THE SENATE

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order concerning the business of the Senate and our ability to discharge—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): There is no business.

Senator Kelly: —our duty as senators. This relates to the overall business presently before the Senate.

Honourable senators, I want to take this moment to remind you that I have been in this chamber for eight years. I start my ninth year next year. I have never yelled at any one of you from my seat. Never! I have never interrupted. I have followed every possible rule dictated to me, in order to help me, by Senator Frith. I ask you to return me the same courtesy, please.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Senator Frith: Just wait until the Speaker calls something so that you can raise your point of order. That is all I ask.

Senator Kelly: There are a number of important public issues on the Scroll, including the debate on the Persian Gulf crisis, the broadcasting bill and others. Committees have been prevented from meeting because of the extraordinary number of hours the Senate has been sitting because of the performances we have witnessed over the past several weeks.

Since September 25, the Senate has been engaged in consideration of Bill C-62. It could have been any other bill, honourable senators, but it happens to have been Bill C-62. We have spent more than 320 hours on this bill. It is now clear, if there ever was a doubt, that it is the goal of some members of the Senate to use their right to speak on this bill to prevent the Senate from coming to a decision, from coming to the point where the Senate decides—as at the end of the day it must always decide—to reach that point and to move on with its other responsibilities.

A significant backlog of public business awaits consideration by the Senate. Just as senators have a right to speak, they also have a right to decide. Indeed, they have an obligation to decide. For this reason, honourable senators, 53 senators took the unprecedented step of preparing a letter to the Speaker. In the letter the senators indicate that they would like an opportunity for the Senate to decide, if the Senate wishes, to determine the question on Bill C-62 and, if the Senate wishes, that the question be put on or before 5:45 o'clock on Thursday, December 13, 1990. In effect, they are saying that it is time to remove this roadblock and permit the Senate to go ahead with its other responsibilities.

Honourable senators, I have the letter in front of me. I have copies for every senator. The letter has not been delivered to the Speaker yet. It will be delivered to him now. It will be distributed to each senator at the same time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Senator Kelly: I would now like to read the letter into the record. It states:

> Dear Speaker Charbonneau:
> The events of the past two months in the Senate, and the need for the Senate to resolve the question now before it cause us to write in order that you may know our wishes concerning the conduct of matters in the Senate surrounding Bill C-62.
> This bill was introduced in the Senate on April 11, 1990. It was debated for approximately two hours at second reading and the motion was carried on May 3, without a recorded vote, but on division. During the summer, 40 days of committee hearings provided an opportunity for the consideration of possible amendments. Since September 25, 1990, the attention of the Senate has been given almost exclusively to Bill C-62. More than 320 hours have been devoted to the bill in the Senate. We believe that it is now time for the Senate to exercise its right to vote on the question now before it.
> The rights to speak and to delay are not absolute. The right to delay ends where the right to vote begins. The right to dispose of a question in parliament is as essential as the right to speak.
> As Senators we have the right and duty to vote on this matter. The present protracted proceedings prevent us from doing this. We recognize that it is not the Speaker's ultimate responsibility to decide when there has been sufficient debate on the question. The Senate itself must decide this issue. We believe it is your duty to provide the Senate with the opportunity to decide.
> We wish you to know that we would like the Senate to dispose of all questions related to Bill C-62 at 5:45 p.m. on Thursday, December 13, 1990 if they have not been earlier disposed of. This will provide all Senators with sufficient advance notice of the vote and there need be no further deferral of the division.

> The division bells should ring for not more than 30 minutes, at which time the necessary questions should be put to the Senate without further debate or adjournment.
> We believe that this matter requires your urgent attention and that the time has come for the Senate to decide whether or not it wishes to set a date for the final vote on Bill C-62.

Let us get on with the business of the Senate, the business that is piling up. Honourable senators, this is the letter and I would like to ask that it be delivered to the Speaker and that sufficient copies be delivered to the senators in their chairs. Thank you.

I have something further to say on this subject, senators, if you will just bear with me for a moment. Honourable senators, essentially what is being said here is that the time has come for the Senate to decide where it goes from here—and I mean for the Senate to decide, honourable senators. We have seen circumstances here—which I do not criticize—agreements between leaders, agreements, incidentally, that excluded independents, although that was corrected by further agreements, and so on. However, at the end of the day it is the Senate which decides. We believe that the Senate should decide where it wants to go now. The Senate should be given an opportunity to decide whether it has heard enough on Bill C-62, for example, and wishes to clear the way in order to to get ahead on its own responsibilities.

I want to refer at this time to something I have been hugging to my chest for quite some time. It shook me at the time it occurred, but I treasure it quite a bit because it comes from, I think, one of the wisest men in this chamber. It was a statement made on November 13, 1984, by Senator MacEachen when he first entered this chamber. It really is worth listening to. I think we should consider his admonition with respect to what we have to consider in the next day or so. Senator MacEachen said:

> No member of this chamber would suggest that the Senate should usurp the leading role of the House of Commons, or systematically obstruct the will of the majority in the elected body of Parliament.

He said:

> Certainly I do not approach my role as Leader of the Opposition from that vantage point.

Further down he reminded us of something else that I think we need to keep in mind. He said:

> Every legislative assembly in our system operates on the majority principle, and the Senate is no exception. The majority will decide; the majority will prevail.

Really, in the simplest possible terms, that is the system we are part of and that is the way the whole system works and must work.

The filibuster on Bill C-62 has been under way for a considerable length of time. Presentations, including individual speeches lasting as long as 18 hours, have ranged from reading books, sports pages, through political history to serious debate on substantive issues relating to Bill C-62. However, it is clear that the central purpose of this exercise is to delay as long as necessary to axe this tax. The opposition has confirmed this publicly again and again. However, we have gone beyond the things to which I have just referred. We went through petitions, in which I believe Senator Davey discussed the origin of the name "Peterborough". Where did Peterborough come from? How did they arrive at that name?

Hon. Keith Davey: On a point of privilege, that is incorrect, honourable senator.

Senator Kelly: I withdraw the statement.

Senator Davey: Thank you.

Senator Kelly: Someone did. Or perhaps it was Kingston that was mentioned. However, the fact is that, when you get to tactics of that sort, clearly the debate is over. The debate is over and we are at that time-filling stage. I do not argue, honourable senators, that our rules are being flagrantly broken. I do not do that. The filibuster is a time-honoured tradition. The technique of using questions in the form of mini-speeches is an interesting technique which preserves the right of the questioner to speak later in the debate.

Honourable senators, I do not doubt in any way—and I mean this sincerely—the sincerity of those who are participating in the delay. I recognize it and I respect it. We are firmly committed to the view that the obligation of Parliament is to decide, and we support the right of senators to speak, to be heard; but we also believe the rights of those who wish to decide must be taken into account. Since we in this house have no rule to assist in ending debate, we could see no way out of this impasse. Recently, however, Senator Frith, my mentor, introduced a view that served as a useful guide to us—

• (1410)

Senator Frith: Did I start all this?

