom. We always talk about our traditional freedom of speech. But actually, through our history, anybody who demonstrates convictions about freedom of speech that are contrary to the established views is usually put in prison. So our tradition is really repression of speech.

It is clear, then, that many people who are concerned about civil liberties desperately want an entrenched charter of rights and freedoms, as it is equally clear that many of the provinces see such a federal charter as an infringement on provincial powers.

There may be a strong parallel between the drive for greater provincial rights here in Canada and the historical states' rights movement in the United States. United States author and historian Henry Steele Commager had this to say in a recent Los Angeles Times article:

"States' Rights" is both an anachronism and a conceptual illusion. States do not have rights; people have rights. In the United States people have all rights. In the exercise of those rights they have allocated to the national government whatever powers are essential to the conduct of the great affairs of the union, and to the general welfare and happiness of the people—

It was the states that repudiated and nullified the requirements of the 14th and 15th amendments and of many civil rights acts, and the national government that—eventually—enforced those. In the realm of civil liberties, it is the states, not the nation, that have been the most consistent offenders; it is the national government, chiefly through the federal courts, but substantially through a series of civil rights acts, that has expanded them. It would be asking a great deal to ask blacks to accept the argument that the states have been the guardians of their freedom and the national government the enemy.

Henry Commager went on to argue that it was the U.S. national government and not the states that proclaimed and protected women on matters ranging from universal suffrage to equal rights. Incidentally, that amendment, known as the ERA, has not gone through yet because of the opposition of many of the states. Commager went on to say:

So too with labour legislation from the Clayton Anti-trust Act to the Wagner Labour Act. It was the Congress which banned child labour and instituted medicare for the poor. Congress too established conservation and environmental ground rules. Through President Teddy Roosevelt to Franklin Delano it was the federal government which established national parks, limited strip mining and the reckless exploitation of fossil fuels—not the states.

While I know there is not complete congruity between the experiences of Canada and the U.S. in this issue of civil rights and protection of those rights, the parallel is certainly not a weak one. Ask an oriental citizen in Canada or the native peoples if a statement in the BNA Act would have been helpful in their achieving the right to vote much sooner than when it was finally accorded to these minorities as recently as the fifties and sixties. Ask Franco-Manitobans if a statement of linguistic rights would not have made some difference to their culture's survival in the long years between Laurier and Trudeau. We know the charter is far from perfect, but due to the diligence of committee members on all sides of the House it is a vast improvement from the first time we saw this charter.

Of course, some one of my political persuasion regrets the silence of the charter on certain matters. We would like to have seen statements about economic rights, such as the right to a job, a decent house, health, clean air or a clean environment. These rights are not included.

Having said that, I for one am not prepared to deny native Canadians of aboriginal background their rights as described in this charter, women their equal legal rights or the average citizen protection against arbitrary search and seizure, simply because my own personal pet interest is not part of this charter of rights. Without the inclusion of the charter of rights, it makes little difference to me whether we bring the BNA Act home this year or a hundred years from now. Maybe equalization or some such matter is important, but I think the charter of rights is vital.

I would like to deal with the amending formula for a moment. As we know, within the resolution the principle of unanimity applies for two years, within which time the first ministers will have the opportunity to find another formula. I wish them luck! Failing that, and after the prescribed time, the Victoria amending formula will come into force. In effect, this amending formula would require a resolution of support at the federal level and of the legislature of any province which, at the time of enactment of this formula, has 25 per cent of the nation's population within its borders. Further, the formula requires support for the resolution from two of the four Atlantic provinces and two western provinces whose populations total 50 per cent or more.

I would like this provision changed so that the 50 per cent of the population required by the western provinces is dropped. Does that surprise hon. members? This change would permit any two of the four western provinces to have veto power.

I am aware—and I am sure the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) will be pleased to hear this—that the present formula protects my province of British Columbia. But I think it is blatantly unfair to the three prairie provinces that a two-province, 50 per cent rule should apply in western Canada, while a simpler and easier two-province veto provision applies in Atlantic Canada without reference to population.

The Victoria formula is important because it will give Canada a reasonable amending mechanism and the freedom to abandon the hobbling unanimity rule which has so frustrated Canadians for years and prevented them from having their own Constitution. I believe a formula requiring a simple two-western province veto is fair to all regions of the country, particularly in light of the formula's flexibility, which provides veto power in future to any province which attains 25 per cent of the nation's population.

The so-called Vancouver consensus supported by the official opposition is unacceptable to me because it permits a province to opt out if it does not agree with some constitutional amendment. Ultimately, we would not have a country at all but a checkerboard of jurisdictions, each with what would amount to its own constitution, which would make a mockery of the mobility rights and other rights which have been guaranteed in this charter. I am sure that if he were alive, the Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker would agree with me on this point.

Mr. Keeper: One Canada, not a two thirds Canada.

Mr. Rose: There are some who say, "What is all the rush? Why risk all this conflict and controversy? Why not take a little more time? Let's polish up the package into one more acceptable to more people."

To answer the last statement first, I believe that if we worked ten years more, we would never create a blue print for Canada that was perfect nor one which would avoid all criticism. Our country is too diverse for that to happen.

As a New Democrat I find the perpetuation of the powers of the Senate so intensely unpalatable that for that reason alone I am tempted to vote against the whole bundle. I will leave that to other members of my party because I am quite sure we will not hear much about Senate reform from either the Liberals or the Conservatives. I will leave it to others in my party to rage over the continued power and presence of that unelected Upper House made up largely of retired Liberal and Tory bagmen and political rejects. But I would like the House to know that the continuing presence of an archaic and unchanged Senate resting sheltered and snug in our brand new Constitution is, to me and many other people, both odious and unacceptable.

Mr. Blaikie: It is an affirmative action program for disabled Liberals.

Mr. Rose: In spite of the government cop-out which deleted Clause 44, which would have weakened the powers of the Senate, I feel that the gains obtained by my own leader in granting extended powers to the provinces in resource management and indirect taxation, plus improvements in the charter of rights for women, natives, the handicapped and for multiculturalism, do more than enough to justify my support for the package.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: But what is this rush to patriate, anyway? Following on the heels of the Quebec referendum of May 20 last a follow through was promised on the commitments made by several political leaders and parties. They promised to renew our Constitution as a means of dealing with the particular needs of the province of Quebec. Beyond that, we are all aware of the strong expressions of deeply felt alienation by the people of western Canada toward the federal government, so that there is now at least a willingness, in some cases at least and in some provinces—and involving many people—to discuss our Constitution and to expect that there will be significant movement on this matter of constitutional change.

Should we falter and return to the interminable and boring rounds of federal-provincial conferences, whatever momentum has been built up among the people of Canada could well be lost. So the time is now. I disagree with those who strongly advocate that this is not the time. This is the time to act decisively with respect to the patriation of our Constitution. The mere transfer of a document from one country to another is not sufficient. We must show the people of Canada that we are prepared to change decision-making processes in order to correct these sources of alienation. I insist that nothing can be achieved by further foot-dragging or delay.

I have dealt with the features of the constitutional debate which are important to me. Admittedly, much more could be said, but I have commented on initiatives I support, such as the charter of rights and freedoms, MP participation in constitution building and added provincial resource protection. I admit I have said nothing about equalization or language rights and very little about legal rights. I have been sharply critical of perpetuating the Senate prerogatives, and in addition I have made suggestions about improving the amending formula to make it more fair and just to western provinces.

Symbols are very important to any nation. We have our own flag. We have our own national anthem. Soon, if we are statesmen instead of mere politicians, I think we will be able to boast of our own Constitution. A few members are still sitting among us who furiously and sincerely fought the new flag both inside and outside the House of Commons. Who today, however, would stand up and say we should rip up the Maple Leaf and unfurl the good old Red Ensign? Who are they? They are darned few.

The same is true with respect to the Constitution. Once we get it home and it becomes part of us, which politician will stand up during the next federal election campaign and say, "Vote for me and I will send our Constitution back to England"?

I recognize that there are some who oppose bitterly what we are doing here. That is inevitable. These things are never easy. Still, passions do cool eventually, and although it is trite but true, time is a great healer. Surely the glue holding Canada together is strong enough to resist our disintegration merely because the federal Parliament, in desperation, seized the initiative to bring our Constitution home.

The Tories are fond of repeating ad nauseam a Gallup poll published some weeks ago which reported that 64 per cent of Canadians opposed unilateral patriation. They use this as an argument for rejection of the package. I know that I have quoted the late John Diefenbaker a number of times but he said that polls were "only for dogs."

I think very few people are aware of what the former, fighting United States president, Harry Truman, had to say about using polls as a basis for political decision-making. In 1954 Mr. Truman is reported to have said:

I wonder how far Moses would have gone if he'd taken a poll in Egypt? What would Jesus Christ have preached if he'd taken a poll in Israel? Where would the Reformation have gone if Martin Luther had taken a poll? It isn't polls or public opinion of the moment that counts. It is right and wrong and leadership—men with fortitude, honesty and a belief in the right that makes epochs in the history of the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: I think Mr. Truman was right and I conclude by saying that I believe the Prime Minister and the leader of my party are right about this matter. The constitutional question comes down to leadership. My leader and members of my party on the committee and members of the official opposition worked hard. They did a great job. I feel that I, my colleagues and my party have done a great many things for Canadians in the past. This time we are going to help win a new Constitution for them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) on a point of order.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) was generous enough to allow a minute or two at the end of his speech for a question, I wonder if he would entertain it now?

Mr. Rose: Yes.

Mr. Friesen: In his speech he said that most provincial governments are so right-wing that they do not have time for bills of rights in their legislatures and that those bills are usually toothless. I wonder if he would give that description to the one in British Columbia.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is precisely what I said. I did not say they did not have bills of rights but I said that some of them are weak-kneed and toothless. I also said that most provincial governments are right-wing. If the codes are not toothless, surely the enforcement is toothless.

While I am on my feet, I wonder if I could ask a question since my time has not run out. It is very important that we finish debate on the amendment before us. There are other amendments to be dealt with dealing with native and civil rights, amending formulas and a number of other things.

I wonder where the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) is? When is he going to come back from his holiday in South Africa, where he is probably studying native rights? He should get back here and let us put an end to this part of the debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to take part in this debate because I share the general feeling of the members of this House concerning the undeniable importance this proposed resolution holds for the future of Canada. Mr. Speaker, this constitutionally significant action of patriating our Constitution should not be taken in isolation, but be part of the constitutional reform that a great many Canadians so dearly wish and to which the supporters of a renewed federalism, including the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau), committed themselves in the referendum debate last spring in Quebec.

Having said this I must add, I am extremely disappointed that the constitutional changes which a No at the referendum was supposed to bring about have been reduced to the bare minimum; all we are left with is a resolution proposal which further restricts the legislative powers of the Quebec's National Assembly. I wonder what would have been Quebec's answer last May 20 if it had been known renewed federalism would result in essentially two reforms: First, unilateral patriation, which is unacceptable to a majority of the provinces and to all political parties in Quebec; second, a charter of rights which, in its linguistic provisions, would significantly reduce Quebec jurisdiction over the language of instruction and compel the Quebec government to amend Bill 101, and this in exchange for the right entrenched in the Constitution for francophones outside Quebec to be educated in French within school systems that they will not control, and only where numbers justify it.

We would be justified in believing, Mr. Speaker, that under these conditions, many of us who, on May 20, trusted the federal authorities to renew Canadian federalism would rather have given the Quebec government a mandate to negotiate sovereignty-association, or at least would not have fought so vigorously for the No. If I may, I would like to recall what the chairman of the No committee in the county of Charlevoix, notary Paul-Émile Tremblay, wrote in this regard in the newspaper Le Devoir on March 2, and I quote:

If I had known what was to follow, I would never have accepted the presidency of the "No" committee in Charlevoix.

To this, some will probably reply that once the Constitution has been patriated, constitutional reform can be undertaken immediately and that agreement will be much easier to achieve as neither unanimity nor the agreement of the British parliament will be required to amend our Constitution. In fact, Mr. Speaker, this is an oversimplification because the procedure proposed in the resolution may make a permanent amending formula impossible until 1986. If this resolution is enacted on July 1, 1981, there would first of all be a period of two years during which the rule of unanimity would continue to apply.

On the other hand, if seven provinces representing 80 per cent of the population could agree on an amending formula after these two years, the federal government would have to hold a referendum within the next two years asking the people to choose between the provinces and the federal government's proposals. Finally, under Section 43 of the resolution, six additional months might elapse before the amending formula approved by a majority of voters is put into effect. We would be deluding ourselves, Mr. Speaker, if we expect to be in a position to address the constitutional reform before 1984, assuming that no referendum is held to choose an amending formula, or before 1986, if such a referendum is held.

Mr. Speaker, if the Victoria formula under Section 45 of the resolution becomes the chosen procedure, it may seem a good idea at first to postpone any true constitutional reform by a few years so that it may be carried out accordingly by a seemingly more flexible approach than the rule of unanimity which has prevailed until now. In other words, is it not true that it would be easier to amend the Constitution with the agreement of only six, seven or eight provinces and the federal government, as advocated under the Victoria formula, instead of having to seek unanimity in keeping with the constitutional practice followed since 1931? It would seem that the need for unanimity is more restricting, but how does that stand up in light of the facts? As things are now the constitutional debate rests basically on a relationship between political forces of which none can invoke the Constitution to stop the constitutional reform process. But if we do entrench an amending formula such as the Victoria formula, then the veto of the four regional blocs—Quebec, Ontario, western Canada and the maritimes—will have been lawfully and formally recognized.

● (1630)

It is therefore not surprising, Mr. Speaker, that those provinces, with Quebec in the lead, which want to negotiate wider legislative powers in the course of the constitutional review are reluctant to accept new rules for the game which would give Ontario, for instance, a province which would find it advantageous to maintain the constitutional status quo, a power of veto with the full force of the law. Mr. Speaker, it is amazing to witness the self-confidence shown by some people who proclaim the uncontested and incontestable legality of the action of the central government in this matter. Yet they ought to know that the current constitutional debate raises many questions to which constitutional experts give conflicting answers and that, therefore, nothing can be stated with certainty by anyone whatsoever. Thus it is foolhardy, to say the least, to claim that the rule of unanimity is a red herring and that in the current state of our constitutional law the Canadian Parliament can unilaterally and in any circumstances amend our Constitution on the strength of the fact that in the past the British Parliament has always accepted the requests of the Canadian Parliament when it came to constitutional amendments, without even taking into account the objections raised now and then by the provinces.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I would say that the real red herring is rather to make people believe, after it has been asserted that the federal Parliament has the unlimited power to amend alone the constitution, that the provinces will be in a better position after patriation since they will then have the formal right to object to any constitutional change. How can anyone take such an argument seriously, Mr. Speaker, when we know that a veto will be granted to the provinces only after the federal regime has been revamped, and that only in accordance with the views of the central government? Let us go back to the question of the rule of unanimity. First, one has to know that if the provinces were indeed ignored in many instances, it is because several of those constitutional amendments did not change in any way the basically federative elements of the 1867 Constitution. However, in its opinion of 1980 on the Senate, the Supreme Court of Canada pointed out, and I quote:

> The 1940, 1951, 1960 and 1964 amendments concerning unemployment insurance, old age pensions, the mandatory retirement of judges, and the old age supplementary benefits were all made with the unanimous consent of the provinces.

Indeed, in the same opinion the Supreme Court refers to a passage of the white paper on the amendment of the Constitution which the federal government itself made public in 1965. It goes like this, and I quote:

> The Canadian Parliament will not request an amendment directly affecting federal-provincial relationships without prior consultation and agreement with the provinces.

Now, then, no one can deny that the proposed resolution before the House substantially changes the rights, powers and privileges of the provinces, in short it changes the essentially federative elements of our Constitution. Indeed, not only does the proposed resolution contain a charter of rights and freedoms which considerably restricts the legislative powers of the provinces, particularly in the field of education with respect to Quebec, but it also includes constitutional amendment formulas which would dictate new rules of the game as regards federal-provincial relations, more particularly because of the fact that, under Section 46, the central government reserves the exclusive right to consult the people of Canada in a referendum should the two levels of government find themselves in a constitutional deadlock. That being said, Mr. Speaker, I for one refuse to go as far as to argue that the rule of unanimity is truly a principle of law to which the Supreme Court will refer when requested to rule on the constitutionality of this proposed resolution. But the spirit which prompted the 1980 advice concerning the Senate allows all kinds of expectations in this regard.

On the other hand, we must keep in mind that Section 91.1 of the B.N.A. Act specifically provides that the Government of Canada cannot unilaterally bring about constitutional amendments affecting provincial rights and powers, their jurisdiction in matters of education, the use of the French and English languages and the duration of the Parliament of Canada. If, under Section 91.1, these matters have been removed from the federal jurisdiction with respect to constitutional amendments, it is precisely because the federal Parliament was not to be allowed to unilaterally ask the British Parliament to amend the provisions of the British North America Act concerning these matters. And yet, this proposal clearly affects the legislative powers of the provinces and especially their jurisdiction in matters relating to the language of education.

