Besides evaluations undertaken in departments and agencies, evaluations are used by Treasury Board and Cabinet Committees. This occurs, for example, when Cabinet or Treasury Board calls for a specific evaluation of a program, often one that is sunsetted. An example is the Matching Policy for University Research, which was examined by the National Finance Committee and subsequently evaluated pursuant to a Cabinet decision. As well, Memoranda of Understanding between departments and Treasury Board under the Increased Ministerial Authority and Accountability (IMAA) initiative typically identify specific evaluations to be carried out by the department and reported to Treasury Board. The Comptroller General indicated to the Committee that about 25 per cent of evaluation activity falls into this centrally requested category.[37] However, neither the OCG nor the Treasury Board has been able to provide to the Committee a list of centrally requested evaluation studies, either underway or completed.

E. Evaluation and Expenditure Reduction

The Comptroller General is of the opinion that it is not realistic to expect evaluation to play a major role in expenditure reduction initiatives.[38] Such initiatives must typically be implemented on a tight schedule, whereas to design and undertake a credible evaluation may require 18 months or longer. As well, not all evaluations are designed to consider expenditure cuts as an issue (the Committee feels strongly that they should be) and they may thus be unable to contribute to the expenditure reduction imperative. Finally, the Comptroller General argues that evaluation findings, particularly those showing how to make programs more cost-effective, are typically used by senior management when they become available rather than left waiting for the next expenditure reduction initiative. Departments then use any freed-up resources for higher-priority items (rather than to reduce their overall budgets). Consequently, "there may not be many opportunities left around for a government-wide expenditure review."[39]

This view of the independence of expenditure reduction and evaluation was confirmed to a considerable extent by the testimony of officials of the Department of the Secretary of State.[40] Committee Members were particularly interested in knowing why programs for the support of women and natives had been cut back in spite of evaluation reports that were generally favourable. The witnesses did not answer the question directly, implying instead that the decision had been taken at the ministerial level. However, they stressed, as did the Comptroller General, that the timing of evaluations was a problem and that evaluation findings were incorporated into management decisions on a more or less continuous basis. One witness suggested that programs are typically evaluated in isolation not only from external priorities but from those of the department as a whole, stating:

> It is not a question of priorizing that program in one part of the department against another program in another part of the department. Those are not decisions for the program evaluation directorate, or even for myself or others reviewing their work.[41]

As well, he indicated, as did other witnesses, that "program evaluation is only one aspect of management when we look at programs."[42]

The Committee found ample evidence, both in testimony and in the written material that was sent in response to its call letter, that program evaluations from time to time produce negative results and that reallocations often occur within departments as a consequence. It is disturbed, however, by the assertion that major, centrally directed expenditure reductions seldom if ever benefit from program evaluation findings. The implication is that evaluations are not sufficiently robust in a quantitative sense to permit programs to be ranked according to agreed-upon criteria. Consequently, when expenditures must be reduced and the savings sent back to the Consolidated Revenue Fund instead of being applied elsewhere in the department, decisions to terminate or downsize programs are apparently made on qualitative and often political grounds. In a more rational world, the Committee believes that government programs would be ranked by their cost-benefit ratios or other measures of priority and that the lowest-priority items would be cut when the budgetary situation required. However, it recognizes that the state of the evaluation art may not be adequate to permit such a course of action.

F. Objectivity of the Evaluation Function

The independence and objectivity of the evaluation function have been discussed at various points above. Program evaluation personnel are members of the department or agency in which they work. They depend upon senior management of the department for their job satisfaction, status and promotion opportunities. Logically, therefore, there is a limit to how critical they can be of programs they are evaluating. In particular, as Professor Hartle argued, if the deputy minister or minister is strongly in favour of a particular program and believes there are no problems with it, the likelihood of its being terminated in response to an unfavourable evaluation would appear to be small. As well, the deputy head must be supportive of the evaluation function if it is to have an impact.

Witnesses from the departments and agencies all agreed that the purpose of evaluation is to serve the needs of senior management. In the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, for example, evaluation planning is carried out by rating twenty evaluation components against eight key decision factors.[43] The latter include the program evaluation needs of senior management, central agency concerns about program performance, interactions with other departmental programs, the time elapsed since the last evaluation and the size of the program budget. However, the witness from this department stated that "the weighting or importance given to senior management needs is equal to the total weighting for the seven remaining factors combined."[44] The same witness indicated that decisions about the department's budget and estimates were, very roughly, 90 per cent the result of pressures from fishermen and the industry and of management needs and only ten per cent from internal reviews such as those based on program evaluation.[45]

The Director General, Review, for the Public Service Commission (PSC) recounted how his staff had supplemented their reading of the evaluation literature with "a significant body of writing on how organizations change. It seemed to contradict the traditional evaluation literature."[46] He stated further that the evaluators had decided "to be an instrument of management in the change process" but that this did not compromise their independence because "we could not be useful to management unless we told them the truth."[47] Expensive evaluation findings end up sitting on the shelf, in this witness's view, when the evaluation process is not integrated into the change process of the department and there is no client interested in hearing the results. What is important, he concluded, is to get the program managers and senior management involved and committed to program change instead of operating "as an external agent of accountability."[48]

The PSC view virtually defines program evaluation as a branch of policy analysis, along the lines suggested by Professor Hartle in his paper. It illustrates the pitfalls as well as the advantages of situating the program evaluation function in the executive branch of government with the deputy head as the client. Mrs. Eleanor Chelimsky of the United States General Accounting Office (GAO) in Washington, D.C. provided another perspective on this problem when she appeared before the Committee to describe the program evaluation system in place in the United States.[49] Her agency works for the Congress, as opposed to the executive, and performs a great deal of program and policy evaluation work at the request of congressional committees. The executive branch conducts evaluations of its programs as well, many of which the GAO evaluates, just as the Auditor General reviews effectiveness measurement in Canadian government departments. One of the consequences of this dual system is that the GAO and the executive may end up doing competitive evaluations of the same program, which in turn can result in an adversarial proceeding of the type envisaged by Professor Hartle.

Mrs. Chelimsky, however, emphasized the need for evaluations by the executive branch > because they know so much more about their programs. People coming in from the outside have objectivity and integrity, which they will apply simply because of the adversarial situation. On the other hand, these people know less. So there is a trade-off there.[50]

The Committee recognizes the need to consider this trade-off when recommending changes to the existing system.

During the Auditor General's testimony before the Committee, one member suggested that the independence of evaluators might be enhanced by adopting the French model, in which each ministry has an inspector general who reports directly to the minister. The inspector general receives a life appointment, similar to that of a judge in Canada, and follows a career path independent of that of a politician or bureaucrat. The Auditor General pointed out that the United States also has inspectors general who report to both Congress and the secretary, the latter being a non-elected Cabinet appointment. However, other world models that differ from Canada's are invariably part of a parliamentary system that differs from the Westminster model, in which "executives are imposed upon the legislature."[51] Although the Committee places a premium on the kind of independence that can apparently be achieved by evaluators in these other systems, it is hesitant to recommend an entirely new category of evaluators, who would constitute an additional, expensive and not necessarily productive layer of bureaucracy.

G. The Role of the Auditor General

The Auditor General Act, 1977 requires the Auditor General to report cases in which satisfactory procedures have not been established to measure and report the effectiveness of programs. Program evaluation is one of the important ways of determining effectiveness. However, in the Auditor General's view, it is departmental management, not the Auditor General, that has the responsibility actually to measure program effectiveness. The Office of the Auditor General recently commenced a government-wide audit of effectiveness measurement, which it plans to report to Parliament in 1993. This will include an examination of the program evaluation function, the quality of evaluations and their use.[52]

The United States General Accounting Office, as has been mentioned, performs a role similar to that of the Auditor General when it evaluates the evaluations performed by the executive branch. However, the GAO also conducts evaluations at the behest of congressional committees. The question arises, therefore, whether the mandate of the Auditor General should be expanded to encompass the performance of program evaluations at the request of committees of the House of Commons and the Senate.

The Committee recognized that such a step would not entail the creation of a new agency or bureaucratic category, although it would undoubtedly necessitate an increase in the resources allocated to the Office of the Auditor General. It rejected this alternative, however, for several reasons. First, although the Auditor General is an officer of Parliament, he has never responded to specific demands from Parliament or its committees, for reasons that are not clear to the Committee. Instead, his Office plans its work on the basis of the Auditor

General's interpretation of what the Act says he should do and reports it to Parliament at a later date. Furthermore, the present Auditor General is not anxious to take on a responsibility for evaluation similar to that of the U.S. General Accounting Office.[53] Second, the Committee believes that the mandate of the Auditor General is already broad enough in the area of value-for-money auditing and should not be expanded further.[54] Finally, for a GAO-like evaluation role to be meaningful, there should be a substantial pent-up demand for independent evaluation on the part of Commons and Senate Committees. The Committee has no evidence that this is the case.

H. Accountability to Parliament

The Treasury Board evaluation policy and the 1981 Comptroller General's Guide are silent about the need for departments and/or the OCG to report to Parliament on the implementation of the policy, the quality of evaluations or the uses made of them. However, for the last few years both the Board and the OCG have instructed departments and agencies to include a section on program effectiveness in Part III of the Estimates. This section is to include summaries of evaluations that have been completed in the previous year, together with evaluation plans for the forthcoming year or years.

The quality of the Part IIIs has been widely criticized, but despite this the Auditor General believes they are the appropriate vehicle for departments to use in conveying effectiveness information to Parliament. He indicated to the Committee, however, that if parliamentarians were to make departments aware of the inadequacies of the Part IIIs, the quality of these documents would certainly improve, making them more useful to Parliament and the public.[55] The Committee agrees that committees of both the Senate and the House of Commons should spend more time on the estimates of specific departments, and in particular the Part IIIs, in order to encourage the government to be more accountable to Parliament concerning the expenditure of public funds. The Office of the Comptroller General is also planning to review the quality of the Part IIIs on a regular basis and to encourage departments to make improvements.[56]

A related issue is the difficulty of ascertaining the relationship between programs that are evaluated and the votes that Parliament is asked to approve in the Estimates. At present each vote, and the program or programs to which it corresponds, encompasses a large proportion of the department's or agency's estimates, whereas most "programs" that are evaluated are in fact small components of the programs as defined in the estimates. The consequence is that Parliament's decision to approve government expenditures is far removed from any information that may be available from evaluation studies. One witness proposed that the votes should be restructured to correspond to the program components that are evaluable and will in fact be evaluated.[57] The Committee believes that this suggestion has considerable merit but suspects that it may take some time for the government to act on it. In the meantime, the Committee's reviews of the estimates would be facilitated if it were to be provided with a detailed list of the program components that departments and agencies have defined for evaluation purposes, in accordance with the Treasury Board policy, together with an explanation of how these components are related to the program and vote structure that is presented in the estimates.

I. Prospective versus Retrospective Evaluation

A number of Committee Members expressed interest in a prospective form of evaluation that would accompany bills to establish new departments, agencies or programs. Several witnesses recommended such an activity as a useful adjunct to or even a substitute for the retrospective evaluation of existing programs. The term, however, is one that needs definition. A basic requirement might be that, when a new program is presented for parliamentary approval, it should be accompanied by a set of evaluability criteria and mileposts that indicate what will be evaluated, how and when (this may be more difficult when a new department or agency is proposed). Such a requirement would have the effect of forcing the sponsoring department to define the objectives of the program in precise terms. Evaluative information of a retrospective nature on similar programs could be included as well. At a higher level of sophistication, prospective evaluation could involve the application of cost-benefit analysis to quantify the likely effects of the program.

The Committee believes that, at a minimum, bills to establish new programs should include evaluability criteria and any other evaluative information that may cast light on the merits of the proposed programs.

CONCLUSION: AN ENHANCED ROLE FOR THE COMPTROLLER GENERAL

The Committee believes that, in order to improve the accountability of the government to Parliament along the lines discussed in this report, it may be sufficient to improve the existing system of program evaluation rather than to scrap it and start over. However, improvements require that the mandate and capabilities of the Office of the Comptroller General be strengthened significantly.

At present, the OCG's capacity to monitor the implementation of its own policies is inadequate. This was shown in particular by its inability to provide reliable information to the Committee on the extent to which government programs have been covered by program evaluations, either in the aggregate or in individual departments and agencies. As well, information about centrally requested evaluations was not forthcoming, while data provided to the Committee on the evaluation of statutory programs was inaccurate and incomplete. The Office urgently needs to improve its information base of evaluation activities if it is to have a credible role as the guardian of the evaluation system.

The OCG shows little interest in providing information to Parliament, despite its role in the monitoring of Part IIIs of the Estimates. It prepares an annual list of completed evaluations for the House of Commons Public Accounts Committee and has offered to provide this to the Senate National Finance Committee as well. However, this list provides even less information about specific evaluations than is available in the better Part IIIs. No attempt is made to reconcile the completed evaluations with the universe of programs that could be evaluated, nor is the quantitative importance of the programs, measured by the financial and person-year resources allocated to them, indicated. As well, the list contains only completed studies, not frameworks or assessments, and the OCG declined to make copies of departmental program evaluation plans available to the Committee. These materials were therefore solicited directly by the Committee from departments and agencies, which provided full albeit not always timely cooperation. Furthermore, the OCG refuses to provide its quality assessments of departmental program evaluation activities to anyone except the departments concerned.

In short, the Committee has the impression that the OCG prefers to act, when monitoring the evaluation function, as a broker between the Treasury Board and other central agencies on the one hand and departments on the other instead of as a central agency in its own right. In part, this is the result of its having been given no real powers to enforce its guidelines and of the fact that departmental evaluators have been placed in the difficult position of being solely responsible to the deputy heads and other senior managers of their own departments.

The Committee recognizes as well that the Increased Ministerial Authority and Accountability (IMAA) and the Public Service 2000 initiatives are increasing departmental autonomy and making central control of program evaluation more difficult. It believes that a balance should be struck between these decentralizing tendencies and the need for central control, and that the best way to achieve this would be to give the OCG direct responsibility for conducting program evaluations. The Committee therefore recommends:

> that the personnel responsible for program evaluation in departments and agencies be transferred to and become employees of the Office of the Comptroller General.

This transfer would ensure that the career prospects of evaluators were tied to the OCG and could not be jeopardized by their producing unfavourable evaluations. They would continue to work as evaluators within the various departments and agencies as they do now, but their independence and credibility would be assured. From an administrative standpoint, evaluators would be similar to lawyers in departmental legal branches, all of whom are employees of the Department of Justice. The Committee believes that this recommended measure provides the best opportunity among competing alternatives to improve the evaluation system and confirm the authority of the Comptroller General. It therefore urges the government to implement this recommendation without delay.

Appendix 1

As you may be aware, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has been studying the system of program evaluation in the federal government as part of its review of the 1990-91 Estimates. Our hearings, which will resume in the fall, have sought among other things to examine the process within departments and agencies of deciding which programs and issues to evaluate and the ways in which evaluation findings are used.

Since it will not be possible for us to hear from every department and agency on this vital subject, I am writing to ask for your assistance to the Committee in the preparation of its report. We are particularly interested in the following:

1. A description of how the program evaluation branch/ directorate fits into your organization, to whom the director of program evaluation reports, and what resources are being provided for the program evaluation function in the 1990-91 Estimates.

2. A comprehensive list of evaluation studies, assessments and frameworks that have been completed by your program evaluation branch/directorate;

3. The program evaluation plan of your department/ agency covering the next several years; and

4. Examples of the uses to which evaluation findings have been put, such as cases where they contributed to decisions by senior management to change program resource levels significantly.

In order to assist you in the preparation of this material, I am enclosing a copy of Issue No. 25 of the Proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, dated May 17, 1990, containing the testimony of the Comptroller and other officials of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. I refer your attention particularly to the Comptroller's opening statement, commencing on page 25A:1, which forms part of his testimony. Annex 2 of this statement provides the department's program evaluation plan for the years 1990-91 through 1997-98, while Annex 3 lists the projects completed by the program evaluation branch over the past ten years. Members of the committee were very favourably impressed by this testimony and have asked me to commend it to all deputy heads as a guide to the kind of information the Committee would like to receive from all departments and agencies.

I look forward to receiving your reply within the next few weeks. Should your staff have any further questions concerning the preparation of this material, they may contact the Research Director for the Committee, Dr. Edward Ketchum, whose telephone number is 237-0143.

Yours sincerely,

ABORTION

THIRTY-THIRD REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

WEDNESDAY, January 23, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

THIRTY-THIRD REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-43, An Act respecting abortion, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of June 26, 1990, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment, but with the recommendation that the Senate itself make the decision to pass, amend, or reject it. We do this in recognition of the fact that the Bill is to be subject to a free vote by Senators in accordance with their consciences. We believe that the most appropriate role for members of this Committee, considering the nature of the issue and the vote, is to inform Senators of the testimony received from our witnesses and the many briefs submitted to us, but to stop short of recommending as a Committee any particular course of action.

The Committee attempted to canvass as wide a spectrum of groups and views as possible in relation to the Bill and the abortion question. Thus, in addition to two federal Ministers, we heard from a number of religious organizations, physicians and some other health care professionals, legal experts, academics, labour, women's groups, activists on both the pro-life and pro-choice side, and the Law Reform Commission of Canada. The government of Ontario accepted an invitation to appear that the Committee extended to every province in Canada. A number of the groups had a very large membership from right across Canada. A list of all witnesses is appended to the report.

Over 300 individuals and groups submitted briefs or letters to the Committee regarding Bill C-43. Thirty-eight individuals or groups appeared before us in person, of which four supported passage of Bill C-43: the Ministers of Justice and National Health and Welfare, the Plymouth Brethren (although they disapprove of abortion), and the Law Reform Commission of Canada. The rest opposed the bill for a variety of reasons. They did so on religious, medical, social, legal, constitutional, or conceptual grounds. Groups whose views were otherwise diametrically opposed nonetheless recommended to the Committee that the Bill be defeated. Of course, beyond that, their views diverged, with a number of groups urging that Bill C-43 be replaced by a stronger Bill, and others insisting that no substitute criminal legislation was necessary.

Rarely have Parliamentarians been presented with such a complex, perplexing and divisive issue as abortion. Arguments relating to ethics and conscience, individual freedom, health, and the proper role of the state were all advanced. The major opposing views -they have come to be known by the terms "pro-life" and "pro-choice" and will be so described in this Report - proceed from irreconcilable premises.

Supporters of the pro-life view believe that human life begins at conception, and that abortion of the preborn is murder. Many deny that abortion is ever necessary for therapeutic reasons, and assert that the procedure itself causes psychological distress and illness to the mother. They are firm in their belief that in any contest between the wishes of the mother and the right to life of the child, the child's interest should always prevail, unless the life of the mother is at risk. The issue of abortion, then, must always be a moral issue affecting society as a whole and can never be a matter of individual "choice."

Supporters of the pro-choice position view the right of women to decide when and whether they will have a child as a fundamental human right and essential to women's equality and health. This decision should be a private one for the woman and her doctor to make, free of state coercion. State action to support life may take many other forms, including family planning, prenatal care and family support, but women should never be forced to bear unwanted children. All of these witnesses agreed that the decision to undergo an abortion was a grave one, a decision taken seriously and thoughtfully by women.

The first issue relating to Bill C-43 that your Committee wishes to present is that of the "criminalization" of abortion. The Minister of Justice pointed out to the Committee that it is common to find acts contained in the Criminal Code that under many circumstances are not criminal. She referred to driving offences as an example. Most witnesses, however, on both sides of the debate, saw the principle of criminalization as far more serious, indeed as central to their positions.

The Law Reform Commission of Canada supported criminalization, maintaining that abortion meets its four tests which determine when an act should be a crime. Pro-life groups, while generally opposing Bill C-43, all strongly supported the inclusion of abortion in the Criminal Code as a way of combatting a serious social harm. In their view, the stigmatization and punishment inherent in the criminal law are essential to denounce and deter abortion.

On the other hand, the opponents of criminalization asserted that no other medical procedure is singled out for special treatment in the Criminal Code, and emphasized that both the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Health and Welfare agree that the procedure is a medical one. The Canadian Medical Association and other health professionals argued that doctors should not be exposed to criminal prosecution in this manner. They stated that the effects of criminalization would be a reduction in the number of doctors willing to provide abortion services, a negative impact on the physician-patient relationship, the introduction of complicated and time-consuming assessment procedures so that hospitals and physicians could protect themselves, and an increase in harassment by pro-life activists. The Canadian Medical Association and the Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists emphasized that Canadian physicians are already governed by medical standards regarding abortion procedures.

The second major issue presented to your Committee was the possible effect of Bill C-43 on access to abortion services should it become law. These concerns arise because Bill C-43 creates the spectre of criminal prosecution for physicians, their staff, and women. Pro-choice groups informed the Committee that, from their point of view, abortion services are already inadequate. They reminded the Committee that one of the reasons the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the former law was because of its effect in restricting women's access to services, thereby endangering their health.

With the obvious exception of the pro-life groups opposed in principle to the provision of abortion services, the concern of virtually all witnesses was that access to abortion services would be further restricted as a result of the passage of Bill C-43 - many spoke of the "chilling effect" of the Bill - and that women who were poor, young, immigrant, or who live away from larger centres would be particularly disadvantaged.

The government of Ontario informed the Committee that some physicians withdrew services from a number of communities immediately after passage of the Bill in the Commons, and that service is threatened in others if the Bill becomes law. Their Ministers argued that the entire spectrum of health services which need to be provided to women, of which abortion procedure may form a part, is the primary responsibility of provincial governments. They concluded that Bill C-43 would be a major impediment to the government's ability to provide accessible, quality health care.

A poll conducted by the Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists in July of last year found that, with 873 physicians from all parts of Canada responding to the poll, of the 464 physicians who performed abortions at that time, 59% indicated that they would discontinue services should Bill C-43 become law. A subsequent poll found that the number of doctors indicating that they would withdraw services had increased by 14%.

Several witnesses argued that the Canada Health Act should be used to ensure access to abortion services. The Ministers of Justice and of Health and Welfare stated that this would not be constitutionally possible, although some legal experts disagreed.

The third issue that the Committee wishes to address briefly in relation to Bill C-43 is that of its constitutionality. The Minister of Justice assured the Committee that in her view the Bill was constitutional, based on existing decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada. In the opinion of some legal experts, the Bill might well be found constitutional on its face, but would fail to pass the tests set out in jurisprudence under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms if its effect were to cause delays and impede access to abortion services, similar to the situation under the previous law which was found unacceptable in the Morgentaler decision. Other groups predicted that the law would be found unconstitutional because it does not allow full autonomy for women in the first trimester of pregnancy.

Pro-life groups argued that there is no constitutional right to an abortion and that, if Bill C-43 is constitutionally flawed, it is in not sufficiently protecting the rights of the unborn child.

In conclusion, we wish to say that our witnesses on Bill C-43 have deepened our knowledge and understanding of all sides of this complex issue. During debate, Committee members will be outlining in detail the issues presented by the witnesses. Your Committee invites any Senator who wishes to propose amendments to the Bill to do so during the subsequent stage of its consideration by the Senate.

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ

Thursday, January 24, 1991

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE NORTHROP FRYE

TRIBUTES

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, this morning the CBC devoted a few moments to tributes honouring the memory of Northrop Frye, the distinguished Canadian literary critic who died yesterday in his 79th year. A short time after its praise of this most noted of the Companions of the Order of Canada, the CBC switched to a somewhat longer program devoted to an assessment of the cultural impact of rap music on society today. Northrop Frye would have rejoiced in the juxtaposition, if not the imbalance of attention.

Here—at the University of Toronto—was a scholar who enjoyed tremendous stature wherever the written word was valued. When a list of 250 authors was compiled to find those most often quoted by scholars, Marx, Aristotle and Shakespeare were in first, second and third places. Northrop Frye was 12th.

Small wonder that the University of Toronto, where he continued to work, appointed him to the special post of Professor of the University, which allowed him to teach wherever he wished in the university.

Honourable senators, we are all richer for having lived in the time of Northrop Frye.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, not much can be added to what Senator Doyle has said, but I can say that I am a graduate of Victoria College which has been graced for many years by the presence of Northrop Frye. Very recently the CBC program Ideas did a series on Northrop Frye. It was a very stimulating series and contained quite a number of passages or parts in which Professor Frye gave his views. He really was one of the world's most scholarly and exciting minds.

Recently, when I had reason to look him up in the current edition of the Oxford Companion to Literature, the most recent one edited by Margaret Drabble, I was quite dismayed to be unable to find any entry about him. I was surprised and disappointed by Oxford, because there is no question about the universal fame that he enjoyed and that he so richly merited.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I should like to support and add my voice to everything that has been said about Professor Frye. He was not only a great scholar, and one of the most distinguished minds of this century, but he was also a splendid colleague, a witty, probing and gentle companion for students and his colleagues at Massey College and everywhere else where he joined in the fellowship. His passing is a great loss for thinking people all over the world and a great loss for scholarship in this country. No doubt senators will want to extend their sympathy to his widow, Elizabeth Brown.

PERSIAN GULF

TRIBUTE TO CANADIAN FORCES—MOTION WITHDRAWN

On Motion No. 2:

> Be it Resolved That this Chamber salutes the high purpose and devotion to duty of the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces who are about to take up active duties in and around the Persian Gulf where the United Nations has pledged itself to the restoration of the recognized Government of Kuwait and the withdrawal of the cruel, invading armies of Iraq, and that this Chamber acknowledges its support for Canada's actions in the United Nations Security Council, where this country co-sponsored a resolution proposing comprehensive, collective sanctions against Iraq, which has brought forth unprecedented multi-national efforts to arrest aggression at its beginning.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am not trying for a popularity prize, but once again I rise to ask leave to withdraw a motion that is standing in my name on the Order Paper. My Motion No. 2 dealing with the Gulf crisis was laid down in September. As we all know, the exigencies of the situation at that time did not allow us to reach Motions. Motions are hard to get at in our agenda. Later Senator MacEachen introduced the same subject when he spoke on an adjournment motion. In my judgment there was a thoughtful and good debate, despite the fact that I took part in it.

Therefore, in the interest of consistency of our agenda—and a certain degree of relevance with regard to my interest in this important matter—I should like to have motion No. 2 withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On Reports of Committees:

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I had hoped that I would be able to introduce a report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration concerning the Estimates, which we have worked on long and hard in the past weeks. However, I suspect that there is a last minute hitch in the processing of the report. I will ask my colleagues for permission to revert to this item later this afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BROADCASTING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SEVENTH REPORT OF TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the seventh report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications respecting its examination of Bill C-40, an Act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain acts in relation thereto.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and to the Debates of the Senate of this day and that it form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, p. 5199.)

A Clerk at the Table:

Thursday, January 24, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

SEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators, I would request leave of the Senate to say a few words explaining the amendments now, as I think I am required to do under Rule 80.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1410)

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, before leave is granted, I want to point out that yesterday a chairman of a committee asked for leave to make some brief comments and then went on for nearly an hour.

Senator Doody: He's gone today.

Senator Bonnell: He made a speech on the report.

Senator Barootes: Because of interruptions he went on for an hour.

Senator Bonnell: That may be so, but he went on for an hour nonetheless.

Before the chairman goes on to make an elaborate speech, I would like to have his assurance that it will be brief and that he will explain what the report has to state without going into any detail or without reading the report word for word as did the chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee yesterday.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I too would like to speak to the question of leave. Perhaps Senator MacDonald's timing is not good, as Senator Bonnell mentioned, because he follows immediately on what took place yesterday. As a matter of principle, and rather than deal with individual cases, I admit that the practice developed in the Senate many years ago, when Senator Hayden would present reports and then ask for leave to make a few comments, was that he would make his comments and, if he was presenting a report on a bill, in effect it resulted—and I hate to use this adjective when I refer to Senator Hayden—a bootlegged third reading speech.

Senator Roblin: It was indeed.

Senator Frith: Senator Roblin remembers. Leaving the word "bootleg" aside, his standing was such that in the result he always got leave to decide when he would make his third reading speech, or his speech on the report, by doing it when it suited his time, whether or not it suited the time or the rules of the Senate. That practice is starting to develop again.

Our rules provide, and I am sure for good reason, that reports are spoken to the day after they are presented—that is, notice is given to have the report taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate. Our rules also provide that a report without amendment, which this is not, be adopted without debate but that the motion for third reading take place at the next sitting of the Senate.

I underline the fact that those are our rules. If we do not want that, and if we want chairmen to be able to speak to a report the minute it is introduced—and I do not think we should—then we can change the rules. In the meantime, I hope this will not become a practice.

For two days in a row chairmen of committees have presented reports and asked for leave to make a few comments. If they ask for leave to make a few comments, then they should take the trouble to ask for leave and explain why they must have leave, why it cannot wait until the next sitting, as provided for by the rules.

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators, I tend to agree. It is entirely possible that these brief remarks could have been made at the consideration of the report stage of the bill. Since honourable senators have copies of the report, and since it will be considered at the next sitting of the Senate, I thought it might be helpful to make these comments now in order to apprise honourable senators of what is before them. This is not a third reading speech. It is a speech made by a chairman of a committee with complete detachment as to what happened.

I assure Senator Bonnell that when my colleague yesterday tried to be helpful and useful he probably placed an intolerable burden upon the attention span of the honourable senator. I shall not do that today.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Can the honourable senator explain how his report, which he has tabled, or presented, is any different, or why it deserves any special consideration when compared to any other committee report which is tabled or presented? Will it now be required of every chairman to ask for leave to take into consideration the report in its proper order?

Senator MacDonald: I was following Rule 80. If I have misread that rule—

Senator Frith: Yes, you may have.

Senator MacDonald: I asked for leave.

Senator Olson: But it was not granted.

Senator MacDonald: I think it was.

Senator Olson: No, it was not.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I will give leave if the chairman assures us that his comments will be brief and that he will not go into a third reading speech or a speech on this report, which we will get into at the next sitting. If he has a few comments to make, such as there being something wrong with the printing or the French translation, then that is fine. If those are not the type of comments that he wishes to make, then there is no reason why the report cannot wait until next week.

Senator Frith: I should like to make it clear that my objection would not be met by an undertaking that the chairman would be brief, but rather by being persuaded that there is some special reason why we should proceed now and leave accordingly given to suspend the rules. Rule 80 says:

> On every report of amendments to a bill made from a committee, the senator presenting the report shall explain to the Senate the basis for and the effect of each amendment. That, of course, will be perfectly in order when the report comes before the Senate in due course. When the report comes before the Senate, as it will at the next sitting, I look forward to Senator MacDonald's explanation of the amendments provided for in Rule 80. Up to this point I have heard no special reason why leave should be given to make comments contrary to the rules and, therefore, I believe leave should not be granted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator MacDonald, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

[Senator MacDonald.]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On Presentation of Petitions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I now give Senator MacDonald a chance to get even, because I should like leave to revert to Presentation of Petitions.

Hon. Finlay Macdonald: No.

Senator Frith: I shall present the petitions at the next sitting.

Hon. Efstathios W. Barootes: Hoisted on his own petard!

Senator Frith: Not at all. I said he would have a chance to get even. He had a chance to refuse me this leave, and he has refused it. It is quite fair to have done so. A petard is in no way involved, hoisted or otherwise.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, may we get from the negative to the positive on both sides?

ABORTION BILL

NOTICE OF MOTION TO REFER SUBSTANTIVE ISSUES OF BILL C-43 TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE OR TO SPECIAL SELECT COMMITTEE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, January 29, 1991, I shall move:

> That the substantive issues of Bill C-43, including the salient claims of witnesses having appeared before the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, and the evidence led therein, and to be printed in full in the Proceedings of the said Standing Committee dealing with Bill C-43, be referred to a Committee of the Whole or a special select committee if that is the decision of the Senate expressed in Committee forthwith, for the purpose of analysing these issues, claims, and evidence, with a view to clarifying what is the principle of Bill C-43 and the scope available to this Senate for amendment of Bill C-43, and the ramifications of the proposed Bill C-43 and its possible amendments in the body of law and Canadian social Charter supported rights, being especially attentive to the potentially seditious effects of Bill C-43 were it enacted in law.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, January 29, 1991 at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ABORTION

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AMEND BILL C-43

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next I will propose the following substantive amendment to Bill C-43:

That Clause 1 of Bill C-43 at page 1 thereof be amended by striking lines 21 and 22 thereof and substituting therefor:

"medical practitioner", in respect of a medical intervention performed in a province, means and striking lines 11 through 14 thereof and substituting therefor:

years, unless the medical intervention is performed by or under the direction of a medical practitioner with reasonable regard for the preservation of the life of the said child when the said medical practitioner is of the verifiable opinion that, if the medical intervention were not performed, the health or life of the and striking lines 4 and 5 thereof, substituting therefor:

renumbering succeeding lines accordingly.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to take any questions honourable senators may have for the Leader of the Government. He will, I understand, be in the chamber later, but he is not available at the moment.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

SCHEDULED RESUMPTION OF MEETINGS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to give notice of some questions that I hope the Leader of the Government in the Senate will be prepared to deal with at the next sitting.

Apparently, the Commissioner for External Relations of the European Common Market has embarked on a trip through South America and North America to find out on what basis the GATT talks can be resumed, because he says that everyone is now aware that something has to happen. If it does not happen, or if they do not come to some kind of agreement on agricultural subsidies, apparently the entire trade talks will break down. This report goes on to say that the commissioner has something new to offer, although exactly what is not clear.

I wonder if I could give notice that we would like to discuss this with the minister at the next session. Perhaps he could find out from the Honourable Mr. Crosbie what the commissioner has in mind, because there are many people in Canada who have a vital interest in having these talks resume and a determination reached reasonably soon. In fact, that should happen sooner than people anticipate, because the permission that was granted under the fast-track rules by the United States Congress expires on March 1.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Thank you, senator. We will try to get the information.

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I realize that the Leader of the Government in the Senate does not think it is necessary to be here for Question Period; that is why he has left his deputy leader here to answer questions. It is difficult for the deputy leader to be informed when he is not in the cabinet. Therefore, I would ask the deputy leader to suggest to the Prime Minister of Canada that he be named to the Privy Council and then to the cabinet of the country so that he could answer our questions, because he is here almost every day, while the Leader of the Government in the Senate can find all sorts of excuses not to be here.

I see the deputy leader does not have an answer to that one. Since he cannot respond, perhaps I can ask the Conservative caucus to put forth a motion to the Prime Minister the next time they meet moving that the deputy leader be made a Privy Councillor and a member of the cabinet to replace the present leader who finds other places to be during Question Period.

Hon Orville H. Phillips: Are you joining our caucus to make that motion?

PERSIAN GULF WAR

POSSIBILITY OF CONSCRIPTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: While I am on my feet, I should like to ask the deputy leader in the Senate if he would find out for sure, and have either himself or his Leader report back to the Senate, that Canadian troops will not be conscripted to be sent over to the Gulf war. I ask because, according to the newspaper this morning, if Israel should be invaded, then ground troops could be sent over to join the Canadian troops in the Gulf. The supposition is that if at any time Israel should get involved with this war, Canadian troops could be sent forward and there may be conscription.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my understanding is that the Prime Minister has made it perfectly clear that there will be no ground troops committed and there will be no conscription. However, if there is further information, I will try to obtain it.

Senator Bonnell: Of course, the Prime Minister said we would not be in a war, but we got into one. He said it would only be under the United Nations, but it is not under the United Nations at all; it is a coalition of some kind.

POSSIBILITY OF GASOLINE RATIONING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Could the deputy leader also find out from the Leader of the Government, and from the man who does sit in cabinet, whether we are going to have rationing of gasoline and other vital supplies for our Canadian citizens?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will try to obtain an update for the honourable senator.

BENEFITS AND RIGHTS TO BE ACCORDED TO CANADIAN FORCES VETERANS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Could the deputy leader also find out for us if the Department of Veterans Affairs is going to take into consideration the factt that the men and women, boys and girls, who are in this Gulf war should receive all the pension benefits and rights, such as the VIP treatment, veterans allowances and disability pensions, to which all of our veterans from the other great wars are entitled?

• (1430)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will try to obtain the information, senator.

STRIKING OF MEDAL FOR CANADIAN FORCES IN GULF CONFLICT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Will you also ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he can assure us that medals will be struck by the Department of National Defence for these great boys and girls to wear to show they took part in this battle for the coalition?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I think that question was asked a few days ago.

Senator Bonnell: I never received an answer.

Senator Doody: It is currently under investigation. I realize how necessary the information is and I will try to obtain it.

INCOME TAX EXEMPTION FOR MILITARY PERSONNEL—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: There was also a question asked a few days ago, and I will ask it again today to remind the Leader of the Government. Is there going to be the same tax break given to those Canadian boys and girls who have had the extra expense of going to the Gulf in fighting for this country as has been given to the American soldiers, airmen, seamen and marines by the United States?

[Senator Doody.]

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think the honourable gentleman asked that question also yesterday, and I think it is being studied by the appropriate department. Are there any further questions while I am on my feet?

Senator Bonnell: I have lots of questions, but I know you will not give me any answers. You will take my questions as notice, so I will save them for the leader next week. Maybe he will come back next week or maybe he will find another meeting to go to.

CANADIAN HERITAGE LANGUAGES INSTITUTE BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson moved the third reading of Bill C-37, to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN RACE RELATIONS FOUNDATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella moved the third reading of Bill C-63, to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Norman K. Atkins moved the third reading of Bill C-260, to amend the Canada Pension Plan (spousal agreement).

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, this bill, as you are all aware, was sponsored by Mr. Bill Kempling in the other place. It corrects a problem in the splitting of pension credits between spouses on the dissolution of marriage, which problem has existed for the last few years and has been a troublesome one. As Senator Atkins has explained to us, this bill gets around the situation in which one spouse could bargain away his or her side of the Canada Pension Plan credits. The situation is somewhat complicated and the history has been explained earlier to us.

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has considered the bill at some length and believes that this is a bill which should be supported and passed without amendment. However, we have some concerns with the way in which this bill was presented, which we would like senators to know about.

There are really three problems, the first being that the bill rests almost entirely upon ministerial discretion. Those senators who have the bill before them will know that it is up to the minister to decide whether someone's pension credits can be restored, the amounts and who is eligible. We have a great deal of concern about legislation that provides so much ministerial discretion. While we understand that under the current circumstances this seems to be the only available way to solve the problem, we would like honourable senators to know that in principle members of this committee on both sides are concerned about it and hope that legislation of this kind does not establish a precedent. We would certainly be unhappy if that were to be the case.

A second problem with the bill is that it does not set out in detail the circumstances in which it would be appropriate for the minister to take remedial action, which he or she will be eligible to do under this legislation. For example, there are potentially deserving spouses who signed spousal agreements with a general waiver prior to 1983, not realizing that they were giving up their rights to a division of credits. They did not later apply for credit splitting based on advice received directly or indirectly from government. Because Bill C-260 essentially provides that remedial action may be taken in relation to ex-spouses who were denied a division of credits, this class of spouses is not eligible for redress, having made no application. Therefore, they have now lost their right to division of credits.

Another example is that of ex-spouses who failed to apply for the division of credits within the delay of three years, as required by the then relevant legislation, which was Bill C-49. Failure to apply in a timely fashion was the situation for a spouse who decided against submitting an application, believing that it would be denied in light of the Preece case in 1983, which held that ex-spouses could waive their entitlements to CPP credits. The question then arises as to whether this person would be considered as having been denied a division of credits within the meaning of the bill.

The point we are making here is that there are many possibilities about which cases may or may not fall under the aegis of Bill C-260. Because the bill depends on ministerial discretion alone, there are no established criteria. We think that is too loose a framing of the bill.

Third, the problem is that the legislation is framed in an open-ended treatment of the form of relief which should be granted in appropriate cases. Would a division of credits with retroactive application be ordered? Would the remedy even be a credit splitting or another form of relief, to quote paragraph 4(b) of the bill, ". . . to place the person in the position that the person would be in under this Act had the division been approved . . ."? Again, the legislation authorizes the minister to exercise discretion when taking suitable remedial action without reference to any kind of standard.

It is clear to members of our committee that the failure to provide criteria and standards in the bill creates a vagueness that may very well impede its implementation. The legislation provides no guidelines to assist the minister or to contain the exercise of ministerial discretion. It only requires that spousal agreements prior to June 4, 1986 have resulted in a denial of a credit division. The satisfaction of Bill C-260 is left to the minister's discretion.

Finally, this is all the more disturbing because there is no clause in this bill forcing the minister to prepare a report on the bill within one or two years of its coming into force. As all senators will know, a clause of this nature is quite often included in legislation to serve as a mechanism of accountability. We are disturbed that there is no such provision in Bill C-260. Nonetheless, we recognize that if we were to amend this legislation, which we would like to do, it would be very unlikely to come forward again for sometime. Because the bill does provide relief to a certain number of people who are caught in this situation, we urge that it be passed without amendment.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RESTRAINT BILL

MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DIVISION DEFERRED

Hon. Duff Roblin moved the third reading of Bill C-69, An Act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures.

He said: Honourable senators, I will let my friend, Senator Leblanc, speak first and I will speak after him.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Saurel): As you know, Bill C-69 implements part of the Budget brought down on February 20, 1990, as set forth in the Expenditure Control Plan concerning program spending. More specifically, the bill eliminates the Canadian Exploration Incentives Program; freezes public utilities income tax transfers to the provinces; caps federal transfers under the Canada Assistance Plan to Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta at 5 per cent; and freezes federal transfers to the provinces for Established Programs Financing, including postsecondary education and health care. The capping of increases in transfer payments will apply to fiscal periods 1990-91 and 1991-92.

The National Finance Committee met a number of times, first on October 3, 1990, and subsequently on October 24, 1990, October 25, 1990, and more recently, for the fourth time on January 16, 1991, the fifth time on January 17, 1991, the sixth time on January 21, 1991, the seventh time on January 22, 1991, and the eighth again on January 22, 1991. Altogether, the committee met eight times, and as a result, more witnesses were able to express their views. With the exception of the ministers and federal officials who appeared before the committee, all witnesses disapproved of one or more aspects of the bill under consideration. Nevertheless, the committee decided to report the bill without amendment because except in the case of the elimination of the Canadian Exploration Incentives Program, the expenditure restraint measures are apply to only until the end of the next fiscal year. Furthermore, the bill was referred to committee last June, and the government, in the person of the Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson, was anxious to see the committee finish hearing witnesses as soon as possible. As chairman of the committee, I acceded to the repeated requests of Conservative members.

However, although spending cutbacks were temporary, some witnesses pointed out that by deciding unilaterally to reduce its transfer payments to the provinces, the government was challenging a number of fundamental principales.

In this respect, I would like to share with you some comments by Mr. Ron Melchers. I have the "blues" of our sitting on Monday, January 21, 1991. I will read the text which I believe is entirely accurate, even if it is not the final version. The witness was a Mr. Ron Melchers, Chairman of the Social Planning Council of Ottawa-Carleton, and this is what he had to say about the Canada Assistance Plan:

> The Canada Assistance Plan is inadequate and should be reviewed, but such a review requires a far more elaborate and complex process than a money bill that unilaterally abrogates one of the fundamental aspects of Canadian social policy in the past 25 years.
> Since 1976, there has been no national debate involving the provinces on the interaction required between social policy and that part of our social policy that constitutes the federal contribution.
> So I hope that there will be a renewed debate on the basic principles of the Canada Assistance Plan, in a multilateral process involving the federal government and the provinces, similar to the process that existed originally, if we are truly to make this legislation an instrument for economic prosperity.

Since the Supreme Court has now been asked to decide whether the federal government has the power to make unilaterally such drastic changes in shared-cost programs like the Canada Assistance Plan, I would rather not comment further on this matter.

However, in the case of Established Programs Financing, transfer payments have already been cut back twice, in the 1986 and 1989 budgets.

Honourable senators will recall that these transfers include pecuniary payments and tax points. The increase in tax points more or less follows the increase in the Gross Domestic Product. This means that the initial cutbacks in 1986 and 1989 and those proposed in Bill C-69 had the effect of reducing pecuniary transfers to the provinces.

For the 1989-90 fiscal year, transfers under Established Programs Financing amounted to $19.8 billion, but 42 per cent of that amount was in the form of pecuniary transfers, while the remaining 58 per cent consisted of tax points.

This trend towards reducing the proportion of pecuniary transfers and increasing tax points is expected to continue as long as the aggregrate of transfers does not increase as fast as the GDP. If nothing is done, sooner or later pecuniary transfers will disappear altogether. Some provinces will be affected sooner than others, but they will all be affected in the end. The federal government is gradually withdrawing its support for fiscal federalism or, as is often the case, for so-called profitable federalism. Honourable senators may wish to look at the impact of this withdrawal on national unity.

[Senator Leblanc.]

For instance, we know that the federal government obtains compliance with the national health standards provided under the Canada Health Act by threatening to withdraw transfer payments from provinces that do not apply those standards. However, when those transfers no longer exist, some provinces may decide to undermine the principle of free health care by, for instance, imposing user fees, supplementary costs or private insurance. In the circumstances, we may end up with as many different health care systems as there are provinces and territories, and Canadians may have trouble getting out-of-province care.

Finally, the government should give some serious thought to the long-term impact of its expenditure control policies on national unity and the future of Confederation. I certainly cannot vote for a bill that in my opinion adds more grist to the mill of separatists of every ilk, in the province of Quebec and elsewhere.

Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I should like to add a few words to the comments made by the chairman of the committee, but before doing so I should like to express my appreciation for the business-like way in which he has dealt with the handling of this bill in committee. It is not his fault that it is now over six months since we had second reading. I appreciate the fact that he conducted the affairs in the most expeditious manner possible under the circumstances. I want him to know that I appreciate that.

The chairman has quite usefully outlined the purposes of this bill, which are part of the federal fiscal restraint program that was announced in the last budget. I do not think there is any need for me to reiterate those details. He has also raised a much larger issue, which is not the essential part of the bill but is a legitimate comment on it. It can be reduced to the assertion that these programs between the provinces and the federal government on these important matters are not capable of being continued indefinitely in the form in which they were first devised.

If anyone follows the history of the transfer policy between the federal government and the provinces, one must be struck by the fact that it is continually being readjusted in order to meet the circumstances of the times and the difficulties that arise, which perhaps were not anticipated when they were first introduced. That is a fair comment. I also think that it is an important comment, because some time in the not too distant future these matters will be reviewed. If my memory is correct—and I hope that I am right in this—there is in some instance statutory undertakings that these transfer payments be reviewed from time to time. Certainly that is the case with equalization in order to make sure that they meet the circumstances of the time. So I do not disagree with him on his assertion that these matters have to be renewed from time to time. I agree with that.

I also think the chairman was right to say that the bill should be supported. Perhaps I am stretching it a bit far, but I agree with him that the bill now has only one year to run. It is important that it should be dealt with now. We will see what happens at the end of that year with respect to these various arrangements.

I point out to the house that, in connection with the tax point situation to which he drew attention, that has been a factor in these equations for many a long day. It is nothing new. It may be that circumstances alter the impact of these tax point transfers, but it certainly gives the provinces the opportunity to take advantage of that tax revenue generating in that way. Otherwise, it would come to the federal treasury and the treasury would then decide whether to pass it on or pass on any portion of it.

Originally tax points were brought in with a reasonable degree of approval by the provinces, because attached to the tax points is the principle of equalization; so that if a province's tax- raising capacity is lower in one province than it is in another, the principle of equalization applies so that low income provinces that are using tax points, as they must under this arrangement, now have the benefit of equalization being applied to them. To that extent, there is something to be said for the tax points themselves. I make that as an observation just to illustrate what is occurring at the present time.

My honourable friend also made reference to the fact that the federal government making these grants can control what the provinces are doing, say, in the field of health. I do not think that is true anymore. From 1977 onward the block grant principle has been in place. That means that, while in the beginning these grants were strictly monitored by the federal government with respect to how the provinces spent the money on education and health, since 1987 that has not been the case. In fact, the provinces are legally and constitutionally at liberty to use this money for anything they wish. I agree with my honourable friend if he suggests that the provinces should be careful to use them for health and education. I think that is right; but, as far as the constitutional position and the legal position is concerned, they are block grants and the provinces have the right to spend the money as they wish.

Perhaps that is something that should be looked into also, because when you get too long a separation between the man who raises the money and the man who spends it, you lose the principle of accountability of the expenditure of public finances. I myself have some sympathy for those who say that it is not a good situation and that we should do something about it. I think that my honourable friend and I may be on common ground with respect to that.

However, I point out that under these restraint programs no transfers are being reduced. It is true that increases have been slowed down and in some cases have been severely capped, but equalization is quite untouched and carries on as it has always done. This bill is for a limited period. We will have to see how we get along after that period expires.

My friend is right in saying that there were numerous presentations before the committee. Those affected or who felt that they had an interest in the matter were vocal and impressive in the testimony that they presented to us. Some of them were asking for more rather than less, but, naturally, they were looking out for the interests of the particular sector of society in which they serve. I thought that these presentations came from people who were obviously dedicated and earnest in what they had to say. It is not surprising, if they were speaking from their own particular point of view rather than the broader public interest. That is the nature of things.

The decision for legislators is not a particularly pleasant one, or a particularly easy one. I, for one, found my sympathies fully engaged by the people who came before us to present their concerns. The problem is, of course, that these particular claims have to be weighed against what I describe as the principle of the common good, or have to be weighed against the various choices that are open to legislators in respect of this matter.

Of one thing we can be assured: that, as usual, there does not seem to be enough tax funds to pay for what the people want. I think that point was put pretty well by Judith Maxwell of the Economic Council of Canada when she was speaking in western Canada last November. She said, "There is, in fact, a large gap between what citizens want and what they are prepared to pay for." We know all about that, but it is nice to have it confirmed from another source.

When in the past we have had problems of this kind, we have tried to meet the expectations of the people who have appeared before us by raising taxes, or by increasing the deficit or the debt. That was the reaction in days gone by. I think we are coming to realize more and more that these options are not open to us today. It would not be advisable for us to adopt those expediencies at the present time. Our present fiscal deficit and our present national debt underline the seriousness of this problem when one considers the cost of debt service. It is now about 40 cents for every dollar that we gather in tax money. One can perceive that by following the increase in this debt support payment over the years, we are rather quickly eroding the capacity of the federal government to meet its current responsibilities, to say nothing of something new.

We find that Bill C-69 is directly related to the debt and the deficit and is an attempt to obtain for the federal government a little more room to manoeuvre, room for manoeuvre which is now pretty closely constrained. In fact, one would say that it is strangled. Somehow the pressure should be reduced. Bill C-69 is part of the policy that will help to relieve that pressure.

No doubt this is painful for some. I hope that it is just in the short run and that there may be hope for better things in the long run. No doubt Bill C-69 is not good news for many. It is not good news for me, for one. However, the constraints it imposes, I suggest, over this two-year period are manageable and, given the budget position with which we are faced, are indeed necessary. Our expectation and our hope is that it will protect the future.

Speaking on the same occasion, Ms. Maxwell made a remark on this matter to which I subscribe. She stated that "for the sake of future generations, we have to make a determined effort to climb over this mountain of debt." She went on to state that "it seems inevitable that the federal government will be forced to curb existing commitments even further just to meet the new claims on the public purse within the next few years." Finally, she stated, "It will be tough medicine to take, but we must bear in mind that it will eventually bring genuine, long-term payoffs for all Canadians." In a nutshell, that seems to be the justification for this bill. On that basis, I ask the house to support it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Roblin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Buchanan, that this bill be read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, pursuant to Rule P-3(a), I ask that the vote on third reading of this bill be deferred until 5.45 o'clock p.m. on the next sitting day, which I take it will be Tuesday.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have no problem with the deferred vote. As a matter of fact, I think it is a great idea. However, would it not be better if the whips had a chance to discuss whether the vote should be held on Tuesday or Wednesday? They have already had some discussion along those lines on another matter.

Senator Frith: Tuesday has no magic for us. For the sake of the record, it should be clear that the rule has been invoked. If the two whips come up with some different arrangement, then we can implement it by unanimous consent on Tuesday.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

ABORTION BILL

THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Senator Murray, moved the third reading of Bill C-43, an act respecting abortion.

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I rise in my place conscious of the fact that I have been in this chamber for a very short time and that this is the first occasion I have had to address you formally. If I inadvertently break with any of the longstanding traditions of this place, I am hopeful that other honourable members will be tolerant of my inexperience and be quick to point out my shortcomings or presumptions.

It is a tradition in this chamber, as well as in the other place, that a new member take the opportunity in a maiden speech to say a few words about his or her constituency as well as the objectives he or she would like to pursue.

Notwithstanding the fact that I was not elected to this august body, all of us having been appointed, there are four constituencies that I would be proud to represent during my tenure in the Senate. The first is my home province of Nova Scotia, a land as beautiful as it is diverse, and one of the original colonies that first joined together to create this country, full of people proud to call themselves Canadians.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Oliver: In many areas of Canada's society and economy, Nova Scotia has much to offer the rest of the country, particularly in terms of its quality of life. While we still have much to achieve, we also have much to contribute. I want to join my voice with other senators from Nova Scotia in making that contribution and in bringing Nova Scotia's unique point of view to issues of national concern.

Nova Scotia is also a part of one of this country's key regions, Atlantic Canada. Some central Canadians tend to undervalue Atlantic Canada, pointing out the current economic dependence of the region on the rest of the country. Honourable senators, I am convinced that we in the region are poised on the edge of a new economic adventure, one characterized by an outward looking, more aggressive and entrepreneurial approach to doing business with the rest of Canada and, indeed, the rest of the world.

For the first time in a long time we are actively discussing more formal economic ties among all four provinces, export markets in New England, Europe and the Asia Pacific, as a means through which we can cooperate rather than fight with one another. I am very much looking forward to doing what I can to help this process along so that we can point to our economic progress as proudly as we can point to the quality of life in the region.

Finally, through my appointment to the Senate I believe I can represent Black Nova Scotians, and visible minorities throughout the country. As a member of both communities, I understand the need to combat racism wherever it appears and to provide equal opportunity to all regardless of the colour of their skin. Equality, fairness, justice—these are concepts that many Canadians take for granted; but for many others they are goals to which they can only aspire. But they are no longer the impossible dream.

Further, at this critical time in our nation-building efforts, fully one-third of Canadians are less than adequately represented in any of the debates that pit Canadians of English-speaking origin against Canadians of French-speaking origin. They are the people of a thousand languages and cultures. This third group does not share the historic tensions that have brought us to this place in time. They came because Canada started out as a beacon of promise and fulfilment. I want to work with them to ensure that it remains so.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Oliver: I must confess that the last few months have been an interesting period for me, as I am sure they have been for all of us. To say my entry into the fierce debate was not exactly what I had in mind would be understating my feelings in the extreme.

I have long desired to be a senator, and I shall make no apologies for that ambition. When I first conceived that desire, the Senate was a chamber of noble aspirations. Despite the century-old debate over the non-elected status of senators, this place was, as seen by Sir John A. Macdonald, a place of sober second thought. It was credited with fulfilling an important national and political role and making a unique contribution in shaping the legislation which ultimately affects all of us.

To say that I want to go back to that time in the history of this body is to say that I want to move forward. Our rules of conduct and procedure, such as they are, were written for a mildly partisan gentlemen's club Senate of the 19th Century. Though honourable senators would have to be blind to believe that we are still a gentlemen's club and deaf to think that this is a mildly partisan place, what we have become is inadequate and inappropriate even in the 20th Century and, of course, we are moving rapidly to the 21st century.

The Senate must be capable of functioning smoothly if it is going to make any contribution to national unity, national strength or even the national debate over its own continuing role in Parliament. We did make an effort with the provisional rules that guide us as I speak, but it is painfully obvious that even they were put together in haste under the exigencies of the day. They will probably have little to do with the long-term reforms of our process and purpose.

Just as Canadians are debating reforms to the Senate, I believe that the Senate should be reforming itself. After all, change should start from within. Whatever happens next, we would at least have made a start towards returning this chamber to its former position, where its views actually counted for something. A useful place to start would be in reviewing the role, powers and activities of the Speaker. A strong Speaker, with the authority of modern rules of procedure, would make a substantial difference in the manner in which we conduct ourselves, particularly where there are partisan issues dividing us. I would also like to see a Senate focusing on strengthening the investigative roles of the committees. It seems to me, as I recall recent history, that the Senate has been able to makes its most significant contribution to the legislative process when it did its homework well. By that, I mean studying emerging issues on their merits and then responding to legislation of its own or from the other place from a position of knowledge and expertise. After all, I read our role as being one to advise and improve rather than to deny and discard. That is not to deny the powers invested in this body in Canada's Constitution, but only to focus on how they might be used more appropriately.

I do not believe that Canadians would be so disheartened with the current functioning of the Senate if we had been pursuing our investigative and advisory roles more effectively.

Today, nobody will deny that Canada is facing a constitutional crisis of a magnitude that we have not seen before. Just as an aside, on the radio the other day I heard a simple solution to our constitutional troubles: Get more Germans to immigrate to Canada. After all, we have spent 120 years trying to unite one country; the Germans united two countries in just nine months.

Certainly we have gone through periods of national unrest in the past, but we have weathered them. The conscription fight, the language debate, Quebec's independence referendum, to name just three, were emotionally-charged crises that threatened our tranquil state. We got through them partly because that emotion was part of a sense of Canadianness, a deep-rooted and personal commitment to our future together.

The current debate is different in a number of respects. In many parts of the country the emotion seems to have been replaced by either a "Who cares?" attitude or, as it appears in Quebec, "What's in it for us?" approach to the issue. Our traditional political institutions are in chaos. Public cynicism is growing daily, and a myriad of other problems are clouding our national vision. Who, then, are people to turn to when all else has failed? I would like to believe that we, in this chamber, could play such a role, though we seem to be having some trouble enough keeping our own house in order. Certainly we have the talent and experience and, if you like, institutional wisdom unlike that which is found in the other place.

Colleagues, in the final analysis, nothing is as important as our ability to bring sober second thought to the national constitutional debate. If we cannot or we do not, how can we expect more of anyone else? I am sorry to be so long-winded in my introductory remarks, but I felt I needed to say all of these things. I believe them deeply and I am committed to working hard with all honourable senators to help them come to pass.

Having said that, I should like to turn to the legislation currently before us: Bill C-43, the abortion bill, which has been highly controversial and will remain so, whether or not it is passed by the Senate. However, I believe that it is an important piece of legislation in that it proposes a compromise between extreme points of view which, by their very nature, are totally irreconcilable.

Though I urge all senators to support the passage of this bill, I am not prepared to argue the issues on moral grounds. I do not believe that I have the right or the ability to impose my moral judgment on people on either side of this issue. The large majority of Canadians ought to hold their own counsel as their individual consciences dictate, without imposing their views on others. This legislation is not for them; it is for those whose views run so deep and so strong that they cannot allow the other point of view to exist alongside their own.

While abortion remains the most perplexing and intractable moral problem of our time, the issues it raises are issues at two distinct levels. For those actually involved in the practice of abortion—women with unwanted or problem pregnancies, health professionals debating whether to perform abortions, and friends or counsellors attempting to provide women with advice—the problem is a direct and personal one. The question at this level is whether performing or undergoing an abortion is morally justifiable. Although the question will be confronted by many individuals, for many others it will never arise. In other words, the personal question of abortion does not generalize to all members of society.

At the second level, abortion is a matter of public policy. Every society must decide whether and how it will regulate abortions. The basic moral question at this social level is whether undergoing or performing an abortion is to be legally permissible. Whatever the shape of the society's abortion policy, settling upon one policy or another is unavoidable. Thus, at the societal level, the moral perplexities created by abortion are also unavoidable. The choice of an abortion policy is the legitimate concern of all members of society capable of participating in the political process. Unlike the personal problem, the social problem of abortion does not confront us, only when we are involved as participants. It is addressed to all of us simply because we are citizens and, as citizens, we must define the common good.

Broadly speaking, abortion policies split into three sorts. A policy is permissive if it treats abortion at every stage of pregnancy as a form of minor surgery. Permissive policies will impose on abortions only those constraints applicable to medical procedures in general such as the competence of practitioners, standards of facilities and the informed consent of the patient.

A policy is restrictive if it treats abortion at every stage of pregnancy as a form of homicide. Restrictive policies either prohibit abortions outright or severely limit grounds for their justification—for instance, to cases where continuation of the pregnancy threatens the woman's life. A policy is moderate if it falls somewhere between the permissive and restrictive policies.

Moderate policies commonly impose two sorts of special constraints on abortion: Concerning the stage of pregnancy at which an abortion is performed; and the reasons for performing it. These constraints take many different forms and can be combined in a number of different ways. The result, however, is that, while permissive and restrictive policies are much of a piece, moderate policies are really a mixed bag.

The strongly held, well-established viewpoints on both sides of the abortion issue are both simple and internally coherent. Beginning with diametrically opposing valuations of the fetus, they progress inevitably to diametrically opposed abortion policies. This conflict between the established views defines the public abortion debate in most countries, including our own.

Faced with this polarization, it is easy to conclude that the established views exhaust all our available options. Either abortion is the moral equivalent of contraception or it is the moral equivalent of infanticide. Against the simplicity and power of these extreme views, more moderate positions appear muddled and indecisive.

However, in Canada and elsewhere, opinion polls tend to show that only a small minority of people support the pro- or anti-abortion stances. Most persons with views on abortion tend to seek out some middle ground which attaches significance to two factors: when an abortion is performed and why.

[Senator Oliver.]

The common sense view appears to be that early abortions are less objectionable than later ones and that some grounds for abortion are less objectionable than others.

Common sense attitudes towards abortion can only be put into practice by a moderate policy—abortion legislation that seeks the middle ground. That middle ground must set a time limit that divides early from late abortions, and it should be more permissive for early abortions than it is for later ones.

In urging senators to support the passage of this legislation, I want to stress my belief that the Minister of Justice has found the appropriate middle ground, given the views of Canadians and the ruling of the Supreme Court which struck down the previous abortion legislation.

Let me turn first to the Supreme Court decision which placed considerable limitations on the scope of any legislation designed to replace section 251 of the Criminal Code. In the judgment in the case involving Dr. Henry Morgentaler and his two colleagues, then Chief Justice Brian Dickson stated that it was not the intent of the high court to resolve the so-called abortion issue, but simply to measure the contents of section 251 against the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The Chief Justice said:

> Although no doubt it is still fair to say that the courts are not the appropriate forum for articulating complex and controversial programmes of public policy, Canadian courts are now charged with the crucial obligation of ensuring that the legislative initiatives pursued by our Parliament and legislatures conform to the democratic values expressed in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Section 1 of the Charter guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. Section 7 states that everyone has the right to life, liberty and the security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

Section 1 of the Charter can be used to salvage a legislative provision that breaches section 7. However, this is possible only if two conditions are met: First, that the objective of the provision is of sufficient importance to warrant overriding a constitutionally protected right or freedom; and, second, that the means chosen in overriding the right or freedom are reasonably and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. In other words, the legislative means are proportional to the legislative ends.

Previous Supreme Court decisions have made reference to three conditions to this second aspect. First, that the means chosen to achieve an important objective should be rational, fair and not arbitrary; second, the legislative means should impair as little as possible the right or freedom under consideration; and, third, the effects of the limitation upon the relevant right or freedom should not be out of proportion to the objective we set out to achieve. Let me again quote from Chief Justice Dickson's analysis and reasons concerning this landmark judgment. He said:

> In my view, it is unnecessary for the purpose of deciding this appeal to evaluate or assess foetal rights as an independent constitutional value. Nor are we required to measure the full extent of the state's interest in establishing criteria unrelated to the woman's own priorities and aspirations. What we must do is evaluate the particular balance struck by Parliament in Section 251 as it relates to the priorities and aspirations of pregnant women and the government's interest in the protection of the foetus. I have no difficulty in concluding that the objective of Section 251 as a whole, namely to balance the competing interests identified by Parliament, is sufficiently important to meet the requirements of the first step under Section 1. I think that the protection of the interests of pregnant women is a valid government objective, where life and health can be jeopardized by criminal sanctions.
> Like Beetz and Wilson JJ., I agree that the protection of foetal interests by Parliament is also a valid government objective. It follows that balancing these interests, with the lives and health of women as the major factor, is clearly an important government objective. I am equally convinced, however, that the means chosen to advance the legislative objectives of Section 251 do not satisfy any of the three elements of the proportionality component.

Later the Chief Justice continued by saying:

> The evidence has led me to conclude that the infringement of the security of the person of pregnant women caused by Section 251 is not accomplished in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. It has been demonstrated that the procedures and administrative structures created by Section 251 are often arbitrary and unfair. The procedures established to implement the policy of Section 251 impair Section 7 rights far more than is necessary because they hold an illusory defence to many women who would prima facie qualify under the exculpatory provisions of Section 251(4). In other words, many women whom Parliament professes not to wish to be subject to criminal liability will nevertheless be forced by the practical unavailability of the supposed defence to risk liability or to suffer other harm such as a traumatic late abortion caused by the delay inherent in the Section 251 system.

Still quoting from the Chief Justice:

> Finally, the effects of the limitation upon the Section rights of many pregnant women are out of proportion to the objective sought to be achieved [by the legislation].

Chief Justice Dickson concluded that the cumbersome structure of the Criminal Code provisions not only unduly subordinated the section 7 rights of pregnant women, but may also have defeated the value that Parliament itself established as paramount, namely, the life and health of the mother.

In his reasons, Mr. Justice Beetz, although disagreeing in some respects with the Chief Justice's reasons, focused part of his analysis on the right to security of the person. He suggested that an administrative structure made up of unnecessary rules, which result in an additional risk to the health of pregnant women, is manifestly unfair and does not conform to the principles of fundamental justice. However, he does conclude that the requirement that an independent medical opinion be obtained for a therapeutic abortion to be lawful cannot be said to be a violation of the principles of fundamental justice when considered in the context of a pregnant woman's right to security of the person.

He also addressed the requirement that abortions under section 251 be performed in hospitals.

Finally, I would like to turn to Madam Justice Wilson's reasoning behind her opinion that section 251 should be struck down. This outlines the parameters set by the Supreme Court of Canada which legislatures have to abide by. Madam Justice Wilson stated that the respect for individual decision-making in matters of fundamental personal importance, reflected in American Supreme Court jurisprudence, informs the Canadian Charter.

In reviewing R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd, the Chief Justice pointed out that beliefs about human worth and dignity were the sine qua non of the political traditions underlying the Charter.

Madam Justice Wilson concluded:

> The right to liberty in Section 7 guarantees to every individual a degree of personal autonomy over important decisions intimately affecting their private lives. The question then becomes whether the decision of a woman to terminate her own pregnancy falls within this class of protected decisions.

She said:

> I have no doubt that it does. The decision is one that will have profound psychological, economic and social consequences for the pregnant woman. The circumstances giving rise to it can be complex and varied, and there may be, and usually are, powerful considerations militating in opposite directions. It is a decision that deeply reflects the way the woman thinks about herself and her relationship to others and to society at large. It is not just a medical decision; it is a profound social and ethical one as well. Her responses to it will be the response of the whole person.

Madam Justice Wilson goes on to conclude that section 251 not only deprives the woman of her right to security of the person, but the right to liberty as well.

While she agrees that section 1 of the Charter authorizes reasonable limits to be put on the woman's right, having regard for the fact of the developing fetus within her body, she takes a developmental focus to the gestation period. By that, she suggests that the state has a more compelling interest in the protection of the fetus in its later stages of development than in the former. However, that precise point in the development of the fetus at which the state interest becomes compelling, she leaves to the informed judgment of the legislature, which is in a position to receive guidance on the subject from all relevant jurisdictions.

In reviewing the Supreme Court ruling, it is easy to see the limits that the decision has placed upon Parliament's ability to legislate protection of the fetus without balancing that interest very carefully with the interests and the rights of the mother. Further, cumbersome administrative procedures contained in the previous legislation were clearly seen to violate the concept of fundamental justice. However, all justices agreed that the state did have the right to impose some restrictions on the rights and freedoms of the mother in the interest of protecting the fetus.

This brings me to the bill itself and the middle ground that I think it has managed to achieve on this complex and divisive issue. Just how divisive was apparent when the House of Commons, on a free vote, passed the legislation we are now considering here by a margin of only nine votes, 140 to 131.

When the previous Minister of Justice, Doug Lewis, introduced this legislation more than a year ago, he stated that its overriding purpose was in finding an appropriate balance between the rights and interests of women and the state's interest in the protection of the fetus. He also stated that the proposed legislation, in seeking that middle ground, would not satisfy the partisans on the extremes of the issue.

As honourable senators well know, the bill is a very simple one, even though the issues that it addresses are not. It requires that any woman seeking an abortion consult with a medical practitioner. It requires that the medical practitioner satisfy himself or herself that the abortion is justified on the grounds that it threatens the life and health of the woman. It widens the definition of "health" to include mental, physical and psychological considerations, and it imposes criminal sanctions on those who violate those conditions.

I believe that the legislation satisfies the problems with the previous legislation that led to the Supreme Court of Canada decision to strike it down. There is no lengthy administrative process that would require a woman to undergo an extensive waiting period before a committee could make a decision on the issue. There is no requirement that abortions be performed in a specific facility. With the cooperation of provincial jurisdictions, this could make access to lawful abortions more equitable and fairer across the country, particularly in our remote regions. There is, in fact, more protection of the health of the pregnant woman, since it prevents non-qualified persons from supplying women with drugs or other substances for the purposes of inducing an abortion.

While I consider that others have talked about the use of the Criminal Code with respect to the abortion issue, I should again like to summarize very quickly some of those arguments. The new law comes under the Criminal Code, because it is only through the criminal law power that Parliament can regulate abortion on a national basis. Health is mainly a matter of provincial jurisdiction under the Constitution. General federal authority to legislate in that health area falls within the federal government's spending power and the criminal law power. In order to legislate directly to regulate abortion, Parliament has to use the criminal law power.

The Canada Health Act, for example, is a general funding vehicle in the health area. Legislation based on the spending power gives the provinces the option of compliance and would not provide the necessary foundation for a national regulatory scheme. It also does not allow the government to legislate directly with respect to the conduct of individuals. Enacting legislation in the Criminal Code reflects our society's interest in the protection of the public health, public order and societal values in the area of abortion. These public interests, which are the foundation of the criminal law power, find their chief expression in the Criminal Code.

Those of us who have been students or practioners of politics over the last few decades understand that Canada is an unusual country to govern. It is like no other. Just as we have a land mass totally out of proportion to our population, we also have language debates, regional disparities, multicultural policies and jurisdictional disputes, all of which compete with each other to dominate the national stage.

Although we approach the abortion issue as many other western nations do, the manner in which we have to deal with it depends on the national government's ability to impose its will on provincial governments. By this I mean that the issues currently under discussion attempt to balance the interests of the unborn against the interests of women, particularly with respect to their health. But health is not a matter of federal jurisdiction. The wisdom of our forefathers left health within the purview of provincial governments.

For the federal government to intervene on the abortion issue it needs a vehicle. It needs to intervene because, as a country with shared values and aspirations, a common approach to the dilemmas imposed by the abortion issue is the only way to proceed. It needs a vehicle because legislation must be based upon an area of federal competence. The only vehicle available to it in this regard is the Criminal Code. The Criminal Code may not be the most appropriate mechanism within which to deal with abortion, but it is the only one we have.

To those who suggest that the federal government is using this mechanism to make criminals out of women or doctors, I can only say: Would you leave it to the ten provinces to decide?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): To which I assume you would say no.

Senator Oliver: That is correct.

Senator Frith: You asked the question whether you should leave the decision to the provinces.

Senator Oliver: And I say no.

For those who demand that the government amend the Canada Health Act to deal with abortion, I ask if legislation dealing with the transfer of money from one jurisdiction to another is really where such a sensitive, moral issue should be contained. We must remember that, as a country, our national ability to enter the health field resides only in our funding powers under the Canada Health Act or under the Criminal Code. The Criminal Code, despite its name, exists to reflect, to a degree, a national approach to issues of a moral nature. As a society we abhor murder, abuse of women and children, desecration of personal or public property and the like. These values are embedded in legislation that defines the limits to individual freedoms and imposes penalties on those who exceed those limits.

In that regard, let me quote from the brief of the current Minister of Justice, Kim Campbell. In her appearance before the House of Commons legislative committee studying Bill C-43, Ms. Campbell dealt at length on the Criminal Code issue. She said, and I quote:

> Criminal law power is primarily related to the protection of fundamental values and reflects our commitment to protection of life, health, human dignity, equality and social order. Society, being a cooperative enterprise, its members must realize the need to compromise, respect each other's needs and views and enjoy mutual trust and reliance. For a society to thrive and grow, it must have a measure of freedom, justice, human dignity, equality and social order. By using the criminal law power as the basis for a new law on abortion, we are enshrining a certain set of values which, in part, describes the kind of society we are... Criminal law tries to reflect deeply-held social values and attempts to balance them with the rights of individuals.

It seems to me that the justice minister, in a few carefully chosen words, summed up the entire abortion debate, which is about values, rights and balance.

Colleagues, the Criminal Code is all we have in this regard. Therefore, it is not surprising that the government has chosen to use it. For those senators who object to the Criminal Code being used to adjudicate the abortion debate, and who may feel that they should vote against the legislation for that reason alone, I urge them to consider what alternatives are available; and further, what alternatives are available consistent with the need to operate within the restrictions, which I have already outlined, imposed on legislatures by the Supreme Court.

Having said that, I think it is also appropriate to remind senators that Canada does not stand alone in this debate and on how it has chosen to resolve it. In fact, most Western democracies have also been challenged by the moral, legal and ethical dilemmas that abortion imposes on modern society. I have had the opportunity to read the research done by Senator David with respect to a number of other jurisdictions that have wrestled with this problem.

Honourable senators, I briefly reviewed the history of this and other places. It underscores the difficulty history has brought to bear and that societies similar to our own have had in coming to grips with this vexing issue. As a Member of Parliament, Benno Friesen, who helped guide this bill through the House of Commons, said:

> This bill is the threshold of what we can do as a society in order to build the kind of moral framework that will help our people to decide the moral issues that influence their lives in a way that is acceptable to all and preserves the right of freedom.

In the legislation before us today, I believe we have a reasonable, pragmatic and common sense approach to the issue. I believe it strikes a balance between the two totally opposing viewpoints on the same issue. I also believe that it satisfies the requirements imposed on legislators by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Since we already know that interest groups will challenge the legislation before the Supreme Court as soon as it is enacted, I do not believe that any inhibitions we have in this regard should stop us from passing the bill. The government's initiative vis-à-vis the Charter of Rights and Freedoms will be determined in a court superior to our own, though I believe it will pass the Supreme Court of Canada challenge. I believe we should give the process a chance. If we fail to do so, we fail the many Canadians who still rely upon this chamber as a place for sober second thought. I also think that we will fail to respect the traditions of this country in maintaining and bringing a fine balance to complex jurisdictional problems.

In the last resort, we must be cognizant of the people's right to decide. The Supreme Court has told us that. History has told us that. Other jurisdictions similar to our own are telling us that. If we reject this legislation on our own moral grounds, we are imposing our own will on the people of this country. I do not believe we have that right; we certainly do not have that mandate.

Honourable senators, I urge you to pass this bill. It is the only way we can move forward as a society. It is the only way we can bring the abortion issue into perspective in terms of the majority of people who are content with their own ideals, values and certainties.

Thank you for listening to me. I apologize for taking so long in this my first address to this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I rise to make a brief intervention on Bill C-43. I could speak for hours on the material I have received from both pro-choice and pro-life groups and the division between the two. I should say that my difficulty also lies in the fact that there is division of opinion within my own family. My wife has manifested on occasion some degree of support for the pro-choice view, whereas my daughter, Angela, aged 21, is seriously in favour of the pro-life position. Consequently, I am going to limit my remarks by reading a few sentences that appeared in the Washington Star on April 2, 1978, entitled, "Abortion Euphemisms". The article reads, in part:

● (1550)

> It is an illusion to believe that resistance to abortion is based on religion. It is in fact based upon biology, nature and common sense. All one has to do is look with one's own eyes upon what is being aborted. It is a living organism with every appearance of a child. It resists its own death—it struggles. Granted its own fundamental rights, it will live, grow and be born, not by faith but by nature itself.

Having read that, honourable senators, I should like to inform my honourable colleagues that I will vote against Bill C-43.

On motion of Senator Neiman, debate adjourned.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SEVENTY-SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc, Chairman of the Standing Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Thursday, January 24, 1991

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

SEVENTY-SECOND REPORT

Your Committee has examined and approved the supplementary budget presented to it by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology (Special Study on Veterans Affairs Estimates), for the proposed expenditures of the said Committee regarding Veterans Affairs Votes 1, 5, 10, 15 and 20 of the 1989-90 Estimates, authorized by the Senate on 2nd May, 1989. The said supplementary budget is as follows:

Professional and Special Services	$5,280

Respectfully submitted,

ROMÉO LEBLANC
Chairman

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator LeBlanc, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration of the next sitting of the Senate.

SEVENTY-THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Thursday, January 24, 1991

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

[Senator Bosa.]

SEVENTY-THIRD REPORT

Your Committee has examined and approved the Senate Estimates for the fiscal year 1991-92 and recommends their adoption.

A summary of the Expenditure Budget 1991-92 accompanies this report.

Detailed copies of the Senate Estimates 1991-92 are available from the Office of the Clerk.

Respectfully submitted,

ROMÉO LEBLANC
Chairman

THE SENATE OF CANADA

Summary of Expenditure Budget, 1991-92

OPERATION EXPENSES

DESCRIPTION	BUDGET 1990-91	BUDGET 1991-92
Personnel	24,147,900	31,049,928

All Other Expenses	40,000
TOTAL OPERATING	38,007,500	43,805,200

CAPITAL EXPENSES

DESCRIPTION	BUDGET 1990-91	BUDGET 1991-92
Construction and Acquisition of Buildings	1,525,000	1,900,000
Acquisition of Office Machinery and Equipment	568,500	457,500
TOTAL CAPITAL	2,093,500	2,357,500
Less Adjustment for Federal Sales Tax	—	(421,800)
Total-Operating & Capital Budgets	40,101,000	45,740,900
Percentage Increase:	8.3%	14.1%

The Total amount of the Senate Estimates 1991-92 is therefore $45,740,900, which represents an increase of 14.1% from the previous fiscal year. This increase is due to the following factors: a) 9.8% of the increase is attributed to the additional costs incurred as a result of the appointment of new Senators. With the appointment of additional Senators during the fiscal year, Senate membership increased by 23%, resulting in a substantial increase of costs and services; and b) 4,3% increase is due to the ongoing operations of the Senate.

Senator LeBlanc: Honourable senators, with the permission of the house, I should like to give a few words of explanation; otherwise, I am afraid that some of this arithmetic might be rather confusing.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I have just tabled the Senate Estimates for 1991-92. The total amount of the Estimates for 1991-92 is $45,740,900, which represents an increase of 14.1 per cent from the previous fiscal year. This increase is due to two factors: a 9.8 per cent increase, which is attributable to the appointment of new senators in the past month, and the normal increase for la masse salariale,or the mass of salaries, which is 4.3 per cent.

I should also indicate to my colleagues that there is no increase in the authorized person years level except for the secretaries of the new senators.

I am sure honourable senators will allow me to offer thanks to members of the committee, especially the vice-chairman, Senator Doody, and Senator Lefebvre, who led our discussions in the budget committee. I also extend thanks to the other members of the subcommittee, Senator Nurgitz and Senator Kenny.

I really want to say that all senators who came to the Estimates study worked long and hard. I am sure honourable senators would want me to express their thanks to all who laboured quietly and patiently in the examination of the estimates for the Senate.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator LeBlanc: I would also like to thank the members of the staff, particularly the Director of Finance, Madam Aghajanian, who was patient in the face of all the requests and last minute demands that we put upon her and her staff. I want them to know that our bad tempers were not directed at them; they were really directed at the problems we were trying to solve.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator LeBlanc, report placed on Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

EUROPEAN BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-88, to provide for the membership of Canada in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased today to speak on second reading of Bill C-88, to provide for membership in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. I should like to focus my remarks on why this bank has been created, on Canada's interests in Central and Eastern Europe, and on our reasons for seeking membership in the EBRD. I will then address briefly the mandate of the bank and Canada's financial contribution to it.

• (1600)

Honourable senators, the countries of Central and Eastern Europe are undergoing political, economic and social changes of historic importance. The political and social ferment in these countries, combined with their acute economic problems, present risks and opportunities. These developments are potentially destabilizing; indeed, the recent events in the Baltic States demonstrate that, sadly, the region continues to face instability. The government has already expressed to the Soviet leadership our deep concern on the use of military force in the Baltic States, and we all hope that the Soviet Union can resolve its political problems without further loss of life. At the same time, the changes that have taken place in Central and Eastern Europe also create the potential for a prosperous, freer and more integrated European and North Atlantic community. The European Bank for Reconstruction and Development can play a central role in permitting the emerging democracies of Central and European Europe to reach their potential.

The concept of the EBRD originated from a French proposal that was quickly endorsed at a meeting of the European Community in Paris in November, 1989. Canada quickly endorsed this principle of a broad-based bank to provide a focus for worldwide financial assistance to Central and Eastern Europe, in support of the process of political and economic change then beginning in that region.

Widespread interest in this initiative quickly developed, leading to a highly compressed series of negotiating meetings. Indeed, the unprecedented speed with which the establishment of this bank was negotiated is the clearest sign of the international community's commitment to support reform in Central and Eastern Europe. This process culminated in the representatives of potential member countries signing the Bank's Article of Agreement, entitled Agreement Establishing the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, which is attached to the bill before us today, in Paris on May 29, 1990.

The countries of Central and Eastern Europe are clearly backward in modern technology and are burdened by the cumbersome and unproductive structures of the communist system. However, they also have a generally well-educated workforce, a good scientific base, and considerable technical skills. With strong and imaginative political leadership and support from the industrial world, many of these countries may be able to transform their economies and societies relatively quickly—thus enabling them to enter the European/North Atlantic Community as active and self-reliant partners.

The EBRD can assist the process of modernization and structural change in Eastern Europe through the provision of financing and technical advice for the steady and systematic introduction of private ownership and market forces into these economies.

Canada has a vital stake in Central and Eastern Europe. Some 15 per cent of Canadians have direct ties with Eastern and Central Europe. Moreover, Canada's future peace and prosperity is intertwined with the peace and prosperity of Europe. As a consequence, Canada is deeply involved in the affairs of Europe through our participation in NATO, the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and other multilateral forums, as well as our strong bilateral ties in both Eastern and Western Europe.

As a nation with broad political, economic, and security interests in Europe, we need to build on our traditional relations and to influence the evolution of Europe in ways conducive to our interests. This means, especially, expanding our political, social, economic, and commercial relations with the countries of this region. We must also seek both bilateral and multilateral links with the region. One key vehicle for this will be the EBRD.

From a commercial perspective, economic liberalization in Eastern and Central Europe will generate increasing trade and investment opportunities for all, including Canadian business. The Bank itself will assist Canadians to be aware of and to finance business with Central and Eastern European countries.

The bank is loosely modelled on the existing regional development banks in Latin America, Asia, Africa, and the Caribbean. However, unlike these banks, the EBRD has a distinctive political mandate. It will support the transition to market-based economies through the particular encouragement of private enterprise in those countries of Central and Eastern Europe adopting both political and economic reforms. The contracting parties of the EBRD have used the Articles of Agreement to state their commitment to democracy, to the rule of law, to respect for human rights, and to market economics. I would refer my colleagues to the preamble to the Articles of Agreement, which is Schedule 2 of the proposed legislation.

The bank is to be European in character, but broadly international in membership. Its membership will include the 12 member states of the European Community, the European Economic Commission, the European Investment Bank, the countries of Central and Eastern Europe, including the U.S.S.R., and other European and non-European countries that are also members of the International Monetary Fund. A list of signatories who intend to become members is included in the annexes to the Articles of Agreement.

The main objective of the bank is to promote the development of the private sector by focusing on those countries undergoing economic liberalization and democratization. To do so, it will need to coordinate its work closely with existing institutions such as the International Monetary Fund and World Bank. In order to establish a mechanism for selecting those countries eligible to borrow, and to ward against possible backsliding on reforms, the Articles of Agreement provide for an annual review of the bank's lending strategy in each borrowing country. This review, which was proposed by Canada during the negotiations, should ensure that only those countries consistently applying the principles of democracy, pluralism, and market economics continue to be eligible for borrowing.

The bank's central task is to build a vibrant private sector in countries that have been dominated for the past 45 years by inefficient state planning and almost total state ownership. The articles specify that at least 60 per cent of bank funding will be targeted toward lending and equity participation in private sector enterprises. Lending to the public sector will be aimed at assisting in the transition toward greater competitiveness and eventual possible privatization of public sector firms. There may also be limited lending for infrastructure projects required to support the free market economy.

I would also note that, for the first time in the Articles of Agreement of any such international institution, direct reference has been made to the bank's role in promoting environmentally sound and sustainable development. The Government of Canada attaches special importance to this element of the European Bank's objectives.

Honourable senators, the initial capital base of the bank will be 10 billion European currency units, or approximately $16 billion Canadian. Of that amount, 30 per cent must be actually "paid-in", or deposited by members with the bank. The remaining capital is "callable"—that is, capital that is not paid-in, but for which the members are liable should the bank encounter financial difficulty.

As in the case of the other development banks, the EBRD will be able to borrow further funds in capital markets at attractive rates of interest on the basis of the callable capital in convertible currency of its most creditworthy members. This will enable the bank to lend almost triple the level of funds represented by its paid-in capital. Thus, the establishment of this bank will create a multiplier effect. Every dollar that member governments provide to the institution will catalyze an additional $2 in investment capital for Central and Eastern Europe.

All powers of the bank are to be vested in the Board of Governors, which, in turn, will delegate responsibility for the bank's management and policy development to the Board of Directors. The Minister of Finance will be the Canadian Governor for the EBRD. Canada will have one of 23 seats on the board of the bank.

Canada was present at all the negotiating sessions for the EBRD, and has been an active participant in the key political, financial, and technical discussions to ensure that Canadian interests are fully represented. Based on the negotiations among the 42 founding signatories to the Articles of Agreement, it is proposed that Canada initially purchase a share of 3.4 per cent of the capital of the bank, making us the eighth largest shareholder.

Canada has elected to pay its subscription during this initial period of capitalization in U.S. dollars, just as we make subscription payments to the other development banks, such as the World Bank, in U.S. dollars. A share of 3.4 per cent would entail a paid-in investment not exceeding $120 million U.S. in respect to Canada's initial subscription of shares. The total callable portion of our share would be up to $280 million U.S. Thus, Canada's total financial commitment—actual and potential—to Central and Eastern Europe through the EBRD will be some $400 million U.S., or approximately $460 million Canadian at current exchange rates. Support of this magnitude is a powerful indication of the government's commitment to political and economic change in eastern Europe.

Although the EBRD will only become operational once the process of ratification by members is completed, there are clear indications that the international business community is eager to cooperate with the bank in developing a vibrant sector in Eastern Europe. Within Canada, strong interest has already been shown by bankers, business people, the legal community, academics and many others.

I am confident that Canadians will use the resources of the EBRD to seek out a range of business opportunities in support of the economic transformation of Eastern Europe.

Honourable senators, the shares that we are proposing to purchase in the EBRD are an investment not just in the narrow accounting sense, but, in a much broader sense, an investment in democracy and pluralism, an investment in economic freedom; above all, an investment in the people of Central and Eastern Europe. We are establishing an institution that will build productive assets and let the people of Central and Eastern Europe help themselves to grow and prosper.

Honourable senators, I must emphasize that for Canada to be a founding member of the bank, the legislation allowing for the communication to the bank of our ratification of the agreement must be in place as soon as possible. I ask my colleagues in the Senate to give timely consideration and passage to this bill. I would suggest that, should it pass second reading, it should be referred to one of the standing committees of the Senate. I think the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs might be the appropriate committee, but certainly Banking, Trade and Commerce would also be entirely acceptable.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as far as I am aware, there is no objection to this bill receiving second reading. I would prefer to adjourn the debate in the name of the chairman of whichever committee Senator Doody chooses. I agree with him. From listening to his comments, it appears to be a flip of the coin as to which committee, but I think he favours Foreign Affairs.

I repeat that I know of no objection to the bill. Therefore, I do not want to see it held up unduly. If it would not be unduly held up by my adjourning the debate until Tuesday in the name of Senator Stewart, the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, then I do so. I take it from Senator Doody's reaction that that is satisfactory.

Senator Doody: Yes. That is agreed.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Stewart, debate adjourned.

THE HONOURABLE GUY CHARBONNEAU

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn:
> That the privileges of Honourable Senators having being constantly abused by the Speaker of the Senate, the Senate do advise the Prime Minister that Senator Guy Charbonneau is unfit to continue to be the Speaker of the Senate.—(Honourable Senator Kirby).

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I rise today to make a few remarks in support of the motion by Senator Stanbury, seconded by Senator Fairbairn:

> That the privileges of Honourable Senators having been constantly abused by the Speaker of the Senate, the Senate do advise the Prime Minister that Senator Guy Charbonneau is unfit to continue to be the Speaker of the Senate.

I should like to make two broad points in my remarks. First, I should like to examine the reasons for this motion. Second, I should like to examine the consequences of the Speaker's actions during the GST debate in this chamber last fall. But before I proceed to either of these points, I should like to make one or two remarks that I think are relevant to the history of debate on Bill C-62 and the way in which that bill was treated by the Senate.

As many of you know—I say "many of you" rather than all of you since a significant number of senators have appeared in this chamber since the summer—hearings on Bill C-62 began in Ottawa last May. At the time when the hearings began it was the view of many senators on our side that, while the bill was not a perfect piece of legislation and would require perhaps some amendment, there was certainly no intention by the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to proceed to defeat the bill when the hearings began.

Although that point may be disputed by some members opposite, I cannot resist pointing out that there were a number of private conversations, including conversations between myself and several members opposite, where it was clearly explained that one of the purposes of the hearings was to find out what changes needed to be made in the bill in order to make it a better piece of legislation, rather than conduct a series of perfunctory hearings and then kill the bill. In fact, it was precisely because we wanted to find out how to improve the bill that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee went across the country throughout July and most of August holding hearings in 12 cities—one in every province and one in each of the territories. It was precisely because we wanted to find out how to improve the bill that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee heard 370 witnesses on the bill.

What happened to the Liberal members of that committee during these hearings was that, frankly, we were absolutely overwhelmed and staggered by the depth and breadth of the opposition that existed in the country to Bill C-62. It was only after listening to all the witnesses for those many weeks all summer that we decided that the bill was so bad and would require such a massive number of amendments that the only realistic way to deal with the bill was to vote to defeat it.

In our view, to fail to recommend that to the Senate would have made a complete sham out of the entire series of hearings held all summer. We did not want to be in the position in which committees of the other place had been during, for example, the Meech Lake hearings or the House of Commons Finance Committee hearings on Bill C-62 in which, during most of those sets of hearings, no matter how much criticism was voiced on a particular proposal—in one case Meech Lake; in the other Bill C-62—the position that the government took was that absolutely not a word—or, to use the Prime Minister's favourite phrase, not a comma— could be changed. Our view was that, having heard the witnesses and having heard the evidence this past summer, it was important that we should try to reflect, in our committee report and in the actions of this place, what we had heard. We were not prepared simply to ignore, as were members opposite, everything that we had heard this past summer. It was as a result of those hearings that we decided to kill Bill C-62, or to recommend to this chamber that Bill C-62 not to be read a third time.

That background is important, because it has frequently been among members opposite that the decision to kill Bill C-62 was made long before the bill ever got here. It is a fact that the Senate Liberal caucus only considered what our action would be on Bill C-62 in the days following Labour Day. In fact, our position was born out of what the Canadian public wanted as opposed to some preconceived notion.

As a result of our position, we had the bizarre situation, during those first few days following September 24, in which members opposite conducted a filibuster on their own bill. It seems to have been forgotten that as the fall unfolded the notion of a filibuster was an acceptable proposition in those early days when it was being carried out by members of the government. They were carrying out that filibuster precisely because the Prime Minister needed time to appoint the British eight. He needed time to pack the Senate. What they were doing was simply filibustering their own bill in order to give the Prime Minister time to do that.

What we did not understand on this side—and I concede that in retrospect we were incredibly naive—is that not only was the Prime Minister going to appoint eight extra senators, thereby ensuring he had an adequate number of votes, but that the government was absolutely confident that even if the eight were not sufficient to solve its problems, the Speaker was absolutely in the Prime Minister's pocket. He would do whatever he had to do within the rules, or outside the rules, legal or illegal, in order to ensure that the bill passed.

The fact that the government was so totally confident of this can be seen by the interview which the Minister of Finance, the Honourable Michael Wilson, gave to Mike Duffy very early in October after the British eight had been appointed. During the course of the interview the minister was asked, "What would happen if the Liberal senators were to conduct a very long filibuster?" The minister's response was, "Don't worry about it, we have a plan. We are absolutely 100 per cent confident that we will get the bill through." The naiveté on our side stemmed from the fact that we assumed that they would try to get the bill through using the rules rather than the Speaker as the means of forcing it through.

I would like to take a moment to review the actions of the Speaker which led members on this side to move ultimately the censure motion. There were five things which the Speaker did which we argue—and I think any unbiased reading of the rules would cause one to argue—were completely outside the rules. The first was that on September 27 the Senate was in session and the bells were ringing summoning senators to a vote. Without the consent of the Senate the Speaker stopped the bells, locked the doors for the weekend and proceeded to act in a manner and using authority which the rules clearly do not give him. One can argue that was relatively minor. One can even argue that it made sense. After all, why let the bells ring all weekend? What we on our side failed to pick up was that however minor that particular transgression was, it merely foreshadowed what was to come in the weeks and months ahead.

On October 4 we were in a situation in which, once again, the Senate was in session and, once again, the bells were ringing summoning senators for a vote. While the bells were ringing, the Speaker sent out a letter at 5.10 in the afternoon in which he stated that he would call the vote for 5.30. It is an amazing coincidence that the Conservative caucus was meeting at 5 p.m., and that they were all in one place just down the hall. I will comment on this more in a moment since one of our independent senators corroborates what we thought happened.

The Liberals, not having been given the advance notice which very certainly the Conservatives were given, were scattered all over Parliament Hill. In fact, some were on their way to the airport while others were in local hotels. We were left in a situation in which the Speaker, first, decided to do something which the rules make it clear he has no power to do. Second, he proceeded to do it in a time and in a manner which ensured that the benefit of his decision would accrue directly to the government, and which could clearly not be used effectively by members of the Opposition.

Senator Frith: In fact, to their prejudice.

Senator Kirby: That is right. As many of us know, Senator Pitfield ended up voting with the government on Bill C-62. Yet, on October 9, he stood up in this chamber and made the following comments which are reported at pages 2426 and 2427 of the Debates of the Senate. He stated at that time:

> I now feel that the situation was born in an atmosphere of collusion between the Chair and the government. That is confirmed on the perfect voting record which the government was able to come up with . . .

That was only a few minutes after the Speaker's letter arrived. Senator Pitfield stated that not only was there a question of collusion, there was also a question of a biased, prejudiced act by the Speaker. He concluded by stating:

> . . . one must conclude that we are possessed of a Speaker who is prepared . . . to act according to his own biases against a private senator and an independent senator. In that case, Mr. Speaker and honourable senators, there is no alternative but to ask that the Speaker resign.

I quote those remarks because it seems to me that here is the view of an independent senator. He was in favour of the GST. He clearly felt that, as a result of the events of October 4 in which the Speaker proceeded to call a vote and to shut off the bells when he had no authority for doing so, the Speaker must resign.

One of the things that was absolutely remarkable about that event upon which I must comment almost parenthetically, is that in addition to doing what he did the Speaker also clearly does not know how to read the clock. The fact of the matter is that he held the vote at 5.25 as opposed to 5.30 as was stated in his letter. That proves to me that he not only broke the rules of the Senate by stating that he was going to hold the vote at 5.30, he also broke his own rule by holding the vote at 5.25.

The third incident involving the Speaker occurred on October 30 when, under the rules, members on this side were reading petitions, something which we are allowed by the rules to do. The Speaker interrupted the Liberal senator who had the floor to give the floor to Senator Doody. Senator Doody proceeded to read a petition which contained, interestingly enough—and I cannot resist making the observation—only three names. They are perhaps the only three people in Canada, other than the 53 members opposite, who were in favour of the GST. Moreover, those three names were those of three of Senator Murray's staff. That gave those of us on this side of the chamber the sense that not only could they not find people who were genuinely in favour of the GST, but that an aura of keystone cops and buffoonery, in terms of the way the other side was proceeding to handle the debate, was created.

What happened as a result was that the Speaker, after having incorrectly recognized Senator Doody, let Senator Doody insert a motion at the end of his petition stating that the Orders of the Day be now read. Having recognized that motion, the lengthy reading of petitions came to an end. Once again, we on this side were left in a position in which the biased actions of the Speaker prevented us from using legitimate tactics to delay the final vote on Bill C-62.

On November 21 Senator Waters very carefully advised the Speaker that after the vote on the final Liberal amendments which had been put forward according to the provisional rules, he would be on his feet to move a further amendment. It is worth emphasizing at this point that none of the independent senators at that point in time had moved any amendments. The only amendments that had been moved at that time had been moved by Liberals.

Senator Waters reiterated his intentions twice in this chamber. Yet, when he rose after the vote on the last Liberal amendment, he was not recognized by the Speaker. Instead, the Speaker waited until Senator Murray had risen, recognizing that his partner in crime was using the strategy they had plotted days before. The minute Senator Murray rose, and because Senator Waters was on his feet, Senator Molgat moved, correctly in our view under rule 26, that Senator Waters be heard.

Let me remind senators that rule 26 says:

> When two or more senators rise to speak, the Speaker shall call upon the senator who in the Speaker's opinion first rose; but a motion may be made that any senator who has risen "be now heard" or "do now speak".

Before the Speaker could break the rule, Senator Frith rose and said that it was six o'clock. As a matter of fact, it was 6.15. The rules clearly indicate that the Speaker must then leave the Chair and the chamber. Therefore, Senator Murray's motion was never on the floor. Furthermore, if it had been on the floor, it would have been out of order, because the Speaker had not yet called Orders of the Day, as is required under provisional Rule P-3.

When the Speaker ignored the provisional rules and ignored Senator Frith's call of six o'clock, a dispute erupted on the floor of the chamber and there was some milling around the Speaker's Chair. The Speaker was asked directly by several of the Liberal senators why it was that he was not prepared to allow debate under rule 26, a debate as to which senator should be heard. The Speaker suggested he could not possibly allow that debate because Liberal senators would carry on for two or three weeks. He made that remark twice in the course of the activity on the floor of the Senate in front of his Chair. That was heard by several members of the press who were in the gallery. We then said to him, "You are the Speaker. What business is it of yours if we manage to use that particular rule and that particular debate to carry on for another two or three weeks? Surely that is none of your business. That is not your issue." Nowhere in the rules does it says that a concern of the Speaker ought to be how long a particular debate takes.

It was very clear that this Speaker was prepared to do anything to enable the government to meet its timetable, whether or not the rules allowed.

The fifth and final breach of the rules by Senator Charbonneau followed shortly thereafter. Rules 27 and 28 state that each senator may speak once on each motion before the Senate. It is also clear from a reading of the rule book that there is no rule which restricts the length of those speeches. Nevertheless, undaunted by the rule book, which states that every one of us is entitled to speak on every motion and does not put any limitation on how long we can speak, the Speaker, in collusion with our friends opposite, accepted a motion to limit debate.

Those five events were spread over a period of two months. These events occurred when those of us on this side were attempting to use the rules—admittedly very creatively but, also admittedly, extremely effectively—to achieve the outcome we wanted from that debate. In spite of the fact that we continued to abide by the rules, including the provisional rules, the Speaker decided to take matters into his own hands and proceeded to achieve the government's political objectives.

On November 22, the day after the Speaker did what I call the fourth transgression, which was when he refused to allow debate on the motion that Senator Waters be now heard under rule 26, four senators—Senators Stanbury, Fairbairn, Lefebvre and myself—went to the Speaker's chamber. We did so because we hoped that the remainder of the third reading debate would proceed in an orderly fashion. We wanted to be crystal clear that we understood the rules under which the Speaker was operating.

As other senators have said—notably Senator Fairbairn and Senator Stanbury—the four of us were astounded by several things. The first was Senator Charbonneau's complete and utter lack of understanding of the rules. He commented that he really was not familiar with the rules. He conceded that there was no question that each senator had the right to speak on the debate. He also conceded that there was nothing in the rules to limit debate. At the same time, he said that he was very concerned—he was clearly worried and fretting—about the fact that, if this debate continued to go on for some time, rebate cheques would not get out; Canadians would not get their cheques before Christmas, which the government had promised them under Bill C-62. He understood that issue, even though it was obvious from his comments that he did not really understand the rules.

On hearing that, our reaction was the same as it was when he told us that he could not allow a debate under rule 26 to hear Senator Waters because the debate would go on for a very long period of time—two or three weeks. At that meeting in his office we said to him, "You are the Speaker. You should not be concerned about the fact that a third reading filibuster might make it impossible for the government to achieve its desired end of getting the cheques out before Christmas." We argued that his responsibility, as the responsibility of the Speaker in any chamber, was to ensure that the privileges of the minority party were protected and that the rules were obeyed. Yet, as we pressed him on whether or not he would allow all of us to speak at least once, it became clear that he was prepared to take that privilege away from us and not protect the right of the minority if that was what was required to get Bill C-62 passed before Christmas.

[Senator Kirby.]

Senator Charbonneau at the meeting told us that, even though we had the right to speak, and even though there were no rules to limit the length of our speeches, he would have to consider arguments from others, as he put it—from the other side—who might have ideas on how to bring the debate under control.

We reported back to Senator MacEachen that it was clear that the Speaker had in mind that the government would move, within the next day or two, to introduce a motion to limit debate. Even though the Speaker conceded that such a motion was outside the rules, he was prepared to take away the right of every senator in this chamber to speak on the motion. We reported back that the fix was already in, in spite of the fact that the Speaker kept saying to us in obscure terms that "Well, of course, someone might try to move such a motion to limit debate." He virtually gave us the motion verbatim in the course of our discussion. It was very clear from listening to him what the strategy was, that it had already been worked out and that he was part of the fix. There was no question about that.

What we had attempted to do was to conduct a filibuster using the rules, recognizing that filibusters always are frustrating for governments and recognizing, however, that in a situation in which the government side has a majority of votes, clearly one of the few remaining weapons which an opposition party has at its command is, the weapon of time, the weapon of using a filibuster in the hope that eventually, while the issue will come to a vote, political and public pressure will build on the government to make a change.

I might add parenthetically that the first filibuster I was ever even peripherally involved in was in Nova Scotia during the winter of 1969 when, in fact, the Liberal Opposition conducted a very lengthy and vigorous filibuster over what was also a tax increase—a sales tax increase. In that debate, the speaker allowed the debate to continue until the Liberal Opposition—small as it was—had, in fact, spoken for as long as it possibly could. There was no attempt by the Speaker in that particular instance to cut off debate.

When one looks at the writings of academic authorities on the role of the Speaker and on the role of the Senate in terms of conducting filibusters, it is worth noting one particular quote from Professor F. A. Kuntz who wrote a book called "The Modern Senate of Canada" in which he says the following:

> The Senate contrives to run its debates without the need of a presiding officer in the traditional sense. More important still is the lack of any provision for closure, with the result that there is no formal restriction on the right of any Senator to speak at any length in any debate.

> In the case of difference between Senators the matter will be discussed by the House,..

Honourable senators, that is exactly what we tried to do. We tried to use Rule 26 to recognize Senator Waters. Professor Kuntz goes on to say:

> . . . with the Speaker having no more authority than any other Senator. The fact is that the Speaker is not supposed to intervene, even if a rule is broken, unless a member calls his attention to the breach.

That description of the role of the Speaker in "The Modern Senate of Canada", flies absolutely in the face of everything Senator Charbonneau did during the debate on Bill C-62. It is precisely because the Speaker continued to intervene "constantly" as the resolution says, that we on this side of the chamber feel that he must be replaced. He clearly and deliberately broke the rules on five separate occasions and, indeed, our suspicion is that he will continue to do so on any occasion in the future as long as he is in the Chair, should his use of that power be required in order for the government to achieve its political objectives. It is the Speaker's hijacking of the Senate in order to achieve the government's political objectives, in order to enable the government to fulfil its political agenda, that has led those of us on this side to conclude that, in fact, the Speaker must be changed.

The other point I should make in considering this question, it seems to me, is that what makes his actions and, indeed, the actions of the government members opposite, particularly reprehensible, is their absolute refusal to change the rules legitimately. I would refer to Senator MacEachen's very careful remarks on this motion which are found at page 4807 of the Debates of the Senate of December 11. There he gives a very good description of how Prime Minister Borden invoked closure on the naval bill back in 1911. He points out exactly what the Prime Minister of the day did, which was to introduce a motion to change the rules. There was then a very lengthy debate on that motion to change the rules. The government had a majority and the government majority carried. In effect, what the change in the rules did was to introduce a form of closure. The government then proceeded to invoke closure under the new set of rules, and that, in effect, is how the naval bill ultimately passed.

What was unbelievable to us about the way the government handled this issue was that it could easily, at any time between October 5 and October 8, when it had the eight extra votes, have introduced a motion to change the rules to introduce a form of closure under the rules, to establish a closure procedure in our rule book. That certainly may have taken four or five weeks, but then a closure system would have existed and the government could then have proceeded to invoke that new rule to achieve its desired end. The government members absolutely refused to do that. What they did instead was to ensure themselves of a totally captive Speaker who would be prepared to act as their hitman whenever they needed him. They eventually got their way even though they achieved it in what amounted to a corrupt manner rather than in an upfront, straightforward manner by first changing the rules.

Finally, honourable senators, I feel there has been a tendency, since we resumed after the Christmas break, for some members opposite to fail to understand what I think are two very serious consequences of the Speaker's actions.

The first is that the Speaker has done irreparable harm to the image of the Senate, to the credibility of Senate committees, in the eyes of the public. At the outset of my remarks, when I said that we had travelled across the country listening to nearly 400 witnesses, what I did not say was that at the end of each day of hearings we allowed people who were not scheduled witnesses to speak to us for five minutes. Some people waited 12 and 13 hours to address our committee for 5 minutes. They had to miss a day at work and sit inside a cramped, hot, stuffy room, in many cases, and they did that because they wanted to express their views in this five-minute interval, to express their concerns about a tax which they saw as regressive and unfair. Moreover, as witness after witness told us, they saw the Senate as their last hope on this issue. They felt that this was the last time they could address their parliamentarians, their senators and thus have a real say in how they should be governed, have a real say in this issue and, in turn, give their last input before the final government decision was taken.

I would read you one example of the kind of comments we heard in those five-minute "walk-on" sessions at the end of the day. Donna Peconi from Peterborough came to Toronto to appear before the committee. She listened to the debate in Toronto and she stood up at the end of one of our long days in Toronto and said the following:

> We realize that you as appointees are being asked to override the elected body . . . What you must consider is the dilemma created when there exists a majority in the House of Commons and the House refuses to listen to the majority of its constituents.
> In our system of government, the line between democracy and dictatorship would almost be indistinguishable but for the Senate. The buck stops right here.
> The people have never called on you as they are calling on you now. The House of Commons did not have a mandate to introduce, much less pass, Bill C-62.
> When this bill was introduced, a majority of the Canadian people rose up in vehement opposition. We have not gone away. We do not want the Bill. We do not feel we need it. We have suggested alternatives to it.

By taking the actions he did, the Speaker is telling people like Donna Peconi, and others who spoke for five minutes in the cities across the country—people like Lawrence Pitaro of Halifax, Erwin Joseph Gordon of Toronto, Edwin Agnew of Winnipeg, Murray Carr of Regina, Mary Ellen Reiman of Edmonton and Brian Calder of Vancouver, to name just a few, as well as the dozens of others that appeared before us—that their views do not matter. He is saying to these people, "We were really fooling you. We are not prepared in this chamber to give you a fair hearing and to allow the chamber to be a legitimate voice of sober second thought. Your views do not matter because I am the Speaker." Senator Charbonneau is, in effect, saying, "I am the Speaker and if Brian Mulroney, the Prime Minister, wants it, he is going to get what he wants entirely independent of how you feel."

The result of that, it seems to me, is that there has been a significant loss of credibility in any Senate committee hearing. I ask you why anyone, under those circumstances, would ever again bother to testify before a Senate committee? If, in fact, the evidence is crystal clear that, even though 96 or 97 per cent of the witnesses make one argument, the Speaker can take the position that it does not matter what anyone else thinks because, "if the government wants something, it is going to get it," then why would anyone bother to take the time and trouble to appear before a Senate committee in the future?

Senator Frith: Let alone wait around for 12 hours.

Senator Kirby: Let alone wait around for 12 hours. It seems to me that that is a very serious and long-lasting consequence of what the Speaker did.

The second consequence, it seems to me, is what he has done to both the atmosphere in this chamber and to the way in which members on this side of the house will feel compelled to treat future issues as long as Senator Charbonneau is in the Chair. In spite of perceptions, the fact is that since 1984 this chamber has passed approximately 95 per cent of all government bills without amendment—and let me remind the 24 new members opposite that we passed that 95 per cent of government bills even when we on this side had a majority in this chamber; so we were not worried about being outvoted. That is not why they passed. They passed because we believed that it was our responsibility to pass them.

Senator Frith: And we never lost a vote.

Senator Kirby: That is right. When we did that, we did it by abiding by both the rules and, indeed, the conventions of this place. I ask you: What conclusion can we draw from the events of last fall? What conclusion can we draw when we are now in the position where we know that, entirely independent of what the rules say, the Speaker will change the rules any time he wants in order to achieve the government's political objectives? We also know—and I say this with considerable regret, since previous dealings with Senator Murray had been very straightforward—that it is enormously unfortunate that Senator Murray would agree on October 18 to a set of provisional rules, would say in his statement to this house on October 18, referring to the provisional rules, "There are provisions that protect the right of the minority to employ the legitimate parliamentary tactic of delay," and would then break them. We took Senator Murray at face value. We passed the legislation he wanted passed in early October. We did that on the understanding that those provisional rules would apply and would give us all kinds of room to filibuster and to use the legitimate parliamentary tactic of delay, as Senator Murray called it. We believed that, in fact, we then had in place a new set of rules and that the government and the Speaker would stick to them. Obviously, we were wrong. We made a mistake; we took Senator Murray at his word. That clearly will not happen again.

It is also very clear that members on this side will never again accept the notion that the Speaker will allow us to continue to use the rules in the way they are written down, and that we must go into any controversial debate now on the assumption that, as long as Senator Charbonneau is the Speaker, he will do whatever he can to achieve the government's political objectives. I simply say to all members of this chamber that it seems to me that that kind of atmosphere—which is the atmosphere that exists and will exist as long as Senator Charbonneau is in the Chair—is not good for this institution, not good for Canada and not good for the people of the country.

So, it seems to me that we are really at the point at which the Speaker, having done his deed for the government, having played his role as judge, jury and executioner, should have the decency to resign and restore some level of cooperation and understanding between the two sides in this chamber. I honestly believed, honourable senators, that when we came back after Christmas there would, in fact, be a new Speaker in the Chair. I obviously realize now that this was once again wonderfully naive and stupid, but I honestly believed that Senator Charbonneau would have realized what he had done and would have had sufficient sense of honour and decency to have resigned over Christmas. I was wonderfully naive about the man and his style.

Faced with this intransigence on his part with respect to resignation, and faced with the fact that it will be very difficult to operate this place as long as we assume that the Speaker is going to break the rules—which, therefore, means that guerilla warfare is the name of the game—it will be difficult for this chamber to continue as it has since its inception. Therefore, in order to restore not only our confidence but the confidence of all Canadians in the Senate, we must have a new Speaker. We must have a Speaker who is, in fact, loyal not only to the Prime Minister but to the Senate. It will be impossible to achieve that sense of loyalty or to restore an appropriate sense of decorum to this chamber unless we have a new Speaker.

In concluding my comments, there is one last point which I think is worth making. I have commented on the Speaker and on the government's actions in the course of this debate. I think it is also appropriate that I make just one short comment on the performance of the members on this side of the house in this debate. Although we were outnumbered, every day of the week, in some cases seven days a week, the fact of the matter is that we clearly countered successfully every move that the government made—except for those moves made by the Speaker, and there is no way to counter his activities. The fact is that members opposite were clearly beaten in spirit, in performance, in dedication and in commitment by the performance of my colleagues on this side of the house. I must say that anyone who thinks that we are incapable of generating that spirit of commitment and dedication to a cause we exhibited in the fall, or who thinks that we can only do that once, should think again. I say that because I know that the sort of gritty, gutsy performance that we exhibited, in defense of a cause that we believed in, is something we are prepared to do again. In fact, as long as Senator Charbonneau is the Speaker, he will invite us to do it again, because we will know that, as the debate proceeds, there is absolutely no way we can trust what he is likely to do.

In conclusion, honourable senators, we can no longer have an atmosphere such as this if, in fact, this chamber is to operate in the way it has done historically. For the reasons I have outlined, Senator Charbonneau's actions during the fall make it imperative that his position be changed. More importantly, his implications on the way this place is going to operate in the future make it in the interest of everyone on both sides of the house that Senator Charbonneau either resign or be fired. In any event, we must have a new Speaker. In the absence of that, it will be an absolute certainty that this chamber will not operate in the way it has done historically, which is not good for us as a chamber and as an institution; it is not good for the Parliament of Canada, and it is not good for the people of Canada.

It is for those reasons, honourable senators, that I intend to support strongly the motion of Senator Stanbury and Senator Fairbairn, and why I would urge all members of the chamber to do the same.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator MacDonald (Halifax), debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON AMENDING FORMULAE—MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT—DIVISIONS DEFERRED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consult broadly with Canadians and inquire into and report upon the process for amending the Constitution of Canada, including, where appropriate, proposals for amending one or more of the amending formulae, with particular reference to:

(i) the role of the Canadian public in the process;

(ii) the effectiveness of the existing process and formulae for securing constitutional amendments; and

(iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including those set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada";

That twelve Members of the House of Commons and five Members of the Senate be the Members of the Special Joint Committee, such Members on the part of the Senate to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion;

That the Committee have the power to appoint from among its Members such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee, or a sub-committee, have power to travel, and hold public hearings, within Canada;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings or of proceedings of its sub-committees, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons;

That the parties represented on the Committee be granted allocations for expert assistance with the Committee work in proportion to the representation of the said parties in the House of Commons;

That the Committee be empowered to retain the service of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Joint Chairmen;

That the Committee submit its report not later than July 1, 1991, provided that, if the Senate is not then sitting, the report will be deemed submitted on the day such report is deposited with the Clerk of the House of Commons and with the Clerk of the Senate;

That changes in membership of the Committee for Members of the House of Commons be effective immediately after notification thereof, signed by the Member acting as Chief Whip of any recognized party, has been filed with the Clerk of the Committee;

That the quorum of the Committee be nine Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken so long as both Houses are represented, and the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six Members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly,

And on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that the motion be amended by deleting the fourth paragraph thereof and substituting the following therefor:

iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including an amending formula based on regional representation, as proposed in the 1971 Victoria Charter; and a formula based on seven provinces representing

50 per cent of the population, with a clause added stipulating that Quebec must be one of the seven provinces; and the alternatives set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada".—(Honourable Senator Watt).

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I have been in touch with Senator Watt, who is unavoidably absent from the Senate today. He has asked me to move an amendment to this motion on his behalf. Senator Watt may want to provide some background on this when he returns. But I will say that honourable senators are generally familiar with the interests of the Aboriginal Peoples, the amending process of the Constitution and any constitutional matters that have been dealt with in the last several years.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Len Marchand: I move, seconded by Senator Adams:

That the motion be amended by adding the following immediately after Roman Numeral (iii):

"(iv) the role of the Aboriginal Peoples of Canada and alternatives to current process and formulae for entrenching their rights in the Constitution of Canada."

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I am advised that we should deal with Senator MacEachen's motion first, and we will then hear Senator Marchand's motion.

Senator Marchand: I do not know what is going on.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I have just informed the senator that I was advised that we should deal with Senator MacEachen's motion first before hearing Senator Marchand's motion.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, if that is the case, I should inform the Senate that there was a discussion between the two sides today, and we have agreed that the vote on that motion will be held on Wednesday next. I would then suggest that the Honourable Senator Marchand proceed, with leave, and we can then keep our agreement on that matter.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Phillips. There was a discussion earlier today. We agreed that a vote would be held on Wednesday. We will give leave to let Senator Marchand's motion be put.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Did you want to speak to the matter?

Senator Marchand: I have nothing to say about the motion, although I have some background notes for myself. Perhaps at some point Senator Watt might want to put something further on the record; but as far as I am concerned the amendment speaks for itself. It sets out the fact that our people, the Aboriginal Peoples of Canada, want to be involved in the amending process as it is going forward. I gave the wording to the Speaker. That is all I have to put forward.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I owe it to you to explain briefly why the government does not accept this amendment. The reasons are similar to those we invoked earlier with regard to other amendments to this resolution.

The government has tried to give the committee the broadest possible mandate to consider the amending process and possible changes to it, especially including the whole question of public participation. We have tried not to indicate a preference for any particular changes, nor to direct the committee to concentrate on any one aspect of the problem. Honourable senators will be aware that I took part in the aboriginal constitutional round that led to the First Ministers' Conference on Aboriginal and Constitutional Affairs in 1987. The representatives of the Aboriginal Peoples were at the table for all the ministerial meetings that led up to the First Ministers' Conference and at the First Ministers' Conference itself. They were there because of an amendment to the Constitution that was made during the 1982 process. They took full part in those discussions.

My honourable friend has heard me say on a previous occasion that, in my judgment, the 1987 First Ministers' Conference on Aboriginal and Constitutional Affairs did not fail because the amending formula under which we sought to make a self-government amendment was too stringent. The conference did not fail because the 7 and 50 formula was too high a hurdle. The conference failed because there was a lack of political will on both sides of the table—what I have described on a previous occasion as a mutually reinforcing intransigence from which I exclude neither certain provinces nor certain aboriginal leaders. That is why it failed.

The federal government's proposal for a self-government amendment had more support than any other proposal on the table. It had the support, as I recall, of the provinces of Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. The others in varying degrees were opposed to the federal government's proposal, and, of course, Quebec, for reasons we all know, was not at the table.

I draw the honourable senator's attention to the fact that the Aboriginal Peoples are specifically mentioned in the discussion paper that we tabled some weeks ago amending the Constitution of Canada and that the committee has the mandate to consider the participation of aboriginal peoples in the amending process and in considering alternatives to the current process and formula. As I have said with regard to previous amendments, the amendment is not really necessary, nor is it desirable, because it tends to express a preference, in some cases, on the part of Parliament for a particular formula or formulae or a direction to concentrate on one particular aspect. I can only assure honourable senators that the matters to which Senator Marchand refers are and will be fully within the scope of the joint committee under the mandate contained in the resolution I presented.

[Translation]

I already explained on December 21 why the government feels it is essential to consult Canadians on the constitutional amending process established in 1982.

You will recall that this process was agreed to by all Premiers, with the exception of the Premier of Quebec, on November 5, 1981, as part of the patriation package.

That package was subsequently approved by the House of Commons on December 2 that same year and by the Senate on December 8, without public consultation.

The Meech Lake debate was the first time Canadians had a chance to examine critically the amending process agreed to in November 1981 and approved in November 1982. The process was found to be defective in many ways.

As far as that process and potential improvements are concerned, I think we should be honest about the past, try to overcome the obstacles resulting from decisions made at that time and work together to seek better solutions.

I don't think it would be very useful to engage in an exercise of historical revisionism and try to rewrite the past.

[English]

I must say that that tendency to historical revisionism, to rewrite the past, was very present—indeed, predominant—in the speech that the Leader of the Opposition made when I presented the resolution just before Christmas.

[Translation]

The honourable senator claimed that in 1988, he and his colleagues supported the objective of achieving Quebec's assent to the Constitution and that they did not intend to strike down the accord.

He and his party colleagues introduced amendments that would have made the Senate's constitutional resolution incompatible with the one already approved by the Commons and three provincial legislatures before a vote was taken in the Senate.

[English]

These amendments, proposed by the Opposition at the time, made it incompatible with the resolution already adopted and would have required the reopening of the whole debate, with consequences that the Leader of the Opposition—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It was adopted where?

Senator Murray: They were already adopted by the House of Commons and three provincial legislative assemblies. The reopening of that debate would have had consequences that the honourable senator is only now beginning to comprehend.

In short, the Senate, or the Liberal senators, attempted to veto the accord. Honourable senators will recall that parliamentary approval of the Meech Lake Accord was only achieved when the House of Commons adopted it a second time, without amendment, on June 22, 1988, thereby breaking the Senate's suspensive veto of six months. Senator MacEachen was correct in saying that the Liberals in the House of Commons voted for the resolution unamended when the second vote was held. He was also correct in stating that the Leader of the Liberal Party at that time, Mr. Turner, staked his political future on that, because he stood 100 per cent behind the unamended Meech Lake Accord. It is clear for the record, however, that the honourable senator did not stand 100 per cent behind the unamended Meech Lake Accord, nor did he stand 100 per cent behind his leader.

[Translation]

In fact, there is no indication that the honourable senator tried to persuade his friends Premier Wells and Mrs. Carstairs that it was advisable to adopt the Meech Lake Accord.

I suggest that we start these discussions on the amending process on an honest note.

[English]

There was one other matter that I cannot let go without comment, and that was the honourable senator's statement on December 21, and I quote:

> The truth of the matter is that wherever he went, Mr. Chrétien expressed support for the five conditions formulated by Quebec for assenting to the Constitution, including the most delicate condition relating to a veto.

Well, surely the truth of the matter is to be found in Mr. Chrétien's speech, a major policy pronouncement at the Faculty of Law at the University of Ottawa, January 16, 1990. Mr. Chrétien did not express support for the five conditions formulated by Quebec. He called them points, not conditions, and he qualified them then as a reasonable basis for negotiation. This was after they had negotiated and had produced a unanimous accord on June 3, 1987.

So if he meant "a reasonable basis for negotiation" with Jean Chrétien, his speech made it very clear that he would impose his conditions on Quebec's five "points" and, under no circumstances, should he, or would he, support the Meech Lake Accord. That was the position of Mr. Chrétien taken in January, 1990.

I think it would be better for honourable senators to consult the historical record rather than to indulge in historical ex post facto druthers.

With regard to the amendment that the Leader of the Opposition has proposed to my resolution, I remind the house again that the motion I spoke to on December 21 provides that the special joint committee inquire into, in broad consultation with Canadians, alternatives to the current process and formulae, including those set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled Amending the Constitution of Canada. This discussion paper raised a number of ways of refining, complementing and supplementing the process now in place, with particular reference, as I told Senator Marchand a few minutes ago, to public participation. The paper did not favour any alternatives to the current amending formula as such, but the mandate of the special joint committee is open on this matter.

[Translation]

The Leader of the Opposition wanted us to oblige the committee to consider more specifically two amending formulas, namely the 1971 Victoria formula and the so-called 7/50 formula, according to which Quebec was to be one of the seven provinces.

Those two formulas would give Quebec a veto on most major changes.

I have to conclude that the honourable senator is repenting at leisure.

He turned his back on Quebec during the Meech Lake debate and now, after the demise of Meech Lake, he would do penance, at least outwardly, by implying that he would have no objection to giving Quebec a veto without giving one to the other provinces as well.

The motion I tabled on December 21 includes that possibility but does not attempt to favour a particular formula or encompass all alternatives Canadians might wish to propose.

I suggest we keep an open mind and listen to Canadians.

The Leader of the Opposition may, if he so desires, ask his colleagues to raise the two formulas he proposed or any other formula in the course of the proceedings of the Joint Committee and during our dialogue with Canadians.

However, let us not give the impression that the philosopher kings have, to all intents and purposes, narrowed the options down to the two formulas proposed by the Leader of the Opposition.

[English]

Honourable senators, in order to engage a full and open debate and to assure Canadians that the Senate and the House of Commons do not have a hidden agenda or a pre-conceived solution, I think the desirable course is to pass the resolution without amendment, the resolution to which I spoke to here on December 21.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to note a point of order based on the following facts which were recounted to me while I was out of the chamber for about five minutes.

I understand that Senator Marchand proposed an amendment to this resolution when the order was called and that it was ruled out of order by the Speaker then in the Chair, without any senator having raised a point of order or having asked the Speaker to intervene to make a ruling on a point of order. If those facts are correct, then I would like it noted and understood that it seems that the disease is contagious and that Senator Bélisle is now taking it upon himself to do what Senator Charbonneau has been doing for some time, namely, to decide himself when he is going to rule on something or make a ruling of his own motion, which he has no right to do.

So here we go again! The Speaker has no authority to make any ruling or to intervene as to order in this house until he is asked to. I have asked how it happened that it got to him in the first place. I am told that someone from the Table went up. I don't know what someone from the Table said, but they have no authority to raise a point of order in this chamber. Senators raise the point of order. Senators are in charge of order in this place.

I want to make it clear that any time we have a repetition of someone suffering from this disease, introduced into this place by Senator Charbonneau last fall, I will be objecting and I hope others will.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I rise simply for the purpose of stating, for the record, that I disagree completely with Senator Frith that the Speaker in this chamber has no right to declare a motion or an amendment out of order, if in his judgment it is out of order.

Senator Frith: Of his own motion.

Senator Murray: And I disagree entirely—

Senator Frith: Of course I know you disagree. You are part of the whole problem. Of course you disagree. You are the one who talked him into doing it in the first place. Don't wave at me, Senator Cogger.

Senator Murray: Calmez-vous.

Senator Frith: No, you will not "calmez-vous" me until I am ready to be calmed. Put your hand down, senator, and don't start trying to tell me to calm myself. You have no right to do that either. If you want to raise a point of order, say what you have to say, but don't talk about "calmez-vous."

Senator Murray: I have been waiting for the opportunity very quietly and calmly to reply to Senator Frith's point of order. It has been a rather long day for the honourable senator.

Senator Frith: Come on, get on with your point of order and stop the smarmy talk. Just get on with what you have to say.

Senator Murray: It has been a rather long day. There is a bit of cloud over his head from recent caucuses of the Liberal Party and he has been receiving some bad publicity—

Senator Frith: What a contemptible slob you are, sir.

Senator Murray: —so we can forgive him his bad humour.

Senator Frith: Don't bother forgiving me. I don't want your forgiveness for anything. Just get on with your point.

Senator Murray: Will the honourable senator undertake—

Senator Frith: Probably not.

Senator Murray: —that for 60 seconds I will be permitted to make my point without his interrupting.

Senator Frith: I will give no undertaking. Proceed.

Senator Murray: All right. Honourable senators, any presiding officer in any chamber, including this chamber—

Senator Frith: Wrong!

Senator Murray: —has the right and the responsibility to declare that, in his judgment, a motion or an amendment is out of order. That much is clear.

• (1730)

Secondly, that person has the right to do so without a point of order being raised by an honourable senator. Nowhere in our rules does it say that the Speaker of this place may only rise—

Senator Frith: Look who is invoking the rules. My goodness!

Senator Murray: I repeat, nowhere in the rules does it say that the Speaker may only make a declaration of that kind when a matter has been brought to his attention by an honourable senator. I have heard that statement made many times by our old friend, Senator McElman, and I have heard Senator Corbin repeat it on numerous occasions. But I find no authority for it in the rules.

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Why are you dragging my name into this debate?

Senator Murray: I am referring in a very dispassionate way to the fact—

Senator Corbin: I want an explanation. Why are you dragging my name into this debate?

Senator Murray: I am referring to statements that the honourable senator has made in the past to the effect that the Speaker has no right in this place to intervene or to declare on matters of orders without having been asked to do so by an honourable senator.

Hon. Anne C. Cools: That is true.

Senator Murray: I hear another honourable senator saying "that is true." But I find no authority for that in our rules. Indeed, the historic record—I have it checked, so we could have a debate on this at some point—

Senator Frith: Yes; let us do that.

Senator Murray: —is divided on the subject of whether the Speaker in this place can and does take the initiative himself on matters of order. The historic record is divided on that matter.

In the event that Senator Marchand moved a sub-amendment or an amendment, the senator then in the Chair made the point that a previous amendment had to be considered first; and that Senator Marchand's amendment, therefore, at that point was out of order; but, in the event, leave was given for Senator Marchand's amendment to be considered.

Thus, honourable senators, when Senator Frith says that the Speaker may not intervene, what does it mean to say that "the Speaker shall preserve order and decorum"? What else could it mean but that, namely, that, if in his judgment there is not a matter of order, he can intervene. Of course he can intervene. The honourable senator is unable to show me an authority, certainly not in our rules, that says that he cannot intervene.

Because the honourable senator raised the point of order, I simply wanted to indicate my complete disagreement with it so that there is no impression on anyone's part that his point has been widely accepted in the Senate; and to flag it as an issue on which we can have a debate at some time in the future.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I can guarantee that as long as I am here, there will be a debate every time the Speaker intervenes to impose his ruling without being requested to do so on a point of order. I will be interested to hear about the divided historical record. As long as I have been here, which is not longer than many, but longer than Senator Murray—

Senator Murray: By only two or three years.

Senator Frith: That is all right. It may be two or three years, or you can make it two or three months. The word "longer" is a comparative word, correct?

Senator Murray: I will not interrupt you.

Senator Frith: Is that all right?

Senator Simard: Do not do that with your glasses.

Senator Phillips: Put your glasses back on!

Senator Frith: I am ready as soon as you are through. Calmez-vous, s'il vous plaît, Senator Murray.

As long as I am here there will be a debate if the Speaker in the Chair attempts to impose a ruling of order on his own motion or her own motion.

The historical record is not divided. I shall be interested to hear this division cited. This point has been raised by Senator McElman, but this is the first time that any senator, while I have been in this house, has stood and said that the practice of this place, and the rules of this place, provide for and permit a ruling by any Speaker unless that Speaker is called upon by the Senate to do so. That is the reason why we stand and address each other. That is the reason why we do not say "Mr. Speaker." We do so for the simple and justifiable reason that we do not elect the Speaker. The Speaker is chosen by the Prime Minister. He or she comes in here and says, "I have the honour to inform you that the Prime Minister has appointed me your Speaker," to which, for 123 years, impliedly senators have said, "Well, that is fine. You sit there. Call the Orders of the Day. When we want you to intervene, we will intervene. Meanwhile, we turn and address each other. We control the order in this place." It is the usage and the practice. It is the record. It is what was included, for example, in the citation from Professor Kuntz' book cited today by Senator Kirby.

For as long as I have been here, this is the first time that any doubt has been cast on the fact and the practice of this place that the Speaker makes rulings when called upon to do so. After having made them, the ruling is then subject to appeal as a final indication that the final authority for rules of order and the preservation of order is in the hands of senators and not in the hands of the Speaker.

So we have a difference of opinion. If Senator Murray wants a debate on it, he will get it. He will get it every time we find a Speaker trying to initiate this new Charbonneau/Murray concept, which is at odds with 123 years of practice in this place. We saw what the result of it was with regard to the GST.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, in anticipation of this debate at some later date, I would ask the honourable senator to reflect on the following question. The duty of the Speaker, as outlined in the rule that I cited a few moments ago, is to preserve order and decorum.

Senator Frith: When called upon by senators to do so.

Senator Murray: It does not say that. It says, "The Speaker shall."

Senator Frith: That has been the practice for 123 years. This is the first time anyone has questioned that practice.

Senator Murray: It says that the Speaker shall preserve order and decorum. I would ask the honourable senator simply to reflect on how the Speaker is to do that.

Senator Frith: When he is called upon. It is very simple. That is the way it has been done for 123 years.

Senator Murray: It says "shall preserve."

Senator Frith: I do not have to reflect on it; senators have been reflecting on it for 123 years.

Senator Murray: The record is clear.

Senator Frith: But I will reflect on it. It is obvious what the answer is.

An Hon. Senator: Reflect on it.

Senator Frith: Good. You make modest questions.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, under the provisional rule, I would ask that a vote on these amendments be deferred until 5.45 on—

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): The question has not been put. He has not put the question.

Senator Phillips: I now realize that the Speaker did not get a chance because Senator Frith was speaking.

Senator Frith: Yes; that is correct. He left the Chair. The Speaker who was in the Chair previously is not in the Chair now. Pay attention, for goodness sakes, sir, or put your hand up and be excused from class!

Senator Corbin: All the new boys and girls think that it is funny over there. They have a lot to learn.

Senator Frith: It was meant to be funny. I am glad they are laughing.

• (1740)

The Hon. the Speaker: It was moved by the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

> That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consult broadly with Canadians and inquire into and report upon the process for amending the Constitution of Canada, including, where appropriate, proposals for amending one or more of the amending formulae, with particular reference to:
> (i) the role of the Canadian public in the process;
> (ii) the effectiveness of the existing process and formulae for securing constitutional amendments; and
> (iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including those set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada";
> That twelve Members of the House of Commons and five Members of the Senate be the Members of the Special Joint Committee, such Members on the part of the Senate to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion;
> That the Committee have the power to appoint from among its Members such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;
> That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;
> That the Committee, or a sub-committee, have power to travel, and hold public hearings, within Canada;
> That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;
> That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings or of proceedings of its sub-committees, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons;
> That the parties represented on the Committee be granted allocations for expert assistance with the Committee work in proportion to the representation of the said parties in the House of Commons;
> That the Committee be empowered to retain the service of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Joint Chairmen;
> That the Committee submit its report not later than July 1, 1991, provided that, if the Senate is not then sitting, the report will be deemed submitted on the day such report is deposited with the Clerk of the House of Commons and with the Clerk of the Senate;
> That changes in membership of the Committee for Members of the House of Commons be effective immediately after notification thereof, signed by the Member acting as Chief Whip of any recognized party, has been filed with the Clerk of the Committee;
> That the quorum of the Committee be nine Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken so long as both Houses are represented, and the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six Members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly,

And on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that the motion be amended by deleting the fourth paragraph thereof and substituting the following therefor:

iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including an amending formula based on regional representation, as proposed in the 1971 Victoria Charter; and a formula based on seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population, with a clause added stipulating that Quebec must be one of the seven provinces; and the alternatives set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada".

And on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marchand, seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, that the motion be amended by adding the following immediately after Roman Numeral (iii):

"(iv) the role of the Aboriginal Peoples of Canada and alternatives to current process and formulae for entrenching their rights in the Constitution of Canada."

The Hon. the Speaker: Dealing with the amendment motions first, is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt Senator Marchand's motion in amendment?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, under the provisional rules, I request that the vote on these amendments be deferred until 5.45 p.m. Wednesday next.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I do not think that rule P-3(a) applies in this case. If I understand correctly, the whips have agreed that there will be a vote at the time stated by Senator Phillips. It seems to me that satisfies the matter. Technically, I do not think that rule P-3(a) applies.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the vote shall be taken at 5.45 p.m. Wednesday next, January 30?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CFB SUMMERSIDE, P.E.I.—MOTION TO RECOMMEND FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL COOPERATION IN DEVELOPMENT OF SOUND ECONOMIC ALTERNATIVES—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton):

That, in view of the important role Canadian Forces Base Summerside plays in the economy of Summerside, Prince Edward Island, the Senate recommends that the Government of Canada and the Government of the Province of Prince Edward Island co-operate in developing sound economic alternatives to Canadian Forces Base Summerside.—(Honourable Senator Phillips).

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, on June 29, 1989, I introduced a motion calling for cooperation between the federal and provincial governments to provide sound economic alternatives to CFB Summerside. Honourable senators will recall that I had some considerable difficulty getting that motion on the order paper. Consequently, I have left it there in order that I may report on the matter.

In my well-reasoned remarks in the original motion I made certain recommendations. These included, first, a federal agency to replace CFB Summerside; second, the use of the air base as an industrial site; and, third, the creation of $40 million federal-provincial fund to assist industry wishing to establish at the cite of CFB Summerside. I had in mind especially industries associated with aeronautics.

I am now pleased to report briefly to honourable senators the progress to date. First, there was an announcement from the Honourable Barbara McDougall of the establishment of a $5 million Community Futures fund. This is now in operation and it has recommended at least two projects. The second was the announcement of the GST processing centre. After the passage of the GST legislation it was announced that this coming summer a new processing centre will be built in Summerside. The cost of the building will be $38 million to $40 million. The centre will provide 400 jobs. It is expected that there will be another 100 jobs created as a spinoff to this centre. Honourable senators, it is interesting to note that the construction of the building itself is estimated to provide 500 to 600 jobs.

The federal government has announced the formation of the Slemon Park Corporation to administer the site on behalf of the community; in other words, the airbase was given to the community. In addition to that, the federal government has announced a $10 million fund to assist industries. Recently the province has made a $5 million contribution to this fund.

A week ago the Honourable Barbara MacDougall and the Honourable Elmer MacKay, in Summerside, announced the creation of the Aerospace Centre for Summerside. The first two tenants include Atlantic Turbine and Bendix Avelex. The Atlantic Turbine project totals $11.5 million. ACOA contributed $4 million to this project and the provincial government contributed $1.7 million. I should add that the Atlantic Turban project requires the construction of a test site for turbine engines, which will cost $2.2 million, and construction will begin on this during the coming summer.

Bendix Avelex announced their project totals $8 million. ACOA is contributing $1.5 million; the provincial government is contributing $650,000. The two companies signed an agreement guaranteeing the creation of 320 jobs by the year 1995.

In the meantime, ACOA and other federal agencies will continue to search for other tenants to occupy space in the hangars available at Summerside. Funds remain to assist new industries wishing to locate there.

In a study of American towns which had gone through a similar experience to that of Summerside—that is, the closing of a major air base—it was found that an educational institution of some type was beneficial to the community. A proposal has been made that a part of Holland College, the vocational institute, would be relocated in Summerside.

I am sorry if I am interrupting honourable senators opposite. I thought you might be interested in this.

Senator Frith: Your apology is accepted.

Senator Phillips: I am sure that Senator Frith will realize that he is infringing the rules and will not wish to carry on that conversation.

• (1800)

Presently, negotiations are being carried on to relocate a portion of Holland College to Summerside. Some difficulty has been encountered in meeting the requirements of Holland College to the module established for the Slemon Park Corporation. However, the advisory board, the provincial government and Holland College are working on this and I am hopeful the problem will be solved in the near future.

Honourable senators, in my remarks on June 29, I referred to the fact that Summerside was the centre of a thriving agricultural community. As a result of free trade and the anticipated removal of the federal sales tax, two of the largest potato-processing companies in Canada are expanding operations in that area.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Phillips: McCain's, with which Senator Corbin is very familiar, announced the construction of a $40-million plant. They turned the sod approximately one year ago and today they are doing their first test runs. I think that is a remarkable achievement. Cavendish Farms, presently located at Kensington near Summerside, has gone through a $30-million expansion.

The federal and provincial governments have assisted these two companies in a very unusual way. The federal government, through ACOA, under the ERDA and the province combined to construct the sewage treatment plants. The federal government contributed $7 million to each project and the provincial government contributed $3 million. The sewage treatment plants, in turn, will be rented to the companies. This took a good deal of ingenuity and I am sure it will meet all of the requirements of GATT.

These projects will not only help the town of Summerside, they will also help the agricultural community. It is interesting to note that the two plants will be processing 30 per cent of the Island's potato production.

In closing, honourable senators, I would like to pay tribute to the Honourable Barbara McDougall and the Honourable Elmer MacKay for their contributions.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Phillips: In fairness, I would also like to mention the Honourable Robert Morrissey, the provincial Minister of Industry who, I am sure, had his difficulties with the provincial Treasurer. That is the case in all governments. I would pay my respects to him.

I would be very remiss if I did not mention the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, established under the leadership of Senator Murray, which has been very helpful.

• (1810)

The first approach of Atlantic Turbines and Bendix Avelex Inc. was made to ACOA and they carried on the negotiations. I am sure that at times they were frustrated with a great deal of bureaucratic delay. However, that has been surmounted and the projects are in place.

In ACOA, two individuals were particularly helpful: Leo Walsh, the vice president for PEI, and Roger Coffin. I 'phoned both gentlemen frequently. I sort of got the message that perhaps I was 'phoning a little too often, because they started returning my 'phone calls at eleven o'clock at night. After they did that a few times, I got the message. However, I want to offer a special thank you to those two gentlemen.

Honourable senators, due to the fact that the clock is fast approaching six, I will terminate my brief remarks, and when a new session of Parliament begins, I hope to be able to give you a further update on the immense accomplishments in the year-and-a-half.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Corbin, for Senator Bonnell, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, may I suggest that all remaining orders stand?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Not only may you suggest it, but you will get support for your suggestion.

Senator Phillips: And I move that all enquiries and motions stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 29, 1991, at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 5169)

BROADCASTING ACT

SEVENTH REPORT OF TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE

THURSDAY, January 24, 1991

The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications has the honour to present its

SEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-40, an Act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunication, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, December 19, 1990, examined the said Bill and now reports the same with the following amendments and observations:

- AMENDMENTS -

1. Page 5, clause 3: Strike out line 39 and substitute the following:

   "(vi) contribute to national unity, shared national con-"

2. Pages 22 and 23, clause 28:

   (a) on page 22, strike out lines 27 to 48;

   (b) on page 23, strike out lines 1 to 28; and

   (c) renumber clauses 29 to 44, and any cross-references thereto, accordingly.

3. Page 29, clause 45: Strike out lines 4 to 28 and renumber the subsequent clauses, and any cross-references thereto, accordingly.

- OBSERVATIONS -

The Committee is grateful to all witnesses and those who made submissions on Bill C-40. The Committee acknowledges their cooperation in the light of the very short notice given them. The Committee notes that the witnesses are generally supportive of the need to replace the existing 1968 legislation. Some witnesses have expressed concerns on issues other than those contained in the amendments; one of these is shared by the Committee.

The Association Canadienne de la Radio et de la Télévision de Langue Française, the association representing French language broadcasters, explained the difficult economic circumstances that their members face and recommended that the mandate of the Société Radio-Canada take more clearly into account the current characteristics and conditions in the French language television market. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Bill acknowledges, in section 3(1)(c), that "English and French language broadcasting ... operate under different conditions and may have different requirements". Further, under section 5(2)(a), the Bill mandates the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission to regulate and supervise the Canadian broadcasting system "in a flexible manner that is readily adaptable to the different characteristics of English and French language broadcasting and to the different conditions under which broadcasting undertakings that provide English or French language programming operate". The Committee is of the view that the circumstances of the French language broadcasters can be addressed through these provisions of the Bill and that an amendment is not required.

The Committee also notes that the Minister of Communication has mandated a task force on the economic status of Canadian television, under the co-chairmanship of Jacques Girard and John Peters, which has been asked to take account of the present competitive environment, particularly in the smaller francophone market. The Minister of Communications gave the Committee his assurances that the Bill provides the necessary authority and flexibility to the Government to follow up on the eventual recommendations of the task force in this regard.

Respectfully submitted,

FINLAY MACDONALD
Chairman

THE SENATE

THE HONOURABLE CLAUDE CASTONGUAY

TRIBUTES ON RECEIPT OF ORDER OF QUÉBEC

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, I would like to bring to your attention the distinction conferred on two of our colleagues last weekend.

The Honourable Arthur Tremblay and the Honourable Claude Castonguay received from the Government of Quebec the insignia of Officer of the Order of Quebec.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Poitras: As you know, our two colleagues have been very active and a tremendous asset to Quebec throughout their careers. Both also made a name for themselves as Canadians, and their influence was felt and their contributions were appreciated throughout Canada and even beyond our borders.

Speaking on your behalf and mine, I want to congratulate them and express the hope that they will keep up the good work.

THE HONOURABLE D.G. STEUART

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to take note of the fact that the Honourable David Gordon Steuart terminated his service in the Senate on January 26 of this year because of the constitutional provision requiring retirement at age 75. I would not like this day to pass without taking note of that fact, and paying tribute to his political career which extended over a period of 40 years.

Senator Buckwold will know better than I Senator Steuart's career. He was a native of Saskatchewan, born in Regina, and had distinguished service in the Air Force before he entered upon his political career. Senator Steuart was an alderman in Prince Albert and later served as mayor of that community.

I remember accompanying Senator Steuart to a meeting in the constituency of Prince Albert during an election campaign in which the Conservative candidate was the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker. I wondered what the point was of taking that long trip to Saskatchewan from Nova Scotia to speak in Prince Albert, but that was the wish of the authorities in the Liberal party in Saskatchewan. I understood the futility of my mission and had no enthusiasm for the task, particularly in the light of the futility and the fact that I did have in the House of Commons reasonably amicable relations with the late Mr. Diefenbaker. But I understood much better after the dinner meeting, because while everyone proclaimed himself or herself a Liberal they made it quite clear that they intended to vote for John Diefenbaker in any event, and David Steuart was not at all surprised about that reality.

We know that Davey served in the Saskatchewan Legislature for quite a number of years. He served in several portfolios—for example, public health, natural resources and several crown corporations. He was the Leader of the Opposition for a period of time and was active in the political life of the province of Saskatchewan at a dynamic period in its history. Those of us who have served with Davey in the Senate know what a lively personality he is. He was described at one time as one of the funniest men in politics. The Senate can ill-afford to lose a colourful and lively personality like David Steuart. As I look around me, I must confess that I do not see many lively and colourful colleagues.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator MacEachen: Do not object; you can say the same when you get up. David Steuart was that: lively and colourful. He was able to enjoy the humour that he bespoke, not only about himself but also about others.

On behalf of his Liberal colleagues—and, I am sure, on behalf of all senators—I want him to know that we regret the passage of time that has brought about his retirement. We wish him many years of health and enjoyment in the future.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I stand to follow our distinguished leader in paying tribute to now retired Senator David Steuart—or Davey Steuart, as we always affectionately called him.

I thank Senator MacEachen for a warm reference to a unique political figure. He was perhaps not quite so unique, having come from Saskatchewan, as have a lot of us—a province that breeds its own particular style of political activist, a product of the Depression and hard times. I often think of the leadership of political parties in Saskatchewan. Most of its leaders were small, from Jimmy Gardiner, Tommy Douglas, Allan Blakeney and Premier Devine, to the greatest of all: Senator Barootes, from Saskatchewan!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: The only reason I can give for that is that most of us who were raised during those hard times in Saskatchewan probably did not get enough nourishment to bring us up into the world. We had to fight for everything that we got out there in Saskatchewan—and we are doing it again these days.

Davey was a product of that environment. I have known him for at least 40 years. He was the mayor of Prince Albert in the days when I was the mayor of Saskatoon and our paths would cross. But wherever he was it was lively and good fun. He was easy to bruise but he was quick to heal, as many of you have seen exhibited during recent debates.

Davey could say the most outrageous things—Senator Barootes might even attest to that—but everyone knew that it was not meant in a vicious or mean way. He rose to the occasion. He got carried away with his enthusiasm and the next day probably regretted it and maintained his friendship with all political opponents with whom he came in contact.

His career in the Saskatchewan Legislature was a brilliant one. Senator MacEachen has indicated the variety of portfolios he held—all important ones. He was the right-hand man of Premier Thatcher at one time and later became Deputy Premier of the province.

Wherever he went he was welcome, although he always said that no-one ever voted for him. In his own constituency of Prince Albert he was known as "landslide Steuart" because the average victory was about 100 votes. Nevertheless, for a Liberal to be elected in Prince Albert was quite an achievement during those years. I might say that it would still probably be an achievement.

Davey managed to keep himself in politics in difficult elections mainly because of the kind of esteem in which he was held by the voters in his area. He is a self-effacing man. He is the type of person who would downgrade his own abilities, which were considerable. He is an extremely bright person. One would have had to work with him in government to know just how able he was.

I am told that when he was made Chairman of the Board and minister in charge of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation, Saskatchewan's biggest business as far as I know, he knew nothing about elective power. One of his assistants called me the other day and recounted the first meeting he had with Davey. He was called into the office of the minister in charge of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation who was preparing for a trip to New York to meet some investment bankers. The corporation needed to borrow several million dollars. It was a big financial deal. The purpose of this particular visit to the minister's office, according to the gentleman with whom I spoke, was to explain to Davey what a kilowatt was. Davey always enjoyed talking about that. After all, here he was, off to talk about an immense expansion of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation, and he really did not know what a kilowatt was. Yet, he got the money he was after. In addition, he made friends with all the investment bankers concerned.

Davey had an illustrious career. If honourable senators want to hear some hilarious stories about what an airman could do in Ireland, then they should get together with Davey some time on a quiet evening. He will regale you with some of his adventures.

When he retired from provincial politics to come to the Senate he was not ashamed to say that he wanted to be a senator. One of the funniest evenings I attended with Davey was at a great banquet in Regina where he was being honoured for his appointment to the Senate. Prime Minister Trudeau was there, and so were most of the Liberals in Saskatchewan, maybe a thousand of them. It was an immense crowd of Liberals.

Davey got up and said that most people never admitted they really wanted to get into the Senate—they were not anxious to become senators. He said, "But I want you to know that I wanted to be a senator. I spoke to everyone I knew about becoming a senator." This was at a public gathering. He said, "I asked ministers, I asked premiers, I used every contact I had, and the answer was always the same: 'Don't worry, you will get the call.'" He said, "My reply was always 'I don't need a call, a whisper will do.'" He then told about the day his telephone rang and when he answered he found that it was the Prime Minister on the other end. According to what Davey told the people gathered at the banquet, he said, "The answer is yes." The Prime Minister said, "I haven't even asked the question." Davey said, "That doesn't matter, the answer is yes, yes, yes." That is how Davey Steuart became a senator.

There are many marvellous stories to be told about Davey. I could go on at length telling honourable senators all the humorous things that went on in his career. He was a great golfer. I remember being on a trip with him which took us down to El Paso, Texas, to play golf. When we arrived we found that the club house was an immense building, just as one would imagine for Texas. Davey looked at it, goggly-eyed, a little prairie boy from Prince Albert and said, "Good Lord, the first nine are under cover." It was almost big enough for that.

Davey was a very honest individual. He did not make any pretence of being anything than what he was. That is what made him loveable and respected by all with whom he came in contact.

I remember when Tommy Douglas, his arch political rival, passed away. This chamber paid tribute to Tommy, and rightly so, on his great political career. I looked up the Debates of the Senate for March 4, 1986, to see what Davey had said, because I recalled that it was quite unusual. Davey did not fall into the pattern, like everyone else, including myself, of saying how great Tommy Douglas was. Davey Steuart said:

> Honourable senators, as I read the newspapers and listened to what has been said about the late Tommy Douglas in this house, I sometimes wondered if we were talking about the same man that I knew for all those years. Senator Roblin and Senator Robichaud said they could not imagine that he could ever say an unkind word to anyone.

You remember this, Senator Roblin. That is what you said. Davey continued:

> My God, they never sat in the legislature opposite Tommy Douglas. I can recall Ross Thatcher saying that if you had a debate with Tommy Douglas, he took the hide off you layer by layer and your own wife never spoke to you for about two weeks after he was finished with you.
> I got into politics because of Tommy Douglas. If someone said he cannot imagine Tommy Douglas having an enemy, then, by God, at times, I could not imagine Tommy Douglas having a friend.

He went on to say:

> He stood for everything that I stood against . . .

and then, in his usual self-disparaging way, he said:

> . . . we did not win even one tiny battle against him.

He went on to say:

> The honourable senator from Regina . . .

that would be Senator Barootes,

> . . . could also mention one or two things. There was the odd person who disliked Tommy Douglas over the years. He used to say about things like that: "You can't make an omelette if you don't break a few eggs." Well, you could look at some of the broken eggs here—and Senator Barootes is one of the broken eggs that went into making Tommy's omelettes.

Then he concludes:

> I got into politics because of Tommy, because I wanted to defeat him—but I never succeeded. But I stayed on; "I came to scorn and stayed to pray." I stayed on and developed a great admiration for what he did, and, in fact, we became good friends.

I think that is typical of Davey. He let you know how he felt, and gave you the basic feeling that he had. He had such battles in the Saskatchewan legislature that what you saw here in the Senate with the GST was probably child's play; it was like kindergarten compared to what steadily went on, and probably does to this day, in that unique assembly of the Saskatchewan legislature.

Honourable senators, all of us are going to miss Davey. I spoke to him just last week. He is enjoying his golf in Phoenix, Arizona. I hope, in due course, that he comes back to say goodbye, when we can again properly recognize him. I can say, on behalf of all of us, that we will miss him as a senator. He has been a great Canadian and a great citizen of this country. He has made a significant and important contribution to the welfare of the people of Canada.

No tribute to Davey can be complete without a reference to his dear wife Eunice, who supported him in every way and occasionally brought him down to earth, when she thought that necessary.

My best wishes are extended to both of them for a happy and healthy retirement.

● (1420)

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, David Gordon Steuart came from Prince Albert, Saskatchewan. Prince Albert has made a tremendous contribution to this country. It once elected Prime Minister William Lyon Mackenzie King, then later Prime Minister John George Diefenbaker and, finally, it gave us David Steuart, who today is probably the best known and perhaps the most notorious Liberal in all of Ottawa. Colourful, quick witted, as impish as an Irish leprechaun, he has entertained and enlivened this chamber and most of Canada with his remarks. At times they were the serious and enraged remarks of a statesman, and sometimes they were the remarks of a court jester. He is the master of the spontaneous one-liner.

We have all seen how, with one single heckling remark, he could devastate the rhetoric and serious debate in this chamber, bringing us all into derisive laughter and annihilating, if you will, the reasoned argument of the speaker of the moment. Usually those witty remarks were laced with sufficient humour that they left the opponent almost helpless to object. As a matter of fact, it was almost—I say "almost"—a pleasure to be insulted by him.

Davey Steuart was also an expert of the great put down, the put down of deflating a self-inflated politician, bigot or big shot. I recall the story of his introducing Prime Minister Trudeau to a very large dinner gathering in Prince Albert at a time when the Prime Minister was less than greatly admired in Saskatchewan. Davey introduced him by speaking of the enthusiasm and the enormous excitement that he had brought to Prince Albert by his attendance.

"In fact," he said, "Mr. Trudeau, this is the most excitement we have had here since the convicts burned down the penitentiary." Then as he looked around and noticed that there were not too many Liberals but quite a few Conservatives, "NDPers" and "CCFers" in the crowd, he said, "I think, Mr. Trudeau, some of this large crowd may even vote for you." That was his put down.

David, as others have said, was an excellent raconteur of political stories and of situations he had observed. His stories improved with each telling. They were always interesting and each one was new because he embellished it with some new details and with that self-deprecating sense of humour that he put into the put down. John Diefenbaker and he lived two doors apart in Prince Albert. Between them was a home for Anglican unmarried mothers. Well, you can imagine what Davey did with this situation. He used to tell the crowd when Diefenbaker was around that between Prime Minister Diefenbaker and himself they had more unmarried single mothers than any two politicians in Canada.

Our friend held very strong opinions on many issues, and he was very quick to express them to anyone. You knew where he stood. To him, issues were black and white, never grey. He never compromised.

He loved campaigning, particularly at the grass roots. He prided himself in his success in door-to-door confrontation and discussions, and in person-to-person encounters on Main Street. The simplicity of Dave's explanations of issues made them quite understandable to voters. Perhaps that is why the harsh and sometimes autocratic edicts of Premier Thatcher were passed on to the Deputy Premier, David Steuart, to explain, to polish, to administer, and to execute. He had that facility of softening and presenting these harsher policies in a more acceptable form and in a better manner.

However, the main tenet of David Steuart's political philosophy was loyalty: loyalty to his leader; loyalty to his party—I might add a characteristic much less evident in the modern politicians of ambitious bent that we see today; and finally, loyalty to the support of the policy of his party, no matter how strongly he might have objected to that policy in the discussion groups and in caucus.

We have been good friends for more than four decades. As has been recounted by others, he was born, raised and educated in Saskatchewan. Like Senator Buckwold and myself, he also had a distinct advantage, an advantage that has been denied to so many of our recent generations—the advantage and the experience of growing up and surviving in the Great Depression of the prairies. As one author commented, reflecting on his post-war generation, "Their parents gave them everything but poverty." We had that and I think it helped us appreciate what we did get when we grew up.

Our friend has given 50 years of his life to the Public Service of Canada: in time of war as a navigator in a bomber in the Royal Canadian Air Force; later, in peace, as an alderman and mayor, as has been mentioned; from 1962 to 1976, as a member of the Saskatchewan legislature, as a cabinet member, Deputy Premier and, later, Leader of the Opposition; and most recently, from 1976 until 1991, as a senator of Canada.

I will miss him, as I know will many other senators in this chamber. He has left his mark on all of us, perhaps particularly on myself. Perhaps his retirement will also put an end to the repeated and embarrassing apologies that I have received from him—no less than 16 to date—which he has needlessly offered to me and to many others in here for things that have been said, and forgiven, in the heat of political battle.

In paying tribute to David Steuart, I wish Dave and his lovely wife, Eunice, a happy and healthy retirement. I hope he comes back to Regina in the spring with better golf scores than he had last year. Thank you very much.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

OFFICIAL REPORT

HONOURABLE ROYCE FRITH—WITHDRAWAL OF REMARKS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to call attention to remarks that I made in the Senate, which appear in the Debates of the Senate for last Thursday. This is my first opportunity to do so. At page 5194 of the Debates for that day I described the Leader of the Government in the Senate in a clearly unparliamentary way by describing him as a "contemptible slob". I wish to withdraw both the adjective and the noun. Obviously, I still feel that what he said was foolish, but it was not then of a character to justify the word "contemptible". I want to withdraw the noun because I just do not think the word "slob" properly applies to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Senator Frith, do you also withdraw the French version? Because you said: Quel plouc méprisable vous faites, monsieur! Do you also withdraw the French?

Hon. Royce Frith: Yes. To use two other languages—French and Latin—I withdraw those words as well, mutatis mutandis.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RESTRAINT BILL

CLARIFICATION OF SENATOR'S REMARKS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, to get back to the Debates of the Senate of Thursday, January 24, 1991, I noticed that the Honourable Duff Roblin said in his speech, and the French version appears on page 5174, that: "I also think the chairman was right to say that the bill should be supported."

However, at the end of my speech I said:

> I certainly cannot vote for this bill.

The bill was Bill C-69.

I fail to see why Senator Roblin is putting words into my mouth.

• (1430)

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I certainly accept my honourable friend's words with respect to what he has just said. If I have misrepresented him in any way, I regret it. I do recall that at the beginning of his speech he gave the impression that the bill had some merit, although I agree that in the end he decided not to support it. Perhaps I stretched too far in implying his complete support.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: Going back to the beginning of my speech, I said that as chairman of the committee, I acceded to the repeated requests of Conservative members. It was talking about expenditure control measures that were to apply until the end of the next fiscal year. This may be what caused Senator Roblin to think that I supported Bill C-69.

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like the permission of my colleagues to run through a suggested program for the Senate for this week, and perhaps next week, although I hope not.

Obviously there are bills that the government feels it has to have passed before we break, and I do not think there will be much argument among our colleagues about their importance. The Joint Committee on the Constitution will be voted on tomorrow. That is of great importance. With respect to Bill C-40, the Broadcasting Act, there are some amendments to be dealt with, but it is my understanding that debate will be joined either today or tomorrow, depending on the progress of Bill C-43, the abortion bill. Bill C-69, the restraint of government expenditures bill, will be voted on today.

Bill C-84, which is the Petro-Canada Privatization Bill, is presently before the Energy committee. I understand that meetings are scheduled and that the committee has already met a number of times. It is my understanding that the committee hopes to report that bill Thursday evening or Thursday afternoon, with a view to dealing with it at third reading or at the report stage and third reading on Friday. Then there is Bill C-88, which is the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development Agreement Bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Are we still under the "have to haves"?

Senator Doody: Yes. The reason we need passage of the European bank bill, which arrived in this chamber belatedly from the other place, and which was proposed for second reading by me on Thursday past, is a March 31 deadline for Canada's participation. March 31 would obviously give us plenty of time to deal with it if we do not get involved in prorogation. I have no way of knowing what the plans of government are in terms of prorogation, but I do know that it is a bill which Canada, as a participant in the European scene and the recovery particularly of Eastern Europe, would be most anxious to have passed so as to allow it to involve itself in that bank. I discussed this briefly with Senator Stewart before we sat today and he and Senator Roblin have talked about it. I think they would like to find a way to facilitate our desire to pass that bill before we break for a recess. We would be most appreciative if that could be done. If it cannot be done this week, then a way will have to be found to do it next week.

Honourable senators, that brings us to the debate on Bill C-43, the abortion bill, which I think will continue today and this evening, if enough honourable senators wish to speak. My understanding, certainly from this side and from what I have heard on the other side, is that a number of senators wish to participate in this debate. I believe some senators want to propose amendments. In order to facilitate that and to try to keep things in a reasonable timeframe, I would suggest that we sit this evening and continue with that debate. Tomorrow afternoon, if other senators wish to speak, then that debate will continue.

When we have finished with Bill C-43, we will get into the amendments and the main motion on Bill C-40, respecting the Broadcasting Act. Then, on Thursday or Friday, as I suggested, we would try to deal with the Petro-Canada privatization bill.

Senator Doody: Well, I did not mean to. We will continue the debate today, tonight, tomorrow and as long as senators wish to speak. Then, when senators have finished with the bill, we will have a vote. But I cannot at this time say when that will be, obviously because I do not know how many senators want to speak, how long their speeches will be, or, indeed, how many amendments might be proposed. All I can say is that the time will be made available to senators who want to participate and the vote will be held at a time convenient for both whips to deal with it. It is our hope that it will be done within the timeframe of this week. The same is true of these other bills.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Doody whether, once we begin the debate on third reading of Bill C-43 this afternoon, it will be continued uninterrupted until we come to a vote.

Senator Doody: The debate has already been started. It is now adjourned in the name of Senator Neiman, as I remember. It is the second order on the order paper today and, although I am being presumptuous, I think Senator Neiman will take up the debate and continue today. It is my hope that it will be continued until senators have finished what they have to say and that we can then get on with the vote.

We then come to Bill C-40, the Broadcasting Act. Honourable senators, these are tenuous grounds. This is not the House of Commons, where one lays down one's orders and says, "This is what we are going to do." What I am doing is asking for a consensus from senators, the ultimate object being to give senators a break by the end of this week. As I suggested the last time I went down this difficult lane, I myself am not as concerned about that as perhaps are others, because I spend most of my time here in Ottawa anyway. But I know that others have different plans and programs. If we can pull this together, and if things happen as I suggest they should, then we could perhaps look at an adjournment until the last week of February or even a little beyond that to early March. Once again, an adjournment date of that nature would, as always, be subject to a recall should something of importance arise, or should the Commons come up with some urgent legislation, or we do, or if the Gulf Crisis intervenes. Of course, we all know that; that is not something new.

I was just about to touch on two bills which we would like to deal with as well and which I had thought were sailing through without any difficulty. Bill C-81 deals with the United Nations convention on contracts for the international sale of goods. I remarked to the chairman of the committee that it would hardly upset the electorate in Twillingate if that bill did not pass immediately. However, it is such a small bill that it would look rather absurd remaining on the order paper without being dealt with. The Legal and Constitutional Committee has made arrangements to look at that and hopefully they will get it back to us in time for Friday.

The other bill, Bill C-82, deals with the port wardens for the harbour of Quebec and the harbour of Montreal. That is also a bill with which I am not very familiar, but one which I thought was not controversial and involved no great problems. It was scheduled to be dealt with by the Transport and Communications Committee this morning, but the meeting was cancelled and the committee decided not to look at it. I would very much appreciate it if that could be reconsidered and we could try to move along with that bill. However, once again, it is not an item over which I would ask the Senate to deny the membership a break.

There are a number of other bills which I will not bother enumerating at this point because they are either waiting for Royal Assent or are about to be reported. The Management Development Centre is to be reported from Finance, and one or two other bills are ready for third reading or Royal Assent.