Senator Kelly: —and hence the letter to the Speaker.

In reviewing the powers of the Speaker of the Senate, Senator Frith said—and this is from memory and subject to correction by Senator Frith, although I remember every word he has said to me, including "sit down"—

Senator Perrault: You are in trouble now!

Senator Kelly: My recollection is that Senator Frith said that the Speaker in this place has no power to act on his own initiative, but that it is the Senate that tells the Speaker what to do.

Senator Frith: Except under the rules.

Senator Kelly: Senator Frith said that the Senate decides.

The letter asks the Speaker to consider certain actions, and clearly the Senate must decide whether or not he should do so. We are simply asking the Speaker to ask the Senate to instruct him to put the question before us now.

Honourable senators, I am deeply conscious of the allegations concerning previous actions of the Chair, the tricks, the breaking of rules, and so forth.

I have reviewed the letter—I signed it as well—and the entire process was put in place in full view of all senators. The letter went to the Speaker at the time it went to all honourable senators. I can find no rule being broken, including reference to the powers of the Speaker, as described by Senator Frith. I believe, however, that the people of Canada are at the point of exasperation and now have every right to expect Parliament to decide and say yes or no to Bill C-62.

Business enterprises, large, medium and small, have the right to know whether this is a go or a no-go and to have this uncertainty and financial chaos brought to an end. Low-income groups who will be entitled under the legislation to receive GST rebates in advance have the right to have their minds set at rest.

Honourable senators, that is the end of my dissertation. I think it is time to get on with the business of the Senate, and I ask the Speaker to so rule.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it is clear that a point of order is raised when there is a breach of order, when an irregularity has occurred to which attention must be drawn and for which a correction or remedy is sought.

We have had Senator Kelly express his frustrations respecting the passage of Bill C-62. He has brought up his frustrations under the guise of a point of order on a matter that is not now before the Senate.

Yesterday we followed the rules and adjourned the debate on Bill C-62. We will dispose with the vote on that today and will then be back on Bill C-62. At that time we will be prepared to deal with what Senator Kelly has proposed.

In the meantime, we would like to read the letter. We would like to examine the letter. We would like to examine its implications, and we would like to make our views known to the Speaker at the appropriate time, and I think the appropriate time is when the bill is again before the Senate.

Senator Simard: You are looking for mercy!

Senator MacEachen: All I want to say is that—well, I will not say anything further, because then I would be entering into the debate, but he has raised some important matters. He has revived in my vivid memory events in the House of Commons, when the Speaker attempted to do something, and did something, which now Senator Kelly is asking our Speaker to do, namely, formulate a motion and put it before the Senate. In so doing, Senator Kelly is asking the Speaker to do something which he has no authority to do and something we would resist totally.

Let us say that we are prepared to examine the letter, examine the implications of it and debate the matter when Bill C-62 is properly before the Senate. I take it for granted that what Senator Kelly has done is to give notice that this matter will be put before us when Bill C-62 is called.

Senator Simard: He is speaking on behalf of senators.

An Hon. Senator: Come on!

Senator Perrault: You can't do it that way!

[Senator Kelly.]

Senator Frith: Are you serious?

Senator MacEachen: Otherwise, it is totally out of context to ask the Speaker to rule on a point of order on a matter that is not before the Senate but relates to a bill that will be brought forward today when the motion is disposed of. So I would hope that we will at least be given a chance to read the letter, to consider it and to prepare our comments before this matter is pursued.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, once again I am in a situation in which I find myself so often in this chamber. Obviously, I did not explain myself well enough. My point of order deals with the ability of this chamber to carry on its business. Bill C-62 is secondary. The central issue with me is that under the present circumstance we cannot carry on our business in a responsible manner. That is my issue and that is my point of order.

Senator Perrault: That is ridiculous!

Senator Kelly: Bill C-62 happens to be the reason why we cannot carry on, but Bill C-62, or whatever, is not the central issue with me. I think that we have to ask ourselves, all of us, not just one side or the other, whether or not we are behaving responsibly. We are not putting ourselves in the position to deal responsibly with our obligations. That is the issue. The way to find ourselves in a position to deal with other business is to consider how to deal with that roadblock.

Senator Thériault: That is crap! Obviously, you have never been in a parliamentary body!

Senator MacEachen: If Senator Kelly's point of order is that we have no way of dealing with other business because of Bill C-62, he is totally wrong. Is he seriously alleging that we are incapable of dealing with other business? Again, he is deeply wrong. Yesterday,under the rules, the debate on Bill C-62 was adjourned and the Senate was free to deal with all other government business.

Senator Cools: All day!

Senator MacEachen: All day and all night. The government has kept us sitting around the clock on Bill C-62. Yesterday Bill C-62 was put off, and what did the government do? It adjourned. It stood every other item of government business. Instead of taking the opportunity to call all the items on the scroll, it stood every one.

Senator Barootes: By mutual agreement!

Senator MacEachen: We did not oppose it. However, if Senator Kelly was eager to do other business, he should have stood up and said, "No—

Senator Perrault: Yes, all 53 senators!

Senator MacEachen: —we want to deal with all of these bills." In fact, the only debate that was initiated was by Senator Frith, who dealt with the Copyright Act. All the other government items were stood by the Deputy Leader of the Government, including the Northwest Territories Bill, a bill to change the Bank Act—did you want to deal with that yesterday? Was that one of your items of public business? Well, your deputy leader stood it yesterday. There are also bills dealing with the Penitentiary Act, the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute, the Criminal Code and aboriginal peoples. All of these bills were before us yesterday. We could have sat and dealt with them, but we were out of here—at what time? And at the request of the government. If that is the point of order, I think it is pretty weak.

In any event, we can deal with these matters today. Let us call these other items today.

An Hon. Senator: Let's do it today!

Senator MacEachen: Do not disguise your real intention. Your real intention is to get a vote illicitly on Bill C-62. If you want such a vote, we will deal with it when Bill C-62 is called. We will debate the issue and confront the Speaker with the issues that are involved.

• (1420)

In the meantime, don't tell us that you are stopped from doing government business. You had a full opportunity yesterday. Why didn't you do it then? Would you explain that?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, first, I do not need to be told what my intentions are. I know what they are.

Senator Perrault: We know what they are, too!

Senator Kelly: In fairness, I should like to remind Senator MacEachen—whom I respect immensely and I shudder at finding myself debating with him—that it may well be that the Senate adjourned last night although it should have worked all night. I would have to agree that that would have been the wiser move. However, it did not do that.

However, even Senator MacEachen cannot argue that we have spent hours and hours reading petitions very slowly, reading names very slowly, speaker after speaker. Take Senator Fairbairn—she will be my heroine forever. She spoke for 18 or 19 hours. She stayed up all the rest of that day. She was up for 35 hours, and was as bright and pretty as she always is. I apologize, senator; that may get me in trouble, but we have had long, long speeches, hours and hours of speeches, very often not on the subject. That was time that could have been used for dealing with the business of the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, in fairness, that is what it was. It was done in the interests, quite legitimately, of delaying the bill. I understand that. However, no one would suggest that Canadians would believe the following argument: because the Senate adjourned last night, it was an indication that the Conservatives have this sneaky plan, that the people who have been delaying have been doing everything properly, and so on and so forth. That is plainly not right and not correct.