Mr. Speaker, if only one or two provinces were opposing this proposal, we could at least argue over the legitimacy of the federal government's action. However, it is a fact that eight out of the ten provinces, representing a majority of Canadians, have publicly expressed their opposition to the federal proposal, and six of them are even protesting before the courts the constitutional legality of this resolution. Therefore, it is unfortunate that the government should resort to such an arbitrary process, especially in view of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that they cannot plead an election mandate, since the constitutional issue was noticeably overlooked during the last federal campaign, nor the referendum debate in Quebec, during which the issue of a unilateral patriation or the entrenchment of a charter of rights and freedoms was never mentioned, but rather a renewal of federalism designed to bring about a sharing of constitutional powers that would be more beneficial to Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, what should we conclude from all of this if not that this proposed resolution is both politically illegitimate and constitutionally very questionable? It is politically illegitimate because eight out of the ten provinces of Canada are opposed to it and the federal government was never given any specific mandate to that purpose, and constitutionally very questionable from a legal point of view, because it is contrary to the rule of unanimity which could be required to amend the sharing of the legislative powers or any other federating element of the Constitution of 1867, and especially because it goes against Section 91.1 of the British North American Act, which does not permit the federal Parliament, as stated in the opinion which the Supreme Court of Canada gave in 1980 concerning our Senate, and I quote:

—to amend in any way the provisions of Sections 91 and 92 concerning the distribution of legislative powers between the Canadian Parliament and the provincial legislatures.

Mr. Speaker, the proposed resolution being clearly questionable, to say the least, from a legal point of view, and its constitutionality running the very serious risk of being rejected by the Canadian courts, it is easily understood why the government will not only petition the British Parliament to transfer to the Canadian authorities the power to amend the Constitution, but will also insist that this foreign Parliament amend this same Constitution by entrenching into it a charter of rights and freedoms in spite of the opposition of a large majority of provinces. If it is true that it is legally necessary to forward an address to the British Parliament to obtain the patriation of our Constitution, it is not so in the case of the charter of rights and freedoms which does not need to be adopted by the parliament in London and which could simply be enacted as a Canadian statute.

What benefit is there in having the Charter of Rights and Freedoms included in the resolution which we will ask the British Parliament to adopt by way of a bill? What we should know, Mr. Speaker, is that in this way the government is actually asking the parliament of Westminster to legalize something which could be illegal from the start and which could have been declared unconstitutional by our Canadian courts had the government not resorted to such an exceptional measure as having a bill passed by the British parliament.

● (1640)

In other words, Mr. Speaker, in acting as it does, the federal government is placing itself beyond the reach of Canadian court intervention and can, strictly speaking, plead unquestionable legality, since an act of the parliament in London, passed pursuant to the Statute of Westminster, could hardly be challenged in our courts. Appearing on January 8 last before the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada, the distinguished constitutional expert from Laval University, Mr. Gil Rémillard, whose opinion has indeed been used by some in support of the federal government view, summing up the matter of the legality of the proposed resolution, stated, and I quote:

In conclusion, it therefore seems to us that the Trudeau resolution could be declared illegal by our courts. That illegality could, however, become legal through the legislative intervention of the British parliament.

And he added this, which is of great interest, and I quote him once more:

However, the federative elements of that British act could be denied application to the provinces if the latter were to reject them.

Mr. Speaker, what is one to conclude from all that, if not that our political leaders, in their search for solutions to the problems of our society, tend to favour unduly and almost exclusively the legal aspect of things, with the ensuing danger of misleading us and locking us up in a perpetual deadlock? For in all probability, if the federal government persists in proceeding as it has until now by invoking, and rightly so, Mr. Speaker, the strict legality of the process, we will see for many years to come a federal-provincial legal guerrilla to which the governments will have to devote the better part of their energy at the expense of the solution of the social and economic problems of the Canadian people.

It is inevitable, of course, that the provinces should in turn also resort to legalism to oppose the application of that British act in its federative elements, and that they should also be, legally speaking, on firm ground, according to Professor Rémillard. Our political leaders would do well to ponder over this thought of the Soviet dissident Solzhenitsyn who in 1978 wrote in his book "The Decline of Courage," and I quote:

A society that is set on the rule of law without aiming at something higher makes little use of the highest faculties of man. The rule of law in itself is too cold and too formal an instrument to exercise a beneficial influence on society. When life is wholly permeated with legal decision, an atmosphere of moral mediocrity is then created which stifles the best inspirations of man. And in the face of the trying times ahead of us legal crutches will be of no avail to make people stand upright.

Mr. Speaker, it is a rather subtle move on the part of the present government to change the nature of our federal system through enshrining a charter of rights and freedoms. It then becomes possible to cast aspersion on avowed opponents of the proposed resolution by inferring they are opposed to giving a better protection to human rights and freedoms. We feel it is highly desirable that the basic freedoms listed in the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights be constitutionally guaranteed all over the world. Yet let us not overrate the importance of the passing by the Canadian Parliament of a charter of rights and freedoms and make it at any cost an absolute prerequisite for the future happiness of our people, even if it means tampering with the basic principles of Canadian federation. The fact remains that in a federative system one level of government cannot compel the other to surrender part of its sovereignty even if it is to hand it over to the judiciary. Yet in many respects it is precisely what is being achieved by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms included in this proposed resolution. If the federal Parliament wants to hand over part of its own legislative powers to the courts, it certainly is its privilege but it is intolerable that it should try to force the provinces to cede part of their constitutional jurisdiction to the courts and more particularly to the Supreme Court of Canada whose judges are appointed exclusively by the federal government.

Does it mean, Mr. Speaker, that our country is condemned, because of its federal system, to never be able to entrench in its Constitution certain basic rights and freedoms which are in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights? I do not believe so, Mr. Speaker. And I should like to submit to the House some ideas how to go about patriating the Constitution, giving ourselves an amending formula and also a charter of rights and freedoms, while alleviating considerably the seriousness and the extent of the confrontations now taking place across Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the debate which has been raging since the introduction of this draft resolution in Parliament has seriously endangered Canadian unity, but it has also given rise to a show of solidarity among the provinces which was unheard of up to now in the history of federal-provincial relations. The solidarity of this interprovincial united front is particularly comforting for Quebec which, after being for so long the sole province to claim its rights from the federal government, may now view the future of the constitutional reform with optimism, a reform which is now in the nature of things and which will have to be started seriously under the pressure of the provinces. Therefore, I think that because of the new power struggle in federal-provincial relations, Quebec and its allies in other provinces can now consent to the patriation of the Constitution without jeopardizing the pursuit of the constitutional reform.

It is possible that for purely partisan reasons, the Parti Québécois government will maintain its traditional position on this matter, but there is good reason for supposing that the new Liberal government that Quebecers will give themselves in a few weeks might consent to such a patriation. In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, the constitutional crisis we are going through could be resolved if the proposed resolution contained only the following items:

1. The immediate patriation of the Constitution.

2. The maintenance of the unanimity rule for the amending formula for 12 months following patriation.

3. A national referendum to be held subsequently in order to allow Canadians to choose between the so-called Victoria formula and an eventual formula agreed to by seven provinces comprising at least 80 per cent of the total population of Canada. Failing an agreement on this matter among the provinces within 12 months following patriation, the Victoria formula would automatically become the amending formula.

4. In case of a constitutional deadlock, a national referendum to be called either by the federal government or by seven provinces comprising more than 50 per cent of the total population of Canada, regional vetos being granted in such a referendum, as specified in Clause 46 of the present proposed resolution.

And what about the charter of rights and freedoms? It would simply be the subject of a federal-provincial conference which would deal exclusively with this matter and would be called after the stumbling block of patriation of the Constitution had been removed and the sovereign people had chosen, if need be, an amending formula in a national referendum. And should this conference still fail to produce an agreement, then the federal government would be justified in calling on the Canadian people in a national referendum to be held under the rules specified in clause 46 of the proposed resolution, which grants regional vetos to the Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Ontario and the western provinces.

So here are, Mr. Speaker, the different stages of my proposal:

1. A federal-provincial conference in June, 1981, to deal only with the patriation of the Constitution.

2. The patriation of the Constitution in the fall of 1981, with the maintenance of the unanimity rule for the following 12 months.

3. A national referendum to choose an amending formula to be held in the fall of 1982.

4. A federal-provincial conference on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, to be held early in 1983.

5. A national referendum, if need be, failing an agreement at federal-provincial conferences, to be held on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in the fall of 1983.

Some will certainly say, Mr. Speaker, that since the past foreshadows the future, no agreement with the provinces will emerge from yet another federal-provincial conference on patriation of the Constitution. Yet, Mr. Speaker, one should not minimize the positive psychological effect the victory of Mr. Claude Ryan's party in the next provincial election to be held very soon in Quebec will have on federal-provincial relations. As I said earlier, a Liberal government in Quebec might well agree to a simple patriation with the unanimity rule as a provisional amending formula and I think that a very small minority of provinces would object to patriation achieved under such conditions. With such a support from most provinces, if not from all of them, the federal government could then legitimately proceed with a simple patriation of the Constitution, and the British parliament would be only too happy to grant this request.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to point out to the House the interesting suggestion put forward by a man who cannot be suspected of any hostility towards the federal government since he is the former clerk of the Privy Council and secretary of the cabinet, Mr. Gordon Robertson, who also has been a close adviser to the Prime Minister in constitutional matters. In a paper delivered before the Forum on Management of the Government Process, on February 10 last, Mr. Robertson, who admitted that he was drawing his inspiration from a former minister of transport, Mr. Jack Pickersgill, suggested that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms should only be binding on the provinces which would have specifically endorsed it by an act of their respective legislatures before the end of the four-year period following the passage of the resolution by the British Parliament or which would have implicitly accepted it by failing to denounce it by way of a resolution passed during the third or fourth year of that four-year period. If really, as it was stated by the Minister of Justice and Minister of State for Social Development (Mr. Chrétien), on January last, before the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, 90 per cent of all Canadians are favourable to the entrenching of a charter of rights and freedoms in our Constitution, it should be expected that given nearly unanimous public opinion, no provincial legislature would dare denounce the charter. In addition, as stated by Mr. Robertson, and I quote:

● (1650)

[English]

Such a provision in the proposed amendment would remove the objection that the Parliament of Canada is seeking indirectly to impose its will on the legislatures of the provinces through the British Parliament because our Parliament could not do it directly in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, if either of the alternatives I have just described were followed to entrench a charter of rights and freedoms, and if the federal government agreed to share with the provinces the right to initiate a national referendum, the present constitutional upheaval would come to an end and the stated objectives could be achieved within a reasonable period of time.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to address the House as a Quebecer and tell the government that in my view these compromises would only be acceptable to the majority of Quebecers if the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which would be submitted for their approval through a national referendum and which, if the Robertson solution were followed, would automatically be submitted for the approval of their National Assembly, were of much more limited scope and did not challenge the language policy which Quebec adopted in 1974. That clearly means that language of instruction must remain under provincial authority and that therefore Section 23 of the proposed resolution must be repealed. Since it is mainly because of Section 23, that I object to the proposed resolution I would like to make it clear why, in my view, it would be against the interests of Quebec to entrench minority language educational rights in the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, just as I would like to see some amendments made by the National Assembly to Bill 101 in order, for example, to allow children of Canadian citizens from other provinces to attend English schools in Quebec, I think it is essential for the National Assembly to maintain the authority it was granted in 1867 to legislate freely in the field of language of instruction. In other words, even though I would like Quebec to be generous toward its English-speaking minority, I still think it is essential for the National Assembly to be able to legislate at any time in order to maintain a balance between its two language groups. In short, Mr. Speaker, the whole issue of language of instruction, which is so closely tied to the very existence and well-being of the French culture in Quebec, must continue to come under the exclusive authority of the only legislative body with a French-speaking majority in Canada, that is to say the Quebec National Assembly.

By entrenching in the Constitution minority language educational rights, as in Section 23, the government is restricting considerably the freedom of action of Quebec with respect to language of instruction. It amounts in fact to hamstringing it if the present economic conditions in Quebec were to change due to unexpected developments and if Quebec became, in ten or 20 years, an important centre of attraction for North-American workers or people from other Commonwealth countries who, of course, would be English speaking, much the same as has happened in Alberta in recent years. Indeed, nobody can foresee what the future has in store for Quebec economically speaking, as nobody had foreseen the energy crisis and the ensuing dramatic economic boom in Alberta. With its ground full of natural resources, it is not excluded that Quebec could somewhat become the Alberta of the year 2000.

Mr. Speaker, it would be unwise, to say the least, to entrench in our Constitution the minority language educational rights to which those new anglophone Quebecers could legally lay claim once they become Canadian citizens in order to compel the Quebec government to allow their children in English schools. That is not to say, Mr. Speaker, that such a situation is bound to occur, but there is the risk of the balance between francophones and anglophones being changed to the detriment of the francophone majority, a risk I refuse to take and which is all the more serious that no increase in the natural population growth in Quebec is expected in the coming years.

Mr. Speaker, after considering carefully all the migratory movements to Quebec between 1969 and 1978, it is fair to say that the entrenchment in the Constitution of the minority language educational rights will open the doors of English schools to 75 per cent of the new Quebecers in the next few years. It is important to emphasize also that Section 23 would even be at variance with the language policy of the Quebec Liberal party which, according to the latest news, is about to advocate access to English schools only to children of parents who attended English primary schools anywhere in Canada, which would exclude children of all the future anglophone immigrants.

If only, Mr. Speaker, this threat to the future of French-speaking Quebec would improve considerably the lot of the francophone minorities in other provinces, the pill would be easier to swallow. Unfortunately, on the one hand, the government goes out of its way to give constitutional guarantees to Quebec anglophones who already have three universities, six CEGEPs, 410 primary and secondary schools financed by Quebec taxpayers and managed by 31 school boards under full control of the English minority, and on the other hand, it is very different when it comes to francophone minorities outside of Quebec who will not be able, under these constitutional proposals, to set up their own school boards and will most probably have to accept French classes in English schools, and only where numbers warrant it. Incidentally, this restriction will have little effect on Quebec anglophones since they are heavily concentrated in the Montreal area. It is a restriction which will have little effect on the English-speaking people in Quebec because of their large number in the Montreal area. But it will be a different thing for the French-speaking minorities in English Canada where in six provinces more than 45 per cent of people of French origin now declare English as their mother tongue and where francophones are very often scattered throughout the territory. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, this is asking Quebec to pay too high a price for their French-speaking brothers in other provinces to enjoy such limited rights.

Besides, I understand why the government is reluctant, even though it wishes strongly to do so, to subject Ontario to the provisions of Section 133 of the Constitution; what I cannot readily understand, however, is the fact that it does not show as much restraint toward Quebec which is as dead against Section 23 of the proposed resolution as Ontario is against being subject to Section 133 of the Constitution. Yet, that would only be fair and logical considering that in Quebec the judiciary and parliamentary institutions have been subject to bilingualism as provided for in Section 133, since 1867. Mr. Speaker, I am as happy to praise the openmindedness and generosity of Premier Hatfield of New Brunswick over institutional bilingualism, as I am sad when I see that Premier Davis of Ontario who after having courted Quebecers during the referendum campaign, has chosen to be narrow-minded which is no credit to his fellow citizens, a majority of whom, according to the latest polls, would favour enforcement of Section 133 in their province. We can only hope that the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) will try to convince his big brother in Ontario to take a more favourable stance concerning the rights of Franco-Ontarians. I even challenge the Leader of the Official Opposition to show by some concrete action that equality before the law of francophones and anglophones is dear to his heart, as he has so often stated, and to bring forward an amendment binding Ontario to Section 133. I am convinced that he would gain stature in the eyes of Quebecers, and that the party to which I belong would be pleased to support such an amendment.

SECTOR BARGAINING ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING UNION BARGAINING

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Halton) moved that Bill C-239, to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Canada Labour Code to provide for the establishment of sector bargaining, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will explain the purposes of the bill by quoting directly from its explanatory note:

> The purpose of this bill is to require union groups in a single public service sector to bargain with the Treasury Board simultaneously, and to negotiate contracts which would run for three years and expire at the same time. This would assure the taxpaying public that each essential public service sector would be strike free, except for the possibility of a walkout every three years.

The reason for the bill and its passage is very simple. It is the growing number of strikes to which Canada and Canadians have been subjected, particularly over the last five to six years. According to the International Labour Organization in Geneva, the countries with the highest number of man-hours lost in a five-year average are as follows. The country with the largest number of man-days lost as a result of strikes and walkouts is Canada, followed very closely, of course, by Italy. I will not dwell on them but the other statistics show that the number of public sector strikes in Canada in the last five years was 1,213, 229 in 1980 alone, affecting 717,853 employees. The number of person-days lost as a result of strikes in the last five years was 10,060,030. And we wonder why our productivity goes down year after year, affecting the economy and all operations, from the small businessman to our over-all economy!

Before hon. members opposite prepare themselves to talk this motion out, to speak against it, I would like to bring to their attention, in as non-partisan a way as I possibly can, in a sort of chronological order, the tremendous amount of support from all walks of life, all factions, including labour, management and government, in support of sector bargaining.