Honourable senators, that is the timetable I propose. I would appreciate it if we could try to work together to achieve that end. We are entirely in the hands of the Senate. If honourable senators find this timetable is inconvenient and they cannot handle the schedule I have laid out, then of course we are available to come back next week or for however long it takes. I join with my colleagues in stating that I do not want to come back next week to deal with those bills, but I am quite prepared to do so.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not think I can add anything. Senator Doody has reviewed the government's program and I have nothing strong, positive or negative, to say about it. I understand his plans and he said nothing that would provoke a strong negative reaction from me.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, petitions against the GST addressed to me continue to come in. In each case, unless I make an exception, the petition contains approximately 20 names.

The first group is from Rochebaucourt in the province of Quebec. Some petitioners have given their postal code, which is J0Y 2P0. In each case, the petitioners are asking for the Senate to do everything it can—

[Translation]

> For these reasons, we humbly pray that senators and members of the Commons, the real representatives of the people, do whatever they can to oppose the new tax on goods and services, and we demand that a general election be held immediately.

[English]

The next petition is also from Quebec. It is personally signed by all the petitioners, many of them from the same area of Rochebaucourt. It seems that the petition has been circulated because it is in the form of an envelope with the printed address to me at my office here. On the front it states:

[Translation]

> No to the GST
> Please sign this petition.

[Senator Doody.]

[English]

I take it that the petitions are circulated and signed as they go around, which is some indication of the strength of feeling of these citizens from Rochebaucourt.

There are also some petitions from Montreal. All in all, there are nine petitions with some 20 to 25 names on each petition.

The next petition has a combination of names from Quebec and Ontario. There are also 12 petitions from Ontario, each of them fully signed in handwriting and every line taken up. Some of the addresses are in Oakville. There are a large number from Cambridge, which is the old City of Galt.

Here is one petition signed by a senior aged 73. Here is another one from Glencairn Avenue in Toronto. This petition contains a group from Mississauga. The next petition is fully signed by residents of St. Denis. The next two petitions are fully completed and are from Kitchener. There is a single petition from Regal Road in Toronto. The last one in today's batch is from Mississauga.

These petitions show that the people of Canada still oppose this tax and wish an opportunity to have an early election so that Parliament can do something about it.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps I could return to the business of the Senate for one second. Since I sat down, several senators have said to me that I did not mention the fact that there was to be a division this afternoon at 5:45 p.m. I do not want to mislead anyone. There is indeed a vote on Bill C-69, the restraints bill, at 5:45 p.m.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

DEADLINE EXTENDED FOR PRESENTATION OF COMMITTEE REPORT RESPECTING CHILD POVERTY

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

> That notwithstanding the Order of Reference of December 20, 1989, and the Order of Reference of June 27, 1990, the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was authorized to continue its examination of child poverty in Canada, be empowered to present its report no later than Thursday, March 28, 1991.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Before voting on the motion, I take it that the reason is that the committee is not fully ready to make its report. Does it require any more hearings or is it just a matter of getting the report ready and that the committee feels it can easily achieve the March 28 deadline?

• (1450)

Senator Robertson: We expect to table the report by Thursday of this week, Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: I see. I thought you said March.

Senator Robertson: It will be tabled this week. It is all ready for tabling, but Senator Marsden will not be here until tomorrow. There were a couple of technical difficulties. We had trouble getting the report out, as you probably know, and we lost our due date last fall with the other commotion. We want to table the report this week and get on with it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

TRANSPORT

PORT OF HALIFAX—IMPENDING COMPETITION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In this morning's Globe and Mail there is a story that the Port of Halifax may be in trouble from the Port of New York and the Canadian Pacific's strategy in buying the Delaware and Hudson Railway.

The president of the Port said that if CN would buy $30 million or $50 million worth of double-stacked container cars the port could combat this challenge. There is no cost saving in CN in buying this type of equipment—in fact, it is no cheaper than the equipment that they have now—but if someone else would supply it, then CN would be relieved of the ownership costs and could then pass this on. That is the only way to lower Halifax's costs to the shipping community, which are their largest customers.

I have two questions: First, is the government prepared to acquire this equipment and thereby relieve CN of equipment costs and return Halifax to a competitive position?

Secondly, is any government—presumably the Government of Nova Scotia—prepared to adjust taxes and other things to CN at the level that the U.S. government charges its carriers in taxes, depreciation, and so on? I believe that is what they term, to use an overused expression, a level playing field.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the questions raised by Senator MacDonald are as complex as they are important. I offer him a couple of alternatives. First, I would ask the minister who reports to Parliament for Canadian National, Mr. Lewis, to let me have a report on the position of the railway in this matter.

I can tell the honourable senator that the government has not considered taking the kind of initiative that he suggests—that is, to purchase those cars ourselves and provide them to Canadian National.

The other possibility is for the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to call the Minister of Transport, his officials and the Chief Executive Officers of Canadian National before the committee with a view to discussing the competitive position of the Port of Halifax and the various ways in which that position might be improved.

Perhaps if Senator MacDonald of Halifax had a word with the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications we might be able to ventilate these issues in the proper forum.

PERSIAN GULF WAR

CANADIAN INVOLVEMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate with regard to the Persian Gulf situation.

In the original discussions in the United Nations, if I understand their resolutions, the objective was to liberate Kuwait. Increasingly, however, we hear from American sources that their intention may be further than that and may involve completely breaking the war-making capacity of the Iraq government.

As this could conceivably mean a land advance at some stage beyond Kuwait and into Iraqi territory, could the minister indicate what the position of the Government of Canada will be in that regard? Will we support such a course of action, or are we simply involved in the liberation of Kuwait?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, in a word, the objectives of the Government of Canada are the objectives spelled out in the various United Nations Security Council resolutions pertaining to Iraq and Kuwait.

Senator Molgat: But, as I understand those resolutions, they deal strictly with the liberation of Kuwait. Do I take it, then, that the minister is saying that the Government of Canada and the Canadian forces will not be involved if it goes beyond the liberation of Kuwait?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I cannot say more than that Canada's objectives in the Gulf do not go beyond those spelled out in the resolutions that we supported and in some cases co-sponsored at the Security Council.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to questions asked by Senator Haidasz on November 15 and by Senator Kinsella on January 23.

PERSIAN GULF

PROTECTION AGAINST NERVE GAS—TESTING OF ANTIDOTE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 15, 1990, by the Honourable Stanley Haidasz regarding the Persian Gulf—Protection Against Nerve Gas—Testing of Antidote.

(The answer follows:)

The Canadian Government has the obligation to provide Canadian Forces personnel with the greatest protection possible against chemical attack. This is particularly important in that Iraq has in the past demonstrated its willingness to use chemical agents against military targets and its own civilian population.

Members of the Canadian Forces currently in the Persian Gulf are all adequately protected against a chemical attack. They are equipped with protective gear including masks and suits, and have all received training in the proper procedures in the event of a chemical attack.

As well, members of the Canadian Forces now in the Persian Gulf have been issued HI-6, which the Department of National Defence considers to be the most effective antidote available against all known nerve agents.

After review of the DND animal and laboratory test data, the results of similar tests carried out in other countries and the studies of HI-6 administration to humans in other countries, Health and Welfare Canada agreed to a study proposal from DND involving a small number of Canadian volunteers.

The Department of National Defence plans more tests with HI-6. However, HI-6 is considered by DND and Canadian Forces medical and scientific experts to be the most effective medication available against lethal nerve agents, and for this reason, it has been selected to protect CF personnel deployed in the Persian Gulf.

Early clinical trials with drugs are aimed at testing acute tolerance of the drug. In the case of HI-6, the Department of National Defence wanted to establish that HI-6, at the doses expected to be effective against nerve gas poisoning, would not cause such severe side effects that those who would be treated would be unable to function.

The consent form which was signed by volunteers participating in the HI-6 clinical trial had been carefully reviewed by Health and Welfare staff. The form met the Department's guidelines, as well as the ethical requirements established through the Medical Research Council's Guidelines on Research involving Human Subjects and the Declaration of Helsinki.

[Senator Doody.]

The consent form used in the HI-6 clinical trial contained a strong warning that potentially serious effects, including fatality, are always a possibility, as well as listing side effects and the possibility of sperm damage.

DND has submitted additional laboratory studies to Health and Welfare, as part of a request for the approval of a second clinical trial. These studies contain further evidence that HI-6 is a mutagen. Therefore, to provide additional information to volunteers, Health and Welfare has requested that the consent form for the second clinical trial contain a statement on the possibility that HI-6 may cause cancer.

CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

HATE LITERATURE LAWS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the following reply is in response to a question raised in the Senate on January 23, 1991, by the Honourable Noel Kinsella regarding the Charter of Rights and Freedoms—Hate Literature Laws—Government Policy.

(The answer follows:)

A federal-provincial working group was formed in 1988 at the direction of Federal, Provincial and Territorial Ministers Responsible for Criminal Justice to examine the operation of the Hate Literature provisions of the Criminal Code, including section 319 which deals with the wilful communication of statements promoting hatred. The working-group, comprised of representatives from the Department of Justice and the provinces of New Brunswick, Québec, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia began a review of the issues in September, 1988. On June 6, 1988 the Alberta Court of Appeal released its judgment in Keegstra v. The Queen, holding section 319 invalid under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. On July 29, 1988 the Ontario Court of Appeal upheld the section in the cases of Andrews and Smith.

In view of the appeals taken to the Supreme Court of Canada in these matters, completion of the working group's study was deferred pending their outcome. On December 13, 1990 the Supreme Court of Canada delivered its judgments in Keegstra and the related cases upholding the legislation.

The working-group has been re-convened at the call of the New Brunswick chair to complete its work in light of the Supreme Court's Reasons for Judgment in the recent decisions. The working-group is not a public forum. Any representations that community groups may wish to present concerning the legislation should be forwarded to the Department of Justice for consideration.

ABORTION BILL

THIRD READING—DEBATE SUSPENDED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips for the third reading of the Bill C-43, and Act respecting Abortion.—(Honourable Senator Neiman).

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I defer to Senator Fairbairn.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Thank you very much, Senator Neiman. Honourable senators, it is with the same concern and difficulty that all of us share that I rise to speak on Bill C-43, the bill that would amend the Criminal Code to re-establish the framework for what constitutes a legal abortion and under what circumstances it may take place.

● (1500)

This, as all senators appreciate, is a divisive, complicated and emotional issue. It is why we wanted to have full committee hearings, and it is why we are having a free vote on this bill.

In January, 1988, the Supreme Court struck down Canada's previous abortion legislation contained in section 251 of the Criminal Code as contrary to the integrity of a woman's person. I would like to quote from the judgment of former Chief Justice Dickson who stated:

> At the most basic, physical and emotional level, every pregnant woman is told by section 251 that she cannot submit to a generally safe medical procedure that might be a clear benefit to her unless she meets criteria entirely unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations . . .

He went on to state:

> Forcing a woman, by threat of criminal sanction, to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations, is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus a violation of security of the person.

Former Madam Justice Bertha Wilson found that under section 251 a woman's capacity to reproduce was subject not to her own control, but to the control of the state, thereby depriving the pregnant woman of both her right to security as well as her right to liberty.

While section 251 specified what constituted a legal abortion, its very form contributed to uneven and increasingly restricted access across the country. Senators will remember that under that section it was provided that abortions could take place on the judgment of a therapeutic abortion committee in Canadian hospitals, and that the procedure would be performed by a doctor who had not been part of that committee. It was left up to the hospitals across the country as to whether or not these therapeutic abortion committees would be set up. In some parts of the country, as we all know, they were not. Indeed, in one province of Canada, that of Prince Edward Island, there was no committee whatsoever.

The stated intent of this new bill is to ensure equal access on a national basis to ensure that the decision to have an abortion is based on sound reasons of the health or life of the female person being under threat, and to ensure that the procedure is performed safely by qualified medical personnel. For the purposes of the bill health includes physical, mental and psychological health. Under this amendment those who perform or undergo abortions that can be proven to have been performed outside the framework of the law are liable to criminal prosecution as specified in the amendment.

It is hard to see how this new provision will avoid, in my opinion, being struck down on the same grounds as its predecessor when it is constitutionally challenged, as we can be sure it will be, if proclaimed. This is an area of the legislation which I know will be discussed by other members of the committee.

It was the conclusion of many of our legal witnesses who appeared before the committee, including Professor Lorraine Weinrib of the Faculty of Law at the University of Toronto, who is also a senior advisor to the Government of Ontario in matters of constitutional law.

As a medical procedure, the safety of abortion, like the safety of any other medical procedure, is already covered under the Criminal Code and provincial health regulations pertaining to health care administered in a criminally negligent manner. If access were really the central issue, then, as suggested by the Government of Ontario, it could be addressed under the criteria of reasonable access in section 3 of the Canada Health Act, which reads as follows:

> It is hereby declared that the primary objective of Canadian health care is to protect, promote and restore the physical and mental well-being of residents of Canada and to facilitate reasonable access to health services without financial or other barriers.

In its presentation to our committee the Canadian Public Health Association suggested that abortion and pre- and post-abortion counselling be included in the Canada Health Act as essential or basic services. If not provided, then transfer payments could be withheld from provinces accordingly.

The Canadian Medical Association took the narrower view that under the Canada Health Act the federal government has jurisdiction only over payment for service—only the provinces have jurisdiction over whether a particular service will be provided. Nevertheless, the CMA also felt that the Canada Health Act could be used to apply financial sanctions. As senators will know, we had very conflicting evidence on this point from the Minister of Health, Perrin Beatty, and the Minister of Justice, Kim Campbell, who disputed whether the Canada Health Act could be a vehicle under which abortion could be covered.

Honourable senators, clearly there is more at stake here than medical safety and access. Bill C-43 has been deemed necessary because the government has promised that it will legislate in the area of abortion, whether or not it was really possible to devise truly good legislation. Added to that is the fact that abortion is clearly among the most emotionally charged and sharply divisive issues that we as legislators and, indeed, as a society, face today.

Despite fears in some quarters, the statistics indicate that the lack of an abortion law in the last three years has not resulted in an upsurge in the number of procedures. Nevertheless, the government in its wisdom has chosen to restore abortion to the Criminal Code rather than using the Canada Health Act. It has put Bill C-43 before Parliament as the compromise.

Like many of us, honourable senators, I have listened closely to the testimony of those who came before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and I am convinced that the bill is an acceptable compromise to virtually no one.

Those who want to prohibit abortion point out that Bill C-43 does not address their concern of guaranteeing and protecting the right to life of the fetus. To accomplish this, honourable colleagues, we would have to entertain an amendment to the Constitution, since no other law protects the fetus either.

We were told by groups such as the Alliance for Life and by witnesses such as Father De Valk that this law was not a law that they even wanted to amend. They did not want an abortion law. What they wanted was a law which would protect the right to life of the fetus from the moment of conception. The testimony is there to read. It is very compelling; in some cases, very stark. As we were told, in fact, this kind of law is truly an evil law because none of us—not one of us—has any right at any time to interfere with the right to life of the fetus.

We should note that the only protection of the fetus at this juncture exists not in Canadian law but in the medical Code of Ethics of doctors themselves through the surgeons' groups that exist—physicians and surgeons councils that exist in each province, as well as nationally. This protection is in the form of time limits on how late in a pregnancy an abortion can be performed. It is in the area of the doctor's own ethical commitment and policing that the only protection for the fetus currently exists.

Those who want access to abortion and the doctors who are caught in the crossfire point to the withdrawal of services that has already taken place in anticipation of the bill's proclamation. Both sides are united in their opposition to Bill C-43, and both sides presented well-reasoned arguments for why it is not an acceptable compromise. Both sides conclude that the government is simply wrong in claiming that the bill protects the fetus on the one hand and, on the other hand, offers a framework for equitable access for an abortion in Canada.

The Minister of Justice asked us in committee to try to distinguish between our own political position and our role as parliamentarians and the need to find common ground. In fact, it would not be too much to say that she gave us a bit of a lecture on this. She asked us to distinguish between the substantive value of the bill and concerns that have been expressed about its possible effect.

Honourable colleagues, I have to ask this: How can we evaluate the substantive value of a bill unless we listen to witnesses and consider the possible effects it may have and, in the case of the bill, the effects it is already having? It seems to me that a crucial test of the substance of the bill is whether it will have the effects that the government intended on those who must function under it. Will it do what the government claims for it?

The problem with this bill is that, as the saying goes, it is neither fish nor fowl. It glosses over the fundamental problem and avoids it, rather than attempting to provide clear guidance.

The Minister of Justice told the Senate committee that there were extraordinary distortions about the bill and its effect. She maintains this in spite of the fact that some of those opposed to abortion have vowed publicly to use this bill in every way they can to stop abortion and in spite of the numbers of physicians who have said they will withdraw their services when Bill C-43 is proclaimed.

A survey completed recently by the Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists Canada showed that 343 of the 760 practising obstetricians and gynaecologists who responded to the survey will cease to perform abortions if Bill C-43 becomes law. This number increased by 14 per cent since the first widely-published survey came out last July, in which 275 physicians said that this bill's passage would cause them to withdraw their services.

Further, in this latest survey, 60 doctors indicated that they had stopped doing abortions in the last six months, meaning that a total of 403 or 53 per cent of respondents either have withdrawn or plan to withdraw their services.

Honourable senators, one might conclude that if Bill C-43 itself has created such distortions even before it is passed, then it is truly a flawed piece of legislation, as virtually all of our witnesses told us. The most recent survey of the obstetricians and gynaecologists also showed that 112 or 15 per cent of the respondents have personally experienced harassment in the last two years. On behalf of its members, the society sought legal advice on what doctors might do to protect themselves from court action subsequent to providing abortion within this new law. Their members examined these proposed guidelines and found that complete compliance was virtually impossible. In their opinion, the use of such guidelines would create heavy pressure for desperate women to lie.

In addition, the cost to hospitals of administering these new psychiatric, psychological and psychosocial evaluations would be major in a time of health care restraint. Yet, without adopting such procedures, doctors who continued to perform abortions will have limited defence against those who say they will use this bill to escalate their harassment to the courts.

Ms. Campbell has said that it is shocking and outrageous that doctors would withdraw services in the face of potential consequences of this bill. They should refuse to be intimidated and they should clearly indicate such refusal. Well, it is easy to say that when one is far from the front lines of this issue. I suppose, honourable senators, if one reflects on the history of this issue over the last two decades, there are not very many doctors in Canada or in any other country who would willingly choose the kind of life that Henry Morgentaler has, as he has pursued this issue through the courts and, indeed, in jail.

As Nicole Duval Hesler, representing the Attorneys Against the Criminalization of Abortion, pointed out:

> Doctors are not heroes, nor should they have to be. The state ought let people be ordinary and the state ought not to make requirements of anyone that they be heroes. Let them lead ordinary lives using ordinary talents and ordinary commons sense.

Honourable colleagues, doctors are like any other professionals. In their field they perform with great skill and dedication many procedures other than abortion. They have many patients under their care and they have careers, families and homes. Why should we or the minister expect them to put everything at risk by continuing to perform this procedure once Bill C-43 is proclaimed, if it passes this house? For it is not criminal conviction so much as an escalation in harassment, violence and disruption that physicians fear most from the passage of this bill. The very initiation of a court challenge, whether or not it results in a conviction, constitutes a clear and inestimable threat in terms of time, stress, reputation and legal costs, both to their professional and personal lives.

We heard graphic testimony from service providers who have experienced intense harassment to the extent of picketing of private homes and families of doctors, and, in the case of a clinic, Everywoman's Centre in Vancouver, the purchase of property right next to the centre so that harassment could be carried on continually and without respite by those who oppose the freedom to have an abortion at that clinic. That clinic has also undergone considerable violence and was invaded and destroyed early last year by people who oppose the issue.

Members of the Criminal Lawyers Association believe, from the cases brought to date, that this law will definitely be used as an instrument of harassment against doctors. They observed that the bill is already having a chilling effect on the availability of therapeutic abortions and that things will only get worse. Representatives of the lawyers feel so strongly about this that they advised the Senate committee to request the government to provide transcripts of the legal opinions prepared for the government on this bill along with an assessment of the legal experiences of those who prepared those opinions. They provided a chronology of legal and harassing actions to support their contention, including private complaints against Dr. Morgentaler and Dr. Machebee in Quebec and the Daigle and Dodd cases which transfixed the nation two summers ago, the prosecution of Doctor Scott of the Scott Clinic in Toronto for assault and the tactics of some groups throughout Canada, which include sending children to the homes of clinic staff and their neighbours to say that the staff were killing babies.

The Canadian Medical Association feels so strongly about the potential danger of this bill that it has now dropped its recommendations to amend the bill and has asked us to defeat it outright. They point to the tremendous energy and resources that have been spent on the abortion issue in the face of desperately needed policies to prevent the need for an abortion in the first place, including counselling, family planning and contraceptive education. So physicians and lawyers understand the environment into which this bill will be thrust, should it become law, and they have conveyed its potential danger to us in the plainest of terms.

However, women are the persons most directly affected in this situation. Abortion becomes necessary to women when they find themselves pregnant without with the means, whether physical, emotional or financial, to bear and raise a child. Abortion is not a procedure that women choose lightly. Women do not become pregnant alone, yet often women must bear the consequences of an unwanted pregnancy alone. Women choose abortion, not as an alternative to contraception, but as a last resort in most cases. The fact that women must resort to it as much as they do tells us quite a lot about how we deal with our sexuality and with unwanted pregnancy in our society. Abortion can certainly be seen as one measure of our collective incapacity to prevent unwanted pregnancy. It is also an indicator that current forms of birth control are still unavailable or unworkable or unsafe for many women in Canada, and, clearly, it is an indicator of our inability to educate both our young men and women to respect one another and to take mutual responsibility in the areas of sexuality and reproductive health.

The demand for abortion is a symptom of a set of societal attitudes and causes that will not be addressed by criminalizing the symptom, nor by ignoring the kind of public harassment that has developed and is threatening access to safe medical procedures. We should not overlook another set of pressures which are so pervasive that no member of our society, least of all the vulnerable, can escape. We live in a highly visual environment in which we are continually bombarded with powerful, sophisticated images about the potential of our sexuality, about possible interactions with the opposite sex and the euphoria that will magically occur. The risk itself, as we were told by witnesses, becomes part of the thrill, and for young people and those with few opportunities in their lives it becomes a part of escaping from existences constrained by boredom, poverty and lack of direction and opportunity. In such an environment, as we heard from our witnesses, unwanted pregnancy should not really come as a surprise to any of us. In stark contrast to the imagery of popular culture, including music, film, television and commercial advertising, there is a dearth of strong, simple messages to promote healthy and equitable relationships, to maintain sexual health and to help individuals take practical responsibility for the consequences of their own actions. In the communication of information pertaining to virtually every other field, we are operating at increasingly aggressive and sophisticated levels. Yet, in the field of information about human sexuality, we are still largely in Victorian times. I think the AIDS crisis has brought this situation very graphically to the fore. Abortion, along with child and spousal abuse, has been the subject of less dramatic attention than AIDS, but clearly they are symptomatic of social inequity and the consequent personal tragedy that is every bit as unnecessary as the spread of AIDS.

Some groups, such as Alliance for Life, have advocated that we teach our children to say no to sex, to maintain their chastity. I can understand the desire to return to a simpler, more sheltered time, but, from a practical perspective, I cannot image how such messages would be an effective counter-measure in the prevailing climate. Also, I think that historically sexual ignorance and repression have not worked particularly well in the past, and in the current climate their effectiveness seems even less likely.

So, to my mind, unless we can give women and young people the tools of knowledge and self-esteem in the area of personal sexuality, we will not get very far in changing the circumstances that lead to unwanted pregnancy and abortion. We certainly will not eliminate the need for abortion by making it increasingly difficult to obtain a safe procedure.

From a jurisdictional perspective, this government has argued that it is up to the provinces to ensure that abortion services are provided and are accessible. It has been pointed out that the harassment of doctors and clinics is a matter of provincial, not federal, jurisdiction. That is fine in theory, except that the provinces have done very little to date to protect doctors, and that is certainly part of the reason why some doctors have already withdrawn services and why so many others say they are going to do so. Many of our witnesses, including the Government of Ontario, pointed out that provincial Attorneys General have been most reluctant to take action.

Regarding the availability of abortion services, we are hardly starting from a positive position. As I said earlier, I really do not have to tell you that access is highly uneven across the country, and in several provinces there is little or no service whatsoever. In most rural areas, and in the north, abortion services are non-existent.

The Minister of Health for Ontario enumerated for us a 70 to 80 per cent withdrawal of services in the regions of Ontario outside of Toronto. How can this bill establish or improve access when its main effect, even before passage, has been to drive doctors away from providing the service where it has been previously available? Withdrawal is expected to be greatest in hospitals because their public boards are likely to come under greater pressure than clinics, and yet, in most provinces, the procedure is only covered by health insurance if it is performed in a hospital. This trend will restrict access even further for those with the least ability to pay.

Honourable senators, I keep referring to the Ontario government because, although we invited participation from every provincial government on this issue, as the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee does on any issue that has a jurisdictional element to it, only the Ontario government chose to appear before our committee, and they wondered how the provinces could act to improve or even maintain access, even if they have the will and the resources to do it, if, under the new bill, fewer and fewer doctors are willing to perform the service?

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Further, in the face of this bill, areas like Toronto and Montreal, that have been reasonably well served by hospital procedures, are rapidly losing doctors willing to take the risk. We were told that the Montreal General Hospital, which provides a large proportion of the abortion services in the province of Quebec, will stop all procedures if this bill is proclaimed. Women's College Hospital in Toronto expects to have similar problems and, at the moment, is on notice by 30 per cent of its doctors that they will withdraw services if the bill becomes law.

The consequence can only be that desperate women, who lack the means to travel to the few remaining services or outside the country, will have to bear children they cannot support, or they will once again be forced, as they were 20 years ago, to submit to so-called back-street measures that will place their health at great risk. These are women who know they cannot nurture and care for a child as it should be cared for. In their situation, in their minds, an abortion is a more reasonable decision than bearing a child they cannot look after and who may end up neglected, abused or abandoned. In many cases, another child would mean that children already in a family would also suffer.

I find it incongruous that one of our witnesses advocated a complete moratorium, if we were able to get the national will to do it, on abortion for a number of years so that a substantial financial investment could be made in research on artificial ways of saving and sustaining fetuses when, as a society, we lack the means to look after and nurture the children and the families that are already here.

During the decade of the 1980s a constant one million Canadian children lived in poverty, a figure that is not improving. It became common public knowledge in the past decade that at least one out of ten Canadian women are abused by their partners and that about one out of four girls under the age of 18 are sexually abused. Do we really want legislation that puts further pressure on these women and the families they are trying to hold together? I ask that because we should understand that those women and very young teenagers are the ones who will bear the brunt of this law. They are the ones without the means or the support to travel even farther afield for the procedure.

Honourable senators, if we pass this legislation, are we, in good conscience, prepared to follow up with funds and policies to reduce the need for abortion? While the government has pledged money for research over the next three years—$500,000 a year—it is going to take much more than research to counter poverty and to educate and to change attitudes. We have yet to see the long-promised national child-care program from this government, something that is desperately needed to assist single and low-income parents in becoming self-sufficient.

Another indicator of our approach to family policy leads us to consider the fact that the Family Allowance has steadily declined in real value since its introduction in 1945. Related to this, food banks have become a major source of nutrition for families on welfare, who cannot absorb even one extra expense each month, such as a medical prescription. More and more the food banks and soup kitchens report that children are coming in on their own.

Honourable colleagues, abortion is a symptom of family and individual ignorance, poverty and desperation. I do not believe Bill C-43 addresses those symptoms in a way that would be beneficial for those who are most likely to have to resort to it. It does not deal with the reasons why abortion becomes necessary, nor will it reduce the demand for abortion. As parliamentarians, we, as much as our colleagues in the House of Commons, are charged with making workable legislation whose intent is clear and unequivocal. If we cannot bring ourselves to give credence to the expert witnesses and the responsible citizens who presented their cases in good faith before our committee—if our only response to them, their experience and well-thought-out concerns is to talk about distortion and rhetoric—then I wonder whether we are living up to our responsibilities.

I have been persuaded by what the committee heard that this is a badly flawed and potentially dangerous bill. The Minister of Justice said many times, including during her first appearance before the committee, that Bill C-43 will not be proclaimed if the effect of proclamation is to thwart the intent of Parliament. Honourable colleagues, the stated intent of Parliament to ensure access through Bill C-43 has already been thwarted by the fact that, in direct anticipation of its passage, so many doctors have either withdrawn their services or have stated they will do so.

The message of our meetings was clear, and we, as individual senators, have choices to make. We can pass the bill and hope for the best. We can amend Bill C-43, and some of my colleagues have amendments they would like to bring forward. A possible amendment would be to make it mandatory for the Attorney General to give consent for pursuing prosecutions under this law. But the minister feels that any amendment should come from the government and has asked us to pass the law and leave it to her to deal with the separate process after Royal Assent. We do not have an ironclad guarantee she will do so, although she has said in good faith that she will. We also do not have a guarantee that any successor, if there were to be a change, would be bound by the commitments of the current minister.

Our third option is to defeat the bill. One does not come to this conclusion lightly. Based on my convictions, which were heightened by the testimony of the witnesses heard in committee, I will vote against this bill; and I would urge my colleagues on both sides of the house to consider the evidence heard by our committee, which is now available to us in proper form, in an effort to consolidate their views and make up their individual minds. Thank you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Senator Spivak?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton: If Senator Spivak would allow me a moment I would like to say that I appreciated the thoughtful presentation of Senator Fairbairn. I hope she will allow me to correct an error that was made by a witness she quoted; that is, that were this bill to be passed, the Montreal General Obstetrics Department would no longer allow abortions to be performed on its premises. Since it performs 4,000 abortions per year and is one of the largest facilities of its kind in Canada, I was startled by that assertion, and I took it upon myself to check with Dr. Gillett, the head of the department, who assures me that, while he and his colleagues are unhappy with this bill, they feel that their professional ethics are such that they must provide certain services within the department, including abortion, and that it is not their intention to close down that facility if this bill is passed.

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you, Senator Lynch-Staunton. As you know, we heard this from more than one witness. It was startling and, indeed, disturbing because the Montreal General serves not only Montreal but a huge part of the province of Quebec; and I am pleased to hear that.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, what is striking about the testimony before the Senate Committee on Bill C-43 was not that all representatives of groups, institutions and communities told us to oppose the bill, but that those who did so had such divergent opinions on the vital matter under discussion. The Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Justice, as well as the Law Reform Commission, which appeared before us, supported passage of the bill. But women's organizations, labour groups, church groups and clergymen, legal and constitutional experts, doctors, and community organizations that provide reproductive health services for women, urged us to reject the bill.

It seems, then, that the laudable objective of attempting to find a legislative compromise between strongly-held positions on the question of abortion has failed the empirical test. Bill C-43 is not viewed as an acceptable compromise by those who appeared before us, as Senator Fairbairn pointed out, nor can one say that it is supported by a majority of Canadians.

The Minister of Justice and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, notwithstanding the testimony, before both the House of Commons and the Senate, urged senators, as parliamentarians, to show leadership and pass this bill. In my opinion, one could only do so if one decided that the testimony of those most directly affected could be dismissed as having no compelling logic, and as being the voice of special interest groups. But I am not at all convinced that that is the case. As one of those who was present for most of the committee meetings, and because the report of the committee was deliberately brief, I think it is important to delineate the arguments and reasons, based on the evidence, that led to my conclusions about this bill.

Those who appeared before us supporting the anti-choice position rejected this bill because it permits abortion for therapeutic reasons, not only when the life of the mother is at risk. As Senator Fairbairn pointed out, they wanted a law to protect the fetus from the moment of conception. For me, however, the arguments against the bill that were most convincing were those that expressed the view that the use of the criminal power to regulate abortion is inappropriate, unnecessary, and should be opposed for reasons of principle and practice.

The real question here is not only abortion in isolation, but the issue of the reproductive health of women. One of the constitutional experts told us that one cannot produce a "system of reproductive health and one cannot protect and forward reproductive health values through the instrument of criminal law." The Canadian Medical Association told us that the "decision to perform an abortion is a medical act and should continue to be a confidential decision made between the patient and her physician in a responsible, informed way after all options have been carefully considered."

In presenting the bill, the Minister of Justice defended the use of the criminal power as the only substantive area of federal jurisdiction under which an abortion law can be created. In her remarks to the committee she said, and I quote:

[Translation]

> The only power Parliament has under the Constitution in this respect is the power it has to legislate in criminal matters. When we tabled Bill C-43, we used that power to create a national standard that would provide under what circumstances abortion could or could not be induced in Canada. The legality of all abortions induced in Canada would depend on whether or not they were done for reasons of health. What we are saying is that abortion is a health matter. The provinces must bear this in mind when they budget for health services.

[English]

Yet constitutional and legal experts appearing before us testified that Bill C-43 neither provided a national standard of entitlement nor affected provincial jurisdiction. Requiring medical justification for legal abortion will not create a national standard of entitlement of abortion for Canadian women. In essence, the argument that was given is that an exemption from prohibition in the Criminal Code based on life or health such as that contemplated in Bill C-43 carries no greater weight in guaranteeing access to abortion or limiting provincial jurisdiction than would exist if there were no abortion law.

The existence of a federal criminal law prohibiting abortion in certain circumstances does not preclude valid provincial laws whose effect is to restrict access to abortions in other circumstances. Provincial laws will stand or fall based solely on the determination of the courts as to whether they encroach upon the federal criminal law power and whether they violate provisions of the Constitution.

Professor Lorraine Weinrib, in her testimony before the committee, stated that:

> . . . what provides a national standard of entitlement is the Charter. The Supreme Court of Canada has said that section 7 of the Charter guarantees women access to health care free of liability under the criminal sanction . . . and that that standard applies federally and provincially.

[Senator Spivak.]

We were also told that the vagueness of the eligibility criteria, which will cause uncertainty and inequity in interpretation, militates against the establishment of national standards.

The Canadian Medical Association, the Criminal Lawyers Association, the Canadian Abortion Rights Action League, the Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists, as well as other groups, all presented arguments against the inappropriate and unnecessary use of the criminal law power to regulate abortion. A summary of the basis of the opposition might go like this, and I will try to be brief because Senator Fairbairn has dealt in some detail with the harassment issue:

First, the bill singles out abortion as the only recognized medical act to attract criminal sanctions. Second, the inclusion of abortion in the Criminal Code threatens the value of the physician-patient relationship. Third, the bill will have a "chilling" effect on the provision of services, as doctors have threatened to withdraw services if Bill C-43 is passed, thus reducing access to services and perhaps leading to a violation of a woman's right pursuant to section 7 of the Charter. It could lead to the potential harassment of women and providers of abortion services, not just doctors. The standard of life and health in the proposed legislation is unacceptably vague and an inadequate standard for determination of criminal liability. The decision to permit an abortion ought not to be premised on whether a woman must be physically or mentally unwell. Bill C-43, it was claimed, is not only unnecessary but poses a real threat to existing abortion services and women's reproductive health.

Of course, legal and constitutional experts claimed also that the bill was unconstitutional on the face of it, or would prove to be unconstitutional after its passage generally on the same grounds as the old legislation. I await Senator Beaudoin's comments on this and will not go into it.

I want to deal briefly with some of the issues. It was argued that it is the threat of prosecution, even the spectre of frivolous prosecution, of the nuisance value and publicity, not necessarily the fear of conviction, that will have a chilling effect on doctors and patients. We were reminded that changes to the Criminal Code in 1969 came about because doctors did not want to be subject to criminal liability. It was not through the action of women's groups, which were then not sufficiently organized.

Under the old section 251 of the Criminal Code, doctors were shielded from criminal liability by hospital therapeutic abortion committees. The retreat that doctors are now making from performing abortions, those that are, and the threat of further retreat is a reaction to the mere inclusion of abortion in the Criminal Code. We were told that the number of physicians threatening to withdraw services, as Senator Fairbairn said, increased after the Minister of Justice sent out an information document in October 1990 for the simple reason that physicians began to understand more fully the risks involved, and indeed had been advised of their position more fully by consultation with legal counsel.

This could create problems of access, especially for young women, poor women and women in rural communities, which, coupled with the problems of delay, uncertainty, stress and ultimate denial of abortions in some cases on grounds other than therapeutic, gave rise to concerns that this bill will have a negative impact on the provision of health care services. One can easily envision that hospitals will introduce multi-step processes, psychiatric assessment, psychological testing, psychosocial evaluation to minimize the chance of prosecution. It suggests, as I have said, that the same access problem that was fatal to the validity of the previous legislation in the Morgentaler case of 1988 could occur under the new legislation.

Women seeking abortions, those who have had abortions, physicians and health care workers may be harassed under this legislation, legal and medical groups claimed, through the laying of private information. Women can face aiding and abetting charges and counselling and conspiracy charges for trying to end an unwanted pregnancy.

The Daigle case was pursued in the absence of a criminal law in place; the injunction was based on the alleged father's rights. Under Bill C-43, according to the Criminal Lawyers Association, one could be able to allege that a crime was about to take place. It is this threat that prompted the Canadian Medical Association, as well as the Canadian Bar and the Criminal Lawyers Associations, to recommend an amendment to Bill C-43, while the bill was being considered in the House of Commons, to the effect that there be no prosecution under the legislation without the consent of the provincial Attorney General. The Minister of Justice, as we have heard, is sufficiently alarmed to have promised that the bill will not be proclaimed until doctors' fears are allayed. Yet neither the amendment nor the delay in proclamation will remove the criminalization of the abortion procedure.

A very significant aspect of the bill causing concern to doctors and those providing the service to women is the impact this legislation may have on the physician-patient relationship. The principal vehicle for the delivery of health care in our society is the doctor-patient relationship. Trust and confidentiality is integral to that relationship and so is the ability of the patient to be frank. From the point of view of the woman, this legislation may discourage frankness, without which proper diagnosis, prognosis and prescription may be threatened. A woman's entire medical record may one day come under the scrutiny of a criminal trial. Her "priorities and aspirations" must be seen by the doctor to satisfy the statutory standard.

From the point of view of the doctor, he has to "operate with an eye to the possible legal actions that will be permitted because of the bill." The advice given to the Society of Gynaecologists and Obstetricians is witness to the feeling of doctors that they need to document, and to exercise extra care. It was claimed that this poisons the doctor-patient relationship, that it attacks it at its core.

These arguments speak to the inappropriateness of using the Criminal Code to regulate abortion. But witnesses have argued that the enactment of Bill C-43 is unnecessary. To quote the Canadian Medical Association again:

> If it is believed that professional standards are sufficient grounds on which to base medical opinion—and if abortion is a medical procedure, and if abortions really are justified when they are based on medical opinions formulated on the basis of standards of the profession—then what need is there for the bill?

For 14 years Quebec has operated without enforcing the criminal law and for three years since the Morgentaler decision the rest of Canada has done so, and the situation has been characterized by a responsible adherence to medical standards. The view of the Canadian Medical Association is that there is no need for "further legislated regulation of abortion and even less need for the imposition of criminal sanctions." Other groups testified that abortion, like any other health matter, is already regulated by legislation, regulation and policies at the federal and provincial levels.

Various sections of the Criminal Code all speak to the prevention of abuses. Provincial health disciplines legislation prohibits the practice of medicine by people who are not doctors, and establishes medical standards. Doctors can also be disciplined by their professional bodies such as the College of Physicians and Surgeons or the Medical Society. All provincial physicians' associations, as well as the Canadian Medical Association, have adopted abortion policies.

Some witnesses argued that the Canada Health Act could be used to solve the problem of unequal access to abortion services, through the withholding of federal medicare transfer payments to provinces which fail to meet the standards within the act. The evidence presented was inconclusive. Some argued that it was a question of amending the Canada Health Act, some of enforcing its provisions, but agreed that such actions were surely dependent upon the political will of the federal government. However, there was agreement that leadership should be exercised by the federal government in producing a coherent policy on sexual and reproductive health, (which was omitted from the Department of National Health and Welfare's "Health for All" policy initiative.)

Apart from all these arguments surrounding criminalization, Bill C-43, in my view, is based on an equally flawed premise, that being the position in which it places a woman in need of abortion services, vis-à-vis her attending physician. In fact, I consider this premise to be the paramount reason for rejecting this legislation.

Under this legislation the ultimate decision as to whether or not to terminate her pregnancy, essentially a profound moral and ethical decision as well as a medical one, is made not by the woman herself but by her doctor who, representing the state, must apply the test of whether the pregnancy she wishes to terminate is likely to threaten her life or health, "mental, physical or psychological". This is conceptually contrary to the doctrine of informed consent, which assumes an autonomous patient. The role of the physician is to inform the patient, the role of the patient is to decide. What should the role of the state be in this fundamentally important and private decision?

Madame Justice Bertha Wilson in the Morgentaler decision presents us with the clearest views on this issue. Basing her decision in that case on the fundamental principles of liberty, security of person and freedom of conscience in a free and democratic society, guaranteed in the Charter, she begins her argument with the right to liberty guaranteed in the Canadian Charter. She states:

> Thus, an aspect of the respect for human dignity on which the Charter is founded is the right to make fundamental personal decisions without interference from the state. This right is a critical component of the right to liberty.

She goes on to quote Justice Blackmun of the American Supreme Court, who stated:

> "Few decisions are more personal and intimate, more properly private, or more basic to individual dignity and autonomy than a woman's decision—with the guidance of her physician and within limits specified in Roe—whether to end her pregnancy. A woman's right to make that choice freely is fundamental".

Justice Wilson concludes that the "right to personal liberty contained in Section 7 guarantees to every individual a degree of personal autonomy over important decisions intimately affecting their private lives" and that a woman's decision to terminate her pregnancy "falls within this class of protected decisions."

In speaking to the question of the right of security of the person, and whether the old Section 251 had violated that right, she makes the fundamental statement of principle, which I believe is applicable to this bill as well. If a woman's capacity to reproduce is not to be subject to her own control, but to that of the state, then she is truly being treated as a "means to an end which she does not desire but over which she has no control. She is the passive recipient of a decision made by others as to whether her body is to be used to nurture new life. Can there be anything that comports less with human dignity and self-respect?"

The freedom of conscience argument for the right of the woman to choose is summed up thus:

> "Accordingly for the state to take sides on the issue of abortion, as it does in the impugned legislation, by making it a criminal offence for the pregnant woman to exercise one of her options is not only to endorse, but also to enforce, on pain of further loss of liberty through actual imprisonment, one conscientiously held view at the expense of another".

One should note that, in Justice Wilson's opinion, a woman's right here is not unlimited but is limited by the stage of development of the fetus, so that in the early stages the woman's autonomy would be absolute; but at some point in the development of the fetus, the state's interest in its protection becomes "compelling", that point, perhaps, falling somewhere in the second trimester. This view is based on the decisions of the American Supreme Court, particularly Roe vs Wade which held that a pregnant woman had the right to decide whether or not to terminate her preganancy in the first trimester, subject only to the requirement that a physician must do the abortion, but that once the fetus is viable, that state interest becomes compelling. The state may thus proscribe its premature removal, except to preserve the mother's life or health.

The fundamental values of our society protected under the Charter, values of individual dignity, equality and fairness, were those which the Supreme Court used as the basis for its deliberation on the old law, and those that it upheld.

In the opinion of one constitutional expert, the significance of the Morgentaler judgment is that, "through the the established modes of Charter review, the members of the majority rejected those substantive features of Section 251 that undermined the autonomy and equality of women in Canadian society. The yet unlearned lesson of Morgentaler is that the state cannot subordinate the constitutionally protected autonomy and equality of women in Canadian society to other concerns that bear a lesser constitutional weight."

Justice Wilson makes the point that women's needs and aspirations are only now being translated into protective rights. The right to reproduce or not to reproduce is one such right and is properly perceived, she says, as an integral part of modern woman's struggle to assert her dignity and worth as a human being.

Thus, I think that Bill C-43 is a backward step, not just because it criminalizes abortion, but because it fails to conceptualize within its provisions the status of women, equally capable as men, of making decisions about the use of their own bodies.

In fact the bill has been quaintly termed "antique," because of its attempt to approach new issues with an old instrument. It does not deal with new technological developments in medical science, engendering different and difficult ethical considerations, now being studied by a royal commission. It does not address the need for an improved reproductive health care policy; the vital need to reduce the high incidence of abortions, especially late abortions; sex education, family planning assistance, access to safe early abortion, and other important questions.

If this bill is passed, the struggle in Canada will then focus on its constitutionality. If it is not passed, the efforts of all those involved will be directed to providing women with health care for their needs. Frankly, my choice is the latter.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if we can have leave to interrupt this debate to permit Senator Stewart to speak on a bill that was referred to by Senator Doody in his "must have" list today, so that that bill can be referred to committee. I believe that Senators Roblin and Stewart have conferred and have agreed that the bill in question could go to committee quite smartly if we allowed Senator Stewart the opportunity to speak at this point. We can then resume the debate on Bill C-43.

• (1610)

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Debate on third reading of Bill C-43 suspended.

EUROPEAN BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT BILL

SECOND READING

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 4:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C. for the second reading of the Bill C-88 An Act to provide for the membership of Canada in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.—(Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough)).

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, Bill C-88 would provide for membership of Canada in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. On Thursday last Senator Doody moved second reading of this bill. I recommend his carefully prepared explanation of the bill to all honourable senators.

I do not want to comment now on the substance of the bill, but it would be helpful if the bill received second reading at this time and then be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. That would permit the committee to meet as early as tomorrow to hear witnesses, with the thought that if nothing unexpected appeared we would be able to report later in the week.

In saying that I make two assumptions: One is that the government would provide all the necessary witnesses to defend the bill before the committee; the other is that the committee could have permission to sit tomorrow afternoon, even though the Senate might then be sitting. On the basis of those two assumptions, I think the bill should be given second reading at this time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Doody speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have little to add to what Senator Stewart said. I thank senators for their consideration in this regard. I certainly will do everything I can to ensure that the necessary witnesses are made available. We will certainly try to make the necessary arrangements for a committee room, and so on, and when the appropriate time comes I will move that the bill be referred to the appropriate committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

ABORTION

THIRD READING—DEBATE RESUMED

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 2:

Resuming from earlier this day the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips, for the third reading of Bill C-43 An Act respecting Abortion.—(Honourable Senator Kirby).

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, in rising to speak on Bill C-43, I should like to address three broad concerns. First, I wish to comment briefly on the debate in this country about the basic issue of whether or not a new abortion bill is necessary.

Secondly, I want to focus more specifically on the legislation before us, Bill C-43. In so doing, I should like to explain why I believe that this is an extremely poor piece of public policy.

Finally, I shall conclude by explaining why I intend to vote against this bill and why, at the very least if this bill is to pass, it must be amended in at least one way.

The first issue I should like to address briefly is the ongoing debate on the abortion issue in this country. This debate has been with us ever since the Supreme Court struck down the law on abortion in 1988. Since that time, in 1988 both pro-life and pro-choice groups have been battling each other in legislatures, in the courts and in the media. Indeed, it is fair to say that massive public relations efforts have been mounted by both sides of this issue in an effort to influence the government and the legislators' response to the Supreme Court decision.

Before beginning a detailed examination of the resulting legislation, Bill C-43, it is helpful to comment briefly on the public debate that has surrounded this bill, because it is only through an understanding of the contrasting arguments on this issue that one can begin to decide whether or not to support or oppose this bill. I wish to add parenthetically that it was in the course of such an examination that I concluded that I could not support this bill.

Canadians have varying moral, philosophical and religious beliefs about the issue of abortion. Unfortunately, by focusing exclusively on these beliefs, public debate in this country has effectively obscured much of the other aspects of the abortion issue. If we are to look at abortion in a fair and balanced way, we must also examine the issue from a public health perspective, as well as from the perspective of the implications of this law not only on the fetus but also on the pregnant woman. Indeed, any discussion of abortion must involve not only the pregnant woman and the fetus but also the resources and support services available to the pregnant woman. In a moment I will comment specifically on the lack of these services and of financial support.

Before doing that I should like to make the observation that there is one element of inconsistency in this public debate which has troubled me for some time. It is somewhat ironic that the rights of the pregnant woman are essentially ignored by the pro-life movement in its arguments against abortion. To the pro-life movement the pregnant woman becomes essentially merely a receptacle or a baby-machine and pro-life or anti-choice advocates ignore the rights of the pregnant woman while concentrating their entire attention on the rights of the fetus. If we accept that argument, we are essentially saying that one individual—in this case, the fetus—can dictate to another, namely, the pregnant woman, how she should live her life. If the fetus can dictate to the mother to carry it to term, why can't the pregnant woman decide what to do with her own body? In other words, we are left inevitably with the dilemma of trying to balance the rights of the fetus on the one hand and the rights of the pregnant woman on the other.

It was exactly to that issue and that balance of rights that the Supreme Court addressed itself when it wrote its decision on Morgentaler in 1988. In that decision Chief Justice Dickson, writing for the majority of justices who decided that the previous abortion bill should be thrown out on constitutional grounds, said the following. I call the attention of senators to this quote because it crystallizes the fundamental problem in dealing with this issue in the law. Chief Justice Dickson stated:

● (1620)

> Forcing a woman, by threat of criminal sanction, to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations, is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus a violation of security of the person.

I strongly support Chief Justice Dickson's position and would argue that any abortion bill which violates this position should not be supported by honourable senators or by Parliament.

Indeed, it is worth noting that Canadians as a whole reflect Chief Justice Dickson's position. When they are asked for their views on the abortion issue in public opinion polls, support for the so-called pro-life position has continued to hover around 10 per cent to 15 per cent, while more than 60 per cent of Canadians have shown consistently in poll after poll they are in favour of the pro-choice position. In particular, they are opposed to Bill C-43.

A Gallup poll conducted in January, 1990 found that only 12 per cent of Canadians supported the pro-life position. Similarly, a public opinion poll conducted last October came up with exactly the same result. Moreover, when Canadians have been asked in public opinion polls whether they agree or disagree with the criminalization of abortion as contained in Bill C-43, again, consistently, 60 per cent to 70 per cent have said they disagree. When asked specifically whether or not they agree with the idea that an abortion is a medical decision that should rest with a woman in consultation with her physician, roughly 75 per cent of Canadians agree.

[Senator Kirby.]

I give honourable senators this public opinion data not because I believe that we ought to make decisions in this chamber based on the results of public opinion polls, but because I think that repeated polls on this particular issue show that the view of the abortion issue, as expressed in the quote of Chief Justice Dickson from his 1988 decision in Morgentaler is a view supported by a vast majority of Canadians.

It is wrong to suggest, as some do, that being pro-choice means being in favour of abortion on demand. As long as abortion is a medical procedure it will not be available on demand. The decision to have an abortion involves a confidential decision-making process between doctor and patient, after they, together, have reviewed the clinical situation and the psychological position of the pregnant woman and the options open to her. This is not abortion on demand.

Indeed, since the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the abortion law, over three years ago yesterday, doctors and patients have been left to make their own private decisions. Frankly, in my opinion, this system has worked well. The rate of abortions in this country has not increased in spite of the very dire predictions by pro-life groups at the time or the Morgentaler decision came down that the result would be that the number of abortions would spiral unless a new law were in place. All the evidence shows that has not happened.

On the other hand, if we look to international experience in other countries with abortion legislation we learn that restrictive legislation is not the answer. For example, in Ireland, the rights of the fetus are enshrined in the constitution. Yet, in spite of that fact, statistics from the World Health Organization show that Ireland has the highest per capita abortion rate of any developed country in the world. Clearly, it does not follow that abortions will be limited simply because the fetus is granted rights. What does follow is that abortions which are dangerous to the health of the pregnant woman—so-called back-alley abortions—will increase dramatically, as the experience in Ireland has shown.

To take another international example, in Brazil abortion is frowned upon by church and state. Nevertheless, Brazil leads the world in the absolute number of abortions conducted in any country. In a country of 145 million people, between three million and five million clandestine abortions take place every year. About 10,000 women die each year of self-induced abortions in Brazil. Statistics from the World Health Organization show that worldwide some 200,000 women die annually of complications related to illegal abortions.

These facts and others which are available tell us clearly that the way to reduce the number of abortions in Canada is not through criminalization. A key ingredient in reducing the number of abortions in Canada is clearly education. Educating Canadians, in particular young Canadians, about sexuality, birth control and contraception will help to reduce abortion. International statistics bear this out.

International statistics also show that another way to reduce abortion is through improved social services which help single mothers to cope psychologically as well as financially. This is how the number of abortions in Canada can be reduced.

One thing that seems very clear to me is that the number of abortions in Canada will not be reduced by cutting funding to people who need abortion services or, indeed, to mothers who want to keep their children but find it financially difficult to do so. The fact of the matter is that since this government came to power in 1984 the annual government contributions to Planned Parenthood have been cut by 50 per cent. Clearly, the government has abdicated its role in education. Indeed, when one looks at the cuts this government has made in other areas of social services we see that it has also abdicated its role in the provision of social services to women who would like to keep their children.

Polls show that less than one-half of Canadians feel that they have sufficient access to family planning information services. In my region of the country only one-third of Atlantic Canadians say they have adequate access to family planning information of any kind. Nationally, nearly one-half the schools in Canada do not offer any sex education classes.

This government, through Bill C-43, wants to introduce legislation criminalizing abortion, but it is not ready to address the more effective methods of redressing the number of abortions, such as through education or financial support for pregnant women. Surely, honourable senators, the prevention of unwanted pregnancies and support for pregnant women must be the watchword if we are to reduce the number of abortions in Canada. Restricting abortion without addressing any of the causes of abortion will achieve nothing except more back-alley abortions.

Bill C-43 will reduce access but not the number of abortions. A closer examination of this legislation shows this extremely clearly. It is to this issue that I would now like to turn.

Bill C-43 is bad legislation in law, and bad public policy. It is bad legislation in part because, as I have already indicated, on a moral basis it is not representative of the views of Canadians. It is bad public policy because this bill will not achieve its stated objective of reducing the number of abortions. I emphasize this because of the position taken by the Minister of Justice before the Senate committee. Bill C-43 will not be applied uniformly across the country. Indeed, in her testimony before the Senate committee, and in a variety of interviews she has done elsewhere, Justice Minister Campbell has offered the following two arguments in support of the proposed legislation. I will state her arguments and then tell you why both arguments are completely fallacious. I find it hard to believe that the Minister of Justice does not understand that.

The first argument as to why honourable senators ought to support Bill C-43 is the following: The Minister of Justice said that requiring a medical justification for a legal abortion will create a national standard of entitlement to abortion for Canadian women. In a moment I will show you how patently false that statement is by simply referring to the Atlantic region.

The Justice Minister makes a second argument as to why we should support Bill C-43 by saying that it is necessary for Parliament to use its criminal law power to restrict the ways in which provincial legislatures can restrict access to abortion. With respect to this second point, 17 leading legal scholars from across the country say that the federal government is wrong to make that claim.

I should like to cite Professor Ryder, of Osgoode Hall Law School, because he is constantly being quoted by the Minister of Justice for his outstanding legal opinion on this issue and on a variety of other issues. Professor Ryder, addressing specifically the points which I just gave, namely, that Justice Minister Campbell has made, said the following:

> Bill C-43 creates no entitlement whatsoever. It will do nothing to remove the provinces' ability to replace restrictions on funding and access to abortion. The purpose of criminal law is to punish, deter and stigmatize conduct that is inimical to the public interest. Criminal law takes the form of a prohibition, coupled with a penalty. Given these characteristics of criminal provisions it is an oxymoron to speak of a criminal law entitlement. Indeed, recriminalizing abortion will place the procedure once again under a shroud of immorality, and consequently will deter women from seeking access and will deter doctors, hospitals and governments providing abortion services. This suggests that the true basis of Bill C-43 is the government's accordance of a moral status to the fetus that transcends and is independent of a woman's priorities and aspirations.

Professor Ryder concludes his remarks by saying:

> The Justice Minister has claimed that "by occupying the field" of abortion regulation with Bill C-43, the doctrine of federal paramountcy will prevent the provinces from further restricting access. With all due respect, the Justice Minister is relying on a long abandoned conception of federal paramountcy.

I give you that quote, honourable senators, because Professor Ryder is regarded by the Minister of Justice as a very strong constitutional and legal expert whom she has quoted on many occasions in connection with this issue as well as several others.

Sixteen other legal scholars concurred with that statement by Professor Ryder. Professors at the University of Victoria Law School, for example, said that the Minister of Justice was simply wrong. The University of British Columbia Law Faculty said that there was no legal foundation for the minister's arguments. Professors from the Law Faculty of the University of Ottawa said that the minister's arguments were totally without merit from a constitutional point of view. Experts from the Law School at the University of Saskatchewan agreed. They called the minister's arguments fallacious and not representative of a sound interpretation of constitutional law.

It is clear, honourable senators, that the legal validity and logic of the second reason why the Minister of Justice said that this bill ought to be supported—that is, that it is necessary for Parliament to use its criminal law power to restrict the ways in which provincial legislatures can restrict access to abortion—has been completely destroyed by leading scholars from one end of the country to the other.

Yet the Minister of Justice continues to turn a deaf ear to those comments. She continues to adopt the position which this government has adopted with respect to other issues. One thinks notably of Meech Lake and the GST. The minister continues to take the position that "It is my way or no way," and that no amendments can be made to this bill.

It is interesting to note the testimony of witnesses who have appeared before the House of Commons committee and the Senate committee on this bill. The House committee heard 52 witnesses. Of those 52 witnesses, 46 were opposed to the bill. Yet not one amendment came from the committee. Similarly, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs heard 38 witnesses. Only four of those 38 witnesses expressed support for the bill, and two of those four witnesses were federal cabinet ministers.

Indeed, Senator Nurgitz, in reporting to this house on January 23, said, on page 1536 of the Debates of the Senate, the following:

> The remainder of the witnesses opposed the bill. They did so on religious, medical, social, legal, constitutional and conceptual grounds.

Groups that call themselves pro-life were adamantly opposed to this bill. They wanted the bill killed. The maker of the film, "The Silent Scream", which is a very controversial pro-life film, told the Senate committee that the bill should not be supported.

The Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists told the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee that over 200 more doctors will cease performing abortions if this legislation is passed. These 200 doctors are in addition to the 60 or 70 who have already stopped performing abortions, according to the Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists. The society then proceeded to present to the committee a poll of 760 of its members. This poll showed that over 85 per cent of the obstetricians and gynaecologists in Canada oppose this legislation. Only 13 per cent were in favour of Bill C-43.

The President of the Canadian Medical Association, Dr. Lionel Lavoie, said that if Bill C-43 is passed, it will result in a series of legal battles. He argues that the bill will perpetuate the harassment of doctors and women by picketers, which will inevitably lead to frivolous legal charges that could permanently destroy professional reputations.

Testimony before the Senate committee by Dr. Judith Kazimirski of the Canadian Medical Association echoed these sentiments. Under the Criminal Code, medical practitioners are liable if they make a mistake. That is what malpractice suits are all about. However, this bill—Bill C-43—will make doctors, their assistants and nurses, liable for performing a legitimate medical procedure. Pro-life groups in Canada have already indicated they are willing to use this law to lay charges against all those involved in the procurement of an abortion. Thus, pro-life groups are saying that they will use Bill C-43 to harass doctors and their patients, even though the doctors will be performing a legitimate and legal procedure under this bill. It is for this reason—for this harassment reason—that doctors are saying that access to abortion will be reduced under Bill C-43.

Honourable senators, we have in Bill C-43, now before us, a bill which, as I have already indicated in quoting the views of legal scholars, fails in the eyes of the legal profession. It fails in the eyes of the medical profession and it fails in the eyes of Canadian society as a whole. In spite of these obvious and glaring failures, the Minister of Justice continues to push for passage of this bill.

I said a few minutes ago that the Minister of Justice has a second reason why she supports this bill. She has argued that it is essential in order to create "a national standard of entitlement to abortion for Canadian women." To show you what a ridiculous argument this is, let me use the Atlantic region, my part of the country, as an example. Senators should understand that Bill C-43 will not change the situation I am about to describe. Witness after witness told the committee that the bill would not, contrary to the claims of the Minister of Justice, and could not, create a "national standard of entitlement" and would simply make access to abortion even harder than it is now.

In Newfoundland there is only one doctor outside the Morgentaler Clinic in St. John's Newfoundland who performs abortions. The St. John's General Hospital has a policy that dictates that abortion be approved by a gynaecologist, psychiatrist and social worker and that the procedure include counselling with a registered nurse. Bill C-43 will do absolutely nothing to remove these hurdles to a woman getting an abortion in St. John's, Newfoundland. In Prince Edward Island abortions are not performed anywhere. The provincial government will not pay for an out-of-province abortion unless a five-doctor panel approves the woman's reasons for having an abortion. This means that few applications are approved and that travel expenses to obtain the abortion are never reimbursed by the provincial government. Bill C-43 will not improve the situation for the women of Prince Edward Island with respect to their ability to obtain an abortion.

In Nova Scotia Dr. Morgentaler has been continuously harassed by the provincial government. When he first opened his clinic the government proceeded to take legal action. When the government lost the case in court it decided to appeal in order to prolong the legal harassment of Doctor Morgentaler. In the meantime, however, the provincial government, in spite of the fact that it lost the first court battle, continues to refuse to pay for abortions done at the Morgentaler Clinic. Indeed, the vast majority of legal abortions performed in Halifax are performed currently at the Victoria General Hospital. Doctors at this hospital have said that if Bill C-43 passes they will cease to perform abortions. In that event, Nova Scotia will be virtually at the point where the only legal abortion that can be obtained, if this bill passes, will be at the Morgantaler Clinic.

In New Brunswick a woman must get the approval of two doctors before the provincial government will pay for an abortion, and Bill C-43 will not alter this requirement in any way.

This review of the situation in Atlantic Canada shows that, contrary to the claims of the Minister of Justice, Bill C-43 will do absolutely nothing to, in the minister's words, "create a national standard of entitlement to abortion for women in Canada."

Bill C-43 will do nothing to eliminate the two tiered level of access which now exists in the Atlantic region. Those women who can afford the added expense will continue to travel, as they do now, to the United States, Quebec or Ontario to terminate their pregnancies. However, poor women, single mothers and women on welfare will be forced to carry the pregnancy to term or, worse, be forced to seek illegal abortions.

Bill C-43 is a particular affront to women. Reproductive choice is fundamental to social equality of women, as was argued very clearly by several judges in the 1988 Morgentaler case. Yet Bill C-43 implies that women are not sufficiently competent or responsible to make their own decisions. What Bill C-43 does is tell women that they do not have control over their own bodies.

I ask my colleagues to consider what I have said today when they vote on Bill C-43. When exposed to the harsh light of reality, this bill fails every test. In particular, it fails the test established by the government itself through its chief spokesperson, the Minister of Justice. More importantly, Bill C-43 continues to demean women in the way that the previous abortion bill did, and, in the words of Chief Justice Dickson, "It is a fundamental interference with a woman's body and thus a violation of the security of the person." That is why I intend to vote against this legislation, and I would urge honourable senators to do the same.

However, if this bill is to pass, if a majority of members of this chamber believe that this bill ought to become law, then I urge you to make one amendment. I believe that this amendment is essential and one that, it seems to me, ought to be acceptable to sponsors of this bill. The purpose of the amendment is to prevent the law and the courts from being used in frivolous prosecutions to harass doctors who are performing legally a legitimate medical procedure. Let me explain.

The Canadian Medical Association told the Senate Committee that the passage of Bill C-43 in the House of Commons has already resulted in increased harassment of doctors and their patients. The Criminal Lawyers Association told the committee the proposed legislation has the very real potential to lead to the harassment of women, of doctors, of medical care workers and health care workers involved in providing abortion services. Indeed, the Criminal Lawyers Association went on to tell the Senate committee last week that Bill C-43 would have a "chilling effect" on doctors, on health care workers and on patients. The Criminal Lawyers Association argues that Bill C-43 provides antiabortion activists and biological fathers with the opportunity to harass women seeking abortions, women who have had abortions and doctors who have performed abortions.

Witness after witness told the Senate committee that Bill C-43 puts the physician-patient relationship in grave jeopardy because of the fear of private prosecutions. Indeed, in their testimony before the Senate committee, the Criminal Lawyers Association explained in some detail how a private prosecution works.

In fact, they suggested at the end of their testimony that the net effect of Bill C-43 would be to lead to a situation in which individuals will feel reluctant to engage in an otherwise perfectly legal and legitimate medical procedure because of fear of being harassed through the courts with frivolous prosecutions— prosecutions which may well not be laid by government officials—that will seek only to ruin lives and reputations rather than uphold the law.

I think it is very clear that all members in this chamber would accept the basic principle that the Criminal Code should not be used to harass people. We have an obligation, it seems to me, in this chamber to ensure that this does not happen. Indeed, I would argue that we absolutely must make sure that it does not happen. We also have an obligation to ensure that the doctor-patient relationship is not placed in jeopardy.

In an effort to ensure passage of Bill C-43, former Justice Minister Lewis and the current Just Minister Campbell have engaged in a massive public relations effort to convince physicians that the Crown will act responsibly and that provincial Attorneys General will only act in accordance with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In spite of these efforts by two Ministers of Justice, the fact is that their assurances are not reflected in Bill C-43. In order to put these assurances into the bill, in order to ensure that, at the very least, if this bill passes, it cannot be employed as a means of using the courts and the criminal law system to harass people, at the conclusion of my remarks I will move an amendment that clause 1 of the bill, at page 2, be amended by adding, immediately after line 8 the following words:

> No proceedings for an offence under this section may be instituted without the consent of the Attorney General of Canada.

This amendment will help ensure continuity and uniformity in the way charges are laid under this act. It will help meet the stated objectives of the Minister of Justice, both with respect to creating a national standard of entitlement and with respect to the way in which Bill C-43 is applied nationally. Moreover, it will help prevent radical activists from using the legislation as a tool to harass doctors and women. This amendment will ensure that cases brought to court under Bill C-43 are consistent with the legislation, and with the spirit of the legislation, and are consistent from one end of Canada to the other. This amendment will help to ensure that cases brought to courts under Bill C-43 are not inspired by the views of a minority seeking to harass people.

If this legislation is to pass, I believe that we in this chamber have a fundamental responsibility to inject some sober second thought into the process in order to ensure that Bill C-43 is a coherent bill, one that will be applied uniformly across the country, and one that meets the stated objectives of its supporters. That is why, in my view, at the very least, this amendment to Bill C-43 must pass.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DIVISION DEFERRED

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, therefore, in completing my remarks on this bill, I move, seconded by Senator Neiman, that Bill C-43 be not now read the third time but that clause 1 of the bill, at page 2 thereof, be amended by adding, immediately after line 8, the following:

> (4) No proceedings for an offence under this section may be instituted without the consent of the Attorney General of Canada.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the honourable Senator Phillips, that this bill be read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by honourable Senator Kirby, seconded by honourable Senator Neiman, that Bill C-43 be not now read the third time but that clause 1 of the bill, at page 2 thereof, be amended by adding, immediately after line 8, the following:

> "(4) No proceedings for an offence under this section may be instituted without the consent of the Attorney General of Canada."

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with a view to keeping order in our proceedings, and knowing that more amendments will be proposed, although I do not know how many, I would offer the proposal that the government should have to deal with the voting on all of these amendments only at one time. This need not be a formal deferral of vote under the provisional rules, but perhaps we could encourage the whips to come to some agreement that, when debate is completed in accordance with the suggestions made by Senator Doody earlier today, we might let these amendments accumulate and vote on them before we vote on the main motion. That, of course, assumes that none of the amendments carry; some of them may. If my suggestion is implemented, I do not intend to include an embargo against points of order on the receivability of amendments, but even if there are such objections, if we end up with some amendments before us plus the main motion, then the whips might like to consult on a way to have all the voting take place on one occasion.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the divisions on the amendments be deferred?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Division on Senator Kirby's motion in amendment deferred.

THIRD READING—DEBATE RESUMED

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill C-43, an Act respecting abortion. There are very few bills that have come before us in my time in this chamber on which it has been difficult for me to decide how to vote, but on this bill it has been very difficult for me to decide the right course of action for me personally.

Senator Frith: In spite of the fact that you do not like partisanship in this place?

Senator Kelly: I know what you are driving at, senator.I am sure this feeling of uncertainty has been present with many members of the chamber, and is certainly emphasized by the intense moral dilemma in which we all find ourselves over Bill C-43. I have been uncertain about my proper course of action on this bill not because I am undecided about whether to support the goals or objectives of Bill C-43, if those are, in fact, to limit access to abortion; not because I am uncertain about whether Parliament should be legislating through the Criminal Code or otherwise, and certainly not because I have any moral questions or uncertainties about where I personally stand on the question of abortion. I have been uncertain because I could not judge in my own mind—and perhaps no one can—what the practical impact of Bill C-43 will be. Will Bill C-43, once implemented, have the practical effect of reducing access to abortion or freeing access to abortion, and how will medical practitioners and the courts interpret Bill C-43? These questions or issues were at the root of my uncertainty, an uncertainty which, I must admit, was compounded by statements from the government and, in particular, from the Minister of Justice and her department—a minister whom I admire very much, I might say.

Let me take Bill C-43 as written. On the face of it, in my simple layman's understanding and language, it allows a woman to obtain an abortion only if two conditions exist: first, that the life or health of the woman is threatened by the pregnancy; and, second, that a qualified medical practitioner reaches a considered opinion that the health or life of the person seeking the abortion is indeed threatened.

Senator Frith: In accordance with certain standards.

Senator Kelly: Having met those conditions, the abortion may proceed lawfully, but only if induced by or under the direction of a qualified medical practitioner.

Honourable senators, I am troubled by this formulation. I understand that the Supreme Court of Canada has held that there is no constitutional recognition in Canada of the inherent right to life and security of the fetus, and that an unborn child is not included within the ambit of the term "everyone" in Section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

• (1700)

I point out, however, as Senator Haidasz and others have before me, that the Supreme Court in the Daigle case invited Parliament to define the level of protection to be afforded to the unborn, since that definition required consideration of broad social, political, moral and economic issues on which Parliament is better placed than the courts to make judgments. On the face of it, Bill C-43 provides insufficient protection to the unborn, in my view. In fact, it could readily be argued that Bill C-43 provides no effective protection to the unborn. As such, Bill C-43 is, in my view, inadequate.

It has been suggested to me that the abortion issue illustrates a collision of rights—the rights of the woman versus the rights of the unborn child. It is indeed unfortunate that an issue could be reduced to a conflict of rights between mother and child. But let us accept for a moment that that is what it is—a conflict between an unborn child and the woman who carries that child. If that is the case, Bill C-43 has come down clearly and emphatically on the side of the rights of the woman, if the child's continued existence threatens the mother's "health or life".

I have to ask myself if that is right. Surely in a just society we must see first to the protection of those who are defenceless and helpless. In that case, there is nothing more helpless and defenceless than an unborn child: one who did not ask to be conceived; one who is totally innocent of anything; and one who relies on the care and succour of society if he or she is to live and grow.

There is no point, so far as I am concerned, in debating the issue as to when "life" begins, although I have been involved in many debates on that issue, or when the fetus becomes a "person" and, therefore, begins to enjoy the existing constitutional or legislative guarantees and protections. In the absence of conclusive medical evidence one way or the other, such discussions are equivalent to the debate on how many angels can dance on the head of a pin.

I believe I can appreciate and sympathize with the agonizing debate that those in the government responsible for preparing this bill must have gone through on this question. Having said that, I note with sadness that Bill C-43 establishes no limits on when an abortion may occur during the gestation period, including, I assume, up to and including the fetus' full term.

There are other things that I find troubling about Bill C-43. One is the very broad definition given to the word "health", as in threatening the "health" of a woman in the bill. Health is defined in proposed subsection 287(2) as including "physical, mental and psychological health". I understand that before 1940 almost all therapeutic abortions were performed for medical reasons. Thereafter, abortions for "psychiatric reasons" came into vogue, and by the 1950s more than half of the abortions were performed for that reason. Now, I understand that more than 90 per cent of the therapeutic abortions performed are for "psychological or mental health reasons". I cannot help but believe that this represents "abortion on demand" by another name.

I am concerned that Bill C-43, as written, may exacerbate this situation, if that is possible. I was alarmed to read the explanation of the government's intent as described in a document dated October 1990, emanating from the Minister of Justice and entitled "Canada's Proposed Abortion Law—Concerns of Doctors". I shall return to discuss this document in a wider context in a moment, but, for the time being, allow me to quote a few lines from page 3:

> The legislation is designed to protect a doctor from being convicted under the new law, where the doctor was of the opinion that there was a likelihood of a threat to a woman's physical, mental or psychological health if the abortion were not induced . . . doctors would be entitled to take into consideration any matters which, in their opinion, are likely to adversely affect and thereby threaten the woman's physical, mental or psychological health. These factors could include rape, incest, genetic defects and socioeconomic factors . . .

And finally:

> Doctors who follow the requirements of the law will be legally protected from second guessing by any other person, including other doctors.

And, I assume, by the courts.

I have emphasized those words or phrases that cause me particular concern and submit that this explanation entails a significant broadening of the provisions of the bill, to the point where I suggest that the bill may not really limit access to abortion at all.

I am particularly concerned with the formulation "likely" to adversely affect a woman's health. Rather than focusing on the current, objectively verifiable situation, the physician may look into the very uncertain and subjective future. I am concerned about the addition of socioeconomic factors. What right or expertise does a physician have to make judgments on such matters? In fact, who can morally judge that any given socioeconomic situation is "likely" going to be incompatible with the birth of a child?

I am concerned that "genetic defects" are brought into the consideration. To me, this may put us on the very dangerous and slippery slope of using abortion for genetic engineering purposes. To legalize abortion to avoid genetic defects, no matter how minor they may be, is morally repugnant to me.

I would also suggest that the explanations given in this document by the Department of Justice as to the practical impacts of Bill C-43 are somewhat at variance with statements given earlier by the current and previous Ministers of Justice. I see no balance between women's rights and the rights of the unborn child in Bill C-43. What I am afraid I see is the requirement for a procedure to be followed to legalize abortions. In short, if doctors who are inclined to give abortions want a carte blanche to do so, I fear the Department of Justice has given it to them through this document's interpretation of the impact of Bill C-43.

In this regard I am not encouraged by what I understand to be the British experience. A law similar to Bill C-43 has been in place in Britain since 1967. A combination of clinical experience and court decisions has had the effect of significantly increasing the number of abortions carried out by medical doctors.

In Canada, if Bill C-43 were passed, I doubt that courts would either be likely to or often try to penetrate the veil of a doctor's clinical judgment and second-guess his or her opinion on whether an abortion was, in fact, warranted. Bill C-43 provides no clear or objective standards for the courts to question such an opinion. Hence, my initial reaction to Bill C-43 was that it was, in essence, a licence to conduct abortions at the instigation of the mother for medical doctors who were inclined to use it as such. As a consequence, at that point in my emotional journey, Bill C-43 was unacceptable to me.

It was surprising to me, therefore, to hear and read that a large number of medical doctors would refrain from providing abortions under fear of prosecution, particularly prosecutions instigated by pro-life groups or individuals. If this were truly to be the practical impact of Bill C-43, I could, albeit with some misgivings, support the bill. I would be concerned, however, that this impact would wane over time, unless the antiabortion movement and provincial attorneys general were to be particularly vigilant and aggressive.

In any event, I do not think it is the right and proper role of Parliament, or this chamber, to pass a bill whose impacts are ambiguous or unknown. The Supreme Court challenged the government and Parliament to enunciate a clear position, and I believe Canadians have the right to expect no less.

I am also concerned that the bill, if passed, would authorize abortions in cases of rape or incest. There is no question that this is a tough issue—that the act of conception has occurred under compulsion; under the most hideous and physically and emotionally painful of circumstances. But is a carte blanche to abort in such cases right? What about the rights of the fetus, who is totally blameless? Should the rights of the fetus be a function of the circumstances of conception? I think not. If a child is no less human because of the way in which it is conceived, why should the case be different for a fetus? In addition, although the pro-choice lobby makes much of this very emotive issue, I understand that less than 1 per cent of abortion patients are victims of rape or incest.

I am very much aware, however, that if the Senate does not pass this bill, there is little likelihood of any legislation on abortion for some time. That concerns me, because the status quo is something that I find morally offensive. Some will say that having no law is better than having a bad law, and, in many cases, I would be inclined to agree. I wonder, however, if this bill and the circumstances it is designed to address are in many ways unique and if the practical realities do not call for legislation—any legislation.

Honourable senators, the debate on this bill has raised a lot of heat, which I guess should have been expected given the nature of the issue and the strong, radically divergent, moral and ethical positions taken. I regret to say that, in my opinion, the government has been unwittingly responsible for much of this dissention by tabling a bill which lands soundly on both sides of the issue and by presenting the bill as being all things to all people.

In trying to create a "balanced" bill, the government created a piece of legislation that realistically provides no protection to the fetus, no matter at what stage in the pregnancy, and furthermore does not allow a pregnant woman the freedom to choose abortion. The moral and ethical decisions are transferred to the poor, beleaguered medical practitioner. It is almost as if Parliament and the government had thrown up their hands in despair and said, "Let someone else make the decision."

That would have been bad enough, but I wonder about the rationale behind the Minister of Justice's putting out papers, making speeches and touring the country meeting doctors to assure them that the chances of prosecution under Bill C-43 are remote. As an example, and as I have said before, I found the "justice information" document dated October 1990 to be particularly one-sided. I think that it was well intentioned but that it was one-sided.

If anyone's rights are to be protected by any law, those who would disregard or break that law must know that they are in constant and imminent danger of criminal or civil prosecution. If the threat of prosecution is really a cosmetic sham, the law is of no practical use.

It is with these thoughts, concerns and often conflicting notions that I have tried to decide the best course of action for me to take on Bill C-43. I have consulted friends, both male and female, medical practitioners and church leaders. Like many senators, I have received mail expressing both the "pro-choice" and "pro-life" points of view.

I have concluded, honourable senators—and I will admit with some misgivings—that I will vote in support of Bill C-43, not because it is a good bill but because it is better than nothing. I have reluctantly concluded that failure to pass this bill will leave a legislative vacuum indefinitely and allow the continuation of the current state of lawlessness. If I thought that defeat of Bill C-43 would result in something better, I would gladly join those who will vote against this bill. But I have no such expectation.

In closing, let me say that obviously I am very much opposed to abortion. I believe that society has an obligation to protect to the fullest degree the rights of the unborn child. To the extent that rights collide, the rights of the more defenceless and vulnerable party—the unborn child—must prevail.

Having said that, I want to disassociate myself from some of the tactics used by the radical fringes of the antiabortion or pro-life movement. Violence or the threat of violence to achieve one's ends, no matter how important those ends, have no place in Canada. The pursuit or threat of violence and some of the other disreputable tactics that have been followed do no justice to and do not advance the antiabortion cause.

Honourable senators, I have often spoken in this place with the objective of convincing the unconvinced to a certain point of view. I do not do that in the case of Bill C-43. I know that each senator must look into his or her heart and the very individual system of personal morality and ethics that each of us has to decide the best response to Bill C-43.

I have spoken on this bill only to put on the record my own very personal journey towards the decision I have made to support its passage.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, at various times past I have spoken in this chamber against the passing of bills that would permit abortion on request. Indeed, on June 13 last I spoke on second reading of Bill C-43 and expressed my opposition to its passage. At that time I gave my reasons for my opposition and I do not propose to repeat them now. However, honourable senators, there is one point with which I did not deal and I wish to do so now.

I believe that human life begins at conception and that from that point on such life is entitled to all the protection our legal system gives to the protection of human life. And I think it is an acknowledged fact that the main and fundamental purpose of our legal system is the protection of human life. This must be so, as otherwise all other laws would serve no useful purpose.

Honourable senators, it is my profound conviction that abortion is wrong. I believe it violates the God-given right to life which every person should enjoy from the moment of conception. It denies to those conceived but not yet born the fundamental of all rights, the right to life—the right to be born. And since Bill C-43 does not in any way even acknowledge the right to be born—since, in my opinion, it is a major defeat for the pro-life advocates and a sell-out to the pro-abortionist forces, I am against its passage into law.

Honourable senators, after I spoke on June 13 last I was followed by the Honourable Jacques Flynn, also a Roman Catholic and then a member of this house. He did not agree with my contention that the bill should be defeated. While he was not satisfied with the bill, he thought it was better to have it as law than to have no law regarding abortion. In support of his opinion he quoted from a statement made by the president of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops dated May 29, 1990. This statement said, in part:

> While we deeply regret that the bill was passed (in the House of Commons) without amendments, it is nevertheless better to have this law that declares abortion a criminal offence than to continue the legislative vacuum which existed for the past two years.

Honourable senators, I am a Roman Catholic, a practising Roman Catholic, and I treat with great respect any statement on public matters made by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops. However, honourable senators, I believe the point of view or opinion expressed by the president of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops to be wholly wrong. In effect, it is saying that any law with regard to abortion is better than no law. How he came to such an astonishing conclusion I do not understand.

Now, I am not alone in my belief that Bill C-43 is not a good law. I am not alone in my belief that the statement made by the president of the Conference is wholly wrong. Let me give some opinions by others. I quote in part from an editorial in The Catholic Register of November 3, 1990:

> What is incomprehensible to many readers of The Catholic Register is the present statement of Bishop Robert Lebel, President of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops. On May 29th he informed members of the House of Commons that Bill C-43 is better than the legislative vacuum which existed for the past two years. When Catholics complained about this stunning endorsement the Bishop reminded them of his earlier (April 5) statement when he said: "If the bill remains as it is it cannot have our approval". The editorial continued, "Well, the Bishops' President cannot have it both ways. He either endorses the stand of the Minister of Justice, or he opposes it. He is for the bill or he is opposed to it."

Let me give you one more quotation which I think endorses my point of view. It is from Bishop Colin Campbell of the Diocese of Antigonish, Nova Scotia, which, by the way, is the diocese to which I belong. I take this quotation from a weekly newspaper feature called "Dialogue with Bishop Campbell", dated June 6, 1990, on the question of abortion. He wrote, in part, and I quote:

● (1720)

> Even Catholic bishops have used the pluralistic society argument. What do I mean by this?

They have fallen into the trap of thinking that the Church must mute the truth because we are not all members of the Church in Canada. I continue the quotation:

> In my view this is nonsense. Abortion is the direct killing of human life. This is wrong. It is wrong not because the Catholic Church says it is wrong but because it is an objective moral evil. Therefore the Church should shout from the tree tops that it is evil even if the Catholic population of Canada was only 6/1000 of the total population.

I continue the quotation. The bishop added:

> Does the above sound rather strong? Probably. It comes down to the question—does one believe that there are absolute moral norms? If right is right and evil is evil, we must proclaim it even if we lose all popularity polls in doing this.

Honourable senators, I believe even the qualified endorsement given to Bill C-43 by the president of the Conference of Catholic Bishops to have been most unfortunate. I think it gave the impression, at least, that the antiabortion people had softened their atttitude on their fight against abortion. Certainly when a highly respected and influential person such as the Honourable Jacques Flynn was satisfied to accept the position of the Conference of Catholic Bishops—and as I mentioned he is also a Roman Catholic—it must have influenced the thinking and the position of many in the antiabortion movement. Personally, I believe that to accept Bill C-43 simply because it calls abortion a crime in some rare cases is a complete sell-out to the pro-abortion forces, and I think the statement from the president of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops did a great disservice to the antiabortion cause.

Honourable senators, let us be realistic. Under Bill C-43 abortion is only a crime unless the abortion is induced by or under the direction of a medical practitioner who is of the opinion that if the abortion is not induced the health or life of the female person will likely be threatened. Let us be realistic again: Under that provision it would take a minor miracle to ever convict anyone.

Honourable senators, I believe the fundamental issue to be resolved by abortion legislation is this: Are we going to allow all human life to be born and to protect it at all its stages or are we not? That is the standard I use and by that standard Bill C-43 fails completely.

But it has been said that this bill is a compromise. I do not know how there can be a compromise when human life is at stake. Either those conceived and not yet born have the right to life or they do not. There can be no compromise in this situation. Certainly it is no compromise to say that abortion is a crime and then not treat it as such.

Honourable senators, if this bill is passed I think we can assume that no other bill dealing with abortion will be introduced by any government in the foreseeable future—the issue is too emotional. But if we defeat this bill nothing will be lost, as in effect it is abortion on demand as it is at present. But certainly it will give time for those who believe that all humans have the sacred right to life to work for a better law.

Honourable senators, to answer those who believe that any law on abortion is better than no law, I quote from excerpts from briefs to the parliamentary committee on Bill C-43 by Campaign Life Coalition:

> Given our opposition to Bill C-43, we have been asked by some Members of Parliament if we would prefer to have no abortion law at all, if our choices are limited to Bill C-43 or no law for a short time. Bill C-43 would entrench in law the principle that killing pre-born children is acceptable. We cannot accept this principle; we cannot compromise. Therefore, a state of lawlessness (while we work towards the enactment of a law which will protect all human life) is preferable to a bad law.

I also quote from a newsletter from the Campaign Life Coalition of Nova Scotia, which stated, in part:

> It is very strange to hear some pro-lifers saying this law would be better than nothing. Please do not believe this nonsense. We are not saying we do not want a law—we are saying it is better not to have this bill which would allow for the wholesale killing of unborn babies throughout the full nine months of pregnancy.

[Senator Macdonald.]

Honourable senators, the first sentence in the November editorial of the Catholic Register from which I have already quoted sums up my own position, and I quote it:

> The choice facing honourable senators this fall as they debate Bill C-43 is simple: either save the bill and kill the baby or save the baby and kill the bill.

Honourable senators, I say let us kill the bill.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there have been a lot of things said about this bill. It has been the centre of a great deal of very impressive debate and very impressive interventions. Many of the things that have been said and many of the reasons advanced against the passage of this bill I agree with. I want to focus on just one part of the bill and its results.

At second reading I objected to the bill on two principles. One, that I thought that the choice of a medical procedure should be the choice of the patient, the woman, and that if there was to be—as there would normally be—consultation between the patient and the doctor that the decision arrived at by the doctor and the patient should not be the subject of criminal consequences.

I want to add a perspective from the point of view of the physician as it would present itself in real terms to the physician.

I do not think that the legal position of the physician needs to be the subject of very sophisticated legal advice. I do agree with Senator Macdonald that there might not be many convictions under this law, but that would be of little help to the physician in his day-to-day life. You are a doctor; a patient comes to your office and says she wants an abortion. Leaving aside for the moment all the agony that she might have gone through in coming to that decision, agony that none of us who are not women can fully appreciate, the patient is seated opposite you and, whatever she has gone through, she is asking you for an abortion. If this bill is passed the first thing you had better do is reach for your Criminal Code—that is, the Criminal Code as it would exist if this bill were passed as amended by Bill C-43. As a doctor, and before you went any further, if you prudently reached for your Criminal Code, what would you read? You would read section 287(1), which would state:

• (1730)

> Every person who induces an abortion on a female person . . .

Here you would have to say, "That is me. I am a person and I am being asked to induce an abortion." It would then go on to state:

> . . . is guilty of an indictable offense and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years . . .

So far so bad. What would make me want to go on past that point? But I do, because it states:

> . . . unless the abortion is induced by or under the direction of a medical practitioner who is of the opinion—

That sounds better. All I have to do is "come to an opinion". It continues to state:

> . . . that, if the abortion were not induced, the health or life of the female person would be likely to be threatened.

I might then consider putting my Criminal Code aside and asking the patient for more detail so that I could decide whether, in my opinion, if the abortion were not induced the health or life of my patient would likely be threatened. But if I am really prudent, I will read on and turn the page, because the statute states, in Section 287(2), the definition section:

> "opinion" means an opinion formed using generally accepted standards of the medical profession.

That might tempt me to think that I have only to respond to the opinion of my colleagues as to the generally accepted standards of the medical profession. But I will not have to justify my opinion simply to my colleagues, as I do in my practice to any of my disciplinary committees. I have to justify it to a court. The book that I am looking at is the Criminal Code. So if I am trying to look ahead, as a doctor, as to what body I must face or procedures I must go through, I should not envisage appearing before a disciplinary committee of my colleagues; I should envisage a charge under the Criminal Code. I should plan hiring a lawyer. I should envisage the lawyer telling me the date of the preliminary hearing and the date of the adjourned preliminary hearings. I should realize that I will probably have to sit in court at a preliminary hearing and listen to the opinion of my colleagues, who will be called by the Crown, as to whether or not I have followed, again the words, "generally accepted standards of the medical profession." How will the prosecution establish that except to call my colleagues? They will be in the witness box and will be asked whether what I did—and this is all before I have done anything—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is now past 5:45 p.m..

Senator Frith: We sometimes do not see the clock. I am almost finished.

Senator Doody: Do you want to go on?

Senator Frith: Yes. I am close to finishing my remarks.

Senator Doody: Well, ask for leave.

Senator Frith: May I have leave to complete my intervention, honourable senators?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: So before I have said a word to my patient, I am envisaging a charge, hiring a lawyer, and there is a preliminary hearing as to whether I have followed generally accepted standards of the medical profession. Finally I see myself in court. I will then go through the whole thing again, assuming that the judge finds that there is sufficient evidence to proceed with my case. After that, I will find out whether or not I am guilty; and then I will find out whether or not I will have the right to an appeal. That all flashes through my mind, or should, before I go any further with this patient who has come in and asked me whether I will perform this medical procedure.

The difficulty with this bill is that it criminalizes these procedures. That means that I, as an individual doctor, have to think of criminal procedures instead of medical procedures. Most doctors will simply say, "Why bother? Why should I get myself into that?" If this bill were left without that definition, and simply left the opinion to the full discretion of the doctor, it might be a different matter. But it sets up these standards. As a result, it sets up this vision of criminal procedure before I even get a chance to think or visualize medical procedure.

For the two reasons that I mentioned on second reading, honourable senators, namely, that there should be a choice by the woman—God knows that it is no easy choice—and that the procedure should not be criminalized, nothing that I have heard since second reading has changed my opinion that the bill should be defeated. I will be voting against it.

Debate suspended.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RESTRAINT BILL

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, as it is now past 5:45 p.m., we shall proceed to the deferred division on the motion for third reading of Bill C-69. Please call in the senators.

Senator Frith: Your Honour, in order to invoke the rule you must call for the "Yeas" and "Nays". We then appeal, under Rule 49, and then you call in the senators.

Senator Doody: Even though it was done last week?

Hon. Duff Roblin: To refresh my memory, my memory is that when this item came up last week the "Yeas" and "Nays" were put. It was at that stage that my friend asked for the postponement of the debate. I presume that we can proceed at once to ring the bells.

Senator Frith: We did not have the voice vote; we should have.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I am willing to abide by what you say, Senator Frith, but since it was debated last week and the "yeas" and "nays" were called for, should we do that again?

Senator Frith: The problem is that we forgot to do that last time. But let us assume that it did occur, with leave, and proceed to call in the senators—that is, so long as we know that under Provisional Rule P-3(a) we should do that.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Please call in the senators.

ABORTION BILL

THIRD READING—DEBATE RESUMED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, we are well into the process of third reading on Bill C-43. It is my privilege to continue to debate this very important legislation, Bill C-43, in respect of abortion.

I wonder whether any subject would be more pertinent to our consideration today as the eyes of the world look on in dread and foreboding at the spectacle of possible megadeath in the Persian Gulf war. I say that without meaning to make capital of the enormous threat to world peace and the tragedy of destruction of lives and livelihoods already under way in the East.

But Mother Teresa, in her address on receipt of the Nobel Peace Prize in 1979, said, "Today the greatest destroyer of peace is abortion." The social scourge of unwantedness of human life itself, an ailment of hopelessness, needs a cure; and abortion is not the cure. A society that declares any of its members to be unwanted, as happened in the late 1930s during World War II, when Hitler walked rampant across Europe, cannot find peace, nor can its campaigns for peace and victory sustain the scrutiny of the God who made them.

Honourable senators, in its received form, Bill C-43 is a very dangerous wedge, acting to chock open a door on abortion between the lifesaving sentiments of persons of conscience, commonly called pro-life, and the lifesaving vocation of persons of training, or doctors and health care personnel. We are told that it occupies the middle ground between extremes of antiabortion restraints and pro-abortion advocates. Perhaps that, indeed, is its intent, but that is not its nature.

Bill C-43 does not even so much as mention the object of its protective interest, if it has one. It does not detail, nor does it even mention, in fact, what abortion is. It does not say whether abortion is the killing of a child before it is born. Yet it appears in the section of criminal law that concerns itself with offences against a person, in company with other sanctions against harm to a child.

Honourable senators, I doubt very much whether the auspices under which abortion is promoted in society are really impeccable. But when a bill is promoted by the government itself it has the aura of authority. How else could we say, as we do, that "law is the greatest teacher"? Legislators have a most profound authorship and responsibility for what they enact, and that is what we are about to do.

I note that even in 1970 well-aware medical professionals knew perfectly well that human life begins at conception. But there was also, as always there may be, an unprofessional dimension among many, of social policy advocacy to displace the old ethic. Yet there is nothing amiss with the "old ethic" inasmuch as it loves, embraces, supports and defends the common good, which starts with human life itself. To advocate a displacement of these values is the essence of sedition.

After the lessons learned in the earlier world wars—World War I and World War II—of this century, first with the muddy carnage at Flanders and Vimy and later with the holocaust of Auschwitz, Dachau, Belsen and Maidanek, the Declaration of Geneva expressed a conscience of the West in 1948 by stating:

> I will maintain the utmost respect for human life from the time of conception, even under threat. I will not use any medical knowledge contrary to the laws of humanity.

Indeed, abortion was declared at Nuremberg a crime against humanity.

Even as recently as 1969 the International Code of Ethics stated:

> A doctor must always bear in mind the importance of preserving human life from the time of conception until death.

Of course, this means natural death.

In Oslo in 1970, the World Medical Association reaffirmed this by stating:

> The first moral imposed upon the doctor is respect for human life, as expressed in the Declaration of Geneva. I will maintain the utmost respect for human life from the first moment of conception.

Honourable senators, let us beware of the unheralded danger to the whole body of Canadian law and jurisprudence by attempting to enact in statute a law that is fundamentally a breach of the ethics we have long defended. The facts will show, as we continue to debate and study the testimony of witnesses presented to our committee, especially those witnesses who are truly expert, that abortion is never required medically, either to save the life of or to improve the health of, no, not even to complete the valid aspirations of, a woman as espoused by the Minister of Justice.

As I will show, honourable senators, it is possible to amend Bill C-43 so that it successfully accomplishes the valid objectives of protection of human life and of the professional standards of doctors and health-care persons. It is also possible to amend it so that it really does not deter a woman from obtaining the health care that is necessary to her, even when a pregnancy complicates that care.

Statistics Canada revealed to us that 72,693 abortions were reported to them in 1988, and all paid by our premiums and taxes. Furthermore, Statistics Canada revealed another horror. In 1987 no less than 13,271 pregnant women were repeating abortion, some for the second, third or fourth time. Therefore, for the good of our society and for the survival of Canada we must do everything we can not only to decrease and discourage abortion but to outlaw it. Care for health and life must be increased; otherwise, why do we suppose we shall recover from the present grip of depravity and despair that is pervading our society?

The vote on Bill C-43 appears to be very close. Let us then, honourable senators, be very careful and prudent. Should Bill C-43 be carried, I think we would want it to be improved so that it will truly protect the innocent and helpless pre-born children, as well as the health and life of the mother. That is why I am offering to you, honourable senators, for your consideration, seven amendments in order to try to achieve this goal. I have asked the Clerk to make these amendments available to you in both official languages.

My first amendment is to increase the penalty from two to 10 years.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DIVISION DEFERRED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Corbin:

> That clause 1 of Bill C-43 at page 1 thereof be amended by striking the line 10 thereof and substituting therefor:
> imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Haidasz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Corbin:

> That clause 1 of Bill C-43 at page 1 thereof be amended by striking line 10 thereof and substituting therefor:
> imprisonment for term not exceeding ten.

Senator Haidasz: In explanation, honourable senators, this amendment, I think, is self-evident. If Bill C-43 seeks to state its disapprobation of something, it is necessary to carry with the offensive act an appropriate penalty. Of course, it is a basic principle of fundamental justice: that the punishment meet the crime. A maximum of two years' imprisonment is a disproportionately light maximum sentence for the criminal act of abortion. I do not have to emphasize that abortion is the causation of the death of a child, before it has proceeded from its mother's womb, by a wilful act or the omission of life-saving support after a wilful act.

None of the expert testimony before your committee, honourable senators, that had anything medical to say about the matter, attested that there is ever a medical indication for the deliberate act of abortion. On the contrary, testimony by Physicians for Life, corroborated by Dr. Teresa McKenna and by Dr. Bernard Nathanson of New York City, is that most abortions are, in fact, performed for non-medical reasons.

In many public speeches, Dr. Nathanson has stated unequivocally, and I repeat, that there is never a medical reason, including the emergency exigencies of saving the life of a mother, for the deliberate destruction of the child in her womb. So, honourable senators, I propose a maximum penalty of ten years' imprisonment for the criminal abortionist. Such a penalty shows a great deal of clemency, I believe.

Offenses of intentionally killing a child close to birth are already punishable by life imprisonment under the Criminal Code section 238. Also punishable as homicide is so injuring a child anytime before birth that it dies afterwards, as set out in section 223(2). Such homicide may be proven culpable with maximum penalties of up to life imprisonment. A sentence of just two years trivializes the crime, even committed by the much hated back-alley coat-hanger abortionist who neglects the rudiments of safety even for a mother. Such abortions already occur in far-off lands in a black market hungry for fetal organs and other tissue. Surely, no one in his right mind would want to equate Canada's level of disapproval for mob-run abortion rings, with its level of disdain for leaving the site of an accident or annoying someone with a noxious substance. Even setting potentially harmful booby-traps is more punishable.

Honourable senators, for the sake of the one duty left to us, that we address this legislation with a sober and long second look, I urge you to support this amendment to increase to a deterrent level of 10 years' imprisonment the maximum penalty for a criminal abortion outside of the provisions already laid out in Bill C-43. To fail to do so would be unworthy of the duty and wisdom that is ours.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It was moved by the honourable Senator Haidasz, seconded by the honourable Senator Corbin:

> That clause 1 of Bill C-43 at page 1 thereof be amended by striking line 10 thereof and substituting therefor:
> imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, on a point of order, earlier today the Deputy Leader of the Opposition suggested that the whips should confer with a view to organizing the votes on these various amendments at the same time at the end of the debate on third reading. I believe those discussions are going on between the whips and, therefore, if no other senator wishes to speak to the amendment just proposed by Senator Haidasz, perhaps we could agree to put off the vote pending some agreement between the whips, and Senator Haidasz could proceed to move, as I understand he intends to do, some other amendments.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to defer the vote and have it called when an agreement is reached by the whips?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DIVISION DEFERRED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like now to proceed to my second amendment, which is the requirement of evidentiary support for a medical opinion. I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Corbin:

> That clause 1 of Bill C-43 at page 1 thereof be amended by immediately following the word "opinion" as it appears at line 13 thereof inserting:
> based upon verifiable medical evidence.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Haidasz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Corbin:

> That clause 1 of Bill C-43 at page 1 thereof be amended by immediately following the word "opinion" as it appears at line 13 thereof inserting:
> based upon verifiable medical evidence.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Haidasz: Again, honourable senators, by way of explanation, this amendment has rather obvious legal benefits that I think recommend it to us. Again, if it is the point of Bill C-43 to seek the disapprobation of anything, it fails to do so where it is not clear about the ground of the escape clause, as the saying goes. If a piece of criminal law says that such and such is a crime, it usually adds words either in the pertinent section or in a related section for similar offences that spell out the circumstances that mitigate the offence.

The substance of this exculpatory provision is already present in Criminal Code sections 45 and 216 dealing with necessity. The commonplace understanding of "necessity" has always been the imminent or proximal likelihood or reasonable belief that there is such a likelihood that, without the medical intervention attempted, the recipient of the treatment would die. Even the section that is often cited as the necessity grounds, section 45, for surgical operations, does not entirely absolve one of responsibility to assess the situation; that is, the circumstances of the case, and that it be reasonable to perform the operation. Moreover, section 45 additionally requires, unlike some circumstances envisioned by section 216, that "the operation is performed with reasonable care and skill." Dr. Bethune was reportedly incensed with the righteous indignation at finding that surgical care in China was often administered without antiseptics. That basic indignation reflects the mind of "the reasonable man" as enshrined in section 45.

Honourable senators, I believe we should take note that an exculpatory provision is well reasoned and proportionate when it is not so wide that it practically negates the defence erected against an undesirable activity. Abortion is such an activity, especially as a fast growing industry. We know that, contrary to what certain uninformed witnesses claimed before our committee, abortions have continued to increase in number since the abortion law was struck down three years ago yesterday.

In 1988 Statistics Canada recorded a 4 per cent increase in the number of reported abortions. Furthermore, Statistics Canada admits that it includes abortions for freestanding clinics only in Quebec. Filed claims for medicare coverage of abortions performed at two Ontario clinics revealed that in the first half of 1988 953 more abortions were performed than for the same period in 1987, representing an increase of 56 per cent. The same source shows an increase of 8 per cent in Ontario hospitals for the same period.

To return to the need for a clear exculpatory provision, it should be evident, as I said earlier, that Justice Dickson and others on the Supreme Court Bench in 1988 disdained a law that was unclear about this. The health grounds of 1969 to 1988 already led to abortion on demand. The Chief of Obstetrics at the Ottawa Civic Hospital, Dr. Beresford, admitted before our committee that there were no applications for abortion turned down. The Badgley Report found as much, and the records show that no one was ultimately convicted for performing an abortion with or without a hospital committee's approval. The reality one discovers upon investigating these matters is that in many cases supportable evidentiary records concerning the alleged health grounds for abortions had not been kept until recently. Yet, for other health or life saving treatments, even cataract removals, the practice has been to maintain a medical chart, including details pertinent to the medical decision to intervene.

In the other House, members argued for a better or tighter definition of "health" in Bill C-43. However, the past 20 years indicate that such an approach has little chance of making a difference in requiring physicians or abortionists to show cause, as it were. That is, whatever definition we try to place on "health," if there is no more requirement than that the physician simply form an opinion, the exculpatory provision is wide open. A person need only state before a court that he is competent and formed an opinion thus and thus and so and so. We forget that the onus of proof to the contrary is upon the court. Such proof of any criminal activity or its intent would be impossible without an evidentiary record, which I call for in this amendment.

Therefore, honourable senators, I urge you to support this amendment, which simply requires that a physician's opinion be based on medically verifiable grounds. The verifiable medical evidence requires that the evidence be verified by a court. To be verifiable by a court, the evidence should be recorded in a reliable manner, free from easy tampering and in accordance with whatever practices the provinces may ascertain for keeping of one's licence to practice medicine. I urge you, honourable senators, to adopt this amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If no other senator wishes to speak, is it your wish, honourable senators, to follow the practice previously adopted of deferring the vote on this amendment to the time settled by the whips?

Hon. Paul David: May I ask a question?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator David?

[Translation]

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, I would like Senator Haidasz to tell me what he means by the word verifiable.

[English]

Senator Haidasz: As I mentioned in my last few sentences, Senator David, the verifiable medical evidence requires that the evidence be, first, verifiable by a court. To be verifiable by a court, the minimum that should be required is that the evidence should be recorded in a reliable manner, free from easy tampering and in accordance with whatever practices the provinces may ascertain for keeping of one's licence to practice medicine.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your wish, honourable senators, that the vote be deferred?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, may I have leave to interrupt the debate briefly in order to ask for leave to revert to Motions? It would be my intention then to ask for leave to move a motion concerning a committee meeting tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Debate suspended.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to motions:

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at two thirty o'clock in the afternoon tomorrow, 30th January, 1991, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

If senators wish, I will be happy to explain the purpose of our proposed meeting.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ABORTION

THIRD READING—DEBATE RESUMED—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DIVISION DEFERRED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, my third amendment is before you. It provides protection of the foetus from conception to implantation. I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Corbin:

> That clause 1 of Bill C-43 at page two thereof be amended by striking lines 4 through 8 thereof, where is set out section 287, subsection (3).

Honourable senators, by way of explanation, this amendment would eliminate subsection (3) of proposed section 287 of Bill C43. I do not have to read that subsection since it is before you in the form of Bill C-43. However, for aid in clarifying the intent of this subsection, honourable senators, allow me to point out that it quite simply creates an artificial vacuity in criminal law with respect to what may or may not be done to a child in the first week to ten days of its life.

Bill C-43 as it stands before us is presented as some means of filling a vacuity in law with regard to the killing of a child before delivery from the womb. Yet the drafters of Bill C-43 decided not to go so far as to erect even a pretense of legal protection of the life that has begun at conception until the project of life has been rooted by a placenta in the womb. They have, with subsection 287(3), expressly set out to maintain the vacuity for the Criminal Code in the case of a child's existence prior to its implantation in the womb, in the wall of the uterus.

But what verifiable basis is there for choosing the time of implantation, I ask, as the moment at which the state should begin to express an interest in protecting the child? It is certainly not found in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. All I can see there, as I said earlier on June 26 last and more recently in November of last year, is evidence that life, liberty and security of the person, as expressed in the Charter, belongs to everyone from the moment he or she begins to exist in the eyes of God, upon whose supremacy the rule of law is tested.

Honourable senators, when I was in Poland two weeks ago I learned that the upper house of the Polish chamber, also called the Senate, stated, in drafting a bill on criminal abortion, and I quote:

> It is no longer a matter of honest scientific disputation whether human life begins at conception. Every civilized society in the world knows the authoritative fact that from the moment of conception a living being is in existence and that being is human.

Honourable senators, furthermore the evidence that was presented by world-renowned human geneticist, Dr. Jerome Lejeune of Paris, when he appeared in the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal for the Borowski case, was uncontroverted and was accorded standing, which it retains today before the Supreme Court of Canada. Further, the testimony of Dr. Bernard Nathanson of New York City, who appeared before the committee a few days ago and who finally stopped performing abortions in New York after the scientific evidence had mounted up before his eyes, was that indeed no one reasonably disputes, in the world of medical education or research, that the conceptum is an entire human being. All that is added therefrom are the same things that are added for the growth of a teenager—food and water.

But, honourable senators, I do not think that is really the issue. I do not suppose that any of us really takes the legal fiction invested a century ago in what is now subsection 223(1), to define a human being for the purposes of the Criminal Code, as having some sort of factual basis. Such a view would be entirely untenable with the reality that even fraternal twins are born at different times. It could hardly be said that the younger was not a human being when its twin had already seen the light of day and been accorded humanity. Therefore, the issue here is whether it is prudent or even sober for a bill that the government has undertaken to bring forth, in response to the long and sustained clamour of Canadians to fill a painful and destructive vacuity of law, to deliberately retain an essential vacuity in the most tenuous and fragile moments of human life.

It is all the more an issue on consideration of the fact that recent history has shown that IUDs such as the Dalkon Shield can do real, even fatal, damage to women, and that their importation and marketing ought to continue to be disbarred by colourable criminal law.

However, I want to bring to the attention of honourable senators a new spectre that has arisen on the shores of Canada and the United States—indeed, the whole world. It originated in France. It is the abortifacient drug called RU-486, and its more recent sophisticated derivatives, as Dr. Nathanson described them to us. They are most effective at impeding or preventing implantation of the conceived and fully human child.

A physician could very well prescribe such a drug even before signs of pregnancy were confirmed. There are no absolutely reliable tests of whether implantation has in fact occurred at the moment or hour or day that it does occur. As a result, a physician could also find himself in the circumstance of prescribing a so-called contragestive drug after implantation, without knowing it and without having to know it; and when the miscarriage ensues, he could hardly be culpable of a breach of section 287. As evidence about implantation is always unreliable, he may, in fact, be acting indiscriminately or, even worse, on a discriminatory basis, to cause the desolation of many pregnancies and the annihilation of many human lives, with impunity.

Honourable senators, I maintain that in that section there is hidden an even greater catastrophe. That, honourable senators, is the wanton, unrestricted harvesting of and experimentation on human beings in the embryonic hours of their lives. No self-respecting Christian, Jew or Muslim in Canada can, with conscience, endorse such a travesty as this. Complete disregard in law for the interest that a peaceful state may have in its own generation from the beginnings of that generation is a mark not of civilization but of total disintegration. To pave the way for such disregard, honourable senators, would be irresponsible in the extreme and I therefore urge you to support this amendment.

• (2040)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If no other senator wishes to speak, is it your wish, honourable senators, that the vote on this amendment also be deferred?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, the fourth amendment that I propose, which is before you, deals with the protection of health personnel based on religious beliefs, oaths and conscience.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DIVISION DEFERRED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Honourable Senator Corbin:

> That Clause 1 of Bill C-43 at page 2 thereof be amended by adding after line 16 thereof, prior to the final quotation marks of Clause 1:
> Coercion 289.(1) Every person who requires a physician or medical practitioner or nurse or employee of a medical practitioner or other employee of a health-care facility, as a condition of their employ or under threat or the fear of any loss, to perform or assist at or otherwise arrange for an induction of abortion is guilty of an offence and is liable on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years.

POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING RESERVED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Amendment No. 4 deals with health personnel within the health-care facilities in Canada. As one reads the coercion section of the amendment it seems that we are talking about physicians, nurses or employees as a condition of their employment. In the discrimination section, it is a matter of discrimination in any manner against doctors, nurses, other employees or against an applicant for employment.

Honourable senators, this appears clearly to be a matter of provincial jurisdiction. I do not think we can regulate any other employment standards within a province, and we do not, and that it is what constitutional experts would call property and civil rights within the province. I am not trying to take away from Senator Haidasz's right to move amendments, but I think clearly this amendment is beyond the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada to legislate. It is ultra vires of this Parliament in that it is currently within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature in each province.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, the reason I brought in this amendment was because of representations I have received from a group of nurses called Nurses for Life, individual nurses, and doctors in the hospital where I practice who related to me that there are surgical interns, in particular in gynaecology and obstetrics, who have been forced to perform abortions or else they would not get a licence to specialize in what they are studying, obstetrics and gynaecology. It is actually in response to them. I asked them: "Are you not protected by the provincial Human Rights Associations and the Canadian Human Rights Agency?" and they said, "No."

Therefore, in a few paragraphs, I now intend to bring that out.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I could not be more sympathetic to the cases raised by our colleague. The question that he asked the individual intern or doctor is very appropriate. It seems to me that what he has described is a human rights violation of the worst kind, especially if the particular person was finding it unconscionable to do that kind of work on religious grounds. Without being an expert in that field, it seems to me that it would be a gross violation of that person's human rights.

Having said that, and expressing to Senator Haidasz a sincere sympathy for that kind of case, I again raise the question, because he has not dealt with it, of how one overcomes the fact that this is property and civil rights within the province, that what we are doing is legislating over and above what colleges of physicians and surgeons do in each province, or what particular departments of health do in terms of standards imposed for the operation of hospitals and health-care facilities in each individual province. I am suggesting, honourable senators, and would even ask the Speaker to rule, that this clearly is well beyond the power of the Parliament of Canada under the British North America Act.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, in response to Senator Nurgitz, and anyone else who brings up such an argument, I still say that the nurses, in particular those from the organization Nurses for Life, stated that they have sought provincial protection against such discrimination and harassment and they failed to get any protection. The federal Parliament, we here in this chamber, should have at heart national standards to apply for every Canadian across the land. Senator Nurgitz shakes his head negatively. We are dealing with abortion. The law of abortion will apply to everyone from coast to coast in this country, and so should the standards by which this law will operate. I am sorry that Senator Kinsella is not here. He was a chairman of the Human Rights Commission of New Brunswick. He could have given his viewpoint in this matter. I have proposed the amendment in response to the health-care personnel I have mentioned. I believe we should protect them. We are here to protect them, and that is what I am doing by this amendment.

Hon. Michel Cogger: Senator Haidasz, may I ask you a question? I do not want to address the substance of the amendment. Perhaps you can help me, or perhaps your seconder, Senator Corbin, can. It seems to me a serious flaw inasmuch as the French version is meaningless. It does not seem to correspond with the English version in its last part. Perhaps your seconder would like to take a look at it.

Senator Haidasz: We can always ask our interpreters to translate it into French as closely as possible. This translation is not mine, Senator Cogger. I gave the English versions to one of the people at the Table. He sent it out for translation. If you can correct it for me, then, fine; or perhaps the translators will correct it for us. We are not voting on it now. I do not think we will vote on it until tomorrow. We will have another French version tomorrow.

• (2050)

Senator Cogger: I want to point out to you that we are not talking about a newspaper article here. We are talking about a legislative text that in its current form in French is incorrect. Surely I am allowed to read it in French, vote on it in French and make my mind up on it in French. This document is incomprehensible. It does not make any sense.

Senator Haidasz: I accept your remarks, Senator Cogger. I can only repeat what I said. Hopefully, the translation will be to your satisfaction tomorrow, because I am sure that we will not vote on it tonight.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, again I reiterate what I said before—that is, that I am sympathetic to the cases raised by our colleague, Senator Haidasz, about these particular matters, but they are matters well beyond the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada under the British North America Act. We cannot regulate those various things that are ongoing within health care facilities anywhere in Canada. He is absolutely correct, we are attempting to regulate or legislate with respect to abortion. We can do that by means of regulating it as a crime—that is, within the Criminal Code. But terms and conditions of employment, and how people are discriminated or are not discriminated against clearly come within all of those various laws that are passed by an individual province. Honourable senators, it would perhaps be simpler if I said that I would be pleased to leave the matter in the hands of the Speaker.

Senator Haidasz: I agree, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak on the point of order, as this is a legal matter I will take it under advisement and then report on it tomorrow.

[Senator Haidasz.]

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DIVISION DEFERRED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, my Amendment No. 5 before you involves a substantive clarification of principle allowing for emergency medical intervention. It is similar to that which I gave notice of the other day, which is found in today's Orders of the Day under Order No. 4. I am replacing that amendment with another amendment. Therefore, I ask the Senate to allow me to strike this amendment as it appears before you, that is, to strike out Motion No. 4, which involves the same amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Haidasz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Corbin, that Clause 1 of Bill C-43 at page 1 thereof be amended by striking lines 21 and 22 thereof and substituting therefor:

> "medical practitioner", in respect of a medical procedure performed in a province, means and striking lines 11 through 16 thereof and substituting therefor:

> years, unless the procedure is performed with every precaution to preserve the life of the child throughout the procedure by or under the direction of a medical practitioner who is of the opinion that, if the procedure were not performed, the life or health of the female person would be likely to be endangered and striking lines 4 and 5 thereof, substituting therefor:

> 287(1) Every person who performs on a female person pregnant with a child a medical procedure that delivers the child prior to term with the effect of the death of that child before it has proceeded from the womb is guilty

renumbering succeeding lines accordingly,

and that Clause 1 of Bill C-43 at page 2 thereof be amended by striking line 5 thereof and substituting therefor:

> and section 288, performing a medical procedure does

[Translation]

Senator David: Senator Haidasz, I am very surprised to see that your fifth amendment was not translated into French.

[English]

Senator Haidasz: I asked for a translation. Nevertheless, I asked to have it struck because I have another one in its place. I am replacing it with another amendment.

Senator Cogger: Will it be translated?

Senator David: Will it come later with the other one?

Senator Haidasz: Yes; it will come later. The substantive amendment is No. 7.

[Translation]

Senator David: I do notice one thing, Senator Haidasz: the whole page is in one language only, and is absolutely blank on the other side.

This seems to me a strange way of going about things, but I will not insist.

[English]

Senator Haidasz: I gave the English translations to a person at the Table. He sent it somewhere to be done. I did not do the Xeroxing of the copies.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, on the point that is being made by Senator David, I notice that the same thing applies to amendments six and seven. Perhaps it would be wise to delay moving these amendments until the translation is provided.

Senator Haidasz: If that is the wish of the Senate, I will agree and abide by the suggestion made by Senator Thériault. Again, I will gladly bring—

Senator Thériault: I do not blame you.

Senator Haidasz: I am not blaming anyone. A mistake has been made. I am not responsible for it. If the French translation is missing, I will bring the rest of the amendments up for discussion tomorrow. Therefore, I adjourn the debate.

[Translation]

Senator David: Senator Haidasz, I don't know if my colleagues will agree with me, but if you can provide me with a French translation of that document, I would readily accept that there has been a translation error for which you are not responsible.

I think it would be preferable to go through all amendments because—

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I object to the introduction of legislation in this House if we are not provided with a copy in both official languages.

[English]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, with the greatest of respect, the reason that we have simultaneous translation in this place and the other place is so that honourable senators may be able to move motions or amendments in the official language of their choice. There is no obligation upon an honourable senator moving an amendment to provide official versions in both languages. That is the responsibility of the Senate.

Our colleague, Senator Haidasz, as a matter of courtesy, attempted to provide us with a French version of the amendments that he had proposed in the official language of his choice, namely, English. It turns out that the French versions—at least the one that I glanced at, namely, the one to which Senator Cogger referred—are quite inadequate. Therefore, we will have to rely, as we frequently and usually do, on the services of the Senate to provide an official version in the language other than that used by the mover.

It would be quite within our rules and our practices here to accept an amendment moved by an honourable senator in either English or French and to depend upon the services of the Senate to produce an official version in the other official language.

Senator Thériault: Is the Honourable Senator Murray saying that the government could introduce legislation in this place in only one language?

Senator Murray: The government would not, of course, do so. No.

Senator Thériault: But it could?

An Hon. Senator: Not the government.

Senator Murray: I think not, honourable senators; but an honourable senator may do so. That is why we have simultaneous translation.

Senator Frith: Is that so?

● (2100)

Senator Thériault: I am sorry, but I do not agree with the interpretation of the Leader of the Government as to why we have simultaneous interpretation. The reason he gave is not the reason why we have it. Can he show me some place in the law where it is stated that is why?

Senator Murray: I am sorry, I did not mean just simultaneous translation but translation services in Parliament.

Honourable senators, there is no obligation upon an honourable senator moving an amendment to provide an official version in both languages. If the Official Languages Act means anything, it means that an honourable senator may speak and propose an amendment in the official language of his choice. Thereupon it is the responsibility of the Senate to provide an official version of that amendment in the other language.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, Senator David made the point. The point has been made many times in committee over the last 12 years that I have been in this place. It is the custom. There is not only that to consider, but the fact that decisions have been rendered by the courts stating that legislation passed even by Quebec in one language is not valid.

Senator Murray: Of course.

Senator Thériault: Suppose that these amendments were to pass, they would then become law. They would be presented in only one language. I do not think that is the intent of the act which made the Parliament of Canada and l'Assemblée nationale du Québec bilingual.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, they would certainly not be voted on in one language. They would be presented to the house for debate and a vote in both languages. My point is that it is not the responsibility of Senator Haidasz to provide the official version in both languages. It is the responsibility of the translation services of the Senate to provide the official version in the official language other than the one spoken by the mover of the amendment.

Senator Thériault: That is the point I am making. It is not the responsibility of Senator Haidasz, or any other senator, but the responsibility of this house of Parliament to provide legislation in both langauges. That is the point I make. I think it should be done. I do not know why we should make an exception tonight.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If I can be of any help, I understand that Senator Haidasz did submit his amendments for translation. That is taking place now. It is expected that we will receive the translations during the course of the evening. The problem is with the translation service.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, because we have decided to sit this evening and because this problem has arisen—and no one is blaming Senator Haidasz—other speakers are ready to proceed. Would Senator Haidasz agree to yield to another senator so that the debate may continue?

Senator Haidasz: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Solange Chaput-Rolland: Honourable senators, there are times when in our society, a number of men and women are given a formidable mandate: to choose, on behalf of the rest of society, between legislation and the absence thereof, in the knowledge that either decision will have serious consequences for those concerned.

The abortion bill before us today is fraught with both moral and legal issues, but above all, it concerns women.

To remove any doubts as to where I stand, I want to make it clear from the outset that although like many women, I find this very difficult, I feel bound by my conscience to vote in favour of this bill, although like most of us, I am as uneasy about the consequences as I am about the reasons that led the House of Commons and the Senate to support it.

I was told there would be a free vote. But free to do what? To decide for future generations that abortion, something that has been practised for centuries, by men or by so-called "angel-makers", will be legal, thereby preserving a measure of a woman's dignity if, for some very serious reason, she should resort to abortion after consulting with a physician.

We all know that abortion has been practised since time immemorial, but there is always a veil of secrecy, of silence and shame, and a fear of being compromised, both for the man or woman practising abortion and for the woman resorting to abortion, more often than not against her innermost feelings, her feelings as a mother, and her family.

I must admit that now, at the age of 71, I feel guilty about voting in favour of this bill, but I would feel even worse about deciding today what may happen tomorrow to our young people or to small children whom we want to protect against cruelty and violence, and also, I think, against having to resort to methods which we never would have dared to discuss openly in the past.

Yesterday's and today's children, although they may be more liberated and freer of social and religious constraint, do not accept, any more than did people of my own generation, those backroom abortions that scarred a woman for life. Even if they know that a woman is medically entitled to an abortion, they do not feel comfortable about it, and this is psychological, mental and social.

Of course it is easy to lie to doctors, and it is easy for doctors to betray the trust of their patients, to use fear as a pretext for refusing to practise abortion openly, according to certain standards.

Our society is one of violence, sexual assault, human solitude and superficial and mostly cruel judgments. Women have always been controlled by men in their most intimate circumstances. I am reminded of women who died because their spouses refused to sign a consent form so that the surgeon could do an operation that would have saved their lives. A victim of rape is usually censured because she probably deserved it or asked for it, and there is still this myth that she probably enjoyed the whole process.

On radio and tv, I interviewed young girls of 13 or 14, who were pregnant. I found this a shattering experience, especially when I asked the girl: What are you going to do with the baby when you go back to school or when you get started on a career? In 98 per cent of the cases, the answer was: Mom will look after it. One glance at the almost desperate look on the mother's face, a woman who had already raised four or five children, was enough to realize that in this particular case or in the case of a rape victim, abortion should probably have been compulsory.

[English]

I have received many letters condemning me in advance for my anguished decision to support this law. I can understand the reasons of those who are pro-life and those who remain pro-choice. Both are valid. Both options are born out of dignity and some sort of morality.

But who am I to condemn today the kind of society in which our grandchildren will live tomorrow? Who am I to repeat the injustices of yesterday and to condone the unknown justice of their future? It is not only for the fear of judgments almost always passed by men who neither know nor understand the terrible anxieties many women experience, with or without their partners, lovers or spouses when asking for an abortion—to terminate the life she bears; for women are not only bearers of children, they are part of a society who fear not to brutalize them in our sexual or social life.

The present morality is not the one in which I was born. The laws of our frightening future will not correspond to today's ethics. Would we give birth to a child in a nuclear environment or become pregnant without fear in a chemical war? Who ever thinks of the son or daughter who one day learns that he or she is the product of a mother who was raped? Do you believe that such a child could live with himself and his mother without more pains than we have ever experienced in our society, so sadly prone to judge rather than forgive, more tolerant for murderers than for the murdered, more lenient to the rapists than to the raped ones?

I do not like this law, nor the doctors who, for fear of being caught thinking and acting wrongly, might make life and death even more difficult for women. Am I obliged to believe that they would prefer their clandestine interventions of yesterday to practising today legally and openly?

And, as usual, men will go free, with or without the law. If a woman seeks an abortion in a small village, she is bound to be criticized and vilified. The doctors might go free if their practice is according to the specification which will make their intervention legal and normal.

I have seen buses full of women, young and old, leaving for some towns in the U.S.A. As a journalist I stood not far from the buses as they came back with the same women pale, crying, and almost in agony. Today they will not have to go to another country to obtain what they want. An honest doctor will, I hope, advise her of all the positive aspects of a normal birth, but will also listen with compassion to her reasons to seek his help.

If, despite the law, which is a sane and honest compromise between the "no" and the "yes" to abortion, a woman of 1991 goes through the same agonies of days of yore, I shall blame some doctors who might not shoulder their own individual medical and legal responsibilities.

I refuse to invoke murder and crime in light of the spirit and letter of this difficult law. Too many are committed with the consent of a dormant society facing violence with indifference, but who refuse a woman the right to dispose of her own body, if forced to require medical help patterned upon the will and the understanding of her tragedy by men who seldom look back on their own responsibilities.

Today, as I speak, thousands of babies, born or unborn, are killed in the name of war. Who cares? Who condemns the aggressors on both sides of this agonizing issue? Generals, soldiers, priests in uniforms? No one.

I would indeed have chosen to let women decide among themselves—among women judges, doctors and lawyers—what kind of life or motherhood they want; but I can see the feminist rationale of my reasoning.

Therefore, I shall pray so that women are not abused because of this law and do not lie in order to seek an abortion, for little do they know how long they might suffer from a hasty decision. I shall also pray that doctors fulfil their responsibilities as described in this law with honesty, courage and compassion. Finally, I shall hope that, as a consequence of this law, sexual discrimination may be more and better explained, not by ads on television but by understanding parents and serious teachers. Adoption agencies might begin a campaign for adoption.

Finally, I hope that our society will copy with more courage and intelligence to curb violence and sexual exhibitions in its advertising and films. This country needs children; but children also, and more so, deserve to be raised in a sane environment. Death is not always the end of life; at times it is the beginning of life.

[Translation]

. . . on this earth torn by violence, the murder of older people as much as that of unborn children.

I condemn the social conditions which somehow forced us to enact this law, which I prefer to the absence of legislation because in this great moral and legal vacuum, in the end, everybody, women, men and children, will lose bits of their humanism.

Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have been told that a French translation to my amendments 5, 6 and 7 is on its way. Perhaps another senator who wishes to take part in debate on third reading can proceed.

Senator Cogger: Senator Haidasz, please believe me, I did not insist on a French translation, and I would ask you to proceed. The purpose of my initial intervention was to point out to you that I thought the French translation was faulty, and I wanted you, as well as your secretary, to be aware so that it could be corrected in due course. As far as I am concerned, you may proceed.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, it was not Senator Cogger's point that got me thinking about it, but Senator David's point. As far as I am concerned, the Leader of the Government can grin all he likes. It is not my first time in a legislature where we have to legislate in two languages. I have been around and I am worried. I am worried because what could have happened is that those amendments could have become law after being presented to this house in only one language, and that would be the precedent that this could cause. I am worried about it. It is not at all Senator Haidasz who is responsible for the translation, or it should not be if it is. It should be this house of Parliament.

Senator Murray: Right.

Senator Thériault: I would not feel very good if I were presenting legislation in French only when 75 per cent of the people could not understand or read the legislation, because if amendments are passed, they become law. The people might understand what I say, but I could say one thing and the legislation could say another. This is something that I have not seen, in this house or in the New Brunswick legislature when I was there after the Official Languages Act was passed, and I do not think it is right. That is all. Go ahead and proceed. If you want to proceed and create a precedent, then go ahead and do it.

Senator Murray: The situation that my honourable friend describes could not happen. It could no more happen that we could pass legislation in one language in this house than it would happen that my friend's words, spoken tonight in English, would not appear tomorrow in French, as they will. There will be two *Hansard*s, as there always are, a French version and an English version, which, as we know, have equal official status. We do not legislate in one language. We legislate in two languages, but it is the right of any honourable senator to speak, as my friend has just done, in the language of his choice and to present a motion or an amendment in the language of his choice. It is the duty of the administration of this place to provide the official version in the other official language.

Senator Thériault: If I understand the requirements of the law in my province, in the Parliament of Canada and in the Parliament of Quebec, after the Official Languages Act was passed, and as a result of a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, by which legislation in the province of Manitoba was annulled because it was passed in only one language, then it does not matter what language I speak, because what I say is not law; but the amendments that are proposed tonight would be if they passed. I know that the Leader of the Government in the Senate knows that he is going to defeat these amendments. That is his prerogative. He has a bunch of people over there who are going to vote against the amendment. However, it could have been some minor amendment on other legislation that passed without anyone saying anything, and it would have passed in one language only, and I think it could be a precedent. I am not sure. I am not a legal expert. I am not sure whether it would be a legal precedent. It is some sort of precedent, and some 20 years down to the road, somebody may look it up to see what happened. I have said what I wanted.

[Translation]

Senator David: Honourable senators, with your permission. I could make my speech tonight so that you could prepare the appropriate documents for tomorrow, as suggested by Senator Thériault.

Instead of discussing the procedure for half an hour, let us proceed with the speeches on the substance of this issue.

With your permission, Senator Haidasz.

Senator Haidasz: Agreed, Senator David.

Senator David: Honourable senators, the abortion debate was revived by the January 28, 1988, decision of the Supreme Court striking down section 251 of the Criminal Code and abolishing the institutional therapeutic abortion committees. It has given me the opportunity to express my views on the issue in this House on two occasions.

On June 16, 1988, I spoke on a motion put forward by Senator Haidasz introducing Bill S-16 concerning abortion. I opposed this bill which called for life imprisonment for inducing an abortion and a term of two years for the woman requesting it.

I had tried to strike an equitable balance between my personal and medical convictions on the one hand and my parliamentary accountability on the other.

The fundamental value, for me as for Senator Haidasz, was and still is the right to live. I agree with the majority of scientists who assert that life is passed on at the time of conception and that the age of the resulting human being is that of its development. At any stage of development, to destroy the embryo or the foetus is to destroy the life on which the human structure is built.

From the Hippocratic oath to that taken in Geneva in 1948, the medical ethic always had the same objective: absolute respect for life.

[Senator Murray.]

In 50 years, attitudes in our so-called civilized society have changed, and the rules of medical ethics have become more flexible. Tolerance has taken the place of rigid individual values, and medical students no longer swear a Hippocratic or Geneva type oath.

In the past 20 years, the number of abortions, as you pointed out, Senator Haidasz, has varied from 60,000 to 72,000 annually. That is the reality that we, as a parliamentarians, must face, whether we want to or not. My conclusion was that abortion was still a reprehensible act, but I could not condemn a woman who had an abortion. I had foreseen that any legislation would be judged to be too permissive by the pro-lifers and too restrictive by the pro-choice people. That is why I felt that the motion, you put forward that year, Senator Haidasz, was incompatible with the present context of our society, and that is why, as a parliamentarian, I sincerely objected to that motion.

In the summer of 1989, the Chantal Daigle case, perhaps too soon forgotten, was given spectacular coverage by the media. The government was judged very severely by many editorial writers because there was no national legislation on abortion. To sound out the views of members, three motions covering a range of alternatives, from the most permissive to the most restrictive, were tabled in the House. None of these motions was accepted and the government was accused of failing to act responsibly because it avoided tabling specific of legislation.

Meanwhile, honourable senators, to try and get a better perspective on this very complex debate, I did some research on the way legislation developed in five democratic countries, our own, the United States, England, France and not at the time—this was only two years ago—was called West Germany. This study, which I called the abortion dilemma, was the subject of my second speech on June 19, 1990, on second reading of Bill C-43.

Interestingly, in all countries covered by the study, the abortion debate provoked intense discussion and division. Nevertheless, all polls taken in those five countries showed that the majority—60 per cent—of citizens wanted legislation that would be a compromise between the two extremes of pro-life and pro-choice. The health of the pregnant woman is almost always the key issue in the various types of legislation proposed. It is often generally interpreted in its broadest sense, including physical, mental, psychological, and sometime social and economic considerations. The general trend in these countries was, generally, a transfer from criminal legislation to health legislation.

Canada's case is unusual, because the federal government has exclusive authority in criminal matters, while the provinces have jurisdiction over the Civil Code and health matters. I think this is particularly important if we are to understand and accept the particular status of Canadian federalism.

Bill C-43, within the only possible context of the Criminal Code of this country, sets forth three basic principles.

First, abortion is a medical act and is thus covered by the Canada Health Act. Women can therefore take advantage of this legislation which provides for free health care, portability and accessibility. We will get back to this last aspect later on.

Second, only a certified physician in the province where the abortion takes place can perform the operation.

Third, the abortion can be performed if, in the opinion of the physician, the health of the pregnant woman is threatened for physical, mental or psychological reasons.

Its seems to me the advantages of Bill C-43 far outweigh its disadvantages. Considering that in that respect no country has been able to reconcile all viewpoints, I voted in favour of this bill which amounted to a compromise that seemed to me to be more acceptable than a legal void.

These thoughts which I tried to sum up as briefly as possible are the essential points of my previous speeches.

Today, honourable senators, I will try to convey my feelings about the arguments made by medical organizations that are in favour of rejecting the bill. The brief presented by the Canadian Medical Association in particular which speaks for 45,000 Canadian physicians in all provinces and the two territories surely deserves very serious consideration.

I fully appreciate the opposition of physicians to "the criminalization of abortion" because it is "the only medical act subject to criminal charges". However I believe that active euthanasia as well as certain genetic and reproductive techniques will eventually be deemed to be the object of special legislation. Still I will limit my comments to abortion.

Honourable senators, in the eyes of a good many people abortion, whatever the gestation period during which it is performed, is in itself a criminal medical act inconsistent with medical ethics. This is why, even though as a medical act it is a relatively simple and banal medical procedure, the very purpose of the act makes it altogether different from all other medical procedures. In any case and as far as I know, it is the only medical act which simultaneously has to do with the health or life of two patients—one might say two "persons"—which is aimed at bettering the life of a patient while destroying a potential life, that of the foetus.

In my opinion, the decision to perform an abortion greatly exceds the "normal context of a physician-patient relationship". In fact, Canada's obligation to deal with abortion in the Criminal Code rather than in a health program which would be outside its jurisdiction might be the lesser of two evils because it emphasizes the seriousness of a medical procedure which, according to the Canadian Medical Association, should be carried out only "after a consciencious analysis of all the other solutions". In this sense, Bill C-43 greatly reduces the triviality of this technique and reminds us that this procedure can be used only for causes which might jeopardize the physical, mental and psychological health of the woman involved.

In this context, I have difficulty agreeing with the statement to the effect that the government "should have concluded that abortion should be considered like any other medical procedure".

Honourable senators, the insistence on the word "criminalization" seems to me to be both abusive and alarmist. It overlooks the facts that the sub-sections which were struck out by the Supreme Court in January 1988 were also part of the Criminal Code and that this legislation referred to "health" without any definition. The precisions in this legislation seem to me to be very relevant to avoid the criminalization of this procedure. Previously, a pregnant woman had to submit her case to the members of a therapeutic committee (where the presence of her physician was mandatory) and obtain the necessary authorization. Today, the decision is left to only one person, her physician.

By comparison, Bill C-43 appears to me to be a real progress, because the definition of health includes physical, mental and psychological considerations. The therapeutic committee's authorization certainly removed a heavy burden of responsibility from the shoulders of the physician carrying out the abortion, but it interfered just as much, if not more, with the normal physician-patient relationship. The elimination of this restraint should in fact increase accessibility. The Canadian Medical Association stated that usually a patient seeks the advice and professional help of her physician who should be able to assume that she is telling the truth. The same remark could apply to the therapeutic committees in 1969.

A bill which would foster lying could not be in the best interests of our country, according to the Canadian Medical Association which stated that it is not in favour of abortion on demand and that this procedure should not be considered as an alternative to contraception. Considering that a physician can always refuse to treat a patient, except in an emergency, I believe it is his responsibility not to recommend an abortion if he feels that it is not warranted.

The Canadian Medical Association focuses on the increasing number of physicians who would refuse to perform abortions. It also emphasized the fact that they will be subject, to harassment and possible court proceedings. The Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists provided figures which certainly impressed several parliamentarians. It is important to note that 873 physicians were polled by this organization and that out of 464 who had performed abortions, 275 indicated that they would stop if Bill C-43 were adopted. The Association felt that this percentage has increased since that poll was taken. Personally, I am quite skeptical, not about the figure of the expressed intentions, but about the middle and long-term realism of their significance.

My impression is that a physician who keeps well structured files in keeping with the not very restrictive demands of this bill will be well protected and free of all sanctions. I think it makes perfect sense that the physician has the same responsibilities with respect to this medical act as he or she does for any other medical act. Today's doctors, as we all know, must practice "defensive" medicine to avoid exposing themselves to court actions which are becoming more and more frequent.

The best defence is properly kept medical files and in this case, a good relationship with the patient.

As far as harassment is concerned, I don't think Bill C-43 clarifies anything whatsoever, and I think it may in fact aggravate certain situations. Harassment already exists in this area and will continue, I imagine. We can expect test cases to be brought before the courts to test the validity of the legislation and eventually, the Supreme Court may be expected to rule on its constitutionality. I will let colleagues with more expertise than I have—I hope you will clear up this point Senator Beaudoin—discuss these legal and constitutional issues.

Honourable senators, accessibility in remote areas appears to be another concern of the Canadian Medical Association. To my knowledge the problem already exists. Thanks to praiseworthy efforts by the provincial governments, progress has been made but mainly in general practice. As far as abortion is concerned, there are two factors that must be considered: there is often a lack of doctors who do abortions in remote areas and there is also the desire of members of these communities to remain anonymous. As in every specialty, a medical act tends to be safer when the appropriate technique is used by enough patients to ensure that the practitioner is capable. However, we must not underestimate the desire for anonymity. And in this respect, our large urban centres, whether we like it or not, are better equipped to meet this need than small towns.

A final argument is the additional resources that will be needed to meet the criteria. The Canadian Medical Association referred to the systematic psychiatric evaluation of psychological tests and a psycho-social evaluation, in order to minize the risk of criminal proceedings. Assuming the statement is not exaggerated, I personally see this as an advantage. It would give the women involved some time—within reason—for reflection and possibly for making a more considered decision and dealing with ways to plan and to achieve more effective use of preventive measures and of course education, especially when we are talking about teenagers who cannot always depend on finding adequate resources in their family or social environment.

Finally, doctors admit that making abortion a "medical act" is the only way to make the provinces responsible for including it as part of universal and free health care services. That being said, I fail to understand why some witnesses claim that the bill discriminated against the poor, the young and immigrant women. I find it hard to understand why this bill would be judged to be useless and inappropriate. I wonder why Canada, of all industrialized democratic countries, should be practically the only one without abortion legislation. In testimony before the committee, Mr. Gilles Létourneau, president of the Law Reform Commission of Canada, said:

● (2140)

[English]

> If we look at the history of legislation on abortion we will see that in Canada, at least, roughly every 20 years the issue comes back again. I think it was discussed in the early fifties, then in 1969 and now in 1991. The law is not a static thing. It evolves to suit the needs of the population.

[Senator David.]

[Translation]

In his preamble, he said:

> We all know that this bill deals with a very delicate issue on social, moral, ethical and religious grounds. We all know that the ideal solution, which would solve all problems, does not exist in our world already so imperfect. [. . .] We sincerely believe that Bill C-43 represents such a compromise et we are here today to support this bill.

Honourable senators, I have covered two of the three aspects outlined in the committee report, that is criminalization and accessibility, due to the opting out of some of the medical practioners. I leave the matter of the bill's constitutionality to more knowledgeable colleagues.

In conclusion, the committee did not propose any amendment in its report. I am convinced that any proposal to amend this legislative text would jeopordize the delicate balance of Bill C-43.

Honourable senators, I find the designations of the two groups opposing this legislation, the pro-life and the pro-choice, better suited than the one suggested by some members of this House as anti or pro-abortion. In fact, I do not think that any member of the Senate is for abortion per se. The choice is between rigid basic principles and more flexible attitudes of human compassion.

As parliamentarians, our role is precisely to try to support a consensus of 60 per cent of the various populations surveyed in our research effort who are in favour of a law which would be neither too permissive nor too restrictive.

It is only by taking such an attitude of compromise that the Minister of Justice, Mrs. Kim Campbell, who in fact declared herself as pro-choice, and myself, always a pro-life, accept the proposed legislation, because we know very well that no law could be applied if it were completely satisfactory to the supporters of one group or the other.

Given these conditions, we cannot expect to escape the reality that abortion has become a feature of our modern societies. It is much easier to criticize this bill than to try to devise another one which would be acceptable to every group heard by the committee.

Honourable senators, by voting down this bill, the Senate would take responsibility for a renewed "legal vacuum" which has been strongly condemned after the events of the summer of 1989. Such an action would have the effect of transferring our legislative responsabilities to the various judicial levels. In my opinion, this would show the people that we have neither the courage, nor the expertise, nor the wisdom to legislate on an issue which has been the centre of countless debates, studies, opinions and suggestions, ever since the Supreme Court rendered its decision, three years ago today.

All these considerations led me to share the views of the representatives of the Law Reform Commission of Canada, which recommended that Bill C-43 be passed.

To conclude, I would like to suggest, honourable senators, that the federal government, in cooperation with the provincial governments, shows leadership by launching an education and prevention campaign to reduce the number of abortions. I think that I am unwittingly repeating what Senator Chaput-Rolland was saying. We must do everything possible to prevent that a medical procedure almost without risk become an alternative to family planning.

We must promote the family and give back to our people the desire and the pride of having children. We should plan for a greater consistency in order to do away with irritants, both social and economic, which prevent couples from raising a family. We have to lessen the burden of children on working mothers, without neglecting the value of the work performed by the mothers who chose to stay home.

Honourable senators, I am glad I had this opportunity to share with you my thoughts on a subject which has been troubling me for a long time. I thank you for your kind attention at this late hour.

[English]

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I believe you have received a French translation of my amendment No. 6.

Senator Phillips: I have not received an English translation.

Senator Haidasz: It is an oversight.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, before we proceed to Amendment No. 6, is it agreed that Amendment No. 5 will be deferred, as with the previous amendments?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DIVISION DEFERRED

Senator Haidasz: Under Amendment No. 6 I move:

> That Clause I of Bill C-43 at page 2 thereof be amended by striking lines 1 through 16 thereof and at page 1 thereof be amended by striking lines 4 through 24 thereof and substituting therefor:
> 1. Section 287 of the Criminal Code is repealed and Section 223 of the Criminal Code is amended at subsection (2) thereof by deleting from the last line thereof the final words "after becoming a human being."

Honourable senators, the vacuity in law which both former Section 251 as amended and the present Bill C-43 were created to fill was itself created artificially in an amending formula of the Omnibus Bill of 1968-69. This vacuity has led to abortion on demand in this country regardless of efforts to clarify such matters as a definition of health or the protection of physicians by hospital boards. The amendment I propose here will close the vacuity by allowing section 223(2) of the Criminal Code to provide protection for the unborn child, as it used to, under former section 206(2) of the Criminal Code.

Until we can find agreement on the most effective way to deter criminal abortions and the veritable holocaust of Canadian children, we should follow the advice of Doctor Bernard Nathanson, who appeared before the committee some few days ago and advised us to "put a moratorium on all abortions." This advice comes from the man who deeply regrets having helped to start the whole seditious ball rolling in New York, where he founded the Abortion Rights Action League, supervised many thousand abortions, and invented the tactics of false statistics on back-street abortions and slogans, such as "every child a wanted child." Today he is thankful for the voice of truth which, in a tiny nun, Mother Teresa, cries "Every child is a wanted child."

Honourable senators, to prove it, let us close the vacuity in Canadian law by adopting this amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that this amendment shall be deferred, as were the previous amendments?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DIVISION DEFERRED

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I come now to the final amendment, Amendment No. 7, which is substantive in nature. I believe you all have the French translation, as I have one here. I move:

> That Clause 1 of Bill C-43 at pages 1 and 2 thereof be amended by striking out section 287 as set out in that clause and substituting therefor the following:
> Abortion or induction of miscarriage
> 287.(1) Every person who by any instrument or by any drug or poison or by any means causes with intent the death of a nascent human being is guilty of an offense commonly called "abortion" and is liable on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years.
> Medical intervention to deliver
> (2) A procedure to deliver a child prior to term from its mother's womb is not an offence under section 287 when the procedure is performed with every precaution available to medicine to preserve the life of the nascent human being throughout the procedure by or under the direction of a medical practitioner who in good faith has formed the verifiable medical opinion that the life of the mother is endangered by a condition of health that is complicated by the condition of pregnancy.
> Definitions
> (3) for the purposes of this section and for the purposes of this Act,
> "medical practitioner" means, in respect of a medical intervention performed in a province, a person who is lawfully permitted to practice obstetrical or gynaecological medicine in that province;

"medical opinion" means a medical assessment of the mother's situation which is formed using generally accepted standards of the medical profession and based on verifiable medical evidence;

"deliver a child" means to undertake a procedure to bring forth the nascent human being by surgical or chemical means, abdominally or vaginally, or by severence of the fallopian tube in the event of ectopic pregnancy in accordance with standard medical practice;

"mother" means the female person whose body produced the ovum that generated the nascent human being, or when that female person is not recognized in law, the person who is pregnant with the nascent human being;

"nascent human being" means the living product of a union of a human spermatozoon and a human ovum.

"life" means the state that belongs to one or more products of conception by human beings in such manner as produces, when not interrupted, the living state of every human being defined at Section 223 of this Act."

"living" means existing in the state of life."

Honourable senators, it should be clear by now, from our discussion, from the remarks made in this chamber, and everything that went on in the committee and is included in the report, that I believe there is real confusion over the intended principle of Bill C-43. Those who believe that Bill C-43 is meant to criminalize abortion, albeit weakly, have shown support for strengthening penalties against hardened abortionists for providing for conscious exceptions from abortion procedures by medical staff and even for according what little protection Bill C-43 offers to a child in its first days of life. On the other hand, there is support for a principle for providing a national standard for the conduct of physicians and health-care providers in dealing with procedures that terminate pregnancies, especially when the procedure can result in the unintended death of the child. Let us recall, as Senator Fairbairn also noted earlier today, that the reason for devising special legislative guidelines for abortion in 1969 was the concern of doctors about the risks of prosecution when their otherwise healing arts, in cases of necessity, required that they interfere with the course of pregnancy to deliver health care to a mother. Interfering with pregnancy often resulted in death to a child; as often as not, death after delivery.

I see it as a genuine desire to afford greater protection still for physicians who may have doubts about what risks they may undertake to a child in delivering health care to its mother, that there is support for the requirement that attorneys general, even at the federal level, initiate any proceedings against an alleged criminal abortionist.

But, honourable senators, support has been uneven in all these areas, since there are still many who suppose that ever since 1988 Canadian law cannot introduce restrictions on access to abortion. I have already pointed out how incorrect that view is. The abortion of approximately 80,000 Canadian children a year must definitely be restricted, reduced, even eliminated. Truly is it said that "one cannot legislate morality," but one starts with the law. Certainly it is seditious in the extreme to legislate immorality.

As senators probably know by now, the issue of Bill C-43 is really two-fold. First is the need to criminalize abortion in order to protect the human fetus. As every Justice of the Supreme Court agreed in the 1988 Morgentaler case, including the much-cited former Justice Bertha Wilson, protection of the fetus—and I underline protection of the fetus—is a legitimate and primary objective of a law on abortion. Why else would we be here, honourable senators, discussing Bill C-43?

Legal expert, Gwen Landolt, appearing before our committee, put it succinctly in her analysis of the rather political opinions put before your committee under the guise of legal facts. She pointed out that the Supreme Court of Canada made quite clear, even in the earlier 1976 Morgentaler decision, that the purpose of the abortion law has always been to protect the lives of unborn children against abuses of liberty. In one simple way of looking at it, many crimes may be seen simply as abuses of liberty.

I want to bring to your attention the contents of my speech in this chamber on June 26 of last year when I spoke not only to my Bill S-16 but also to Bill S-7. I do not want to repeat all that evidence. However, I would like to make the following remarks at the present time.

The protection afforded by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, of the rights and freedoms of all its subjects, expresses the need in Canada to preserve and continue that society at its very point of origin, from the hand of the Creator whose supremacy is the foundation of the self-same Charter, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms Section 1, until natural death. The protection to human life, given since earliest times at common law, always incorporated protection of the child, before and after birth, a reflection in part of the desire of human beings to preserve and perpetuate human society. The Supreme Court of Canada requires the guidelines of a normative or definitive nature, concerning the law's protective interests in mothers and their children, for the common good, as one finds in reading the judgment in the Daigle case of 1989, to which Senator David referred a few moments ago. That is precisely what a clearly-worded bill achieves, whose intent is also clear, and not the politically coloured intent of one minister of Justice or one justice of the Supreme Court.

As one final word, honourable senators, let me repeat to you what I am duty bound, as a thinking Christian, to say, for those who must want to know the clear teaching of the Christian church. I refer you to the observations made earlier today by my friend and colleague Senator John Macdonald of Cape Breton to the effect that some Catholic bishops in Canada are too fearful of seeing Bill C-43 disappear from these houses of legislature with nothing to replace it. It may encourage you to note that at last I received, as of Friday last, from the Permanent Committee of the Canadian Catholic Bishops, a letter written by their chairman, Bishop Lebel, in which he says the following:

> The position of the Conference remains that outlined in our submission to the parliamentary committee on January 31, 1990. We said then the bill was "seriously flawed" and we called for a number of amendments.

The letter goes on to say, with regard to the amendments I had suggested to them as late as last week, "Your proposed amendments," Senator Haidasz, "are in general of a kind that we had in mind and, as such, have our support."

It may also interest honourable senators to note that in one point at least we are at a juncture where the pro-life movement, as represented by Campaign Life Coalition, and the Christian Church, are in agreement even on method: boths arms have expressed the support for the substantive amendment that you have before you.

Father Alphonse De Valk, who embodies the very unity of faith and morals this agreement should represent, speaking of Bill C-43 in its unamended form stated:

> When Roman Catholics vote in favour of this bill, they vote against human reason, Christianity, and the teaching of their (own) church. These teachings have been consistent for 2000 years in absolutely rejecting the legitimacy of killing the unborn. There is no such thing as a woman's right to kill her unborn baby.

To demonstrate that this is not just an opinion, I must quote again the statement of Canada's Western Bishops who are also in agreement. They stated: "Bill C-43 as it stands, does not provide the required protection for the preborn." All bishops, to teach with authority, assent to this statement from Rome, which reads, for the good of all society:

> . . . it must be taken as absolutely certain that one may never obey an intrinsically unjust law, such as a law approving abortion in principle. One may not take part in any movement to sway public opinion in favour of such a law, nor may one vote for that law.

For what it may mean to honourable senators, and for me it is the gospel truth, Bill C-43 is a dangerous sham as worded, and the only way it can be shaken down to something I can vote for, and I suggest the same is true for many of you, is through this substantive amendment which is before you.

Honourable senators, may I conclude by stating that I refute what Senator Kirby stated earlier in the chamber about so many Gallup polls that are in favour of pro-choice. In 1989 and 1990 I conducted a poll by myself which was sent to 67,000 homes across Canada, and not the 1,400 telephone calls that these Gallup polls make. With the approval of honourable senators, I should like to table as an appendix to today's Debates of the Senate—because it is already 10:15 p.m.—the results of that survey. It is two pages long.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of survey, see appendix, p. 5245.)

Senator Haidasz: Thank you very much, honourable senators. That is the end of my intervention. I thank you for your great patience and understanding.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to intervene in this debate. However, I should like to point out that earlier in the day Senator Frith suggested that in accepting the amendments we were not bound to the view that the amendments were in order.

This evening Senator Nurgitz raised a point of order on at least one amendment. It may expedite the debate from here on in if the Chair would rule on all amendments as to whether or not they are in or out of order. It would expedite the debate from here on in if the Chair would do so. When the Chair is ruling on amendment No. 5, for example, it would rule on all the amendments. We may thereby save a lot of time debating whether amendment such and such is in order.

I am sure the Chair would find a number of us on this side, myself in particular, in agreement with the Chair's ruling. I am thinking of a previous occasion. I would hope that the Chair would not have the difficulty with the other side that it has had on previous occasions. Therefore, with the greatest of respect, I would request that the Chair rule on all the amendments.

As I said earlier, it is not my intention to speak on Bill C-43. I know there are others who, in their wisdom, are not present at this hour of the night. Therefore, I wish to move the adjournment of the debate with the understanding that anyone who wishes to speak may have the floor.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I would agree with what Senator Phillips has said. We have at least one person on this side who would like to take part in the debate tomorrow. I am in complete agreement.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Sidney Buckwold: Honourable senators, may I ask whether it is possible for the Senate to meet tomorrow morning, say, at 10 a.m., in view of the fact that there are no caucus meetings? Is there any reason why we cannot do that? It may interfere with committees, but normally there is caucus. However, I gather that is not taking place tomorrow. It may save us some time towards the end of the week.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I did not know that the Honourable Senator Buckwold had cancelled our caucus for tomorrow morning. As chairman of our caucus, I rather resent the cancelling of our caucus.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, we have not settled the question of the seventh amendment. Is it your wish that the seventh amendment be deferred as the previous amendments were?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable Senator Phillips has proposed that the Chair should rule on the admissibility of all the amendments. I should like to point out to honourable senators that normally when the Chair is asked to rule it is because there is contention and argument is given on both sides. However, if it is the wish of the Senate that we look at all of the amendments, we can do so. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (2220)

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I concur in what Senator Buckwold suggested earlier with regard to sitting at 10 a.m. tomorrow morning. I suppose that he was not aware that there was a caucus meeting tomorrow of government supporters.

However, I would point out that Thursday morning is free and that if we cannot dispose of all the legislation within these two days, then perhaps we could start early on Thursday morning to cope with the workload.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I think that we can leave the question of Thursday until we see how things go tomorrow. I hope that we will be able to make considerable progress tomorrow and possibly end the debate on Wednesday with a vote on Thursday. Prior to that we can probably deal with the broadcasting bill.

I know that the honourable senator wishes to get back to Toronto on Thursday. I think he can relax and plan to take the six o'clock flight.

I move that all remaining Orders, Inquiries and Motions stand.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

ABORTION BILL

NATIONAL SURVEY ON ISSUE — PRESS RELEASE

THE SENATE OF CANADA LE SÉNAT DU CANADA

Hon. Stanley Haidasz
Toronto - Parkdale
(613) 992-2713

213-15 East Block
Ottawa, Ontario
K1A 0A4

PRESS RELEASE

Senator Stanley Haidasz conducted a national survey seeking the opinion of Canadian adults on the important issue of abortion.

The abortion survey was conducted in the winter of 1988-89. A total of 67,000 questionnaires were sent out, prefaced by a letter and up-to-date information about the abortion issue in parliament. Delivery achieved was 64,555 - that is 94.3%. Total response received was 10,188 which represents a participation level of 16.4%. As the average number of adults in each home is 2.1, the data collected therefore represents opinions of 21,395 adults.

The survey also showed clearly a strong desire to have access to abortion severely restricted. Only 14% of respondents wanted unrestricted access to abortion, as is now the case -- abortion on demand -- following the January 28/88 majority decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. In view of the vacuity in abortion legislation and the inaction of the federal government revealing its own lack of leadership and moral courage, Senator Haidasz introduced in the Senate proposed legislation restricting abortion. This legislation called Bill S-7 received first reading in the Senate on September 26, 1989. This bill responds to the majority view of respondents to this survey.

RESULTS OF THE SURVEY

1. HOLD STRONG VIEWS ON ABORTION ISSUE 75%
   Consider other issues more important 22%
   Little or no interest 2%

2. Aware there have been 1 million approved abortions since 1969:
   Yes 41%; No 59%

3. Aware that most abortions were paid for by Medicare:
   Yes 50%; No 48%

4. BELIEVE INDIVIDUAL HUMAN LIFE BEGINS:

AT CONCEPTION	66%
At 12 weeks	12%
Later	5%
At birth	16%

5. CONSIDER AN UNBORN CHILD AT ANY STAGE TO BE A HUMAN BEING;

.....2

6. Do you agree that all human beings have an ABSOLUTE RIGHT TO LIFE AT EVERY STAGE OF THEIR DEVELOPMENT UNTIL NATURAL DEATH?

AGREE	69%
Disagree	23%
No opinion	8%

7. On which STANDARD would you most prefer a new abortion law to be based:

a) ABORTION to be ILLEGAL unless the MOTHER'S LIFE ENDANGERED 53%

b) Abortion permitted up to: 8 weeks 12%
12 weeks 14%
16 weeks 8%
of a pregnancy; illegal therafter.

c) Abortion permitted on request at any time: 14%

8. If answer to previous question was b), which of these reasons do you consider acceptable for an abortion:

Child may be born with an abnormality	25%
Financial reasons	8%
If child may not be of sex wanted	0%
If pregnancy from rape or incest	31%
Any reason (free choice)	14%

9. Do you object to the use of Medicare funds for abortions?

YES 50%; No 50%

YES 77%; No 23%

11. Do you know where your MP stands on the issue of abortion?

Yes 23% NO 77%

NOTE: About 1% of respondents did not answer every question.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, petitions against the GST are still coming in, and like the previous ones, they are all addressed to me.

I will start with seven petitions from the province of Quebec. Here is one I picked at random, from the Montreal area.

(Names of signatories read).

I have another one here from Amos, Quebec.

(Names of signatories read).

In all cases, the petition was duly signed by all petitioners.

I have a third one from Amos, Senneterre, Val d'Or and Hull, in Quebec.

(Names of signatories read).

I see here many names from Rochebaucourt, an area in Quebec which I mentioned yesterday.

(Names of signatories read).

This one is also fully signed.

I shall continue with a petition from Amos, in Quebec.

(Names of signatories read).

It seems most of these petitions are from people in rural communities.

I shall continue with another petition from the province of Quebec, also from Rochebaucourt.

(Names of signatories read).

Honourable senators, I have another one here from Senneterre, Amos and Val d'Or, Quebec.

(Names of signatories read).

For today, those are all the petitions I have from Quebec. As usual, these petitions are worded as follows:

> Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon senators and members of the House of Commons, as true representatives of the people, to do everything in their power to oppose the new goods and services tax, and we insist that an election be held immediately.

These seven petitions contain about 20 names each, which gives us a total of about 140 names.

[English]

Honourable senators, I have four petitions from Cambridge, in which the petitioners are calling upon senators and MPs, "true representatives of the people," to do everything possible to abolish the new goods and services tax and to demand a general election immediately. These Canadian producers—some of whom, I take it, are farmers—are busily pursuing their activities and flooding the market with products, yet they have no financial improvement. The petition states that the government must therefore set up a national credit office to create the money required by the existence of new wealth and abundance.

Honourable senators, I have more petitions from Rexdale. Included is the name of a petitioner from Cambridge.

(Name of signatory read)

Some signatures are from Cambridge and some are from Toronto.

(Names of signatories read)

The third petition is from Oakville, Ontario. Most of the signatories are from Oakville.

(Names of signatories read)

Today alone, honourable senators, some 220 Canadian citizens point out that petitions against the goods and services tax and the demand for an immediate election are, to quote Senator MacEachen on an earlier occasion, apparently infinite.

I have an additional petition with only three names on it. It says "DDO." I am not sure what that is, but I will file the petition nevertheless. The petition is indicative of the continued unpopularity of the government and demonstrates the rage of Canadians against the present government and its infamous tax.

ABORTION

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-43

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have three petitions to present from citizens who are protesting Bill C-43. They are calling upon the Senate to defeat this bill for reasons which have been clearly explained in speeches in this chamber over the last day or so.

The first petition contains six names of people from Cranbrook, Kimberley, and Wasa, B.C., who are calling upon us to defeat Bill C-43.

The other two petitions are signed by people from Toronto and the surrounding area. The first one has on it 65 names. They have extended this petition by several pieces of paper. All of these petitioners, who are Canadian citizens, are distressed at the thought that Bill C-43 may pass, and they urge the Senate to defeat this bill.

The third petition is signed by 11 citizens from Toronto, who call on the Senate to defeat Bill C-43. I hope that honourable senators are paying attention to the breadth and depth of the petitions we are receiving.

THE CONSTITUTION

NEGOTIATIONS WITH QUEBEC—NOTICE OF MOTION TO REQUEST RESIGNATION OF PRIME MINISTER AND MINISTER OF STATE FOR FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Thursday, January 31, 1991, I will move:

> That the Prime Minister and the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations resign because they do not have the confidence of Canadians to speak for the federation in negotiations with Quebec.

• (1410)

QUESTION PERIOD

CANADA POST

ADHERENCE TO REGULATIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Phillipe D. Gigantès: Honourable senators, the post office is passing from the sublime to the ridiculous. On Sparks Street, at the corner of Elgin and Sparks, there is a sign in the post office that states "Postal products destined for foreign countries are not subject to the GST." The sign is in white letters on red. Ahead of me in the line was a young lady who said, "Why are you making me pay GST? I am sending this letter abroad." The employee behind the counter said, "I have my orders. You pay the GST or your letter doesn't go"; so the young lady paid the GST. I was next in the line and I said, "The young lady said there is a notice there. Why do you want me to pay the GST?" He said, "If you are going to start that, then I am going on a coffee break."

I should like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to please instruct whichever minister is responsible for Canada Post either to take down the sign or to tell the employees to obey it. This is typical of this government: they always speak out of both sides of their mouth.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall see that Canada Post, which is an autonomous crown corporation, is made aware of the honourable senator's representations.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

HONOURABLE JACQUES FLYNN—STATUS OF ACCOUNT

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government if he received Mr. Jacques Flynn's statement of account.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): No, honourable senators.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to three questions that I would ask to be printed as part of today's proceedings. The first is in answer to a question by Senator Hays, dated January 17, requesting plans for further Outlook Conferences. The second is in answer to a question asked on January 22 by Senator Olson regarding short-term financial assistance for farmers. The third is in answer to a question asked on January 24 by Senator Olson regarding the scheduled resumption of the GATT meetings.

PLANS FOR "OUTLOOK" CONFERENCE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on January 17, 1991, by the Honourable Dan Hays regarding Plans for further "Outlook" conferences.

(The answer follows:)

> The Minister of Agriculture with the "Growing Together" Conference of last year established a format for interchange and exchange of ideas between all stakeholders in the agri-food industry and government—a format which he intends to continue.
> The Minister of Agriculture in fact proposed to his provincial colleagues at the Federal-Provincial Meeting of Agriculture Ministers in Winnipeg last November, that a similar type of forum be held this spring. The consensus in Winnipeg was that the spring was not the most opportune time and therefore the decision was taken by federal and provincial ministers to postpone plans for such a conference until another time this year.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE—CANADIAN SHORT-TERM FINANCIAL REQUIREMENTS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on January 22, 1991, by the Honourable H.A. Olson regarding short-term financial assistance for farmers.

(The answer follows:)

> On October 13, 1990, the government announced the Cash Flow Enhancement Program to provide interest-free advances to farmers for the 1990-91 crop year. This program was announced as an interim measure to assist farmers facing serious cash flow problems until a more effective long-term safety net program could be put into place.

The Cash Flow Enhancement Program allows farmers to receive interest-free cash advances of up to $50,000 under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act (PGAPA) and the Advance Payments for Crops Act (APCA).

As of Jan. 2, 1991, $1.3 billion had been advanced under the PGAPA and $245 million under APCA. Some of this money can be used by farmers to cover their operating costs.

Agriculture Canada estimates that this program will provide a benefit of about $95 million in interest relief for the 1990-91 crop year.

In addition, the federal government announced a new generation of safety net programs on January 11, 1991. The new programs, called GRIP (Gross Revenue Insurance Plan) and NISA (Net Income Stabilization Account) will help farmers obtain operating credit this spring because the support is targeted to individual farms and farmers will know the guaranteed revenue for each crop on their farm before seeding.

Farmers can take this information to their lenders when making credit arrangements. The program will also ensure assistance goes where it's needed most because the program is based on individual situations.

The new safety net program isn't going to solve all farm problems. There is uncertainty surrounding GATT negotiations, continuing low grain prices, input costs, requirements for diversification and the need for improved management skills. The problem is multi-faceted and the solution must be multi-faceted. But until the new safety net programs are in place, it is impossible to judge the requirements.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

SCHEDULED RESUMPTION OF MEETINGS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on January 24, 1991, by Senator Olson regarding the scheduled resumption of the GATT meetings.

(The answer follows:)

The Vice-President of the EC Commission responsible for External Relations, Mr. Andriessen, met with Ministers from Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay, Chile, Colombia and Mexico on January 25 and attended meetings in Washington on January 28 and meetings in Ottawa on January 29 including a meeting with the Minister of International Trade. In each of these meetings, Mr. Andriessen explored the prospects for resuming the Uruguay Round negotiations.

The Brussels Ministerial meeting reached an impasse last December, mainly as a result of an impasse over the thorny issue of agriculture. Since that time, there has been intensive efforts among the key participants aimed at resuming the negotiations.

Mr. Arthur Dunkel, the Director General of the GATT, has indicated that while he is "cautiously optimistic" he is still in the process of developing a "platform" paper on agriculture which he hopes could provide a basis for resumption.