I do believe, as I said before, honourable senators, that it is our duty at least to ask the Senate what the Senate wants to do now.

Senator Frith: About what?

Senator Kelly: About getting on with the business of the Senate.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, if Senator Kelly wants to ask the Senate what it wants to do now, then he should at least follow the rules. Rule 44 (1) reads as follows:

> Two days' notice shall be given of any of the following motions:

There is nothing there that senators opposite do not understand, is there? Then:

> (a) to make a new rule or to repeal or amend an existing rule;

Surely that is what Senator Kelly is asking. If that is what he wants. Senator MacEachen, the Leader, asked him if he was giving notice. He said, "No, no, I am not giving notice. I want it right now."

That is the most ridiculous argument I have ever heard. He went on to talk about what Parliament is all about. Parliament is giving the people who are here and in the other place, because we are both Houses of Parliament, the right to speak. Rule 27 states that that is what Parliament is here for. Surely, if there is any respect whatever for Parliament and what it stands for—what its purpose is, why it has evolved the way it has—it is because Parliament is a place where the members therein have the right to speak. I ask senators to look at Rule 27. I shall not quote it, they can look at it themselves. It says that we have the right to speak.

I would hope that Senator Kelly will understand what parliamentary democracy is all about. Its rules are not to be trampled upon. There is a way of doing what he has described he wants to do. That is to follow Rule 44—nothing else.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think it is clear that if there is a point of order—and there very well may be—it is on Bill C-62, which is not before us. That point of order, if it were to come up, would come up on the item that is the foundation of the point of order. I ask that we proceed with the business on the Scroll. Let us have the messages from the House of Commons. That is the first thing. Eventually, we will come to this point of order.

The point of order cannot be anticipated. I cannot stand here and raise a point of order on the Copyright Act, or on something which is further down on the Order Paper. I ask the Speaker to do his job, which is to give us these messages from the House of Commons and deal with the items on the Order Paper as they come up. In due course, today, we will get to the GST, when we can deal with this point of order which is based on the GST. There is nothing before us at this time which is the basis for a point of order.

[Translation]

Hon. Gerald A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I want to speak on this point of order. For days, weeks, months, we have had a debate on a bill. I think everything has been said. Often, the debate continued day and night. To my opinion, with the reading of the petitions, it seems clear that the debate is no more productive. The right of the Senate to dispose of a question is at stake.

[English]

The right to speak and the right to delay legislation are not absolute—

Senator Frith: Order. He is talking about an order that is not before the House.

Senator Beaudoin: I did not interrupt you, Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: It is not now before the House. It is your duty, Mr. Speaker, to call the Orders of the Day. The first is messages from the House of Commons.

Senator Beaudoin: What has happened to my right to speak?

Senator Frith: The senator is attempting to continue the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: I think, honourable senators, there is a—

Senator Frith: I ask you to rule that there is no point of order at the present time.

The Hon. the Speaker: There is a point of order. I think I should listen to the senator's point of view—

Senator Frith: No, you should not, Sir. You listen to senators when the point of order comes. There is no point of order before us. The point of order comes at the time the subject is before us.

Mr. Speaker, are you seriously suggesting that you should listen to debate on a point of order that is declared to be based on an order that comes later in the proceedings? If I raise a point of order now on something that is 10 places down, would you listen to debate on that?

The Hon. the Speaker: The point of order, as far as I have understood, and I have not seen the text, is not necessarily on Bill C-62, but on the general—

Senator Frith: It is precisely on that.

Some Hon. Senators: Read the letter.

The Hon. the Speaker: I have not read it yet.

Senator Frith: The only point of order which could have been raised at this point has to do with your not having said "Amen" at the end of prayers.

Senator Beaudoin: The point of order is on the right of the Senate to vote.

Senator Frith: What is before us at the present time is messages from the House of Commons. You should begin with those messages from the House of Commons.

Senator Beaudoin: Senator Frith, the point of order is on the right of this House, this Senate, to vote. That is what it is.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Beaudoin: You have claimed for days and nights that you have the right to speak. So do I. I have the right to speak.

[Senator Beaudoin.]

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Senator Beaudoin: If you have the right to speak, then I have the right to speak. You have the right to delay; we have the right to vote. There is no right that is absolute. There is such a thing as the abuse of rights in our Canadian systems of law.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Senator Beaudoin: We have reached that stage of abuse of rights. The right to delay does not include the right to paralyze Parliament.

Senator Corbin: You are the abuser.

Senator Beaudoin: Please, Senator Corbin—

Senator Corbin: You are the abuser, you and your dictatorial mentors.

Senator Beaudoin: Please, Senator Corbin, you may listen with advantage. I have the right to speak.

Some Hon. Senators: Not now!

Senator Beaudoin: Nowhere in the written and the unwritten Constitution is there such a right to paralyze this house. The right to speak ends where the right to vote begins. Parliament, too, has rights. The Senate has rights. One of those rights is to vote, to dispose of a question. The right to vote is as basic as the right to speak in our parliamentary system.

Senator Molgat: And your Speaker took the right to vote away from us.

Senator Beaudoin: You should not forget, Senator Molgat, that this house is a legislative body, a house of discussion, a house of exchange of views, but also a house where legislation may be disposed of. Sooner or later, questions have to be put and decided.

If there is nothing explicit in our rules, our bylaws or in the Constitution, then we have to rely on section 1 of the Standing Rules and Orders.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Beaudoin: We have to rely on the implicit or implied power of this house. We have to create precedents, if necessary.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, Oh!

Senator Beaudoin: Lex parliamenti is composed of rules and orders, but it is composed also of precedents. A legislative house may create precedents, in the same manner as courts of England have created common law. This house, in the field of lex parliamenti, is the highest court in the land. Let us do something positive. Let us vote.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Senator Thériault: How much did you pay Jacques Flynn to write that for you?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have heard the arguments on the point of order. I shall delay my reply and study—

Senator Frith: No, you do not.

The Hon. the Speaker: I will read the transcript of the arguments. I have listened to the arguments. I will take the matter under advisement. I will come back later this afternoon. In the meantime, we can proceed with the Orders of the Day.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: No, you do not.

The Hon. the Speaker: If honourable senators do not like what I am doing, then it is up to you to decide. You can say that you do not agree with me. I am here and I am listening. This is the usual procedure when there is a point of order. I have listened to the arguments—

Senator Frith: But you have not heard everything.

Senator Haidasz: Nobody adjourned the debate today. You cannot adjourn a debate.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, my understanding of Senator Kelly's intervention was that he was giving us notice that when we got to Bill C-62, we would have an opportunity to discuss this matter. For that reason, I made some very preliminary remarks since the implications of this proposal are far-reaching.