I go back to 1973 when the Liberal government commissioned the Finkelman report to look into labour relations. The report, released in 1974, strongly recommended sector bargaining. The then minister of labour, now Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), presented a memorandum to cabinet on the subject of labour relations in Canada which I have here. It is marked "Confidential", but I will quote it because it is very pertinent to the bill before us. It reads in part:

> Some of the problems are of a structural nature in that there are too many bargaining points, too many bargaining agents and unions. The result, as any holiday traveller in Canada knows, is something as exciting as the Olympic lottery. As he embarks on his holiday, confident that the airline pilots are working and that the machinists are also on the job, there just may happen to be a walkout of ticket clerks and other personnel. And even if all of these private sector employees are on the job, the trip could still be placed in jeopardy by collective action taken by air traffic controllers, technicians, airport electricians or firefighters. There are similar difficulties in the movement of grain, with risk of its steady flow being halted, if in the long stream handling the commodity, there is labour peace on the dockside but not on the ships or the waterways.
> It is clear that the system today lacks coherence and has a great potential for conflict.

The same can be said for the Post Office which has no less than four unions. One day the sorting clerks can go on strike and shut down postal delivery, and when that dispute is solved, the next day a second union could go on strike, as it has in the past, and shut down the postal service. So all of these essential public service sectors with more than one union are clearly affected by this measure. For example, last year alone eight firemen closed down Toronto International Airport. I think the time has come for Parliament to make the necessary changes to make it impossible for eight firemen to close down Toronto International Airport.

In any event, the cabinet memorandum goes on to say:

> I am proposing, therefore, the establishment of the Canada Labour Relations Council as a mechanism that will go beyond one shot, crisis or ritual consultation.
>
> Our own objectives for the council would be: > an alteration of bargaining structures so as to reduce the number of bargaining points,

That is the Liberals' own recommendation to cabinet after receiving that recommendation in the Finkelman report. The Canada Labour Relations Council was formed as a result of that recommendation. It was a tripartite committee composed of labour, government and industry. It began work in July, 1975 and unfortunately ended in March, 1976. I say "unfortunately" because labour decided to quit the council as a result of that same government's position on wage and price controls. No public reports ever issued from this council, but there were several confidential reports to the then minister of labour. I will get back to that in a while. These confidential reports again recommended very strongly the sector bargaining position.

● (1710)

I personally have had an interest in this subject since February 13, 1975, when I asked the then government to introduce legislation dealing with sector bargaining. I have a whole report in front of me with respect to every time I wrote on the subject, but I will not read it into the record since I do not have the time.

The first positive response from a Liberal cabinet minister to this recommendation was on April 16, 1975, when the then minister of labour, the hon. member for Hamilton East, said in response to my question on sector bargaining:

Certainly on the labour side I have been receiving considerable encouragement toward this end.

Then on July 17, 1975, I asked the minister whether he could advise the House if the government intended to look at the possibility of having union groups in a single public service sector bargaining with the government simultaneously in order to avoid the fragmentation of union power and, if so, when this House could expect an announcement. The then minister of labour replied:

There is a good deal of sympathy for this type of approach. There have been discussions toward this end with the chairman of the Canada Labour Relations Board and with the business community and with the labour movement itself. There is a general disposition to achieve this type of objective. I might say that we have achieved something along these lines already.

In response to another question from me the then minister of labour said:

I welcome the hon. member's enthusiasm for this approach.

Then on July 28, 1975, I asked the minister:

The first meetings of the Canada Relations Council are now over . . . Can the minister indicate whether the concept of single sector bargaining was discussed at these meetings? What was the result?

The minister's reply was this:

Yes, this issue was discussed. The council decided that both were desirable objectives. They agreed to form panels of management—labour—and government. They will meet several times again and hopefully will come up with some definite recommendations along these lines.

As I said earlier, because of the wage and price controls introduced by the Liberals, labour decided to quit that council, unfortunately, and therefore it was disbanded.

As if there were not enough studies already, the government then commissioned the Bairstow report in March of 1978. It is a very excellent report which took a short time to publish, and it was released in December of that same year. It supported this position. I would like to quote briefly from the Bairstow report:

Above all, it is our strong opinion that a wider-based bargaining structure in those industries within our terms of reference would be in the best socioeconomic interests of the Canadian public.

The key words there are "wider-based bargaining."

As a result of this, I asked the then minister of labour, Martin O'Connell, why he had not acted on the many recommendations dealing with sector bargaining, the most recent of which was the Bairstow report. Mr. O'Connell answered in the House on February 14, 1979:

I am waiting to discuss the recommendations of that committee with its members—I am waiting for a response to my invitation.

I have brought to the attention of hon. members what I think have been four or five years of positive comments from ministers, and reports and studies which made the suggestion of bringing in sector bargaining. As I said earlier, during those five years the number of strikes increased year after year. In 1977 there were 176 strikes affecting 54,000 employees. In 1980 there were 229 strikes affecting 230,000 employees. This took place during the years when this government and many reports were recommending sector bargaining. We have finally reached the number one position among countries having the most number of man-days lost as a result of strikes. That is a shame. This government has not been able to reach a decision on this most vital of issues.

As recently as November 12, 1980, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) spoke to the London Chamber of Commerce and said:

There is as I indicated growing concern or a shock, I think, at the capacity of even tiny groups of public servants to cause massive disruptions in our lives. And moreover there is a dismay at what appears to be growing disregard of the law governing the collective bargaining process in the federal public service. These are concerns which have been expressed to me and I must say to you that I share the concerns.

I agree with the President of the Treasury Board. Further on in his speech he gave specific support to sector bargaining. In fact, he went on to say:

The right to strike is not an inalienable right. Surely in the case of essential services, there is a greater public good to be served and the right to strike surely must be reviewed in that context.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and I suggest to hon. members that Canada's economy has been hurt and damaged so much by strikes and walkouts, particularly within the public service sector, that the time has come to take one of two positions. That is to say, first, we could take away the right to strike within the public service sectors of our economy. I strongly recommend this, following on the words of the President of the Treasury Board in the speech he made to the London Chamber of Commerce. We no longer have a 14-hour working day, child labour or many of the other factors which gave rise to granting the right to strike. I believe some unions are now taking advantage of their powers.

Second, if the government is unwilling to take away the right to strike, which is particularly supported by the majority of businessmen and Canadians in this country, as recent polls have indicated, then hon. members at least should very seriously consider introducing legislation such as the bill which is before us now. I do not care if it is my own personal bill, as long as something along those lines is introduced. I would like to see this bill go to committee. I hope that members opposite who have heard me explain to them the support of their ministers and the reports which have been made by their government supporting sector bargaining will not talk this bill out today. I hope it will at least be allowed to go to the committee stage where these reports can be dealt with in detail and looked at in a more serious and fundamental way.

In closing, I hope hon. members will see fit to support the bill before us. I again repeat very strongly that unless and until a similar piece of legislation is introduced, along with a provision for secret ballot votes on strikes based on the Taft-Hartley Act concept of the United States, which I happen to have on the Order Paper of May 2, 1980, in Bill C-472, then we should very seriously consider taking the right to strike away from essential services in the public sector. Positive steps must be taken now to assist industry and the small businessman, who is having enough troubles as it is with high interest rates and the like. I appeal to hon. members to let this bill at least pass on to committee stage.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I would like briefly to respond to the motion which is now before the House, namely, Bill C-239, to amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Canada Labour Code to provide for the establishment of private sector bargaining.

The hon. member opposite mentioned some studies which have taken place. As members of the House will recall, on March 9, 1978 the then minister of labour, the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro), appointed an industrial inquiry commission pursuant to Section 198 of the Canada Labour Code. This commission, chaired by Frances Bairstow, was charged with the responsibility of ascertaining the advantages and disadvantages of wider-based bargaining in federal industries, with particular emphasis on the transportation, grain handling and communication industries; any impediments, legislative or otherwise, to wider-based bargaining or the rationalization of bargaining units; any matters incidental or relating to any of the foregoing matters.

The commission began a comprehensive review of bargaining in the specified industries with 19 days of hearings in five cities throughout Canada. Many of the hearings were held in camera at the request of the parties appearing. Several of the groups which appeared before the commission returned for further appearances in exploration of some of the issues raised in earlier meetings. The commission also held frequent executive sessions and individual commission members interviewed representatives of interested organizations.

In addition to personal testimony, various briefs and correspondence were filed with the commission, both from groups and organizations which appeared and from some individuals and organizations who were unable to present their views personally.

Between hearings and executive sessions, the commission received correspondence from the public, press accounts, innumerable telephone requests for information and responses to newspaper advertisements announcing appearances in particular cities. Background materials and research analyses were scrutinized and considered. All major allegations made in hearings and in personal interviews were checked and investigated.

Bearing in mind the limited time frame for the submission of its report, the commission concluded that priority had to be given to those sectors containing the greatest potential for disruption of services. Thus, the commission decided it should restrict its inquiry to aviation, airport services and grain handling.

The railway industry is already deeply involved in its own form of wider-based bargaining. Indeed, the experience of the management and labour groups in the railways provided many witnesses with important background information for the commission.

In the shipping industry there also exist many coalitions of bargaining groups. The commission decided that to disturb these relationships until the parties have had a further opportunity to assess their experience would be injudicious, particularly since the record of work stoppages both in seafaring and in port facilities gives some basis for optimism for the future. This has not always been the case, but it seems to have been so in recent times.

In studying the record of work stoppages and other disruptions as well as the potential for damage to the public, the commission concluded that its limited time and resources would best be deployed in a search for improvements to the bargaining process in the high priority areas of air transportation, airport services and grainhandling. Their importance to the nation's economy and relationships to other industrial sectors is a barometer by which the Canadian economy is judged by other countries. In summary, the selection of problems for study was determined on a basis of priorities.

Early in the commission's deliberations the interrelationship with the public service became apparent. Key to the grain handling operations were those who are a vital part of that industry, but whose employer is the Government of Canada. In airport services virtually all job functions are performed by public sector employees, but their impact on the highly integrated field of commercial aviation is immense. This can be demonstrated by considering that no airline pilot, flight attendant, mechanic or ticket agent can continue working in the face of a work stoppage resulting from a dispute between airport firefighters and the Government of Canada. The reverse might not necessarily be true.

A similar dichotomy between the public and private sector exists in the grain-handling industry where integration of job functions is essential to productivity. While the commission's treatment of the public service aspect of grain handling was national in scope due to the certification structures dictated by the Public Service Staff Relations Act, its approach to rationalization of bargaining points on an integrated industry basis was limited to the port of Vancouver for a variety of economic, market, industrial relations and collective bargaining reasons.

For the purposes of its investigations, the commission proceeded on the basis that "wider-based collective bargaining" is any restructuring or coalition of the present system of bargaining which assists in reducing the high degree of fragmentation of unions and/or management units, hence, the current proclivity for sequential work disturbances and shutdowns which exist within certain industries.

The motivation for this commission's inquiry was a consideration of the socioeconomic interest of the public as well as of the interests of employers and employees within the collective bargaining process. The commission endeavoured to identify those structural disabilities which may unnecessarily impede productive bargaining between the principal parties to the process. Its fundamental thrust was to obviate the damage which such inherent defects in the bargaining structure may inflict on members of the general public who are not otherwise involved in or parties to the process. I thank my hon. colleague for sending me a note so that I could outline that.

The paramountcy of the public interest and the legislatively enshrined commitment to the process of free collective bargaining do not exist in isolation. Recent and continued conflict between these principles can no longer be ignored or denigrated by the parties. There is no question that unresolved bargaining disputes in the key industries reviewed by the commission are injurious to the public and the economy. That is not the question here.

So too are the uncertainties of operating productively a public or private enterprise while the potential for perpetual bargaining disputes clouds rational planning. Canadian citizens have the inviolable right to be protected, not only in respect of their health, safety and general welfare, but as well against inconvenience and disadvantages of an economic and social nature.

It has become increasingly clear that the public interest depends greatly on the development of orderly and constructive relationships between employers and their employees. To the extent that existing bargaining structures require adjustment in order to facilitate such development, it is in the interest of all parties, including the public, that such changes be effected. It was to that end that the commission dedicated its energies.

It is the structure within which parties bargain collectively, and not the bargaining process itself, which is the key to the issue here. A major aspect of this structural component is the occupational interrelationship and the legislative duality that arises from the application of two federal labour jurisdictions, that is, the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service Staff Relations Act. To assist employer and employee groups in the voluntary resolution and adjustment of many of the dysfunctional elements of their relationship, the commission recommended the establishment of an independent mediation and conciliation agency that would be tailored to function in the entire federal sector. The commission subscribed unequivocally to the principle of free collective bargaining as the preferable method of resolving labour-management relations issues, as opposed to artificial solutions imposed by others.

Finally, the commission dismissed as impractical the belief, widely held in some quarters of Canadian society, that the right to strike or lockout, whether in public or private sectors, should be banned.

• (1730)

A little earlier the hon. member said the unions are starting to use their power—I believe his term was "out of proportion to what it should be".

Mr. Jelinek: Abuse.

Mr. Parent: The hon. member is correcting that now.

The unions have bargained for and gained the power they have, and in most cases their power is used judiciously. I would no more want to legislate unions and strikes out of existence per se than I would want to say private industry should not be making profits in excess of "X" amounts. I do not think it is the business of this legislative body to do that.

The commission also held such belief to be unworkable since evidence indicates that restrictive legislation does not in itself prevent strikes. Further, I feel it necessary to add that such proposals as Bill C-239 are simplistic because they make no attempt to address the fundamental realities of the bargaining process. I strongly and respectfully suggest that there is no point whatsoever in pursuing Bill-239 as it will not improve the climate of industrial relations in Canada.

I would like to make one more point before giving the floor to my colleagues. The hon. member stated that Canada led the world in the number of strike days lost. I suggest that if the figures were taken from the International Labour Organization, that organization does do not always use the same basis for counting the number of days lost. It is for that reason that Canada may indeed be faring much better than indicated a little while ago.

I hope all hon. members will consider my suggestions in their deliberations.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to speak on this bill which, on its surface, appears to be good. It appears to be popular. Anyone involved in the grain trade, whether he be a farmer, someone working in a port facility or someone who derives his income from farms or port facilities, would like it because it seems to indicate there would be fewer strikes and less cost to the people involved in those sectors.

It is popular to refer to problems in the air travel industry and to suggest there should be fewer strikes and interruptions faced by consumers of air services. This bill is based on what I consider to be a false assumption that the unions of this country are creating all the problems, or a substantial number of them. There is the suggestion that if we could get all the unions in a particular sector in line, that would somehow solve the problems.

Mr. Jelinek: The unions support this.

Mr. Murphy: I represent the constituency of Churchill, and I know that it is not just the unions which are not in line. When we talk about grain transportation, we are talking about a number of different government and non-government agencies which are involved, and this complicates the movement of grain in this country. The CNR makes certain decisions, the CPR makes certain decisions, and the Canadian Wheat Board also makes certain decisions. Anyone involved in the grain trade recognizes there is not always agreement as to what should or could be done. Port authorities and the government are involved in the movement, sale and transportation of grain in Canada. People who focus on only one item, quite often fail to recognize that this is not strictly a union problem; it is a problem relating to the whole structure of Canadian industries.

It is not easy to identify which unions belong in a particular sector. Some will say that the railway lines obviously belong in the grain transportation sector. Others will say railway unions have something to do with CN Express. Others might say that they belong in the sector occupied by VIA Rail because VIA Rail moves people from area to area. Others might say they belong in the sector transporting dairy products because that sector also uses rail lines. Those unions also belong in the sector transporting live or packaged beef to various parts of the country.

In what sector do railway unions belong? Human beings as well as goods are serviced by rail lines. It may be fine to say that they are all part of the grain-handling system and therefore belong in that particular sector, but that is very simplistic. I do not think this matter can be easily resolved.

Another problem may be the attitude of government. This bill suggests that the Public Service Staff Relations Act as well as the Canada Labour Code are involved, and this is correct. However, I cannot imagine this government, or any preceding government, giving the same rights to workers under the public service regime as those given to people under the Canada Labour Code because for a number of years unions whose workers came under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, have asked governments for the rights enjoyed by people working under the Canada Labour Code, and the government has always turned them down.

When this type of legislation is proposed, under what umbrella do people come? Do they come under the umbrella of the Canada Labour Code or the umbrella of the PSSRA? That has not been answered here.

Let us look at the situation on Parliament Hill. This government and previous governments have not given bargaining rights to people who work on Parliament Hill. How can we say all these different sectors should be under one umbrella when we cannot even determine the bargaining rights of people on this Hill? Certain events in the past few months would indicate that that is a necessary step for the government to take. A number of people, including members of this House, feel that unions are too powerful, yet this proposed legislation would put a number of weak unions into a combined bargaining unit which would probably be greater that the sum of its parts.

If there is one negotiating force with respect to grain handling, can hon. members imagine what strength that force would have in negotiations? Can hon. members imagine what strength they would have to hamper the movement of grain and other products across the country?

This bill will not resolve the problem which exists. This is not just a matter of regressive legislation which would solve the problems we face; it is a matter of an attitude on the part of the private sector and government in relation to how things should be operating.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston) went to London, as a previous speaker mentioned, to speak to a Chamber of Commerce, to denounce workers in the public sector and to say that they have too much strength, which must be taken away. It disturbs me that he should go to a conference and make that type of allegation. When I asked him in committee today if he was willing to bring legislation before the House, he said he was not; but he is ready to go out and attack the workers and their bargaining rights at meetings of chambers of commerce and conference board meetings. Yet he is not ready to make a statement in this House or to bring in legislation. I think that demonstrates a poor attitude.