It is expected that the Dunkel consultative process will reach a critical stage over the next week or so. Canada has been working hard since the Brussels meeting to help develop a basis for resuming the negotiations. We have had extensive ministerial level contacts with the USA, EC and Mr. Dunkel. In all of these discussions, we are stressing the importance of resuming the negotiations and concluding them in the original time frame envisaged under the USA fast track authority.

Following his conversations with Mr. Andriessen, the Minister of International Trade remains cautiously optimistic that a basis for resumption will emerge in the near future. However, for this to occur, all participants will need to show flexibility.

ABORTION BILL

THIRD READING—MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT—SPEAKER'S RULING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips, for the third reading of the Bill C-43, an Act respecting Abortion.—(Honourable Senator Phillips).

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, before we proceed with the debate on this Order, the Chair was asked, at the last sitting, to rule specifically on what we might call Amendment No. 4 from Senator Haidasz. I have looked over the amendment and would refer honourable senators to Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, page 79, citation 240, which states:

> The Speaker will not give a decision upon a constitutional question nor decide a question of law, though the same may be raised on a point of order or privilege.

I find that this particular amendment, and the question that was raised, is one of constitutionality and law, which must be settled by honourable senators themselves and not by the Chair. Hence, I leave it to the Senate to decide as to its validity.

I was also asked to rule on the matter of the other amendments presented to us. I have looked them over, and while there might be some questions of form, I find that the amendments are in order and that there is no conflict between them. Because of the procedure we are following, of suspending the vote on the amendments, there was a potential problem of some amendments superseding or contradicting others, that in the process of voting on them we might find ourselves in some difficulty. However, after looking them over carefully, I see no problems in that regard. Therefore, they are all in order.

THIRD READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, first, I wish to thank Senator Doody for having spoken on my behalf and on behalf of the government in presenting this bill for second reading last June.

The issues raised by this bill—that is, the philosophical, moral, legal, constitutional and administrative issues—have been carefully and conscientiously studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Witnesses appearing before that committee have represented the widest possible range of opinion not only on this bill but also on the complex and sensitive subject of abortion itself. All of these witnesses have received the respectful attention of the committee.

I thank the Chairman, Senator Nurgitz, and his colleagues on that committee, for their excellent work. Let me also thank and congratulate all honourable senators who have taken part in the debate so far for their thoughtful and thought-provoking speeches on such a difficult subject.

What can I add to the debate at this stage? In January 1988, when the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the 1969 abortion law, namely, section 251 of the Criminal Code, I became chairman of an ad hoc committee of the cabinet to consider this matter. I mention this because it is already a matter of public knowledge, having been referred to on several occasions in the media. In light of this experience, I will try to address two questions today. First, why are we proposing any legislation on the subject of abortion? Second, why this bill and not some other approach? Why legislate on abortion at all? Let me say a word about public opinion on this matter, because it has been referred to in the debate most recently in the course of Senator Kirby's speech yesterday.

Superficially it appears polarized between what I might call the classic pro-life and pro-choice positions. In reality, however, the majority of Canadians believe that abortion should be permitted under medical criteria and that this should be legislated by Parliament. The January 1988 judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada created a legislative void. From that day forward there have been demands that the government and Parliament act to fill the void. The majority of Canadians, to the extent that their opinions are reflected in the polls that we have all seen, do not support the proposition that Parliament should do nothing. Canadians expect Parliament to legislate on this matter. This is understandable. Abortion is a medical procedure, but Canadians know that it is not simply a medical procedure. Even in the polls that we have all seen on this matter, and which, as we know, have difficulty capturing all the nuances on a subject as complex as this, we can see Canadians instinctively trying to find the balance between the woman's rights and her health on one side, and the protection of the fetus on the other.

● (1420)

In addition to public sentiment weighing on Parliament to fill the void, we have also received a clear invitation from the Supreme Court of Canada to draft a law in accordance with the majority judgment in the Morgentaler case. Senator Kelly referred yesterday to the judgment of the Supreme Court in the Chantal Daigle case wherein the judges invited Parliament to legislate on this matter. When they brought in their judgment striking down the 1969 law they told Parliament, in effect, to try again.

[Translation]

The court stated that even if its role was to examine legislation to determine whether the balance which a given law seeks to establish among various interests is compatible with the constitutional guarantees, first it is up to Parliament to establish that balance.

As to the use of the Criminal Code and the federal constitutional jurisdiction over penal matters to pass regulations governing abortion, the court did not question the fact that the purpose of the legislation is to protect the health and the life of the woman and the foetus. Mr. Justice Beetz said that this was a valid objective of Canadian criminal law.

[English]

Our colleague, Senator Oliver, has already placed on the record, in the course of an excellent speech on January 24, the statements of Chief Justice Dickson in the 1988 judgment that protection of the interests of pregnant women is a valid government objective, and that the protection of fetal interests by Parliament is also a valid government objective. These references may be found at page 5179 of the Debates of the Senate.

To that I would add, for what it is worth, that other countries which legislate on abortion, and I have a list of 25 of them, do so through criminal law prohibitions subject to certain legal exceptions. If Parliament is to legislate on abortion, it is only at this level that we can deal with it; that is, under the criminal law power. Parliament cannot regulate abortion as a national health issue under the Canada Health Act because there is no authority for health to be dealt with in this way at the federal level. The Canada Health Act, as honourable senators know, is not a statute regulating health. It is a statute enacted under the spending power. If this statute were used to regulate the provision of abortion services, it would clearly infringe upon the provincial responsibility for the delivery of health-care services, such as abortion.

This brings me to another important consideration arguing in favour of parliamentary action to legislate on abortion. The 1969 abortion law was in effect for 19 years. Whatever its deficiencies—and these have been defined by the Supreme Court—it had the virtue of providing a legal framework within which the provinces, who are responsible for delivery of health services in our federal system, could act on this sensitive and controversial matter. The provinces decide what health care services are medically necessary and, therefore, insured under medicare. Generally speaking, they accepted as medically necessary those abortions which were permitted under the 1969 federal law. Once that law was struck down, the provinces were on their own. In most cases they demanded that the federal government and Parliament provide guidance. The provinces demanded that we fill the legislative void. In some cases the provinces moved to fill the void by enacting regulations as to when, where and under what circumstances abortion could be performed and/or insured in the provinces.

I heard Senator Kirby yesterday refer to the uneven situation that exists from province to province and state that Bill C-43 could make no difference in that situation. Well, I cannot foresee the future any better than can Senator Kirby, but the fact of the matter is that some of these provincial initiatives were taken in the absence of a law—that is, after the 1969 law had been struck down by the Supreme Court of Canada. It seems to me that it is the absence of a federal law that encourages or incites provinces to move in and fill the void rather than the passage of a law such as Bill C-43.

As I have indicated, for almost 19 years the provinces, for their purposes, accepted, as medically necessary, abortions that were permitted under the 1969 federal law. Honourable senators will be aware that some of the provincial initiatives to which I referred have been, and still are, the subject of constitutional challenges in the courts. Whatever the final outcome of those cases, they underline the problems caused by uncertainty as to what the law is, especially in a system where constitutional jurisdiction in health is shared between the federal and provincial governments.

To a great extent it was to remove uncertainty about abortion that a previous Parliament was persuaded to act in 1969. When Mr. Trudeau, as Minister of Justice, introduced the amendments which eventually became law, he referred to the pre-1969 situation as follows:

> In fact, no one can say with any degree of certainty what the present law in Canada is in relation to such abortions . . . Some experts claim that there is no defence whatever to a charge of procuring a miscarriage based upon medical considerations; others argue that a miscarriage may be procured if it is necessary to preserve a woman's life; and still others maintain that the law is not being amended in substance in Bill C-195—which was the bill that he presented

> —but is merely being codified and that the Bill simply reflects what is now being done in hospitals under responsible management by ethical members of the medical profession with the tacit, if not the express approval of those responsible for the administration of the criminal law . . . Whatever divergent views may be held concerning what the law should be, there is, I believe a real need for clarification of this very important matter—important not only to the medical profession but to the public generally.

That was from a press release from Justice Minister Trudeau dated March 15, 1968.

Now, the uncertainty that prevailed in 1968 is not, in substance, the situation that exists in 1991, but we do have a legislative void federally. We have no legislative framework or guidance from which provinces can take their cue.

[Translation]

I think it is necessary to establish a legislative framework concerning abortion. Therefore, it is incumbent upon the federal government to use its criminal power for that purpose.

It is obvious that the adoption of this law will not prevent provinces from regulating abortion using the power they have in the area of health.

However, Bill C-43 makes it clear that abortion is a medical act performed for health reasons. This bill creates a national standard that defines the conditions under which abortions may be performed. That norm will have to be complied with by all levels of government.

[English]

This bill, I repeat, would indicate Parliament's view that abortion is a medical act which requires the direct involvement of a medical practitioner. It defines the conditions under which abortions may be legally performed, and it responds to the provinces' request for federal guidance in this area by providing a legal framework for the medical profession and the provinces to determine medical necessity and the provision of insured services in respect of abortion.

Honourable senators, let me say a few words about how we arrived at this particular bill and not some other proposal from among the many that have been suggested. When, after considering the Supreme Court decision of January 1988 in the Morgentaler case, the government announced its intention to draft new legislation on abortion, we had to bear in mind two tests it would have to pass. First it had to pass parliamentary approval; it would then have to pass any challenge in the courts. It would have to be drafted to make sure, as certainly as we could, that it would pass such a legal challenge. We had already determined that we would not invoke the "notwithstanding" clause to shield our legislation from a challenge under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

By way of testing opinion in the House of Commons prior to bringing in legislation, in July 1988 the government gave that chamber the opportunity to vote on a "Sense of the House" resolution, calling on the government to legislate on the basis of the so-called gestational approach in which restrictions on abortion increased over the term of the pregnancy. Perhaps I should add at this point that this so-called gestational approach—what is sometimes called the trimester system, in which you would have minimal restrictions on abortion in the first trimester of a pregnancy; somewhat more severe restrictions in the second trimester; and abortion possible only under the most exceptional circumstances in the third trimester—probably most faithfully reflects the state of Canadian public opinion on this matter. I have been advised that this is the approach that would most accurately track the majority judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Morgentaler case.

In July 1988 in the House of Commons five amendments were permitted to the main resolution, which covered the full range of options with regard to an abortion law, from the most permissive to the most restrictive. Honourable senators can consult the divisions in the House of Commons, as recorded in the Commons Hansard of July 28, 1988. All five amendments were defeated. The main resolution was defeated 147 to 46.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No party lines?

Senator Murray: On a free vote, as I recall, on which both ministers and private members were able to vote according to their personal views. The closest vote, 118 to 105, came on the defeat of an amendment which would have permitted abortions only in life-threatening situations on the declaration of two medical practitioners. Such a provision, if enacted into law, would, in the opinion of most experts, not survive a challenge in the Supreme Court.

So the main resolution put before the House of Commons in a "Sense of the House" resolution, and five amendments representing the entire range of opinion on abortion, were all defeated in July 1988. The general election of 1988 intervened. In 1989 the subject of abortion was once again before the courts, notably in the Borowski appeal and in the case of Chantal Daigle. While the decisions and reasons for judgment in those matters are, I think, crystal clear, they are no substitute for a legislative framework on the subject. That was the conclusion of the government and of members of the House of Commons who again urged us to bring in legislation during the summer of 1989.

Bill C-43 was introduced in the House of Commons on November 3, 1989. Although there had been numerous changes in that House as a result of the 1988 general election, the debate on Bill C-43 in that House convinced me that, on the subject of abortion, it is almost as difficult to arrive at a consensus in the 34th Parliament as it was in the 33rd. I am as certain as one can be that a bill more liberal or more permissive than Bill C-43 would not pass the House of Commons in a free vote. I am also certain, on the basis of all the advice that I and the government have received, that a bill more restrictive than Bill C-43 would not survive legal challenges in the courts.

Honourable senators, what has helped to discourage or defeat other middle-of-the-road initiatives on abortion has been a voting coalition between those at either extreme: those who are opposed to legalizing abortion under almost any circumstances, and those who want no legal restrictions on abortion. I am sure I have heard, during the course of debate in this place, some honourable senators at either pole of this issue now combining to kill any idea of compromise and to vote against and kill Bill C-43. But Bill C-43 is the result of a compromise between those pro-choice and pro-life members in the other place who came to the conclusion that a legislative void was unacceptable. In that respect there is little doubt, as I indicated earlier, that members of the House of Commons reflected the opinion of a majority of Canadians who call for legislated standards on this matter.

The essence of the compromise for the pro-choice members was that the law would define abortion as a medical act and would therefore protect a woman's health as well as her right to security of the person subject to minimal restrictions. For the pro-life members, the compromise was that they accepted, however reluctantly, that the restrictions be minimal so long as the law made no distinction between life at various stages of the pregnancy. This was the principle that they were determined to preserve. They would support no bill based on the gestational approach.

In any event, Bill C-43 passed third reading in the other place on May 29 last year by a vote of 140 to 131. It had the support; indeed, it was the product of efforts of people as prominent on the pro-choice side as Lise Bourgault, MP, and of people as prominent on the pro-life side as Mr. John Reimer, MP and Mr. Benno Friesen, MP. As honourable senators heard, when the committee met it had the support of ministers responsible, who supported the bill though they came at the question from quite different perspectives: the Minister of Justice, Ms. Campbell, from one perspective—not just official but personal—and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Beatty, from quite another personal as well as official perspective.

[Translation]

Some groups say that the bill has already had a disastrous impact on the availability of abortion services in Canada.

Physicians have nothing to fear from Bill C-43, as long as they use good judgment in performing their duties and act in accordance with medical ethics. We are told, however, that physicians are afraid they will be subject to abusive prosecution and harassment if they continue to perform abortions once Bill C-43 is adopted.

Harassment is already taking place, even without federal abortion legislation, and it is unlikely that the passage of Bill C-43 will make it possible to eliminate all forms of harassment.

However, this legislation will make it clear that abortions performed by physicians are medical acts authorized by law. Unwarranted prosecution by private citizens of physicians who perform legal abortions would have little chance of success, since it would then be necessary to prove, beyond any reasonable doubt, that the physician concerned did not form the requisite medical opinion on the question whether the woman's health or life was threatened.

[English]

Now, honourable senators, it is up to the Senate to decide. Amendments have been proposed. One in particular, proposed by Senator Kirby, astonished me, given his implacable opposition to the bill and his intention to vote against it. That amendment would provide for a federal Attorney General fiat before a prosecution could be launched in law.

I do not exclude the possibility of an Attorney General's fiat as a matter of principle, nor, I believe, does Ms. Campbell; but in our system the administration of justice is a provincial responsibility. Parliament should not simply, by amending a law, confer a fiat upon the federal Attorney General without canvassing all of the implications of such an action with the provinces. Indeed, I understand from Ms. Campbell's testimony before the committee that it is her intention, immediately this bill receives third reading, to consult with her provincial counterparts on all aspects of its implementation. That would surely include the question of whether a federal Attorney General's fiat or, indeed, a provincial Attorney General's fiat, should be provided for in respect of prosecutions under this law. Therefore, I believe it would be premature for Parliament to legislate such a fiat for the federal Attorney General now. I will vote against the amendment recognizing that the federal Attorney General and the Minister of Justice will be consulting with the provinces on all aspects of the implementation of this law.

If you believe, honourable senators, that no law on abortion is a desirable state of affairs or that no law is preferable to Bill C-43, then you will vote against this bill. The defeat of this bill will mean that there will be no law on abortion and no further government initiatives to bring in a law during the present Parliament.

I do not know, nor does anyone know for sure, the consequences of perpetuating the legislative void, the absence of law, on abortion. It is hard to see how the public interest is served by such a legislative void. As I have said, most Canadians expect us to act on this matter. If you believe, as I do, and as the government does, that we have a duty to give the country a law on abortion, then I urge you to support this bill as being the only alternative available after a long and exhaustive legal and political process. In a word, it is simply the best that the House of Commons could do on this matter for the foreseeable future.

Honourable senators, do spare a thought for our elected colleagues in the House of Commons and what they must face. They have been, as are all candidates for federal public office, under unrelenting pressure from the advocacy groups at either end of the pole on this issue—under pressure to take an uncompromising stand, yes or no, for or against, "align yourself with one camp or the other." That is the choice with which they are confronted at all candidates' meetings and in the conduct of their public duty as candidates and members of Parliament.

Honourable senators, members of the House of Commons have their own private consciences, of course, and their public duty. Our elected colleagues in the House of Commons, informed by their private consciences and discharging their public duty, have given us a law that they believe to be philosophically sound, constitutionally valid, administratively workable and, if it does not represent a consensus in the country, at least it represents what Mr. Turner calls an accommodation on this extremely difficult issue. They have done the best they could after much agonizing debate. It would be unfortunate if the Senate were to reject now what they have brought forward in good faith.

● (1500)

I urge you, honourable senators, to resolve your doubts in favour of giving this bill a fair chance to provide the legal framework and the guidance that other governments and the health professions require on this matter and which Parliament has a duty to give.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Senator Murray, in your remarks you mentioned the void there would be if there were no abortion provision. As I understand it, the old provision was struck down as a result of the Morgentaler case of approximately three years ago. For the last three years we have had no provision with respect to abortion. Yet, in the testimony before the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, the evidence was that during that three year period there has been no appreciable increase in the number of recorded abortions performed in Canada than there was before the striking down of that provision. I wonder what difference you feel it would make if there was no provision for abortion?

Senator Murray: I can only repeat, honourable senators, that the experience after the 1988 decision was that in some cases the provinces moved into the void. We believe that is not a desirable state of affairs, given our responsibility and theirs in this field. Some of the initiatives that the provinces took have been and still are the subject of challenges in the courts. This creates a climate of uncertainty over this matter that we believe is not a desirable state of affairs in terms of public policy.

Further, the provinces themselves, which have a responsibility for the delivery of health services, and from time to time the Attorneys General, have asked that we, the federal Parliament, provide legislative guidance; that we fill the legislative void in this matter.

Finally, to the extent that one takes polls seriously, just about all of them in a considerable majority believe that Parliament has a duty to legislate on this matter.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order on the statement made by Senator Lewis. I took the trouble to check on the statistics. I telephoned Statistics Canada and asked them for the number of abortions that were performed since 1987. In 1987 there were 67,266 reported abortions in Canada. In 1988 there was an increase to 70,754. In 1989, one year after the striking down of Section 251 by the Supreme Court of Canada on January 28, 1988, there was not a big increase, but there was an increase from 70,754 in 1988 to 72,693.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What was the population increase over the same period?

Senator Haidasz: I do not know.

Senator Frith: That would be relevant, would it not?

Senator Haidasz: I guess there was a slight increase. For 1990 there are no available statistics.

Senator Lewis: I am only going by the evidence.

Senator Murray: The relevant statistics have to do with abortions per thousand births. My recollection is that it had not increased substantially over the years.

Senator Frith: That is a more significant statistic.

Senator Haidasz: The relevant statistics are the following. In 1987 it was 18.2 per 100 live births; in 1988 there was a slight increase to 18.8 per 100 live births. Unfortunately, I have not figured out the same statistics for the increase in 1989.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I want to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question arising out of my intervention yesterday. Can he tell me whether the government ever seriously considered presenting Bill C-43 without the definition of "opinion"?

Senator Murray: The definition of "health"?

Senator Frith: No, "opinion." Clause 287(2) under "Definitions" states:

> "opinion" means an opinion formed using generally accepted standards of the medical profession.

Did the government ever consider presenting the bill in such a way that the discretion would be left entirely to the doctor, so that it would read "the direction of a medical practitioner who is of the opinion"; so that, as far as the criminal law is concerned, all that a doctor would have to show in a defence was that he was, in fact, of that opinion. Of course, he would be subject to his own association's disciplines within that, but the consequences of not fulfilling the standards imposed by his medical or profession association would be those flowing from the breach of his standards, not criminal consequences. What happens, of course, is that the generally accepted standards of the medical profession are incorporated into the criminal law and given criminal sanction which they otherwise would not have. I say that because my own attitude to the bill would change if it did not criminalize breach of standards.

I confess that I could have done my own research overnight on the question, but the Leader of the Government in the Senate may have the information. Was any amendment presented to simply remove the definition of "opinion" and leaving the word "opinion" stand as it is within Clause 287(1)? Did the government ever consider presenting it in such a way that medical standards were not defined and thereby criminalized, but simply left to the profession to discipline? Second, was any such amendment presented, according to his knowledge?

Senator Murray: In answer to the second question, I am not aware that any amendment was proposed to remove that provision from the bill. I do not specifically recall the discussions that led to incorporating that definition of "opinion" into the bill, but I am reasonably certain that it was put there out of an abundance of caution, more to protect the position of medical doctors and their relationship with their patients than to increase or make more severe the criminal sanction.

Senator Frith: As I said yesterday, if one is put in the position of a doctor, with a patient asking for an abortion, because of that definition the position of the doctor is one that would require the doctor to think seriously of going on with the discussion at all; whereas, if it were left simply to the discretion of the doctor and sanctions only from the medical profession, the doctor might then be prepared to go further.

I elaborated on that yesterday and I will not go any further with it now.

Senator Murray: I just asked one of my colleagues whether the profession had objected to this particular provision. Senator David says that it did not. I do not see why it would.

Senator Frith: Then that means that I did not persuade you yesterday. Reread what I said yesterday and see if that changes your mind.

Senator Murray: Yes, I heard you and I read it; but, once again, it is codifying the existing practice. What other standards would the doctor use except these standards?

Senator Frith: That is not the point.

Senator Murray: Yes, I know that it is not your point, but it is an additional assurance for the profession in that the "opinion" that we are talking about is the one formed using generally accepted standards in the medical profession.

Senator Frith: But the difference is that the doctor takes his chances with his colleagues instead of with the criminal courts. That is the difference.

Senator Lewis: Honourable senators, I wish to ask another question. In the previous section of the Criminal Code—and I believe it is section 251 concerning the general prohibition against abortion—the words used are anyone who "induces a miscarriage"; but in the new section, which is worded to start the same as the old section, states "anyone who induces an abortion." It then goes on to repeat the same wording.

Is there any great significance to changing that wording? There was some indication at our hearings in the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs that, technically speaking, abortion to the medical profession appeared to refer only to the first trimester, that thereafter it was an interruption of the pregnancy. That must be followed up. Do you know if there was any great significance in that change?

Senator Murray: What I do recall from the process was that there was the closest contact among the drafters in the Department of Justice, the medical profession and the legal profession as to the appropriate terms to be used in a 1991 law. That is not to say for a moment that the Canadian Bar Association or the Canadian Medical Association necessarily support this bill—I think you know where they stand on the matter—but the Law Reform Commission does support it, as the honourable senator knows. There was close discussion over a long period of time about the terminology that would be appropriate in a 1990 or 1991 law in this matter.

Senator Lewis: I wish to ask another question. Would you then look at section 288, which concerns supplying a device or a drug knowing that it is intended to be used to induce an abortion. There is strange wording in that section. It states that anyone who unlawfully supplies a device, knowing that it will be used to induce an abortion, is guilty of an indictable offence.

Is the word "unlawfully" used in the wrong context? Should it not be included further on? Should it not state that anyone who supplies a device knowing that it will be used for an abortion commits an unlawful act? The wording of that section probably comes from the previous Criminal Code, even before the 1969 legislation.

Senator Frith: Where do you say the word "unlawfully" should be?

Senator Lewis: It is found in section 288.

Senator Haidasz: Yes; it is in the first line of the section.

Senator Frith: I have it right in front of me. You say that it should be elsewhere in the section?

Senator Lewis: Yes, because it states: "everyone who unlawfully supplies."

Senator Frith: What do you think it should state?

Senator Murray: Where do you say "unlawfully" should be located?

Senator Frith: That is what I am asking too.

Senator Murray: Should it be before "to induce an unlawful abortion"?

Senator Lewis: Yes, that is what it is. I don't know if there is any particular advice that is peculiar to abortion. So that anyone who produces that—

Senator Murray: It is no mistake that the adjective "unlawfully" is placed where it is.

Senator Frith: You mean adverb, do you not?

Senator Murray: Yes; adverb. It states "everyone who unlawfully supplies." There is no mistake that it is there. A physician would unlawfully supply or procure a drug or other noxious thing, and so on, whereas anyone else would not lawfully supply or procure a drug intended to be used to induce an abortion. I am sure that these matters came up at the committee.

Senator Lewis: No, they did not.

Senator Murray: I ask for some assistance from my colleagues who were there.

Senator Lewis: It did not come up in our committee. It seems to me that anyone who supplies such a device would certainly know that it is to be used for an abortion.

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Lewis: But it really means supplying it for an unlawful abortion. There are exceptions in the other section. Abortion is unlawful, except in certain cases. Then it may or may not be unlawful to supply that device.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: Well, a self-induced abortion would be unlawful under this act.

Senator Lewis: It strikes me that this section may be open to Supreme Court challenges.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on this delicate issue. I have listened to the Leader of the Government in the Senate with increasing desolation. By every test that he himself proposed, this law is unnecessary or ineffectual. Any law on a subject such as this should improve the situation by allowing something or by forbidding something. Improve the situation. It is not enough to make a law. A law which is made must do something. Let us consider some of the tests.

• (1520)

The judges wanted equality of access in their 1988 decision. This law does not give equality of access. On the contrary, it might make it even harder. By that test, this law fails.

Senator Murray quoted Judge Beetz as saying that he wanted protection for fetal interests. How can anyone say that this law in any way protects fetal interests?

Senator Murray says that this bill fills the legislative void. What void, and how does it fill it? The law does not meet any of the tests. It does not do anything. Nothing cannot fill a void. A void is being added into a void.

Senator Murray said that provincial measures to fill the void have already been taken. He said later that there is nothing the federal government can do about that because the issue comes under provincial jurisdiction.

He implies that it is undesirable that doctors be harassed, but he opposes an amendment that would protect them.

He said that this is the best that the House of Commons could do, and asked us to think of the pressures to which our elected colleagues are subjected. Does anyone here believe that if this law passes Members of Parliament will still not be under constant pressure from pro-choice groups who will want abortion decriminalized and by pro-life groups who will say that this law is a licence to unrestricted abortion.

In other words, what we have before us is a negation of what Senator Murray says Canadians expect the government to do something about. The government has passed a law that does nothing. Truly, I could vote for this law or against it and there would be no effect.

Senator Murray is putting on the look that we have come to expect of him, one which we have seen on TV. He looks like a startled deer found in the searchlights of a hunter at night. He does nothing. He does not please one side. He does not please the other side. He does not do what each side does not want to happen; and he does what each side does not want to happen.

If this bill is not passed, the situation will not change. If it is passed, the situation will not change.

He tells us that doctors will not be harassed successfully. Then why are we passing a law that will do nothing? Why has he taken about an hour of our time to tell us, as he usually does, contradictory things about the same issue?

A law should be passed if it will do something or prohibit something. I tell honourable senators to read the text of Senator Murray's remarks. They will not pass any of the tests he has set. This bill will not do any of the things he hopes it will do. It will do all the things he hopes it will not do. It is a bad law. We should vote against it.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, the report of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs was brief, for the reasons given in the report. However, I think there are a number of points that deserve further discussion. Today I would like to address the legal and constitutional aspects. I agree that abortion is an issue that goes well beyond the purely legal aspects of the case, but I would rather not make this a long, drawn-out debate. Others, like Senator Thérèse Lavoie-Roux, will discuss other aspects or have already done so, as did Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland, Senator David and many others. I will stick to the legal issues, and I would like to go back over a few points raised by Senator Lowell Murray. We cannot afford to ignore the legal issues in this debate.

Constitutionally, the subject raises two fundamental questions:

> First, can Parliament, under our Constitution, intervene as far as abortion is concerned? And if so, how? Where does it stand as far as the division of powers is concerned?
> Second, does Bill C-43 respect sections 7 and 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which, as we know, is part of the Canadian Constitution?

The report of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs stated that most witnesses spoke out against Bill C-43 and that only four endorsed the bill. In law, however, arithmetic is not the only criterion. We must also consider the qualifications and expertise of the expert witnesses that testified. Those who endorsed the bill included, of course, the Minister of Justice, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and also the Law Reform Commission of Canada.

The Law Reform Commission is an independent body, created by the Parliament of Canada in the early Seventies, which has always included top quality legal experts among its membership. Members have been judges, law professors and lawyers. Some went on to become members of provincial courts of appeal, the Federal Court and even the Supreme Court of Canada.

I am always impressed by the quality and depth of the work done by the Law Reform Commission. The commission has been studying abortion for a number of years. Legal experts on the commission, both male and female—I insist on this last point—have studied the question and published a very interesting paper on the subject in 1989.

The commission, speaking through her chairman, Gilles Létourneau, a recognized criminal law expert, reached the conclusion that Bill C-43 respected the division of powers outlined by the Constitution and also respected the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. There is a double test: the division of powers and the Charter. No legal expert is infallible. The same applies to the Law Reform Commission. Legal experts who draw the opposite conclusion are not infallible either. In any case, the Supreme Court of Canada will have the last word. I am quite comfortable with that.

[English]

Criminal law enshrines certain basic values and establishes national standards and national norms.

• (1530)

The Supreme Court of Canada, in the Morgentaler case of January, 1988, came to the conclusion that section 251 of the Criminal Code, which was dealing with therapeutic abortion, was violating the Charter but not the division of powers. The seven judges are unanimous on the point of division of powers.

Mr. Justice Beetz has written:

> I agree with McIntyre J. and the Court of Appeal that there is no merit in the argument that s. 251 is ultra vires of Parliament.

He was talking about the division of power. He goes on to say:

> In Morgentaler (1975), supra, this Court unanimously held that s. 251 is not colourable provincial legislation in relation to health but that it constitutes a proper exercise of Parliament's criminal law power pursuant to s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. I agree. Indeed, as I have decided, s. 251 cannot be said to be simply a mechanism designed to protect the life or health of the pregnant woman. While this ancillary objective explains, in part, certain of the requirements of the exculpatory provision in s. 251(4), it does not represent the principal objective of s. 251 as a whole, which is to protect the state interest in the foetus. Parliament established the indictable offence of procuring a miscarriage . . .

At that time they used the word "miscarriage."

Senator Frith: Do you say the words "miscarriage" and "abortion" are exactly the same?

Senator Beaudoin: I do not claim to be an expert in medicine, but the only difference is that an abortion is a provoked miscarriage and a miscarriage is something that occurs accidentally or naturally. Senator David, of course, as a doctor, is in a better situation to explain the difference between the two words, but that is the difference I see.

Senator Frith: Was there not evidence before the committee to say that the words have a different meaning than the definition that the Canadian Medical Association has given them?

Senator David: I am a cardiologist, not an obstetrician. A miscarriage is a natural process, and an abortion is an artificial process.

Senator Frith: I was hoping that Senator Beaudoin had been at the committee meetings. I have it second hand that the issue came up at the committee. The difference had something to do with the weight and size of the fetus and that there was a medical distinction between the two. If he knew about that, I would be interested in his comment as a lawyer, because of the fact that the original section uses the word "miscarriage" and the present word is "abortion." However, if he was not at the committee and is not aware of what I am talking about, then I cannot expect him to comment on the legal consequences of the difference. In other words, the difference between using the word "miscarriage" in one section and the word "abortion" in the present section might have legal consequences.

Senator Beaudoin: I have been at the committee meetings. I understand your preoccupation. However, for the purpose of the quotation of Mr. Justice Beetz, legally speaking it does not—

Senator Frith: I understand. For the purpose of his quote it is not important. I simply piggy-backed on it when I heard the word to ascertain if you wanted to say something about that difference. You said at the time the word was "miscarriage", which is quite correct. Of course, you are talking about the comment of Mr. Justice Beetz at the time. He could not be expected to see what we are concerned with. However, it is a fact that it may be more than accidental, or at least it may have more than accidental legal consequences, that the word picked was "miscarriage" in the original section and is now "abortion".

Senator Beaudoin: I have to be quite prudent because I am quoting this with regard to the division of power between Ottawa and the provinces. I believe you will agree with me that "interruption de grossesse" in that context is a domain where the federal authority may intervene for a particular reason under the Constitution of Canada. That is the only reason why I quote Mr. Justice Beetz. Senator Nurgitz remembers very well that some experts who appeared before the committee said that it is not criminal law, that it is colourable legislation. My answer to that is that whether we like it or not it is criminal law.

The Supreme Court has rendered two decisions in that regard; the Morgentaler case of 1976 under the Canadian Bill of Rights, prior to the Charter, and the Morgentaler case of January 1988 under the Charter. In both cases the Supreme Court said very clearly that the Parliament of Canada may use the criminal law power to give a "cadre juridique" to the question of abortion. In my opinion it is clear-cut.

Senator Frith: I was not arguing about that.

Senator Beaudoin: Mr. Justice Beetz concludes by saying:

I consider this a valid exercise of the criminal law power.

[Translation]

It was under sections 7 and 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and section 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 that section 251 of the Criminal Code was declared unconstitutional, and not under section 91.27 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

Bill C-43 differs from section 251, which was judged unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. The therapeutic abortion committees provided under the old section 251 will no longer exist. According to C-43, it will be exclusively a matter between a woman and her physician. The definition of "health" in Bill C-43 is broad. The bill cannot be compared with section 251 of the Criminal Code. The two provisions have nothing in common.

There is probably more than one way to legislate abortion. I do not disagree. We can also decide whether to legislate or not to legislate, but the consequences will not be the same.

We must look at the Canadian Constitution and its division of powers. To have an efficient national standard on abortion, some legal experts—and I agree with them—say we should use section 91.27 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and legislate accordingly. Federal powers in health matters are too weak in this respect, being based only on spending power. The residual federal power to maintain peace, order and good government cannot, in my opinion, be used, and there are several reasons why this is so. In any case, very few legal experts have used residual powers to support their arguments.

When Parliament uses its criminal law power to protect persons and property, it occupies its legislative field and sets national standards.

• (1540)

[English]

This is what we call in constitutional law "The paramountcy doctrine." If I am not mistaken, Senator Kirby said that doctrine is obsolete. But I do not think the paramountcy doctrine is obsolete in Canadian constitutional law. It has been used by the Supreme Court many times. It was used in 1990 in the case of Banque de Montréal c. Hall in the Supreme Court of Canada.

[Translation]

We must not forget that basically, the provinces have jurisdiction over health matters under sections 92.7, 92.13 and 92.16 of the Constitution Act, 1867. The famous Chief Justice, Sir Lyman Duff, said so very clearly in 1938, in the reference on the Ontario Adoption Act. The courts have continued in this vein. The Parliament of Canada cannot impose an efficient national standard solely on the basis of its limited powers in health matters.

Others claim there is no need for the federal government to intervene through legislation. I feel that access to abortion must be protected at the national level. How this is done is up to the Parliament of Canada, which must legislate on the basis of its criminal law power. Otherwise, there is a risk of Balkanisation. Of course, the provinces cannot occupy the criminal field if the federal government fails to do so. However, by deciding not to intervene, the Parliament of Canada would indirectly help the provinces to restrict access to abortion. The provinces can do this under sections 91.7, 92.13 and 92.16. It is not the first time and it will not be the last that the Parliament of Canada passes legislation to occupy this field. As Senator Lowell Murray said earlier, several other countries have done so. France, the United States, the United Kingdom and West Germany, to name only a few, did not, as Senator David said yesterday, opt for a legal vacuum.

[English]

Some experts have said that section 45 of the Criminal Code covers the subject already so that there is no need to intervene now in the field of criminal law. That section cannot be relied upon as constituting an efficient national standard in the field of abortion. Section 45 of the Criminal Code fulfils another aim, as the Law Reform Commission of Canada has said. It concerns surgical operations and establishes criminal responsibility. That section does not address abortion as such, or in particular. Section 45 says:

> Every one is protected from criminal responsibility for performing a surgical operation on any person for the benefit of that person if
> (a) the operation is performed with reasonable care and skill, and
> (b) it is reasonable to perform the operation, having regard to the state of health of the person at the time the operation is performed and to all the circumstances of the case.

I might say here, incidentally, speaking of the doctors, that the medical acts are, of course, protected by the presumption of innocence, which is enshrined in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Very few witnesses spoke about that, to my complete surprise. A doctor is not presumed to have committed a criminal act. A doctor is presumed to be innocent. We have to take that into account. It is already in black and white in the Canadian Constitution.

Senator Frith: It might take them a lot of time and money to find out, though.

Senator Beaudoin: The fact is that it is a fundamental principle of our values in Canada that everyone is presumed innocent.

[Translation]

Legislative void in itself is not the preferred option, as evidenced by what I called the summer 1989 "war of injunctions"; the Daigle case came up when we did not have legislation, if I may recall that fact.

We must not always let the Supreme Court alone make the final ruling. Legislators must also face up to their responsibilities.

The Law Reform Commission argued that, in a way, by protecting certain values through criminal law, Bill C-43 contributes to providing the foetus with some protection and achieving a certain balance between the rights of the mother and the rights of the child to be.

My colleague Senator Spivak referred to the opinion of Madam Justice Bertha Wilson in the Morgentaler case.

[English]

This learned judge, Madam Justice Bertha Wilson, for whom I have the greatest admiration, is referring to the American doctrine of the three phases which were considered in the famous American case of Roe v. Wade. That is obviously a possible solution. I would certainly accept such a possible solution myself. That has not been the selected position, because there are many others, and the Canadian government has finally selected the mechanism provided for in Bill C-43.

[Translation]

In the January 1988 Morgentaler case, Madam Justice Bertha Wilson, ruling with the majority as we know, writes on page 183 that Section 251 of the Criminal Code breaches Charter Section 7 because it takes away from the woman at all stages of pregnancy the decision to seek an abortion.

Bill C-43 does not at any stage of pregnancy take away from the woman the decision to seek an abortion.

It cannot be said to be "a complete denial of the woman's constitutionally protected right under Section 7, and not merely a limitation on it".

● (1550)

[English]

The proposed limitation to section 7 of the Canadian Charter appears to respect the Oakes test of 1986, which was elaborated by former Chief Justice Dickson.

[Translation]

Finally I conclude by saying that if a number of witnesses spoke out against Bill C-43, it is not because they all think the same way or are all in agreement. On the contrary, many of them reach that conclusion on the basis of altogether different premises and as a result of diametrically opposed reasonings.

It is therefore necessary to say so to avoid concluding prematurely that there is a clear majority, a majority which in fact does not exist with respect to motives.

Unfortunately the abortion debate quickly polarized and the two major lines of thought owe their ultimate junction only to the absolute positions advocated in their arguments.

I conclude that Bill C-43 is a valid and worthwhile attempt, in law, to resolve an extremely difficult and delicate issue over which the views are strongly opposed and probably irreconcilable.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to speak at length in this debate, for we have had some thoughtful speeches regarding the content of Bill C-43 from both sides of the house. The fact is that there are sensitive, sincere people on both sides of the argument who hold their views with great conviction.

I have serious concerns of conscience. Without being judgmental, I am concerned that we live in a society where the abortion option is increasingly being pursued by those who feel incapable, unwilling or unable to bring new lives into this world. The inevitable conclusion is that society is simply not providing enough aid and support to those we expect to give birth to the next generation of working and producing Canadians.

Indeed, all of us should be concerned about a Canada whose birth rate is so reduced now that our population will take 82 years to double. By contrast—and I checked this with a data bank last night—Iraq's population will double in 20 years. In a practical way we should be concerned that Canadians are reproducing at such a low rate that we are faced with the fact that a predominantly aging population may make it impossible to fund social plans such as the Canada Pension Plan, medical care and so on. This is an inevitable result of a low rate of birth.

While it may be inevitable that abortion in some form, legal or illegal, will always be with us, we must ask ourselves whether society is providing enough counselling for young people regarding the life and death issues of pregnancy and abortion and the challenges and difficulties presented by unwanted pregnancies. Are we sufficiently mindful of the plight of pregnant teenagers and frightened, battered and abandoned pregnant women? I think not. They require infinitely more aid, counselling and understanding than the lectures and advice generated and professed by certain self-proclaimed moralists; and when these women resort to abortion, which is a serious decision, they do not need to be lectured by a group of male politicians.

Yesterday, despite our opposition, the government passed its spending restraint bill which will only serve to provide less help and assistance to the pregnant women of Canada.

Senator Haidasz: Shame!

Senator Perrault: They will be some of the victims. Ironically, we have no trouble at all providing funds for our participation in the Gulf war, but what are we doing about serious social problems here in Canada, including the severely declining birth rate? I suggest we give life a chance. Are too many of us losing our reverence for human life?

A few months ago in our extended family a pitifully small little boy was born. He was an extreme so-called "preemie"—a fetus who was not expected to survive. This little boy spent weeks in an incubator. He was the recipient of the best that medical science could offer. The entire hospital staff, nurses and doctors rallied around him to support his gallant fight to survive, and survive he did. He is my grandnephew, little Michael. He is a wonderful, playful, intelligent and healthy new Canadian—a great tribute to Canadian medical science and his own indomitable spirit. His successful battle for life inspires me to ask myself how many potentially great Canadians are lost through abortion each year in this country.

I am reminded of Arthur Rubenstein's story in which he said that he was a sixth child and that his mother had given serious consideration to having him aborted. Thank God for Arthur Rubenstein and thank God for an environment in which his mother felt secure and confident enough to proceed with the pregnancy.

I have another personal observation. I will never forget the call I made during the last election campaign in Burnaby, British Columbia. The door was answered by a very distraught looking woman. After requesting her support for our candidate, she replied by saying:

> I have been a nurse for 16 years at the local hospital. I quit my job last week. I could no longer assist at abortions. It has affected my conscience too severely. I was trained to save life and not to take life.

[Senator Perrault.]

We all approach the sensitive and critical matter of abortion in different ways, and I believe that everyone's right to hold his or her views deserves respect, but a respect for life, or lack of it, is manifested in many ways. Some of us have heard about the new organization in one European country whose members advocate the right to have a baby "put to sleep humanely"—that is their expression—if, within 30 days of its birth, it presents its parents with too much stress and too many emotional problems. Imagine! That report was on the CBC a few months ago. Few of us have found any of our youngsters who are not an emotional stress for at least a month or two months after they have been born. This is normal. The views of such an organization are utterly appalling. Voluntary euthanasia is given increasing credibility in certain countries of the world. In my view, these are ominous developments for the human race.

I have agonized over this bill. I will make my decision how I will vote between now and tomorrow. While it purports to offer better than what we have now, it has been condemned by responsible members of the Canadian medical and legal profession, as well as some members of Canada's churches. That is disturbingly significant. I wish it could be said that the bill before us answers the concerns of those Canadians concerned with preserving the sanctity of life and reducing the need for and the number of abortions in our nation. I do not think it does. It would, in fact, establish abortion on demand.

Where are the positive proposals to promote responsible sex education, affordable daycare, responsible birth limitation, security and assistance for prospective mothers, efforts to make it more attractive for pregnancies to be carried to full term, and, yes, measures to make adoption easier and more attractive? There are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have been waiting for years to adopt a child. From the province of British Columbia and other provinces many people have served missions over to Romania and have brought back dozens of Romanian orphans for adoption because of a shortage of adoptable youngsters here in Canada.

• (1600)

The additional supportive actions to which I referred a few moments ago are simply not in this bill and no assurances have been provided that auxiliary measures to assist the mothers of Canada will be introduced. For these and other reasons it will be difficult for me, in conscience, to support a bill so deficient in its content and so flawed in its construction. Better the status quo, perhaps, and a return to the drafting process than a halfway measure relating to abortion which could be enshrined for many years to come in the statutes of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I suggest that almost everything has been said over and over again in this House on this notorious Bill C-43.

I decided to rise, first because I am a woman, and also because the duties I have carried out over a great many years in public life brought me many times face to face with this problem.

The abortion issue has always been and still is the object of impassioned debates, so that public opinion remains divided not only in the various provinces of this country as well as the country as a whole, but also I would venture to say in the other developed countries in the Western world.

As a matter of fact, because of our democratic parliamentary system, parliamentarians reflect this polarization ever-changing public opinion. Some—there are fewer and fewer of them—are implacably opposed to the very notion of abortion under any circumstances. The lesser uncompromising among them may make an exception for rape and incest.

At the other end of the spectrum can be found a greater number of people who advocate abortion on demand, while the vast majority stands somewhere in between the two extreme pro-life and pro-choice positions: they try to find an uneasy balance between their respect for life on the one hand, and the freedom of the mother, of the woman who has to deal with an unwanted pregnancy on the other.

According to a Gallup poll carried out last October, Canadians are divided along the same lines. The figures are not absolutely identical to those supplied by Parliamentarians: in other words, 12 per cent of them would be absolutely against any abortion; 26 per cent would be for abortion on demand, while a little over 60 per cent would want abortion to be authorized within a legislative framework.

Clearly, it would be better if the State did not have to legislate in an area which some consider as the sole responsibility of women. Unfortunately, this is not an issue where one can remain neutral. Abortion has been the subject of debates for decades, if not longer, in all societies, which shows conclusively not only that there exists no perfect solution which might satisfy everybody, but especially that all societies are interested in this issue. Life and death are two basic choices about which no society can remain indifferent.

Over the next few minutes, honourable senators, I will try to disprove very briefly some of the arguments presented in committee, in the news media or in the mail we have received these past few months.

Those who support the pro-life approach, whether on religious or moral grounds, are against abortion in any shape or form. I suggest their position is completely disconnected from reality in today's society. I suggest it should be emphasized, in order to dispel a number of myths, that no woman or teenage girl unfortunately, most of them are teens and women 20-35 years of age—seeks abortion without reluctance. This decision remains always extremely painful for all women and those who support the pro-life position do not seem to realize that there are social, psychological and, of course, health reasons which may sometimes compel women to use this last recourse solution.

I take this opportunity to tell you that I find quite deplorable that a number of pro-lifers should use unacceptable pressure tactics against those who do not share their opinion. To suggest today that abortion should never be allowed is to ignore a reality which we all wish would be different but which unfortunately remains part of our daily life. On the other hand, I would not want to imply that all pro-lifers condone this attitude. In fact, a great many of them are among this majority I referred to earlier. They use no harassment tactics and show no intolerance against those who do not share their views.

The most vocal group both by their testimonies before the parliamentary committee and by the representations they made in meetings at our offices, et cetera, were the pro-choice.

On the other hand, and I want to put this on the record, I think that we all want that abortions be perfomed by medical practitioners. Some of the pro-choice women do not want the medical practitioner to have any say, even as a third party, in the decision the woman has to make.

That is another example of how unreal this whole thing is. There is no doubt that, and everybody agrees on that point, the reason of an abortion must be the physical and psychological well-being of the woman. It must be performed under the best conditions possible. The medical practitioner has to form an opinion whether we like it or not. So, to think or to argue that it is up to the woman alone to decide is unrealistic. I wonder who would perform the abortion then.

A lot was said about criminalizing, or rather recriminalizing abortion, about the increased risk of prosecution for doctors limiting access to abortion services.

I would like to refer, at this time, as others may have before me, to the brief the Law Reform Commission of Canada presented in committee. I will quote the Commission mainly because it is an independent group composed of eminent lawyers. If I remember correctly, the present chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, Justice Lamer, was once part of this Commission. I think these are extremely competent people who certainly command a considerable amount of credibility in their field. Allow me to read one paragraph of their brief dealing with Bill C-43:

> Critics have said that, under such conditions, the practitioner would risk criminal prosecution by third parties starting private prosecution and face needless harassment. This concern is not justified. Private prosecution is very uncommon. It is also difficult to overdo it, given the safeguards provided for in our criminal system. First, the plaintiff must convince the judge he has prima facie evidence. Otherwise, the judge will refuse to lodge a complaint.
> Second, once a complaint is filed, a private prosecution can be suspended at any time by the attorney general who is empowered to intervene and stay proceedings.

That is precisely what happened to Quebec in 1976.

> Third, if private prosecution is started and fails, the plaintiff may be ordered to pay costs. These three provisions of our criminal law are, in our opinion, sufficient safeguards against excessive private prosecution. Moreover, civil law proceedigns for damages can be instituted in case of excessive prosecution and, if found guilty, the defendant may be ordered to pay exemplary damages over and above the regular ones.

Legal proceedings are rare in that area. It should be pointed out, and I think Senator Beaudoin mentioned it earlier, that it is the same thing in the cases of repeated injunctions we had in Quebec, Manitoba and Ontario. Perhaps for me who is from Quebec the Daigle case was the biggest to hit the headlines. It happened in the absence of legislation.

In a legislative vacuum, nothing can stop anybody who is really intent on harassing to launch civil proceedings. To think that Bill C-43 will result in more harassment or proceedings is to put facts in a different light than they should truly be.

Many protested against the fact that the law criminalizes abortion, that physicians and women are considered as criminals. Personally, I think that was strongly exaggerating. Even under the legislation that had been passed in 1969 by the Trudeau government and was in effect until 1988, I do not remember or know any case where a woman was jailed for getting an abortion in Canada. Yet, that is what we were told by people at the committee. There were attempts to raise the biggest threats possible.

Some wished that the abortion law would be incorporated into the Canada Health Act. I think that real efforts were made to find another legislative framework than the Criminal Code.

Unfortunately, the Canada Health Act—as certain senators have mentioned it last night—is not convenient since it is intended for the financing of the health case system based on certain principles and since it provides, generally by speaking, for certain surgical, medical and pharmaceutical services.

This law does not contain any definition or very precise list of medical acts. It does not seem to me to be an adequate legal framework for an abortion law.

Much was also said in this House, to say the least, about the fact that doctors who perform abortions will stop doing them to the extent that access to abortion will decrease.

I think our duty is to see to it on the one had that abortions are performed under the best physical and psychological conditions for women and on the other hand that access to abortion is mostly the same everywhere in Canada.

I think that yesterday one of my colleagues—Senator Lynch-Staunton, I believe—has corrected figures that had been given concerning Montreal General Hospital, among others, where most abortions in Quebec are performed and where they would not be done anymore. There are no grounds for that. I have also spoken to other groups that have indicated that those figures were far from being accurate.

That being said, I think that this law, contrary to the one that was passed in 1969, is providing for a better access on the one hand in eliminating the famous therapeutic committee which not only caused undue delays before an abortion could be performed but was much too vague since it only referred to the mother's health.

In the present bill, we say that an abortion could be procured for physical, mental and psychological health reasons. This, I believe, leaves the door wide open as to allow abortion on demand.

The argument that this bill will reduce accessibility as doctors will be reluctant to procure abortions surprises me, because from 1969 to 1988, when abortion was under the Criminal Code, doctors never mentioned the fear of prosecution. It could be argued that they were protected by the famous therapeutic committees. I can tell you that a good number of abortions were performed in private clinics and that, to my knowledge, there never was any prosecution. I am speaking, of course, about the Province of Quebec that I know best.

Unfortunately, law or no law, the harassment of doctors who perfom abortions is likely to continue. We can only hope that in cases of abuse, judicial actions could be taken against those people who demonstrate their intolerance. Were such actions ever taken? I will have, once again, to ask some of my friends in the legal profession. I don't believe actions were ever taken against individuals who had damaged the property of other persons who were legally authorized to perform abortions. I don't think we always used the legal means at our disposal to prevent excesses.

We have already come a long way. There was a time when we did not even talk about abortion, about whether or not to allow abortion. Today, we recognize that, in our society, abortion is a medical act to which we can have access. Let us hope that, in the years to come, whatever is left of intolerant behavior will disappear.

As to accessibility, I was saying a moment ago that the fact that we broadened the reasons for allowing an abortion improves accessibility. Moreover, the fact that Bill C-43 establishes a national standard and a strong legal framework is probably the best guarantee that the provinces which still refuse it, will have more difficulty restricting access to abortion. Let us hope that more progress will be made in the years to come.

I don't understand why women who came to argue in favour of free choice whatever the circumstances used arguments that were rather superficial, and failed to show any concern for Canadian women who do not have access to abortion. We know that in the Maritimes—in any case in Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia—and also in some places in Western Canada, there are major restrictions, even on performing an abortion that normally would be recognized as legitimate and feasible.

I think it is quite true that the provinces, considering their jurisdiction in health matters, may intervene and add further restrictions. At least, this legislation will give women solid ground on which they will be able to argue with their respective governments and ask them not only to make these services available when necessary but to pay for them as well, as do the majority of Canadian provinces when an abortion is performed.

Honourable senators, in concluding I may recall that Bill C-43 makes abortion a medical act and provides greater access for all women by expanding the conditions for inducing an abortion. This bill protects their physical and psychological well-being, and by eliminating therapeutic abortion committees and the obligation to perform abortions only in accredited hospitals, what we have here, in addition to the national standard provided by Bill C-43 is greater access to abortion for women.

I would also like to get back to some of the points raised by previous speakers. Beyond the abortion issue, there are probably a number of other questions we should ask.

What are the causes that lead women to consider terminating a pregnancy? Why are we talking so much about abortion? Couldn't we set aside our pro-life and pro-choice concerns for awhile to understand what is really going on and ask some questions about the causes, however remote they may be, that lead a person to make a decision that should always be a last resort?

It would probably be a good thing to take a more objective look at life, how it is programmed and planned and what we expect of it. Things are not as clear as they seem.

If we consider the causes and motivations that lead an adult woman or teenager to consider terminating her pregnancy, perhaps it would make us less affirmative and a little more compassionate and encourage us to become more active in areas such as sex education, family planning and developing more satisfactory family policies.

Honourable senators, I do not claim this is a perfect bill. However, I think it can offer a better balance between our respect for life and women's autonomy in a society that recognizes life and liberty as fundamental values.

Thank you.

[English]

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, for more than five years it has been my great privilege to represent this chamber as a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. In that time, members have been asked to look into many of the most vexing aspects of the laws which govern our country. For me, there has been no task so unrewarding, no experience so frustrating, no exercise so humiliating as being the sounding board for the enthusiastic critics of Bill C-43, an act respecting abortion.

Much of the argument that we heard against the bill was not new in 1948 when Canada signed the UN declaration to have "the utmost respect for human life from the moment of conception". It was not new in 1969, when we gave hospital committees the right and the responsibility to determine when abortion should be permitted. It was not new when the court sank the committees.

What seemed to be new to some of us in that compression chamber of a committee room in 250 East block—surely the most depressing of all parliamentary gathering places—was the fact that the defenders of the right to life, through uninterrupted pregnancies and the champions of a woman's entitlement to prepaid abortion, for the most part agreed that the bill should be killed-not argued to death; not modified; not amended in any way—simply defeated by us, the members of this chamber.

Such a circumstance should make for easy decision-making on our part—except, perhaps, for old-fashioned reactionaries, blimps and such who might argue that senators have no business destroying what the House of Commons has wrought—even when a free vote has been allowed.

But easy decisions, honourable senators may agree, should be looked at with much suspicion. After all, east is east and west is west and when the twain start meeting we must not ignore Mr. Kipling's cynicism. And just as well, for we find that the right to life faction is interested in rejection as a means of avoiding anything that might look like endorsement of abortion in any way. The right to lifers are impatient to be done with Bill C-43 so they can get on with a new bill restoring a law against all abortion except that which might be needed to save the life of an ailing mother. We find that what the freedom of choice gang wants is abortion on demand—no voice for a father; no advice from a parent; no opinion from a doctor, although the physician's oath may specifically instruct him or her to prescribe no treatment he regards as unnecessary and require him to consult with his patient on the implications of any treatment sought.

Between the right to lifers and the freedom of choicers in the great debate stand the doctors: the gynaecologists as a specialized group; the Canadian Medical Association; the activist arm of professional healers. They also oppose the legislation, but they put their emphasis on access and produce surveys and polls to show that as things stand some of their members are already refusing to supply abortion services. Not surprisingly, they anticipate harassment from either side if the legislation is enacted.

If any abortions are to be considered as criminal, what is to stop civil as well as criminal actions in the courts that could drag on over two- or three-year periods and ruin a doctor's reputation even where innocence is established? If the law is passed, we are told, there will certainly be a stampede toward denial of service.

It was the very point that the Canadian Abortion Rights Action League took up last week in a letter to senators. In the copy that came to me, Kit Holmwood, President of CARAL, said:

> If the government were to ignore the doctor's withdrawal of abortion services, which occurred after the bill passed the lower house, that would indicate a . . . profound defeat for democracy and parliamentary government . . . The Senate has a moral duty to stop this pernicious bill before it wreaks havoc on the provision of a necessary medical service.

Perhaps we will be forgiven if we see, in the haste of some doctors to deny service to patients, a reaction similar to that which we witnessed among doctors in 1962 when they responded to the introduction of medicare with a denial of service to their patients in Saskatchewan.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Honourable Perrin Beatty, addressed the concerns of physicians in his appearance before the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. He said:

> The House Legislative Committee examined the feasibility of amending the bill so that any charges laid under the act would require an attorney general's fiat—that is, the prior consent of a provincial attorney general. On consideration of this matter, the committee decided not to recommend such an amendment because of a fear of altering the delicate balance of the bill.

What is involved in the "delicate balance" Minister Beatty speaks of? It has to do with the spirit and the letter of the Canada Health Act which, Mr. Beatty reminds us:

> . . . respects the supremacy of the provinces in the delivery of health care services. To attempt to control or direct the provinces' delivery of abortion services would be inconsistent with this approach and inconsistent with the constitutional division of powers with respect to health. It would be treating abortion in a way in which no other medical procedure is handled under the Canada Health Act.

Fine balance could be tipped if provincial attorneys general were simply told to rule on federal interventions at any stage.

The Minister of Justice, Kim Campbell, reminds us that laws can be changed after they have been passed. She has promised to convene a meeting of provincial attorneys general "to ensure that Parliament's intent be served." She said, "We share a public responsibility to ensure that the law is not used to harass people."

Could there be clarification after passage of Bill C-43 to dispel the impression that abortion is a criminal act—not a lawful medical procedure which is the way Health Minister Beatty described it? Certainly, the two ministers say that they are willing to consider anything that would lessen the likelihood of spooking doctors and patients.

Indeed, such a second look could do much to clear the air of misconceptions brought into the debate by organizations and individuals who chose sides in the great debate.

Honourable senators, to remind you of what I mean by choosing sides, let me come back once again to the advocacy of the Canadian Abortion Rights Action League. In the last month of 1990 the following story appeared in the Montreal Gazette under an Ottawa dateline:

> Two thirds of Canadians are opposed to the Government's proposed abortion law, a new poll shows. The poll, commissioned by CARAL, shows 66 per cent of Canadians disapprove of the bill while 25 per cent approve and another 9 per cent don't know.
> League executive co-ordinator Jane Holmes said her group hopes the poll will help persuade the Senate to defeat the bill.

[Senator Doyle.]

> The poll, conducted by the Environics Research Group, asked 1,495 Canadians whether they agree or disagree with the federal government's attempt to put abortion into the criminal code.

Let me read part of that question again. It is whether they agree or disagree with "the federal government's attempt to put abortion into the criminal code."

In my opinion, polling is not a particularly useful political pastime. At best, we are told, it produces snapshots of the fluctuating moods of the public. But what kind of snapshot are we to expect when the camera is jiggled by a loaded question?

• (1640)

Again, may I quote Mr. Beatty:

> The criminal law has traditionally been used to regulate abortion. Under the old law, performing an illegal abortion could bring a penalty of up to life imprisonment for a person performing an abortion. Under the new law, the maximum penalty would be a term not exceeding two years. To secure a conviction, the Crown would have to demonstrate either that the doctor had been negligent or failed to enquire as to the woman's medical condition, or that he had performed an abortion after having formed an opinion that there was absolutely no valid reason to believe that carrying the baby to term would have any effect on the health of the mother . . . Abortion is a lawful medical practice.

Honourable senators will understand, perhaps, why members of our committee chose not to make changes or recommend passing Bill C-43 as it stands. Instead, as Chairman Nurgitz explained, we opted to leave the future of the legislation in the hands of the senators themselves, who have only to answer to their consciences in proposing amendments or casting their votes.

All senators have access to the printed record of the words we have heard. They have had a very long time to consider the bill itself and ponder their personal response.

Senator John M. Macdonald drew on a lifetime of advocacy to give us his thoughts seven months ago. He was, as always, plain spoken, direct and sincere. He said:

> I believe Bill C-43 to be a deceitful bill in that it gives the impression and the illusion of protecting the unborn when, in fact, it does no such thing . . . The so-called safeguards are meaningless window dressing to appease, if possible, those who oppose abortion.

Six days later, on June 19, 1990, we listened with great care to the advice of Senator Paul David. Like Senator Fairbairn and others who have spoken or testified since, he urged us to design and provide "generous, consistent, effective and dynamic programs to support the family." He said:

> We must eliminate the social and fiscal irritants that are perceived as obstacles by parents who want to have a child. The negative right to abortion could then be compensated by a positive right to more and multiple benefits for those who take on the responsibility of providing for the human enrichment of our country.

And then Senator David said this:

> In the Canadian legislative framework, I cannot imagine a more reasonable compromise than the one that is presented to us (in Bill C-43), a compromise that ensures accessibility, universality and transferability for all Canadian women, no matter in which province they live.

After two weeks of concentrated testimony from impassioned witnesses, I find myself, as I told Senator Macdonald last night, coming back again and again to the principal thrusts of the debate as they were described in this chamber more than half a year ago. Nowhere were they outlined so clearly.

First, Senator Macdonald held up for our approval the summing up he found in a brief from the Campaign Life Coalition. He said:

> We cannot compromise. Therefore, a state of lawlessness (while we work towards the enactment of law which will protect all human life) is preferable to a bad law.

And then Senator David, offered us the summing up of research that he and lawyer Mollie Dunsmuir had undertaken in 1988 of the evolution of abortion law in the United States, England, France, West Germany and Canada. He said:

> Our study clearly showed that in all the countries considered, the opposition of these two groups (for and against abortion) led to years of deadlock. In spite of these difficulties, each country developed legislation to fill the legal vacuum that was much more harmful than an imperfect law.

Honourable senators, I have taken too much of the chamber's time, but this debate is the denouement of the drama which began with the Supreme Court challenge of the law of 1969. It is not the end of the matter, I am certain.

I am also certain that whatever way we may wish to move in the future, we will have the need of law and of a standard of service that can be achieved only through federal effort and dedication.

These are my reasons for voting for Bill C-43, as I shall when the roll is called.

Like Senator David, I favour the imperfect law to lawlessness. Like our old comrade, Jacques Flynn, I believe in the principle that respect for life demands that abortion must be justified.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, in the few days we have had to discuss the very troubling issues which have been raised by Bill C-43, we have heard canvassed once again the full range of personal dilemmas which the subject of abortion makes us confront. This has not been a political debate but a discussion, as it must be. I am grateful that so many senators have taken the time to share with the rest of us their deeply-felt beliefs, as well as their misgivings; but I have to tell you that, although much of what we heard in our committee has been echoed and repeated here, there was very little evidence of misgiving on the part of the witnesses who appeared before our committee. Indeed, I think Senator Doyle and some of my other colleagues on the committee would think that some of the witnesses were somewhat over-decisive in giving their opinions.

The message was clear. Thirty-four out of 38 groups told us unequivocally to reject Bill C-43. So why this uneasiness in the chamber? We know that the bill passed by a small majority in the House of Commons and we know that the committee received a clear message from 34 groups, representing literally millions of people, that we should reject the bill. At the same time, we heard from several of them that the problem has not worsened appreciably in Canada since the Morgentaler decision three years ago, nor, more significantly, in the province of Quebec where, for about 14 years, the government has refused to use criminal sanctions to deal with it.

We know that in the most recent polls well over 60 per cent of Canadians have indicated that they do not want to have abortion recriminalized. Yet here we are struggling with it within the criminal context. Why are we doing it? The simple answer is that the government has fallen into a trap, that of listening to often well-meaning people who think that if there is a problem, slap a criminal sanction on it and it will go away. Then it heard from those people opposed to recriminalization of abortion, and finally it came up with a compromise in Bill C-43 that pleases virtually no-one.

Again, senators may ask: How can this happen? I believe it is because some people have not separated the factors which give rise to a demand for abortion, which they regard as immoral or simply bad, from the remedies which could help to correct the situation. Professor Lorraine Weinrib, who appeared before the committee, has just completed a very scholarly analysis of the 1988 Morgentaler decision and the reasons for judgment of the various judges who, coming from sometimes quite divergent points of view and reasoning, all agreed that the offending sections then in the criminal law regarding the provision of abortion services must be struck down. Professor Weinrib argued very cogently before us that, based on the same reasoning, Bill C-43 would eventually fail.

Let me give you a few of her comments. This is one observation she made regarding one of the reasons for the failure of the 1969 amendments:

> The Department of Justice did not do its homework properly and did not remember that the major change in 1969 was not the addition of a therapeutic exemption, because the common law provided that and doctors were providing therapeutic abortions across the country, the problem was that the doctors did not want to be subject to criminal liability . . .

Now, I do not want to go into all the arguments or the positions put forward by the doctors themselves, because you have heard them already today. I simply want to say that, given what we have heard in this committee and what has been made patently clear to the Minister of Justice, access to a physicians' services is going to deteriorate over what it is today.

Professor Weinrib continued, referring to the 1969 amendments:

> The access problem combined with the problems of delay, uncertainty, stress and ultimate denial of abortions in some cases on grounds other than therapeutic, all suggest that the same access problem that was fatal to the old legislation in Morgentaler occurs under the new legislation.

Another interesting aspect of the access problem is that when the Minister of Health, the Honourable Perrin Beatty, appeared before us, he told us that the federal government can do nothing to guarantee women equal access to abortion across the country. The federal government can do nothing. That is obvious. It is not within its competence to do that. These are provincial responsibilities; so how can we assure any kind of a national standard, as the Minister of Justice has, over and over again, assured our committee and assured people in letters and in communiques and interviews, and has assured the doctors? How can we possibly say that there is a national standard? There simply will not be, cannot be, under this new law. In fact, the very lack of it, which will be worse than what we had, is going to make this law just as flawed as the previous law.

Another important area of the judgment to which Professor Weinrib referred was the question that has been raised from time to time about the protection of the fetus, with which I think many people are concerned. The minister herself has implied in her statements that somehow this law was going to provide a balance between the health of the woman and the protection of the fetus. Well, may I just offer honourable senators another quotation from Professor Weinrib? I should say that, in explaining to us her position and her reasoning with regard to Bill C-43, she emphasized that she was drawing on the most conservative areas of the judgments that were made in the Morgentaler case; that is, those parts of the judgment which would probably stand the test of future challenges and different judges sitting on the Supreme Court of Canada.

All the three Justices—

and here it was Dickson, Beetz and Wilson

> —in the majority when they turned to section 1 of the Charter which, as you know, permits limits on Charter rights, agreed that what they had declared as the rights to fundamental justice and to security of the person were more important constitutional values than the protection of the fetus.

● (1700)

Many people in this chamber may disagree with those points of view in their concern for the protection of the fetus, and I do not criticize anyone for that. But there is nothing in the Morgentaler judgment which directs Parliament to deal with this. It is an important issue, and it must be addressed, in the first instance, by the Commission on Reproductive Technology, which is now under way. It is something we are going to have to deal with. There is nothing in Bill C-43 that addresses this, and to import it into the legislation is a trifle fanciful.

[Senator Neiman.]

I agree that Madam Justice Wilson spoke carefully about what is called the third trimester period in American jurisprudence. She said that some day the state would probably have to intervene at that point. She used the word "state"; she did not use the word "Parliament". There again, I think we have been misled, inadvertently perhaps, by several people who talked about this. Today Senator Murray said in his remarks that "Parliament has been directed", "Parliament has been asked", and "people have asked Parliament." That is not what the polls say that were taken on abortion. They are not saying that Parliament has to deal with it; they are saying that something must be done. If Parliament is not the proper instrument to handle this issue, obviously it has to be our provincial governments. I will refer to that area in a moment.

I will briefly quote the opinion of one other distinguished lawyer, Madame Duval Hesler, who represented the Attorneys Against Criminalization of Abortion. She argues that Bill C-43 is illegal because > . . . we have a superseding Charter which takes precedence over bills or laws which infringe upon the constitutional guarantees of that Charter.

The decisions in the Morgentaler case were based on the Charter. Professor Weinrib also argued that the only national standard we have today is the Charter. It is the only instrument that can set standards that will be applicable to all Canadians. Professor Weinrib made this comment:

> However, I want first to say that Bill C-43 is antique. It is outmoded, even before it was introduced and before it is passed. A real policy about abortion must not be a policy about abortion at all, because any country and any civilized society wants to eliminate abortion.

I cannot believe that anyone here would disagree with that point of view.

Of course, there have been continuing demands by many concerned people and groups to do something about the problem of abortion, and also about the unplanned and unwanted pregnancies that caused it for a variety of socio-economic reasons: pervasive poverty, lack of sexual education and responsibility, and a dearth of social and support services. Of course, people want legislation if and where it will help. I would dispute Senator Murray's statement that there is a governmental void at the moment or that Parliament—that is, the federal government—has been asked to fill it by imposing criminal sanctions once again.

I must confess that I had always hoped against hope that if the federal government insisted upon entering the field, it would do so by setting some parameters regarding the funding of health services. The issues giving rise to this problem of abortion, health services, education and societal standards are clearly within the jurisdiction of the provinces under section 92. As I mentioned, the Province of Quebec has made great strides in spite of and without criminal sanctions. The Province of Ontario is moving swiftly and decisively in this field and has asked the federal government, through our committee, in effect to stay out. However, the federal government could, and

I think should, for the foreseeable future have a role to play through the Canada Health Act by refusing to fund insufficient or non-existent health services, of which abortion, as a recognized medical procedure, is one. But the federal government has consistently declined to accept its responsibility. I stress that I am not only referring to this federal government but also to preceding governments.

Let me read the opinions of some distinguished professors of law. They are from the University of Ottawa, and were solicited with respect to the constitutional validity under sections 91 and 92 of certain statements repeated frequently by the Minister of Justice concerning Bill C-43. This first opinion was given by two professors of constitutional law at the University of Ottawa. They wrote:

> The most obvious vehicle for ensuring national standards of entitlement to abortion for all Canadian women is not the Criminal Code, but rather the Canada Health Act.

They go on to speak of the federal role under the criminal jurisdiction. Then they add:

> However, the provinces may also regulate abortion, as a health care matter, pursuant to their constitutional jurisdiction over health, civil rights, and matters of local concern in the province, under sections 92(7),(13) and (16) of the Constitution Act, 1982.
> As explained above, provincial legislative authority in this regard remains unaffected by the existence of federal abortion legislation, criminal or otherwise. Provincial legislation in relation to abortion is constitutionally permissible so long as it represents a valid exercise of provincial authority over health care, and does not offend the Charter.

I would remind honourable senators that the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Health and Welfare both said on several occasions that the provision of abortion services is a healthcare service.

● (1710)

I would like to quote extensively from an opinion of Professor Bruce Ryder of York University, who, as Senator Nurgitz pointed out the other day, has impressed the Minister of Justice from time to time with his opinions in various areas of constitutional law. He stated:

> The question arises whether the federal government has the constitutional ability to create a national standard of entitlement—

Those are words that the Minister of Justice has used from time to time, > —to abortion by some other means. The perversity of using the Criminal Code to accomplish this objective is further underscored by the presence of an effective alternative.

> The regulation of the medical profession, hospitals, and health care generally are matters within exclusive provincial jurisdiction. Thus, the federal government does lack the ability to directly regulate provision of abortion or other health care services.

Further on he states:

> . . . the Canada Health Act requires that provincial health plans meet the criteria of comprehensiveness, accessibility, universality, portability, and public administration in order to qualify for full federal funding.
> The federal government could insist that abortion is a medically necessary service under the Act, and that any province that fails to provide fully funded access to abortion will disentitle itself to federal funds. Federal fiscal pressure of this nature was used to ban extra-billing across the country when that practice was thought to jeopardize our social right to equitable access to health services.

Is this not a comparable situation, honourable senators? He goes on:

> Similarly, the Canada Health Act could be employed to promote a national standard of entitlement to abortion. This mechanism is not perfect: a province could decide to restrict access to abortion and forfeit federal funds.

I interject here that it is perfectly entitled to, but it would be a little more difficult for it to take that decision.

> In practice, a province would not likely pay the high price of deviating from national standards. The Canada Health Act thus provides the most effective federal means of promoting a national standard of entitlement to abortion.

Senators have heard from various speakers the vast discrepancies that are now occurring across Canada in the provision of abortion and other related health care services. As was pointed out to us by Doctor Kazimirski of the Canadian Medical Association, this very unfair and inequitable situation could be corrected if the federal government had the political will to use the power at its command.

I would like to believe, honourable senators, that these authorities might have convinced you that Bill C-43 is unnecessary, illegal and unconstitutional. Unfortunately, once again it will take many years of unnecessary wrangling and court challenges to prove that this is so. If senators vote for this bill, however, because they sincerely believe that it helps to obtain or sustain some of the moral, ethical and social objectives that they hold dear, I believe they are simply deluding themselves. The solution to the terrible problems which gave rise to unwanted pregnancies and to the need for abortion does not lie in the Criminal Code; it lies within each one of us as individuals in our community, and as senators representing our provinces, to assist in and upon the support of our churches, our schools and our local governments to provide the proper kind of social and health services so that we can all begin to eradicate the roots of the problem.

In voting for this bill we may be salving our consciences temporarily, but what we are really doing is exacerbating the problem once again for those least able to help themselves: the poor, the disadvantaged and those in remote parts of Canada—and senators are aware that we have many remote areas.

Senator Murray said that Bill C-43 was the best solution. I say it is one of the worst. It is badly conceived, totally unnecessary and bound to do more harm than good. I ask senators to reject this bill and to concentrate their efforts in their provinces, where they will do the most good for all Canadians.

On motion of Senator Doody, for Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION BILL

ELEVENTH REPORT OF ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Dan Hays, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, presented the following report:

Wednesday, January 30, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources has the honour to present its

ELEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-84, An Act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, December 21, 1990, examined the said Bill. After consideration of testimony of ten witnesses, some of whom supported the Bill, some who did not, and considering that the Government has not responded to ENERGY AND CANADIANS INTO THE 21ST CENTURY, A Report on the Energy Options Process, tabled in the House of Commons, August 10, 1988; nor to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources' Report on the study tabled on June 11, 1990 nor to this Committee's Report on Petro-Canada tabled in the Senate June 12, 1990; nor has it articulated in more than in a general way the Government's energy policy objectives, the Committee recommends that Bill C-84 should not be passed by the Senate, and new legislation to privatize Petro-Canada should not be introduced for a period of at least six months.

The Committee further recommends that: (1) the Government forthwith implement the second recommendation of this Committee's Report on Petro-Canada (see page 13); (2) if the Government is to proceed with the privatization of Petro-Canada and if the Government intends to change the Board of Directors of the company, that these changes be made as soon as possible; and (3) privatization should not be contemplated until such time as energy markets, now disrupted by the Persian Gulf Crisis, have stabilized.

DISSENTING OPINION

[Senator Neiman.]

The members of the Committee who support the Government are not in agreement with these recommendations, and urge that the Senate adopt Bill C-84 without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

DANIEL HAYS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Hays, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

BROADCASTING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF SEVENTH REPORT OF TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Seventh Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications (Bill C-40, An Act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto and in relation to radio-communication, with three amendments), presented in the Senate on 24th January, 1991.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish briefly to explain the amendments, which I meant to do the other day.

There are three amendments and one observation in this report. The first amendment adopted by the committee concerns a clause dealing with the programming provided by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. This amendment would add the expression "national unity" to the wording of Bill C-40. The purpose of this amendment is to ensure that national unity remains one of the objectives pursued through the programming of the CBC. The terms which were in that original clause continue to be in it: "contribute to shared national consciousness and identity."

The second amendment adopted by the committee concerns section 28, a clause dealing with the power of the Governor in Council to set aside or to refer decisions back to the CRTC. Through this amendment the committee proposes to delete this section entirely. The committee does so because it is of the view that the Governor in Council should not be given this power concurrently with the power to issue policy directions to the commission.

The third amendment adopted by the committee concerns section 45, a clause requiring the board of the CBC to establish English and French-language broadcasting committees. Through this amendment the committee proposes to delete this section entirely. The committee feels that the establishment of these two committees would detract from one of the CBC's objectives, which is to contribute to the development of national unity.

There is one observation which is explained in full in the report I tabled last Thursday.

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, with your permission I would like to have several senators speak to these amendments. I believe Senator Stewart will speak on one amendment, Senator Graham will speak on another and I will speak on the third.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I am speaking on the amendment that deals with national unity. The amendment which has been made to the bill by the committee, if not removed by the Senate, would make it incumbent upon the CRTC in its programming to contribute to national unity. One wonders why the words of the original act, the act now in effect, were changed by the bill brought in by the government to remove national unity as a programming objective of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

For the benefit of honourable senators who have not had an opportunity to look into this matter, I ought to explain the act as it now stands, then the provision in the bill before it was amended in the committee, and finally the provision in the bill as reported by the committee.

The broadcasting act which is amended by this bill, provides that the national broadcasting service—that is, the CBC—should, among other things, "contribute to the development of national unity and provide for a continuing expression of Canadian identity." Those are the words the government found no longer acceptable. The government proposed to replace those words with the provision that the programming of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should "contribute to shared national consciousness and identity."

The bill as amended by the committee would restore the reference to national unity. As amended by the committee, the bill would provide that "the programming provided by the Corporation should contribute to national unity, shared national consciousness and identity."

In other words, the purpose of the amendment made by the committee is to restore national unity as an object of the programming of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The government has sought to expunge the expression "national unity" from the bill. One wonders why, particularly at a time when national unity in Canada needs no gratuitous turmoil or aggravation. Surely we have enough trouble maintaining national unity in the country without asking Parliament to vote that national unity no longer be a goal of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Those words "national unity" that are the object, the target of the government's action. The evidence for that is in the bill. We find that no change was made to the earlier part of the same section where references are made to the health of the Canadian body politic. Let me read the first two sections of the broadcasting act as they now stand and compare them with the language that the government proposes to use instead thereof. Honourable senators will see that in this particular case there is virtually no change in the substance. We are told in the original Broadcasting Act, in section 3, that:

> It is hereby declared that
> (a) broadcasting undertakings in Canada make use of radio frequencies that are public property and those undertakings constitute a single system, in this Act referred to as the Canadian broadcasting system, comprising public and private elements;

This relates, honourable senators, not specifically to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation but to broadcasting generally in Canada. We are talking about both the public and private elements.

Subsection (b) reads:

> the Canadian broadcasting system should be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians so as to safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada;

Let us look now at the bill. The substance of those provisions remains unchanged. We find that clause 3(1)(a) states:

> It is hereby declared as the broadcasting policy for Canada that
> (a) the Canadian broadcasting system shall be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians;

Paragraph (b) deals with the operation of an English and French language sector. We then turn to paragraph (d), which states:

> The Canadian broadcasting system should
> (i) serve to safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada,

The clauses of the bill that deal with safeguarding, enriching and strengthening the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada are different, but the burden of the legislation is exactly the same. The Canadian Broadcasting System—under the bill as under the present act—is "to serve, safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada." That is to remain virtually the same. It has not changed at all in substance.

Having seen that there is no change there, one wonders why the expression "national unity" became the object of a proposed change by the government, particularly at a time when the whole question of national unity needs no gratuitous aggravation.

If a change is to be made, surely in these circumstances it is one for which there is a clear and urgent requirement. In the committee we were not given any evidence of a clear and urgent practical requirement for the elimination of the expression "national unity." There was talk about journalistic integrity. The phrase "promotion of national unity by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation", we were told, might offend against journalistic integrity. Surely we have to move from that kind of elevated generality to specifics.

What is the clear and present requirement for a change in the language of the act to strike national unity from its provisions? We are not dealing here with semantics. We have a political problem in this country, and it relates to national unity. For the government to propose the removal of the expression "national unity" from the purposes of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is clearly offensive to many Canadians.

I put it to honourable senators on both sides of the house that the committee report should be supported. This is not the time for the Senate of Canada to be voting against the promotion of national unity.

I invite honourable senators to support the report of the committee that the words "national unity" be included in the bill so that the clause would provide that the Canadian Broadcasting Service should contribute to the development of national unity and contribute to shared national consciousness and identity. Those words are hardly offensive. In the absence of a specific and present requirement that they be set aside, those words should be sustained.

Hon. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I wish to begin by saying that I welcome what has become known as the Broadcast Act and to say that it is needed and is long overdue.

You will be thankful to know that I do not intend to address all of my concerns and reservations about the bill. Rather, I will make a few general remarks and then address the specifics of one of our amendments, namely, the deletion of clause 45.

I have always thought that the central role of the Government of Canada is to preserve this country. One of the pathfinder institutions that was created to help in this process is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The CBC was meant to be the articulate voice of Canadian sovereignty. It was meant to be one of the determinants of our endurance as a national association in this unique country at the northern end of the world. It was meant to help link and bind the fragile regions. In that respect, if we do not remain true to the basic characteristics of this country we will fall apart, because we are a vast, sparsely-populated territory.

We are enhanced by the presence of two official languages, along with a myriad of multicultural voices which dot the landscape of this, the second largest country in the world. But we do sleep next to the elephant. We are threatened not only economically but also culturally. It is not just by locker coincidence that we have endured as a nation, but because successive governments and the people whom they represent have ensured that those institutions like the CBC are not and have not been dismantled or divided.

I have enough trouble with the CBC cutbacks back in my home area of Cape Breton, where CBC Sydney has been reduced to a store-front operation. In that instance, as in so many others across the country, we are losing one of our most effective vehicles to communicate about our successes, our difficulties, our culture, our traditions, and our distinctiveness to communicate with one another and with the rest of the country. We are being trapped at the end of a one-way street. Like it or not, we are being faced with the prospect of being force-fed with information and propaganda from Toronto and Ottawa and, in the case of Cape Bretoners, from Halifax. That wealth of talent, inherent to a very special part of Canada, is losing another vehicle for development. That means a further boost to the forces of marginalization and the process of disintegration presently at work in this country.

● (1740)

I want to quote briefly from a speech made by Pierre Juneau, the former president of the CBC, a former chairman of the CRTC, when he spoke to Le Cercle canadien in Toronto on June 23. He said:

> Stations such as CBFLT in Toronto or those in Rimouski, Calgary or Sydney are not so many attached to the body of the CBC. Instead, they are the branches and leaves of a tree which allow that tree to breathe and capture the sunlight, or, putting it another way, the roots that provide nourishment to the tree as a whole.

He argued that the closing of regional stations—he said that the so-called local station closings were actually regional ones—is "contrary to the letter of the law of both the 1968 broadcasting Act and the new Broadcasting bill that is expected to replace it shortly."

I am also concerned that the bill undermines the independence of the CRTC and that its ability to act in the public interest is being weakened.

I want to turn specifically to clause 45 of the bill. I will read two of the sub-clauses of clause 45. Clause 45(1) states:

> The Board shall establish a standing committee of directors on English language broadcasting and a standing committee of directors on French language broadcasting, each consisting of the Chairperson, the President and such other directors as the Board may appoint.

Clause 45(4) states:

> The standing committee on English language broadcasting shall perform such duties in relation to English language broadcasting, and the standing committee on French language broadcasting shall perform such duties in relation to French language broadcasting, as are delegated to the committee by the by-laws of the Corporation.

At first blush, clause 45 might sound innocent enough or structurally sensible. But such a change was considered and recommended by the parliamentary committee when preparing for the Broadcast Act passed in 1968, which at that time was rejected by the government. If such a proposal were rejected in the mid-1960s, there is all the more reason to reject it in 1991.

I wish to quote from the remarks of the president of the CBC when he appeared before the standing committee of the Senate. He said: "In our view, the creation of separate committees on French and English programming would run counter to the spirit of those objectives and would introduce at the board level a division which would be counterproductive, particularly at this point in time."

I view clause 45 as a worrisome, dangerous precedent, not the evolution of a fair balance between regions and cultures but, rather, an actualization of discord. As I understand it, the CBC has had an unwritten tradition of collegiality between directors representatives of the two founding languages.

[Translation]

> This, in my opinion, is a recognition of our cultural mosaic and of the need to maintain an awareness of the interests of both the English and French languages.

[English]

But there is a vast difference between an unwritten tradition of collegiality and the entrenchment of permanent separate decision-making centres at the heart of the CBC which would only ensure permanent division. In my opinion, it would contribute to a permanent rupture. If the CBC cannot ensure collegial decision-making between English and French, in the name of heaven what national institution can? It strikes me that clause 45 will only contribute further to misunderstanding, to jealousy, to selfishness, to regionalism—all those things against which the CBC should stand.

We are, I fear, embarked upon a dangerous trend. It is a further decline in the CBC's original mandate to contribute to a spirit of national solidarity. We have a responsibility in this chamber, particularly at this most sensitive and crucial time in our history, to use every means at our disposal to ensure that our traditional will to endure, to work together, to live together, is not diminished. That to me would be the consequence of the passage of clause 45.

Our nation is under attack as never before by the forces of narrow regional isolationism and, I believe, the me-first syndrome, the protect-your-own-backside syndrome. We can no longer leave the survival of our country to luck or to coincidence. We can no longer leave it to chance. The entrenchment of clause 45 with separate and distinct committees, one to look after English language broadcasting and the other to deal with French language broadcasting, is, in my opinion, a giant leap for Canadians in the wrong direction. I urge all honourable senators to support the amendments as proposed.

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, my amendment has to do with clause 28 of the bill. The 1968 Broadcast Act authorized the Governor in Council to have the power of review over various CRTC broadcast activities. To be fair about it, from then until now it has been a power seldom used.

Bill C-40 would have the government retain this power, but, as well, add a power of direction. This power of direction would allow the government to issue directions on matters of broadcasting policy. This may be realistic in this era of remarkable ongoing and continuing technological change. Besides, there are safeguards.

However, these two powers combined—the power of review and the power of direction—in the words of David Colville, the freshly-minted new chairman of the CRTC, suggest the "weakening of the independence of the Commission through double-barrel government intervention on a particular issue by both Direction and Review." We on this side certainly agree. When it comes to government intervention into broadcasting, enough is enough.

In that spirit, we seek to remove the government's power of review, especially since such matters should and could be left to the courts.

On motion of Senator Atkins, debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and not withstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, January 31, 1991, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON AMENDING FORMULAE— MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:
> That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consult broadly with Canadians and inquire into and report upon the process for amending the Constitution of Canada, including, where appropriate, proposals for amending one or more of the amending formulae, with particular reference to:
> (i) the role of the Canadian public in the process;
>
> (ii) the effectiveness of the existing process and formulae for securing constitutional amendments; and
> (iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including those set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada";
> That twelve Members of the House of Commons and five Members of the Senate be the Members of the Special Joint Committee, such Members on the part of the Senate to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion;
> That the Committee have the power to appoint from among its Members such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;
> That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;
> That the Committee, or a sub-committee, have power to travel, and hold public hearings, within Canada;
> That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings or of proceedings of its sub-committees, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons;

That the parties represented on the Committee be granted allocations for expert assistance with the Committee work in proportion to the representation of the said parties in the House of Commons;

That the Committee be empowered to retain the service of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Joint Chairmen;

That the Committee submit its report not later than July 1, 1991, provided that, if the Senate is not then sitting, the report will be deemed submitted on the day such report is deposited with the Clerk of the House of Commons and with the Clerk of the Senate;

That changes in membership of the Committee for Members of the House of Commons be effective immediately after notification thereof, signed by the Member acting as Chief Whip of any recognized party, has been filed with the Clerk of the Committee;

That the quorum of the Committee be nine Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken so long as both Houses are represented, and the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six Members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is 5:45 p.m. The Senate must now proceed to the deferred divisions on the motions in amendment to the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, respecting the proposed special joint committee on amending formulae.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we have no objection to voting on the two amendments together. We will be asking for a standing vote. There is no reason to vote separately on them, because they are not contradictory or competitive.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that we shall vote on both motions together?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Please call in the senators.

[Senator Doody.]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Let the doors of the chamber be locked.

• (1800)

Honourable senators, by agreement of the Senate, there are two questions before the Senate at this time. The first is: It was moved by Senator MacEachen, seconded by Senator Frith:

That the motion be amended by deleting the fourth paragraph thereof and substituting the following therefor:

(iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including an amending formula based on regional representation, as proposed in the 1971 Victoria Charter; and a formula based on seven provinces representing 50 percent of the population, with a clause added stipulating that Quebec must be one of the seven provinces; and the alternatives set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada";

The second question is: It was moved by Senator Marchand, seconded by Senator Adams:

That the motion be amended by adding the following immediately after Roman Numeral (iii):

"(iv) the role of the Aboriginal Peoples of Canada and alternatives to current process and formulae for entrenching their rights in the Constitution of Canada."

Motions in amendment negatived on the following division:

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please rise.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): We do not need a standing vote on this. I said earlier, and I want to clarify this, that we wanted our amendments supported, but they have been defeated. However, we are not against the main motion and never have been. We simply wanted those additions made to it. So, it may carry.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, that the main motion shall carry?

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I continue to receive petitions addressed to me. Today, I have several to bring to your attention.

[Translation]

I have three petitions from Quebec, mostly from the region of Saint-Hyacinthe. The first one has been signed by 20-odd people.

I have another one also from the region of Saint-Hyacinthe, in the Province of Quebec. It is drafted much in the same way as those we have had so far.

Three more from the Montreal and Granby regions, each bearing the signatures of about twenty petitioners. All told, we are looking at 60 signatures from residents of the Province of Quebec.

From Ontario, only one today and it comes from the region of Oshawa.

As usual, they are worded as follows:

> Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon senators and members of the House of Commons, as true representatives of the people, to do everything in their power to oppose the new goods and services tax, and we insist that an election be held immediately.

Honourable senators, the petition from the Oshawa region, in Ontario, bears a single name.

As far as I can recall, this is the first time I have received from British Columbia this kind of petition addressed to me personally.

[English]

There are six from British Columbia dated January 26.

Senator Simard: Are they from Vancouver Quadra?

Senator Frith: I do not think so, but it is possible. If you are so curious, I will give you some addresses and you may know whether or not they are from the riding of Vancouver Quadra. Most of them are from New Westminster, which is another riding; but I would not be at all surprised if there were some from Quadra. It seems that every riding is represented by citizens who are enraged by this government, particularly regarding the goods and services tax.

I have another group of petitions from Vancouver, New Westminster and Surrey. One petition contains a picture of a mother of six. That was affixed to the last of the six that I have from British Columbia.

As I stated, the rage against the government, and the wish for an immediate election so that the people can express their rage, continues.

The six petitions from British Columbia contain 20 signatures each, which amounts to 120 from British Columbia today. Including the 60 citizens from Quebec, the total is 180 in today's batch of petitions.

ABORTION

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have a petition in which 12 citizens of Edmonton, Alberta, ask the Senate to defeat Bill C-43. They oppose the recriminalization of abortion and remind us that a majority of Canadians feel the same way. They ask us not to pass Bill C-43. There are 12 names on this petition, seven women and five men, all of whom are from Edmonton.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

TWENTY-THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Lorna Marsden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, presented the following report:

Thursday, January 31, 1991

The Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to table its

TWENTY-THIRD REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized to study and report on childhood poverty and certain significant and costly social problems that manifest themselves in adult life and on measures that might better alleviate such problems, has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 21, 1989, proceeded to that inquiry and now presents its final report entitled: "Children in Poverty: Toward a Better Future".

Respectfully submitted,

LORNA MARSDEN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Marsden, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

WORKERS' MOURNING DAY BILL

TWENTY-FOURTH REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Lorna Marsden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, presented the following report:

Thursday, January 31, 1991

The Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to table its

TWENTY-FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C223, An Act respecting a Day of Mourning for Persons Killed or Injured in the Workplace, has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Wednesday, January 16, 1991, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

LORNA MARSDEN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as you are aware, it is customary to give one day's notice for third reading. Often we have ignored that rule if we have intended to have Royal Assent on the same day. If it is the intention of the Senate to try to get its business concluded this afternoon, I have tentatively arranged for Royal Assent at 6:00 p.m. If that is the wish of the Senate, then we will not need to return tomorrow morning.

Therefore, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): No.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Leave is not granted.

On motion of Senator Doody, on behalf of Senator Spivak, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

TWENTY-FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Lorna Marsden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, presented the following report:

Thursday, January 31, 1991

The Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to table its

TWENTY-FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized to examine and report on Veterans Affairs Votes 1, 5, 10, 15 and 20 of the 1989-90 Estimates, has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of June 28, 1989, proceeded to that inquiry and now presents its report entitled "It's Almost Too Late".

Respectfully submitted,

LORNA MARSDEN
Chairman

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I should like to make a few remarks on the report of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs. I think that is what Senator Marsden intended when she tabled the report.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, because of the participation of Canadian troops in the Persian Gulf, and the fact that one of our recommendations deals with that, I thought it would be appropriate to say a few words on the report and some of the anomalies we feel still exist in legislation concerning veterans.

I want to thank Senator Marsden for giving me the opportunity to offer a few opening remarks on the report of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs. May I express to her and, indeed, to all members of the Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, my appreciation on behalf of the members of the subcommittee for their support and for allowing me the freedom to conduct the business of the subcommittee at my own pace in concert with Deputy Chairmen, Senator Lorne Bonnell, and Senator Paul David, both of whom lent advice, support and guidance.

I would be remiss, honourable senators, if I did not give deserving appreciation to other senators in the chamber who, while not members of the committee, attended many of the meetings to gather evidence on our mandate. I refer to Senators Molgat, Muir, Rossiter, MacDonald (Halifax), Macdonald (Cape Breton), Barootes and former Senators Guay and Sherwood.

May I acknowledge the gratitude of the committee for assistance given during the study in preparation of the report by the clerk of the subcommittee, Mr. Denis Bouffard, and his secretary Mrs. Marie Claire Jak, the administrative assistant, Miss Laura Fox, and Mr. Grant Purves, who is a research officer with the Library of Parliament.

I acknowledge, too, the efforts of the veterans' organizations and members of the public who gave testimony and offered advice as to their concerns on the application of benefits to the veterans they represent.

We had the pleasure of hearing evidence by the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the three largest and prominent veterans' organizations—the Dominion Command of the Royal Canadian Legion, The Army, Navy and Air Force Association and the National Council of Veterans Associations of Canada. We heard from the National Prisoners of War Association, European Theatre, the Merchant Navy Association, the Merchant Navy Prisoners of War Association, the Federation of British Canadian Veterans, the Sir Arthur Pearson Association of the War Blinded, and a small group of veterans who suffered beyond belief and who were confined to the Lager Buchenwald, the concentration camp.

Honourable senators, we chose the title of the report "It's Almost Too Late" because it is literally true when we consider that the average age of our First World War veterans is over 90 and the average age of our Second World War veterans is around 70. Even our Korean veterans are approaching 60 years of age. We have only a few more years in which to show those who serve that we care by ensuring that they and their surviving spouses spend their last few years in dignity and comfort.

Since the committee's last report in 1982 entitled "They Served, We Care" the passage of nine years has brought improvements to veterans' programs and to government policy. Most notably, the introduction of the Aging Veterans Program, later called the Veterans Program, assisted veterans to stay in their own homes rather than go into an institution, where they could be far away from their families. The government provided funds for assistance in housekeeping, groundskeeping, transportation, intermediate nursing care and many other benefits which allowed them to live in comfort in their homes.

At the same time, the hearings of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs highlighted the unequal treatment of our veterans who served in the Merchant Marines and the Merchant Navy. It also mentioned the continuing plight of some of our veterans living abroad. Some 50 years after the war, they are denied benefits which all other veterans receive because they chose to live in another country, even though that was their right under the Charter. There is a need for realignment of prisoner-of-war compensation in groups of veterans with deserving claims, who were overlooked when the veterans' independence program was extended to Canada's service veterans. The report mentioned other anomalies in the legislation and ways in which our treatment of veterans could be improved.

I should like to deal with some of the highlights of the report. The wartime service and post-war treatment of the veterans of the Canadian Merchant Navy was a major focal point of the committee's concerns. This brought about some heavy debate when Bill C-87 was introduced in the House of Commons and here in the chamber some months ago. The subcommittee heard from a number of groups and individuals who represent Merchant Navy veterans and Merchant Navy prisoners of war. As far as we were aware, our investigation mark the first occasion on which a parliamentary committee had been made aware both of the service and sacrifices of merchant seamen during World War II and of the shabbiness of their treatment in the years following the war. We also became aware of how little we and other Canadians know of the wartime history of the Merchant Navy.

I commend honourable senators to read the opening section in the report which capsulizes the story of the merchant seamen and the startling tales of the dangers experienced by merchant seamen equal to those of any of the military. Yet successive Canadian governments stubbornly refuse to grant these gallant men veteran status.

Without going into too much detail, I should like to quote from former senior officers of the navy. The Minister of Transport, for example, in April 1943 said:

> Merchant seamen virtually formed the fourth arm of the fighting services, and despite their reticence to blazen abroad their heroic exploits, we feel that in fairness to them and to their next of kin the Canadian public should be told of their work.

A rear admiral, the Commander-in-Chief of the Canadian North-West Atlantic, uttered these telling words:

> Make no mistake, the real victors of the Battle of the Atlantic were not the navies or the air forces, but the Allied merchant seamen.

Following the war, the survivors of this fourth arm of the fighting services were not granted veteran status. They were called non-combatants, which is a despicable characterization of their service. How can anyone consider they were non-combatants, untrained and unarmed, in the navy ships, out in the worst dangers? When the bombs and the bullets hit them and killed them, the bullets did not say, "We cannot touch these people because they are civilians."

• (1120)

I repeat that I commend the opening section on merchant seamen for reading by senators. I am sure you will be interested. I must now take the opportunity to congratulate Senator Neiman for her speech on Bill C-87 in which she gave some history of the merchant seamen.

In order to save some time today, honourable senators, I am going to present the 12 recommendations. This should take only a few minutes. I refer, first of all, to the merchant seamen again, and these are the recommendations we are making to the government:

> 1. That, at the earliest possible opportunity, the Government of Canada introduce legislation to extend full veterans' benefits to all Canadian merchant seamen who served in dangerous waters in Canada's armed conflicts.
> 2. That the War Veterans Allowance Act be amended to define as "veteran" all merchant seamen who made at least one trip through dangerous waters.
> 3. That the Government of Canada prepare and place in the Peace Tower a Book of Remembrance honouring merchant seamen who died of enemy action in Canadian armed conflicts and, further, that suitable monuments to their sacrifices be erected.

Recommendation No. 4 has to do with the Canadian veterans who decided, as was their right, to live in a foreign country after the war. The recommendation in that regard includes, first:

That the residency requirement of the War Veterans Allowance Act and Part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act be amended to permit otherwise qualified veterans to apply for benefits from outside of Canada; and secondly,

That the Canadian government take immediate steps to negotiate an agreement with the United Kingdom to exempt War Veterans Allowance from British taxes.

There are hundreds of Canadian veterans still remaining over there, many living in poverty. Canada refuses to help them, and hides behind this residency restriction, which forces them to come back to Canada for 12 months when they are in their 70s and 80s. It is not fair.

Dealing with the prisoners of war, the next recommendation is:

6. That the rates of compensation provided for under the Prisoners of War Compensation Act be reviewed with the objective of taking into account the severity of the POW regime forced on veterans by the award of additional compensation for each month deemed extremely severe and that two additional categories be added at appropriate rates of compensation for those veterans who served 30 months and more as prisoner of war.

When honourable sentors read the report, they will understand what that means.

The next recommendation is:

That, for the purposes of establishing entitlement to Veterans Independence Program benefits, receipt of prisoner of war compensation be treated as proof of undiagnosed medical disability.

Honourable senators, if anyone is paying attention, I want to remind him that at this time, when the government is concerned, and rightly so, about young Canadians overseas, our prisoners of war today are not entitled, unless they have a disability, to the Veterans Independence Program, even if they have fulfilled all the requirements. That is the reason why I feel some of these anomalies are so important today and the reason why we called the report "It's Almost Too Late".

Recommendations eight and nine are as follows:

8. That the Veterans Independence Program immediately be extended to civilians who served in close support of the wartime armed forces, that is, as enumerated in Part XI of the Civilian War Pension and Allowances Act, and that these benefits be comparable to those offered military veterans; and

9. That the cuts to the heavy housekeeping component of the Veterans Independence Program be fully restored.

I have only a couple more, senators. The next recommendation states:

10. That the Veterans Allowance Act be amended:

1. To establish a common age at which both men and women qualify for benefits and that this common age be 55 years old;

This recommendation tries to overcome an anomaly in the act. When the act was revised to include female veterans, due to the fact jobs were hard to find they lowered the age of qualification for the war veterans allowance to 55. Today there still are veterans who have to wait until they are 60, and I feel it would be only right, under the Charter, to equate the ages for both male and female veterans.

Recommendation No. 11 states:

11. That the Pension Commission give careful consideration to the psychological problems which may arise when the stresses of retiring and aging are combined with those of blindness, and that these problems influence the assessment of applications for exceptional incapacity.

The president of the Sir Arthur Pearson War Blinded Association appeared as a witness before the committee, and he made a strong case. Again I remind honourable senators that 50 years after World War II it is only now that the Canadian Pension Commission is considering extending exceptional incapacity to the war blinded because of their situation as they grow older.

This recommendation is prophetic to what is happening today. Recommendation No. 12 states:

12. That peacetime service personnel pensioned under the Special Duty Area Pension Order be eligible for Veterans Independence Program benefits.

The recommendation has to do with those who were serving in peacekeeping forces and who served after the war in Europe and around the world on behalf of Canada as a special duty. There is an order to cover their benefits under the Pension Act. On the news today it was said that the wives of veterans at the Trenton Air Force Base were visited by the Minister of National Defence and were assured that they would be entitled to pensions, allowances, benefits and care. As a matter of fact, in connection with the reference to the committee, we are going to deal with that problem.

On the last page of our report we advise that:

The Sub-committee on Veterans Affairs will be examining this Special Duty Order in its new mandate, the "Veterans Health Care Regulations"... to ascertain the benefits, services and care to which armed forces personnel, in all categories should be entitled.

One of the witnesses brought to the fore the fact that if veterans need care in a home, they are not entitled to it under the Veterans Independence Program.

Honourable senators, that is a short version of the contents of the committee's report. I would like to give one example of a prisoner of war who served in the theatre of war under the most dangerous conditions and who, while incarcerated, received harsh treatment. He is not entitled to the Veterans Independence Program because it was not included in the order. To emphasize that fact, I had a letter from a Mrs. Coughlin. She wrote to me on behalf of her husband in January requesting assistance for the Veterans Independence Program as a recipient of POW compensation. Of course, he was ineligible because what he received through the War Veterans Allowance exceeded the maximum allowable for qualification. This veteran received the War Veterans Allowance, and the maximum allowable is now $1,262 per month if the veteran is married. Because he was entitled to Workmen's Compensation, he was brought over the maximum allowable, and removed his eligibility for the Veterans Independence Program.

This veteran died in bitterness, and his wife states in the letter that he died always wondering why he was not entitled to VIP. He asked one of the district office staff members whom he visited the following question: "When am I going to be classified as something other than a prisoner of war who did his country a disservice by being taken a prisoner?"

Honourable senators, this aspect of the matter emphasizes the justification for calling the report "It's Almost Too Late". Veterans today do not have many more years to live. Fifty-odd years after the Second World War we should not be too proud of the fact that there are cases such as those I mentioned which require recommendations to give the veterans the deserving benefits that are due them and their spouses after they die.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Marsden, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

EUROPEAN BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT BILL

TENTH REPORT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. John B. Stewart, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, January 31, 1991

The Standing Senate committee on Foreign Affairs has the honour to present its

TENTH REPORT

Your Committee to which was referred the Bill C-88, An Act to provide for the membership of canada in the European Bank for reconstruction and Development, has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Tuesday, January 29, 1991, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN B. STEWART
Chairman

[Senator Marshall.]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, further to the remarks made earlier, I move, with leave, that third reading be given to the bill now.

Senator Doody: This is Bill C-88, having to do with the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

Senator Frith: But leave was not granted for the other one.

Senator Doody: The first bill for which I asked leave was a private members bill. I am not going to suggest that we hold the Senate back for it. It may well be an important bill, but nevertheless I do not think it is that important. What I am saying is that if leave is not granted now—which, of course, is every senator's right—then I will move that third reading be given to the bill at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Frith: No. Next sitting.

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

INTERNATIONAL SALE OF GOODS CONTRACTS CONVENTION BILL

THIRTY-FOURTH REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, January 31, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

THIRTY-FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-81, An Act to implement the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods, has in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, December 19, 1990, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Oliver, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON AMENDING FORMULAE—NOMINATION OF SENATORS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(h), I move:

That Rule 66(1) be suspended in relation to the nomination of senators to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the Process for amending the Constitution of Canada;

That the following senators be appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the said Special Joint Committee, namely, the Honourable Senators Beaudoin, Carney, Gigantès, Hatfield and Kirby;

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House accordingly.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think we should grant leave. I distinguish this from legislation because it is normal in our practice for the whips to settle on the names of those who serve on committees, and that the meeting of the Committee of Selection, which is the committee referred to in Rule 66(1), is usually pro forma as a result of that discussion between the whips. Therefore, I think we should grant leave to save them going out and having a purely pro forma meeting with the Committee of Selection.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, 1st February, 1991, at nine o'clock in the forenoon.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader is not present this morning and I have not heard from him. I presume he will be present later today. In any event, I will be pleased to take as notice any questions senators may have.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wanted to ask a series of questions on several subjects. I also noticed that the leader was not here today. There were several senators who came around before the session got underway with some perturbation that I was even here. I have been greatly influenced by their concern that I take a short time now.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, there is a matter I would like to give the deputy leader notice of. I received an answer about the agricultural programs known as GRIP and NISA—sounds like a couple of diseases. The answers were good as far as they went, but they were completely inadequate as far as giving a reasonably good explanation of what the farmers or the producers are faced with in meeting the financial requirements that they are part of. I ask that he request the Department of Agriculture, not only for my benefit but for the benefit of the producers, to put out a more complete explanation of these programs and do it in language that we can understand.

THE CONSTITUTION

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL MEETINGS—REQUEST FOR OPEN DEBATE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, the second matter I give notice of is this: I wonder if Honourable Senator Murray would come into this chamber and give an explanation of the new task that he has been given by the Prime Minister, who has stated that he has hundreds of senior civil service personnel working on some kind of a new constitutional structure for Canada.

It seems to me that the leader should come into this place and explain what their task is and tell us the instructions that have been given to them to perform that task. He ought to know by now that having all of this done in camera until it comes out in a seamless web, like Meech Lake, does not work. I hope that he comes into this chamber and gives an explanation of what they are up to.

I think this is now the seventh federal and provincial committee that is working on the Constitution. It seems to me that we should have an open debate here and I would ask the Deputy Leader to take as notice our request that he initiate such a debate by giving an explanation of what this task force is about.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will make inquiries.

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. George van Roggen: Do I understand that the leader will not be here for Question Period this afternoon?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have not seen him this morning, so I really cannot answer the question. I notice that his reference book has arrived, but I dare not touch it. It might very well be sacred.

Senator van Roggen: I would much rather put the question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate than have you carry it as a messenger for him.

Senator Doody: I can understand that.

Senator van Roggen: If such an opportunity is to be presented to me later in the day that is fine, otherwise I will have to do the best I can in putting the question to you.

Senator Doody: You had better put the question to me now.

Senator van Roggen: I had better put it to you now, because this is Question Period and unfortunately I cannot be here tomorrow.

PERSIAN GULF WAR

ROLE OF CANADIAN FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—NEED FOR CHANGE IN WEAPONRY

Hon. George van Roggen: My question of the government concerns the role of our Canadian fighter aircraft in the Middle East. An article in the Globe and Mail of January 30, 1991, entitled: "Weaponry on CF-18s not changing, military says" points out that Canada has no plan to equip its CF-18 fighter planes with air-to-ground missiles to attack Iraqi defences, a military spokesman said. He then goes on to describe how their role could not be changed without political decisions being made by the cabinet.

The commander of all allied forces in the Gulf tells us now that no Iraqi aircraft are taking the air, except to fly to Iran. The defensive role that our fighters are playing in escorting coalition bombers over targets is for the purpose of fighting off fighter aircraft. If there are no fighter aircraft, then our pilots are being asked to expose themselves to antiaircraft fire from the ground for no good reason. They cannot fire back. They have no air-to-ground missiles on their aircraft, which could be fitted to those aircraft; and they are exposing themselves to danger for no good reason—that is, unless an Iraqi fighter can show up for them to fire on and there are none. However, there may be at some time in the future.

On last night's news two of our fighters returning from escorting some bombers were asked to assist some American fighters or British fighters who were engaging an Iraqi ship or patrol vessel of some sort. The other coalition fighters were almost out of fuel and had to disengage, so the Canadian fighters attacked the ship. But they did not have the proper weapons. So they did the best they could with their air-to-air machine guns and sparrow missile, which is an air-to-air missile—not armaments equipped for air-to-ground or air-to-sea effective combat.

To add insult to injury, this morning the Canadian commanding officer down there—according to today's Globe and Mail—had to explain how this was not technically going beyond the authorization of the cabinet in performing only a defensive role in the Gulf.

My question to the government is: Why are you putting Canadian pilots at risk from antiaircraft and ground fire when they are not equipped to perform any offensive function except against enemy aircraft—and there are none. That is my specific question.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will try to obtain an answer for the honourable senator. I do not mean to accept the premise that there are no enemy aircraft available. There may or may not be; I do not know.

I will try to get whatever information I can for the honourable senator.

Senator van Roggen: After all, what is so sacrosanct about only defending ourselves. We are not there only to defend ourselves. The mission that our pilots have, along with the coalition people, is to drive the Iraqis out of Kuwait, is it not? That is an offensive action, not a defensive action.

FISHERIES

MAPPING OF FISH STOCKS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government a question. I hope he will answer it, but it is really a suggestion in the form of a question.

I read today that one of the subjects the super-bureaucrats are looking at is how to divide jurisdiction over fisheries. I should like to ask the deputy leader if he might not suggest to his colleague, Senator Murray, that they ensure that the maps upon which the bureaucrats will base some of their recommendations are not land maps, as they were at one time some years ago, with the lines dividing the provinces unto the water. If you are dealing with mineral rights, that could make some sense. I suggest that they contact the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to ensure that, when they are looking at jurisdiction over fisheries, fish movement maps be the instrument that is used.

I will illustrate that with an example. The salmon heading for the Gaspé River can be caught near Port aux Basques or Cape Breton. It also touches P.E.I. and New Brunswick, through the Northumberland Strait. Eventually—that is, if there is anything left of the slices that have been taken—the tail and the head might arrive in the Gaspé River, but I doubt that too.

Has anyone given some thought to this type of problem and not allow the constitutional lawyers to look only at their theories in abstraction when, in fact, they should look at the moving patterns of fish stocks before they even put the subject on the table.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will certainly pass that along to the appropriate department.

PENITENTIARY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—STATUS REPORT

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, may I briefly give an update report on the progress of Bill S-19, an act originating in this chamber, which amends the penitentiary Act to reinstate the statutory visitation privileges of Members of Parliament.

Bill S-19 was given first reading in the House of Commons on January 21, 1991, and was considered by the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections on January 22, 1991, together with those private members bills originating in the House of Commons, which were placed on the order of precedence at the end of December, 1990.

The Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections is responsible for deciding which private members bills and motions must come to a vote. Votable bills are protected in that they cannot be talked out without a decision. They are moved to the bottom of the order of precedence after each hour of debate until the fifth hour, when the Speaker will interrupt the debate to put the question.

The Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, in its twenty-second report, honourable senators, designated Bill S-19, standing in the name of Mr. Nunziata, as a votable item. This is the first time that the standing committee responsible for private members business has selected a senate bill as a votable item.

ABORTION

THIRD READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED—DIVISION DEFERRED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips, for the third reading of the Bill C-43, An Act respecting Abortion.—(Honourable Senator Nurgitz).

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I yield to my colleague, Senator Johnson.

● (1200)

Hon. Janis Johnson: Honourable senators, I wish to join the debate on Bill C-43 and begin with some quotes from submissions made by witnesses to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and from others, concerning this bill.

The first brief from which I would like to quote is from the Legal Education Action Fund for Women and is dated January 19. In it appears the following: "The core problem with the bill is that it labels as criminals women who seek abortions on the basis of their own priorities and aspirations if these priorities do not coincide with those of a doctor and the state."

The Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists of Canada stated in November, 1990: "The decision to perform an abortion should be considered a medical one and, as such, the issue of therapeutic abortion should not be included in Canadian criminal law."

The Tories for Choices stated in 1990:

> It has now been two years since the former Criminal Code legislation was struck down by the Supreme Court of Canada. Available data show no significant increase in the number of women seeking abortions. Women have continued to adhere to the same high standards of practice that characterize the delivery of all medical procedures.

I now wish to quote the eloquent words of the Honourable Barbara McDougall, who, in May 1988, said:

> There is no question that the issue is a moral issue. The question is, who is to make that moral judgment; the court in its red robes and ermine, the church in its silk robes and rings, or politicians in the green chamber, people like us, men and women of ideals and principle? ... Why are any of us in a position to make this judgment best? Why is the woman who is carrying the child not the person who can make that judgment best? Do we honestly believe that she who has the life within her will make a worse decision than us?

Lastly, I wish to quote the comments of the Honourable Kim Campbell, the Minister of Justice, when she addressed the standing committee on January 18, 1991: "Personally, I am comfortable without legislation." She went on to state that Canadians were uncomfortable and that that is why we have this bill. She said: "In a sense it puts the medical code into the criminal code." I say, fellow senators, why is it there?

I could regale you today with hundreds of other quotes from associations, societies and women across Canada about the importance of defeating this regressive legislation. It is not the right bill for our times. It does not reflect the realities of the 1990s and the fact that women have rights and equality under the law and the Charter. It takes us to pre-1969 and the days when women had absolutely no control over their reproductive lives—we were so powerless that to have a tubal ligation required the husband's signature. We had no choices then, and the freedoms we have achieved in the last 20 years have been hard-fought battles all the way. Power is not easily surrendered, and that is the issue here. Women have the right to decide what is best for them, just as men do, and this bill denies our rights, for it recriminalizes a procedure we have a right to access, if that is our decision.

I have listened patiently to the debate. I know that senators speak from their own convictions. But no matter where one stands, let us be fair—no one here is not "pro" life. That is the worst and most offensive misnomer I have ever heard. It implies that people who are against the bill, or who believe that women should choose on this matter, are somehow against life itself. It is absolutely crazy.

I have given birth. I have nurtured a child. I have had a baby die. I hold life sacrosanct. It is precious, and so are our children. No woman is against a fetus. It is not a question of that; it is a matter of a woman's health when her physical and mental well-being may be seriously compromised by following through with an unwanted pregnancy.

This bill will hurt women, for it will limit access by causing delays in the system. Doctors are going to stop doing the procedure. Already today 14 per cent fewer doctors perform the procedure than was the case before May. They do not need the aggravation of potential lawsuits and the responsibility of sole decision-making. Who does?

I come from a family of physicians, men and women. I have seen their soul-searching on this issue and others. I know their sensitivities and respect their worries about such legislation. They are not bluffing or reacting just for something to do. They care, like we all do, about doing what is in the best interests of everyone. But the bottom line of this bill is—is it necessary, or, as grandma used to say, "When something is working, don't fix it!" The situation in Canada was working, especially since the 1988 Supreme Court decision.

Many years of working on women's health issues have shown me, above all else, that no one likes abortion or takes the decision lightly; some 99 per cent of women do not use abortion as a means of birth control; every woman who has one is emotionally affected; recriminalizing abortion will only hurt the very people we are trying to help most—the poor woman, the teenager, the single mom. Believe me, those who can afford it have other options than our system, and they use them.

Above all else, a woman who decides on an abortion will get one somehow, some way. After the agonizing comes action for a woman in this situation, and, if desperation sets in due to accessibility problems, delays, bureaucracy, or the like, she will resort to other means. That is unacceptable to me in this country today. We need to support women in their choices and not to continually challenge and defeat them because they are not in control of our society.

Women do not make the rules they have to live by. Yes, we are impacting more, but we still live by men's decisions in every aspect of our lives. Where does our freedom lie?

On this issue, trust me, I represent a large spectrum of popular opinion. I am of the post-war generation, the baby-boom crowd, as they call us. As a woman, I am offended by this bill. As a new senator, I feel a tremendous responsibility to fight it for the thousands of women who cannot speak to the issue and be heard themselves.

I thought that I would pass on this debate because the bill is so controversial, and I know how my government feels. I am also very loyal and respect my Prime Minister greatly. But the time comes in life when one must stand up for one's beliefs, for one has to live with oneself. I have never shied away from the principles I hold dear, and now is not the time to compromise on that score. The dignity of women is at stake. Our fundamental right to choose is severely compromised by a law that will recriminalize a health procedure. Once again we are the scapegoats for people trying to find a way out of an issue that was best left alone. I know in my heart that we can do better.

[Senator Johnson.]

In closing, let me say that the best way out of this situation is through education, counselling, and openness with our young people on sex education and family planning. Some progress has been made in this area, but not nearly enough attention is paid to family life programs in our schools and in our communities. The federal and provincial governments have to work in this area together. In fact, with the ever-changing family situations in our society, the Canadian family in the 1990s is an area of major concern. But that is another discussion for another time.

For today, this is a vote according to one's conscience. I was told that initially. I can respect anyone who votes that way. But if honourable senators vote on this bill on any other basis, then they are doing a great disservice to themselves and to the men and women—especially the women—of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear! Hear!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak in debate on this motion—

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. On Tuesday last, when I was presenting my seven amendments to Bill C-43 I wanted to speak on my fourth amendment concerning a conscience clause.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Has Senator Haidasz not already spoken in this debate?

Senator Haidasz: I have risen on a point of order.

Senator Doody: If the honourable senator has already spoken, then I am afraid the rules are very clear. If he wishes to speak again, he will have to ask leave of the Senate.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I rose on a point of order to state that on Tuesday last, when I was trying to make a speech to explain the reason for my fourth amendment for the inclusion of a conscience clause for health personnel in Bill C-43, I was interrupted by another point of order made by Senator Nurgitz. He had the right to do that. However, it prevented me from giving an explanation of my amendment.

• (1210)

With leave of the Senate, I ask that I be allowed to make a few remarks about the conscience clause that I proposed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Leave is not granted. If no other honourable senator wishes to speak on this motion, the debate is considered concluded.

By agreement of the Senate, the vote is deferred until 3 o'clock this afternoon. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BROADCASTING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION OF SEVENTH REPORT OF TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Poitras, for the adoption of the Seventh Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications (Bill C-40, An Act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocummunication, with three amendments) presented in the Senate on 24th January, 1991.—(Honourable Senator Atkins).

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators, I move:

> That the Seventh Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be not now adopted but that it be amended by > a) deleting the words "with the following amendments and observations" and by substituting therefor the words "without amendment but with the following observations"; and > b) by deleting the word "AMENDMENTS" and the amendments numbered 1, 2 and 3.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Poitras, that the Seventh Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be now adopted.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Atkins, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cogger:

> That the Seventh Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be not now adopted but that it be amended by

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. That motion is in order. The Senate does not amend a committee's report. It refers the report back to the committee if necessary or, if it so feels, with instructions to amend, with a request to amend, or with a request to give further consideration.

Honourable senators, I am sure it is not in order for the Senate to move amendment of a committee report. Therefore, I ask Your Honour to rule accordingly or reserve. If you rule it out of order, a motion to refer the report back to the committee, either with instructions or for reconsideration, would be in order. This is a committee report; therefore, only the committee can amend it. We can either adopt it, refuse it, or instruct further consideration.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if the Senate feels that this motion is out of order, I do not want the proceedings to be delayed. Therefore, I would suggest that those of us who do not approve of these amendments simply vote against the report.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I am not prepared to rule now. I am prepared to reserve judgment and report at the earliest time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it is a matter of importance beyond the question of the Broadcast Act. If we are going to change our procedures, the Rules Committee might want to look at that and might want to give the Senate this authority. I believe we should have a ruling. Perhaps Your Honour could rule on it later this day. I am not pressing for an immediate ruling, but I am pressing for a ruling as to whether or not such a motion is in order, because I am convinced that it is not and it ought to be so declared. If we wish to change our procedures, let us have a recommendation from the Rules Committee.

Senator Doody: I have no quarrel with that. Rather than prolong the procedure, perhaps Senator Atkins might have leave to withdraw the motion. Perhaps we can proceed in that way.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: If the motion is being withdrawn because it is out of order, then leave is granted. Leave has to be granted to withdraw. I wish to know whether the mover of the motion is withdrawing it because it is out of order. If so, then leave is granted.

Hon. Michel Cogger: He does not have to explain why.

Senator Frith: That is his problem, sir. I have a right to say yes or no to leave. I am saying no unless he will accept that that is the reason for withdrawal. This is not just a matter of caprice. Let me make it clear that it is consistent with what I have said up to this point; namely, that I believe such a motion is out of order. I am consistent in my position. Otherwise, I should like a ruling.

If the mover of the motion is prepared to say, "I withdraw because of the objections as to its being in order," I shall grant leave.

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators, I am prepared to withdraw the motion. I would be interested in knowing whether we can then vote on the committee report.

Senator Frith: I cannot prevent us from doing that. If leave is asked to withdraw the motion to amend the report because of the objection as to its orderliness, and it is therefore withdrawn, then the motion is before us. I cannot stop us from voting on that.

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I wish to withdraw my motion.

Senator Frith: Because of the objection as to its being in order?

Senator Atkins: Yes.

Senator Frith: Then leave should be granted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion in amendment withdrawn.

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF SEVENTH REPORT NEGATIVED

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Poitras, that this report be adopted.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The motion is now before us and I should like to speak briefly on it.

Technically, of course, Senator Atkins needs leave to speak to it now, because, by moving his motion in amendment, he has spoken to it. However, I shall not insist on that if he wants to say something, especially if he wants to explain why he is against national unity.

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators, once again, I should like to speak directly to this bill. Bill C-40 is a result of perhaps the most comprehensive and public review of broadcasting policy ever undertaken in Canada. The bill has been more than five years in the making and has twice been passed in the other place. Along the way, the bill has been the subject of wide-ranging public debate and comment and even some adjustments. It has twice passed second reading in the Senate.

The review of broadcasting policy produced two unanimous conclusions. The 1968 Broadcasting Act is outdated and the choice of Canadian programming is inadequate. The Broadcasting Act urgently needs updating to encompass new technologies not covered by the existing Broadcasting Act, to ensure the CRTC's authority to manage the broadcasting system effectively, and to reflect social realities such as human rights concerns and the need for better representation of women and minorities in our broadcasting system. In addition, there is a need to put in place new legislative provisions to help ensure that more and better Canadian programming choices are available to all Canadians, if our cultural sovereignty is to be protected and strengthened.

This legislation addresses these issues. It is the result of a genuine consensus and I believe it is time that it become law.

The first amendment relates to the CBC and national unity. Senator Stewart spoke about this amendment yesterday. Bill C-40 alters the CBC's mandate under the existing Broadcasting Act by replacing an obligation to contribute to the development of national unity with an obligation to contribute to the shared national consciousness and identity. This new wording recognizes the important role that the CBC can and should play in helping Canadians understand their country and each other. At the same time, it fully respects the CBC's journalistic independence and integrity.

In considering this issue, an all-party committee of the other house concluded unanimously that there must be no suggestion in the act that the CBC has any obligation to serve as a propagandist, even for a cause as legitimate as national unity. I believe that this was, and remains, the right conclusion. I believe also that it is important and constructive to note that this view has been supported by the majority of witnesses who have appeared before the committees of both houses of Parliament which have studied this bill, including witnesses from the CBC and the Friends of Canadian Broadcasting.

In my view, we should stay with this new wording rather than amend the bill to restate words which have been seen as problematic by the Caplan-Sauvageau Task Force, the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture of the other house, the two legislative committees of the other house, the senior management of the CBC, the past-chairman of the CRTC, and the foremost historian of Canadian broadcasting policy, Professor Frank Peers.

It is interesting to note that during his appearance before the Senate committee Professor Peers captured well the concerns of several other witnesses. Responding to questions on this issue, he suggested that an objective of contributing to the development of national unity places unreal expectations on the mandate of a public broadcaster because the phrase "national unity" may refer to particular constitutional arrangements which can alter over time. He supported the new wording in the bill because, in his view, broadcasters should be expected to do what they do best, which is to reflect and represent society as it is.

Honourable senators, the new wording refocuses the CBC mandate somewhat without taking away the responsibilities of the national public broadcaster to provide a responsible service to Canadians. Clearly, the CBC should be expected to help build this country as best a public broadcaster can, by reporting as accurately, honestly and objectively as it can, and by helping Canadians in all regions to share in our diverse culture and heritage. That is the mandate that this legislation gives to the CBC.

I was interested to note that the president of the CBC on Monday, speaking to the Canadian Club, made the following point, if I may quote a news article:

> It is an essential institution, he said, and "one of the few institutions we have left that can function as a powerful, effective instrument for nation-building."

On the second amendment, which relates to the powers of review and direction, Senator Davey made some comments with regard to that amendment. Under the current Broadcasting Act, the Governor in Council may set aside and refer back a CRTC decision for any reason. No public notice of appeals is required and only the result of these is made public. Clauses 28 and 29 of Bill C-40 change this process in three important ways which together limit the power's application and make the appeal process more transparent and open to the public.

Clause 28 narrows the power's application to matters clearly relating to objectives of broadcasting policy and regulation in clauses 3 and 5 of the bill. Clause 29 then requires that petitions to review a CRTC decision be copied to the CRTC, which must open a public register and send copies to all participants in the public hearings concerned. Finally, clause 28 also requires that the Governor in Council give reasons for setting aside a decision after a referral back. Under the current act, the Governor in Council may set aside a decision after a referral back without giving any reason.

It has been suggested that the power of review is unnecessary because, under clause 31 of the bill, a CRTC decision can be appealed to the Federal Court. However, the court may hear an appeal on questions of law and jurisdiction only and not on policy matters. Jurisprudence demonstrates that courts are reluctant to intervene with decisions of tribunals, particularly expert tribunals like the CRTC, because these tribunals are best placed to consider the evidence knowledgeably and assess it in the context of their expertise in relation to the regulated industries.

Moreover, unlike most administrative tribunals, the CRTC is empowered to interpret and implement a law which contains a statement of public policy enshrined in section 3 of the current Broadcasting Act and in clause 3 of Bill C-40. The courts have never called into question a CRTC interpretation of this policy. The Governor in Council's review power is therefore the only means of appealing CRTC decisions on the basis of a commission's interpretation of legislated broadcasting policy. Without this power, the commission's application of broadcasting policy would be beyond appeal. In effect, an appointed body would become the final arbitrator of a public policy so important that Parliament has enshrined it in law.

Experience with the existing review power indicates that since its introduction under the 1968 Broadcasting Act it has been used sparingly and judiciously in the public interest, regardless of which party was in power. In more than 20 years, the review power has been used to deal with 12 issues affecting 17 CRTC decisions. Among those issues were matters relating to Canadian content, to federal-provincial agreements and to the hearing of local concerns, none of which would have been heard in court. To place these numbers in context, each year the CRTC issues over 1,000 decisions which are open to appeal and affect one or more new licences, licence renewals or amendments.

The power of direction proposed in clause 7 of Bill C-40 serves quite another purpose and its application is also limited. The Governor in Council may only issue direction of general application on broad policy matters with respect to any of the objectives of broadcasting policy set out in subsection 3(1) or any of the regulatory objectives set out in subsection 5(2). Also, clause 7 states that directions may not apply to particular licensing decisions, nor to matters pending before the CRTC.

Finally, before issuing a direction, the Governor in Council must consult with the CRTC, invite public comments by publishing the proposed direction in the Canada Gazette, and table a proposed direction in each house of Parliament where it stands referred to the appropriate committee for a period of 40 days. Only after the expiration of these 40 days and a final consultation with the CRTC may a direction be issued. These limitations ensure that, like the power of review, the direction power will be used both sparingly and judiciously.

The power to issue policy directions and the power to review decisions, taken separately or together, do not substitute the Governor in Council for the CRTC, nor do they undermine the CRTC's authority. The CRTC is, and will remain under the bill, one of the most powerful and independent regulatory authorities under Canadian law. As the minister stated in his comments to the Senate committee, no power or combination of powers in Bill C-40 would allow the government to influence who would receive a broadcasting license.

The third amendment relates to the standing committees or subcommittees of the board of the CBC. Senator Graham commented on those amendments yesterday. The Caplan-Sauvageau Report and the House of Commons Standing Committee on Communications and Culture both recommended that a new Broadcasting Act recognize the differing characteristics of French and English language broadcasting. Bill C-40 recognizes this reality and ensures that the broadcasting system as a whole, the CRTC and the CBC will also recognize it. Clause 3(1)(c) states that:

> English and French language broadcasting, while sharing common aspects, operate under different conditions and may have different requirements;

Clause 5(2) requires the CRTC to regulate and supervise the broadcasting system in a flexible manner that is readily adaptable to the different characteristics in English and French language broadcasting and to the different conditions under which they operate.

As for the CBC, clause 45 of the bill establishes standing committees of the board of directors to deal with matters relating to French and English language broadcasting. These committees ensure that this fundamental aspect of Canadian broadcasting will be given full and due consideration at the highest levels of the CBC without, at the same time, dividing the corporation in two. The committees are intended to make positive contributions to the management and operation of the CBC. Their creation recognizes the reality that the English and French language services operate largely independent of each other, serving different audiences with different needs, which the board must take into account. At the same time, the bill permits cross-membership between these committees, which could foster a better understanding at the board level of the different characteristics of the CBC French and English services across Canada. They should lead to a greater exchange of information between the two services that now exist.

Under Bill C-40 there remains only one board of directors of the CBC, and Clause 45 gives the board full authority to ensure that the standing committees become positive rather than divisive elements. The chairperson and the president are to be members of both standing committees. All other members are appointed by the board, not by the government, and the committees would perform such duties as determined by the board as a whole. In short, the CBC has full leeway to experiment with the structure and the function of these committees until it is satisfied that they contribute to the fulfilment of the CBC's mandate in a positive and constructive manner.

For these reasons, honourable senators, I believe Bill C-40 should be adopted as it was presented to the Senate committee. I therefore urge honourable senators to give serious consideration to passing Bill C-40 as it stands.

Senator Frith: Bill C-40 is not before us. The report is before us.

Hon. John B. Stewart: I should like to ask Senator Atkins a question. As I understood the honourable senator, he said that he did not object to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation engaging in nation building, or words to that effect. He then said that the expression "national unity" created difficulties for the preservation of journalistic integrity.

My question relates to the meaning of certain expressions used in the bill. The bill in the form Senator Atkins prefers would required the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to contribute to shared national consciousness and identity. On the other hand, Senator Atkins would not have the corporation contribute to national unity. Could the honourable senator explain why "shared national identity" is less offensive than "national unity"? Is it not true that the expression "national unity" has come to be regarded as unacceptable in certain quarters and that the government is yielding to pressure from those quarters? If the second prong of my question is not accurate, will the honourable senator tell the house why contributing to "shared national identity" is better than contributing to "national unity". I should have thought that "identity", which indicates absolute sameness, would be more offensive to the government than "national unity."

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, I believe in national unity, as, I am sure, does everyone in this house.

[Senator Atkins.]

Senator Stewart: We will be voting together then.

Senator Atkins: The fact of the matter is that your definition of "national unity" may not be mine. When a broadcaster is responsible to cover the issues in this country as a follower of public affairs, I would ask this question: Is it not fair that the CBC cover my definition of "national unity", yours or anyone else's, whether they are members of this house or of the public, in an objective and fair way? They are not there as propagandists; they are there to contribute, in my view, to the shared national consciousness and identity of this country.

• (1240)

Senator Frith: Surely there is more disagreement about the meaning of "identity" than there is about the meaning of "unity".

Senator Stewart: Surely Senator Atkins will agree that if there are differences of understanding about the meaning of the expression "national unity", the same differences would exist—and at an even higher degree—about the meaning of "national identity." And if we agree that "national unity" must be deleted because people differ, then it follows that the entire clause should be struck from the bill.

Senator Atkins: I suppose the other question, honourable senators, would be what definition the CBC has in relation to its view of national unity.

Senator Stewart: You make my point.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: I have a question for Senator Atkins related to clause 45, to which I spoke yesterday. I advocated the deletion of that particular clause because in my view it would further contribute to the division of the country and, indeed, to balkanization.

Towards the end of his remarks Senator Atkins said, if I heard him correctly, that the legislation permits cross-membership between the proposed English language broadcasting committee and the French language broadcasting committee. I cannot find any clause in the bill which prohibits such cross-membership, but since he made specific reference to it, I wonder whether he could expand on that and tell us where the bill expressly allows for it.

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, as part of its responsibilities under the act, the board is empowered to appoint the committees. First, the chairman and the president are automatic ex officio members of both subcommittees. There is nothing stopping the board members from serving on both committees. There is nothing stopping the membership on the French language committee from representing other parts of the country. That is what I am saying when I talk about the cross-membership of the subcommittees of the board.

Senator Graham: I suppose, for purposes of clarification, then, what Senator Atkins is suggesting is that, besides the chairman and the president, directors from various parts of the country could serve on both subcommittees.

Senator Atkins: Yes.

Senator Graham: Could he tell me where that is stated in the legislation?

Senator Atkins: It is not stated in the legislation but there is nothing in this bill to prevent it from taking place if that were the decision of the board.

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I should like to respond to Senator Atkins's comments on the power of direction and the power of review.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Could the honourable senator put it in the form of a question?

Senator Davey: I ask Senator Atkins to comment on my observations, if I can put it that way. In his presentation he made the power of review and the power of direction almost meaningless. He spent a great deal of time saying how little the Governor in Council is involved in those powers. If those powers are really so unimportant to the government, then would he not agree with senators on this side of the chamber that the one power should be removed? In saying that, I am mindful of the fact that the Chairman of the CRTC is concerned about that double-barrelled intervention. Senator Atkins has spent quite some time diminishing the role of the government. Why, then, does he not agree with us and have the power reduced?

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, I think the new bill opens the system up for those interested in any area of licensing or any other direction of review or power. The public has a better opportunity under this new bill to examine the direction which the government is taking. That is why I think it is important that we put back into the bill the clause that the amendment proposes be taken out. I think there would be great concern if we do not open the process up so that the public is more aware of what is going on.

I say that respectfully, Senator Davey, because I know that you sponsored Bill C-68. I think that bill was a first class bill for its time, but now in 1991, many things have changed. There has been a great deal of experience developed over the intervening years. Through that experience, the proposals in Bill C-40 are very solid.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It was moved by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Poitras, that this report be adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "Yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "Nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Let the doors be opened.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. We have rejected the committee's report.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): We have not rejected the bill.

Senator Frith: You cannot pick and choose. You have refused the report. What has the Senate just voted on?

Senator Doody: We voted on a report.

Senator Frith: Yes, and what does that report say? It says:

> Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-40 . . . has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, December 19, 1990, examined the said Bill and now reports the same with the following amendments and observations:

Hon. Efstathios W. Barootes: We are defeating the amendments.

Senator Frith: You are defeating the report. Please reread the motion. Incidentally, Senator Macdonald is a bit mischievous here! What will happen the next time he stands up and moves a motion? Are we going to assume that he is throwing it in for some frivolous purpose and will then turn around and vote against his own motion?

Hon. John M. Macdonald: I had an obligation to present the report of the majority of the committee, which I did antiseptically, in a detached fashion.

Senator Frith: May I say you did have an alternative, sir. You could have said no, which is apparently how you felt. Apparently, you were against this report. You cannot pick the part that you wish to defeat. The part that you have defeated is the report of the committee: that the bill be adopted with amendments. You cannot say, "I am voting for the part that says 'reporting the bill' but I am voting against the part that says 'with amendments'." It is one report, and that is what has been rejected. It would be quite out of order now to move to third reading. You cannot reverse that except if you have a two-thirds majority, and I doubt that.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Olson: No, they do not.

Senator Frith: Of course, you can change the vote. That is possible. It would be in order to reverse the decision we just made with a two-thirds vote, but there is no authority for proceeding now with third reading on this report. The analogy of the GST, where a report was defeated, does not apply, because in the case of the GST vote the report of the committee said that the bill "shall not be proceeded with." The Senate defeated that recommendation, which, of course, means that the bill shall be proceeded with. In this case, what the Senate has done is to say to the committee, "You have, as we asked you to, reported the bill. You reported it with amendments. Therefore, you are telling us what we should do with the bill; in effect, give it third reading with these amendments." And the Senate has said no to that. That is the end of it.

Senator Doody: No, honourable senators. That is clearly not the end of it. The committee report was rejected. The bill now proceeds to third reading. It has been the standard procedure. It is what we have done on previous occasions and it is what we will continue to do. The committee's report was not accepted by the Senate, so we go to third reading and vote on the bill. If the Senate does not want to approve it at third reading, it will be defeated at third reading.

Senator MacEachen: But the bill has not been reported.

Senator Doody: But, certainly, the committee report has no bearing on the ultimate fate of the bill itself.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on this so-called standard procedure, I challenge any senator—and I will be convinced if I can be shown or if the Speaker makes a ruling, which I ask for now—to show me a case in which a committee has reported a bill with amendments, in which the Senate has rejected that report and in which we then proceeded to third reading. All this vote was about was to reject the report. The motion was for the adoption of the report and the Senate has said, "No, we will not adopt that report." That is the stage that goes before third reading, but it must be adopted or, as in the case of the GST, rejected outright. If there is a case in the Senate in which a committee has reported a bill with amendments, and in which a motion was made to adopt the report, obviously including the amendments, and in which it has been rejected and we have then proceeded to third reading, I should like to see it.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If there is no further discussion on the point, I will reserve my judgment on the matter. I wish to look at the precedents and I will report as quickly as I can. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Later]

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to bring to the attention of honourable senators the presence in the Speaker's gallery of Mr. Speaker Donahoe of the Nova Scotia legislature, accompanied by David McNeil, Clerk of the New Brunswick legislature.

Some honourable senators will recall that Senator Donahoe, Speaker Donahoe's father, was a member of this Chamber for a number of years.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION BILL

ELEVENTH REPORT OF ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE REJECTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the eleventh report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources (Bill C-84, An Act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada) presented in the Senate on January 30, 1991.

Hon. Dan Hays moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, I would like to speak on this motion, and as a beginning comment, to thank the witnesses who appeared before the committee during the course of our consideration of Bill C-84, respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada. The witnesses that we heard were representative of the varying points of view on whether or not the privatization of Petro-Canada should be proceeded with, and they were also willing to answer the questions of the committee that related to one of my main concerns—shared, I think, by some other members of the committee—and that was a description and comment on the policy context within which Petro-Canada is being privatized.

I should also like to thank the committee members for their patience and their observing of decorum in the committee's proceedings. I think we had a good debate, both with witnesses present and when we were discussing the content of our report.

Finally, in this context, I thank the committee's support people in the persons of Nicole McMillan, our clerk, and Dan Shaw, from the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament, as well as the late Dean Clay, for their assistance to the committee in connection with this report.

I would like to speak on two aspects of the report. The first is the recommendation that this legislation should not be passed and new legislation privatizing Petro-Canada should not be introduced for at least six months. The explanation, as you will see in the committee's report, is that we have not yet heard from the Government of Canada, for example, on the report "Energy and Canadians into the 21st Century", which was tabled in the House of Commons on August 10, 1988. Nor have we had a response from the government to the report of the House Energy Committee that commented on that report. Nor have we had a comment on the Senate's own Energy Committee's report of June 12, 1990, on Petro-Canada. I might add that the government has never commented on the report of the House Energy Committee from the previous Parliament when it was chaired by Barbara Sparrow, MP from Calgary, in which, among other things, it recommended the establishment of a strategic petroleum reserve for Canada to address concerns about security of supply for Atlantic and eastern Canada.

The second part of my speech will deal with comments that the committee has made with respect to the privatization of Petro-Canada, if it is to proceed. I will reserve my comments on those until such time as I get to that point in my intervention.

The main item of concern to me on the energy policy context is with respect to Canada's security of supply and with respect to Canada's levels of self sufficiency in oil. I could comment on natural gas but that is covered fairly well in a report of the Senate Energy Committee, tabled some time ago, which recommended that Canada adopt a core market policy or a policy to ensure gas supply to essential service customers, as they are characterized in some cases.

Principally, I am concerned in my comments here today about security of oil supply and levels of self sufficiency in oil. The government, during the free trade debate, and now when pressed on what the energy policy context of this day is, always refers to mechanisms that are external to Canada to answer the question.

If I understand correctly, we are relying on external mechanisms with respect to what happens in energy matters in Canada, particularly with respect to oil, which, to a large degree, will tend to drive the price of other energy forms.

What are those external mechanisms? One is world price. I will not spend a lot of time on that subject because I think it is obvious that world price has largely been determined by OPEC. The current Persian Gulf crisis shows us how OPEC can be destabilized. Again, rather than spending a lot of time on that subject, I refer honourable senators to the committee's Petro-Canada report tabled in this chamber June 12 and adopted shortly after that, which describes in detail the situation in the world in terms of world reserves and where we obtain the oil we need. There are also comments about the situation in the United States and its alarm about its dependence on imported oil and the current process of developing a national energy strategy under the direction of their Secretary of Energy, James Watkins.

Let me go to the next external mechanism to which we are referred, which is the International Energy Agreement. On this count I do not put the same faith in the International Energy Agency as the government as a means of protecting our interests. The previous externality we have relied on—that is, world price, to drive markets in a way to ensure that we do not have to worry about security of supply or levels of self-sufficiency—goes without saying. It is unstable; does the IEA, which is a creature of the OECD, cover this problem? I think not, even though it makes a lot of sense and is an important element in the world energy picture.

To give you the flavour of why I am concerned, rather than speaking on my own behalf, I would like to quote from the December 24, 1990 issue of Petroleum Intelligence Weekly and an article entitled "Energy Implications of the Mideast Crisis". It is by Mr. Silvan Robinson, who is chairman of the Energy Environmental Programme at the Royal Institute of International Affairs in London. Prior to that, he was president of Shell International Trading. I am not going to quote at length from this article, but on a selective basis. This paper is also a distillation of a paper that was presented to the Royal Institute on November 25 of last year. I would urge any honourable senators who are interested to read this paper. To make my point, the article asks this question:

> Is the International Energy Agency any longer the appropriate forum for managing crises? Is its remit in any case too narrow?

When talking about crisis management, I quote:

> An oil supply disruption affects the world in two ways—through the physical disruption of supply and a dislocation of prices. However, the remit of the IEA—certainly as it is presently interpreted—is that its primary concern is to help manage the supply-demand balance in a strictly volumetric sense, despite the major impact that price volatility has on world economic activity.
> The attitude of the IEA board is accompanied by what appears to be a misunderstanding by many governments and inter-governmental officials about how the price mechanisms of the international oil market nowadays actually work.
> The business is now extremely fragmented and market-oriented. Futures and forward markets have developed. The oil price is not based on short-term or even long-term marginal costs but on a balance of expectations about supplies and desired stock levels.
> It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that there is something amiss about the conceptual and practical framework of the IEA. Oil price movements in times of emergency are a matter of world importance. And the world's so-called strategic stocks are owned in such a way that except in times of extreme emergency, paralysis of action is inevitable. This may not have mattered much so far, but does nothing to allay future concerns.
> The issue of stock ownership—

And here he is referring to strategic petroleum reserves or excess capacity.

> —is the key. At present, for all practical purposes, strategic stocks exist in only three countries: the USA, Japan and Germany.
> During this crisis, the oil industry has so far demonstrated its usual remarkable flexibility. Given the reexpansion of Saudi Arabian supply, disruptions up to the size of one or two other Middle East producers can be "managed". And what would happen if Saudi Arabia itself were disrupted? This is not an abstract possibility. Surely a more powerful insurance against this catastrophe, enabling a measured, not panic, response should be at the heart of the stock strategy.
> One approach would be to revive the concept of oil leasing to the consumer world by producers with surplus capacity.
> The concept would be that the oil be stored throughout the consumer world, not just in the U.S. and Japan. It would be leased at production cost plus a fee and only fully paid for if used.
> The implication is that not only should the role of the IEA be changed, but possibly also its format. As presently constituted, the IEA has considerable merits. It has a good staff. Its market reports are basic reading for energy analysts. It is not an overblown body like so many U.N. agencies.
> But it does have a narrow focus, not only in terms of its ability to act on price levels, but also because it has no direct responsibilities for the non-OECD world, which will before long represent half the world's consumption. Its role in a real crisis is even more questionable. The so-called oil-sharing mechanisms are not likely to be remotely workable.

I rely on this person as being an expert and more knowledgeable than I. I have quoted his words selectively from the article, and I urge those interested to read the whole piece. I only quoted portions of it in the interests of trying to focus on what I believe is at issue; but let me add that I have had the opportunity in our Energy committee to meet with the Canadian bureaucrats who are responsible for our IEA involvement.

My conclusion is that the IEA will not work. Immediately after the 1979 Iranian revolution and oil embargo, the IEA should have come into operation. Its membership decided that it would not be a wise idea to bring it into operation. When pressed, the answer I determined from the bureaucrats who appeared before our committee was that because the IEA has no control over price, only volumes—a point made by Mr. Robinson, whom I have just quoted—then it really will not work very well in a time of crisis. In any event, they decided not to test it. So I question our reliance on world price or the IEA as a means of ensuring our security of supply.

Another thing that the government tells us we should take comfort in is the Free Trade Agreement with the United States, which secures our access and which we think, for some reason, is something that puts us in a better position. Here I should like to quote from our report, Energy and Canadians into the 21st Century: (Energy Options). It contains a discussion that deals with Article 904, the proportional access provision of the FTA, and Canada's position vis-à-vis the U.S.

The Free Trade Agreement does not give Canada greater security of supply, in that we import virtually no oil from the U.S. I suppose that we import some electric power and perhaps minimal amounts of gas, but virtually no oil, although we do have access to 50,000 barrels a day of North Slope crude, which we do not use on a market basis but could presumably secure, provided we took transport through the United States. I might say in passing that that is a remarkable example of how careful is the United States about letting its oil out of its control, and the degree to which it will go to ensure that it will address its serious problem of security of supply.

I quote from the energy options report. This is in the context of a discussion about proportional access and Article 904. I take this from page 49 of the report:

> The issue, therefore, is not whether such assurances should be sought and given, but rather whether the concept of proportional access negotiated in the FTA is an acceptable means of giving these assurances from the Canadian standpoint. The Advisory Committee is satisfied that the proportional access clause can be implemented and managed in a way that does not prejudice Canada's energy security interest.

The reference there to "assurances" must be taken in the context of this report's being prepared before the FTA was entered into. I quote further from page 50:

> The practical implications of this constraint—that is, the Article 904 proportional access constraint,

> —are as follows. Supply emergencies are addressed by the International Energy Agency Agreement, which supercedes the FTA in cases of conflict. Under most reasonable scenarios, the IEA Emergency Oil Sharing System, or related mechanisms addressing pre-crisis situations, would require Canada to maintain, or perhaps even increase, its oil supply to the United States or other IEA member countries. Hence, the proportional access provision would likely not be relevant in this context.

The point here, honourable senators, is that this report from which I am quoting does not address the issue of regional security of supply. That would be addressed only by monitoring carefully our level of self-sufficiency and how our own crude feedstock needs are met. I make this comment now from memory, although I have the details somewhere in my notes. The current level of oil self-sufficiency in crude oil in Canada, I believe, is 64.1 per cent; that is, we supply 64.1 per cent of our own crude oil feedstock requirement. The balance is imported. Ten years ago we were supplying in excess of 70 per cent, and at one point in the 10 year period we were importing as much as 84 or 85 per cent.

The relevant point here is that our level of self-sufficiency is declining while our oil dependence in Atlantic and eastern Canada is increasing. On a market basis that trend will continue. I put it to honourable senators that, unless we do something about it, it will continue to the point where we have what is essentially a pooled asset with the United States. Of course, we have signed the FTA and the section under discussion means that it will be difficult for us to interfere with that, although there are some circumstances in which we could do so.

I will quote further from the Energy Options Report, having given that background:

> Specifically, the federal government retains full authority and has a heightened responsibility for the following:
> to monitor all aspects of Canadian, U.S. and international energy balances, reserves to production ratios, trade flows, etc.;
> to form a view on whether export volumes to U.S. markets can be sustained over the long term, considering the adequacy of Canadian reserves and production to meet future Canadian demand requirements; and > if the view is that these volumes cannot be sustained, to deny increases (i.e. refuse the export application) and to cap the Canadian supplies accessible to the U.S. market at the then-existing level (i.e. invoke proportionality).

I emphasize the words "has a heightened responsibility for the following" and point out that the Energy Option Committee recommends in very strong terms that that heightened responsibility involves managing our energy future.

The report goes on to say that if it is managed badly there will be an electoral consequence for the bad managers. I suppose my concern is that we have ignored the admonition of Energy Options. We are not managing our energy future in a prudent way and we are using as a reason external factors. When we do that we are ignoring the example of countries with which we compete who look after their own needs on a priority basis and who manage their affairs so as to take full advantage of export opportunities and to ensure security for their own markets.

I believe—and this goes beyond the simple concern respecting oil—that unless we learn from those other countries, and follow their example, we will make ourselves more vulnerable and will put ourselves in a position where we are going to be exploited by those very able competitors in other parts of the world, and here I think principally of the United States, Pacific Rim countries—in particularly Japan—and Europe, who approach their problems in a different way. We seem to take for granted things that they are forced not to take for granted, and thereby, I believe, we are doing a great disservice to our future. We should be managing our energy future. From questions that were answered by the Minister of Energy yesterday we know that the IEA is not taking into account the fact that we are dependent on imported oil at the same time as being a net exporter—a net exporter undertaking obligations to supply additional oil to other countries. This apparently is under negotiation, but at this point the reality is that there is no good answer to the question, "What happens to us in the event of short supply and an obligation to share when we are a major importer?" Over time, if the trend I described earlier continues, we will be as reliant as is the U.S. on imports.

I am not suggesting, when I talk about this, that we should close our doors, supply all of our own oil and not export. We should have healthy levels of exports. We should import, because it makes no sense to close our doors and simply be self-sufficient with our own supply. But the level of self-sufficiency is key. I feel that it should be about 70 per cent. For those who are interested, I delivered a paper to a heavy oil conference which elaborated on what I thought it should be and how I thought we should meet that need.

At any rate, I will close by saying that this reliance on external factors—our IEA agreement involving the usual problems in having to deal with 21 other countries; simply saying that the market alone will look after us; our looking at the FTA and thinking that, having entered into it, our problems are solved; and our not managing our problem as the energy options report admonishes us to do—is folly. This is the most glaring element of Canadian energy policy that is missing. I do not believe that we should proceed with the privatization of Petro-Canada until we have a statement of energy policy that is detailed enough to enable us to make a judgment on what the government intends to do to manage this problem.

Petro-Canada may or may not play a role in this. One of Petro-Canada's functions was state-to-state transactions. This could be a way of covering some of our security of supply or self-sufficiency concerns. It might be utilized for swap arrangements. There are many policy options that Canada might pursue to cover this problem, and Canada acknowledges that it has the problem. The rhetoric of the minister when he makes presentations on this subject is very good. I mean, I agree with him. He says we are concerned about that. However, when pressed yesterday, he answered the question by stating that we are pursuing demand-side options.

We are pursuing alternative fuels, conversion to gas and ethanol. When asked what he would do if we were importing 50 per cent or 60 per cent of our requirement, or some low figure, he would not answer. I think that question should be answered. I appreciate that once it is answered, the next question is, how is it to be done? There is some pain there. However, avoidance of pain has gone on too long. I think we should set the policy and then deal with the questions, because our long-term interests demand that.

One of the other options is a strategic petroleum reserve, which was one of the recommendations made by the house committee when chaired by Mrs. Sparrow. It was mentioned in the article I quoted. The author suggested some other arrangements which might work better, such as leasing of production, provided that could be done on a secure basis.

There are other aspects of an energy policy which should be fleshed out. However, I used the security of supply and level of self-sufficiency as the most striking examples of something that should attract our attention. It has attracted the attention of the government, but I do not believe the government has articulated in a detailed enough way for us to understand what it is doing to ensure that we have what we need for a long-term, secure supply and a comfortable level of self-sufficiency. I will not repeat the Hibernia debate, but it is key to that. We have spent a lot of money to bring the production on, but we have not completed the intervention, which has been justified only on a regional development basis, by ensuring that production from that area displaces imports in a region that is totally dependent on oil imports.

The second aspect of the report addresses some of the things that should be done, if the government wishes to privatize Petro-Canada, to make it a more successful privatization. The recommendations are that the company comply with the second recommendation of the committee's June report. In the interests of time, we did not repeat that in the report now before the Senate, so I will briefly read it into the record. The recommendation is that Petro-Canada be required to present as much information in the public domain as is required of comparable publicly-traded, private-sector companies. In the text of the report the committee referred to the Ontario Securities Commission's annual information form, or the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission 10K and 10Q files, as standard of disclosure.

Over the years Petro-Canada has presented different kinds of information in its annual reports. As time has gone on, it has presented more detail and has been more consistent. When the committee looked at Petro-Canada in its study, it found that there was not enough information to do the kind of comparison that the committee wanted to do with Petro-Canada's peer companies, namely, Imperial Oil and Shell. The committee felt, in the abstract, that that was an important recommendation. However, if the company is to be privatized, it is even more important to have a reasonable period of time within which there is a history of that information being made available in order that energy analysts and investors will be able to make good judgments about Petro-Canada's value, and so that the public, whether it is a Senate committee or someone else who wants to go into detail—and there are many who will—will have enough information to judge and comment on Petro-Canada's activities.

The committee decided that this would be helpful, and I submit that it would aid those interested in making a proper assessment on the effect that the public policy objectives Petro-Canada has been required to serve have had on its financial performance and how the company is managed. In fact, some believe, and it was put to us in some of the testimony received, that Petro-Canada still has an overhanging public policy purpose to this day, namely, its commitment to Hibernia and to high-cost east coast production. We have heard from Petro-Canada that its current capital requirement is, in large part, needed to meet its commitments on Hibernia, which I believe are around $100 million in each of the next two years. The minister confirmed yesterday that it is contractually bound to go ahead with these expenditures.

Since Bill C-44 was passed and moved ahead, one of the Hibernia participants—Gulf Canada, with a 25 per cent interest in Hibernia—is selling one half of that interest. One of the things that Petro-Canada may have do when it is privatized is follow the Gulf example and restructure. In fact, the chairman and chief executive officer have stated that they will have to do that kind of thing under certain circumstances. That is fine. If they are on their own, let us see how they do on their own and how they cope with the problem of their capital expenditure commitment. The company has immense assets, but it may have to dispose of some. It may have to restructure. That is common in that industry and many companies, including one large one, Dome-Petroleum, have failed. That is not likely for Petro-Canada, although I guess anything is possible, but let us see how it operates for some time with private sector mandate and full public disclosure before it is privatized.

The answers given by the minister to questions raising these issues are that before the public offering is made there will have to be a prospectus which complies with various Canadian and probably the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission requirements. I accept that, and that is very good. However, Canada is not the usual vendor of shares. Others may disagree, but it seems to me that Canada has a much higher obligation to its purchasers than does the average seller of a company. I think that period of history with disclosure would be very helpful, and it would also give the market an opportunity to judge the effect over time of the public policy purposes on the company. It would also allow Canada and the company to wind up the public policy job that it was asked to do, before it is offered to the Canadian public.

The second point relates to management. Management is responsible to the board. There is a suggestion—and it was confirmed by the Minister of Energy when he appeared before us yesterday—that the board of Petro-Canada is to change. I do not raise this as a reflection on the current board—nor does anyone—but in 1988 the whole board did change. Perhaps that was to ensure that the new government's policy positions were well represented on the board. This committee's June 1990 report on Petro-Canada states that the company has had some 43 or 44 directors in 14 years. That is unusual.

If the government intends to put in place a different kind of board, it should do so now, not at the time of the initial public offering. That board should be in place for some reasonable period of time to see what its judgment on management is and how that changes the company, if it does, before it is sold to the public.

The last item is obvious—and I am sure would happen anyway—namely, that the sale to the public should not be contemplated until such time as energy markets now disrupted by the Persian Gulf crisis have stabilized. That is simply common sense.

The company will be new to the Canadian market and it is large. In informal discussions that I have had with investment dealers, counsellors and some of those who appeared before the committee, I am told that it will be difficult for them to assess the value of Petro-Canada. It will probably be done largely by a net tangible asset evaluation of some kind.

It will be difficult to value the company's underdeveloped land position, but that will have to be done. As an integrated company one of the things that would help would be good information for a period of time on a segregated basis—that is, downstream, segregated from upstream activity. We do not have that at this time. The way Petro-Canada has been reporting, we could not get that information, but we could get better information on Imperial and Shell because of the Securities Commission's filing requirements.

Honourable senators, I have gone on as long as I wish in explaining what it is that the report recommends and why. I hope that honourable senators on both sides will see this not just as a strict, ideological issue on either of our parts—that is, the government's part to privatize just for the sake of privatizing, or the opposition's part not to privatize because of a strong belief in public ownership.

Personally, I would be happy if the government just took a position on this; for example, if they said, "We are believers in the market and it ends there. Wherever that takes us, we go. We will not do anything." If they were to accept political responsibility for it, that would be fine. I, for one, would be in favour in letting them do what they want. But what is happening now is that they are saying, "We are looking after you, Canada. We believe in security of supply, R&D and all these things"; but they will not give us the meat of those statements. It is a legitimate thing for those of us in opposition to press the government hard to say "What is your real policy? What do you want to achieve so that Canadians can judge the government on that basis?" As it stands now they are receiving the benefit of being the good guys because they believe in all these things, yet they are not dealing with the pain of actually setting the objective and then stating how they will achieve their objective.

Reasonable objectives will cost money, but the government is prepared to spend money. Hibernia, the government's initial commitment to OSLO, the Lloydminster Upgrader, and the Vancouver Pipeline are all examples of the government's willingness to intervene and spend money.

In conclusion, I hope that we look at this on a non-partisan basis. On this side we are not saying, "Do not ever privatize Petro-Canada." That is not our position.

But I do not believe that the company is ready to be privatized at this time. Prior to privatization the government would be well advised to follow the recommendations of the committee with respect to the steps that should be taken to ensure we all understand the company better than we do now.

Honourable senators, I leave it with you. Hopefully, the report will pass. I appreciate the nature of this legislation. It goes back a long way. The government of the day is Progressive Conservative. It did not want Petro-Canada. It was an issue in the period of Mr. Clark's government in 1979 and it remains an issue. Personally, I hope that we are looking at this not on a political, partisan or ideological basis but, rather, on a pragmatic basis in terms of what best serves the Canadian interest. The Canadian economy cries out at this particular point in time for a sense of direction. That sense of direction can, in large part, be provided by the government of the day. One of the things that would help do that would be to flesh out the government's energy policy and to heed the recommendations of the energy committee's report.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I want to respond with a few words. I will not cover the matters covered by the chairman in the order in which he covered them, but I hope to cover them.

Before I get into details, however, I wish to associate myself with the chairman's comments of appreciation for the work of the staff and the witnesses. The witnesses were of a high quality. They were recommended by the chairman. They were well chosen and very balanced. The committee did a thorough, competent and thoughtful job. It was well-balanced.

I am glad that Senator Frith is back in the chamber, because I wanted him to hear this comment particularly. In my view, the work of the committee was carried on in the best traditions of senate committees—that is, in a totally non-partisan basis, the way that he knows I feel all activities in this chamber should be carried on.

Hon Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I hope that you bring a motion some day to state that we break down the entire party system in here and see what everyone says, including those here.

Senator Kelly: The vote in the committee was five to four. The fact that the five happened to be, incidentally, Liberals, and the four, incidentally, happened to be Conservatives should not be construed as being a partisan decision, because it was not. That was a total coincidence, and I want Senator Frith to know that.

Senator Frith: I will try very hard to do that so as not to construe it.

Senator Kelly: I am grateful that Senator Frith returned in time to hear my testimony on that fact.

I was part of the minority opinion contained at the bottom of the Senate report, and I wish to discuss some of the views that were not contained to any great extent in the report itself.

● (1430)

I apologize to the chairman for asking his indulgence in permitting me to do that. I should like to comment, first, on several points of detail that were discussed in the committee. Not too many were contained in the report, because we anticipated that we would be able to debate these things before the full chamber.

At the time we had the discussions many of the committee members were concerned that the privatization of Petro-Canada was, as some said, an irreversible step in dismantling a past and possibly future instrument for the implementation of government policy. Honourable senators, it should be pointed out that Petro-Canada has not been used as an instrument of public policy since 1985. It would be a tremendous misallocation of resources to hold on to a corporation that has been dormant as a public policy instrument on the off-chance that it may be reactivated at some point in some uncertain future. Furthermore, the privatization of Petro-Canada has no impact on the other regulatory, fiscal and public enterprise tools the government retains in its arsenal to effect public policy objectives. There also appears to be some apprehension among some committee members that the sale of shares in Petro-Canada will somehow cost the government or taxpayers money. As I understand it, the first tranche of shares will be treasury shares issued by Petro-Canada. They are not government-owned shares being resold. At least that is my understanding. Once Petro-Canada's treasury shares are sold, the government's shareholding position will be diluted to 85 per cent from 100 per cent.

To my admittedly more of an engineer's mind than an accountant's mind, this means the government will own 85 per cent of Petro-Canada, but that the net value of Petro-Canada has been increased by the infusion of equity from the sale of treasury shares. In effect, the government will own a smaller part of a larger pie.

Until we know what price the treasury shares will command on the market, we will not know the extent of the government's actual gain or loss. My suspicion is that in real terms either would be relatively small.

In subsequent tranches, government-held shares will be offered for resale.

Some committee members feared that if these shares were sold at below the value at which they are recorded in the government's accounts—in other words, their value prorated to the book value of Petro-Canada—somehow additional tax dollars would be required to make up the difference. I do not pretend to be an authority on accounting policy, and I am certainly no authority on government accounting policy, I understand from those who are that the committee's concern is misplaced.

As I understand it, because the privatization amounts to the sale of an asset that has already been paid for, any return generated by the sale less than the value carried on the government's books will require the government to record the loss by accounting entry, but it will have absolutely no impact on the government's cash requirements.

I cannot agree with the committee report that the government should unilaterally appoint a new board of directors as a precursor to privatization. I understand the point of view expressed by the chairman and others, but I cannot agree with it. I think this is something that should be left to the new shareholders, including the government as long as it is a shareholder, under the commonly accepted practices of any company under company law.

I must say I agree wholeheartedly with the committee report that the standard of disclosure for Petro-Canada should equal that of comparable publicly-traded companies. In fact, I have always believed that this should apply to all federal Crown corporations. I have never understood why a Crown corporation's disclosure to Parliament and to public is less than any publicly-traded company. I have never understood why a Crown corporation raising debt, for example, in United States markets sees no irony in providing a fuller disclosure to the American SEC and it feels obligated to provide to Canadian parliamentarians, the Canadian public or Canadian securities regulators.

In this regard, it is ironic that we should recognize that even the partial privatization of Petro-Canada will require it to meet higher standards of disclosure for two securities commissions in jurisdictions where shares are offered into its shareholding.

It is the central recommendation of the committee's report, however, to which I take exception. The committee report recommends that the privatization of Petro-Canada should be shelved until the government enunciates a comprehensive energy policy with particular attention to the issue of energy security. Several committee members were very frank and forthcoming in their view that this bill should be used as some form of hostage to get the government to respond to conclusions and recommendations than the committee's Petro-Canada report tabled in June, 1990, and the earlier report on energy options. I am one of those who believe firmly that the government should as a matter of course respond to conclusions and recommendations of committees of this Chamber, as it does with the standing committees in the other place. On the other hand, I believe in this instance the Minister of Energy did an excellent job of doing just that when he appeared before us yesterday. I believe the chairman of the committee had heard a statement of energy policy yesterday. I believe he has heard it before. What he is really saying is that he does not agree with that energy policy. Carried to its ultimate destination, I do not think he will be pleased until the energy policy stated by this government agrees with his energy policy. But, in my opinion, he heard an energy policy yesterday. I was there.