Your Honour, you have heard hardly anything on this point from this side. I believe that we want to discuss this. I am requesting that we defer this point of order until we come to Bill C-62 in due course, and that we be given an opportunity to make our points. Other than that, I think this matter will create considerable difficulty in the chamber.

I do not think it is unreasonable that we be given the opportunity. I have not had a chance even to read the letter. I have been listening to other people. I think I should have a chance, as my colleagues should, to make our points. Then you can do what you feel you must do, Mr. Speaker. But I think you must hear us and give us a chance to prepare and to read the letter.

The normal time to do this would be when Bill C-62 is called and, honourable senators, if it is possible for 53 senators to address the Speaker and ask him to reach a certain conclusion, perhaps it is also possible for 51 senators on this side to ask that this matter be dealt with when we come to Bill C-62, when we will have an opportunity to make our points. I think that is a reasonable request.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I would just like to take a moment to be sure the record is clear. I know enough about procedure in this chamber to know about notice. I was not giving notice. I was offering a point of order. It was not notice. A point of order was offered today.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, if it was not Senator Kelly's intention to give notice, I am requesting on behalf of my group that this matter be dealt with when we come to Bill C-62. That will come in the normal course of events today.

Senator Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, it appears that there is a difference of opinion with respect to a very preliminary question, and that is whether the point of order submitted by Senator Kelly is specifically a point of order with respect to Bill C-62 and, therefore honourable senators opposite argue that it should be pursued when Bill C-62 is under consideration. The position maintained by Senator Kelly is that the point of order is not specifically with relation to Bill C-62 but that it is about the ability of the Senate to organize its own proceedings, and that obviously is a much more generic question, a much more general question. Obviously, Bill C-62—

Senator Thériault: Have you read the letter?

Senator Ottenheimer: —is an instance—

Senator Thériault: Have you read the letter?

Senator Ottenheimer: I will listen to Senator Thériault's speech after—

Senator Thériault: No, I am asking you a question. Have you read this letter? Have you read the first paragraph and if you have, under what interpretation of that language do you see support for what you are saying?

Senator Ottenheimer: I am referring to my interpretation, senator, to which I have as much right as you have to yours. I do not interfere with you when you express your opinion and I would hope for the same courtesy from you. I do not interfere with you when you express your opinion. You have the perfect right to do it. I have an equal right, not a greater right. At least Senator LeBlanc, when he interferes, does it so calmly that you sometimes have to strain your ears to hear what he has to say. But the honourable senator opposite has a more raucous voice—

Senator Thériault: You do not do it very calmly.

Senator Ottenheimer —and, therefore, it is not as easy to ignore.

Senator Thériault: Well, read the first paragraph.

Senator Ottenheimer: Therefore, having been instructed by the honourable Senator Thériault opposite, I will continue.

There has been an argument that the point of order deals exclusively, essentially, primarily—however one wishes to define it—with Bill C-62. The position put forward by Senator Kelly is that the point of order deals with a more general question and that is the ability or right of the Senate to determine its own business, the order of its business, the timing of its business and the organization of its business.

Senator Frith: One raises that under Prayers.

Senator Ottenheimer: That is, I think, the initial difference of opinion: whether the point of order deals specifically or exclusively with Bill C-62 or whether the point of order deals more generally with another principle, and that is the ability of the Senate to determine its own affairs.

If the point of order deals with the latter more general consideration, then it appears that now or any appropriate time is opportune to debate it.

Senator Kelly, in making his submission, as I recall, quite clearly stated that it was not a point of order exclusively or primarily on Bill C-62. It was not a point of order on Bill C-62, but a point of order dealing with—and these were perhaps not his exact words, but what I understood from them—the right of the Senate to order its own business.

Senator Corbin: It is obvious you cannot read your own letters.

Senator Ottenheimer: Senator Corbin tells me that I cannot read well. I will have to take my chances in trusting my ability to read without being corrected by him.

If the point of order deals with the more general, more universal, and I would suggest more important issue, which is the right of the Senate to determine and to organize its own business, then obviously it is an extremely important point of order. There is obviously a balancing of rights. What Senator Kelly has asked is not for the Speaker to decide on a substantive issue, but to provide an opportunity for the Senate to decide. It is not for the Speaker to decide, but for the Senate to decide with respect to its own organization.

That is what has been submitted to the Speaker. It may well be said, and I think it is true, that this procedure is unprecedented. I think that is probably the case. I doubt if any senator opposite will deny that the whole situation of the Senate during the past approximately two months has been an unprecedented situation—

Senator Frith: Senator Beaudoin tried it.

Senator Ottenheimer: —unprecedented in terms of the organization of business, unprecedented in terms of the way in which business has been conducted. Therefore, if one is in an unprecedented situation, then the solution or resolution itself is going to be unprecedented. It is practically impossible foresee that one would be in an unprecedented situation, and yet have a resolution full of precedents. That almost defies logic.

The Senate is in an unprecedented situation. Indeed the resolution of it, to establish or re-establish, confirm or enunciate, however you put it, the right of the Senate to conduct its own affairs and organize its own business is important. If the situation we are in is unprecedented, it may well be that the manner in which that principal is to be affirmed and made operative, may be unprecedented as well.

There is one other aspect. I think this has been canvassed and there is nothing original about it. Obviously, every parliamentary body has a right to debate, a right to speak. Every parliamentary body, I would suggest, has a right to decide, a right to come to a resolution. Therefore, there are times when these rights have to be balanced. I do not believe, although I do not know, if any honourable senators on the other side would say that the right to speak and debate is absolute, that it can go on and preempt any right to decide. I do not know if there are those who would maintain that. If so, it is obviously incorrect.

The Senate, whatever it is, is one of the Houses of Parliament. It is not a debating society. It is not like the Upper Canada Debating Society where people come to debate, to sharpen their oratorical skills, to learn to speak extemporaneously, even to train their bladder. It is none of those things. The Senate debates, but it must also decide. To argue that it can debate without an opportunity of coming within a reasonable period of time to a decision is, I think, contrary to the nature of a parliamentary institution.

Similarly, to require that a vote be held without a reasonable period of time for debate, is equally unacceptable. There has to be a balancing with respect to both the right to vote and the right to decide. What the Speaker is being asked to do is provide an opportunity for the Senate to decide its procedure in the particular circumstances in which we are, and that may well be unprecedented. However, the situation in which we are is unprecedented, and it is difficult to see that the solution can be anything but.

Before concluding, I should like to quote from the first five or six lines of paragraph 1 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fifth Edition, which state:

> The principles that lie at the basis of English parliamentary law, have always been kept steadily in view by the Canadian Parliament; these are: To protect a minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority; to secure the transaction of public business—

The transaction of public business obviously is related to voting; that is not simply related to debating.

Beauchesne's goes on to state:

> to secure the transaction of public business in an orderly manner; to enable every Member to express his opinions within limits necessary to preserve decorum and prevent an unnecessary waste of time;

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Ottenheimer: Since honourable senators opposite liked that particular passage so much, I will read it again. It states:

> —to enable every Member to express his opinions within limits necessary to preserve decorum and prevent an unnecessary waste of time; to give abundant opportunity for the consideration of every measure, and to prevent any legislative action being taken upon sudden impulse.