● (1740)

In committee today, the minister also said that the government is not willing to put government workers under the protection of Part IV of the Canada Labour Code which would bring them under the section that deals with occupational health and safety. The bill not only proposes to put the private sector and unions together but it seems to expect them to negotiate almost at the same time and almost on the same front.

Mr. Jelinek: Read the bill. It says "public sector."

Mr. Murphy: The government does not give even partial protection to workers who come under the jurisdiction, let alone the protection, of the Canada Labour Code. It will not even give them the protection of the occupational health and safety section. Instead, it takes the view that it can issue Treasury Board directives which will give the same protection. I do not think they are worth very much, Mr. Speaker. In 1972, Treasury Board issued directives to managers telling them to hire more women in the public service. An excellent report which was issued last year shows that this directive has not been followed. Treasury Board directives are not good enough in this area or in any other.

I wonder if it is possible for legislation of this type, whether it originates with the hon. member or with the government, to resolve the problems that exist in the areas of grain transportation, air travel and many other sectors of the economy. We certainly recognize the complaints as valid and honest.

If the government's motive is to try to designate employees, as it tried to designate the air controllers' union, how can it then expect co-operation? Can the Public Service Alliance, the Canadian Labour Congress or the various public service unions be expected to work toward solving problems with a government that is attacking them inside and outside this House?

Mr. Jelinek: They support sector bargaining.

Mr. Murphy: A voice in the wilderness says the government supports sector bargaining. That is true to some extent. The government's submission to the inquiry into wider-based bargaining indicates that it wants a lot of other changes made at the same time. It has proven unwilling to make modifications in the present act which would affect its treatment of people here on the Hill or people affected by the occupational health and safety section, those who do not come under Part IV of the labour code or anything else.

The danger of this bill is that it would take protection away from unions; it would not give them protections that are necessary to make it work.

I have to oppose the bill, Mr. Speaker. It is not practical and it is not complete. Considering the government's present attitude toward workers, it could never be successful.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Jelinek) regarding his private member's bill which is now before us.

As I have stated on many occasions, I share with him and other members of this House, a deep concern for the disruptive effects of public sector strikes on the economy and well-being of this nation.

It has been self-evident for years that no one really wins in a strike situation. There are not even any runners-up. Victories are often claimed by either management or the unions, and sometimes by both. But both sides can be classified as losers, as can those not directly involved in the disputes.

What angers me is that the situation has been allowed to continue and that no effective corrective action has been implemented.

To this government's shame, it has allowed public sector strikes, like death and taxes, to be considered inevitable. I vehemently disagree. How can we possibly accept as inevitable the repeated disruption of essential services which are so costly to individual Canadians and to the nation as a whole?

There comes a time, and that time has long past, when we must take rational measures to ensure that the effect of strikes is minimized.

A step forward in this regard would be the passage of this bill, an act to amend the existing Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Canada Labour Code to provide for the establishment of sector bargaining.

Madam Speaker, this makes a great deal of sense. As the hon. member for Halton has stated, the purpose of this bill is to require union groups in a single public service sector to bargain with the Treasury Board simultaneously and to negotiate contracts which would run for three years and expire at the same time.

This would assure the taxpaying public that each essential public service sector would be strike free, except for the possibility of a walkout every three years. Such a move would force bargaining units, which represent different job categories in a common service, to resolve their disputes with management at the same time.

This would effectively eliminate successive strikes in a particular sector, strikes that obviously disrupt the work of the entire common service. Thus, a small number of people would be prevented from using the power of intermittent and vitally-timed strikes to hold up for ransom the government and the country because an essential service is being denied. This is what is happening now and this is what must be stopped.

From 1975 to 1980 there were more than 1,200 strikes in the public sector in Canada. Almost one million people were directly involved in the strikes, with millions more affected, and these strikes resulted in about ten million lost working days. And, as the record shows, things are definitely not improving. The figures for 1980 were the highest for the previous six years. I repeat, this has to be stopped.

It would have been reasonable to assume that after the major postal strike in 1975, this government would have been seriously working to prevent these situations. That infamous strike involving the Post Office ran from October to December, a total of 45 days, involved nearly 1,800 workers, and cost the department a loss of 700,000 work days.

I am quite sure that instead of 1,800 workers, the figure involved was around 19,000, including the inside workers. Other postal workers had to give up their jobs because of the strike.

No one has ever been able to come up with that strike cost in real dollars to everyone of us not directly involved, but you can be sure it was in the millions of dollars. I think a ballpark figure was $50 million, and that probably was too low. A great many small businesses suffered seriously and some went bankrupt. That was the result of only one of the bargaining units within the common service. The others each had their day, and again Canadians were the ones to pay.

As I have said before in this House, I am not against the right of the labour force to strike. What I am opposed to is allowing a group of people working in essential services the right to tie up this country every few weeks or months in order to force their employers to award them sometimes unreasonable and excessive increases in pay and benefits. Through this bill, such blackmail would cease. By containing public sector bargaining within a specified three-year period, the issues could be resolved on a more stable pattern, and all at the same time.

• (1750)

The result of such government action would be to remove the burden of sporadic strikes from the economy. It could have a direct and helpful influence on strikes involving the private sector. The private sector could use a helping hand. Its strike record in the past six years is less enviable. From 1975 to 1980 there were close to 5,000 strikes in the private sector which involved more than 2.5 million people and cost the economy about 40 million lost working days. How anyone can claim there are winners in strikes is beyond me.

The adoption of the bill can only serve to ensure that there will be fewer losers and, if the system works as it should, possibly none. I would go further to suggest that, nearing the end of the proposed three-year period, if the two sides fail to reach agreement, binding arbitration be made mandatory.

If management and union representatives cannot, in three years, settle their differences, someone should have the authority to step in and do it for them and for the rest of us. I am well aware that there are dedicated people on both sides of the bargaining table who take their responsibilities very seriously and work to achieve a fair and equitable settlement. I know also there are people in those chairs who relish and seek to perpetuate the role of adversary. If these people knew there was a mechanism in place, such as binding arbitration to override such posturings, things would probably change. We have to let them know we are serious. We should lock the representatives of management and union in a room, give them only bread and water, and not allow them any dinner breaks until they come to terms, and I am quite sure within a week or so they would be able to hammer out a settlement. For example, the union which affects most Canadians is the postal union, it is usually CUPW, so we would have the Postmaster General (Mr. Ouellet) and Mr. Jean Claude Parrot locked in a room. Then we would be able to see which one has the staying power. I am sure it would not be too long—four or five days—before they would be out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: Canadians need a halt put to the chaos of strikes, especially when it involves essential services.

We have to put a halt to transportation strikes during those times when Canadians traditionally travel home, such as at Christmas and in school breaks. We have to put a halt to the disruption of mail services which affects the delivery of government cheques to those in need and affects the commerce of thousands of firms, large and small. We have to halt communication strikes which deprive large segments of the population of their right to know what is happening in the world. Year after year we fumble around with these issues, and year after year nothing happens. Why not? It cannot be that difficult to get our act together. It cannot be that difficult to put the good of the country ahead of the demands of the minority. People have been fed up with the situation for a long time. Now is the time for us to act on their behalf. All the talking in the world does not seem to have done a bit of good. The message we must deliver to the unions and to management obviously has to come in the form of legislation, a law to show both sides just how serious we are.

Therefore, I urge prompt passage of this bill before us. I hope those of us assembled here will vote to have this bill go to committee. I am quite sure the bill would get a positive response, particularly if we were all given a free vote, because I think deep down members on all sides of the House are fed up with strikes. I guess I am one of the minority here, but I have said it time and again that there should be no strikes in essential services. There should be binding arbitration on the bases I have suggested. I think people who take jobs in the post office, the fire department or the police department should take those jobs knowing they will not have the opportunity to strike. If they want the privilege to strike, let them go to work for General Motors or Ford, in the private sector or elsewhere in the public sector. But it should be a privilege to work in an essential service. Other countries do not seem to have nearly as many labour problems as we do here.

Again, I hope that serious consideration will be given to having this bill passed today and referred to the committee.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I would like to come to the same conclusion as the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy), namely, that I cannot support this bill because it is impractical, but I cannot associate with the remarks he made about the record of performance of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Johnston). For example, we have no less an authority than the young—although he is quite perceptive—hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) who sits in this House and contemplates with envy the record performance of the responsible President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Beatty: It is nice to see you have a sense of humour.

Mr. Peterson: I share, with hon. members opposite, the concern about what strikes of any kind do to members of unions, management and to the productivity of Canadians. This is a major problem we all have to face. I can think of five reasons why this bill does not address the issue.

First, in requiring the sectoral approach, and dealing with the Treasury Board only, it ignores the fundamental reality of our present system. We have two groups which deal with labour problems under our present regime. We have two different acts. The jurisdictions are separate. We have to deal with both of those before we can come to grips with this issue. This bill contemplates dealing with only one of them.

Second, and briefly, because time is running out, this bill fails to recognize the way in which the Public Service Staff Relations Act Structures our present bargaining unit. We are not organized along sectoral lines at present. For example, a person who is a clerical worker can move from any department to another within government. This privilege is designed to ensure job security and equality. A person should not lose his or her job if a particular department is abolished. A person should have the opportunity to move from department to department.

Mr. Jelinek: What has that got to do with the bill?

Mr. Peterson: We believe that is the way we should continue, and we will continue.

I would like to talk about the three-year mandatory term which this bill contemplates for all collective agreements. It is customary in North America, in Canada and the United States, to have far less than a three-year term in the private sector. There is a minimum one-year term, but it is not customary to impose a three-year term in a collective agreement. Why is it not customary? It is not customary because we have volatile economic circumstances. Conditions change. Labour and management need the opportunity to readjust their priorities to changing circumstances. We do not want to create a climate of hostility and lack of trust.

Fourth, the reason why this bill does not address the problem with which we should be dealing, that of labour unrest, is that it would deny employees in certain areas the right to strike.

Mr. Jelinek: That is not true.

Mr. Peterson: If you deny people in certain areas the right to strike, you would not be able to stop them. If hon. members think for one moment that they can stop a strike by making it illegal, I ask them to look at the recent example of what has happened in Poland. There, the full authority of the state was unable to overcome the indignation—

Mr. McKnight: The only comparison is between the two governments.

THE CONSTITUTION

RESOLUTION RESPECTING CONSTITUTION ACT, 1981

The House resumed debate on the motion of Mr. Chrétien, seconded by Mr. Roberts, for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the amendment of Mr. Epp, seconded by Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton),—That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the proposed resolution by deleting Clause 46, and by making all necessary changes to the Schedule consequential thereto.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. When the debate was interrupted at five o'clock, the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs had the floor.

Mr. Louis Duclos (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes I have left I would like to speak briefly to the issue of resorting to a national referendum. I have already indicated that I agree with the idea of seeking the opinion of the sovereign people in the case of a constitutional deadlock. I believe, however, that it would be contrary to the very nature of federalism if the federal government alone had the right to consult the sovereign people to break out of a constitutional deadlock which might develop between Ottawa and the provinces. The fact that one of the two levels of government unilaterally would assume the right and the twofold privilege of deciding when a national referendum will be held, and of drafting as it sees fit the question to be put to the people, can only create such an imbalance between the two levels of government that the spirit of Canadian federalism will be basically altered to the benefit of the federal government.

I would like at this point to make a distinction between the referendum held in Quebec and the referendum possibilities legislated by the Alberta government, and the referendum process provided in this proposed resolution, because the Quebec referendum, for instance, was only for consultation purposes, that is it did not bind anyone either constitutionally or legally, and only had a certain moral value. This is why I believe that Section 46 of the proposed resolution should be amended to allow the provinces, providing that seven of them representing more than 50 per cent of their total population agree to it, to initiate a popular vote across Canada in order to break a constitutional deadlock.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to complete my remarks by quoting, without comments, from a statement on the constitutional issue published last January 29 by the Assembly of Quebec bishops:

> We do not see how social peace can be built on a Constitution which has not been agreed to by the contracting parties and the major partners of public authority. The possibility of achieving this peace would be even more remote in Canada since, according to the spirit of confederation and our legal tradition, any substantial amendment to the Constitution requires the agreement of Quebec for reasons which are deeply rooted in the basic duality of our country.

Mr. Speaker, because in its fundamental aspects this proposed resolution represents a step backward for Quebec, which expected a very different aftermath to the referendum, as clearly evidenced by the unanimous opposition to this proposed resolution of all provincial political parties in Quebec, whether federalist or independentist, I shall unfortunately have to oppose it in the forthcoming vote.

Mr. Speaker, when I reflect deeply on the implications of this proposed resolution for the future of Quebec and of Canadian federalism, I cannot help thinking that the constitutional status quo before the referendum was not so bad after all.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to commend the hon. member for Montmorency, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Duclos) for his very fine and eloquent speech. I was most impressed with his frankness, sincerity, the depth of his feeling and indeed the courage with which he placed on the record his genuine feeling about this constitutional package.

He identified a number of serious flaws. I must say it was most refreshing for a man of his stature to stand in this House of Commons, and I am sure it was not easy for him, and speak with such deep feeling.

I want to say as well that I found his approach very reasonable. I think it is fair to say that many of us on this side share some of the feelings he expressed in his comments today. He not only pointed out some of the deficiencies and inadequacies in the resolution before us, but coupled it with a number of constructive suggestions which I hope his leader and members of his caucus will seriously consider. In many respects some of the reservations he has expressed here tonight are reservations which we in this party share.

● (2010)

I suspect there are a number of Canadians and, indeed, some members of this House who are torn sometimes between a compelling obligation on the one hand to get involved in this debate and an obvious reservation on the other over the fact that there is a perception that this constitutional debate has gone on too long. Many Canadians are undoubtedly becoming weary and bored with what appears to be an endless constitutional debate. I am sure there are a number of Canadians who are saying: whatever it is, let us get it over with, let us pass it and go on to some of the more important issues before us such as the economy, energy, jobs, transportation and agricultural matters.

I suspect it is fair to say, in talking to people in my constituency and across the land, that the Constitution is not all that appealing, at least to the vast majority of Canadians, nor is it considered a priority item.

Regardless of whether it is boring and somewhat incomprehensible to many Canadians and whether or not it should be of major priority, we have this resolution before us with which we have to deal. We have a responsibility and an obligation as members of this House to attempt to explain the contents of this resolution to Canadians. Our duty on this side is, of course, to draw attention to some of the weaknesses and try to warn about imminent dangers as a result of the passage of this package.

I must say—and I am sure you will share this view—there have been some excellent speeches. This has been an excellent debate. There has been a tremendous amount of work put into the speeches made in this House of Commons, and it is important that we consider them.

The importance of this measure has to be considered in the context that it will form the basic ground rules by which our country is to be governed economically, politically, culturally and socially. It also should be borne in mind that constitutions do not operate by themselves; they require people and institutions in order to work. Therefore, it requires a maximum amount of participation in the formulation of this basic structure, in addition to an eminent amount of good will, understanding and a solid commitment of the vast majority of Canadians, if the proposal is to work and provide that structural framework wherein our country can move ahead and function in a climate of harmony and fulfilment.

What I find most unfortunate and, indeed, disappointing is that this particular proposal is dividing our country as never before. The divisive and embittered environment within which this debate is being carried out is a result of the confrontationist tactics of this government. This has been brought about by the sleazy strategy outlined in that infamous leak of a cabinet document prior to the introduction of the resolution. This has been caused by lack of candour, and I refer here specifically to the exchange in this House about the government's relationship with representatives of the British government. This unfortunate situation is the result of unilateralism, to which the hon. member who just resumed his seat referred as well, and the result of ignoring the wishes of the provinces.

Thrown in with this proposal is a very discriminatory energy program which is the most destructive policy ever perpetrated on an industry in this country. This government—and this as well has been alluded to by the parliamentary secretary—did not receive a mandate for constitutional reform at the last election, just as it did not receive a mandate to take over the pricing of oil. That is a provincial responsibility and, indeed, it has been worked out in the past through federal and provincial co-operation. Nor did this government have a mandate to confiscate or nationalize, as is proposed, and as is being done, under the National Energy Program.

One finds it passing strange that a resolution, ostensibly designed to renew our federation, should be greeted with such concern. A resolution, if it was going to renew our federation and provide that new impetus for renewed nation building, should be received with joy, enthusiasm, excitement and great expectation. It should be a cause for celebration. It should be a mechanism which is seen and perceived as one that will unite rather than divide us.

I submit, as I did earlier, that this proposal is dividing our nation. That division, I submit, will continue if the proposal is passed and it will cause irreparable harm to our country. This proposal is challenged by more than half of our federation. Some eight provinces are now opposed, with more than two thirds of Canadians in opposition to it. It is rejected by a total region, that region wherein there are no elected representatives in this government, the western region. It is met with apprehension and deep concern. There is concern about the federal structure being under attack, concern about resources, concern about a possibly unitary state, concern about property ownership and a concern that the traditions and roots on which this country was built are being subverted or ignored.