I do not believe it is proper to use Bill C-84 as leverage to force a government response to a committee report. That is my general position.

Let me explain why. Since Petro-Canada has not been an instrument of public policy since 1989, its privatization is essentially irrelevant in the context of the development of an energy policy, or in the context of energy self-sufficiency. I would also say this to the committee. Did the then Liberal government, if this is a partisan position—and I am not suggesting it is—embark on a comprehensive study or northern transportation when it announced the privatization of the Northern Transportation Company Limited in 1983? Did this or any other place demand a review of telecommunication policy prior to the privatization of Tele Globe? Did we demand a comprehensive transportation review before we embarked upon the privatization of Air Canada? Were we asked to? Did we look at the future structure and competitiveness of the munitions industry before we authorized the privatization of Canadian Arsenals? Of course we did not. There is even less reason to require or expect it in the case of Petro-Canada's privatization. Petro-Canada, as I have said before, has not been a public policy instrument for over half a decade.

I am puzzled by the committee's preoccupation with energy self-sufficiency. It comes down to how you look at the world, particularly the world in terms of energy. I take it from discussions and debate in committee that the majority of the committee members feel that we must be certain of self-sufficiency in oil and gas before we share our oil and gas output with other countries. To me, the snacks of a brand of isolation is in that is both passé and not appropriate when it comes to energy. We cannot isolate ourselves from the world, from world energy markets or the world-wide forces of energy supply and demand. We cannot and should not deprive other countries of our energy resources for strategic reasons. We abhor such practices when committed by the OPEP cartel. And, when taken to their extremes, such practices can lead to the sort of hostilities we witness today in the Persian Gulf.

We cannot and should not hoard our energy resources. We should make the most out of them. It is up to Canadian capital, Canadian initiative and Canadian entrepreneurship to maximize the value added Canada and Canadians realize from our energy resources. But to leave our energy resources in the ground, or to leave them undeveloped as a edge against the dim and uncertain future makes no economic sense. I believe that is morally and logically indefensible.

I know many of my friends opposite disagree with this view. I ask them how they would feel if the cue were on the other foot, if we had no oil and gas production, but say, for example, Mexico did. I have the feeling we would be arguing, at least on moral grounds, that energy is an essential and global resource. That is where I certainly stand on the whole question of self-sufficiency. Self-sufficiency in itself is not appropriate given the way in which nature has spread these resources throughout the world.

Honourable senators, I have said my piece, I urge that Bill C-84 be passed without delay so that the government may proceed with the privatization of Petro-Canada when market conditions for the privatization are most favourable.

● (1440)

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Kelly a question, which will give me an opportunity to clarify a point. He said that I did not agree with the energy policy of the government, as articulated by the minister. The frustrating thing is that I do agree with it, but I do not know what it is other than in an abstract sense.

Let me ask the honourable senator the same question I asked the minister. It appears from his remarks that this would not matter to him; but at what level of self-sufficiency, if any, would he have concern about Canadian energy security—50 per cent, 40 per cent—bearing in mind that the U.S. are very alarmed at 50 per cent?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I have difficulty trying to project myself into what the government response would be to that question. I can give you my own, but Senator Hays and I look at the world differently. I could well be wrong.

We should be participating in a discussion on the world energy. How are we going to see to it that all of the areas of the world will have sufficient gas and oil, which is the fundamental energy that drives the industry and keeps the market system moving? I have difficulty coming to a figure in terms of where we are, because it is not that easy.

For example, if we consider that today we are very wasteful of energy, we would say that our needs over the next several years will be so much. At the same time, I would recognize that some scarcity every now and again might move us faster into the development of alternate energy sources. It might make us turn down our thermostats. I do not want to see us preserving the level of use that we have now, because it will not only be bad for us but it will be bad for the rest of the energy-consuming world.

When we have the resources that we have—nature gave us a lot—we feel it is our right to waste it, because it is ours. It is not that simple. That is why I cannot answer the honourable senator's question directly.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to say that I am going to be very brief, perhaps less than five minutes. I have to tell Senator Kelly that it is exceedingly tempting to rebut his speech. There are many things to which he asserted in his speech that recent history in the last 15 years has proven absolutely wrong.

Senator Frith: Partisanly wrong or non-partisanly wrong?

Senator Olson: Absolutely wrong. If we privatize Petro-Canada and sell off the one Canadian company left that is large enough to carry out some of the projects that we know have to be carried out in Canada if we are going to have a respectable amount of gas and oil production in Canada from Canadian resources—

Senator Barootes: Such as Hibernia.

Senator Olson: Yes, Hibernia, the Beaufort Sea and the tar sands are the three major resources that we have left in Canada to develop. The western Canadian sedimentary basin is still producing respectfully, but it is starting to decline. There have not been any major finds of additional oil. There have been some gas finds recently, but there has not been what the industry refers to as an elephant—that is a big oil field—in the last 15 or 20 years. That is a fairly good indication that we have probably found all there is.

There will be many small oil fields found, which will help to keep up the production. However, the production of oil out of that basin is declining at approximately 100,000 barrels per day per year. That has to be made up somehow.

Honourable senators, we know that we have the resources in Canada to do it. We have Hibernia, the area off Nova Scotia, and particularly the Beaufort Sea. Even more important, there are the reserves in the tar sands of Alberta. We know there are 900 billion barrels of oil there; but it takes large investments of capital for the processing plants, along with a long lead time, to bring that oil into the consumer stream. No one in the oil business would argue with that.

[Senator Kelly.]

There are only three oil companies left in Canada that are big enough to take on these jobs—Imperial Oil, Exxon or Shell. It requires an investment of $5 billion to $6 billion at a time, and that $5 billion or $6 billion has to be invested with a lead time of at least six years from the time the decision is made to go ahead with it until oil is coming out through that processing plant. They are not doing that. How are we going to get this done unless we depend on some international or multinational—whatever you want to call them these days—oil companies to do it? There certainly are not any Canadian companies besides Petro-Canada that are large enough to take on those kinds of investments, along with the risk.

That is why I believe we should keep Petro-Canada in its present form. Senator Kelly gave the excuse that it has not been used as an instrument of government policy for the last seven years—not since 1984 anyway. That does not say there is anything wrong with Petro-Canada and its capability to do that. That is a mismanagement policy on the part of the government. Right now we should be building tar sands processing plants. We should be bringing one on about every 18 months, with a capacity of something over 100,000 barrels per day. We have not brought one in since 1984. We have not even started one since 1984. That is not a good reason; that is just fobbing off mismanagement by the government to develop Canadian resources.

I know that that oil is more costly than buying offshore oil at the present time. Senator Kelly has a point of view and says that we are better off to buy offshore oil. He must have forgotten what happened in the crunch of the late 1970s and the first year of the 1980s. We were pleading to get some of these countries to sell oil under the quotas they had to sell. I remember that. The price went up and there was real concern in this country that we were not going to have enough. So we did embark on a policy of developing more Canadian resources.

We need a Canadian oil company. We need one that can properly be used as an instrument of government policy to bring on the resources in Canada.

• (1450)

I should just interject here to say that the minute we sell any shares, even the 15 per cent that is called for as the first tranche in this bill, then that will be the end of using it as an instrument of government policy. The shareholders would very properly expect the federal government not to use it for that purpose because their purpose is to make some earnings on their investment.

In conclusion, I just want to say that it is a serious mistake, one that I am sure we are going to regret sometime in the future, whether it is five years or ten years down the road.

The other thing is that you cannot put together another one because there is not enough left of the Canadian oil and gas structure, even if you were to get a lot of little Canadian companies together to try to organize a large company. We have Exxon or Imperial Oil out there, along with what they acquired of Texaco. They were the two biggest and now it is one. There is Shell Oil out there, and it is a fairly big company. Certainly, they could do it, but they may or may not. I do not think either of those would be willing to take such long-term risks with their capital.

So, we will regret it. However, I hope that the sales between now and when the government is changed will be small enough that we can get most of Petro-Canada back and use it for the purpose for which it was designed, in the interest of Canadians, to have a secure and stable energy system. Thank you.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, if I may be allowed to make a brief intervention, I do not think we have had sufficient discussion in the Senate on what I consider to be a very important element of the committee's report, and that is item 3 which says, "privatization should not be contemplated until such time as energy markets, now disrupted by the Persian Gulf Crisis, have stabilized."

It seems to me that that is a very real concern. When this legislation was proposed, and the whole idea of privatizing Petro-Canada was being developed, there was no immediacy of a Gulf crisis or a potential disruption of world oil supplies, which could have a devastating effect on the whole world and on Canada in particular. It seems to me that it would be very prudent for the government to accept a recommendation, such as proposed in this committee report, to delay, for at least six months, the implementation of this legislation that would end up privatizing Petro-Canada.

Senator Olson has said that 15 per cent does not seem like much, but he is absolutely correct in saying that, once 15 per cent is in the hands of the general public, shareholders of the company will quite properly insist that their interests must be represented, and, as such, Petro-Canada would not be in a position to be an instrument of government policy or to be a stabilizing influence on the energy situation in this country as it potentially could be under its present set-up. For that reason, if for no other, it seems to me that this chamber should support the committee's report. Anything can happen in the next six months. Who knows what the result to energy supplies will be of the hostilities that are occurring in what is probably the most volatile area of the world?

So, in my short intervention, I am asking all senators, perhaps especially those who oppose the committee's report—only because delay seems to me most sensible and most protective for the interests of this country—to accept a delay of six months in the implementation of this legislation.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I listened with interest especially to the point made by Senator Olson that what we need in Canada is more of what the oilmen call "elephant hunting", that this situation can only be secured if, indeed, we have a government-owned oil company such as Petro-Canada, and that, for that reason, there should be no sale of the shares of that company.

It seems to me that, if that were true, the mistake that was made was not made at the time that it was determined, I believe in 1984 or 1985, that Petro-Canada should not be an instrument of government policy. The mistake was made at the time that Petro-Canada was permitted to be an integrated oil company. It was not involved just in the exploration side of the business. It went out with the avowed intent, through the acquisition of other companies, through the acquisition of refineries and through the acquisition and building of marketing outlets, to take at least 15 per cent of the market. At that point it became subject, in my judgment, to the financial disciplines that would apply to any company that is in a competitive retail market. If our intention, when Petro-Canada was first formed, was to secure energy supply and to allow a company with government backing to have enough capital in order to go "elephant hunting", and to go up on to the North Slope or to Hibernia and put billions of dollars into projects, then we should never have permitted Petro-Canada to be in the refining and marketing business. The day we did that, we lost that option. We had to have financial reality determine the policy of Petro-Canada.

Perhaps there is something to be said, as Senator Hays says, for security of supply. I am not sure. It is perhaps just as well to talk about comparative advantage. However, if there is a good argument for concern about security of supply, then I would suggest to honourable senators that Petro-Canada should not be the instrument of that policy. It should come from government policy itself. In other words, it can invite other people and other organizations to come in and take part in joining in the security of Canadian supply.

I do agree with the report's recommendation that better financial information be supplied by Petro-Canada; but, surely to goodness, that will be part of the process of marketing the shares that are going to be sold to the public. I do not think there is any need to delay the sale of the shares of Petro-Canada while that better financial reporting is done. The shares will not sell unless there is improved financial information.

I see no reason for the suggestion, for example, that the new board be in place before the shares are sold. If the company is privatized, then it will be up to the shareholders themselves to determine who is on the board. Far better to leave it until we are at the point where the shares are being sold. As to the loss on the government books by the sale of the shares, I do know something about government accounting and that loss will not show up because we account on a cash basis. The investment in Petro-Canada is gone, written off, not carried as an asset on the books of the government. There will be no cash loss. In fact, in selling shares, there will be cash income.

• (1500)

We come to the final argument that the reason for delaying passage of the bill is to wait until the energy markets stabilize due to the Persian Gulf disruption. I do not think that is a reason for not passing this bill. That may be a reason for not putting the tranche forward for sale to the public. It may be a reason, but not for not passing the bill. The bill can be passed now; and, if the energy situation in the Persian Gulf makes it uneconomical to put shares out to the public, then that can be delayed until a proper time is available, which I am sure would be determined by the underwriters.

Looking at the committee report, I find that no case has been made for a delay in this legislation in any one of the areas raised by the committee, although I think it is an excellent report. Honourable senators, it is my belief that the bill should be passed now.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Hays: I wonder if Senator Everett would permit a brief question. The Government of Canada has recently completed a privatization, namely, Air Canada. It deals with a different sector, but recently I read an article in the Globe and Mail report on the business magazine section which I think is devastating. The Chief Executive Office of the company said they were not ready to go private. What a miserable time for the current shareholders to find that out!

It seems to me—and I would like Senator Everett's reaction—that those are the kinds of things to be avoided, especially by the Government of Canada. If Canada were a business in the market, it would be "buyer beware." But there is a magic or cachet to Air Canada. There is the same kind of potential euphoria for Petro-Canada, particularly with respect to its employees. I do not know whether or not Senator Everett read that article, but I wonder if he is persuaded that there should be no question about Petro-Canada being ready to go private and that it be well understood before it occurs, using Air Canada as an example of moving too hastily.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I think that is a risk anyone takes who goes to the public market. One can go at the wrong time and one will suffer the consequences as a result. I would hope, in the case of Petro-Canada, that the 15 per cent tranche is sold at the right time. I did read the article on Air Canada, and I am not certain that the case was well made that the problems they had were due to going public at the time they did. Surely to goodness the important issue is that we are passing a bill that makes it possible for stock to be sold and the company to be privatized at the right time. We are not saying the government should do it now; we are giving the government authority to do it at the right time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Hays, seconded by the Honourable Senator Graham, that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Let the doors be opened.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I declare the report rejected.

Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, is it possible that I could suggest, with leave, now?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): There are some bills left over until tomorrow. What is the point?

Senator Kelly: It is not because I am trying to get out tonight, I just think it would be nice to do it.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Kelly's honesty and candour is very disarming, but not sufficiently disarming. I think we should go by the rules.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Atkins that this bill be referred to the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: I would like to note, honourable senators, that there is a distinction between this and the Broadcasting Act, because in this case there was not the difficulty in interpreting the committee's report.

On motion of Senator Kelly, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

ABORTION BILL

THIRD READING—DEBATE CONTINUED—MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED—MOTION FOR THIRD READING NEGATIVED

On the Order:

Resuming debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips, for the third reading of the Bill C-43, An Act respecting Abortion.—(Honourable Senator Phillips).

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, before we proceed with the debate on third reading there are several amendments to consider. It is moved by the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips, that Bill C-43, respecting abortion, be read the third time.

There were motions in amendment thereto and by agreement of the Senate, the vote was deferred to this time this day. I will now proceed with the first amendment.

• (1530)

Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Kirby, seconded by the Honourable Senator Neiman:

> That Bill C-43 be not now read the third time but that clause 1 of the bill at page 2 thereof be amended by adding, immediately after line 8, the following:
> (4) No proceedings for an offence under this section may be instituted without the consent of the Attorney General of Canada.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Let the doors of the chamber be locked.

Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Kirby, seconded by the Honourable Senator Neiman, that Bill C-43 be not now read the third time but that clause 1 of the bill, at page 2 thereof, be amended by adding, immediately after line 8, the following:

> "(4) No proceedings for an offence under this section may be instituted without the consent of the Attorney General of Canada."

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the vote is taken I would like to note that this is supposed to be a free vote. The doors have been locked. We should not require the whips to come down the aisle for every vote. Let us vote on whatever there is to vote upon. It is not a party-line vote. Let us get the voting done.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: The rule book states specifically that the vote will be taken after the whips come—

Senator Frith: You are the last one who should be raising that point.

An Hon. Senator: When did you find that rule?

Senator Frith: Nice try, but not even close to a cigar.

Senator Barootes: You are not going to lock us out, are you?

Senator Frith: I am trying to lock you in, senator, not out.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I thought, when I proposed that it would not be necessary to call in the members, that the question would be put. Your Honour need simply say, "All those in favour of the amendment will please rise." We assume that all honourable senators have been called in.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, that was the opinion of Senator Frith. It was not the opinion of those on this side of the house.

Senator Frith: It was certainly not just my opinion. There was very strong agreement from both sides.

Senator Murray: There may be someone out there trying to get in.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I thought it was the order of the house that we were to vote at 3 p.m. on the amendments to the bill. The bells have rung. Is that not why we are here?

Senator Frith: The rule does not say anything about calling in the members. It simply states: "upon the request of two senators", which is what we have had. It does not say anything about calling in the members.

We are here. Two honourable senators have risen. The rule states that you, Your Honour, should call for a standing vote.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment negatived.

● (1610)

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Haidasz P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Corbin:

That Clause 1 of Bill C-43 at pages 1 and 2 thereof be amended by striking out section 287 as set out in that clause and substituting therefor the following:

Abortion or induction of miscarriage

287.(1) Every person who by any instrument or by any drug or poison or by any means causes with intent the death of a nascent human being is guilty of an offense commonly called "abortion" and is liable on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years.

Medical introduction to deliver

(2) A procedure to deliver a child prior to term from its mother's womb is not an offence under section 287 when the procedure is performed with every precaution available to medicine to preserve the life of the nascent human being throughout the procedure by or under the direction of a medical practitioner who in good faith has formed the veritable medical opinion that the life of the mother is endangered by a condition of health that is complicated by the condition of pregnancy.

Definitions

(3) For the purposes of this section and for the purposes of this Act,

"medical practitioner" means, in respect of a medical intervention performed in a province, a person who is lawfully permitted to practice obstetrical or gynecological medicine in that province;

"medical opinion" means a medical assessment of the mother's situation which is formed using generally accepted standards of the medical profession and based on verifiable medical evidence;

"deliver a child" means to undertake a procedure to bring forth the nascent human being by surgical or chemical means, abdominally or vaginally, or by severence of the fallopian tube in the event of ectopic pregnancy in accordance with standard medical practice;

"mother" means the female person whose body produced the ovum that generated the nascent human being, or when that female person is not recognized in law, the person who is pregnant with the nascent human being;

"nascent human being" means the living product of a union of a human spermatozoon and a human ovum.

"life" means the state that belongs to one or more products of conception by human beings in such manner as produces, when not interrupted, the living state of every human being defined at Section 223 of this Act."

"living" means existing in the state of life."

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, pursuant to rule 49(5), the bill has been defeated.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn:

That the privileges of Honourable Senators having been constantly abused by the Speaker of the Senate, the Senate do advise the Prime Minister that Senator Guy Charbonneau is unfit to continue to be the Speaker of the Senate.—(Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax)).

Hon. Anne Cools: Honourable senators, Senator MacDonald had moved the adjournment. He indicated to me that he would yield to me, but he is not here at this time.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): There is no problem with that, Senator Cools. The order can still stand in his name. Please go ahead.

• (1630)

Senator Cools: Honourable senators, I hope that I can match a little of the interest and the fervour that has just been experienced by most of us. I think some of us need a few minutes to settle down. In any event, it is my understanding that the Senate has just defeated Bill C-43, so perhaps I can be the first to call attention to that fact.

The immediate order of business before us is the motion of censure of Senator Charbonneau. As we all know, Senator Charbonneau has, in the minds of many on our side, acted quite inappropriately. The wording of the motion calls upon Senator Charbonneau, essentially, to resign. In actual fact, the motion articulates the wish that the Prime Minister be advised that Senator Charbonneau should not be in the position of Speaker of the Senate.

I should like to say, honourable senators, that for the past many weeks we have all observed Senator Charbonneau smarting under his own mischief. We have all been aware for quite a few years that Senator Charbonneau was not in his strongest field of endeavour as Speaker of the Senate, but many of us overlooked it, or forgave it, because many of us—or at least I did—felt that Senator Charbonneau was a very fine gentleman.

Honourable senators, I should like to share with you a story which indicates the opinion that I had formed of Senator Charbonneau—until the GST debate. Some years ago, soon after I came to the Senate, a woman came to visit me with her daughter. I proceeded to show this friend of mine and her daughter the Senate. In the process of doing so, this woman said to her daughter, "Your grandfather walked through these halls. Your grandfather worked in these halls." Of course, I automatically inquired of these persons as to who the grandfather, or perhaps it was the great-grandfather, was. I was told that the notable person was C.D. Howe. Having acquired this information, I was, of course, seized with some excitement and some fervour and proceeded to acquire a great more zeal in showing the descendants of this most remarkable Canadian around the Senate.

Honourable senators, I charged into the Speaker's chambers, very excited that this child was visiting, and I wanted to introduce her to some of the senators. I want to let honourable senators know that Senator Charbonneau responded with tremendous grace and magnanimity. He was very pleasant and very nice. That, for me, was my formative impression of Senator Charbonneau: a very nice man, not too up on the rules and procedures, but fundamentally a nice man. At least, honourable senators, so I thought.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Honourable senators, it is with some considerable disappointment that I feel I must join with those who consider that a motion of censure should be passed on him.

I should like to refer very briefly to the famous, or rather infamous, letter of December 10, 1990, whereby I believe 54 honourable senators from the other side sent to Speaker Charbonneau. Clearly, it is not a letter, because if one examines it one sees very clearly that there is not a single signature on the letter. As a matter of fact, if one probes a little deeper one discovers that, in point of fact, there is a list of signatures somehow or other stapled to this letter, but the letter, in and of itself, is not signed. There is nothing whatever to relate the list of signatures to the letter. I find that very interesting because I was under the impression that we, as parliamentarians, having before us a particular forum, used particular instruments, and the instruments that we used were parliamentary instruments, such as motions and inquiries and resolutions. They are part and parcel of our parliamentary tradition. The letter is, to my mind, quite a new phenomenon.

What I am about to say may be a little novel to some honourable senators, but my opinion is that, in point of fact, that communication was not a letter to Speaker Charbonneau at all. It was, rather, a very thinly-veiled petition. It was a petition to the Speaker. However, the Speaker, within our system, has no authority whatsoever to receive a petition from members of the Senate. Senator Charbonneau, in receiving this letter, and in acting according to its instructions, has done a most interesting thing. He has usurped the Throne. It is the Governor General of Canada who is authorized to receive petitions or expressions of wishes from honourable senators. It is very interesting because, while I know that this government currently is seized of repudiating many of the principles of responsible government, it is my understanding that the Speaker of the Senate has no authority whatsoever to receive petitions from honourable senators.

Honourable senators, I would just like to—

Senator Simard: Conclude?

Senator Cools: No, no, Senator Simard. You are like a mosquito. I should like to tell you, Senator Simard, there are in the West Indies and in tropical climates things called mosquito nets. These mosquito nets are fine, gossamer-like, almost invisible, but they have the effect of keeping mosquitos at bay. Frequently, Senator Simard, you remind me of a mosquito around a mosquito net.

Senator Simard: Come back to Canada!

Senator Cools: Don't worry about that! I am here and I am not leaving.

Honourable senators, I should like to be very clear because this current government has demonstrated on many occasions that it has no compunction about intruding into authority and the powers of the Governor General and the two Speakers. This government has no regard for any opinion other than the opinion of one man, that man being the Prime Minister.

On the question of the motion, of course, I would like to place on the record a couple of thoughts. First, those of us on this side who are speaking to this order have maintained that our privileges as members of Parliament have been seriously violated. We are maintaining that our privileges have been trampled upon.

● (1640)

In the various actions taken by Senator Charbonneau, I would say that he trampled on our privileges in an important way. This question of privileges, honourable senators, is something that has troubled legislatures in colonial countries. For example, in Canada the term "House of Commons" is used to describe the lower house. It is the only lower house in all of the Commonwealth countries and empires that actually uses the name "House of Commons." There were reasons why the Imperial authorities agreed that the House of Commons could be so named and titled.

The question of our privileges in this chamber are not determined by the Speaker of this chamber; they are not determined by the wish or whim of any government. They are determined by the Constitution Act of 1867. I will put section 18 of the Constitution Act on the record. Under the heading "Legislative Power" it states:

> The privileges, immunities, and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and by the Members thereof respectively, shall be such as are from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, but so that any Act of the Parliament of Canada defining such privileges, immunities, and powers shall not confer any privileges, immunities, or powers exceeding those at the passing of such Act held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the Members thereof.

To some in this chamber that might seem esoteric, but to others it seems inexorable and inevitable. The fact of the matter is that the question of the privileges of the members of the Parliament of Canada was one of tremendous conflict and problem. It was thought to have been resolved by section 18 of the Constitution Act. In other words, Speaker Charbonneau, as has this government for some time, keeps trying to amend and alter the Constitution and the powers of the Senate at their own wish and whim. This matter was settled.

I would like to put another piece of information on the record. Sometimes these things may seem intellectually trying. They are not. They are there for all of us. I would like to put on the record a quotation that I took from a legal opinion which was given to Lord Bathurst in the year 1815 from His Lordship's most obedient servants, Garrow and Shepherd. This legal opinion is entitled "The Opinion on the Privileges of the House of Assembly and on the Casting Vote of the Speaker of the Legislative Council." Honourable senators should remember that the issue I am discussing is the question of the privileges of senators and the attempts to resolve those unsettled questions by including them in the Constitution Act. I quote from this legal opinion to Lord Bathurst as follows:

> In answer to the second question, "Whether the Assembly is entitled to all the Privileges to which the House of Commons of the imperial Parliament are entitled under their own peculiar Law, the Lex Parliamentaria".
> We beg to report, that we think they are not so entitled. The Privileges of the High Court of Parliament composed of the King, The Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons of the Realm, are founded on the ancient law and Custom of Parliament and we conceive arise from the supremacy, or as it is sometimes called, the omnipotence of this High Court when the Parliament or great Council of the Nation thus composed sat together in one Assembly; Tho' the period when the two houses separated in their sittings, is not ascertained, yet whenever that event took place, each house retained certain privileges and powers; The Lords the judicial power; the Commons the power of accusation and impeachment.

It goes on and on. This legal opinion, on which Lord Bathurst relied heavily, clearly delineates the position that legislatures in the colonies did not have the privileges of the legislatures of England.

I think it is important to continue that train of thought because during that time in history—this is pre-Confederation—the legislatures were preoccupied with these questions, just as they were preoccupied with the questions of the "financial powers" of the upper chamber.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Senator Cools, please forgive me for interrupting. Honourable senators, I should like His Honour the Speaker to apply Rule 16(c), please.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I have been asked by an honourable senator to apply Rule 16(c), which reads:

> . . . if senators have occasion to speak together, they shall go below the Bar, otherwise the Speaker shall stop the business under discussion.

Senator Doody: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I remind honourable senators of Rule 16(c).

Senator Cools: I thank honourable Senator Corbin for his intervention. I was so preoccupied that I had not noticed that other activities were taking place.

Returning to my point, Lord Bathurst and others at the time relied on these opinions. At the time of the discussion of Confederation detente, so to speak, these matters were thought to have been resolved by the express articulation of the Constitution Act, 1867, the then BNA Act.

● (1650)

In respect of Speaker Charbonneau's activities and behaviour, one matter that has perturbed me very deeply is that the Speaker, like this government, has been reluctant to obtain the advice of the Senate. Every bill that comes before us states that passage is with the advice and consent of the Senate. I have done a little work trying to ascertain the precise meaning of "advice", the definition of responsible government, and the taking of advice. Certainly, advice is not a command; advice is not a whim. The Prime Minister just does not "feel like" doing something and proceeds to give instructions to the Governor General. Advice has particular meanings. I am not going into those definitions, but I would like to put on the record the fact that Speaker Charbonneau, in his activities over the last several months leading up to the introduction of Senator Stanbury's motion, was consistently reluctant to take the advice of the Senate.

We may observe, for example, that many of Speaker Charbonneau's rulings over the past few years—and I have taken the time to go back and read a few—along with the Speaker's rulings in the other place, show consistent attempts to degrade the rights of the Senate under consistent citations of sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution Act. Well, honourable senators, the Senate has spoken on that issue. Had the Speaker of this chamber taken the advice of the Senate and of honourable senators, he would have researched to ascertain exactly what the opinions of senators were on some of these matters. Speaker Charbonneau has consistently refused to take the advice of the Senate—such advice as, for example, the famous Ross Report. In that report, Senator Ross clearly delineated the powers of the Senate regarding those sections of the Constitution. Senator Ross was a Conservative. He was the Leader of the Government here in the Senate around 1918.

It is unfortunate that Speaker Charbonneau is not in the Chair today because it would have been nice, I thought, to see him and to share with him some of these ideas. He is not here—so be it. In any event, on that matter he did not take the advice of the Senate.

Another area in which Speaker Charbonneau has been reluctant to listen to the Senate is that of the use of section 26, invoked for the appointment of what we on this side in recent months have learned to call the "swamp" senators. Had Speaker Charbonneau attempted to ascertain what senators' opinions were on that action or on similar actions, he would have discovered that in 1877 the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Senate moved and passed a motion of censure—they called it a want of confidence—against Alexander Mackenzie's government. That is interesting because at that time it was a Tory-dominated Senate.

I should like to put on the record the fact that in 1873, when Alexander Mackenzie attempted to have Lord Dufferin recommend that section 26 be invoked for the purposes of essentially swamping the Senate, his request was ignored. The literature basically says that Lord Dufferin put the request in his pocket and waited for an election. But the important point that I am making is that when the request went forward to Lord Kimberley, the then Secretary of State for the Colonies, he was crystal clear on why he would not give advice to Her Majesty on the question of the appointment of more senators. I shall read from his dispatch exactly what Lord Kimberley stated:

> You will readily understand that Her Majesty could not be advised to take the responsibility of interfering with the Constitution of the Senate, except upon an occasion when it had been made apparent that a difference had arisen between the two Houses of so serious and permanent a character, that the Government could not be carried on without Her intervention, and when it could be shown that the limited creation of Senators allowed by the Act would apply an adequate remedy.

This is important, honourable senators. Lord Kimberley was saying that no one, but no one, was to interfere with the Constitution of the Senate. At the time, Senator Campbell and Senator Wilmot were so seized of Lord Kimberley's resolve that they moved a motion in this chamber in support of him and in tremendous condemnation of the government of the day. That government had made a request, but no action followed. No action was taken. The Senate at that time censured the government—never mind the Speaker—for what turns out to have been a thought, because no action was taken.

I think Speaker Charbonneau could have equipped himself to some degree with the history of the Senate, with what I would call advice, the collective historical racially unconscious mind of the Senate as it has worked for 123 years until now. That is what "the advice of the Senate" means—the advice of the Senate as responsible government. It means carrying through, from generation to generation, those fine thoughts and principles that have made everything vital and all systems come alive.

Honourable senators, I should like to repeat that the motion was made by the Honourable Mr. Campbell, the then Leader of the Government in the Senate, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Wilmot, who was somewhat unique because he was the only member of the Senate chamber who actually took part in the conference on that issue of the deadlock clause.

Senator Corbin: He was from New Brunswick.

Senator Cools: Yes, he was. These are very important men. I shall read from that resolution, which is to be found at page 130 of the Debates of the Senate in the year 1877:

> The Honourable Mr. Campbell moved, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Wilmot,
> To Resolve, 1st. That by the 26th clause of the British North American Act, 1867, Her Majesty the Queen is empowered at any time in her discretion, and upon the recommendation of the Governor General, to direct that three or six Members be added to this House, provided that the persons so summoned to a seat therein represent equally the three divisions of Canada.

Honourable senators, this resolution has five segments to it and I will read what, to my mind, is the important clause. It is as follows:

> The House desires to express its high appreciation of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in refusing to advise an Act for which no Constitutional reason could be offered; and to record their opinion that any addition to the Senate under the provisions of the 26th clause of the British North America Act which is not absolutely necessary for the purpose of bringing this House into accord with the House of Commons, in the event of an actual > collision of a serious and permanent character, would be an infringement of the constitutional independence of the Senate, and lead to a depreciation of its utility as a constituent part of the Legislature.

Honourable senators, the behaviour of Speaker Charbonneau, when he squirrelled these eight senators off to be sworn in some hidden place, in 1877 would have resulted in a vote on and the passage of a very strong condemnation of the government. That would have happened if there had even been the thought of altering the Constitution and the composition of the Senate. In 1873, when Alexander Mackenzie asked for six senators, he was met with refusal by Lord Kimberley and the Queen. The Senate censured Alexander Mackenzie.

Honourable senators, Senator Pitfield has been quoted time and time again, and I do not want to repeat his remarks, about collusion and cooperation; but I would like to say that I found it especially disturbing that the Speaker worked industriously to decline the advice of the Senate. I am now, in particular, speaking of the advice given by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, Senator Buckwold.

Honourable senators, committees of Parliament were first seen as a very novel innovation. The original concept of committees came from Sir Erskine May. The actual creation of standing committees came as part of the sweeping reforms of William Gladstone.

For the last hundred years or so, committees of both houses of Parliament have been viewed as somewhat sacrosanct and as the mechanism whereby each and every item, order and bill undergoes serious and intense study. I found it most striking that 25 new senators were appointed to this chamber and most did not even pretend to know what was contained in Bill C-62. They did not even try to convince us that they had studied the bill or the issues contained in it; nor did they attempt to give the Senate advice. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce had referred to it Bill C-62 and, in obedience to that Order, it studied the bill and did all of the things that such a committee is empowered to do. Senator Charbonneau, as Speaker of this house had no regard whatsoever for the work of that committee, for the advice of that committee, and for the fact that that committee had received and executed its instructions from the Senate.

Honourable senators, I should like to put on the record a quotation from a gentleman who was formerly viewed as one of the preeminent experts on the procedure of committees. I am speaking of Sir Reginald Palgrave. On the subject of a committee of a house of Parliament and its purpose, he said:

> The assistance of those who appoint the Committee is its legitimate function. And this assistance is generally rendered by the conduct of an inquiry through the reception of evidence, the drafting of a document, or the consideration of papers referred to the Committee.

Honourable senators, Senator Charbonneau had no interest whatsoever in hearing the advice of that committee or in receiving the assistance of that committee.

Honourable senators, much has been said about Senator Charbonneau and his transgressions. In point of fact, so much has been said that few transgressions have been overlooked. However, I want to put on the record what I felt was one quite flagrant transgression, so that one more will join those that have already been considered.

Senator Charbonneau assisted the government and denied the Senate on the occasion when he broke rule 57 of the Rules of the Senate. That rule states:

> When a bill has been read a third time it shall be deemed to have been passed by the Senate and there shall be no further debate or amendment.

Honourable senators, I served on the special committee, chaired by my colleague Senator Hebert, for the purpose of studying Bill C-21 to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. I was appalled by the manner in which the Speaker of the House of Commons was used to re-open debate in that house on that bill. I was appalled by the political support the Speaker of the House of Commons gave to the government in what was, if not an irregular procedure, at least an unusual one. Honourable senators, I was even more appalled when the debate on Bill C-62 was reopened in this chamber. That could not have happened without Senator Charbonneau's compliance, because he has served the Prime Minister quite well and loyally. I want the record to add to the list of Senator Charbonneau's transgressions his transgression of rule 57 by allowing the debate here on Bill C-21 to be reopened.

● (1710)

There are a few other things that Senator Charbonneau has done that have bothered me. I was genuinely scandalized by statements made by the Honourable Ministers Jelinek and André. Those statements were so evidently contemptuous of all of us, and so evidently in contemptuous of the Senate, that I was amazed that Senator Charbonneau never raised an objection. In point of fact, ruling after ruling in the Senate chamber reflected his thoughts and his sentiments. I must state that I did not enjoy being slandered by Minister Jelinek. However, I will not repeat the statements since I think the point has been made.

The mood in the Senate is not what it used to be, and probably may never be again. That has been jolting to me and to my sensibilities. I want to be crystal clear to honourable senators that Senator Charbonneau, as Speaker of this chamber, has not only ignored the advice of the Senate but has also transgressed the "rule of law."

The "rule of law" is not a rule; or a law. One cannot say that one has broken this rule or this law. It is a way of thinking, a way of interpreting the world. The "rule of law" is a moral and ethical system of social and political organization and behaviour. It is a way of life in short contrast to primitive, primordial impulses. I would like to put on the record a definition of the rule of law, and it reads as follows:

> Rule of law. A concept of the utmost importance but having no defined, nor readily definable, content. It implies the subordination of all authorities, legislative, executive, judicial, and other to certain principles which would generally be accepted as characteristic of law, such as the ideas of the fundamental principles of justice, moral principles, fairness and due process. It implies respect for the supreme value and dignity of the individual.

It implies limitations on legislative power and safeguards against abuses of executive power.

I was very struck last Friday when we had a repetition of a speaker interventing. This time the transgressor was Senator Bélisle. I was mystified that, at that time, Senator Murray got to his feet and disputed with Senator Frith on the issue of the Speaker of the Senate's ability and power to intervene in matters of order. Senator Murray said that opinion was divided; Senator Frith asserted that opinion was not divided, that opinion was quite clear that the Speaker of the Senate had no authorized role as the Speaker in these matters.

I did a little work, honourable senators, and I discovered that until quite recently Senator Charbonneau also shared the view that a Speaker had no special powers to intervene. I would like to read a quotation from Erskine May which was used by Senator Charbonneau in one of his rulings. This quotation from Erskine May summarizes everything and speaks in the most poignant way to the problem we have had in this chamber. The following statement is from Erskine May and it was quoted by Senator Charbonneau:

> Erskine May notes that "in the enforcement of rules for maintaining order, the Speaker of the Lords has no more authority than any other Lord, except so far as his own personal weight and dignity of his office may give effect to his opinions and secure the concurrence of the House. As a consequence, the responsibility for maintaining order during debate rests with the House as a Whole. The Leader of the House has a special part to play on expressing the sense of the House and in drawing attention to cases where the rules of procedure have been transgressed or abused".

The issue for many of us on this side of the chamber is precisely what Erskine May stated: no more authority except insofar as the Speaker's own personal weight and dignity of his office. I think that has been a little bit of the fault, the question of the weight and dignity of Senator Charbonneau.

Honourable senators, the hour is drawing a little late, so I would move the adjournment of this debate.

Senator Doody: I thought we had an understanding that Senator MacDonald would get the adjournment back when Senator Cools—

Senator Frith: When she is finished.

Senator Doody: I see. When Senator Cools is finished tomorrow, or whatever.

[Senator Cools.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I think Senator MacDonald agreed to yield to anyone who wanted to speak. We have not forgotten that he did yield and it did stand in his name.

Senator Doody: That is right.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I believe this stands in the name of Honourable Senator MacDonald.

Senator Frith: No, Senator Cools.

Senator Doody: Senator Cools has adjourned the debate in her name because she is not finished.

On motion of Senator Cools, debate adjourned.

BROADCASTING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION FOR THIRD READING—SPEAKER'S RULING

• (1720)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Before we proceed to other business, honourable senators, I am prepared to give a ruling on the matter that was raised earlier today. As I make this ruling, I am conscious of a statement that was made about a speaker at one time. He said that there is no telling what happens when you put a hat and a gown on a fellow. He thinks he becomes an instant expert.

With that statement in mind, I must tell you that this is an extremely difficult ruling to make, because essentially there are no precedents that can be found where a bill was thrown out because a committee report recommending amendments was negatived. There is no such case.

What we do have is cases where the adoption of a committee report was negatived on a recorded division. I can refer you there to one on August 3, 1977, concerning Bill C-34. It was negatived on a recorded decision of the Senate and we then went to third reading of the bill. Admittedly, there had been no amendments proposed per se.

Today we have the case of that report on Bill C-84, where the committee specifically states:

> . . . the Committee recommends that Bill C-84 should not be passed by the Senate, and new legislation to privatize Petro-Canada should not be introduced for a period of at least six months.

That came to a vote this afternoon. It was negatived, and we proceeded to third reading. The issue is whether, if a committee recommends amendments, that changes the situation. There is nothing in the rules or the precedents. The only way that I can rule is to proceed by logic.

The Senate is not obligated to send a bill to a committee. There is nothing in the rules that says that we must do that. It is true that that is our general practice, but there are many precedents where we have not done so. I can quote one in 1988 dealing with a motion by Senator Nurgitz on Bill C-104. It was introduced, the bill was read the second time and it was immediately put on the order paper for third reading the following day. So there are several precedents where we do not send bills to committee.

When we send bills to committee we do so essentially to get advice from the committee. But in my view the Senate cannot be bound by the advice that it receives from a committee. In other words, the Senate must remain master of its own decisions. If you followed otherwise—and let us take the case of the bill presently in question—because the Senate did not like the report we could say, "We will send it back to the committee." That is allowable. The committee could report exactly the same thing as that it has presently reported. The Senate would then be faced with the same question coming back. We could then end up with a situation in which the bill could simply navigate back and forth from Senate to committee.

I repeat, the Senate must remain master of its own affairs. It cannot be subject to committees' decisions. In my view, the Senate can negate a committee decision. When it does so, the bill can then proceed to third reading. Therefore, in this case I rule that we should now proceed to third reading of the bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I will not ask for an appeal of the ruling. I wanted to note that the principle that your honour referred to applies in the case of referring a bill back with instructions. You did not refer to that. That might have an influence in a different direction on your ruling. However, the ruling has been made.

I do not think we will ask for a vote on an appeal, but I want it noted that I disagree with the ruling. Of course we are masters of our own fate, but the practice has always been to send it back if we do not agree.

Senator Simard: Not always.

Senator Frith: No, we send it back not only to have the committee look at it again but also with instructions, which shows that we do control it. However, let us leave it at that.

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask one question about the third reading of this bill. There was some discussion this morning that third reading would take place directly at 10:00 a.m. tomorrow. Am I correct on that? Was there some discussion this morning?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I do not think so, at least not on the record.

Senator Davey: No one knows about it? All right, then.

Senator Frith: Yes, there was some discussion after the division bell had started suggesting that a vote could be held at ten o'clock tomorrow, but I do not think that would apply now because we do not know where it will come up on the order paper. It is open for debate tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Atkins, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SEVENTY-SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the seventy-second report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (supplementary budget of Social Affairs, Science and Technology), presented in the Senate on January 24, 1991.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I move that the report be adopted.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

SEVENTY-THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED ON DIVISION

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the seventy-third report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Senate Estimates 1991-92), presented in the Senate on January 24, 1991.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I move that the report be adopted.

An Hon. Senator: On division.

Motion agreed to and reported adopted, on division.

THE CONSTITUTION

NEGOTIATIONS WITH QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR RESIGNATION OF PRIME MINISTER AND MINISTER OF STATE FOR FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès, pursuant to notice of January 30, 1991, moved:

> That the Prime Minister and the Minister of Federal-Provincial Relations resign because they do not have the confidence of Canadians to speak for the federation in negotiations with Quebec.

He said: Honourable senators, speaking on the motion standing in my name, I should like to say that the country is threatened with disintegration because Quebec will probably leave Canada.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: That is your own opinion, of course.

Senator Gigantès: There are policies which offer a small hope that Canada might survive. These cannot be piloted by Prime Minister Mulroney and his Minister for Federal-Provincial Relations, Senator Lowell Murray. They must be replaced by people who would be trusted by Canadians to speak for the federation in negotiations with Quebec. These negotiations can be on one of two subjects: either renegotiating the marriage contract or negotiating a separation agreement.

Whichever is the case, the lawyer for the federal side, the spokesman for the federal side, has to be trusted, both by those who want the federation to continue and by Quebec who will want an interlocutor that the other side trusts, whatever Quebec decides to do. I shall explain why we have come to this perilous crossroads in our history, what policies might help and why Brian Mulroney and Lowell Murray are not trusted and must go.

Laws must help a nation improve its condition and achieve its desires. Lawmakers, therefore, must have a clear and comprehensive perception of the nation's condition and its desires. Without such a clear, comprehensive perception, the lawmaker may pass individual pieces of legislation which do not fit the needs of the nation as a whole. Moreover, the lawmaker may not view the nation in isolation. It exists in a larger world, which is both external to us and invasive. The lawmaker, therefore, must have a comprehensive understanding of how this external world affects us. Incidentally, what is required of the lawmaker is also required of journalists, and I wish they would pay attention to those requirements. Both the legislator and the journalist betray their calling if they do not meet these requirements.

I propose to describe the nation's desires and to examine how and whether these can be achieved given the effect of the external world upon us and given our internal condition as a nation. Such analysis, of course, is not enough. Lawmakers must then propose policies that will make things better, and I shall do so. This means that lawmakers must foresee what lies ahead, prescribe policies for what lies ahead and be convincing when reporting on all this to the people, their masters.

Senator Simard: Where were you in 1981? Writing speeches for Trudeau? Why didn't you plan ahead then?

Senator Gigantès: So, let us pass to the desires of the nation. Simply put, wherever we live in this land, whatever our language, religion or ethnic origin, we all want our health services improved and maintained as the good value for money they now are. There is no one who disagrees with that, anywhere in the nation. We also want our education system improved. This, I submit, includes superior day care, which may be the most important stage in education. We also want our economy to be mended so that fewer and fewer of us are poor and more and more of us are rich. These three desires—good health, good learning and good living-are inextricable. We cannot achieve any of the three without the other two.

In addition, we must achieve them while being involved inescapably with a world where old processes have been so speeded up by technology that they appear to be utterly new. I shall single out one of these processes: the movement of money.

Thanks to computers, which link banks and stock exchanges around the world electronically, unimaginable sums of money can be, and are, moved from one end of the globe to the other with a few strokes on a keyboard. Currency transactions in New York alone represent 120 times more dollars, daily, than world merchandise trade. Because of their colossal volume, the fluctuations of currencies have a dynamic of their own, often unrelated to what goods and services are produced by the countries that issue those currencies.

For example, if you had 100 million in Canadian dollars a year ago and had moved them all into certain European currencies, you would now have 112 million in Canadian dollars, without your having had to bother with setting up a business, hiring people, dealing with suppliers or customers. There are any number of obliging countries that will help you avoid the tiresome business of paying taxes anywhere. I am talking now of safe investment in rock-solid currencies and not of risky toying with Brazilian funds. Twelve per cent tax-free and safe ain't bad!

You would have reaped this harvest because the Canadian dollar lost 12 per cent of its value vis à vis the currencies of some European nations in the last 12 months. Yet Canada's production of goods and services did not fall by 12 per cent relative to the production of goods and services in those other countries in the past 12 months. People with lots of money take quite naturally to this state of affairs. It does give them a greater degree of freedom and it also affects, or rather reinforces, their innate tendency to see themselves as part of a global economy. Why think in terms of improving the efficiency of your production line in Canada when you can build a super-modern factory in a low-wage country and make much more money? Modern technology has produced machines that can do automatically the very complicated jobs for which you once needed skilled manpower, and poorer, underdeveloped countries give you an abundant supply of low-wage workers for the less-skilled jobs such as sewing the upholstery for automobiles. A very rich person can grow richer faster by looking for such combinations of sophisticated machinery and low-wage labour around the globe rather than only at home.

All of this, of course, presupposes free trade, and globalization of everything to do with money-making on a grand scale. Those who are into money-making on a grand scale are for a free-market economy, by and large, except for transition periods when they expect government protection for those of their assets which they have not yet been able to move into some Mexican free trade zone. I am not criticizing them. I am describing them. If I had their money, I might behave as they do.

In global terms, a good case can be made for the movement of economic activity from rich countries, such as ours, to poorer countries. The poorer countries need this movement. Eventually, they will become richer and be better economic partners for us. In theory, in the long run, we shall all benefit. However, as John Maynard Keynes pointed out, in the long run, we shall also all be dead.

The trick, therefore, is to manage the transition, and to help the poorer countries raise their standard of living without lowering ours in the process—and without wrecking the world environment either. Capital and jobs are moving to poorer countries. How do we preserve our standard of living? It can be done, of course, because not every form of production can be moved abroad economically. We cannot send all our children to school in poorer countries and all our sick to foreign hospitals. We cannot all eat in restaurants abroad. We cannot fly our laundry to Mexico and back as cheaply as we can wash it at home. Seventy per cent of all goods and services produced in Canada are not part of foreign trade. However, in the 30 per cent that is part of foreign trade, we are losing jobs in manufacturing and other high-tech sectors. We shall lose data processing to the Bahamas. That is where American Express gets its data processing done at $1.50 an hour and our banks will have to compete.

To manage this transition, we shall have to accept and feel comfortable with a role for the state in the economy. Being a Liberal I feel comfortable with both the profit motive and with a vigorous role for the state in the economy. Conservatives feel uncomfortable with a role for the state. Socialists feel uncomfortable with the profit motive. I submit that we need the state to play a vigorous role so that Canada does not become Argentina, which was once a very promising economy and is now a mess. One of the problems I shall address is how the state can make sure there is enough capital left for our needs here when free-marketeer capitalists are happier investing in Mexican tax-free production zones and hate any interference by the state with a businessman's freedom to make money.

Incidentally, the Gulf war is a splendid illustration of how inadequate free market thinking can be at times. The first oil crisis occurred in 1973. There were others. This is one more. It is obvious to anyone, except a free market fanatic, that the Western World should have moved decisively out of Middle East oil from 1974 onwards. You do not let your well-being become endangered by some Saddam Hussein. The Muslim world feels, rightly, that we of the West have exploited it. They resent us bitterly. They may be right in resenting us. But governments are not elected to don sackcloth and ashes and beat their breasts apologizing to hostile foreigners. Intelligent governments see to it that even justifiably hostile foreigners cannot harm us.

Private enterprise in the U.S. made sure that not enough was done to reduce dependence on Middle East oil. In 1974 North American automobile manufacturers could have been encouraged through taxes and government subsidies to use engines that burn natural gas. It is less polluting, and we have huge supplies here in Canada and in the U.S. With extra government investment, engines burning hydrogen could have been developed. We have the hydroelectric potential to generate all the hydrogen we need. It is more expensive, but it does not pollute. The byproduct of using hydrogen as a fuel is distilled water. So we should subtract the cost of the eventual cleanup we would have to face with gasoline burning engines from the price of hydrogen fuel, which would become more economical. Private enterprise did not want to do this. The state should have stepped in and provided the drive and the incentives. Influential free-marketeers did not want the state to assume this role. So now we have to kill people instead.

I have digressed into a later part of this discourse. As I was saying before I interrupted myself, we all desire good health, good learning and good living. All three are menaced because the rest of the world, which is external to us but invasive, is going through a transition of fast capital movements to low-wage, low-tax, low-regulation areas and to plain, ordinary gambling on currency fluctuations rather than investing in production and jobs. Canadian money is following this trend. It is an inevitable transition that we must manage wisely if we want to fulfil our desires as a nation.

However, we shall be severely handicapped in managing this transition by the highly probable breakup of our country. In the next two and a half years Quebec will probably separate from the rest of Canada. Ontario might do the same. I shall explain why the next two and a half years are especially critical, but first let us remind ourselves of some Canadian history.

We were separate British colonies, trading north-south with the United States. Because Britain had helped the South against the North in the U.S. civil war, after its victory the Union government of the U.S.A. erected tariff barriers that closed the American market to our products, including Quebec products. For a while north-south trade was moribund, so we created an east-west alternative, Canada, with the unenthusiastic participation of Quebec.

The Quebec francophone establishment—the bishops, corporate lawyers and people with money—generally supported the creation of Canada, just as they had accepted the conquest. But there was another element that never accepted the conquest, just as Hungarians never accepted the Austrian conquest and Ukrainians never accepted the Russian conquest. This element could not see in what they were inferior to the anglophones and why anglophones and their Quebec allies held the real power in the province. The Quebec francophones considered themselves the expression in North America of a great culture, a great language, French. They wanted it to survive and flourish. They kept Quebec nationalism alive.

Today's Quebecois nationalists are the intellectual and emotional descendants of those early nationalists who never accepted the conquest. Today they are no longer village priests and schoolmasters. They dominate the media, the arts, the teaching profession, the labour unions and, probably, are now a majority of elected Quebec politicians at all levels of government.

The best among them say to me, and I quote:

> We have not been ill-treated by anglophone Canadians. Relatively speaking, we were subjected to a benevolent conquest. And yes, indeed, when we decided to get rid of our traditional elites and had our quiet revolution in 1960, entering belatedly into the 20th century, English Canada did not try to stop us. Important English Canadian elites supported us enthusiastically, even. The rest is historical detail. Like grownup children, if you like, we now are capable of leading our own lives, running our own affairs and collaborating closely with English Canada as one civilized state with another. We could have an amicable divorce that will damage neither side economically. Why not?

Unfortunately, it will be a messy divorce. The nationalists I have quoted above who do not care to blame anglophone Canadians for all the country's ills are a minority among the nationalists. The anglophones who would view the breakup of the country dispassionately and reason that an amicable divorce is the best available solution are also a minority. The wise journalists and broadcasters in either language are a minority. I can just visualize the vitriol coming over the airwaves and mixing with the ink. There is an underlying conviction on both sides, among Quebec nationalists and Canadian nationalists, that they have each been more than reasonable and that it is the other's fault.

I am an historian by academic training. Historians take our collective memory and allegedly record it objectively and with scholarly propriety. Maybe a few do. Most are propagandists, whatever their country or continent, especially if they are teaching history at the high school level. When it comes to events of the past 10 or 20 years, all of us old enough to remember become historians and propagandists.

● (1750)

I would like to talk of this propaganda, at least some of it. Anglophone Canadians are trained at school to believe that they have been remarkably generous, considering they won the battle of the plains of Abraham. They let the francophones keep their language, their church-run schools, their legal system. Francophone Quebecers have multiplied. Heck, there are more of them than ever. Yes, indeed, the Western populations were insensitive about the needs of their French populatins, but they've improved, haven't they? Didn't the Supreme Court strike down the anti-French laws in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta? Aren't there thousands of anglo kids in French immersion? Haven't we had federal Prime Ministers from Quebec more often than from any other province?

As a Quebecois I would have to say:

> Yes, but French was the majority language out west before the territories became provinces. Now it is hardly spoken there. The remaining western francophones are being assimilated at a quickening pace. When Manitoba contravened the Constitution in the last century and banned the use of French, Sir John A. Macdonald did not use the disallowance power to strike down that law. Many decades later, the Supreme Court struck down that law but by then it was too late. Why didn't Macdonald act? Because his anglo electorate was anti-French. Old history? Not really. Think of all those who complain about there being French writing on one side of their cereal boxes. Think of the Airline Pilots' Association fighting against allowing a francophone pilot to talk in French to a francophone air controller. Today, most francophone federal public servants are forced to work in English even though, by law, they are allowed to work in French. They have to switch to English to make their bosses understand. And it is worrying to be evaluated by someone who does not understand your language and the mental habits it represents. We, Quebecois, need more powers to protect our language and our culture.

Now we come to the history of the last ten years and here I shall speak as an ethnic who is desolate because two groups he loves do not seem to know how to get along together.

[Senator Gigantès.]

The Quebecois are not the only ones who want more power. The western provinces want more power too. Ottawa, they say, is not sufficiently sensitive to their problems. The division of powers in the 1867 Constitution is antiquated. The Constitution should be changed and more power given to the provinces, say the provinces.

Enter Pierre Elliott Trudeau. He says, in effect,

> Yes, the 1867 division of powers is not ideal. We should change it but not necessarily by a one-way transfer of powers from Ottawa to the provinces. Some transfers the other way might make sense.

When asked by a Newfoundland premier why management of the fishery should not be given to each province, Trudeau replied, "Because fish swim."

There was, too, the small matter of the Constitution being under British control. Having a logical bent, Trudeau said that to change the Constitution we must first bring it back home. Then we must adopt an amending formula that is other than unanimous consent of all the provinces because that is a formula for constant deadlock. Then we must give the people some basic rights which cannot be touched by any government, federal or provincial. Then we shall negotiate everything else and, if we cannot agree, let people decide by referendum.

He had two provinces on his side, Ontario and New Brunswick. The others grouped together in what was called the "gang of eight". In April 1981 they came up with a document which contained their constitutional proposals. Central to this document was a statement by all eight premiers than on no account should a referendum be used: governments should decide, not citizens.

Honourable senators, I have this document here and I ask the Senate's permission to have it printed as an appendix.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay, this is an official document dated April 16, 1981.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Senator Gigantès, I believe there is a more appropriate way to table this document.

Senator Gigantès: These documents are from the Library of Parliament, and they are the only ones I have. I am sorry, but what can I do?

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Leave was simply asked to table the document, was it?

Senator Gigantès: No, I asked leave to have it printed as an appendix.

Senator Doody: How many pages long is it? I have in mind the printing of it.

Senator Gigantès: Well, if you don't want to put it in as an appendix, honourable senators, you can get it from the library yourselves.

Then we had what Quebec nationalists came to call the "night of the long knives." On that day in 1981 René Lévesque agreed with Trudeau publicly that if there were differences over designing the Constitution, these differences should be resolved by referendum. The other premiers freaked. A referendum was the last thing they wanted. How would you feel, if you were a premier, took a stand and found yourself repudiated by your own province in a referendum?

Feeling that they had been betrayed by Lévesque, they proceeded that night to make a deal with the feds without Lévesque's participation, and the 1982 Constitution was born. Lévesque, of course, claimed he had been betrayed by the other premiers. In Quebec's National Assembly, Lévesque's separatist Parti Quebecois was joined by Claude Ryan's federalist provincial Liberal Party in rejecting the 1982 Constitution.

And here is where things get complicated. The 1982 Constitution follows almost to the letter the constitutional proposals set forth by the so-called gang of eight premiers in April 1981, a text which Lévesque helped write and which he signed. The 1982 Constitution even contains Article 43, which allows the federal government and a province to make constitutional changes which affect that province alone. In other words, Quebec could negotiate what extra powers it felt it needed without having to get the approval of other provinces.

So a Canadian nationalist can say that the 1982 Constitution gave Quebec the Constitution Lévesque had written and that the rejection of this Constitution by Lévesque showed that his separatist party could never have agreed to accept any deal with the federal government short of independence. On the other hand, a Quebec nationalist would answer that the contents of the 1982 Constitution do not matter, that what really matters is the process, the fact that the English Canadian provinces and the federal government could reach agreement on a Constitution for the whole country without the participation of Quebec. This was Quebec's nightmare come true. Ever since the population of English Canada started growing much faster than the population of Quebec, nationalist Quebecois have faced the spectre of the day when they might not count in the federal Parliament; and the only way to avoid that would be to leave Canada.

So the process was frozen before the last essential stage. The Constitution had been repatriated; a Charter of Rights had been adopted; a less rigid amending formula had been adopted, but the renegotiation of the division of powers as between the federal and provincial governments, which was the whole purpose of the exercise, could not be undertaken because Quebec would not participate; and after passing the Constitution without Quebec's consent, the federal government did not feel it could rub salt into the wounds by renegotiating the division of powers without the participation of Quebec's two main political parties.

Honourable senators, I should like to adjourn this debate in my own name. I shall resume tomorrow at this point.

On motion of Senator Gigantès, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 9 a.m.

QUESTION PERIOD

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION PERSIAN GULF

ROLE OF CANADIAN FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—NEED FOR CHANGE IN WEAPONRY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on January 31 last by the Honourable Senator van Roggen regarding Persian Gulf War—Role of Canadian Fighter Aircraft—Need for Change in Weaponry.

(The answer follows:)

> The Canadian Air Task Group continues to be totally allocated to the defence of Allied Forces against Iraqi air attacks, a role for which they are suitably trained and equipped.
> Our aircraft and their personnel are not being put at unnecessary risk by not being equipped with air-to-ground weapons.

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I move the third reading of Bill C-84, respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

BROADCASTING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators, I move the third reading of Bill C-40, respecting broadcasting and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto and in relation to radio communication.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Atkins, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cochrane, that this bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wish to propose an amendment to the motion. I move:

> That Bill C-40, An Act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto and in relation to radio communication, be not now read the third time, but that the bill be amended in clause 3 at page 5 by striking out line 39 and substituting the following:
> (vi) contribute to national unity, shared national con-

That one line should be struck out. The clause as amended would read:

> contribute to national unity, shared national consciousness and identity,

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Atkins, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cochrane, that this bill be now read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Stewart, seconded by the Honourable Senator Turner:

> That Bill C-40, An Act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto and in relation to radio communication, be not now read the third time, but that the bill be amended in clause 3 at page 5 by striking out line 39 and substituting the following:

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, the fact that we are dealing with this amendment now makes one want to comment on the need for a reconsideration of the procedures of the Senate. This bill was sent to a committee. As we know, the function of a committee is to prepare a bill. Until a bill has been reported by a committee, what we call a bill is only a proposed bill. It is the function of a committee to adopt the clauses—in other words, to create a bill. The rejection of the report of a committee is the rejection of all the committee's work with regard to all clauses that were amended in the proposed bill, and with regard to all the other clauses. The fact that we are now on third reading shows how necessary it is that there be an urgent reform of the rules of this House.

On the substance of the amendment, as I said when we were discussing the motion relative to the report of the committee, the function of the amendment is to make it a purpose of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to contribute to national unity. The government has no difficulty whatsoever having the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation contribute to national identity.

"Identity" is a much stronger word than "unity." After I had spoken at that time I checked the dictionary. There I found that "identity" means "absolute sameness." So the government has no problem in having the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation contribute to national absolute sameness.

The word "identity" also means "oneness." In algebra it means "equality of two expressions."

It is clear, honourable senators, that the expression "national unity" has taken on a sense of opprobrium in the ears of the government. It is the special meaning that the term has acquired which is now being attacked by the government in this bill. It would be shameful for the Senate of Canada to reject the notion that it is one of the functions of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to contribute to national unity.

It is said that it is offensive against journalistic integrity for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to contribute to national unity.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Offensive to what?

Senator Stewart: Journalistic integrity.

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Tell us what that means.

Senator Stewart: I guess what it means is that the journalist sets his own standards; he is true to himself; she is true to herself.

An Hon. Senator: Then we are in trouble.

Senator Stewart: You are right on, senator.

The expression "national unity" offends against journalistic integrity, but against "national identity." "National absolute sameness" does not offend.

Honourable senators, can we seriously vote in favour of a bill which deliberately has struck down national unity as one of the objects of the national broadcasting service?

• (0910)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words on this matter.

This issue—whether to incorporate in the Broadcasting Act a mandate, an obligation for the CBC and Radio Canada to "promote national unity"—has been with us now for more than 20 years.

Honourable senators will know that, when the Broadcasting Act of 1968 was passed, such a mandate was incorporated into the preamble of the act.

Honourable senators are also aware of the arguments that are generally made in favour of and against incorporating such a mandate, such an obligation, into the act. Those who favour it say that, at worst, it is harmless and, at best, it contributes to national unity to impose this obligation on the publicly-owned broadcasting service. Those against it are concerned with the way in which such a mandate, such an obligation, may be interpreted—whether it does leave it open for governments to insist that a certain line be taken by the publicly-owned broadcasting service, in particular in its news and public affairs programs. All of those fears, as I will demonstrate in a moment, were expressed back in 1967 and 1968 when the Honourable Judy LaMarsh brought in what became the Broadcasting Act of 1968. Nevertheless, the mandate, the obligation, was incorporated into the preamble of the Broadcasting Act.

Senator Stewart: Twice the Leader of the Government has told us that these words are found in the preamble. I notice that he now seems to be changing his position.

Actually, it is to be found in the effective part of the act. If the honourable senator would like me to read it, I will do so. It is to be found in subsection 3(g) paragraph (iv) where it says:

> . . . contribute to the development of national unity and provide for a continuing expression of Canadian identity;

It is not in the preamble but in the functional part of this act.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I accept that and I thank the honourable senator for that correction.

I will show, by reference to several quotations from ministers of the Crown only a few years after passage of the 1968 act, that some of the fears expressed about incorporating this obligation into the act were well justified. I will leave it to honourable senators to decide whether it is wise now to accept the amendment proposed by Senator Stewart to impose again such an obligation on the publicly-owned broadcasting service.

Ms. LaMarsh was quite clear—whether in the preamble or, as Senator Stewart now points out, in section 3 of the act—as to the intended effect. As she said, when she introduced the legislation in Parliament in 1967:

> The mandate set out is more than a preamble, it is an integral part of the measure, expressing the intentions of parliament, and it will have all the forces of law. Thus the whole of the rest of the bill must be considered in the context of this declaration of policy.

As I indicated, immediately there were concerns expressed by members of Parliament on this matter. Mr. R. W. Prittie, a New Democratic Party spokesman on the bill, said, in the course of the debate:

> I have noticed that on the part of members of this house, French speaking members in particular, there has been a great deal of criticism of the French network of the CBC. We hear the charge that it is riddled with separatism and that these people are promoting disunity in the country. This may or may not be true. I simply do not know. But I would not want to see a witch hunt started because there is something in the bill saying that national unity must be promoted which would enable the government to go to anyone who was not doing exactly what was wanted and > say: You are not promoting national unity; you are a separatist and therefore you are out.

Well, this argument went back and forth.

Senator Frith: If you are a separatist, I guess by the term you are out all right! You cannot have it both ways.

Senator Murray: Out of the CBC. Of course, the problem is who defines "separatist", and according to what criteria. This was the danger that the member of Parliament in question raised on that occasion.

Interestingly enough, Mr. Gerard Pelletier, who was then the Parliamentary Secretary to Miss LaMarsh, said this about the national unity mandate in the government bill in the House of Commons on January 26, 1968:

> Personally I would be most favourable to the deletion of this paragraph. It seems superfluous. It seems to me that by including it, we are giving to certain people cause to think that there is a suggestion of propaganda, which is incorrect.

Then there weighed into the discussion Mr. Robert Stanbury, later to be a cabinet minister in the Trudeau government. I ask honourable senators to pay careful attention to his interpretation of what this mandate for national unity meant in respect of the obligation of the CBC:

> In my estimation, non-government media should not be directed in the kind of editorial policy they should pursue. On the other hand, parliament many years ago established a vehicle for the expression of public policy in broadcasting. That vehicle is our public corporation, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. One of the very reasons for its existence is the development and nurturing of national unity. While we in this parliament do not want to direct the editorial opinions of the owners of other news media—and I underline the phrase "other news media"—

> —we have the right, on behalf of the owners of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, to decide a basic factor of that corporation's policy. That is why in the mandate of the national broadcasting service we give it some direction.

• (0920)

Senator Frith: I wonder if anyone in Canada cites and quotes Liberals more frequently than the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I know of no Liberal who does.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: He cannot get anything sensible out of Conservative speeches to quote.

Senator Stewart: They are his scriptures.

Senator Gigantès: And he cannot speak for himself.

Senator Frith: Never fear anonymity if you are a Liberal because as long as Senator Murray is around, somehow, some day, somewhere, he will quote you.

Senator Murray: I regret if honourable senators are embarrassed by these quotations from their predecessors, as well they might be.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Frith: Far from it, sir! "Amused" is the word, senator!

Senator Gigantès: To have a government like yours is embarrassment enough. Nothing else can embarrass us.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, an obligation to promote national unity was placed in the Broadcasting Act of 1968 by the government of the day. Some ministers and spokesmen for the government defended the obligation on the basis that it was necessary and desirable, and that it could not lead to censorship, interference, or editorial direction. But it is clear what others had in mind, and I put on the record the revealing statement of Mr. Stanbury, later to become a minister of the Crown.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Get another researcher!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is clear from statements made by ministers of the Crown during the Trudeau years that it was Mr. Stanbury's interpretation they relied on.

Senator Stanbury: I hope so!

Senator Murray: They did believe that the government had the right to give editorial direction to the CBC because the CBC had a mandate for national unity in the act. It was only a couple of years later that Mr. Trudeau made his famous attack on Radio-Canada and its news, editorial and public affairs program.

Senator Stanbury: And he was right!

Senator Murray: This was at a Liberal fundraiser in Montreal on October 19, 1969. Here he is talking about a news broadcast he heard on Radio-Canada. I quote Mr. Trudeau:

> Only a few days ago, David Rockefeller, the head of one of the largest financial institutions in the world, was interviewed on the CBC. They got hold of him and managed to ask him: would investors keep coming if Quebec became independent? You know, it is a disease of the mind at the CBC—and I shall deal briefly with the CBC later if I have any time left . . .

Later in the same speech he provided an allusion to the national unity mandate in the act:

> I spoke earlier about that other institution, the CBC. There again, the taxpayers' money is not always used to build a strong and united Canada, and yet that is why people pay taxes to the federal government.
> I must say a word about the tremendous job the new directors of the CBC have done in the last two years. I know they have to work hard every day to get from that institution objective views, a little less separatist in their outlook. I know that it is our responsibility also . . . They are working to set things right within that institution. But they have a difficult task to do and it is not sure that they will succeed. I, for one, believe they will. But if they do not, we will assume our responsibilities as a government. We will close the shop. Don't think that we won't do it. If need be, we can produce programs, and if not, we will > show people Chinese or Japanese vases. Instead of the nonsense they dish out, that would be of some cultural benefit. And if we do not succeed—you know, we have cut expenses in Ottawa in the last year. Expenses were reduced in every field and, as a result, the ministers I have mentioned earlier had to lock a few doors, to put an end to a few programs . . .

So there was the obvious threat to the CBC if they did not hew to the line, if they did not promote national unity, as defined by the Prime Minister and the government of the day. I think it is a perfect illustration of the danger of imposing that kind of obligation on the journalists and the people who run the news and public affairs programs at the CBC. Senator LeBlanc shakes his head, but the fact of the matter is that his old chief, his colleagues, and perhaps himself, regarded the enemies of the party as being enemies of the state when they were in power, and this kind of quotation simply proves it.

Senator Gigantès: But you are enemies of the state—you, personally!

Senator Murray: I am glad to have that on the record.

Senator Gigantès: The separatists of the country are in your caucus!

• (0930)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, a few years later our colleague, Senator Marchand, spoke in this house on the same subject. He was talking about how the CBC and Radio-Canada put questions to embarrass the federal government. He said that it was a systematic and dangerous trend in the CBC and Radio-Canada. Mr. Chrétien himself, then the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, was talking about the news judgment of Radio-Canada in an article in La Presse.

[Translation]

> Mr. Chrétien complained that the news reports never mentioned his statements on Canadian unity, while any nitwit who had anything to say about independence was sure to get the attention of the media, always according to Mr. Chrétien.

[English]

To return to the relationship between the criticism and the public pressure exerted by ministers of the Crown on the CBC and Radio-Canada on the basis of their interpretation of the national unity mandate, let me quote from a brief exchange on a program on the English network called 90 Minutes Live, between the Honourable André Ouellet, then a cabinet minister in Mr. Trudeau's government, and Peter Gzowski. Mr. Ouellet said:

> It is written right in the law that Radio-Canada and CBC have a clear mandate from parliament to foster national unity, therefore if when it comes that there is a question of the referendum, I don't want to see Radio-Canada on the fence presenting as a neutral body the two sides. I think mostly, that they should not present the other side.

I wonder if Senator LeBlanc, as an old journalist, agrees with that statement.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: I do not know if I agree with that statement, but I would ask the minister if he does not think that in some way it is more honest to say some of the things that he has quoted—and I do not agree with some of them, including the last one attributed to Mr. Ouellet. I disagree with that approach.

Senator Murray: I have not finished.

Senator LeBlanc: But it is more honest to do what these people were doing—even if you find it outrageous while you are quoting from it—than what it was when I arrived in Ottawa to work for the CBC. We were getting directives at that time. We had a famous one in "preview commentary." If you want to read the memoirs of former minister Nowlan, you will find a couple of interesting chapters concerning how the Diefenbaker government—which you have forgotten also existed during some of the time that we are talking about—

Senator Murray: No, not at all.

Senator LeBlanc: The Diefenbaker government did not publicly say something; it gave directives and exerted pressure very clearly to abolish that program without ever admitting publicly to it.

Senator Frith: Exactly. Characteristically sneaky!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have heard of that incident. There have been other incidents. There were incidents during the famous pipeline debate in 1956 when it was alleged that pressure had been exerted by the then Liberal government on the CBC to keep the Leader of the Opposition off national television.

Senator Frith: That was when Speaker Beaudoin destroyed himself by doing what Senator Charbonneau tried to do in here.

Senator Murray: Was it? I see.

Senator Frith: The same.

Senator Stanbury: Not tried to, he did it!

Senator Frith: Yes, he did.

Senator Murray: Only a few years after this so-called mandate or obligation was put into the act we have had generalized accusations against the CBC in the most sensitive area of the network's operation—that is, news and public affairs—and an attempt on the part of Liberal ministers to justify that pressure on the basis of the mandate and the obligation that it had been put into the act.

Let me continue with a quotation from the Honourable André Ouellet when he appeared on 90 Minutes Live, as it was called back in 1977. Mr. Ouellet said:

> It is written right in the law that Radio Canada and CBC have a clear mandate from parliament to foster national unity, therefore if when it comes that there is a question of the referendum, I don't want to see Radio Canada on the fence presenting as a neutral body the two sides. I think mostly, that they should not present the other side. I think it would be unfair to chuck them out and refuse them (sic) to present the other side, but as an instrument of Canadian unity with a mandate to foster Canadian unity, I believe that... Radio Canada... should be promoting Canadian unity and being (sic) on the side of those who want this country united...

Later there is a series of questions and answers. It states:

Q. Mr. Ouellet, what if I were to use the word propaganda?

A. Well, when it comes to the survival of our country I don't think we have to be afraid of words.

Q. Propaganda?

A. Indeed, sure.

It is fairly obvious from the declarations of various Liberal cabinet ministers of the day that their interpretation of the CBC's "national unity" mandate and the government's role in overseeing that mandate goes far beyond what was contemplated by Miss LaMarsh in 1967, and is rather closer to the definition given by Mr. Robert Stanbury at the time.

What happened is that the Liberal government of the day applied the legal weight of the mandate and their own considerable moral suasion—that is, if I can call it that—to try to influence the professional news coverage and editorial judgment of the journalists and producers employed by the CBC. An examination of the record—Mr. Trudeau's attack on the CBC for asking a particular question of David Rockefeller in a news interview; the indictment of Radio-Canada by our late colleague, Senator Marchand; Mr. Chrétien's complaint that his speeches on national unity were not adequately reported; Mr. Ouellet's assertion that Radio-Canada should not act as a neutral body presenting both sides in the referendum debate—yields no other interpretation but that they were applying their political pressure and the full weight of the legal mandate to try to influence the professional judgment and conduct of the journalists and producers at the CBC.

In my judgment, therein lies the danger with this kind of mandate and obligation being put into the law regarding a publicly-owned broadcasting corporation such as the CBC. It is for that reason that I think, and continue to believe, that on balance the broadcasting law is better without such a mandate and such an obligation on the CBC. Such an obligation and such a mandate is always open, in my view, to abuse or to the appearance of abuse. For that reason, I have absolutely no hesitation at all in voting against the amendment and urging others to do likewise.

Senator Frith: Against national unity also.

Senator LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I wonder if the minister would answer a question. I listened with interest to some of the comments that he made. I was of the school of journalism in the Norman De Poe period. Frankly, I never felt very offended in my freedom as a journalist by any politician. We had some great controversies in my time. If you remember the famous meeting of Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. De Poe in the corridor, there is no doubt that—

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: I believe that happened when Mr. Diefenbaker was Leader of the Opposition, if that matters.

Senator LeBlanc: That may be. If it is, I stand corrected. But it is a classic scene. I am sure that it will be repeated 50 years from now—that is, if we still have a national broadcasting system or if we still have a nation.

• (0940)

I would like to know from the Leader of the Government if the phrase "national unity" has become a non-phrase, and if it has been excised from the dictionary—at least from the dictionary of freedom which the Minister pretends to promote. How does identity, and the responsibility to promote identity, differ in the spectrum of freedom of journalists or non-pressure on journalists? What differences does he see?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I understand it, the matter was pretty thoroughly canvassed at the committee. I can tell honourable senators this, that those who are on the front line—the producers, the journalists and the broadcasters—feel quite strongly that the obligation to promote "national unity" is susceptible to abuse, whereas the mandate to promote "national identity" is far less susceptible to political abuse. Perhaps the point they make is that the mandate to promote national unity seems to focus largely, if not exclusively, on the news and public affairs component of the network, whereas "national identity" could be seen to be promoted through quite a variety of other instruments, perhaps principally not news and public affairs but culture, drama, and so forth.

By the way, we are not excising the phrase "national unity" from the dictionary. It is an honourable term. We use it all the time and we believe in it. We are committed to it.

Senator Gigantès: But you do not know what it means.

Senator Murray: We do say that trying to impose a general obligation upon the publicly-owned broadcasting service, particularly on its news and public affairs component, is open to abuse. As I have shown by the record, journalists and public affairs producers in that corporation are vulnerable to exactly that kind of interference and pressure from politicians.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, Senator LeBlanc anticipated one of my questions. The minister has made a plea for journalistic purity—

Senator Murray: No, I am not so naive.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, you are. You are naive enough not to know that you are naive.

Senator Stewart: I mean in the performance of their journalistic functions.

Let us take the minister at his word. Does that not mean that the whole subclause should be removed from the act so that the CBC would not be required to contribute to shared national consciousness and identity? It seems to me that his argument leads inevitably to that conclusion.

Similarly, the bill the minister is supporting would require that the Canadian broadcasting system serve to safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada.

Senator Murray: That is the system.

Senator Stewart: Yes, but the system includes the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Surely, if you are looking for words which a government can interpret so as to put pressure on the Canadian broadcasting system, or on private broadcasters, that sweeping statement is full of weapons that a government might use. Why does the minister not come clean and say, "I believe in purity, no directions to journalists. Let them be guided by their own insights. Parliament will allow them to use the media, the public broadcasting airwaves, and so on, to put out their own views, but we must not give them any guidance whatsoever." Consequently, we should strike out this reference to "national identity", and also this reference to the strengthening of the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada. Why does the minister not go all the way?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator has just confirmed that what he has in mind is "direction to journalists." What he has in mind with this amendment, this mandate, this obligation to promote national unity is "direction to journalists", just as I suspected.

There is not much that I can add to what I have already said in my reply to Senator LeBlanc's question, except that there is a difference between the national broadcasting system, which includes the public and private broadcasters, and the national broadcasting service, the CBC.

I make the point that the national broadcasting service, the publicly-owned CBC, is far more vulnerable to political pressure and interference from ministers of the Crown and parliamentarians generally, who hold the power of the purse, at least, than are private broadcasters.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I think the minister must have misunderstood something that I said. When I referred to safeguarding, enriching and strengthening the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada, I was not saying that this is a direction which I would wish to give to the system. These are words from the bill that the minister himself is promoting. This is the direction he proposes to give to the Canadian broadcasting system. Those are not my words but the words of the minister.

Senator Murray: I know that.

Senator LeBlanc: The minister seems to attach a lot of importance to someone answering a question in an interview—for instance, a minister, not necessarily the minister responsible. He calls that pressure. Personally, I call that inevitable. It will always happen. The fact is that cabinet as a body has to decide whether or not it will continue allocating funds to the public broadcasting system, which historically it has.

Is he now saying that the sort of quotation he gave is more threatening to the life of the public broadcasting system, which everyone intends to support but does not always support, than for a government to reduce systematically the capacity of the publicly-owned corporation to do its job, as his government has done in the past few years?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not accept the accusation about the relationship of this government to the CBC. The unfortunate fact about the CBC is that it went considerably over its budget and was then faced with the necessity of cutting back. It cut back in ways that may or may not be pleasing to some, particularly some at the local level who wanted to maintain complete local television service. What has been done has not in any way compromised the integrity of the system.

I should also say this about that series of attacks which seemed to me at the time to be orchestrated against the CBC and against Radio Canada by my honourable friend's cabinet colleagues. They claimed to be speaking for large numbers of people. Inquiries were made at the time. I have the figures here on those complaints, but I will not take up the time of the Senate to put them on the record. It appears that the number of complaints that the corporation, or, indeed, the CRTC, was receiving on this point was infinitesimal. To give credit to the President of the CBC, at the time, Mr. Al Johnson, he gave the back of his hand to his political masters and the accusations they were making against Radio Canada. In the event, Mr. Harry Boyle, the then chairman of the CRTC, was asked to conduct an inquiry on the matter. He had to take out advertisements in all of the newspapers to invite people to come forward with their complaints or views as to whether the CBC and Radio Canada were or were not fulfilling their mandates to "promote national unity." There were very few takers.

As often happens, this was—the term "paranoia" comes to mind, but let us say incipient paranoia on the part of politicians about what they perceived to be biased reporting by the CBC and Radio Canada in particular. It is not unusual; it happens all the time. However, what is dangerous is when such politicians can trot out an obligation that they have already written into the Broadcasting Act to give their complaints, and the political pressures they bring to bear, some appearance of legitimacy.

Hon. Daniel Hays: Honourable senators, in speaking to this amendment, I would like to begin by following up on the exchange that has occurred here this morning. Considering my brief time spent in the committee's proceedings, I am very impressed with the Leader of the Government's command of past history. I can remember when there were questions about the appointment of Senator Waters, how impressed I was by Senator Murray's close reading of the Alberta papers and, in particular, the weeklies, and his ability to be able to give quotes from them on things that various Alberta senators had said, comments that might reflect badly on those senators in terms of how well-thought-out their pronouncements were on that particular issue. In any event, in this case he has done a careful study of a very tense time in Canadian history, the time around the referendum, and he has picked up on a number of extreme comments made by some Liberal politicians. The honourable senator is not obliged to be balanced and fair in his comments, but I think he has been very selective.

I did not attend as many hearings as I would like to have attended. However, Senator MacDonald, the chairman, attended all of them, and I hope he will comment on what I am about to say if I am wrong. The point I would like to make is that there was absolutely no evidence by anyone who appeared before the Transport and Communications Committee of any actual interference. There was a comment by someone—and I do not believe it was at a public session—who had been involved with one of the journalists' unions, to the effect that there was close scrutiny of the news lineup as well as the stories, but it did not go as far as actual interference. This exchange highlights the healthy disregard that politicians have for journalists and that journalists have politicians.

The key is that I do not believe that there was any actual breach of the journalistic integrity of CBC or Radio Canada journalists in this case. I think Senator Stewart's point is the same as mine, which is that any bit of language can be picked up at a time of high feeling and used to support the view that the corporation is not fulfilling its obligations under the statute, or whatever. So, notwithstanding what the minister has said, there is absolutely no evidence of interference. There is much evidence of disenchantment, disgruntlement and strong feeling, but not of interference.

I would also like to pick up on Senator LeBlanc's point about this government's trend toward reducing the resources being made available to our public broadcaster and the effect of that trend. I do not know that it is specifically targeted at the disenchantment with the journalistic standards of the CBC and Radio Canada—I would not say that—but the practical effect of the trend is that that organization is being disseminated.

The minister has said that the CBC was over budget and had to respond. The fact of the matter is that the CBC has been trying to fulfil a mandate in carrying both a national and a regional service, and it has not been able to do that because it has not been obtaining the necessary budget enhancement. That additional budget enhancement has not been forthcoming, and the corporation has had to take dramatic steps and cut programs.

The most disturbing aspect of all this is the rhetoric of the government, that the CBC is not generating sufficient commercial revenue to justify the type of programming that it wishes to produce. The fact of the matter is that it never will be able to justify its existence on a commercial basis. So to justify cuts on the basis that the CBC is not able to generate commercial revenue sufficient to pay for its programming means that it must begin to rely to a greater and greater degree on commercial revenues. If it begins to rely more on commercial revenues to produce its programs, the next step is that it is no longer a public broadcaster. The next step is to dispose of the corporation as part of the privatization process or for some other reason. I raise this point because we seem to be at about step two of a four- or five-step process that will take our public broadcaster away from us.

[Senator Hays.]

On the matter of cost, news and current affairs programs do produce substantial commercial revenues because such programs do not have to compete with U.S. programming in the same way that Canadian drama and entertainment programs have to compete.

One of the hearings of the committee that I did attend was when representatives of the CTV appeared. I will base my example not on news or current affairs programs but on a drama program, and I shall try to abbreviate it as much as possible. CTV is very proud of a program called E.N.G., which has a wide audience. The cost of E.N.G. for one hour of production is about $950,000. That cost is probably comparable to the cost of any good-quality program. When the witness from CTV, Mr. Gary Maavara, was asked how much money that program would generate, he said about $150,000 for each of two showings. So it would generate around $300,000. He said that Telefilm Canada contributes about $300,000 to the production, and the other moneys would, I assume, be generated in some other way by the producers of the program, either through provincial-funding sources or through private capital. So we can see that a popular Canadian program that costs roughly $1 million to produce will generate roughly $300,000 in Canadian revenue.

● (1000)

Using Dallas as an example, I asked him what it would cost to buy and air a good-quality U.S. program. He said that the CBC would pay about $65,000 to show one hour of Dallas. Honourable senators, I would assume that two hours would either be double that figure or less. The program ENG, which is a good one, but less popular than Dallas, costs them $150 for an hour, but Dallas, at $65,000 an hour would draw a larger audience. This gives honourable senators some idea of the impossibility of generating good quality entertainment programs for Canadian viewing in competition with the U.S.

I went on to ask him if money could be made by selling ENG to the U.S. and the rest of the world, and if I could assume that it would generate $65,000 for a showing in the U.S. He informed me that it would be more like $20,000.

Honourable senators, this series of numbers really tells the story. If we wish to have Canadian programming which has Canadian reference points and which employs Canadian producers, actors, writers and directors, then we will have to recognize that it cannot be done on a commercial basis. That is, in so many ways, the story of Canada. Unless we are prepared to provide financial resources either through Telefilm vehicles, or similar provincial vehicles or by direct payments to CBC, we will not have Canadian programs and our artists will lose an opportunity.

To return to the point made by Senator LeBlanc, which is the systematic reduction in resources being made available to CBC, Radio Canada, that organization is under attack. In fact, at this point it would not return to its original form, which had a rich regional programming base as well as a rich national programming base. It has probably gone forever in the form in which we once knew it. However, the rationale for what was done still exists. It can still be attacked by cutting, cutting and more cutting—by referring to its inability to raise the necessary commercial revenues to justify its programs. At some point in the near future I think that will cut into news and current affairs programs.

Honourable senators, that brings me to the last item in this picture that I want to draw to the attention of honourable senators. It relates to the general attitude about the CBC's inefficiency, namely, its crew-size problem—the number of people who go out on an interview, or whatever. It is a problem that must be dealt with at some point by the corporation by people who support the corporation and by the government.

The fact of the matter is that, if we want to have good quality programming, such as The National and The Journal, it is going to cost a lot of money. It does not involve only the people we see on the set. If they are not supported by good producers, researchers and writers, the program will disappear, because it will not be good enough to justify.

The problem with the CBC as a public corporation is that it has difficulty operating on a non-union basis. It has difficulty doing what a private entrepreneur-producer would do, which is to cut corners to avoid costs. At some point that has to be aired.

I agree with Senator LeBlanc, that the most serious attack on the CBC, Radio Canada, has been on the budget cuts. I believe it was the desire of the previous government to do that, but it did not do so because people fought against it. People, notwithstanding what was said by Mr. Trudeau and others, said "No", and so they did not cut it. The difference now is that this government is cutting, and the net result will be that we will not have a CBC if we go to steps three, four and five when we are now at steps one and two. That is the most insidious, dangerous and menacing thing that the CBC now faces.

Honourable senators, there is no particular magic to the words "national unity." It is, however, a laudable objective. Surely, those of us who want to have a country, including all of the provinces, would want to have that as an objective, and we would want all of our federal institutions to contribute to national unity. To simply say so is not a threat to journalistic integrity, and there is no proof that it has been any more of a threat than the words that are proposed to replace "national unity" or that would be added to "national unity" if the amendment proposed by Senator Stewart, which I support, is passed. I would ask all honourable senators to support this motion.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, the remarks made by Senator Hays are most useful and interesting, but only in the last few moments of his speech did he address himself to the amendment proposed by Senator Stewart.

Anyone is naive who believes that a news organization, a news room, a newspaper or a television station cannot be influenced by the views of the president, the managing editor, or whoever is in charge of that organization in the absence of any directive.

Senator LeBlanc mentioned Senator Murray's point with reference to the interview with Mr. Ouelette when he came rushing back to indicate that the Conservative Government under Mr. Diefenbaker, the famous preview commentator, had said "heads will roll." Of course that was the case. Any government would seek to control CBC.

Senator MacEachen: I do not know how you are doing.

Senator MacDonald: If we agree that the CBC is one of the non-government media, we could start the argument on the same basis, that it is "non-government media." Every witness who describes the CBC as being "government owned" is immediately called up and informed that it is the "publicly-owned" CBC. The basis of its integrity was laid long ago by a man by the name of Dan McArthur.

Honourable senators, I think that "national unity" is a term almost peculiar to Canada. I think of the self-absorption of that term. I do not think "national unity" means a damn thing. Many countries of the world would not know what we were talking about. National unity in Canada has become an obsession. It has become a slogan that we have to have everywhere. In this very chamber, Senator Davey made reference to an article which I attribute—perhaps incorrectly—to Rick Salutin, where he talked about the unholy alliance between the CBC and the Globe and Mail. Implicit in the statements Senator Davey was making was that the CBC was in some way supportive of Meech Lake.

Hon. Keith Davey: I still think it was.

Senator MacDonald: Apparently, honourable senators, the Meech Lake Accord was not everyone's cup of tea, but it was mine. I thought it was wonderful. Honourable senators, if I had found myself suddenly directing the CBC, you can be sure that the CBC would have been supporting what I thought at that particular time were the most minimal demands, conditions, under which we could have had a whole country. I now wonder whether the CBC should stand up and say that it has read the Allaire Report. They could say, "We at the CBC have just learned this thing and it is the funniest thing we have ever heard in our lives. It is laughable." There could be commentator after commentator, newscaster after newscaster, referring to this report, saying, "Quebec has just announced the funniest report and everybody is holding their stomachs in Edmonton laughing. It is hilarious." Whither national unity? Whither the obligation? Certainly, every government in this country, of every party, thinks the CBC is out to get them, and every party will do anything they can to control it. They will do it in the name of national unity; they will do it in any name.

• (1010)

To answer your question finally, during the hearings—and I think you were there—the evidence that this had happened was presented by Mr. Racine who, at the time of the crisis, was a journalist in Montreal. He said that supervisors were standing over the shoulder of every journalist to clear their copy. That, to my mind, is compelling evidence. That evidence was presented by Mr. Racine at one of the hearings. Don't tell me that reporters at the Toronto Star are not influenced by the views of Mr. Honderich. They do not need directives. I once asked John Bassett, the publisher of the Toronto Telegram, "What do you do with a reporter who does not seem to be following your editorial line or your view?" And Mr. Bassett said, "I would try to find a job for him where he would be more comfortable."

"National unity" has become a hangup. If you do not like "national unity" and you think "identity" is better or a stronger word, why not leave "identity" in there? If that means "oneness", leave it in there as it stands now.

Senator Frith: It is. You have it all wrong.

Senator MacDonald: He finds "identity" to be a stronger word than "unity".

Senator Davey: "Identity" is in our amendment.

Senator MacDonald: I know. It is in the bill now.

Senator Davey: As amended.

Senator MacDonald: If "identity" will do the job, why put back "national unity"?

Senator Frith: He is saying that "identity" will not do the job. That is why.

Senator MacDonald: I thought he did.

Senator Frith: I think you misunderstood him.

Senator Stewart: Is not the truth of the matter that you are quite prepared to have Parliament instruct the CBC to promote national identity, but you run from the expression "national unity" because, as you just now said, that expression has taken on a certain meaning in the context of the current political debate on the future of this country and that you do not want to promote national unity in this particular political context?

Senator MacDonald: Would you give me your definition of "identity" again?

Senator Stewart: "Identity" means absolute sameness, oneness. Then the dictionary goes on to the algebraic meaning of the term.

Senator MacDonald, what I am saying is that, if your argument is based on the danger that a government, or the top people in the corporation, will latch upon a certain expression to give directions to journalists, then that applies at least as strongly in the case of "national identity" as it does in the case of "national unity". However, you are prepared to live with "national identity" but not "national unity". So I conclude that the danger you fear is not direction. What you are saying is that the expression "national unity" has come to have a specific meaning in the context of the present public debate about the future of this country, and that you do not want to be on the side of those who believe in what this particular verbal symbol stands for.

[Senator MacDonald.]

Senator Murray: That was what happened in 1977, effectively, as I have demonstrated.

Senator Stewart: No. I think, Senator Murray, that the incident to which Senator MacDonald referred was the FLQ crisis of 1970. I see that Senator MacDonald is nodding his head. We were not told as evidence, but we were told in camera—and, as Senator MacDonald has referred to it, I feel free to speak—that, at the time of the FLQ crisis, journalists at Radio Canada found that supervisors were watching their copy, and that was found to be offensive, and that one of the purposes of removing the expression "national unity" from the act is to prevent that sort of thing from happening again. That is a fair statement of what we were told, is it not, Senator MacDonald?

Senator MacDonald: I think that we may have reached the point where we do not want a publicly-owned broadcasting system reporting to Parliament through a minister. We need the National Film Board. We need to bring back Grierson reporting to a minister, the Carry on Canada series, no reference to Parliament, just the minister! Marcel Masse can direct the way in which it will go. We do not need the CBC, just a propaganda agency. We will have to get another word for it. The National Film Board will sound too sissified. We will have to find something more management- oriented, something that will take direction and that will drive us into national unity whether we like it or not!

Senator MacEachen: Like the BBC?

Senator MacDonald: And we can have a room upstairs where they will make them cooperate. That is what we have to do. Put some teeth into it.

Senator Stewart: Senator MacDonald, you already have told us that you have no objection to the requirement being imposed upon the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that it promote "national identity". That expression does not scare you at all. You are eager to vote for it. On the other hand, the expression "national unity" causes you to cringe. I find it difficult to understand your mental process unless it is to be understood in the context of the present political debate. It would seem that, in the context of the present political debate about the future of the country, by deciding against this expression "national unity", you are opting for one side in the discussion.

Senator MacDonald: I think it is about time I surrendered. I cannot argue against unresisting—I do not want to use the word because the Speaker might call me out of order. It was just that over the course of all the hearings, national unity was not brought up. It was not a matter which concerned us. If I had to guess which amendments the committee might present, I would have put national unity down as number 36. I would have put review power as number 1, but national unity would have been number 36 because it was not mentioned and because everybody who had been an architect of any Broadcasting Act, or on any task force, or who had been president of the CBC, were all opposed to the obligation of the CBC to promote national unity. Now, today, I have learned a lesson on semantics from a professor that I cannot handle. I give up!

• (1020)

Senator Frith: I can see the headline: "National Unity Slips to 36 on Finlay MacDonald's Alltime Hit Parade"!

Senator Hays: I should like to ask a question of Senator MacDonald about Mr. Racine. While there was oversight and they were looking over the shoulder, according to him, there was no evidence of any interference with copy. I do not remember its coming up in any other context than at that one meeting. I agree with that. Senator MacDonald says no one asked about that. That surprises me.

In any event, I wanted to tell Senator MacDonald that there was no evidence of any interference. Whether or not he agrees with this, surely the issue is journalistic standards, which, in their simplest terms, are fairness and balance in reporting. Opinion is important to a journalistic organization, whether it is electronic or print; but the key is that there be balance and fairness in terms of presenting the other sides of the issue. By definition there is more than one side if an opinion is being expressed. It is difficult for a journalistic organization, whether it is the CBC or a newspaper, to deal with that. That has to be very difficult. Senator MacDonald mentioned Mr. Honderich of the Toronto Star. You do have an obligation to your readership or viewers.

I wonder if Senator MacDonald would not agree that this is what we are talking about and that the words "national unity", "shared national consciousness" or "identity" are just hooks people grab when they are mad. Here we are talking about an example where the government was mad because it did not think opinion was balanced. But whether or not that was the case, there does not seem to have been any breach or breaking through the management and board of the CBC into the newsroom and into the actual writing of the stories. If it did not happen, surely the words "national unity" were not the issue; the issue was whether or not the organization was presenting opinion on a particular issue in a fair and balanced way. Politicians reacted strongly, and they will do it again.

Senator MacDonald, I respect your judgment as someone who is steeped in this tradition. I know a little bit about this subject but not much. Am I wrong? The issue we are trying to talk about is that of journalistic standards and how any organization ensures that they are met.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I wonder if perhaps historians among us might not underline this day, February 1, 1991, and recall in the future that that was the day when we actually began the debate about the privatization of the CBC. What we have heard from Senator Hays and Senator MacDonald, and the direction in which we have been urged by Senator Stewart, points us in no other way than toward the realization that our chief concern should be with the perception of what the CBC is or might be and not what the CBC is and is trying to be.

Senator MacDonald got very close to the perception of the CBC when he was talking about the unique situation we have in the way we deal with our national broadcasting system. In almost every other country in the world, if it was said in a radio broadcast today that the revolutionary guard was approaching the Parliament Buildings, there would be a comma, and then it would say "according to a government-owned broadcasting station." That is shorthand for "this is propaganda we are giving you."

I wonder if there is anywhere left in the world where they say something about Canada and then say afterward "according to a government-controlled broadcast today." That is what we invite when we start to deal with nice phrases that do not have a precise meaning. We know that they are given precise meaning. We heard Senator Gigantès' fit of venom this morning when he talked about the Leader of the Government in this chamber as being one of the agents of disunity. I forget his exact words.

Senator Murray: Enemy of the state.

Senator Doyle: Enemy of the state. We will report that. Senator Murray has been accused of being an enemy of the state. That is because he was the champion of the Meech Lake Accord. He was our white knight. But those on the other side disagreed with the Meech Lake proposition. You brought your chief spokesman, Mr. Pierre Trudeau, here, who argued that the accord should be thrown out, that it was the job of the provinces and the Senate to throw it out. It was going to get us nowhere. I believe, like Finlay MacDonald, that it was our last real hope of trying to achieve some accommodation with Quebec that would be realistic and intelligent.

Now, were you preaching disunity on your side? Were we preaching it on our side? Is that the kind of definition we want enshrined in the act? If it is, Senator Stewart, then I would suggest to you that you also find a place for the support of democratic institutions. We are all in favour of them. How about Christian charity? We are all in favour of that. How about Judeo-Christian culture? We certainly believe in that. What about holy orders? We all aspire to them.

Senator Davey: How about Progressive Conservative? There is an oxymoron.

Senator Doyle: What about Liberal, with or without upper case?

Senator Barootes: Sell the CBC to the Toronto Star!

Senator Doyle: There is a good suggestion. We would not want to sell the CBC to John Bassett.

Senator Davey: Or to the Globe and Mail.

Senator Doyle: Or to the Globe and Mail. You just proved, with the help of Rick Salutin, that the Globe and Mail is an enemy of the state.

Senator Frith: That would be superfluous or redundant!

Senator Doyle: Sell it to the Toronto Star. There is the answer to the problems of the world. Senator Davey knows more about the Toronto Star than any other man, other than Beland Honderich.

Senator Davey: I know almost as much about the Toronto Star as you, senator, know about the Globe and Mail, but not quite as much.

Senator Stewart: Would Senator Doyle permit a question?

Senator Doyle: I am sure Senator Davey will agree that one can never tell about any instrument of the press any more than we can tell about how things may change in this chamber from day to day. I will tell you this about the Globe and Mail: At the Globe and Mail I never saw anything that resembled a corporate unity, to say nothing of national unity. What the editorial page ordains, the rest of the staff feels they must fight. That was the red flag. That we were interfering with reporters' idealistic position on journalistic integrity. That is something else we might enshrine in the CBC act. There was always division. There was a strong fight, as strong a fight as one will ever find in this chamber, of one kind against another. I am sure that Senator Chaput-Rolland will have found the same thing in her long experience in this wonderful world of journalism.

• (1030)

Senator Davey: Senator Doyle, your references to the Globe and Mail just recently were all in the past tense. Would you make those same statements about the Globe and Mail today?

Senator Doyle: I would not make those statements about the Globe and Mail today because I am not in a position to know. I might get a research grant and go after it and see if I can write a paper and produce it. That might be a worthwhile undertaking. We can do them for our side, but better still, why don't you do the Globe and I'll do the Star?

Senator Stewart: While Senator Doyle still has the floor, I should like to ask him a question. I think we ought to get away from this parochial discussion, which is of interest only to those who come from Toronto.

Senator Davey: You should come to Toronto some time.

Senator Stewart: I hear such things about Toronto that I am not attracted.

Senator Doyle proposes that certain other words should be put in the bill. The truth of the matter is that we now have an act which includes the expression "national unity". It is a conservative principle that the presumption is in favour of the status quo. In other words, the presumption is in favour of the act as it now is. If it is to be altered and the words "national unity" struck out, there has to be a compelling reason. It is rhetoric to say that we could put in this or that other expression. The truth of the matter is we are not putting in, we are taking out. We are taking out "national unity". I argue that, since that expression is in the act, there ought to be a compelling and present reason before it is taken out. Senator Doyle has not told us what the compelling present reason is to remove the expression "national unity" from the act. Will he do so?

Senator Doyle: I am again in awe of academe. I never could understand that principle of leaving words as they are simply because they are there. I presume to understand that they were put there in the beginning because they sounded good, not because they were serving a particular purpose. However, I have never been able to understand why, when some people recite the Lord's Prayer, they include the words "for thine is the kingdom, the power and the glory", and others do not use those words. They must have had a good reason for taking them out or putting them in, although I just don't understand it.

Senator LeBlanc: To my surprise, as one who was brought up without the quoted words, I find increasingly they are used in the church that I still attend, but that is not the issue.

It is too bad in a way that we are having this discussion, because it is turning out to be an interesting exchange as we get away from some partisan aspects of it. If we were not having this debate on what appears to be the last morning of our sitting, I think it would be an important debate, and I am sorry that it did not take place before we froze the bill into its last form. With reference to Senator Doyle's suggestion about standards of professional or journalistic integrity, if I were to try and give a role to the news and public affairs division of the CBC, I think it is probably the only one that, by instinct, I would suggest. The judgment should be on the recognized standards of the journalistic profession. I think on that we probably would have agreed very quickly. By the way, I also feel that it would have been a happier phrase than a notion like national unity.

My question to Senator MacDonald is the following: I happened to have been involved as press secretary in the FLQ crisis. I was interested to hear the exchange involving the "looking over the shoulder" that Senator MacDonald referred to, and I think there was a man named Racine who was mentioned in that exchange. Did that relate to the period of the FLQ crisis, or did it relate to some other period as did the quotes Senator Murray used about Mr. Trudeau and others? In other words, was the testimony heard from this individual describing the "looking over the shoulder" at the copy during the FLQ crisis?

Senator MacDonald: That's a very good question. I do not know. When I returned to the testimony of Mr. Racine I referred to a period, and someone asked me if that was during the FLQ crisis and I nodded. I admit now that I do not know whether it was the FLQ crisis or leading up to the referendum. I do not know, Senator.

Senator Davey: For the record, it was the FLQ crisis. Also for the record, if you will recall, Mr. Racine made some reference to Mr. Pelletier, and I made a comment which I will now make to Senator Murray. Senator Murray spoke earlier and commented upon statements made by Mr. Pelletier. As I pointed out to Mr. Pelletier and as I now point out to Senator Murray, and he can only take my word because it is certainly nowhere on the record, Mr. Pelletier changed his mind those several years later on the concept of national unity.

Senator LeBlanc: If the reference is to the FLQ crisis, I might say as the one who at that point was directly involved with the media, I remember no circumstance—and some months ago now I looked at my notes of the time—when, as press secretary, I asked any news information group to be cautious in a given area where they did not fully cooperate. We are talking about people being kidnapped now and the security aspect of that. I know of one incident where I had to ask an editor to be very careful of identifying a possible site, and that was done at the request of the security people at the time. However, I know of no circumstance in which anything was imposed on anyone. In fact, there was cooperation either to be very careful about police investigation in order not to indicate what might be a location.

ABSTENTIONS

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

Ross—1

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment negatived.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I would like to speak briefly to Bill C-40 with particular reference to clause 45. I would like to read some pertinent parts of the clause.

Clause 45(1) states:

> The Board shall establish a standing committee of directors on English language broadcasting and a standing committee of directors on French language broadcasting, each consisting of the Chairperson, the President and such other directors as the Board may appoint.

Subclauses (2) and (3) speak to who shall preside and who shall preside in the absence of the chairperson or the president.

Subclause (4) states:

> The standing committee on English language broadcasting shall perform such duties in relation to English language broadcasting, and the standing committee on French language broadcasting shall perform such duties in relation to French language broadcasting, as are delegated to the committee by the by-laws of the Corporation.

• (1100)

In speaking to the first amendment moved by Senator Stewart earlier today, Senator MacDonald (Halifax) expressed some surprise that such an amendment had been moved. He suggested that none of the witnesses who appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications with respect to this bill had offered any complaints. Because a key witness who appeared before the committee—namely, the president of the CBC—complained and expressed very serious reservations on behalf of the directors of the corporation with respect to clause 45, perhaps Senator MacDonald would change his mind with respect to this particular amendment, which I shall be moving in a moment.

I should like to quote from remarks made by the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation when he appeared before the committee on January 15. He was talking about the concerns of the CBC and stated:

> The first of those items and the one upon which I can safely say that the CBC's Directors have the greatest concern is the provision in section 45 which calls for the establishment of standing committees of the Directors on English-language broadcasting and French-language broadcasting . . ."In section 3(1)(i) of the Bill, the Corporation is called upon to serve the interests of all Canadians, by reflecting Canada and its regions and contributing to shared national consciousness and identity."

Mr. Veilleux went on to say:

> In our view, the creation of separate committees on French and English programming would run counter to the spirit of those objectives and would introduce at the Board level a division which would be counter-productive, particularly at this point in time . . ."We believe it should be left to the Board of the CBC to determine the most appropriate means of meeting the goals set for the CBC and that this provision of section 45 of the Bill represents an infringement of that necessary freedom. Further, we feel that the exercise of responsibility for French and English language programming by these committees would run counter to the proper responsibilities of the Board as a whole." Accordingly we would recommend—

"we," the CBC board of directors,

—the deletion of section 45 from the Bill.

As I said the other day, honourable senators, the CBC has always had an unwritten tradition of collegiality between directors who are representative of the two founding languages, but there is a big difference between an unwritten tradition of collegiality and the entrenchment of permanent, separate decision-making at the very heart of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I am afraid that by passing this bill and including this particular clause we are merely contributing to further balkanization, to permanent division, as I said the other day, to a permanent rupture, to unnecessary misunderstandings and tensions at this time—at this fragile, crucial time in the history of our country.

Accordingly, honourable senators, I move:

> That the Bill C-40 be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows:
> Page 29, clause 45: Strike out lines 4 to 28 and renumber the subsequent clauses, and any cross-references thereto, accordingly.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I should like to go on the record with an amendment. I move:

That Bill C-40, An Act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto and in relation to radio communication, be not now read a third time, but that the Bill be amended as follows:

1. Page 5, clause 3: Strike out line 39 and substitute the following:

(vi) contribute to national unity, shared national con-

2. Pages 22 and 23, clause 28:

(a) on page 22, strike out lines 27 to 48;

(b) on page 23, strike out lines 1 to 28; and

(c) renumber clauses 29 to 44, and any cross-references thereto, accordingly.

3. Page 29, clause 45: Strike out lines 4 to 28 and renumber the subsequent clauses, and any cross-references thereto, accordingly.

Honourable senators, this motion in amendment has to do with the references to the power to review clause.

I am still distressed about the fact that this government will have a power of direction and a power of review. I think the Governor in Council has too much power. I think that power should be cut back and I have spoken about this often. The way it should be cut back is to remove the power of review, and I would so move.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Atkins, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cochrane, that the bill be read a third time now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to make a short intervention about the dimension of this bill that touches on CBC cuts. I do so because of a speech, a copy of which I received in the mail last week from a David K. McGown, the Director of Governmental Relations at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. The speech was written by Mr. R. D. Fullerton, the Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of the CIBC.

I speak about the effect that this bill, along with many other government programs, has upon the CBC and the role of the CBC in Canadian cultural life. The speech is entitled: "'To Be Or Not To Be': The Hamlet Syndrome in Canada." It begins as follows:

Two events took place last month which typify the challenges Canada faces at this crucial point in its social and economic history.

Here at home, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation reduced staff and cut back some of its regional programming.

And in Brussels, the latest round of negotiations among countries participating in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade reached what many observers fear is a permanent impasse over the issue of agricultural subsidies.

● (1110)

The cuts to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation have provoked considerable outrage within the media and among many Canadians. As with earlier decisions—

That is, decisions of this government.

—to reduce Via Rail service, privatize Air Canada and do the same thing with Petro-Canada, this action seems to have hit a collective nerve. A precious emblem of national unity was being undermined. At least that's the way many people saw it.

> Meanwhile, the GATT deadlock—which could have a profound effect on the welfare of a trading nation like Canada—evoked hardly a murmur of protest or concern from the general public.
> I find the difference in the way Canadians have responded to these two events quite instructive—and disturbing.
>
> It suggests that we are preoccupied, almost obsessively, with only select aspects of nationhood—like the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, like Via, like Meech Lake.
> The disturbing part is that the more we focus on these matters, the more we neglect the equally substantive issues upon which the destiny of this country really rests—

I repeat:

> . . . upon which the destiny of this country really rests—issues such as the changes under way in world trade, the competitive challenges we face in the global marketplace, and the paralysing burden of our national debt.
> But the situation goes beyond mere neglect.
> It's almost as if we prefer constitutional turmoil, national soul-searching and internal bickering. Indeed, it often appears to me that we use these time-honored Canadian pastimes as excuses $%not$% to make the decisions and $%not$% to take the actions necessary to survive as a dynamic, confident player on the world stage.

Obviously, "world stage" means the world business stage. It means the world of profit and losses, the world of dividends for shareholders and bonuses for management. He goes on:

> You might even say that Canada suffers from the "Hamlet syndrome"—a bias toward self-absorption and self-doubt when decisive action is what's called for.

What has happened to these national symbols under the administration of this government is that we have taken up the national-international moral standard and value system of profit, and it has been successful. Ordinary people who do not own any shares, who do not know anything about business, who do not know anything about the Chicago futures market or the "Big Board" on the New York Exchange are starting to believe that the only real value in life is the value of making a profit. Of course, that profit is not shared equally with the people about whom I have just spoken. That is the identity crisis that this speaker seems to feel we are facing, that we feel that we are too identical, when we agree on the value of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and what it means to each Canadian's cultural life, on what Via Rail means as a national symbol to a Canadian or on what the Constitution means to Canadians. These are second- and third-rate values compared to those that, for example, create jobs.

I maintain that this is the basic central value system upon which this government operates. I have come to that conclusion on the basis of its actions. It justifies everything it does, especially what it does to cultural institutions in this country, on the basis of the reduction of the deficit. I know it is pressured into such actions by international business. For example, if the government tries to appease some woman who has three children to raise, is caught in the cycle of poverty, is trying to make a living for herself but cannot because she does not have day care because we have to reduce the deficit, what do they say to her when she asks, "Oh, does that mean that if I put up with no day care for a few years, you will reduce the deficit and then I will get day care?" Has anyone who has said that the most important national goal is to reduce the deficit ever told that woman when we have done it we will get back to some of these things that really touch upon people's lives? What does this woman know about the deficit? How can we explain to her that she will have a better life? That is what the government is there for, to give the governed a better life. Will she have a better life when the deficit is reduced?

Of course, the answer is, "There will be more jobs. Big business will invest and maybe take less profits and spread the money arouAA&N= Agoverned a better life. Will she have a better life when the deficit is reduced?

Of course, the answer is, "There will be more jobs. Big business will invest and maybe take less profits and spread the money around." The woman then says, "Oh, that's fine. Then I'm going to get day care." The reply will then be, "Oh, no, you're not going to get day care. Did you ever hear anyone say that you are going to get day care once the deficit is reduced?" The bottom line in all of this will be a national system of Philistine values. The metaphor that is used on page 3 of this speech is that Canada is becoming a Hamlet, too introspective, too worried about these values about which Hamlet was concerned. The speaker goes on to say:

> Hamlet thinks a lot. But he doesn't do anything.

On page 4 of the speech, he says:

> That's the "Hamlet syndrome." And there's evidence that Canada is turning into the Hamlet of the late 20th century. While other nations are busy exploiting developments in the global economy, this country sometimes seems bent on avoiding them.

Senator Murray: Whose speech is it?

Senator Frith: It is R.D. Fullerton's, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. He goes on:

> Take the whole matter of trade, for example. Few people, especially a Vancouver audience, . . .

That is where he was speaking.

> . . . would argue with the fact that trade is absolutely essential to Canada's position as an industrialized nation.

Of course it is, but why must we accept the corollary that therefore there has to be a cutback in cultural values? Money has to be spent on cultural values just as it has to be spent on economic values and trade values. On page 13, Mr. Fullerton says:

> We won't, for instance, be able to have world-class social programs unless we first become a world-class > competitor, capable of producing the wealth that can sustain those programs.

What do we want the wealth for? What do we want world-class social programs for? To make life better and culturally richer for our citizens, we hope. Is that all that "better" means? Does it not mean the enjoyment of Canadian cultural institutions and cultural activities? But that seems to be way down the conveyer belt and the cuts are always taking place in areas that are considered frills. If we accept that standard, then we end up with Philistine rather than artistic values.

● (1120)

At page 21, in conclusion, Mr. Fullerton says:

> And that national unity is not something that can be legislated or imposed from above. It grows from within—out of belief in ourselves, confidence in ourselves, and pride in ourselves.

Honourable senators, I agree, but belief in ourselves about what? Is it our ability to show huge profits and rich dividends? Is that what we want to believe in? Is it confidence in our ability to compete and, therefore, again produce world-class "Fortune 100" companies? Pride in ourselves about what? About world-class companies or about world-class cultural organizations like CBC?

Mr. Fullerton went on to say:

> Those qualities do not come from talk, debate or discussion. Nor do they emerge out of self-absorption and self-pity. They are forged in the crucible of action, decision and, most of all, success.

Speaking for myself and my own life as a Canadian, I am more proud of the success of the CBC and have received more in life from the success of the CBC than I believe I ever have received from the success of a company on the "world stage." I do not brag about that, but I certainly brag about the CBC. It is one of the institutions that make being a Canadian something to believe in, to have confidence in, and to have pride in ourselves. I flag this because I believe it is an illustration of the road we have been led down by this government and the value system that this government and its closest ally, big business, is creating in this country. I think it is important that we recognize it as yet another example of what is going on.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, the fact is that this bill is badly flawed. That is really quite remarkable given the fact that the bill has been kicking around for more than five years and, of course, its predecessor is now 13 years out of date.

In my judgment, honourable senators, our amendments were just the tip of an iceberg. What we can expect is more advertising, more and more lowest common-denominator American programming and, as always, many more effusive, fulsome commitments to Canadian programming. Still, honourable senators, the bill's time has probably come and that is primarily because of ongoing technological change. The need for new legislation has become and will become paramount as we move towards the twenty-first century.

The CBC cuts came at a most untimely moment for Senator MacDonald and Senator Atkins. In the process, may I say that I congratulate them both for the way they have handled this report. In my judgment, the very existence of the CBC is threatened as never before, and threatened as never before by this government which, for heaven's sake, is even afraid of "national unity."

Honourable senators, I want to quote remarks made by the President of the CBC, Mr. Veilleux, when he was speaking to the Canadian Club in Toronto. He said:

> . . . CBC is in very real and serious danger of dying the death of a thousands cuts.

Mr. Veilleux made that comment within the last ten days.

I should also like to quote comments made by Mr. Pierre Juneau, one of Mr. Veilleux's predecessors, when he spoke to a group in Toronto. He said:

> I'm of the view that continual decimation of CBC's budget over the last six years had already had a sorry impact on CBC's ability to carry out its mandate.

Both Mr. Veilleux and Mr. Juneau added an additional comment. In his presentation, Mr. Veilleux went on to say:

> I alone cannot decide the future of the CBC. It is for the public to decide the future of its public broadcaster.

That is the message of a good bureaucrat who, incidentally, is someone I respect.

Mr. Pierre Juneau, on the other hand, is unchained. The newspaper article says the following:

> In a scathing attack on federal funding policies, Juneau said the Conservative government is hypocritical in promising the public more from the network while slashing its ability to even keep up present standards.
> "I can envision a time when the television aspect of the CBC might disappear completely.
> "There are those in government who have always had it in for the CBC," he said.

To that, honourable senators, I would say "Amen".

Honourable senators, I do not quarrel with some of the things said earlier by Senator Murray. Too many Liberals have been critical of the corporation. But the most insistent critics of the corporation over the years have been, and no doubt will continue to be, our friends opposite. I, for one, have very grave doubts and concerns about the future of the corporation.

Meanwhile, honourable senators, the CRTC has acquired new leadership, leadership which is now just a few weeks old. The new chairman of the CRTC, David Colville, announced, in a story in the Globe and Mail that public hearings in March will examine the effect of CBC cutbacks. In an article in The Citizen it states:

> In a prepared statement, CRTC chairman David Colville said the hearing will consider the changes in light of CBC's mandate, CRTC expectations, the availability of other sources of information and entertainment in the affected communities, CBC's existing resources, and "the impact of potential further cuts."

Those hearings are to begin in the middle of March in Hull.

Honourable senators, I had not met Mr. Colville until Senator MacDonald produced him as a witness at our committee. I was extremely impressed. I thought he was a man of vigour, intelligence and commitment and I rest just a little more easily about this bill because of the presence of people like Mr. Colville.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

EUROPEAN BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT ACT

THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-88, to provide for the membership of Canada in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Senator Davey.]

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, this is an important bill. Its purpose is to provide for the membership of Canada in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. If any senator doubts the importance of the bank, she or he should turn to pages 7 and 8 of the bill, where the purpose and functions of the bank are described. We are told there:

> To fulfil on a long-term basis its purpose of fostering the transition of Central and Eastern European countries towards open market-oriented economies and the promotion of private and entrepreneurial initiative, the Bank shall assist the recipient member countries to implement structural and sectoral economic reforms, including demonopolization, decentralization and privatization, to help their economies to become fully integrated into the international economy by measures:
> (i) To promote, through private and other interested investors, the establishment, improvement and expansion of productive, competitive and private sector activity, in particular small and medium-sized enterprises;

then the article goes on with a list of other measures that the bank is to promote and assist. In other words, the bank has to do with the reconstruction—economically, politically and socially—of parts of Central and Eastern Europe. It is a very important undertaking; consequently, the bank is very important.

The bank is to have its headquarters in London and there are to be 23 directors. The work of a director is a full-time job. Eleven of these directors are to come from certain specified European countries, such as France and England. There are to be four directors from other European counties, such as Norway. There are to be four directors from the Central and Eastern European countries that are to be recipients of the functions of the bank. Finally, there are to be four non-European directors. Canada, by reason of the size of its participation in the bank, would be one of the four countries eligible to have one of the four non-European directors.

Obviously, it is to be a very important bank. Consequently, the directors bear great responsibility. We do not know yet who the Canadian director will be. One could talk about the grand salary which undoubtedly the director will receive. He or she will be paid by "City" standards, perhaps 80,000 pounds per year, and there undoubtedly will be a suitable automobile and expenses. One could let one's imagination run free in this area, but I think it is more constructive to emphasize the requirement that Canada be represented by a highly competent person as a director of this bank. One would hope that this appointment will not be used for patronage purposes. That does not mean that a Progressive Conservative should not be appointed. If the appropriate person for the appointment is a Progressive Conservative, then so be it. I have no objection to that.

Hon. Duff Roblin: That's damned nice of you!

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: It is difficult to find a competent Progressive Conservative, he means, but if you find one, it is okay.

Senator Stewart: No, that is not what I said. I did not hear the undoubtedly very important interjection from Senator Barootes.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: I didn't say anything!

Senator Stewart: Oh, I see.

Senator Roblin: I demand that the comment be attributed to me! Senator Barootes is quite guiltless on this occasion.

Senator Barootes: The hearing is the second thing to go!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): At least on this occasion!

Senator Stewart: You are on the same axis from where I stand, and that is why I did not hear Senator Roblin's highly significant interjection.

Senator Roblin: I will give it to you again when I get a chance.

Senator Stewart: Well, if you don't want it on the record, then fine.

I wanted to say a word about the cost of Canada's participation in the bank. If we look at the bill, we notice that clause 6(1) provides the following:

> The Minister may provide for payment out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund to the Bank, in the manner and at the times provided for in the Agreement, of an amount not exceeding one hundred and twenty million American Dollars, in respect of Canada's initial subscription of shares.

And then we have a subclause 2 which provides as follows:

> The Minister may provide for further payments to the Bank, in the manner and at the times provided for in the Agreement, in respect of supplementary subscriptions of shares, from funds authorized for that purpose in an appropriation by Parliament.

The committee was told by witnesses from the Department of Finance that this bill was accompanied by a Royal Recommendation not because of clause 6(2) but because of clause 6(1). In other words, clause 6(1) is the only clause in the bill which appropriates money.

• (1140)

The brief presented to the committee from the Department of Finance contained the statement:

> Canada's subscription to the EBRD will not increase the budgetary deficit though it will be added to the Government's borrowing requirements.

I think it is important to realize that it is not true that there will be no cost to the taxpayers as a result of Canada's participation.

Even if Canada were in a surplus position, there would still be a cost for this subscription, to the extent that the money so used could earn income if invested elsewhere. However, Canada is not in a surplus position, but continues to support a large debt, to which will be added the money borrowed to meet our obligations as a participant in the new European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. When the representatives from the Department of Finance were asked if they could give us a rough figure as to the costs, they conceded that as of that moment they had not made the calculation.

But if we calculate, using simple interest, at the average weighted interest rate for current government borrowing of 10.258 per cent, the debt will have increased by approximately $185 million over the five years through which Canada will be making its paid-in contribution of $150 million, including approximately $35 million in interest costs, and will continue to increase by more than $19 million per year thereafter. This cost does not include any additional amounts Canada might contribute by means of replenishment or which might be called in from the Canadian unpaid subscription of $280 million.

That is the long way of saying, honourable senators, that our participation in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development is not simply a gesture. We are taking on a financial burden, which, in our present financial circumstances, will increase the deficit and, thus, the debt. That is not an argument for staying away from the bank, but it is a point that ought to be mentioned when we are cutting back on government activity in other areas. This is an important undertaking. The bank has the potential to do a great deal of good work. Our director could perform an important role; and, if all that is done, the costs we as Canadian taxpayers will have to bear will be well justified.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, there are at least three points on which my honourable friend and I find ourselves in agreement, but I must first begin by expressing my appreciation to him of the businesslike way in which he conducted the affairs of our committee to enable the bill to be brought before him at that time. I want to thank him for that.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: I agree with him that this is an important bill, and I also agree that it is not objectionable that a Progressive Conservative should actually be appointed a director of this company. I am pleased to know that has his approbation.

I would also like to say that he is right about the money. Witnesses appeared before us with the suggestion that this represented no drain on the public treasury. I suppose that from a detached and arcane chartered accountant's point of view, you can make that argument; but the fact is that over the first five years, in which we have to contribute $30 million a year and $150 million at the end of a five-year period, that will undoubtedly have to be financed by borrowing, so we can expect that an interest rate of 10 per cent could well be ascribed to the cost of this endeavour.

I agree with my friend that this is the right thing to do. It is the right thing to do because this bank has a unique function. It is not designed to bolster governments, no matter how well-meaning or deserving they are. It is designed to help the private enterprise sector undertake activities in Eastern Europe that they might otherwise be unwilling or unable to undertake. I think that is an important difference. It is designed to help the private enterprise sector make a contribution in the reinvigoration of the economies of eastern Europe. Sixty per cent of the fund is dedicated to that end. The other 40 per cent will be made available to governments in instances where they are improving the infrastructure necessary for an economy to operate, such as a telecommunications system or matters of that kind. However, it is not intended to support their budgets, deficits or, as I read the information we were given, national objectives that are unsuited to the circumstances. So this bill has this particular characteristic of a bank which is different from the other international organizations of which we are a member.

I would like to draw the attention of the house to an interesting point in the bill—it was also mentioned by Senator Stewart—which has to do with the purpose of the bill. It says that the bill is to promote the transition toward open market-oriented economies, to promote private and entrepreneurial initiatives in Central and Eastern European countries and is committed to and applying the principles of multi-party democracy pluralism and market economies. I do not know of another institution of this kind that has pinpointed that so directly.

The question then arises: Who are the people who will be conducting themselves in accordance with the purposes of this bill? Does it apply to the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics at the present time? Does it apply to Romania or Bulgaria? These are good questions, and one would have to say that it is going to take a good deal of consideration on the part of this new bank to decide how to handle it.

In fact, it is recognized that there may be a problem, because in one of the provisions of the charter under which they operate, there is a clause, which is on page 12 of the bill, dealing with the fact that some of the people to whom they are giving this money may not be operating in accordance with the purposes of this bill, they may not be multi-party, democratic, et cetera. In that case, the board of directors have a responsibility to consider the situation, and, if three-quarters of them consider that the recipient is not living up to the purposes of this bill, then they can do something about it.

I am at a loss to say how this will actually work out in practice, because one can see that while it is all very well to include these conditions in a statute, when it comes to the operation of the bank itself, one can easily envisage that there may be difficulties which will have to be surmounted. It will probably end up that the pure milk of the word, as recorded in this piece of legislation, may be subject to considerable interpretation in order to make it as useful as those operating the bank hope it may be.

However that may turn out, I think this bill deserves the support not only of this house but of the Canadian nation. We are making a constructive contribution to the reconstruction of Eastern Europe. Our share of this operation is 3.2 per cent, which is par for the course with respect to our percentage of holdings in international financial organizations of this kind. So I recommend this bill to the house and hope it will receive quick support.

THE CONSTITUTION

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stewart:

That the Prime Minister and the Minister of Federal-Provincial Relations resign because they do not have the confidence of Canadians to speak for the federation in negotiations with Quebec.—(Honourable Senator Gigantès).

Hon. Senator Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, when I adjourned the debate in my own name yesterday, I was saying that what happened in the 1982 Constitution can be summarized, leaving out the details, as having Canadian nationalists believing that Quebec had been given more or less what René Levesque had asked for in the constitutional proposals that he and seven other premiers presented on April 16, 1981. On the other hand, Quebec nationalists said that the content did not matter so much as the process by which a new Constitution had been adopted by Canada over the objections of Quebec. And this, I said, was the nightmare of Quebec: that the English-speaking population would increase to such an extent that some day Quebec would face a change in the Constitution which it did not want.

So the process was frozen before the last essential stage, I said in concluding yesterday; the Constitution had been patriated; the Charter of Rights had been adopted; a less rigid amending formula had been adopted, but the renegotiation of the division of powers as between the federal and provincial governments, which was the whole purpose of the exercise, could not be undertaken because Quebec would not participate. And after passing the Constitution without Quebec's consent, the federal government did not feel it should rub salt into the wound by renegotiating the division of powers without the participation of Quebec's two main political parties.

This did not paralyse the country. It did not even anger Quebecers very much. After all, they knew that, more or less, the Constitution contained what Levesque and the Gang of Eight had asked for. Successive polls showed that substantial majorities in Quebec approved the 1982 Constitution. One Quebecer in particular, Brian Mulroney, praised that Constitution publicly and praised Trudeau for passing it.

Quebec nationalists hated it and continued calling the passing of the Constitution a betrayal. However, they were not gaining ground. They were falling in the polls. The Parti Quebecois was internally torn. It dumped Levesque. Federalists could hope that some day a new Quebec government would agree to use the 1982 Constitution and renegotiate the division of powers.

Then came the 1984 election. Brian Mulroney knew he had to win Quebec to come in with a majority, but the Tories were non-existent in Quebec. They had no electoral machine. So Mulroney allied himself with the Parti Quebecois. A large number of Parti Quebecois members became Tory candidates. Mulroney adopted their vocabulary. The 1982 Constitution, which he had praised, became, in his speeches, the betrayal of Quebec. His candidates went even further, and for this, among other reasons, they won.

So we had in Ottawa, for six years before the failure of the Meech Lake Accord, a government composed of a coalition of anglo Tories and Quebecois nationalists. There were Quebecois nationalists in the federal cabinet making speeches in Quebec that sounded like the speeches of Jacques Parizeau. Mulroney himself, when speaking in Quebec, used the vocabulary of the Parti Quebecois members in his cabinet.

Let me say that the Quebec nationalists in the Federal Parliament have every right to be there. They were elected. The people who elected them knew that they were electing nationalists. I have more of a problem when they become cabinet ministers and say that they see their primary role as that of defending their province. Is not the primary role of a federal cabinet minister to defend the federation as a whole?

My biggest problem is with Mr. Mulroney, because he has spoken with a forked tongue, on Meech Lake in particular. He presented it in English Canada as meeting minimal demands from Quebec and an agreement that changed little. He presented it in Quebec as a major step that would increase Quebec's powers.

● (1200)

My biggest problem is with Mr. Mulroney, because he has spoken with a forked tongue, on Meech Lake in particular. He presented it in English Canada as meeting minimal demands from Quebec and an agreement that changed little. He presented it in Quebec as a major step that would increase Quebec's powers; and that was how Gilles Rémillard, who was the Quebec minister responsible for negotiations with the rest of Canada, also presented it in Quebec's national assembly. This occurred on Friday, June 19, 1987. It is found on pages 8780-8787 of the French version. I will give you some small citations from it in French. He was saying:

[Translation]

What does distinct society mean?

. . . a standard of interpretation based on those two broad principles, duality and social distinctness, the > recognition that it is the role of the Government of Quebec, the National Assembly—this Assembly—to protect and promote Quebec's specific identity.

> The fact that this appears at the very beginning of the Constitution of 1867 shows how important these principles are and makes it quite clear that this interpretation is to apply to the entire Constitution of Canada. It is not just a standard for interpreting three, four or five points. It is a standard for interpretation of the entire Canadian Constitution, and this will be very important for the future.
> . . . thanks to this instrument, the division of legislative powers will become truly significant, because there are grey areas . . .

In the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society we have a fundamental instrument for interpreting this division of legislative powers.

Mr. Rémillard gives a few examples: communications, financial institutions, international affairs and, finally, all federal powers. He says that spending power applies not only to new shared-cost programs but to the old ones as well. I quote:

> Spending power does not mean the federal government has the right to legislate in areas under provincial jurisdiction.

If you take this and look at the list in the Allaire Report, you will see similarities that are very striking indeed.

Finally, Mr. Rémillard says:

> Subsequently, we will be able to start phase two . . . revise certain powers, restructure federalism in terms of this new approach taken in phase one . . .

Since Canada has bilingual reporters and translators, people were able to read what Mr. Rémillard said. What we have here is on the one hand, Mr. Rémillard's interpretation of Meech Lake, in other words, an Allaire Report, and on the other hand, the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations and Mr. Mulroney, telling English Canada: This means strictly nothing—the Meech Lake Accord is just routine.

This caused Mr. Trudeau to say:

[English]

It was said that Meech Lake would cause trouble because it turned out to be the major step that Quebecers were told it was and English Canada would feel betrayed; if it turned out to be the minor symbolic change that English Canada was told it was, then Quebecers would feel betrayed. To go a step further, Quebecers had the right to choose and should choose whether they wanted to be a province of the Canadian federation or whether they wanted to be independent: there is no other choice. That, of course, is true. No good Quebec nationalist would deny this truth.

The whole Meech Lake exercise killed Brian Mulroney's credibility. We have bilingual reporters, as I said previously. We have instantaneous communications. The contradiction between what he and his cabinet said in English Canada and in Quebec made English Canada first, and now Quebec, feel that they were the victims of a shell-game artist. I submit that Brian Mulroney was abandoned by his long-time friend, Lucien Bouchard, because Bouchard realized that he could no longer trust Brian Mulroney to handle the Quebec question.

Further, to make Meech Lake pass, Mulroney and his amanuensis Lowell Murray, resorted to grossly unbecoming public manipulation of provincial premiers and to truly sickening ego-preening in interviews. Pride cometh before a fall. Mulroney fell. Meech Lake fell with him. Having said so often that its failure would mean that the rest of Canada rejected Quebec, having sown the wind, he repeated the whirlwind. Ordinary people in Quebec were outraged. The outrage was abetted by the independantiste elite, which had been bitterly and publicly opposed to the Meech Lake Accord, was delighted by its failure and now bemoaned its defeat. All that is found in the newspapers, and honourable senators can find it.

In addition, the economic policies of the Mulroney government have led Quebec business people, the Chamber of Commerce among others, to declare that Ottawa was ruining them with high interest rates.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: The best years of their lives. What are you talking about?

Senator Gigantès: If you read French you would see. Federalism was no longer profitable. One should not blame these businessmen for the use of the word "profitable" when their premier has talked of profitable federalism.

Quebec businessmen have heretofore opted for staying within Canada, because they have felt that one way or another it afforded them a better chance of flourishing than independence. With the Mulroney economic policy pushing them into bankruptcy, they wonder if they might not flourish better if independent. The Quebec labour unions certainly feel that Mulroney's economic policy takes them further and further away from their goal of full employment. They see it as a policy of despair which denies that anything can be done both to cut the deficit and preserve and improve existing services, while moving closer to full employment. Such feelings are shared in the rest of Canada. The stark, cold and hard philosophy of the bottom line—that is, the law of the jungle—has led to the weakening of things that we believe made us a better society than the United States. The dying of VIA Rail, the weakening of the CBC, the sale of Air Canada, and now Petro-Canada, are all wounds inflicted on the Canadian sense of being different from the United States.

• (1210)

The reduction of federal subsidies to provincial education, health care and other parts of the social safety net have shocked the country and have contributed to the loss of confidence in Mr. Mulroney. He rides at 12 per cent in the polls. The Gulf War may help him temporarily, but only temporarily. He is no Mrs. Thatcher sending her armada to the Antipodes, landing 900 British commandos who defeated 13,000 Argentineans and took back the Falklands. Mrs. Thatcher, whatever else one might one think of her, always told her people precisely what she intended to do, and meant it. Mr. Mulroney could not do that if he tried. Moreover, as Mrs. Thatcher said of herself, "The lady is not for turning." Mr. Mulroney turns like a weathervane.

So, in the two and half years before the next election, if things continue as they are, we shall have a Prime Minister who is not trusted in Quebec and who is considered outside Quebec as being held prisoner by separatists in his own caucus. Quebec has come up with radical proposals for restructuring the federation. These are the most federalist proposals that we can hope for because Premier Bourassa, who asks in effect for all the spending power and who wants to discuss reform on a one-to-one basis with the federal government, is, believe it or not, closest to a federalist in Quebec.

The other provinces will not trust Mr. Mulroney to be their plenipotentiary spokesman in negotiations with Quebec. They cannot. He will, therefore, have his hands tied because the other provinces believe that he is a prisoner of the separatists in his caucus. They feel that the separatists who are there can move out and put him in a minority situation at any time. The people outside the caucus in other parts of Canada perceive it in this manner.

This is a major problem for Quebec because Quebec federalists, if honourable senators will accept Mr. Bourassa as being a federalist, will not have a federal voice, a federal interlocutor that the rest of the federation accepts. Being frustrated in their incapacity to discuss with somebody who is not an accepted interlocutor with the rest of Canada, in other words, Mr. Mulroney, Bourassa federalists will lose ground to the separatists who will say, with some reason, that the only way out of the impasse is for Quebec to leave first and negotiate later.

Many say Quebec cannot afford such a solution. I disagree. Indeed, Quebec would possibly lose $6 billion annually in net federal transfers, federal subsidies of one kind or another minus federal taxes, or $100 per head. That is not a negligible sum. Moreover, there will be a flight of capital from both sides of the Ottawa River. This will cause bitterness and make the divorce even messier than I fear it will be. Business people on both sides will demand profitable patriotism, and they will be aided and abetted by newspapers of the Toronto Sun variety. I can hear them now: "How dare you pave our sidewalks with traitorous bricks from Quebec, or traitorous bricks from Ontario as the case may be, when I, a patriotic Ontarian, have non-traitorous bricks to sell?"

Directly or indirectly, partly or in whole, 600,000 jobs are affected in Quebec by trade with Canada. That trade is worth $35 billion, and a similar number is affected in Canada. Surely, say the ostriches, their heads firmly planted in the sand, no one will disregard this bottom line.

Anglos and Francos both make the same mistake one about the other. They each think the other has a cash register for a heart. They are terribly wrong. A point is reached where sentiment takes over from accounting. One counts the costs and accepts them. I think Quebec would do that—count the cost, accept it as a temporary problem, leave and then negotiate with what remains of Canada.

That is another problem for Quebec. Because, when Quebec leaves, eight provinces will say to Ontario: "Your population gives you too much power. You must allow us to dilute this power through a Triple E Senate." I said that in Vancouver last Saturday. Ontario might think: "What is in this for me? Why should I be the milk cow for the poor relations in the Maritimes, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, when they no longer have to buy their refrigerators, washing machines and cars from me, but can buy them from the United States, thanks to the Free Trade Agreement?" Sometime after Quebec goes Ontario will leave. What is now Canada would be unrecognizable as Canadian. It would look like the United States, which is a hell of a lot better than some other countries, but less good than the Canada we know.

Those will be bitter times, and they will be blamed on Quebec in English Canada. Trade between Quebec and Canada will suffer. Those engaged in this trade on both sides will suffer. Neither side will be able to shift its trade quickly to the U.S.A., because the Americans have a trade deficit and they are not going to be an easy market in which to expand, free trade deal or not.

Barring a miracle, we have two and half years to keep it all from happening or at least to make it less painful than it will likely be. What we are facing is the negotiation either of a new marriage agreement or a separation agreement. There is no third option. That is what Quebec is proposing. We cannot escape it. All honourable senators on the other side of this chamber know it. Those who do not know it do not belong here.

Why two and half years? Because that is when the next general election might take place. The electoral map is a disaster area for the Tories. Barring a miracle, they know they will be wiped out. So they do not want to go to the polls any sooner than they have to, which means that during the two and half years when Quebec nationalists will be making their demands we shall have a bunch of petrified ministers in Ottawa led by a man no one trusts. Certainly, Canadians who are not Francophone Quebecers cannot trust Mulroney to represent them in negotiations with Quebec.

If we wait until after the next general election, things might be even worse. We will have got rid of Mulroney, but we will have a fragmented Parliament without the makings of a workable coalition. The western NDP might be a force in that Parliament, but it has not a clue on how to deal with Quebec. Harcourt is talking in British Columbia about being tough with Quebec. Neither has the Reform Party much of a clue about what to do with Quebec. They talk of tough luck. Quebec is not going to accept tough luck. Thus, it is the next two and half years that will make the difference, and it is anglophone Tories who can make the difference. They cannot stay in a coalition with the Quebec separatists in Mulroney's caucus. The non-Quebec Tories must seek other coalition partners.

I was discussing this with a Social Credit member of the B.C. legislature and was told that it was not easy to get rid of a leader. "Look at the trouble we have getting rid of Vander Zalm," this person said. I replied that the issue facing the B.C. Social Credit Party was not one of national survival. The issue facing the federal non-Quebec Tories is national survival.

It is, of course, in the personal interest of those Tories to dump Mulroney. The polls show that the only western seat that is safe for a Tory right now is that of Harvie André, which makes one wonder. Personal interest combined with the duty to save the nation is a powerful force. Suppose that it prevails, that a Tory Brutus slays Mulroney politically and that a coalition government is formed; what should that government do? Remember, I promised to give you not only an analysis of problems but an attempt at solutions.

I submit that the solutions I am about to propose have a chance of preserving the union or, if this cannot be done, of leading to a civilized divorce. Moreover, the economic components of these solutions would be good for all of us, including Quebec, whether it separates or not; and, of course, these solutions, these policies I propose, should help fulfil the three desires which, I said at the beginning, we all share, whatever our language, religion, ethnic origin or province: good health, good learning and good living.

Let us start with the preoccupation that the Tories have sold as the most important—the deficit and the national debt. I have been arguing for some years that the only way to reduce the deficit and, thus, the national debt is to have a full employment policy. In my book The Road Ahead, I pointed out that those countries which make full employment the cornerstone of their economic policy have over the long term had surpluses or very small deficits. In its latest report the Economic Council of Canada accepted this view, quoted me without a tip of the academic hat in my direction and declared that one has to increase employment to reduce the deficit.

Senator Simard: Get Trudeau back—please work on that!

Senator Gigantès: You are excused, Senator Simard.

The arithmetic is quite simple. In 1989 dollars, the unemployed or employable people on welfare had earned, on average, some $15,000 before losing their jobs. While still employed they produced, on average, $15,000 worth of goods and services. When they became unemployed, they cost society about $15,000 in lost tax revenue plus unemployment insurance or welfare payments. But they produced no goods or services. What we tax, our gross domestic product shrank, in other words; consequently tax revenues shrank, and consequently the deficit increased.

We should use part of the $15,000 the employable unemployed cost us to subsidize their employment. We would save money and wipe out the deficit. Let me provide one example only. Workers over 45 who lose their jobs do not find other jobs easily. There is no reason why they cannot be trained to give home care to the elderly, for instance, so that they can stay at home. That would cost many times less to society than institutionalizing senior citizens and it would create jobs. It would not be inflationary. This is only one example. In my book I have provided others. The scheme was checked for accuracy by the Economic Council of Canada, by Informetrica, a respected think tank, and by the economic researchers of the Library of Parliament.

We should get rid of our high interest rates. They kill small businesses, farms and home ownership. There are other ways to control inflation that are preferable to high interest rates. One is suggested by Robert Heilbroner and Lester Thurow in their book entitled Economics Explained, the latest edition. They would use the income tax to tax away year over year income increases above, say, 5 per cent when inflation threatens. Intrusion by the state in the economy—your free marketeers will scream. But isn't the manipulation of interest rates through government control of the money supply an intrusion by the state?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If I may interrupt you for a moment, Senator Gigantès, would it be your pleasure to adjourn the debate in your own name?

Senator Gigantès: I have only five minutes left.

Senator Simard: That is too much!

Senator Gigantès: I will not adjourn the debate in my own name; I will continue speaking, Mr. Speaker.

In an ideal free market world, totally unregulated by the "wicked" state, money should not be a state monopoly. Businesses and banks would issue their own money. Florentine bankers did just that in the Middle Ages.

But high interest rates, of course, are good for people who have money to lend. Remember we said that we now live in a world in which people with money can move it instantaneously from one country to the other.

Senator Simard: What did you do about that in 1983 and 1984?

Senator Gigantès: Wouldn't intervention by the state to subsidize employment creation—employment creation by business—and the use of the income tax to limit income increases as a means of fighting inflation be resented by people with money? Would they not hesitate to invest in Canada? Where would we find capital? I would imitate Quebec and go a step further. They have set up a Crown corporation called the Caisse de Depot, a sort of investment bank into which all public pension contributions are deposited for investing. Each province should have one of those investment banks, but not only for public pension contributions; all pension contributions, all RRSPs should go to the provincial investment bank and be used as development capital.

I have only a few minutes so I cannot give you much more detail.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Gigantès: The issue is: do we sink into the mindless selfishness of pure market economics or do we practice cooperative capitalism as do the full employment countries? If we want to keep our standard of living and have it improve, if only modestly, we have to adopt cooperative capitalism.

With deficits gone, thanks to full employment policies, we shall hear fewer cries for shredding our social safety net, including our health service. It is not perfect. But it is the best, according to the New England Journal of Medicine. Victoria, right in beautiful British Columbia, is making our health service work cost effectively through excellent administration. As a society, we spend substantially less than the U.S. on health care as a percentage of our gross domestic product. But we cover everyone. They do not—37 million Americans cannot afford and do not get health care. The president of a U.S. chain of hospitals pays himself $17 million a year—and there's the rub. Moneyed people do not like our system because it blocks such money making on the backs of the sick. Happily, since it costs less than other health systems, we can afford it.

With full employment policies, disappearing deficits and a decrease in national debt, we should not continue being so stingy about education, starting with superior day care. It is our greatest opportunity for betterment. It is not only a matter of money. I would have the federal government collaborate with a willing province, one of the poorer ones, to change the funding of universities, as an example for other provinces to follow. University funds would go to students as scholarship money, but only to those students who pass a tough entrance exam that demonstrates they know their two mother tongues—English and mathematics or French and mathematics. There would be a healthy dose of science and the humanities in the required mix. The message would soon percolate to the school boards, the high school teachers, the students and the parents that the days of marginally-educated people reaching university are over. The universities would meet their expenses through much higher tuition fees, which would be paid by the students with their scholarship money.

Would these policies keep Canada together? I cannot promise that. The policies would be good for Canada as a whole or for its component parts if it should fall apart. Such policies would signal that there is a collective will to fulfil our universal desires for good health, good learning and good living, caring for one another. With such policies, Iceland, which has fewer natural resources than Newfoundland, has twice the gross domestic product per capita that Newfoundland has. Nearly every member of Iceland's work force has a top high school diploma or better. That is the case for only 30 per cent of Newfoundland's work force.

Senator Doody: Come on, Senator!

Senator Gigantès: And unemployment in Iceland is less than 1 per cent, which is why they can afford all these good policies.

Again, would Quebec stay? I don't know. If it stayed, it would want some things the other provinces do not necessarily need. For instance, Quebecers feel that if they live outside their province they will lose their French identity and become assimilated into anglophone Canada.

• (1230)

Senator Barootes: You make a mockery of free speech, my friend!

Senator Gigantès: What is wrong with that? Nothing if you want it, but they do not want it. Ask those who resent French lettering on their cereal boxes if they would like to live where they would have to become French.

This means that Quebec has an extra dimension to its economic development needs, a French dimension. This means that it will feel uneasy about federal intrusion in any part of its education chain, including manpower training. These are things that are interchangeable from one English-speaking province to another, but not interchangeable between one English-speaking province and Quebec.

Can our provincial politicians understand that it is not a matter of Quebec getting more but of Quebec needing something different because it is different? What is needed can be done through the current Constitution. Under Article 43, it allows for negotiating arrangements specific to one province to suit that province's needs, and not just that Quebec has specific needs. It is not a matter of changing the Constitution. It is a matter of changing national and regional attitudes in a hurry.

We need a credible federal government to make this point convincingly. I made this speech last Saturday in Vancouver.

Senator Doody: I would have been there, had I known!

Senator Gigantès: I said to the audience, "Any one of you probably does not need more than her fingers and his toes to count the people in Canada who think Mr. Mulroney can be convincingly honest." I received a standing ovation on that one, and it was not a Liberal audience. We need a Tory Brutus. It is up to you, the voters, to take this message to the Tory caucus in the other house. The roar of the people is the voice of God, they say where I came from originally. I hope the people of the country roar for our Canada.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Antonio Lamer, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to cause Letters Patent to be issued under his Sign Manual and Signet constituting the Right Honourable Antonio Lamer, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, his Deputy, to do in His Excellency's name all acts on his part necessary to be done during His Excellency's pleasure.

The Commission was read by the Clerk of the Senate.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to establish the Canadian Polar Commission and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof (Bill C-72, Chapter 6, 1991)

An Act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute (Bill C-37, Chapter 7, 1991)

An Act to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation (Bill C-63, Chapter 8, 1991)

An Act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures (Bill C-69, Chapter 9, 1991)

An Act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada (Bill C-84, Chapter 10, 1991)

An Act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunication (Bill C-40, Chapter 11, 1991)

An Act to provide for the membership of Canada in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development (Bill C-88, Chapter 12, 1991)

An Act to implement the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (Bill C-81, Chapter 13, 1991)

An Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (spousal agreement) (Bill C-260, Chapter 14, 1991)

An Act respecting a Day of Mourning for Persons Killed or Injured in the Workplace (Bill C-223, Chapter 15, 1991)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

• (1250)

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Leave having been given to revert to Presentation of Petitions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable Senators, I am here with what Senator Doody has just described as the daily dose. I have six petitions from Quebec and three from Ontario. They are of the same form as previously. They are from St-Prosper, Disraeli, Quévillon, Victoriaville and Rochebaucourt. The first name on that one is a Simard.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): An intelligent Simard!

Senator Frith: They are fully signed with roughly 20 names per sheet.

The petitions from Ontario are from Tilbury, and there are two from Oshawa with one signature per petition. They are all against the GST.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, 26th February, 1991, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I move that all remaining Orders, Inquiries and Motions stand.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 26, 1991, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 26, 1991

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE HONOURABLE EUGENE A. FORSEY, P.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, last week a former colleague of ours passed away in Victoria. Being by nature generous of spirit and kindness, Canadians are often extravagant in their praise of fellow Canadians, including conferring the title "Great Canadian" on their colleagues. Then someone who egregiously merits that title comes along and one is found reaching for one's Roget. A Canadian whose life truly earned the title "Great Canadian" died last week in the person of Senator Eugene Forsey. He was too modest ever to think of himself as such and was so opposed generally to hyperbole or sloppy language that he would probably have been sparing in applying the title to others as well as to himself; but a great Canadian he really was.

Certainly I would not try to list definitively the elements that comprise merit for the title "Great Canadian," but I do know—and I think honurable senators will agree—that whatever they are Eugene Forsey had them. At a time like this it is very difficult to say enough, and yet it is hard to say too much. I do not want to list all of his accomplishments because I believe they are so well known to all of us. However, I do not want to avoid or overlook mentioning how many of his great qualities were the qualities of a great human being, quite beyond those he had as a scholar, a constitutional expert and a person of facility and wit in the English and French languages. It is at times like this that we reach for our thesauruses or other sources that synthesize or capture what it was that Eugene Forsey demonstrated by his life.

In the current issue of MacLean's there is an article that is headed, it seems to me very aptly, "Humor and eloquence, Eugene Forsey leaves a rich legacy." The caption under his photograph reads, "Forsey: biting wit and constitutional expertise."

He was surprisingly modest considering his accomplishments as a trade union leader, a philosopher, a parliamentarian, an expert in the English language, including its achievements in the Book of Common Prayers, and as a letter writer who would have been considered a champion even among the famous letter writers to The Times of London.

When discussing legal or constitutional matters with a lawyer, he would never fail to point out that he was not a lawyer. For example, he would say to someone like myself, "Of course, I am not a lawyer. What do you think of this?" I, and people such as my colleague, Senator Beaudoin, finally convinced him not to bother with the courtesy of saying that he was not a lawyer and that he valued our opinions much above his, because, of course, as that comment related to me, the situation was the other way around. It was perhaps even so in the case of Senator Beaudoin.

As further evidence of his modesty, that same article in Maclean's states:

> When he left the Senate, he declared that he was glad to retire "while the signs that I am going downhill are not as visible to other people as they are to me." In his lifelong pursuit of excellence, Forsey judged no one more strictly than himself.

Those of us in the Senate who remember him would certainly agree that if he was going downhill, those signs were certainly not visible to us.

Honourable senators, the stature he achieved, I think, is unequalled. Among all the other qualities we have lost with the passing of Eugene Forsey, Canada has lost a genuine oracle.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, on behalf of the government and all of our colleagues on this side, I join with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition in paying tribute to The Honourable Eugene Forsey.

Senator Frith referred to Senator Forsey's impatience with sloppy language and then went on to refer to him as "Senator" Forsey. I have to tell Senator Frith that the last time I referred to Eugene Forsey as "Senator" Forsey in his presence, he immediately corrected me. He said, "I am no longer a senator. You do not call retired senators in this country 'senator'. That is an Americanism." I immediately reverted to his academic title, "Doctor" Forsey and I shall do so in the remarks I will make today.

Doctor Forsey was appointed to the Senate in 1970 by Prime Minister Trudeau. He was named to the Privy Council in 1985 by Prime Minister Mulroney. The obituaries over the past few days have noted that he had been an Arthur Meighen and John Diefenbaker Conservative, a Pierre Trudeau Liberal, a founding member of the CCF, and a non-member but a sometime financial contributor to and voter for the NDP.

• (1410)

The record shows that, in his last biography furnished to the Canadian Parliamentary Guide of 1990, he listed his political party affiliation as "Independent." Independent he was, in or out of a party caucus, but Dr. Forsey was more than the gadfly he has been made out to be and much more than a self-described fringe player in Canada's academic, economic and political life.

Freedom and Order was the title of a collection of his essays published in 1974. He understood the limits of both freedom and order, and in what he wrote and what he said on politics and government, on economics and religion, he sought to show us the right balance. At his most incisive, his most biting, his most rhetorical, his most polemical, and at his funniest, Dr. Forsey was still a great gentleman, a gentleman in Cardinal Newman's definition. He did not seek to inflict personal pain on others. He could be ferocious in his criticism of ideas or policies with which he disagreed. Few, if any, of his friends were left unscathed. However, they remained his great friends and steadfast admirers because his sincerity and his integrity were so manifest.

Many honours and distinctions came to him: The Rhodes Scholarship, his Ph.D., the Order of Canada, the Chancellorship of Trent University, an honorary life membership in the Canadian Historical Association, the Fellowship of the Royal Society of Canada, and honorary doctorates from U.N.B., McGill, Saskatchewan, Waterloo, Trinity, Dalhousie, York, Carleton, Queen's, McMaster, Memorial, Acadia, Trent and Mount Allison.

Eugene Forsey was a stimulating, interesting public figure in this country for more than half a century. "I have been around a long time," he said, "I have known a great many interesting people. I have had three careers, all minor, academic, union and political. I have belonged to three political parties and two churches and been deeply influenced by a third. I have been blessed with an astonishing number of wonderful friends, far beyond my deserts, and I've had a lot of fun."

He was passionate in his Canadianism and he was also an internationalist. He was Canada's foremost critic and controversialist, never dull and always listened to with respect. The word that Senator Frith has chosen, "oracle", seems to me to be a most apt description of Dr. Forsey. Some countries have many such writers and commentators enlivening and elevating national debate and controversy. In Canada, in our time, Eugene Forsey was sui generis and now he is gone. His voice will surely be missed.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, the late Senator Forsey was not only a great national treasure, he was a great national resource. At one time or another I think he was in some way associated with every one of Canada's major political parties and gave generously of his advice and assistance to all of them if he felt that he could contribute to making this a stronger nation and assist in the process of national unity.

He was born in Newfoundland, as we all know, but his love for, and his interest in, all of Canada and its regions extended from the Atlantic to the Pacific. He had a great intellect and an acerbic wit. He prodigious memory was utterly stunning.

The last time I saw him was about six weeks ago. We had a visitor to the buildings, the great-granddaughter of Mackenzie Bowell who served briefly as a Conservative Prime Minister of this country. She said, "I have always regretted that I have never met anyone who knew my great-grandfather." She said, "Of course, it was so many years ago." A short time later we happened to meet Senator Forsey coming into the building. I cannot help but call him "senator." But here was Dr. or Senator Forsey coming in the door. I said, "This is the granddaughter of Mackenzie Bowell." He said, "Oh, it is a pleasure to meet you. The last time I saw Mackenzie Bowell he was hopping on a streetcar in downtown Ottawa." He said, "I want to tell you about a conversation that I had with him." His granddaughter was utterly stunned. Dr. Forsey had a photographic memory. He recalled in detail a speech that Mackenzie Bowell had made many years ago. He said, "Mackenzie Bowell was no great intellectual. I don't want to mislead you, but while your grandfather had no prodigious mind, he was a good man, a courageous man, who loved Canada. He was fair despite some strong beliefs he held with respect to his religious beliefs. Eugene Forsey then proceeded to recount other events in the life of Mackenzie Bowell. As a result, I supsect that Bowell's great-granddaughter had seldom experienced a more satisfying day.

It should be placed on the record—and I am pleased to acknowledge this—that Eugene Forsey was a great help to me when I was Leader of the Government in this place. He was always available to offer his advice and counsel, and I am sure he was the same with my friends on the other side of the chamber. As we engage in a national dialogue on Canada's future, we can ill afford to lose him. It is a severe loss. I am sure he would have wished to have contributed to the dialogue on the reorganization of Canada and its institutions. I join most heartily in the eloquent tributes that have been paid to the late Senator Forsey by the Leader of the Government in the Senate and by the house leader on our side.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérald Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I would like to add a few words in tribute to former Senator Forsey, whose achievements are not only well-known in parliamentary and labour circles but also in the academic world.

I know few experts on Canadian history as well versed in parliamentary history as Dr. Forsey. I have had the good fortune to meet other experts of this calibre, including Jean-Charles Bonnenfant and Maurice Olivier. Dr. Forsey wrote a great deal. We are indebted to him for having written so many articles, so many letters to the newspapers and such remarkable books as Dissolution of Parliament and Freedom and Order.

Dr. Forsey had a very independent mind and was known for his sometimes biting wit. Whether or not we agreed with his views, Dr. Forsey was always most interesting. On the subject of parliamentary history he was literally a walking encyclopaedia.

He spoke French extremely well. I remember our frequent exchanges, and he always insisted on speaking French. His French was excellent. He was quite modest, however. He always said: But I make mistakes! However, he made very few, and he expressed himself very well in French and, of course, in English.

I believe that in Dr. Forsey we have lost a great friend of the Canadian parliamentary tradition. I know few experts of his intellectual stature. He was also able to make a fine distinction between the strictly political and what was constitutional or parliamentary law.

He leaves Canadians an important legacy. As I said before, few people have written as much as he did on the subject of parliamentary and constitutional matters in general. We owe him a great deal. Our consolation must be the thought that his remarkable writings will remain for years to come.

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN COMMONS GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance will deliver his budget speech in the other place this afternoon at 4.30 p.m. May I be permitted to remind honourable senators that it has been the practice in the past that only senators have been admitted to the Senate Gallery of the House of Commons on such occasions, thereby ensuring that senators were not denied access to the gallery because many of the seats were occupied by relatives and friends of senators. I would ask for your cooperation in continuing this practice today.

BRETTON WOODS AND RELATED AGREEMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-93, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday, February 28, 1991.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

ANNUAL REPORT OF PARLIAMENTARY LIBRARIAN TABLED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the annual Report of the Parliamentary Librarian for the financial year 1989-90.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators will be glad to know that petitions against the implementation of the GST and requests by Canadians across the land for its revokation and for an election have been maintaining a constant flow during their absence from the Senate.

First, I have a batch of 233 petitions from the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

In each case, we have the statement that the new federal and universal 7 per cent goods and services tax introduced by the Conservative government will create hardship, and so forth.

The petition humbly prays that senators and members, who are the genuine representatives of Canadians, do everything in their power to block the new goods and services tax. The petitioners demand that an election be held immediately.

As I said before, honourable senators, there are 233 petitions. Each petition bears a number of names and signatures. Most of them are dated January. There are about 20 signatures on each petition. This means that during the month of January, more than 4,000 Canadians expressed their dissatisfaction with the government and its GST.

[English]

In the same period I also received four petitions from Alberta, one from British Columbia, one from Manitoba, one from New Brunswick, 13 from Ontario, and one that includes petitioners partly from Ontario and partly from Quebec. If the government feels that it can sleep restfully on the assumption that this tax has been swallowed by the Canadian people, I assure you that it has not.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Just table the petitions, please.

Senator Frith: Wouldn't you like that.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Your party would reject it!

An Hon. Senator: Yes.

Senator Simard: Would you get on with it!

Senator Hastings: We will get on with it.

Senator Frith: One at a time, please. Senator Simard is first.

Senator Simard: We do not need to listen to your speech.

Senator Frith: He has nothing more to say. He may be listening to the people for the first time in his life. Now, Senator Barootes, do you have something to say?

Senator Barootes: Is it your party's policy, if elected—heaven forbid—that you would do away with the GST?

Senator Frith: I certainly hope so, senator, on both counts: the election and doing away with the tax.

Senator Hastings: The election is certain.

Senator Frith: What was that?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Is that—

Senator Frith: We now have something from Senator Murray.

Senator Murray: Is that Mr. Chrétien's position, namely, that you would do away with the GST?

Senator Frith: You will have to ask Mr. Chrétien about that. That is certainly my position.

Senator Murray: Surely you speak for the leader.

Senator Frith: As far as I am aware it is also his position. Next?

Senator Barootes: You are the new leader replacing Mr. Chrétien.

Senator Frith: No. Tell me—

Senator Simard: Are you on a single plain, or what?

Senator Frith: First, Senator Barootes. I will be with you in one moment. Please wait your turn.

Senator Barootes: You will be in the second row next year.

Senator Frith: As they say at the meat market, "Please take a number. You are first." Who was next? I believe it was Senator Murray.

Senator Murray: No; I am finished.

Senator Frith: Senator Barootes, then? Or Senator Doyle, perhaps, wishes to speak?

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: You told us what you hope about Mr. Chrétien, but what sayeth Mrs. Copps? What does she say? She is the leader.

Senator Simard: Or Mr. Martin, for that matter.

Senator Frith: I have not had a chance to speak to Mrs. Copps about that, but I will. I will have an answer for you, sir. You will then be able to write another totally inaccurate article for "The Idler" on that subject.

Senator Doyle: Good.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SEVENTY-FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Tuesday, February 26, 1991

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

SEVENTY-FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee has examined and approved the budget presented to it by the Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee on the Process for amending the Constitution of Canada for the proposed expenditures of the said Joint Committee with respect to its examination of the process for Amending the Constitution of Canada, as authorized by the Senate on Thursday, January 30, 1991. The said budget is as follows:

Professional and Special Services	$ 85,080
Transportation and Communication	49,800
Other Expenditures	16,800
TOTAL	$151,680

Respectfully submitted,

ROMÉO LEBLANC
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator LeBlanc, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE BUDGET, 1991

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to give notice that on Thursday next, February 28, I will call the attention of the Senate to the budget statement to be made by the Minister of Finance on February 26, 1991.

QUESTION PERIOD

AGRICULTURE

GROSS REVENUE INSURANCE PLAN—NET INCOME STABILIZATION ACCOUNT—AMOUNT OF PRODUCERS' INSURANCE PREMIUMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a very serious question, one which I asked him some three or four weeks ago. It concerns the rest of the details respecting the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan and the Net Income Stabilization Account being offered by the federal and provincial governments to producers. I appreciate the replies I received from Senator Doody about one month ago. However, they were incomplete.

Apparently the Minister of Agriculture and his counterparts in the provinces have not come to the point where they have decided completely what the insurance premiums to be paid by the producers for these two programs will be. Can the minister reply today, or take as notice this question and obtain an answer as to when producers can expect to be offered a complete package? In this way they will be able to make the necessary management decisions to apply for either of these programs or only the crop insurance program which was in place before. I understand that this program is again to be offered in 1991, particularly in some areas where neither of these two programs is appropriate for this year. Some management decisions have to be made within the next two or three weeks in order for producers to participate in any of these programs.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I will take the question as notice with a view to providing whatever information is available on those matters at the moment.

Meanwhile I can tell the honourable senator that we can expect Mr. Mazankowski to be bringing in some legislation on those matters in the next little while.

Senator Olson: It is important to have the legislation, and I understand that. Even before it is brought in, having the rest of the details would let us know precisely what the premium rates, and so on, are going to be. Farmers will then be able to decide as to whether or not they want to participate.

PERSIAN GULF WAR

CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES—PRECLUSION OF COALITION COUNTRIES FROM PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, today a senior spokesman for the Soviet Union suggested that nations other than the 25 member nations of the allied coalition liberating Kuwait would qualify as members of a peacekeeping force, be it sponsored by the coalition or by the United Nations, when the cessation of military action in the Gulf region takes place.

Does Canada accept the Soviet notion that nations such as Canada, Denmark and France—all active members of the allied coalition—be precluded from peacekeeping when we all recognize that not only 28 nations but practically all the world, save Cuba and Yemen, supported the 12 UN resolutions against Iraq?

I assume that the suggestion from the Soviet Union is that these nations, Cuba and Yemen, would qualify, while Canada, France and other member nations of the coalition would be precluded.

Can the minister tell us what is the government's position with respect to this notion? Is Canada seeking actively to participate in peacekeeping when cessation of hostilities take place?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I think it fair to say that this country has both a good deal of experience and expertise in this field. The government has made it clear that that experience and expertise will be at the disposal of the United Nations for future peacekeeping efforts in the region.

I cannot say more than that at the moment. There is no peacekeeping proposal before us or before the United Nations at this time.

[Senator Olson.]