Senator Haidasz: I have not been able to speak on third reading yet.

Senator Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, it appears to me that those basic principles are, in the final analysis, the criteria which the Senate will wish to bear in mind.

In summary, the point of order put forward by Senator Kelly does not deal exclusively with Bill C-62. It deals with the general issue of the ability and right of the Senate to organize its own business. Within that context the Senate will need to bear in mind the balancing of rights to speak and to decide. It should use, as criteria in reflecting on that, what Beauchesne's calls the principles of parliamentary law. These principles make up the first paragraph of the Fifth Edition.

Obviously, it is not for me to suggest when that decision should be made. However, I do understand that Senator Kelly's point of order deals with the general principles of the right of the Senate to determine its own business. That does not mean it cannot be interpreted, viewed or seen in another context, a more restrictive one, that of Bill C-62.

As I understand it, the point of order put forward by Senator Kelly is on the general principles of the right of the Senate to organize its own business.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, may I ask the honourable senator a question? I have had a chance to glance at the letter dated December 10, to which reference was made earlier. The first paragraph states:

> The events of the past two months in the Senate, and the need for the Senate to resolve the question now before it cause us to write in order that you may know our wishes concerning the conduct of matters in the Senate surrounding Bill C-62.

The second paragraph recites certain information respecting that bill.

Then on page 2, the following appears:

> The Senate itself must decide this issue. We believe it is your duty to provide the Senate with the opportunity to decide.

The second last paragraph begins with the following:

> We wish you to know that we would like the Senate to dispose of all questions related to Bill C-62 at 5:45 p.m. on Thursday, December 13, 1990 if they have not been earlier disposed of.

Senator Ottenheimer has said that the point of order Senator Kelly sought to raise earlier this afternoon does not deal with Bill C-62, but rather deals with a more general question, the general question of the right of the Senate to decide on all questions put before it.

That leads me to pick up our rule book. I suppose it still has some relevance in this place, although one at times begins to think that it is now an antiquarian document. Rule 44 states:

> 44.(1) Two days' notice shall be given of any of the following motions:
> (a) to make a new rule or to repeal or amend an existing rule;

If in fact what Senator Kelly has said does not deal with Bill C-62, as the letter itself would lead one to believe, then what we have is a proposal to establish a new rule, a new rule dealing with how decisions in general will be made in the Senate. We already have a rule which lays down a rule of law stating how decisions are made by the Senate.

So I put it to Senator Ottenheimer that he is disguising an attempt to impose closure on Bill C-62 under the guise of dealing with a general principle. However, if he is bringing in a new rule incorporating a general principle, to use his words, and that if, indeed, this does deal with the general principles, the correct procedure would be to give notice under Rule 44.

So I ask Senator Ottenheimer, if this does deal with general principles and not with Bill C-62, why is he not following the rules of the Senate and why is he trying to duck the rules of the Senate?

Senator Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, briefly in reply to Senator Stewart—-

An Hon. Senator: Take your time!

Senator Ottenheimer: I intend to.

Senator Stewart first dealt with the question of whether the point of order dealt with Bill C-62, or the more general question, which I call the Senate's right to organize its own affairs. He quoted from the letter signed by a number of senators and which refers to Bill C-62. No one disputes that Bill C-62 is relevant here. However, my submission and that of Senator Kelly's is that the point of order is founded on a larger, more general principle, and that Bill C-62 and the references thereto are instances thereof.

• (1450)

Senator Stewart read paragraphs of the letter that referred to Bill C-62. Allow me to read the third paragraph:

> The rights to speak and to debate are not absolute. The right to debate ends where the right to vote begins. The right to dispose of a question in parliament is as essential as the right to speak.

I think that these are the general issues, and the point of order deals with those issues. Obviously, it has relevance to Bill C-62 as well, but I would maintain that the point of order has a grounding in these general issues.

Senator Stewart then said or asked a question to the effect that we were attempting to bring in a new rule and therefore it should be done in terms of a motion of which notice is given. My reply to that point is that there is no attempt here to bring in a new rule. However, there is an attempt, in a situation that is unprecedented—

Senator Austin: What a smoke screen! You must be embarrassed, Gerry.

Senator Ottenheimer: —to apply the rules and traditions as they presently exist. If the situation is unprecedented, then obviously the resolution or gestation of that situation will be unprecedented as well. It is like someone who has a cow. Perhaps that is not a good example.

An Hon. Senator: What is it?

Senator Ottenheimer: The example I was going to give relates to a cow and a bull. If they are together, the fruit of their union will be either a cow or a bull. The same would be the case if you had an elephant and an "elephantess". However, if you have a cow and an elephant, Lord knows what will develop, but that is not a particularly good simile, so allow me to put it another way. You can see that my knowledge of animal husbandry is quite limited. If we are in an unprecedented situation, then obviously the resolution of that situation will be unprecedented as well.

So in answer to Senator Stewart: No, it is not a new rule that is being sought; it is an application, in unprecedented circumstances, of what has always been recognized as the rule, practice and tradition of the Senate, and that is to organize its own business within the principles of parliamentary law, which are those to which I alluded earlier. That is my reply. It is not a new rule, but the application of existing tradition, rule and practice in unprecedented circumstances.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I put it to the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer that it is closure without a closure rule. Let us be candid.

Senator Austin: Why don't you just use the word "closure"?

Senator Ottenheimer: I certainly would not call it that. I would not say that it is closure without a closure rule. I would say that it is a reaffirmation of the tradition and rule of the Senate to organize its own business.

Senator Olson: That's closure.

Senator Austin: Bring it in under rule 44.

Senator Ottenheimer: If it is necessary that this tradition be recognized in unprecedented circumstances, then so be it, but the tradition and the right of the Senate to organize its own business while respecting the rights of the minority and the majority—

Senator Perrault: It is muzzling!

Senator Austin: The rights of whom?

Senator Ottenheimer: —while respecting the rights of people to speak and while respecting the rights of people to vote as well. It is a balancing of the two rights, the right of people to speak and the right of people to decide. We are in an unprecedented situation. There has to be a balancing of the right to speak and the right to vote. The principle of the Senate deciding its own business is a valid one, and all we are asking is that it be recognized in the present circumstances.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I am in a dilemma. I want to make an intervention on Senator Kelly's point of order but I am persuaded in my own mind, as a result of reading the rules, that if I were to speak or intervene I would be out of order on a point of order that is not properly before us and is therefore out of order.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Senator Kelly, you didn't learn. Why didn't you wait until 8 o'clock? Nothing was going to happen in between.

Senator Lawson: The second part of my concern is that it has been suggested that the Speaker withdraw and consider this matter having heard the debate. If His Honour does withdraw to consider the matter without having heard my intervention—and I am not prepared to make that intervention now because I am satisfied that it would be a violation of the rules and that I would be out of order speaking on a motion that is not properly before us—it is a violation of my rights.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Senator Ottenheimer.]