Yes, this measure, in my view, does violate the spirit of federalism and the integrity of the provincial domain. What is most sad is that, in the process, our nation, instead of being drawn together, is being driven apart.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his Liberal caucus, together with what is left of his left-wing rump, may very well, in crass political terms, win this issue. They will ram it through, and legally they may even win. However, will Canada and Canadians be winners in the process? It will be some victory when you consider that, in addition to the provinces and growing numbers of Canadians, as the parliamentary secretary pointed out, all political parties in Quebec are opposed. The New Democratic Parties in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta and Quebec have publicly spoken against the action.

We have a number of senators in the other place who are speaking out, including Jean Paul Deschatelets, Andrew Thompson, Eric Cook, and John Godfrey of Ontario who said he would hold his nose and vote for the package, notwithstanding the fact he has some very serious reservations. Maxwell Cohen, one of the Liberal government's expert witnesses before the committee, opposes the constitutional proposal. Gordon Robertson also is in opposition, and I could go on and on. This would be some victory.

One wonders, with a victory of this nature, how Canadians would respond in the final analysis to this constitutional package. Will there be a positive attitude? Will they feel comfortable with it? Will they feel a part of it, or will it perpetuate further bitterness and distrust? Attitude, in my view, is one of the most important elements that cannot be defined in words or in law. There must be a genuine sense that this law, which is not an ordinary one, will be respected and upheld voluntarily in spirit and, indeed, in fact. That can only happen if there is an attitude on the part of Canadians that this Constitution is a real, living, dynamic reflection of the Canadian way of life as interpreted through the individual eyes of Canadians.

There must be a sense of attachment, a sense of fulfilment and a sense of communion. There must be the assurance that one can preserve ones individuality within the oneness of a nation.

There are a number of other elements which are part and parcel of this resolution which are not defined in words. There must be trust, and trust must be fostered by actions, and by words. In order for unity to prevail, there must be trust and respect for the truth.

• (2020)

No community can survive, Mr. Speaker, unless there is a basic trust amongst its citizens. It is true of governments as it is of leaders, of business and indeed of the world of politics. The community must build on a foundation of trust so that co-operation and a sense of partnership can develop and indeed flourish, and that is the way it is in nation building, especially in our type of federation.

When we look at what has happened in this constitutional renewal process, we find that time and again we have witnessed the federal government and its spokesmen being less than candid. We have seen this government renege on its commitments, we have seen it withdraw and subvert; certainly their actions hardly create the climate of trust and confidence.

There is a deep feeling of mistrust in our nation today, a feeling that somehow someone is being had and is going to be had. There is anxiety where there should be confidence, goodwill and optimism, and when we look at the root of that problem, Mr. Speaker, we find it in the fact that this government is pushing through its constitutional reform proposals on the same platform of deception as it did in the last election campaign, as it is doing now with its imposition of the misleading fact of the National Energy Program which is confiscatory, which talks about Canadianization but in effect is nationalizing, pitting region against region, Canadian against Canadian, and singling out and attacking one industry in one particular region.

I repeat, this government has no mandate to do that. It did not receive one in the last election and does not have one now because it does not enjoy majority public support. Canadians are becoming increasingly suspicious and have serious doubts about this package.

The process, combined with other deliberate attacks upon the region of Canada from which I come, has caused bitterness and deep division, and I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that this will escalate with the passage of this resolution.

Now, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), our spokesman on this resolution, has outlined in fairly succinct terms the reservations that we as a party hold with respect to this measure. There are three fundamental objections with which I want to deal briefly. One is the amending formula, and as the hon. member for Provencher indicated, as far as we are concerned, the Victoria formula represents an outdated mechanism, which no longer corresponds to the reality of Canada and is rejected by the vast majority of provinces. It is unfair because it creates different classes of provinces. Quebec and Ontario have, and always will have, veto power, and with the amendments which were passed in the committee stage it looks as if we have different classes of provinces in western Canada and the Atlantic region, and I cannot accept the principle of inequality in the status of provinces.

I cannot accept that western provinces, my province, will be treated as a second or third-class province in Canada, while other provinces have a perpetual veto. We have political alienation, an unhealthy mood in western Canada right now, and this proposal will further exacerbate that issue and will create a double form of discrimination. We can only suspect there will be further alienation and bitterness as a result.

The reasons that we in western Canada are opposed to the amending formula are summed up quite succinctly on page 11 of the submission of the Premier of Saskatchewan, and I would like to put it on the record. It reads:

> The proposed amending formula is the most unacceptable part of the federal resolution, the part which does most serious violence to the basic principles of federalism. Saskatchewan cannot endorse the resolution unless major changes are made in the amending formula.
>
> In a federal state, the procedure for amending the Constitution is the most important part of the fundamental law. And the amending formula proposed in the resolution is so weighted in favour of the central government, so biased against the interests of the provinces, that it threatens to destroy the balance that is crucial to the maintenance of Canada as we now know it.

I think that sums it up fairly well.

Dealing with the interim amending formula, I can only agree that it is nothing more than an illusion, as has been alluded to by the hon. member for Provencher. This party offered an alternative amending mechanism. It may not be perfect, but I believe it is an approach which more accurately reflects the reality of Canada and at the same time sustains the fundamental federalist structure. I believe it can provide a basis for a strong central government without limiting the cultural and regional characteristics of Canada and, above all, it will respect the equality of the provinces.

The referendum proposal is something to which I object as well. To me, the binding referendum is a radical departure from the principle of parliamentary democracy. This particular feature of the package has the potential of being the most divisive element in this resolution. We were told it was only going to be used as a deadlock-breaking mechanism, but the reality is that the federal government could trigger it at any time, and, in effect, it becomes a form of amending formula. It is a device which could circumvent provincial authority and thereby significantly alter our federal system. And we know what can be done in terms of manipulating public opinion, manipulating the rules and the question and, what is most important, and as has been alluded to by other speakers as well, only the federal government has the right to initiate a referendum. If you can manipulate the question and the kind of advertising for which this government is so famous, you can certainly receive the kind of answer they would naturally want.

The process is another issue to which I object and much has been said about it. I cannot accept unilateral action. It just does not work in this country and is not in keeping with the Canadian tradition. Asking Westminster to invoke changes without the consent of the provinces is certainly most unfair. We are asking Britain to do what we cannot do legally in this country.

There are other deficiencies and omissions. A lot has been said about the perfection of this package, there has been a lot of fanfare, but what I find, Mr. Speaker, is that when you sort out the rhetoric, you find that this resolution is deficient in many ways. What I find most unfortunate is that, throughout the process, some glaring inequities, which have been with us for many, many years, have been overlooked. They are inequities which have caused division in this country, which have caused alienation, and which have been ignored in the past and are being ignored in this measure as well. In many cases, those irritants are being exacerbated.

● (2030)

I give you as an example, Mr. Speaker, the matter of removing the equality of status of the provinces. The west is now, in effect, a minority. This measure will simply exacerbate that situation. Having total disregard for the provinces, in terms of its unilateralism is another measure. But what has been totally disregarded and ignored is the political inequality which exists in this country, inequality which shuts out one half of the country from the political process. To me, that is the number one issue in this country.

If it is language and cultural inequality which have caused the problems in Quebec, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, it is political inequality that is causing problems in western Canada today. That is what is at the root of the energy problem. It is at the root of western alienation. It is at the root and core of western separatism. Those irritants and those issues have not been addressed by this government, nor have they have been addressed in this resolution.

The west is dissatisfied because it is being ignored in the decision-making process. It is being left out. The west is a very dynamic and growing region, but it considers itself impotent because it does not have the political clout. That is why we have splinter groups and separatist movements springing up in the west. Unless there is some redress to this political inequality which will fester and continue to mount, it could be very detrimental to this country. We need electoral reform, be it Senate reform, be it proportional representation, or be it some other method. That balancing mechanism which was to be provided in the Senate has deteriorated to the extent where it is no longer useful.

I quote from page 41, of the Task Force on Canadian unity, which outlines the thought behind the Senate. It reads:

> The role of the Senate and the method of selection of its members were extensively debated at the time of confederation. The method adopted was meant to counterbalance the principle of "representation by population" applied in the House of Commons. The Senate was intended to act as a house of "sober second thought" in reconsidering the legislation of the more "radically democratic" lower house, to protect the interests of private property (hence, the property requirements for membership), and to reflect provincial and regional interests.

The task force goes on:

> Because of the method and the practice of appointment of its members which give the Senate at least the appearance of an institution rewarding friends of the government of the day, its credibility as a body representing regional interests and its general effectiveness have been undermined.

So we do not have that mechanism to provide for regional balance. The political inequality must be redressed. This is indispensable before the country can function harmoniously. All regions of Canada must be able to participate effectively in the decision-making process of our national government. If this is not done, tensions will build, divisions will grow and our federation will crumble.

As a westerner I can tell you very confidently, Mr. Speaker, that we as westerners want to build and not dismantle. But we as westerners must have an effective voice in the decision-making process. We must have a voice in plotting the direction and course of this nation.

I turn now to another major deficiency in this resolution, which is the failure of it and of the government to address the continuing erosion of our economic unity—this economic union called Canada.

I believe that in order for our country to be strong, the Canadian common market must be strong. Since we have been so preoccupied with issues that divide us, we overlook the fact that many of the factors which can unite us can also provide economic stability and growth and foster interdependence and opportunity.

We must not overlook the tremendous potential of our economic partnership in this country. The balkanization of our economy by provincial governments aided and abetted by federal policies—which are sometimes inward looking policies and sometimes very selfish—do not augur well for our national economic future. What is most unfortunate, given the kind of climate, the poisoned environment in which we find ourselves now, is that I do not hold out a great deal of optimism for that to improve. That is so because this government does not consult and co-operate. It employs the tactic of confrontation. And the situation is not improving; it is deteriorating. I must say that in the past 13 years, this Prime Minister has failed to address that very fundamental problem.

To emphasize the importance of the point I want to make, I would like to quote from a document entitled, "Interprovincial Economic Co-operation Towards the Development of a Canadian Common Market" issued by the minister of industry and tourism for the province of Ontario, the Hon. Larry Grossman. At page 6 it states:

> If we are to succeed in our quest for a strengthened nation and a renewed Canada, then we must in fact begin by making a commitment and a conscious decision not only to rework constitutional arrangements but to build solid economic relations among the regions of Canada.
> We need a new set of economic and political relationships that can accommodate our existing strengths across this country—in the maritimes, in Quebec, in Ontario, and in the west—in such a way that we reinforce each other in a genuine partnership that creates a stronger and more united whole.
> But the problem has been that in recent years the traditional economic links between the Canadian provinces have been eroding.
> And it is that erosion of economic links that could, if not reversed, threaten our very survival as a nation.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if this nation is to survive, it must do so not only as a viable political unit but as a viable economic unit.

For my part, there are far too many impediments and far too many restrictions to the free movement of goods and services, labour and capital, in this country. We must start removing the barriers rather than constructing new ones. The same study cites another fact which I would find amusing if it were not true. It is stated at page 6 that:

> In fact, Canada's ambassador to the European Economic Community has stated "that there are now fewer barriers to trade among the countries of Europe than among the provinces of Canada."

What has been done in the last 13 years? There has been a build-up of barriers and impediments, not a removal of them. There has not been co-operation; there has not been a working together. All the fault does not lie with the provinces. It is stated in the same study:

> However, the "barriers to trade", issue is really only symptomatic of a broader and perhaps more important problem: that is, the lack of co-ordinated regional economic development strategies.
> In fact, it is the development of competitive rather than complementary regional economic development strategies that is threatening the very economic framework that is necessary to sustain us as a nation.

Barriers are not only frustrating, they are costly. They retard progress and create tension. The provinces have tended to internalize the economic benefits of their provincial economies. In so doing, they have borne a cost in terms of greater economic integration and specialization. As a result of this specialization, our import level of manufactured products is the highest of any nation in the world. Why? Because we have fragmented our own domestic market. We have failed to look at the whole, and have simply addressed the parts. We have adopted a tunnel vision approach. We have failed to recognize our own market potential. If we do not do something about this, our manufacturing sector will continue to flounder and we will fail to achieve a vibrant economy. There are many, many impediments: provincial procurement policies, the equivalent of many non-tariff barriers, the lack of uniform provincial standards, and liquor buying practices. In my province of Alberta there has been a beer strike for almost a year. Whom did it benefit? It benefited the Americans; there has been a real market for American beer. Also there are licensing and certification practices, barriers to capital and labour mobility, competition and land purchase policies, hiring practices, marketing boards, restrictions on the mobility of professionals, fiscal and non-fiscal measures, and so on. We forget that we are not only political partners; we are economic partners.

● (2040)

Transportation is a subject which is very near and dear to me. I should like to refer to Part III of the National Transportation Act which was passed in 1967. It was to provide a framework for extra provincial trucking in Part III. It has never been passed or implemented. The federal government regulates rail, air and marine transportation through a system of regulations, and provides the mechanism for policing and enforcing. In the area of motor vehicle movement, there are ten different sets of regulations; there is no uniformity. It frustrates the orderly movement of interprovincial trade. It is costly and creates dead heading. At this time when we are looking at improving our energy efficiency, it is wasteful and, above all, it mitigates against establishing an integrated multi-modal national transportation system.

These impediments, restrictions and unco-ordinated approaches mean lost opportunities for Canada and for Canadians. Surely it is time to talk about regional co-operation in Canada. At page 9, the study concludes as follows:

> We have a clear choice: We can, at this critical time in our history as a nation, continue to balkanize our country's economy, or we can develop a unified Canadian Common Market, with combined interests, shared objectives, and mutually beneficial goals.
> We can use our differing strengths as a basis for building a strong Canadian whole. Or we can restructure the individual units, failing in the end to ensure a firm foundation upon which we can develop and strengthen as a nation.

This is the kind of impetus I would like to see not only in the resolution but, indeed, in action through federal-provincial co-operation. I have had some experience in this area; I know it can be done, but it depends upon the attitude of the federal government. Rather than confronting, if the government used a policy of consulting and co-operating, many of these issues would be overcome. The government has been an absolute failure over the last 13 years. It has further perpetuated the barriers and impediments to the free interprovincial movement of goods and services.

I should like to speak briefly about the charter of rights. Again, there are deficiencies. There has been much misleading rhetoric by members on the other side. If we listened to them, we would be led to believe that all of a sudden Canadians will receive a host of new freedoms and rights. That is nonsense. Quite the opposite is true. I submit that the charter will probably limit our freedoms. It will place a new emphasis on the courts, without any changes in the selection process, without any modification of the checks and balances. It will be the judiciary rather than the legislatures who will have the final say.

Mr. MacKay: Who has more compassion?

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes, who has more compassion? We have heard a lot said about multiculturalism. I welcome the incorporation of the spirit of multiculturalism in the Constitution, but when it comes to implementing the spirit of multiculturalism and adjudicating which institution is best qualified or has the most compassion to see that it is instituted in a human fashion, certainly it is not the courts. I would suggest that Parliament is more appropriate.

I should like to deal with the areas of property rights. I am appalled by the hypocrisy of the Liberal Party and the blatancy of the NDP. If ever there was a fundamental right and freedom near and dear to me and the people I represent, property rights are one of the most profound that westerners and all Canadians want preserved.

An hon. Member: What about P.E.I.?

Mr. Mazankowski: We have talked about P.E.I. I think there is a way around that. The right to own and enjoy property is very basic and fundamental. That right is denied as a condition of NDP support. The NDP members do not want it because they say it will impede the government's ability to expropriate, confiscate or nationalize. The right to own land, be it farmland, recreational or family residence, is enshrined in the constitutions of many western nations. It is protected by law and by custom. The right is as fundamental as the well-being of the society, a right we all know and share. It is as fundamental as freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom of assembly and freedom of the press. Many of our ancestors in western Canada were lured there by the thrill of owning their own land.

Finally, any charter which does not recognize the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person, or the pre-eminence of a family as a unit, is absolutely deficient. This is the foundation upon which our society was built, upon which our society rests. I could speak about this matter for quite a while, but it has been referred to by most Members of Parliament. Every day we open our proceedings here with a prayer and we swear our oath of allegiance on the Bible. At the end of each throne speech delivered at the opening of a session of Parliament, we ask Divine Providence for guidance in our deliberations. One wonders, when the supremacy of God is omitted, whether this package can be taken seriously. Obviously there must be some reason for the omission. Perhaps it was a condition of the NDP support. It looks as if this package were a package of convenience. When one looks at the dissenting views and the way in which the government has accommodated some and rejected others, one must question the seriousness and whether in fact this is a resolution of convenience.

If we choose to exclude the reference to the supremacy of God, where are we and where are we going? This hypocrisy is further evidenced in the government's refusal to entrench the right to life and to stop the legalized slaughter of the unborn. What could be more fundamental in a charter than the preservation of life itself? I see those as major deficiencies.

In conclusion, I reiterate that the government was not given a mandate to impose a unilateral constitutional package on this nation. It was not given a mandate to impose the degree of state intervention and domination that we see in selected areas of the economy.

It is this deceit, dishonesty and total lack of political integrity which are causing very serious problems and divisions in the country. I submit that the passage of this resolution will exacerbate, not ameliorate, those divisions and that bitterness.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2050)

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of this crucial debate on the future of our country, I would first like to pay tribute to all those hon. members and senators who devoted their time and their very best efforts to the work of the joint committee. I congratulate too the co-chairmen of the committee for their judicious and sober guidance. Most of all, I recognize and congratulate the many Canadians who travelled to Ottawa, many at their own expense, to exercise their right to be heard. This was perhaps the noblest act, for they are the Canadians participating directly in drawing the blueprint for the survival of Canada.