ENERGY

DISBANDMENT OF COGLA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Recently it has been reported that Maurice Taschereau, head of the Canada Oil and Gas Lands Administration, COGLA, has been transferred to the position of advisor to the Deputy Minister of Energy. There is much speculation that COGLA is about to be disbanded. If this is the case, can the minister advise us how the functions of COGLA will be carried on? If it is to be disbanded, is it being disbanded as a result of the recommendations of the federal Inuvialuit Environmental Review Board Report last July which was very critical of COGLA for not being prepared for a major oil spill in the Beaufort Sea?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, for the present, at any rate, my honourable friend's question with regard to the future of COGLA is hypothetical.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS TO ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Hon. Colin Kenny: Reports are circulating within the bureaucracy that it is, in fact, being disbanded. Memoranda are being circulated to that effect, which I think is more than hypothetical. Would the minister inquire and report back to the house if this, in fact, is happening?

While he is at it, will he make inquiries about my questions on this subject which are on the order paper and which date back to October 3 and 4? I have asked a series of questions relating to oil spills and the government's capacity to deal with them, including spills in the Beaufort Sea, which matters come under the responsibilities of COGLA or within its purview.

• (1440)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will take the latter part of the honourable senator's question first. One of his questions, dating from late October, will be dealt with by my friend, the Deputy Leader of the Government when he is giving delayed answers. I will make inquiries, as suggested by the honourable senator, as to the arrangements with regard to the future of COGLA and/or the mandate that COGLA presently exercises.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

REVENUES FROM TAX GREATER THAN ANTICIPATED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: I want to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether it is anticipated that there will be a shake-up in the statistical and economic analysis sections of the Ministry of Finance and the Ministry of National Revenue, in view of the fact that preliminary reports indicate that the yield from the GST is going to be much greater than anticipated.

As members of the committee, we were told everywhere we went that this was going to be revenue neutral, that no more money would be taken via GST in its first year than was the case with the manufacturers' sales tax. The Minister now says that he is bewildered, that he cannot understand how it happened that the yield from the GST is far larger than anticipated—exactly what the opposition suggested would happen. This represents a breach of faith with the Canadian people and a very serious dereliction on the part of the government.

Then we were told that the inflation rate would be only 1.5 per cent.

Hon. Earl H. Hastings: It would be 1.25 per cent.

Senator Perrault: My distinguished colleague with the photographic mind has reminded me of the figure of 1.25 per cent. That is double the anticipated figure.

Ministers who are unable to bring facts to the chamber, whether it's on the other side or in this place, and who deliberately mislead the Canadian people, should be moved to other less onerous responsibilities. We would like your answer to this.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, with regard to the inflation rate, the Minister of Finance has already dealt with this matter—

Senator Perrault: Not very well.

Senator Hastings: Blame it on somebody else.

Senator Murray: —not to my honourable friend's satisfaction, but he has dealt with the matter.

Senator Perrault: Ineptly.

Senator Olson: Is that the way we run the country now? A great way of doing things!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think it is an objective impossible of attainment to satisfy the honourable senator with any answer that the government gives.

That portion of the recent increase in the consumer price index, which is accounted for by the introduction of the GST, is very close to the 1.25 per cent.

Senator Perrault: Double.

Senator Murray: No, no, that portion of the increase that is accounted for by the GST is very close to 1.25—

Senator Olson: That is from December to January. Talk about January to January.

Senator Murray: Today is February 26. We do not have the January to February statistics yet.

Senator Olson: We have not got the statistics for February. We have January's and that's all.

Senator Murray: January was the basis of his colleague's question.

Senator Perrault: The inflation rate is now running on a 12 month basis over 6 per cent, the highest in years. That section attributable to the GST is 2.7 per cent.

Senator Murray: It is very close to 1.25 per cent. If my friend will examine the statement made by Mr. Wilson, he will see that a good part of the increase is due to taxes having been introduced in other jurisdictions. Be that as it may—

Senator Perrault: Try to blame the provincial Government.

Senator Murray: As for the revenue projections from the GTS, the GST has now been in force for less than two months and it will be premature in the extreme—

Senator Hastings: Tell your minister that.

Senator Perrault: What is the Minister making statements for?

Senator Murray: —to suggest that the GST is going to bring in an amount of revenue much greater or much less than had been predicted. The Minister of Finance and the Deputy Minister have told me, within the past little while, that we would not be in a position to calculate this until the fall, at least.

Senator Perrault: The policies of this government are devastating the country economically and there is no good news anywhere.

May I plead with the Leader of Government to at least assure us that in the budget that will be presented later this day consideration will be given to reducing that 7 per cent to a lower figure to at least provide some relief for the people of this country from the tax burden that has been imposed.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there is good economic news. Interest rates continue to come down, a tack which I am sure has not escaped the attention of Senator Olson—

Senator Olson: I am going to deal with that tomorrow.

Senator Murray: —who tells us he is going to deal with this matter tomorrow.

Further to that, it is clear from a good many of the think tanks and people in the business community that there are very real prospects for an early recovery from the present recession and a renewal of economic growth.

EXTERNAL RELATIONS

ECONOMIC AID TO POLAND—GOVERNMENT LOANS TO THAILAND—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, in October of last year I appealed to the Prime Minister of Canada, as well as to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to increase Canada's economic aid to Poland in view of the plight of the economic situation there, and I brought to the attention of the Prime Minister the generous loan which the Government of Canada accorded the Government of Thailand by having the Export Development Corporation lend Lavalin $800 million to build a $2.3 billion rapid transit system in the City of Bangkok.

We learned over the weekend that a military coup occurred in Bangkok and the leaders of the military junta stated that they overthrew the Government of Thailand because it was corrupt.

I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the federal government has taken any steps to investigate the Export Development Corporation's loan to the Government of Thailand which was overthrown last weekend, or whether it will stop any further loans to Thailand in view of the fact that it has been overtaken by military leaders?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will ask my colleagues, Mr. Clark and Mr. Crosbie, to whom the Export Development Corporation reports, whether they can provide any information on whether the status of this loan and this project has been affected in any way by the coup in that country.

● (1450)

Senator Haidasz: As the Leader of the Government in the Senate will recall, I prefaced my question on an appeal to the Prime Minister for increased aid for Poland in its present tragic economic situation. In comparing that situation with the situation regarding Thailand, I would like to say that later this week Canada will take part in a meeting of members of the Paris Club to discuss Poland's request to that Club and the International Monetary Fund to forgive 80 per cent of its debt. In view of the fact that we have heard that Canada opposes this request by Poland, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government to let us know whether Canada's opposition to Poland's request, as represented in the stories that are going about, is true, and, if so, would the Leader of the Government ask the government to review its opposition to Poland's request?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall ask for a report on the matter from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Clark.

SOLICITOR GENERAL

CANCELLATION OF CONFERENCE SPONSORED BY LIFERS GROUP AT JOYCEVILLE PENITENTIARY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate pertaining to the government's decision to cancel the conference at Joyceville institution which was to have been sponsored by the Lifers Group in that institution. By way of background, I should inform the government leader that the conference was in keeping with the policy of the Correctional Service of Canada to encourage the participation of inmates with respect to rehabilitation programs. It was part and parcel of the Correctional Service of Canada's policy to encourage inmates to participate in programs affecting their future. The conference was to have brought together approximately 100 inmates serving life sentences for first or second degree murder to participate in a conference at Joyceville institution with correctional officials and outside people interested in correction. The minister was briefed on this program in December. At that time he approved of the program and indicated as much in a letter dated December 4 to the Lifers Group at Joyceville, in which he said:

> Thank you for your letter . . . outlining the activities of your group and providing an agenda proposed for the conference you are organizing to take place in May 1991.
> The industry and commitment that your efforts entail are appreciated, and your suggestions and those of your fellow inmates, as well as the opinions of informed individuals such as those you have listed as conference participants, are welcomed in the continuing process of reform in our correctional system.
> I look forward to receiving any conclusions or recommendations arising from the conference that you may wish to forward to this Ministry. I wish your group well in this current endeavour and its ongoing activities.

The conference received widespread support from the press and from many interested correctional organizations in Canada. Indeed, the chairman of the National Parole Board said, in a letter to the Lifers Group, that he would be interested in attending and participating in such a worthwhile endeavour. The commissioner of the Correctional Service of Canada, Mr. Ole Ingstrup, supported the conference and recommended it to the minister. He indicated to the lifers that he too would be interested in attending the conference. The Canadian Bar Association-Ontario said, in a letter dated January 4, 1991 to the Lifers Group at Joyceville:

> Thank you for your letter and material giving details of the "Lifers Conference" to be held at Joyceville Medium Security Institution on May 21st, 22nd, and 23rd, 1991.
> Canadian Bar Association-Ontario would very much like to be involved with this Conference both at the Conference itself and by supplying ahead of time any views or materials which you think might be appropriate.

According to a news article, the Solicitor General, in his announcement of the cancellation of this very worthwhile conference, stated:

> "In light of the number of serious concerns that have been expressed, I have reviewed this initiative, and decided that it will not take place,". . .

He said that he had "made his decision after receiving several complaints from concerned individuals and groups."

My question to the Leader of the Government is this: Would he indicate to me, now, what concerns the government had with respect to this conference that had developed since the Solicitor General approved it in December? If it is simply a matter of the $24,000 cost of the conference, I want to assure him that there are many public-spirited citizens ready to put up the money to proceed with the conference. So I am asking the Leader of the Government to express the government's concerns that have developed with respect to this conference and, as well, advise us as to who are the concerned individuals who expressed the view that led the government's change of attitude?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall ask the Solicitor General, Mr. Cadieux, to provide me with a note on the matter, which I will share with the honourable senator and with the Senate.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, if the honourable senator intends to speak to the Solicitor General, would he indicate to him that an early reply would be appreciated because, as I have said, there are many public-spirited citizens ready to put up the necessary funds for this conference if he will reconsider in light of the support that the conference is receiving editorially across Canada and from all those who are interested?

My supplementary question is as follows: Is the government's correctional policy now to be determined by individuals lobbying the government, such as the Victims for Violence? Are these the people who will enjoy veto power over correctional policy in this country?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend cannot have it both ways. He is the first to complain when he feels that the government is not giving sufficient attention to the representations made by members of the Canadian public. Unfortunately when those members of the Canadian public do not agree with his point of view, he attacks the government for having paid attention to them.

In any event, I shall endeavour to get an early reply to the question. I have to tell the honourable senator that we have been providing prompt replies to questions asked in this place. After Senator Doody tables today's delayed answers, there will remain only three outstanding questions to be answered, plus those questions that have been asked today, and they have been sent forward for replies.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I wish to clarify one point: I am not asking for it both ways. I stated that the policy of the government was supported by many public-spirited citizens. When that policy was criticized by a few people, it was immediately changed. The minister immediately ran for cover with his policy when it was criticized. As the editor of The Edmonton Journal says:

> While Mulroney talks of a government that makes tough decisions, Cadieux runs for cover as soon as the wind blows. The Joyceville convention has been cancelled, the Victims of Violence group is probably happy, and Cadieux has taken the predictable step of setting up a task force to consider prison issues. When it comes to political courage, the Solicitor General is not exactly a ground-breaker.

I am not asking for it both ways. I am asking the government to decide on this policy and to support it.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is asking us to ignore the representations of the Victims of Violence and other individuals and organizations that have made representations to the government.

AGRICULTURE

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE—SCHEDULED RESUMPTION OF MEETINGS—PROGRESS REPORT—CANADIAN SHORT TERM FINANCIAL REQUIREMENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. (Bud) Olson: Honourable senators, I do not know whether Senator Doody has a delayed answer to a question I asked about a month ago. He probably does not, because perhaps all the information was not available. The question has to do with the resumption of the GATT negotiations in Brussels respecting trade, and particularly that part dealing with agriculture subsidies. There have been some fairly important developments since I asked my question. The chief commissioner of the EEC has made a trip around the world to South America, North America, and so on, to say that something has to be done. Could the Leader of the Government give us some indication of what the prospects are now for these discussions to resume so that we can find some relief from these disastrous world prices?

• (1500)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my information is that prospects are quite good for a resumption of the negotiations on agriculture and an end to the impasse that has stalled the negotiations. Mr. Dunkel is meeting with the Trade Negotiations Committee in Geneva today and after his consultations with a number of countries, his statement indicates that he believes he has found a basis for the resumption of negotiations. I would think we would know for certain later today.

NEW BRUNSWICK AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND POTATO FARMERS—GOVERNMENT SUPPORT

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government tell us if there is any intention on the part of the Department of Agriculture to offer support to potato farmers in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island which may be required as a result of the restrictions on imports of our seed potatoes to the United States?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Of course, honourable senators, the federal government has been involved in discussions with the United States and has been sponsoring discussions at the technical level for some days now. My information is that these discussions have led to some relaxation on the part of the Americans of the restrictions that they imposed.

Senator Bonnell: Can the potato industry of New Brunswick and P.E.I. hold out any hope of financial support from the federal government to assist them in dealing with this catastrophe to the potato market, particularly in view of the flooding of table stock potatoes because seed potatoes have to be sold as table stock?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, two or three days ago the department announced that the potato virus is under control. We will be meeting again with the United States Department of Agriculture to present a comprehensive eradication program.

With regard to the supplementary question just asked by the honourable senator, Mr. Mazankowski tells me that compensation for affected growers will be considered once the eradication plan is finalized.

Senator Bonnell: Did the honourable gentleman state that the eradication program is now in place and has been finalized?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my information is that a comprehensive eradication program will be developed and will be presented to the United States at a technical level next week. I am told that, to date, results of investigations that have taken place indicate that eradication of the virus is feasible.

Senator Bonnell: Is it the intention of the federal government to offer financial support to the potato producers of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island to assist them in the eradication of this virus?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the comprehensive eradication plan is now being developed and the details of that plan will be made known at a later date.

THE ENVIRONMENT

OIL POLLUTION IN THE GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE—SOURCES OF POLLUTION—DEATH OF SEA BIRDS ON P.E.I. BEACHES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, last fall I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question regarding the Irving Whale in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. I also made mention of the fact that sea gulls were dying on the beaches on the north shore of Prince Edward Island and asked whether their deaths were attributable to oil seeping from the Irving Whale.

At that time I was informed that the government was looking into this matter. However, it is my understanding that it has now been proven that the cause of the deaths of the gulls on the north coast of Prince Edward Island is due to leakage from the Irving Whale. Is it the intention of the government to raise the Irving Whale or do they have some other plan in mind to stop the leakage of oil?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I believe a reply to my honourable friend's question was tabled here as recently as December 17. That was a response to a question asked by Senator Bonnell on November 27 regarding the condition of the Irving Whale, the most recent study, and of the government's position.

[Senator Bonnell.]

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, that was December and this is now February, almost March. It is my understanding that the Department of the Environment has said that the oil did come from the Irving Whale in spite of the answer I received to my question. My question now to the government is: If the oil is coming from the Irving Whale what does the government intend to do about that.

Honourable senators, this is 1991, not 1990 and circumstances have changed in that the government has now issued further information on this matter.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will inquire of my colleagues to see what further information I can bring in for the benefit of the honourable senator.

STORAGE AND DESTRUCTION OF TOXIC RUBBLE—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on October 26, 1990 by the Honourable Colin Kenny regarding The Environment—Storage and Destruction of Toxic Rubble.

(The answer follows:)

> The Government of Quebec announced on January 18, 1991 that all PCBs under provincial control, including St-Basile-Le-Grand, will be destroyed by the end of 1993.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

MULTIJURISDICTIONAL DISCLOSURE SYSTEM—SALARIES OF EXECUTIVES—ROLE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 7, 1990 by the Honourable Raymond Perrault regarding Canada-United States Relations—Multijurisdictional Disclosure System—Salaries of Executives—Role of Canadian Government.

(The answer follows:)

Currently, Canadian corporations issuing securities in the United States are required to comply with U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) regulations, including disclosure of the remuneration of their five leading executives.

The question of the documentation required by Canadian companies applying to issue securities in the United States is being discussed by provincial regulatory authorities in Canada and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Provincial securities commissions are jointly discussing with the SEC about the establishment of a "Multi-Jurisdictional Disclosures System" whereby Canadian and U.S. corporations wishing to issue securities in the neighbouring jurisdiction would be permitted to do so on the basis of documents filed with their own regulatory authorities.

The federal government has not been involved in this process.

RAFFERTY-ALAMEDA DAMS PROJECT—ASSESSMENT PROCESS FLAWED—FEDERAL RESPONSIBILITY—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 8, 1990 by the Honourable D.G. Steuart regarding Environment—Rafferty-Alameda Dams Project—Assessment Process Flawed—Federal Responsibility.

(The answer follows:)

The Minister of the Environment discussed the draft agreement with Cabinet and received their approval.

No order-in-council was required. The Minister of Environment, under the existing Environmental Assessment and Review Process Guidelines Order, has the authority to appoint a public review panel. As the decision by Justice MacPherson is being appealed, it would be inappropriate to comment further.

The minister recently appointed a review panel to replace the group that resigned on October 12. This new group consists of Dr. John Archer, Chairman, a noted Saskatchewan historian, Dr. William Stolte, an associate professor with the Faculty of Civil Engineering at the University of Saskatchewan, and Dr. Roderick Riewe, a zoologist with the University of Manitoba in Winnipeg.

Corbin regarding the Persian Gulf—Deployment of Canadian Forces—Statement of the Right Honourable Joe Clark—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

On November 29, 1990, Canada voted in favour of Security Council Resolution 678, authorizing the use of all necessary means to uphold and implement Resolution 660 and all subsequent relevant resolutions (relating to Iraq's invasion and occupation of Kuwait) and to restore international peace and security in the area. Resolution 678 gave Iraq the six-week period leading up to January 15, 1991 to comply with earlier Council resolutions on Kuwait. On January 22, 1991 the House of Commons adopted a motion reaffirming its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

BREACHES OF INTERNATIONAL LAW—IMPACT ON KUWAITIS—UNITED NATIONS' SANCTIONS—IMPLICATIONS FOR CANADA—EFFECT OF "WATER WEAPON"—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the next delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 13, 1990 by the Honourable Jerahmiel Grafstein regarding Persian Gulf—Breaches of International Law—Impact on Kuwaitis—United Nations' Sanctions—Implications for Canada—Effect of Water Weapon—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

The government firmly believes that the use of water leverage, even in time of war, is immoral and would establish a precedent in relations between nations which would be abhorrent to Canadians and to all civilized peoples.

The government understands that the existing reservoirs of the dams of the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers are currently at full capacity. With the onset of the rainy season it would not be a practical alternative to stem or redirect the flow.

It is the stated policy of the government of Turkey that water will not be used as a weapon or a threat against any country. Even if cutting the flow of water were feasible, it would be damaging to the Syrians, who are a part of the multinational force, as well as the Kurds in the north of Iraq who have already suffered considerably under the Iraqi regime.

From the outset of the Gulf crisis, Canada has condemned not only the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait but also Iraq's treatment of Kuwaiti nationals and foreigners in both Kuwait and Iraq. Protests over the treatment of Kuwaitis by Iraq have been made by Canadian officials in Ottawa and Baghdad as well as by Canada in the United Nations during the time that it was a non-permanent member of the Security Council. On September 25, 1990, Canada, along with all members of the Security Council except Cuba, voted in favour of Resolution 670 which, inter alia, reaffirmed that the Fourth Geneva Convention applies to Kuwait and that, as a party to that Convention, Iraq is liable for any breaches of the Convention it commits in Kuwait. Most recently Iraq's Ambassador to Canada has been made aware, by senior External Affairs officials, of Canada's serious concerns over Iraq's treatment of prisoners-of-war and its deliberate despoiling of the environment.

JAMES BAY II—ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT PROCESS—ROLE OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 20, 1990 by the Honourable Charlie Watt regarding Energy—James Bay II—Environmental Assessment Process—Role of Federal Government.

(The answer follows:)

The federal government has taken steps to fulfil its obligations with respect to the James Bay hydroelectric project. An agreement has been reached with Québec concerning a joint public review of the hydroelectric complex and this agreement was signed on February 12, 1991. The Minister of the Environment will be in a position to announce the details of the review process soon, which will include the full participation of those affected by the project.

BALTIC STATES

STATUS OF REFUGEES FROM LATVIA AND LITHUANIA

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on January 17, 1991, by the Honourable Lorna Marsden regarding the Status of Refugees from Latvia and Lithuania.

(The answer follows:)

Although avoidance of military service is not, in itself, a basis for according refugee status, Canadian officials have been sympathetically counselling Baltic refugee claimants, in the event some may have legitimate claims to refugee status. Although the government is prepared to accept some legitimate cases which comply with our criteria, our preference is that refugees from the Baltic Republics be resettled locally, taking into account the strong traditional ties existing among the Baltic States and their neighbours.

So far, very few requests for immigration by Baltic refugees or potential immigrants have been received at our embassies. Any refugee requests would be treated on a case-by-case basis. We do not expect many such requests, given the measures for local resettlement being taken by Scandinavian governments, which have strong traditional ties with the Baltic Republics, as well as neighbouring governments such as Poland.

PERSIAN GULF WAR

PRISONERS OF WAR IN IRAQ—BREACH OF GENEVA CONVENTION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on January 23, 1991, by the Honourable Jerahmiel Grafstein regarding Prisoners of War in Iraq—Breach of Geneva Convention.

(The answer follows:)

All states in the Gulf conflict are parties to the 1949 Geneva Conventions and are bound by the instruments, notwithstanding that there has been no formal declaration of war. The Conventions set out protections for vulnerable persons affected by armed conflicts, such as the sick and wounded, prisoners of war and persons in occupied territory.

Geneva Protocol 1 of 1977 provides for additional protections during international armed conflicts. Protocol 1 has been adhered to by a number of states, including Italy, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Canada (Canada ratified both Protocols on November 20, 1990 but the ratification takes effect only on May 20, 1991). Iraq, the USA, UK and France have not adhered to Protocol 1 and, as a result, it does not apply to the Gulf conflict. However, some rules in Protocol 1 are codifications of principles of customary international law which are binding on all states.

According to the information available, Iraq has committed a number of breaches of the Geneva Conventions. These include many actions in occupied Kuwait such as wilful killing, torture and inhumane treatment of civilians, taking of hostages and extensive wanton destruction of property not justified by military necessity. Other Iraqi breaches include torture and inhuman treatment of POWs, including causing serious injury, their use as human shields and the lack of protection from public curiosity. Many of these breaches are grave breaches—war crimes.

Individuals responsible for grave breaches may be tried in any country since the crimes are mostly part of customary international law, binding on all states. Alternatively, an international tribunal could be established to try these crimes (i.e. Nuremberg) but this would require an international agreement. Compensation from Iraq for breaches can also be claimed by the states affected and could form part of any final settlement.

Canada believes that Iraq is responsible for a number of breaches of the rules of armed conflict and we have joined other states in condemning Iraq for blatantly disregarding its international legal obligations.

It is too early to discuss the post-hostilities procedures that may be put in place to address violations. There is no reliable evidence to support Iraqi claims that the USA and other Coalition forces have violated the rules of armed conflict. The Coalition has distinguished between legitimate military objectives and civilians and has taken special care to minimize incidental loss of life of civilians. Iraq cannot rely on alleged Coalition breaches to justify its ill treatment of prisoners of war.

Coalition partners not party to Geneva Protocol 1 of 1977 are nevertheless taking care to respect its basic rules on minimizing civilian casualties.

PERSIAN GULF WAR

POSSIBILITY OF GASOLINE RATIONING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is in response to a question raised in the Senate on January 24, 1991 by the Honourable Lorne Bonnell regarding Possibility of Gas Rationing—War in the Persian Gulf.

(The answer follows:)

The Federal Government has taken a phased approach in responding to the Persian Gulf crisis. The "Consultation" phase began after the invasion of Kuwait on August 2, 1990. During this phase, Canada actively participated in the more frequent meetings of the International Energy Agency (IEA). An Interdepartmental Task Force on Oil Demand Restraint was established to review federal oil consumption and associated voluntary demand restraint programs. A Policy and Communications Group was established with the Provinces and Territories to collaborate on the development of demand restraint initiatives and a public information strategy.

Phase II of emergency preparedness began with the outbreak of hostilities on January 16, 1991. The IEA invoked its Contingency Energy Emergency Response Plan (CEERP) and requested countries to activate response measures in a cooperative and coordinated fashion. the range of response measures include oil stockdrawdown, a temporary increase in crude oil production, fuel switching away from oil and demand restraint. A combination of voluntary demand restraint and commercial stockdraw are considered to be the best responses in Canada. The Federal Government accelerated its development of voluntary demand restraint plans in conjunction with provincial/territorial governments. Communications efforts were increased to maintain public awareness.

Should the crisis deepen, the IEA could trigger its International Energy Program. At this IEA "trigger" Canada would concurrently declare a national emergency under the Energy Supplies Emergency Act activating the Energy Supplies Allocation Board. The Energy Supplies Allocation Board (ESAB) was established by the Energy Supplies Emergency (ESE) Act after the 1974 oil embargo of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC). It was created to ensure that a national oil shortage could be managed by the Federal Government with industry support. The Board is governed by a Chairman and five members from different provinces and with a diversity of experience. The Deputy Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources Canada is currently Chairman. In non-emergency situations, ESAB is responsible for developing programs that could be activated in an oil emergency. ESAB consults with the provincial governments and the Industry in the development and maintenance of these programs.

Within one week of the declaration of a national emergency, ESAB's Crude Oil Allocation Program would be in place. This program deals with the allocation of crude oil to refiners. Its purpose is to protect consumers from disruptions in the supply of petroleum products caused by a crude oil shortage, and to minimize the disruption in the petroleum products market.

[Senator Doody.]

Within 60 days of the declaration of an emergency, the Crude Oil Allocation Program could be supplemented by the Products Allocation Program. This program provides for the allocation of refined petroleum products to wholesalers and retailers according to a priority of use categorization established by the Board. Each wholesale customer will be classified by their supplier into a category based on the end use of the product: Category A—concerned with the health, welfare and security of the citizens of Canada; Category B—concerned with the economic stability of Canada; Category C—concerned with the maintenance of a standard of living.

The Rationing Program of gasoline and diesel fuel could be fully implemented within 90 days of the declaration of an emergency if the Crude Oil Allocation Program and the Products Allocation Program are deemed inadequate to meet the requirements of an extended emergency. Under these circumstances, rationing could be necessary to ensure that the fuel supply is adequate to meet the controlled demand and to ensure that consumers get their fair share of the available fuel according to the established priorities.

Ration coupons would be distributed to eligible gasoline and diesel fuel consumers according to motor vehicle ownership. Fuel would be rationed to businesses according to their past consumption and their priority of use.

The Federal Government has no plans to invoke any of the mandatory allocation or rationing programs at this time. The current oil supply situation is considered comfortable with Canadian refiners reporting no particular supply or distribution problems. As such, the Government's attention is focused primarily on:

—increased monitoring of the domestic and international supply situation;

—working with the provinces/territories on demand restraint programs and the Canadian oil industry for the exchange of information;

—developing and promoting a national public information program on voluntary demand restraint and energy efficiency;

—reviewing and updating allocation and rationing plans, programs and procedures;

—preparing the necessary legal documents, in draft format, for activation of the Board and its emergency allocation programs and regulations in the event of a declaration of an emergency by the IEA.

BENEFITS AND RIGHTS TO BE ACCORDED TO CANADIAN FORCES VETERANS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on January 24, 1991, by the Honourable Lorne Bonnell regarding benefits and rights to be accorded to Canadian Forces veterans of the Persian Gulf War:

(The answer follows:)

The Government has declared the Gulf area a "Special Duty Area". This means that the Canadian personnel serving there are considered to be on duty twenty-four hours a day. Should they be injured or killed while serving within that area, they, or their dependents, would be eligible for extensive pension and treatment benefits no matter how the disability was incurred.

Should any of our serving personnel be hurt or lose their life in the Gulf the necessary legislation is already in place to provide them, or their dependents, with pensions and benefits.

Until the full extent and impact of the war on our Forces is known, it would be premature to say what might be required. Canada has always cared for those who served in war, and will ensure that those Canadians now serving in the Gulf are treated with all care and attention as well.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF HALIFAX—IMPENDING COMPETITION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on January 24,1991, by the Honourable Finlay MacDonald regarding Port of Halifax—Impending Competition.

(The answer follows:)

The Government has not considered the purchase of double-stacked container cars for CN's account. On the other hand CN can develop partnerships with shippers and other interests who would benefit from such investments.

The Port of Halifax is currently experiencing high rates of traffic growth. Container traffic reached four million metric tonnes in 1990, an increase of 2 per cent over 1989 and 105 per cent since 1985. Total cargo has increased from 14 million metric tonnes in 1985 to 17 million metric tonnes in 1990.

Over the years, the Port of Halifax and CN have together faced many competitive challenges from Eastern Seaboard ports for import-export container traffic. The Port's continuing growth in the volume of containers handled shows that the Port along with CN, have been managing to provide a competitive service to shipping lines. Their ability to continue to do so in the face of port and rail developments in the U.S. should not be dismissed at this time.

In this regard, there are many reasons, other than inland rail service costs, for shipping lines to choose their ports of call. Year round ice-free access, deep water and efficient terminal systems to handle containers are but some of these considerations.

The Canada Ports Corporation is now examining this situation in order to assess the magnitude of the threat and to identify appropriate measures.

THE ESTIMATES, 1990-1991

CONSIDERATION OF THE EIGHTEENTH REPORT OF THE NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the eighteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, almost a year ago, the Committee decided its scrutiny of the 1990-1991 Main Estimates would focus on the system put in place to ensure that the Federal Government programs are evaluated periodically. We worked on the principle that the evaluation could be very useful to us and to all senators to force any government to account for supplies already voted by Parliament and periodically renewed by legislative or fiscal process. You will agree, I hope, from reading this report that our scrutiny was useful and profitable.

As indicated in the report, the Comptrolller General of Canada and the Auditor General of Canada, Professor Hartle from the University of Toronto, who is a former Treasury Board official, Mrs. Chelimsky, from the US General Accounting Office, representatives from private consulting firms and from the Canadian Bond Rating Service as well as civil servants in charge of program evaluation and follow-up activities in various government departments and agencies testified before the Committee. In addition, we asked all departments and main government agencies to send us information on the program evaluation activities they conduct.

Professor Hartle presented an extensive brief in which he was extremely critical of the present program evaluation system and recommended enthrusting the Senate with such task. His arguments are quoted in extenso in our report, but essentially his reservations seem to have to do with the fact that a number of so-called evaluations are nothing more than reports from management consultants hired by the departments, while no formal program evaluation is required.

Based on the testimonies heard by the Committee, program evaluations are tools allowing senior officials to review more or less systematically the departments and agencies' programs. Their primary objective is to respond to the needs of the executive, not to keep Parliament informed, although the evaluation results must appear in Part III of the Estimates. The role of the Program Evaluation Directorate under the Office of the Comptroller General (OCG) is to develop and implement program evaluation policies and guidelines, work closely with the departments and agencies to assist and advise them and, from time to time, rate their performance. The OCG does not have the authority to lay down its own progam evaluation standards. As a matter of fact, it cannot hold back funds from departments which do not conduct their program evaluations to its satisfaction. It can recommend that Treasury Board take such a step but, as far as we know, that has never been done. In short, with regard to program evaluation at least, the Comptroller General exercises very few of the powers, if any, normally exercised by a comptroller in the private sector and even within federal departments.

The Comptroller General and departmental witnesses agreed that evaluation did not play a major role in expenditure reduction initiatives when a budget is tabled or in the case of any other centralized examination of government wide expenditures. This was mainly due to the timeframe. Expenditure reductions were usually implemented on a tight schedule, while undertaking a credible evaluation may require 18 months or longer. Witnesses also maintained that as evaluation findings became available, senior management tended to use these to improve their programs instead of waiting for their expenditures to be cut.

The committee felt this attitude rather disturbing, since it implied that decisions to terminate or downsize programs were apparently made on political grounds instead of based on unfavourable evaluation findings. In fact, the Comptroller General himself complained recently in his evaluation plan for government programs that too few program evaluations considered whether a program should be maintained or its implementation modified to any considerable extent. A study of 150 evaluations made between 1984 and 1988 made the OCG realize that only 17 per cent initiated major changes in program structures, including their termination, while more than half had led to improvements in management. This seemed to confirm the critical comments made by Professor Hartle.

According to law, the Auditor General, when auditing departments and agencies, must mention any cases where measurement of effectiveness, mainly done through program evaluation, is not done satisfactorily. In fact, he was very critical in recent reports regarding the scope and quality of evaluations in certain departments. On the other hand, the committee has evidence that a number of major statutory programs like unemployment insurance have not been evaluated regularly, if ever. The Comptroller General's statement that most government programs had been evaluated seemed to be based on inaccurate information.

The committee spent considerable time trying to evaluate the degree of impartiality and objectivity in the evaluation function within federal departments and agencies.

Those responsible for evaluation were mostly departmental employees whose advancement in fact depended on senior management, in other words, the deputy minister. Even if they are honest, and we believe most of them are, there is a limit to the amount of criticism they can offer, especially when the programs being evaluated have the almost unconditional support of the minister or deputy minister.

In concluding, I would like to add that this report has apparently caused some feelings of frustration within the Public Service. I would like to give everyone the assurance that our study was not aimed at specific individuals or departments. What we were trying to elucidate through this exercise was the inner workings of the system for evaluating our federal government programs. Thank you, honorable senators.

On motion of Senator LeBlanc, for Senator Marsden, debate adjourned.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES BILL

SECOND READING—POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING—DIVISION DEFERRED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, for the second reading of the Bill S-18, An Act to further the aspirations of the aboriginal peoples of Canada.
> And on the Point of Order concerning the admissibility of the Bill—(Speaker's Ruling)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have asked for this ruling to be distributed so that you can follow it.

Honourable senators, on December 17, 1990, Senator Doody raised a point of order with respect to the admissibility of Bill S-18, An Act to further the aspirations of the Aboriginal Peoples of Canada. Senator Doody stated that there seemed to be financial implications in the bill which may be beyond the authority of the Senate to inaugurate. On December 20, Senator Doody further explained his point of order regarding the receivability of the bill. He felt that two of its clauses, specifically 8(2) and 8(3), imposed new duties on an existing department that caused a new charge upon the Consolidated Revenue Fund and hence infringed on the financial initiative of the Crown.

On January 22, Senator Frith spoke to the point of order raised by Senator Doody. He carefully reviewed rule 62 of the Senate Rules and sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution Act which deal with bills appropriating public money. He argued that sub-clauses 8(2) and 8(3) are not appropriating clauses within the meaning of section 53 of the Constitution Act because they do not appropriate money and are not intended to invoke a new administrative function for the department requiring a new charge on the public revenues. Senator Frith asked that a legal opinion furnished to him by Parliamentary Counsel on Bill S-18 be appended to the Debates of the Senate of that day. With respect to clause 8(2), the legal opinion stated:

> The measures in themselves need involve no expenditure of public revenues and could probably be undertaken now as a matter of exercising ministerial power in areas of the Minister's jurisdiction under other statutes and appropriations.

With respect to clause 8(3), the legal opinion stated:

> There is not thought to be any action required under this clause that cannot now be done by the Minister within the general administrative powers the Minister has from other sources. The clause will turn the power into a duty. It does not require additional charges on the public revenue.

As a result of their disagreement over the nature of clauses 8(2) and 8(3), both Senator Doody and Senator Frith asked the Chair for a ruling on this matter. I have given careful consideration to the serious submissions made by both Senators and now rule as follows.

May I begin by stating that the issue of what defines a money bill and what does or does not require a royal recommendation has been a key concern of this house in recent years. An important study on the form and use of royal recommendations was undertaken last year by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and a report was presented to the Senate in February, 1990. In its conclusion, the committee noted that the use of royal recommendations raises important legal and constitutional issues, on which further light may be cast by additional study. It recommended that the issue of royal recommendations be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. It would appear that the issue is still a difficult one and that Senators will want to pursue it in more detail in the near future.

With respect to Bill S-18, the Chair believes that it must judge subclauses 8(2) and 8(3), not against sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution Act, since pursuant to citation 117(6) of Beauchesne's Fifth edition, "The Speaker will not give a decision upon a constitutional question nor decide a question of law", but against rule 62. That rule states:

> The Senate shall not proceed upon a bill appropriating public money that has not within the knowledge of the Senate been recommended by the Crown.

With respect to rule 62, which at that time was rule 70, Bourinot's Fourth edition states at page 413:

> Though the recommendation of the governor-general cannot be formally given in the Senate to a motion involving money,—since such matters must originate in the Commons—yet that house has a standing order which forbids the passage of any bill which, from information received, has not received the constitutional recommendation.

• (1410)

The rules therefore provide that the Senate will not proceed upon a bill appropriating public money that does not have attached to it a royal recommendation. Bill S-18 has no such recommendation attached to it and yet a point of order has been raised that it has clauses within it that do infringe upon the financial initiative of the Crown. In order to determine whether or not Bill S-18, or more specifically clauses 8(2) and 8(3), would normally require a royal recommendation, the Chair must turn to the following authorities. Erskine May, 21st edition, cites the following conditions, among others, with respect to matters which require a royal recommendation: (1) "The expenses arising out of the imposition of new duties on an existing department or authority" (page 797); (ii) "charges upon the consolidated revenue fund" (pages 797-8); (iii) increase of charge by extension of purpose" (page 802). Likewise, the document tabled by the Justice Department at the November 2, 1989 meeting of the National Finance Committee entitled "Requirement of the Royal Recommendation for Money Bills" gives the following instances: (i) "departments and regulatory bodies—provisions establishing, or imposing new duties on, departments or regulatory bodies", (ii)"extending purposes—provisions extending or altering the purposes of a previously authorized expenditure."

The Chair is of the opinion that clauses 8(2) and 8(3) clearly impose new statutory duties on the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs, and hence on the department. They therefore infringe upon the financial initiative of the Crown and are not in order. Bill S-18, as long as it contains these contravening clauses, should not be proceeded with and should be removed from the order paper.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not want to debate the ruling. I do want to say that this is obviously a carefully thought-through ruling by the Chair, but it turns on the question of whether Rule 62 applies. As I recall, I dealt with that in my earlier submissions. The ruling holds that 8(2) and 8(3) are appropriating clauses, whereas I contended that they were not. It seems to me that the basis of the ruling is that they are appropriating clauses. Because I do not want to be in the position of being unable to argue this point on another occasion by having let it pass. So I appeal the ruling to the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, shall the ruling of the Chair be sustained?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes!

Some Hon. Senators: No!

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the ruling please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea!

The Hon. the Speaker: Those against?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay!

The Hon. the Speaker: I believe the "yeas" have it.

Senator Frith: You said the "yeas" have it?

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Call in the members.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, before we do that, on a point of order, there is a provisional ruling respecting this. Perhaps we are moving too quickly.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Yes. Let us take a moment to look at the rule.

Senator Murray: In view of the provisional rule, I wonder whether we might take a few moments to have consultations between the whips as to when this division should take place. My recollection is that a division on an appeal from the Speaker's ruling can be put off for 12 hours. That would take us to half past two tomorrow morning. Perhaps the course of wisdom would be an early consultation among the whips to decide when we want to have this division.

Senator Frith: After a quick reading of the rule, I agree with the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The appropriate rule is P-3(c), where it provides:

> (c) When a division is requested pursuant to Rule 49(3) in relation to a motion that the Speaker's ruling be sustained, the said division shall be deferred for a period not to exceed 12 hours whereupon the bells to call in the Senators shall be sounded for not more than 30 minutes, whereupon the vote shall be taken.

So we anticipated such a question arising when we worked out the provisional rules.

Perhaps the two whips can discuss when they want the vote taken, and we can go on to the next order, with leave to revert to this item.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Senator Frith.]

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND (PROTECTION OF THE UNBORN CHILD)—SECOND READING—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: On Tuesday, January 22, 1991, Senator Doody raised a point of order regarding the permissibility of the Senate continuing with its consideration of Bill S-7, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (protection of the unborn child), after a substantial decision had been taken on Bill C-43, An Act respecting abortion. Senator Doody referred honourable senators to Citation 725 found in Beauchesne's 5th edition, page 223:

> "A motion for leave to bring in a bill, the objects of which are substantially the same as those of a bill upon which the House has come to a decision in the current session, is out of order."

Citation 416 of Beauchesne also states:

> "... a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgement of the House.
> Unless such a rule were in existence, the time of the House might be used in the discussion of a motion of the same nature and contradictory decisions would be sometimes arrived at in the course of the same session."

The principle that no motion can be received which is essentially the same as a question which has been previously resolved is reflected in the Senate Rule 47(1) which states:

> "A motion shall not be made which is the same in substance as any question which, during the same session, has been resolved in the affirmative or negative, unless the order, resolution, or other decision on such question has been rescinded as hereinafter provided."

Although Bill S-7 and Bill C-43 have different objectives and represent alternatives on the subject of abortion, the Chair feels, in that they both deal specifically with amendments to Section 287 of the Criminal Code, a strong case may be made that they are "the same in substance".

The Chair also notes that in the course of its deliberations on Bill C-43, amendments were proposed by the Honourable Senator Haidasz which resembled very closely the objectives and provisions of Bill S-7. These amendments were debated and rejected by the Senate on recorded divisions on January 31, 1991, the same day that the Senate made its final decision on Bill C-43. I refer honourable senators to the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate at pages 2232-2238 with respect to these amendments and their disposal.

It would seem to the Chair that if ever Rule 47 were to be invoked, now would be the time. I recognize that what defines the term "the same in substance" is a question of judgement and that there may be honourable senators who disagree with my opinion and I respect that. The issue itself is an emotional one and feelings understandably run high. The Senate has pronounced itself this session on the question of abortion. Given that the substance of Bill S-7 has been considered and disposed of during the debate on Bill C-43, it is not in order to proceed any further with Bill S-7. The order for second reading should be discharged and the bill removed from the Senate Order Paper.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while I do not have anything to say myself on this ruling, yesterday my colleague, Senator Haidasz, came to me and said that he would be unable to be here today. He was concerned that the ruling was going to be given today and he would not be here to ask for support for an appeal. I suggested that he speak to the Chair about delaying the ruling until tomorrow. Obviously that did not work out, for whatever reason. However, Senator Haidasz did leave a note here addressed to Senator MacEachen.

Therefore, although I am not appealing the ruling, I feel that, as Acting Leader, I ought to ask the Senate for leave to permit Senator Haidasz to raise some questions about this ruling tomorrow if he wishes to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I might say that Senator Haidasz did come to see me and I mentioned that I would render a ruling today and that he would have a copy, but he made no further comment. However, it is up to honourable senators.

Senator Frith: It is a question of whether the Senate will grant leave tomorrow. That is all I can say. I feel I have fulfilled what I consider to be my obligation to my colleague.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, if Senator Haidasz wishes to appeal the ruling tomorrow that would be agreeable to us.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES BILL

SECOND READING—POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING—DIVISION DEFERRED

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 2:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I may revert to the second order, as agreed to a moment ago, my colleague, Senator Petten, tells me that he and Senator Phillips have agreed to a vote on the ruling on Bill S-18 today at 3:30 p.m. with a 15-minute bell.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SEVENTY-FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Seventy-Fourth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (budget of Special Joint Committee on the Constitution), presented in the Senate on 26th February, 1991.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

CONSIDERATION OF TWENTY-FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Consideration of the Twenty-Fifth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology (Veteran Affairs Votes No. 1, 5, 10, 15 and 20 of the Estimates 1989-90) tabled in the Senate on 31st January, 1991.—(Honourable Senator Marsden).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, Senator Marsden tabled the report of the subcommittee on Veterans Affairs and allowed me to speak on it. When I concluded my remarks, I adjourned the debate. However, in the Debates of the Senate, for some reason, the fact that I adjourned the debate was omitted. That is not too serious, but I do intend to continue my speech at a later time. So that should be changed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): In support of what Senator Marshall has said, Senator Marsden did say that she expected Senator Marshall to speak to the item on which he had adjourned the debate.

I do not know how we handle that. Perhaps the Table can give us a recommendation on that. If I understand the situation concerning Order No. 9, Senator Marsden adjourned the debate on some aspects, but there are other aspects to which Senator Marshall wishes to speak. Is there any reason why it cannot stand in both their names? Or, given what we have now said, is there any question that Senator Marshall can speak to the order whenever he wishes, despite the fact that it stands in Senator Marsden's name and in view of the fact that she told me that she expected Senator Marshall to speak to it?

Senator Marshall: That is agreeable with me, but I am more concerned with the fact that I said something in the chamber and it was not recorded.

Senator Frith: Yes; I understand that.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senator?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN IN CANADIAN SOCIETY

DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Frith calling the attention of the Senate to the issue of violence against women in Canadian society.—(Honourable Senator Spivak).

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Royce Frith for his Notice of Inquiry of last February 13, in which he drew the attention of the Senate to the need to examine the issue of violence against women.

In a recent startling article in Policy Options Christina Benson said—to document her argument that avoiding the issue of violence against women is the standard Canadian response—that:

> —when a "senior" Senator Royce Frith tried to draw the attention of his colleagues to the problem of "Violence Against Women in Canadian Society", and start a debate on the matter, not one Senator responded.

I must confess that I felt more than a twinge of guilt since my intervention has been on the order paper since February 21, 1990.

Ms. Benson goes on to say that awareness in government on this issue has moved from laughter—wife beating was greeted with laughter in the House of Commons when it was first introduced there six years ago—to bordeom and disinterest. Canadian women are regularly threatened, assaulted, abused, harassed, mutilated and killed—often in their own homes—by people they trust. It is reported in the newspapers, all kinds of reports are produced by government and non-government agencies, yet not much happens.

Approximately 14 women students in Montreal were killed in a classroom by a man simply because they were women. There has been no national inquiry on the matter. In fact, when a group closely associated with the Montreal massacre wished to appear before the House of Commons Committee on Gun Control, initially they were told that the committee had no time to hear them.

● (1430)

One triumph has occurred in the midst of tragedy, the recent Supreme Court decision in the Angelique Lyn Lavallée case. That case, as honourable senators will recall, was the first time in Canada that a woman has successfully used the defence of battered-wife syndrome against a murder charge, a woman whose repeated beatings over a three-year period had sent her to hospital eight times for treatment. The battered wife syndrome is a medically recognized phenomenon where a woman is unable to leave a relationship despite physical, sexual and emotional abuse. That decision by Madam Justice Bertha Wilson, unanimously supported, relegated to the ashcan of history the historic notion that women are objects needing discipline, a notion that had its origin in the famous rule of thumb which was that you could beat your wife but only with a stick no wider than the width of a thumb.

Moreover, the notion more latterly developed that women enjoy being beaten has been relegated to the realm of maudlin melodrama or sick soap opera.

When the incidence, degree and consequences of violence against women are considered together, the extent, tolerance and deep pervasiveness of violence toward women is astounding. The magnitude of wife assault, spousal homicide and sexual assault in Canada is reflected in the statistics—and the statistics on reported violence are underrepresented. It is estimated, for example, that for every incident of wife abuse reported to the police, 10 go unreported. Still, almost one million women may be battered in Canada each year.

A report released in January, 1990 by the Ontario Native Women's Association estimates that eight out of ten native Indian and Métis women have suffered some kind of abuse—and in 84 per cent of the cases the husband is responsible. Three times as many husbands kill their wives as vice versa. One in four women can expect to be sexually assaulted during their lives—50 per cent before the age of 17. One in two females and one in two males have been victims of sexual offences. I would point out that 99.2 per cent of sexual offences against female victims and 96.9 per cent against male victims were committed by males. In 1988, for example—and I just pulled this one province at random; the other provinces are equally as bad—there were 780 confirmed cases of sexual abuse of girls under 18 years of age in the province of Quebec. The abusers included fathers, brothers, uncles, stepfathers. From international research, four empirical generalizations have emerged on violence against women in the family and in society. Within the family context, it is men who are violent against women.

Both in the family and in society the victims are the weakest. Weakness is seemed to emanate from one's sex—that is, female—age, physical ability, and economic dependency.

Violence results from a challenge to the power relationship, that is the status quo, and here I quote: ". . . the perpetrator fails to recognize and respect the victim's basic human rights fundamental freedom, dignity and right to peace and security and acts accordingly."

There has been a recognition over the last 10 to 15 years that violence against women is a serious issue in spite of the fact that it has always existed in some form. Many commentators on the issue of violence against women maintain that inequality underpins female victimization. A well-respected researcher on the subject has concluded from her extensive work that "women's fear and victimization are equality issues, for women's social and economic inequality reduces their ability to protect themselves from violence and to rebuild their lives after an experience of victimization."

Poor women are disproportionately represented in the statistics on violence. They are more vulnerable and lack the resources to escape abusive situations and to seek help from agencies outside the criminal justice system and the social service network. The findings from the 1982 and 1988 crime victimization surveys in Canada show that the rates of wife assault for women with a household income under $20,000 are two to four times higher than for women above this income level. The 1982 survey found that 50 per cent of the wife assault victims did not work outside the home and were most likely dependent on the income of their partner.

If a woman is living in a violent relationship, is responsible for children, and is economically dependent on her partner, her options are limited by her access to resources. Economic resources purchase safety. Money is needed to move, to hire a lawyer, to pay rent, to feed herself and her children, to access child care, to buy transportation, and so forth. We know from research that, at separation, men's incomes rise by 42 per cent and women's incomes fall by 73 per cent. Thus economic hardship and deprivation can be a consequence for women who leave their husbands.

According to some of the available research, the victimization of women is in part learned behaviour. While not all men who were abused as children or who experienced violence between their parents become wife assaulters, many men who assault their partners do have those experiences in their background. One study concluded that 50 per cent of men who beat their wives were either victims of child abuse or witnessed violence between their parents. And, for some women, being abused by their partners is an extension of their childhood experiences. Research on the biographies of wife assault victims has shown that one-third were either victims of child abuse or witnessed their own mother being assaulted.

In addition to the physical, psychological and economic effects of the victimization of women, fear is seen to be "one of the most pronounced effects of violent victimization." The urban victimization survey found that 56 per cent of women living in urban centres "feared for their personal safety walking alone in their neighbourhood at night. This figure jumps to 72 per cent in the case of victims of wife assault." Fear restricts autonomy and results in withdrawal from normal movement and activities. Fear is controlling. A past president of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, in the context of commenting on the murder of the 14 young women in Montreal in December of last year, stated:

> The bedrock of equality is having the right to live without fear in our own apartments, the right to walk freely in our city streets, the right to meet a stranger's glance directly without being accused of "asking for it," the right to live in this society free of the constant state of sexual terrorism that every young women in this country must be aware of today.

The violent victimization of women is explained in a variety of ways. Some regard abusive behaviour as a means to control women, others see it as a reflection of our culture in which male aggressiveness and dominance is encouraged and condoned. For others, assaults on women are rooted in sexist attitudes and values in our society. Feminists view violence against women in the family and in society as a direct outcome of the unequal and subordinate status of women in the economic, social and political institutions of society. For some, all of these factors are explanatory.

● (1440)

The report to the Secretary General of the United Nations Economic and Social Council in 1988 linked violence against women in the family and in society to women's inequality. The report stated:

> It is generally believed that the main cause of violence against women stems from their status and role in the family and society, and the unequal power structure therein, which places women in an inferior and subordinate position to men.

Family violence is a complex issue that involves responses from all levels of government. The federal government is responsible for criminal legislation, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, financial assistance to social services through cost-sharing arrangements with provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan, and for providing financial support to projects and programs in the provinces. Some federal initiatives in the family violence area include:

> In 1983 Parliament repealed the rape legislation in Canada and replaced it with the sexual assault legislation. The legislative initiative was intended, among other things, to shift the focus from the sexual to the violent and assaultive aspects of the offence.
> The 1983 sexual assault legislation explicitly recognizes sexual assault in marriage whether the spouses are living together or not. Prior to 1983, the rape law in Canada "granted a man an absolute right to sexual access to his wife . . . husbands could not be charged with raping their wives".
> In 1983, the R.C.M. Police introduced a charging policy that required members of the force to lay charges in all cases of spousal assault where there were reasonable and probable grounds that an assault had occurred.
> In 1986 the Family Violence Prevention Division was created in the Department of National Health and Welfare. Among its functions, the division coordinates all federal initiatives in the area of family violence.
> In 1988, the federal government launched its Family Violence Initiative. The government allocated $40 million to six federal departments—Health and Welfare, Canada Mortgage and Housing, Justice, Solicitor General, Indian and Northern Affairs, and Secretary of State—over a four-year period to enhance and augment their activities with respect to family violence. Canada Mortgage and Housing was allotted $22.2 million for the creation of 500 new emergency shelter beds across the country.

Most recently the Sub-committee on the Status of Women in the House of Commons has launched a study on violence against women, and it is ongoing. On February 20 the government announced a new family violence initiative containing provisions for educational initiatives, for review of legislation, for funding, for support of community programs on family violence, including those undertaken by aboriginal people on reserves, and provisions to strengthen intervention and treatment services.

A component of Health and Welfare Canada is the National Clearinghouse on Family Violence. The clearinghouse is a national resource centre that provides national information and referral services to Canadians.

A study done by Linda MacLeod in 1989 summarizes the recommendations advanced by women's groups over the years to reduce women's fear and victimization. Taken together, they represent a "holistic" response to the problem of violence against women. They include such things as ongoing, predictable funding for rape crisis and sexual assault centres; ongoing, predictable funding for transition houses; aggressive charging policies; legal measures that proscribe spousal sexual assault and wife assault; improvement in the economic and social status of women, including access to affordable and quality day care; and public education that emphasizes the link between degrading and violent pornography and women's vulnerability. MacLeod also lists five themes that must be recognized before we can begin to attack this problem: safety issues, negative attitudes towards women, barriers to equality, responses to violence against women, and women's participation in developing strategies to mitigate their fear and victimization.

Ultimately the issue is one of political will. Thousands of recommendations exist at every level of government on this issue. One thing we can do here is at least address the issue, and I would hope that at some point the Senate will ask the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology to place this matter of violence against women in Canadian society on its agenda for consideration.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

• (1450)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate in the name of Senator Marsden, but I would add that I am not sure whether she is prepared to speak to this right now. However, I am certain the honourable senator would be glad to yield to any other senator who wished to speak to this inquiry.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Marsden, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ESTABLISHMENT OF STANDING COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall rose pursuant to notice of January 22, 1991:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the advisability of striking a Standing Senate Committee on National Defence.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to address my inquiry No. 12, dated January 22 asking the Senate to consider the advisability of striking a Standing Committee on National Defence, an inquiry which I am sure all senators will agree is significant at this time as we ponder the reality of the scourge of war.

To give some background on the involvement of the Senate in this important area of national policy, I want to review the short history of the Senate's involvement and participation in defence matters in the past decade.

[Senator Spivak.]

In the spring of 1980, noting that Canadian defence and foreign policy had not been formally updated or debated for almost a decade, nor had the capabilities of our armed forces to fulfil our foreign policy and defence commitments been explored, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs took the initiative and moved for authorization to hear evidence on and to consider matters relating to national defence. This task was assigned to a Senate subcommittee, pursuant to the Rules of the Senate of Canada.

In 1982, after extensive hearings, the subcommittee completed its first report entitled, "Manpower in Canada's Armed Forces." A year later, in 1983, after further hearings, the subcommittee completed its second report, "Canada's Maritime Defence."

Following the federal election of 1984, the committee was reconstituted in November of that year as the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence. During the following 15 months it completed two reports: The 1985 report on "Canada's Territorial Air Defence"; and the 1968 report entitled: "Military Air Transport."

The special committee then proceeded to examine matters relating to the Canadian army. Coincidentally, in the course of this process, the government published the 1987 White Paper on Defence entitled: "Challenge and Commitment: A Policy for Canada." Many aspects of this 1987 defence policy reflected the information the special committee and its predecessor subcommittee had revealed to the Canadian public regarding the state of our armed forces.

While the work of the special committee continued with its defence policy as background, its program of activity was interrupted by the dissolution of Parliament in 1988 and the unfortunate death of the committee's original chairman, the late Senator Paul C. Lafond, who led the committee with honour and distinction, and the death of his successor, the late Senator Henry Hicks who became chairman in 1988. I was privileged to serve as deputy chairman to both of these fine leaders who brought credit to the Senate as did all other members who served on the special and subcommittees. I might mention the names of the members of that committee since it has been so long since the committee has sat. The members of the committee were Senators Balfour, Bonnell, Buckwold, Doyle, Lewis, McElman, Molgat, Molson and Roblin.

Following the recall of Parliament after the general election in the fall of that year, a motion was approved in the Senate which authorized the special committee to complete its examination of Canada's land forces—army. In the interval and during its subsequent deliberations, the strategic global situation unfolded in a new direction, and was altered by the announced changes in the defence policy of the Soviet Union, the erosion of the coherence of the Warsaw Pact Organization, the rapid political changes in Eastern Europe and the sudden and dramatic reduction in the Canadian defence budget announced in April of 1989. These events prompted the special committee to re-examine areas of its report in light of the initial appreciation of these changes, and this delayed completion of the report: "Canada's Land Forces" until October, 1989. As the amended Order of Reference for the work of the special committee provided only for its existence until October 31, 1989, the committee was dissolved and it has not been reinstated since that date.

Although the committee accepted the decision that its mandate had expired, a unanimous concern was expressed by members of the committee at our last meeting—a meeting which took the form of a debriefing—that we should find a means of re-establishing the committee in another form, preferably as a standing committee, primarily to take advantage of the inventory of vital information we were able to gather over almost a decade—information which was useful in bringing before the government and the people of Canada a great deal of previously restricted information and a range of studied considerations and recommendations.

One of the problems with which the Senate of the day had to contend, honourable senators, was the difficulty in manning what was becoming a proliferation of standing committees—a problem that was hindered by reducing numbers in the Senate and a reluctance to appoint replacements by those responsible.

In this regard, at the meeting an alternative was discussed. It was that we might consider an amalgamation of the defence committee with the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, an idea which offered a community of interest in both areas, and which would be parallel with a similar move made by the House of Commons.

Since the numbers handicap has now been removed as a result of the influx of new senators, the establishment of a standing committee on national defence would be a justifiable consideration in light of the present global turmoil. Furthermore, we currently have over 20 senators who have a military background. With regard to our new senators, I am sure everyone recognizes the careers of senators Waters and Forrestall who played a part in NATO.

Honourable senators, I think it would be appropriate at this time to remind ourselves of the positive acceptance and respect gained through the work of the committee, and to give new senators a related overview of the material contained in the committee's recommendations. To do this in as short a form as possible, I need only refer to a special report published in The Financial Post of May 25, 1987, almost four years ago, headlined "Senate Laid Groundwork for Change: White Paper Will Correct Some Deficiencies Uncovered by Upper Chamber Committee." I would quote in part from that Financial Post article which states:

> The Senate, of all institutions, can take some of the credit for the imminent new white paper on defence policy—not just for its appearance, but also its content.
> In the past five years—

I would remind honourable senators that this was written in 1987—

> —the Senate's special committee on defence has churned out no less than four top-notch reports on the various aspects of the defence, including personnel (1982), the Navy (1983), territorial air defence (1985), and military air transport (1986). All four issued a clarion call for a new white paper that would finally attempt to match military commitments with the ability of the Armed Forces to meet them.

The article goes on to say the following:

> The Senate Committee served the important function of getting the debate into the public domain: mainly by adopting a low-key, non-partisan approach to witnesses.

• (1500)

Drawing on the candid evidence of senior and respected defence officials, as well as learned experts in the field, the committee revealed that if Canada had to go to war—and I am speaking about at that time—many glaring inefficiencies would have to be given urgent attention in the three arms of our Canadian forces: land, sea and air.

The writer went on to state:

> But the remarkable aspect of the Senate report is how closely its major recommendations appear to mirror the main components of the then-Defence Minister Perrin Beatty's new doctrine.

Honourable senators, in another comment the writer, referring to the speculation of what was contained in the white paper, stated:

> The white paper is also expected to announce an increase in the number of troops for Canadian Forces Europe (CFE) and a withdrawal from the commitment to help defend northern Norway. (Dropping the Norway commitment frees up about 5,000 troops for redeployment).
> Again, these expected changes parallel the Senate's thinking. In its first report—Manpower in Canada's Armed Forces—the Senate recommended that CFE be increased to 10,000, and that the Army's Mobile Command be increased by 4,000.
>
> In sum, the Senate committee recommended that Canadian Forces strength be increased to 92,000, (from the then-current 86,000), and equipped to carry out its assigned roles. Beatty's long-range plans may be similar.
> The Senate committee's various recommendations carry a high price tag. At that time, Canada's defence budget represented about 2% of gross national product. The committee calculated that implementing all of its recommendations would require defence spending be increased to 2.5% - 3.0% of GNP.

Honourable senators, I am sure that an acceptance of our suggested increase in defence spending at that time would have been a wise choice as we look back to 1987.

One of the items of concern, which was obvious as a follow-up to our reports, was that we should take a comprehensive look at Canada's national security and defence requirements in what was becoming a rapidly changing and very unstable world. That was almost two years ago, honourable senators, and unfortunately the initiative to reconstitute a defence committee was overtaken by an ongoing series of events too numerous to repeat.

The implications for Canada, as a result of the changes that have been unfolding throughout the world and the requirements for armed forces to maintain both world and internal stability—and a good example of this is the recent incident at Oka—had not been fully examined by a Parliamentary body. Moreover, the destructive effects of the April 1989 and February 1990 defence budget cuts, the undercalculation of inflation costs and the potential impact of successive no-growth budgets in the current five year period have not been studied and identified, nor have public interest groups and individuals been provided with the opportunity to present their concerns regarding Canadian security and defence or to participate in a public debate on such issues.

As honourable senators are no doubt aware, the situations in Eastern Europe, the USSR and elsewhere have been evolving at a rapid rate, and while the threat of the Soviet and Warsaw Pact aggression in Europe has been greatly diminished, new and dangerous instabilities have become apparent in these countries, as political expectations overtake economic capabilities. The instability in the Baltic states is a clear indication of this.

Moreover, the removal of the stabilizing effects of the superpower and bloc "Cold War" positions has allowed for new threats to develop, most prominently in the Middle East and the Persian Gulf. Many other trouble spots, disturbances and local wars exist which could erupt into regional or world conflict and threaten even more the world stability upon which Canada's security depends. Certainly, honourable senators, we have been suddenly struck with the stark reality of a new kind of war in the Persian Gulf, the results of which are unfolding in unbelievable proportions.

Since the spring of 1989, Canadian foreign and defence policy has been less than consistent. While it is known that studies on national security policy by the Department of External Affairs and a defence policy review by National Defence Headquarters are proceeding separately, they are being developed in camera without public-interest-group input or even the input of a Parliamentary body such as the Senate committee which had spent the previous decade studying some of these critical policy matters. The development of policies without a deep and long-ranging strategic analysis and an appreciation of the new challenges to world stability can lead to serious errors in judgment which may, in turn, affect the long-term security of Canada and our ability as a responsible nation and an international player to participate effectively in regional-stability operations, threatening the peace and security of the international community.

There is a clear and present danger that what may emerge from a defence policy review in which the narrowly-focused financial factor is the dominant consideration, will be Canadian Armed Forces which are far less capable than the highly-competent forces we now have, and forces which will be incapable of supporting Canada's foreign policy in an increasingly unstable world. If the projected impacts are as indicated by recent defence budgets—and although we can find the money when the need arises—we shall have much reduced regular forces and much smaller militia and reserve forces, which should be our thrust in the future, than those planned in the 1987 white paper. Some of these reductions, if allowed to proceed, could well have a very unbalanced impact among the navy, army and air forces, with greatest impact being on the army, both in overall size and diminished operational capabilities. If current trends in Ottawa are not questioned, Canada could end up with an army that is inadequately equipped for the uncertain conditions of the modern battlefield and incapable of participating in peace-restoring operations.

[Senator Marshall .]

To emphasize this, I again turn to the Financial Post and an editorial from just last month, January 17, 1991:

> Budget constraints will impose their own discipline on a new direction for defence policy. But if the politicians are going to call upon the military to fulfil specific roles, as they have in the gulf, they must make adequate provision for the forces to carry out their assigned duty. A priority in making that provision should be the prompt replacement of the 1987 white paper as soon as possible after External Affairs has completed its foreign-policy review.
> Admittedly, the rapidly changing world, and the need for long lead times in the design and manufacture of military equipment, make it difficult for defence capability always to be equal to the demands of the day. But it's clear the 1987 policy needs to be reworked.

The question of national security and defence policy is an area of public responsibility which should not be left to drift. It is a vital matter requiring constant attention and review in light of the changing and volatile international environment which Canada is now confronting. Prospects of future instabilities in several regions of the world also exist and pose a threat as the Persian Gulf war, we hope, comes to a close.

Since the Senate of Canada has a responsibility to deal with all aspects of public policy, it can ill afford to leave the complex questions of national security and national defence to a spasmodic ad hoc approach. There is much work to be done in this field by the Senate as a responsible Parliamentary body. The experience developed during the period from 1980 to 1989 has demonstrated the need for a continuing committee to consider issues in these critical areas of public policy.

Honourable senators, finally, when the special committee visited the Canadian forces stationed in Europe, and after we witnessed with pride the activities of our officers, men and women in Base Lahr in Germany and in the peace-keeping forces in Cyprus, Senator Hicks was compelled to state, "Canada does not deserve such a competent, professional and dedicated armed force."

Honourable senators, although my inquiry has been rather critical of the "on-again, off-again" government approach to our armed forces, it should by no means be seen as a criticism of our young men and women serving their country, as they are doing at this very moment, and I know I echo the sentiments of all senators when I state that we are very proud of all of our service personnel and that we wish them well in the difficult times they are currently enduring. However, our purpose here is to ensure that they are properly equipped and that the level of commitment provided to them is equal to the allegiance with which they serve their country.

• (1510)

Honourable senators, I hope other senators will take up this challenge and state their opinions on the creation of a Standing Senate Committee on National Defence.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the Senate do now adjourn for 10 or 15 minutes to the call of the bell?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

An Hon. Senator: Do you wish to have the vote at 3.30?

Hon. William J. Petten: At 3.30, please.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): With a 15-minute bell.

Senator Petten: With a 15-minute bell, if that is agreeable.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: So we will adjourn to the call of the bell at 3.30.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 3.43 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the flow of petitions against the GST asking for its withdrawal and an immediate election continue. Today I have two petitions from Ontario, both fully signed. They are from the Sudbury and Killarney regions. One address which struck my eye is 202B Perrault East. There is another petition from the area of Noranda and Rouyn, Quebec, also fully signed. These petitions are flowing in from all across Canada, and I present these three for today, representing in total the petitions of some 75 Canadians.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I also have a number of petitions from the region of Kenora, Rainy River. These came to me from the member of Parliament for that area, Mr. Robert Nault. The petition contains 564 signatures from various towns in that area including Kenora, Thunder Bay, Keewatin and Devlin. I would like to table these.

Senator Barootes: Are those addressed to the House of Commons or the Senate?

Senator Molgat: They are addressed to the Senate, Senator Barootes. I can read the names if you would like. It is a petition to the honourable Senate of Canada, and says:

> The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your Petitioners in the certain assurance that your Honourable Senate will therefor provide a remedy.

HUMBLY SHOWETH

Senator Barootes, I would be happy to read the whole petition, including the prayer and the names, if you wish. I am certain you would be happy to have that. Do I have your request to do that?

Senator Barootes: What you have read is sufficient.

Senator Molgat: Thank you very much, senator.

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR MANAGEMENT DEVELOPMENT BILL

BILL TO AMEND—TWENTIETH REPORT OF THE NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Saurel) Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

Thursday, February 28, 1991

The Standing Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

TWENTIETH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-34, An Act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, June 14, 1990, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Bolduc, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

[English]

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRTY-FIFTH REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE PRESENTED, PRINTED AS APPENDIX AND ADOPTED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the thirty-fifth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs respecting Bill C-79, to amend the Parliament of Canada Act.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and to the Debates of the Senate of this day and that it form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix "A", p. 5385.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(f), I move that this report be taken into consideration now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a few brief comments. First, these amendments more accurately reflect the way the Senate operates as opposed to the way that the House of Commons would operate within its rules. To that end the committee has had the cooperation of the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, as well as the deputy chairman, Senator Doody. These amendments have been carefully vetted.

There is a change from the word "board," as it was put into the original Bill C-79 to state the word "committee" because our committee does operate with the committee on Internal Economy.

Honourable senators may recall the problems that we constantly run into during intersessional periods when, either through dissolution or prorogation, there is no authority for the Senate to act. Approximately two or three years ago Senator Frith and I were sent out to commission the publication of a report on how that should be done. One of our former Clerks, Mr. Fortier, was good enough to prepare an opinion indicating that we needed statutory authority to act during those periods. I am pleased to say, honourable senators, that we now have that authority.

Some other changes deal with the authority of the committee to make contracts. I am pleased to report to those honourable senators who have served on the Internal Economy committee and who have had the embarrassment of being sued from time to time by some of our friends in the media, that this provides that kind of immunity from lawsuits of individual members. However, it does not preclude the committee from being sued.

These and a few other changes that have been made are a great improvement. They reflect how the Senate works. Bill C-79 will be a good addition to the operation of this place and will take away none of the authority that the Senate now has over its own activities. I commend the report to honourable senators.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as Senator Nurgitz has pointed out, what we have before us today is the end of a long and detailed road. I can assure honourable senators that, in my opinion, there is not a word or a comma in this bill that has not been agonized over for, I think, the last year. This has been studied very deeply and has been the subject of a completely bipartisan approach. Therefore, I want to recommend support for the report and to thank some who worked much harder on it than I did, particularly Senator Nurgitz, Senator LeBlanc and Senator Doody, and Senator Nurgitz may want to add to that list.

• (1410)

I believe we should adopt this report and leave any questions there may be until third reading. We might have made some mistakes. We do not think we did, but we might have; if so, questions can be raised at third reading. In the meantime I think we should support the adoption of this report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill, as amended, be read the third time?

Some Hon. Senators: At the next sitting.

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill placed on the orders of the day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT PROPOSALS

THIRTY-SIXTH REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE PRESENTED, PRINTED AS APPENDIX AND ADOPTED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Thirty-Sixth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs concerning proposals to correct certain anomolies, inconsistencies, archaisms and certain errors in the Statutes of Canada.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and to the Debates of the Senate of this day and that it form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix "B", p. 5388.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(f), I move that this report be taken into consideration now.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I wonder if we might have an explanation of why this has to be done today. Why not comply with the rules and give us 24 hours notice?

Senator Nurgitz: Thank you, Senator Hastings. I will give you an explanation. By the way, I should have thanked friends opposite for allowing me to speak on the previous report I tabled. The reason for my haste is that I will be leaving the country today and this is my last opportunity to present the report and deal with it.

Senator Hastings: Agreed.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, very briefly, the report concerns a proposal dealing with anomolies. I should say it is a proposal because only after it has proceeded through the two houses and those items are removed that are found not to be acceptable to the committees in each house is a bill prepared. Therefore, we will be having a bill shortly. This method has been used for many years so that genuine anomolies and miscellaneous matters can be dealt with—not that we would be passing substantive matters or controversial matters; an effort is made to make certain that no new offences are created, that nothing is done in this kind of miscellaneous statute that prejudicially affects individual rights or results in any public expenditure.

I want to pay particular tribute to the consultant used by the committee, Lise Bélanger, who did an excellent job in assisting our own researcher, Mollie Dunsmuir. The work of the committee, which was difficult and somewhat painful, was done by a subcommittee of our Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee, consisting of Senators Neiman, Stanbury and Beaudoin. They did an excellent job. I would particularly like to thank Senator Neiman, who is out of the country. She took the time to prepare a revision of the final report and faxed it to us. I expect that within the next few days I will attend upon her personally and thank her.

Honourable senators, I commend the report to you.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe we should support this report. It represents the results of a great deal of work, although much of it was done by researchers. Among the many useful functions the Senate performs, it does this kind of work on statutory anomalies particularly well. This is clearly a case in which we must rely on the work of the committee and its researchers. There being no reservations on the part of the committee chairman, I believe we should support the report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE ESTIMATES, 1991-92

REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(e), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Estimates for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1992, with the exception of Privy Council Vote 20 (Official Languages).

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move:

[Senator Nurgitz.]

> That, when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, 5th March, 1991, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the question is put, I would ask the Deputy Leader of the Government to give us an idea of what the government's program in the Senate will be for next week and thereafter.

Senator Doody: I will certainly try to do that, honourable senators.

Presently before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications is Bill C-82, the Quebec Harbour bill. As you know, the matter of the appointment of the Privacy Commissioner is before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. We would like to have those matters dealt with as soon as possible.

Bill C-34, dealing with the management centre, was reported today; as was bill C-79.

The Main Estimates have been tabled and we would expect to get the Supplementary Estimates (C) on Tuesday of next week. Those will be tabled at that time and then referred to committee.

We received the Bretton Woods bill, Bill C-93, on Tuesday past and that will be introduced for second reading today. We would like that bill to be read the second time and be referred to committee, and it is our hope that the bill will even go beyond the committee stage by next week. There are some other bills which are in the process of being dealt with in the other place, but I cannot be certain as to when we are going to get them. Hopefully, it will be next week; if not, I will be able to give you an update at that time. Currently, the program is as I have outlined it.

• (1420)

We also have coming to us before the end of March, of course, the borrowing authority, the interim supply bill and Supplementary Estimates (C). So these things will have to be dealt with before we go, but as of this moment, that is about all the information that I can share with my colleagues.

Senator Frith: Did you say the main supply and the interim supply?

Senator Doody: The two appropriations, the interim supply bill, Supplementary Estimates (C), and the borrowing authority.

Senator Frith: The interim, Supplementary Estimate (C), and the borrowing authority. Thank you.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

PERSIAN GULF WAR

DISPOSITION OF CANADIAN FORCES FOLLOWING CEASE-FIRE—POSSIBLE PARTICIPATION IN PEACEKEEPING OPERATIONS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, this is a fairly important, perhaps even historical, day, in that the cease-fire in the Persian Gulf war seems to be holding. It has now held for approximately 15 hours. I am wondering if the minister could give us an indication of what Canada's participation will be from here on. For example, we would like to know how long our armed forces will remain in the area, whether or not the ships will remain there, and whether or not there have been any plans made for the keeping of the peace or the maintaining of some stability, as well as Canada's participation in those efforts in that part of the world.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, our role in any peacekeeping effort would be determined by the Secretary General of the United Nations. We, of course, being among the most experienced members of the United Nations in peacekeeping exercises, would have a considerable contribution to make in the planning and organization of any such effort.

With regard to the specific questions asked by the honourable senator, it is, I think, rather too early to state exactly when our forces would be returning from the Gulf. So far as the post-war planning is concerned, the honourable senator will be aware that the Prime Minister and Mr. Clark, early in February, set out the elements of Canada's position with regard to that question. Our officials have been visiting with governments in the Middle East to discuss this, and Mr. Clark has had discussions with representatives of a number of allied and other countries. I expect that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would shortly be meeting with the U.N. Secretary General and with the Secretary of State of the United States, and may himself be going to the Middle East before too long to resume those discussions with interested governments.

Senator Olson: We have heard of the initiatives that have been taken by the Prime Minister and delivered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs both to the United Nations and to some of the governments of the countries in that region. I wonder if we could be provided with a fleshing out of the situation. We have heard only that proposals have been made. Most people who are asked about this believe that the most effective way would be to have the peace and security forces in the area made up of armed forces from nations in that region. Does Canada endorse the position that those efforts to maintain stability will be left to countries in the region—in other words, the Arab world?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, so far as peacekeeping forces are concerned, the answer to that question is yes. We have maintained all along, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs repeated this yesterday, that the principal participants in such a peacekeeping force should come from the Arab world.

ENERGY

DISBANDMENT OF COGLA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Last Tuesday I asked him to confirm whether or not the Canada Oil and Gas Lands Administration, COGLA, was going to be disbanded, and, if so, was it as a result of the recommendations of the federal Inuvialuit Environmental Review Board, which was critical of COGLA last July for not being prepared for a major oil spill in the Beaufort Sea?

The Leader of the Government replied that my question was hypothetical—

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): For the moment, I said.

Senator Kenny: —for the moment. Now that the question is no longer hypothetical, would the minister please advise us whether this was the reason for disbanding COGLA, and who will carry on its functions once it is disbanded?

Senator Murray: A number of those functions will be absorbed by the National Energy Board; but I would have to obtain and bring in a more complete report of the situation from my colleague Mr. Epp.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ELIMINATION OF TOXIC WASTE—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Colin Kenny: On a related subject, in August 1988 there was a fire at St-Basile-Le-Grand where a large quantity of PCBs went up in smoke. That caused the dislocation of hundreds of residents in the area. Following that, in September of that year, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced that the government would spend $6 million to lease an incinerator for PCBs at CFB Goose Bay and an additional $15 million for a second transportable incinerator to clean-up PCBs and toxic waste. Since then I have been repeatedly asking the government for progress regarding the clean-up of the PCBs and the status of the second transportable incinerator.

Tuesday I received a reply from the government which said:

> The Government of Quebec announced on January 18, 1991 that all PCBs under provincial control, including St-Basile-Le-Grand, will be destroyed by the end of 1993.

● (1430)

Does this mean that the federal government has abdicated all responsibility for the clean-up of toxic waste at this site?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The honourable senator is telling us that on October 26, in one shot, he asked two or three questions. On Tuesday, only one of those questions was replied to. The questions he asked on October 26 were: When can we expect the incinerator to be operational? When will the toxic rubble at St-Basile-Le-Grand finally be cleaned up? The second question was answered on Tuesday; the first was not.

I shall attempt to obtain satisfaction from my colleague, Mr. Epp, and bring in a reply as soon as possible.

Senator Kenny: The fire took place in September, 1988. A month later the minister announced that the federal government was taking action to resolve the problem and bring forward another incinerator. This is a very long period of time for the government to take on this matter. Given the urgency that the government expressed at the time and the damage that took place, it is remarkable that the government is incapable of advising us whether or not it is going to put in place a second incinerator. It seems to have allocated the money for it. Is it or is it not going to put in place a second incinerator? If it is going to be put in place, when is that going to happen?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator should not leap to the conclusion that the government is incapable of advising him on the question of the second incinerator. The Leader of the Government in the Senate does not have the information at his fingertips. He has undertaken to obtain the information from his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and to bring it to the Senate very shortly.

Senator Kenny: I accept that. It would not be fair to assume that the Leader of the Government in the Senate should be briefed on all matters before the government. If it were a question of my popping up in my chair and saying, "Let's have the information on this," I would not expect an answer from the government leader. However, the question has been placed before him for three years and the answer has been coming forward for three years. That strikes me as providing plenty of notice.

Senator Murray: Same answer, honourable senators.

PERSIAN GULF WAR

COMMENDATION OF CANADIAN TROOPS

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Is it the intention of the government in due course to introduce in this house, and perhaps in the other house, an appropriate motion to commend and thank our troops in the Gulf and those of our coalition allies?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the Prime Minister has already spoken for the government, and I expect for all of us, in that respect earlier today. However, I welcome the suggestion of the honourable senator and I trust that we can get on with it very shortly.

STATUS OF MILITARY DECORATIONS FOR CANADIAN TROOPS

Hon. George van Roggen: I have not looked into this next matter, so I am asking this question on the basis of newspaper reports. A few weeks ago a newspaper report indicated that Canadian forces were no longer entitled to receive, and could not be awarded, the ordinary military medals for valour that we have been accustomed to in previous wars. Would the Leader of the Government let me know what the situation is relative to the decoration of our troops at the present time, whether in the Gulf or otherwise, and whether it is intended that appropriate Canadian medals be authorized for our troops if they can no longer receive British medals?

• (1440)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The short answer to the question, honourable senators, is yes. We will be taking steps to ensure that there is appropriate recognition by way of awards and decorations for those who have served in such an excellent fashion on behalf of Canada and the international community in the Gulf War.

I understood that the Victoria Cross in particular was not available to Canadians and that this decision had been taken in 1972 or 1973. I will obtain further information on the matter and advise the Senate in due course.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

CITIZEN INSTRUCTIONAL LANGUAGE TRAINING—ABOLITION OF PROGRAM

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government and is with regard to a program that was cancelled about a year ago, that being the Citizen Instructional Language Training Program. I presume it was available in all provinces. In my own province it was available for the teaching of English as a second language to immigrants because a large number of immigrants arriving are not fluent in English. This program permitted the province that was participating in this program to have a program of English teaching. This program was cancelled a year ago.

Is the government giving any consideration to reinstituting this program? I ask the question now because I see that we have proceeded with an agreement on immigration with the province of Quebec, an agreement which provides for $332 million in financial compensation to the province. The compensation takes into account the additional expenditures that Quebec must incur because only one-third of immigrants speak French upon their arrival. That agreement provides for second language training. Will the same thing be reinstituted for a province like mine?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I shall make inquiries, honourable senators.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF GST ON SMALL BUSINESSES

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, this morning I received a phone call from a small manufacturing businessman in London, Ontario. Like all small businessmen, he is feeling the effects of the recession. He does not receive money for his receivables for 30 days, yet he has to pay the GST up front. He would like to know where he is to get the money to pay the government. If he borrows the money from the bank, will the government pay the interest on the loan? If not, why not? He is going to send the minister a letter.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, we look forward to hearing from my honourable friend's constituent.

Senator Turner: Honourable senators, this businessman was against the GST, like all small businessmen, and he is feeling the effects of it right now.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I hope my friend will have advised his constituent that the policies of the government are bringing inflation down, that interest rates have fallen by 400 basis points during the current recession, that the vast majority of forecasters are now expecting a resurgence of economic growth beginning in the second half of this year, and that the Minister of Finance brought in a budget only the other day with a plan for economic recovery to ensure that this happens.

Senator Turner: I would like to inform the minister that this man is a former Tory supporter.

INCREASES IN ACROSS-THE-BORDER PURCHASES—EFFECT ON CANADIAN BUSINESS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. There have been reports of a substantial increase in across-the-border trade right across the country, that Canadians are going across the Canada-U.S. border purchasing retail merchandise and bringing it back into Canada.

Is the government considering any measures to restrict this one-way trade, with Canadians taking advantage, particularly since the implementation of the GST, of substantially lower prices in the United States and bringing the merchandise back to Canada?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I would be interested to know what restrictive measures the honourable senator has in mind.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I have no restrictive measures in mind. I am asking him what restrictive measures the government is planning. It is not my job to tell the government what it ought to do. I am asking whether the government is planning anything.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator has asked whether we have any restrictive measures in mind and I must advise him that we do not.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, the government has asked for some suggestions on how to prevent this trade from taking place and increasing, as it has been to date. I would proffer the suggestion that the Canadian dollar is higher than it should be in terms of the American dollar. In fact, the parity price of the Canadian dollar in terms of the American dollar is probably closer to 80 cents than to 86 cents.

I would suggest to the Leader of the Government that we are now in a position in which we could narrow the short-term rates between Canada and the United States. We are still some 400 basis points over the United States in short-term money and it is that situation which is keeping the Canadian dollar inordinately high. That could be corrected at this time, especially after having passed the GST and taking steps to reduce the deficit, and especially after the policy enunciated by the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada that there would be an ongoing reduction of inflation.

Under those circumstances, the policy option is now open to reduce interest rates, and indeed to reduce the value of the Canadian dollar in terms of the American dollar, and to close off this growing trade which is exacerbating the recessionary situation for many businesses in Canada caused both by people buying in the United States and by the inability of Canadian businesses to meet the export competition because of an overvalued dollar.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I mentioned a moment ago, interest rates have fallen by some 400 basis points during the current recession. The spread between Canadian and U.S. interest rates has narrowed somewhat.

An Hon. Senator: By how much?

Senator Murray: If the honourable senator wants to know, I have that information here and can look it up and give him the statistic, but the gap has narrowed.

The purpose of the budget introduced on Tuesday by the Minister of Finance is to lower inflation and interest rates. As the honourable senator is aware, the government does not have an explicit exchange rate target in mind, but, if history is any guide, the lowering of inflation and interest rates would have the effect on exchange rates that he describes.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I would like to take short issue with the government leader. I believe that the difference between 30-day treasury bills in the United States and 30-day treasury bills in Canada is in excess of 400 basis points at this time. While I commend the actions that are being taken in the budget by the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada to reduce inflation, I do think that something could be done without creating an inflationary pressure. Especially since the GST is now in place and especially since its revenues are being directed toward the reduction of the deficit, there is an opportunity open to the government to reduce the spread between interest rates here and in the United States. One must remember in that regard that there is a spread of only about 1.75 per cent or 175 basis points between long-term obligations—that is 20 and 30-year bonds, in Canada and in the United States. This is a policy option that is open to the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance to lower that spread between the interest rates, thereby lowering the Canadian dollar without egregious inflationary effects but with beneficial effects in this recession—both for exporters and for businesses along the border that are becoming crippled by the outflow of dollars to the United States.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I appreciate the point that the honourable senator has made, and in principle I do not disagree with them. He will have rejoiced, as I will, in the fact that the bank rate came down again today, slightly, to below 10 per cent for the first time in a long time.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Everett very much for answering the question that I had addressed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. From now on I will know where to address my questions on finance and economics.

SOLICITOR GENERAL

CANCELLATION OF CONFERENCE SPONSORED BY LIFERS GROUP AT JOYCEVILLE PENITENTIARY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he has any information to share with the Senate with respect to the matter that I brought before him two days ago—that is, the government's decision to cancel the Conference of Lifers at the Joyceville institution.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Not today, honourable senators.

Senator Hastings: I regret that the minister does not have a response today. I should like to impress upon him the urgency of a response. As I indicated the other day, the conference had widespread support from the minister himself at one stage and from all the officials of the national headquarters of the Correctional Service of Canada, the Chairman of the National Parole Board the officers and warden of the Joyceville institution and regional headquarters, as well as broad support throughout the correctional community. There is a feeling of frustration and depression that the minister could offhandedly simply cancel this on the basis of a concern.

In light of the support and the requests for a reconsideration of the government's decision to treat the matter as urgent, and at least give those who have given of their time voluntarily to the organization of this conference the benefit of the reasons for his decision, if it is merely a matter of money, that can be solved without a drain on the public treasury. The least the minister could do is advise us of his concerns so that we could address them because of the efforts that have been put into this conference.

[Senator Everett.]

I know the government leader's basic liberal-mindedness and reform-mindedness with respect to these issues, which he has displayed since he was assistant to the Minister of Justice many years ago. I know that he understands volunteering in this work. He must appreciate the feelings that exist out there today. I am simply asking him if he could not use these good offices to urge this minister to reconsider his decision. If the minister will not reconsider his decision, could the government leader urge him to give us the reasons for his decision so that they be addressed in the future?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall endeavour to obtain an early reply to my friend's question from the Solicitor General of Canada.

THE SENATE

TRIBUTES TO HANSARD STAFF

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to mention an event that is not necessarily a happy one for us, namely, the pending departure of two of our loyal Debates reporters. The reporters are Ms. Barbara Neuberger, who joined the Debates staff in December of 1987; and someone who has been with us for a longer period time than that, Dianne Olsen, who has been here on the latest occasion since September of 1985.

My usually efficient grapevine signals that they have decided, in the case of Ms. Neuberger, on a reallocation of her time priorities. She will be leaving the Senate Debates staff soon. Ms. Dianne Olsen is returning to British Columbia.

I have no written or otherwise specific authority to speak on behalf of all senators, but, if I may, I will speak on my own behalf and presume to do so on theirs by expressing our understanding regret that they will be leaving us.

We appreciate the excellence of their service—over a three year period for Ms. Neuberger, and at least six years for Ms. Olsen—while they were here. I hope that their memories of their time here will be as good as is ours of their service.

I suggest that if we ever establish a beyond-the-call-of-duty service ribbon for the GST stint that the Debates records will enable us to reach them for suitable bestowal.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to take this opportunity to endorse the comments of my colleague across the way. Naturally, we on our side share those comments. We will regret losing these two loyal and capable employees of the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND (PROTECTION OF THE UNBORN CHILD)—SECOND READING—SPEAKERS'S RULING SUSTAINED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Guay, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill S-7, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (protection of the unborn child), and on the ruling given by the Speaker on 27th February, 1991.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, as Senator Frith put it yesterday, I do not wish to engage in the debate on the Speaker's ruling, but, rather, state that I believe there was either some misunderstanding of the rules or some forgetfulness of the chronological events as Bills S-7 and C-43 were introduced in this house, and as the purposes of both bills were stated.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, when that point was raised by the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding the point made by my colleague, Senator Haidasz, I stated that I did not feel that the points made by the Leader of the Government were in accordance with my interpretation of parliamentary rules. I have not changed my mind. I have no more to say on that.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I appeal the Speaker's ruling.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: All those in favour of sustaining the ruling of the Chair on Bill S-7, given on Febraury 27, 1991, please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon the Acting Speaker: All those opposed please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

Honourable senators, I declare the ruling sustained.

BRETTON WOODS AND RELATED AGREEMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody moved the second reading of Bill C-93, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to begin today's consideration of Bill C-93, proposing amendments to the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act, by emphasizing the International Monetary Fund's pivotal role in the world financial system. I will then address the specific elements of Bill C-93.

The International Monetary Fund (IMF) is the central institution of the international monetary system. The IMF has two key roles. First, it carries out what we generally call "surveillance". In other words, the IMF monitors and assesses the economic policies of its member countries, and provides advice on the appropriateness of these policies. In addition to country-specific economic analysis, IMF surveillance entails the analysis of developments in global foreign exchange markets; analysis and policy advice on payments imbalances among the major industrial economies; and a broad assessment of the compatibility and consistency of policies among the major industrial countries. Until the emergence of the debt problems of developing countries in the early 1980s, surveillance was the dominant role for the IMF, and remains a function of critical importance to sustained global growth.

The IMF's second major task is to provide credit to countries facing balance of payments financing problems. This credit is given on the condition that countries undertake policy reforms designed to eliminate the imbalances within their economies, thus creating the conditions necessary for sustainable, non-inflationary growth. While a large number of developing countries have turned to the IMF during the past decade, industrial countries can draw on the Fund's resources as well. In the past, countries such as Italy and the United Kingdom have sought access to IMF credit.

The IMF's continuing ability to operate effectively is crucial to the smooth operation of the world monetary and financial system. The early 1990s are marked by uncertainty about the prospects for sustained global economic growth. The crisis in the Persian Gulf and developments in Central and Eastern Europe are clear indications of how the economic outlook can shift quickly and significantly. The evolution of global payments imbalances necessitates a continuing need for balance of payments financing, possibly on a substantial scale.

In May 1990, the Fund's Interim Committee—the major policy advisory body of the Fund, which is chaired by the Minister of Finance—reached agreement to increase total Fund capital subscriptions or "quotas" by 50 per cent. The quotas which members subscribe are the major source of the funds which the IMF lends to countries in balance of payments difficulties in order to correct their imbalances, without resorting to protectionist or other disruptive measures. Quotas are also used to determine the amounts which members can borrow under the various facilities of the IMF. Finally, honourable senators, quotas determine the voting strength of members and the composition of the executive board.

The proposed increase in IMF quotas is part of a regular cycle for reviewing Fund quotas. The higher level of total IMF quotas is required to ensure a better balance between the resources available to the IMF and the needs of members for balance of payments financing over the next few years.

Developing countries have made extensive use of IMF funding in recent years and will continue to do so. There will be a need for the Fund to continue to play a major role in the international debt strategy by supporting countries which are having problems servicing their external debts in their efforts to restore creditworthiness. For its part, the Fund has shown innovation and flexibility in its policies in response to the special needs of the major debtor countries. It has ensured that the restoration of sustainable, non-inflationary economic growth is a centrepiece of its adjustment programs, and has shown flexibility in the timing and use of its resources in order to accommodate the special needs of borrowers. The Fund and World Bank have also agreed to use their resources to enhance debt and debt service reduction by commercial banks with heavily indebted developing countries, thus reducing the debt overhang. The proposed increase in IMF quotas will create scope for similar innovation in response to future needs.

However, Fund resources are not restricted simply to the developing countries. An important element of the Fund's activities in the period ahead will be to facilitate market-oriented reform in Central and Eastern European countries. In fact, the emerging democracies of Central and Eastern Europe are already looking to the IMF for advice and financial support. We expect close cooperation among the IMF, World Bank and the new European Bank for Reconstruction and Development in support of the economic transformation of Central and Eastern Europe.

The last increase in Fund quotas was seven years ago. That increase, in conjunction with large-scale borrowing, gave the IMF the necessary resources to respond to the debt problems of many developing countries. During that period, however, arrears to the IMF have accumulated and have started to threaten the Fund's continued ability to assist members in dealing with their balance of payments problems.

In response to its mounting arrears problem, the Fund has undertaken policies to prevent arrears from increasing and to promote the elimination of existing arrears. As a further measure to strengthen the Fund's arrears strategy, it was agreed during the quota negotiations that the quota increase would be conditional upon passage of an amendment to the Articles of Agreement allowing for suspension of the voting rights of members in arrears. This would be an intermediate step between powers which the IMF already has under the Articles—an initial sanction of suspension of borrowing rights—and the ultimate sanction of expulsion.

The Fund must also stand ready to deal with crisis situations, both with regard to individual members as well as more systemic threats to the international monetary system. The Fund has recently demonstrated its flexibility in responding to countries affected by events in the Middle East, and will be a key player in helping these countries adjust to changed economic circumstances.

It is in this context that I present for the Senate's consideration the legislation before us today, Bill C-93 to amend the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act. Bill C-93 is a central element in Canada's continuing commitment to the smooth functioning of the international monetary system. It provides for an increase in Canada's quota subscription in the International Monetary Fund from 2,941 million Special Drawing Rights, or SDRs, to 4,320.3 million SDRs. In terms of Canadian dollars, this means an increase in Canada's quota from approximately $4.9 billion to $7.2 billion, an increase of $2.3 billion.

I would point out, however, that although our subscription in terms of Canadian dollars will increase by $2.3 billion, the actual Canadian dollar payment is $5.8 million. This payment is a non-budgetary expenditure. Of the remainder, 25 per cent will be paid in Special Drawing Rights from our international reserves, while the balance of our commitment is held in reserve in the event that the IMF needs to draw upon additional resources. The larger IMF quota adds to the resources available to Canada in the event of balance of payments need.

The increase in Canada's quota will allow Canada to maintain an effective voice on IMF issues. Canada has been a full participant in the activities of the IMF and strongly supports its role as the central institution in the international monetary system. In order for the IMF to continue to play a critical and effective role in the system, member countries must act to ratify the quota increase and suspension amendment. Legislative approval of the quota increase and the suspension amendment will demonstrate the importance Canada attaches to the role of the Fund.

That, honourable senators, is an explanation to the bill as I have received it. I would suggest that should the bill receive second reading, it would be referred to the Foreign Affairs committee that usually handles the IMF and international monetary fund items. I commend the bill to the consideration of the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

INTRODUCTION OF TEMPORARY LIMITATION OF LEGISLATIVE POWER TO DELAY PASSAGE OF COMMONS BILLS ARISING FROM THE BUDGET—INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

On Inquiry No. 9:

By the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax):

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the advisability of introducing in the Senate, for a trial period, a self-imposed limitation on the exercise of the Senate's legislative power in respect of the passage of bills arising from the Budget, received from the House of Commons whereby, after a specified period commencing on the day a bill is given first reading in the Senate, if the Senate has not adopted a motion for its third reading, the bill will be considered to have been read a third time and passed.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, unless some other senator wishes to speak to this inquiry, I would ask that the inquiry be withdrawn.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

THE BUDGET, 1991

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. H. A. Olson, rose pursuant to notice of February, 1991:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Budget statement made by the Minister of Finance on February 26, 1991.

He said: Honourable senators, I apologize for rising to say a few words on this matter on a Thursday afternoon because we all know how rushed senators are on Thursdays.

Senator Frith: Do not apologize.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, a number of comments need to be made about the budget statement made by the Minister of Finance on February 26, but, at the outset, I promise I will confine my remarks to one aspect of the budget only, that being the monetary policy or, indeed, the lack of commitment respecting monetary policy in the budget. Even in that regard I will be brief.

The reason the monetary policy in this budget is so important is because the consequence of whatever monetary policy is followed by the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada from time to time usually—in fact, almost inevitably—ends up being reflected in the interest rates that are charged. Farmers are the people I am primarily concerned about, but my concern also extends to those running businesses across Canada.

There are many reasons for the problems we are encountering with respect to this recession that Canada is suffering at the present time, but there is no doubt in my mind, nor in the minds of most Canadians, that interest rates are the major cause of this recession. In fact, the Minister of Finance and, indeed, the Prime Minister, have admitted that it was a deliberate action on their part, or on the part of the government, to have the high interest rates that we have had for the last two years, save for the last three months. They did it deliberately to cause a cooling off of the Canadian economy for the purpose of curbing inflation.

Senator Simard: It was fighting inflation.

Senator Olson: It would be helpful if Senator Simard would let me make my own speech and not try to finish my sentences.

Senator Simard: Do not put words in the minister's mouth that he never said.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what I planned to do was to bring in several quotes from some of the eminent economists of Canada concerning the wrong-headed monetary policy that this government and the Governor of the Bank of Canada have been following for a long time, but I must admit that I get a little weary listening to someone quote from newspapers knowing that anyone in the Senate who is interested in these matters has read them in the last two days or so; so I decided not to do that. I assume that most people who are interested in these things know that most leading economists, whether they work for the major banks or for the various institutions that study matters like this, such as C. D. Howe and the Conference Board of Canada, have repeatedly said that the monetary policy and the consequent interest rates have, in fact, brought Canada into a recession,and that by the next quarter it will be a depression. The definition of a depression, of course, is having four consecutive quarters of negative growth. That is what we are getting into.

It is not my intention, therefore, to establish that we are in a recession and that it will very soon be a depression, according to the definitions. I will not quote those economists or even the Minister of Finance, who admits that he is not so proud of the fact that it was deliberate government policy to introduce a monetary policy that would result in such brutal interest rates and bring the country to its knees.

Honourable senators, this policy increased bankruptcies to their highest level in the history of Canada. Never has there been the number of bankruptcies that we have seen in Canada each month for the last four or five months.

The government no longer brags that this was good monetary and financial management, but that does not take away from the fact that it did brag. It did that all the while people in the private sector, who did not have any axe to grind with government policy, were telling the government that it was wrong and that it would bring housing to a halt; and it has. They said it would cause a great deal of suffering and pain in an already depressed agricultural industry; and it has. Honourable senators, that is the area I am primarily concerned about today, because, if the situation does not change, the agricultural industry will have an even more severe crisis on its hands. It is bad enough now, but it is going to get even worse, because there is no prospect, honourable senators, that international grain prices will improve in the near future. The talks that started in Uruguay several years ago have collapsed. There is now some hope that they may be able to revive the negotiations, but for that to turn into an improvement in international grain prices is a remote hope indeed. There is no target yet available as to how much any such improvement might be.

• (1520)

Many people do not understand how, in a situation where there is probably a lower stock of grain in the world in relation to the total annual consumption than we have had in the last 20 years, grain prices can be so low, but it is true. The total consumption level is approximately 525 million or 530 million tonnes world-wide, and usually we have about 28 to 30 per cent, or sometimes slightly over 30 per cent, of that on hand at any given time. Right at the present time we have 15 per cent, about half of the normal on hand.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What does that say about the law of supply and demand?

Senator Olson: The law of supply and demand is not working, and the reason is because of the subsidy war that is being fought between Europe and the United States. If you think that is just some psychological situation, I want to tell you that it also involves some very practical problems, one of which is that buyers do not dare buy ahead. That is true whether they come from Eastern Europe, where they need grain desperately, or from any of the traditional customers along the Mediterranean. We sell grain to all of the countries on the rim of the Mediterranean and to several other European countries, and will as to Asia and so on. They just do not dare buy ahead. As a matter of fact, I know of at least two grain buyers who lost their jobs because they made some purchases of grain, even at these low prices, and sometime later someone heard that the United States or Europe had increased the export subsidy; so it made them look like fools for having paid too much. Of course, grain buyers will not go out and make any purchases of grain if they do not know what the subsidy is going to be the week after next; and that has been the situation. Of course, I am not going to give the names or even identify the countries of the two grain buyers that I am discussing, but I can guarantee that it happened. They made a deal for what were the regular requirements for grain and, about three weeks later, the price went down because either Europe or the United States increased the subsidy, and they were fired because they apparently did not know how to make a good deal.

So here we are in this situation. There is not much hope that we are going to have any significant or dramatic change in the international market, at least in the foreseeable future. The price should have gone up substantially long before now because of the situation with respect to supply and demand, but it has not, and because of that, honourable senators, there has been a great deal of distress in the agriculture community, particularly in the grain sector.

The level of interest rates that has been brought on by the Bank of Canada's increasing the bank rate through almost all of 1989 and 1990 has had disastrous effects on people who have already completely lost their net incomes. After all, the price of grain is substantially below the cost of production, even on the immediate cost input, let alone on the capital costs over the long term. So there was no money to pay increased interest charges, and yet the government continued on and brought these people to their knees. Bankruptcies, as I said, have never been higher. I heard the minister tell us here not so long ago that the number of bankruptcies in the farm sector is going down, but there is a good reason for that. It is because one can only go broke once! Once you go broke and are bankrupt, it cannot happen to you again.

Honourable senators, we know that the Governor of the Bank, Mr. John Crow, and the Minister of Finance, have been following a monetary policy that has brought on these interest rates. We were just talking about that a few minutes ago. The rate has been as much as 600 basis points higher than in the United States. Why? They say it is to fight inflation, that that is what they are doing it for. They have done something about inflation, all right; they have cooled the Canadian economy down to where there is not much inflation left except for what the GST has caused. Of course, I do not want to get on to that argument. As a matter of fact, I do not want to get into a controversial debate at all because I want the minister to help me solve this monetary policy problem, which was completely absent from the budget statement of the Minister of Finance a couple of days ago. I say that because, if one listened carefully to what the Minister of Finance had to say last Tuesday afternoon and evening, one would have noticed that he did not make any commitment that the government was going to change monetary policy so that interest rates could come down. Oh, he expressed the hope that that would happen, but he did not give any commitment that the government, from here on out, was going to reduce interest rates. What he said—and this is why it is so difficult—is that the government is going to set up some targets, and he laid them out: 3 per cent by the end of 1992; 2.5 per cent by the middle of 1994; and 2 per cent by the end of 1995.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Inflation targets.

Senator Olson: Yes, those are inflation targets. Those are the targets that he set out, but he did not say that the government would reach those targets if our international trading partners were not at those levels.

Then yesterday the Governor of the Bank, Mr. Crow, did an unprecedented thing. He held a press conference in the Bank of Canada during which he announced his support for what the Minister of Finance was doing, and he then went on to lay out these targets for inflation. In the press release that I received in my office yesterday he said:

> The range of public policies besides monetary policy can make a significant contribution.

That is toward the reduction of inflation.

> However, since inflation cannot persist over an extended period without monetary accommodation, for price stability to be reached it is essential for monetary policy to work firmly and consistently to that end.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: It's team work!

Senator Olson: That's team work, all right, but do you know who pays for this kind of team work? It is the guy who owes any money to the bank. That is who pays. It does not matter when he borrowed the money or what the rate was when he borrowed it, because 98 per cent of loans are now on a floating rate. Every time the Bank of Canada changes the rate, he pays more, or less, depending on what the change is. However, there is even more difficulty if you examine the statement more closely. The governor said:

> in order to keep to this course—

That is to keep on this inflationary course, this depression course:

> —the Bank will be carefully monitoring the trend rates of expansion of money, credit and total spending to ensure they are consistent with the targets and—

Listen to this carefully!

—will be adjusting its monetary policy actions accordingly.

• (1530)

Senator Murray: Are you surprised?

Senator Olson: No, I am not surprised. What I think the bank is doing—and I will read you more quotes because they lead to the same thing—is setting the stage to wrench inflation down to 2 per cent, and it is are going to be as vicious as necessary with respect to monetary policy until that is achieved.

Honourable senators, the problem is that Canada does not set the inflation rate for our trading partners, and no country has a 2 per cent inflation rate at the moment, not even Japan or Germany. If the Bank of Canada is going to force Canada, by monetary policy, to an inflation rate that is lower than our trading partners, it is going to gouge money out of anyone who has a debt, such as the farmers or the fishermen. I think Senator Petten understands the severe distress that goes along with paying those old debts.

The minister did not say anything about inflation. In careful reading of his speech one will see that he alluded to inflation, but he never made a commitment that this government was going to change monetary policy to keep interest rates down. The next morning the Governor of the Bank of Canada takes an unprecedented step; he calls a press conference and says that the bank is going to provide targets to take the fear of inflation out of people. He said that will probably help them from making unjustified wage demands, and that sort of thing. The Minister of Finance has told me several times that interest rates have come down 4 per cent or 400 points, from 14 per cent down to 10 per cent, give or take a quarter. I am not exactly sure where interest rates peaked out, but I believe it was at approximately 14 and a quarter.

Senator Simard: What was it in 1981?

Senator Olson: I am not talking about 1981; I am talking about the problems people have right now.

Senator Frith: He might be talking about 1881.

Senator Olson: We never know. I can tell honourable senators opposite something that perhaps they do not yet understand. When your polls get down to 12 and 14 per cent, the people no longer believe you. They do not believe that what is happening today is a consequence of what happened in 1981 and 1982. You got away with that for years. It is not valid and no one believes it anymore. As a matter of fact, they do not even believe the Minister of Finance.

I see Senator Doyle sitting there, but I cannot understand what he is saying. It does not matter, because his mike is not on, but mine is. The front page of a paper he is familiar with, Globe and Mail, said yesterday that "Wilson's optimism lacks credibility."

Senator Doyle: I have not been there for a long time.

Senator Olson: And it was not any better when you were there.

Senator Doyle: Editorials are not on the front page.

Senator Olson: It is unusual to have the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance going to all this trouble to set the stage to put the screws to anyone who has debt service charges to make. That is what the speech is all about. As I have said, I do not want to be controversial or adversarial because I would like some help in trying to get them to change their minds.

The interest rates we had throughout 1989 and 1990 were brutal. They were 600 points above the United States, while the price of grain was dropping. I know of farms that have been in families for three or four generations that were knocked out because of this double whammy—what happened on the income side and on the expense side because of debt service charges, which was directly caused by the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada.

Senator Frith: It could not have been caused by a Conservative monetary policy. Are you sure it was not during a Liberal administration? That is what the Conservatives would assume.

Senator Olson: That is what they are trying to say; but if you travel the country these days, people do not believe that garbage any more. Don't the Conservatives have people who can tell them what the public is buying? Farmers grind their teeth when they think that they voted Conservative in 1984 and 1988. As I said, I do not want to get into that, because we need to help each other to help those people.

Senator Frith: You are making them uncomfortable, Bud. Be careful!

Senator Olson: When I left my office today I promised myself that I was not going to get into an argument with Senator Murray because I want him to help me to help those people in difficulty.

One also wonders about who is in charge. I believe there were some editorials in the Globe and Mail about that too. I am wondering whether it is Mr. Wilson or Mr. Crow. Who is running whom? I have suspected for a long time that the Minister of Finance was sucked in, if you understand that term, by the monetary philosophy of the Governor of the Bank of Canada. In all of his speeches that I have read—and I have read a lot of them because they interest me—I do not believe he understands what is going on on main street or on the north 40 out on the farm. He probably knows what is going on on Bay Street, but that is no comfort to someone who is losing his lifetime assets because of a monetary policy of the government. That is what is happening.

Honourable senators and Leader of the Government, why did the Bank of Canada, in an unprecedented action, hold a press conference? Is the Governor of the Bank of Canada going to provide public relations for the Minister of Finance, or does the Minister of Finance and the government believe that their credibility has sunk so low that people do not believe what they say anymore? The government probably thinks that because of some mysterious aura the public is going to believe the Governor of the Bank of Canada, so it brought him in on the act. But I do not believe that.

Senator Simard: What about the government?

Senator Olson: They are supporting each other; and, in supporting each other, they are setting the stage to gouge Canadians on interest rates again. The government said that the interest rate is down 400 points from its peak of 14 per cent. How much has the spread changed? That is what is important. I do not know what the bank rate of Canada was at 2 o'clock today because I did not find out—

Senator Murray: It was 9.94.

Senator Olson: I thought it would be slightly less than 10 per cent.

Senator Murray: You are right.

Senator Olson: Do you know what the rate is in the United States today? It is 6.27. I found that out this morning. So we are still 400 points apart.

Senator Murray: No!

• (1540)

Senator Olson: Actually, it is 390 points, but 390 points on 600 points—6.26, which is the United States' level—is a higher percentage than it was when we were at 14 per cent. Relative to the U.S., our rate has not come down at all.

I admit it is much more comfortable to be paying whatever prime is today—I think it is approximately 11 per cent—rather than paying 14.75 per cent, which it was at the peak. As a competitive factor with the United States, it has not improved at all. That is sad because it is hurting.

The Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada is proceeding to set the stage in case we do not get down to 3 per cent, and then 2.5 per cent, and then 2 per cent, which I know they are planning to do. They are going to increase viciously the interest rate through the monetary policy until they do to the farmers, the fishermen and the small businessmen exactly what they did through 1989 and most of 1990.

Senator Frith: You can count on it. That is what they will do.

Senator Olson: That is Tory philosophy. It indicates that we have not learned a damn thing in the last 60 years, because that is exactly what the Tory government did in the 1930s. It kept interest rates up around 8.5 per cent, which was a ridiculous amount in relation to any other cost factors that were in the economy.

I want to plead with the minister today to do whatever he can to persuade the Minister of Finance to get Mr. Crow back into the Bank of Canada, where he belongs, and to get him to follow the instructions of this government, which he is obliged to do. You are trying to transfer the blame to the Governor of the Bank of Canada. It is the responsibility of this government and no one else. Yesterday, Mr. Crow acknowledged that if the Minister of Finance is unhappy with what he is doing, all he needs to do is tell him to do something different, and he has no choice: He either does it or resigns. The minister surely knows that. If the government has any notion in the future to repeat the kind of monetary policy and brutal activities that go with that, the Governor of the Bank of Canada should resign, and the sooner the better. Canadians have a right, with something as important as monetary policy and interest rates, to some form of democratic government that asks the government to deliver the results that they deserve from the administration of their affairs at the national level. Of course, monetary policy is at the national level. It is disturbing indeed that the government seems to be setting the stage to do more of what John Crow, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, did throughout 1989 and 1990.

There is much more that can be said about the budget, but we do not need any more harsh monetary policy to satisfy the whims of one, John Crow. It is the responsibility of this government to set it differently so that we do not have that brutal type of monetary policy. It has the authority and the responsibility to use that authority.

I was interested in a discussion that was held a few minutes ago in Question Period. There is no mystery about what would happen if interest rates went down and we started to remove the difference between the U.S. and Canadian rates. The value of the Canadian dollar would change. It would start to decline. Honourable senators, that is something that we needed two years ago. We know what the consequences would be. For those things that we import there would be an increase in the price which eventually would show up in the CPI. To carry on with an artificial and false relationship, rather than the economic relationship between these two currencies, is hurting some people in this country very severely. They have suffered enough. You do not need to demonstrate any longer that you can have these harsh policies to force down inflation. We know that a government can do that for a while, but do not try to tell the people across this country that the government is not responsible for it, because they know better. They know that the government not only has the authority but the obligation to exercise that authority to see that we do not have brutal interest rates that have hurt people so severely during this past while.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada, in my opinion, does not know how much misery he has caused many people. I do not believe that he intends to change his mind. If the targets that he has set out for the decline in inflation are not met, he is going to use the monetary policy and continue to increase interest rates until those targets are met—3.5 per cent, 2.5 per cent and 2 per cent—by 1995.

Honourable senators, if the rest of the world does not move down at that same rate, there is going to be an unjustified brutal handling of Canadians who have to pay debt service charges for whatever reason. One can no longer get a fixed interest rate. One can get mortgages for a few months or something less than five years. However, farmers do not have that available to them. Perhaps there are one or two banks that will give a fixed interest rate for a short period of time, but certainly not for a period of time that is long enough to pay off the debt so that you do not have to pay the float after that. These days the banks are run on a floating basis. Every time the Governor of the Bank of Canada changes the interest rate, everyone who has any indebtedness pays the shot.

Perhaps the minister will get up and say that the interest rate is on the way down. I would like him to stand up and say one other thing, which is that the monetary policy from here on is not going to brutalize Canadians like it has done for the past two years. There was nothing in the budget that gave a commitment from the Minister of Finance that that was going to happen. As I said at the beginning of my speech, he expressed the hope that interest rates were going to stay down, but he did not give a commitment that they would keep interest rates under control for people who are caught in a recession with a debt they simply cannot pay.

• (1550)

I would plead with the minister to do what he can to persuade his government not to allow the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance to brutalize Canadians like this any more.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Senator Olson seems not to understand, or if he understands he is unwilling to acknowledge, the connection between inflation and interest rates. The historical record is clear. When Canada had low inflation, as we had in the 1950s and 1960s, we had low interest rates. The international record is also clear. Those countries such as Germany and Japan which traditionally have low inflation rates also have low interest rates.

The honourable senator makes light of the inflation targets that have been set out by the government and by the Bank of Canada.

Senator Olson: I do not make light of it; I think it is a plot.

Senator Murray: The conspiracy theory again. My friend says, in effect, that the targets set by the government and endorsed, it appears, by the Governor of the Bank of Canada to bring inflation to 3 per cent by the end of 1993 and to 2 per cent, I believe it is, by the end of 1994, are unattainable. The fact of the matter is that in Canada, between 1953 and 1973, we had an average annual increase in inflation of 2.6 per cent. We must remember that the inflation rates of the 1970s, when my honourable friend and his friends were in power, are not the norm in this country. Double-digit inflation is an aberration. A 2 to 3 per cent inflation rate is attainable as the historic and international records prove.

The honourable senator suggested that the targets set out in the budget are unrealistic because inflation is imported from other countries. What other country, he asked, among our major trading partners has an inflation rate of 2 per cent. The average between 1983 and 1990 in this country was 4.6 per cent, whereas in the United States it was 3.9 per cent, in Japan it was 1.6 per cent and in Germany it was 1.8 per cent. We do not have to wait until international rates come down. The challenge for this government and this country is to bring our rates down to the levels that our competitors have attained with regard to inflation.

Senator Olson: Talk about interest rates, not inflation.

Senator Murray: My friend refuses to acknowledge the connection. We must bring inflation down. If the budget proves anything it is that we are not prepared to leave it all to monetary policy. That is why this budget has established inflation rates for this country over the medium term. That is why we are convinced that bringing inflation rates down is a precondition to bringing interest rates down, to putting the recession behind us and to restoring economic growth as of the second half of this year. Most of the forecasts in the private sector agree with us, with our scenario, with our forecasts and, honourable senators, with our policies.

In the budget we have set out the inflation targets for the next few years. We are going to legislate ceilings on increases in government programs spending. We have extended the expenditure control plan, as the honourable senator knows. We are going to provide for a special fund so that all the revenues from the GST will go to debt reduction and debt servicing.

Senator Olson: We need $42 billion for that.

Senator Murray: Yes, a deficit that was heading for $35 billion in fiscal year 1991-92 has been held to $30 billion and will be down below $25 billion in 1992-93. This is an economic recovery plan. The conditions are being established for a recovery in economic growth to over 3 per cent in 1992 and over 4 per cent in 1993.

The honourable senator can deny the connection between inflation and interest rates if he wishes, but the facts prove him wrong, the record in Canada proves him wrong and the international record proves him wrong. We must get inflation down if we are to get interest rates down. The budget proves that we are determined, through our fiscal actions, not to leave the whole job of battling inflation to the Bank of Canada and to the monetary authorities.

What is the alternative which the honourable senator suggests? It is very simple. It is to pick up the telephone, call the Governor of the Bank of Canada and tell him to get the interest rates down right away. Honourable senators, we say that the way to bring interest rates down permanently is to reduce inflation and inflationary expectations permanently.

The honourable senator is surely not denying the fact that inflationary pressures and inflationary expectations have been higher in this country over the last few years, and are higher now, than they are among our immediate competitors and trade partners. Any attempt to bring interest rates down in the face of serious inflationary pressures would be self-defeating. We could bring short-term inflation rates down initially, but this would only stimulate demand and aggravate the inflationary pressures. Very soon expectations of higher inflation would become entrenched causing long-term interest rates to rise immediately. As the inflation rate increased, short-term interest rates would go up again and we would end up with interest rates higher than those we started with.

Honourable senators, a wealth of international and Canadian experience proves that lower inflation rather than overly expansionary monetary policy is the key to lower interest rates. As I have said, the international record proves it and the Canadian record proves it. Therefore, by getting inflation down the government is paving the way for lower interest rates. I suggest to my honourable friend that the policy has already begun to show results—

Senator Frith: Just since Tuesday?

Senator Murray: No, we have followed the main lines of this policy for several years now. We have not left it all to the monetary authorities. Interest rates are coming down paving the way for a resurgence of economic growth in the second half of this year.

I know that other honourable senators will want to take part in this debate at a later date. Perhaps my honourable friends opposite wish to take the adjournment. If not, Senator Doody will do so on behalf of Senator Simard.

Senator Olson: I wonder if I could ask the minister one question. I asked him if he would give a commitment on behalf of the government that it is going to narrow the rates between Canada and the United States which, by the way, as a percentage of the total have expanded even in the last four months. Would he give a commitment that the government will narrow that in order that we can have at least some hope of being in line with our competitors?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not accept the honourable senator's statement about the spread between Canadian and U.S. interest rates. I do believe they have narrowed recently. Obviously I am not going to make the kind of commitment that my honourable friend suggests on behalf of the monetary authorities. We are convinced, as I believe are the international markets, that Canada is on the right track and on the road to a resurgence of economic growth in the second half of this year and over the medium term.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 5, 1991, at 2 p.m.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRTY-FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

THURSDAY, February 28, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

THIRTY-FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-79, An Act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act, has in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, January 23, 1991, examined the said Bill and now reports the same with the following amendments:

1. Pages 1 and 2, clause 1: Strike out lines 6 to 27 on page 1 and lines 1 to 12 on page 2 and substitute the following:

"after section 19 thereof, the following headings and sections:

"Internal Administration

Committee

19.1 (1) In this section and sections 19.2 to 19.9, "Committee" means the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration established by the Senate under its rules.

Intersessional Authority

(2) During a period of prorogation or dissolution of Parliament and until the members of a successor Committee are appointed by the Senate, the Committee continues to exist for the purposes of this Act and, subject to subsection (3), every member of the Committee, while still a senator, remains a member of the Committee as if there had been no prorogation or dissolution.

Senate control

(3) In exercising its functions and powers under this Act, the Committee is subject to the rules, direction and control of the Senate.

Emergencies

(4) Where the Chairman of the Committee deems that there is an emergency, the Committee's Sub-committee on Agenda and Procedure may exercise any power of the Committee under this Act.

Report of decision

(5) The Chairman of the Committee shall report to the Committee any decision made under subsection (4) at the meeting of the Committee immediately following the decision.

Capacity of Committee

19.2 (1) In exercising the powers and carrying out the functions conferred upon it pursuant to this Act, the Committee has the capacity of a natural person and may

(a) enter into contracts, memoranda of understanding or other arrangements in the name of the Senate or in the name of the Committee; and

(b) do all such things as are necessary or incidental to the exercising of its powers or the carrying out of its functions.

Function of Committee inter alia

19.3 Subject to subsection 19.1(3), the Committee may act on all financial and administrative matters respecting

(a) the Senate, its premises, its services and its staff; and

(b) the members of the Senate.

Main Estimate to be prepared

19.4 Prior to each fiscal year the Committee shall cause to be prepared an estimate of the sums that will be required to be provided by Parliament for the payment of the charges and expenses of the Senate and of the members thereof during the fiscal year.

By-laws

By-laws

19.5 (1) The Committee may make by-laws

(a) governing the use by senators of funds, goods, services and premises made available to them for the carrying out of their parliamentary functions;

(b) prescribing the terms and conditions of the management of, and accounting for, by senators, of funds referred to in paragraph (a); and

(c) respecting all such things as are necessary or incidental to the exercise of its powers and the carrying out of its functions.

Chairman to table by-laws

(2) The Chairman of the Committee shall table before the Senate the by-laws made under this section on any of the first thirty days after the making thereof.

Chairman to make by-laws available

(3) When the Senate is not sitting, the Chairman of the Committee shall cause the by-laws made under this section to be deposited with the Clerk of that House and such by-laws shall thereupon be deemed to have been tabled before the Senate.

Coming into force

(4) Subject to subsection (5), by-laws made under this section come into force on such day as may be fixed by resolution of the Senate.

Earlier effect

(5) By-laws made and tabled under this section during a period of prorogation or dissolution of Parliament have effect without a resolution of the Senate until the end of the thirtieth sitting day of the session of Parliament immediately following the prorogation or dissolution, unless they are earlier rescinded by the Senate." "

2. Page 2, clause 1:

(a) Strike out line 13 and substitute the following:

"(6) By-laws made under this section" ;

STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT PROPOSALS

THIRTY-SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

THURSDAY, February 28, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

THIRTY-SIXTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the document entitled "Proposals to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect" ("the Proposals"), has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of June 19, 1990, examined the said Proposals and now reports the same with the amendments and comments listed at the end of this report.

Your Committee, agreed on October 4th, 1990, to engage Ms. Lise Boulanger to prepare a preliminary analysis on the Proposals, which is included as Appendix 1. Ms. Boulanger's report was most helpful to your Committee, and was instrumental in focusing the Committee's attention on clauses which raised a specific concern (see below).

In her conclusion, Ms. Boulanger notes that "it is deplorable that no explanatory notes are provided in the case of the proposals contained in the schedules since the schedules in fact contain as many proposals as the main body of the text." Your Committee whole-heartedly concurs, and this issue is dealt with in more depth under General Concerns.

Your Committee also had general concerns about the combination of genuine anomalies and miscellaneous amendments, some of them substantive, in the same Proposals.

BACKGROUND TO PROPOSALS

The 1990 proposals represent the sixth series of proposals for a Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act since the program's inception in 1975 (1977, 1978, 1981, 1984 and 1987). This program is aimed at correcting certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada and at repealing certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed. Appendix 2 describes the various parts and schedules of the Proposals.

The proposals for a Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act are published by the Department of Justice and studied by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General and your Committee prior to a bill being published or introduced. If any member of either Committee objects to a particular proposal, it is withdrawn. The actual bill, incorporating the changes made by the Committees, is then published with speedy passage through both Houses of Parliament guaranteed.

The proposals were tabled simultaneously in the House of Commons and the Senate on February 15, 1990, but not referred to your Committee until June 19, 1990, after they had been approved by the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General of the House of Commons. Although this procedure avoids the possibility of conflicting amendments, it is very time-consuming and sometimes results in your Committee studying the proposals under serious time constraints.

The Department of Justice has established certain criteria for determining whether or not a proposal may be presented in this document. A proposal must not:

1) be controversial,
2) result in public expenditure,
3) prejudicially affect individual rights,
4) create a new offence or expose a group of persons to an existing offence.

When the proposals were tabled in the House of Commons on February 15, 1990, it was suggested by a member that the criteria be enlarged so as to include proposals put forward by the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations. While the criteria have not actually been changed, Justice officials testified that any proposals made to the Department of Justice by the standing joint Committee directly, or proposals made to the Department from other government departments with an indication that they were being made to deal with concerns of the Standing Joint Committee, have been included in this set of proposals.

Proposals originating with the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, or in response to their concerns, usually involve ensuring consistency between the enabling legislation and existing regulatory practice. Your Committee suggests that such proposals could most efficiently be dealt with as a distinct group, perhaps by a joint committee of the two relevant committees or by some other consultative mechanism developed for the purpose. Whether such proposals should be separately listed in the Department of Justice document, or just informally grouped together at the study stage, is a matter to be considered. Your Committee has long been concerned that Parliamentarians must pass legislation with no knowledge of what the regulations may be. Unfortunately, regulations can be used to authorize practices or policies not contemplated by Parliament when legislation is passed. Therefore your Committee is especially concerned that some of the amendments proposed to validate regulations may retrospectively authorize practices never contemplated when the original act was passed.

As Ms. Boulanger noted: "the majority of the 1990 proposals unequivocally meet the criteria listed earlier." Some provisions, however, concerned either potentially controversial substantive amendments or financial expenditures. These are dealt with under Specific Concerns later in this report. Your Committee decided to recommend approval of most of these provisions, after hearing testimony as to their purpose and effect.

GENERAL CONCERNS

Although your Committee recommends the approval of the Proposals, with the exceptions noted below, your Committee has a number of on-going concerns which we feel should be resolved before the next set of Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Proposals are presented to Parliament.

1. The Proposals deal with two different types of amendments:

    1) non-substantive anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors, and the repeal of spent enactments;
    2) miscellaneous amendments and repeals of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature.

The majority of the proposals presented in 1990 fall into the first category and should require little study. As Ms. Boulanger notes, they are uncontroversial and fall into categories of eliminating sexist terms, modernizing the language, updating references, eliminating inconsistencies between the French and English versions, and correcting minor errors.

Similarly, many of the statutes repealed, in whole or in part, have long since ceased to have effect and are already deemed to be repealed pursuant to subsection 2(2) of the Interpretation Act which states: ". . . an enactment that has expired, lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect is deemed to have been repealed." Adding them to a Schedule of the Proposals, however, gives official notice of the repeal to the public and the legal profession.

Most of the contentious proposals fall within the second category, and are initiated by the department administering the legislation rather than by the Department of Justice itself. This category requires closer parliamentary scrutiny, since it can easily contain amendments which are substantive rather than technical. What appears non-controversial and uncomplicated to the department administering the legislation may appear both controversial and complicated to the members of the public affected by the amendment.

For these reasons, your Committee recommends that in future the Proposals be divided into two Parts: one to deal with true anomalies which should not be substantive; and the other to deal with miscellaneous uncontroversial amendments and repeals, which might be substantive as long as they otherwise meet the Justice criteria.

Justice officials drew our attention to two proposed amendments which they thought might be borderline because of their financial implications. Both (clauses 101 and 136), discussed in detail below, are recommended by your Committee for approval. However, rather than asking Parliament to approve amendments that arguably do not meet the criteria, we feel that Justice should modify their criteria somewhat, possibly to cover modest expenditures where the amendment proposed is uncontroversial and corrects an error or oversight that is prejudicial to a group of persons or to public policy. Such amendments should be accompanied by a letter from the appropriate Minister confirming that funds have already been appropriated and no new monies will be required.

2. At present, the explanatory notes in the main body of the Proposals are often insufficient to allow parliamentarians to readily understand the implications of the change proposed. In part, this seems to arise from the fact that the administering department puts forth the reasons for the amendment, but Justice staff does the explanatory notes. Justice staff has taken the position that their role is to provide a neutral technical description rather than to comment on the policy position of the department.

Your Committee feels that, where an amendment is more than a simple anomaly, inconsistency, archaism or error, the explanatory notes should state the initiating department or agency for each proposed clause, together with a brief justification by the initiating department or agency, as well as the technical explanation.

3. Your Committee is particularly concerned about the complete lack of explanatory notes in the Schedules. We understand that this is because Schedules were traditionally printed with the English version on the left page and French version on the right page, leaving no room for explanatory notes. The printing of schedules was recently reformatted so the English and French versions are found respectively in the left and right column of the left hand page. However, the absence of explanatory notes was continued.

Your Committee feels that there should be explanatory notes in the Schedules similar to those in Part I of the Proposals or, alternatively, a vastly reduced use of Schedules.

4. Your Committee recommends that the Proposals be studied concurrently by the House of Commons and the Senate. Although this might raise the possibility of conflicting reports, we feel that the opportunity for a more considered study of the Proposals would justify the approach. Any resultant conflicts in recommendations could perhaps be referred to a joint committee for resolution.

5. A joint committee might also be a preferable way of dealing with amendments initiated by the Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, especially if these could be grouped together. Possibly, a joint committee of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General and this Committee could meet with the Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, and expeditiously deal with these proposals.

SPECIFIC CONCERNS

Your Committee also had specific concerns with a number of clauses, although most were resolved after testimony from Justice staff or from officials from the relevant departments.

Clause 12, amending section 25 of the Bankruptcy Act, would permit the deposit of moneys belonging to a bankrupt's estate in an institution that is not a bank, provided that the deposit is insured by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation or under a provincial enactment. Your Committee feels that this is a substantive amendment, and that a discrepancy between the English and French versions creates a potential ambiguity. Your Committee recommends that this clause be deleted.

Clause 44, amending paragraph 6(b) of the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, provides that the terms prescribed by regulation for the issuance, suspension or cancellation of a licence are in addition to terms and conditions specified by the Minister. Your Committee heard testimony that it is impractical to specify all of the terms of an individual licence by regulation. The present practice is that licences include terms and conditions customized to the individual licensee, and that the industry does not object. The Fisheries Act specifically provides for such individualized terms and conditions, so this amendment is to provide consistency between the two Acts, and to ensure that Ministerial conditions cannot be challenged as ultra vires. Your Committee, after consideration, recommends that clause 44 be accepted.

Clause 48 amends subsection 92(2) of the Cooperative Credit Associations Act to confirm that provincially incorporated cooperative credit societies can invest in securities dealers. Federally incorporated cooperative credit societies are given this power by section 12.1 of the Act, enacted by section 4 of chapter 21, Revised Statutes of Canada (3rd Supplement), but the consequential amendment to section 92 was overlooked. Clause 48 confirms that the enactment of section 12.1 was not intended to imply a difference in the powers of federally and provincially incorporated cooperative credit societies. Your Committee raised a constitutional issue with respect to this clause and it has been withdrawn.

Clauses 61, 62 and 63 amend the Criminal Code to the extent set out in Schedule I, Parts I, II (English version only), and III (French version only). Clauses 18 and 20 of Part II, which substituted the phrase "reasonable grounds" for "reasonable and probable grounds" in two separate provisions of the Criminal Code, were withdrawn as a result of the report of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General. The position of the Department of Justice is that these two tests amount to the same thing; that the English versions of these two provisions were simply overlooked when the phrases "reasonable grounds" and "motifs raisonnables" were consistently substituted for a variety of similar tests throughout all federal statutes, including the Criminal Code in the Revised Statutes, 1985; and that the proposed amendments involve only uniformity of language throughout the Code.

Your Committee does not agree. Had the two clauses not already been withdrawn, we would have recommended that this Committee object to them on the grounds that they could prejudicially affect individual rights. As is discussed below, your Committee feels that all schedules should include reasonable explanatory notes. In the absence of such notes we find it deplorable that amendments to the Criminal Code should be grouped in a schedule. Amendments to criminal legislation, by their very nature, have a particularly high potential of interfering with individual rights. In the absence of explanatory notes, it was most difficult for members of your Committee to feel reassured that no further clauses in Schedule I infringed such rights.

Because of your Committee's detailed study of previous amendments to the Immigration Act, we studied clauses 77 to 82, the proposed amendments to the Immigration Act, with particular interest.

Clause 77 is an amendment to the Immigration Act intended to offer increased protection to refugee claimants returned to a safe country under the provisions of Bill C-55. In its twenty-fifth report to the 33rd Parliament, dated July 20, 1988, this Committee noted and welcomed the fact that the Minister of Employment and Immigration had made a commitment to introduce such a provision in the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act. Through an inadvertent error in the original translation of the Minister's letter, however, a small inconsistency has arisen between the English and French versions. We therefore recommend that the French version be amended to read "l'autorisation légale de s'y trouver" to more closely parallel "given legal authority to be in that country".

Clauses 78 and 79 also amend the Immigration Act. They deal with removal orders in cases where an order is made against a person whose claim to be a Convention refugee is initially rejected, but who cannot, for whatever reason, be removed to another country. If the person is subsequently determined actually to be a valid convention refugee, clauses 78 and 79 ensure that the existing removal order will be automatically quashed.

Clause 80 deals with an overlap between the Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters Act and the Immigration Act. Where a conditional removal order is made against a refugee who subsequently leaves the country to voluntarily testify under the provisions of the Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters Act, clause 80 ensures that there is no possibility that his or her departure from Canada can be considered as an execution of the removal order. This ensures that refugees testifying abroad have the same right to re-enter the country as non-refugee immigrants, and that no new removal order is necessary should the refugee claim be rejected.

Your Committee consulted an expert in immigration law, and has been assured that the previous three amendments, while substantive, are non-controversial.

Clause 81 deals with an erroneous cross-reference between Bill C-71 (War Criminals) and Bill C-84. Because both Bills were under consideration by Parliament at the same time, it was not possible to finalize the cross-references and clause 81 corrects an outstanding anomaly.

Clause 82 is necessary as a result of the fact that Bill C-55 and Bill C-84 were before Parliament at the same time. Both Bills substituted a new section 121 to the Immigration Act but Bill C-84, as the later Bill, contained the most up-to-date cross-references. When Bill C-84 came into force on August 12, 1988, section 121 was properly cross-referenced. Unfortunately, Bill C-55 came into force on January 1, 1989, repealing the correct version of section 121 and substituting an earlier version. Clause 82 reintroduces the necessary cross-references.

Clause 101 amends the Municipal Grants Act to allow grants in lieu of taxes to be paid with respect to certain lands in the Territories. The Municipal Grants Act, 1980, excluded certain types of property from the definition of federal property on which grants in lieu of taxes could be paid, including most real property for which an original Crown grant had not been issued. For various reasons, federal property in the Territories is often "reserved" for use rather than granted. Grants in lieu of taxes cannot be made with respect to such lands even when they are within a municipality.

Grants to territorial municipalities continued to be made for a number of years after the Municipal Grants Act, 1980, came into force. For the last several years, however, such grants have ceased because of doubts as to their legality. Clause 101 is designed to retroactively remedy this problem, and to ensure that municipalities in the Territories are not prejudiced. Notwithstanding the fact that clause 101 has financial implications, your Committee, after hearing testimony and considering the various factors, recommends approval of this amendment. Although it involves the expenditure of money, the amendment is designed to allow a pre-existing program, for which funds have already been allocated, to continue and does not involve new expenditures. We feel, however, that the Department of Justice should modify its criteria for those anomalous situations in which amendments might involve the expenditure of public founds. The amendment is a desirable one, but Parliamentarians should not have to stretch the criteria to pass a worthwhile amendment. Rather, the criteria should be drafted in such a way that all such appropriate amendments are included.

Clause 115 amends the Parliamentary Employee and Staff Relations Act to give adjudicators of grievances certain of the powers of the Public Service Staff Relations Board. We requested comments from the Office of the Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel, and were advised the proposed amendment is a necessary one to ensure that long-standing Board practice is entirely consistent with the specific powers granted. We specifically inquired as to whether the new powers would make any difference to the adjudicator's ability to summon a parliamentarian, and were advised that, while the Act as a whole infringes on the powers, privileges and immunities of senators, this amendment will not extend the infringement beyond the existing bounds already sanctioned by Parliament.

Clause 120 amends the Public Service Staff Relations Act in the same manner as clause 115 amends the Parliamentary Employee and Staff Relations Act.

Clauses 134 and 135 amend the Statistics Act to allow Statistics Canada slightly greater flexibility in sharing collected information. Your Committee asked the Office of the Privacy Commissioner to review these sections, and was informed that there were no privacy concerns. The revision of section 12 of the Statistics Act better reflects the reality of StatsCan's relationship with some of its clients.

Clause 136 amends the Statute Revision Act so as to authorize the free distribution of the loose-leaf updates to the Revised Statutes. At present, a number of people, including members of Parliament, receive the annual statutes of Canada free. However, there is no similar authority to authorize the distribution of loose-leaf updates to the revision. Although clause 136 involves a small financial expenditure, your Committee recommends approval of the clause.

Clause 137 amends the Statutory Instruments Act to exclude membership rules established by bands and by-laws made by councils of bands from the application of the Act. This exclusion was recommended by what is now the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations in its Fifth Report, tabled in the House of Commons on March 20, 1987. These exclusions are presently authorized under the Statutory Instruments Regulations, and clause 137 would continue the existing exemptions and extend them to all membership rules and band by-laws, regardless of when they were established or made. This would ensure that no such rules and by-laws could be considered invalid for non-compliance with the requirements of the Statutory Instruments Act. Your Committee considers this to be a substantive matter, and could not be assured that it was uncontroversial. We recommend that the clause be deleted.

Your Committee was originally concerned at the number of amendments to the Canadian Environmental Protection Act in Schedule V (Amendments to the French version of certain Acts of Parliament, sections 11-21). We understand from testimony, however, that this is the first opportunity that arose to correct certain anomalies between the English and French versions resulting from the large number of amendments as it went through Parliament.

Of more serious concern was clause 53, an amendment to the Young Offenders Act, dealing with situations in which a young person's record can be disclosed. The English version says such records can be disclosed to a peace officer investigating an offence "that the young person is suspected of having committed". The French version states that it can be released to a peace officer investigating an offence "que l'on soupçonne, pour des motifs raisonnables, avoir été commise par l'adolescent".

Your Committee feels that the difference between "suspected" and "on soupçonne, pour des motifs raisonnables" is substantive, and not merely a linguistic anomaly. Where there is a substantive difference between the English and French versions of a criminal statute in particular, we feel that the version which least interferes with individual rights should become the standard. Therefore, your Committee recommends that clause 53 be deleted. We further recommend that Schedule IV be amended, by adding the words "on reasonable grounds" after the word "suspected" in the English version of the provision.

CONCLUSIONS

Your Committee reports the Proposals with the amendments set out in the letter of September 13, 1990, from the Minister of Justice to the Chairman of your Committee (Appendix 3) and with the following amendments:

Clause 12

Strike out clause 12 and renumber subsequent clauses accordingly.

Clause 137

Strike out clause 137 and renumber subsequent clauses accordingly.

Schedule IV

Add after line 17 on page 83 the following:

Young Offenders Act

24. Subparagraph 44.1(1)(f)(i) is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(i) for the purpose of investigating any offence that the young person is suspected on reasonable grounds of having committed, or in respect of which the young person has been arrested or charged, whether as a young person or an adult, or"

Schedule V

Strike out section 53.

RECOMMENDATIONS

Your Committee also stresses the importance of an improved process for dealing with future Proposals including, in particular:

the division of the Proposals into two Parts: one to deal with true anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms, errors and the repeal of spent statutes, all of which should be clearly non-controversial, and the other to deal with miscellaneous amendments and repeals, which might be substantive as long as they otherwise meet Justice criteria; explanatory notes which state the initiating department or agency for each proposed clause, together with a brief justification by the initiating department or agency for any potentially substantive amendments, in addition to Justice's technical explanation; explanatory notes in the schedules similar to those in the main document;

a reduced use of schedules, especially for such important statutes as the Criminal Code;

the concurrent study of the Proposals by both the House of Commons and the Senate, with any resultant conflicts to be referred to a joint committee;

the separate study of proposals initiated by the Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, which could be dealt with by a joint committee of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General and this Committee or such other consultative mechanism as may develop;

the provision, with any proposed amendment involving minor financial expenditures, of a letter from the Minister of the originating department confirming that the necessary funds have already been appropriated;

a revised set of criteria allowing proposals affecting public expenditure in strictly limited circumstances so that amendments such as clause 101 and clause 136 can be dealt with more easily; and the addition, in all schedules dealing with linguistic concurrence, of the unamended provision in both languages.

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ
Chairman

CONSIDERATION OF THE 1990 PROPOSALS FOR A MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT

BACKGROUND

The 1990 proposals represent the sixth series of proposals for a miscellaneous statute law amendment act since the program's inception in 1975 (1977, 1978, 1981, 1984 and 1987). This program is aimed at correcting certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada and at repealing certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed.

The proposals for a Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act are dealt with in a special way in that if a member of your committee objects in some way to a particular proposal, then it is withdrawn.

The Department of Justice has established certain criteria for determining whether or not a proposal may be presented in this document. A proposal must not:

1) be controversial;
2) result in public expenditures;
3) prejudicially affect on individual rights; or
4) create a new offence or expose a group of persons to an existing offence.

However, for the first time, these criteria have been expanded in 1990 to include proposals submitted by the Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations. Mr. Craig Lovgren, Legal Counsel with the Department of Justice, testified before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General that two of these proposals contained in clauses 101 and 136 were on the borderline of acceptability given the above-stated criteria, but were nonetheless retained. These proposals will be dealt with further on in this study.

1. ANOMALIES, INCONSISTENCIES, ARCHAISMS AND ERRORS

The majority of the proposals presented in 1990 fall into this category and consist, as the case may be, of eliminating sexist terms, modernizing the language, updating references, eliminating inconsistencies between the French and English versions, correcting minor errors or repealing certain statutes, either in whole or in part.

1. Eliminating sexist terms

It is the internal policy of the Justice Department not to use sexist language when drafting statutes. Since this policy is fairly recent, there are still adjustments to be made. For example, in English, we no longer use the pronoun "he"; instead we repeat the antecedent. For example, the proposals contained in clauses 2, 4, 13, 14, 21, 22 and 23 of Schedule IV (Amendments to the English version of certain statutes) are aimed at eliminating a sexist term and replacing it by a neutral one.

It should also be noted that clause 94 amends subsection 33(1) of the Interpretation Act to allow both masculine and feminine pronouns to be used in the drafting of legislation.

2. Modernizing the language

A number of clauses are aimed at modernizing archaic provisions which date back to the time when Parliament sat only a few months a year. This is true of clauses 6 (Department of Agriculture Act), 71 (Federal Court Act), 109 (Department of National Revenue Act), 125 (Public Works Act), 133 (Secretary of State Act), and 145 (Veterans Affairs Act). The proposal contained in clause 71 was suggested by the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations. When the Federal Court Act was passed in 1970, a 1989 provision was retained whereby the rules of the Federal Court can only be laid before Parliament at the opening of a session.

3. Updating references

It is fairly common for a statute to contain references to other statutes. These references can become outdated if the other statute is amended. For example, clause 3 of the proposals amends section 8.6 of the Aeronautics Act since the references contained in this statute became outdated following the adoption of the 1985 Criminal Law Amendment Act. Clauses 11, 22, 23, 82, 87, 88, 90, 110 and 129 as well as clauses 7, 9 11 and 14 of Schedule I (Amendments to the Criminal Code) correct certain references.

4. Eliminating inconsistencies between the two versions

Schedules IV and V are specifically aimed at amending either the English or the French versions of certain statutes. These amendments are sometimes being made in order to ensure consistency between the two versions. For example, clause 1 of Schedule IV amends paragraph 68b) of the Access to Information Act by substituting the English expression "made or acquired and preserved" by "preserved" to make it consistent with the French version which contains the one word "conserver". Clauses 26, 28, 32, 35, 36 and 40 of Schedule V are other examples of proposals aimed at ensuring consistency between the French and English versions of certain statutes.

5. Correcting errors

Following are several examples of errors which these proposals aim to correct:

- Since the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions is not by name a department or ministry of state, the reference to it should have been added under the heading "Other Government Institutions" (clauses 2 and 118);

- The heading "Reports" is substituted for the heading "Annual Reports" to reflect the fact that this section of the Act deals with more than annual reports (clause 9);

- This amendment would correct the reference to "Plan 64317", which should be a reference to "Plan 63417" (clause 106);

- Error in adapting the 1985 Criminal Law Amendment Act to the Revised Statutes (1985) (clause 11, Schedule 1).

6. Repealing legislative provisions

Approximately 42 statutes are totally repealed by the 1990 proposals, while an additional 17 are repealed in part. Item 28 of Schedule VII was substituted by "subsections 72(1.1) and (79.1(2)" during consideration of the proposals by the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General. The Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence reveal no motive for this amendment.

No explanation is given in the proposals for these partial or total repeals. One has to refer to the background notes prepared by the Justice Department for further details. Many of these statutes, or portions thereof, have long since ceased to have effect and have been repealed pursuant to subsection 2(2) of the Interpretation Act which reads as follows:

> "(2) For the purposes of this Act, an enactment that has expired, lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect is deemed to have been repealed."

There is therefore some question as to the very need to repeal these statutes and provisions by way of a miscellaneous statute law amendment act. Perhaps a more expedient way could be found to deal with these particular cases.

Items 8 and 27 warrant some consideration and will be focussed on further in part two of this study.

2. OTHER QUESTIONS

While the majority of the 1990 proposals unequivocally meet the criteria listed earlier, this is not quite the case for some of them. It is solely a judgement call as to whether certain proposals are controversial or not. Consequently, the Committee may wish to know more about the reasons behind some of the proposals for which little or no explanation is given.

It should also be mentioned that the 1990 proposals were not reprinted after they were considered by the House of Commons Committee. This Committee did recommend some changes, as can be seen from the enclosed excerpt of its Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence. The following clauses were either amended or withdrawn: clauses 57, 58, 59, 76 and 137; clauses 18 and 20 of Schedule I and item 28 of Schedule VII.

1. Clauses 12 to 21 amend the Bankruptcy Act and while some of the amendments are minor (clauses 15 and 18 to 21), others add or take away certain rights or obligations. Subsection 25(1) of the Act is amended to permit the deposit of moneys belonging to a bankrupt's estate in a financial institution that is not a bank. Subsection 28(1) of the said Act is amended to delete the requirement that copies of certain documents be sent to Statistics Canada. Finally, paragraph b) is amended so as to enable a trustee to maintain a single trust account for all estates summarily administered by the trustee.

2. Clauses 27 to 34 amend the Canada Ports Corporation Act. Since these amendments apply only to federal government property, it was ruled that they did not affect the rights of private citizens.

3. Clause 39 repeals paragraph 114a) of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act and replaces it by another. Since this provision appears to create a new offence it might not meet one of the criteria listed earlier. The Justice Department is of the opinion that this amendment merely serves to clarify the provision.

4. Clauses 49 to 54 amend the Copyright Act, doing away with the need for a Copyright Office seal and the requirement that certificates and copies issued by this Office be sealed. This amendment would ensure that there is only one register (instead of several "registers") and would eliminate the need for both original and certified copy to be produced in the case of any grant of an interest in a copyright. No explanation is given as to the reasons for or the consequences of such amendments.

5. Clauses 55 to 60 amend the Canada Business Corporations Act. At the request of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, clause 56 was amended to include the directors of the corporation among the persons to whom a proxy circular must be sent. There was agreement on clauses 57, 58 and 59 during the study by the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General (see enclosed text).

6. Clauses 77 to 82 amend the Immigration Act. The amendment to paragraph 46.01(1)b)ii) follows a commitment made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration to your committee (clause 77). Clauses 78, 79 and 80 could be viewed as controversial since they amend the rights of refugees who have been granted landing. Moreover, clause 80 deals with the relationship between conditional removal orders under the Immigration Act and transfer orders made under the Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters Act.

7. As noted earlier, the proposal contained in clause 101 was deemed by the Justice Department to comply fully with the criteria. This clause amends the Municipal Grants Act to enable grants in lieu of real property taxes to be paid in respect of any real property for which an original Crown grant has not been issued in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. These grants were paid up until 1980.

8. Clause 104 which amends the National Parks Act would require management plans of national parks to be laid before each House of Parliament rather than just the House of Commons. This amendment is in response to a commitment made by the Minister of the Environment to the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

9. Clause 120 amends the Public Service Staff Relations Act to extend the benefit of the grievance provisions of the Act to employees of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service who are not within the occupational category described as administrative support. One has to wonder what effect this amendment will have and whether it is appropriate to include it in the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act.

10. The proposal contained in clause 136 would amend the Statute Revision Act to provide authority for the distribution without charge of update pages for the loose-leaf edition of the Revised Statutes of Canada. The Justice Department considers this to be a borderline proposal in that it involves public expenditures. However, failure to include this provision in the Act was merely an oversight since it had already been decided that some persons would be entitled to receive the Revised Statutes of Canada.

11. Clause 137 would exclude the membership rules established by Indian bands as well as the by-laws made by the council of a band from the application of the Statutory Instruments Act. This proposal was recommended by the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations.

12. Clauses 138 to 140 amend the Trade-marks Act. These proposals would eliminate the requirement of filing certified copies of applications for the registration of a trade-mark in countries of the Union other than Canada. The Justice Department does not provide any explanation to justify these proposals which will in fact considerably affect the procedure that has to be followed when seeking to register a trade-mark. The current one-month period for filing a statement of opposition would be lengthened to two months and changes would also be made to the registration renewal process.

13. Schedule I contains 41 proposals to amend the Criminal Code. Proposals 18 and 20 were withdrawn following the review by the House committee. While these proposals appear to meet the criteria for inclusion in a Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act, the mere fact that there are so many proposals is surprising. Perhaps it would be advisable to request some explanations.

14. Clause 9 of Schedule IV amends the English version of the Customs Act. This amendment is identical to the one proposed by your committee when it examined Bill C-34. It seeks to bring subsection 111(1) in line with section 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

15. Clauses 11 through 21 of Schedule V amend the French version of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. No explanation is given for the proposed amendments. In some cases, entire paragraphs are added. Undoubtedly, it would be wise to obtain additional information as to the reason and substance of these amendments.

16. Item 8 of Schedule VII repeals paragraph 173(1)f) of the Canada Business Corporations Act. This paragraph allows a corporation to reduce or increase its stated capital which is deemed to be set out in the articles. One has to wonder about the implications of repealing this provision.

17. Item 27 of Schedule VII repeals sections 11 to 14 of the Interest Act. Pursuant to these provisions, debts incurred in Manitoba, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Alberta and the two territories bear interest at the rate of five per cent per annum. These provisions would be anti-constitutional. Item 27 would repeal these sections in each province and territory which have enacted laws respecting interest payable under a judgement.

CONCLUSION

It is deplorable that no explanatory notes are provided in the case of the proposals contained in the schedules since the schedules in fact contain as many proposals as the main body of the text.

While the majority of the proposals appear to meet the criteria set out by the Justice Department, the Committee may wish to obtain more information, in particular as regards the proposals mentioned in part two of my study.

APPENDIX 2

PARTS AND SCHEDULES

OF PROPOSALS

APPENDIX 2

The Proposals are structured as follows:

Part I consists of clauses 2-148 dealing with various Acts and with the first six Schedules to the Proposals;

Part II (clauses 149-160) deal with statute law repeals, including Schedules VII and VIII;

Schedule I deals with amendments to the Criminal Code, referred to in clauses 61-63 of the Proposals;

Schedule II sets out a new Schedule to the Financial Administration Act, referred to in clause 75 of the Proposals;

Schedule III sets out a new description of the Northern Yukon National Park, referred to in clause 108 of the Proposals.

Schedule IV contains amendments to the English version of various statutes, referred to in clause 146 of the Proposals;

Schedule V contains amendments to the French version of various statutes, referred to in clause 147 of the Proposals;

Schedule VI replaces the words "des Consommateurs et des Sociétés" with the words "de la Consommation et des Affaires commerciales" in various statutes, referred to in clause 148 of the Proposals;

Schedule VII deals with the repeal of various statutes in whole or in part, referred to in clause 149 of the Proposals; and Schedule VIII deals with amendments consequential on the repeal of one particular banking statute in Schedule VII, referred to in clause 150.

APPENDIX 3

LETTER FROM THE

MINISTER OF JUSTICE

TO THE

CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE

Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada

Ministre de la Justice et Procureure générale du Canada

SEP 13 1990

Honourable Nathan Nurgitz
Chairman, Standing Committee of the Senate on Legal and Constitutional Affairs
The Senate
Ottawa, K1A 0A4

Dear Senator Nurgitz:

As you know, the 1990 Proposals for a Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act were tabled in the Senate on February 15, 1990 and were referred to the Standing Committee of the Senate on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on June 19, 1990.

I am pleased to enclose the briefing notes on the Proposals prepared by officials of the Department of Justice. I trust that the Committee will find these notes of assistance as it proceeds to its examination of the Proposals.

I am also writing to you today to ask that several of the Proposals be amended or withdrawn. A list of the changes, together with explanations, is appended and I am requesting that your Committee consider the Proposals subject to these changes.

The changes fall into three categories. The first, listed in Appendix One, consists of changes that are necessary as a result of the passage of other Acts since the Proposals were tabled.

The second, listed in Appendix Two, would delete the proposals that were not unanimously accepted by the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Justice and the Solicitor General when it considered the Proposals. As you know, the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Program has always proceeded on the basis that proposals that are not unanimously accepted by both the House and Senate Committees are not included in the bill.

The Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Program is a way of making non-controversial changes to federal statutes. Since the Proposals were tabled, a number of departments have indicated that they would like certain of the Proposals affecting them to be amended or withdrawn and their wishes are reflected in the final category of changes, listed in Appendix Three.

Ottawa Canada K1A 0H8

Departmental officials will be available to answer any questions you or the other members of the Committee might have about these changes when the Committee considers the Proposals.

Yours sincerely,

APPENDIX ONE

CHANGES TO THE 1990 PROPOSALS FOR A MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT AS A RESULT OF THE PASSAGE OF OTHER ACTS SINCE THE PROPOSALS WERE TABLED

Clause 64

Strike out lines 40 to 42 on page 21 and lines 1 to 15 on page 22, and substitute the following therefor:

1990, c. 16, s. 8; 1990, c. 17, s. 16(1)

"court"
«tribunal»

""court" means

(a) in the Province of Ontario, the Ontario Court (General Division),
(b) in the Province of Quebec, the Superior Court,
(c) in the Province of Nova Scotia, the county court of the county court district in which the customs office is situated or in which the importer or owner resides or carries on business,
(d) in the Provinces of New Brunswick, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the Court of Queen's Bench,
(e) in the Province of British Columbia, the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, the Supreme Court, and
(f) in the Provinces of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, the Trial Division of the Supreme Court.""

This amendment would ensure that the amendments already made to the definition by the British Columbia Courts Amendment Act and the Ontario Courts Amendment Act, 1989 are reflected in the final text of the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act, 1990.

Clause 65

Strike out lines 19 to 37, on page 22, and substitute the following therefor:

Definition of "court"

""(5) In this section and sections 139 and 140, "court" means
(a) in the Province of Ontario, the Ontario Court (General Division),
(b) in the Province of Quebec, the Superior Court,
(c) in the Province of Nova Scotia, the county court of the county court district in which was seized the thing in respect of which an application for an order under section 139 is made, (d) in the Provinces of New Brunswick, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the Court of Queen's Bench, (e) in the Province of British Columbia, the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, the Supreme Court, and (f) in the Provinces of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, the Trial Division of the Supreme Court.""

This amendment would ensure that the amendments already made to similar provisions in other federal statutes by the British Columbia Courts Amendment Act and the Ontario Courts Amendment Act, 1989 are reflected in the final text of the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act, 1990.

Clause 75

Strike out lines 25 to 48 on page 26 and lines 1 to 8 on page 27, and substitute the following therefor:

"(2) Schedule I.1 to the said Act is amended by deleting therefrom the reference to

"Canadian Space Agency
Agence spatiale du Canada" and the corresponding reference to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

(3) Schedule I.1 to the said Act is further amended by adding thereto, in alphabetical order, a reference to

"Canadian Space Agency
Agence spatiale canadienne" and a corresponding reference to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

Coming into force of subsections (2) and (3)

(4) Subsections (2) and (3) come into force on the later of the day on which this Act is assented to and the day on which the Canadian Space Agency Act comes into force."

This amendment deletes subclauses 75(2) to (6). These subclauses would have amended the proposed Schedule I.1 to the Financial Administration Act on the coming into force of the Department of Forestry Act and the Department of Industry, Science and Technology Act. As both of these Acts have now come into force, the effect of these subclauses should be incorporated in Schedule II.

The amendment also adds new subclauses (2) to (4) to deal with the fact that the French version of the name of the Canadian Space Agency in the order designating it a department for the purposes of the Financial Administration Act is not the same as the French version of its name in the Canadian Space Agency Act, which will provide a statutory foundation for the Agency once it comes into force.

Clause 102

Strike out lines 26 to 33, on page 35, and substitute the following therefor:

R.S., c. 27 (2nd Supp.), s. 10 (sch., item 17); 1990, c. 16, s. 18; 1990, c. 17, s. 36

"102. The definition "judge" in section 18 of the Narcotic Control Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"judge"
«juge»

""judge" means
(a) in the Province of Ontario, a judge of the Ontario Court (General Division),
(b) in the Province of Quebec, a judge of the Superior Court for the district in which the conveyance, in respect of which an application for an order under section 17 is made, was seized,
(c) in the Province of Nova Scotia, a judge of the county court for the county court district in which any such conveyance was seized,
(d) in the Provinces of New Brunswick, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench,
(e) in the Province of British Columbia, the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, a judge of the Supreme Court, and

(f) in the Provinces of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, a judge of the Trial Division of the Supreme Court.""

This amendment would ensure that the amendments already

This amendment deletes subclause 147(2). This subclause would have postponed the coming into force of subsection 41(2) of Schedule V until the day on which the Museums Act came into force. As this Act has now come into force, there is no longer any need for subclause 147(2).

Service canadien des Forêts" and the corresponding reference to the Minister of Agriculture

Strike out the reference on page 70 to and the corresponding reference to the Minister of State for Science and Technology Strike out the references on pages 69, 70 and 72 to

"Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion" and substitute references to

"Minister of Industry, Science and Technology"

These amendments would integrate subclauses 75(2) to (4) of the Proposals into Schedule II. Subclauses 75(5) and (6) provided for subclauses 75(2) to (4) to come into force on the coming into force of the Department of Forestry Act and the Department of Industry, Science and Technology Act. As both those Acts are now in force, the changes, which are consequential on those Acts, can now be integrated into Schedule II in a more straightforward fashion.

Add in alphabetical order on page 70 a reference to "Goods and Services Tax Consumer Information Office Bureau d'information des consommateurs sur la taxe sur les produits et services" and a corresponding reference to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs

The purpose of Schedule II is to consolidate without amendment all orders in council in force designating divisions or branches of the public service of Canada as departments for the purposes of the Financial Administration Act. Since the proposals were tabled, the Office referred to has been so designated : see SI/90-74, 1990 Canada Gazette Part II p. 2679.

This amendment deletes subsection 41(1) of Schedule V. Subsection 41(1) would have amended subsection 9(3) of the National Archives of Canada Act, as it read before the coming into force of the Museums Act. As the Museums Act has now come into force, there is no longer any need for subsection 41(1).

APPENDIX THREE

CHANGES TO THE 1990 PROPOSALS FOR A MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT AS A RESULT OF THE WITHDRAWAL OF PROPOSALS

Clause 57

Strike out lines 3 to 11, on page 20, and substitute the following therefor:

"57. Subsection 160(3) of the said Act is"

Strike out lines 20 to 22, on page 20

Subsection 160(1) of the Canada Business Corporations Act requires certain corporations to send their financial statements to the Director appointed under that Act. This requirement has applied ever since the Act was enacted where the gross revenues of the corporation exceed $10,000,000 or the assets of the corporation exceed $5,000,000. Clause 57 would amend subsection 160(1) to permit these amounts to be fixed by regulation. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has requested that this proposal be withdrawn.

This does not affect the proposal to amend subsection 160(3), which deals with concerns of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations.

Clause 58

Strike out and renumber subsequent clauses accordingly

Clause 58 would amend subsection 161(5) of the Canada Business Corporations Act in relation to disqualifications from acting as auditor. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has requested that this proposal be withdrawn.

Clause 59

Strike out lines 41 to 44, on page 20, and substitute the following therefor:

"holding body corporate, the Director may make an"

Clause 59 would amend subsection 163(4) of the Canada Business Corporations Act, which relates to exemptions from the requirement of appointing an auditor. Part of the amendment would provide that subsidiaries of Canadian corporations only can be exempted. The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has requested that this part of the amendment be withdrawn. This does not affect the other part of the amendment, which deals with concerns of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations.

Clause 76

Strike out and renumber subsequent clauses accordingly

Clause 76 would alter the period for which the Canadian Human Rights Commission reports from the calendar year to the fiscal year. This change was originally requested by the Commission, but it has now indicated that it wishes to continue to report on a calendar-year basis. This proposal should therefore be withdrawn.

New Clause 137

Add immediately before line 1, on page 47, the following new clause:

"137. Paragraph 11(2)(a) of the Statutory Instruments Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(a) the regulation was exempted from the application of subsection (1) pursuant to section 19.1 or paragraph 20(c), or the regulation expressly provides that it shall apply according to its terms before it is published in the Canada Gazette; and

""

Renumber the subsequent clauses accordingly

Clause 137

Strike out lines 1 to 15, on page 47 and substitute the following therefor:

"137. (1) The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 19 thereof, the following heading and section:

"EXEMPTION OF MEMBERSHIP RULES AND INDIAN BAND BY-LAWS

Exemption from examination, registration, publication and scrutiny

19.1 The following classes of regulations are exempt from the application of sections 3 and 5, subsection 11(1) and section 19:

(a) membership rules established before or after the coming into force of this section by a band under section 10 of the Indian Act; and

(b) by-laws made before or after the coming into force of this section by the council of a band under section 81, 83 or 85.1 of the Indian Act.""

Strike out line 22, on page 47, and substitute the following therefor:

"Act by reason of the application of section 3 or 5, subsection 11(1) or section 19 of the"

Clause 137 would amend the Statutory Instruments Act by excluding membership rules established by Indian bands and by-laws made by councils of bands from the application of the Act. François Bernier, the General Counsel for the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, has pointed out that the amendment as drafted might, by exempting these instruments from the application of subsection 11(2) of the Act, prevent defendants from relying on their lack of notice of an unpublished by-law as a defence to a charge of contravening the by-law.

Mr. Bernier has accepted an alternative proposal, which would exempt membership rules and by-laws from the application of the provisions of the Act respecting examination, registration, publication and parliamentary scrutiny. Since membership rules and by-laws would, under this proposal, remain "statutory instruments", the proposal takes the form of adding an exemption section to the Act (proposed section 19.1) instead of amending the definition "statutory instrument" in subsection 2(1).

The effect of the alternative proposal is identical to that of the original proposal, except that it would now be clear that a defendant charged with contravening a band by-law could rely as a defence on a failure to take reasonable steps to bring the purport of the by-law to the notice of those likely to be affected by it.

The defence is now set out in paragraph 11(2)(b) of the Act and applies in respect of band by-laws because they have been "exempted from the application of subsection 11(1) pursuant to [regulations made under] paragraph 20(c)."

As band by-laws would, under this proposal, be exempted from the application of subsection 11(1) by a provision of the Act (rather than the regulations), a consequential amendment needs to be made to paragraph 11(2)(a) of the Act. This is the reason for the proposed new clause 137.

Schedule VII

Strike out the fourth column, headed "Extent of Repeal" for item 28, on page 102, and substitute the following therefor:

"subsections 72(1.1) and 79.1(2)"

Item 28 of Schedule VII would repeal certain provisions of the Fisheries Act. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans has requested that these repeals not be proceeded with, in view of the introduction of Bill C-74. Item 28 should therefore be deleted except to the extent it would repeal subsections 72(1.1) and 79.1(2). The repeal of these two subsections is consequential on the amendment proposed to the definition "sentence" in section 785 of the Criminal Code by item 16 of Schedule I to the Proposals.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a petition which is addressed to the Honourable The Senate of Canada and it states:

The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your Petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefor provide a remedy.

HUMBLY SHOWETH

WHEREAS the Government of Canada has seen fit, since Confederation and without hiatus, to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books and newspapers and, now proposes to include them in GST

WHEREAS uninhibited dissemination of the printed word as a cornerstone of democracy, culture, education and a literate and productive society will be negatively affected by GST application WHEREFORE the undersigned, your Petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate of Canada to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in tax free status for the printed word by proposing amendment to Bill C-62 to include retention of the zero rate

AND as in duty bound your Petitioners will ever pray.

This petition is signed by some 275 members of the reading public, all of them from the province of New Brunswick, most of them from southern New Brunswick, Saint John, Fredericton and vicinity.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I report that the flow of petitions against the GST and the demand for an immediate election, consistent with the form that I have been tabling these last many days, continues. Some that came in today I have not yet organized, but I will have done so by tomorrow.

I have four petitions from Quebec from the region of Victoriaville and Arthabaska. The second group is also from Victoriaville.

[Translation]

I have a third one that is from Plessisville, and a fourth one from Victoriaville.

These four petitions bear the names and signatures of about 70 persons.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(e), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (C) for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1991.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No.

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON FEDERAL SUPPORT PROGRAMS FOR AGRICULTURAL PRODUCERS

Hon. E.W. Barootes: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, March 6, I will move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be authorized to examine and report upon the federal government support programs for the agricultural producers of Canada; and
> That the Committee present its Report no later than May 2, 1991.