Senator Lawson: I know the ease with which the chamber has, while talking about preserving the rights of everyone to speak, from time to time overlooked we independents down in this corner. Fortunately, we were able to salvage the situation on the last occasion, but I am worried that you will fall into the trap of cutting us off again. I am not prepared to debate the merit of Senator Kelly's motion until it is properly before us, nor do I want—and I would protest it—His Honour withdrawing and deciding the issue without having heard from us.

Senator Frith: Good for you.

Senator Perrault: Well done.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I want to thank Senator Stewart for repeating portions of the letter that was presented to us by Senator Kelly; in particular, when he referred to the portion of the first paragraph that reads:

> . . . in order that you may know our wishes concerning the conduct of matters in the Senate surrounding Bill C-62.

The operative words are "surrounding the bill" and that is what I want to come to. Senator Frith said a moment or two ago that if at that stage something was to be put before the Senate it would have to have with whether or not the Speaker can say "Amen" when he is repeating prayers. That comment might be apt, but I think there is something beyond it that we must consider, and that is that what made Senator Kelly's comments apt was the very presence here of the senators opposite and the senators on this side. We do represent the business of the Senate—what we are going to say, what we are going to argue and the points that we are going to make. We cannot lose sight of the role of the people in the Senate while we waive the rule book as we have been doing for days on end. We have waived the rule book here and we have waived it outside the chamber when we have stopped to talk to reporters after every meeting of the Senate. Members of the Fourth Estate have waited for us and we have said, "Just watch the rules. I've got a few more tricks up my sleeve. I have something to surprise them with tomorrow. We aren't finished yet." We have heard all these arguments made outside the chamber, arguments that are counterpoints to what we say we are trying to do here inside the chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Austin: Now go through the list of tricks Senator Murray has to shut us off that have ended up as stories in the press.

Senator Simard: You can speak later, senator.

Senator Austin: I am following your precedent.

Senator Simard: You are invited to speak later.

• (1500)

Senator Doyle: You have a louder voice than I have, but I will say this: You want to know what kind of tricks I am talking about. I will tell you. I will tell you about the trick yesterday, when the very business of paying tribute to a deceased colleague was used to deflect this chamber from the purpose before it. I think that's foul.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I would like to know whether Senator Kelly and Senator Ottenheimer can explain to me whether, under the Kelly rule, it is open to me now to raise points of order on the Clerk's Scroll. There are several items here that might be of importance, pressing maters of national importance. I would like to know from Senator Ottenheimer whether, if these are the new rules, I can freely examine the Scroll and to raise certain points of order and have them debated, just as he is asking the Speaker to have his point of order debated.

Let me give you an example, if you would like. There is one item here dealing with the monitoring of the implementation of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. I think that is a pressing and important matter of some public concern, and I think it is important that perhaps a point of order ought to be raised in that connection. I would be prepared to do it and deal with it now, if he would like.

Senator Simard: Chers collègues—

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have asked Senator Ottenheimer to respond as to whether or not, under your rules and procedures, it is appropriate.

Senator Simard: Obviously, Senator Grafstein knows what the answer is going to be. The answer is that this is not the proper time to raise that type of question.

Senator Grafstein: Exactly.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Simard: I don't know of a rule that allows one senator to ask another senator a question for advice, legal advice or what have you. You can ask questions in Question Period. You can ask questions of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. That is tradition and that is fair ball, and I think Senator Grafstein is just stalling for time.

So I am going to go ahead now and make a few comments, as I invite Liberals or Conservatives to do. But certainly I invite Liberal senators to participate in this debate. After all, they want to speak. Senator Olson has argued for the rights of senators to speak. I say not only do they have the right to speak, but they also have the right to be heard. I am glad that the voice heard when Senator Ottenheimer was speaking has now ceased and I can go on uninterrupted. That's fine. That's an improvement.

[Translation]

Senator Frith, Senator MacEachen and some other senators opposite reminded us several times of a rule according to which the Speaker does not have the right to decide on his own initiative about the length of the debates. But that it was to the members of the Senate to express their opinion and ask the Speaker to allow the Senate to proceed. Our ultimate responsibility, I believe, for all of us in this chamber, after debating a question, after speaking about it, as Senator Olson said, our ultimate responsibility is to be able to decide or take a vote. This is what I remember of Senator Kelly's point of order. The objective is to allow this chamber, which has been paralyzed since the 25th of September, to function normally. This is what I remember from Senator Kelly's point of order and from his letter to the Speaker. Indeed, he requests the Speaker to consider if the work could proceed in a normal and regular fashion. To this question I humbly answer, no. The reason is that since September the 25th, this chamber has lived through unusual times. I do not know how many rules have been broken. It is not to me to judge but I know one thing: for all intents and purposes, the committees' activities have been cancelled. It has been impossible for us to take part in a number of committees which normally lead us to recommendations to this House.

[English]

Senator MacEachen said yesterday that the government senators indicated they were not serious about proceeding with the normal business of the house. According to him, that was all he needed to say, that we are not serious about dealing with the orders of business.

Senator MacEachen: I did not say that.

Senator Simard: Since 1984, Senator MacEachen, you have been able to do away with a very good practice, the pre-study of certain legislation, not only of Bill C-62 but of many other bills. You were able to do that, Senator MacEachen, but one thing you haven't been able to do yet, for all practical purposes is paralyze all the work of the other committees with your strategy, your methods, your gimmicks. Senator Buckwold predicted on September 25 that all political gimmicks would be used to stall this legislation and paralyze the work of this house.

So, yes, Senator MacEachen, you were able until September 25 to make sure that no pre-study took place, but you have gone beyond that, sir. So don't blame the government. Don't try to use yesterday's example, the fact that at 4 p.m. this house adjourned to demonstrate that the government is not serious and does not want to proceed, that the only thing on its mind is passing Bill C-62. You were responsible for that, sir, and your arguments won't wash.

Another thing you said, Senator MacEachen, to whoever wanted to hear, whatever media was in front of you asking you questions—as Senator Frith and Senator Buckwold and others have said, that unless government members or the Speaker broke the rules, invented or created new rules, this legislation would not get through.

Well, I respectfully submit that Senator Kelly's point of order, his letter to the Speaker, is not a breach of the rules. Actually, I think it is in the spirit of the rule book. The Speaker has to maintain order and decorum and it is also his responsibility—and this is my main point—to allow members on both sides of the house, collectively, to make decisions. There is no use debating, no use speaking, no use delaying. Senator Olson has told us he wants his rights. He would like everybody to believe that there is an absolute right for senators to speak. Well, I say that the ultimate right, the only right that counts, is that the legislature be allowed to make a decision and bring a matter to its logical end, for or against. That is what I submit.

So, Senator MacEachen, don't go in your usual way, pretending that the government members are breaking the rules here. We are only asking the Speaker to live with the spirit of this rule book tradition. No Canadian will believe you Liberal senators if you try again to suggest that somehow, because of Senator Kelly's point of order, rules have been broken in the Senate of Canada. It won,t wash with Canadians. So this is why we are addressing this point of order.