Just in the past month, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) said:

> The kind of opposition we bring against ourselves I find exhilarating.

He said this in the Liberal wilderness of British Columbia. This is perfectly in keeping with a man who would subscribe, in this day and age, to the manifesto of Machiavelli rather than to the supreme majesty of God. Nothing characterizes the spirit with which the Prime Minister entered into his latest attempt to change Canada through constitutional reform than that guiding epigram of the Italian manipulator. I quote from his epigram:

> There is nothing more difficult to take in hand, more perilous to conduct, or more uncertain in its success, than the introduction of a new order of things.

The Prime Minister is fond of quoting classical dictums from sources as diverse as Shakespeare and Plato. Indeed, he values them not just rhetorically, but as matters of guiding principle. We saw this in his attitude at the first ministers' conference last summer. His being so keen a student of Machiavelli, I recommend this quotation to the Prime Minister and ask him to take heed:

> Many have imagined republics but he who abandons what is done for what ought to be done, will bring about his own ruin.

By the way, Machiavelli also remarked, with admirable relevance for today, that:

> When neither their property nor their honour is touched, the majority of men live content.

I suggest that the Prime Minister's greatest exhilaration—if, indeed, he is exhilarated by opposition—will come when the people of this country turf him and his party of sheep out of office for having impinged upon both their property, by failing to protect it, and their honour, by imposing closure on their elected representatives in this House. I might add that they are tarnishing the honour of all Canadians, as my friend, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), said, by: shaming and embarrassing them all by having the Parliament of the United Kingdom reject a joint resolution of the Parliament of Canada.

The Prime Minister is the first to take the unprecedented steps. He is the first to move unilaterally on matters of Constitution. Why does he speak in such horrified tones? Why does he speak in veiled and threatening language when the possibility of the British parliament using unprecedented steps is raised?

We are playing under the rules of the Prime Minister. It is he who has dictated the length of the game and the object of its goals. He has appointed the referee and the place where it is to be played. Why does he squawk now and say that he will take his ball home if people who are not on his team realize that his game is rigged from start to finish?

Since 1979 members of the Liberal Party of Canada have enjoyed absolutely no power at the provincial level in the country. In 1980, they were brought back, led by the invisible man, a non-leader, on false promises and big carrots. They have absolutely no representation west of Winnipeg, and representation there, for a start, has, rightly, alientated 51 per cent of the population of Canada. More than half of their members are from the province of Quebec.

It is absolutely ludicrous that the Prime Minister even presumes to speak for Canada on a matter such as this, on the matter of our futures and on the matter of the futures of every single person in Canada now and who will arrive in the future. Does it have to be reiterated that fully eight of our provinces, two of them original partners in confederation, vehemently oppose both the matter and the manner of his initiative—or, should I say, his ambition? In the face of this, in Vancouver he said that he has managed, to use his words, to split both parties on this side of the House. He has the unmitigated gall to say such a thing when he alone is responsible for perhaps the biggest split and the gravest divisions which have confronted our country for generations.

How is it that the Canadian people, at least as far west as Winnipeg, allow themselves to suffer what has been termed, in philosophical studies by Lacan and others, as "charismatic abuse"? Why do they allow this same abuse to be brought down upon them to the extent that their Prime Minister, their political leader at home and abroad, feels that he can afford to provoke a confrontation between Canada and Britain for internal political gain which threatens to poison relations between our two countries for years and decades to come?

Is this the image they want abroad, the "tough-guy" Trudeau sneering behind his cloak of innuendo, misstatements and false report? His Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacGuigan) is the laughing stock of the diplomatic world, when the Department of External Affairs was the hero of the world a mere 14 months ago. His representative at the court of St. James consider themselves latter-day gumshoes—the James Bonds of the north—and make ridiculous suggestions and equally ridiculous recommendations as their strategy for the coming fray.

Good Lord, I daresay that Canada's image abroad has taken such a beating that the prestige gained from the great diplomatic triumphs of the fifties and the sixties have undoubtedly been lessened. This crew, this band of cowed and deluded people across the floor, presumes to carve out a new constitutional image of Canada, new rules of life and new rules of behaviour. It has the audacity to point to alleged splits in the opposition—especially with regard to members of the left—thereby demonstrating again its collective vanity and arrogance. At least in the socialist party there is some attempt to provide for sincere dissent in the ranks. At least in their position one can see some co-relation between party philosophy and party action.

What of the sheep opposite? What, in their constitutional manifesto, is markedly and specifically Liberal as opposed to Conservative or socialist? What separates them from other policies such as the National Energy Program, which confirmed them to be socialists in sheep's clothing?

I am sure that a classic and quite recent definition of political Liberalism would be instructive at this juncture in order to inform members opposite what it is they purport to be. Liberalism in politics, said Wayne Lyman Morse:

—can be defined in terms of objectives. A major objective is the protection of the economic weak within the framework of a private property economy. The Liberal . . . emphasizing the civil and property rights of the individual, insists that the individual must remain so supreme as to make the state his servant.

Indeed, just as the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) reminded the House last week, governments cannot be supreme. It is the people in a democracy who must be supreme. This is a principle which I and my colleagues on this side of the House, at least, heartily endorse.

Would any socialist Liberal opposite care to subscribe at this moment to that classic definition of Liberalism? Would the Prime Minister? At least the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), through a momentary aberration or "fit", no doubt, subscribed for a short time to the right to own property before being brought to heel by his master's voice and reversed his previous decision and voted against the right to own property.

Next to freedom from religious persecution, I doubt that any right has more respect in Canada than the right of the individual to own property. Many Canadians can say that is why they came to Canada. These Liberals, however—and I use the term loosely—did not allow the right to own property in their charter. Are they who control the state truly servants of the people, as their particular philosophy maintains, or at least should maintain? The three principles of federalism are: diversity, rights and consensus. What did the Prime Minister and his partisans make of these three principles? For diversity they substitute sameness; for rights they substitute prejudice and discrimination by omission, and for consensus they substitute confrontation and unilateral action.

● (2100)

I remind hon. members opposite of what the hon. member for Provencher so rightly stated, and I quote his words: "Governments cannot be supreme; it is the people in a democracy who must be supreme."

Professor Peter Russell of the University of Toronto said, and said very plainly, "I believe that this country is built on an understanding that the fundamental terms of our federation, particularly the powers of the respected levels of government, will not be altered by unilateral action—"

He added that "—there is a very strong, arguable case that, unless the statute of Westminster is amended there is a legal bar on the British parliament to go ahead without provincial consent for a resolution of this kind."

Professor Russell also pointed to the use of the word "dominion" in the constitutional arrangements between our two countries and noted, "Dominion might mean more than the dominion parliament."

This brings to mind the timely reminder to the House made by the hon. member for Provencher that the Fathers of Confederation themselves preferred, as a guiding passage, the spirit of divine majesty paramount in this country. "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea."

In his futile attempt to justify the government's attempt to change the nature of confederation according to its own wishes, the hon. member for Hochelega-Maisonneuve (Mr. Joyal) stated in his speech: "The level of government that is actually losing the most power in this process is the federal Parliament."

On the contrary, as Professor Russell pointed out, if this proposal should go through, "—it would seem . . . to . . . put the provincial legislators in a subordinate position in the Canadian constitutional structure." He also pointed out to the Canadian people as the co-chairman of the committee hoped he would, that if that proposal went through, "—it would mean that the British Parliament can reduce the powers of the provinces without their consent, which is not happening to the federal Parliament." Professor Russell concluded that this course of action will "—rearrange our federal system into a system of a hierarchy of power rather than a division of powers between sovereign legislative bodies."

I hope that I have impressed upon the House the clear fact that, try as the government might, to legitimize its proposed resolution by selective quotations from the past, in fact it is a bogus process and one that will simply reorganize the division of powers between the bilateral levels of government in this country without the consent of one side of that division.

Patriation, an amending formula and a charter of rights: these are the three elements in the resolution. The government wanders through a hall of mirrors in its priorities as it favours a charter of rights above the other two elements in the package that express contradiction to the polled will of the people whose primary concern is to patriate their Constitution. Let us discuss this step by step.

As we have repeated endlessly, Her Majesty's loyal opposition, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) stated on October 2, is entirely in favour of the principle that "the Constitution should be brought home to Canada without delay." We in the opposition and the people of Canada have absolutely no difficulty with this admirable aim, and the Prime Minister should be gracious enough to stop trying to suggest that somehow we are against this, because we are not.

Resistance to the government's proposal began to build when we encountered the amending formula which it has attached to patriation.

First and foremost, if the entire package came to the country under the very formula being proposed, the Victoria formula, it certainly would not pass. What is more, it would not pass at either stage—the consent of the provinces stage where Ontario, Quebec, two Atlantic provinces and two western provinces have to approve, or the referendum stage where it is put to the people.

This fact, above all, must condemn the resolution as it stands before this House; that under its own terms it would never be approved by the Canadian people. Resistance reaches a crescendo, however, when we come to the third element of the package, the charter of rights.

As the joint committee heard, and as the people of Canada should hear, for it bears any amount of repeating:

—the process of entrenching rights in the Constitution is about as serious a constitutional act as a nation can ever undertake for it means in theory that certain powers are to be withdrawn from the representatives elected from time to time by the people, and it establishes a new set of limitations on what elected legislatures can do for the people.

In that sense, it involves nothing more nor less than a change in the social contract between the governed and the government and it entrusts the judiciary with the task of interpreting the terms of that contract.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that I mentioned earlier the hon. member for Rosedale's (Mr. Crombie) three guiding principles of Confederation: diversity, rights and consensus. To these may be added three more from one of our leading constitutional authorities: that the process of constitutional change should be considered, that it should be popular, and that it should be unifying.

This brings us to the point where we can crystallize the essential difference between the government's proposal and the Conservative alternative. That crystallization is the matter of process, for it is here that we differ fundamentally; it is here that the government has departed from the will of the country; is here that it has affronted the rights and dignity of the provincial legislatures, and it is here that it threatens to provoke a bitter feud with the Parliament of Great Britain, perhaps our dearest and most amicable friend in the world.

Let us examine this point of process as it applies to both the amendment formula and the charter of rights. Under the proposed formula, any province attaining "a population of at least 25 per cent of the population of Canada" according to any census, past or present, would be forever armed with the power of veto over proposed amendments. The reasons for this clause, as it applies to Ontario and Quebec, are very clear. It implies that for a very long time to come, all the other provinces will be relegated to a second-class status, without having, singly, the power of veto.

However, it seems to have escaped the attention of this government and, indeed, of the entire country, that this veto power could be extended to a third province in the future by virtue of this entrenched requirement.

Could not Alberta or British Columbia, for example, be viewed as major contenders to become the third province in Canada to attain 25 per cent of the total population and thus acquire the power of veto over all parts, all regions, of the country, if it was in their interest to do so?

Let no member mistake my remarks that somehow they constitute an anti-provincial or an anti-western position; rather, they are meant to indicate a position of national democracy based on broad consensus and not on regional prejudice.

As an expert witness to the committee pointed out, the Victoria formula gives any province that acquires 25 per cent of the population the power of veto. In this regard, he said, "You must remember when you are talking about constitutions that you are not talking about a law for today or tomorrow or this decade. We are talking about a law for centuries ahead."

This is a point of view that I could heartily endorse. I encourage all members to realize that what we are debating will be conceivably a matter of importance for centuries, not just for the last year or two of the Prime Minister's tenure.

● (2110)

This describes just one example of the shortcomings of the amending formula. Another no less important weakness deals with the area of native and aboriginal rights, so hard fought for in the committee and over the years. It is instructive to look behind the highly publicized recognition of aboriginal rights which have been given recently.

In Section 35(2) of the present proposal, in Part IV which deals with constitutional conferences, provision is made to include in the agenda of the conference the following:

—an item respecting constitutional matters that directly affect the aboriginal peoples of Canada,—

Section 35(2) further on reads:

—and the Prime Minister of Canada shall invite representatives of those peoples to participate in the discussions on that item.

Who will the Prime Minister appoint to represent these people? Which representatives of the native people will the Prime Minister invite to attend? Who will decide the item on the agenda?

In the aftermath of all the delirious self-congratulation in the committee on the recognition of aboriginal rights, what has been the more sobre upshot of it all? What do the native peoples themselves say to the doubletalk of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Munro), the member for Hamilton East, who said that failure to entrench the charter of rights "would be an intolerable disappointment to the native people—" if aboriginal rights were not entrenched?

What are the native people saying to the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) who said in his speech that "no one in Canada, no government or individual will again be able to disregard the rights of Canada's original people." In a word, they are saying "nonsense." These rights may be entrenched, but how will they be interpreted? They will be interpreted by the courts, by government appointed judges to the Supreme Court. They are the ones who will interpret difficulties or confrontation over aboriginal rights. That is the "government" and the "individuals" mentioned by the Leader of the New Democratic Party who, in the future, will decide native rights.

Del Riley, the President of the National Indian Brotherhood which consists of ten provincial and two territorial groups and represents 300,000 Indians, said he will resign over constitutional amendments that ultimately provide for the courts to define aboriginal rights. Indian provincial groups in British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba and Quebec have threatened to withdraw from the National Indian Brotherhood unless these constitutional amendments are dropped. And I know that Indian groups in my own riding in Ontario, represented by the Union of Ontario Indians, are opposed to the government's constitutional amendments.

This is clear to the Indians and the native peoples of Canada. They know what the government is trying to do. They will not be fooled again. The native people realize that what these constitutional amendments really mean is that the government is seeking a cowardly and ignoble way out of fulfilling its responsibilities directly to the native peoples, as it is required to do by the BNA Act, and trying instead to devolve that power to the Supreme Court, an appointed, not an elected body. Where is the democratic representation in that move?

So much for the minister's intolerable disappointment. He either does not understand the implications of the charter of rights or he is in collusion with this infamous attempt to rob the Indians of their ancient rights.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that indeed this proposal does not guarantee the continued participation of the native people of Canada in their own constitutional destiny; that it does not guarantee their rights, as alluded to in Section 33; and that it does not guarantee that fair and representative native counsel will be sought during the two-year interim period between passage of the act and the coming into force of Part VI of the act.

Briefly put, the amending provisions of this act do not accommodate, beyond the two-year interim period, any future participation, of the native peoples of Canada in any further constitutional change that may affect them, their treaty rights, or their aboriginal rights; none at all.

Furthermore, under Section 132 of the BNA Act and the natural resource transfer agreements, it is clear that Indian rights are the responsibility of the federal government, and the federal government alone. While there is provision in the amending formula for at least a measure of provincial participation in future constitutional change, there is absolutely none for aboriginal peoples. Clearly this gives rise to an obvious constitutional contradiction. It will be quite possible that in the future the provinces will be part of a decision-making process which might change the Constitution as it relates to native and aboriginal rights. Indian and native rights are exclusively and always have been the responsibility of the federal government.

As I mentioned before, these are the shortcomings in the amending formula before us. As if they were not bad enough, the greatest resistance to the package must be when it comes to the third part, the charter of rights. Resistance, the voice of reason, must be heard with respect to this part in two distinct ways: first, as a matter of principle, and second, as a matter of substance.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Chrétien) has asked with passion how can we, the members of the opposition, "stand each in turn and move preposterous amendments to the charter of rights and then the next day . . . vote against it."

I am very happy to endorse the hon. member for Provencher's reply to this. He said that "—in order for the charter to find agreement among Canadians, it must be more than words—it must enjoy consensus and legitimacy—and—what Canadians want is a charter which is carefully considered and approved by Canadians in Canada!" And that is why I can approach the charter from two points of view, the point of principle and the point of substance.

Now, as far as the principle of a charter of rights is concerned, I agree entirely with the hon. member for Rosedale who said that one of the things "our forefathers learned about rights was their rights lay in the common law, that they did not need to have their rights listed; that the only listing came when those rights were reduced, that if they can write it down then they can take it away."

I also agree entirely with Professor Russell of the University of Toronto, who said in January that "I am not one that sees a need for a great deal of change, we have one of the oldest Constitutions in the world (dating back to 1215) and I think we have done pretty well by it—." As Professor Russell said later, "I have not heard any strong, good, clear reasons why the entrenchment of rights has to take place now and through the British Parliament."

I consider this to be very sound reasoning, notwithstanding the tedious and, at times, hysterical screams from across the floor about the need in Canada for a charter of rights. What members opposite constantly fail to point out in the midst of their high-blown speeches on equality and so on, is that it is not so much that these rights are new and will be newly protected on the passage of this charter, as that the process of interpreting these rights will be new. Make no mistake that in the aftermath of the passage of this bill, if it occurs, and for literally centuries afterwards, the Supreme Court of Canada will judge the validity and extent of these rights and will stamp their interpretation on them for all time. These rulings will be binding.

Now this means essentially that the function of interpreting human, civil and democratic freedoms in this country is to be taken out of the hands of the 282 elected representatives to the House of Commons and put in the hands of the government-appointed judges to the Supreme Court of Canada. This is the devolution, or should I say the centralization of power that we are talking about, and the people of Canada should make sure they are fully aware of this before this bill goes through.