I hope honourable senators have observed that I am adhering to the "Frith rule" here.

Senator Hastings: That is something new!

An Hon. Senator: It is the "Bonnell rule".

Senator Frith: Small progress,but progress nonetheless!

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON ANNUAL REPORT OF DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY, 1990

Hon. E.W. Barootes: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, March 6, I will move:

> That the Committee present its Report no later than December 19, 1991.

QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL FINANCE

GST REVENUES—DEBT SERVICING AND REDUCTION FUND—PURPOSE AND METHOD OF OPERATION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government to help a number of us here, as well as other people across the country, understand the purpose of the so-called Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund and what it was designed to do. I tried to understand its purpose when it was announced by the Minister of Finance, but I really cannot see what it was designed to do. We know that it is estimated that $22 billion will accrue from the GST. It is also my understanding that, as a result of privatization, that figure may be higher. If massive privatizations, such as the one involving Petro-Canada, go forward, the yield could be in the area of $8 billion. In total, it would be substantially less than the projected debt service charges for the same fiscal year which are now estimated to be in excess of $40 billion.

● (1410)

Is it intended that the money from the GST and these privatizations will go into a fund that will by-pass the Consolidated Revenue Fund out of which all debt service charges are paid?

Honourable senators, it is not only I who has this dull or muddy view of the purpose, because economists, including leading bank economists, such as Doug Peters of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, called it "a public relations gimmick." Others have simply called it "smoke in mirrors." However, I am sure the government would not seriously make this proposal and follow through with legislation if there were nothing more to it than that. Yet, that is what the situation appears to be.

Could the Leader of the Government give us some brief indication of how this will work so that it does not interfere with or does not simply substitute for what normally happens, which is that revenue comes in and expenses are paid, including debt service charges? Will this money be separated into some special account?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Wilson will be bringing in legislation very shortly to create the Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund. At that time I trust the honourable senator will have answers to all his questions. If his questions are not answered in the legislation, he will have another opportunity to put them to the minister and/or officials who would appear before a Senate committee at that time.

Senator Olson: The minister has not told me anything I did not already know. I know that legislation is to be introduced. What I am trying to find out is what it is intended to do. I want to know how the procedure and methodology of using this fund will be applied so that it does not appear to the Canadian public that this is just smoke in mirrors. The government is trying to set up something that it is obviously obliged to do in any event, which is to account for the revenue and pay the expenses, including the debt service charges.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend will have to contain his patience until the legislation is introduced. The legislation will indicate how the fund is to be set up and how it will operate.

Briefly, the advantage of setting up the fund is that the government will be unable to use any excess from the GST to increase program spending in other areas. The proceeds from the GST will be dedicated entirely, first, to servicing the debt which now takes almost 40 cents of every revenue dollar, and, ultimately, reducing the national debt.

Senator Olson: I take it, then, that this legislation will be an attempt somehow to try to screw up the discipline of governments a little, because the honourable minister knows, just as well as I do, that no parliament has any right or any authority to commit some future parliament to what it may or may not want to do. Is that all it is good for—to try to screw up the discipline of this government so that it is not tempted to introduce some new sweetheart programs?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, future parliaments will be committed unless and until they decide to change the law that we have brought in. During the next election campaign my honourable friend's party will have an opportunity to campaign on the proposition that the proceeds from the goods and services tax ought not to be used to service and pay down the debt but rather for some pie-in-the-sky program which I am sure his leader will not hesitate to bring forward.

Senator Thériault: Like the child care program!

Senator Olson: The minister knows very well that what he is talking about now amounts to much the same thing: pipe-dreams and delusions. What the Leader of the Government appears to be saying is that they are going to legislate discipline on this cabinet, because future parliaments are not bound by what this parliament does. He knows that very well. They can change any law at any time. I am asking him seriously because I believed the minister was serious and that he was bringing in something that was useful; but apparently, as the days go by and other people, not just myself, examine what this so-called fund is designed to be used for, it looks like it is nothing more than a public relations gimmick, smoke and mirrors, laying out what the government is absolutely obliged to do anyway. Why does the minister not tell us what it really is so that we do not have to play this funny little game? He has admitted that he is going to try to legislate some discipline on this government. Surely, that is not the full extent of what the legislation is there to do.

Senator Murray: Well, honourable senators, in recent years, we, unlike our predecessors, have been running a surplus on the operating account in government.

Senator Olson: We had that every year.

Senator Barootes: No. You never had one.

Senator Murray: We have not been borrowing to pay our operating account. We have run a surplus on the operating account. The honourable senator should study the idea of a debt servicing and reduction fund using the proceeds from the GST in conjunction with the other decisions or initiatives announced in the budget, such as a cap on spending increases year over year and the other fiscal disciplines that are being imposed. The honourable senator will quickly come to the conclusion, I trust, that over time the proceeds from the GST and privatization, which right now would be insufficient to cover the servicing costs, will, in a very short time, not only cover the servicing costs but would be dedicated actually to paying down the debt. Even the honourable senator must have had a mortgage at some time or other in his life, and he should understand the concept of interest and principal.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: This is really the silliest argument I have ever heard—

Senator Thériault: They are just copying Washington!

Senator Olson: —that is, that somehow the government can take its obligation to pay the interest on the debt, which obviously has to be the first obligation of any government in office, and say, "Now we are going to set that over here as non-program spending for which we are not responsible." Yet this government has borrowed more money—as has been pointed out, since it went into office in 1984—than all governments in Canadian history before it. The debt is more than 100 per cent greater than it was in 1984 when you took over.

Senator Murray: Compound interest. Surely you understand that.

Senator Olson: Whenever you borrow money, you have to pay the interest on it. If you are going to borrow $30 billion because of the deficit, the Canadian people know that what that leads to is that the taxpayers will have to pay the rate of interest that the Bank of Canada imposes on Canadians into perpetuity. That is the penalty one pays for borrowing money. However, you are not fooling anyone when you try to introduce this bookkeeping red herring whereby you say that the debt service charge is in one pile and programs are in another and that the program costs are below the total revenue for any year. We understand that. Noone is fooling anyone with that. Now, however, you come along with a serious matter legislating a new fund, and we want to know how that is going to work, because noone in the country except the government seems to understand what the smoke and mirrors are all about.

Senator Murray: Well, honourable senators, if I am not mistaken, it was only a very short time ago, in the course of third reading on the GST bill, that my friends opposite supported an amendment which would have that very effect, of earmarking revenues from the GST to a debt-servicing and reduction fund.

Senator Barootes: Hang your heads!

Senator Thériault: You turned it down!

Senator Murray: If I am not mistaken, the amendment was proposed by one of the independent senators and enthusiastically supported by Senator Olson and his colleagues.

• (1420)

Senator Barootes: Senator Buckwold suggested it in his speech too!

Senator Murray: I would have thought that, far from criticizing the initiative Mr. Wilson announced, my friends opposite would be leaping up to claim authorship.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: I take it, then, that the government is now bringing in legislation that was specifically designed around the amendment presented in this house. You are now supporting something you voted against only a few days ago. Is that correct?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, like a great many other things at the time—

Senator Olson: It did not sound so good then!

Senator Murray: At the time we indicated that the government looked sympathetically upon many of these ideas, but we were not prepared, during the course of that debate, to accept politically-motivated amendments that were presented solely for the effect of delaying and derailing the implementation of that tax.

Senator Olson: My friend could have saved a great deal of time had he stood up in this chamber when those amendments were moved and accepted the amendment, which he is doing now. Now you are bringing in, in legislative form, as a result of the deliberations of the budget, a fund that follows the motion made in this house as to the use of the funds from the GST, which debate occurred in this chamber last November. That is useful information.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not have the amendments before me, but it seemed to me that the principle was clear. The principle was that the proceeds from the GST, or some of them in the case of that amendment, should be used to pay down the deficit and the debt. We have long accepted that principle, and it was introduced in Mr. Wilson's budget of last Tuesday, which would be followed up with legislation. I would expect the honourable senator to be rejoicing and applauding the initiative of Mr. Wilson.

An Hon. Senator: Don't count on it!

Senator Olson: I would be happy to see the legislation and how the government manages it. But, besides these digressions, the question I asked at the outset was: What is the sense of having dedicated $22 billion, more or less—and it will be a little more or less depending on the amount of revenue received from privatization proceeds—when we know that the debt service charges are $40 billion plus? So the government will have to find more money because it will have to pay interest on the rest of that too. The government is going to have to pay $40 billion whether or not it has a new act and fund.

Senator Murray: That is what I am trying to explain to the honourable senator. The beauty of this initiative is that over a fairly short time the proceeds from the GST will exceed the amount of money that is required to pay the interest on the debt. At that time, what is left will be used to pay down the principal. Again, if my honourable friend ever had a mortgage in his life, he would understand the concept of paying down interest and then attacking the principal.

Senator Olson: Is Senator Murray saying that the government is going to raise the rate of the GST to double the revenue that is being collected now? The revenue being collected from it now is projected to be $22 billion. He has just said that it is an act for the purpose of making sure that somewhere down the road there is going to be revenue from the GST in excess of the interest charges on the national debt, and that this legislation is going to be used to make sure that that money is used to pay down the principal of the national debt. That is what he has just said. It will be the 22nd or 23rd century before that happens.

In all seriousness, is that the only purpose of this fund? If so, we are now making legislation for 75 or 100 years in the future.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator has not read, or, if he has read he has not understood, the projections which Mr. Wilson provided in the documents accompanying the budget. We are heading for a balanced budget in a very few years, and even before that the borrowing requirements of the government will be at or close to zero.

Senator Olson: Let the record show that the answers were completely unsatisfactory.

PERSIAN GULF WAR

COST OF CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN SANCTIONS AND WAR

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he can give us the most recent estimate available to the government of the cost of Canada's participation in the sanctions and the war against Iraq.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not carry those figures at my fingertips, but I will endeavour to obtain an accurate figure and bring it in in a day or so.

IRAQ

AID FOR POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether Canadian aid for the post-war reconstruction of Iraq will be given now or after the demise of Saddam Hussein?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, not being the Almighty, I am not in a position to say when the demise of Saddam Hussein might take place.

Senator Haidasz: Would the leader at least tell us whether it is the intention of the Government of Canada to contribute Canadian funds to the post-war reconstruction of Iraq?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, yes, it is our intention to participate in that effort.

Senator Haidasz: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether it has been decided how much taxpayers' money will be allocated to the post-war reconstruction of Iraq.

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators. It should also be pointed out, however, that there are very considerable opportunities for Canada's business firms to take part in the reconstruction of the physical infrastructure and the economies of the affected countries, including Kuwait as well as Iraq.

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION—LIST OF ASSETS ELIGIBLE FOR CANADIAN ASSISTANCE

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could tell us whether the Government of Canada has drawn up a list of those Iraqi assets that would be eligible for the Canadian assistance that will be available in the program to which the Leader of the Government has just now made reference?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have not seen such a list but I shall make inquiries.

REPARATIONS FOR WAR DAMAGES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, a statement has been attributed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that, contrary to Secretary Baker's statement that the Americans are going to go after Iraq for war reparations, Canada is not going to pursue the same policy. Could he elaborate on that?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am not sure that the statement which my friend attributes to Mr. Clark is accurate or in context. I saw Mr. Clark, as I am sure did Senator Bosa, saying on television that the question of reparations was not at the top of Canada's priorities; but he did not say that it was not a matter to be pursued.

• (1430)

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION—BASIS FOR CANADIAN ASSISTANCE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government tell us if Canadian assistance for the reconstruction of Iraqi assets will be conditional upon Iraq's performing any reparation requirements that are drawn up? I ask the question because I hope that we would not get ourselves into a position in which Canadians would be paying to assist or reconstruct Iraqi assets while other countries were drawing off from Iraq on a reparation's account.

[Senator Murray.]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, we are not seeking to act independently and unilaterally in a matter of this kind. It is precisely for the purpose of consulting with other authorities that Mr. Clark has met in the past few days with the Secretary General of the United Nations, with Secretary Baker in Washington, and is now en route to the Gulf area, where he will meet with representatives of the Government of Saudi Arabia and other governments in the region.

Senator Stewart: In other words, the Government of Canada at this point does not have a position with regard to assistance for the reconstruction of Iraqi assets; that is, the Canadian position will be determined consequent upon knowing what other governments will do with regard to reparations. Is that the situation?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we are giving considerable thought to what we can and should do, but the short answer to the honourable senator's question is that we are consulting with other members of the coalition and other governments in the region on this matter.

REPARATIONS FOR WAR DAMAGES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a follow-up question on this point. In the Toronto Star this morning it appears that Mr. Clark has gone farther than the minister has suggested to the Senate. Mr. Clark is quoted, in a Toronto Star article written by Olivia Ward arising out of an interview that he had at the United Nations yesterday, as suggesting that Canada "was not amongst the countries that were insisting on reparations." It does not appear, as the minister has suggested, that Canada is consulting. It appears that Canada has taken a position that it is not amongst those countries that are insisting upon reparations.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, those are two different questions. That was not the question asked by Senator Stewart. His question was not about reparations, but about what we might do with regard to rebuilding the physical assets of Iraq. That was the question he posed.

I replied to the earlier question about reparations by referring to Mr. Clark's interview yesterday, in which he stated that the question of reparations was not at the top of our priority list.

CANADIAN POSSESSION OF ALIEN PROPERTY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Opposition, if he cannot answer today, answer tomorrow what external assets of Iraq, if any, are in the possession of Canada's custodian of alien property.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Do you mean the Leader of the Government? You asked the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Haidasz: I apologize. I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether any external Iraqi properties or assets are in the hands of Canada's custodian of alien property?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I am not aware of any, honourable senators.

CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY—RESPONSIBILITY OF IRAQI LEADERSHIP

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: I have another question arising out of Mr. Clark's interview at the United Nations yesterday, and that is the position of the Canadian government with respect to holding the leadership of the Saddam Hussein government responsible for crimes against humanity and whether or not the Canadian government intends to pursue this issue or intends to take a backseat on this issue?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, that is a matter that would be pursued at the United Nations, and I do not think that the honourable senator would expect that Canada would be, as he puts it, taking a backseat on the issue.

Senator Grafstein: There appear to be two parallel paths to deal with this question. One is through the United Nations, which historically has not been involved in the mechanics of holding tribunals or establishing tribunals that would deal with the issue of crimes against humanity. My question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate is the Canadian government's position to take a leadership role in establishing tribunals that would hold Mr. Saddam Hussein and his leadership accountable if, in fact, they have been responsible, as is now alleged, for serious breaches of laws against humanity?

Senator Murray: I do not think I would give a different answer to that question than I gave to the first.

HONOURABLE JACQUES FLYNN, P.C.

PAYMENT FOR SERVICES TO GOVERNMENT DURING GST DEBATE

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he has received a bill from our former colleague, Jacques Flynn, for services he performed during the GST debate?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I thank the honourable senator for raising this question again. I may have inadvertently misinformed him the last day he brought it up. I confess that I have not seen a bill. I believe there is one either for disbursements or for professional services or for both. I am not certain. I suspect that it has been paid. I thank the honourable senator for reminding me to obtain the information. Indeed, if he wants to be more precise about it, he might wish to put a question on the order paper, to which I would reply with all the details he is looking for.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to five questions. I would ask that these answers be printed as part of today's proceedings.

THE ENVIRONMENT

RAFFERTY-ALAMEDA DAMS PROJECT—REIMBURSEMENT OF GOVERNMENT FUNDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 27, 1990, by the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, regarding Rafferty-Alameda Dams Project—Reimbursement of Government Funds.

(The answer follows:)

Eight million of the ten million dollars was paid to Saskatchewan prior to the initiation of the federal court action to seek an injunction to stop construction. Two million dollars is being held in abeyance. If the present court action proceeds it would be the intention of the Federal Court to seek reimbursement.

THE ECONOMY

MIGRATION OF CANADIAN MANUFACTURING FIRMS—EFFECT ON INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on December 19, 1990, by the Honourable Royce Frith, regarding the Economy—Migration of Canadian Manufacturing Firms—Up-to-Date Figures on Job Creation, Creation of New Firms, and Bankruptcies.

(The answer follows:)

The number of business bankruptcies in 1990 was 11,642, which is higher than the 1982 peak of 10,765. However, as a percentage of total establishments, 1990 bankruptcy incidence was only 0.73 as compared to 1.28 in 1982.

Personal bankruptcies in 1990 totalled 42,782—higher than the 30,642 recorded in 1982. The incidence of bankruptcy was higher at 0.43 compared to 0.36 in 1982.

Bankruptcies in all years are substantially lower than new business creations. Between 1981 and 1990 business bankruptcies ranged from about 8,000 to 11,000 compared to new businesses which ranged from 90,000 to 140,000.

Bankruptcies—see tables 1 and 2

The most recent data released by Statistics Canada indicate that the total number of business and personal bankruptcies in Canada in January 1991 increased by some 21 per cent from December 1990, and were 69 per cent higher than January 1990.

Personal bankruptcies were 76.7 per cent higher in January relative to a year ago, and despite a decline in the number of bankruptcies in December (to 4,821), have returned to near the record monthly peak, reached last November (4,879).

The incidence of personal bankruptcies—the ratio of personal bankruptcies to private households—for 1990 was 0.45. The previous high was 0.36 reached in 1982.

Preliminary estimates for 1991, using January data, indicate an increase in this ratio to 0.61.

Business bankruptcies in 1990 totalled 11,642. The previous peak of 10,765 was reached in 1982. January business bankruptcies totalled 1,170, and were 43 per cent higher than a year ago.

The incidence of bankruptcy—the ratio of bankruptcies as a proportion of total business establishments—for 1990 was 0.73, still much lower than the rate of 1.28 reached in 1982.

Preliminary estimates, again using January data, indicate an increase in this ratio in 1991 to 0.81.

New Business Creation—see Table 3

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business (CFIB) estimates that some 140,000 new business were created in 1990. This is virtually the same rate of new business growth observed since 1987, and is significantly higher than the 89,000 new businesses created in 1982.

The CFIB also estimates that in 1990 some 140,000 firms will go out of business, a significant rise from the 120,000 closures noted in 1989. However, it should be remembered that business closures can occur for a number of different reasons including inter alia: sale, merger, retirement, and/or bankruptcy.

Employment—See table 4

During the period 1984 to 1989 employment level growth averaged more than 2 per cent per year, with total employment increasing from 10.6 million in 1984 to 12.6 million in 1990.

The recent slowdown in the economy has caused employment growth to lose momentum, but employment still registered an increase of some 0.69 per cent in 1990.

EXTERNAL RELATIONS

ECONOMIC AID TO POLAND—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on February 26, 1991, by the Honourable Stanley Haidasz, regarding External Relations—Economic Aid to Poland—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

As the honourable senator has noted, this matter is being discussed in the Paris Club of official creditors. A Polish delegation also visited Ottawa earlier this year to discuss Poland's request.

Canada is playing a very constructive role in these discussions. Canada recognizes the historic and courageous efforts under way in Poland to pursue fundamental political and economic change, and the government accepts that significant additional debt relief is essential to achieve this goal.

It is unlikely that the Paris Club will agree to debt reduction of 80 per cent, and our discussions with Polish authorities suggest that they do not expect such massive relief, but we are confident that an agreement will be reached with Poland in coming months.

THE ENVIRONMENT

OIL POLLUTION IN THE GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE—SOURCES OF POLLUTION—DEATH OF SEA BIRDS ON P.E.I. BEACHES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on February 26, 1991, by the Honourable Lorne Bonnell, regarding Oil Pollution in the Gulf of St. Lawrence—Sources of Pollution—Death of Sea Birds on P.E.I. Beaches.

(The answer follows:)

Environment Canada is discussing with the Canadian Coast Guard suitable studies to determine the technical feasibility of all options for the recovery of the Irving Whale.

The environmental risks and benefits associated with these options for recovery of the oil and barge will have to be evaluated.

Terms of reference for a study are being developed.

EXTERNAL RELATIONS

GOVERNMENT LOANS TO THAILAND—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on February 26, 1991, by the Honourable Stanley Haidasz, regarding Government (EDC) Loans to Thailand.

(The answer follows:)

Initial reports indicate there has been little disruption to business in Thailand.

Thailand's miliary council has apparently announced it will appoint a panel to look at large investment projects. It is not known if this will slow negotiations on the MRT project.

The Canadian Government will continue to offer strong support to Lavalin International Inc. as we have done in the past. We shall keep a close watch on developments in order to more clearly evaluate the impact of the coup on Lavalin and other Canadian companies pursuing business in Thailand.

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR MANAGEMENT DEVELOPMENT ACT

THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Third reading of Bill C-34, An Act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof.—(Honourable Senator Bolduc).

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I move that the Bill be given third reading.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, in his appearance before the National Finance Committee on February 28th, the Principal of the Canadian Centre for Management Development, stated among other things:

> . . . the mission of the Centre . . . is to improve the quality of management and through it . . .

According to him . . .

> . . . the quality of the Public Service and, as a consequence, the quality of service to the people of Canada.

I am sure that no one could disagree with that laudable objective. However, I am not convinced that this Act, which confers on the Centre the status of a departmental corporation, is necessary to achieve it.

The Centre has now been operating quite successfully for over two years under an Order in Council, obtaining the resources it requires through the Estimates process. Its predecessor organization, the Centre for Executive Development in Touraine, functioned perfectly well as part of the Public Service Commission. Mr. Dewar, the Principal of CCMD, indicated in the Committee meeting, answering a question from Senator Bolduc, that the National Defence College in Kingston, which many senior public servants as well as military officers attend, is an integral part of the Department of National Defence and that there has never been any suggestion that its status should be changed. He stated, however, that an Act of Parliament would benefit CCMD in various ways. First of all, it is "declaratory" and draws attention to the importance of training as a major part of management in the Public Service. The Principal feels that insufficient attention has been paid to training in the past. He thinks that Bill C-34 helps the Centre to be more outward-looking and to focus on the knowledge and expertise it can acquire from the universities and the private sector.

He believes that the bill confers a degree of independence, allowing the Centre to operate under a Board of Governors and report to Parliament through a minister—who will now apparently be the Secretary of State—without requiring it to respond to the day-to-day needs of the minister in the way a department does. In turn, this should make it easier to attract academics and other outside persons to work as faculty members of the Centre.

Finally, Mr. Dewar believes that the legislation will enable Public Service managers to operate more effectively and efficiently in a climate of increasing globalization, shifts in social values, rising expectations of government services and contining restraint.

[Senator Doody.]

I must say that I do not find the principal's asrguments very convincing, although I am sure he is sincere in stating them. For example, as Senator Pitfield pointed out in his speech on the bill on June 13, 1990, Clause 20 states that the Secretary of the Treasury Board, of the Public Service Commission and the Centre's principal are ex officio governors. Since the Clerk of the Privy Council is the head of the Public Service and the other two officials determine the conditions under which Public Service managers are recruited, paid and promoted, I find it difficult to see who this proposed structure for the Centre can assure its independence and help it to train managers, and I quote:

> Who are capable of questioning the status quo and creatively envisioning and managing change.

It seems more likely that such a structure would be a sure-fire recipe for the Centre to become part of the Public Service establishment with a mission to indoctrinate managers in whatever management theories and fads are fashionable at the moment. As well, the Principal acknowledged to the Committee that there is a need for the Centre to recruit more women and members of minority groups to its faculty, to give its students greater exposure to management experience from the private sector and to get them out of their isolation in Ottawa. He did not indicate how the bill would help him to accomplish all this. Perhaps, as Senator Pitfield suggested, it would be outside the hothouse atmosphere of Ottawa and learn how managers operate in the real world.

Finally, there is the question of the costs associated with this legislation. In a time of continuing restraint, I wonder whether establishing the Centre with a separate administration and its own Board of Governors can be economically justified. On February 26th, the Minister of Finance announced in the Budget that the numbers of senior managers, known as the SM and EX groups, will ne reduced by some ten per cent, apparently over the next two years. This suggests to me that there will be fewer managers in future to attend the courses that CCMD offers and therefore that fewer faculty members will be needed and costs can be saved. However, I observe in the 1991-92 Estimates that the Centre requests the approval of an increase of 8.6 per cent over the 1990-91 estimates, which I find hard to reconcile wth the prospect of declining numbers of students. Even though there is provision for a full evaluation and review of th Centre's activities and organization within five years, I fear that passage of Bill C-34 may result in the Centre being funded every year simply because it is there.

For all these reasons, I intend to vote against the bill. Besides, the Committee has taken a vote on that matter, which resulted in five Senators being in favour of Bill C-34 and four against, including the President.

Thank you, Honourable Senators.

• (1450)

[English]

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, the hearings of the National Finance committee gave us the opportunity to have, as a witness, among others, the director of the Canadian Centre for Management Development, Mr. Dewar. He is a top career civil servant, a man of wide experience in public administration who has served, among other positions, as Deputy Minister of National Defence.

I believe we have received from him satisfactory answers to numerous questions which had been in the mind of many senators on both sides of the chamber.

He has argued eloquently, and with a good deal of relevancy, on the necessity to apprise the senior administrators, or to remind them, of the importance of values which must characterize them, such as probity and efficiency in serving the public and the government.

He has also pertinently stressed the constant necessity for senior civil servants to take into account, in the management of the public sector, the specific criteria which characterize it, namely the primacy of the public interest over special group interests, the primacy of the rule of law and of its respect over the rule of men and administrative discretion, and the limited public resources at their disposal as managers.

He has also confirmed to the honourable members of our committee that the centre's program of management training will put emphasis on increasing the administrative abilities of our senior people, as well as developing their analytical abilities in policy or program formulation, as well as deepening their understanding of values inherent to the Public Service.

Mr. Dewar also reassured us that the management and the operation of the centre will comprise a fair share of human resources coming from the Public Service, from the academic community, and from private enterprise where, as a matter of fact, a fierce competition gives a strong impetus to the hierarchy to constantly innovate in the management of its resources. There is no doubt that this will benefit our senior people.

The management of the centre wishes also to cooperate with other training institutes, for example, ENAP, with which an accord has been signed and which has an excellent record in serving the Quebec public service. Let us hope that this collaboration will extend to the management schools of our Canadian universities such as Western, York, HEC in Montreal, as well as the National Defence College in Kingston. All those establishments, I believe, serve the country very well.

Some Senators had doubts about the necessity of incorporating by statute this administrative unit which is already in place. Mr. Dewar explained to us that the process of development training needed the administrative autonomy and flexibility of a government corporation on the one hand, and that, on the other hand, the impact of a statutory declaration of its mission as well as the required performance evaluation of the centre and the accountability of its management justified a specific statute to establish the centre which, incidentally is not an academic institution but a management training centre for government employees.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I noticed that Senator Leblanc questioned the CCMD's autonomy on the grounds that the Board of Governors will include the Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the Cabinet, the Chairman of the Public Service Commission and the Secretary of the Treasury Board.

I don't think there is any reason to get upset. The purpose is not to give the CCMD some kind of theoretical autonomy vis-à-vis the government. The purpose is to give it administrative autonomy so that it can manage the development process effectively. However, I don't think it would be appropriate to turn the CCMD into something that would be completely outside the government.

What the CCMD must do is focus the attention of senior officials on management techniques that are applicable to government because they have been tested in the government or in the private sector, and at the same time make them aware of the general environment in which they live and their specific job environment in the government. That environment is quite different, I must say, from the private sector.

My point is that corporations as such should not be seen as a manoeuvre that would have the effect of removing them entirely from the government. That is not the objective.

Corporations must keep step with the government's objectives but at the same time, they must have sufficient administrative flexibility to manage the learning or training process.

This new legislation must be seen within the context of Public Service 2000, which is a very important focus throughout the government.

As for his reference to the National Defence College, I don't think the college's objective was necessarily to give management courses to senior members of the Canadian Forces or to senior management, in other words, to colonels, brigadiers, major generals, lieutenant generals and generals. The purpose is, in fact, to expose them and, first of all, to acquaint them with international politics and strategic issues and also to bring them into contact with the civilian half of the group. It is important for our military people not to be isolated, so that at the National Defence College, in groups of 35 or 40, half the group will consist of civilians from the private sector, universities and governments.

It is a valuable experience for us—I am an ex-student of the college myself and I am proud of it—it was a valuable experience to be able to discuss military and strategic issues. I think it was also valuable for the colonels who were there and who today have become generals who, as you all know, have just given an impressive performance.

[English]

We have underlined many desirable facets of the government management training policy. I would like to mention here two important ones that we have stressed to the authorities of the centre. First, the necessity of frugality in spending public money, particularly in a period of austerity. Self-restraint must be the lot of higher civil servants and senators, as well as all Canadian citizens.

Secondly, we have affirmed the importance for senior government officials to be in constant contact with executive interchange, by trainees or otherwise, with the real world of the various Canadian regions and private businesses in Canada.

With the testimony of Mr. Dewar and with the additional information provided by the management of the centre, both of which complement the law prescriptions, I have the honour to move the third reading of Bill C-34.

• (1500)

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: All those in favour please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: All those against please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I propose, pursuant to Provisional Rule 3(e) that the vote be deferred until 5:45 p.m. tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, pursuant to Provisional Rule 3(e), the vote will be taken at 5:45 p.m., Wednesday, March 6.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Senator Nurgitz, moved, the third reading of Bill C-79, to amend the Parliament of Canada Act.

He said: Honourable senators, it was mentioned at second reading, that a number of committees, both in the House of Commons and in the Senate, have looked at this bill. It has been studied quite extensively in the Senate by both the Internal Economy committee and the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee. Various amendments were proposed in committee. However, there are two additional amendments that I would like to introduce at third reading. I hope that they meet the approval of our colleagues. They have been discussed with senators on both sides of the chamber.

I note that during second reading Senator MacEachen raised a question with the sponsor, Senator Nurgitz, regarding the matter of whether or not this bill accorded privileges or special status to members of Parliament that are not enjoyed by ordinary citizens. I do not think that question has been answered to this point.

[Senator Bolduc.]

It is my understanding that the Parliament of Canada Act amendments do not result in special treatment for MPs and senators in matters of criminal law. The act enables a senator, in our case, to ask the Internal Economy committee for an opinion concerning the propriety of his or her use of goods or services for carrying out parliamentary functions. The act also permits a peace officer to seek an opinion from the committee. It is important to note that a peace officer is not required or obliged by the act to seek an opinion before investigating a senator. The opinions are meant to assist peace officers in doing an investigation if an investigation is required.

Members of Parliament and senators are subject to laws like any ordinary citizens. They are also subject to parliamentary rules and privileges, which are complex. It is felt that the opinion or the assistance of an expert body—in this case the committee—may be helpful to those people charged with the responsibility of carrying out the investigation. The provisions do not create a special treatment for parliamentarians as investigations can and will be carried out by the appropriate authorities, as they would be with any citizen who is suspected of committing a crime.

These changes are intended to clarify the rules on how parliamentary resources are used. For instance, a similar situation exists with regard to any citizen who is alleged to have misused an employer's funds. The police would normally consult the employer regarding the rules, procedures and expected behaviour of employees for using the funds. Senators, of course, do not have an employer in the same sense, but the committee is responsible for managing parliamentary funds. If an opinion is given by the committee, the court is required by the act to take it into consideration, but it is not bound by the opinion. I would assume, however, that the court would give some weight to the opinion of the committee that is charged with the responsibility of drawing up and administering the rules and privileges of the Senate, but it is not bound by that opinion. So each case will be judged and considered on its own merit and, as I have said, if an opinion is sought, it is not binding on the courts.

Honourable senators, if that explanation is satisfactory, I would like to introduce the first of two amendments that I have. The first amendment deals with the use of the word "by-laws" in the new legislation. Senators on both sides of the chamber felt that "by-laws" is not a term that has been in use in the Senate but a term that has been in use in the other place. They felt that the term "regulations" would be more suitable for use in that part of the act that pertains to the Senate. Therefore, I move:

> That Bill C-79, as amended by the 35th report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, be not now read a third time but that it be amended
> (a) by striking out in clause 1 the heading immediately preceding section 19.1 (as renumbered by the said report) and substituting therefor the following:

"Regulations"

(b) by substituting in clause 1 the word "regulations" for the word "by-laws" wherever it appears in sections 19.5, 19.6 and 19.8 (as renumbered by the said report).

The second amendment that I would offer for honourable senators' consideration deals with subsection (3). We had asked in committee that this subsection be removed because it did not seem to be necessary. However, I am told by our legal counsel that subsection (3) is necessary when you consider it in relation to subsection (2). Subsection (2) provides statutory authority for the continued existence of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration during a period of prorogation or dissolution. Subsection (3) completes the picture by providing statutory authority for making changes in the membership of the committee during such a period. Before subsection (3) was deleted, it read as follows:

Composition of Committee

(3) The Leader of the Government in the Senate, or the nominee of the Leader, and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, or the nominee of the Leader, may, in accordance with the rules of the Senate, change the membership of the Committee from time to time, including during periods of prorogation or dissolution.

It seemed to me at first glance that it meant that there had to be concurrence of both leaders to change the composition. I am told that that is not so, that it means that during a period of prorogation or dissolution each leader or the nominee of the leader—that is, the whip—has the authority to make changes. The "and" in the second line combined with the verb "may" has the effect of conferring this authority on each leader. Therefore, I move:

That Bill C-79, as amended by the 35th report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, be not now read a third time but that it be amended in clause 1.

(a) by adding, immediately after subsection 19.1(2), the following new subsection:

"Composition of Committee

(3) The Leader of the Government in the Senate, or the nominee of the Leader, and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, or the nominee of the Leader, may, in accordance with the rules of the Senate, change the membership of the Committee from time to time, including during periods of prorogation or dissolution.";

(b) by renumbering the remaining subsections and any cross-references thereto accordingly;

(c) by striking out the heading immediately preceding section 19.5 and substituting therefor the following:

"Regulations";

(d) by substituting the word "regulations" for the word "by-laws" wherever it appears in the said clause.

It appears to me that these last two sections have already been dealt with in previous amendments.

• (1510)

Honourable senators, those are the amendments I want to put before the chamber and I would request that they be supported.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we support these two amendments. However, Senator MacEachen will have something to say about the bill as amended.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the honourable Senator Grimard, that Bill C-79, as amended by the 35th report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, be not now read a third time but that it be amended

(a) by striking out in clause 1 the heading immediately preceding section 19.1 (as renumbered by the said report) and substituting therefor the following:

"Regulations"

(b) by substituting in clause 1 the word "regulations" for the word "by-laws" wherever it appears in sections 19.5, 19.6 and 19.8 (as renumbered by the said report).

Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: As for motion in amendment No. 2, it is moved by the honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the honourable Senator Doyle, that Bill C-79, as amended by the 35th report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, be not now read a third time but that it be amended in clause 1:

(a) by adding, immediately after subsection 19.1(2), the following new subsection:

"Composition of Committee

(3) The Leader of the Government in the Senate, or the nominee of the Leader, and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, or the nominee of the Leader, may, in accordance with the rules of the Senate, change the membership of the Committee from time to time including during periods of prorogation or dissolution.";

(b) by renumbering the remaining subsections and any cross-references thereto accordingly;

(c) by striking out the heading immediately preceding section 19.5 and substituting therefor the following:

"Regulations";

(d) by substituting the word "regulations" for the word "by-laws" wherever it appears in the said clause.

Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion in amendment?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I will not speak at length and I am not going to be adamant that my suggestion be accommodated at this time, but it seems to me that there should be some consent of a member before he or she is removed from a committee. That is not provided for in this second amendment. I have worried about this in the past and I am sure you all realize that we have had some reason to be concerned about it more recently.

The amendment as put forward by Senator Doody does not provide for that. I would seriously say that this gives quite a lot of authority and power to the leaders of both parties who can just throw members off a committee whenever they have a whim to do so, however well motivated that whim might be.

As I have said, I am not going to insist that this amendment be changed now, but it is something I would like the deputy leader to think about because a day will come when the members of a committee and, indeed, the members of the caucus of the Senate, should have something to say about this matter. I understand the need for speed to accommodate changes in a case where a senator cannot attend and a substitution is made.

Honourable senators, these amendments may be put forward in great sincerity, but then someone may abuse the law. I would hope that the mover of this motion would take that into account so that we do not go too far down this road of by-passing the democratic selection and election of members to a committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is Senator Olson proposing an amendment?

Senator Olson: No, I am just making some cautionary remarks and putting out a guideline. I am also giving notice that if this is abused too badly we will be forced to take some action to re-establish democracy.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt motion No. 2 in amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THIRD READING ON BILL AS AMENDED—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as Senator Doody mentioned at second reading of the bill, I asked Senator Nurgitz, the sponsor of the bill, whether members of the House of Commons and senators were given any special privileges in the bill that were not available to the ordinary citizen. I did not have in mind privileges that might be regarded as necessary to the discharge of the function of a senator or provisions for services that are necessary to permit a senator to carry out his or her duty. Senator Nurgitz told me that he agreed that it would be undesirable to convey in the law privileges which were not available to other citizens and that he would follow up; at least, he gave me that impression.

I regret that Senator Nurgitz is not present today, but I do know that the committee examined the bill and I noted that Senator Doyle raised a somewhat similar question, particularly with reference to the criminal law; but I do not find that the matter has been explored as fully as I had hoped. I am back at the matter today because what Senator Doody has said has not fully satisfied my concern on this particular point.

Before going on to deal with the point, I should say that I realize that a great deal of work has been done on this bill. The functions of the boards have been clarified, the status of the Senate in the system has been properly acknowledged, and the amendments that have been put today are further indication of the efforts that have been made to improve the bill and make it more serviceable. But I think it would be unfortunate if the passing of the bill embedded in the law privileges for senators and members not available to ordinary citizens.

As I remember, when the bill was first introduced it provided an opportunity for a member of Parliament or a senator to go before a board to seek the opinion of the board as to whether any impropriety had occurred with respect to the use by the senator of the resources provided by the Senate or the House of Commons. If a police officer made the request, pending the opinion of the board, the process was frozen for at least 30 days. If, at the end of the 30 days, the board gave no opinion, then, of course, the section ceased to operate. Why would one take an objection to that? Well, it was pointed out that there was a considerable delay of 30 days provided in carrying out the legal processes, which would give the opportunity for evidence to be destroyed, if indeed any violation had occurred. I do not know of any citizen who would have that opportunity to delay the process for that length of time and to make it obligatory for another body to intervene before the process was carried forward. Now, that appeared to be the main concern originally, and I am advised that in the committee of the House of Commons, according to a note provided by the Library of Parliament, those objectionable provisions were removed. The note says:

● (1520)

> . . . the potential for delay and the possibility to obstruct the investigation were also eliminated.

That is with one caveat, which I will come to in a moment.

> In its place were introduced provisions allowing but not requiring a peace officer to request an opinion.

In the original provision, a peace officer had to go before the board.

> Also, a Board which wished a peace officer to have an opinion (but which had not been asked for it) were given the right to give it to the peace officer, who would then have to give it to a judge if the officer were applying for the specified legal processes.
> These processes do not apply to ordinary citizens. They cannot go to any body and ask if their past, present or future actions were proper, and be assured that the forth> coming opinion will be considered by a judge. There is a procedure in income tax matters that permits citizens to request advance rulings, but there is no other general provision that covers all Acts of Parliament as does that in C-79.

>
> Thus, to that extent, Parliamentarians are treated differently.

And it is true. The document goes on:

> But it must be remembered that the opinion of the Board is not binding on the judge; it must only be considered.

Senator Doody mentioned that this afternoon.

> Furthermore, the intent of the bill as amended appears to be that police investigations not be impeded. However, there is one provision that may serve to undercut that apparent intention.
> In an amendment at Report Stage of the House, a provision was introduced so that if a Senator or Member merely requested an opinion, and if the Board informed the peace officer of that fact, the peace officer would apparently have to wait for the opinion.

So, in the situation as described, if a member of Parliament or a senator, who may have an indication that an investigation is underway, goes to the board for an opinion and the board then tells the peace officer that it is preparing an opinion, the peace officer cannot take any further action. Furthermore, there is no time limit specified in the bill within which the board must act? This document goes on to say:

> This amendment would appear to re-introduce into the bill some of the aspects that were strongly criticized in its original form.

I find that worthy of note and worthy of looking at very carefully before the bill is passed. Is it possible under the amended bill, as it came from the House of Commons, for a Member of Parliament or a senator to ask for an opinion which would then delay the process of, for example, carrying out a search warrant indefinitely, until the board acts? Is that now the provision of the bill? That is what this document, which has been made available by the Library of Parliament, says.

May I just go on to deal with another aspect of this same question of the special or different treatment for parliamentarians from other Canadians? This document goes on to state:

> One other provision of the bill as amended also serves to distinguish Parliamentarians from other Canadians. The bill provides that applications for most of the defined processes must be made only to a judge of a provincial court. In other types of cases (i.e. where the goods, services etc. of a Parliamentarian were not involved), justices of the peace would also have jurisdiction. The intention of this provision seems to be to signal that applications for the defined processes are serious matters and should be so treated. It must also be noted, however, that the test of whether the process should be issued is exactly the same whether it is handled by a judge or by a justice. Thus, it may be argued that Parliamentarians are not really being treated differently, and to the extent that they are, such treatment is a reflection of the serious effect the issuance of legal process may have on the career and life of a Parliamentarian.

I am not in a position to judge authoritatively on the significance of an application to a judge of a provincial court as distinct from a justice of the peace, but presumably this bill provides that the applications go to provincial court judges, and it is argued in the document that it might be justified because parliamentarians are special people or that the impact of any such process would be greater on the career and life of a parliamentarian.

In any event, I want to tell Senator Doody that I am concerned about this point, and I have not completed the research that I think I ought to do before I, for example, consider moving an amendment. I think it would be unfortunate, as Senator Nurgitz said, if there were provisions here—for example, as have been described by the Library of Parliament paper—which would permit an investigation to be delayed indefinitely, with the implications to be drawn from that. The conclusion would be that the club has come together to surround its brother or sister and that the process would or could be delayed indefinitely. Is that the correct interpretation? Is what I am arguing correct? Is that the correct conclusion to be drawn from the bill as amended? That is the Library of Parliament's argument, but I am not yet prepared to accept it. I should like to do more work on it, and, if I find that the argument is soundly based, I might bring in an amendment tomorrow to clarify that point. If I can be convinced that there is no foundation to my concern, I will drop the matter and let the bill go through.

● (1530)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Do you have one or two concerns, senator? I should also like to do more research.

Senator MacEachen: I mentioned two. The first is the more substantial. The second concerns a difference, but I cannot judge the significance of the difference.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

THE BUDGET, 1991

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the Budget statement made by the Minister of Finance on February 26, 1991.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: If Senator Frith does not mind, I would like to speak to this.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I am content to yield to anyone who would like to speak on this matter.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, I am pleased to take part in the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, in which he took part on February 28.

The Honourable Senator gave us further proof of the trap senators and anyone else must beware of when they make commitments at the very beginning of their speech. Senator Olson, for instance, told us he would be brief, but he was not last Thursday! We do not hold that against him! Senator Olson is never brief anyway!

He also told us that he would address only one aspect of the Budget, that being the monetary policy. I think that he succumbed a few times to the temptation of touching on others subjects. I remember in particular this very interesting exchange between him and Senator Murray. We will not hold that against him either!

Senator Olson told us that the primary cause—there are many others, of course—of this recession in Canada was precisely high interest rates. An old hand of politics like Senator Olson should know that, while interest rates play an important role, their impact is not the most decisive. There is still a link between inflation and interest rates.

On this subject, I think that Senator Murray did indeed make, in response to Senator Olson's speech, the kind of connection that should be made between the two. I also wish to thank Senator Murray for his contribution to this debate.

Of course, these comments concerning Senator Olson at the beginning of my speech serve as an introduction. I am particularly grateful to Senator Murray for kindly reminding Senator Olson and his colleagues that, for the opposition, this tactic, this battle horse is not new.

Senator Olson has been telling us for a year at least—speaking no doubt on behalf of his Party and his colleagues—that the interest rates can be brought down by a phone call to the Governor of the Bank of Canada or by a decision imposed upon him by the Minister of Finance or his deputy-minister.

Clearly, that would be naïve and futile. It would make things much worse in the long run than a high interest rate policy applied at a given point in time.

Senator Olson, in his speech, almost cried out in indignation. I think he is trying to scare Canadians when he says that for once—surely it is not the first time—the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada would agree to set targets to fight inflation.

Senator Olson told us it would be unheard of—he mentioned it two or three times in his speech last Thursday—and almost scandalous for the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada to agree on such targets, because it is probably some form of conspiracy . . .

[English]

Senator Olson: I did not say that at all!

[Translation]

Senator Simard: That is what you said in essence, Senator Olson. Is is quite clear. I have the text of your speech here. It is clear to anyone who cares to read it that you find it scandalous that the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance could agree with each other.

[English]

Senator Olson: It is! It is!

Senator Simard: We have come a long way from the Coyne years! I do not think there is a scandal.

Senator Olson: The press conference was a scandal!

Senator Simard: These two high-ranking financial personalities each have different but certainly converging objectives and missions; that is, to have a healthy and inflation-free Canadian economy that will provide jobs. There has been no conspiracy. There was no need for these two people to hold separate press conferences.

Senator Olson, you attacked the integrity of the Governor of the Bank of Canada when you suggested that he was being influential in his giving of a press conference. That is a shame. It is not acceptable. The scandal is that a senator would pass such a judgment or have Canadians pass such a judgment.

Senator Olson: I am glad that message got through, because that is what I intended to say.

● (1540)

Senator Simard: I do not intend to say, as Senator Olson did, that I am going to be brief, so that I will not break that promise as Senator Olson did last week.

In order to set the stage and put the budget of Mr. Wilson in proper perspective, I would like to read excerpts of an article by Mike Duffy entitled, "Not for the faint-hearted." This article explains a lot about the priorities and objectives of the budget and explains how it fits into the overall scheme of the government. The article reads:

> It's a job that's been held by some of the most prominent names in Canadian politics: Crosbie, Chretien, Sharp, MacEachen, Lalonde, MacDonald, Turner—the list goes on and on.
>
> But since World War II, no one has been minister of finance longer than the incumbent, Michael Holcombe Wilson.
>
> Like a parent dealing with a rebellious teenager, Wilson has given the Canadian economy "tough love."
>
> No one in my memory has been as immune as Wilson to his critics and the faint-hearted in his own party. In the process, he's succeeded in doing what his predecessors only dreamed of, administering the bitter medicine needed to cure the ailing Canadian economy.
>
> And thus we reach "Lucky Seven," as some are calling Wilson's seventh budget address. If Ottawa insiders have it right, this budget is probably also his last.
> It comes as Wilson marks his seventh year as minister—the sixth-longest serving finance minister in Canadian history. After seventy-seven months in the job, Wilson is ready, even eager for a change.

> The only question is, will Prime Minister Brian Mulroney allow him to leave finance and take another non-financial portfolio? One that would allow him to jump right back into business should he decide not to run in the next election?
>
> There are a lot of reasons for the PM to keep Wilson where he is.
>
> The economy is still in recession, the GST has just gone into operation, and we're beginning negotiations aimed at expanding the Free Trade Agreement with the United States to include Mexico.
> But while all of that is true, it is also true that no minister deserves more than Wilson to have his career desires met.

It goes on to consider his record with regard to income tax. We all know, and even Senator Olson will agree, that Michael Wilson lowered personal and corporate tax rates and simplified them, and that he has closed many loopholes. In fact, Michael Wilson plugged loopholes in the tax law cutting everything from business lunches by 20 per cent the write-offs for boats. That should please our NDP and Reform Party members and maybe some Liberals. He imposed a minimum tax on corporations. I will jump to the last paragraph and conclude.

> Michael Wilson rejected the politically easy course taken so often by his predecessors.

I do not always agree with this great Maritimer, Mike Duffy, but I believe many Canadians will agree with this article. He continues:

> He has taken decisions that will guarantee our kids' futures. He deserves a chance to choose his next portfolio.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Mike Duffy did not get one of the Prince Edward Island appointments to the Senate but he is getting his speeches read into the record anyway.

Senator Simard: He would be very welcome and he would be a good one.

Hon. H.A. Olson: The sooner Mike takes a new appointment the better for Canadians.

Senator Simard: That is your opinion.

Senator Olson: I am just agreeing with you.

Senator Simard: I was hoping you could agree with some of the things he has done.

Senator Frith: He disagrees even with your agreeing with him.

Senator Simard: I was hoping that you could agree with some of the things he has done, but I have no illusions. These people across the aisle begged the house and the world to accept legislation before Christmas and when we do bring it in it is no good. So I do not expect these people to agree with Michael Wilson. I hope the Prime Minister asks Mike to make another sacrifice in order that he can continue to do a good job.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, to start with, I thought it opportune to acknowledge the eloquent and necessary efforts, although not popular, deployed by Michael Wilson over the years. Coming back to the budget tabled last week and the current debate, I can say without any hesitation than Canada is slowly climing back towards a new prosperity which will give Canadians a sense of belonging, a taste for life.

A new prosperity, because the prosperity that Canada once knew was mangled, destroyed by Liberals between 1974 and 1984.

I will give you a few more quotes to prove what I was saying. I will quote famous journalists and economists later in my speech. You don't have to take my word for it as you seem prepared to do.

The lavish expenses, the financial squandering of the Liberals during these years were not only detrimental to their hold on power, they were also detrimental to the future.

The Liberals, in effect, mortgaged the future of the country by putting Canada on the way to deficit budgeting, a way we could leave only with great difficulty and at an enormous cost to our people.

Jeffrey Simpson in an article in the Globe & Mail dated Wednesday, February 27, describes the Liberal years as "nightmare years". And I quote:

[English]

> Minister Michael Wilson's seventh budget confirms yet again the overwhelming fiscal weakness of the federal government. Ottawa became a fiscal cripple in the years 1975 to 1984, when the federal government accumulated nearly $200 billion of debt. Compounded interest on that accumulated debt cost another $120 billion by 1989-90.

Please, colleagues opposite, when you mention the $400 billion debt of Canada remember what Geoffrey Simpson and many other columnists say, that of that $400 billion, $200 billion is the amount that you people accumulated and $120 billion is the compounded interest on that sum, the debt that the Tory government inherited in 1984.

[Translation]

Senator Thériault: Does that apply to New Brunswick as well?

Senator Simard: We will talk about it later.

● (1550)

[English]

Senator Olson: But in 1984 you had a plan to fix all that.

Senator Simard: This is exactly what we are doing. I am coming to that momentarily. Do not get restless. You will get it all anyway.

Hon. John B. Stewart: The next century is also coming!

Senator Simard: Jeffrey Simpson states that the total bill for these ten nightmare years of economic mismanagement—and this is not a Tory speaking—is in the vicinity of $320 billion.

Mr. Simpson states that it was obvious by the time the Tories took power in 1984 that, having spent a decade getting into an utterly untenable fiscal situation, Canada would need more than a decade to extricate itself from trouble. That difficult and painful process of escape is still on and will be for some years yet.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the steps taken by Mr. Wilson in this budget aim at reducing the debt and therefore the deficit.

In the simplest of terms, the debt, as we all know, is the amount of money we have to borrow to pay for the expenditures that exceed the revenues.

For all and each of the years between 1970 and 1985, the liberal government has spent more than it has received, undoubtedly to please everyone and to gain votes.

I know it is difficult for Senator Thériault to recognize that fact but that is the truth and it must be said.

Senator Thériault: What have you done in New Brunswick?

[English]

Senator Simard: This is the message that I and everyone on this side receives. I hope we will get a couple of converts on the other side who will travel to all the cities and villages to remind people of the job that needs to be done, why we are doing it, and who caused the problem that we inherited.

[Translation]

Senator Thériault: Would Senator Simard authorize a question?

Senator Simard: Yes, of course.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I wonder why Senator Simard did not practice what he is preaching now when he was in charge of New Brunswick's finances.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, we might go back to that. I can tell you that I presented four budgets which all resulted in surpluses. I needed a lot of guts to remove from the roles a great many taxpayers which the previous government, under former Premier Robichaud, had put there. But I did it.

While Quebec and Ontario were developing their industries and building highways, we did the same. I remember that Senator Thériault at the time was an elected member. Senator Thériault go out of politics in 1974, 1975 or 1977—

Senator Thériault: 1979.

Senator Simard: During the first four years, while I was minister of Finance, Senator Thériault was predicting the end of the world. He was one of those who were urging us to spend even more. Well, we removed people from the roles. We built the necessary infrastructure. We have no difficulty defending our management over that period.

As a matter of fact, Senator Thériault will always be guilty of the same sins because as other members on his side, he has never been able to accept the decision of New Brunswick voters. If the New Brunswick voters were as intelligent as I think, they were right. I cannot say whether they may err, but we have no reason to believe they can. If they put their trust in the Hatfield government for 17 years, it is certainly because this government must have done something interesting, unless the alternative would have still been worse.

We will talk again about these years some other time. For now, I wish to talk about 1991 and the forthcoming years. If you have other questions, however, I should be pleased to answer them.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, may I ask whether you agree with the policy of the Minister of Finance of Canada who will be responsible for the demise of Medicare in New Brunswick?

Senator Simard: Thanks to Mrs. Bégin, a well-informed person who is a former Liberal minister in a previous federal government, I am in a position to answer this question. I will come to that in a little while, Senator Thériault, so just bear with me.

I am coming back to the current Budget. In 1984-85, the deficit of operation amounted to $16.1 billion and the servicing of the debt to $22.5 billion for a total deficit of $38.5 billion.

In 1990-91, our operations surplus amounts to $12.5 billion and the servicing of the debt $43 billion for a net deficit of $30.5 billion. It is still much too high, but we are moving in the right direction.

Senator Thériault: Try and preach that in New Brunswick!

Senator Simard: From reading these data, it is clear that this government, notwithstanding the unpopularity of some of the measures it was compelled to take, administered, not for its own satisfaction or personal glory, but with a view to balancing public finances and put Canada again on the right track.

To move from a deficit of operation of $16.1 billion to a surplus of operation of $12.5 billion represents a tunraround of $28.6 billion over a short period of five years. A challenge properly met by Mr. Wilson and the Mulroney Government.

The continued efforts of government will make it possible to achieve a real balanced budget by 1995-96. It is only then that a reduction of the public debt will be possible.

The policies announced on February 26 by Mr. Wilson are still intended to restore prosperity in Canada through expenditure control and eventually deficit reduction.

These latest initiatives, which are part of an overall plan launched in 1984, include the following: legislation will be passed to cap program expenditures; all revenues from the GST and privatization will flow into a Debt Servicing and Reduction fund; government operations, including wages, will be severely restricted; after 1991-1992, average growth of program expenditures will be limited to 3 p. 100 per year; the number of senior civil servants will be reduced by 10%; transfers to the provinces will also be subject to budgetary restraints. However, the main transfers will continue to grow faster that the rest of the federal program expenditures. Contributions to unemployment insurance will be increased. Tax increases will only apply to tobacco products.

Honourable senators, let me go back for a moment to the growth rate of government expenditures. It will reach 69 percent in 1991-1992, that is an increase of $7.5 billion.

At first glance, that rate may still seem too high. But further analysis shows this rate is linked to four expenditure items which will increase for very special reasons. I am sure our friends on the other side will want to support these expenditures in the coming year.

The budget provides $3 billion for the training of the unemployed, $1.6 billion for the elderly, which I am sure Senator Olson will support, $1.3 billion for assistance to struggling farmers, $0.6 billion for our presence in the Persian Gulf, and $1 billion for the rest of government expenditures.

Honourable senators, I am confident the vast majority of Canadians will approve of this budget.

Here is what we could read in the newspapers the day after the budget was tabled: in Le Soleil, "Wilson donne l'exemple", in the Financial Post, "Firm attempt to control spending", and in La Presse, "Un budget honnête qui voit loin".

Those are headlines or titles of editorials concerning the budget.

[English]

The Financial Post attempts to control spending.

● (1600)

In the Ottawa Sun, Mike Duffy wrote: "This budget is truly an historic document, one for which our children will thank him." The Gazette: "Wilson's budget sees brighter days soon for the economy." The Financial Post: "Economists mostly bestow a thumb's up."

[Translation]

Of course, the budget did not please everyone; on the whole, however, reactions are positive, our citizens agree with the ultimate goal of the government's financial program and with the initiatives required to achieve the goal of reducing the public debt.

Two budget initiatives in particular caught my attention:

First, the initiative of legislating the growth of expenses.

Second, the control of the growth of transfer payments to provinces.

Honourable senators, whether the hon. senator Olson likes it or not, program expenditures will be capped by through legislation for the next five years. I think this sends a clear message to Canadians, to labour unions, to employers and the private sector. Besides, many private sector companies active in various areas have had to make cuts themselves, in order to balance their budget if not for their own survival. When the government endeavours to cap by an act of law its own expenses over the next five years, I challenge any future government to change that legislation. Such a government should have serious reasons to do so, otherwise it would be putting itself at risk.

Honourable senators, this indicates the firm intention of the Minister of Finance to control expenses and to force our managers to run operations in an even more rigorous manner.

Providing for such a capping through legislation will garantee the realizaton of the goals set forth in the budget concerning program expenditres.

That legislation will change substantially the way the government manages its expenditures and will give Canadians even stronger assurances that the program expenses growth will be controlled once and for all.

[English]

Under the legislative spending limits, the budget makes this clear statement: "Spending limits will provide the assurance that higher taxes, including the GST, will not be used to finance higher than projected or new spending programs." I invite Senator Olson and his colleagues to further reflect, and maybe Senator Olson should retract the statements that he made earlier this afternoon. We can all be part of them, I suppose. Some of us are, more than others, but I believe that in this instance, Senator Olson, you demonstrated today that your partisanship got the best of you. I am sure that you will want to consider this new measure, this legislated spending limit and perhaps lend support to these two measures. It is never too late, as we all know.

Therefore, colleagues, a guarantee in black and white, a guarantee to the citizens of Canada and to the financial community, that is what these two measures are all about. We hope that the other levels of government in Canada will follow this initiative.

[Translation]

The growth of transfer payments to provinces will also be limited.

Since 1985, provincial spending increased much faster than federal spending. Despite the freeze, transfer payments to provinces will continue to increase faster that federal program spending.

To service their debt, provices pay an average of one third of what the federal government has to pay.

[English]

Let us not forget that the major federal transfer to the provinces will exceed $33 billion in 1990-91, a 40 per cent increase since 1984-85. This is an average increase of almost 6 per cent by comparison with the total federal-provincial spending group by only 3.7 per cent annually over the same period. Thus transfer payments to the provinces will continue to grow but at a slower rate under the Budget expenditure controls. Only in 1992-93 will this measure really take effect, where total transfers will be limited to $35.1 billion rather than the original projection of $35.8 billion. This will give the provinces the time required to adjust. Now we are talking $1 billion. That is a lot of money. Perhaps I should point out, by way of explanation or illustration, that this measure, that will come into effect in this first year of the five-year extension—that is, in 1992-93—will represent less than one-third of 1 per cent of all provincial revenues.

So that should put Senator Thériault's concerns to rest, and I will return to this in a minute.

[Translation]

In the past, provinces benefited from an increasing support from the federal government when its financial situation allowed.

So it is reasonable to ask provinces to contribute to restrictions when our country's situation makes it necessary.

If both levels of government make an effort to control public spending and limit taxation, all Canadians will benefit from that and we will be on the way to economic growth and prosperity.

I invite honourable senators of the opposition to set aside partisanship, to support the federal government and to urge provinces to take over the funding of education, health care and social programs, even though they have to rearrange their priorities.

I listened carefully to the comments made by the former financial critic of the Liberal Party in the House of Commons, Mr. Doug Young, who is a former member of the New Brunswick Legislative Assembly and former leader of the Liberal Party in New Brunswick. He is now financial critic on Treasury Board votes. He said that it was terrible that Mr. Wilson would ask provinces, in his budget, to take over and to continue to give services even though the federal government was limited the growth in expenditures. Our friend, Mr. Doug Young, said this:

[English]

"The Government of Canada will soon resemble the kind of weak national government envisaged in the Allaire Report."

As far as I am concerned, a weak government is not one which tries to limit transfers to provinces to get a hold on its financial problems. There are no new ways. We have done all we can and we have to pay higher interest rates. This is when a weak government exists.

Senator Olson: That is what we have now.

Senator Simard: No, sir. The situation is serious enough, but every time this government has tried to limit expenditures, cut waste, whether it is Via Rail or Air Canada or Radio Canada, or what have you, you people opposite have always said, no, have organized meetings, almost suggested insurrection. You have done that.

Senator Olson: You are using pretty strong language.

Senator Simard: Yes, you have done that. We encourage you to demonstrate as Senator Buckwold did last year from coast to coast. No, I think that Mr. Young again is wrong.

Now here is what the Deputy Leader of the Liberal Party said last week when this reduced transfer to provinces—not reduced transfers, but limited growth transfers—

Senator Olson: What she said is that you are going to ruin medicare.

Senator Simard: Sheila Copps got up in the other place and said that these new tax measures were a Separatist's dream, a featherless nightmare. Senator Thériault was good enough to agree with that statement. He continues to scare the people of my own province, as well as other Canadians, with the threat that the end of medicare is in sight.

[Senator Simard.]

• (1610)

Let me quote what another great Canadian, a former Liberal minister, said. She could be called the mother of medicare. I refer to Monique Bégin and this is what she said last week. You do not have to take a Tory's word for it. I remember when Monique Bégin came to New Brunswick and tried to discourage us. She almost made threats in those days because we were considering user fees. She had medicare at heart, just as Senator Thériault seems to have it at heart. Canadians have medicare at heart.

This is what Monique Bégin said last week: "The five principles are at the heart of Canadians and we will not lose them." The former Minister of Health also predicted that the principles of medicare will survive in Canada, even if the federal government loses its financial influence over the system.

She went on to say that the five basic principles of medicare have become deeply rooted in Canadian society and that no province can destroy them, even if Ottawa ceases to provide cash for provincial medicare programs. We know we are not doing that.

Senator Thériault may put his mind to rest. He can stop spreading rumours and doom and gloom with his statements.

[Translation]

Finance Minister Wilson deserves our praise, and I am convinced that his efforts will be successful. I have a few more comments, but I will get back to that later on.

[English]

What I believe this budget is all about is leadership. I am proud to be a Progressive Conservative Party supporter, supporting a government that has had the courage, and which continues to have the courage, to do the tough thing. That is what leadership is all about.

Senator Olson: You mean high interest rates.

Senator Simard: I would like to quote from an article written by Diane Francis which appeared in a local paper about two weeks ago. She stated:

> As for economics, let's not forget that most of Canada's current mess is courtesy of Trudeau, whose so-called "just society" with its unsustainable-university-transfer equalization policies contributes more than anything else to the current debt-deficit crisis.
> Of course, Mulroney's far from blameless and he should have been more hard-nosed in slashing costs. But Canadians are spoiled and this is, after all, a democracy. Besides, we Canadians have a misguided propensity to blame Ottawa for every grievance—including obscene tax hikes by cities and provinces over which the prime minister has no control.

She concludes the article with these words:

> So ask me who's been the better prime minister during my adulthood: Pierre Trudeau, who gave away everything and left us with a flawed constitution or Brian Mulroney, who is trying to do the right thing on both fronts?

Mulroney has been a much better leader all in all than Trudeau, whose policies—we are now discovering—are unsustainable, both economically and constitutionally.

The only explanation is a matter of style not content. Mulroney is one of Canada's few middle-class prime ministers and, like all middle-class lads, he realizes that if mortgage payments go up we have to fork out more, turn down the heat and lights a bit to save money or do a bit of both.

Trudeau, on the other hand, fashioned policies which made Canadians believe they could be indulged, little rich kids—as Trudeau himself was—endlessly demanding generosity from daddy in Ottawa.

If we are going to compare the leadership of yesteryear with today's leadership, one could read the article from which I have just quoted; or one could perhaps compare the new leader of the Liberal Party and his leadership with that of the present Prime Minister.

I would now like to turn to what Robert Fife was saying in a local paper a few days ago. In talking about Mr. Chrétien on Meech Lake he stated, "Even before he won the leadership, he flip-flopped, vacillated on free trade, somersaulted on Oka and waffled on the hated goods and services tax." Mr. Fife pointed out that despite an overwhelming opposition to the GST, it took Mr. Chrétien until fall to say he would scrap the 7 per cent tax if elected Prime Minister; but the polls showed most Canadians did not believe him. "On no single issue has Chrétien lost more than with his flip-flopping on the Gulf War." The day before the bombs began raining down on Iraqi forces Chrétien declared, "Our troops should be called back if there is a war." The next day John Turner delivered one of his finest speeches, outlining why Canada should back the U.S.-led and UN-sanctioned war. I submit that is not quite leadership.

I wish to conclude with another quotation of Mr. Chrétien's.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I want to take this opportunity to send a message to Senator Murray as well. This afternoon, there were some questions about the gulf war and reparations for damage caused by the war. Considering the statement made by the Leader of the Liberal Party and reported by Canadian Press last week—the issue here is leadership or the absence thereof—I would urge Senator Murray, as opposed to what the Liberal party leader told us . . .

[English]

Last week, Mr. Chrétien was saying "maybe," and I have a headline here from the Canadian Press which I would like to read.

[Translation]

Jean Chrétien, Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada, feels that the coalition forces should let Saddam Hussein save face.

I am still talking about leadership! I will make a connectin with the Budget later on. Here we have the new Leader of the Liberal Party asking the coalition forces to let Saddam Hussein save face, because according to what he is telling us, it is a lot easier to get into a war than to get out of it!

Can you imagine a Canadian leader asking the world to let Saddam Hussein save face, a man with blood on his hands and probably one of the best known war criminal since the Nuremberg trials, a man who attacked Israel! Senator Murray, I hope that your recommendations to the governement will not put too much emphasis on this statement by Mr. Chrétien.

I think it is more important for the Iraqi people and especially those who were the victims of Hussein's machine to save face . . .

Senator Thériault: You are pitiful!

Senator Simard: . . . to have something to eat and to see their country rebuilt. I am very disapointed. I am sure Senator Thériault is so upset because he doesn't feel comfortable with this statement by his new leader.

Senator Thériault: You are pitiful!

Senator Simard: That is where leadership counts! Mr. Chrétien hs failed to show leadership. We know it took time for him to go to war! He says it is hard to get into a war but even harder to get out. For him, it was hard to get in s well! He failed to show any leadership during the debate on the Goods and Services Tax, during the crisis in Oka, and during the debate on Meech Lake.

Compare Mr. Chrétien's leadership with that of the Prime Minister of Canada! I would like to conclde with a reading from an article by Marjorie Nichols which appeared last week in the Ottawa Citizen.

● (1620)

[English]

If leadership were a quality that could be quantified and subjected to a productivity test, Martin Brian Mulroney would rank with the best and the brightest leaders.

My dictionary defines a leader as "one who leads, a chief director." According to that test, Mulroney must be given high grades.

In the six years and five months since Mulroney and his Tories were swept into power, Canada's political/governmental landscape has been irreversibly altered.

I am quoting this article because this is where the budget fits in: with the government's overall plan of bringing common sense and sanity to the financing of Canada. This is what leadership is all about. Ms. Nichols went on to say that we have come a long way in our program, that:

Privatization, deregulation, free trade, tax reform and the GST have transformed this country.

Later in the article she says:

The National Energy Policy has been abandoned and the National Energy Board defanged. Also gone is the > Foreign Investment Review Agency, replaced by a government entity that encourages foreign investment.

As opposed to discouraging it. According to Ms. Nichols the Prime Minister "lives and breathes politics." There is nothing wrong with that. Some people seem to think that it is awful. Certainly to face the Liberals you have to be partisan, you have to breathe politics and you have to keep up the fight. She went on to say that Mulroney:

> . . . has single-handedly transformed the Conservative party into the most prosperous and powerful machine in this country. styleoff ti4;4
> The affirmation of Brian Mulroney's leadership abilities is that he remains the leader of a two-term majority Tory government in a peaceful, prosperous, united and liberal country next door to the world's nosiest and pushiest neighbor.

Ms. Nichols finishes with this question:

> Know anyone else who might do better?

In conclusion, honourable senators, I apologize for taking so long. I was not interrupted very much, but that is probably my own doing.

Senator Murray: You just weren't provocative enough.

Senator Simard: I understand that we might be going away for two or three weeks. Before Christmas it was difficult at times to participate in debate because senators opposite had decided that there would be no debate, that they would do their show and that would be it. As a result, I have accumulated some material over the past few months. In any event, I thank honourable senators for their patience. I hope that senators opposite will all support the budget and do what we on this side are doing. Senator Olson will be going to Alberta. I hope that he will tell the people there that a little more than government policy is at stake here.

Senator Olson: I will tell them the truth.

Senator Simard: There is training for the unemployed and measures involving the handicapped. Of course, Canada has to pay for its war effort, and that is in the budget as well. We are on the right track and, God willing, the Tory party may be in power longer than senators opposite had expected.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I will take the adjournment again under the same condition; that I will yield to anyone who wishes to speak to the order.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

SECOND WESTERN HEMISPHERIC CONFERENCE OF PARLIAMENTARIANS ON POPULATION AND DEVELOPMENT
INTER-PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE ON GLOBAL ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Mira Spivak rose pursuant to notices of Thursday, June 14, 1990:

That she will call the attention of the Senate to the Second Western Hemispheric Conference of Parliamentarians on Population and Development, held at Quito, Equador, from 6th to 9th March, 1990.

and

That she will call the attention of the Senate to the Inter-Parliamentary Conference on the Global Environment, held at Washington, D.C., from 29th April to 2nd May, 1990.

She said: Honourable senators, I shall be speaking to both Inquiry No. 7 and Inquiry No. 8, if I may, at the same time. They deal with meetings of parliamentarians that I had the privilege to attend during the spring of last year.

Parliamentarians from 28 nations of the Americas came together in Quito, Equador, between March 6 and 9, 1990, for the Second Western Hemispheric Conference on Population and Development. The first such conference had been held in Brazil in 1982, as a result of which the Inter-American Parliamentary Group on Population and Development was formed to coordinate and support the parliamentarian movement in the western hemisphere to enhance the awareness of the relationship between population and development.

Delegates at that conference were given a vivid and painful view of the problems in the region by the elected representatives of those regions. For example, members of the newly-elected Chilean government and members of the former government spoke. The delegation included both the niece of General Pinochet, the military dictator of Chile, and the widow of one of his victims. They described: (1) economic stagnation; (2), a debt crisis, now the single most important factor influencing development in the region—in negative balance with more money flowing from Latin America and the Caribbean to developed countries than coming in; (3) population growth rates in some countries which will double within 25 years; (4) a devastated environment, polluted watersheds, oceans and rivers and unsafe levels of air pollution—in fact, recently the Globe and Mail reported that in Sao Paulo, air pollution is the leading killer of children under four and that respiratory ailments account for 20.3 per cent of deaths, compared with 11.3 per cent from infections caused by parasites; (5) cities in which the urban population has doubled every 14 years since 1950, where poverty, crime, congestion, pollution and street children are ubiquitous and where basic services are inadequate; and (6) women and children dying in large numbers from preventable diseases and diseases that have reappeared such as measles.

Population and development at this Second Western Hemispheric Conference were, as the Quito Declaration states, approached from the perspective of four different concerns.

The first was the health of the family with emphasis on the need for accessible, high-quality, family-planning services for all and focusing on the special needs of adolescents.

The second was environmental degradation, particularly the problems of urban concentration and pollution in the cities and the destruction of one of humanity's most precious resources: The tropical rain forests.

The third combined several aspects of social progress, including the problem of street children; the need for more equitable representation of women in the South American and Caribbean parliaments; and the effect of the debt crisis on social programs that are critical to the welfare of the people in the region.

The fourth was the importance of population policies and the need to consider demographic variables, including migration, as an element of development planning.

To this end, parliamentarians pledged themselves to work with their parliaments, constituents and national leaders to enhance the health of the people of the region by means of primary health care, family planning services and information, family life education, maternal and child health services to all in need, especially adolescents.

They pledged to halt the destruction of the environment by measures such as consulting and, where appropriate, collaborating with relevant groups to implement policies on pollution controls; developing sustainable agriculture; protecting watersheds and tropical rain forests; and preserving the diversity of our flora and fauna. It was recognized that we are all trustees for the next generation and that protection of our fragile ecosystem is the responsibility of all nations—North and South. Debt for Nature Swaps was supported.

They pledged to improve the lives of children by promoting health measures such as child survival strategies consisting of growth monitoring, oral rehydration, breastfeeding and immunization; as well as providing universal and completely free primary school education, investing in community centres, making use of outreach workers to offer street children specialized care and protection and by signing, ratifying and implementing the Convention on the Rights of Children. That has been done. The conference focused much of its discussion in this area on the phenomenon of street children.

They pledged to improve the status of women by increasing educational and employment opportunities; by eliminating laws and social practices that discriminate against women; and by ratifying and implementing the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women.

They pledged to adopt and implement population policies that are rational, equitable, and in accord with national aspirations.

They pledged to improve justice and equity within the region and the nations of the region by attempting to reach agreements that will relieve the crushing debt burden, and by adopting economic adjustment policies, where necessary, that do not deprive people of their basic rights to health, education, employment or social services.

The conference placed special emphasis on the key role of women in the development of Third World countries. It was noted that, in every Latin American country, female literacy lags behind male literacy rates; women earn less; and the labour of those who work in the fields and at home is not valued by economists and planners. Women are considered worthless unless they bear many children, yet this is seen as proof of male virility. Physical violence against women is common and widely tolerated. Women's health suffers because of lack of access to family planning and other health services. Of course, women are also under-represented in the important decision-making fora in society.

Thus, it was deemed a priority, both as a matter of human rights and to foster economic development, to improve the status of women in the region, and a number of specific measures were put forward and discussed to achieve this end. International Women's Day happened to fall on one of the days of the conference. Many of the articulate, intelligent representatives of their countries, who happened to be women, addressed the conference on that day in a moving and eloquent fashion: Women from Venezuela, Cuba, Mexico, Brazil and Argentina.

Honourable senators, I want to comment more briefly on the other important meeting of parliamentarians that I had the privilege to attend in Washington from April 29 to May 2, 1990. Through some process of elimination, I had the honour of leading the Canadian delegation to the Inter-Parliamentary Conference on the Global Environment called by six U.S. senators and chaired by Senator Albert Gore of Tennessee. This was the first international conference to focus strictly on parliamentary strategies to address global environmental issues. Those issues identified were: Global climate change in discussions led by Senator Albert Gore; depletion of the stratospheric ozone layer, a topic directed by Senator John Chafee of Rhode Island; deforestation and desertification, led by Senator Rudy Boschwitz of Minnesota; loss of biodiversity, led by Senator Max Baucus of Montana; sustainable development, led by Senator John Heinz of Pennsylvania; degradation of oceans and water led by Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts; and population, led by Senator Tim Wrath of Colorado.

Not only were the American senators, Republican and Democrat, equally charming and intelligent with firsthand knowledge of the issues involved, but their advisors numbered among them some of the world's most celebrated scientists such as Dr. Carl Saigon, the noted author and astronomer; Jacques Cousteau, and Dr. Sherry Roland, the man who discovered the hole in the ozone layer.

The conference produced a document: Legislative Strategy Papers, April 29-May 2, 1990, which contains the lists of legislative goals and strategy options adopted by delegates attending. As well, a computer network was specially developed for the conference which is an international network for environmental policy. Lastly, a Declaration of Environmental Interdependence was signed by most though not all delegates of the 30-some countries represented. Of course, I signed on behalf of Canada, although I am not sure senators are aware of that fact.

Honourable senators, I do have the Declaration of Environmental Interdependence in my possession. I will spare you the reading of it, but if any of you are interested in it, I will be glad to share it with you.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: If no other honourable senator wishes to participate, these Inquiries are considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, March 6, 1991

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

THE LATE HONOURABLE EUGENE A. FORSEY, P.C.

TRIBUTES BY STANDING COMMITTEE FOR THE SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

Hon. Michel Cogger: Honourable senators, with your leave I would like to draw the attention of this chamber to the tributes to the Honourable Eugene A. Forsey at the meeting of the Committee for Scrutiny of Regulations on February 28 this year. As a number of you may know, ex-Senator Forsey was the first joint-chairman of the committee, known at the time as the Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. He made an exceptional contribution towards developing parliamentary control over legislation delegated by Parliament.

[English]

As was said by my co-chairman at last week's meeting, from 1973 to 1979 Eugene Forsey co-chaired the committee with, in succession, such distinguished parliamentarians as Gordon Fairweather, Bob McCleave and Gerald Baldwin. In his recently published memoirs, Dr. Forsey readily acknowledged the contribution of these colleagues and of the staff of the committee at the time in the formative years of the joint committee. But in reading this chapter of Dr. Forsey's memoirs, it is soon evident that his own contribution was unique. His commitment to the supremacy of Parliament and the preservation of the Rule of Law was heartfelt and unyielding.

Throughout his tenure on the committee, Eugene Forsey was ever vigilant to ensure that regulations, in his words, "fall squarely within the powers conferred by Parliament" and that regulation-making powers "are not so exercised as to trench unduly on the lives, rights and liberties of the Queen's subjects." He was ever aware that the mass of subordinate legislation scrutinized by the committee, to which he once referred as "that mystic Moorish maze of regulations", "is often of crucial importance to the daily lives and fortunes of thousands, or even millions, of ordinary people."

In reading his memoirs, I was struck by this passage which Eugene Forsey quotes from his earlier writings:

> Freedom depends on law. But law which can be set aside whenever the Government sees fit, for so long as it sees fit, without Parliament or the people hearing a word about it, is not law at all. It is a shadow. It leaves the citizen utterly defenceless . . . No law is safe, and when no law is safe, no citizen is safe.

Honourable senators, as I said, last week the joint committee paid formal homage to its first co-chairman. I wanted to put these words on the record.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the flow of petitions, in the same form as those that I have been presenting for, lo, these many days, continues.

[Translation]

Today, we have five from Quebec, from the cities of Montreal, Laval, Greenfield Park the area around Montreal. The second petition is mainly from residents of Amos and Victoriaville and the third is also from the same area. The fourth is from the Senneterre area—I think it says Barraute—but I can't read the name of the town. The fifth is also from the same area. Each of these petitions is signed and the lines are complete. Thank you.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 75 people, most of whom are residents of southern New Brunswick, from the communities of Blacks Harbour, Hampton, Saint John, Fredericton, Grand Bay, Pocologan, Westfield and many others in that area. These people object to putting a tax on literature in Canada.

QUESTION PERIOD

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION SOLICITOR GENERAL

CANCELLATION OF CONFERENCE SPONSORED BY LIFERS GROUP AT JOYCEVILLE PENITENTIARY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on February 26, 1991, by the Honourable Earl A. Hastings regarding the Solicitor General—Cancellation of Conference Sponsored by Lifers Group at Joyceville Penitentiary—Government Policy.

I am somewhat reluctant to table this answer because I will miss the daily phone calls from Senator Hastings regarding it.

(The answer follows:)

The meeting at Joyceville Institution which was planned for later this spring by the Lifers' Group of that Institution was cancelled as a result of serious concerns raised by members of the general public and victims' groups as reflected in the media, correspondence and calls. With this type of very real public concern, it would have been particularly difficult to meet the intent of the workshop insofar as the Solicitor General was concerned. Many correctional initiatives depend on community support both for implementation and for ongoing success. To this extent, corrections must move very cautiously, and can not alienate those whose help and support is essential. Given the reaction to the news of the meeting, this concern was present.

Cost was not the determining factor in the decision to cancel the meeting. The cost to the Correctional Service of Canada of $20,000 had been budgeted for and would have been absorbed by the CSC.

The meeting was originally approved as one means by which the Correctional Service of Canada could hear the concerns of interested individuals and groups. The meeting would also have been used to seek constructive suggestions for further improvements to security and program development which would address the needs of long-term offenders generally, and more specifically offenders serving life sentences. Currently, there are approximately 2,000 offenders in the system serving life sentences, and all of these offenders become eligible for parole at some point in their sentence.

Although the inter-institutional meeting has been cancelled, other initiatives will be taken to involve offenders directly in identifying concerns and developing programs to meet the special needs of long-term offenders. Lifers will be part of this process and, in fact, the Commissioner of Corrections is planning to meet the Joyceville Lifers' Group later this month. As was noted in the press release, a task force on the management of long-term offenders is underway and there is no intention to backtrack on the Ministry's intent to provide effective programming for all segments of the offender population.

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR MANAGEMENT DEVELOPMENT BILL

THIRD READING—DIVISION DEFERRED

On the Order:

Motion of the Honourable Senator Bolduc, seconded by the Honourable Senator Grimard, for the third reading of Bill C-34, An Act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof.—(Division deferred to 5.45 p.m.).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): My understanding is, honourable senators, that an agreement has been reached between the whips to have the vote at 5 o'clock this afternoon with a 30 minute bell.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): So the bell will start at 4:30 p.m.

Senator Doody: My understanding was that the bell would start at 5 o'clock.

Senator Frith: If the division is to be taken at 5 o'clock the bell should be at 4:30 p.m.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is the understanding that the vote is going to be at 5:45 p.m.?

Senator Doody: My understanding was 5 o'clock. If there is a 5 o'clock vote, then presumably the bell would be at 4:30, but that is not the way we have done it before. A 5:45 p.m. vote would cause the bells to start at that time and the vote would be at 6:15 p.m., so obviously there is something missing in the terminology; but I am sure it is nothing that the two whips cannot straighten out.

Senator Frith: I am not sure of that.

Senator Doody: It is very vague.

• (1410)

Senator Frith: If you go by the Rules of the Senate, Rule P-3.(a) states "the taking of the division." It is a question of what you mean by "taking of the division." It does not say the starting, but states:

> . . . the taking of the division may . . . be deferred until 5:45 o'clock p.m. on the next sitting day, whereupon—

It is ambiguous.

Senator Doody: Yes; it is.

Senator Frith: It then states:

> . . . whereupon the bells to call in the Senators shall be sounded until the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Senator then in the Chair that they are ready to proceed to the taking of the vote; but, in any case, the said bells shall be sounded for not more than 30 minutes, whereupon the vote shall be taken.

You could read it either way.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Remember the way we did it?

Senator Frith: Yes. You could read it either way. It is ambiguous. In any event, I am sure that we can agree on how we want it done.

Senator Doody: Yes. Perhaps the two whips can try to confer on this and make up their minds as to which way they want to do it. We should be able to inform the senators as quickly as they can so that they can be here either at 5.00 or 5.30.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, we should decide, by unanimous consent as a Senate, to start ringing the bells, for example, at four o'clock and that we vote at five o'clock. We should not leave it up to the whips because there are some independents here who do not have whips. With the Senate making the decision, we will then have made a unanimous decision.

Senator Doody: I am always fascinated by a committee of 104 or 105 trying to accomplish something. I have seen interminable discussions with a committee of eight or twelve. As for the independents, we would certainly welcome them into our caucus if they need a whip.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Never!

Senator Doody: I am sure they would be equally welcome in the other caucus if the only requirement in this place were the advice of a whip. This has been the responsibility of the whips in the past. We should let the whips work it out.

Senator Frith: We can agree to it, but let us do it on their recommendation.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, are we to have the actual vote at 5.00 or 5.45 p.m.?

Senator Frith: We will let the question of the time stand until the whips have agreed. They can then tell us if they are prepared to have the bells ring at 4.30 for a vote at 5.00. We will then ratify what they agree upon.

Senator Doody: Exactly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, for the third reading of Bill C-79, An Act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act as amended.—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have continued my examination of the particular matter that I raised yesterday. I do not know if Senator Doody has conducted his examination to determine whether or not there is a basis for my concern, but my further examination convinces me that there is a basis for concern. Therefore, I want to pursue the matter and possibly put an amendment before the Senate for consideration.

Before I return to the point that I raised yesterday, I should mention that after we finished with the debate Senator Lewis referred to clause 20.3(1) of the bill, which provides that the Internal Economy Committee:

> . . . has the exclusive authority to determine whether any previous, current or proposed use by a senator of any funds, goods, services or premises made available to that senator for the carrying out of parliamentary functions is or was proper,—

The following paragraph 20.3(2) provides that:

> Any senator may apply to the Board for an opinion with respect to any use by that senator of any funds, goods, services or premises referred to in subsection (1).

The question or the concern that might require clarification on this point is exactly what are the ramifications of the use of the words "exclusive authority" if the section provides that Internal Economy has the exclusive authority to determine whether any use of funds or materials is or was proper? If the committee through an act of Parliament has the exclusive authority, where does that leave the courts? If the committee determines that an action was proper, is it still possible for the Crown to lay charges and the court to hear those charges?

It was interesting that in the House of Commons, when the bill was before the committee, the Government Whip, Mr. Hawkes, gave an example of what could occur.

> If we say . . .

And I presume the expression "we" in this case refers to a board . . .

> . . . that Rod Murphy can take his budget and buy a Mercedes-Benz car, he should not be in trouble if he spends it on a Mercedes-Benz car. He must have the certitude that the board can, through by-law, tell him how to spend his money. So when I read that the board has in law the exclusive authority, it does not bother me, because I think that is what the whole thing is.

This quotation is from the Special Committee on the Review of the Parliament of Canada Act Issue 16, November 8, 1990 at page 18.

The question I pose for an answer by whomsoever can provide it is how far does this exclusive authority by the board, either in the House of Commons or the Senate, to determine the proper use of funds extend? Does it extend as far as the example provided by Mr. Hawkes? Is the purchase of a Mercedes-Benz automobile, if office funds were that abundant, a proper use of parliamentary funds just because the committee decides that it is? Is the effect of section 20.3 of Bill C-79 that the resources provided to parliamentarians may be used for absolutely any purpose authorized by the committee? If that is the case, then, of course, that is the end of the matter, I would think, and there would be no role for a court; but that is a point that was suggested by Senator Lewis yesterday in a whisper in my ear. I followed it up and that is what I found.

However, I return to the point that I made yesterday, and I might be able to state it more clearly today. It is provided in the legislation that a member of the House of Commons or the Senate can apply to the board for an opinion as to whether his use of resources is proper, either past, present or future. I have no difficulty with that as it stands on its own, but the difficulty appears to arise when that seeking of an opinion is linked to the commencement of a legal process. As I understand the reading at the present time, if a member of Parliament or a senator sought an opinion as to his use of funds by the board, the issuance of a search warrant or an arrest would be stopped until that opinion was issued. The judge, in deciding whether to authorize the issuance of a warrant for the arrest, must have in his hands the opinion of the board.

Do we want to have in the law a provision which permits me, if I get wind that I am under investigation, to go to the board and ask for an opinion, and allow the board to take its time—days, weeks or months—and only when it gives its opinion can the police act? I say that because the opinion has to be in the hands of the judge before the warrant to search, for example, could be issued.

I think that problem was detected in the House of Commons and an amendment was made to the bill in that House to remove that objection. The amendment was moved at the report stage of the bill in the House of Commons, but, in retrospect, it seems to have made the situation even more difficult. Whereas in the original version there was a limit of 30 days on the time allotted to the board to give its opinion, in the amendment there is no limit whatsoever.

I have talked to Mr. Gauthier from the other place who seconded the amendment at the report stage. I believe it fair to say that he did not detect this difficulty in the amendment. His purpose was to give members and senators an opportunity to have an adjudication by the board on the use of funds. I do not have any difficulty with that. It can be quite useful. If a senator is concerned, or has doubt, about what he is doing or what he proposes to do, and if he can go to his peers and say, "What do you think?", and if they examine it objectively and say, "Well, what you are doing is okay, or is not okay," then I think that is a useful thing. However, if the process of going to a judge to have a search warrant or to lay a charge cannot be completed until the opinion of the board is given, then that is an anomaly. At the very least it is a provision that certainly confers upon members of Parliament and senators a status that is not available to any other citizen. Do we want that?

Members did not want it in the House of Commons because they tried to remove it. Inadvertently, I say, they put it back.

I am putting an amendment on the table. I am not going to try to take the weight of the ethics of the Senate or the House of Commons on my own shoulders, unless there is some view that we ought to do something about it. What I propose is an amendment to remove that objectionable clause in its entirety and replace it with a new one.

The new clause would provide that where a peace officer has in his possession an opinion, he must provide it to the judge who is being asked to issue a process. On page 2, in clause 20.3 (2) of the bill, there is the provision that:

> Any senator may apply to the Board for an opinion with respect to any use by that senator of any funds, goods, services or premises referred to in subsection (1).

Subsection 1 is there to look at if we wish to do so. Clause 20.4 (1) states:

> During any investigation by a peace officer in relation to the use by a senator of funds, goods, services or premises . . . the peace officer may apply to the Board for, or the Board may, on its own initiative, provide the peace officer with an opinion concerning the propriety of such use.

So that the peace officer may go to the board asking for an opinion, or the board may issue one on its own; and, if he has it, the peace officer must show it to the judge. Once that process is launched, so to speak, the following comes into effect:

> Where an opinion is provided to a peace officer pursuant to subsection (1) or the peace officer has been advised by the Board that an application . . . has been made by the senator to whom the investigation relates and where an application for a process is made to a judge, the judge shall be provided with the opinion and shall consider it in determining whether to issue the process.

I am not sure what is the correct word, but the course of justice is stopped until an opinion is forthcoming from the board. There is no time limit on the board. I think that is unintended and unnecessary because it has the implications which were criticized when the bill was before the House of Commons. What I would suggest is that if a peace officer has in his possession an opinion, he must provide it to the judge who is being asked to issue a process—if he has it; but if he does not have it, he is not stopped from going to the judge to make an application. That would mean that the peace officer, if he had an opinion from the board would have to show it to the judge; but he would not have to wait or have an opinion from the board before he could go before a judge. The reason is that one could delay. What would our defence be if I asked for an opinion from the board and the board took 30 days or three months, as could happen, before rendering an opinion? In the meantime, everything has stopped because the peace officer cannot go to the judge because the judge cannot decide on whether to issue an arrest warrant or search warrant unless he has the opinion. I think I have laboured this point excessively.

• (1430)

If honourable senators think there is merit in removing those provisions from the bill, I have an amendment that would strike out lines 1 to 10 on page 3. These are the lines that provide the basis for the difficulty I have outlined. I would move:

> That Bill C-79, as amended by the 35th report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, be not now read a third time but that it be amended
> (a) in clause 1 by striking out lines 1 to 10, on page 3, and substituting therefor the following:
>
> "Opinion to be considered
> (2) Where an opinion is provided to a peace officer pursuant to subsection (1) and where an application for a process is made to a judge, the judge shall be provided with the opinion and shall consider it in determining whether to issue the process." and
>
> (b) in clause 2, by striking out lines 19 to 29, on page 8, and substituting therefor the following:
>
> "Opinion to be considered
> (2) Where an opinion is provided to a peace officer pursuant to subsection (1) and where an application for a process is made to a judge, the judge shall be provided with the opinion and shall consider it in determining whether to issue the process."

That second part provides the same rule for members of the House of Commons as it does for the Senate. I would be happy to discuss these amendments privately to determine whether they have merit before I move them. Perhaps we could stand the debate for a little while and chat about it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): In considering the amendment, we might also remember something not crucial but relevant from a procedural point of view—namely that we have already adopted amendments and that this bill will go down the corridor to the House of Commons amended anyway. It's a question of whether the bill will go to the House of Commons with this amendment as well. In other words, this amendment will not create any delay in the process of the bill, since it has to go back to the House anyway with the other amendments that we have already agreed upon; and we may very well agree to this one too.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am hesitant to stand because I have already spoken at third reading.

Senator Frith: Not on the amendment.

Senator Doody: My understanding is that this proposal has been discussed with members of the other place, and that they have found it to be an improvement over what was originally proposed. As Senator MacEachen has said, through some inadvertency that limiting clause went in at the report stage. We have no quarrel with that and, if it is the wish of the Senate to accept this amendment, it will simply be added as another amendment to the already amended bill.

With regard to the question raised by Senator Lewis through Senator MacEachen, that is another concern. My understanding of what Mr. Hawkes said is that it was simply an extreme to demonstrate that the Board of Internal Economy of the other place would set out the rules and procedures that govern the expenditures of funds allocated to individual members for their use. The same would apply in the Senate. The Board of Internal Economy would set out the guidelines, or in our case regulations, and they would govern the use of public funds by individual senators. The example of a Mercedes Benz, of course, is an absurdity to the ultimate degree, because I can imagine no committee, certainly not the Internal Economy committee to which I belong, that would sanction the purchase of a Mercedes Benz. As a matter of fact, as Senator Hastings has said from time to time, he has trouble getting the 10,000 sheets of paper for his newspaper, important though it is to the electorate in Alberta. So I do not have the same concern as Senator Lewis on that particular problem. It simply means that the committee that is responsible will set out the regulations to govern the expenditure or the use of funds. Then, if a senator or a peace officer is asking for an opinion, they are the regulations that are used in determining whether or not, in the opinion of the board, the funds have been expended properly.

I must speak to Mr. Hawkes about his hyperbole. Read at random, it can certainly be quite disconcerting. However, I think I know what he was getting at.

In any event, I think that this amendment is perfectly acceptable. I should also call the attention of the chamber to the fact that I will have to ask someone to move another amendment, which is a technical one that was brought to my attention today by the Law Clerk, who tells me that one of the clauses has to be renumbered to fit into the procedure.

Senator Frith: Let us just say that it is agreed.

Senator Doody: Someone will have to move it and it will have to be seconded by someone else. It is here.

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I have some questions regarding this amendment. First, am I correct in understanding that the proposed amendment mirrors what happens in the House of Commons, so that the treatment in the House of Commons and in the Senate would be precisely the same?

Second, would someone applying to the committee for an opinion have the certainty that that opinion would stand?

Senator Doody: As to the first question, the answer is yes. The House of Commons and the Senate are in this bill treated exactly the same in this regard.

As to whether the opinion will stand, it has to be considered by the legal officer, the judge, but it does not have to be accepted. The judge does not have to accept the opinion but must consider it when he is considering the particular case. Each case will be judged on an individual basis.

Senator Kenny: If I understand correctly, as the bill is now written, the judge would have to accept the opinion?

[Senator Doody.]

Senator Doody: No. He has to consider it. He has to take it into consideration when he is making up his mind as to how he should dispose of the case, but he does not have to accept it as the decision that he has to hand down.

Senator Frith: A word about that point, and about the point raised by Senator Lewis. I think we should understand what we are doing, and I think that what we are doing is correct. We have to put it into the context of complaints about the use of resources. When the police investigate those complaints they often find that there is little by way of guidelines as to what is authorized use of resources in some cases. However, they do find that in many cases it was not clear what rules apply to the use of resources. At one stage we were told that the police had said, "You ought to have regulations so that if we get complaints about use of resources from, for example, a disgruntled employee"—which sometimes happens—"we can have something to turn to." That really was part of the motivation for establishing these rules.

The use of the word "exclusive" is, I think, quite intentional and not inadvertent, with the intention that anyone who wants to know what is authorized for use of resources, and who makes the decisions, will know that it is the Board of Internal Economy in the other place and the Internal Economy committee here; but it does have the consequence that Senator Lewis was saying. It says "exclusive," and, of course, he and other lawyers in the Senate know that there is a body of law that fills 20 shelves 20 feet long as to when a law can exclude review by the courts or when it cannot. Of course, that would come into effect here, too, but I do not think we want to get into that huge branch of administrative law dealing with what are called privative clauses. I think the point raised by Senator Lewis is well raised, but I thought it would be worthwhile explaining the genesis of this clause, and that it is not a capricious use of either the establishment of the rules or the use of the word "exclusive."

• (1440)

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, may I make a comment relating to Senator MacEachen's point. If this amendment requires a police officer to provide the judge with the opinion of the board, we must remember that the judge has to exercise his discretion when he issues the process. The police officer may or may not have this opinion, but it seems to me that we should go further and say that the judge should be informed if such an opinion has been requested. That might have some significance to a judge who is trying to make up his mind. If an opinion has been requested, he should know, although there may have been some delay or reason why the police officer had not received it. I think the judge should know whether or not an opinion has been requested.

Section 20.4(1) says:

> . . . the peace officer may apply to the Board for, or the Board may, on its own initiative, provide the peace officer with an opinion . . .

So it is not required of the board, but it may do so on its own initiative.

Senator Doody: I think that is deliberate.

Senator Lewis: That could be, but I am wondering whether or not the judge should be informed. If there is an opinion in existence, he should have it; but if it is known that an opinion has been requested, he should be given that information. He may ask where the opinion is and be told that it has not yet been received. I think that might be of some significance to a judge.

Senator Doody: I think I can remember that discussion having taken place in committee some months ago. I cannot recall exactly the reason for it's not being done that way. I am sure there are many other refinements, fine tunings, corrections and additions that can be made to the bill, but I do not think we should get into that at this point. It is a matter of timing. If it is at all possible, I would like to get the bill as amended read the third time today so that it will be sent back to the House of Commons. It would then be looked at there and a message would be sent back to us tomorrow so that we could have Royal Assent tomorrow and go on about our business. We have spent so much time with so many amendments, corrections and discussions on this particular bill that I am beginning to wonder if we will ever see the end of it.

Senator Frith: Perhaps we should launch the ship and see if it leaks.

Senator Doody: We will send it out to sea and let the naval architects in the other place decide whether or not they want to make more improvements. I suspect the bill will be looked at again before too long; but, in any event, I would be hesitant to suggest that we tinker with it any more than we have—not to say that the improvements we have made are not significant.

Hon. Romeo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I should like to make a point of clarification. When the Internal Economy committee examined this matter some months ago, it was careful to ensure that the word "board" not apply in the case of the Senate, not because we wanted to be different but because the powers that the board will have in the House of Commons are considerably different—and I use the word "different" not more or less from the powers that be Internal Economy committee has. We have insisted that the Internal Economy committee's recommendations to this house for approval or disapproval be continued; in other words, that the policies put forward by Internal Economy should be subject to ratification by the whole Senate, continuing with our tradition and the rules we try carefully to follow. I want to make it plain that this provides no increased power to the Internal Economy committee. It might be a different way of using that power, which will always be subject to the ratification of this house.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, before the motion is put, which I will be pleased to move, may I make sure that the Senate knows that the extent of my consultations with the other place have been confined to Mr. Gauthier who was involved in the report stage amendment. My office has discussed this with him, but I have not gone beyond that. I do not want to oversell the process.

• (1450)

Honourable senators, I move the amendment which I read and which, I think, has been circulated.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that Bill C-79, as amended by the 35th report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs . . .

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense!

[English]

Senator Kenny: It has not been circulated.

Senator Frith: I thought it had been.

Senator Kenny: No one has a copy of it.

Senator Doody: It is being circulated now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do honourable senators wish me to read it or do you wish to dispense?

Senator Doody: I believe Senator Kenny wants it read.

Senator Murray: Senator Kenny wants a copy.

The Hon. the Speaker: Copies are being made and will be distributed shortly.

Is it your wish, honourable senators, to wait for those copies to be distributed before we vote on third reading of Bill C-79, as amended?

Senator Frith: I believe another amendment has to be put.

Senator Doody: Senator Simard will put another amendment, which is a technical amendment.

Senator Frith: I believe it involves renumbering.

[Translation]

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard moved: That Bill C-79, as amended by the 35th report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, be not now read a third time but that it be amended in clause 1 by substituting subsection number 19.5(7) with subsection number 19.2(2).

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion in amendment agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, that this bill, as amended, be read the third time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Doody: I do not believe Senator MacEachen's motion in amendment has yet been put.

The Hon. the Speaker: I believe honourable senators agreed that I should dispense with the reading of it. Then Senator Kenny stood up.

Is it your wish, honourable senators, that I read the amendment?

Senator Kenny: May we have five minutes to read it?

Senator Doody: Take all the time you want. It is a noble piece of legislation.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it the wish of honourable senators to proceed to Order No. 3 and then to revert to this order?

Senator Frith: I think we should wait until Senator Kenny has had an opportunity to read this amendment. He, or anyone else, may then wish to deal with it.

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, I think matters would be expedited if the Chair were to read the amendment as moved by Senator MacEachen. That is the proper way of doing business.

Senator Frith: Yes, but we did ask for dispensation.

Senator Corbin: No unanimous agreement was given to that. I should like to have the amendment read.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Senator MacEachen, P.C., seconded by Senator Frith that Bill C-79, as amended by the 35th report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, be not now read a third time but that it be amended

(a) in clause 1 by striking out lines 1 to 10, on page 3, and substituting therefor the following:

"Opinion to be considered

(2) Where an opinion is provided to a peace officer pursuant to subsection (1) and where an application for a process is made to a judge, the judge shall be provided with the opinion and shall consider it in determining whether to issue the process." ; and

(b) in cluse 2, by striking out lines 19 to 29, on page 8, and substituting therefor the following:

"Opinion to be considered

(2) Where an opinion is provided to a peace officer pursuant to subsection (1) and where an application for a process is made to a judge, the judge shall be provided with the opinion and shall consider it in determining whether to issue the process."

[English]

Do honourable senators wish me to read that in English also, although Senator MacEachen moved it?

Senator Ottenheimer: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it the wish of Senator Kenny that we now take a vote on this?

Senator Kenny: Yes, go ahead.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

[Senator Doody.]

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion in amendment agreed to.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, that this bill, as amended, be read the third time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

TIMING OF DIVISION ON BILL C-34

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps I could interrupt for just a moment. Further to the vote we are to have this afternoon, there has been—as we all agreed just a moment ago—a misunderstanding about what 5 o'clock meant and what the 30-minute bell meant.

My understanding is that the whips have agreed that the bell will start at 5 o'clock and the vote will be at 5:30 p.m. Hopefully, for future votes, we can pin down what we mean when we say that a vote will be at a particular time. In this particular instance the bell will start at 5 o'clock and the vote will be held at 5:30 p.m.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN IN CANADIAN SOCIETY

DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Frith calling the attention of the Senate to the issue of violence against women in Canadian society.—(Honourable Senator Marsden).

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I should like to speak briefly to this major social problem which faces our country. First, I should like to congratulate Senator Frith for his introduction of this problem in a Senate debate on February 13, 1990 and Senator Spivak who, last week, again took up the question. They are not alone among Canadians who are concerned about this issue. I know that many members of Parliament, those serving on a committee examining this issue in the other place as well as individual MPs, are also concerned. Mr. Lyle Vanclief, a member of Parliament, recently held a seminar in his riding at which the women's shelters advocates and others discussed this issue. It is becoming a problem which is under common debate. Each of the senators here described the situation eloquently. It is not my purpose today to review again the sad statistics and the arguments on this problem of violence against women. It takes many forms, as senators know, from emotional and physical abuse to murder.

● (1500)

Those of you who do not believe it is a common problem should ask the women you know about what has happened to them, because it is very difficult to find women in our society who have not, at some time in their lives, been assaulted at least verbally and violently if not physically.

This past weekend I met a leading Canadian politician who has a number of daughters who told me that each of his daughters, the oldest being in her mid-twenties, had already suffered some kind of violent assault, verbal or physical—and these are people from a relatively privileged background. There is no protection.

I do not want to go over that evidence. I want to suggest to my honourable colleagues that there are three major unresolved questions to which we must put our minds and commit our resources. The first is what causes this persistent violence against women. It is not a new issue, but it is becoming an increasingly evident issue. The second question is what it is in our society, in our culture, in our way of doing things, that makes it possible for violence to continue against women. Third, and in many ways most important, what can be done? However, we cannot answer the "what can be done" question until we have answered the previous two questions.

There is increasingly rich literature on the question of the causes of this violence. Most fields of social science and many fields of biology and medicine are now asking these sorts of questions, and the explanations vary. One criticism of this literature is that it is confined to academic circles, that there are scholarly articles written and published, that there are learned societies that get together and debate the issues, but that that literature is not connected to the everyday life of not only victims but of community workers and others who work with victims of violence.

There is, for example, increasing evidence that the behaviour is inherited, either socially or in some other way. A study of the children of battered women, published in 1990 by Professor Jaffe and his colleagues, concludes that males who come from homes where they witness their mothers being battered are a thousand times more likely to end up as batterers themselves; and that, alas, is a great many homes.

There are other explanations offered. In some of the literature, people argue that the causes of violence against women are, to a large extent, economic—that is, people who are under enormous pressure and in very difficult straits. However, upon reviewing that evidence, some authors have recently argued that when that economic tension is relieved one begins to see that it is not that alone, that there is something in our patriarchal way of doing things that is intrinsic to this problem of violence. It remains an unresolved debate in the literature, but a very important one. The causes of this must be uncovered.

The second question, of course, is what maintains this violence. Why does it go on generation after generation? What are the aspects of our culture, as compared to other cultures, that support violence against women? What is acceptable behaviour in our society? Apparently, violence against women is acceptable behaviour in our society. There is evidence of that everywhere. That question can be answered. That is not locked in the same mysteries as other questions, but that answer has not yet been made clear.

The third question is, of course, what can be done. It is true that a number of governments have tried to make progress on this issue. The first action was symptomatic relief—that is, providing shelters for women who are being battered and their children. We are trying to re-educate police officers and police forces to lay charges against batterers. That action is underway. The current federal government has, as have previous governments, supplied support for that. On February 20 last the current government announced a new family violence initiative. It was a real attempt to undertake immediate symptomatic relief.

There is, of course, also the question of gun control laws. Many years ago the Honourable Ron Basford told me that gun control legislation is a women's issue since we are the ones at the fatal end of the guns most of the time. We now have that issue before us again. The public debate is revealing as to who sits on which side of that issue.

In her statement in the Senate on February 27, which I do not propose to review here, Senator Spivak reviewed various initiatives. I would like to suggest to my honourable colleagues that there is now wide-spread agreement among groups across this country—women's groups, men's groups and mixed groups—that there is a need to have a royal commission on violence against women. I am not ordinarily a strong advocate of royal commissions, but I do think that this is exactly the sort of subject on which the depth and scope provided by royal commissions would be extremely valuable. The issue is worse than it used to be and the questions that I and others have posed need to be answered. The Montreal massacre, of course, brought it very much to our attention.

I should like to quote from an article written by Mary Labatt published in the news letter of the Federation of Women Teachers' Associations of Ontario in January of this year. I quote:

> In Montreal, more women were killed by their partners in 1990 than were killed at the Polytechnique. But, nobody noticed these women because they were killed in their own homes. They were nameless and faceless victims.
> In 1989, 119 women were murdered in domestic relationships. Most publications say that one in ten Canadian women is battered by her male partner, but research now indicates that one in four women is physically abused by her male partner.

I would like to point out that in half of those cases the women were under the age of 17. This happens at an age at which these girls are extremely vulnerable. The people perpetrating this violence are of all ages. This is not a problem of young men or middle-aged men or old men, but 99 per cent of assaults against women are perpetrated by men and almost 97 per cent of the assaults against men are also perpetrated by men. So the issue that we must consider is male behaviour.

Labatt goes on:

> In the Smith study, an additional measure of abuse revealed an even higher incidence rate over 36 per cent. One study found that 80 per cent of the children witness their father's violence and it is known that this trauma can leave indelible scars on their developing personalities.

Battering is one thing. Labatt continues:

> A Canadian woman is raped every seventeen minutes . . . and the incidence of rape is rising alarmingly. Eighty-four per cent of assaulted women are raped by someone they know and 57 per cent of the rapes occur on a date . . . And 60 per cent of rapes take place in private homes.

Date rape is a very common and very sad problem in our society.

> The attitudes of young people towards date rape are unbelievable. One researcher found that fifty-four per cent of high school boys and forty-two per cent of the girls sampled said it was acceptable for a boy to hold a girl down and force her to have sexual relations with him if he had spent a lot of money on her, they had dated a long time, or she led him on . . . In another study, 65 per cent of the boys and 47 per cent of the girls thought a man could force a woman to have sex if they had been dating for more than six months . . . A study at York University revealed that 31 per cent of the males and 22 per cent of the females thought the girl was to blame if her partner forced sexual relations on her . . .

This goes on and on. These are Canadian studies and are recent studies. They tell us more than we ever wanted to know about the attitudes of those people who are most frequently the victims of this violence.

● (1510)

Honourable senators, this is a crucial question and there is no easy answer to what must be done. It is quite clear that the palliatives that we have so far attempted in Canada are not the answer. The incidence of violence is not going down. All your daughters and granddaughters are at risk, as, apparently, are a great many of your sons and grandsons, who, one assumes, will end up as potential perpetrators of these crimes.

I suggest to you again that, in order to answer the question of cause, the answer pertaining to the question of maintenance, and the answer to the question of what can be done, we need a royal commission of the kind that is being proposed by women's groups in this country—for example, the FWTAO, among others. This idea has widespread support across this country. It would be useful to provincial ministers, police forces, social workers, educators, parents, victims, and people who fear their own potentiality for violence.

The Senate should call upon the government to establish this royal commission. I hope that the government will listen to this. It is a major issue. But if the government does not listen, then I suggest that Senator Spivak's proposal, that a start on this issue should be made by one of the Senate committees, becomes a priority.

On motion of Senator Fairbairn, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES 1990-91

EIGHTEENTH REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Leblanc (Saurel), seconded by the Honourable Senator Thériault, for the adoption of the Eighteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Main Estimates 1990-91), presented in the Senate on 23rd January, 1991.—(Honourable Senator Marsden).

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I do not want to absorb the whole afternoon, but I know that Senator Leblanc is anxious to get the Senate to concur in this report and move on.

Let me briefly congratulate the chairman and the deputy chairman of this committee, Senator Bolduc, for another extremely valuable report from the National Finance Committee.

This report on program evaluation arose in part out of a concern about budget cuts in the budget prior to this one. As senators will recall, there were cuts to women's programs and native communications programs. The question that arose was: Were those cuts motivated by poor evaluation? That is, were those programs not succeeding in meeting their aims, or were they motivated by political ends? At the end of this extremely interesting study we are not sure what the answer to that is, but neither of those programs had received negative evaluations. In fact, they had positive evaluations. Therefore, one assumes that those cuts were politically motivated.

The committee learned, for example, that the Canada Assistance Plan, a program that has been badly mauled by this government in Bill C-69 and in this past budget, had never had a program evaluation until the Auditor General's report for 1989 reviewed it. Since then, however, a program evaluation has been undertaken.

The committee reports that there was a great deal of evidence that, although there are negative evaluations of programs, it is seldom that reallocation of budget occurs as a result. That led us on to further study concerning the process, objectivity and the results of evaluation.

Honourable senators, I strongly recommend this report to you as being a useful and interesting report on the management of government. We had extremely fine witnesses both from Canada and elsewhere, including from the Public Service and the private sector, and I believe that we learned a great deal. I hope that this report will make an ongoing contribution to the debate on the quality of management of publicly-funded programs.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SICENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

TWENTY-THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Twenty-Third Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology entitled: "Children In Poverty: Toward A Better Future", tabled in the Senate on January 31, 1991.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I am pleased to tell you that the report that we tabled earlier entitled: "Children in Poverty: Toward a Better Future", is now out in its proper covers and is available for distribution. Those of you who have read the Globe and Mail this morning will know that Mr. Geoffrey York wrote a story about a meeting that we had with the people who had been witnesses and with some members of the press yesterday.

Honourable senators, in the view of the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, the poverty of children in this country is most alarming. Despite efforts by many people and many governments, the poverty of children is not diminishing. Children are poor because their parents are poor, and their parents are poor largely because they do not have jobs that pay them a sufficient amount to support their families or they do not have jobs at all.

The issues of poverty are of great consequence on the Canadian economy. Based on a study that we commissioned—which is printed as Appendix 1 in our report—this report points out that over the next 20 years we can expect approximately 187,000 students to leave school due to their poverty. These high dropout rates will cost Canadians an estimated $620 million in unemployment insurance costs and an additional $710 million in social assistance payments. If we got rid of these high dropout rates, federal and provincial income tax revenues would rise by $7.2 billion and consumption taxes by $1.5 billion. I should point out, honourable senators, that these estimates were made before the GST came into effect. The incomes of these workers would be considerably greater—about $23 million greater over the next 20 years.

We know that people who drop out of school have a poor future in terms of the economy. This is a key issue in trying to prevent not only the misery to those people and their families, but also to prevent those costs and those foregone revenues for government.

• (1520)

Honourable senators, we drew particular attention in this report, based on some excellent testimony from a variety of aboriginal groups, to the problems of poverty among members of the aboriginal community. For example, did you know that about 51 per cent of all aboriginal children are living in poverty, and the difference is not very great whether they live on reserve or off-reserve; that the life expectancy of an aboriginal person at birth is 8 years less than that of a non-aboriginal person holding everything else constant? There are very serious problems there, and it is to these kinds of problems that the committee turned its attention in trying to create solutions.

Members will recall that on December 19, 1989 we tabled in this chamber an interim report entitled "Child Poverty and Adult Social Problems" in which we laid out the relationship between being brought up in poverty and one's later life. The purpose of the current report is to seek solutions.

There are 16 recommendations in our report. I will not go through all of them, but I hope that honourable senators will read this report. It is not that long and is very much to the point. The recommendations fall in two categories. If we are going to help people get out of poverty, we need to supply income support. Obviously one is in poverty if one does not have enough income. However, supplying income is not enough. We also need to look at services such as housing, the food banks, a variety of issues that make the life of children who are living in a culture of poverty better.

On the income side we have two alternatives to propose. In the first alternative, called the mixed alternative, we take all the current child benefits programs, maintain the family allowance, and add $500 million, which is a tiny proportion of the amount that has been taken out of children's programs by de-indexing and cuts of various kinds. That would raise a very large proportion of families now in poverty above the poverty line. The second alternative would include everything as well as the family allowance in creating a child benefit which, through the income system, would generate revenue. No additional funds would be required, but there would be a loss of family allowance.

In our meeting yesterday, in response to our report, members of Parliament from all three parties on the other side largely supported the mixed option, the one that retains the family allowance. However, in this report we have laid out for honourable senators our thinking, our calculation and the options so that this can be debated.

On the income side, I would like to remind all senators that the federal minimum wage is the lowest of any jurisdiction in Canada; and, with regard to those children of two-parent families living in poverty, a great many of the parents are working full-time and for a full year, but if you earn the minimum wage, you are earning about 40 per cent below the poverty line. A few years ago it was 80 per cent of the poverty line. The federal minimum wage needs to be brought up to the level where if you work full time and earn it, you are not in poverty. It needs to be indexed to the cost of living. In addition, we need to ensure that any federal contracting or federal government programs pay at least the federal minimum wage.

There are many other recommendations and I am not going to draw them all to your attention now, but I do hope that members of this chamber will obtain copies of this report, distribute them in their various constituencies and talk about it. It is one in a long series that have come forward from "Child At Risk" under Senator Bonnell's chairmanship through a series of other reports on child benefits. I believe that it makes very serious and practical recommendations.

Before resuming my seat, I would like to express thanks to Sandra Harder from the Library of Parliament's research staff who worked so hard and so well in the creation of this report, and Patricia MacDonald of the Parliamentary Centre who is the research officer for our committee. Both of them, with Serge Pelletier, who was then the clerk of our committee, worked long hours and on weekends in order to produce this report. In particular, I would like to thank and congratulate Senator Brenda Robertson who was the inspiration for our taking up this subject of the study of child poverty and who herself has shown tireless commitment to the success of this report. I thank them and members of our committee and other senators who joined us from time to time to hear our excellent witnesses and to produce what I hope will be a series of implemented recommendations.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CANADIAN VETERANS' ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED KINGDOM—ELIGIBILITY OF MEMBERS FOR CANADIAN BENEFITS

Hon. Jack Marshall rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, May 30, 1989:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to a visit to England for meetings with the Canadian Veteran's Association of the United Kingdom with regard to their appeal to the Canadian Government to recognize their eligibility for benefits under the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act (residence rule).

He said: Honourable senators, although very belatedly, I rise to address my Inquiry No. 3 dated March 30, 1989 which I introduced almost two years ago, and I apologize for the delay. While it may appear that I was neglectful in addressing an inquiry so long after I introduced it, the delay is entirely justified and this will become obvious as I explain other elements of the inquiry that evolved over the past 23 months.

The inquiry calls the attention of the Senate to a visit I made to England for meetings with the Canadian Veteran's Association of the United Kingdom in 1988 in regard to their appeal through the Senate Sub-Committee on Veterans Affairs to the Canadian Government to recognize their entitlement to benefits under the War Veterans Allowance Act, benefits still denied them because of an outdated, outmoded and obsolete clause in the act introduced some 31 years ago. This clause demands that in order to qualify for benefits under the act, the veteran must come back to Canada and spend 12 months here before returning to his or her chosen country of residence.

Honourable senators are aware of the number of pleas that I and others have made in this chamber through Inquiries and Motions culminating with the introduction of Private Member's Bill S-4 in May 1989 to amend the act, a private member's bill which was justifiable, fair and humane in its intent, but was denied by the outmoded rules of this chamber and ignored by the press. One of the roles of the Senate is the protection of minority rights which in this case would be the protection of a small group of Canadian veterans who, as is their undeniable right, chose to live where they wished after service to their country.

It is therefore my intention today to review at length all the various points I made over the past many months to relate the inconsistencies of successive Canadian governments with regard to anomolies in the act and to relate my findings regarding other issues of which we were previously unaware—nor was the government aware, and it became evident that those who should have been responsible did not care one bit. Fortunately, that resulted in positive action on behalf of Canadian veterans living overseas through a co-operative effort of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs and the Canadian Veterans Association of the United Kingdom.

● (1530)

Honourable senators may also recall that at the invitation of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, and prior to my visit in 1989, the National Secretary of the Canadian Veterans Association of the United Kingdom, Mr. Percy Mercer, came to Canada at our invitation to appear before the subcommittee to give evidence on the plight of many of those Canadian veterans who are living in absolute poverty. To make my point, I refer in his testimony to one case, among others, of a veteran who was a prisoner of war for three years. This prisoner died not only destitute, but left his wife in the same condition after his death because he was not aware of the benefits to which he was entitled.

This veteran, William Simmonds, as a result of the Prisoner of War Compensation Act passed in 1976, was entitled to 25 per cent compensation, or $461.80 per month at present rates. After his decease, his wife should have been entitled to half of that amount, or $231 per month for the rest of her life.

Honourable senators, the Simmonds did not even know there was a POW Compensation Act which Canada introduced in recognition of those who suffered in POW camps during the wars even though too many years after the fact, and neither did the Canadian Veterans Association in the United Kingdom know. Nor was there any effort to advise them, even though a small staff is employed within the External Affairs Department at the High Commission office in London to serve veterans and other Canadians. All I could find out when I visited and spoke to officials was that there was no evident responsibility, they claimed, or they did not have the budget, they claimed, to seek out Canadian veterans to advise them of changes in the legislation which might be to their benefit. As a matter of fact, when I met with them they did not even know what I was talking about.

As I concluded from discussions with High Commission officials, it became obvious that there never was much concern shown in the veterans affairs division of the High Commission office, or by either of the governments of Canada since the war, to honour our commitment to those Canadian veterans. This was the case despite the pleas made by various individuals from time to time until the Senate subcommittee took up their cause three years ago. As a result of this embarrassment to the government, the social worker from the High Commission office in London was brought to Canada for a six-week orientation regarding the legislation—proof that I was right.

As a result of the evidence from Mr. Mercer on the Simmonds' case, it became immediately apparent there may be others who were entitled not only to POW compensation but, more so, that there could be many others who may have been entitled to a disability pension and were not even aware of it. This proved to be the case, as honourable senators will readily observe as I continue my remarks.

It was decided that all those who were listed with the association, and for whom it and we were seeking the war veterans allowance, which the government still refuses to grant them, should be interviewed again to ascertain from their medical records their potential entitlement to benefits under the Pension Act. This, honourable senators, has been going on for over 23 months with more than satisfactory results, mainly through the cooperative efforts of the subcommittee and the CVAUK. The main reason for the delay in addressing my inquiry was to await for these results, allowing for matters to evolve to the benefit of our Canadian veterans and their dependents who were living for too long under destitute conditions to which they need not have been subjected.

I should clarify one inconsistency in the legislation, honourable senators, which came to light, and one which I find difficult to comprehend. I ask honourable senators to pay particular attention to note the hypocrisy of the legislation and its inconsistencies.

While the War Veterans Allowance Act restricts the entitlement to a veteran living in a foreign country through an outdated residence rule, namely, the requirement to return to Canada for 12 months in order to qualify, there is absolutely no restriction on residents as it relates to a prisoner of war or a disability pensioner. While all Canadian governments—and I emphasize the word "all"— have refused stubbornly, and still refuse, to recognize the right of those Canadians to a war veterans allowance, they recognize without question and without any restriction residence of a Canadian veteran who was entitled to a disability pension. This was despite the fact that so many were not aware of their rights, and nor was there any responsibility to advise them. More correctly, noone cared.

What is more bizarre, honourable senators, is the following example of an actual situation in the case of a Canadian veteran in the U.K. which I discovered as a result of an award of a disability pension for which he applied. One of the applicants, John H. Mackie, was informed by the Canadian Pension Commission that his disability had been assessed at 1 per cent, effective February 26, 1988. Since the assessment is less than 5 per cent, a monthly pension is not payable. Instead, the veteran receives a one-time single payment, in this case of $455.28.

Under the veterans' legislation, a 1 per cent disability pension, although seemingly insignificant, gives the veteran the right to apply for a war veterans allowance, which is usually granted on a means test and age eligibility. In this case, veteran Mackie would by all accounts qualify. Instead of getting the one-time payment of $455, he would be entitled to $1,315 per month, if married, or $866.19 a month if single, under the act. He would receive that every month, along with other related benefits, for the rest of his life. His wife would continue to receive the married rate for a year after his death, and then receive the single rate for the rest of her life.

The utter hypocrisy, then, is that veteran Mackie can receive the one-time payment of $455 for his 1 per cent disability pension without any restriction and without being subject to any tax, but his right to apply for a war veterans allowance is denied him unless he returns to Canada for a year. This is despite the fact that he might be unable to travel, or, even if he is able to travel, that he might have to swim because he cannot afford the fare in the first place because he is too poor.

As a result of the discovery that there could be many more Canadian disability pensioners in the U.K. who potentially are entitled to such benefit, Mr. Mercer and his colleagues have been seeking out these veterans and widows. They have submitted some 131 cases, either through the High Commission office in London or the Foreign Service Office of the Department of Veterans Affairs here in Ottawa. Some have been submitted to the Royal Canadian Legion. I have received copies of all cases so as to monitor their progress. This has been going on for the past many months.

As a result of the latest report I received from the Pension Commission, I am pleased to advise that some 43 claims from those veterans who could not qualify for a war veterans allowance have been approved for disability pensions, and payments are being made to veterans and/or their widows living in the U.K. amounting to over $250,000. These veterans, or their widows, will continue to receive monthly benefits for the rest of their lives, instead of the miserable £46 per week from the U.K. government under its social security system, and the little over £10 per week, just increased from £45, from the Canadian government under what is called the Needy Fund. Many more applications are in process.

• (1540)

Let me give just two or three examples of the awards made to some we found who had become entitled to a disability pension or widow's pension.

One widow is currently paid a 10 per cent single rate of pension of $147.78 monthly and a grade attendance allowance of $880.11 for a total of $1,027 monthly effective December 16, 1988, and, as well, was granted a retroactive allowance of over $2,000 in a lump sum.

Another widow is being paid $264 monthly with a retroactive award back to April 15, 1985 in the amount of over $9,000.

Another widow is deemed entitled to a full widow's pension of $1,108 monthly and she received a retroactive award totalling some $35,000. This particular lady was called by Percy Mercer and, when he told her, she was in such shock that she wondered if she could spend the money. As a matter of fact, she told Mr. Mercer that she had saved up enough money to buy a second-hand coat and said, "I guess now I will be able to buy a new one."

I referred to the Simmonds' case earlier and I am pleased to be able to report that last year on her 90th birthday Mrs. Simmonds asked me to thank Canada for what she termed a blessing in that she is now receiving $264 a month. She received a retroactive cheque amounting to almost $9,000, instead of the pittance she was receiving over the years. Her husband, William Simmonds, would be very proud that his wife has been awarded her just due, but perhaps he would be bitter that he was not recognized while he was alive for his years as a prisoner of war.

It is also sad, honourable senators, that, because of the utter complacency of the veterans affairs representatives at the High Commission, the husbands of these widows should have been and could have been in receipt of a pension, in most cases perhaps ever since the end of the war in which they fought some 45 years ago; and the widows should have been receiving their widow's portion since their husbands died and not the pittance they have been receiving from an uncooperative U.K. government. Just think of the amount of money Canada has been saving since 1945.

During my trip to the U.K. I visited some of these widows and veterans, and I can tell you, honourable senators, it was not a pleasant experience, other than to learn some lessons about Canada's commitment to its veterans and its relationship with the government of the country in which they chose to live, in this case our mother country—the country for whom those veterans fought—the United Kingdom. Great Britain and the United Kingdom government will not exempt war veterans allowance from income tax and our government uses that as an excuse not to repeal the restrictive clause. It even refuses to enter into a protocol agreement with the country for which these Canadian veterans sacrificed their lives. However, we have protocols with countries like Germany, which was our enemy; and many other countries exempt from tax war veterans allowance in reciprocal protocols.

To give Senators an idea of our generosity to allied veterans whereby we allow them to exempt tax on allowances, I place on the record the numbers we recognized as of January 4, 1991 and the countries involved. For example, we have Canadian war veteran recipients living abroad, and I will just run down a few of the figures. In the United States there are 49; in England and Scotland there are 103; in Wales there are 3; in Ireland there are 7; in Europe there are 1,349; in Australia there are 6; in New Zealand there are 3. There are also some in Indonesia, Israel, South Africa, Jamaica, St. Pierre and Miquelon, the Mediterranean and others unknown, for a total of 1,554. These statistics were prepared by the Departmental Statistical Unit in March 1990.

Here is a list of the veterans and the numbers of allied veterans living in Canada by district office. In the Atlantic regions there are 486 now receiving full war veterans allowance from Canada because they lived in Canada for ten years after they left their country. In the Quebec region there are 2,791; in the Ontario region there are 2,704; in the prairie region there are 490; in the Pacific region there are 907; for a total of 7,378. They have to reside in Canada for ten years and are then entitled to war veterans allowance. They can then leave and go wherever they want. The U.K. government will not recognize our Canadian veterans for that service.

It is comforting, honourable senators, that, as a result of the events which took place, the Department of Veterans Affairs is now expending every amount of energy and attention to process applications initiated through the channels I have described. It should be recorded that the pensions which accrued to those Canadians overseas came about through proper channels of the system and not through any appeal to government. As became obvious, this was the right decision.

One sad note in the exercise, however, despite the success we have had with many claims for pensions, is that many of the veterans or widows have died since the time they applied for the pension and before their awards reached them. It is difficult to describe this in better words than those of three of the many letters I received from members of the families. One said:

> I sincerely apologize for not letting you know of my mother's death. But I was given to understand Canada House in London would let you know as I sent them the death certificate.
> My mom died on 1st July 1990. Sorry for any inconvenience.

Can you imagine, honourable senators, she is sorry for any inconvenience she caused Canada. She enclosed the original death certificate and asked me to return it. That letter was signed by Mrs. G. McGill.

Another letter received in my office concerns a veterans widow, Mrs. Florence N. Morton, and it states:

> Thank you for your letter of 31 August regarding Canadian veterans entitlement to survivor benefits. It is with sadness that I have to inform you that my mother, Mrs. F. N. Morton, died on 16 July 1990. And therefore all your splendid efforts on her behalf are to no avail. She passed away peacefully and was, to her very last day, eternally grateful for the care and attention given her by the Canadian Veterans Association, she was so grateful for anything she received.

Another says:

> I have read your letter with interest and can only admire the splendid efforts your Association has made for veterans. It must be a great comfort to know their welfare is in such good hands.

Another states:

> I am sorry you were not informed at an earlier date of my mother's demise. I have written to at least three departments informing them of the date of death, and unfortunately, this information had not reached you.

Here is another:

> My grateful thanks to you and the Senate Committee for the efforts you have made on my late mother's behalf.

This letter was signed by Jennifer S. Butcher.

Honourable senators, may I take this opportunity to give full credit to a few senior officials in the Department of Veterans Affairs for their sympathetic cooperation in taking action to process the claims for pension. First and foremost to Mr. André Lemieux, the Chief Pensions Advocate for his immediate and decisive action by sending an advocate over to the U.K. to interview Canadian veterans and widows on the spot to avoid delays of long distance correspondence to seek supporting evidence from widows who would find it difficult to cope.

In this regard, one of the advocates, Mr. Walter Mutz, spent 10 days in London with Mr. Mercer and interviewed some 32 cases which allowed for speedier processing. Also to the former Chairman of the Canadian Pension Commission, Major General John Wolfe, who, as the decisions and awards I have referred to have shown, directed the most serious concern and speed in dealing with the claims and was considering other positive action to process claims through the commission, that of sending a team of commissioners to England to process the cases on the spot for speedier action and in order to ensure that these aged veterans and/or their widows received their just and overdue recognition to allow them to enjoy some comfort in their few remaining years. Just imagine what would have happened if they had done this 40 or 50 years ago. Unfortunately, General Wolfe recently retired, but I am sure we will receive the same service from the acting chairman, Mr. Murray McFarlane. I also extend gratitude to the pensions advocate, Mr. Walter Mutz, who is deserving of the highest praise for his tireless efforts in processing most of the claims for pensions, to his colleagues in the foreign district office, and to Mrs. Doris Boulet, for keeping my office apprised of the awards on a regular basis. She is in Charlottetown.

If I may be so bold, I would like to relate to honourable senators a portion of a presentation made to the subcommittee by the chief of the Bureau of Pensions Advocates during our fact-finding mission to DVA headquarters in Charlottetown last March. I quote from the brief of Mr. Lemieux:

> The bureau has been involved with the Canadian Veterans' Association of the United Kingdom since February 1988. To date, our District Office in Ottawa, which handles all Out-of-Canada claims, has created 131 files. Many of these cases were brought to our attention by your chairman. Indeed, it is a matter of record that your Committee has a long-standing interest in the plight of these Canadian veterans and/or their dependents. I know that your Chairman . . . communicates regularly with Mr. Percy Mercer and is well aware of the Bureau's involvement with both Mr. Mercer and Mr. Greenhalgh of the Canadian High Commission.
> As a point of fact, it was at the insistence of your Chairman that arrangements were made for Mr. Walter Mutz, one of the Pensions Advocates in our Ottawa District Office, to travel to England in January 1989 for the purpose of meeting or contacting Canadian veterans or their widows. In his words, "The trip went very well and was worthwhile". Thirty-two files resulted from his visit. Plus an additional 35 files have been opened since.
> You might be interested to know that today 67 First Applications have been submitted to the Canadian Pension Commission; 43 of same have resulted in favourable decisions; 22 have met with rejection. Our rate of success: 66 %. With respect to the balance, 10 have been withdrawn and the others are pending submission.

These are Canadian veterans who went overseas, who could not get a job there and who eventually came home. They found that the job they had before the war was no longer waiting for them, so they went back to England with their wives, and many of them just did not do very well. Some of them, of course, have done very well. One of them is the national secretary of the CVAUK, who is doing all this legwork. He is a successful businessman in England.

Honourable senators, while we can take some satisfaction from what we have achieved in regard to those who have now received disability pensions, regrettably we are as yet unsuccessful in the fact that Canada still refuses to recognize those veterans in the UK now referred to as "needy". Despite the procrastination of government, I have been able to receive sympathetic support from many of the veterans groups I have addressed over the past two years here in Canada because, fortunately, they have listened. Branch No.297 of the Royal Canadian Legion in Cornwall has in the past three years sent over 2,000 pounds sterling each year to help these needy veterans. Branches of the legion in Chalk River, Perth, Deep River, Petawawa and Smiths Falls have also contributed in kind, and they are due thanks from the committee and from the Senate. The unsung heroes in the United Kingdom who have been providing funds to those veterans are the members of the Canadian Women's Club under the present chairperson, Mrs. G.N. Sellers, and they have devoted most of the time of their club to finding funds to be able to provide a little comfort to those destitute veterans from Canada.

It is true that just recently, on August 17, 1990, the Minister of Veterans Affairs announced that the British Department of Health and Social Security has raised the amount that Canada is allowed to pay to needy Canadian veterans in the UK before these payments begin to affect their monthly National Assistance Benefits. The maximum has gone from 21 pounds sterling to 43 pounds sterling per month. However, even this increase leaves these needy veterans in poverty and barely able to exist, veterans who might have been receiving decent pensions over the decades.

It is beyond comprehension to try to reason why a government, regardless of political stripe, can be so generous in some aspects to some veterans and yet so blatantly mean as to ignore the few hundred who chose to reside in a country other than Canada. I would hate to think that it is because these people over there do not vote for anyone in Canada, but I can only conclude in my suspicious mind that that is so.

Let me review now some of the appeals to recognize these Canadians that have been made to governments over the years, just to emphasize how long it has been going on. Back in 1951, some 40 years ago, the Royal Canadian Legion, in one of its first meetings with government, stated as one of its priorities, "that War Veterans Allowance Benefits be extended to Canadian veterans living outside Canada." Leaping ahead to 1974, when I was an MP, I was asked by the Honourable Robert Stanfield to prepare a policy paper on Veterans Affairs. One of the listed commitments read, "we would extend full benefits to Canadian veterans living abroad". I shall not comment as to whether or not we would have extended those benefits, because here we are, 16 years later, without that commitment being fulfilled by either party. Again, in November 1984, the Senate subcommittee, chaired by Senator Lorne Bonnell, recommended in its report "They Served: We Care", "that the residence requirement of the WVA and Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act be amended to permit qualified persons to benefit from the legislation while residing outside Canada." It is interesting to note that out of the seven recommendations we made, six were implemented. Is it not strange that this one was not?

This is the argument I get from the department to justify their inaction: DVA claims that even if we repealed the section of the act that demands that the veteran return to Canada for 12 months and granted their War Veterans Allowance, the UK government would tax most of it back. Yet, from my discussions while in the UK with veterans who came back to Canada for a year and who are in receipt of the WVA, they contend that they are better off by some $500 per month. No one has proved to me that I am wrong, and I challenge anyone to do so. The department admits that they would be some 20 per cent ahead, and to me that is justification enough to pay them WVA. They have no right to deny them that percentage, however small.

Let me place on the record some of the repeated promises of government made by ministers of the department over the years. Let us go back to September 10, 1984 to find what was said by the Honourable George Hees:

> I cannot see a strong case being made to extend income maintenance provisions of Canada's social assistance, of which WVA is a part, to individuals who elected to remain in another country and want to apply for a Canadian benefit such as WVA.
> There are no plans at the present time to amend WVA with respect to the eligibility requirement for veterans residing abroad.

Now let us move ahead two months to November 22 to a letter Mr. Hees wrote to the CVAUK:

> . . . you can rest assured that both I and the officials of my department are giving serious consideration to relaxing this requirement even further and will be doing so . . . if it is at all possible bearing in mind the current economic state.

If my memory serves me right, all we heard in those days was how strong the economy was. Was that not an election year?

The most striking comment by Mr. Hees is this remark he made around the same time while visiting the UK:

> The need to go back to Canada is nonsense. After all . . . if they were able to go back the money would be provided . . . it would have to be provided if they were able to come back, but they cannot because they are too sick. They are too aged and they are too infirm to return.

● (1600)

Yet, since the act was amended to introduce the restriction in 1960, not one effort was made to repeal the clause in the act which, in simple terms, says that in order for a Canadian veteran who chose to reside in, or return to, another country following cessation of both World Wars and the Korean Conflict, to receive War Veterans Allowance, he/she must return and fulfil a 365 day residency requirement in Canada to qualify. That is absolutely and utterly ridiculous at this time when they are so old.

Honourable senators, I have asked time and again for ministers to use their discretionary powers to grant a compassionate award to override the meanness of the U.K. government, but to no avail. They say that it cannot be done. Honourable senators, I know that it can be done. I know that it has been done and it could be done again. It has been done within the last few years, and I refer to a memorandum from the then Minister of Veterans Affairs and place on the record an extract which says, in part:

> Over and above the legal considerations involved, I have to be concerned about the human dimension of these cases and the fact that their resolution has dragged on an unconscionably long time. Moreover we are far from certain that this period would not extend further. Consequently, I believe that the only sensible course of action is to put the cases that have been held pending into pay immediately, and, therefore, I felt it appropriate to give you this as a ministerial directive.

So it can be done. I understand that this ministerial directive cost many thousands of dollars, and I say "bravo" to that minister; but why could not he or his predecessor or his successor do the same for destitute overseas veterans? They can. I can only ask the question: What about the incontrovertible right of Canadian veterans who chose, as a right, to live in a country other than Canada? That is their choice under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which says that every citizen of Canada has the right to enter, remain in and leave Canada. It also says that every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to equal protection and equal benefit of the law.

Let me put on the record another contradiction. I refer to a Veterans Affairs backgrounder dated February 1988. I highlight only a couple of segments from a five-page document, and I quote from this backgrounder published by the department:

> Prior to 1960, all veterans who chose to live outside Canada forfeited any rights to the allowance.

I say that is complete and utter discrimination and a denial of human rights. This is a statement made by the Canadian government referring to veterans who, as young men and women, answered our government's call and, without question, volunteered their lives not only to fight for their chosen country, Canada, but also for their mother country, England, which refuses still to exempt them from income tax despite the fact that we do when it concerns U.K. veterans who chose to live in Canada. Canada tells them they forfeited their rights. I say the government has, up until now, broken faith.

We should wonder what the recruiting officer said to those young Canadians back in 1939 and 1914 when they joined. I can just imagine them saying, "Yes, my good man, you can offer your lives for your country, and if you are lucky enough to come out of battle alive, you have no right to go and live wherever you choose. You had better go back to Canada or you will not get any benefits." These are benefits to which Sir Robert Borden committed himself before Vimy Ridge. He promised all Canadian troops that no man, whether he died on the battlefield or came back to Canada, would have cause to say that Canada did not fulfil its commitment to all veterans of the Canadian forces.

Another contradiction and supposition is that these veterans decided to live or remain in a foreign country. This is not so, as I found out, and as the government neglected to find out. The majority of these Canadians returned to Canada after the war, in a good number of cases with war brides, but they found to their dismay that the jobs which they had left prior to going overseas were gone, or that they just could not get them back or could not find another job. So many decided to return to the U.K., for example, where they made contacts through the families of their wives, through friends or in other legitimate ways.

Finally, honourable senators, I am reminded that on Tuesday, November 20, the Minister of Veterans Affairs appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology to discuss Bill C-87—and Senator Marsden will, I am sure, recall this—an Act to amend the statute law in relation to war veterans. In his introductory remarks, the minister explained that the bill would improve wording and correct archaic, outdated and paternalistic approaches to the way we sometimes do things, or have done them in the past. That was the minister himself. The bill amended 14 pieces of legislation and 64 clauses in the act. I asked the question: Would it not have been a simple deed to have added one more simple clause, number 65, to amend another archaic clause in the War Veterans Allowance Act which denies Canadian veterans their right to eligibility to all veterans benefits because they chose to live outside the country they served, a country which, when called upon, they volunteered to defend?

So, honourable senators, as we rejoice that our young Canadian men and women are returning from the Persian Gulf without loss of life or casualty, we should recall that we still have Canadian veterans from World War I, from World War II and from the Korean War who are still not recognized for the benefits they deserve and to which they have a right. Thank you, honourable senators.

THE OTTAWA SENATORS

NEW NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE FRANCHISE

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard rose pursuant to notice of Friday December 21, 1990:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the granting of a National Hockey League franchise to the City of Ottawa and in particular to the fact that, unfortunately, promoters and supporters did not feel it was necessary to give a French name, or at least a bilingual name, to the hockey team The Ottawa Senators.

Honourable senators, I will be brief, just the time to withdraw this Order.

So, honourable senators, I am pleased to rise on the notice of inquiry I gave on December 21, 1990, when I called the attention of the Senate to the creation of a new National Hockey League club in Ottawa in a year and a half from now, which takes us to the fall of 1992.

This notice of inquiry provided me with the opportunity to congratulate Mr. Finestone and his team as well as Terrace Investments on obtaining the preliminary approval of a National Hockey League franchise.

In my opinion, having a National Hockey League team in Ottawa will not only increase the visibility of the National Capital Region abroad, but it will make a substantial and long-lasting contribution to the economy of the region. The investment required just to house the new club and accomodate supporters and visitors is already a major one.

Incidentally, while we support this worthwhile project, Mr. Finestone's group and Terrace Investments will get a chance to deliver the merchandise with no governmental assistance.

Greater numbers of visitors in the region and more frequent visits will produce interesting financial benefits. Remember that such benefits could have been directed to another city or even outside of Canada.

All the more reason to applaud to the decision of the National Hockey League.

So, I will gladly reiterate my congratulations on a job well done and assure the new team of my support.

Honourable senators, my main reason for bringing up this issue was to encourage this group which, I hope, will reflect the linguistic duality of Canada in its daily operations, as well as in its marketing and through its personnel selection.

Honourable senators, because a large proportion of supporters of the new hockey club are francophones and this club will be representing the National capital of an officially bilingual country, I hope that the concerns I expressed in December and which were shared by many can be overcome and that the Ottawa Senators will be known as the Ottawa Senators-Sénateurs d'Ottawa.

I therefore urge the owners of the club to reflect in their organization and in marketing this new sports product the bilingual vocation of the National Capital Region.

My office contacted the management of the team. I also contacted journalists concerned with this issue. I have reasons to believe at this time that my prayers will be answered.

This new club of the most prestigious hockey league in the world, the National Hockey League, will be a constant reminder of the linguistic duality of Canada.

In closing, I want to wish the best of luck to the Ottawa Senators-Sénateurs d'Ottawa.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

AUTHORIZED COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON FEDERAL SUPPORT PROGRAMS FOR AGRICULTURAL PRODUCERS

Hon. E. W. Barootes, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, March 5, 1991, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be authorized to examine and report upon federal government support programs for the agricultural producers of Canada; and

That the Committee present its Report no later than May 2, 1991.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. H.A. Olson: Is the chairman not going to say a word or two about why this is so urgent? Perhaps he does not need to.

Senator Barootes: Do you wish me to say a few words?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): They might wish to change their minds.

Senator Barootes: Did my deputy leader say yes or no?

Senator Doody: I said that they might change their minds once you explained it to them.

Senator Barootes: I will have to talk my way out of it.

Senator Frith: Senator Olson may decide to support you after all!

Senator Barootes: That would be nice, because I do enjoy the support of my friends opposite, and perhaps I can convince some of my own people of the importance of this.

As senators are aware, the Department of Agriculture has launched with considerable fanfare two programs to assist grain farmers and producers in the west. The first program is the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan or GRIP, and the other is the Net Income Stabilization Account, NISA. Moreover, this last Friday and Saturday, Ministers of Agriculture met in Regina and discussed what they called a third line of support or attack for immediate monetary assistance before the seeding season. There have literally been tens of meetings—30 in our province alone—with respect to these two programs in order to provide farmers with explanations of the details and how they would apply to individual farmers in various areas.

The shortcoming of what has been going on, senators, is that unfortunately no definitive information has been elicited to fully satisfy some of our farm folk; that is to say, on what date are eligible producers to apply, what is the deadline and detail about the breakdown of fiscal responsibility between federal and provincial governments and the producer with respect to insurance and other programs. That is what we would like to elicit from our Minister of Agriculture and from the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds. It is to that extent that our committee in the Senate would like to undertake this study. My understanding is that the ministers involved would be pleased to appear before the committee in order to allow us to extract from them as much definitive, up-to-date information as possible, not only for our own benefit but for the benefactors of these programs out west. Thank you.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I want to support everything Senator Barootes said—

Senator Barootes: Where did I go wrong!

Senator Olson: —about the deficits in information that has not only been provided to us but to the producers who will be participating in these programs. The date of May 2 is fine because we will be able to study a lot of other things, but I hope that when the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds appear before the committee, we will be able to get the rest of the information from them because the farmers or producers have to know in advance what the programs are going to cost them and what the insurance premiums are going to be. It is clear that that information has not yet been made available.

• (1620)

Honourable senators, there are some very serious problems in this regard, because March 31 is probably the deadline, or at least it has been the deadline, for signing up for this insurance program. There is good reason for that and I do not argue that point. However, in this case, a signatory signs on for five years, not for one year at a time like the Crop Insurance Program; a person must wait three years before he can get out of this program and he must then wait another two-year period if he decides to sign up for the program again. The longer term commitment and the higher financial commitment involved in this is a very serious management consideration for all of the producers who will be involved.

Therefore, I would completely support Senator Barootes, and I would hope that this motion is passed today. We would then have authority to ask both ministers to appear before us to give us the complete information that is required.

Honourable senators, I would add just a word of caution: It will not be good enough to ask senior bureaucrats for this information, because, no matter how good they are, if the government has not made up its mind to the point where they have signed or can sign a detailed agreement with the provinces as to what the shares are going to be, how much will be paid by the federal government and how much will be paid by the provincial government—and if the producers do not know what their share of the program is going to be—they will not be able to help us. If there is a problem with respect to the government's share and the producers' share, then we must act quickly. There may be a dispute among the actuaries who are doing the calculations of what would be an appropriate insurance premium. I would suggest, honourable senators, that we should hear from the two ministers, or at least one of them who can speak with some authority. If they are still hung up in some negotiation with the provinces, then the producers ought to know that, because we are running out of time.

I thank honourable senators for their patience and would hope they will support Senator Barootes' motion.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON ANNUAL REPORT OF DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY, 1990

Hon. E. W. Barootes, pursuant to notice of March 5, 1991, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be authorized to examine and report upon the Annual Report of the Department of Forestry for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1990, tabled in the Senate on 26th February, 1991 (Sessional Paper No. 342-984), and other matters relating to federal jurisdiction in the Canadian forestry industry; and
> That the Committee present its Report no later than December 19, 1991.

He said: Honourable senators, I feel embarrassed to rise again in this hallowed chamber, but I would move this particular motion standing in my name.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

THE HONOURABLE CHARLES TURNER

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to take note of the fact that the Honourable Charles Robert Turner will terminate his career in the Senate on March 24 of this year because of the constitutional provision requiring retirement at age 75. I understand that this may be the last appropriate day to pay tribute to Senator Turner while he is present and able to take his seat in the Senate.

As many of us know, for many years Senator Turner has been a political institution in his native city of London, Ontario. It was not his city of birth, that was Toronto, but London became the place where Senator Turner became not only a political institution but he became identified with all of the varied interests of that active city. When he was a member of parliament, and undoubtedly since then, Senator Turner usually spent his weekends in his native city, in his constituency, and he always reported to us on the results of his active weekend visiting all the clubs and associations to which he not only belonged but of which he was a friend. Charlie was, if I may say, a real joiner. He was not only a member as a trainman and as a CNR engineer, he was a member of the United Transportation Union and a past member of the Brotherhood of Engineers. In addition, he belonged to the London East Optimist Club, the World Federalist Parliamentary Association, the Canadian Parliamentary Association, the Canadian Club of London, the City of London Press Club, the Irish Benevolent Society, the Railway Fuel and Operating Officers Association, the Independent Order of Oddfellows, the Loyal Order of the Moose, the Independent Order of Foresters, and the London Liberal Association.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: When Senator Turner entered the House of Commons he had already spent 27 years in the service of the CNR, where he was an active member of the union. He was first elected in the general election of 1968, subsequently winning re-election in four consecutive general elections: 1972, 1974, 1979, and 1980. He served as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour and to the Minister of Public Works, Science and Technology. However, he made his real mark in the House of Commons—and it was a significant mark—as Chief Government Whip, to which post he was appointed in 1980, a post he held until his retirement in 1984. Subsequent to his retirement from the House of Commons, he was named to the Senate on July 9, 1984.

Early in his parliamentary career he was nicknamed "Choo-Choo Charlie" by Prime Minister Trudeau—an allusion to his years as a railway engineer and his capacity for hard work. Throughout his political career, Senator Turner has been attentive to the concerns of his constituents. As I mentioned already, the weekend for him was not a time of rest and relaxation; he customarily travelled to London during the weekend with his wife Marjorie, and his work as a constituency person became legendary.

There was one notable exception to Senator Turner's regular routine, and that was the interruption during the bell-ringing episode in the House of Commons which lasted for 15 days.

Senator Turner, as Chief Government Whip, did not leave Parliament Hill for 15 days. He slept within shouting distance of the chamber of the House of Commons for 15 nights. I think he slept part of the time in the government lobby.

Upon his retirement as MP for London East, Prime Minister Trudeau paid Charlie a fitting tribute when he said that "it can truly be said that he helped to give politics a good name." The proof, according to the then Prime Minister, was that "after four years as the government whip, Charles Turner remained one of the best liked and most respected of our politicians."

I had the occasion to work quite closely with Charlie as whip in the House of Commons. He understood what the line of command meant. When he received the directions that he sought, he followed them out meticulously; and when he gave directions, or when he gave orders as chief government whip, he expected them to be carried out meticulously. He never wavered in his determination that discipline, good order and loyalty should be the practice of Liberal members of the House of Commons.

During those four years, Charlie's weekly summation and weekly exhortations at the caucus were certainly highlights for all of us. He was a splendid person to work with, and he carried that same attitude of teamwork and collegiality to the Senate.

After having spent so many years as a trainman, it is interesting that he should have been translated into a parliamentarian and that he became as well-liked as a parliamentarian as he was as a union member and as a trainman. The transition was easy for Charlie because those qualities that made him effective in his pre-parliamentary career were still at his disposal when he entered Parliament.

It is a big day for Senator Turner, because being in Parliament and being associated with members of the House of Commons and the Senate has been a great, precious and valued experience for him. He has enjoyed it and appreciated it. It is also a big day because he is separating himself from all those wonderful experiences.

I regret Charlie's departure. He has been everything one would want as a friend and a colleague. He has been a source of strength on all occasions. If I may be forgiven, I should like to read a letter that I received. I have not asked his permission, but it is a handwritten letter that Charlie wrote to me in December. It is a bit political, but most of you are accustomed to political comments.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): We have six independents!

• (1410)

Senator MacEachen: It does encapsulate Charlie's attitude. He said:

> Dear Allan,
>
> As I move to the end of my political career, I must say that today, December 13, 1990, I was very proud to be associated with you, Senator Frith and Senator Corbin and all my Liberal senator friends. Proud to be a Liberal. Proud of the way we have stood up for the little guy and all Canadians.
> This will be a day I will never forget. Let us all fight on.

Charlie, I was moved by that letter, because I knew it was heartfelt, and I will treasure it as one of the expressions of comradeship that comes in politics and which could never have come from a more treasured colleague than yourself.

Honourable senators, I am sure that Senator Turner carries with him today the gratitude that we all share for his service and contribution, and we extend our best wishes for his future life and career in London.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have never until today admitted to Senator Turner that on two occasions in my adult life I put in several years in the ranks of management of Canadian National Railways. So I had heard a great deal about Senator Turner long before I ever had the pleasure of meeting him personally.

In Parliament, in the House of Commons and in the Senate, he has been an authentic voice of the working people of Canada, especially the trade unionists of Canada and in particular the employees of the Railway Workers of Canada. Senator MacEachen has referred to his work as Chief Government Whip in the other place. All of us understand what a pivotal position the whip holds in our parliamentary system. He must have the total confidence, both of the leadership, of the caucus and of the backbench, and it is a great tribute to his own personality, talents and integrity, and the respect in which he has been held by his own party, that he held the position of Chief Government Whip for so long under sometimes trying circumstances in the other place. I may also say that under our system, the whip has also to enjoy the respect and esteem of members on the other side of the house, and this, it is generally agreed, Charlie Turner did during all the days that he served in Parliament.

He was one of two or three who were named here officially by his namesake, Prime Minister Turner, in 1984, and in this place he has remained an active and eloquent voice for what he calls the "little people," particularly the working people of this country.

Honourable senators, on behalf of the government and of my colleagues on this side, I am very pleased to pay tribute to Senator Turner's long, constructive and excellent service to his country and to Parliament, and to wish him well on the occasion of his retirement from this place.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to endorse and associate myself—incorporate by reference, I suppose, could be the expression—everything that was said by Senator MacEachen and Senator Murray about Charlie Turner.

I want only to add a couple of very personal dimensions about Charlie. The first one is that I believe I knew Charlie Turner before we knew that we knew each other. That is because when I was a student I spent several summers working on a signal gang installing a block signal system on a double track between London and Sarnia. The division actually started at a wonderful little station that had only room to stand in. It was about the size of a phone booth. I think it was called Lobo. The switch went from there to the Glencoe subdivision and down toward Chatham.

To me, engineers were great beings in those days. I was a young guy digging trenches to bury cable and climbing telephone poles to string it, as well as doing various other things. I say they were great beings because they went by in those marvellous old iron horses. Charlie was what in the business was called a hogger, for engineers are called hoggers.

I do not think I have ever before corrected my colleague Senator MacEachen, and I will probably never do so again. However, Charlie was never a trainman. A trainman is a very specific definition of a person in a crew. Charlie was the hogger. I am sure many was the time that I stood looking up in awe at the person who was running this marvellous big wheezing giant locomotive.

Although we never acknowledged it at the time, we have since realized that we had a common friend in the person of E.L. Baker who was the signal superintendent and who worked out of London, where, of course, Charlie also worked.

My next experience with Charlie was when he was the candidate in London East in the 1970s, and I was campaign chairman for Ontario. Charlie, when looking over all the ridings for the strong spots, the soft spots and the medium spots, saw there was no question where London East stood. I am sure this is something that Senator Atkins has done many times. There was no reason why London East stood there. I suspect there were times when I said, "Forget about London East, Charlie will win it." Senator Atkins may have said the same thing occasionally, although probably from a different point of view.

I learned a lot from Charlie. In my opinion, Charlie Turner was the perfect constituency man for the reasons partly outlined by Senator MacEachen. He was well known, he was beloved, he paid attention to his work. As Senator MacEachen said, he went back to his constituency every weekend. Every Saturday of his life he was at some event in the constituency. He was a perfect one-man Gallup poll as to what was going on. Any of you have been with him—and I see many honourable senators nodding—will remember that. He would come back and say, "This is what they are saying in London." Sometimes we had to wait for Mr. Gallup to confirm what Charlie said was true. If you could not wait for Gallup, you could always count on Charlie.

He had great respect as a union man and as a railroader. He has great respect as a politician, and as a citizen. He is a uniquely great Canadian. There will never be another Charlie Turner. He himself defines what he is and what is great about his Canadianism.

● (1420)

There is a Yiddish word that explains Charlie Turner. I know Senator Barootes, Senator Nurgitz and Senator Buckwold speak Yiddish almost as well as I do, and they will know what this word means: Charlie Turner is a mensch.

Hon. Thomas H. Lefebvre: Honourable senators, someone once asked me how I would describe my colleague and friend the Honourable Senator Charles Turner. I said, "You would have to say I knew him as the former member of the House of Commons for London from 1968 to 1984, elected and re-elected five times, in good times and very tough times for the Liberal Party. It was a personal victory on many of those occasions."

I knew him as a railroader. Some of us also knew him as a musician, and I will let him elaborate on that when he speaks. In his young days he was well known in Northern Ontario and Quebec as a professional musician.

He is also known as a gentleman, a father, a grandfather, and companion to his loving wife Marjorie for 51 years.

These are some of the highlights of a life filled with hard work and much happiness.

Charles Turner has been my good friend for more than 20 years. We worked together on many occasions both in this chamber and in the House of Commons down the hall. I have always said, if you ever wanted to have as a friend someone who is modest, self-effacing, honest, steadfast, and having much integrity, then you could never do any better than having Charles Turner as that friend and I am happy that he was mine.

One of the most intense periods in which both of us were implicated in our respective jobs was our stint in opposition when I happened to be Chief Opposition Whip and Charlie was the Chief Deputy Whip. He could be counted on day and night to do anything required to help make our jobs easier, but, more importantly, to keep Parliament controlled and operating. It is during such times that the qualities and values of a person become more and more evident. After the 1980 general election, as mentioned by Senator MacEachen, Charles Turner became the Chief Government Whip, and continued his great work while enhancing his already excellent personal reputation.

[Translation]

Speaking also on behalf of my wife Lea, I want to say how proud and honoured we are to have Marjory and Charles Turner as our friends.

When I first set foot in Parliament as a junior member, in 1965, one of the more senior members told me the following about politics: It isn't easy to become a politician; it is hard work; critics can be merciless; you put in long hours; and the problems you have to deal with become increasingly numerous and complex. But above all: never give up.

I agree with every word, but we should not forget there are very few professions that provide this opportunity to work in an environment that is so highly charged both emotionally and intellectually, and at the same time gives parliamentarians a chance to get involved in very complex and very important issues that that are vital to the well-being of our fellow citizens.

Those are the circumstances in which we meet people who become both colleagues and friends. I am very glad that in the course of my career as a politician and parliamentarian, I had this opportunity to enjoy the friendship of a man of great integrity and dedication, my friend, Senator Charles Turner.

[English]

When one becomes a parliamentarian, one's horizons are immediately widened. The people we meet come from every profession, trade, ethnic and cultural background and from every corner of this vast country. These individuals have their own characteristics and qualities. My life has been enriched by meeting, working and making friends with all of these persons. One whome I will always cherish as a friend is the Honourable Charles Turner, an outstanding former member of the House of Commons and a gentleman senator.

Charlie, you have earned your excellent reputation. I wish Marjorie and you many years of happy retirement in health and in peace. Best wishes from all the members of my family.

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, I was elected to the House of Commons in 1968 at the same time as Charles Turner. I have been thinking over the past days about what sort of address I would make on the occasion of his departure. I have come to the conclusion that there would be no better testimony to his merit and hard work as a politician over these last few decades than to quote from his own speeches, speeches he made in the House of Commons and these he made here in the Senate, speeches that were full of the hard-won experience and sound common sense which he always exhibited. I have perused some of his first speeches in the Commons, and I have come up with, I think, a number of worthwhile quotations. I may take a little more time than I normally do in these matters, but I feel it is important to remind ourselves of the will that propelled this member of the House of Commons and Senate from London. His first speech in the House of Commons was made on October 25, 1968. He was speaking to an amendment to the Criminal Code to permit peaceful picketing. He said:

> It is true there will always be areas of conflict. It is for this reason we have collective bargaining. However, there is no sense conducting bargaining in an atmosphere of hostility. Management and labour must learn to live together and to communicate.

He said further on:

> In my 25 years of experience with the collective bargaining process, I have found that union members turn to the picket line only as a last resort, and after the majority of the members have voted in favour of strike action in a democratic manner by secret ballot.

He continued by saying:

> Our society expects a man to marry, rent or buy a home, bring children into this world and clothe and educate them; he is also expected to buy all the things that are displayed in stores and supermarkets, buy a car, take a yearly vacation—even on a buy now and pay later basis—contribute to the church and community efforts, as well as pay federal, provincial and municipal taxes. All this adds up to one thing, Mr. Speaker: money or the weekly pay cheque . . .
>
> The working people of this country, Mr. Speaker, take great pride in being good Canadians, and we must not forget that unions and picket lines have helped immensely in the creation and building of this great nation, so that all Canadians may enjoy a better way of life.

● (1430)

In another speech, on the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, he said:

> It is time we introduced laws in this country that would stop companies laying off employees when they feel like pulling up stakes and moving to other parts of the country or closing down entirely. These laws should apply from coast to coast and they should be federal laws. When a company has been established in any part of Canada for many years, the management of that company has a responsibility to the community in which it is located.

On March 6, 1972, Charlie Turner spoke on a bill to finance Canadian National Railways and Air Canada. Goodness knows how many speeches he made in the House about those two institutions and how many interventions he made in committees, but he always spoke from the heart; he spoke from experience and with the interest of the little guy in mind. He concluded that particular speech by saying:

> The workers of all companies in Canada are entitled to a decent pension at an earlier age. They should not be thrown out of work without adequate pensions that are tied to the cost of living. I urge the railways and all industries to update their pension plans and meet the personal needs of employees and retired employees in a fast changing society.

[Senator Corbin.]

In the ensuing years, Charlie Turner continued to serve in the House of Commons until 1984 when he was called to the Senate. Yet he never forgot his background, his vocation in life, and he kept on speaking from personal and sometimes private experience. To illustrate what I say, I will quote for you a brief passage from a speech he made on December 20, 1985, when we were studying the Financial Institutions Depositors Compensation Bill. He said:

> Honourable senators, over 60 years ago, my parents lost their savings in the Home Bank bankruptcy in Toronto. My mother, who was an orphan, on the advice of her banker and her lawyer—who happened to be a Conservative—invested the liquid assets of the estate of her mother and father. My father, who was a little immigrant boy, came to this country, worked hard and saved a few dollars, met a lady and decided to get married, and lost his savings. This was shortly after they had married and bought a house. Honourable senators, what a way to start out in the Canadian way of life. This is the "just society", and we are again experiencing that today.

He said, in concluding his remarks:

> Honourable senators, I take no risk in my investments. I use common sense and, therefore, I am opposed to supporting Bill C-79, which does not cover all the citizens who made investments in both banks, but instead bails out a favoured few of the uninsured depositors.

He made yet another speech, on February 5, 1986, on the Family Allowance Act. It was an unusually long speech for Senator Turner, of course full of common sense, and again he told everyone where his heart lay. He said:

> Therefore, the loss will be experienced by poor families. This is not redistribution. In 1986, more than $16 million will be withheld from families living below the poverty line. To me, as a working guy, this is a disgrace.
> Honourable senators, in my opinion, the answer is, yes, we are our brother's and our sister's keeper. Therefore, as one who has watched the families of my former riding grow up, and knowing what financial problems they have endured during their children's growing-up period, I can only suggest that Bill C-70 be referred back to committee . . .

So there you have Charlie Turner, in words, speaking from the heart and from tough experience.

Charlie, as Vice-Chairman of the Senate Liberal Caucus, you will be missed tremendously. Your departure will create a vacuum, and you will be extremely difficult to replace. I would like to extend to you, to your wife Marjorie, to your children and your grandchildren my very best wishes.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, so many warm and wonderful words have been said about Senator Charlie Turner this afternoon that one might think there is nothing further to be said; but I am going to say it, anyway, because I am so fond of him and we are such good friends.

I want to begin by thanking Charlie for what he has contributed to our country in the 23 years he has served in both Houses of Parliament, what he has contributed to the people of London, Ontario, whom he has represented on Parliament Hill since 1968, and what he has contributed to the Liberal Party, which he has supported with a lifetime of loyalty, candour and honour. I also want to say a personal "thanks for the memories Charlie," of a close working relationship which we have shared on Parliament Hill for such a long time.

As Senator MacEachen said earlier, former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau hit the nail on the head when he paid tribute to Charlie at a testimonial dinner in London in 1984. He said that Charlie helped give politics a good name, and he went on to note that he has remained one of the best liked and most respected of our politicians. Honourable senators, I believe those words are even more appropriate today, because, in the intervening seven years, Charlie has contributed with dedication and excellence to the work of the Senate.

Senators may know, or at least suspect, that Charlie has a soft spot in his heart for Senator MacEachen. He also has another long-standing soft spot in that big heart for Pierre Trudeau. Before becoming a candidate in 1968, Charlie had already laid the groundwork for the kind of respect and affection that has marked his relationship ever since with Mr. Trudeau, whom he simply referred to as "the boss." Mr. Trudeau referred back to Charlie as "Choo-choo" in somewhat irreverent recognition of his 27 years as a locomotive engineer for the CNR. If I might digress, all of us know of Charlie's association with the railroad, but some may not be aware that he earned his living for five years as a young man as a professional musician. He played with bands in Quebec and Ontario. He played at Standish Hall over in Hull, and he also played with Johnny Lombardi's band in Toronto. So he is definitely a man of many talents.

To return to 1968, when Mr. Trudeau was running as a candidate for the Liberal leadership, Charlie was the president of the London East Liberal Constituency Association. He received word from an organizer that Mr. Trudeau would be in the region looking for support and that Charlie and his riding delegates could come and meet him in Guelph. "No way," said Charlie, "If he wants to meet me and the boys he should come right here to London." Three weeks later candidate Trudeau was in London expressing his appreciation to Charlie for his frankness, and they became fast friends. This is a small example of the straightforward and down-to-earth attitude that Charlie carried with him throughout his political life as a self-styled representative and spokesperson for the ordinary individual or, as he puts it, the little guy.