Senator Haidasz, who I hope will participate in this debate, was seeking mercy a few minutes ago when Senator Ottenheimer was speaking. He in fact complained that he had not had time to speak on third reading. Yet, he is one who participated in the filibuster on this bill during the last three months. Thus my hope that he will speak to Bill C-62 before December 13.

As I understand Senator Kelly's letter, it asks the Speaker to rule that a vote be taken on December 13, two days hence. Surely senators opposite can arrange their business in a way which will allow them time to speak. The provisional rules have been in place for at least the last month. That should have allowed senators opposite time to participate in the debate. Yet, they chose to entertain us with stories about Premier Vander Zalm's cousin's dog. They have read books to us. Senator Davey told us about the World Hockey League. Another senator talked about the eloquence of Winston Churchill, while yet another read the book Too Funny to be President. Another senator read to us about the evolution of the Dominion of Canada—

Senator Barootes: Or told sexist jokes.

Senator Simard: Yes, while another told us about life in the time of Confederation. I am sure my other colleagues, regardless of their vacation plans—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Simard: —would willingly give them up or rearrange them if senators opposite would tell the world when they are read to vote, if it is not on December 13.

Senator Perrault: Vacation plans.

Senator Simard: I would be quite willing to postpone my vacation plans and stay here until December 31.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Simard: But what would that do for the families who are waiting for their cheques? What will that do for businesses such as Sears or the company from which I read the letter two weeks ago, a car dealership in the Maritimes? What will this do for the 120 people who work at this car dealer's business and for the company's inventories? What will it do for their plans to get organized for the implementation of the GST on January 1? And there are hundreds of thousands of other businesses in Canada waiting to know whether the GST is a "go" or a "no go".

[Senator Simard.]

I thus challenge you, Senator MacEachen, and I am asking if you will change your mind about using all the political tricks in your book and tell this house, today, that you will participate in this debate in a positive way and indicate to the Speaker, who will consider it, as the Speaker is a fair-minded person—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Simard: I know he is. If your partisanship would not blind you, you would also know that.

Maybe that could be the extent of your participation in this debate, Senator MacEachen, and if, for some reason, a great many senators having not participated in the debate on third reading and wanting to, then perhaps you could tell the house that a week from now, or a week from next Thursday, on December 20, that, yes, you will agree to take a vote on December 20. Will you do that? Will you undertake on behalf of your party that at 5.45 p.m. on December 20 we will take the vote? I am prepared to wait. Canadians will put up with you for another week. But at least they will know that on December 20—

Senator MacEachen: I thought you said December 28.

Senator Simard: Do you want to do it on December 28? We are waiting for your offer, as I am sure the Speaker is. I am sure Canadians are waiting to get an answer from you. I am sure they are waiting for an indication that you want to be reasonable.

Some Hon. Senators: The 28th?

Senator Simard: You can decide. Why not make it the 25th? If you are going to make life miserable for all Canadians, go ahead. Our duty is to be here and to make sure that the wishes of Canadians, through their members in the House of Commons, are met.

Senator Frith: Ten per cent of the vote in North York.

Senator Simard: Senator MacEachen, you say that you want to wait until 8 p.m. I don't know what is magical about 8 p.m. or 6 p.m. You want to wait until you feel that you are authorized to speak, or that it is in better order to speak then because we will be back on Bill C-62 under these provisional rules. Why keep Canadians waiting? Why not participate in this debate now? You don't have to agree that, technically, it is a point of order or not, as Senator Frith is so proud of doing in dishing out his great knowledge on procedure. With some reservations, speak to this point of order and please undertake on behalf of your caucus that on December 20, or December 28, a vote will be taken. We are responsible. We can be here on December 20.

Before closing, colleagues, I ask Mr. Speaker to rule—unless you get a date other than December 13, that is, unless you get a firm and public commitment from Senator MacEachen and on behalf of his party—to rule today and according to the request made by Senator Kelly on behalf of some 53 senators of this house, a vote will be taken on December 13.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, Senator Lawson has put the case very clearly in saying that this point of order is fraudulent, and it is. We attempted to overcome that by suggesting we are prepared to deal with it in its proper place when we come to Bill C-62. That has been ignored. If that is to be the prevailing view, then I think I will take the only recourse open to me at this point and move the adjournment of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Senator MacEachen, seconded by Senator Frith, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Murray: For one thing, honourable senators, we have already a house order to the effect that there will be a vote on Senator Gigantès' motion to adjourn the debate.

Senator MacEachen: At the next sitting.

Senator Murray: No, no, at 5:45 p.m. today.

Senator Simard: That is this sitting now.

Senator Murray: At 5:45 p.m.

Senator Simard: This sitting here.

Senator Murray: This vote has been set for 5:45 today so I suggest to honourable senators that a motion to adjourn the Senate now is out of order.

Senator Frith: It is never out of order.

Senator Doody: It cannot be received.

Senator Murray: Senator Doody has the appropriate citation here and can read it into the record, but we have set a vote for 5:45 tonight—

Senator Frith: No, we did not.

Senator Murray: We cannot adjourn the Senate now.

Senator MacEachen: Question.

Senator Doody: No, excuse me, senators, the adjournment that was taken yesterday started, in effect, a new sitting day today. At 2 o'clock we started at the top of the order paper again and this is a new sitting day. We are in the process of dealing with the business of today. Senator Kelly's point of order has been put on the floor and it is in the process of being discussed. Later on today at 5:45, according to the provisional rules, which were accepted by all members of this honourable chamber, we will have the vote. After that time, obviously, we have to proceed with the day's proceedings.

Senator MacEachen: Question.

Senator Frith: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we have a vote at 5:45 that has to be held.

Senator Frith: Not today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Oh, yes, today. That was an order of the Senate yesterday.

Senator Frith: No, it says until the next sitting. Read the rules, which might be a new experience for a lot of people.

Senator Barootes: That same day, which is today.

Senator Frith: For one thing, we did not get to another sitting because we did not call anything. For another thing, the 5:45 vote is called at the next sitting at which 5:45 arrives.

Senator Simard: This is silly.

Senator Doody: You can see the calendar has changed. We adjourned on the 29th of November. We are sitting today on the 11th of December. It is a new sitting day.

Senator Frith: Of course it is. Of course it is. Mr. Speaker, you might have to follow the rules this time. It's tough.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we cannot supersede the order of the house on the vote at 5:45 today.

Senator Frith: Is that your ruling?

The Hon. the Speaker: You can overrule me, but that is the way I see it.

Senator Frith: That is your ruling? Your ruling, Mr. Speaker, is that the motion for adjournment is out of order; is that correct?

Senator Barootes: It is not receivable.

Senator Frith: Is that correct?

The Hon. the Speaker: It is not receivable because we have an order to vote at 5:45.

Senator Frith: It is out of order?

The Hon. the Speaker: Therefore, it is out of order.

Senator Barootes: It is not receivable.

Senator Frith: It is the same story. All right, we will appeal it.