• (2120)

What we are doing is Americanizing our judiciary and imposing upon the Supreme Court a political burden of great weight, one that they have never had before. Who knows how, in future decades, the Supreme Court will interpret these marvellous and noble rights that everyone is going on about?

As was said in committee, this charter does not guarantee rights or freedoms, what it does is guarantee a change, a very significant change, in the way in which decisions are made about rights and freedoms.

Can members on both sides of this House be assured that Canadians want to Americanize their system of government? Are they being given that clear choice? The Prime Minister, quite simply, is taking away from Parliament the power and the process of democratically discussing fundamental principles of freedom and is putting that power into the hands of a few, a very few, members of the judicial branch of government, members who will be appointed by the government in power. I want to inform the people of Canada that their rights and freedoms presently protected and advanced by Parliament will in future be manipulated and interpreted for them by the imaginations of lawyers, as one expert witness said, and the size of an individual's bank account, for that shall be their only recourse.

This is the clear and simple fact of the case, and it is futile for members on the other side to try to attach some sort of anti-motherhood, anti-rights and freedoms bias on the voices of opposition here. They know that we speak the truth and the situation will be a I have described it. For the benefit of these true detractors of freedom opposite, I would like to acquaint them with the words of the eminent twentieth century philosopher, Hand, who addressed this question in 1942 in a far more eloquent and pertinent way than I have heard any hon. member opposite do. He said that a society so driven that the spirit of moderation is gone, no court can save; that a society where that spirit of moderation flourishes, no court need save; that a society which evades its responsibility by thrusting upon the courts the nurture of that spirit of moderation, in the end will perish.

The Progressive Conservatives want our Constitution brought home and we want it brought home immediately. Last October 2, that was made very clear in this House when the motion was moved by our leader. That motion was voted against by members of the government. The Progressive Conservative Party wants a fair and workable amending formula, arrived at by consensus. The Progressive Conservative party wants the rights and freedoms of Canadians guaranteed in our Constitution.

Our members on the constitutional committee worked effectively to improve the draft charter of rights and freedoms. Thanks to PC initiatives, significant improvements were made in provisions dealing with the handicapped, the deaf, the denominational schools, and the territorial representation at future constitutional conferences.

We would like to see more improvements, too. We believe our Constitution should acknowledge the ultimate supremacy of God, it should guarantee the right of individual Canadians to own property, and it should be strengthened to ensure the true equality of men and women. We want the best possible charter of rights and freedoms for Canadians. But we insist that our rights be approved in Canada, not finalized by the colonial act of another country.

We have proposed that kind of formula—the Vancouver consensus—which as late as last September was accepted in principle by all of the provinces. The Vancouver formula would require that any constitutional changes involving both levels of governement be approved by the federal government, plus at least seven provinces representing at least 50 per cent of the Canadian population. It would protect essential provincial interests involving the rights and powers of their legislatures and the ownership and control of their property and natural resources, all areas in which the provinces have been guaranteed protection since confederation began in 1867.

The Vancouver formula would allow constitutional changes to be approved by Ottawa plus a reasonable provincial majority. It would treat all provinces as equals. The Liberals want a very different kind of amending formula. Under their proposal, two provinces, Quebec and Ontario, would have a permanent veto over any constitutional change, regardless of whether or not they had at that time 25 percent of the population. There would be a different set of rules for Atlantic provinces, and still another set of rules for provinces in western Canada. Provinces would cease to be equals; instead, we would have first, second and even third-class members of the confederation.

The Prime Minister also wants to give Ottawa unilateral power to use a referendum to make constitutional changes without any reference whatsoever to the elected provincial governments and legislatures. That would end completely the partners of Canadian federalism.

There is no doubt in my mind that what this country is moving toward is a new type of government. Perhaps you can call it socialism, perhaps you can call it a republic, but the most important and most dangerous aspect of this move to a new form of government is that it is changing what we have grown to know, understand and appreciate as a group of equal partners coming together freely and willingly. It is changing it into a strong, central, unitary government and it is not going to be accepted by the majority of the people of Canada.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is fond of pointing out that the debate on the Constitution has been going on for almost 50 years. He has said that the consent of the provinces has been sought for 53 years and that for 53 years we have failed. Before I finish my remarks this evening, I intend to point out the fallacy of these statements together with a number of others.

To take part in this historic debate on the twelfth day of March in the year of our Lord 1981 is, of course, a privilege, a privilege that must be extended to every Member of Parliament. It may be difficult to place a different perspective or perhaps a perspective more meaningful to the area I represent in light of all those things that have already been said by those who have already spoken. However, to not enter into the debate and by my silence perhaps indicate, even directly, a support of the government action which is not there would be unthinkable.

I did not personally sit on the committee that undertook an extraordinarily heavy workload for some 14 weeks. Some might say because of that the voice of Prince Edward-Hastings was not properly heard on the committee and in the debate, and that my brief intervention here will not be sufficient. I suggest that I was well represented on the committee, as were the people of Prince Edward-Hastings.

I say with all the emphasis I can muster that on February 4 when the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) introduced an amendment to write into the Constitution that Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth of Canada is indeed the Queen of Canada that my interests were being fully represented and properly expressed, as were the wishes of the majority of the people of Prince Edward-Hastings. That was not so when one of the Liberal members of the committee, Mr. Lapierre, stated that within two years we would be rid of the monarchy.

● (2130)

I believe in the rights we enjoy through the parliamentary system, the rights we enjoy through the common law, and the rights which are protected by the Crown. I believe it is important in our Constitution that we guarantee the role and the status of the monarchy, and I for one want to retain that heritage rather than have the republican system being forced upon us.

I was well represented on the committee, and so were the people of Prince Edward-Hastings, when the Hon. Perrin Beatty introduced, with great clarity and detail, an amendment having to do with the right to own property. The family farm, the family business and the family home represent some of the most fundamental elements of Canadian society. Yet, anyone who has ever dreamed of owning his home, farm or business will be disturbed by the fact that, while the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights included the right to enjoy property, the charter of rights proposed by this government in the Constitution is mute on the subject. I believe the right to own property is a fundamental right, a right which should be enjoyed by all Canadians, yet the government opposite with its majority voted down that right.

It is interesting to note that the particular amendment was supported by many organizations from all across Canada, including the Canadian Organization of Small Businesses, the Canadian Bar Association and many others, yet it was turned down. It is indeed frightening that a socialist Prime Minister, supported as he is by a supposedly socialist opposition, purposely wants to omit this right from his charter of rights.

Once again I was well represented on the committee, as were the beliefs of the people of Prince Edward-Hastings when the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) introduced an amendment having to do with the position of the family—and that is the belief of the people of Prince Edward-Hastings—affirming that the Canadian nation is founded upon principles, and acknowledging the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free individuals and free institutions; affirming also that those individuals and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values under the rule of law.

While perhaps not as many people think about it as often, I know my interests and, therefore, the interests of the people of Prince Edward-Hastings, were being well served when the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) spoke on the clause dealing with the freedom of information. We all know the extent of government in Canada, the growth of the bureaucracy and the threat it imposes on the individual in terms of an individual's right to know what the government knows about him. With the computerization of information and the use of the SIN by the government and by institutions, wrong information and, in some cases, information no longer relevant, can plague a person for the rest of his or her life. Surely under these circumstances they should be entitled to know exactly what is in the file, and they should have that right under freedom of information.

To deal with a more technical aspect of the process, Senator Duff Roblin, on February 2, spoke eloquently on why the so-called Vancouver formula should be used rather than that proposed by the government. Senator Roblin is no stranger to Prince Edward-Hastings, having spoken there on a number of occasions, as indeed have all the other members of that committee.

Basically, what Mr. Roblin was proposing was that the provinces be consulted and given a far more equal chance to create the changes necessary in our Constitution rather than having the federal government do it alone.

So without being present at the committee hearings and without taking an active part in the committee itself, I am content that my interests and those of the people whom I represent were well cared for by that committee. It is indeed unfortunate that each of those rights I have just quoted were turned down by the Liberal majority.

It is my considered opinion that over the almost 114 years of our confederation, we have had very little to be concerned about by way of freedom. It seems to me we are more endangered now by the implementation of the Prime Minister's charter of rights than we ever were before. Not to have these various rights written down has never bothered me. I knew they were there. To write down only some of them indicates that the rest are not available to me, and that concerns me very much.

Why is it so necessary to force a charter of rights through the British parliament at Westminster? Why must we rely on another Parliament to do what we should be doing here at home? Before I answer that, I want to make a point which is particularly important to the people in my area.

The Prime Minister repeatedly and emphatically refers to Great Britain, the United Kingdom, as a foreign country. As one whose parents were born in that foreign country, I resent that allegation very deeply. I resent it more for the way in which it is said than the words themselves. I am confident the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) does not consider Greece a foreign country. I am confident the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) does not think of Germany as a foreign country, at least not in that context. These are the countries in which their parents were born. These are friendly nations, along with many others, which are the birthplaces of many Canadians. This does not make them foreign in the context the Prime Minister uses those words.

As a matter of fact, my father who came to this country in 1913 and voted in every election from the time he was old enough, now, of course, requires a citizenship in order to vote. He, like many others who thought of themselves as British subjects, now must have that piece of paper before they can vote.

It is very obvious to me, and apparently a large number of Canadians, that it is not necessary to involve our friends at Westminster. We could and should do the job ourselves. The Prime Minister made it very clear in his statement of October 2, in his Regina speech of October 29, and at many other times and places, that he cannot achieve an agreement with the premiers of the provinces of Canada. I wonder perhaps if it is not possible that the fault is not all with the premiers. Let me review for a moment just who those ten men are.

The Premier of Quebec, a dynamic and controversial public figure in modern Quebec, was a war correspondent in battle torn Europe. The Hon. René Lévesque was one of the first western journalists to enter a concentration camp after the war. In political life he was, in part, responsible for Quebec Hydro, but he left the Liberal Party to become the leader of the Parti Québécois and a separatist government. He has no support for his actions in this House, but one wonders about the strain imposed by a former colleague on him, the present Prime Minister, perhaps causing such actions. It is interesting to note that another colleague, the Liberal leader of the opposition in Quebec disagrees just as fervently with the Prime Minister.

● (2140)

Premier William Bennett of British Columbia knows the world of family business, having operated his own furniture and retail appliance store in the interior of the province for many years. Could it be that the reason they cannot agree is that the Prime Minister has absolutely no knowledge of the working of private business and, frankly, has never had any interest in it?

The controversial Mr. Peter Lougheed, premier of the province of Alberta, has played football and climbed mountains and done those athletic things that the Prime Minister seems to revel in. In addition, he has a Master of Business Administration degree. Would that our present Prime Minister had any knowledge of administering a business! Perhaps we would not be in the trouble we are in today if he did.

Premier Allan Blakeney is an interesting comparison, a highly intelligent individual, as is the Prime Minister, a Rhodes Scholar and one who has socialized or nationalized, industry, whichever you prefer, in the province of Saskatchewan, just as the Prime Minister intends to nationalize the oil industry and perhaps others in Canada.

An hon. Member: What about PWA?

Mr. Ellis: Surely they should have much in common, yet Premier Blakeney cannot abide the plans of the Prime Minister. Not only has he withdrawn his support for the proposal but so have the federal Members of Parliament from this province.

Premier William Davis, one of the oldest in terms of length of service to his province, has agreed to support the package after receiving certain concessions from the Prime Minister.

Mr. Beatty: Order, order. Show some courtesy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Ellis) has the floor.

Mr. Ellis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Their heckling does not bother me. It shows, as it did to others in this House, the respect they have for the Constitution.

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that Premier Davis is philosophically opposed to many of the policies of the Prime Minister. Let me make the point here that Mr. Davis has spoken out strongly about entrenching the monarchy and those rights of which I spoke a moment ago. His support is therefore very important to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Hatfield, another Conservative premier, has also agreed to support the Prime Minister's package. Again philosophically opposed to the Prime Minister in many areas, he has seen fit to support his proposals without some of the concessions gained by Mr. Davis.

Premier Brian Peckford of Newfoundland, a former school teacher, some would say a brash young man, who sincerely and with tremendous spirit fights for the people of Newfoundland, wants for them a better way of life and sees the offshore oil as a way of achieving it. It seems to me that a common sense application of provincial rights, as has been proposed by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), would make an ally of this man.

Premier John Buchanan of the province of Nova Scotia is a lawyer and the son of a coal company employee in Sydney. He worked in the blast furnaces of the Sydney Steel Corporation before entering university, and obviously knows what it is like to work, and work hard, for a living. Could one suppose that this is the reason why he and the Prime Minister disagree so strongly on this matter?

Premier Sterling Lyon, who grew up in the rural province of Manitoba, took over that province after the socialists had virtually bankrupted it. He found absolute chaos, and only by the toughest of legislation was he able to start turning the province around. Perhaps it is because he is so tough and so very Canadian that he is the leader of those who oppose the Prime Minister in his Constitution attempts.

Last, but certainly not least, our very, very good friend the Hon. Angus MacLean, Premier of the province of Prince Edward Island. There is so much that one can say about this quiet Canadian who has done so much for his province, both in the federal House and as premier. Perhaps when you understand that he was shot down as a bomber pilot over Germany during the Second World War, that he escaped from imprisonment and walked the length of Europe to escape from the Nazis and return to fight again, when you compare that with the picture of the present Prime Minister driving around Montreal on a motorcycle with his black leather jacket and his helmet with a swastika on it, perhaps you have some idea of the deep philosophical difference—

An hon. Member: I thought you had class.

Mr. Ellis: Of these two men, I leave you to judge who would carry the admiration of the majority of Canadians.

So that when the Prime Minister says it is not possible for him to achieve an agreement with the premiers of Canada to go to Westminster, as he should with their unanimous support for this package, maybe, just maybe, it is not the fault of the ten premiers. Maybe, just maybe, it is the fault of an arrogant Prime Minister who will not listen, who does not understand and cares little for the fabric of life of most Canadians, the same Prime Minister who for a number of years got away with arguing against wage and price controls and then put them into effect, who argued against an increase in gasoline prices and home oil costs and then implemented higher prices, who talked about free enterprise and now nationalizes the Canadian oil industry. Is it any wonder that a growing number of Canadians, some 64 per cent at last count and probably much higher now, want nothing to do with the Prime Minister and his package?

His Excellency, Jules Léger, in a speech to the Prime Minister at the time of his appointment as Governor General, finished with these words of Paul the Apostle:

> Who makes you, my friend, so important? What do you possess that was not given you? If then you really received it all as a gift, why take the credit to yourself?

How different, when on June 17, 1864, in order to gain co-operation for his dream of a new nation, John A. Macdonald went the extra mile and called on George Brown in his St. Louis Hotel to bring about the broad coalition that ultimately became the federation we call Canada. It was not the first time he had bent, had compromised and, through discussion and negotiation, brought about an agreement between opposing views. How different the persuasion by logic and reason to the confrontation tactics of our present administration.

His Grace, Archbishop Ted Scott appearing before the committee said:

> Governments have jurisdiction but they do not have rights in the same sense that people do—they are called to be servants of the people.

And I would quote, Mr. Speaker, the editor of the Trentonian, a small newspaper published three times a week in a town just adjacent to mine where my hon. friend, the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees) has his constituency, and distributed in my riding, who said this:

● (2150)

> Thus the problem which is the major one in what is now happening is one that has affected everything the Trudeau government has done since it first came to power. It tries to do essentially right things by wrong methods. In a true democracy, which is what we are supposed to be, the method is as important as the end in view. Trudeau's present course of action reveals an attitude on his part which we have seen all too often, which being spelled out, means that he seems to think the end justified the means. That is bad philosophy.

Finally, the last of my quotations, Mr. Speaker, is from my good friend, Phil Dodds, the sage and conscience of Cherry Valley. Writing in the Picton Gazette he said:

> The change will not mean a great deal to the majority of Canadians; it will not provide jobs and help the million unemployed; it will not reduce the crushing burden of debt; it will not reduce inflation, or in any general way make for a better life. One thing it is sure to do is to cause further disunity in a country that can only really progress if there is unity and co-operation.

Certainly there is need, and I think an expressed desire by many, perhaps the majority of Canadians, to have their own Constitution in Canada. I feel that way. Certainly it is time that it was done. But the reason for doing it should not be to satisfy one man's ego. It should be done by Canadians, for Canadians, with the help of all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ellis: Our party has offered an easy out for the Prime Minister, and that is to split the bill, bring back the Constitution with an amending formula that, while not entirely agreed upon, is very nearly so. It seems to me that the best thing the Prime Minister could do for his country would be to step down, retire and allow someone else who has the best interests of this country at heart to a far greater degree, rather than personal egotism. I am confident that those ten men, whose various backgrounds I described a few moments ago, would come together with someone of the right calibre and move ahead to make this a better Canada.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, at seven minutes to ten I am not about to embark on the substance of my remarks. But tonight I want to put in the right perspective what I will say tomorrow.