Charlie always talks about "guys," even when he means "persons." It is a habit that neither Senator Lorna Marsden nor myself have persuaded him to break, but we know very well what he means. He means fairness and justice and equality for all Canadians, female and male, of whatever age, colour, race, religion or political affiliation. He means an extra bit of fairness for those who are poor and disadvantaged and lack or miss the opportunities from which Charlie and all of us have been able to benefit. As he has said so often himself, "It is the little guy that makes the world go round. The big guy is nobody if he doesn't have the little guy to do the work."

Most of us are familiar with Charlie's work on Parliament Hill starting with the five consecutive election victories he had in London in good times and bad. In the House of Commons he served, appropriately, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour and then later with his old friend, the late Bud Drury, when he was the Minister of Public Works and Science and Technology.

As Senator Corbin has noted, by going through some of Charlie's speeches over the years, he always spoke out for the less fortunate and the working person. He talked about transportation and safety. He talked about unemployment insurance, workers' rights, portable pensions and pensions for veterans. He talked about pollution in Lake Erie back in the late 1960s long before the environment had become a popular and fashionable political issue.

Charlie was also a House of Commons person and he worked for part of his career there assisting the Speaker as Deputy Chairman of Committees of the whole house.

It is said that his ambitions in life were to be, first, a railway engineer, and he did that; second, a politician, and he did that; and third, a policeman. I think he took particular pride in being made an honourary member of the protective staff on Parliament Hill in 1983, therefore managing to achieve his third ambition as well.

It was as Chief Government Whip in the House of Commons that Charlie really hit full stride from 1980 to 1984. He was just terrific. For years he had helped members of the caucus and their staff in any way he could to keep the team working. He helped members from all parties find their way in the parliamentary system. He listened to their troubles and to their joys. He was generous with his time and with his friendship. He was loyal, he was fair and he was tough. The combination of all those qualities made him a very special whip.

One of my greatest memories of working with Charlie when I was associated with Mr. Trudeau was during the historic bell-ringing episode of March, 1982. Senators will recall that the then Conservative opposition in the House of Commons refused to come in for a vote for two weeks in their effort to force the government to split its omnibus energy bill. All this was taking place in the middle of very controversial constitutional discussions. As whip, Charlie really was the captain of our ship. He brought a cot into the government lobby and he literally lived there day and night to maintain a presence for the government. We all worried about his health, but Charlie said he figured that only through that example could he ask other members to come in and share the load, and he was absolutely right. It was a magnificent performance of determination, and the experience made Charlie invaluable to our Senate Liberal caucus as we worked our way through the many weeks, and indeed months, of opposition to the goods and services tax last fall.

● (1450)

All of his responsibilities in Ottawa over the years have never kept him away from his duties in London. His constituency work was, and has continued in his years as a senator, to be legendary. At one point in 1979 it was said that in 11 years he had missed only four weekends of returning to his riding in London while Parliament was sitting. Charlie, honourable senators, did not whip back and forth, to and from London by plane. He drove that distance every weekend, because, where Charlie went, his wife Marjorie went as well. She has been his greatest source of support and advice since they were married 51 years ago. She was also one of his best organizers. In addition to his amazing ability to attend every conceivable function in the riding, Marjorie has always been on the other end of the telephone, a constant link with anyone who had an idea, who had a complaint, or who had a need. Charlie drove back and forth all of those years because there were not equal travel points for spouses—indeed, for many years there were hardly any points at all—and the two Turners have always travelled as a team.

Honourable colleagues, the senator from London is, indeed, quite a guy, and I will miss him sorely. I am tremendously sad to see him retire, although he assures me that he will keep active in politics and volunteer work with the charities and all the people who have come to count on him for so long.

Over the years, Charlie has always greeted me with a gruff but cheerful question: "Joyce, are we winning or losing?" If he were to ask me that question today, my answer would be that the Senate is losing a very fine representative and friend; but the democratic process is always winning when a person like Charlie Turner dedicates his life and abilities to its service.

Charlie, may you and Marjorie have many more happy and active years back in London, with time spent with your family, particularly your grandson, Mike, who has been such an important part of your life. Remember always that you have another houseful of friends to come back to and visit here in the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, during the 16 years I served in the House of Commons with Charlie Turner, there were very few members of Parliament for the province of Ontario who survived throughout the whole period. During those years I saw David Lewis, the leader of the NDP in Ontario, defeated, and I saw ministers of the cabinet defeated. One of the very few people who survived for 16 years as a member of the House of Commons for the province of Ontario, was the member from London East, Charlie Turner.

I remember, in 1972 and 1979, that running as a Liberal in Ontario was no easy venture, but Charlie Turner survived. I sometimes wonder why, during those 16 years, Charlie Turner had such success in the province of Ontario while others did not. Other speakers have paid tribute to the values that Charlie Turner held dear. Honourable senators, Charlie Turner represents the ordinary people of this country. There is no doubt that that has played a great part in the support and confidence his constituents have extended him.

Honourable senators, as a representative of French-speaking Canada, I would like to pay a personal tribute to Charlie Turner. During the 16 years he was a member of Parliament we witnessed significant improvements towards making both linguistic groups feel comfortable in this country. At that time I saw people pressuring the government to slow down the pace of linguistic reform, arguing that English-speaking Canadians would resent the speed at which policies were being implemented. Charlie Turner, however, would have nothing to do with applying that sort of pressure. I would like to tell Senator Turner that, as a member from the province of Quebec, I always admired his courage, his decency and fought for his beliefs.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, as a colleague who had the privilege of being elected at the same time as Senator Charlie Turner, I would like to take this opportunity to join the other senators and especially Senator MacEachen, Senator Murray, Senator Fairbairn, in expressing my great respect for the values he has embodied and the courage he has shown in the course of performing his duties here in Parliament, and I wish to offer him my best wishes for a long and happy retirement.

[English]

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I also wish to associate myself with the previous speakers in expressing my deep appreciation and respect for Senator Charlie Turner. Having worked on the railroad myself almost every summer holiday for Canadian pacific and for whom my dad worked for 45 years—I was very glad to hear about his experiences at CNR. Above all, I appreciate his defence of the men and women who work for our railway companies in this country.

Throughout the years we served together in the House of Commons and here in this chamber I have admired Senator Turner's courage admonishing us when we forgot to look after, as Senator Fairbairn called them, "the poor guys"—the really poor and disadvantaged people in our country. I also wish to thank him for his wise advice and for his support, both here in this chamber and in the other place. I consider him one of my political mentors.

● (1500)

Many of you probably do not know, nor has it been stated, that Charlie Turner also took time out to meet with his constituents who were of other than English and French origin. Many times he stuck out his neck to help the immigrants and the refugees who chose to settle in that beautiful, serene and prosperous city of London. In particular, the Polish Canadian Community of London is indebted to Senator Charlie Turner for his assistance, compassion, and the understanding he has shown to their problems.

I also want to thank Senator Turner personally for his hospitality and support whenever I, as a minister, visited London to spread the good news of the federal government's policy of multiculturalism.

This afternoon I join other honourable senators in expressing to our colleague, Senator Charlie Turner, our thanks for the services he has rendered to our country and our people, in this chamber and in the House of Commons. I wish him, his wife and family, much health and happiness.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I, too, wish to join in the tributes being accorded my old pal, Charlie Turner. Charlie is probably getting anxious about the many good things that are being said about him, and he probably wants to respond to them; so I will not take up too much of your time.

I first got to know Charlie as a friend and colleague back in 1968. We served there together between 1968 and 1979 and worked together in many ways, on committees and so on, on behalf of the Liberal Party.

During all that time the one thing I always appreciated was that Charlie and his wife Marjorie were good friends. We had many conversations concerning matters of the day, about government and politics. I could always count on Charlie for good friendship and good advice.

The tributes that have been paid to him today have been many. I know him as a good, honest, decent and hard-working man who has served the people of this country extremely well. I will miss him as a friend around this place. I will also miss the friendship of his wife Marjorie. I wish them both good health, much happiness, and many happy years together.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have never worked on a railway and I have never been an MP, but I have had the great pleasure and privilege of being Senator Turner's seatmate for the last few years. It has been both a great pleasure and a great privilege.

This afternoon we have heard, from so many who have been friends of my seatmate for many years, that Parliament is losing a very experienced member with all the accumulated wisdom that he has gathered during those years. The Liberal benches are certainly losing a stalwart and one of our important sources of commonsense and advice.

The people of Ontario, and in particular the people of London, have had every phone call, letter and visit responded to on every question asked, from citizens as individuals to businesses, schools, universities and hospitals. As I have sat here I have seen those answers go out by the hour. Nothing gets left behind. It is most impressive. We have learned a great deal from that.

To Senator Turner I say it has been a great experience to be your seatmate. I feel as though I have made a strong friend and have learned a lot about life and politics. We have not quite got through all the details of your life story yet. We need you here a few more years, and that would be very enjoyable indeed.

You have changed my mind on many things, and you have certainly added a great deal to what I know and what I think. I will always appreciate that.

We are losing you from this chamber, but we are not losing you from our lives, and certainly not from our thoughts. On behalf of this corner, I am asked by my colleagues around here to express to you, to Marjorie, to your grandson, Michael—whom we all feel that we know—and to all the members of your family, our best wishes for a great deal of health and happiness. We hope to see you here often.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, this will be a hard act to follow. Honourable senators and friends, thank you for your touching remarks. I shall treasure them as the finale to my political career—a career that has been long and rewarding.

It has been many years since, as a boy at the age of 13, I found my political leanings. Yes, even at that age I knew where I stood—despite my father's conservatism.

Scolded by a Tory candidate in Toronto after seeking information on the history of the Tory Party for a current events school essay, I marched down the street to Liberal campaign headquarters and to a receptive welcome.

Not only did I receive my sought-after information, but I was also introduced to the Maple Leaf hockey stars of the day: the famous "Kid line" right winger, "Charlie" Conacher; left winger, Harvey "Busher" Jackson; centre "Joe" Primeau; and the great defenceman, the "Big Train", Lionel Conacher, who later became a member of the House of Commons. What a great day for a kid who thought he knew them by listening to the Foster Hewitt radio broadcasts on my crystal radio set in my bedroom.

I can look back on the past and say that I owe much of my success to the man at the Liberal Party campaign headquarters. He helped me out and he also asked me to be a volunteer worker. So, I say to all my senator friends: Reach out your hand to help the youth of today, because you never know what the future holds for that particular person. As the years roll by that youth may grow up to be a candidate of your political party.

Yes, senators, it was a great day, and the beginning of my life-long passion with politics. After writing the school essay and receiving a mark of 98, I marched back down to the Liberal Party headquarters and began working on the 1930 provincial election campaign. That is 61 years ago! It is no wonder I feel that I am growing older each day. But I have never looked back as I progressed through the political ranks.

• (1510)

I have met very many interesting people, many that I have read about in the magazines and newspapers of this great land. In the "dirty thirties", my Dad requested me to go with him to the great Toronto election meetings, where I met personally the Right Honourable Mackenzie King and the Right Honourable R.B. Bennett at the election rallies in Toronto's Massey Hall.

During my career as a railway passenger engineer and fireman, I have pulled the private cars of the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent from Toronto to Windsor; the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker from Chatham to London to Hamilton; the Right Honourable Mike Pearson from Toronto to London. Upon arrival at the station, every one of those great Canadians took the time to walk up to the engine to shake hands with and to thank the crew personally for a good ride and to wish them well in their future endeavours. To me, that is the mark of true and dedicated political leaders, who will always be remembered in the history books of this great land.

When I decided to run in the 1968 federal election campaign, I was ready. I had been schooled and trained in every part and parcel of an election campaign. The general elections of 1968, 1972, 1974, 1979 and 1980 were the precursor of my joining honourable senators in July 1984.

We have been through some momentous times in the past two decades and I am proud to have been part of the team, with my former bosses, with Pierre Elliott Trudeau, John Turner, Jean Chrétien, Allan J. MacEachen, Royce Frith, Eymard Corbin, our caucus chairman. My seat-mate, Lorna Marsden, Professor of Sociology, adopted me as her oldest student by far. She tried to teach me the finer points of economics and politics, but I must admit that she did not have much to work with. They are all distinguished people, distinguished people all, and I have been privileged and proud to serve with them and with all of you. Together we have been part of the history of this land: The energy debate in the House of Commons, the bell-ringing for 14 days, 22 hours and 11 minutes, when the deputy whips, Ralph Ferguson, M.P. for Lambton-Kent, René Cousineau, M.P. for Gatineau and myself, were on duty 24-hours a day and therefore slept in the Liberal lobby of the House of Commons. Then, of course, the GST debate, the abortion bill, the drug bill C-22, the Benson fiscal reform, and free trade and the defeat of the Joe Clark government.

At times it has been a heady experience for a former railway engineer, but I must admit how much I enjoyed being a member of the House of Commons and of the Senate Transportation committee when I could grill my former railway bosses. I must also admit that I was really tough on them. Now it is time for me to be shunted off into the siding, out of this house and away from the people who have meant so much to me over the years.

In leaving, I am reminded of the two short blasts of the locomotive communicating signal that would tell me, a passenger locomotive engineer, it is time to pull out of the station and proceed to make my final run into the land of retirement. The only thing missing is the banner on the front of the locomotive.

As a former member of Parliament for 16 years, and a member of this house since July 1984, it is now my turn to move on, but, before I do, I would like to thank all honourable senators, members of Parliament, the pages, the security staff, both inside and out, the Black Rod, the Sergeant-at-Arms, the table officers, Senate Debates and Hansard reporters, the cafeteria and restaurant employees, nurses, bus drivers, messengers, secretaries, custodians, the elevator operators in the Victoria Building, the Post Office employees for both houses—in fact, all the employees of this great building—for all their many courtesies. You have all treated me with kindness, efficiency and courtesy.

I thank also my long-time friends, Senator Thomas Lefebvre and his wife, Léatrice. Tom was the person who willed me the job of Chief Government Whip so that I could accumulate a lot of grey hair. However, I must say that his help and advice kept me on the straight and narrow path and out of trouble.

My thanks are due also to my good friend, Senator Joyce Fairbairn, and her husband Mike Gillan. She was my "Dorothy Dix", "Ann Landers", "Dear Abby" all wrapped up in one, my trusted confidante, and the one to whom I took all my troubles. I thank her for her very special way of supporting me at all times. We were in many wars and battles together. She will always be remembered by my wife, Marjorie, and we wish her all the best in the years ahead. In our eyes she was a very special person and a helpmate.

As you all know, the political life affects families. I come from a closely-knit family. Therefore they were all in the game. I am grateful to them and to all my railroad buddies for their loyalty to me, their patience and their strength; and to my wife Marjorie, who stood behind me at all times and gave me the strength to carry on when the going was tough, and who has been my best friend and has tolerated politics for my sake. On February 7, 1991, we celebrated our 51st wedding anniversary. She has been my wife and house secretary in a first-class manner, taking all the phone calls, answering all the doorbell house calls, and giving my constituents first class service, especially during election campaigns when I was occupied elsewhere.

My two daughters, Charmain and Gloria, would travel from their homes in Toronto and Burlington to work on Saturdays during my election campaigns. To my son-in-law, Al, who worked very hard on my first election, to my three grandsons, Mike, Mark and Terry, all attending university, I offer my thanks and my fondest and deepest appreciation. I look forward to having more time with them than I have had so far, to show how much I appreciate them.

Thanks to my former secretary and assistant, Mrs. Frances Chisholm, and Mildred Maloney, for their dedication, loyalty and hard work. They and all of you have helped me live a full and rewarding life as a senator, Chief Government Whip, Parliamentary Secretary, Assistant Deputy Speaker and MP during the past 22 years and 9 months. To all who have pushed me up the ladder of success, I will always be grateful, and I sincerely hope that I have not let you down.

I thank the people of London-East and all the Londoners who sent me to Parliament to represent them in five elections with good majorities. I thank the London-East Riding Association for their confidence in me. I feel a deep identification with my people and their families and their hopes for this great country, a great land. It is the greatest honour to hold office in Parliament and the Senate.

I sincerely hope that we have helped solve the many problems of the people of London and the area, so that life could be a little easier for those great Canadians. Now I am back to London, Ontario, the city which has been so good to me. In my retirement years I hope to give something back to my community by becoming more heavily involved in charitable causes and fund-raising for the hospitals of the area.

As I go about my new life, I shall think of you all often. To slightly paraphrase Keats:

> I can scarcely bid you goodbye, even in a speech.I have always made an awkward bow. Good luck and God bless you all . . .

And I will see you all in heaven. Thank you very much.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Frith, I have a number of petitions to present. If I give the short title of the petition it would cover it all. The petition is addressed to the Honourable the Senate of Canada, and states, "We refuse the dictatorship of the GST." It is from Ontario and contains 14 signatures.

The next one is from Manitoba and contains approximately 420 signatures.

[Translation]

I have another petition from the province of Quebec, where people object to the new federal goods and services tax introduced by the Conservative government. This petition is from the Victoriaville area. I have another one with signatures from Alberta.

[English]

I also have a number of petitions which say "No" to the GST. Each one of these sheets of paper I have in my hand is a petition in itself. Some are dated the month of March, 1991, while others are dated February, 1991. Some are in English—

[Translation]

Some of these petitions are in French and were sent from various regions in Canada.

[English]

Honourable senators, the other day I presented here in the Senate a petition against the GST. For some reason it came back to my office with a card marked "Urgent" on it. I will present it again in case it was not validly done the other day.

This petition is from the southern region of New Brunswick, containing signatures from the areas of Grand Bay, Saint John, Fredericton, Westfield, Back Bay, the Fundy Islands, and others.

I also have other petitions containing the names of hundreds of people who oppose the implementation of the GST. They, too, are from areas such as Saint John, Grand Bay, Pocologan, Rothesay, Welsford, and others.

I have another petition from the Upper Saint John River Valley, from the areas of Stickney, Mount Pleasant, Hartland and Peel. It also contains the names of residents from the Bathurst area.

[Translation]

I have some petitions signed by Canadian citizens, mostly from the Montreal area. I have four full pages.

[English]

I also have petitions opposing the national Goods and Services Tax from the areas of Woodstock, Saint John-Westfield, Hampden and Douglas, New Brunswick.

For today, the final petition covers a number of localities, such as Sackville, Nova Scotia and Sackville, Fredericton and St. Maurice, New Brunswick.

That is it for today, honourable senators. I am sorry I do not have more right now.

NATO NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY AND EURO-ATLANTIC ROUND TABLE

MEETING OF ECONOMIC, SCIENTIFIC AND TECHNICAL COMMITTEES AND DISCUSSION ON EUROPEAN SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, March 12, 1991, I will call the attention of the Senate to the participation and contribution of honourable senators in meetings of the Economic and Scientific & Technical Committees of the NATO North Atlantic Assembly, held in Paris, on February 11, and Brussels, on February 12 and 13, and in the Euro-Atlantic Round Table discussions on European Security and Co-operation held in Berlin, on February 14 and 15, 1991.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is the time when the adjournment motion is usually moved. I will do that in just a moment. If I may take the time of the Senate for just one minute, I should like to give honourable senators a rundown on what the status is and where we are currently.

As honourable senators are aware, we had talked about a Royal Assent today in anticipation of getting back from the House of Commons Bill C-79, the amendment to the Parliament of Canada Act. It appears that members there have run into some sort of a problem and the bill will not be back today. Because that was really the only important bill that we had for today's Royal Assent, it is probably better to defer Royal Assent until we return from our brief adjournment. At that time we can deal with that bill, with Bill C-34 and with any other bills we might receive.

Having said that, I suggest that we adjourn today until two o'clock on Monday, March 25. That, of course, presupposes that we get the Bretton Woods bill, Bill C-93, into committee today. I do not think there is a problem with that. We have had an assurance to that effect.

There are three financial bills in the other place which may be coming to us within the next several weeks. There is the borrowing bill, and also Supplementary Estimates (C), which is not in the other place but is now here in committee. There was a meeting on it already today, and I understand that another meeting, or more meetings, will be held before the magic date of March 31. That bill does not present a problem. I understand that the interim supply bill should not present a problem either. We will deal with that when we return on March 25. As far as I understand, everything is in order concerning the borrowing bill. The Estimates have been tabled, as has the government's spending plan. The Budget has been brought down, and so on. I assume that we can deal with that very quickly.

It may be helpful, if any senator has any problems with that, to come back during the week of March 19 to deal with the borrowing bill. I hope that will not be necessary, but it may be. If so, we will certainly call the Senate back for that purpose.

Honourable senators, having said that, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday, March 25, 1991, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE BUDGET, 1991

CUTS TO GRANTS AND CONTRIBUTIONS—COMPOSITION OF REVIEW COMMITTEE

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In the Budget Speech, it was announced that the Honourable Harvey Andre would be chairing a committee that was reviewing the cuts to grants and contributions.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us what the composition of that committee will be, when it is expected to begin and end its work, and whether there will be a report to Parliament listing the reasons behind the committee's recommendations?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): In answer to the latter part of the question, honourable senators, I am reasonably confident that the answer is yes, the Minister would be reporting to Parliament the decision to have him and a committee review these matters as announced in the Budget Speech of the Minister of Finance. My recollection is that he is working within a six-week timeframe. I cannot say, because I do not know, who the other members of the committee are. I assure the honourable senator I am not one of them.

SOLICITOR GENERAL

CANCELLATION OF CONFERENCE SPONSORED BY LIFERS GROUP AT JOYCEVILLE PENITENTIARY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few observations with respect to the response I received yesterday from the government to my question about the cancellation of the offender management conference that was to be held at Joyceville Institution with the focus on long-term sentences. I am particularly impressed that the former Solicitor General and our colleague, Senator Kelleher, is with us today. I assure you, senator, things have been getting worse since you left that department and this latest fiasco is another indication of just how bad things are getting in his former department.

Senator Kelleher: Do I take that as a compliment?

Senator Hastings: I am going to comment on the answers which were really not answers at all. I had asked the Minister to share his concerns and exactly who were the individuals concerned on which he had based his decision. We received a response to neither but four paragraphs of correctional rhetoric to justify or excuse the Minister's decision. He sort of wandered into the area of some unknown concern by the general public and then alluded to the concern expressed by the Victims of Violence, an organization dedicated to harassment and tormenting offenders while they are in custody. I asked the question, had he conferred veto authority with respect to correctional programs on the Victims of Violence? One can only assume from his response, and from the response of the Government Leader in the Senate, that the answer is yes.

The Minister responded to me by saying:

> Many correctional initiatives depend on community support both for implementation and for ongoing success. To this extent, corrections must move very cautiously and can not alienate those whose help and support is essential.

We must agree with that observation, especially when he refers to "those whose help and support is essential." I think the Minister might have given consideration to the support this conference had received from the wardens and staff of the institution. He might have given consideration to the inmates themselves whose help and support are needed to make these events successful.

May I place on record the view of the staff of Joyceville Institution with respect to the Joyceville Lifers Group. I have a letter from the Assistant Warden Correctional Programs, Mr. Lou Kelly, who states:

> I would like to take this opportunity to recognize and applaud the contribution of the Joyceville Lifers Group on the opening of the Oakwood Day Care Centre.
>
> Quite clearly, the Joyceville Lifers Group is establishing a very positive image in both the institution and the community. Congratulations.
>
> Sincerely,
> Lou Kelly.

That is the view of the staff of that institution with respect to the work of William MacAllister, co-chairman; John Hipolite, co-chairman; and Gary Foshay, the secretary of the organization. I suggest to the minister that he might have given consideration to their support which was needed, as well as that army of volunteers who dedicate themselves to working in the institutions, and certainly not the Victims of Violence whose total contribution and effort seems to be the persecution of the inmate or the offender while he is in custody.

I will not burden honourable senators with a list of those who have supported this very worthwhile conference, including the chairman of the Justice Committee of the other place, the honourable member for Mississauga, Bob Horner, who said it was a good idea. From all across the corrections community there has been nothing but support and criticism of the minister for his decision to cancel and seek solace in a task force which is the refuge of every cabinet minister in trouble. So we have a task force, which is a logical step and I commend the government for that, or at least I commend the Commissioner of Corrections for it. It is the only logical step toward recognizing the importance of providing offenders with programs to help them meet their individual needs and with a view to increasing their potential for integration back into society.

Honourable senators, the problem is even more acute when one considers the number of inmates in this category. At the present time there are 3,670 inmates, or 28 per cent of the total population of 13,203, serving sentences over 10 years; 2,049 are serving a life or indefinite sentence, and 600 are eligible for a judicial review after serving 15 years. That number, and the projected increase in the number of inmates required to serve long-term sentences in the coming years, certainly puts increased emphasize on the Correctional Service of Canada to adapt to this reality so that it may accomplish in a more efficient manner its mission in society.

I would ask the minister and honourable senators why and what on earth will be the use of a task force that is going to examine this area and bring forth logical worthwhile reforms for developing an inmate's responsibility to the management of his own sentence, personalized programs, the development of programs adaptable to the needs of the inmate in serving long-term sentences? What is the logic in advocating the creation of lifers' clubs within the institutions to undertake these programs and support and assist in these programs? What is the use of the taskforce, if, in the end, the minister, with one whisper, one criticism, one small word from the Victims of Violence, drops his responsibility and runs for his office—his "chicken coop office," as the Whig Standard in Kingston called it, drops a "chicken feed" press release, and runs for cover instead of assuming his responsibility? I want to assure the minister that I intend to follow this taskforce and recommendations which are now in the discussion stage; and the lifers and all the people I have indicated who are supporting this conference will be prepared in the future to play their part. We can only hope there will be a new minister fulfilling that responsibility.

CENTENNIAL FLAME RESEARCH AWARD BILL

MOTION FOR THIRD READING

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella, for Senator Doody, moved the third reading of Bill C-258, respecting the establishment of the Centennial Flame Research Award to publicize the contributions to Canadian public life of persons with disabilities.

He said: Honourable senators, in putting this motion, I would like to point out that, as you learned from the report of the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee, Patrick Boyer, who initiated the private member's bill, appeared before us. His presentation was very helpful to all honourable senators who participated in that committee meeting. The project is an excellent one, the idea of using the fund accumulated from coins thrown in the Centennial Flame in front of the Parliament Buildings for promotion and understanding of issues affecting Canadians with disabilities. Mr. Boyer indicated at the meeting that there were some difficulties with the bill, but he was hopeful that we would be able to go forward with it and avoid amendments. So the report from the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee was without amendment.

Mr. Boyer wrote to Dr. Bruce Halliday, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and Status of Disabled Persons of the other place to point out some of the matters relating to the bill that came up before the Senate committee. I think it would be helpful to read some of those points into the record because they establish the fact that Mr. Boyer recognizes a few areas of deficiency. Mr. Boyer wrote:

> Several amendments were considered, with which I have full sympathy, but the Senators decided not to propose these amendments since they might ultimately cause the whole Bill to be lost, given the fact the House of Commons would have to then again pass the Bill as amended, which is quite problematic given the House Order Paper and the pending prorogation.
> In lieu of amendments at this time, I did give my personal commitment to the Senators on the Committee that I would do my utmost to ensure that their concerns were reflected in the operation of the Centennial Flame

Research Award, which is my purpose in writing to you at this time. As you know, Bill C-258 provides that the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, which you Chair, will play an important role regarding the Centennial Flame Research Award.

Previously we have discussed the importance of the Committee drawing up some simple procedural rules and criteria to govern its operations for this purpose.

I would like to suggest that, when the Bill is fully enacted and receives Royal Assent, and your Committee proceeds to commit to writing these simple procedural rules, the following three points be incorporated:

1) Wherever appropriate and possible, all references should be to "The Parliament of Canada" or "The Senate and House of Commons" rather than simply "The House of Commons";

2) At the time the research study is presented by the award recipient each year, it be made available simultaneously to $%both$% Houses of Parliament; and

3) Elaborating upon the meaning of section 6 of the Bill (copy attached) it should be clarified that the funds for the award shall consist of all money collected from the Centennial Flame itself, and monies received as donations which may be paid directly into a Centennial Flame Research Award Account by donors and benefactors who wish to contribute to the money being raised without such funds literally taking the form of coins tossed into the fountain.

Honourable senators, with those points on the record, I move that the bill be read a third time.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have no problem with this bill, and I fully concur with the objective and the aim that this legislation is trying to achieve, which is to award a sum of money to a disabled person so that that person may write a report on the contribution of disabled persons to society. It is a meritorious objective and my colleagues and I support it.

However, there are a few anomalies in the bill that I would like to bring to your attention and on which I would like to propose an amendment. The amendment that I propose to put forward provides for the greater participation of the Senate in the administration of the act. The present bill is strictly a House of Commons bill, notwithstanding the fact that the Centennial Flame where the monies are collected is on Parliament Hill and that Parliament is made up of both houses, the House of Commons and the Senate. The amendments will provide statutory authority for the acceptance of donations to the Centennial Flame Research Award Fund over and above any money collected from the Centennial Flame on Parliament Hill. It will also make certain other technical changes to the bill that are consequential to the first changes that I have just described.

In providing for greater participation of the Senate in the administration of the act, the definition of "committee" will be amended to refer to the committees of both houses that normally deal with matters relating to the status of disabled persons. The two committees that would act as administrators of the research award fund could make whatever arrangements between them as are necessary to carry out the roles of administrators. They could, for instance, appoint certain members of each committee to work together in respect of the administration of the act. The amendment does not create a joint committee, which would make it difficult in the other place to pass amendments. It simply makes both committees responsible for the administration of the act and allows for more flexibility and how the committees will carry out the task of seeing that the awards are granted each year to worthy candidates. There are a few other technical changes in the wording that improve but do not change the substance of the bill as passed by the House of Commons.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Senator Bosa: Therefore, honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Hébert:

That Bill C-258 be not now read a third time but that it be amended to provide for the participation of the Senate in the administration of the Centennial Flame Research Award, to extend to Canadians who are unable to visit the Centennial Flame on Parliament Hill the opportunity to contribute to that Award and to make provision for other matters incidental or ancillary to the objectives of the Bill:

(a) by striking out the definition "Committee" on page 1 and substituting the following:

""Committee" means those committees of the Senate and the House of Commons established to deal with matters relating to the status of disabled persons, acting as administrators of the fund established under section 3;";

(b) by striking out lines 1 to 9 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"Fund established

3.(1) There is hereby established a fund to be known as the Centennial Flame Research Award Fund into which shall be paid, in each fiscal year,

(a) all money collected from the Centennial Flame monument on Parliament Hill in Ottawa, and

(b) any money otherwise received as a donation to the Centennial Flame Research Award Fund.

Payments out of fund

(2) Following an approved application for an award under this Act in the second or any subsequent fiscal year of the fund, there shall be paid from the fund an award for the purpose set out in section 4.

Purpose of award

4. The purpose of the Centennial Flame Research Award Fund is to provide awards of money to enable disabled persons to conduct research and prepare reports on the contributions of one or more disabled persons to the public life of Canada or the activities of Parliament.";

(c) by striking out lines 17 to 21 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"recipient who qualifies under subsection (1) and meets such other criteria as the Committee considers appropriate and the Speakers of the Senate and the House of Commons approve." ;

(d) by striking out lines 22 to 33 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"Administration

6. The Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons shall supervise the collection of money for the Centennial Flame Research Award Fund and, subject to this Act and to such regulations as the Board may make in that behalf, may take any measures necessary for carrying out the purposes of this Act." ;

(e) by striking out line 35 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons approve a recom-" ; and

(f) by striking out line 41 on page 2 and substituting the following:

"both Houses of Parliament."

I may add, honourable senators, that this is a non-partisan bill. It was adopted unanimously in the other place. I cannot see anyone in the Senate objecting to the improvement of this bill by including our chamber as an integral part of this program. When this bill is sent back to the other place, I do not foresee that the members there will have any objections to adopting our amendments.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Bosa, seconded by the honourable Senator Hébert, that Bill C-258 be not now read a third time but—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion in amendment concurred in.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Kinsella, seconded by the honourable Senator Sylvain, that this bill, as amended, be read the third time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

BRETTON WOODS AND RELATED AGREEMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), for the second reading of Bill C-93, An Act to amend the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable Senators, I do not intend to take a lot of time speaking to the second reading of this bill. Its objectives are well known. Its principal objective is to increase the capital subscriptions of the fund which was undertaken seven years ago. The increase is now required in the light of the growth in world trade, the expansion of capital flows and because of the still unsolved and daunting problem of international debt.

The purpose of the increase in the capital subscription is to strengthen the fund to meet its additional responsibilities and to maintain it as an integral part of the smooth operation of the international financial system. We support that. It is a good thing and we have no difficulty whatsoever with it.

There is another provision in the bill which is new, and that is to increase the sanction against a country that is in arrears in its payments. I think that, at the present time, if discipline is to be taken against a country in default, the discipline is extreme because it involves the expulsion of the country from the fund. There is a less onerous but nevertheless strong penalty put in under which a country in arrears might lose its voting rights in the fund.

Honourable senators, both the Parliamentary Secretary in the House of Commons, and Senator Doody in the Senate, in introducing the second reading of the bill, underlined the importance of the International Monetary Fund in the resolution of current international indebtedness. We all know that the indebtedness of certain countries in the world is, to say the least, very severe. It was the subject matter of an intensive study by the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which submitted its report with a number of recommendations in 1987.

● (1600)

Senator Doody referred to innovative measures that have been undertaken by the fund and forecast even greater coordination between the World Bank and the fund in the resolution of the international debt problem. I want to underline that, while we support the bill, its examination in committee will give us an opportunity to delve more fully into what has happened with the international debt problem since 1987 when the Senate committee submitted its report. Has the situation become better or worse? At the present time, what are the prospects for resolving the international debt problem?

The Senate committee made some recommendations, and it would be interesting to find out to what extent the International Monetary Fund and the international community have responded to these recommendations, and to what extent improved coordination has taken place between the IMF and the World Bank. We would like to look at some of those problems in committee. We would like to know whether the so-called structural adjustment has worked in the developing countries since 1987.

We know that one of the conditions imposed by the International Monetary Fund, as it extends financial assistance to developing countries and other countries, is to exact changes in the economic policies and sometimes in the industrial policies of the developing countries. That series of policy changes recommended by the International Monetary Fund is sometimes referred to as "structural adjustment." What kind of structural adjustment has taken place in the developing countries since 1987?

In following up, one might want to find out to what extent the pronounced increase in Canada's international indebtedness has had on the international debt problem throughout the world. It is known to all that Canada is financing an increasing amount of the current deficit through borrowing abroad. That is a new trend in Canadian international finance. We are financing current consumption through borrowing abroad. Historically we have financed capital investment through borrowing abroad and used the increased productivity and the earnings of that capital investment to retire the debt and to pay interest payments. It is quite a different case now in Canada. Senator Doody raised another aspect which is the role that the International Monetary Fund might have in assisting the new situation in Eastern Europe. A number of Eastern European countries have asked to join the fund and would like financial assistance. It will be interesting to explore that in the committee.

The consideration of Bill C-93 in committee would also provide an opportunity of obtaining up-to-date information on a number of proposals for handling international indebtedness put forward since the Senate report of 1987, such as President Mitterrand's proposal to the Toronto Economic Summit in June 1988, the Japanese Minister of Finance's plan of the summer of 1988 and, of course, the March 1989 Brady plan. It would be of interest to look at debt reduction mechanisms such as buy-backs, swaps, debt exchanges, exit bonds and at the operation of the IMF's structural adjustment facility, which was set up in December 1987.

The parliamentary secretary to the minister, introducing the bill in the House of Commons, made reference to the innovative policies of the IMF. He said that a clear example of that innovation was a decision to use IMF resources and those of the World Bank to permit developing countries to buy back a portion of their commercial debt at a discount on the secondary market, thus reducing their overall debt burden. He also said that the proposed increase in IMF quotas would create scope for similar innovation in response to future needs. Honourable senators, it would be of interest to know whether the buy-back of the debt in the secondary market is of much significance. It may be innovative and useful, but is it a significant solution or is it merely a drop in the bucket, as some might suggest?

Honourable senators, I am mentioning these items so that officials, whom we expect to appear before the committee, will pay attention to our interest in this matter. Regrettably, the last time the Foreign Affairs committee tried to get thoughtful responses from officials on these matters, the effort was not particularly successful. I believe the officials failed to understand that the Foreign Affairs Committee had thoroughly examined the debt question, and a number of the members of the committee had developed considerable knowledge on the matter. The responses of the officials were at a level that did not take into account the effort that had been made to develop an understanding of this problem. So it would be my hope that when the bill goes to committee, officials would take our request for information more seriously than was the case the last time we asked for such help.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform you that if Senator Doody speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have little to add. I simply want to thank Senator MacEachen for his comments, and, at the appropriate time, I will refer the bill to the appropriate committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if there are no objections, I would ask that all remaining orders stand, along with all inquiries and motions No. 1 and No. 2.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE LATE MADAME PAULINE VANIER, P.C.

TRIBUTE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): It is my painful duty to inform you that the Hon. Pauline Vanier, a member of the Privy Council of Canada, passed away last Saturday, at the venerable age of 92.

Madame Vanier, wife of the late Georges Vanier, who was Governor General of Canada from 1959 to 1967, earned the respect of all in her own right.

After losing her husband in 1967, she gave away most of her belongings and devoted herself to the mentally handicapped, working at l'Arche, the establishment founded by her son Jean near Paris.

Always concerned for the welfare of the needy, she had made tremendous efforts in France after the war to help the victims of the war. For her accomplishments, the French government awarded her the Jacques-Cartier medal. She continued her work when she came back to Montreal with her husband in 1953.

All her life, Madame Vanier was very unassuming, gracious and generous toward those who were treated harshly by life.

Madame Vanier gave much more than she ever received.

Mother of five, her family was always foremost in her mind and she appreciated the pressures the modern family is subjected to. However, considered that the young people are much brighter today than they were in her days because they are calling the institutions into question. That is but one example of the open-mindedness of this great lady.

Allow me, on behalf of the government and of my colleagues on this side, to offer my sincere condolences to the members of this great Canadian family.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Murray has outlined the illustrious career of Madame Vanier and why her passing has elicited such comment in the country, particularly as it relates to her selfless service in the many causes which she served so unstintingly, some of which were mentioned by the Leader of the Government.

Honourable senators, all I can do is associate myself with any praise that has been bestowed upon Madame Vanier, since it is so richly deserved, and extend my condolences to those who are bereaved by her passing.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND-FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-91, to amend the Financial Administration Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday, March 27, 1991.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1991-92

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-97, to provide borrowing authority.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I realize that two days' notice is necessary for bills in this place. I had hoped that we would be able to move this one along more quickly. As this is the borrowing authority bill, we would very much appreciate having it passed before we adjourn for the Easter break. We hope to be able to accomplish that on Thursday and have Royal Assent; we would thus have that business concluded before Easter.

The borrowing authority bill is an annual event, and this one is not that much different from others. All the necessary advance information has been provided to the Senate, the House of Commons and the public, inasmuch as the budget and the financial plan of the government and the Estimates, and so on, have all been made available.

On March 21, 1991 the government announced that treasury bills are to be offered for sale on March 28. They are to be sold under the authority granted by section 47 of the Financial Administration Act. That is because the borrowing authority for the present year has now run out and there is none left. It would be most appreciative if honourable senators could see fit to let us have second reading on this bill to get it into committee so that committee members can have a look at it and then we could have it returned here in time for Royal Assent before we adjourn.

With that in mind, I would ask leave to proceed with second reading today. However, if that is impossible, then I ask for second reading tomorrow. We are at the disposal of the Senate. If it decided not to give leave, then it would have to be done on Wednesday.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a brief comment concerning the remarks of the Deputy Leader of the Government. We have no difficulty in principle to the borrowing bill, except that we think that it deserves the usual scrutiny in committee and the usual notices for the various readings of the bill.

Subject to confirmation by the government, it is my understanding that it is the intention of the government to bring back the House of Commons on April 8. In that event, we would return on the following day. Therefore, would it not be appropriate to give the borrowing bill second reading, send it to committee this week and deal with it finally on the week that we come back? That would seem to be a reasonably rapid dealing with the bill. If there are reasons that have not yet been stated, and if a case for urgency can be given, we would then take a look at those reasons.

Senator Doody: I appreciate Senator MacEachen's comments. I know precisely what he is saying. The reason for asking for the bill in the shorttime frame that I indicated is that borrowing authority in the current year has run out and they are now operating under section 47, which enables them to use short-time borrowing only. That disrupts their mix of short-term, long-term and flexibility in terms of interest rates, windows of opportunity, and all the jargon that is appropriate to the borrowing people in the department. It is entirely up to the Senate as to how they want to proceed. However, it would be convenient and helpful if we could get the borrowing authority passed before we adjourn for Easter. I will leave it at that right now.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day. Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator MacEachen: No leave is given.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday, March 27, 1991.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Daniel Hays: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of the Honourable Senator Frith. The petition protests the goods and services tax. There are three petitions containing 63 signatures from residents of various parts of Alberta.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present two petitions on behalf of Senator Frith. There are two petitions from the area of Goose Bay and Happy Valley in Labrador. The petitions contain 39 signatures protesting the imposition of the goods and services tax.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, in the name of Senator Frith I have the honour to present a petition in support of the goods and services tax. The petition is dated March 6, 1991. It bears one signature, but no address is given.

[English]

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have a petition that I submit on behalf of myself. It is signed by 200 Prince Edward Islanders and the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the goods and services tax. I table this without reading the names.

INTERNATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF FRENCH-SPEAKING PARLIAMENTARIANS

THIRTEENTH REPORT OF CANADIAN SECTION TABLED

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the thirteenth report on the activities of the Canadian section of the International Assembly of French-Speaking Parliamentarians.

THE ESTIMATES, 1990-91

TWENTY-FIRST REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the twenty-first report of the Standing Committee on National Finance concerning Supplementary Estimates (C) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings and the Debates of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix, p. 5488)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Bolduc, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

TWELFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Daniel Hays, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, presented the following report:

Monday, March 25, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources has the honour to present its

TWELFTH REPORT

Your Committee, authorized to study "Energy and Canadians into the 21st Century: A Report on the Energy Options Process", has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of June 21, 1989, proceeded to that inquiry and now presents its interim report.

A full two and a half years have passed since the Energy Options Advisory Committee completed its report entitled "ENERGY AND CANADIANS INTO THE 21ST CENTURY", a Report on the Energy Options Process. Up to the present, there has been no response to the report on the part of the federal government. While the views of the House of Commons Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources were sought and received by the government, that Committee's set of witnesses was limited to members of the Advisory Committee itself and no public response to their report (tabled 11 June 1990) has been offered.

Your Committee is of the opinion that the Energy Options report should be used to assist in the formulation of a comprehensive national energy strategy. We believe that such a strategy must be articulated in order to provide a framework of guiding principles within which decisions in the energy sector can be made. Such a strategy is, in fact, common in many industrialized countries such as France, Japan and recently the United States. With a view to ensuring that the effort put into the Energy Options process is not lost, your Committee is currently assessing certain aspects of the report. Such a review is further warranted given the heightened level of concern over the link between energy and the environment.

Your Committee has begun its formal hearings on the report, and to date three witnesses have been heard. The Committee intends to complete its study in the new Session of Parliament. It was in the expectation of the upcoming prorogation that the decision was made to issue this Interim Report outlining our call for the creation of a national energy strategy and delineating the issues which we feel merit consideration.

The central focus of our study will be the demand side of the energy equation, which has historically received little attention. Within this context we have identified two issues on which we intend to concentrate: energy and the environment; and energy efficiency. In recent years, both industry and government have begun to recognize that an important link exists between energy use and environmental degradation. The federal government has recently released its Green Plan, which includes proposals that will deal with this issue thereby affecting the energy sector. The House of Commons Standing Committee on the Environment is concluding a major study on the issue of global warming. Industry is also beginning to address its role in meeting the environmental challenges it faces. Your Committee wishes to contribute to these efforts by examining measures which could reduce greenhouse gas emissions. These might entail the promotion of energy efficiency and fuel-switching, regulation of emissions, the introduction of a carbon tax and the adoption of other market-based instruments. As part of the Committee's review, a critical evaluation of relevant sections of the Green Plan will be conducted.

In examining the link between energy and the environment, the Committee may also consider investigating a number of additional issues. Topics for consideration could include oil tanker safety and the environmental effects of oil and gas drilling in the Beaufort Sea.

It is widely recognized that increased energy efficiency can contribute effectively to reducing the environmental impact of energy use. Moreover, efficiency gains can represent the least-cost path to addressing our energy needs, and thus provide net economic benefits. The Committee heard evidence of the enormous potential for efficiency improvements within North America. We believe this issue should be examined in greater detail as it applies to the Canadian context. In particular, we will address the energy-saving opportunities available in certain end use applications, including the federal government's own operations, as well as the barriers to improved efficiency and the role of government in reducing them.

In its deliberations, the Committee will take into account the need for greater balance in government intervention in the energy sector. Traditionally, federal and provincial government's efforts have been concentrated on the supply of energy. Governments in Canada have begun to re-examine the usefulness of demand reduction in addressing our energy requirements. The Committee sees merit in promoting movement towards a greater balance in the energy sector.

SENATOR DANIEL HAYS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Hays, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

QUESTION PERIOD

AGRICULTURE

INTERIM FINANCING FOR GRAIN PRODUCERS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he could give us any report of progress on what the government intends to do about some interim financing for grain producers, because the season is nearly upon them.

We know that Bill C-98—the GRIP and NISA programs—is progressing through the House of Commons and will probably be here later this week. However, even if it is passed, it does not make any contribution toward planting and other expenses for the spring season of 1991.

Therefore, I was wondering if the Leader of the Government could give us some report on what the cabinet has decided or what it is going to do about this requirement. The Minister of Agriculture, as well as the government leader, have indicated that this was a matter that was under very serious and active discussion by the government.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will ask for a report from my colleague, Mr. Mazankowski.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

CONTRACT POLICING TO PROVINCES AND TERRITORIES

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable Senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and is with regard to the RCMP. I am quoting from a Manitoba government news release where the Manitoba Minister of Justice states:

> The federal government has issued a "take-it-or-else" ultimatum. They are demanding we accept non-negotiated cost increases of up to 25 per cent per year or they will terminate RCMP services in all jurisdictions.

The Minister of Justice backs this up with a communiqué which reads as follows:

> Ministers responsible for policing in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Northwest Territories and the Yukon expressed concern over the present impasse with the Federal Government over RCMP contract policing. At a recent meeting with the Federal Solicitor General and the Provinces/Territories, Mr. Cadieux failed to demonstrate any flexibility on the major issues of cost sharing and further indicated his interest to terminate RCMP contract policing to the Provinces and Territories at the expiry of the existing 10 year contract on March 31st, 1991.

This is a communiqué, as I mentioned, from all the provinces and the two territories. They go on to say that they cannot understand why the federal Solicitor General would adopt such a callous and inflexible attitude.

● (1420)

The communique continues:

> The Provincial and Territorial Ministers . . . agreed this was a gross example of Federal high handedness in dealing with Canadians.
> The Ministers also agreed that this appeared to be yet another example of the Federal Government's willingness to sacrifice a great Canadian institution, like the RCMP, to short-sighted and high-handed views of management.

I will not read the whole communique but essentially it is along the same lines regarding the federal government. I wonder if the minister could tell us where the matter now stands?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not have an up-to-date report on those discussions. I can say with certainty that, contrary to the statement by the Manitoba minister, we have no interest in, and no intention of, terminating police services to those provinces with which we have policing contracts on behalf of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Senator Molgat: I would point out to the minister that, while this is the Manitoba minister speaking, he backs up his statement with this communique issued by the eight provinces and two territories saying exactly the same thing. So it is not just the Manitoba minister making the statement; it is eight provinces and two territories.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, what we are trying to accomplish here is to have the provinces pay a greater share of the total cost of the RCMP presence in those eight provinces that use the RCMP as a provincial police force. I can produce statistics for the honourable senator, not today but tomorrow or the next day, which will demonstrate that the citizens in those provinces where the RCMP act as a provincial police force are paying, on a per capita basis, less for provincial police services than is the case in those provinces, such as Quebec and Ontario, which have their own provincial police force. In other words, the federal government has been carrying too great a share of the cost of the RCMP in those provinces and we intend to rectify that situation.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to four questions that I would ask be printed as part of today's proceedings.

ENERGY

DISBANDMENT OF COGLA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on February 26, 1991, by the Honourable Colin Kenny, regarding Energy—Disbandment of COGLA.

(The answer follows:)

Given the low level of oil and gas activity in the North, coupled with the transfer of COGLA type responsibilities to Offshore Petroleum Boards on the East coast, it is appropriate for the federal government to move at this time to transfer COGLA's remaining functions to other organizations.

COGLA's oil and gas regulatory responsibilities will be integrated among three federal government agencies: the National Energy Board, Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Energy, Mines and Resources.

A task force of representatives from COGLA, EMR, IAND, and the NEB has been set up to examine how best to carry out this integration, and to recommend to the ministers of EMR and DIAND how and when the changes will occur. A decision by the two ministers will be made at the end of March.

COGLA's disbandment has been contemplated by the federal government for quite some time and is not a result of the Environmental Impact Review Board's criticism of the agency in July of 1990. In fact, by integrating COGLA's responsibilities in other agencies, the federal government is re-affirming its commitment to the Frontier Energy Policy of 1985.

PERSIAN GULF WAR

STATUS OF MILITARY DECORATIONS FOR CANADIAN TROOPS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on February 28, 1991 by the Honourable George van Roggen regarding Persian Gulf War—Status of Military Decorations for Canadian Troops.

(The answer follows:)

In the past, Canada relied on British honours to recognize brave Canadian military personnel.

Over the years, but especially since the creation of the Order of Canada and the Bravery Award in 1967—the Centennial of Confederation—Canada has cautiously evolved its own national honours and awards, including the establishment of a Chancellery at Government House to provide a National Honours Secretariat.

Over the past few years, a comprehensive national honours policy has been developed to guide all national honours, including those of the Canadian military.

While the entire honours system is not yet complete, those few outstanding honours categories, including the Canadian Military Valour decorations, are in the final stages of approval.

For the first time since Confederation, Canadian valour decorations will soon be available to Canadian service members for extraordinary valour in the face of an enemy.

With the conclusion of hostilities, the Government of Canada is taking steps to ensure that there is appropriate recognition for those members of the Canadian Forces who served in the Persian Gulf during the period of crisis and hostilities.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

CITIZEN INSTRUCTIONAL LANGUAGE TRAINING—ABOLITION OF PROGRAM

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a delayed answer raised in the Senate on February 28, 1991, by the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, regarding Official Languages—Abolition of the Citizen Instructional Language Training Program.

(The answer follows:)

The decision to terminate the CILT Agreements as of March 31, 1990 was part of the federal government's overall deficit reduction strategy which, in a time of fiscal restraint, involved making very difficult decisions.

Language training for adult immigrants is an educational matter of concern to both the federal and provincial governments. At the federal level, initiatives in this area are focused in the Department of Employment and Immigration which continues to address the issue of language training for adult immigrants through provincial educational institutions. The Department also gives financial support to agencies which assist newcomers in developing language skills.

In this context, new initiatives have been introduced to help immigrant women whose lack of language skills can present a barrier to their full participation in the community and to their advancement in the labour force.

PERSIAN GULF WAR

COST OF CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN SANCTIONS AND WAR

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on March 5, 1991, by the Honourable Stanley Haidasz, regarding the Persian Gulf War—Cost of Canada's Participation in the Sanctions and War Against Iraq.

(The answer follows:)

The total cost of the Canadian Forces operations in the Gulf to March 31st, 1991, has been estimated at $690 million.

This covers all costs of the operations, including such items as pay for CF personnel in the Gulf, the cost of outfitting the ships and aircraft, and the cost of operating them while there. It does not include the cost of ammunition expended or any loss of major equipment.

The estimated monthly costs were $90 million. During January and February 1991, however, they rose to $105 million. This monthly figure represents incremental costs of $70 million for items such as fuel, rations, special foreign allowances, spare parts, and repair and overhaul, and normal operating costs of $35 million such as salaries and the depreciation of equipment.

Many of these incremental costs are offset by reducing activities and expenditures in other areas. To the extent that they cannot be offset from elsewhere in the Defence Budget, they will be funded from the $600 million special allocation of the 1991-92 Federal Budget.

It should be remembered that although hostilities have ceased, there will be costs related to the redeployment and repatriation of the Canadian Forces from the Persian Gulf.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ESTABLISHMENT OF STANDING COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall calling the attention of the Senate to the advisability of striking a Standing Senate Committee on National Defence.—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, Senator Marshall outlined very well the work that the National Defence Committee has done over the years. It is generally accepted that the committee made a major contribution to reviewing the whole of Canada's defence stand and presented useful recommendations to government, a number of which were followed. The most notable recommendation, which took some time to actually occur, was the production of a white paper. In the committee's view, that was urgently needed. We regretted the delay, but it was finally completed. Unfortunately, shortly after its production, the subsequent budget destroyed any possibility of that white paper being accepted.

The committee, at the conclusion of its work, was unanimous in its last report that the National Defence Committee be re-established. We fully understand the difficulties in the Senate insofar as numbers and the problem of being able to staff committees. However, since that recommendation, we have had several new senators arrive in this chamber and I believe we are now in a position to look at the re-establishment of the National Defence Committee as a standing Senate committee.

When we consider the amount of money spent by Canada on defence matters, there is a sound reason for having a Standing Senate Committee on National Defence to look at this major expenditure. In the past it has been said, with valid reason, that you cannot separate defence from external affairs, that the two are linked, and that defence is an extension of external affairs.

• (1430)

However, we are at the point now where the Foreign Affairs Committee has another major job on its hands and that is the monitoring of the Free Trade Agreement with the United States, plus all of the reviews of the very major changes that have gone on in the world and are continuing in the field of external affairs. So I doubt that the committee would be able to devote the time specifically to defence matters, that I think is now needed and has been needed for sometime. With the immense change in the world situation, with the whole attitude vis a vis the East Bloc, and so on, it is urgent that we review our defence position in Canada.

The department apparently is proceeding with its own review, but the latest report I have is that it has been delayed. In a recent story in the Toronto Star, "Defence Chief Blames War for Delay in Review", Mr. McKnight was reported as saying that the review could not be done because of the war. We know that some 18 months ago, it was agreed that there would be a complete review of the internal structure of National Defence Headquarters, and a contract for some $5 million was awarded to an outside group to do that study. At some time or other that study will be published, as will the government review. At that time I think it is important that a committee of the Senate be ready to look at those reports before the government proceeds to act upon them. A Senate committee would provide the opportunity for outside voices to be heard, not simply people in the Department of National Defence, but many others from across the country who have an interest in this subject and who can express opinions on the studies that will be produced. I think that would help greatly in coming to a better conclusion.

It is my view that we have to be prepared to completely review our defence stand. We have to question whether what in the past we believed to be the proper structure of a military force is indeed valid in today's world, in the kind of obligations that Canada might face. Will we indeed be faced with a land battle where traditionally we depend on the original structure of infantry, armour and artillery, or are we looking at light mobile defence forces? From the point of view of aircraft, despite what undoubtedly was very good service by our fighter aircraft in the Gulf War, do we, from a Canadian standpoint, really need that type of aircraft? Would we, as Canadians, be better off with a large fleet of transport planes, planes that, for example, would have a second use, namely, for surveillance and transport within the country; planes that would permit us to take young Canadians, for example, from one end of the country to the other to help develop within Canada an opportunity for Canadians to know each other? We attempt to do this within the military through the three cadet services: the Navy Cadets, Army Cadets and Air Cadets. We move them around in the summer and take them out to camps in various parts of the country. We should be doing more of that.

In my view, we should be doing more of that. Yet every summer we find ourselves restricted because of costs and availabiltiy. Perhaps we should be looking at these new approaches from a defence standpoint. So I think that it is time that we re-establish this committee. With the new senators, we now have the personnel within the Senate to man a new committee.

The need is there now. These reports should be out soon and we will be ready to deal with them. I urge honourable senators to accept Senator Marshall's motion to proceed with the re-establishment of the committee.

Hon. Stan Waters: Honourable senators, I should like to follow up on the remarks of Senator Molgat and Senator Marshall on the need to establish a Standing Senate Committee on National Defence. I will not repeat all the powerful and very convincing arguments made to me about the necessity for doing that. In fact, I find it very disquieting that a sombre nation like Canada, spending nearly $14 billion a year on defence, does not have such a standing committee in the Senate. That should be of very great concern to all of us, particularly in a time of tumultuous change in the military structure of the whole world. The threat analysis is all changing. The former alliances, both NATO and the Warsaw Pact, are crumbling. The lessons of the Gulf War need to be digested. We are re-equipping our armed forces. We do know where we are going in terms of strategic goals because the foreign policy analysis has not been finished, and yet we are still prepared to commit $13 billion dollars to a program of which we do not know the military objectives. I find that very disturbing.

We should also remember, in this time of tumultuous change, that we are talking not only about rearmament and new armament, but about the challenges we face in disarmament, in arms control and in identifying new alliances. We will have to take a very hard look in future at where we fit into NORAD and NATO. There is a complete restructuring of the traditional military alliances that we have lived with for 45 years. These are very important times and it is important that we get our direction right. We will not get our direction right if we do not organize a committee and obtain some foreign policy goals from External Affairs to identify where we are going.

[Senator Molgat.]

I separate myself from Senator Marshall's remarks in one area. He suggested that it might be wise to follow the example of the House of Commons and combine this committee with the committee on veterans' affairs. I think that is totally inappropriate. They have totally different objectives. It might administratively be convenient, and I do not know what arguments and rationale they use in the House of Commons, but to me it makes no sense to combine the two. I do not see any advantage in that at all.

I would like to reinforce the remarks made by Senator Marshall and Senator Molgat and stress that it is not only important but urgent that this committee be established. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I would like to say how much I appreciate the fact that three of our colleagues have raised the very important question of defence. It indicates to me that in this chamber we are not impervious to the march of events. In view of the turmoil that exists in the world, which we have seen developing these last few years, the question of our defence policy is again under examination and scrutiny.

I well recall that at one time the Foreign Affairs Committee encompassed within its range of responsibilities matters dealing with defence. Some time ago a subcommittee of the Foreign Affairs Committee was set up to give concentrated attention to this matter. In the course of time the subcommittee was translated into a special committee, and it is the record of that committee to which some of my colleagues have referred today.

I wish to pay tribute, if I may, to both Senator Marshall and Senator Molgat for the zeal with which they pursued the investigations of that committee. It is perhaps important to recall that, at the time, Canada's foreign policy was settled. At that time the Cold War was in full flight, so to speak. We in the National Defence Committee had no problem deciding what was the foreign policy of Canada. At that time it was quite clear what our foreign policy was. That is important, because defence does not have a life of its own. Defence depends on what is the foreign policy of the country, and it is counter-productive to think that we can develop a policy on defence in isolation, or without regard for the changing foreign policy of the nation.

Under those circumstances, I was, at the time, an ardent supporter of the defence committee. I thought that, as a special subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, it did all right, and I am not sure that its contribution, though perhaps it status, was improved by making it a special committee. At any rate, at the time, when one considered the settled state of our foreign policy, the mandate of that committee was pretty clear and we were able to offer some useful contributions to defence policy in this country.

But it is now equally clear that the conclusions we reached then are quite inappropriate for today. The reasons they are inappropriate have been mentioned by Senator Molgat and others, and I concur with the observations made by the honourable senator, and by Senator Waters, on the need for a new look at defence problems in the present circumstances.

What concerns me, however, is the best way to go about this. While I do not dismiss out of hand the concept of a special committee on defence—I am personally willing to listen to arguments on this subject and to consider all aspects of the proposal—it does seem to me that we should consider the link between defence and foreign affairs and ask ourselves whether we can usefully go very far in our re-examination of the defence situation until we have a pretty good idea of our concept of our foreign policy. As has been stated by members of this house, there is a debate going on in the country these days with respect to our foreign policy, and it would perhaps be useful to examine the impact of foreign policy on defence. That leads me to the conclusion that we should not automatically accept the idea that a separate defence committee is the way to go. I must confess that if I had to make a decision—and if I had the authority to decide at this particular moment—I would be inclined to say that we might be better advised to pursue the foreign policy objectives of Canada in the foreign affairs committee, as we have done in the past. We should not concentrate so much on the Free Trade Agreement, which, in a sense, is now passé, although it has not disappeared from the arena of public discussion by any manner or means. The fact that the committee has recently been concentrating so much attention on the Free Trade Agreement means that it has not looked at other matters that might be of interest to it.

I believe there is a general feeling in the committee that perhaps we have done all we can with respect to the Free Trade Agreement, although some senators may think that we should continue to look into that. We are certainly continuing our study with respect to the trilateral discussions with Mexico, but I would suggest that that should no longer be the central focus of what the Foreign Affairs Committee should now be considering. I had the impression that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs was now considering the new foreign policy interests of Canada and the sort of reference it should seek from the Senate in order to discuss those new foreign policy interests. Proposals have been made in the committee that we should re-examine those fundamental aspects of our foreign policy and decide how the committee might contribute to a study of the problems and to proposals for a solution. If I have judged its feeling correctly, I think the committee will conclude that that area should receive primary attention from here on in.

If that should be the case, then the question of defence is closely aligned to what that policy directive or policy discussion should be. The correct defence policy of the country, I suggest, will be closely related to what we conceive to be the foreign policy interests of the nation.

The conclusion of that line of argument leads me to suggest that perhaps we should ask the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs to consider this question of defence and to consider whether, within its program for the future, there will be time, interest and personnel to include the question of defence in its study of the foreign relations policy of the nation. Should the committee reach the conclusion that it can usefully, efficiently and effectively deal with the question of defence in connection with the general state of foreign policy, then that is one thing; if it decides that it has too much on its plate and that members would rather tackle the problem in some other way, then they will no doubt be able to formulate some reflections on that matter.

My conclusion, honourable senators, is that I would not like to support this solution as it stands, because I think it requires further study before we can decide how best to proceed. While I do not propose to make any motion to that effect at the present time, I know that at the next meeting of the foreign affairs committee, which is tomorrow, I will have the opportunity, should I wish, to ask the committee to consider the general character of this problem and to apply its collective mind to the solution that should be proposed. When that consultation has taken place, perhaps I, for one, will have a better idea of how to approach this problem.

Honourable senators, I will conclude by saying that there is a problem. The defence policy of the country is now unsuited to the terms we see around us today. The white paper that was received with such interest a short while ago is no longer a safe guide for conduct in all aspects of our defence policy. I agree with those who say that these are important matters that require our attention, without much delay. However, I do believe it would be advantageous to consider the matter on the wider basis that I have suggested and, hopefully, we will find the correct and most productive method by which this problem can be approached.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, while this matter is being discussed by either the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs or the Standing Senate Committee on Rules and Orders, perhaps I could take the adjournment in my name so that the matter may be further discussed in this chamber.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES, 1990-91

TWENTY-FIRST REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

MONDAY, March 25, 1991

The Standing Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

TWENTY-FIRST REPORT

Your Committee, to which Supplementary Estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991, were referred, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, March 6, 1991, submits its report as follows:

Supplementary Estimates (C) are the third and final supplementary estimates for the 1990-91 fiscal year. Your Committee held two meetings, on March 7 and March 19, 1991, to review these supplementary estimates. Officials of the Treasury Board Secretariat appeared as witnesses at both meetings.

Because of large reductions in statutory expenditures resulting mainly from lapses and legislated changes, total proposed expenditures in these supplementary estimates are actually negative in the amount of $2.253 billion. Consequently, these supplementary estimates reduce the estimates tabled for the 1990-91 year (budgetary plus non-budgetary) from $153.273 billion at the time of Supplementary Estimates (B) to $151.020 billion.

Background information supplied by the Treasury Board Secretariat, which forms part of this report, includes: a listing of all voted items greater than $5 million; a summary of the expenditure framework and estimates for 1990-91; a statement of 1990-91 supply to date; and a list of $1 votes that authorize the transfer of funds from one vote to another and the payment of grants, plus miscellaneous items.

The $2.253 billion negative total in these supplementary estimates is made up of a reduction of $2.843 billion in statutory expenditures, which are included in the estimates for information only, and a proposed appropriation of $590.3 million that is to be voted by Parliament. Total budgetary expenditures of $150.607 billion exceed both the government's projection of $147.8 billion in the 1990 Budget and the 1990-91 Main Estimates and its revised projection of $150.3 billion at the time of Supplementary Estimates (B). In the Budget of February 26, 1991 and in the attached Treasury Board information, the forecast of total budgetary expenditures for 1990-91 has been increased by a further $1 billion to $151.3 billion. In other words, the government has had to revise the expenditure framework upwards on two occasions to accommodate the total budgetary expenditures in the estimates for 1990-91. These increases are largely attributable to changes in economic conditions and associated increases in major statutory expenditures. In particular, the onset of the recession resulted in increased unemployment insurance payments and increases in the federal government's transfers to the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan, while the high interest rates that prevailed during the fiscal year led to substantial increases in interest payments on the public debt. These increases were only partially offset by the reductions in statutory expenditures, referred to above, that appear in Supplementary Estimates (C).

When Supplementary Estimates (B) were tabled on November 23, 1990, the President of Treasury Board announced a reduction in current-year government expenditures of $350 million in order to offset the additional budgetary requirements of the same amount for the Department of National Defence. This reduction was to be achieved through a combination of deferrals of $100 million in grants and contributions in four departments and agencies (other than National Defence). These cutbacks were not included in the departmental information of Supplementary Estimates (B) and similarly do not appear in Supplementary Estimates (C). The amounts to be voted for each department and agency in these supplementary estimates are net in the sense that the reductions required have been subtracted from the amounts requested. Where the department's or agency's reduction exceeds the amounts requested, and for those departments and agencies that do not appear in these supplementary estimates, part or all of the reduction remains in a frozen allotment with Treasury Board and must be lapsed by the department by March 31, 1991.

A number of specific expenditure items were questioned by members of your Committee in the course of its customarily careful scrutiny of these estimates.

An appropriation of $44.9 million is being requested for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to help defray severance payments and other benefits for the 1,100 employees the CBC plans to lay off, pursuant to the closure of 11 television stations announced in December 1990. As well, there is an inter-vote transfer from capital to operating expenditures of $28.0 million to offset a shortfall in advertising revenues. Four separate museums have been established from what was formerly the Canadian Museums Corporation. Appropriations are required for each of these new crown corporations because they are now responsible for their own statutory employee benefits, formerly payable through Treasury Board Vote 15, and must also pay provincial sales taxes.

The estimates of the Canadian International Development Agency include a $25 million grant for international humanitarian assistance, which is directly related to the effects of the war in the Persian Gulf region, and a $19.1 million contribution for geographic programs, specifically increased food aid for the Horn of Africa. $153.5 million and 1,644 additional person-years are being requested under National Revenue, Customs and Excise for administration and collection of the Goods and Services Tax. Privy Council estimates include $18.0 million for the Citizen's Forum on Canada's Future. This Forum was established under the Inquiries Act, which gives it no authority to spend funds without the specific approval of Parliament.

$31.8 million has been included in the estimates of the Department of Public Works for accommodation needs of various departments, along with $24.5 million for further accommodation requirements for the implementation of the Goods and Services Tax. Although some downsizing of the federal government is taking place, additional expenditures connected with new initiatives and the accommodation requirements of 215,000 public servants invariably arise, for example: the need to remove asbestos in government-owned buildings; accommodation for the Canadian Space Agency, GST administration and Environment initiatives; and increased costs incurred when leases are renegotiated. The estimates of the Treasury Board include $32.5 million for additional costs to meet provincial health payroll taxes, which several provinces have introduced in place of health care premiums.

A number of the large reductions in statutory expenditures were also questioned. Under Employment and Immigration, $1.319 billion is being saved from elimination of the government's contribution to the Unemployment Insurance Account and $227 million in respect of its contribution to UI benefits for self-employed fishermen. These savings arise from the passage of Bill C-21 amending the Unemployment Insurance Act. $700 million less is needed for the Public Debt Program of the Department of Finance, reflecting recent reductions in interest rates. Under this program, $41.15 billion was identified in the 1990-91 Main Estimates and an additional $2.5 billion appeared in Supplementary Estimates (B). With the present $700 million reduction, total interest payments on the public debt for 1990-91 are estimated to be $42.95 billion. Finally, the large positive and negative adjustments in statutory payments under the Social Program of the Department of National Health and Welfare (Family Allowance, Old Age Security, Guaranteed Income Supplement, Spouse's Allowance and the Canada Assistance Plan) can be ascribed to unforeseen shifts in economic and demographic variables.

At a later date, Treasury Board will be providing written responses to specific questions raised by the members of your Committee. These will include additional detail on the expenses of the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future and on the use of the Treasury Board Contingencies Vote.

Respectfully submitted.

LIST OF ONE DOLLAR VOTES INCLUDED IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C), 1990-91

The 39 One Dollar Votes included in these Estimates are listed in Appendix I by ministry and agency along with the page number where each vote may be located in the Estimates.

These One dollar Votes are grouped below into categories according to their prime purpose. The votes are also identified in Appendix I, according to these categories. The category for each vote has been designated by an "X". In those instances where a vote falls into more than one category, the prime category is designated by an "X" and other categories by an "*".

A. Twenty-five votes which authorize the transfer of funds from one vote to another. (An explanation of the new requirement and the source of funds is provided in Supplementary Estimates).

B. Nine votes which authorize the payment of grants. (An explanation of the new requirement and the source of funds is provided in Supplementary Estimates).

C. Five miscellaneous votes. (Additional explanations are provided in Appendix II).

- one vote which provides a guarantee of loans made by Canadian Financial Institutions -- External Affairs;
- one vote which provides authority to delete from the accounts of the Staff Development and Training revolving fund an amount representing the loss on operations pertaining to the termination of discretionary language training -- Public Service Commission;
- two votes which write-off certain debts due Her Majesty in Right of Canada -- Employment and Immigration;
- one vote which repeals a certain section of the Self-Supporting Airports and Associated Ground Services Revolving Fund Act -- Transport.

Additional Explanation

Category C - Miscellaneous $1.00 Votes:

Employment and Immigration -

Vote 6c Employment and Insurance - Pursuant to Section 25(2) of the Financial Administration Act, to write-off from the Accounts of Canada 27 debts due Her Majesty in Right of Canada amounting in the aggregate to $1,161.72 in regards to Government Annuities Account overpayments - To authorize the transfer of $1,161 from Employment and Immigration Vote 5, Appropriation Act No. 2, 1990-91 for the purposes of this Vote.

Explanation:

This item authorizes the write-off of 27 overpayments from the Government Annuities Accounts with a total value of $1,161.72. These overpayments are debts included in the Statement of Assets and Liabilities. The overpayments are considered unrecoverable because:

- the debtor is deceased;

- the debt records have been lost;

- collection costs cannot be justified.

Additional Explanation

Category C - Miscellaneous $1.00 Votes:

Employment and Immigration

Vote 17c Immigration - Pursuant to Section 25(2) of the Financial Administration Act, to write-off from the Accounts of Canada 2,225 debts due to Her Majesty in Right of Canada amounting in the aggregate to $2,243,290.28 in regards to transportation loans issued pursuant to Section 119 of the Immigration Act - To authorize the transfer of $486,840 from Employment and Immigration Vote 5 and $1,756,450 from Employment and Immigration Vote 10, Appropriation Act No. 2, 1990-91 for the purposes of this Vote.

Explanation:

TB 815126, December 13, 1990.
This item authorizes the write-off of 2,285 transportation loans with an outstanding balance of $2,243,290.28. These loans are being written off for the following reasons:

- the debtor is deceased - $72,000 (71,149.65)

- the debtor is not a resident of Canada or cannot be located - $44,000 (43,790.47)

- the debtor is incapable of paying the debt - $49,000 (49,047.29)

- the debtor is an undischarged bankrupt - $18,000 (18,222.49)

- the further costs of collecting the debt are not justified - $13,000 (12,732.20)

- the debtor has his account transferred to a private collection agency - $2,048,000 (2,048,348.18)

A similar item is included in S.E.(C) each year.

APPENDIX II

Additional Explanation

Category C - Miscellaneous $1.00 Votes:

External Affairs & International Trade Canada:

Vote L13c — Pursuant to Section 29 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize the Minister on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada to guarantee loans made by Canadian financial institutions in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the Minister of Finance to the government of Czechoslovakia in an amount not to exceed $30,000,000 and to the government of Hungary in an amount not to exceed $15,000,000.

Explanation — The G-24 (a coordinating body of OECD countries to provide assistance to Eastern Europe) has agreed to undertake a concerted effort to provide balance of payments support for Eastern European countries undertaking major programs of economic adjustment with the support of the International Monetary Fund. The total assistance to be provided is $US 1 billion for the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic (CSFR) and $US 500 million for Hungary.

The provision of loan guarantees constitute Canada's contribution to this undertaking of the G-24 group of donor countries. Canada's commitment is $US 25 million ($Cdn 30 million) for the CSFR and $US 12.5 million ($Cdn 15 million) for Hungary. This represents approximately 2.5% of the G-24 effort.

TB recommended this authority to parliament under the following conditions: (a) all agreements shall be subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance on the terms and conditions of loans made by Canadian financial institutions; and (b) 50% of the value of the loan guarantees or as otherwise agreed by the Minister of Finance shall be offset against the the 1991-92 ODA Reserve as a fiscal control measure.

APPENDIX II

Additional Explanation

Category C - Miscellaneous $1.00 Votes:

Public Service Commission -

Vote 26c To authorize the Minister to delete from the accounts of the Staff Development and Training Revolving Fund an amount of up to $800,000 representing the accumulated loss on operations pertaining to the termination of discretionary language training.

Explanation:

TB 815465 December 20, 1990 transferred the provision of discretionary language training from the Revolving Fund to appropriations beginning in 1991-92. (The Revolving Fund was shared by discretionary language training and the Special Operating Agency.)

In 1990-91, discretionary language training is expected to incur a deficit of approximately $650K. Since discretionary language training will no longer be part of the Revolving fund and there will be no means of recovering the debts incurred by this activity, PSC seeks authority for its Minister to delete that debt from the Revolving Fund accounts.

Authority is also requested to remove the assets and liabilities related to the provision of discretionary language training (estimated at $150K) from the Revolving Fund accounts in order that the accounts accurately reflect only the Special Operating Agency activities.

APPENDIX II

Additional Explanation

Category C - Miscellaneous $1.00 Votes:

Transport -

Vote 2c Self-supporting Airports and Associated Ground Services Revolving Funds Act - In accordance with Section 12 of the Revolving Funds Act, 1985 R.S.C.,c. R-8, to repeal Section 10 of the said Act, as of March 31, 1991

Explanation:

Transport Canada has operated the "Airports Revolving Fund" since 1969 as a management and accounting tool. It has proposed winding up the Fund because it no longer serves the practical purpose for which it was intended. The Department is developing new costing and financial reporting management tools on an individual airport basis. Officials expect that each airport can be operated on a more commercial basis as a result.

Four of the eight airports in the Fund are being transferred to local airport authorities (Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary and Montreal). It would not be practical, or necessary, to retain the Fund to handle accounting transactions for the four remaining airports. For example, the flexibility to vote-net revenues, originally provided for under the Fund, is now available to Transport on a more widespread basis.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, March 26, 1991

CRIMINAL CODE
CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-80

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I give notice that on April 9, 1991, I will move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon the subject-matter of Bill C-80, An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Customs Tariff in consequence thereof, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto; and
> That the Committee present its report no later than November 28, 1991.

As I am sure honourable senators know, Bill C-80 is the gun control legislation.

QUESTION PERIOD

BANK OF CANADA

UNDERTAKING TO ACCEPT GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURE GUIDELINES—REQUEST FOR MONITORING AND REPORTING TO SENATE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government with respect to the operating expenses of the Bank of Canada. I am interested, of course, in the reply but I am also asking this question because I am sure the Leader of the Government expects me to ask it, since I know of his deep and abiding interest in the operations of the bank.

First, I would ask the Leader of the Government to give us an explanation of exactly what the officials of the Bank of Canada promised—and I am asking because I am not sure what it means—when they gave some kind of undertaking that they would abide by and live within the expenditure guidelines set down by the government, which included approximately a 3 per cent increase. I believe the House of Commons has already had some kind of committee hearing, and, following that meeting, the Governor or one of the senior officials of the bank gave an undertaking that they would live within the guidelines. I would like to know what that means.

Secondly, at the same time I would like the government leader to give us some assurance that this will be monitored and reported to the Senate from time to time so that we can make sure that they do, in fact, keep their commitment.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall ask my colleague, Mr. Wilson, to provide what further information is available on that matter at this time.

Senator Olson: Well, that is a good start and I would like to have that information; but surely the Leader of the Government could be a little more helpful and tell us why it is that the Bank of Canada, which has been following a policy that bleeds everyone else to death, can get away with spending 200 or 300 per cent more than the expenditure guidelines by which they admonish everyone else to live, and which indeed is the government's guideline for increased expenditure. If you have been to cabinet meetings, then you must have heard about this.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, this, as the honourable senator knows, is quite a complex question. I do not think I could do justice to it during the oral Question Period, but I shall, as I said, ask my colleague, Mr. Wilson, for a more complete report, which I hope will satisfy the honourable senator's curiosity.

Senator Simard: His partisanship, too!

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I believe the government leader could do justice to it and that he should try to do justice to it. I have been to one or two cabinet meetings and I know what is discussed there.

Senator Murray: Not recently, I hope.

Senator Olson: . . . and I know that when one comes out of there, one has certain information that is not highly classified. The government leader could tell us and tell us today. What is the justification for the Bank of Canada's coming forward with approximately an 11 per cent increase in administration costs for the projected fiscal year over the last year, when it is asking everyone else to live within 3 per cent and, in some cases, to live with a reduction?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator wants some information on this interesting subject. He shall have it. The information will be authentic, because I will let the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance speak for themselves, in their own words, which I shall be happy to convey in due course to the honourable senator.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that may be a reply, but it is totally unsatisfactory.

Senator Nurgitz: I thought he was doing good!

Senator Olson: I know you thought he was doing good. I know from past history and recent history that the minister has a deep interest in the operations of the Bank of Canada. That is not something new. He has had it for years. He used to ask questions about it at exactly five minutes after two every Thursday. He also has a deep and profound knowledge of how much damage has been done to hundreds of thousands of people across this country who have no way of defending themselves against the actions of the Bank of Canada in following the monetary policy that has been so devastating. For him to say all of a sudden that he does not know about it is absolutely incredible.

Senator Gigantès: He means he does not care!

Senator Olson: I am not going to accuse him of that. I think he is trying to be cautious in replying and that he will refer this and delay it and all that sort of thing. I would ask him to be more forthcoming because I am sure he attended the meetings in which explanations for these actions were given. For example, I doubt that the kerfuffle that went on between the chairman of the Banking Committee in the House of Commons and the Governor of the Bank of Canada and his officials completely escaped the minister. He knows about that. Tell us why the Bank of Canada is not applying the expenditure guidelines to itself when it is admonishing everyone else in the country to do so?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have taken, and continue to take, considerable interest in the policies of the Bank of Canada and of monetary policy in this country. I have never pretended to have at my fingertips the details of the remuneration program or the administrative and operational expenses of the bank. I can and will obtain that information and table it here at my first opportunity.

With regard to the policies of the bank, let me say that I commend the bank, as I think the honourable senator should, for joining with the government in committing itself and the country to certain inflation targets, which, when realized, will have the effect of bringing interest rates down in this country and ensuring a quick recovery and renewal of sustained economic growth in Canada. If I may say so, this would be vastly preferred to the alternative put forward by the honourable senator, which is to turn on the money machine, print money and cause inflation to be fuelled in an extraordinary fashion.

Senator Olson: That is the minister's interpretation of what I said, but I will tell him to his face that he is totally, absolutely and completely wrong. I have never advocated that policy in my life, and I do not do so now. I can also tell him that I have sympathy for the hundreds of thousands of people who have gone bankrupt and are now out on the streets with debts exceeding their assets. That hurts and it is the result, in many cases, of the policy that has been followed by the Bank of Canada and supported by this government. You should be ashamed to the point where you hang your head in sympathy for the people you have hurt so badly.

Thousands of farmers across this country have either gone bankrupt or are on the verge of bankruptcy because they have been forced to pay as much as 50 to 80 per cent more debt service charges than was the level when they committed the debt.

• (1420)

The government leader should know about that, and if his government does not know about it, believe me, it will find out on election day. That is what I am concerned about, and that is why I take it very seriously that any official, namely the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance, would admonish everyone else to live within certain guidelines and then come in with expenditures that are 300 per cent or more above what they are asking everyone else to live with. By the way, it is not only salary; they are asking everyone else to cut personnel when they are adding personnel to do the same job they have been doing over these years. It is a pretty false admonition to come along and say "We have to do this and we have to do that."

There are a lot of people in this country who did not believe that advocating lower interest rates would depreciate the value of the Canadian dollar. In fact, when the interest rates did start to come down the Canadian dollar did not come down, which puts exactly a lie to what the government and the bank were advocating. If the value of the Canadian dollar had gone back to where the economic value would be determined, by trade balances and various costs on both sides of the border that have to be taken into account, a lot of people in Canada, in the agriculture industry, the lumber industry and the petrochemical industry, would have been far better off than they are now. If the government does not have the wit to see that, and even after the fact it still continues with this garbage or false argument that what it did was the right thing, then it can face the consequences.

That is why I asked my question. The reason I am pursuing this matter is because I have had enough of replies stating that you did the right thing. The fact is that you did the wrong thing, and it is proving to be more wrong day by day judging from the number of people who were critically and financially hurt by what this government did over those years. That is why

I want to know what the Bank of Canada is doing, because it is important to alot of people who live in my part of Canada.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator began this exchange by asking for some information which I undertook to provide. I wonder whether it is worthwhile doing so, because it is clear that he has already made up his mind. He has rushed to the condemnation of the Bank of Canada, its officers, employees and the governor, as well as the Minister of Finance. The honourable senator is not seeking information, he is seeking an opportunity under the guise of placing a question to make a speech. That is an imposition on the time of other honourable senators, it is against the rules, and I decline to join with the honourable senator in that exercise.

Senator Olson: That is great! If that is all the concern the minister and his government has for the people of this country, people who have been damaged by this policy, then the least that we in the Opposition can do is to make sure that it is recorded and reported to the people that he and his government do not give a damn about how much people have been hurt. I raised this matter because of the snippy answers the minister always gives me, such as "We did the right thing." You did not do the right thing; you did the wrong thing.

Senator Simard: You said that awhile ago.

Senator Petten: It bears repeating.

Senator Olson: Yes, I did. The minister is now hiding behind what I am doing by saying that it is improper and therefore avoiding responsibility to the Canadian people for the damage he has done to those who have gone bankrupt. Bankruptcies were up another 45 per cent in February in some parts of Canada. Is that of no concern to the government either? What is it that concerns this government? Canadian citizens are suffering because of the government's and the bank's policy, and the government leader should be concerned about it. If that is the kind of answers we are going to get, I will have to report to the people insofar as I can, and I have some capability to do that, at least to some of the people in the area that I come from. I have a computer and a mailing list too.

Senator Barootes: Eighteen hundred.

Senator Olson: It is more than that now. If that is all the concern that the government expresses for farmers, fishermen and small business men who have been severely damaged by the interest rate policy he is now supporting, so be it.

At the beginning I simply asked the minister if he could get some information so that we could follow the sincerity of these guys. If they have any sincerity at all in admonishing other people to live within guidelines, surely they can live within them themselves. That is what I asked, but I have no capacity to monitor that. I know that the minister has and I want him to give me a undertaking that he is going to monitor that, and that he will report to the Senate from time to time.

But the first thing he needs to respond to is what it is that they promised to do. We know that their new Estimates for the ensuing year are about 300 per cent more than the government guidelines. What is the justification for approving it? Why does the government not take its responsibility and put them back within the guidelines too?

Let the record show that the minister chooses to ignore these questions that are so important to a lot of people.

Senator Murray: Let the record show that the minister has, three or four times already this afternoon, undertaken and committed to bring in the desired information.

POLAND

FOREIGN DEBT—REDUCTION BY PARIS CLUB—TERMS AND CONDITIONS OF REPAYMENT

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, last Saturday, March 16, we learned from the press that the countries of the Paris Club agreed to reduce Poland's foreign debt by 50 per cent. Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform us of the terms and conditions that Poland would have to meet in order to pay back Canada only 50 per cent of its debt?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I think I should point out that Poland is Canada's largest debtor country. It owes Canada approximately $3.2 billion. Much of that debt relates to grain sales made by the Canadian Wheat Board in the 1970s. My notes from the Department of External Affairs, which were prepared subsequent to the decision of the Paris Club, to which my friend has referred, indicate that Poland is implementing a comprehensive and difficult program of economic reform, replacing a nonproductive centrally-planned regime with a open, competitive economy. Projections by the International Monetary Fund and other experts suggest that Poland would not have the capacity to meet its obligations fully in the immediate or medium term future without international assistance. Therefore, Polish debt would continue to be a problem for the international financial system in the indefinite future.

With regard to the specific question put by the honourable senator as to what the terms are, I can only tell him that Canada and the dozen other creditor countries in the Paris Club have agreed in principle on measures to alleviate Poland's dealt service burden in order to support its adjustment efforts, but that Poland must now conclude an agreement with the IMF on an economic reform program and much of the assistance which the Paris Club has agreed to provide will be conditional on Poland's continuing with its economic reform efforts.

As I indicated, our assistance to Poland will take the form of a reduced interest rate charged on outstanding loans. Once an agreement between Canada and Poland is signed we will begin to receive interest payments from Poland for the first time in several years.

FURTHER REDUCTION BY UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Following a statement by President Bush during President Walesa's visit to Washington last week the press reported that President Bush had stated that the U.S. would raise its reduction from 50 per cent to 70 per cent with respect to Poland's indebtedness.

Following that announcement by President Bush, a spokesman for the Canadian External Affairs Department stated that Canada would not follow the example of President Bush and up its reduction from 50 to 70 per cent.

• (1430)

I would like to ask whether this spokesman from the Department of External Affairs was revealing the federal government's policy? If so, does that mean that the federal government will not offer any hope of reducing Poland's debt further than 50 per cent?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Any hope? Honourable senators, as I indicated, Poland is our largest debtor country. It owes us $3.2 billion, most of it as a result of grain sales made during the 1970s. I do not have the figures in front of me, but I think I can say with certainty that Canada's exposure, in terms of the Polish debt on a per capita basis, is considerably greater than that of the United States.

Hon. George van Roggen: Very much larger.

Senator Murray: Very much larger, Senator van Roggen reminds me. Our exposure is much greater than that of the United States, and indeed of any other country.

In any case, with regard to the 50 per cent figure that was used, the 50 per cent reduction in its debt payments, that was the figure agreed upon by the Paris Club at its meeting the other day. It will be done, I am told, in two stages. For the first part, Poland will begin payments on its debt for the first time in a decade.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

USE OF REVENUES TO REDUCE NATIONAL DEBT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, during the GST debate, as I presume you all recall, one of the amendments brought forward—I believe by Senator Lawson—was directed to taking any surplus revenue that might be achieved through the GST and applying it by law to the reduction of the federal debt. It was a very fine statement by Senator Lawson, who had the good sense to oppose the bill.

If senators refer to the Debates of the Senate, they will see that the very excellent presentation of Senator Lawson was ridiculed, pooh-poohed and shrugged off, and the amendment was defeated.

Senator Simard: Question!

Senator Buckwold: I see that Senator Simard has had a good rest and is back in good form.

Senator Murray: And we can say the same for you.

Senator Simard: Are you prepared for another trip, senator?

Senator Buckwold: Well, if you can find the money, I am ready for the trip, senator.

In reading the Budget Speech—and I apologize for having been away for two weeks during that period. I read a response by Senator Simard, by the way, in the budget debate—I was interested, as others were, to read:

> As part of our Plan for Economic Recovery, we will ensure that all GST revenues are allocated solely to the effort to bring the public debt under control. This will be done through legislation to establish the Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund into which all GST revenues will flow.

That was very interesting, and exactly the kind of thing that was proposed in the amendment debated by the government, an amendment which, in my personal opinion, should have been accepted but was not. It was merely reaffirmation of the fact that there would be no amendments, a reaffirmation of the fact that the government, under no circumstances at any time during this discussion and debate on the GST, would accept any amendments and run the risk of sending it back to the House of Commons. Yet if one reads the Debates of the Senate and the responses of those who were involved, the idea was considered absolutely nonsensical.

My question to the Leader of the Government is to define what is meant by "all revenues." I am delighted to see the government doing what it is proposing. But does "all revenues" mean that every penny that is received from the GST will be used to reduce the debt, which we applaud, or does it mean that surplus funds over and above what was collected under the manufacturers' sales tax, which has been eliminated, will be used under that definition of "all" to reduce the debt? The emphasis on the word "all" revenues twice in the speech of the Minister of Finance would indicate to me all revenue.

Again, then, where do we replace the $20 odd billion that was forthcoming under the now defunct manufacturers' sales tax which is replaced by the GST? I would appreciate a response from the Leader of the Government in this regard.

The Minister of Finance has indicated that legislation will be forthcoming to bring this into law. In the meantime, I think the Canadian public would be very interested in knowing that every penny of the GST is going to reduce the debt and that the $20 billion revenue to the government that will otherwise be lost will come from some other place. I am not quite sure. I have never seen that explained and I am looking forward to a response from the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I cannot and should not add to the announcement that was made by the Minister of Finance in his budget. That matter was the subject of an exchange between Senator Olson and me in Senators Buckwold's absence a while back. As I indicated to Senator Olson, we expect to table legislation on this matter before very long and the honourable senator will have the answer to his question fully at that time.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, one would be led to believe by that response that the Leader of the Government does not know. It is a very simple question. Maybe it is a simple person asking it, but the question was: Does this mean all revenue or surplus revenue? Surely that has been discussed. It is a very important philosophical approach. The legislation says "all revenues." To tell us now that when the legislation comes through we will then know the answer is an evasion of a question that the Canadian public is entitled to know.

Senator Murray: I appreciate the point that the honourable senator has made, but I do not intend to take it upon myself to elaborate on the budget presented by Mr. Wilson in this respect, and I shall ask him if he wishes to do so in advance of bringing in legislation. If he does, I shall inform the honourable senator.

STATUS OF TAX ON BOOKS

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate encouraged by Senator Buckwold's question. Our mutual friend and former leader, Bob Stanfield, used to say that it is one thing to sacrifice your principles and win, but it is quite another to sacrifice your principles and lose.

I recognize that the brilliant but mischievous tactics with regard to the amendments to the GST had some merit going for them. Considering the encouragement the Prime Minister gave to that first amendment in Vancouver with respect to the GST on books of various kinds, could the Leader of the Government indicate to us whether any progress has been made, or are there any changes contemplated by the department, with respect to tax on books?

● (1440)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I remember the debate very well. I remember the amendment very well. The statement of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Finance and others, including myself, at the time was that we would examine this matter in the light of experience with the GST and in the light of the impact of the GST on that and other sectors of the Canadian economy. As we speak—March 26, 1991—the GST has been in operation for only three months. Therefore, I think it would be premature to expect the government to have arrived at a definitive conclusion at this stage.

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the honourable senator who is chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, with regard to this quotation he has attributed to Mr. Stanfield. I must say that I am a little taken aback that Mr. Stanfield should be talking of abandoning one's principles. One would not think he would do that. When the honourable senator spoke, did he consider an accepted Tory doctrine to be: Abandon your principles but try to win at least?

[Senator Murray.]

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators—

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question is out of order. I do not think the senator is allowed to ask questions of other senators in this place. However, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, the honourable senator may be subject to questions dealing with the business of the committee.

Senator Gigantès: On the point of order raised by the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, I would point out that my question affects the conduct of the committee. The honourable senator is Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications and he communicates something which is pertinent to a question posed by a member from this side. It therefore affects the question, the way in which we understand the answer, and whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who also comes from Nova Scotia and who must have known Mr. Stanfield for some time, was imbued by this Tory principle, if it is a Tory principle, that it is not really one's principles that matter but whether one wins or loses.

Senator MacDonald: Is His Honour directing me to answer the question as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is out of order.

Senator Gigantès: I would like it to be noted on the record that honourable senators opposite do not want to get into a discussion of the value of principles in politics.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I cannot let that aspersion go unremarked, because what has been done on this side of the house was merely to suggest that we adhere to the regular rules of parliamentary institutions like this one.

Senator Stewart: When did that start?

Senator Roblin: If it did not start sooner than now, then now is soon enough.

USE OF EXCESS REVENUES TO REDUCE THE NATIONAL DEBT

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, to return for a moment to the point raised by Senator Buckwold in respect of the utilization of the excess revenues deriving from the GST, during the course of the debate on Senator Lawson's motion, I, like many others, was quite taken with the idea that the excess revenues could be used to reduce the debt. But if one looked at the equation that was involved, one had to come to the conclusion that if one used those excess revenues to reduce the debt all one would do would be to increase the deficit. Therefore, what became important was to have an undertaking that the excess revenues from the GST would be used to reduce the deficit.

Honourable senators will recall that I received a letter at that time from the Minister of Finance which was tabled and printed as part of the proceedings of the Senate. That letter was to the effect that the excess revenues from the GST would be used either to lower taxes or reduce the deficit.

My question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Does he feel that this initiative the Minister of Finance has taken in the current budget—the resolution—is an attempt by the Minister of Finance to live up to the undertaking he made in that letter which was tabled in the Senate?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Yes, honourable senators, the revenues would be used to service the debt, and the undertaking has to be read in conjunction with certain other undertakings that were given in the budget, notably those relating to a cap on program expenditures over the next five years in respect of which we will also be introducing legislation, and the inflation targets that I was discussing a few moments ago with Senator Olson.

THE ESTIMATES, 1990-91

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C) ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Twenty-First Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Supplementary Estimates (C) 1990-1991) presented in the Senate on March 25, 1991.

Hon. Roch Bolduc moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, Supplementary Estimates (C) are the third and final Supplementary Estimates for the 1990-91 fiscal year. Your committee held two meetings on March 7 and March 19, 1991 to review the Supplementary Estimates. Officials of the Treasury Board Secretariat appeared as witnesses at both meetings.

Because of large reductions in statutory expenditures, resulting mainly from lapses and legislated changes, total proposed expenditures in these Supplementary Estimates are actually negative in the amount of $2.253 billion. Consequently, these Supplementary Estimates reduce the Estimates tabled for the 1990-91 year—budgetary plus non-budgetary—from $153.273 billion at the time of Supplementary Estimates (B) to $151.020 billion.

[Translation]

The negative amount of $2.253 billion in these Estimates results from a $2.843 reduction in statutory expenditures, which were included as a point of information only, combined to a proposed $590.3 million appropriation to be voted by Parliament.

The total budgetary expenditures of $150.607 billion are under the $151.3 billion contained in the revised expenditure framework for the fiscal year 1990-1991 and announced in the recent budget.

This framework takes into account the economic conditions. These evolved since the Main Estimates for that period were tabled last year. A substantial increase in major statutory expenditures was also necessary on items such as Unemployment Insurance, the Canada Assistance Plan and national debt service.

The report provides further information on particular items that members of the Committee asked questions about during the thorough scrutiny Estimates usually undergo. Later on, the Treasury Board Secretariat will answer other questions in writing.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your attention.

[English]

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, Bill C-99 is based on the final Supplementary Estimates for the current fiscal year. I want to refer now to that bill.

There are two items I want to bring to the attention of honourable senators. On page 5 of the Bill C-99, under "Department of Communications," there is a vote, vote 30c, which is for payments to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for operating expenditures in providing a broadcasting service to authorize the transfer of $28 million from communications vote 40 of Appropriation Act No. 2 for the current fiscal year for the purposes of this vote and to provide a further amount of $44.9 million.

The transfer and the provision of the new money were questioned in the committee, and the committee has reported to the Senate in its Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate at page 2381 as follows:

• (1450)

> An appropriation of $44.9 million is being requested for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to help defray severance payments and other benefits for the 1,100 employees the CBC plans to lay off, pursuant to the closure of 11 television stations announced in December 1990. As well, there is an inter-vote transfer of capital to operating expenditures of $28.0 million to offset a shortfall in advertising revenues.

Given the intense criticism directed at the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation arising from its decision to terminate certain local and regional broadcasting, it seems to me that members of the Senate ought to realize that not only are those parts of the country losing the discontinued services, but that the Canadian taxpayer is being required to put up millions of dollars to pay for this downsizing. That is one point that I wanted to bring to the attention of the house.

The other vote that I want to bring to the attention of the house appears at page 13 of the bill. It is vote 1c under the Privy Council. The amount that the Senate is being asked to authorize is $17,960,000.

What is this for? It is for the so-called Spicer Commission. In the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate on March 25, 1991, we are informed by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance that the Privy Council estimates include $18 million for the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future. This forum was established under the Inquiries Act, which gives the Forum no authority to spend funds without the specific approval of Parliament.

By vote 1c the Senate will give its support to the Spicer Commission to spend those millions of dollars. We asked the officials from the Treasury Board if they could give assurance that would deflate the notion that some members of the commission are attracting very large payments for their services.

The representatives of the Treasury Board staff said that they were not able to do that, and that we would have to await the Public Accounts of Canada. Those accounts will be available some time late in the fall.

In the meantime, the Senate will be voting $18 million for the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991, and questions with regard to per diem remuneration remain unanswered.

I think honourable senators should know what they are voting for when they vote for this bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the honourable Senator Bolduc, seconded by the honourable Senator Chaput-Rolland, that this report be adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Stewart: On division.

Report adopted, on division.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1991-92

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is my intention at this time to ask permission of the Senate to bring forward Bill C-97, the borrowing authority bill. I understand that there is a general consensus among honourable senators that we at least introduce this bill for second reading at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-97, an act to provide borrowing authority.

He said: Honourable senators are aware that the Financial Administration Act requires that statutory borrowing authority be obtained from Parliament before the government may increase its outstanding debt. To be clear, this requirement refers to new borrowing and not to the refinancing of existing debt which is authorized under section 46 of the Financial Administration Act. Therefore, the rule is that with the exception of temporary short-term borrowing under section 47 of the act, all new borrowing by the government must be authorized by Parliament.

[Senator Stewart.]

Bill C-97 then comes before us at this time as part of the regular process by which the government carries on its financial business. The budget and Main Estimates for 1991-92 have been tabled. With the new fiscal year fast approaching, the request for borrowing authority for the same year is being made. Background to this legislation is provided in the Estimates and in the budget publications.

Bill C-97 itself requests borrowing authority in the amount of $26.4 billion for 1991-92. This is comprised of $23.4 billion to cover anticipated borrowing requirements, and the normal $3 billion reserve to manage foreign exchange transactions.

The borrowing requirements include the government's net anticipated financial requirements from the budget of $21.6 billion and $1.8 billion, an estimated exchange fund account earnings.

I should explain that the request for borrowing authority to cover exchange fund earnings reflects the fact that they give rise to additional Canadian dollar borrowing requirements. This is because although they are reported in the Public Accounts as budgetary revenues, they are, in fact, retained in the exchange fund account and are not available to finance the operations of the government. Hence, the $1.8 billion in borrowing to cover that account.

Bill C-97 provides, as usual, that all unused borrowing authority in excess of $3 billion will be cancelled on March 31, 1991. This preserves the government's non-lapsing reserve to be carried forward into the new fiscal year.

Finally, honourable senators, the bill provides that the $3 billion reserve granted as part of last year's borrowing authority legislation will be cancelled on March 31, 1991, or on the date Bill C-97 comes into force, whichever is later. This prevents the accumulation of non-lapsing reserves from previous years, but does so in a way which will not be disruptive.

In closing, I want to indicate that all borrowing authority granted for 1990-91 has now been used up. The government announced on March 21 that Treasury bills to be offered for sale on March 28 are to be sold under the authority granted by section 47 of the Financial Administration Act.

Honourable senators will appreciate that we are drawing close to the end of the financial year and that it is important to the smooth functioning of the government's program of borrowing that this legislation be in place as quickly as possible. If because of uncertainty or delay it is necessary to borrow only for short terms, the government cannot maintain the desired balance of short term and long-term debt and thereby maintain a prudent level of exposure to changes in interest rates. As well, the functioning of our borrowing program will be less smooth.

● (1500)

I thank honourable senators for letting this bill come forward as expeditiously as it has, and I would be most pleased to have it referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance if it is the wish of the Senate so to do. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if the Deputy Leader would clarify one point in his statement? He said that all of the borrowing authority for 1990-91 had been exhausted. Does that include also the non-lapsing $3 billion? Has all of that been used up?

Senator Doody: That is my understanding, senator.

Senator MacEachen: In any event, both have been used. Honourable senators, I intend to make some comments tomorrow before we send the bill to committee and, therefore, I would like to adjourn the debate now.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1991-92

SECOND READING

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella moved the second reading of Bill C-100, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1992.

[Translation]

—He said: Honourable senators, Appropriation Act No. 1, 1991-92, Bill C-100, grants Interim Supply for the first three months of the new fiscal year.

The 1991-92 Estimates were tabled in the Senate on February 28 this year, and immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

[English]

This appropriation bill contains $13,145,000 of voted items which are required to meet government expenditure requirements to the end of June, while the Main Estimates are being reviewed by the various committees. A second appropriation bill will be tabled prior to June 30, 1991, to secure release of the balance of the Estimates.

This present bill contains a general proportion of three-twelfths of all votes plus additional proportions for some 34 votes. The additional proportions are required mainly to meet payments of a seasonal nature in some programs, to meet payments in accordance with certain agreements, and to meet the need in other instances to make major payments before the end of June.

I should point out, honourable senators, that, as usual, in no case is Parliament being asked to pass the entire amount of a vote.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, in concluding, I would like to stress four points.

First, the proportions requested in the bill are designed to meet all essential requirements of the Government of Canada until June 30, 1991.

Second, the bill does not release the total amount of any item.

Third, the bill has the usual format of Interim Supply bills.

Finally, passage of this bill will not jeopardize the rights or privileges of members of Parliament, which include scrutiny of budget items when the Estimates are in committee for consideration, or in the course of subsequent debate in the House; the usual commitment is hereby made that those rights and privileges will be respected and will be neither abolished nor restricted in any way as a result of the passage of said bill.

[English]

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, the honourable senator who has just spoken has described the bill accurately. I should like to ask about two of the votes. As the honourable senator has said, in most cases the government is asking Parliament to provide three-twelfths of the amounts sought in the Main Estimates, but there are some exceptions. One of the exceptions appears on page 5 of the bill. It is the famous vote 5 for the Treasury Board, the so-called contingencies vote, a wonderful vote that can be used by the government for any purpose. Let me read the language of the vote:

> Government contingencies—Subject to the approval of the Treasury Board, to supplement other votes for paylist and other requirements and to provide for miscellaneous minor and unforeseen expenses not otherwise provided for including awards under the Public Servants Inventions Act and authority to re-use any sums allotted for non-paylist requirements and repaid to this appropriation from other appropriations.

That is all very clear. The government, in the Main Estimates, is asking for $400 million of this unearmarked money, but it is now asking Parliament to vote three-quarters of that as interim supply. What is the explanation for that? What is the need for a large part of the vote to be provided to the government at this time? I assume that this is not a seasonable requirement. That is my first question.

While Senator Kinsella is turning up the answer to that, let me call attention to another vote. It is on page 13. In this case, it is the Privy Council vote no. 1, which reads:

> Privy Council—Program expenditures, including the operation of the Prime Minister's residence; the payment to each member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada who is a Minister without Portfolio or a Minister of State who does not preside over a Ministry of State of a salary equal to the salary paid to Ministers of State who preside over Ministries of State under the Salaries Act, as adjusted pursuant to the Parliament of Canada Act and pro rata for any period less than a year; and the grant listed in the Estimates.

Now, the total amount in the Main Estimates is approximately $73 million. By the bill now before the Senate, the Senate is being asked to vote $24,334,666.67. This, as I said, is larger than three-twelfths. Again, I assume that there is not a seasonal explanation as to why the operation of the Prime Minister's residence is more expensive in April, May or June, or why the salaries of the Ministers without Portfolio who do not preside over a Ministry of State should be higher in this period. I wonder what the explanation is. Why is this fourtwelfths and not three-twelfths as in the case of most of the other votes?

There are other cases, honourable senators, where a larger percentage than the three-twelfths is being sought, but in most of those cases one can make at least a shrewd guess as to why the money is needed relatively early in the fiscal year. But in these two cases we ought to be given specific information, either now or at a later stage of the bill.

• (1510)

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, I would hesitate to make a shrewd guess at this time. I too had looked into your first reference, honourable senator, and I cannot find my note on that, but I will attempt to provide you with answers in some detail tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1990-91

SECOND READING

Hon. Roch Bolduc moved that an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1991, be read the third time.

Honourable senators, I want to take this opportunity to introduce Appropriation Bill No. 4, 1990-91, which concerns Supplementary Estimates (C) for 1990-91. This year's last Supplementary Estimates concern votes worth about $589 million. Statutory spending dropped by $2,843 billion, a net reduction of $2,253 billion. Total estimates for the year 1990-91 represent $151 billion. The Supplementary Estimates are about 2 per cent of this year's Main Estimates.

The Estimates were tabled in the Senate on March 5, 1991, and referred to the Standing Committee on National Finance on March 6. Representatives of Treasury Board appeared before the committee to answer questions on March 7 and March 19.

As was explained in committee, statutory items were changed for two main reasons, the first being the passage of two bills, one to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act (Bill C-21) and the second to implement various measures announced in the February 19,1990 Budget (Bill C-69). The second reason is the revised cost projections on which many statutory estimates are based, depending on changes in economic and demographic variables.

[Senator Stewart.]

[English]

Honourable senators, Parliament is being asked to approve $558 million in budgetary expenditures, which is within the government's previously announced expenditure framework. Major items include $154 million for Revenue Canada Customs and Excise to administer collection of the goods and services tax; $74 million for Public Works Canada for a variety of purposes including accommodation, real property projects and access requirements for disabled persons; $73 million for additional transfer payments to Indian and Inuit people and to the Territorial Governments; $45 million for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation toward the one-time cost of restructuring; $33 million additional payments for provincial health payroll taxes (Treasury Board); $22 million as contributions in the operation of legal aid systems; $18 million for the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future; and $18 million for the Fisheries Adjustment Program for Atlantic Canada.

There are some 39 $1.00 votes in these Supplementary Estimates. A listing of these votes, containing additional explanations for the five miscellaneous votes, has been provided to members of the committee. Honourable senators, should you require additional information, I will be pleased to try to provide it. Thank you.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Stewart: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Bolduc, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

CONSIDERATION OF TWELFTH REPORT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the twelfth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, presented in the Senate on March 25, 1991.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to speak to this report. By way of explanation, what was tabled is an interim report. I wish it were a final and complete report, following a full set of public hearings on Energy Options, the report of the group chaired by Mr. Tom Kierans, who was one of our three witnesses, entitled Energy and Canadians into the Twenty-first Century.

Unfortunately, due to other activities in the fall and some uncertainty about when the house might prorogue, the committee did not proceed with hearings and, accordingly, you see before you now a partial report which is an attempt on the part of the committee to highlight what it wanted to achieve in its hearings. Hopefully it will be something that will be used by the committee as it is formed after prorogation to conclude work on this important inquiry. The inquiry might change, but what was on our minds was a close look at what might be called the demand side of the energy equation—that is, energy efficiency and means of conserving energy.

I cannot let the occasion pass, honourable senators opposite will understand, without drawing attention to my own concerns about supply side issues relating to lack of specific objectives in the government's energy statements. Its policy is one of making laudable but abstract statements about what it intends to achieve for the Canadian energy future. The specifics are missing. I believe we covered that subject in our report on Petro-Canada. Petro-Canada probably should have been studied after Energy Options, but it was completed first and, if we had not done it then, it would not have been done at all. In any event, hopefully that will contribute to a better understanding of Petro-Canada and the concerns about supply side issues.

The other matter I would like to discuss at this time is what is happening in the United States, which, in many respects, is an equivalent of energy and Canadians into the twenty-first century. It is a series of reports encompassing an interim report on a national energy strategy for the United States and now a first edition of a national energy strategy. It related to our twelfth report because the same process that is ongoing in the U.S. is now ongoing in Canada. Your committee has played a role in this process in terms of assisting with policy direction and providing ideas on what should be Canada's energy future.

Increasingly Canada's energy future, as we have emphasized before, is not enough. It is North America's energy future and the world energy future with which we must be concerned. The committee, as it has done on three other occasions, visited Washington last week for two days. I was accompanied by Senator Buchanan and Senator Sylvain. The committee was served by its clerk, Nicole McMillan, and two researchers from the Library of Parliament, Dan Shaw and Lynn Myers.

I should like to take a moment to talk about what we learned. It is particularly timely and, I believe, important because it follows on the conclusion of the war in the Gulf; and it also follows closely on the signing of the Air Quality Accord on acid rain on March 13, 1991, between Canada and the United States. The committee met first with specialists from the Congressional Research Service. We were briefed extensively on the U.S. Clean Air Act. By way of specific reference, it is called TITLE 4: Acid Rain Legislation. The act is the primary American response to acid rain problems in the United States, and reinforces the U.S. commitment to Canada as it formalized the signing of the Air Quality Accord by our two countries.

Before I report to you on this act, an environmental preamble is in order. We have some 300,000 lakes in Canada that are vulnerable to acid rain. Approximately 150,000 are being damaged, and more than 14,000 are acidified. About 55 per cent of eastern Canada's forests, which generate $14 billion worth of forest products, are in areas where rainfall is acidic. More than 80 per cent of Canadians live in areas with high acid rain pollution levels.

Since 1985, Canada has attempted to control acid rain. Regulatory and program measures have since achieved a 40 per cent reduction in 1980 sulphur dioxide emissions, but, more importantly, the country has a goal to reduce annual sulphur dioxide emissions to 2.3 million tonnes in 1995.

In brief, I should observe that Canada is currently behind the United States in taking action. However, we are catching up quickly. As you know, because of significant transboundary flows emanating from the United States, Canadian efforts alone are not enough. In this regard, the U.S. Clean Air Act was signed into law in November 1990. TITLE 4 sets goals for January 1, 2000 of reducing sulphur dioxide emissions by 10 million tons and annual nitrous oxide emissions by 2 million tons from 1980 levels. Beginning in the year 2000 total utility sulphur dioxide emissions will be limited to 8.9 million tons. Total industrial sulphur dioxide emissions will be limited to 5.6 million tons and small sources will account for some 2.2 million tons.

TITLE 4 will be implemented through a two-phase process. Under Phase 1 owners and operators of 111 facilities listed in the law are required to reduced emissions by 3.5 million tons annually by January 1, 1995. These facilities include all those with capacities in excess of 100 megawatts and emit at a rate greater than 2 1/2 pounds of sulphur dioxide per million BTUs.

I am spending a bit of time on this matter because both Canada and the United States have to develop a means of achieving these objectives of limiting emissions. I believe that in this regard the U.S. is ahead of us in some areas. For example, it proposes to create allowances that will be traded commercially and will have value. Canada may perhaps find this precedent useful in implementing its own objectives for limiting sulphur dioxide emissions.

Under Phase 2 all utility facilities greater than 25 megawatts are affected by the bill. This phase lowers the threshold emissions rate of 2.5 pounds to 1.2 million pounds per million BTUs. For existing sources that emit at a rate of less than 1.2 pounds per million BTUs, their allowable emissions are kept at a specific emission rate times an historic average fuel consumption level. To maintain emissions reductions beyond the Phase 2 compliance date, the law essentially caps sulphur dioxide emissions and existing individual sources through a tonnage limitation. Sulphur dioxide emissions from plants commencing operations after enactment must be completely offset by initial reductions at existing facilities beginning after Phase 2 compliance.

The law also creates a comprehensive permit and emission allowance system to ease the industry's overall cost of compliance. An allowance is a limited authorization to emit a short ton of sulphur dioxide. Facilities receive allowances based on specific formulas contained in the law. Allowance sales and auctions are to be held to improve liquidity and availability of allowances for utilities and independent power producers that need them.

It is envisaged that the allowances will trade on an exchange. I do not know what kind of exchange, but perhaps something like the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. The value will be determined at some point in the introduction of trading in the allowances. Anyone in the U.S. can buy the allowances. One of the possibilities might be that organizations like the Sierra Club and people who are anxious in buying down the overall rate at which emissions can be made into the atmosphere will buy them up, and they would be taken off the market. In other words, there is no requirement that the allowance be used.

The legislation is incomplete in that we have only seen the act as it was passed and signed, and a treaty has been entered into. However, someone observed that something like 10 per cent of what is required is in the act, and something like 90 per cent will have to come in the form of regulation. According to the U.S. deadlines, regulations are to be in place within 18 months. The speculation is that because of the short timeframe and the difficulty in actually describing what these allowances are, the legislation, at least at this point, says more about what they are not rather than what they are. However, they will be of enduring value and can be traded, bought and sold. There is also speculation that there will be an initial period of difficulty while matters get sorted out. However, all those we spoke to seemed to be supportive of the idea and were convinced that it would work.

One interesting question that came up from time to time was whether or not Canada should pursue the same approach, and, if we did, whether or not these allowances should be traded between the two countries. Interestingly enough, there was quite a bit of support for the idea of trading allowances between the two countries. For that to happen, we would have to have closely harmonized legislation. I am not sure whether Canadians would be interested in that approach. My initial reaction was that Canadians would want to be careful about selling allowances, if, in fact, we did harmonize our systems to the point where trade could occur, because it might limit Canada's ability to value add within our country.

Having addressed those issues and those kinds of concerns, it may well be that there is room for that kind of trade to occur between the two countries. In any event, if Canadians sold allowances and found themselves with very tight caps on emissions, they would simply have to address a means of producing goods without emitting sulphur dioxide or nitric oxide.

The Clean Air Act promises immediate environmental relief in Canada. Anyone living down-wind from a U.S. incinerator or power plant, or drinking from the Great Lakes contaminated by atmospheric pollution, can find something encouraging in this Clean Air Act. Estimates suggest that the annual transboundary flows of sulphur dioxide from the U.S. to Canada will decline by 5.1 million tonnes in 1970 to 1.9 million tonnes in the year 2000, or by 37.3 per cent. In return, Canada to U.S. annual sulphur dioxide flows will decline a total of 33 per cent from 1970 to the year 2000. It appears that the Americans are about to catch up to Canada in its efforts to restrain the trade of sulphur dioxide emissions.

[Senator Hays.]

The committee met a congressman and staff of one of the house sub-committees and it also met with senior officials of the Department of Energy. Clean air legislation is in place subject to the regulations being implemented within 18 months and, as I said, Canada and the United States have already used it.

I would now like to turn to that which is up in the air, namely, the development of, in my opinion, a much-needed comprehensive energy policy which is sensitive to both supply side and demand side concerns. Our interim report describes what is at issue in Canada and talks a little bit about what we have done. It highlights some of our concerns about what we should be doing. In the United States that initiative is prompted right now by the National Energy Strategy. I wish they had called it a national energy program and maybe they will by the time it is over, but in any event it is the first item on the American legislative agenda. I will refer to it as NES for short.

Apart from the many legislative problems that this draft bill, which has been produced by the administration, will receive and draw fire in Congress about, and the different form that the NES will ultimately take, it is clearly the U.S. administration's most well articulated attempt at setting an energy policy. In particular, the NES specifically addresses the country's security of supply matters, something our committee has been prompting the Canadian government to do.

In brief, the NES highlights that may be of interest to honourable senators are that it a proposal for a new national policy to increase energy supplies and reduce demand. If implemented as proposed, it is expected to result in reduction of oil demand of 3.4 million barrels per day over projected demand by the year 2010. In the same timeframe, domestic oil production will increase by 3.8 million barrels per day over projected levels if the plan is introduced. NES would also increase the electricity derived from renewable sources by 16 per cent. It introduces alternative transportation fuels such as compressed natural gas, ethanol and methanol to reduce a further 2 million barrels per day of oil consumption. The bill will reduce the demand for electricity by 10 per cent primarily by reducing the degree of regulation in this sector.

For Canada, the most controversial proposal is the opening up of the coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska. This reserve borders on the Yukon Territory and forms an important part of the calving grounds for the Porcupine caribou herd. The Secretary of Energy has told a committee hearing before Congress that the President will be advised to veto any legislative package that does not include this provision, that is, the opening up of ANWR.

This issue will be hotly contested by environmental groups in the U.S. as well as by a number of members of Congress. The administration claims that its legislative package contains a considerable number of provisions which will govern ANWR development with a view to protecting the environment from damage. Proponents of drilling in ANWR believe that it has the potential to be the third largest producing region in the United States and it is being counted on to provide a large part of the projected increase in domestic production to which I referred earlier, that is, an increase of 3.8 million barrels per day in domestic production.

Many observers expected to see stricter Corporate Average Fuel Efficiency Standards, or CAFE. CAFE relates to requirements on automobile manufacturers for overall fleet efficiency standards.

In the NES this measure with respect to CAFE has been left out. In fact, the energy secretaries advised congress that the President will be advised to veto any legislation which includes them. Apparently there will be a very strong lobby against stricter CAFE standards, particularly by U.S. automakers.

The NES proposes a number of changes in the way that the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, FERC, handles applications regarding natural gas pipelines and nuclear power plant construction. This is also important to Canadians because of our major gas exports into that country. Time required to obtain a pipeline construction permit would be reduced, but FERC would still have to be satisfied that state and federal environmental laws were not breached. Only FERC would be responsible for administration of National Environmental Policy Act matters with respect to gas pipelines. Proposed changes to FERC regulatory procedures are also aimed at speeding up the various approval processes. The NES further proposes to move FERC into the Department of Energy, but this initiative is not expected to succeed. That is a conclusion that may or may not be borne out, but it was based on discussions we had, that is, moving FERC from a independent agency which was not partisan—if anything, it is bipartisan because appointments of commissioners to FERC are approved by the Congress—into DOE where it would become partisan, that is, the administration would appoint the FERC body members. In any event, because of that, and because of the longstanding existence of FERC as an independent agency, it seemed to us unlikely, based on our discussions, that that would materialize.

Here we come into the wonderful world of division of powers in the United States. There are more than 80 individual bills before Congress dealing with energy, and in the aftermath of the NES publication more are expected to follow. In all there are now 38 bills before Congress which deal with energy conservation and renewable energy. About one-third of the measures contained in the NES will require legislation, and this has been introduced into both houses of Congress by the administration.

I am going to talk about two congressional initiatives, one in the Senate and one in the House. As you can imagine from the number of bills that have been introduced, there are many initiatives and it is very difficult to anticipate which ones will be most influential in determining the final shape of the legislation, but it is clear from discussions that we had that there is a fierce determination to have this process completed by the fall or certainly by the end of the year. So that as difficult as the United States is to govern, based on the division of powers and the two houses of Congress and the multitude of initiatives that can happen, particularly on the House side, they do make the unworkable work by actually having this determination to bring it to a head and a conclusion by a certain time.

In any event, the most important bill, next to the NES, that is, the administration's bill, is the Johnston-Wallop Bill introduced in the Senate by the chairman of the Energy Committee and the ranking minority member.

● (1540)

There are many similar provisions in their legislation to the NES including the drilling in ANWR, but it also has a number of key differences. For instance, the Johnson-Wallop Bill has more emphasis on conservation than does the NES. The Johnson-Wallop Bill also has more measures designed to promote the greater use of alternative energy sources. A second difference in this bill is the inclusion—and this is interesting to Canadians because it appears in both Senate and House bills—of a 9 per cent import fee to fund the Strategic Petroleum Reserve. This would probably contravene the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement—not probably; I think it would contravene that agreement.

We did have discussions about that. The idea here is that because they do not have any new money to take out of their general revenue, they have to find ways in this legislation to fund initiatives that cost money. One of the initiatives that the United States feels is important is an enhancement of their Strategic Petroleum Reserve up to a billion barrels, which we have talked about before and to which I have referred in speeches briefly. It is important because the U.S. is on its way to 60 per cent dependence on imported oil. It is currently at 50 per cent. It will take time, even if all this goes through, to catch hold. Their Strategic Petroleum Reserve was designed to cover them at a time when they were importing roughly only 40 per cent. Therefore, they are way off side, and they want to do something about this; and what has been proposed is this import tax on all imported oil. Of course, that runs directly into the face of our access to their market. We had a similar tax called Superfund which was a tax on imported oil, the proceeds of which went to address environmental issues; and that recently has come off. In any event, we in our discussions made that point. I am optimistic, based on my understanding of what is happening, that in the end they would do something other than what is proposed.

When we were there we had a meeting with several representatives of energy efficiency groups. This was to give us some balance. We had meetings with the administration, with people on both sides of the Congress. We wanted to meet, as we have done in the past, with some people who are interested in what was going on, to get their perspective. We chose to meet with people interested in energy efficiency and these groups identified their national priorities as environmental quality, economic competitiveness and energy security.

Of course, they were critical of the NES in particular, and we obtained a lot of information about their concerns. We were told that energy efficiency offers a practical means of achieving national goals. It protects the environment in the short run by reducing acid rain, and in the longer run by reducing the risk of global climate change. It strengthens energy security at a time when domestic oil production is declining and we are becoming excessively dependent on oil imports; that is, the U.S. Energy efficiency enhances the competitiveness of the U.S., and for that matter Canadian industries, in world markets by reducing the cost of production, and serves the consumer by cutting lighting, cooling and heating costs in homes and offices.

By way of example, these groups indicated to us that if the U.S. had a national goal of reducing energy intensity by 2.5 per cent per year, the country would likely realize the following:

(1) the U.S. would save between $1.3 and $2.2 trillion over the next 20 years in constant 1987 dollars. The total investment in conservation measures required to achieve this saving would be in the order of $300 to $500 billion;

(2) the nation would reduce the projected increase in oil imports by 2 to 3.6 million barrels per day or by $18 to $40 billion;

(3) on the same basis U.S. industries would improve their competitiveness through lower energy costs, deferring the need for investment in new power plants alone, and could free more than $100 billion for capital investment and other industries.

Finally, we received a report on the consequences of the Gulf War. We received this analysis of two likely scenarios for the world oil market in the wake of the Gulf crisis that has just concluded. Prior to the Iraqi invasion, Kuwait had been producing about 2 million barrels per day. However, Kuwaiti oil production facilities have suffered considerable damage, as we all know. The only Kuwaiti oil production that is expected to be available immediately is about 100,000 barrels per day from the offshore portion of the Neutral Zone. Based on currently available information, no other Kuwaiti production is expected to be on line for at least six to 12 months. Damage reports have estimated that over 500 wells are on fire or almost half of the total onshore wells in Kuwait, comprising 743 and, in the Neutral Zone, 453. Preliminary estimates indicate that it will take two years or longer to put out these fires and bring the wells under control.

Restoration of Iraqi and Kuwaiti production across the two scenarios leads to a production estimate of .42 to .4 million barrels per day in the fourth quarter of 1991 and rising to between 2.2 and 5.3 million barrels per day in the fourth quarter of 1992. However, at the present time there is a large amount of excess oil stock available worldwide. In order to reflect the uncertainty associated with the drawdown of these stocks, a range of assumptions was used. In the fast recovery case, it is assumed that the current excess stocks—about 200 million barrels over and above normal levels at the end of 1990—are utilized by the end of 1991. In the slow recovery case, the excess stocks are assumed to be utilized by the end of 1992.

[Senator Hays.]

In summary, this analysis suggests:

(1) world oil prices will likely range between $15 to $20 per barrel through 1992;

(2) if there is slow restoration of Iraqi and Kuwaiti production, prices could be sustained near the $20 range through 1992 even if other OPEC countries continue near current production levels; and

(3) production and demand for oil in the U.S. will not be greatly affected by this range of prices in 1991, but in 1992 with sustained lower prices, there will be a significant growth in oil demand and a decrease in domestic production.

The final item that we dealt with when we were in Washington meeting with officials of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission who briefed us on a very important initiative that they have under way, is that they have just completed the first phase of a deliverability study. They found that they were unable to predict with much certainty or accuracy deliverability requirements in the United States. They have done a great deal of work to address that problem and will have in place information systems that will give them within a 2 per cent discrepancy what deliverability will be at any given point in time.

Weather is always unpredictable and uncertain. I could not figure out why they were so worried about that. It struck me that it might be a concern because of the fact that our gas markets are becoming shorter and shorter—that is, shorter-term contracts along the lines of an earlier energy committee recommendation about imposing core markets to ensure security of supply. I do not think that was the motivation, but, in any event, they will have better information on the deliverability than they ever had before as a result of that initiative. We were briefed on that. They had urged Canada to do the same, and one of the things that I have promised myself to do is to find out how accurate our deliverability predictions are.

Honourable senators, that is perhaps a longer than wanted summary of what it was that we discovered when we were on our fact-finding mission to Washington Thursday and Friday of last week. I think it is timely to make the report now and to relate it to the twelfth report of the committee which, as I said earlier, approaches the Canadian problem from basically the same perspective as the U.S., our entry into the problem being the 1988 Energy and Canadians into the 21st Century Report. I have gone on longer than I thought I would, and so I will conclude. I will not adjourn the debate in case someone else wants to continue at a later time.

• (1550)

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, my honourable friend, Senator Hays, was well advised to bring to the notice of this chamber the findings of his visit to Washington, where he discussed the National Energy Strategy that has been developing in that country. I suppose an examination of that strategy indicates how difficult it is to devise an energy strategy which meets all the considerations that might be brought to mind, and particularly in that country the present strategy bears clear marks of the compromises that have been made from the original attempts to devise such a policy to the one that is before the American people now. I hazard the guess that there will be some substantial changes even yet before that becomes part of American law. But it is important for us, because what happens down there in that field of energy, whether or not it applies to us directly in all respects—which, of course, it does not—certainly does have an influence on the thinking in this country and also highlights aspects of the problem which perhaps we have to pay attention to though they may affect Americans more than they affect Canadians.

I particulary hope that the committee will from time to time take note of the implications of this new strategy for Canada. The question of our markets in the United States, and the energy trade in the United States, are part of the considerations that we should take into account with respect to this matter. The environmental aspect of the matter, particularly when one considers airborne pollution and the fact that environmental problems cannot be restricted by national boundaries, may also have an effect on our activities in this country. We need to examine that whole policy quite carefully to determine what aspects are important in respect of their implication or their application to our problems here in Canada.

However, I want to return to the report itself, because there are some things in there which I feel are well worth emphasis. The first is that the committee is now going to pay more attention to the question of demand for energy than it has in the past. I think that is a very good thing. When we look at the activities of the present government, we will see that a number of initiatives have been put in place so far that have a bearing on the demand side of the equation. There is an ongoing program on energy efficiency, and diversity initiative, I think it is called. It has been working for the past several years and the committee might be well advised to study it to see what progress has been made and just how suitable it is for the problems at hand. The government has been conducting a demonstration with respect to the use of natural gas in various kinds of automotive vehicles, such as buses. I myself would like to know how that is getting along. Then, of course, there is the program to promote natural gas and ethanol as more environment-friendly fuels than the ones we generally use, which has attracted quite a large financial endowment of some $28 million, and I would be interested to know how that is getting along.

I think the most interesting development recently in the demand side of the energy equation is the one that was announced the other day with respect to the agreement between the Government of Canada and Ontario Hydro about power saving. The Government of Canada and Ontario Hydro have come to an understanding as to how they should go about the business of finding out how to use less electricity. That is a very significant aspect of the problem. Estimates are that they will be able to reduce the use of power in federal government office buildings and structures in the province of Ontario by some 17 per cent with a 2.5 year pay-out. When one reflects upon it, that is quite an astonishing and hopeful conclusion. I am particularly encouraged by the fact that when the minister made the announcement with respect to this, he indicated that he intended to adopt the same policies, if he could, in the rest of Canada. That is a initiative on the demand side which I find gratifying. If one could reduce the use of electricity in Canada by 17 per cent all over, the consequences for the building of new power plants and many other things are quite remarkable.

When we were discussing the report on energy options, a Mr. Amory Lovins, who is an American expert on this matter, appeared before the committee. He gave us a pretty good and rather convincing presentation to the effect that, with respect to electricity, we could do much better than a reduction of 17 per cent if we really put our minds to it. The implications of that possibility for the energy system in Canada, and for the building of new hydroelectric plants, is indeed quite staggering. When he was able to show how it worked successfully in certain parts of the United States it convinced me that this was an avenue that should be very thoroughly explored. I am glad that the committee is going to take this matter under consideration in the near future. I think the initiative taken by the government and Ontario Hydro is a very hopeful indication of what might possibly be expected in respect to this matter.

I suggest to the house that the demand side of the energy problem is going to become the key to future policy. When one talks about a comprehensive energy policy in Canada, I think the question of demand supply has to be one of the most important and foremost factors that are considered in that respect.

The other thing the committee is going to do is take a look at the effect of the energy system on the environment. As we all know, and as Senator Hays has indicated very clearly in his comments this afternoon, these are also very important matters.

I remind the house that a couple of days ago the House of Commons committee on the environment produced an extensive report on this subject. I have had a quick look at some of the recommendations and they are numerous. They cover everything that I could think of with respect to environmental problems and energy and propose a very ambitious program which will tax the goodwill of the citizens of Canada to implement, because not only do they call upon the government to do certain things—which, of course, is to be expected—but the report also makes it quite clear that environmental protection starts at home. It starts with the number of trips one makes in one's car, that being the biggest contributor to environmental problems in many parts of the world. When one considers what is involved in asking Canadians or anyone else to drive less to save the climate, one understands the problems that are involved, and they are not to be solved easily.

I hope that the Senate committee will take the report of the House of Commons under consideration, as I am sure it will, and if there is anything that we can usefully add that will either make the problem more apparent or make the solutions more palatable, then it would be something about which the Senate could well occupy its time.

My point in rising is merely to thank my friend for giving us the picture of the development of energy policy in the United States, to tell him that I think the committee is well advised to consider its pursuit of demand problems in the energy field, and that while the House of Commons may have preempted the bulk of the energy investigations that we might otherwise take into account, nevertheless there may be some things that we can usefully add to what they have already done; so I think the committee has lots of work to do.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

THE HONOURABLE GUY CHARBONNEAU

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn:
>
> That the privileges of Honourable Senators having been constantly abused by the Speaker of the Senate, the Senate do advise the Prime Minister that Senator Guy Charbonneau is unfit to continue to be the Speaker of the Senate.—(Honourable Senator Cools).

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, Senator Cools has agreed to yield to me on this matter.

Honourable senators, it is with a heavy heart that I get involved in this particular debate on this motion. After almost 40 years in the parliamentary arena, a little more than 20 in this place, I suppose I have lost some of my zest for confrontation and argument of that nature. Yet, the issue is so serious that I feel compelled to participate.

● (1600)

Perhaps I would have, nevertheless, refrained from getting involved had it not been for the article that appeared in The Idler magazine of January-February 1991 in which our colleague, Senator Doyle, had an article entitled, "Red Chamber Hell", which I assume was meant to explain what had gone on in this place but which, to me, is a piece of fiction. I regret to say that, because I have always considered Senator Doyle to be a serious writer. Yet I can only categorize this piece as a rewriting of history/fiction insofar as what went on this chamber.

The issue before us is a very serious one. It goes to the fundamentals of British parliamentary practice and of a free, democratic society. Although I do not come from that tradition, not being of British stock, I am an admirer of the British parliamentary system. I think it provides the best when properly followed—the best in the systems of discussion, yield and decision-making in a free society. The essentials in that are that there be rules and that those rules be followed. If we cannot have that in this arena, then the system itself is at risk. What went on in this chamber from the period September to December put our system very much at risk. My concern is not so much to fight bygones as to ensure that this never happens again and that we establish, and re-establish, in this place a sensible, respectable method of operation.

Honourable senators, I do not in any way fault the new senators who are in this place. Most of the new senators have come here with little or no previous parliamentary practice. It is understandable that they would arrive here—and many of them came in the very heat of debate—not knowing the rules, not knowing the background, and, indeed, not knowing anything of the traditions of this place or of the parliamentary system. I do not blame them. How could they have known those things if they had not been part of them? It is understandable that they would not realize that this place is, indeed, very different from the House of Commons or from any provincial parliamentary system in Canada. It is not the same, and the fundamental difference is that the Speaker in this place is appointed by the Prime Minister—not simply this Prime Minister—and that is in the Constitution. It goes back to the origins of the Senate in 1867. For that very reason, when this Senate was formed it was formed on the basis of the British House of Lords. There are no hereditary peers, it is true, but the practices, forms, rules and structures of this place come essentially from the British House of Lords.

Here, for example, is what Abraham says in Abraham & Hawtrey's Parliamentary Dictionary, London, Butterworths, 1970. Honourable Senators, I will not read all of what he says, but he does say the following:

> The Speaker of the House of Lords has no authority beyond that of any other peer to determine questions of order. Such questions can be settled only by the House itself. He has no power to enforce the rules of the House or to maintain order in debate. He cannot adjourn the House or do anything else without the consent of the House, except put the question, collect the voices, and announce the decision.

You may say, honourable senators, that that, of course, is the House of Lords, that times have changed and that it no longer applies here. I will give you some more recent views on the subject. During a debate on the reform of the Senate rules, the Senate had gone through an in-depth study of its rules in 1969. Here is what was said by the Honourable Senator Jacques Flynn, who many of you will remember and who, indeed, I believe, was behind the scenes all through the fall session when we were involved in the GST debate. On February 26, 1969, Senator Flynn said:

> On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that there is an unwritten rule which may be of use to Senator Grosart, that the Honourable the Speaker will not intervene unless some senator objects.

Not too long after that another distinguished senator—and I am delighted that he is in the chamber this afternoon—the Honourable Senator Molson, who was then chairman of the rules committee, offered to the Senate his interpretation of the role of the Speaker. On December 10, 1970, Senator Molson said the following:

> . . . the Speaker is one of us who is called to the chair to preside over our meetings. In this sense I think the French term "le président" is much more apt than the term "Speaker". He is presiding without ruling, and he will rule only when a senator makes an appeal or a comment on a matter of order. In such instance the Speaker will then take up the task of maintaining order, as is set forth in his duties.

There is the role and position of the Speaker in this place. It is not to make decisions. It is certainly not to order the stopping of the ringing of the bells. It is certainly not to decide when a vote will be taken. The rules are clear.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to go through all of what Senator Stanbury has as the background of his motion, but I do want to deal with one specific item, and that is the matter of the ringing of the bells and what really began the uproar in this place last fall. It began when the Speaker took upon himself an authority which he did not have, does not have, has never had, and which has never been given to him by this chamber. That was a decision to stop the ringing of the bells and to call for a vote.

Honourable senators, some people might say that that is only reasonable, that, after all, the bells had been ringing at that point for an hour or an hour and a half. Let us say even that they had been ringing for two or three hours and that was not reasonable. What some honourable senators across the way have said is that, with a system like this, at some point you have to stop the ringing of the bells. To tell the truth, I agree with them. At some point the ringing of the bells has to be stopped.

Indeed, back in 1982, as chairman of the Rules Committee, I brought up that matter. It was subsequent to the events in the other place. As chairman of that committee, in the course of discussion, I said to my colleagues, "We do not have a rule in the Senate in that regard, and some day we may be faced with that problem." I remind honourable senators that at that time it was a Liberal majority in this place and a Conservative minority on the other side and that, traditionally, the ringing of the bells extends a benefit to the Opposition, not to the government.

Nevertheless, I thought that we should have a look at it. We did; we produced a substantial report on the subject of the ringing of the bells. It was order of business No. 4 of the Rules Committee which dealt with the procedure to follow when the bells ring indefinitely, as happened in the other place. We discussed the matter, and we obtained a good report. We had a look at the United Kingdom House of Commons and the House of Lords; we looked at the Australian Senate and the Australian House of Representatives, and we obtained copies of the procedures in Belgium, Sweden, Finland and India. In addition, we went to the provincial legislatures of British Columbia, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario. We had a good discussion on the subject.

We realized the situation before us, as to what had happened in the other place, and we stated in our report that the bells had rung from 4.20 in the afternoon on March 2, 1982, until 2.29 in the afternoon on March 17, 1982—15 days. I remind my honourable friends that this was the Conservative Opposition in the House of Commons which did this for 15 days. The question was on a motion that the "House do now adjourn." Madam Speaker waited for the return of both the Government and Opposition Whips before terminating the ringing of the division bells.

The bells had gone on for 15 days in the other place and Madam Speaker followed the rules and waited for the whips to enter. The bells in this place did not ring for four hours and action was taken by the Speaker.

The committee examined that matter carefully, and here is what I said to the committee in May of 1982:

> The clerk tells me that the only other matter on our agenda, which remains from our original agenda when we started meeting last week, is the procedure for the bells to summon senators to a recorded vote. I believe you have all now received a copy of the research that has been done in this regard. You will see that it appears that we are the longest bell-ringers in the world. It was two minutes in one place, extended to three minutes; it is six minutes somewhere else; and in another locale it is nine minutes.
> I think the most sensible rule of all is the one applying to the National Assembly of Quebec, which states:
> > When the President considers that sufficient time has elapsed after the call, he shall put the motion to the vote in accordance with Standing Order 109.

That is what I put forward to the committee, and this is what Senator Jack Flynn said: "We should certainly leave it alone for the time being. If you put that question to the Senate, I will have the bells ring for two days."

My honourable friends, that was only eight years ago. It was discussed by the senators. I had put forward to the Opposition the consideration that we should have a limit on the bells, and there is Senator Flynn's response—nothing doing. "No limit on the bells," he said. If it had not been discussed, if it was out of the blue, honourable senators opposite might tell me, "Of course, we could not foresee this kind of event." Honourable senators opposite had the opportunity, and they said, "No, we do not want any limit on the bells." How can senators opposite support a Speaker who did what he did? I am not talking to the new members. I understand them. I am talking to those who have sat in provincial legislatures, those who have sat in this house for a long time. How could you support what went on? How could Senator Doyle write in that magazine that it was all okay, that nothing was wrong, that it was perfectly acceptable? That is rewriting history. It has nothing to do with what has gone on here. It has nothing to do with the traditions of this place or of the parliamentary system.

When we allow things like that to happen, my friends, we are undermining the whole of the system, not just what goes on in this chamber but the whole of our parliamentary practices.

As I have said, I will not go over all the things that Senator Stanbury put forth, but it was a succession of events, a succession of the breaking of the rules, a succession of the Speaker taking on responsibilities which are not the Speaker's rights. Each time that is done the system is weakened.

One of the most unfortunate events in this is that the Canadian media did not react. The only time that the Canadian media were here, and they were here in droves, was when there was a ruckus in this place. One could hardly get out the door. They were out there with their cameras. The guards had to place ropes to control them.

Senator Barootes: You invited them in, do you not remember? You ushered them in.

Senator Molgat: Yes, I did, and I am glad you brought it up.

Senator Barootes: Are you blameless in all this?

Senator Molgat: Senator Barootes, I hope that any time I have to make a speech you will be here, because you help me greatly. You remind me of things that I have forgotten in the course of my discourse.

Yes, Senator Barootes is right. I did stand at that door and I said to the press, "Come in. There are no rules in here."

Senator Barootes: That has nothing to do with the fellow who did it all, then. This is not a confessional booth.

Senator Molgat: I will be happy to continue, as soon as you are finished, Senator Barootes.

I have noticed that the media also liked to play that one. In fact, it played again last Saturday. They love that piece.

Senator Barootes, when did that happen? It happened when Mr. Speaker broke the rules. That is when it happened. It happened when Mr. Speaker decided on his own—

Senator Simard: That is not the case.

● (1620)

Senator Molgat: Senator Simard, you can shout all you want but the facts are very simple.

Senator Barootes: Stones have been known to move and trees to speak!

Senator Molgat: That is fine. You obviously do not like what I have to say, but it happens to be the truth. You had an opportunity, as I have just pointed out to you, to put some control on the bells. You Conservatives refused to do it. You Conservatives refused to put any control on the bells, and then you had Mr. Speaker break the rules to stop the bells. That is an absolute breach of the rules. Mr. Speaker decided that there were no rules in this place when he proceeded to break them.

The catastrophe is that in all this there was no media reaction. The only time the media came here was when there was an uproar.

Senator Simard: Blame everybody else!

Senator Molgat: When we started the debate on the substance of the bill, when we introduced amendments, there was not one single press person here—not one! You could look up in the galleries; they were as empty as they are right now—not one single person! That is a very unfortunate side to what went on in this place. Apparently, in the view of the press, the matter was trivial. I believe that it is important because this place is a fundamental part of the Canadian parliamentary system. I know that we do not enjoy good press coverage, but that has nothing to do with it. This is a fundamental part of the Canadian parliamentary system. Anything that goes wrong here is wrong for the system, and the media ought to be as reactive to anything being done wrong here as they ever could be and ever are in the House of Commons. Well, my honourable friends, I could continue.

Senator Doyle: Senator Frith did not complain about the media.

Senator Molgat: Senator Doyle has some more fiction for us, has he?

Senator Simard: No. He was quoting Senator Frith.

Senator Molgat: More of the rewriting of history such as he gave us in The Idler?

Senator Doyle: Senator Frith said that the media had been fair.

Senator Molgat: I am not interested in rewriting history but—

Senator Simard: You are trying hard!

Senator Molgat: —I am interested in protecting the rules, the traditions and the proper functioning of this place, because they are important.

Senator Barootes: The world according to Molgat!

Senator Molgat: Senator Barootes, it is not the world according to Molgat; it is the world according to the documents I have read—and I am going to read you some more! You might give this a little more importance and attach more value to it, Senator Barootes, because it was the leader of your party whom I am going to quote. It was not your immediate party leader; this is a few years back. It is already on the record, but I think it is worth rereading into the record. This is the Honourable George Drew speaking on June 4, 1956, in the House of Commons. It was at the time of the pipeline debate. Speaker René Beaudoin was under attack, and, let me tell you, what Speaker René Beaudoin did over there pales into insignificance by comparison to what Speaker Charbonneau did in this place. Speaker Beaudoin would virtually be absolved when one compares the two cases.

Senator MacEachen: It was a venial sin, a peccadillo.

Senator Molgat: With that background, here is what Mr. George Drew had to say. It is a little long, Senator Barootes, but given that it is a good Conservative source, I am sure you will want me to read it all. Mr. Drew said:

> The government cannot divorce itself from the tragic downfall of the Speaker on this occasion. He is the victim. He is a casualty of the government's overbearing conduct during this debate. We had done what we could do to prevent the government proceeding on the arrogant course which has produced this sorrowful result. That was our only recourse; that in fact was our only right.

Senator MacEachen: Rather self-serving.

Senator Molgat: To continue:

> It was the duty of the Speaker to protect our rights just as it was his duty to protect the rights of the government.

He continued:

> Whatever may be said of the ugly things that happened last week, I think it can be said with certainty that every hon. member is equally sorry that they ever happened. No hon. member of this house will want to see a repetition of the turmoil into which this house was thrown last Friday. Let it be admitted immediately that we all share some responsibility for that turmoil. We all took part in it. We can have no happy recollection at any time of that sad event. May I point out, however, that, confronted as we were with a rigid denial by the Speaker of our fundamental rights to be heard in regard to these issues, we had no course open to us but to register our anger in the way we did.

He continued:

> Were we quietly to submit in the face of this course that savoured in every way of the dreadful dictatorships that have grown up in Europe in these past few years? It was Junius who said that the subject who is truly loyal will neither advise nor submit to arbitrary measures. The subject who is loyal will neither submit nor advise. We were not prepared to submit to as arbitrary measures as ever denied to the sitting members of a legislative body the rights to which they were entitled by tradition, by the rules and by all the declared purposes of this parliament.

> I repeat again, however, that we used the only weapons that we had as free men and women to bring to the attention of this house and to the attention of the people of Canada the disgraceful denial of our rights which had taken place.
>
> We had no choice but to assert our rights as we did. We had no choice, moreover, but to bring this matter to a head by the motion that is now before us.
>
> Here we had no power of self-defence. We have none but to declare what we believe to be the rights of the people of Canada and their representatives here in this house. We shall not be subservient to false interpretation of the rules. We shall not be subservient to anything that savours of dictatorship here in this house. We shall not be subservient to the will of the majority expressed by the Speaker, as it has been in this case, in a manner which no longer seeks to define the right of the majority but establishes for the time being mob rule.

He continued:

> A partisan vote on the motion now before us will not relieve the unhappy situation in which we now find ourselves. Never before has this house been faced with so serious a situation. Never before were members of this house conscious as they now are that something good, decent, precious and valuable has been destroyed. There is only one way this situation can be relieved. I appeal with all the earnestness I possess to the Prime Minister as head of the government to follow the only course which will restore the dignity, honour and traditions of parliament.

That was Mr. George Drew speaking in the pipeline debate on the matter of Speaker Beaudoin. I recommend that course of action at this time.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might take part in this debate? I had not intended to get involved, but I found myself very heavily involved in the process, not in terms of time but in terms of crossing the floor to sit, instead of as an Independent Liberal, as an Independent.

• (1630)

I found that a serious decision to make. I can understand the concern about the rules of Parliament and adherence to them. I have some knowledge of the role of the Speaker in this chamber and the fact that the conduct of business is in the hands of the individual senators. That is a fact. But what has made this chamber, which has existed since Confederation, work over the years has been a civility and an understanding of the other side's view. In my judgment, that broke down. What we were dealing with in this legislation was a government tax measure that goes to the very root of democracy—that is, the right of the elected Commons to determine the taxation and fiscal policies of the government.

Senator van Roggen: That is not the point.

Senator Stewart: You are rewriting the Constitution.

Senator Everett: I am not rewriting the Constitution. Hear me out. That legislation came here and was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Extensive hearings were held, and the report was issued—not a report to make a government budget and taxation measure operate better, although it was extensive in the sense that it dealt with every aspect of the GST legislation and pointed out in each case the particular shortcomings of the legislation.

At the end of the extensive report, the committee did not do as the Senate is required to do and by tradition does. It did not agree to make this amendment or that amendment. It decided to vote against the bill and terminate the government's taxation measure.

When this matter came before the house, honourable senators will recall that the government was at a numerical disadvantage. The government made an attempt to delay consideration of the report because the motion on the order paper was that the bill on the GST "be not now proceeded with." At that time I argued that there was no cause for delay and that we should move forward and deal with the legislation. Following the appointment of the 12 additional senators—

Senator Bonnell: Eight.

Senator Everett: Eight, I am sorry, the balance of power shifted. At that stage it was the Opposition that started the delay. Again I argued that there should be no unnecessary delay—not delay by virtue of honest debate, but delay by means of motions that did not seek any redress and were purely and simply there to delay altogether.

The avowed intent of the Opposition was that the GST should not pass. That was reiterated over and over again. In the first week, as I recall, there was a motion by Senator Frith to notice strangers, and, if I am correct, the bells started to ring. The bells rang throughout the entire weekend, and, at the end of that period, I believe on Tuesday, the motion was withdrawn. The following Thursday there was another motion put and the bells started to ring. As I understand it, and I believe there was sufficient evidence for that purpose, the clear intent was that the bells were to ring for another weekend. The avowed intent was that the tax would not pass.

It may be, as Senator Molgat said in his persuasive presentation, that the rules transcended the situation and that the Speaker had no right to do what he did; but it does not occur to me that a group in Parliament has the right to stop consideration of legitimate legislation forever. I recall Senator Kirby, in an appearance on the CTV morning program, saying that they were going to delay the legislation until it was withdrawn.

I took a position, and I am not sorry about it. In my judgment the Speaker did what he should have done.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator van Roggen: Why did they change the rules? Bring in a motion instead of abusing them!

An Hon. Senator: Order!

Senator Everett: Purely and simply, Senator van Roggen, because we did not operate on the basis of rules. I, for one, would like to return to a situation where there was give and take on the rules, where there was debate, where we dealt with legislation and where we tried to improve it. If we failed, then we went on to the next item. That is what is important to me. We should not make this chamber a carbon copy of the House of Commons with all sorts of rules. That is not what the Senate is about, any more than that is what the House of Lords is about. It is a system that operates on civility. Over the process of the GST debate the civility was lost.

I supported the Speaker's actions because I felt we were not dealing with a question of a loss of privileges of the parliamentary system; we were dealing with a system in which there was a determination on the part of the Opposition to see that an important, integral part of government legislation did not pass, by means that were never intended to be part of the parliamentary system. For my money, I believe the Speaker was right to intervene, and I showed that intent when I voted. I voted again in favour of the motion to deal with the issue. It so happens that I was in favour of the GST, but, had I not been, I would have had exactly the same attitude.

It was not a question of the issue. I understand what this motion says. I heard a lot of the rhetoric about the loss of the privileges of Parliament and the rights of democracy. It seemed to me at the time that the danger to democracy and to this operation was put in jeopardy far more by the actions of those who prevented debate and who determined that this legislation would not be dealt with and would not go ahead. It was for that reason that I crossed from that side to sit her as an independent. I have heard the senators on that side say how appalled they were with the Speaker's and the government's actions. I have to tell you that I was appalled by the actions on that side of the house to a sufficient extent to leave that side of the house and come over here.

• (1640)

Senator Stewart: That is not what happened.

Senator Everett: It is exactly what happened.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Stollery, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that all remaining orders, inquiries and motions stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

POVERTY

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WELFARE—RECOMMENDATIONS AND DOCUMENTS

March 19, 1991

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SHOULD REVERSE POLICY ON CAP

The federal government should abandon its policy of cutting Canada Assistance Plan payments to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, the National Council of Welfare said in a report made public today.

"The need for welfare and social services is bound to increase during the current recession, and it is no time for cuts in our safety net of last resort," said the report, The Canada Assistance Plan: No Time for Cuts.

The last two federal budget speeches announced limits on federal CAP payments to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. Increases in federal payments are to be held to five percent a year through the end of the 1994-1995 fiscal year.

The federal government initially said it expected to save $75 million during 1990-1991 and $80 million during 1991-1992 because of the change, but these estimates were quickly outdated by rising welfare costs. The latest provincial estimates add up to losses of at least $865 million for the two fiscal years.

Ontario says it stands to lose $310 million this year and $510 million in 1991-1992. Alberta predicts no losses this year, but a significant loss in 1991-1992. British Columbia forecasts losses of $45 million this year and has no estimate for next year.

The National Council of Welfare has six specific concerns about the federal policy: four relating to the impact of the policy and two relating to the way the policy was developed.

1. The Canada Assistance Plan is one of the few national social programs in Canada that is intended specifically for low-income people. There have been numerous suggestions over the years to improve the Canada Assistance Plan, but no previous federal government ever suggested pulling back from its basic commitment to the needs of the poor.

2. The federal government is imposing limits on programs that were specifically designed to be open-ended. Because welfare is the safety net of last resort, the system has to be flexible enough to protect people with no other sources of income.

3. Federal restraints on CAP payments to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia could deter long-overdue improvements in welfare elsewhere in Canada. It is hard to imagine poorer provinces making major improvements in benefits with the possibility of cuts in federal funding hanging over their heads.

4. Limits on federal funding to CAP will deter the development of social services that play a vital role in alleviating or preventing poverty. The Council is especially concerned about the impact of the CAP limit on child care.

5. The last two budgets marked further backward steps in federal-provincial relations. Plans to trim CAP and also funds for medicare and post-secondary education detract from the spirit of co-operation that is so essential in programs vital to the health and welfare of Canadians.

6. Major changes in social policy should not be announced in budget speeches. The parliamentary traditions surrounding budgets are incompatible with the open consultations that are essential to developing good public policy.

The federal policy is the subject of a court case now before the Supreme Court of Canada. British Columbia, with the support of Ontario, Alberta, Manitoba, the Native Council of Canada, and the United Native Nations of B.C., is challenging the federal government's right to make unilateral changes in the Canada Assistance Plan without provincial consent. A ruling from the high court is expected later this year.

The Canada Assistance Plan was set up in 1966 as a means of cost-sharing welfare and social services. Through its support of provincial and territorial welfare programs, CAP helps provide income to unemployed people who cannot find decent jobs, single parents and their children, people who are disabled or in poor health, and needy people who are not protected by other social programs. CAP also helps pay for a wide range of social services for welfare recipients and other Canadians who are not on the welfare rolls, but who have low or modest incomes.

The National Council of Welfare is a citizens' advisory body which advises the Minister of National Health and Welfare on matters pertaining to poverty and social policy.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

FOURTH REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

TUESDAY March 26, 1991

The Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

(Report No. 46)

1. Pursuant to its permanent reference, section 19 of the Statutory Instruments Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. S-22, your Committee wishes to draw the attention of the Houses to the lack of legal authority for certain provisions of the Narcotic Control Regulations, C.R.C., c. 1041, and Food and Drug Regulations, C.R.C., c. 870 and to the failure of the Government to take corrective action within a reasonable time.

2. The regulations at issue are section 68 of the Narcotic Control Regulations and sections G.06.001 and J.01.033 of the Food and Drug Regulations. The first of these, enacted pursuant to section 20(c) of the Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.N-1, grants the Minister of National Health and Welfare a discretion to authorize any person to possess or use narcotics where the Minister deems it to be in the public interest or in the interests of science. It further empowers the Minister to specify the purposes for which and conditions under which the narcotics may be possessed or used. Sections G.06.001 and J.01.033 of the Food and Drug Regulations, enacted pursuant to sections 45(1)(a) and 51(3), respectively, of the Food and Drugs Act, R.S.C. 1985, c.F-27, provide similar authority in respect of controlled drugs and restricted drugs (see Appendix A for the text of the relevant enactments). In the judgement of the Joint Committee these regulatory provisions are not authorized by the terms of the enabling legislation. Given the similarity between the regulations at issue and between the enabling clauses pursuant to which they were enacted, it is sufficient to explain the conclusion reached by your Committee by reference to section 68 of the Narcotic Control Regulations.

3. Section 20(c) of the Narcotic Control Act authorizes the Governor in Council to make regulations:

> (c) authorizing the sale or possession of or other dealing in narcotics and > prescribing the circumstances and conditions under which, and the persons by whom, narcotics may be sold, had in possession or otherwise dealt in;

This provision reflects Parliament's intention that the lawful possession and use of narcotics be authorized by regulation of the Governor in Council. Parliament also ordered that the Governor in Council should have the responsibility of determining, by regulation, the circumstances in which possession of narcotics is lawful, the conditions under which possession of narcotics is lawful, and the persons who may have such possession.

4. In enacting section 68 of the Narcotic Control Regulations the Governor in Council did not exercise the powers vested in him by section 20(c) of the Act but subdelegated them to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Section 68 does not authorize the possession and use of narcotics, but simply gives the Minister a discretion to do so. Neither can the regulation be seen to prescribe the circumstances in which possession and use are lawful for it merely provides for the exercise of the Minister's discretion in any circumstance the Minister deems to be "in the public interest" or "in the interests of science". The regulation also fails to prescribe the conditions under which, and the persons by whom, narcotics may be had in possession or used. It provides instead that the Minister may give his authorization to any person and subject to any conditions the Minister chooses to impose. In short, section 68 of the Narcotic Control Regulations delegates to the Minister of National Health and Welfare the exercise of the authority and powers which Parliament, in enacting section 20(c) of the Act, decided should be exercised by the Governor in Council.

On the basis of the well established principle that a person to whom legislative powers have been delegated by Parliament may not in turn delegate the exercise of those powers to another person, the Joint Committee had no difficulty concluding that section 68 of the Narcotic Control Regulations is an unauthorized subdelegation of power to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Joint Committee reached the same conclusion regarding sections G.06.001 and J.01.033 of the Food and Drug Regulations which confer a similar discretionary authority on the Minister with respect to controlled and restricted drugs.

5. The Joint Committee's objection to section 68 of the Narcotic Control Regulations was made known to the Department of National Health and Welfare in February of 1975. In the Spring of 1977, the Department was advised that the Committee's objection applied equally to sections G.06.001 and J.01.033 of the Food and Drug Regulations.

Where a department accepts your Committee's view that a particular regulation is invalid, the Committee expects that department to undertake to revoke the regulation and replace it with a regulation that conforms to the authority granted in the enabling statute. In a case where the responsible department considers it essential that the regulation continue in force, the Committee may not insist on its immediate revocation provided the department undertakes to seek the necessary legislative authority for the regulation at an early date. In the case of section 68 of the Narcotic Control Regulations and sections G.06.001 and J.01.033 of the Food and Drug Regulations, the Department of National Health and Welfare chose the latter course of action. In April of 1975, the Joint Committee was informed that "steps are being taken to remove any doubt" as to the legality of section 68 of the Narcotic Control Regulations. In October of 1980, it was advised that its position with regard to sections G.06.011 and J.01.033 of the Food and Drug Regulations "seems quite valid" and that the matter would be resolved by amending the Food and Drugs Act. These amendments to the Narcotic Control Act and Food and Drugs Act were never adopted by Parliament. In an October 7, 1986 letter to the Chairmen of your Committee, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, while acknowledging the invalidity of the regulations under report, referred to the preparation of a bill consolidating all federal legislation relating to the control of psychoactive drugs. The Minister indicated that authority for the present regulations would be provided for in the proposed legislation, known as the Psychoactive Substance Control Bill. This bill, the introduction of which has repeatedly been said to be forthcoming, has yet to be presented to Parliament. A summary of the correspondence exchanged between the Department and your Committee on the regulations under report, and of the various undertakings given to the Committee, is set out in Appendix B to this Report.

6. Your Committee is sensitive to the significance of the programs administered on the basis of the regulatory provisions dealt with in this Report. Section 68 of the Narcotic Control Regulations and sections G.06.001 and J.01.033 the Food and Drug Regulations permit the Minister to authorize, on an individual basis,

(1) trainers of drug interdiction dogs to obtain and possess narcotics for this purpose (approximately 10 authorizations per month);

(2) research scientists to obtain and possess narcotics, controlled and restricted drugs for the purpose of basic and clinical research (approximately 90 authorizations per month); and

(3) physicians to prescribe and supply methadone to patients for treatment of opiate dependence (approximately 1200 patients).

A previous Minister described the discretionary authority conferred by the present regulations as being "vital in ensuring that narcotics, controlled and restricted drugs are not diverted to illicit purposes and remain available for legitimate medical and scientific uses." While your Committee recognizes the importance attached to the programs in question, it cannot ignore the fact that they operate on the basis of regulatory provisions that were never authorized by Parliament. The failure of successive Ministers to seek legislative authority for those provisions eventually led your Committee to request their immediate revocation unless the responsible Minister could furnish the Committee with a firm and definite commitment as to the timing of the introduction of the promised legislation.

No such commitment has been given and in a letter dated March 12, 1990, the Minister of National Health and Welfare stated that: "In view of the nature and extent of the programs operated under these provisions, I would like to emphasize to the Committee that repeal of these provisions is not an option consistent with the fulfillment of the health protection mandate of my Department." This is tantamount to stating that the fulfillment of the Department's "health protection mandate" can justify the Minister's continued reliance on illegal regulations. Your Committee categorically rejects the suggestion that a Minister may choose to pursue a course of action not authorized by law so long as the pursuit of that course of action is consistent with the fulfillment of departmental objectives. Such an approach is entirely at odds with the requirements of the rule of law. Constitutional government requires ministers and public officials to administer the law as it is made by Parliament, not as they wish it to be. If legislation is thought inadequate, the Government can propose changes to that legislation, but until Parliament approves any such proposal, it is the duty of Ministers and public servants to administer departmental programs in accordance with existing legislation.

7. In enacting the Narcotic Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act, Parliament decided that any exception to the statutory prohibitions against the possession and use of narcotics, controlled drugs and restricted drugs should be granted by the Governor in Council by means of regulations. Contrary to these statutes, programs have been established under which the Minister purports to exercice a discretionary authority to grant such exceptions; the regulatory provisions supporting these programs are invalid and are recognized as being invalid by the Government.

Some sixteen years after this problem was drawn to the attention of the Department of National Health and Welfare, and notwithstanding repeated promises to do so, the responsible Minister has yet to seek parliamentary approval for legislation authorizing these regulations. It must be emphasized that the Government's decision to proceed by way of legislative amendments is largely responsible for the fact that the problem discussed in this Report stands unresolved so many years after it was raised by the Committee. It should be clear that successive Ministers have also had the option of adopting new regulations that conform to the powers conferred by the Narcotic Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act. The adoption of such regulations would not mean that the objectives of the programs described in the preceding paragraph could not be met, it would simply require that they be administered on the basis of prescribed rules rather than on the basis of the unfettered discretion of the Minister.

8. Given the requirements of the rule of law and taking into account the Government's failure to promptly seek legislative authority for the regulations under report, your Committee if of the view that pending the enactment of new legislation, these regulations should be revoked and replaced by regulations that conform to section 20(c) of the Narcotic Control Act and sections 45(1)(a) and 51(3) of the Food and Drugs Act.

Respectfully submitted,

MICHEL COGGER

Joint Chairman

APPENDIX "A"

APPENDIX "B"

- February 10, 1975: Committee's objection to the legality of section 68 of the Narcotic Control Regulations is conveyed to the Department.

- April 3, 1975: Committee is advised that "steps are being taken to remove any doubt" as to the legality of the provision.

- May 25, 1976 and February 28, 1977: Department is asked to advise as to progress.

- April 13, 1977: Department is advised that objection to section 68 of the Narcotic Control Regulations extends to sections G.06.001 and J.01.033 of the Food and Drug Regulations.

- May 18, 1977: Committee referred to Bill S-19 which did not pass in the 1974-75-76 Session. This Bill would have amended the Narcotic Control Act. Committee advised that Bill may be reintroduced in the 1976-77 Session.

- July 12, 1977: Committee advised that objections to Food and Drug Regulations are "under review".

- November 17, 1978: Committee advised that former Bill S-19 will not be reintroduced but that the Department is "discussing a new Bill to consolidate Parts III and IV of the Food and Drugs and the Narcotic Control Act." It is intended to introduce a new Bill in the "next Session".

- August 28, 1980: Department queried as to progress.

- September 22, 1980: Committee advised that legal adviser to Department cannot confirm that Committee's position on Food and Drug Regulations "is either demonstrably wrong or demonstrably right". Department awaiting further advice from their Legal Services.

- September 23, 1980: Previous consolidation project has been abandoned and the Department state their "expectation that the Narcotic Control Act will soon be re-opened with respect to cannabis control". Necessary legislative amendment will then be made.

- October 15, 1980: On sections G.06.001 and J.01.033 of Food and Drug Regulations, Committee advised that its position "seems quite valid". Issue will be resolved by amending the Food and Drugs Act.

- October 28, 1980: Inquiry from counsel as to whether the Department "will promote the necessary amendment to the Food and Drugs Act".

- December 1, 1980: Counsel is advised by the Department that "it would be highly improper for me to indicate to you what I might think our Minister's intentions are before she has made them known to the Members in the House of Commons in the appropriate way".

- July 12, 1982: Counsel, on Committee's instructions, further inquires as to introduction of legislation.

- August 20, 1982: Department advises that "the decision to introduce legislation rests with the Cabinet. I am unable to give you any commitments as to when the action you refer to will be taken".

- November 3, 1982: the Chairmen write to the Minister in relation to the Committee's objections to the Food and Drug Regulations.

- December 22, 1982: The Minister replies that her officials are "consulting with the Department of Justice as to how the question of sub-delegation of a rule-making power may best be resolved".

- June 16, 1983: The Chairmen inquire as to the progress of legislation to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

- July 25, 1983: The Chairmen write to the Minister concerning section 68 of the Narcotic Control Regulations and ask when remedial legislation is to be introduced.

- August 11 and November 1, 1983: In two letters, the Minister advises that in one case, discussions between her officials and the Department of Justice are "continuing" while in the other, the issue is "under investigation by officials of the Department".

- April 19, 1984: Minister advises, in relation to the Narcotic Control Regulations, that her officials "are not entirely in agreement with the Committee's view that section 68 is an unauthorized sub-delegation of a rule-making power". Minister states her Department's Legal Services have been requested to conduct "a more extensive review".

- July 4, 1984: Chairmen write to Minister to restate objection, and reasons therefor, to section 68 of the Narcotic Control Regulations.

- December 19, 1984: Reply is requested by Chairmen.