When I first came here, which is longer ago than I want to reflect upon, we in Yukon felt neglected. There was a sitting Liberal member at the time who had been here for eight years. We have had a member since 1903, which is before many of the provinces became provinces. We thought that perhaps a solution to assist in our economic ills, our lack of development and our lack of progress—since the Marshall Aid Plan was still in force at that time—was to declare war on the state of Alaska, lose it, and then apply for Marshall aid. This gives you some idea of the view which we in the north held with respect to the manner in which southern Canadians viewed themselves—their mentality reached to the sixtieth parallel and no further.

The other event that I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members, in order to put things in proper perspective for tomorrow, is with respect to a great deal of reading I did before I came here. To my shock and dismay I found that of the three districts in the Northwest Territories, the Mackenzie, Keewatin, and Franklin districts, there is only one which was represented in Parliament, namely, the Mackenzie District. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who is entering the chamber now, was not here at the time I introduced my private bill. But I am sure he is aware of the fact that the Franklin and Keewatin districts of the Northwest Territories were not represented in Parliament. The Mackenzie District was. The member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar) now represents that area; but in 1957 there was no representation there.

At that time, I introduced a private member's bill which would have given the franchise, the vote, to those Canadians who live in that part of Canada. There was some resistance to that bill. I wondered why and I made inquiries. When the answer to the question came forward from the Privy Council Office as to why there should be resistance to a measure which would give the franchise to these Canadians in these two districts of the Northwest Territories, the answer was that they were mainly Eskimos in that part of the country and they would be extremely susceptible to the views of the Anglican church, which dominated those two areas of Canada. Therefore, they said it would be too dangerous to give these people the franchise. That was the answer given to me. Of course, it was an answer which I rejected out of hand, which every fair-minded Canadian would reject. Eventually the measure was passed the same year it was introduced. Hence, we now have sitting in this place the hon. member for Nunatsiaq.

Those two illustrations might give hon. members some idea of the sense of isolation that we in the two northern territories have felt for a long time. It is what I often call the "southern mentality" or the "southern Canadian syndrome." So often in this debate, I have heard expressions like "federal-provincial", "across Canada" and "from sea to sea." There has been nothing said that takes the mental vision of Canada beyond the sixtieth parallel which, after all, composes some 40 per cent of our country in land and water mass. That is very difficult to understand for Canadians who have lived in the north. The only place I have heard the expression "from sea to sea to sea" has been on this side. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said it in his remarks, as did the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), and as did others from our party who have participated in this debate. They have mentioned the three seas of Canada. They have used the phrase "throughout Canada" instead of "across Canada."

At this time of one minute to ten o'clock I want to leave that thought with you, Mr. Speaker, before embarking tomorrow on the substance of my remarks as to how I feel about the fact that we in the north have been left out of these constitutional considerations and how, in all justice, we should fit into these constitutional considerations.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRANSPORT—FREIGHT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM FOR RAPESEED PRODUCTS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, the question I wish to raise tonight was raised in the House on February 20, 1981, and can be found at page 7513 of Hansard. It was a question which was directed to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) asking him to give the House an assurance that the interim freight assistance program for rapeseed products, which expires on March 31, would be extended. I was also asking whether consideration would be given for allowing an increase in the amount of the subsidy to allow for inflation and the increase in the movement of rapeseed products.

● (2200)

I was very disappointed by the fact that the Minister of Transport sluffed off my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray). Then I repeated my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who indicated that the matter was under consideration. I find it strange that the Minister of Transport would not attempt to answer this question. He is well aware of the fact that numerous representations have been made to him directly by the rapeseed processing industry.

The name "rapeseed" has recently been changed to canola. Over the course of the next few months and years, I presume the term "rapeseed" will disappear and the term "canola" will take its place. So when we talk about rapeseed or canola, we are talking about one and the same thing.

The interim rate subsidy provided funds to meet the difference between the freight rate applied to the movement of raw rapeseed and that of processed rapeseed. Unprocessed rapeseed moves to export position under the statutory freight rate, which is roughly a half a cent a tonne mile. Prior to 1976, processed rapeseed products moved at the going commercial rate. Of course, this mitigated against the rapeseed crushing industry, which is simply after parity in terms of freight rates. In other words, it wants the freight rate on processed product to equal roughly that on unprocessed products.

Of course, the reason is very clear. The rapeseed crushing industry is perhaps one of the very few significant, indigenous, value-added, agriculturally-based industries in western Canada. Its growth and development has created a new market. It has provided a very valuable source of domestic vegetable oil. It has become a very major and important export market. Above all, it creates economic opportunities within the regions where rapeseed is produced. It creates jobs. It is an area wherein we can broaden the agricultural base by encouraging the further processing of agricultural products.

A minimum compensatory rate was established by order in council in 1976. Of course, there has been some question about the level of that rate. Certainly it is not a rate which only covers the variable fixed costs. It is a freight rate about which the rapeseed industry has some serious reservations. They asked the Minister of Transport to propose an independent review. The freight rate was established by the Canadian Transport Commission, but it has never been totally accepted. Until such time as the whole question of the statutory freight rate would be resolved—and back in 1976, Mr. Otto Lang, the former minister, felt it would be resolved in due course—an interim freight subsidy was established to help processors defray the gap, so that there would be some semblance of parity between the two freight rates. It was established at $3 million. As one can appreciate, the amount of product moved has increased and the prescribed freight rates have increased.

As a matter of fact, on February 11, the existing minimum compensatory freight rate was increased by 10 per cent to 15 per cent. We are really looking at two issues. First, we are looking for assurance from the government that the interim freight subsidy will be renewed after its expiration on March 31 and, second, on behalf of the rapeseed industry, we are asking that consideration be given to increasing the level of that subsidy to cover more closely a sizeable portion of that gap.

I hope the parliamentary secretary who will be responding tonight will give the rapeseed crushing industry some assurance that that will be continued because I am sure he well appreciates that forward sales and markets are now being made, and the increase of 10 per cent to 15 per cent in the minimum compensatory rate has now already reduced the margin by $2.50 to $3 per tonne. So I hope the parliamentary secretary will give us a positive response because I can assure hon. members that it will be welcomed by the crushing industry and by producers of this very valuable product for western Canada and for all of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to reply to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), the former minister of transport for whom I have the highest esteem. Although he may regret that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has referred his question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray), whose parliamentary secretary I am, it is with pleasure that I shall try to answer his question although I know in advance that I may very well be unable to meet his expectations since the hon. member wants to know definitely whether his requests or his recommendations will be accepted. Mr. Speaker, in my answer I will explain the program and at the same time try to convince the hon. member that his hopes may soon be fulfilled.

[English]

The freight assistance program was initiated by the federal government in December, 1976. As the hon. member said, it was meant to compensate the western processors by giving them an adjustment for higher freight rates for rapeseed oil and meal.

The hon. member seems to be interested in the prolongation of this program, and I agree with him. He referred to the need of the processors, but he forgot—and it would have been a good occasion at this time of night—to give detailed information to this assembly on the benefit this program has brought about. Since its inception, the program has given extensive assistance to processors. As much as $12.9 million has been given to the seven processing plants in western Canada. The program has been useful in contributing to the financial viability of the processors.

Since the 1970s—and, in fact, since the beginning of that decade—as hon. members will be aware, the rapeseed processing industry has demonstrated significant growth. Crushing capacity has expanded by more than 25 per cent over the past five years. This has been in line with rapeseed oil production in Canada, which has increased to a level where it now meets 50 per cent of the total domestic market requirement.

The hon. member spoke of exports. Our export performance has also been very impressive over the past five years. Rapeseed oil exports have increased from 20,000 tonnes to 120,000 tonnes. Our export performance for rapeseed meal—

Mr. Mazankowski: Answer the question.

Mr. Laniel: —over the past five years has been more spectacular and has increased from 21,000 tonnes to 162,000 tonnes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Laniel: The answer will come, Mr. Speaker, by the end of the month.

TRADE—IMPORTATION OF JAPANESE AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY RESPECTING QUOTAS

Mr. John Gamble (York North): On February 9, I asked the Minister of Industry Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) whether, in light of his failure to secure concessions from Japanese automobile manufacturers to fabricate their vehicles in Canada and in light of Japan's establishment and maintenance of non-tariff barriers, it might not be prudent for this government to impose quotas on the importation into Canada of Japanese automobiles.

I expressed major concern at that time for the Canadian autoworkers who have been and will continue to be laid off if Japanese automobiles manufactured in Japan continue to flood the Canadian market. I drew the attention of the minister to actions that had been taken by the government of France and pending United States legislation which would enforce such quotas. The minister's response to me was to the effect that the Japanese automobile industry was privately-owned and was not government controlled. I recognize that fact, else how could it have been so successful?

What the minister did not say, although I am convinced he was so informed, is that there exists in Japan a close liaison between government and industry. The government of Japan is intent upon protecting its industrial base through the imposition of non-tariff barriers of the very kind that the minister acknowledged in his response to me. For years, the Japanese have skilfully managed to preclude entry into their markets of the products of foreign nations which have been manufactured while at the same time flooding other countries with their own finished products. Their chief tactics have been prolonged negotiations and substantial delay in the removal of the non-tariff barriers.

In the interval, their manufactured trade surpluses have soared, while ours have declined. As a specific illustration, in 1980, the importation of Japanese vehicles to Canada increased 151 per cent over the level established in 1979. Knowing these facts, the minister responded to my question with respect to quotas, as reported at page 7020 of Hansard, as follows:

> With respect to the matter of quotas, if the U.S. Congress legislates quotas, in my view it will be necessary for the Canadian authorities to consider taking parallel action within our own legal framework and in light of our own circumstances. That is why I said we are watching the Canadian situation and the American situation very closely. Because we have an integrated industry on a North American basis, I think we must be very careful about the timing and extent of our actions.
> At the present time I think our priorities, in the interests of Canadian workers, should be to strive to increase the level of Canadian content in Japanese vehicles sold in North America and around the world and, in the meantime, to keep in touch with the situation so that we are ready to take other action in the interests of Canadian workers and the Canadian economy should circumstances make that necessary.

I was troubled by that response, Mr. Speaker. What the minister is suggesting, in essence, is that the automobile industry in North America, between Canada and the United States, is integrated as a consequence of the Auto Pact. We may, because of that integration, consider following a policy established by the United States, but we must do so being careful to watch our timing and the extent of our actions. The one thing the minister has not suggested is that we do anything on our own.

Last weekend, the Secretary of Commerce in the United States commented that the United States administration intended to impose quotas on Japanese manufactured automobiles. The minister, who was in the House a moment ago, appeared on television that same evening and indicated that Canada would undoubtedly follow suit.

Why is it that if Canada and the U.S. are linked in an integrated automobile industry, the U.S. can take that initial necessary step but our country cannot? Why could Canada not have taken the lead for once in remedying a known ill? The answer lies in the administrations of both countries. In the U.S. we now have a government determined to force the hand of the Japanese by taking those aggressive steps necessary to convince them that now is the time for business. In Canada, on the other hand, we have a government which will wait, hope and pray that something is done to save the Canadian automobile industry and the employees who work for that industry.

I submit that the minister should spend less time, and I quote his words, "watching closely, keeping in touch and monitoring situations" and spend more time taking strong action and taking that action to determine that the present ill is remedied.

Unfortunately, under his tutelage, Industry, Trade and Commerce has become the department of indolence, timidity and cowardice, and I do not think that serves the people of Canada well.

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble), I want to say that, to my mind, leadership means to achieve the achievable. It does not mean to dream about something that you cannot realize. Maybe you can base your life and day to day decisions on the ultimate solution and possibilities, but you do not always reach them.

As far as the automobile industry and its difficulties in our country are concerned, the Canadian government has been vigorously pursuing its interest in greater sourcing by Japanese companies of Canadian auto parts as well as in mutually beneficial investment in Canada, with the aim of achieving a significant Canadian content in Japanese cars sold in North America and in world markets. Anyone would hope that all of the Japanese cars sold in Canada would be made in Canada. One of these days we might reach that end, but let us do it one step at a time. To this end, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gray) visited Tokyo last year for high-level meetings with the Japanese government and the private sector automotive interests.

His visit has been followed up by exchanges of government and private sector missions between the two countries and a number of specific interests and opportunities have been identified and are being pursued, particularly in the auto parts area. Honda's purchasing activity in Canada has increased significantly. While the Canadian government would prefer to see current automotive trading problems resolved through a positive and faster approach, we are watching very closely developments related to the level of vehicle imports into Canada and the import-restrictive pressures which are building in other markets, including the United States and Europe. We have been keeping in close touch with the U.S. administration on further developments in this area—as the hon. member mentioned, but he does not seem to appreciate that—including recent Congressional initiatives, and we believe, particularly in the event of any U.S. action, that, Canadian authorities would need to consider parallel moves within our own legal framework and in the light of our own circumstances.

In the interim, we have formally expressed our concerns to the Japanese authorities regarding the question of vehicle imports and, as a result, the Japanese ministry of international trade and industry has requested that Japanese auto manufacturers exercise caution in exports to Canada.

HOUSING—INTRODUCTION OF SHELTER ALLOWANCE PROGRAM

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, on March 9, I directed several questions to the minister responsible for CMHC. I asked whether the minister intends to use shelter allowances as a means of doing away with rent controls since he was quoted on March 2 in the Toronto Star as advocating the lifting of rent controls as a means of holding down inflated house prices. This is a theory I cannot comprehend because I believe that shelter allowances without rent controls inevitably will inflate, not reduce, shelter costs.

The minister asked me to direct these questions to provincial ministers, despite his earlier outspoken statements opposing rent controls. Of course, we know that he was muzzled by the Ontario election. The minister also refused a direct answer to my question about who will benefit from shelter allowances and how the minister intends to prevent rent gouging by landlords when there are no rent controls.

I was even more concerned when the minister gave no reassurance that the $400 million required for shelter allowances would in no way limit the amount of CMHC funds which are urgently needed for non-profit housing and for community service grants required for municipal land banking programs.

● (2220)

My concern was based on the fact that CMHC capital funds recently were cut back by $2 million and allocations for non-profit housing were reduced by 5,000 units, very severe cutbacks when affordable housing is desperately needed throughout all regions of Canada.

I cannot agree with the minister's theory that housing allowances would be less effective where there are rent controls. Rent controls allow landlords annual increments based on the rate of inflation, and they can deduct their costs from their income tax. One cannot expect landlords to subsidize low-income tenants, but they must not also exploit tenants by raising rents, as they would be tempted to do if shelter allowances were provided. Therefore, we must also have fair rent controls.

In British Columbia, a single parent with two children on social assistance is allowed $325 maximum for shelter. Since most two bedroom apartments cost close to $500, the difference must be paid from food allowances. Rent controls are essential to ensure that any additional shelter allowance would go to help pay present rents and would not result in rent increases.

According to a CMHC background paper, shelter allowances could relieve the housing woes of more than 400,000 families who spend a disproportionate amount of their income on rent. This proposal would cost close to $400 million. I sincerely hope this is possible, but I am somewhat skeptical. In B.C. the SAFER program of shelter allowances for senior citizens costs approximately $9 million and covers only 30 per cent of those over age 65. Most of them pay close to 40 per cent of their incomes on rent, and only a small portion of this cost is covered by the SAFER allowance.

Although I support the concept of the shelter allowance, I would not want other social housing programs to suffer. In 1978, a report by the Canadian Council on Social Development contained the following statement:

> No one program can answer all needs. At best, housing allowances would be a suitable program response for 51 per cent of problem households. . . . Housing allowances will not and should not serve as a replacement for the direct provision of subsidized housing units. Housing allowances are not a panacea. They are at best stop-gap measures.

I had hoped the minister would answer my question by saying that shelter allowances are needed, perhaps administered provincially and with shared funding from the Canada Assistance Plan. They should be part of a multifaceted approach to solving Canada's housing problems. However, if there are not enough apartments to rent or if these are of poor quality, all the allowances in the world will not provide adequate affordable housing. Therefore, we must protect and increase CMHC dollars for non-profit housing units and affordable land. We must extend RRAP home repairs, especially in older parts of Canada, and we must return to improved public housing to house low-income Canadians who desperately need help.

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Savard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) concerning shelter allowances and rent controls, I would say her question is twofold. As regards the shelter allowances, the minister did not announce that he had the intention of establishing such a program. I insist on that. He simply said that it might be a good idea to examine the subject. Mr. Speaker, the shelter allowances would represent a significant and additional advantage of social housing programs. He mentioned this subject so it could be discussed at the national conference on housing. The hon. member is aware that a certain number of sessions during that conference were devoted to social housing. The minister delivered a speech on social housing and housing for native people. There again he wanted to launch a discussion on that issue. I might add that at the closing session all the experts who took part in the forum said that although the conference had been very productive, not enough attention had been paid to the question of native and rural housing. It has emerged from the discussions held during the conference that the shelter allowance program may replace the current social housing programs. It has also emerged that non-profit co-operative housing programs are fulfilling a serious need in a tight rental housing market. I share this point of view and I maintain that the shelter allowance program has the advantage of better conciliating the current programs with the needs of tight renting housing markets. Finally, Mr. Speaker, it should be clearly understood from what he said that the shelter allowance program must not be considered as a substitute for the existing social housing programs. The non-profit co-operative housing programs would be maintained. As to the second part of the question, Mr. Speaker, dealing with rent control, I can only repeat what the minister has already said in this House, that it should be referred to the provincial ministers concerned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.