- March 4, 1985: Minister writes to the Chairmen on section 68 of the Narcotic Control Regulations and sections J.01.033 and G.06.001 of the Food and Drug Regulations. The Minister indicates that these provisions have been under extensive review and that the "options indentified as being available to this Department are under active consideration".

- December 20, 1985: In a new letter, the Minister again assures the Chairmen "of the active consideration of the options available to my Department in relation to this matter".

- February 26, 1986: Chairmen write to the Minister expressing the Committee's view that his Department "has had ample time in which to correct the situation" and requesting "a definitive response for submission to the Joint Committee". Minister informed that Committee may consider reporting to the Houses.

- October 7, 1986: Minister replies that "the Department of Justice has confirmed to my Department that the provisions [of the Narcotic Control Regulations and Food and Drug Regulations] could be a sub-delegation of the regulation-making authority provided in the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act." Minister refers to project "to consolidate all pertinent federal legislation" and states that possibility of amending current legislation through a Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Bill will be considered as well. Minister assures Committee that "every effort is being made to address the problems of concern to the Committee in as timely a fashion as possible".

- December 18, 1986: In light of previous delays encountered in settling the issue, Committee invites the Minister to appear before the Committee on February 19, 1987.

- February 4, 1987: Minister writes that drafting of the proposed Psychoactive Substance Control Act has begun and that discussions are underway as to the possibility of amendments through a Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Bill.

- July 15, 1987: Chairmen refer to previous letter from Minister and seek his advice as to the progress of the proposed Psychoactive Substance Control Act, the drafting of which the Minister anticipated would be completed "early in the Spring of 1987".

- October 28, 1987: Minister replies he intends "to have this Bill ready for tabling in the House of Commons at the pleasure of the Deputy Prime Minister, late in the fall of 1987".

- May 9, 1988: Chairmen ask the Minister whether it remains his intention to introduce the Bill in the current Session.

- June 14, 1988: Minister advises the Committee that "substantial progress has been made leading to introduction of the Bill" and that it is his intention "to see this Bill go forward at the earliest possible opportunity".

- June 27, 1989: Chairmen inquire as to progress.

- September 25, 1989: Minister replies that he hopes "to offer the Bill for introduction this fall.

- December 21, 1989: Chairmen write to Minister noting that Bill has yet to be introduced and stating that in light of repeated previous assurances that the Bill would shortly be introduced "the Committee cannot continue to defer this matter indefinitely on the basis of such assurances". Committee requests revocation of illegal regulations unless the Minister can give "a firm and definite commitment as to the timing of the introduction" of the Bill.

- March 12, 1990: Minister replies that revocation of regulations "is not an option consistent with the fulfillment of the health protection mandate of my Department". Minister acknowledges that "The long history of this matter is disturbing" and states his intention to "immediately propose the tabling of (the) long overdue (Psychoactive Substance Control Bill) following conclusion of the required consultations."

- June 19, 1990: Chairmen write to the Minister of State for Regulatory Affairs and state that "the Committee's position at this time is that unless a firm commitment can be given on the timing of a legislative solution, the sections queried by the Committee should be revoked or amended to conform to existing statutory authority. It is the intention of the Joint Committee to report to both houses in the Fall, unless action is taken before then." A copy of this letter is sent to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

- July 30, 1990: Minister of State for Regulatory Affairs writes that he agrees that "resolution of these issues is long overdue" and that "it is unreasonable that such important regulations should continue to be relied upon without legal authority." The Minister requests the Joint Committee to "continue to be patient" until the proposed legislation is introduced.

- October 24, 1990: Minister of National Health and Welfare is informed of Committee's intention to report to the Houses.

BRETTON WOODS AND RELATED AGREEMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—ELEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. John B. Stewart, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, presented the following report:

Wednesday, March 27, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has the honour to present its

ELEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee to which was referred Bill C-93, An Act to amend the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act, has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Thursday, March 7, 1991, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN B. STEWART
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

On Notices of Motions:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we usually put the adjournment motion at this time. However, I now ask for leave to revert to the adjournment motion later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

REPORT OF BÉLANGER-CAMPEAU COMMISSION—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. Could he advise the chamber as to what structural arrangements will be made or have been made to respond to the Bélanger-Campeau Report, which calls on the rest of Canada to make an offer to Quebec to see if they want to stay in Canada or if they will be having a referendum on sovereignty in about 18 months? My curiosity is with respect to this offer from the commission, because some arrangement or process will have to be put together to find out what, if anything, the rest of Canada wants to offer to Quebec.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, there are several points that should be underlined. First, the Government and the Parliament of Canada do not speak for "the rest of Canada." They speak for the entire country and their responsibility is to represent the interests of the entire country.

Second, we must take this one step at a time. The only good news from the Bélanger-Campeau Report is that there is still an opportunity for Canada in the coming months to concentrate all our minds on the need to strengthen this country and to reinforce—indeed, to renew—the consensus in this country which must underline our common citizenship and on the basis of which any constitutional reform would go forward.

We have already appointed the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future with a view to giving as many Canadians as possible an opportunity to express themselves with regard to the values that unite us and the things that divide us as Canadians. We have asked that commission to report by July 1.

This Parliament has also appointed a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee, to study the amending process, it being obvious that, even if we reach agreement on substance, we need a process that will help ensure that we can implement any agreement in substance that is reached. That joint committee will also be reporting by July 1.

After that, there will be an opportunity for the government and for members of this place and the other place to reflect. We will want to consult Parliament. We will want to have consultations with the premiers and with the population of Canada, and we will go forward from there.

The honourable senator has asked what structure has been put in place. Those decisions have not been made and will not be made for some time yet.

STATUS OF CITIZENS' FORUM ON CANADA'S FUTURE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Well, honourable senators, I thank the honourable minister for that answer, such as it was. I am not being critical when I say it is incomplete, because, obviously, the report only came out today. However, I was worried about one thing that was mentioned by the minister, which is that perhaps the so-called Citizens' Forum is going to be one of the important structures to respond to the recommendations of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission. I would have to say that to date I am not favourably impressed with this commission, not only because of its mismanagement of budget considerations, to which criticism apparently it does not seem to think it has to reply, but also because some of the comments that have been made by the chairman are rather offensive to me. I would hope that there would be some other mechanism, or other parts of the structure, that will be called into play to respond, if that is what the government is going to do, to the report of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission.

● (1410)

I do not expect the minister to agree with me, but I hope there will be more to it than what he has just described; and, what is more, I hope that it will take some time after the commission has closed its doors on July 1 before a complete response is made to whatever offer is expected from this recommendation of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission.

[Senator Murray.]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the honourable senator's question gives me the opportunity to point out that the Citizen's Forum on Canada's Future was not set up to provide a response to the Bélanger-Campeau commission, or any other commission, but, rather, to encourage a dialogue among Canadians as to the values that unite us and the challenges that lie ahead of us. As I have said on previous occasions in the Senate, I do not expect a list of recommendations for amending the Constitution from the Citizen's Forum. I expect findings as to the views heard from Canadians across the country and some conclusions from the commission's discussions.

The honourable senator's question also gives me the opportunity to point out that, in a number of provinces, parliamentary and other committees have been struck and are going about the work of considering the future of the country and, in particular, the role of certain provinces and regions in that future. We will receive the information from those committees as well as from the Citizen's Forum and the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee by this summer. As I have said, at that time we will have an opportunity to consult among ourselves as parliamentarians and with Canadian citizens generally to decide what the next step should be.

BÉLANGER-CAMPEAU COMMISSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding the Bélanger-Campeau Commission. Honourable senators, I must say this intrigues me. It has been a long time since we heard a representative of the Government of Canada speak for Canada in Quebec.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: That's what you say!

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, during the hearings of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, I was pleasantly surprised to see that at least this time, the Canadian government's representative, Mr. Hogue, had spoken for Canada. I was delighted. I thought that all of a sudden the government had decided the commission was going to talk about Canada.

My question is this: Can the Leader of the Government inform this House why the government's representative on the Bélanger-Campeau Commission abstained from voting on the report?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators, Senator Thériault claims it has been a long time since a federal spokesman spoke out in favour of Canada in Quebec. I want to say, first of all, that this is absolutely untrue. I must reject this out of hand.

Second, Senator Thériault mentioned the case of Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue, a member of Parliament who represented the Progressive Conservative party on the Bélanger-Campeau Commission. I would like to point out that Mr. Hogue did vote on a number of important questions before this commission, including the sovereigntist option, when he voted against the option. At the end of the day, there was a question on the commission's final report, which constituted Quebec's position in future negotiations.

Mr. Hogue felt that, in the circumstances, it was better to abstain, since he was a member of the government party in Ottawa and did not want to comment on Quebec's position in future negotiations.

DEADLINE FOR A REFERENDUM

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I will let the people of Canada judge who speaks for Canada. I will leave it at that, for the time being.

Yesterday, however, we did not hear Quebec's position. We heard the position of a commission formed by the Government of Quebec. It was not necessarily the position of the government of Quebec.

The commission's position bothers me as it does other Canadians because of the very short timeframe provided in the commission's recommendations. A referendum must be held within . . . I won't get into the details. It says a period of 18 months. I hope with all my heart that Canada, Canadians, the governments of Canada, Canada's representatives and the representatives of all the provinces will have enough time during these 18 months to make proposals that will be acceptable to Quebec. However, if this took more than 18 months . . . the Quebec Premier signed the report. I was told this morning that the Premier and Mr. Ryan signed the report. That was not the case till yesterday. I understand that Mr. Hogue is a member of the Conservative party. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us how a representative of the Canadian government could finally decide to abstain, without ever having contacted anyone in the federal Conservative government?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, since Mr. Hogue represented the Progressive Conservative Party on this commission, I am sure he consulted his colleagues in our party before announcing his decision to abstain on the final vote.

Senator Thériault: Including the boss?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I must admit that I am not aware of all the circumstances of these consultations.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, doesn't the fact that he abstained, as a Conservative and representing the Conservative party, lead one to conclude that the present Conservative Party, including the Prime Minister, Mr. Mulroney, is either not very federalist or slightly separatist?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, perhaps Senator Denis was on extended leave when the Prime Minister of Canada made his latest speech on the subject in Quebec a few weeks ago.

The commitment of the Prime Minister of Canada, the Conservative Party and the federal government to the future of this country is crystal clear. A senator who is on the same side as those who tried to sabotage Meech Lake is hardly in a position to give lessons to anyone on this matter.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, would you agree that it was the abstentions and silence of most Anglophone ministers in the Conservative Party, those who kept quiet and failed to help Prime Minister Mulroney pass Meech Lake?

FARM INCOME PROTECTION

STATUS OF BILL C-98

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question on another subject that is vitally important to some of the people in my part of Canada, namely, the disposition of Bill C-98, the Farm Income Protection Bill. We expected to receive it yesterday because it passed through the report stage in the House of Commons the night before. I understand that the New Democratic Party is holding it up in a form of blackmail—that is, if the government does not back away from its recommendations for some rule changes in the House of Commons, the New Democrats will not let Bill C-98 get through. They are holding one against the other. I intend to make sure that the farmers in western Canada know what they are up to.

Could the minister give us an indication of when we might expect this bill? Imperfect as it is, at least it will provide some stability to farm income for late 1991 and thereafter.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): As the honourable senator knows, being an experienced parliamentarian, it is the government that proposes and the opposition that disposes. I would not want to apportion blame between the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party in the other place with regard to this matter. I would leave that to the honourable senator.

Having said that, the House of Commons will not adjourn until later today. Perhaps my friend's information is more up to date than mine, but I have not entirely abandoned hope that they might pass that bill today. If not, it would be very high on the government's priority list when the House of Commons returns on the 8th of April.

Senator Olson: Well I hope you are right. We could pass it later today or work on it later today anyway.

HONOURABLE JACQUES FLYNN, P.C.

PAYMENT FOR SERVICES TO GOVERNMENT DURING GST DEBATE

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. I have been waiting for some time for the answer to my perennial question about Jacques Flynn's bill for services performed during the GST debate. The last time I raised it the leader said he had inadvertently misinformed me the last day I brought it up and suggested that I submit a written question.

Senator Barootes: Have you?

Senator Corbin: I have, and he said he would reply with all the details I was looking for. The question has been filed with the table for some time. I think it has been published on two consecutive Mondays, certainly once, and I still have not received an answer. I am a little worried that we may be going into a new session, at which time the present leader may not be in his present position and I may never get an answer to my question. I am very anxious. This is an expenditure of public moneys and I would like to have an answer.

Senator Barootes, what is your question? I would like to reply to it.

Senator Barootes: I am wondering about the leadership matter you raised. Were you speaking on behalf of the problems of the Liberal opposition or the Conservative Government side?

Senator Corbin: I think you may be misinformed or you may not have heard or seen correctly. I never raised the question of leadership. I do not question my leadership. I am quite happy with it.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND NEW BRUNSWICK POTATO FARMERS—ERADICATION OF VIRUS—FINANCIAL SUPPORT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government tell us what financial support will go to pay the farmers of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick as a result of the problem they are having with the potato virus? Could he also table for me a report from the department on what steps must be taken to eradicate this virus?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I understand that on March 13 a meeting was held between the federal Department of Agriculture and representatives of the Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick Marketing Boards, in which details of the eradication program were finalized and made public. I do not have those details in front of me. As to the compensation plan, I can only tell the honourable senator that we are still working on it.

NEW BRUNSWICK

ELECTORAL CONSIDERATIONS—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Last week, following an exchange with Mr. Porford or an invitation from the Leader of the Confederation Party in New Brunswick, the New Brunswick Premier announced that the forthcoming provincial election campaign would deal with such essential issues as the economy, the environment, the creation of jobs, without any reference to the linguistic debate or the entrenchment of Bill 88, as though this legislation was not really fundamental, even if it deals with equality, the collective rights of citizens, distinct institutions, etc., for both official linguistic communities.

Last week, also, in response to the Hon. Bernard Valcourt, our federal minister, who was urging the New Brunswick government to introduce in the Legislature of that province a resolution asking the federal government to proceed with the entrenchment of Bill 88. Mr. McKenna told us that what he really wanted was to discuss this issue with the Prime Minister of Canada, without wasting his time with Minister Valcourt.

Senator Thériault: That's good!

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, my question is this: Do you feel that the letter from the provincial government which you have probably read, according to Mr. McKenna, and which was addressed last Fall to the federal government is enough to convince the latter to follow-up with this formal request and which would result on the full entrenchment of Bill 88, and not only of a vague principle or a notion of equality, something Mr. McKenna would be satisfied with?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my honourable colleague will remember that during the Meech Lake Accord negotiations, two amendments to the Canadian Constitution dealing with New Brunswick linguistic communities were considered. An amendment would have required the consent of the federal Parliament and all the provinces, being a change to the amending formula.

The other amendment could have resulted from a bilateral agreement between the federal Parliament and the New Brunswick Legislative Assembly. Following the failure of the Meech Lake Accord, these two initiatives died.

In his letter to Premier McKenna, Prime Minister Mulroney agreed to sit down with him in the near future to discuss the whole issue of the entrenchment of the two linguistic communities as mentioned in New Brunswick Bill 88 as well as in the Canadian Constitution.

I will not say more today. I am looking forward to renewed discussions between Prime Minister Mulroney and his New Brunswick counterpart.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, I accept this reply from the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I would not want to pursue the debate, for fear of being accused of abusing the time of the Senate, something Senator Olson does often, as he has every right to do.

I might add that I am pleased to hear the Senate government leader tell us that both sides are prepared to debate the issues. I hope they will be aired publicly but not, as suggested by Premier McKenna who, having sent that letter, would seem to want the debate to be held behind closed doors. Let me recall that the people on the other side blamed us and blamed last year's constitutional process because they said it was held in camera.

Keeping in mind the fact that at least three resolutions were passed during regional meetings held recently in New Brunswick following their presentation by Acadians from northwest, southeast and northeast regions, and that they were endorsed by anglophone delegates urging the governments to come to agreement on that question, I hope the governments will indeed act on that. Whether Mr. McKenna likes it or not, I hope that in the coming months that debate will be the highlight of political activities in New Brunswick. We should not be afraid to tackle the issue.

I would remind my colleagues that we were in office in 1982 or 1981 and that at times we had a majority of only half a seat, yet we did pass that legislation. If Mr. McKenna with his 58 seats cannot find the courage to debate the issue and cannot convince the people of New Brunswick of the soundness of that legislation, of the benefits of the linguistic experience for New Brunswick, and of the need to enshrine that law, I believe that the electors of New Brunswick ought to be concerned about the situation. Still, Senator Murray, I find your remarks encouraging.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. May I suggest that the government leader ask Senator Simard to send the Premier a copy of his statement or of his recommendations, for they are very important. If he would rather not send a copy of his statement, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate promise that he will speak to the Prime Minister about the intervention of the Premier?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I can assure Senator Denis that the Prime Minister of Canada follows very closely what goes on in this House and reads the Debates of the Senate, especially what our friend Senator Simard says!

I have every reason to believe and I am confident that a non-partisan spirit of cooperation, such as that which existed under Mr. Hatfield and Mr. Trudeau, will continue to exist between New Brunswick and Ottawa on linguistic issues, for the benefit of the Acadian and English-speaking people of that province.

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, in response to the honourable leader of the government in the Senate, I want to say that I hope he did not think I was being partisan when I suggested that we send the Prime Minister copy of the declaration made by our colleague Senator Simard.

You cannot find more purely Conservative and purely Liberal than those two!

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I wish to thank sincerely the leader of the government in the Senate for the stand he just took.

I reiterate that, as an Acadian from New Brunswick, I am happy with the negociations between the first ministers of Canada, and the main thing I respect Mr. Mulroney for, as Prime Minister of Canada, is the attention he always paid to francophones outside Quebec.

Again, I thank the leader of the government in the Senate for the stand he took concerning Mr. McKenna.

I do not always agree with Mr. McKenna's policies and I let him know when that is the case. On this issue which is very sensitive in New Brunswick at this time, the Premier wants to prevent the head of the CORE, who seems to have the same thing in mind as my colleague Senator Simard, from making bilingualism the sole focus of the next provincial elections.

I am convinced that the leader of the government in the Senate and the Prime Minister of Canada realize that Mr. McKenna's popularity in the polls is 66 per cent overall in New Brunswick, 52 per cent in anglophone areas and 80 per cent in francophone areas. So, I would say that he represents the people of New Brunswick very well indeed.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to three questions that I would ask be printed as part of today's proceedings.

AGRICULTURE

GROSS REVENUE INSURANCE PLAN—NET INCOME STABILIZATION ACCOUNT—AMOUNT OF PRODUCERS' INSURANCE PREMIUMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate on February 26, 1991, by the Honourable H.A. Olson regarding GRIP and NISA.

(The answer follows:)

At the federal-provincial Agriculture Ministers' meeting in Regina on March 1 and 2, agreement was reached on a methodology for calculating premium rates. Premium rates and indexed moving average prices will be announced once the provinces have completed the rate calculations and submitted them to the federal government for approval. Approval must be forwarded to the provinces within 24 hours. Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario have announced premium rates to date. Other provinces are expected to follow shortly.

Agriculture Canada staff are working closely with provincial governments and farm leaders to ensure that information is available to farmers as soon as possible.

GRIP goes a step beyond conventional crop insurance by offering price support in addition to yield protection. It will guarantee revenue per acre rather than simply guaranteeing prices or yields.

Under the program, a target revenue is calculated for each crop on the basis of probable yield, seeded acres and a support price. The support price is based on 15-year average prices indexed for inflation.

Here is an example of how GRIP would work. If we assume the long-term average price is $4 a bushel, and a farmer's probable yield is 30 bushels per acre, the target revenue under GRIP would be $120 an acre. This would be the minimum the farmer could expect to receive for that crop.

This is bankable information that a farmer will be able to take to his lender. As Allan Taylor, Chairman of the Royal Bank of Canada, said recently, "From a lender's standpoint, it's a very positive move . . . When your clients have that sort of protection against a crop—a guaranteed price—you've got something much better to work with than the risk-taking that goes without that sort of protection."

If, after harvest, the market price is $3.45 a bushel and the yield is 22 bushels an acre, the farmer's market revenue would be $75.90 an acre. The GRIP program would pay out $44.10 an acre to bring the farmer's revenue per acre up to the target level.

It is important to note that the support provided by GRIP is on the revenue per acre. If, in this example, the price is the same, but the yield is above average at 38 bushels an acre, the farmer would earn $131.10 an acre on the market, so there would be no GRIP payout.

GRIP will be delivered through two components, crop insurance and the new revenue insurance component. Crop insurance premiums will continue to be shared as in the past: producer—50 per cent, provincial government—25 per cent and federal government—25 per cent. The revenue insurance component will be shared 33 and one-third per cent by the producer, 25 per cent by the provinces and 42 and two-thirds per cent by the federal government.

Under NISA, each farmer will have an individual account consisting of two parts. Part A is made up of producer contributions, while government contributions and accrued interest go into Part B.

Producers will contribute 2 per cent of their eligible net sales, which are sales minus purchases of agricultural commodities, into the account. The federal and provincial governments will share equally the cost of matching the farmer's contribution.

A farmer who had sales of $100,000, who bought $20,000 of seed, would have eligible net sales of $80,000. This producer's NISA contribution would be 1,600, and another $1,600 would be contributed by governments.

Producers will also be able to contribute up to an additional 20 per cent of eligible net sales, but these additional amounts will not be matched by governments. Producer contributions will be made after tax, so they will not be taxable when withdrawn. Government contributions and accrued interest will be taxable on withdrawal.

Withdrawals will be triggered in two ways: first, when the farm's gross margin falls below the previous five-year average, and, second, when taxable income falls below $10,000.

In the first case a farmer with eligible sales of $80,000 and eligible cash costs of $60,000 would have a gross margin of $20,000. If the average margin for the previous five years was $30,000, the NISA withdrawal would be $10,000.

[Senator Doody.]

In the second case, a farmer with taxable income of $6,000 would be allowed a NISA withdrawal of $4,000 plus his contributions to the account for that year.

NISA withdrawals will not be taken from the farmer's contributions until Part B of the account is exhausted.

IRAQ

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION—LIST OF ASSETS ELIGIBLE FOR CANADIAN ASSISTANCE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 5, 1991, by the Honourable John B. Stewart regarding Iraq—List of Assets Eligible for Canadian Assistance.

(The answer follows:)

There is no list of Iraqi assets in Canada. Such assets can be divided into those owned and controlled by Iraqi nationals and those owned and controlled by the Government of Iraq.

Iraqi Government assets in Canada can be divided into funds held in financial institutions and other assets.

There are no means currently available to obtain a list of non-financial assets.

Iraqi Government assets held in Canadian financial institutions are presently frozen pursuant to the United National Iraq Regulations made under the United Nations Act.

It appears that regulatory or legislative action would be required to compel financial institutions to produce a list of Iraqi Government assets.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

CONTRACT POLICING TO PROVINCES AND TERRITORIES

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on March 25, 1991 by the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat regarding RCMP—Contract Policing to Provinces and Territories.

(The answer follows:)

Contract policing represents slightly less than half of the RCMP Program, as measured in human and gross fiscal expenditures. The net cost to the federal government in 1990-91 is expected to be approximately $251.7 million.

As promised, you will find below a table providing the total provincial and federal per capita cost of RCMP policing to provinces and territories.

	Total Per Capita cost-Independent Police Forces	Total Per Capita cost-RCMP Contract Forces (100%)	Per Capita RCMP cost to province (68%)
B.C.		$200.39	$136.26

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1991-92

THIRD READING

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella moved the third reading of Bill C-100, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1992.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving third reading of Bill C-100 I should like to make a few comments in reference to the questions and observations made by our honourable colleague, Senator John Stewart. With reference to the first matter, the Treasury Board vote 5, nine-twelfths or $300 million of the $400 million is being sought by Bill C-100. The explanation is that the additional six-twelfths or $200 million is required to provide for unforeseen expenditures that may arise during the interim supply period. I am advised that this additional proportion is entirely consistent with previous interim supply bills. Apparently this has been the practice. It represents prudent financial management practices to cover situations in which the supplementary cash requirements in excess of the three-twelfths might be required before introduction of supplementary estimates. While this provision may appear large as a proportion of this particular vote in question, it is not excessive in the context of all government expenditures during this period. Any such funding requirements from this vote would represent temporary allocations which would be reimbursed with passage of a supplementary bill. I understand that included in this vote 5, which covers the entire expenditures of the Government of Canada, will be paylist shortfalls and, perhaps more importantly, the temporary allocations which would be made awaiting the supplements.

With reference to Privy Council vote 1, where we have four-twelfths or $24 million out of $73 million, the additional one-twelfth, as it were, above the one-third—representing $6 million in this instance—is required to cover operating costs of the Citizen's Forum on Canada's Future pending approval of the first regular Supplementary Estimates for 1991-92. The forum's mandate is to the end in June, 1991 and these operating costs are treated as program expenditures under the Privy Council department. The Main Estimates show commissions of inquiry and task forces as a distinct activity within the Privy Council program. All 1991-92 expenses of the Citizen's Forum are expected to be incurred in this year's first quarter.

Honourable senators, that concludes the information I would like to bring forward.

Hon. John B. Stewart: I would thank the honourable senator for his thorough response.

Yesterday I drew the attention of the Senate to the fact that the final Supplementary Estimates for the year ending March, 31, 1991, include approximately $18 million for the Spicer Commission. The honourable senator just now has told us that there is provision under the Privy Council vote for additional payments on behalf of the Spicer Commission in the 1991-92 fiscal year. Would it be fair to ask the senator for an assurance that money from the contingency vote, Treasury vote 5, will not be used to supplement the moneys being provided for the Spicer Commission under vote 1c of Privy Council, or is that beyond his powers of prophesy?

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, the ultimate safeguard that is in place is the need, the necessity and the obligation that these expenditures will come before the house for our scrutiny. These moneys are for contingencies. They are identified in this particular vote in part for this foreseen expenditure and, because it is by definition a contingency, it would be difficult to provide, from this position, any more specificity than I have.

• (1440)

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I shall be brief. I should like to make one or two comments about Privy Council votes 1 and 1c regarding money to pay the expenses of the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future, or the Spicer Commission as it is called.

As I said earlier during Question Period, I am not favourably impressed with what that commission is doing. I do not know the details—and apparently there has been some attempt to find out what happened about the financial mismanagement, if that is the right word—pertaining to certain commissioners putting in requests for as much as $18,000 a month for remuneration in one form or another. However, I guess that can be sorted out. Hopefully they will not be given authority to do that sort of thing.

The other matter that seriously troubles me about the commission is some of the comments that are made by the chairman from time to time. For example, I heard him say on television—so this is not a misquote—that there is great uneasiness among the rank and file because of the way parliamentarians are acting; and he voiced his perception of what people think parliamentarians are doing in giving themselves one raise after another. The $153 per day figure was mentioned in this regard—the $153 that no one ever received, although we were accused of receiving it two or three times.

He has also said that we played kazoos in the chamber. There was never a kazoo played in this chamber at all—and I know, because I was here every day, although not every hour of every day. That, too, was a false statement by whoever it was in the press who first reported it. It was perpetuated as if it were a fact, when it was never a fact.

I grant you, honourable senators, that there was some noise in here, and for very good reason. It was to stop the Speaker from breaking the rules. That is what it was all about. To say there was kazoo playing, and that sort of thing, indicates to me the man does not know what he is talking about. It indicates that he is very badly informed, even under-informed. To have that same person enjoy the confidence of Canadians, and to try to gather a consensus of citizens, creates a very tenuous confidence. I have to say that there is even stronger language to describe that kind of activity, but I am not about to use it.

We should examine what the man does. The kind of comments he makes displays his ignorance of what goes on here. I do not think he is fit to head a commission to look at anything that has to do with public policy if that is the level of his information. The application of his intelligence in making public statements about such matters is, in my view, disgraceful.

There is no mistake. I heard him say those things—not directly, face-to-face, but on television.

I want to put these points on the record because I hope that somehow he will get a copy of them. It would let him know that there are some people here who take this matter seriously.

Senator MacEachen: The Prime Minister will send him a copy.

Senator Olson: I hope he does.

We expect people in positions of trust to act with a certain amount of intelligence based on good information. What he has displayed is a complete lack of both.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL

27 March 1991

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Beverley M. McLachlin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in her capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 27th day of March, 1991, at 4:00 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,

Anthony P. Smyth
Deputy Secretary, Policy.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1991-92

SECOND READING

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator DeWare, for the second reading of Bill C-97, An Act to provide borrowing authority.—(Honourable Senator MacEachen)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, when the honourable Barbara McDougall opened the debate on Bill C-97 in the other place, she said:

> it is important to set this bill in the right context, that is, in the context of the economic policies of the government as they were set out last week in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance.

I agree with that statement. The bill cannot be examined in a vacuum. It has to be examined in the context of the policies which surround the bill. However, before dealing with that wider view, it is important to appreciate fully what we are being asked to do in approving Bill C-97.

• (1450)

The government is asking authority from Parliament to borrow $26.4 billion in the 1991-92 fiscal year. That is $900 million more than last year's $25.5 billion, which, in turn, was $700 million more than the $24.8 billion in borrowing authority obtained for the 1989-90 fiscal year. Such has been the government's success in attempting to live within its means.

As Senator Doody pointed out yesterday, the $26.4 billion being sought for the 1991-92 fiscal year is made up of three components: financial requirements of $21.6 billion, exchange-fund earnings of $1.8 billion, and a non-lapsing reserve to cover contingencies of $3 billion. The figure of $21.6 billion for financial requirements is a key number, as important in evaluating Canada's fiscal health as is the deficit.

When I spoke in this chamber on the borrowing authority bill for 1989-90 I drew attention to a tendency on the part of the Minister of Finance to cast the picture in terms not of the budgetary deficit but of financial requirements. I noted that in the 1989-90 fiscal plan the Minister of Finance stated that:

> Financial requirements represent the extent to which the government has to borrow in capital markets. This more closely parallels the definition of deficits used in both the United States and the United Kingdom.

Certainly in that year the reason for this preference was pretty obvious. The deficit for 1989-90 was estimated in the 1989 budget to be $30.5 billion, and the financial requirements for the same year to be $20.5 billion. That is $10 billion less. For a Minister of Finance anxious to demonstrate that he was successfully moving towards balancing the books, the lower figure had a lot of attraction. Nor was 1989-90 an unusual year. I traced financial requirements, excluding foreign-exchange transactions, from 1984-85 to this current fiscal year and compared them with actual budgetary deficits. Financial requirements were always lower by an amount ranging from about $7 billion to $10 billion, except in 1985-86 when financial requirements were lower by only $4 billion.

There is nothing surprising about this trend since financial requirements reflect both budgetary and non-budgetary transactions, and the non-budgetary transactions generally show a surplus. For instance, the surplus on non-budgetary transactions for 1989-90, 1990-91, 1991-92, and 1992-93 is estimated at $8.5 billion, $6.7 billion, $8.9 billion, and $10.2 billion respectively. With this positive item on his balance sheet, Mr. Wilson clearly hoped that financial requirements would move towards balance much faster than budgetary deficits. For example, financial requirements were estimated in the February 1986 budget to decline to $10.8 billion in 1990-91.

May I point out, of course, that Mr. Wilson was grossly mistaken. The borrowing requirements for 1991-92, excluding foreign-exchange transactions and exchange-fund earnings, are $21.6 billion. That is about $10 billion more than Mr. Wilson was predicting for last year. The truth of the matter is that since 1986 the Minister of Finance has been on the same treadmill with respect to financial requirements as for budgetary deficits, and his forecasts have hardly been reliable.

Financial requirements since 1986 have fluctuated between $18.1 billion and $23.8 billion. As a matter of fact, they have been steadily increasing since 1987. However, despite this track record, Mr. Wilson still persists in projecting a rosy picture for the future. Having found that a good many of the key projections for the past have been in error, the usual practice is to present a further, better, rosy picture for the future. So we are not surprised, really, to find that in the 1991 budget there is a confident prediction that financial requirements will have dropped to $5.3 billion in 1993-94, and that from 1994-95 on a surplus will be achieved to pay off government indebtedness.

Well, that is a very dubious possibility, judging from past trends and past predictions by the minister. Of course, faced with his failure to decrease financial requirements and the deficit, and when this becomes apparent to the public, the Minister of Finance responds with what is now a familiar pattern: he presents another plan. In fact, he has been reminiscent of the Soviet Union in its heyday in his ability to present new plans. His first budget was a clear and realistic plan, a five-year plan. When that was proved to have exhausted itself, he produced a medium-term plan; and now there is a new plan in his 1991 budget entitled "The Plan for Economic Recovery". One wonders why there is this obsession or this preference—this preoccupation—with producing plans when each of the previous plans proved to be so defective. One would have thought that the minister would have protected himself from future criticism.

In any event, there is, in the 1991 budget, the Plan for Economic Recovery. Of course, a key feature of this plan is another plan which was the centrepiece of last year's budget. For those who may be confused by the great abundance of Wilson plans, let me point out that I am referring to the 1990 Expenditure Control Plan. The 1990 Expenditure Control Plan was to have a two-year duration, terminating in 1991-92. Under the 1991 Plan for Economic Recovery, this duration is now extended to 1995-96, although some of his features do lapse in 1994-95.

I have no intention, honourable senators, particularly at this time, and in view of the nearness of Royal Assent, of reviewing all of the elements of this plan, although I think it does deserve analysis in its entirety. I simply note in passing that, since the Expenditure Control Plan was launched last year, program spending increased from $103.5 billion in 1989-90 to $108.3 billion in 1990-91. Thus, there was an increase of about $5 billion. I should point out that, on this score, the program spending forecast contained in last year's budget was $106.6 billion for 1990-91, an increase of about $2 billion from planned to actual program expenditure, which is surely a disappointing result for the first year of Mr. Wilson's Expenditure Control Plan. That reinforces my continuing question: Why all these plans?

● (1500)

We do have the 1991 Expenditure Control Plan, the main features of which are the new limitations on growth rates of the Canada Assistance Plan and Official Development Assistance, a freeze on per capita entitlements under Established Programs Financing and payments to Telefilm Canada, the Export Development Corporation and under the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. Important cuts will be made to funding for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Canadian Jobs Strategy and the Green Plan, and ceilings are being placed on federal public sector wage settlements.

My main concern, however, is with the effects of the Expenditure Control Plan on the balance between federal and provincial governments and on the quality of federal-provincial relations. The most significant feature of the 1990 expenditure control plan was the reduction of major transfer payments or programs to provinces. Per capita entitlement under the Established Programs Financing, which is the largest single form of assistance to provinces and which has grown since 1984-85 at an annual rate of more than 6 per cent to $20 billion in 1989-90, was frozen for two years. Of course, the 1991 budget extends this freeze to 1994-95. This allows total EPF entitlement to grow in keeping with population increases in each province. However, in 1995-96, entitlement will not grow more than the GNP growth rate less 3 percentage points.

The growth of transfer payments under the Canada Assistance Plan to provinces other than those receiving equalization payments was limited last year to 5 per cent for two years—a ceiling extended by the 1991 budget. These programs are primarily used to finance social assistance, health care and secondary education. The government has not touched the equalization transfers that flow to the poorest provinces, but it announced in its 1990 budget a new policy of eliminating grants and subsidies to business and of seeking reimbursement of financial assistance to business on rigorous terms. Whatever the motivation—this new policy may have been related to the eventual subsidy negotiations with the United States—the result will be negative to the operations of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, the Western Diversification Fund and other regional development initiatives.

The Expenditure Control Plan is designed to constrain federal transfers to the provinces. No one will question the need to constrain federal expenditures, but one wonders about the timing. Was it appropriate timing for the Minister of Finance to decree unilaterally a reduction in the rate of federal transfers when the country is going through a painful appraisal of national unity and federalism?

I think we must be concerned at the combined effect of the accumulation of the massive public debt and the disengagement of the federal government from senior federal responsibilities. There is ample resonance of this phenomenon contained in the Allaire Report. One wonders whether the report is about federalism or dissatisfaction with Canadian policy, particularly monetary and fiscal policy, and the disengagement of the federal government from its responsibilities.

We have seen the government financially disengage itself from unemployment insurance, put certain crown corporations on the auction block which were relevant to national unity, and now move away from transfer programs equally relevant to equitable standards of national welfare, health and education. We have also heard the loud and legitimate discontent of provincial representatives when meeting with the Minister of Finance. That is creating additional strain when Canada can least afford it.

Honourable senators, there is another aspect of the current budget that I wish to mention briefly in view of the prolonged discussions we had in this chamber not so long ago on the Unemployment Insurance Act. There seems to be a gap between the reassuring words issued by representatives of the government and the harsh reality of the economic world at the present time. That is well illustrated by the blow delivered by the Minister of Finance to the unemployed workers of Canada and to those who fear they will soon join the ranks of the unemployed.

When the Senate was asked to pass Bill C-21, the unemployment insurance legislation, it was assured by the government that, though direct contributions would cease, the government would nevertheless be there to help finance the program in difficult times. When the changes implemented by Bill C-21 were announced in the 1989 budget, Mr. Wilson wrote in his budget papers, and I quote:

> The government will continue to contribute to the financing of the program in difficult economic times when it is inappropriate to raise premiums and prudent to allow deficits to build in the unemployment insurance account . . .
> To provide for stability in the future and cushion the impact of the change in financing, the premium rate for employees will be set at $2.25 per $100 of insurable earnings for 1990, 1991 and 1992. This rate is lower than the rate that would be required initially to reflect fully the fact that all unemployment insurance expenditures will now be financed by premiums.

That is the end of the minister's quotation. Five months ago, on October 22, 1990, Senator Simard assured this chamber, and I quote:

> Mr. Michael Wilson told us that, during a lengthy crisis, money will be made available to supplement the UI account so that the premiums paid by the employers and the employees are not unduly high.

Last month the Minister of Finance announced that UI premiums were being increased 24 per cent to $2.80 per $100 of insurable earnings for workers and to $3.92 for employers, which are the highest levels in the history of the program.

• (1510)

It is interesting to recall, honourable senators, that when the Minister of Finance refused in his 1985 budget to increase the rate to $2.60 per $100 of insurable earnings for employees and $3.64 for employers, he explained his decision in the following words:

> This would represent an increase of 11 per cent over current rates and result in additional premium payments of about $1 billion in 1986. The government is concerned . . . that an increase of this magnitude would impose an additional burden on the private sector, especially on small businesses, that would hinder job creation and economic recovery.

In this budget the minister increased them not by 11 per cent but by 24 per cent. Additional payments will amount not to $1 billion, which he found unduly onerous, but to more than $2 billion. One must ask the question: If, in 1985, when the economy was in strong recovery, an increase in rates of 11 per cent was unacceptable because it would "hinder job creation and economic recovery," why is an increase of 24 per cent in the middle of a recession acceptable? Will this increase stimulate economic recovery and job creation? It certainly undermines the credibility of the minister that he would establish such a strong foundation against increases of this magnitude for economic reasons, provide assurances to the country when changes were made to the UI account, and then, because of the need for additional general revenues, he soaks the employers and employees an additional $2 billion. This increase in premiums is equivalent to a tax increase.

One wonders as well why the budget is totally oblivious to the fact that more than one and a half million Canadians are unemployed. I do not know of any budget in a period of recession in the history of this country like this one, because it has overlooked entirely the needs of the unemployed and has established no policies to either create jobs or to stimulate the economy. I think it is unique in that sense.

One might say that that is the conclusion of a partisan Liberal, but the Toronto Dominion Bank, in its budget analysis, stated:

> There is nothing in this budget that addresses the high unemployment rates in Canada except that 2,000 public servants will be added to the unemployment rolls.

I take honourable senators minds back to November 1984 when Mr. Wilson, in the first flush of victory, faced the country and presented his economic statement. Perhaps you ought to go back and read it, because it is very instructive. He lamented that if his government maintained the status quo inherited from the Liberal Government and took no initiatives, the results would be dismal:

> the unemployment rate is expected to decline only gradually to just over 7 per cent in 1990, averaging about 9 per cent over the medium term . . . Clearly this is not an acceptable economic outlook for Canadians.

That is a quotation from the publication, A New Direction for Canada, page 7. Well, 7 per cent unemployment was unacceptable to the Minister of Finance if it were the result of the maintenance of Liberal economic policies that he had inherited, but 10.2 per cent unemployment in present circumstances, apparently the result of Conservative policies, is acceptable, because no action has been taken to address this high level of unemployment.

Senator Simard: No short fix, but they are good sound policies. They are worth it, and you know that.

Senator MacEachen: We have heard that. In addition to the production of plans, the recurring theme of the Minister of Finance in every budget is "our policies are working," but the working of the policy has resulted in a deficit which has remained stationary for a period of five to six years. The Minister of Finance is running the same budgetary deficit that he ran five years ago, even though he is constantly telling us that his policies are working.

Not only did the Minister of Finance take no action to address the plight of the unemployed—and for the unemployed the short term is very important—but he reduced funding for the Canada Jobs Strategy Program in the amount of $100 million. Those of us who strenuously oppose Bill C-21 take no comfort in having our fears confirmed in this budget. The additional burden placed upon the unemployed and the working people of Canada is really quite offensive.

These are only one or two aspects of the economic policies that ought to be examined in the context of the financial requirements of the government. I have touched only on expenditure control, the unemployment insurance situation, and the employment and unemployment situation in Canada at the present time. There is still the larger question of the state of the economy and its future prospects. That is a very large question indeed. I would like to save that matter for a later date, perhaps on third reading of the bill, which now, I understand, is to be dealt with when we come back on April 8 or April 9.

I would like to say a word on the process of the borrowing bill. My remarks will be milder than they would have been had the situation prevailed as we expected; namely, that we would be expected to deal with the bill as originally planned, and as we were prepared to do, give it second reading today, send it to committee and complete it tomorrow. We were prepared to do that, but that is no longer necessary for reasons that have been imposed upon us, not by the Senate but by the House of Commons.

• (1520)

I wonder why it is. Maybe Senator Doody is asking—and if he is not he should be—why it is that the management of the government is so bad that it puts itself in the position that it cannot get its borrowing bill through Parliament in a timely way. It is a damn good question. If I were the Prime Minister I would be asking Mr. Andre and the Minister of Finance, "Why is it that at the end of March 1991 you are totally out of borrowing authority, that you have used up not only the $21 billion, or whatever it was, plus $3 billion of nonlapsing reserve authority, and now you have to use section 47 of the Financial Administration Act to borrow on short term, and you have not got your bill?"

Senator Barootes: I guess we must need that prestudy mechanism.

Senator MacEachen: I do not think it would help at all. I think the suggestion made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration is much more relevant than the suggestion made by Senator Barootes. When she introduced the bill for second reading she said:

> I want to remind honourable members that this bill provides borrowing authority which the government needs to meet its requirements for 1991-92. It is important that it should be considered in a timely manner.

That was on March 5 at the second reading stage of the bill, and I think the bill was in the Commons for some considerable time before it was brought forward for second reading. The minister said that it is important that it should be considered in a timely manner, and I could not agree more.

The borrowing bill was introduced in the other place on February 27, 1991. It received second reading on March 7 and was passed on March 20. The same bill was introduced here on Monday, March 25. We are not going to deal with the bill because we cannot, and, if we did deal with it in a timely way, as recommended by the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the House of Commons would not cooperate in providing Royal Assent tomorrow. I find that interesting.

I find it even more interesting when I realize that the borrowing bill of last year received Royal Assent on June 12, 1990. This bill is here on March 27, 1991. There is a reason why there was a relaxed attitude last year and there is a panicky attitude within the last few days. If that panic had started in February, when it ought to have started, we would not be in this mess at the present time.

Why has the government run out of its borrowing authority? Why has it failed to forecast its requirements and had to use the $3 billion of nonlapsing authority before the end of the year? Well, the government's estimate of borrowing requirements for 1990-91 was wrong by several billion dollars. Last year the government sought borrowing authority for $25.5 billion including $21 billion for financial requirements, $1.5 billion for exchange fund earnings and $3 billion for contingencies, for a total of $25.5 billion. Financial requirements in 1990-91 were bigger than expected, largely due to an unforeseen $1.8 billion increase in public debt charges and to other unforeseen increases in requirements arising from foreign exchange transactions.

The result of all that is that the entire 1990-91 borrowing authority has been consumed. As I stated, the government has already used up the $3 billion nonlapsing borrowing authority which is usually put in there to tide it over into the next fiscal year. Last year the government was able to get along until the end of June, when it had its bill passed for borrowing. As I said, the government is already making use of authority under Section 47 to borrow on the market.

We understand clearly. I stated on Monday to Senator Doody that if urgency could be demonstrated we would facilitate the bill. We listened to the arguments that were made and we said that a case has been made because the government is out of money and it may cause difficulties for those who are managing the public debt. It may cause the government to borrow more short term rather than an appropriate mix of short-term and long-term bonds. So we said we will accommodate in order to avoid an embarrassment to the taxpayer or an increase in interest rates or whatever.

I do not intend to develop that theme very much, but I do think it is legitimate to ask why it was not foreseeable early in the year that a difficulty was looming, and why was that bill not produced somewhat earlier and pushed through the Commons somewhat more quickly in order to get it here so that we could deal with it. We can do it, but the Commons is not to be here tomorrow.

Anyway, I think I have said enough to indicate that it is rather unpleasant for the Minister of Finance and his associates to find themselves in this situation at a time when they ought to be doing everything to bolster their credibility rather than undermining it by this type of mismanagement. We are prepared to give the bill second reading today and we are prepared to give it "timely" passage, in the words of the minister, when we return on April 9.

[Senator MacEachen.]

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if Senator Doody speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, before Senator Doody speaks I would like to ask him to take this opportunity to explain the situation. Senator MacEachen has told the Senate that although we received the bill only on Monday, it was anticipated that it would go through all stages and receive Royal Assent this week. As I understand it, there was to be second reading this afternoon, the National Finance Committee would meet tonight or, if no minister was available tonight, early tomorrow morning, and the bill could become law later this week.

We must realize that this is not a mere slip. As I understand it, the implication of this bill not becoming law until the House of Commons has come back from its holiday will be that the entire borrowing program for the next two months will be badly disrupted. Several hundreds of billions of dollars will have been borrowed in short-term instruments and the mix, as Senator MacEachen has said, of the government debt will be seriously disturbed. That disturbance will be perpetuated in the debt stream for months and, indeed, years. There may also be an element of cost, because the government has not been able to go to the market in a predictable way.

• (1530)

Given this situation, will Senator Doody explain to us why the government's financial management plan is being so badly disrupted by the government or by the government leadership in the other place, and why this additional financial burden—perhaps millions of dollars—is to be imposed upon the Canadian taxpayer? We deserve an explanation from the Deputy Leader of the Government or perhaps even from the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who is influential with his ministerial colleagues.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am advised by my leader that I should accept these reproaches in the spirit of the Lenten season in which we now find ourselves.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Senator Doody, since you will close the debate upon speaking, I wish to say something to Senator Stewart. I do not know the reason for the delay and I am not taking any position in respect of that, but the disruption of the government's financing program under previous circumstances would likely have been a matter of concern because the yield current was at that time reversed. In other words, short-term obligations were more expensive than long-term obligations. The senator will know that that situation has again reversed itself in Canada. While the difference is not great, short-term obligations now are below the cost of long-term obligations. Perhaps the government has been taken off the hook by a lucky concatenation of events. Nevertheless, from a fiscal management point of view the need to borrow in the short-term market during this hiatus should not be costly to the government.

Senator Stewart: I thank the Honourable Senator Everett for his reassurance. Since short-term paper is less costly than long-term paper, the conclusion we must draw is that there is no need to push forward with the bill at all. That, I assure the honourable senator, is quite the opposite of what I was told by authoritative spokesmen from the government earlier this week. The honourable senator is just talking off his cuff.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: It is great foresight; that is what it is.

Senator Everett: You are saying that I am talking off the cuff in respect of what?

Senator Stewart: I am referring to the total cost implications.

Senator Everett: I assure you that I am not. The yield curve has gone the other way. I can assure you that the cost of short-term financing will now be below the cost of long-term financing, which was not the case some month or two months ago. I may be talking extemporaneously, but I am not talking hot air in that respect.

Senator Stewart: I am not talking specifically about interest rates; I am talking about the costs—that is, both the initial costs and the long-term costs of a disruption of the financial management program.

Senator Roblin: You are talking off the cuff, too.

Senator Stewart: That is not true, Senator Roblin. You are just talking.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators will forgive me if I thank honourable senators opposite for their cooperation on this matter. Senator Stewart is absolutely correct. I did assure him that the government wanted this bill as quickly as possible. A meeting was arranged for him with members of the Department of Finance, who explained the urgency of the bill. For some reason—which I cannot explain and I do not understand—the government or the leadership in the other place did not make arrangements for the House of Commons to be present for Royal Assent tomorrow. Unfortunately, the best laid plans and the efforts of all of us in this place to facilitate the requests were to no avail and were pointless. They will have to wait until we come back to get third reading of the bill.

What I would suggest now is that at the appropriate time I will refer the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and it can be studied when we return, or tonight, or tomorrow if there is a minister available. I will leave it entirely up to the committee to decide; it is their prerogative. Once again, I thank you for your efforts.

Again, I want to assure Senator Everett that I did not arrange the differences in the short-term and long-term rates at this point to get me off the hook. I was well and truly on it before that.

Senator Everett: On a matter of clarification for Senator Stewart, I was not arguing with him about the lack of management on the government's part. That is a case that is well made and well taken. I am saying that it is fortuitous that this—

Senator Doody: It is better to be lucky than smart.

Senator Everett: —will be accepted in here.

Senator Stewart: Thank you.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE SUSPENDED

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard moved the second reading of Bill C-91, to amend the Financial Administration Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, allow me to speak briefly to Bill C-91, an Act to amend the Financial Administration Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

We are getting close to four o'clock and, if I have not finished my remarks, I know the Speaker will draw my attention to the fact that Mr. Justice is about to enter the chamber. I will continue after the Royal Assent ceremony and conclude my speech.

Before dealing with the subject matter I cannot resist the temptation to say a few words about the speech of Senator MacEachen. I feel all the more at ease because the issues he dealt with, that is his criticism of the budget, the bad administration of the government and its delays in tabling estimates and borrowing requirements can be linked to other measures contained in Bill C-91 because it really has to do with setting some order in public finance.

[English]

I will make a few remarks. Senator MacEachen never fails to amaze me.

Senator MacEachen: I hope to continue to do so.

Senator Simard: He is a good magician, as he has always been.

Senator Barootes: He amazes himself!

Senator Simard: He is a master of the illusion.

Senator MacEachen: I thought Mr. Wilson was that!

• (1540)

Senator Simard: It was enlightening to a certain extent. Not that he proposed many new Liberal Party initiatives, but he was content to criticize. He referred to the National Energy Program and the government's reform of UI. I think at one time he even talked about FIRA.

Senator MacEachen: No.

Senator Simard: I think you touched on the edges of that.

Senator MacEachen: No.

Senator Simard: However, there was certainly one element that transcends your whole speech, that this government did not know what it was doing, contrary to the government that you worked with for so many years with Mr. Lalonde and Turner, as if they were all the great years.

Senator MacEachen: They were.

Senator Simard: You did not back us on structural changes that prevent government from moving ahead much as it should. You did create, Senator MacEachen, you and your colleagues, major structural problems that we had to correct. I could talk about the doing away with the National Energy Program and the reform of UI. You found courage to start some changes, but we went a little further and we were criticized for that. You had great ideas.

However, you say that Mr. Wilson's five year plan of 1984 was no good. Now he is coming with a new plan.

Senator MacEachen: Yes.

Senator Simard: You spoke about the present high unemployment period that we are experiencing. It is true; there are certainly too many Canadians unemployed.

Senator MacEachen: Unacceptable.

Senator Simard: I say to you, Senator MacEachen, that perhaps Mr. Wilson's plan should be adjusted periodically.

Senator MacEachen: A new plan ever year. Once the previous one failed, there was a new one.

Senator Simard: You know, Senator MacEachen, you are obviously ill at ease here.

Senator MacEachen: No, I never felt more comfortable.

Senator Simard: You remind me of your previous leader, Mr. Trudeau—

Senator MacEachen: That is a compliment.

Senator Simard: —who said, in 1984, that a constitution should last for a thousand years. Well, a constitution does not last and should not last for a thousand years. The same thing with a five year plan. It needs to be adjusted to perhaps aim at new targets, keeping in mind the changing situation both nationally and internationally.

Senator MacEachen: Smile when you say that.

Senator Simard: However, we have to wait, because on the Orders of the Day there is Order No. 31. It follows your intention that you made known on June 13, 1989, that you would draw the attention of the Senate to the 1989 budget speech. Why did you wait 22 months to criticize and make suggestions? Why did we have to wait 22 months to hear your great knowledge? Why did you wait until today to tell us that what was presented in 1984 or 1990 did not work?

Senator MacEachen: I have given you many speeches.

Senator Simard: Why did we have to wait?

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator MacEachen: I have given a number of speeches in that period. I will give you a list.

[Translation]

I understand that the judge is at the door and about to enter. I shall resume my remarks in a little while. Thank you. That was my introduction.

[English]

Senator MacEachen: Well, you won't have a big audience after Royal Assent. I can tell you that.

Senator Simard: As long as I help you, senator, that is okay.

On motion of Senator Simard, debate suspended.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Beverley M. McLachlin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to cause Letters Patent to be issued under his Sign Manual and Signet constituting the Honourable Beverley M. McLachlin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, his Deputy, to do in his Excellency's name all acts on her part necessary to be done during His Excellency's pleasure.

The Commission was read by the Clerk of the Senate.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof (Bill C-34, Chapter 16, 1991)

An Act respecting the establishment of the Centennial Flame Research Award to publicize the contributions to Canadian public life of persons with disabilities (Bill C-258, Chapter 17, 1991)

The Honourable Steve Paproski, P.C., Acting Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bills:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1992 (Bill C-100, Chapter 18, 1991)

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1991 (Bill C-99, Chapter 19, 1991)

To which I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bills.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, unless I am mistaken, some honourable senators would like us to move on, they may have travel plans, etc.

If that is so, with leave of the Senate, I move the adjournment of the debate on this Bill, as long as the motion stands in my name.

On motion of Senator Simard, debate adjourned.

• (1600)

[English]

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Motions:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That, when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, April 9, 1991, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if it is agreeable, I would move that all remaining orders, inquiries and motions stand.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 9, 1991, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, April 9, 1991

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—CONCURRENCE BY COMMONS IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that they had agreed to the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-79, to amend the Parliament of Canada Act.

FARM INCOME PROTECTION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-98, to authorize agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand there have been discussions between Senators Barootes and Olson on this bill. I am not privy to the outcome of those discussions, but I do know that a concern has been expressed that we should try to deal with this bill as quickly as possible. If we give the normal two days' notice, we will not be able to start second reading until Thursday. If that is the wish of the Senate then, of course, that is the route we will take, but if senators wish to move the bill along we could try to start second reading today and refer the bill to committee. Obviously, I am at the disposal of the Senate.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Would it not be good enough to proceed to second reading tomorrow?

Senator Doody: I have no problem with starting second reading today, tomorrow or Thursday; it is up to the Senate. I cannot make a motion or ask for leave until I know the wishes of honourable senators.

Senator MacEachen: We can do it today.

Senator Doody: Then I take it we will proceed to second reading today.

Senator MacEachen: Your silence convinced me.

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44 1(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would ask that the address of His Excellency Carlos Salinas de Gortari, President of the United Mexican States, delivered before the members of the Senate and House of Commons on Monday, April 8, 1991, together with all introductory and related speeches, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a series of petitions signed by approximately 1,262 people from different regions of the province of Quebec including the Abitibi, the region of Lac-Saint-Jean; there are a great many from Saint-Léonard, a municipality of the province of Quebec.

These 1,225 petitions are opposed to the GST and they urge the Senate to do everything possible to counter it. They request also that elections be held as soon as possible.

Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present, on behalf of Senator Frith, five petitions comprising 120 names asking members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons to do everything possible to abolish the new goods and services tax and to demand that a general election be held immediately.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SEVENTY-FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Tuesday, April 9, 1991

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

SEVENTY-FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee notes that certain anomalies have existed in the terms and conditions of employment of Senators' secretaries between those hired on or prior to December 31, 1984 and those hired on or after January 1, 1985.

The most distinct variation is the tenure of appointment. Those hired prior to 1985 are transferred to a lower paying position whereas those hired in 1985 and thereafter are terminated on a minimum of two (2) weeks' notice.

Considering the disadvantages of such a system for both the Senate and the Senators' secretaries, your Committee recommends:

1. That there be no change to the staffing method;
2. That Senators' secretaries who have a minimum of one year of continuous employment and whose services are no longer required be offered the following options:

Senators' secretaries hired on or prior to December 31, 1984

a) Acceptance of a transfer to a position of support secretary and entitlement to "staffing priority" for a period of one (1) year commencing from the effective date of the transfer or

b) i) Upon request, their employment be terminated on six (6) months' notice commencing on the date their services are no longer required;

ii) During the notice period, the employee be extended staffing priority rights;

iii) The employee be offered counselling services with respect to alternatives, benefits, etc.;

iv) The employee be given a lump sum payment equivalent to one week's salary for each completed two (2) years of employment in a Senator's office up to a maximum of thirteen weeks, in addition to the normal severance pay benefits of one week for every completed year of continuous employment;

v) The employee who accepts the termination lump sum be permitted to again seek employment with the Senate after a period equivalent to the number of weeks for which they have received the lump sum payment.

Senators' secretaries hired on or after January 1, 1985

The employment of Senators' secretaries whose services are no longer required and who have one or more year of continuous employment, be terminated in accordance with paragraph 2(b) above.

Respectfully submitted,

C. WILLIAM DOODY
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Doody, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

RELATION OF INFLATION RATE TO INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to explain what the Minister of Finance meant when he said there was more room for interest rates to decline and that it would be good for the economy if they did. I do not understand why he does not act upon that statement instead of just saying that there is room for it to happen.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance, in the statement that my friend has alluded to, was saying nothing that he has not said on numerous previous occasions. As we win the battle against inflation, interest rates are bound to come down, with the resulting beneficial effect on the Canadian economy.

Senator Olson: But there is more to it than that. He says too:

> We have had a lot of success in reducing the inflation rate and that's why you see that there has been a reduction in interest rates by four percentage points since—

• (1410)

Are we going to continue to see this success that the Minister of Finance talks about, which is almost devastating the Canadian economy? Is that what he calls success?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the budget that the Minister of Finance brought down some weeks ago provides for a cap on increases in government program spending over the next five years. We are bringing in legislation to that effect, bold programs limiting spending increases to 3 per cent annually. There are to be inflation targets in which the government and the central bank are cooperating, as the honourable senator knows. There is a provision in that budget, which will be followed up with legislation, to provide for a debt reduction servicing fund to which proceeds from privatization and the goods and services tax will be applied.

All these can be seen as policies which are intended to help bring down inflation and restore an acceptable rate of non-inflationary growth in the Canadian economy. So, yes, we anticipate further success with our economic policy—

Senator Olson: Raising unemployment levels.

Senator Murray: —and, yes, the result of that will undoubtedly be continued decreases in interest rates and renewed non-inflationary economic growth including a lower unemployment rate, a lower inflation rate and a more acceptable rate of economic growth.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is a new definition of success in lowering unemployment rates, when last week they hit an all time high for six years. I believe 10.5 was the rate. If we are going to understand what the minister has to say, we will have to have a revised dictionary for certain words.

Another important point I wanted to make is that I believe there was an 11 point reduction in the bank rate last Thursday, but in the prior week it did not, in fact, move at all, and, indeed, in the week before that it went up. It was a very small amount, but it actually rose. Is there now a conflict between the opinion of the Minister of Finance and the governor of the bank with the minister saying that there is room and that there ought to be a reduction in interest rates, because we have so wrecked the economy that we are now faced with the current inflationary pressure? At the same time the Bank of Canada does not, in fact, continue to lower interest rates as rapidly as these other economic factors take place.

Senator Murray: The honourable senators should not become fixated on one week's—

Senator Olson: I gave you the results from four—

Senator Murray: The honourable senator should look at the trend lines. The trend line of interest rates for many, many weeks has been downward. We are determined not to make the same mistake that our predecessors made in following policies that have the effect of refueling inflation, thus triggering another upward spiral in special rates with the resulting recessionary impact on the economy.

We expect there will be a renewal of economic growth this summer, by which time we will be out of the current recession.

We have been following policies which will make that possible. Following the kind of policies that the honourable senator espouses would ensure a renewal of inflation and a renewal of an upward spiral in interest rates.

Senator Olson: I certainly hope that the honourable minister is not accusing the previous administration for the run-up in interest rates that has taken place since 1986. That is the clear implication he wants to leave—

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: No; I am talking about your record between 1980 and 1984.

Senator Olson: The people of Canada want to know what will happen in 1991 and 1992. All these old ghosts that you have hauled back from 10 or 12 years ago were interesting 10 or 12 years ago. They are of no interest to Canadians now. They want to know from the government what it is going to do now.

If the Minister of Finance believes that there should be further substantial reductions in interest rates, why does the government not do that, instead of hiding and saying, "Well, there is some kind of trend line here, but we have stopped lowering them"?

The point is that we are still 400 basis points higher than the competitive rates in the United States. The Americans are our competitors in a whole lot of economic activity, including competitive factors.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I refer to what happened between 1980 and 1984, when interest rates were in the 20 per cent range. That was the worst recession in the history of the country.

Senator Olson: Except for now.

Senator Murray: I refer to that time not to make the honourable senator feel bad or to add to his guilt complex about these matters, but simply to state that we have learned something from the experience of our predecessors. We are determined not to repeat those mistakes. Because we have held to the course of our economic policy, we will be coming out of this short-lived recession this summer.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is the kind of rhetoric and double-talk we keep getting from this minister. We now have the highest rate of bankruptcy in Canada ever. We have never had the levels of bankruptcy that we see for January and February. We do not yet have the statistics for March, but they are likely to break all the records. If that is the only way the government knows how to manage the economy, then it is pretty sad.

The minister brings up something that happened 10 or 12 years ago that was similar. He says that the government is not going to repeat it. It has repeated it already in 1986 and 1987 when interest rates went up by about 50 per cent.

The question I am asking—and I do not see why the minister does not get around to answering it—is this. Is the Minister of Finance in charge, or will the government lower these rates so that we get more in line with the competitive factors that make for long-time reliable employment in Canada? Will the minister simply continue to raise ghosts and spout rhetoric about what happened 10 or 12 years ago, which is a completely inadequate and irrelevant answer as far as the Canadian people are concerned?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as the economy emerges from the recession on to a path of sustained, non-inflationary growth, as it surely will this summer, I hope the honourable senator will be as quick to give credit where credit is due and to attribute the renewal of economic growth to the steady policies of this government.

Senator Olson: If that happens, I will guarantee the minister that I will be quick to compliment the government. But there is no indication that that it is happening yet.

THE BUDGET, 1991

CUTS TO GRANTS AND CONTRIBUTIONS—PROGRESS OF REVIEW COMMITTEE

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable Senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he has any further information regarding a question I asked on March 7 last about the committee established under the Chair of the Honourable Harvey Andre concerning cuts in grants and contributions of the federal government.

In his rely to my question at that time, the Leader of the Government said he anticipated that the committee would report in about six weeks, which would be next week. I wonder if that is still the case.

As the leader will appreciate, there are many voluntary associations that are making plans and are very concerned about such things as the review of the Employment Equity Act, and they wish to know what their situation will be with respect to funding as they prepare for that very useful activity in terms of public policy development.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not know whether that report will be made by Mr. Andre next week. I shall inquire as to progress.

My recollection of the mandate of the committee is that it was to find a certain amount of savings in the present fiscal year, but rather greater amounts in future fiscal years. In that respect, I am sure everything possible will be done to minimize disruption to organizations that are now carrying on activities on the basis of government funding.

Senator Marsden: Honourable Senators, I thank the Leader of the Government for that information and would ask that he report as quickly as possible on the date on which we can anticipate seeing that report.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SRI LANKA—CANADIAN AID TO VICTIMS OF CIVIL WAR

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable Senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, which he may wish to take as notice. The country of Sri Lanka is gripped in a terrible civil war, as everyone knows, and every night death squads are operating and young men and women are disappearing. A group of women has recently established a Mother's Front, comparable to that which existed in Argentina a few years ago, which is led by Dr. Manorani Saravanamutu, a physician, who is trying to do what she and her colleagues can to help those woman whose husbands and sons have been killed and who have no means of economic subsistence.

Could the Leader of the Government look into whatever aid the Government of Canada is officially giving those women who are in such terrible circumstances under the conditions presently existing in Sri Lanka?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs for an early report, which I shall bring to the Senate.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ELIMINATION OF TOXIC WASTE—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable Senators, five weeks ago I asked the Leader of the Government when, if at all, the government was going to place a second transportable incinerator to clean up PCBs and toxic waste. Honourable senators will recall that I have been asking this question for two years now.

On February 28 the Leader of the Government said that he did not have the information at his fingertips; but I wonder if he has managed to obtain it in the past five weeks?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am still awaiting a report from my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, on this matter.

Senator Kenny: In the same vein, would the Leader of the Government be kind enough to inquire about questions 56 and 58 on the Order Paper?

In the case of question No. 56, I have been waiting since September 27. In the case of question No. 58, I have been waiting since October 4, 1990.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, question No. 56, to which the honourable senator has referred, takes up five pages in the Minutes of the Proceedings and actually consists of 28 questions, most of which are subdivided into further questions. It is a very detailed question, and I assure the honourable senator that we are working on it and that we will bring in a reply as soon as we can.

While I am on my feet I should say a word about our record in dealing with questions in this place. Since September 25 we have brought in 154 delayed answers to questions asked during the Oral Question Period. There are three outstanding questions as of this date and one delayed answer that will be replied to today by Senator Doody.

Senator Kenny: I appreciate the response of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but it seems unfair, on the one hand, to suggest that my question No. 56 is composed of 28 questions and then, on the other hand, to say that only three questions await reply. Perhaps there are 28 questions to which we await replies, in which case the honourable senator's batting average has just dropped significantly.

Senator Murray: I was referring to oral questions.

AGRICULTURE

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND NEW BRUNSWICK POTATO FARMERS—ERADICATION OF VIRUS—FINANCIAL SUPPORT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, the other day asked the Leader of the Government if he could make available the plan for eradicating the PVYN virus in Prince Edward Island potatoes. While awaiting an answer from the minister I read in a newspaper from Prince Edward Island that the federal government had made available $7.9 million toward that plan. The opposition in Prince Edward Island—which is, of course, from the same party as the federal government—and the government of Prince Edward Island, which does not necessarily support the federal government in all things, passed a unanimuous resolution stating that it was not enough money, and that it would not help to eradicate the virus. In fact, the federal government has asked the farmers of Prince Edward Island to use the virus-infected potatoes for table stock, whereas the Government of Prince Edward Island is of the opinion that the potatoes should be destroyed to try to clear the whole province of the virus in one year.

Can the minister tell us if any progress has been made between the Minister of Agriculture of Prince Edward Island, the Minister of Agriculture for Canada, and the Premier of Prince Edward Island with regard to further financial aid for the hard-stricken farmers of Prince Edward Island, who will lose about $50 million as a result of the virus?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, frankly, I was not aware, although I am not surprised, that there is a difference of opinion between the two governments as to the amount of money that one side or the other would consider adequate for a program of this kind.

● (1430)

I will ask Mr. Mazankowski, the Minister of Agriculture, to provide me with a report on this matter, which I will bring to the Senate in due course. Meanwhile, I should draw Senator Bonnell's attention to the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the Prince Edward Legislature a short time ago in which the government of that province spoke favourably of the cooperation it had received from the federal government in addressing this serious problem.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, cooperation is fine if dollars are attached to it. That would help the farmers of Prince Edward Island because, as you know, the province's economy has been almost completely destroyed in the last five years. Our potato industry has been destroyed by the virus, our hogs and cattle are getting pneumonia, and our lobsters have listeria. We can no longer sell our lobster to the United States because of their size. So our fish market is gone, our agriculture market is gone, and, because of the GST, our tourist market is almost gone. In Prince Edward Island all we have is agriculture, the sea and our tourism. In each case the Government of Canada is doing little to support the province, perhaps because the province did not send too many federal members to Ottawa to support the government in the last election. If that is the case, I am sure fewer MPs will be re-elected next time, because Canada sympathizes with the needs of Atlantic Canada.

I would ask the minister to talk to his Minister of Agriculture and Minister of Finance and put in a strong word in support of the farmers of Prince Edward Island to getting more money to help eradicate this virus so that their market to the United States will return to normal by next year. I hope Senator Murray will tell me that he will do that, because he comes from an area close to Cape Breton and he must have a soft spot in his heart for Prince Edward Island. I know the premier always speaks well of him, so I hope he will speak well of the premier and will do that for him.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, in launching a partisan attack against the federal government, my honourable friend did a disservice to his own province by saying that agriculture is a disaster area and that the fishery and the tourism industries are finished. We recognize that there are problems, and we are working cooperatively with the Government of Prince Edward Island and the private sector to resolve them. One has only to read the Speech from the Throne at the recent opening of the Prince Edward Island legislature, and other declarations emanating from that government, to know that while there are problems the Government of Prince Edward Island attaches a great deal of importance to a continuation of the cooperative effort that has existed between the Government of Canada and the Government of Prince Edward Island for some years now. I much prefer the more constructive and forward-looking approach of the Premier of Prince Edward Island to the very pessimistic and, indeed, partisan attitude of my honourable friend.

Senator Bonnell: If you do, then will you ask the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture to provide more funds to the farmers of Prince Edward Island? We can then ensure that the cooperation from the Prime Minister and his cabinet, which was supposed to have been in the Speech from the Throne of Prince Edward Island, does not change in the future. Do not let down the farmers of Prince Edward Island when their finances are in bad straits. Many of them will not be able to put in their crops and many will go bankrupt.

Senator Simard: And in the meantime you will continue to be partisan.

Senator Bonnell: I think we should all be a bit partisan to see if we cannot get a little better leadership from the Government of Canada.

[Translation]

NEW BRUNSWICK

EFFECTS OF ECONOMIC CRISIS IN BORDER AREAS

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I would have two questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. My first question concerns what I consider can only be described as a crisis in New Brunswick, especially in three regions: in the northwest, a little less in the Campbellton area, in Chaleurs Bay and certainly in the St. Stephen-Milltown region. It is the crisis in the border areas. Hundreds of jobs are affected in these regions because Canadians shop more and more in the United States.

Given the government's enviable record, I think, in showing its great sensitivity on many occasions as new problems arise, I hope that the government is well aware of the situation and that an overall approach has already been considered.

Some of our opponents and other people who no doubt are quite ignorant of the real causes of this crisis attribute this new surge of Canadian shoppers to the United States to the Goods and Services Tax or the Free Trade Agreement. Others, and I am one of them, believe that a third factor, equally important, is the present recession. I suppose that with the recession, people want to save as much as possible to make ends meet.

Therefore my question for Senator Murray is: Has the government studied this problem or is it planning to do so in order to investigate the situation and find what solutions might be applied?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Simard for his question. I took careful note of his representations.

I will ask my colleague, the Minister of Finance, for a report as soon as possible.

Senator Simard: Thank you, Senator Murray.

I might add that the Government of New Brunswick, led by Mr. McKenna, has already hired a firm to study this problem.

It might be appropriate, in a spirit of co-operation, to join them or to contribute to this study. This is a very acute problem.

NEW BRUNSWICK

ENTRENCHMENT OF BILL 88—REQUEST FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: I have a second question, further to a series of questions I raised on March 27 concerning the need to entrench the provincial legislation recognizing the two official communities in New Brunswick, commonly known as Bill 88.

I learned last weekend in New Brunswick that there had been an exchange of documents between the federal and provincial governments. If there was an exchange, it means that there was a reply to a letter from Mr. McKenna to the Prime Minister of Canada in March. Neither the reply nor Mr. McKenna's letter were made public.

Senator Murray, could you do everything in your power to make public this exchange of letters on such an important subject as soon as possible? I think that we could thus help advance the debate on Canadian unity and possibly let Canadians and especially New Brunswickers know where the federal government stands on the subject.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators, parliamentary tradition requires that we obtain the consent of the other government involved before tabling such papers.

If the Government of New Brunswick agrees, I will be pleased to table the letters from the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of New Brunswick on this subject.

Senator Simard: Thank you, Senator Murray.

• (1440)

[English]

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, the first question posed by Senator Simard raised a very interesting point. He referred to the very significant and serious impact on the Canadian economy of cross-border shopping. In his remarks he said that there were three reasons for this. The first, he said, was the Free Trade Agreement.

Senator Simard, do not shake your head, because it is on the record and I made a note.

The second reason he gave was the GST—

Senator Simard: On a point of order, please allow me to respond. I will not take much time. I am on the record as saying—and I know these people are doing their job, contrary to what you people say—that certain people invoke two reasons: One is the GST and the other is free trade. The record will show that I added one other reason: that it is mostly because of the current recession. So please don't put words in my mouth.

Senator Buckwold: I seem to have touched a very sensitive nerve. Senator Simard outlined two reasons and then said there was a third reason. In other words, accepting the fact that there are two very significant reasons, his third reason was the recession which, in fact, has partially been caused by the first two reasons.

The fact is that the opposition to the GST raised the point that not only was it poor legislation but that probably the worst part of it was that the timing was wrong. We outlined all the various reasons why this was not the time to introduce it. It was even the subject of an amendment.

Senator Simard: What is your question?

Senator Murray: When would have been a good time?

Senator Buckwold: We now have agreement by an important member of the committee that, yes, this has created serious problems because, honourable senators, cross-border shopping is a serious problem.

My question to the Leader of the Government is: Does he agree with his colleague, Senator Simard, that a good part of the problem facing Canadian industry, and especially the retail trade—which has resulted in the worst unemployment record we have seen in many years—is, in fact, a result of free trade and the GST?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is against free trade with the United States; he is against free trade with the United States, Canada and Mexico; he is against the GST, and he is against any of the economic policies which would have the effect of bringing Canada into the 21st Century and making it competitive in the 21st Century. None of that is surprising. I reject his statement that Senator Simard agrees with the position taken by the opposition on that matter. Senator Simard very carefully attributed those statements to commentators and other people of the general public who have been writing or speculating about these matters.

As for the GST, I think it is only fair to remind the honourable senator that it has been in place now for four months and it is rather premature, to put it mildly, of the honourable senator to attribute any economic impact to the imposition of that tax.

Senator Buckwold: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government, who indicates that these economic policies are going to lead Canada into the 21st Century. My concern is that we may not make the 21st Century if the policies of the government continue, as they have done, to wreck the economy of this country. That is not only my opinion, it is even the opinion of those who supported free trade. It is even the opinion of those who supported the GST. It is their opinion that the results of all these policies have been an absolute tragedy for the Canadian economy and opportunities for employment.

Does the Leader of the Government really and sincerely believe—and I have every admiration for his sincerity—that because we have had only four months to look at the effects—and I am sure he has read the report of Statistics Canada indicating the quite serious economic effect on the price index, much more than was anticipated by the government in last week's news—there has been no significant impact? Does he really believe that all these marvellous things, such as more employment and lower prices, will happen when in the last four months the retail trade has been devastated and a province like Saskatchewan suddenly finds there is a way of getting a little money and moving in as Quebec did and as other provinces may be? What can he expect to happen without properly recompensing those low-income people who are suffering from the regressive nature of this tax? Surely there must be some feeling in his heart that this has been a contributing factor to the terrible economic crisis that this country is going through.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator, together with Maude Barlow, Shirley Carr and other critics of the Free Trade Agreement, are wont to contribute to the Free Trade Agreement layoffs in industries that are not even covered or affected by the Free Trade Agreement.

The honourable senator also knows that the country has been in an economic recession, although I believe it will turn out to be a short-lived one because we expect we will be out of it by the summer. He should not, therefore, attribute layoffs, and other phenomena of this kind that are caused by the recession, to the Free Trade Agreement or to the GST.

[Senator Murray.]

It is too early to draw the kind of negative conclusions that the honourable senator is drawing from the operation of the GST. We will have to wait many months yet to draw proper and accurate conclusions as to the impact of the GST on the Canadian economy.

We continue to believe, as the weight of evidence from all the economic experts indicates, that the overall impact of the GST on the Canadian economy will be positive. Indeed, we believe that it will result, by itself, in a very considerable increase in economic growth in the country.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CLOSURE OF CFB SUMMERSIDE, P.E.I.—STATUS OF SEARCH-AND-RESCUE OPERATION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, on another question, I noticed in an article in a daily newspaper in my province that the Department of National Defence is still transferring servicemen to Summerside. I also noticed, some days ago, an independent survey which showed that to move 413 Squadron of search-and-rescue from Summerside to Nova Scotia would cost the Government of Canada many more millions of dollars than if it were to leave it where it is.

In view of the fact that more personnel are being transferred to Summerside, and the fact that new information indicates that it will cost many more millions of dollars to move, would the Leader of the Government advise me if the Department of National Defence is considering leaving 413 Squadron search-and-rescue in Summerside rather than move it at a cost to the taxpayers?

● (1450)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have no reason to believe that that is the plan of the Department of National Defence, nor do I have any reason to accept the premise of the honourable senator's question. I shall ask my colleague, Mr. McKnight, for a report and will bring it in as soon as possible.

ANSWERS TO ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS TABLED

STAVENGER, NORWAY

OFFSHORE NORTHERN SEAS PETROLEUM EXHIBITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 52 on the order paper—by Senator Marshall.

PROTECTION OF THE ENVIRONMENT

PREVENTION OF MARINE POLLUTION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 57 on the order paper—by Senator Kenny.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: May I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government when I may expect an answer to my written Question No. 73? I was promised a speedy answer on a number of occasions.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Is that the question concerning Mr. Flynn?

Senator Corbin: Yes.

Senator Murray: I believe there is a draft reply, if not on my desk, headed for my desk imminently, and I will try to bring in the reply this week. If the draft is satisfactory to me, then I am sure it will be satisfactory to my friend, and I will bring it in this week.

Senator Corbin: Just do not change the amount.

Senator Murray: Come on now!

Senator Corbin: It was a simple question and it requires a simple answer.

OFFICIAL REPORT

CORRECTION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, on behalf of Senator Frith I should like to make a correction to the record of Senate Debates of December 11, 1990. In that speech Senator Frith was referring to former House of Commons Speaker Louis René Beaudoin and not to our colleague, Senator Gérald Beaudoin.

On page 4849 of Senate Debates, December 11, 1990, at the bottom of the first column the word "Speakers" should be inserted before the names of Beaudoin and Charbonneau. In the French version the word "Senators" should be deleted and the word "Speakers" be inserted there.

This correction arises from discussions between Senator Frith and Senator Beaudoin.

BRETTON WOODS AND RELATED AGREEMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-93, to amend the Bretton Woods and related Agreements Act.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the bill is given third reading, I wish to continue the discussion that we had on second reading and draw, to some extent, on the evidence that we heard in the Foreign Affairs Committee when the bill was considered there. I also wish to make some comments on Canadian indebtedness, which subject was referred to by one of the ministers in introducing the bill in the House of Commons or by the spokesman in the Senate.

As honourable senators know, the main purpose of Bill C-93 is to increase Canada's subscription to the International Monetary Fund on the occasion of IMF quota increases approved under the Ninth General Review. We support the bill. The IMF is a needed institution. It helps maintain the balance of order in the world's monetary and financial system. The danger is that it may become marginalized because of the large financial flows that continuously move across the globe. Certainly the IMF should not fail or should not be jeopardized because of inadequate resources. The proposed 50 per cent quota increase will help it respond to a number of challenges that it will face during the next five years.

I also welcomed Bill C-93 on second reading because it gave us an opportunity to update our consideration of the utility of the IMF and other international financial institutions and to consider the debt problems of developing countries. I mentioned that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs had produced a most helpful report on these subjects in 1987 and that the examination of Bill C-93 in the committee would permit us to look back to what we had done under the chairmanship of Senator van Roggen, to see whether any progress had been made in the intervening years in the resolution of the debt crisis.

The world debt problem is far too large a subject to be dealt with in the remarks that I intend to make today. Therefore, I should like to highlight a number of developments that seem to have taken place since the publication of the Senate committee report. These developments provide a fair indication of progress achieved and the major challenges still to be met not only by the IMF but also by the world community.

To begin with, public awareness of the debt problems of developing countries has grown not only among the general public in industrialized countries but also among their governments and private lending institutions. At the beginning of the 1980s, the typical response to the rapidly rising debt burden of developing countries was debt rollover. It was not until the mid-eighties that means of reducing the stock of international indebtedness for the benefit of heavily indebted countries began to receive serious consideration. Since then, we have seen the development of new programs and procedures by the World Bank and the IMF to bring some relief to the heavily indebted countries. We have also witnessed the elaboration of a number of plans and mechanisms designed not only to help reschedule debts and alleviate the strain of structural adjustment but also to reduce the stock of debt itself. We cannot measure the contribution made by the Senate committee report to greater sensitivity to the pressing need for debt relief, but it was a step in the right direction.

• (1500)

This increased sensitivity did result in some achievements. The rise in the debts of developing countries reached a plateau of about 1.2 trillion in 1987, 1988 and 1989. However the stock of debts began to rise again in 1990 to 1.3 trillion.

Another important development since we looked at the situation in 1987 has been the reduction of the commercial banking sector's vulnerability. Provisioning policies, restructuring and debt conversions have reduced the exposure risks of private banks. The virtual suspension of net private loans in 1987, and their feeble recovery since, have also contributed to reduce private banks' involvement. Public involvement, however, has grown, particularly with the increase of net official loans since 1989 and the cancellation of some public debt. I certainly welcome this development because one of the thrusts of the Senate report was that governments ought to play a greater role by initiating a number of measures to help developing countries.

My third observation is that the experience of the past few years has confirmed the relevance of the case by case approach. The ability of the creditor community to negotiate tailor-made packages for individual countries largely accounts for success stories such as the deals with Mexico, Chile and Costa Rica. It might be added here that in the committee it was difficult to cite a large number of success stories in addition to those three. One might mention Columbia, which has maintained a stable situation, and possibly Venezuela.

I think it is true to say that success stories are still too few and far between. The last three years have demonstrated that many debt-ridden countries are unable to carry out the restructuring and adjustment policies expected of them, and this is particularly true of the severely indebted, low income countries concentrated in Sub-Saharan Africa.

How could adjustment policies be made to work in countries which, in the words of the World Bank:

> suffer from structural weaknesses such as undiversified, primary commodity exports, rapid population growth, and poorly developed education and health systems.

Clearly this group of countries will not be able to manage scheduled debt service without recourse to further arrears and rescheduling for the foreseeable future.

That brings me to another new and disturbing feature of the world debt scene, namely, growing arrears. The stock of arrears and its rate of growth is, in a sense, a crude measure of the failure of existing remedial measures to deal with world debt problems. The growth of arrears was particularly rapid between 1985 and 1987, but has continued since. At the end of 1989 interest arrears stood at US $35 billion and principal arrears at US $44 billion for a total of US $79 billion, or 6.4 per cent of developing countries debt. Arrears are estimated to have grown to US $86 billion in 1990. This compares with the debt of US $64 billion for Argentina and US $95 billion for Mexico, which are among the world's largest debtors.

The solution is certainly not to deprive countries in arrears of their voting rights in the IMF. This might be of some use to deter irresponsible governments, but the list of countries with arrears include Argentina, Brazil, Ecuador, Egypt, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru and Zambia. The World Bank has flagged with concern the dramatic growth of arrears during the past five years, noting that it has:

> disturbed creditor/debtor relations, reduced the access of countries running arrears to vital trade credits and foreign investment and complicated foreign trade financing.

Clearly there is a policy gap waiting to be filled.

[Senator MacEachen.]

The Brady initiative was geared to the problems of severely indebted middle-income countries with high levels of commercial bank debts. The current strategy is built on access to debt reduction facilities with the support of international financial institutions for countries with sound adjustment programs. This strategy falls short when applied to countries unable to support the cost of such adjustment. It does not deal effectively with the problem of arrears. With the stock of developing countries debt growing again, my view is that we should not look complacently at progress made since 1989, but rather agree with the World Bank that "despite hopeful signs, the debt crisis is far from over."

Those are some of the comments that seem to have come out of the discussion in the committee. I do not intend today to deal with Canada's policies towards developing country debt issues, but I want to take the opportunity to cover one particular aspect of Canada's involvement with foreign indebtedness, which is Canada's own external debt. I do that because I raised the question about two years ago in this chamber, specifically on June 21, 1989, in relation to the Borrowing Authority Bill 1989-1990. At that time I expressed some concern over our growing foreign indebtedness, and my concern was aroused by two statements which appeared in documents issued by the Department of Finance and which I had looked at.

The first statement, contained in a 1989 publication entitled "Canada's economic prospects for the 1990s", indicated that by 1988 Canada's international indebtedness was estimated to have risen to just over 38 per cent of GDP from 35 per cent in 1985. It had not been in this range since the mid-1960s. That is one statement that caught my attention.

The second statement, contained in the 1989 Fiscal Plan, acknowledged that approximately 19 per cent, or about $50 billion of the outstanding government of Canada debt, was held by non-residents. I think that is a matter we ought to look at and be aware of.

As I pointed out on that occasion—and it is a point which is still valid—using capital from abroad to finance economic investment in Canada was a feature of Canadian history, but it was a different matter when foreign savings were used to finance consumption and the deficit. I was less concerned by the figures than by the trend when I said, "If this trend continues, I think it will be a worrying factor."

There are a number of ways of measuring the degree of Canada's dependence on foreign savings. I have looked at a number of them for the purposes of identifying trends and of getting some points of reference to compare Canada's foreign indebtedness with that of other countries. I certainly have not done everything that should be done to have a comprehensive picture. However, I do have some comments that may at least introduce the subject for discussion.

Let me take a look at the current account deficit. A first indicator of Canada's dependence on foreign savings is to be found in the balance of payments flows on the current account and the capital account. These flows provide a clear measurement of foreign capital movements as they affect Canada, and measure changes in Canada's foreign indebtedness. In simple terms, the current account includes merchandise import and export trade, non-merchandise trade, service transactions, investment income and monetary transfers.

The current account deficit climbed from $9 billion in 1987 to $10 billion in 1988, and to $16.6 billion in 1989. In 1990 it was $16 billion.

When I addressed this subject in June 1989 I was concerned about a current account deficit running at a yearly rate of about $10 billion for the previous three years. We now know that it has been running at the much higher rate of about $16 billion over the last two years. Thus, the upward trend has been accelerating.

I should flag also at this point that the deficit on foreign investment income, which stood at $16 billion in 1987, was $24.2 billion in 199O. With this $8.2 billion increase, which largely reflects higher borrowing from abroad, the deficit on foreign investment income for 1990 is an all-time record.

I would now like to deal with the capital account, which records outward and inward flows of direct and portfolio investment, of foreign and Canadian bonds, changes in Canada's official reserves and Canadian banks' net foreign currency transactions with non-residents.

The capital account makes equally interesting reading. Net capital movements, including so-called statistical discrepancies, increased from an inflow of $12.2 billion in 1987 and $14.2 billion in 1988 to an inflow of $22 billion in 1989 and $21 billion in 1990. The increase of Canada's foreign indebtedness in 1987 represented 2.2 per cent of the GDP. The increase in 1990 accounted for 3 per cent of the GDP. Thus, the trend revealed by balance of payments figures over the past four years is unmistakable. There has been a significant acceleration of Canada's foreign indebtedness.

As I said a moment ago, this trend in itself is not necessarily distressing inasmuch as foreign savings are used to finance investment and sound development in Canada. In order to get a deeper view I also looked at the stock of foreign investment in Canada, using Investment Canada's report of January 1991, entitled "International Investments: Canadian developments in a global context".

My first observation is that Canada's share of the world stock of inward direct investment has been declining. In 1967 Canada accounted for about 18 per cent of the world's direct foreign investment. In 1987 this share had dropped to 8.5 per cent.

It will be of interest to note that in 1967 the United States accounted for 9.4 per cent of the world stock of inward direct foreign investment. In 1987 it accounted for over 25 per cent of the stock.

Thus, while our foreign indebtedness is increasing, our share of the world's stock of direct investment is declining. Concomitantly, foreign portfolio investment in Canada has been increasing faster than direct investment over nearly a decade.

Honourable senators can draw their own conclusions concerning all of this. It makes food for thought.

Another important feature is the relative importance of foreign acquisitions versus new businesses and expansions. In the early 1980s acquisitions accounted for about 7 per cent of gross inflows of foreign direct investment. During the past two years they accounted for more than 50 per cent of the total. These trends are important for the insight they provide into the use of foreign savings for investment and developmental purposes.

Direct foreign investments in productive capacity is generally regarded as the most desirable form of investment for development purposes because of their effects on transfers of technology, opening up natural resources, job creation, diversification, increased competition, and linkage between profitability and exported earnings. Somewhat similar benefits can be derived from reinvested earnings.

It is worth noting on this score that while reinvested earnings accounted for 73.8 per cent of the growth in the stock of direct foreign investment in the period 1983-89, this percentage has declined to 56.3 per cent in the 1986-89 period.

To sum up, Canada's liabilities abroad have not only been rising more sharply, particularly over the past two years, but their composition has also been changing. Foreign direct investment has declined relative to portfolio investment. Reinvested earnings have declined relative to new direct investment. New business and expansions have declined relative to foreign acquisitions, particularly over the last two years, when the latter accounted for more than 50 per cent of foreign direct investment.

While this last feature reflects large transactions such as the sale of Texaco Canada and of Consolidated Bathurst, they evidence the strength of foreign-based merger and acquisition activity in Canada. Recent large increases in foreign portfolio investment also suggest their responsiveness to interest rate differentials. If, indeed, divestitures, acquisitions and interest rates have become such large factors in moving inward flows of foreign savings into Canada, the quality and ultimate use of these flows is moving away for more traditional flows of foreign savings, which were directed into productive investment and contributed so much to the development of the country.

• (1520)

Honourable senators, I am not suggesting, nor do I want to leave the impression, that these trends are alarming, but they should, in my judgment, be matters of continuing concern, particularly since a large portion of the inflow of foreign savings is now consumed by the government sector. This is a new trend. I mentioned this fact in 1989 and the trend has accelerated.

The 1990 Budget and the 1991 Budget papers contained two charts on sources and uses of savings, showing the relative importance of foreign and private domestic savings available to offset the total government sector deficit. In 1984 this deficit stood at 6.5 per cent of GDP. Domestic savings amounted to 7.1 per cent of GDP and foreign savings at -0.6 per cent of GDP. This negative figure means that in 1984 Canada was actually reimbursing government-held foreign indebtedness. Four years later, in 1988, foreign savings, 1.7 per cent of GDP, had become a more important source to offset the government sector deficit than domestic savings. The situation deteriorated further in 1989 with foreign savings accounting for 2.9 per cent of GDP against domestic savings of 0.7 per cent of GDP. In 1990, with the recession, domestic savings to offset the government sector deficit did rise to 1.3 per cent of GDP, while foreign savings remained fairly stable at 2.4 per cent of GDP. However, at that level, foreign savings were almost twice as large as domestic savings to finance the government sector deficit and continued to register a serious deterioration from the situation which prevailed up to the mid-1980s. That is a startling fact that has to be considered by all of us.

As is to be expected, the 1991 Budget takes a rosy view of the future. A dramatic change is expected in 1991 as the projected trend is reversed and domestic savings become again a more important source than foreign savings in offsetting the deficit. By 1993-96 the 1991 budget predicts the total elimination of the foreign source of savings, a development I certainly would welcome, since it would put us back, after more than ten years, into the healthy situation which prevailed in the early '80s. The unfortunate practice of financing our government sector deficit by borrowing abroad would come to an end. However, these happy prospects tie in with Mr. Wilson's budget deficit reduction plans, which I intend to review on another occasion, and even if those plans have more success in the future than in the past, Canadians will still be left with the job of reimbursing what will be, by then, a huge government-held foreign debt.

In looking further at government-held foreign debt, I have tried to identify trends in federal government liabilities to non-residents. Figures are made available by the Bank of Canada in the Bank of Canada Review and in the Statistics Canada Report of Security Transactions with non-residents. Based on these figures, the increase in federal government liabilities in 1988 was $12.8 billion. In 1989 the increase was $8.8 billion. In 1990 the increase was another $9.9 billion.

The result of these calculations is somewhat startling. In 1988 the increase in government liabilities to non-residents amounted to 35 per cent of the inflow of foreign capital. In 1989 it amounted to 26 per cent of the inflow. In 1990 it amounted to 32 per cent of this inflow. These figures provide an insight into how much of our foreign capital import flows has been consumed by the federal government. In should also be noted that the increase in federal government liabilities abroad has accounted, for the last few years, for about 40 per cent of the government's cash requirements. The government has gone abroad to borrow 40 per cent of its cash requirements. Thus we have ample evidence that the rapid build-up of Canada's foreign indebtedness is, in a very significant way, the result of never-ending federal budget deficits and of the resulting borrowing needs of the Canadian government.

[Senator MacEachen.]

I think the reality is plain enough, that we are in a new phase when we begin to finance our current consumption by foreign savings that have amounted to approximately 40 per cent of the cash requirements of the government in recent years. That is the trend that I talked about two years ago—a trend that has accelerated.

I would like to say a word, in conclusion, on Canada's growing international indebtedness, with a few observations on the stock of debt rather than flows which I have just discussed at some length.

With large continuing net inflows of foreign savings, Canada's foreign debt and federal government liabilities abroad have grown accordingly. The evaluation of the stock of direct foreign investment and portfolio investment in Canada is a very complex exercise. I am aware that Statistics Canada is shortly to release some figures on Canada's foreign indebtedness and I am therefore putting forward the last available figure on stock of Canada's total net liability to foreigners as an order of magnitude. The estimated net figure for 1989 is $229 billion.

With a net inflow of about $21 billion in 1990, the current Canadian indebtedness abroad would now be in the order of $250 billion.

Senator Buckwold: Is that only federal?

Senator MacEachen: No, that is total indebtedness.

The estimated gross figure for 1990 is $409 billion. If these figures are valid, as I trust they are, they enable us to draw a few conclusions.

First, the federal Government of Canada, with $75 billion of foreign liability, accounts for about 30 per cent of this stock of $250 billion of foreign indebtedness.

• (1530)

Honourable senators will remember the statement contained in the 1889 Fiscal Plan, to which I referred a moment ago, stating that approximately 19 per cent, or about $50 billion of outstanding Government of Canada debt was held by non-residents. Clearly we have no reason to rejoice. Two years later the proportion has gone up to 30 per cent and the stock of the Canadian government foreign debt has gone up by 50 per cent. Contrary to most forms of foreign indebtedness, that of the Government of Canada's is sterile and has to be serviced and redeemed by all Canadians. With its present order of magnitude, its service is a significant drain on our balance of payments. That is my first conclusion, and probably it is the most important one and the one that is most significant in a discussion of Canadian indebtedness and the state of the Canadian government.

The second conclusion is that—I do not know how to put this in order to be as accurate as I want to be, but let me put it this way: Canada has now joined the ranks of the world's most severely indebted countries. There are many of them, developing countries and developed countries, and Canada is a member. So I think we should bear in mind the difference between a developed country and a developing country. Let us take a look at some of the countries. The total foreign debt stock, both public and private, measured in U.S. dollars, of Argentina is $64 billion; Brazil is $111 billion; Egypt, $48 billion; Mexico, $95 billion, Poland, $43 billion; and Venezuela, $33 billion. All of these are dwarfed by Canada's foreign debt, which, on a comparable basis for calculation, was about Canadian $210 billion for 1989. The situation is, of course, much worse if expressed in per capita terms. Honourable senators will also remember the Minister of Finance's admission in the 1989 publication I mentioned earlier that Canada's international indebtedness by 1988 was estimated to have risen to just over 38 per cent of GDP from 35 per cent in 1985. Last year the figure had risen further to 47 per cent. Thus, the trend has not only continued but accelerated.

The third conclusion, and it is brief, that has struck me is how silent the government has been about these important developments in the financial position of Canada in the world. I think we are entitled to ask whether the government is satisfied with the current trends and, if so, what is the source of its satisfaction. It would be reassuring if there were a convincing reason why we should regard this as a satisfactory development, particularly the changes in the composition of our indebtedness and the considerable proportion of that indebtedness that is federal government debt, sterile debt. If our anxiety or our concern can be assuaged, that would be okay. If, on the other hand, the government shares in the concern I have expressed today, it would be useful to know why these concerns are not reflected in any of its policies and plans, given the fact that increasing foreign indebtedness on the current scale of magnitude will inevitably place new constraints on the management of Canada's public finances.

Thank you, honourable senators, for staying with me through that analysis.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: May I ask a question of Senator MacEachen? It seems that the next step that the honourable senator would have gone into, had he wanted to inform us, is the net result of this very startling, almost horrendous group of figures that he has given us, something about which I think every Canadian has to be concerned. Given the impact on the foreign exchange value of the Canadian dollar and the impact on interest rates of the information and statistics the honourable senator has given us, can we realistically look for a cheaper Canadian dollar vis-a-vis the American dollar or significant lower interest rates in comparison with the United States?

Senator van Roggen: The answer is no.

Senator MacEachen: I think I will save the answer for another day, because I do not think it is an answer that I would like to give off-the-cuff, to say that what I have said would have the impact of affecting decisively the trends in foreign exchange or affecting interest rates. Obviously there are interrelationships. I think the government has made it clear from time to time in its own documents that the inflow of capital into Canada has been influenced by the interest rate policy of the government or of the Bank of Canada. That is obvious. It is also reasonably obvious that the value of the Canadian dollar on the financial markets is influenced by the demand and supply of the Canadian dollar. Certainly the inflows of capital have a considerable impact on that demand.

So I think the question is clear and sound and that the interrelationships are clear, but to draw a definitive conclusion off-the-cuff in answer to the honourable senator would be somewhat daring.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Simard, seconded by the Honourable Senator David, for the second reading of Bill C-91, An Act to amend the Financial Administration Act and other Acts in consequence thereof.—(Honourable Senator Simard).

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I would like to pick up this debate where I left off on March 27, 1991. I urge you to listen first to the arguments that I will submit to you, arguments which, I think, will be quite convincing, and to examine them more thoroughly as quickly as possible so that Bill C-91 can be referred to a committee this week and perhaps even today.

Let's get into the heart of the subject-matter of Bill C-91, An Act to amend the Financial Administration Act and other Acts in consequence thereof.

As some of you surely know, the Financial Administration Act, which came into effect in 1951, sets out the principles and practices underlying financial management within the federal government. However, these principles go back to Confederation and even before that, and they have remained relatively stable since that time.

Although the amendments contained in this bill are essentially of a technical nature, they are an integral part of the government's management strategy.

Their purpose is, first, to make the financial management process more efficient; secondly, to modernize certain procedures that have become outdated and cumbersome over the years; and, thirdly, to correct errors in the wording of the act in French or in English.

As well, the utimate objective remains unchanged since it is still to adapt the financial management within the federal administration to the reality of the 1990s and beyond.

Even though the amendments tabled today have been designed, as I have said earlier, to bring the financial management into line with business practices of the present decade, they still preserve carefully the fundamental precepts of the parliamentary control to which I have referred a moment ago.

• (1540)

[English]

Honourable colleagues, by permitting the use of modern electronic technology, these amendments would assist departments in meeting increasing demands with limited resources for the benefit of all Canadians. More specifically, they would improve the management of the federal government's cash inflows and outflows, increase the efficiency with which government programs and services are administered, and streamline certain internal initiative processes that are not reflective of modern business practices. Also, the legislation will clarify certain roles, responsibilities and authorities. It will also strengthen the management of accounts receivable and provide enhanced tools to better manage the public debt and more flexibility in funding the delivery of services, thereby providing better service to the public. I therefore urge my colleagues to endorse and enthusiastically pass these amendments which I will now briefly summarize.

[Translation]

Firstly, the bill includes some organizational provisions designed to officialize the Treasury Board's role with regard to planning and managing capital assets. Those provisions will allow the Treasury Board to continue implementing an administrative framework for capital assets which focuses on long term investments in the name of Canadian taxpayers. Another organizational provision will identify the role played by the Treasury Board and the Governor in Council in the approval of the plans and budgets of Crown corporations.

Secondly, the few minor changes set forth will enhance the legal provisions dealing with cost recovery. Honourable senators, you will certainly agree with me that it is only fair and reasonable that costs of services, fees and advantages provided by the government to private users or classes of users be paid by those very users. These changes will also guarantee Canadians a better control over policy implementation because they will clarify the wording of the act so as to minimize interpretation errors.

They also confirm the secondary role of the Financial Administration Act by specifying that costs incurred under the act will be subject to the provisions of all other legislation.

The changes included in the bill will guarantee further that users or classes of users concerned will be consulted and that their comments will be considered before costs are incurred.

The changes also postulate that the ajustment of initially established costs and prices must be done through the regulatory process and, consequently, that users and classes of users concerned will be able to have their say.

Finally, the changes guarantee all classes of users that they will not have to pay higher costs than those for which they receive services and benefits. In other words, there will be no cross-subsidization between users or classes of users.

[English]

Honourable senators, these changes will be comforting to Canadians. The same is true of the other amendments. However, lest there be some misconceptions, I should note that the cost recovery changes do not apply to the setting of fees and charges by crown corporations. Crown corporations operate at an arm's-length relationship from the government and do not use the Financial Administration Act as the basis for charging for the goods and services they provide through their normal activities.

Thirdly, there are several amendments designed to improve cash management and modernize the government's payment practices. Among these are provisions to make collection agency fees statutory disincentive, thereby eliminating the current budgetary restrictions faced by departments when using them. The legislation also includes a provision to charge interest on overdue accounts, which total hundreds of millions of dollars, and to impose an administrative fee for NSF cheques. Of course, this would not apply to those Canadians who pay their accounts on time, and there are built-in provisions to waive or reduce interest charges where warranted—for example, for humanitarian reasons or where delays in recording a payment caused interest charges to accrue.

Honourable senators, on the other side, expansion of debt forgiveness authorities will provide the means to forgive any debt when it is in the public interest to do so or when collecting a debt or enforcing the repayment of an overpayment would be unreasonable or unjust. This provision also addresses a recommendation by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance included in its fourteenth report of March 19, 1986.

Honourable colleagues, other provisions in the bill will be of particular benefit to the government's suppliers.

• (1550)

By streamlining the payment process and permitting the government to take full advantage of electronic payment techniques with electronic transmission, arrangements can be made to ensure that payments are not just issued but are actually in the suppliers' hands by the due date.

This measure and this whole bill can be called a "good news" measure or "good news" legislation. It provides for fair and equitable treatment and puts an end to good taxpayers actually subsidizing bad or late-paying taxpayers. When the Minister of Finance made his intention public a couple of months ago a number of taxpayers said that it was about time the government collected the money due to it and charged interest on overdue accounts. Of course, there are provisions in the Income Tax Act to charge interest on late income tax payments, but there are many other situations where interest could not be collected.

[Translation]

Also included in the other improvements made to the financial administration process are: the simplification of the approval process for the remission of taxes, the clarification of requirements related to the recording and discharge of debts at the end of the fiscal year, and, if need be, the use of forecasting and expenditure limits to eliminate unjustified overhead.

With the improvements made to the planning and budgetary processes, the financially viable Crown corporations of a commercial nature named in Part II of Schedule III will have to take into account the payment of dividends in their annual corporate plans.

I am sure that this matter will be of interest to my honourable colleagues when this bill will be studied in committee.

I, for my part, have some questions on the subject, that I consider to be very relevant.

[English]

In summary, honourable senators, a number of the amendments contained in this bill are designed to bring financial management practices in the government into the modern age and to increase productivity without sacrificing or diluting the fundamental principles of parliamentary control of expenditures. This bill will benefit Canadians and I urge that you give it rapid consideration and speedy passage, at the end of the month for example.

Senator MacEachen: When?

Senator Simard: Maybe at the end of the month. I was pleased to learn earlier today that the chairman of our committee is prepared to sit tomorrow. I told our deputy leader that I hope the committee will see fit to sit not only this Thursday but possibly Friday or Monday or next Tuesday so that within the next ten days we can wrap it up, having heard all the complaints and suggestions. I am sure that the opposition, including Senator John Stewart, will want to know what this bill is all about. I know that when public servants come up with what they call housecleaning initiatives, we are always concerned; so the onus will be on the public servants to tell us that it is not just routine and that all the implications are understood.

Yes, Senator Stewart, you have a friend on our side and we will make sure that not too many things are hidden in the bushes and that people do not spring surprises on us. I am all for that. At the same time, some of us have pet projects that we would have loved to have included in the bill. I know that Senator Stewart may have a couple of concerns that he would have liked to have the bill correct, but, in my humble opinion, they would not be sufficient to warrant delaying this bill or voting against the bill altogether. There will be other bills in the fall or next year which can deal with these other subjects in which we have an interest. We are prepared to have the committee sit even if the Senate is not sitting and I am sure that in the next two or three weeks we can report the bill, perhaps with some recommendations for the government to consider.

Senator MacEachen: Amendments? Would you take amendments?

Senator Simard: I am talking about recommendations at this time.

Senator MacEachen: Amendments?

Senator Simard: The committee has done quite a good job with the bill. It has suggested measures that have been asked for by Canadian businessmen and by the average taxpayer. So I would hope that the Opposition, Senator MacEachen included, would tell us whether they want these amendments next year. The government will listen, as it has done on many occasions.

As Jeffrey Simpson was saying last week, Mr. Chrétien—and, God willing, Senator MacEachen—will be with us for many more months as leader of this party and will want to contribute to debate and offer suggestions. Jeffrey Simpson was saying that the time has come to forget the past a bit, to forget those good years when the government could throw money at every problem, and to offer more financially sound suggestions. That is what this bill is all about, among other things. It starts by putting some more sanity in the administration.

Senator MacEachen: Thatcherism; look what happened to Thatcherism.

Senator Simard: God willing, and Mr. Chrétien listening, I hope that Senator MacEachen will want to join us in trying to improve this area of government management. I am looking forward to suggestions and I invite Senator Stewart, among others, to give us the benefit of his wisdom and great experience; but I hope he does it in his usual swift manner.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I will try to be brief. I must say that I am very much encouraged by what Senator Simard has just said. We have here a bill to amend the Financial Administration Act. The implications of the bill now before the Senate really cannot be understood without a very careful reading, not only of the bill but of the Financial Administration Act. You have to work one into the other to really see what is going on here, and that is going to take some time. Senators are going to have to do their own preparatory work and then, of course, as Senator Simard so wisely says, we are going to have to have frank and disclosing answers from the public servants. It may well be that we will be able to make the deadline of the end of the month that Senator Simard mentions.

When the bill was being discussed in a legislative committee in the other place, that committee was told, in a statement prepared by the Treasury Board—and, honourable senators, the name is not the name of a specific minister but of the board as a whole—that the amendments are "basically either housekeeping or technical in nature and do not make any fundamental changes in principles." I think that is enough to tell honourable senators that the proposed amendments ought to be examined with great care.

● (1600)

This is a bill to amend the Financial Administration Act. The Financial Administration Act is an act of central importance. Let me read the words of the Deputy Comptroller General spoken in the legislative committee of the other place on December 13, 1990. He described the Financial Administration Act as follows: "That act governs the control by Parliament of the public purse." He said that the Financial Administration Act governs the control by Parliament of the public purse. I hope he means the control by Parliament of the public purse rather than meaning that the Financial Administration Act controls Parliament. It seems to me that either interpretation could be defended on the basis of recent experience.

An analysis of the main provisions reveal the importance of the bill. One aspect of the bill deals with roles and responsibilities in financial management; another aspect deals with cash management and revenue generation; another deals with debt forgiveness, another with public debt management, another with financial management improvement, and yet another with the relationship of the Treasury Board and crown corporations in financial matters.

There is also a provision with regard to control by Treasury Board. Honourable senators, let me read from the statement that was made. It states: "The bill will fill a gap in the assignment of responsibility for setting terms and conditions of employment for a small number of Governor in Council appointees." The implication is that there is looseness in the present regime with regard to setting terms and conditions of employment for certain Governor in Council appointees. I do not know whether or not that refers to the Spicer Commission, but we can certainly discuss that in committee.

One aspect of the bill that I am sure will be thoroughly canvassed in committee is the one that relates to encouraging cost recovery and revenue generation. The bill provides for a new section 19 in the act. Clause 6 of the act states:

> 19.1 The Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board,
>
> (a) by regulation prescribe the fees or charges to be paid for a right or privilege conferred by or on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada, by means of a licence, permit or other authorization, by the persons or classes of persons on whom the right or privilege is conferred; or
> (b) authorize the appropriate Minister to prescribe by order those fees or charges, subject to such terms and conditions as may be specified by the Governor in Council.

When the Assistant Secretary, Expenditure Coordination Directorate, Program Branch of the Treasury Board appeared before the committee in the other place, he was asked if this amendment would allow the government to charge service fees for crown corporations or departmental corporations which cannot now be charged, and the answer was in the affirmative. The witness was then asked if he would agree that the definition of "users" had been extended to include provincial governments, and the answer again was in the affirmative. The witness was further asked if he would agree that the amendment would allow user fees to be charged for rights or privileges conferred by the crown by means of a licence, permit or other document, which could not be done before, and again the answer was in the affirmative. A member of the house then asked if he would agree that it provides that regulations may allow for automatic increases of fees which would not be possible under the existing law, and again the answer was in the affirmative. The witness from the Treasury Board was then asked if it were not true that the passage of the bill would allow the government to charge for government services or facilities even though the service or facility must be provided by an act of Parliament. Again, the answer was in the affirmative.

[Senator Stewart.]

Honourable senators, it is not at all surprising that some of those who make use of services or facilities are uneasy about the impact of these fees and charges and the possible increases of fees and charges that could take place if this particular clause of the bill carries and stands as part of the bill.

There is also the question of how far Parliament will be going if it enacts this clause toward conferring upon the government a virtually undefined right to impose taxation by order in council. We will have to look at that in committee.

Honourable senators, under the misleading expression "Transitional" we have at page 27 of the bill clause 52.

• (1610)

> Orders of the Governor in Council and of the appropriate minister made under paragraph 19(b) of the Financial Administration Act before the day on which this Act is assented to
> (a) are not inconsistent with paragraph 19(1)(b) of the said Act, as enacted by section 6 of this Act, by reason only that they apply notwithstanding the provisions of any Act relating to a service or the use of a facility; and
> (b) continue to apply notwithstanding those provisions.

In other words, Orders in Council made under the provisions of the present bill will have force to overrule explicit provisions in acts of Parliament with regard to fees and charges. That is a matter into which the committee will have to inquire.

Senator Simard spoke about hobby horses. I think he confessed that he, too, had his hobby horses. I think he intended to imply that I have a hobby horse. If that is what he wants to call it, then so be it.

I am disappointed to notice that the bill does not make any provision with regard to clarification of the Financial Administration Act with regard to Governor General special warrants. The fact that the bill is defective in this respect was noted in the other place. The witness from the Treasury Board was asked explicit questions on this point.

For the benefit of new members of the Senate, I should mention that we had an incident in the spring of 1989 that involved Governor General special warrants. The government, first, was to have Parliament adjourned—that is, both houses were to adjourn in December of 1988 even though the government knew that it needed supply. It then had Parliament prorogued, although the government knew that it needed supply. It proceeded to use special warrants to take the billions of dollars that it needed from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. We were told by the president of the Treasury Board that there was no limit on the amount of money the government could take, nor was it necessary for the government to meet Parliament for financial reasons even one day a year so long as money could be withdrawn from the Consolidated Revenue Fund as provided by the Financial Administration Act, according to the legal interpretation on which the government relied.

I was hoping that in 1991, with the dust settling and the heat gone, the government would have seen fit to make the Financial Administration Act consistent with the constitutional principles on which this country is founded—constitutional principles deeply rooted in history, as Senator Molson would say. But the government has paid no attention to this matter. The bill before us is empty and silent with regard to special warrants. The evidence given in the other place with regard to this question is most enlightening. One must listen carefully to the answer given. The witness was asked, "Why is there no provision?" Mr. Lacombe replied:

> My understanding is that the use of special Governor General warrants have always been in compliance with the law and therefore there was no need to amend the warrants.

The implication is that you amend a bill only if the government has been breaking the existing law. That is, you amend the law to conform to what the government has been doing in violation of the previous act. Again Mr. Lacombe said:

> I can tell you that no consideration was given to changing any clauses with regard to special Governor General warrants because they were used in compliance with the Financial Administration Act at the time they were used.

Again, Mr. Lacombe states:

> What I can say is that in terms of the current provisions for special Governor General warrants, as I indicated there was a view that there was no need to change the law. I am not an expert in this area but I understand there were circumstances in Australia where they did not have provisions similar to ours and the result was an election.

Think of it, honourable senators. The poor people in Australia do not have a provision comparable to section 30 of the Financial Administration Act. Consequently it was possible for members of the Parliament of Australia to precipitate an election. Think of it. How benighted they are. I am told that the same prevails in the United Kingdom and in New Zealand. They do not have this enlightened provision that we have in the Financial Administration Act. Consequently it is possible for Parliament to precipitate an election. Think of the trouble that causes to ministers, to their staff and to the top public servants. We certainly do not want that to happen here. That is the implication of the answer given by the Treasury Board.

The answer given on behalf of the Treasury Board is precisely the reason why section 30 of the Financial Administration Act should be amended by the bill that is now before the Senate. If that is what Senator Simard calls a hobby horse, then I am prepared to ride it, because it is a hobby horse that people who believe in constitutional government and who believe that there are constitutional principles—again, quoting Senator Molson—that are deeply rooted in history, have ridden for centuries and should continue to be ridden as long as public servants take the attitude that the government of the day, regardless of its politics, ought to have access to the Consolidated Revenue Fund, even if the money has not been voted by Parliament.

This is a matter that the committee has to look into and get a better answer than the one that has already been given, if a better answer is available.

• (1620)

Therefore, honourable senators, there is important, intensive work to be done by the committee to which this bill goes before the bill can be considered for third reading. I would hope, Senator Simard, that with intense effort it could be completed, as you say, before the end of the month. Thank you, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform honourable senators that if Senator Simard speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading.

Senator Simard: Before I move that the bill be sent to the National Finance Committee, I would like to say that I never thought that I would touch such a sensitive nerve, Senator Stewart.

Senator Stewart: I regard these matters as important.

Senator Simard: Surely your preoccupation and concern can be debated over there. We all wish that we could make present legislation as ideal as possible, but obviously this bill does not go far enough to accommodate Senator Stewart. However, I believe it is an improvement.

When I alluded to the possibility of completing the study before the end of the month, that was expressing a wish that if we could not complete the business this week, or even next week, that we not let a couple of weeks go by before we reconvene and hopefully terminate our work. Therefore the end of the month is as far as I could project. If the work could be completed before that, I am sure our colleagues would appreciate it, because it is important for Canadians, never mind the government. One never knows; we hear all kinds of rumours on the Hill that the House might be proroged. It would be unfortunate that at the taxpayers expense we had to start all over again in the House and in the Senate. I am sure we all want to save government money while doing the best work we can.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Simard, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

PRIVATE BILL

UNIVERSITY OF EMMANUEL COLLEGE—BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold moved the second reading of Bill S-20, to amend the Act of incorporation of the University of Emmanuel College.

He said: Honourable senators, it is my privilege, as sponsor of this bill on behalf of the University of Emmanuel College, to speak on second reading to explain the bill and give you a little history of the college, which is located in Saskatoon and is an affiliate of the University of Saskatchewan.

Emmanuel College was founded in Prince Albert in 1879 and in 1883 was established and incorporated by an act of Parliament of the Dominion of Parliament as the University of Saskatchewan. It had nothing to do with the official provincial university known as the University of Saskatchewan at that time. When the provincial university was established in Saskatoon in 1909, Emmanuel College moved to that city. While retaining its university status, it relinquished its title in favour of the new university. St. Chad's College was established in Regina in 1907 and continued to work there until 1964 when it amalgamated with Emmanuel College to form the College of Emmanuel and St. Chad still affilitated with the University of Saskatchewan.

By resolution of the provincial Senate in May 1967, the College of Emmanuel and St. Chad was recognized as the theological college for the Province of Rupert's Land, but the student body includes postulants from the diocese beyond the eccelesiastic province.

I might say, to those who are not familiar with the situation, that the purpose of the college is to prepare candidates to receive ordination in the Anglican community, especially in the Anglican Church of Canada.

As noted earlier, the institution was granted a charter as a university in 1883 by the Parliament of Canada at a time when, in fact, Saskatchewan was a great area which included presently Saskatchewan, Alberta, parts of the Northwest Territories and, indeed, part of the Yukon. The population at the time was 56,000 and, I would guess, mostly native. Our Anglican friends were anxious to ensure the proper education of those who would be involved with the church and had an act passed by the Government of Canada in that year.

The charter is still in effect although the name was changed in 1909 from the University of Saskatchewan to the University of Emmanuel College. Although, in its original charter, provision was made for the addition of several colleges, this university has existed throughout history with only one college. That college is presently known as Emmanuel and St. Chad. The University of Emmanuel College is governed by a Senate composed of 13 members plus the chancellor and vice-chancellor.

Bill S-20 updates the legislation which had been previously amended but which was originally passed by the Government of Canada in 1879.

Let me briefly go through the changes. I think that probably it is easier to read from the act, because it quite self-explanatory. The preamble indicates the history which I have already given you.

● (1630)

Moving into the legislative changes that are required, the bill prays that Her Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons enact the legislation as follows. Clause 1 would provide the University of Emmanuel College with a French name by amending the long title of the French version of the 1914 amending act. It would also restore in that long title the original French name of the University of Saskatchewan. This is but a housekeeping measure to indicate properly the name in both languages.

The second clause is an amendment which is consequential on the amendment proposed in clause 1.

Clause 3 would amend the university's charter to provide that the principal of the college affiliated with the university be ex officio Vice-Chancellor of the university.

The amendment proposed in clause 4 would update section 12 of the university's charter by providing that the Senate of the university be composed of certain designated office holders or persons with qualifications described in the new provision.

Finally, the notes concerning clause 5 indicate that section 14 of the university's charter requires that a formal procedure be followed in the making of a statute, by-law or regulation by the university pursuant to the statutory authority to do so given to it by its charter.

At this time it cannot be determined with certainty from the records of the university whether the formalities were always complied with in the past when any statutes, by-laws or regulations were made. This amendment would remedy any such irregularity, if any irregularity did, in fact, occur.

Honourable senators, that basically is the intent of Bill S-20. Before I ask for the support of the house in passing this important legislation to the college, let me say that Emmanuel College and the University of Emmanuel and Saint Chad has played an important role in the life of the University of Saskatchewan in Saskatoon and the community in which I live. Certainly it has earned the respect of the entire city and area. It has produced members of the clergy of the Anglican persuasion who have been a credit to that church and who have been most influential in the development of the province.

Having said that, it would be my hope that honourable senators see fit to support Bill S-20.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have no quarrel with the bill. It appears on the surface to be a reasonable and sensible piece of legislation. I suggest that it go to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs when Senator Buckwold is prepared to so move. We will have our experts look at it there.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Buckwold, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

FARM INCOME PROTECTION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Eileen Rossiter moved the second reading of Bill C-98, an act authorizing agreements between the Government of Canada and the provinces to provide for protection for the income of producers of agricultural products and to enable the Government of Canada to take additional measures for that purpose.

She said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak to the second reading of the farm income protection bill, Bill C-98. Before I address the bill itself, I should like to present some background which led to the tabling of the farm income protection legislation.

Since the mid-1980s various market pressures have called into question the adequacy of protection which Canadian farmers receive under existing insurance and stabilization programs. Trade wars, falling prices and successive droughts have put the squeeze on Canadian farmers. Since 1985 record levels of emergency federal support have been offered. Yet farmers have continued to suffer financial hardship.

The summer of 1988 was an important turning point. Canadian farm leaders told federal and provincial agriculture ministers that they wanted programs to provide more predictable support, support they could count on for the long-term.

The wheels of the federal government, the provinces and producers were soon moving in fast motion toward a new grain safety net program. The Grain and Oilseed Safety Net Committee was established in January of last year. It included 19 farmers working in partnership with 14 officials from Agriculture Canada and the provinces. I emphasize the word "partnership" because that is exactly what the safety net policy process has been and why it has been so successful. The safety net committee was but one of 11 separate task forces established under the agri-food policy review.

This ambitious and unprecedented review was launched in December of 1989 by the Minister of Agriculture about a month after the government published Growing Together—A Vision for Canada's Agri-food Industry. Growing Together laid the foundation for a new consultative process involving the federal government, the industry and the provinces. It was built on four pillars: market responsiveness, self-reliance, regional sensitivity and environmental sustainability.

Based on these four pillars, Growing Together explored many complex issues and identified changes needed in seven key areas. Safety net programs was one of them. The Grain and Oilseed Safety Net Committee was put on a fast track because the farm income situation required urgent consideration.

The new safety nets, the Gross Revenue Insurance Program, GRIP, and the Net Income Stabilization Account, NISA, are among the first tangible results of the agri-food policy review. The grain safety net process represents a unique new approach to public policy making. GRIP and NISA are outstanding examples of what can be accomplished when farmers and governments work together.

In the case of the safety nets, the task was accomplished quickly. The Grain and Oilseed Safety Net Committee met for the first time in January of 1990. At that time the proposed new programs were just beginning to take shape.

Last August the committee recommended to federal and provincial ministers the Gross Income Insurance Program, GRIP, and the Net Income Stabilization Account, NISA. Federal and provincial ministers agreed in principle to the programs at their November meeting in Winnipeg. On January 11 the Minister of Agriculture announced that GRIP and NISA would be available to farmers before spring seeding.

The Farm Income Protection Bill was introduced to provide for the implementation of long-term safety net programs for Canadian farmers. This legislation represents a new approach to income stabilization in Canadian agriculture. The protection is permanent, predictable, targeted and effective.

The new safety nets provide similar protection equitably to all farmers in all regions. They encourage good management practices based on long-term market trends.

This comprehensive review protection provided for the establishment of four programs. They are the Revenue Insurance Program, the Crop Insurance Program, the Gross Revenue Insurance Program and the Net Income Stabilization Account. As well, there are provisions in the bill for special measures.

Under GRIP, farmers receive total revenue protection from both production and market price risks. It is a bankable program because farmers will know before seeding what their minimum revenue will be for each crop enroled.

• (1640)

GRIP offers equitable support across all crops and regions. It targets support to individuals who need it most. It targets revenue which includes both price and yield. The program opens up various options for producers. They can enrol for total GRIP coverage, or just crop insurance, or, if they wish, only for the revenue insurance component. Now producers can buy the best type of coverage for their farms.

NISA enables farmers to set aside money in their own individual accounts. They can stablilize their income by making deposits during good years to draw upon in difficult years. Income stabilization is geared to the individual.

Bill C-98 authorizes the Minister of Agriculture to enter into agreement with provinces for one or more of the programs. There are five guiding principles: production or market neutrality, equity, protection of farm families and communities, consistency with international obligations, and encouragement of long-term environmental and economic sustainability.

The bill also defines elements common to all programs specified in a federal-provincial agreement. Common elements include: criteria used to determine producers' and products' eligibility, conditions for enrolling and opting out, methods used to calculate premiums and payments, terms and conditions for audits, assessment of environmental sustainability. Also, committees shall be established to ensure a continuing review of the Act and the agreements. A report to the Minister of Agriculture must be made on a yearly basis. Extra requirements for specific programs are also included.

Under exceptional circumstances the Minister of Agriculture is authorized to take special actions. For example, the minister may set up a Special Measures Committee to examine a problem beyond the scope of existing programs and recommend special measures to resolve it.

Two committees are already working to carry out such tasks. One committee is analyzing the situation of grain and oilseed producers. The members of committee have created four working groups to examine short-term support, land use, farm finance and diversification. Another special measure, or third line of defence committee, is at work for the horticulture sector.

The Farm Income Protection Act is built on the provisions of the Crop Insurance Act, the Agricultural Stabilization Act, and the Western Grain Stabilization Act. When Bill C-98 is passed, all agricultural products will be protec ted under this new comprehensive legislation. However, I would like to emphasize that while the old Acts are being repealed, crop insurance and tripartite stabilization programs continue. In addition, as a transition, provisions under ASA and WGSA will apply for the 1990-91 crop year. The federal government will have the regulatory power to offer protection to producers of commodities not protected under a federal-provincial agreement, such as industrial milk and cream.

I would like to point out that at the committee stage in the House of Commons the Minister of Agriculture accepted a number of amendments to respond to concerns raised during hearings. The Statement of Principles now better clarifies the issue of equity across programs an agricultural products. National management committees must be established for NISA, GRIP and the Revenue Insurance Program.

Also, the Special Measures Committee section was revised to ensure that its membership consists of representatives of Canada, the provinces, and any other groups, as appropriate.

In fact, during review of this legislation in the House of Commons, the Minister of Agriculture once again accepted a number of amendments which will further improve this bill. These include the addition of a fifth principle— to provide for the encouragement of long-term social and economic sustainability of farm families and communities. Another change will now ensure that the national committees will review the Act an its agreements and report to the minister on its recommendations at least once a year.

As well, the minister has agreed to table in Parliament the agreement signed with the provinces with their concurrence.

To conclude these remarks on the second reading of Bill C-98, I want to emphasize the federal government's commitment to ensure that Canadian agriculture has a strong future. That commitment has been met by working closely with industry and the provinces towards a more stable and predictable agricultural economy.

This new Farm Income Protection Act demonstrates how effective a partnership approach can be.

Senator Olson: STPH-FPLT Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words about Bill C-98 before we pass second reading and hopefully send it off to the committee on agriculture so that we can deal with some of the details there.

[Senator Rossiter]

I want to begin by complimenting the Honourable Senator Rossiter for giving a very complimentary explanation of what this bill is all about and where it came from. In fact, I think it fair to say that she was probably over-zealous in calling it a great new and unique bill. I know that she had to say something nice about it, but there is nothing new or unique about it at all.

As far as insurance against yield is concerned, a crop insurance program has been around for a number of years. In fact, I introduced it way back between 1968 and 1972. It protected farmers against a loss in yield and it was called "all risk crop insurance." It did not matter what caused the loss, whether it was drought, flood, or bad weather, insects, hail, or for any other reason, because it was all risk crop insurance. There is nothing new this bill about that; it is carrying on that. The trouble is, this government seems to think that the contribution of the federal government was too much, so it has actually reduced it a little and loaded more of the cost of that type of program on to the producers—and, I might say, at a time when they can ill afford it.

In Alberta at least, and I think in most of the other provinces, the government has agreed that for 1991 it will offer the crop insurance again in the same form and without any modifications as it was offered last year and the year before. To that extent, I am quite happy about it, because it does give farmers some additional time to consider and to make the correct management decision based on that consideration as to whether they want to sign up for what is called "GRIP." When a farmer signs up for GRIP, it is for three years and the farmer cannot get out. Perhaps the premiums will be too high. Quite frankly, it is not known what the premiums will be until sometime later in the season. That is not good.

The other part of the GRIP program allows a farmer to insurance against changes in price. There is also nothing new or unique about that. That could be done previously under the crop insurance program. A farmer could elect the price and there were several options offered, such as 60 per cent or 70 per cent, which was yield, but then a farmer could elect the price to insurance it at. Under the new program there are not any elections; the farmer takes what is known as an IMAP price—and I am not saying that is unfair—which means an international moving average price for the last 15 years.

• (1650)

I think that turns out to be $4.15 per bushel in the 1991 year. That is fair. It is not enough by any means in comparison to the increased costs people, particularly grain farmers, have had to suffer during the past few years. As I have said, I will not complain about it because it is certainly a lot more than the market price at the present time.

However, when Senator Rossiter was explaining the reasons why—she said I think 19 producers or producer groups were represented on the committee along with provincial and federal governments—she mentioned that we got into this situation because of drought and lower prices. She could also have mentioned that we got into it because of an incompetent federal government in dealing with farm policies. There has never been a time since I entered the political scene when there has been such a disastrous decline in farm prices and therefore farm income. There is no such thing as net farm income anymore. Saskatchewan is the worst province, where it is going down to below zero. Senator Barootes would know that there will be a decline of something like 43 per cent, I believe, in net income for Saskatchewan farmers — that is the projection — and it may go below zero. That has happened since this government has been in office. There are all kinds of things that the government could have done and should have done. By the way, I tried to coax them to do some of them from time to time.

One makes an effort to get debt service charges down. There has never been any justification for the enormous debt service charges that have been charged farmers, usually in situations where they had absolutely no defence. The only way to get around paying these high debt service changes is to pay off the debt. Farmers cannot do it; other small businesses can—but I will not make that argument today.

Senator Nurgitz: Why?

Senator Olson: Because I have done it so many times and I think it is starting to sink in a little. However, if you would like me to make it again today, I could. The other problem with this program is that we here, and the farmers, particularly the producers in the prairie provinces, have waited and waited for it. I know that even some senators in the Conservative ranks, from the prairies, were getting a little impatient with their own government because they were waiting for it to come out with a program after they had gone past the deadline. It used to be that you signed up for crop insurance by March 31 or else you missed it for that year. This program was not even ready then. I guess it could have been passed if you had set aside all the rules of notice in both houses of Parliament and forced it through, but there was no reasonable time for the program to be brought in. We were still asking what the insurance rates would be—I have it right in front of me here somewhere, if I can find it—on March 2. On that date, at a meeting in Regina, the federal and provincial ministers of agriculture approved the criteria for third line of defence programs and finalized premium methodology. They did not agree on what the premiums would be even at that late date, but just on the methodology that would be used to calculate the premiums.

We had a meeting, and I must give a lot of credit to whoever on that side is responsible, in particular Senator Barootes, who, as chairman of the Agriculture Committee, managed to get the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds to come to a meeting of the Senate committee some time in the middle of March. They gave a lot more information that night, I might say, than they had either been able or willing to give the agriculture producers of this country for weeks prior to that night. I was indeed grateful, and I am sure other senators were too, that those two ministers came and were open, frank and forthcoming, and whatever other terminology you want to use.

Senator Barootes: Conservatives!

Senator Olson: We obtained information for people who had been waiting weeks for it. I think the chairman of that committee should be commended. Perhaps I should get a little credit too for prodding him to do it; but we finally got the right ministers to the right meeting and they have followed through.

Senator Nurgitz: Great chairman.

Senator Olson: The other problem that the development of this program demonstrates is a serious one within this government. That is, the government does not seem to be able to do anything without dragging the provincial treasuries in along with their treasury. One might say, perhaps, that that is the way it should be, that the federal treasury should be making laws that involves charges against the provincial treasuries. That is exactly what this measure does.

The unfair part of it is that there are some provinces where the financial burden to deliver this program is far greater than for other provinces. Let us take Saskatchewan for example. Alberta has a similar problem to some extent, but its economy is a little more diversified than Saskatchewan's. For Saskatchewan, given the number of grain producers and the amount they contribute to the total economy, and therefore to the revenue of that government, it is an enormous burden for them to pay their costs at the same level as some other provinces such as Alberta, Ontario or wherever. I am not sure that is fair. Under the Constitution of Canada the federal government is responsible for agriculture, along with the provinces to some extent but not necessarily in exactly the same programs.

So what has happened now with the acceptance of various parts of these two programs, GRIP and NISA ,is that there will be different levels available to farmers depending on whether they live on one side or the other of a provincial boundary. The government should ask itself the question: Is that fair? We are all Canadians, so why should we not all be treated the same under exactly the same conditions, particularly if we just happen to live across the boundary?

I know very well that it is a much greater burden for Saskatchewan to offer these two programs to their producers than it is for the province of Alberta. There are two reasons: first, there are more of them and, secondly, they are more reliant on the agricultural economy to produce the revenue that the province has available to pay for these kinds of programs. So I think the government should have taken that fact into account, but I do not think it will, at least not for 1991.

If you want to participate, the province has to pay a certain percentage. I could give the percentages, but I think they are already well-known—namely, percentages of the burden or responsibility that the federal and the provincial governments will have to pay. As I have said, each province will be different. Canadians will be treated differently in these provinces.

• (1700)

Senator Rossiter, what happened to the third line of defence? You mentioned it in your speech today, but only insofar as horticultural products were concerned. There is supposed to be a third line of defence, according to the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Mazankowski, and the Minister of Grains and Oil Seeds, Mr. Mayer, to deal with situations that GRIP and NISA fail to deal with. These programs are going to do absolutely nothing for those farmers in desperate straits who will be trying to seed their crops in the spring of 1991. There will be no income available from these programs until after the harvest of 1991. The Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Grains and Oil Seeds acknowledge that there is a severe problem that must be dealt with. Then they refer to the third line of defence, but they do not do anything about it.

I believe an announcement was made two weeks ago that some kind of interim payment was made under the Western Grains Stabilization Act. Senator Rossiter, is that all there is to this third line of defence for the producers? That will help the grain producers, but what about the others? Hopefully you can answer that question for me.

I am ready to pass this bill. I was going to say that I will hold my nose and pass it, but I will not even need to do that. It is a lot better than what we have now, but I do not think we should oversell it and say that it is some great, new and unique concept in protection for farmers. That kind of program has been on the books for years. A farmer could use his crop insurance, once he had it, to convince the banker to lend him money. In many cases farmers were loaned too much, because the price of their product decreased by the time it went to market.

As I have said, we should pass this bill, and the sooner the better. There will then be no further apprehension about whether or not a program will be put in place. Some of the provinces have gone a long way in attempting to distribute application forms based on the assumption that this bill will be passed in its present form. As far as I am concerned, we should pass it and get on with it. Then, when the weaknesses show up, as they will, amendments can be made in the next session of Parliament. Thank you.

Hon. E. W. Barootes: Honourable senators, I want to thank the sponsor of the bill for the concise way in which it was presented, and I also wish to thank Senator Olson for the complimentary remarks he made about the committee on which he sits and in which I regard him as a leading light. I want to compliment him as the introducer of crop insurance on a federal basis in Canada. Indeed, it is incorporated in this program. Unfortunately, some of the other things he introduced, such as the Western Grain Stabilization Act, have been good in supporting the income of farmers in the past, but, at the present time, I believe it is $960 million in the hole. That means that the taxpayers of Canada and this government will have to honour that bill. On the other hand, the Wheat Board—and this is only a guesstimate—is some $700 million in the hole from overcompensating farmers on the basis of their grain in the past year or two. That too will have to be made up by the bulk of Canadian taxpayers. Senator Olson must also admit that the "ad hockery" we have used in supporting farmers in the past few years has not been successful in restoring permanent stability in our farms. I might also add that many producing organizations and producers support this program as restoring some degree of stability, and I am sure Senator Olson will agree that this bill provides something better than what we had in the past.

Senator Olson: That is the hope anyway.

Senator Barootes: Yes. There is no doubt that shortcomings will be found in the program, and amendments will be incorporated over the next few years as our farm experts, governments and, particularly, our producers identify defects in the program. We look forward to those, and the minister has said that he anticipates this to occur.

The bill, on the whole, is a good one, and perhaps by next year we will be able, on behalf of my friend Senator Bonnell, to include horticultural crops and other types of crops that are not presently included.

I took a slight bit of offence, Senator Olson, when you mentioned that the incompetence of the agricultural policies of the present government has led us into the situation.

Senator Simard: Shame!

Senator Barootes: If I thought that a government could make it rain, stop floods, prevent grasshoppers from coming into the fields, stop rust and all the other plagues and pestilence—

Senator Olson: I was talking about the decline in prices.

Senator Barootes: —I would agree with him, but I think he got carried away. This government has made a superlative effort to support producing farmers, particularly grain farmers, in these difficult years, and I would be prepared to match the record of this government's munificence toward the agricultural industry with any former government over any five- or ten-year period.

Senator Nurgitz: He agrees and he is sorry he said what he said.

Senator Barootes: You are taking it back. Thank you very much.

As for the third line of defence, as you know, this last week an interim payment on the Western Grain Stabilization has, in my province, yielded some $47 million, and I think the total in Canada is over $100 million. I think ours was $87 million. I also recall the figure of $140 million, which is the final payment to be made in November. In my province the rest of the third line totals about $2500 for the major farmers and, on average across the province, $1200 per farmer.

Senator Doody: Pity the poor fishermen!

Senator Barootes: Do you want money for the fishermen too?

Senator Doody: No wonder there is no money for the fishermen!

Senator Barootes: We cannot seed fish. We can seed grain. We harvest grain and you harvest fish.

Senator Doody: There is no mercy!

Senator Barootes: I might add that I too am looking forward to what further measures of an immediate nature will be forthcoming in the third line of defence.

• (1710)

I hope that by the middle or toward the end of this month something more will be heard in that respect, although I am sure, knowing my farm friends, of whom I have many, that it will not be enough; but I hope it will be of some help to get them through the seeding season and to get their crops in the ground in order to reap the great benefits of this program this fall.

With regard to the matter of equity between provinces, these programs are specific—specific to that farm and to that farmer. They are targeted directly, so it will depend on the kind of soil, the kind of crop, the history of the farm and, I might add, the record of that farmer's farming policies and practices. So it is not a matter of spreading a little butter over all the bread. This is a targeted program and it will remain targeted to the specific needs of that particular farm area or that farmer, which I think will be helpful, whereas our other ad hoc programs are on a general basis so that the rich and the poor were treated the same.

I look forward to seeing how this will work out. I regret that the one area which we have not been able to attack is that of farmers who have a heavy debt load and are paying heavy interest who, in the bonanza years of the $5 and $6 wheat prices—

Senator Olson: When the Liberals were in office.

Senator Barootes: I am not saying that. That was incidental and unfortunate, but it was true. In that period of $6 grains farmers enlarged their farms. They believed that they could add a section here and a section there and have it paid off with two or three crops. Unfortunately many of them tried that. They were good farmers but made bad economic judgments. Then came mortgage rates of 20 and 22 per cent over which the farmer had no control. But they got that easy money from the banker to buy that land. I regret that 10 or 12 per cent of those farmers are indeed in extreme difficulty these days, but I know of no way that we can go to a bank and say that we are the Government of Canada and we want you to wipe out this man's debt or reduce the rate. A contract is a contract is a contract. We can ameliorate it.

Senator Olson: And bankruptcy is bankruptcy is bankruptcy.

Senator Barootes: We can help with debt restructuring and so on, but I cannot make up today for a bad judgment that I made a few years ago. I wish some way could be found to do that. Some of my friends in the National Farmers Union would like to see those debts wiped out, but I do not think there is a feasible, easy way to do it. We have to work with these farmers and help them until they can get their debt reduced. GRIP and NISA may be one way of helping them do that.

I thank you very kindly for listening to me. I want to thank Senator Olson for staying and assisting us in proceeding with this bill today. I should also like to thank the Leader of the Opposition who gave us leave to proceed today. Thank you very much.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Rossiter, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if there is agreement among senators, I would move that all remaining orders, inquiries and motions stand.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

ADDRESS
of
HIS EXCELLENCY CARLOS SALINAS DE GORTARI, PRESIDENT OF MEXICO,
to Both Houses of Parliament
in the
HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA,

APPENDIX

of

THE PRESIDENT OF MEXICO,
MR. CARLOS SALINAS DE GORTARI

to

Both Houses of Parliament

in the

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

on

Monday, April 8, 1991

President and Mrs. Salinas were welcomed by the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister of Canada, by the Honourable Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate and Honourable John A. Fraser, Speaker of the House of Commons

[English]

Hon. John A. Fraser (Speaker of the House of Commons): The right hon. Prime Minister.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. President, Madam Salinas, Mr. Speaker, chers collègues, mesdames et messieurs:

During my visit to Mexico last year, Mr. President, we laid the foundation of a new beginning in relations between Mexico and Canada. Today with your visit here all of us build on that foundation, and on behalf of the people of Canada I extend to you, Mr. President, to Mrs. Salinas, your family, and all members of the Mexican delegation the warmest of welcomes to our country, Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Formal diplomatic relations between Canada and Mexico go back many decades. First contacts date to the days of Captain George Vancouver who gave Canada's largest Pacific island its original name, "Vancouver Y Quadra", after himself and the commander of the Spanish vessels, Mexicana and Sutil with whom he sailed.

[Translation]

If Canada and Mexico grew on the same continent, each tended to look elsewhere, however, for like-minded partners. But the world around us is changing dramatically and economic competition and opportunity are the hallmarks of our age. And so it is no coincidence that both of us have re-calibrated our global orientations and re-formulated our foreign policy priorities, at about the same time.

• (1110)

[English]

Since you came to office, Mexico has been focusing more northward to the United States, our common neighbour, and to Canada, to build new partnerships to improve the lives of your people. And Canada has begun to focus more southward, to consolidate our base in the hemisphere and to pursue new opportunities in the global economy.

Our first step in implementing this new policy direction was to conclude a free trade relationship with the United States. As you know, the decision to secure that free trade relationship was supported 100 per cent by all Canadians and all members of this House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Well, give or take a few.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: The next step was to develop a comprehensive strategy for relations with Latin America. By the year 2000, 600 million people with a purchasing power of $1 trillion will live in Latin America. It will constitute a continent of enormous economic power and great political influence on the world stage.

As part of our strategy for relations with Latin America we have joined the Organization of American States, both to demonstrate our commitment to progress in this hemisphere and also to play our part in making it happen. A lynch pin of our strategy is our renewed relationship with Mexico.

During my visit to Mexico last year we concluded 10 agreements covering a wide range of public policy issues from law enforcement to environmental protection. Today, four more agreements are being signed; on film co-production, double taxation, and on commerce, including a $500 million line of credit between EDC and Pemex.

These agreements are further building blocks in the construction of our new relationship.

A North American free trade agreement is a logical next step. That is why, Mr. President, we have endorsed your proposal for such an agreement. We know that the road will be long and difficult. We know it is a courageous decision by you, Mr. President, and all parliamentarians wish you well.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: A North American free trade agreement would create a market of over 350 million people with a gross product of over $7 trillion, bigger than the European Community whose economic relationships will intensify greatly in 1992.

[Translation]

Trade in goods and service would exceed $300 billion per year. Canadian consumers would benefit from the lower prices that competition and comparative advantage can deliver. And Canadian producers would benefit competitively from the restructuring and modernization that access to a larger market makes possible.

We have no intention, however, of renegotiating the Canada-U.S.A., FTA. We want to build on the FTA and to expand trade liberalization to encompass all of North America.

The objective of all three governments is to negotiate an agreement that allows them to strengthen their economies through free trade, for the benefit of their people.

[English]

The advantages for Mexico are clear. If there is one lesson that globalization and interdependence have taught, it is that increased trade brings higher living standards and greater opportunities. Trade, not aid, has opened up the most effective avenues to prosperity and to social justice. Aid, while extremely helpful has not itself been able to deliver prosperity. But trade, by transforming developing nations into advanced economies, has done so.

Not so long ago Singapore, South Korea and Taiwan were considered to be underdeveloped centres of low-cost labour. But as a result of sound economic policies at home and increased trade abroad, the standard of living in these countries on a per capita basis, is on a track to parity with the western industrialized countries during this decade. This is an extraordinary achievement and I think it is one that Mexico is going to emulate.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Countries with strong economies can afford to provide their citizens with social benefits that others cannot. These same countries are also those that can afford to impose the most stringent environmental standards on their industries and on their citizens. They are also the countries that dominate international trade.

Mr. President, 87 per cent of Canadian imports now come from the United States, Europe and Japan, and not from, for example, countries with extremely low wage rates such as China or India or the Soviet Union. The argument that wage structures in less developed nations somehow fundamentally distort a free trade area, or provide substantially unfair advantages, does not stand up to serious scrutiny.

The reality is that in the knowledge age we live in, competitiveness depends not on one, but on many factors, including education, training, productivity, communications and transportation networks, proximity to markets, and the costs of capital as well as the costs of labour.

[Translation]

The Government of Canada believes that a Canada-U.S.-Mexico free trade agreement can prove to be in the best interests of all concerned—if it can be achieved on terms that are acceptable to all three sovereign nations.

But important as the trade issue is, there is much more on the agenda of our two countries. Cooperation is underway on environmental protection. Business links are growing between private enterprise on both sides.

And 350,000 Canadian tourists and business people visited Mexico last year.

Talks between President Salinas and I will address the evolving situation in this hemisphere to which he, as President of Mexico, brings a unique perspective. And our talks will go beyond respective domestic and regional concerns to the ongoing challenges in the Persian Gulf, the evolving situation in the Soviet Union, the prospects for successful conclusion of multilateral trade negotiations and the urgent need to limit the spread of weapons of mass destruction and to control the sale of arms.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, simply put, there would be no discussion today of a resurgent Mexico, much less of a North American free trade agreement, were it not for President Salinas. His confidence in Mexicans and their confidence in themselves, have made it possible to transform attitudes, to accomplish changes and to chart a course that even five years ago seemed unthinkable.

Canadians respect Mexico's dynamism, and all Canadians admire Mexico's culture. We welcome you today, Mr. President, as the visionary leader of a great people with an exciting future. Here in the House of Commons, this crucible of Canadian democracy, I invite you now, on behalf of all parliamentarians of all political parties, who value our association with Mexico—and all of us do—I invite you today to address the Parliament and the people of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1120)

His Excellency Carlos Salinas de Gortari (President of Mexico):

[His Excellency spoke in Spanish.]

[Translation]

The Hon. John A. Fraser, Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada; the Hon. Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate of Canada; the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister of Canada; hon. members of the House of Commons and Senate of Canada; Your Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen: I come here in respectful response to the invitation extended to me by this sovereign body, which so worthily represents the people of Canada. In this house of democracy resides the will of the great Canadian nation to find its own answers to its needs and to forge its own path in the world. I bring to this rostrum the friendship of the Mexican people and speak with their voice in expressing our desire for Mexico and Canada to become better acquainted with their many coinciding aspects, as well as with the wealth of their differences, so that together we may embark on new relations of exchanges and co-operation for our mutual benefit.

Canada and Mexico are both the outcome of singular experiences, but both are genuine nations, soundly rooted in their history and solidly backing their national project. Here in this Parliament speaks the voice of a sensitive and vigorous country that jealously guards its linguistic and cultural traditions and cherishes peace and co-operation among nations. Mexico draws its identity from a synthesis of civilizations and cultures; the strength of our blending of races gradually built up a national character that is proud of its past, aware that it is the heir and custodian not only of universal values but also of its own way of life and profound communal solidarity.

Mexico has a robust identity and sufficient vitality to build its own sovereign future. We therefore do not fear an encounter with the world, rather we actively seek it. To be bent on autarky would not only be Utopian, but would mean condemning ourselves to backwardness and marginalization. Our homeland is able to look out at the world and open itself up to contact with other peoples, without thereby failing to be faithful to itself, to its traditions and culture, to its values and historical raison d'être. We Mexicans today look towards the future and are determined to play a significant role in the coming century.

That is why I have come to Canada, an industrialized nation with a high export volume, a wealth of natural resources and a wide rate of freedoms, which will undoubtedly contribute to shaping the world of the third millennium. The Mexican people want to establish new continental relations that are more dynamic, more productive and more just. By doing so, our governments will be in a better position to carry out their tasks in a manner befitting the men and women of our countries and our times, who are doing their best to make our hemisphere an area of convergence and freedoms. We can take advantage of the goodwill and hard work of our peoples to guide our agreements and encounters to our mutual benefit and ensure that this new world will once again astonish humanity, just as it did 500 years ago.

Members of Parliament: Today, as we are just beginning to witness the end of the world's post-war structure, we recognize the crafty barriers and outworn dogmas that are designed to hinder the exchange of ideas, goods and people. The new co-operation between the great powers, the autumn revolution in central and eastern Europe, the new democracies here in the Americas, evinced, to our fascination, the global nature of the human condition, the flexibility of politics and the economic interdependence of nations. The Persian Gulf conflict was a painful reminder of the same global reality. Today, it is no longer possible to dream of an isolated social experience, impenetrable to coexistence or to alien conflicts. The hope and the challenge of building a world governed by international law are growing at a parallel rate. The true challenge of our times is to recognize the constructive force of the globalization of history, to face with responsibility and respect the variety of social experience and to avert the risk of new attempts at protagonism and new myths aimed at ignoring the sovereignty rights of states.

The world economy is the stage of a harsh and intense competition for markets. The revolution in knowledge and technology is transforming work habits and making social relations more fluid. New centres of innovation, resources and trade are at the forefront of economic activity and are forming into blocs to profit from their comparative advantages. To have staying power in this new international arena demands changes in economic structures, openness to competition and innovation, and new forms of association both within and outside the borders of individual nations.

In view of those circumstances, Mexico has set out to make the changes needed to secure a new placement in the world economy and to play an active role in the political configuration of the future. Within our borders, Mexican society has undergone a significant transformation over the past 25 years. Our current population of 82 million will increase by a further 10 million during my administration. Every year, one million young people seek to join administration. Every year, one million young people seek to join the labour force. Their demands are clear-cut. They want opportunities, services, and to participate in the decisions that concern them as well as in national affairs. They now reflect the demands of a better-informed and therefore politically more active, mature society. That is why in Mexico development, democracy and, above all, solidarity with those who have the least are essential needs and not merely options for defining government policies. Our response has had to be commensurate with these legitimate demands and in keeping with the new global reality.

We have strengthened our democratic institutions by changing the customs and practices that hampered the indispensable modernization of our structures. Thus, we now have a more vigorous system of parties in which increased electoral competition is the distinctive characteristic of political contention. The progress of democracy in Mexico has been reflected in the establishment of a new juridical framework for electoral matters, the result of an agreement reached between the different and even opposing political forces in the country. This new electoral legislation ensures a framework agreed upon with a view to establishing mutual responsibilities and acceptance of electoral results. We Mexicans know that our greatest political challenge lies in renovating our democratic practices, organization and structures in unison, so as to respond to an increasingly demanding society.

Mexico has never lost its course on the road to democracy. However, if politics are to be constructive, favourable economic conditions need to be established—as many fledgling democracies are beginning to discover—to ensure that the aspirations and ideals of liberty are solidly founded in actual reality in order to be long-lasting. The democratic exercise of power therefore also involved building economic foundations that will give our people more and better opportunities to realize their hopes for a decent life.

In Mexico, it is through our modernization strategy that we have sought to regain the path to gradual, sustained growth. After two years of persevering joint efforts in that direction made by society and the government, we have succeeded in achieving a growth rate of 4 per cent of GNP in real terms, and in reducing the public deficit to just half a percentage point of our national product, the lowest level in a quarter of a century. Strict fiscal discipline and a successful, timely renegotiation of the foreign debt have provided the necessary stability. Moreover, the pact signed by all sectors of society to reduce inflation remains in force, and this year we aim to cut it back to half the rate recorded in 1990.

During the past two years, Mexicans have seen inflation reduced more than it had been over the past 20 years. Our objective is to lower it to single-digit levels comparable to those of our main trading partners and to provide the greatest possible certainty regarding the development of our economy.

Economic stability has therefore been our highest priority. From the outset we viewed it as an essential condition for ensuring the continuity and viability of the structural measures that we have implemented in order to modernize our productive plant. The main objective is to make Mexico a major exporting country: hence the urgent need to ensure greater efficiency in productive processes and over-all quality of the end product. That is why we opened up our economy to international and domestic competition. In a brief period of time, we moved from being one of the most closed developing economies to being one of the most open. We have dismantled non-tariff barriers, removing them from over 85 per cent of imports; tariffs now average 10 per cent and the highest stands at 20 per cent. We needed to encourage innovation and competition, and to take advantage of the arbitrage of foreign prices on domestic prices.

• (1130)

That, in turn, meant broadening and stepping up the process of deregulating large sectors of our economy and establishing more attractive conditions to encourage greater flows of foreign direct investment, on which access to new technology largely depends. The fields of transportation, telecommunications and secondary petrochemicals are now more efficient and competitive; new regulations afford security and certainty to foreign investors who now have 100 per cent access to investment in activities that account for nearly two-thirds of our GNP. The Mexican Congress is currently studying bills to define clear, competitive rules for the protection of intellectual property rights. The climate for investment is attractive and dependable. This year Mexico has witnessed the arrival of nearly $4 billion in foreign investment and we expect more in the future.

Another important structural change has lain in the sale of public companies that are not of a strategic or priority nature. Our State has grown not only in terms of bureaucracy but also of property. The economic crisis of the past decade revealed the seriousness of the problem. More state-owned property and greater trade protectionism in Mexico simply did not lead to greater justice or greater economic strength that would allow us to deal with international contingencies and grow. The government has therefore privatized mining industries and companies, our airlines, and the telephone company, and soon to come are the commercial banks. The funds obtained from such sales have aided financial stability and have been invested in tackling extreme poverty. The Mexican people realize that government responsibility does not lie in owning a new fleet of aeroplanes or new bank offices, but in meeting demands for water and schools, and in providing opportunities for Indian, rural and urban communities. That is why Mexicans support the government's programs for change and thereby guarantee the continuity of such programs.

This shows the magnitude of the efforts made by the Mexican people. The strength of the nation and its increased capability to meet domestic needs and the demands resulting from globalization of the economy rest on a firm foundation. Consequently, we now intend to step up the process of diversifying our ties and bolstering trade relations with the various regional integration areas. We are aware of the potential of our geographic location, which makes us, like Canada, neighbours of the world's strongest economy and a link between the Orient and the Occident. We are also aware that Mexico is a bridge connecting the northern and southern parts of the hemisphere, which implies greater two-way trade with the countries of Latin America and therefore a secure link in shaping a continent-wide, free trade area.

Consequently, we have begun talks with Canada and the United States of America that will, in the near future, enable us to embark on negotiations leading to the signing of a trilateral free trade treaty. I am convinced that such a treaty is unquestionably the best option for the parties involved. It is an opportunity for our three nations to create a major economic zone that while respecting our cultural differences, will have the vitality to compete successfully with the European market and the Asian Pacific Rim.

Within the framework of an agreement between sovereign nations that will do away with tariff and non-tariff barriers, increase the expand trade patterns and objectively and justly resolve differences, we can expect investment and the creation of jobs to benefit all three countries. We will also be able to find economies of scale that will not only increase the competitiveness of Canada and restore that of the United States, but also bring Mexico's competitiveness up to world levels. A new array of technological options may well open up as a result of greater specialization and diversification in production and exports. We have what is needed to translate efforts into well-being for the inhabitants of North America.

Particularly for a country such as Canada, where the export of goods and services accounts for one-fourth of the gross domestic product, Mexico's market, in full expansion with 82 million consumers, is a potential destination for Canadian products and investment. Correspondingly, Mexico is seeking free and reciprocal access for its products to Canada and the United States. Furthermore, we are convinced that such conditions will generate greater investment and more sources of well-paid jobs, which will dissuade our fellow countrymen from leaving Mexico in search of job opportunities in the north. Economic relations with the United States are already strong, but we now wish to ensure that they grow in an organized and equitable manner, taking into account differences in the levels of development achieved by the two economies.

Very broad opportunities truly exist, since the economies of Canada and Mexico are complementary. Mexico is seeking to gain from Canadian experience in the fields where Canada has consolidated advanced infrastructure and has leading-edge technology. Such fields include, for example, telecommunications and public transportation, advanced irrigation projects, and water and environmental sanitation. Efforts to modernize Mexico urgently call for access to different technological options that will give producers greater flexibility in meeting the expectations of modern consumers.

Freer trade between our nations is expected to enhance the well-being of our peoples. We must not blame free trade for the conditions imposed on the productive situation by other factors. We have nothing to fear but barriers and obstacles that are intended to protect some parties from competition and, in doing so, end up destroying creativity and well-being. We must not forget that, sooner or later, such barriers have been demolished by the freedom-seeking vitality of peoples and by their demands for justice.

Distinguished members of Parliament, a free trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America is already in force. Arduous and intense negotiations preceded the signing of this agreement and now serve as valuable experience of which Mexico hopes to take advantage. Although the debate was undoubtedly intense, it was finally shown that the economic prosperity of Canada, one of the world's most important exporting countries, is closely linked to access to new markets and consequently to plans for developing a free trade in goods and services. An economy that closes itself off loses competitiveness. An economy that is skilfully opened up gains new competitive vitality.

In Mexico we share this vocation. It is with the support of our culture and our history that we are opening up to the world and to the competition for markets. We know that the path that each nation pursues cannot be other than the result of its own historic experience, of the specific circumstances of its geography and even of the resources with which nature has endowed it. In the world of today, however, comparative advantages are not inflexible—they can be built up. The circumstances of today's world oblige us to make use of all the energy, imagination and determination of Canadians and Mexicans alike in working toward the convergence of our goals, so as to take full advantage of the complementary aspects of our economies. We can share a vision of the future, based on the long term, that will heed the needs of coming generations, who deserve to live in a better world.

We have embarked upon a new and vigorous stage in bilateral relations between Canada and Mexico. We are counting upon the spirit of our societies and the interest of our governments to strengthen our ties in the different areas of our agenda, both as regards our economies and in the fields of politics and culture. In particular, we in Mexico want to intensify the co-operation between our countries in two areas that the Mexican government and people regard as especially sensitive. These are: the fight to definitively eradicate the scourge of drug trafficking, and the mutually respectful and concerted effort to improve the environment.

The international struggle against illegal traffic in narcotics is Mexico's struggle as well. Over the past two years, we have seized thousands of tons of cocaine and destroyed hundreds of hectares of marijuana and poppies; we have broken up over 100 criminal organizations and confiscated their goods and properties; we have substantially increased budgetary resources for combating drugs and raised penalties and sanctions against those proven to have a connection to this chain of terror; we have ratified the Vienna Convention and are playing an active role in international forums. We have carried out these and other actions because in Mexico we consider drug trafficking to be a basic threat to the security of our country and to the health of our young people. We know that this chain of criminal activity transcends the frontiers of any country—which means that co-operation among nations is essential. Nonetheless, for it to be truly effective, such co-operation must be respectful of the sovereignty of all the states involved.

In the protection of the environment, Mexico assumes its commitment along with the entire world, because it sees this as a humanitarian cause of universal scope. Mexico has gladly accepted its responsibility in this crusade that is incumbent upon us all, since all of us stand to benefit from its advances and its successes. We Mexicans are convinced that our growth need not lead to the ravaging and pollution of the environment; quite the contrary. Growth that damages the environment is not growth. Resources and technologies for cleaning it up are still needed, but with government and society working together we have made progress.

A few days ago the Mexican Government took the decision to definitively close down one of our country's five refineries, precisely the one that supplied Mexico City. This was done at great economic cost, but this action will prevent the release of 80 thousand tons of pollutants per year into the atmosphere. We are also going to make other heavy investments in improving the environment of Mexico City, but we realize that a great deal still remains to be done, not only in our capital city but also in other areas of our country, some of which have been declared part of the patrimony of humanity. The initial and long-term efforts must be made by the Mexicans themselves, but we also propose to obtain more far-reaching international co-operation in this endeavour. I must acknowledge that our efforts have been supported by the invaluable technological and financial assistance of friendly countries, among them Canada, for which I hereby extend the sincere and fraternal gratitude of the people of Mexico.

Honourable Members of Parliament, Mexico has always based its foreign policy on strict observance of the principles that define harmonious coexistence among nations. By tradition and conviction, Mexico has displayed a clear vocation for peace and conduct consistent with respect for the self-determination of peoples, the peaceful settlement of controversies and co-operation for development. For that reason, and because of the strength of its history, Mexico has confidence in its future, in the deep-seated nationalism of its people, and in the vigour of an ancient culture, which is experiencing a renewal and renaissance, and which proudly offers to the world's surprised eyes the contributions stemming from the spirit of its men and its women to the vast cultural wealth of the west.

Today Mexico, proud of its past, looks to the future. In doing so, we have found in Canada a friendly and respectful nation, interested in becoming acquainted with our way of life. We Mexicans also want to gain a better knowledge of this country's way of life, to explore in depth the traditions and customs of the people of Canada, and to enrich ourselves with the value that they themselves place on their pluralistic society and the diversity of their ethnic groups and their languages.

In the spirit of a Canadian who so staunchly demonstrated the strength of his determination, Terry Fox, as in the impressive talent of men of science like Frederick Banting and the humanism of Stephen Leacock, we Mexicans have come to know of the greatness of your people. That is why we are certain that this new era of friendship can be positive and enduring. The people of Mexico make very good friends. They want to be, in the true sense of the word, friends of the people of Canada.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau (Speaker of the Senate): Your Excellency, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Prime Minister, honorables collègues du Sénat et de la Chambre des Communes, distinguished guests:

[Editor's Note: Speaker spoke in Spanish.]

[Translation]

Mr. President, we are honoured by your visit. Your stature as an economist and a humanist inspires us with trust borne of reason. The validity of your democratic convictions is testimony of mutually beneficial co-operation.

[Translation]

You embody our countries' hope to create organic ties on this North American continent which we share with a powerful neighbour.

A worthy representative of contemporary Mexico, in your writings and your political life, you have already shown that technology and human values are not opposed but, on the contrary, that they combine to enrich humanity.

[English]

It is entirely appropriate, Your Excellency, that you should visit our assembly at this historic juncture in Canadian-Mexican relations. Mexico is of immense importance to Canada.

Before today, we knew you as a forward-looking leader determined to reshape your nation to meet the challenges of the future, while preserving the diversity of your cultural traditions and a deep sense of national pride in the achievements of previous civilizations.

Today, we have had the privilege of hearing you speak eloquently of your vision of the Mexico of today and tomorrow, and we feel that under your leadership the aspirations of your people are in good hands.

Your bold vision for the future of North America opens the door to new avenues of co-operation which promise to carry us well into the next century. Time strengthens friendship, and we look forward to expanding our ties in the months and years ahead.

In listening to you, Mr. President, we realized once again how the firmness of your ideological convictions is yet allied to a wise pragmatism, and your courage to a political wisdom which commands respect.

Mr. President, your mother is an economist and your father a senator; your inheritance was obviously the presidency.

We are proud to share our coming prospects with a neighbour who so profoundly grasps the interdependence of the modern world.

Your country is indebted to you for a new deal for its people. Your knowledge and experience fit you perfectly to play a prime role in the new deal that the three neighbouring countries in North America are contemplating. And we have the greatest confidence in the man who started the process, the President of Mexico, whom we have the honour to welcome here today.

On behalf of my colleagues in the Senate of Canada, your Excellency, allow me to thank you very warmly for your inspiring address to us today and for your moving expressions of friendship for the Canadian people.

We would ask you to carry back to Mexico a message of the deep friendship which all Canadians feel for the Mexican people.

[Translation]

I thank you, Mr. President, and wish you good luck.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Your Excellency, Madam, Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Members of the House of Commons and Senate, honoured and distingued guests, ladies and gentlemen:

Today, I have the duty but also the immense pleasure to express on behalf of all members of the House of Commons and of all political parties represented here our great joy in having you among us in this historic Chamber.

Canada and Mexico have enjoyed an enduring friendship over many years. Since diplomatic relations were established in 1942, we have maintained positive and constructive contacts for our mutual benefit in numerous spheres of activity.

I should mention, Mr. President, the continual exchanges that have taken place between members of your Parliament and members of our Parliament over many years which have had a great effect in understanding both among your own people and among our colleagues that you meet with today.

I might say from a personal point of view that before I was elected to this House, I visited your country as part of a bidding delegation for the 1976 Winter Olympics, when you were holding the Olympics in 1968. We were very well received by your representatives and they got us the Olympics. They got us the Summer Olympics though, not the Winter Olympics.

I have also had the privilege of being on a parliamentary delegation visiting your country. I want you to take back to your colleagues the very great importance that we place on these exchanges.

Today, we are facing new challenges arising from vast changes in our hemisphere and the world community, and you have spoken of them. In your address to us today, you have not ignored the difficult questions but rather with statements of courage and vision you have drawn attention to them.

As a true leader, you have reminded us that a challenge is also an opportunity. Since assuming office you have achieved great progress in moving Mexican society forward to realize its true potential.

Those of us who have had the opportunity to visit your country are impressed with the vast storehouse of resources, both material and human, with which your country is blessed. Culturally rich, economically dynamic, historically resplendent, politically self-assured, Mexico cannot help but succeed. These values and attitudes are reflected in the views you have expressed to us today.