The Hon. the Speaker: All those in favour of my ruling?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

(And two honourable senators having risen).

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, pursuant to the provisional rules, this is an appeal, and it has been put, and the vote is put over for 12 hours.

Senator Murray: To twenty to four in the morning.

Senator Frith: So it will be at 3:40 in the morning we will have the vote.

Senator Doody: I wish to call to the house's attention that we have a vote here at 5:45 this afternoon.

Senator Frith: That is the whole point. You made that bed, now you have to lie in it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senators, the sitting is suspended until 5:45 this afternoon.

The sitting was suspended.

ABSTENTIONS

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

Nil

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion negatived.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I ask for leave to ignore the clock to discuss something that Senator Doody and I have discussed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, according to the rules, I must call the Orders of the Day.

Senator Frith: Your Honour, according to Rule P-3(a), that is quite right.

Honourable senators, as things stand at the moment, the next event before us is a vote at 3.40 tomorrow morning. I do not want to disappoint any nighthawks, but that vote is now completely academic. It will not make any difference to anyone who wins or loses the vote because the decision was made that it was not receivable as a result of the necessity to hold the vote we just held. Therefore, the vote scheduled for tomorrow morning is dépassé, and for that reason Senator Doody and I recommend, with leave, that the motion for that vote tomorrow morning be withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker: It being 6 o'clock, I suspend the sitting until 8 p.m.

The sitting was suspended.

At 8 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

THE SENATE

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think I was on my feet when the sitting was suspended.

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

Senator Frith: I have spoken to Senator Doody and I told him that we wish to take advantage of Rule P-1(a), our one per week, tonight. Therefore, it being after 5:45 o'clock on a Tuesday, within the terms of Rule P-1(a), I move that the Senate do now adjourn. The result of that, as you know, is that, without a ruling or anything else, the sitting is automatically suspended, not adjourned, forthwith until 2 o'clock the following day, and that would be our invoking of the P Rule for the week, in any event.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, as the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, that provisional rule is there. It offers the opportunity for any honourable senator to move the adjournment once a week. Senator Frith and his colleagues are invoking their right to do so.

Senator Frith: What about the "forthwith"?

Senator Murray: "Forthwith", as he says, and "notwithstanding". Let me therefore simply express my astonishment that this should be the case, having sat here this afternoon listening to a number of honourable senators opposite, and in particular the Leader of the Opposition, tell us why they wanted, and intended, to deal with Senator Kelly's point of order as soon as Bill C-62 was called and we were back on Orders of the Day.

Senator Frith: And that will happen tomorrow at 2 o'clock.

Senator Murray: The point of order is still before the house.

Senator Frith: We do not accept that.

Senator Cools: It never got before the house.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it seems to me that they cannot be very anxious to express their views on this important matter. However, that will give the Speaker the opportunity to study the transcripts of what was said during the day.

Senator Frith: I cannot resist mentioning that the wording of Rule P-1(a) was agreed upon and settled amongst us, and I am now going to have to look a second time at the meaning of the word "forthwith" when I agree to that word with Senator Murray. However, it is an automatic adjournment.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, what we are doing is out of order, but presumably we are doing it by consent, namely speaking when the rule says "forthwith", but having seen the breach occur twice, may I make it a third time? It is simply to say that it is my intention at 2 o'clock tomorrow to address the matters that have been raised by Senator Kelly—fundamental matters, I may add.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is suspended until tomorrow at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

[Editor's Note: For continuation of proceedings see Issue No. 116B.]

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 11, 1990

[Editor's Note: Continuation of proceedings from Issue No. 116A.]

The sitting of the Senate was resumed at 2 p.m., Wednesday, December 12, 1990, the Speaker in the Chair.

The Hon. the Speaker: The sitting is resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

MOTION TO ADJOURN WITHDRAWN

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I think it is appropriate for me to withdraw the P-1 motion, your honour.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator MacEachen?

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: I did not hear what Senator Frith said.

Senator Frith: I just withdrew the P-1 motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: I recognize Senator MacEachen.

RULE 26—MOTION TO HEAR SENATOR WATERS—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Under Rule 26 I move that Senator Waters be now heard.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The page should take your motion, if you have it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has Senator Lawson a seconder?

Hon. H. A. Olson: I will second the motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Under Rule 26, Senator Lawson has the right to move his motion because Senator MacEachen had not yet started to speak. Therefore, it is moved by Senator Lawson, seconded by Senator Olson, that pursuant to Rule 26, Senator Waters now be heard.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Lawson: Honourable senators—

Senator Forrestall: That is a setup.

Senator Kenny: What is a setup?

Senator Forrestall: That is a setup, and you know it.

Senator Kenny: Who is saying that?

Senator Forrestall: I said it.

Senator Lawson: If you will be quiet for a moment, I would like to indicate my position on this. We have gone over these various debates over the last number of weeks, number of months, and on a number of occasions the Independents lost the opportunity to speak in this chamber because we extended the simple courtesy when the agreement was made between the two parties, that the Liberals would have eight amendments and so on, but in the process nobody bothered to give any recognition to the rights of Independents to speak in this chamber. I felt that to avoid that happening again on a very critical question that is raised by Senator Kelly, which could, if approved, result in the termination of the debate, that the Independents would not have any rights—you heard from a number of Liberals on the other side—the Independents would have no right whatsoever to speak on third reading and we would again be stripped of our right of legal participation in this chamber. If we cannot accommodate that by speaking last, I propose this motion to ensure that at least one of the Independents will speak first.

An Hon. Senator: I have no problem.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, certainly the circumstances for the application of Rule 26 are before us. The last occasion on which the problem of Rule 26 arose—which rule reads:

> When two or more senators rise to speak, the Speaker shall call upon the senator who in the Speaker's opinion first rose; but a motion may be made that any senator who has risen "be now heard"—

And that has happened with the motion of Senator Lawson.

There was some dispute on the orderliness of this motion when it was last made.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Because there was a motion made.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will recall that it was said by the Speaker at that time that he refused on that occasion to put the motion, which he has not done this time. In his defence, although it is not a brief that I particularly want to take, when I discussed it with him one of the things that he relied on was a provision in Beauchesne's. I made a note and as I recall it, it was at Page 99. I remember on that occasion, that Senator Murray was proposing a motion, which we argued, and which Hansard or the Senate Debates showed had not actually been put before Orders of the Day were called. In any event, the Speaker recognized Senator Murray, although Senator Waters was not only on his feet, but had given notice in advance that he wished to speak.

The Speaker first took the position that he could not do that because there was a motion before the Senate. There was some dispute as to whether there was, in fact, a motion before the Senate. Even assuming that there was a motion before the Senate, there is almost always some question before the Senate, and it is always in those circumstances that Rule 26 applies. Why? Well, because if there is a matter before the Senate, a question or a motion, then, of course, under Rule 27 any senator is entitled to speak to it.

Whoever made the rules took the trouble to anticipate that a situation could arise in which many senators, or at least more than one senator, might want to exercise his or her right under Rule 27 to speak to a motion. At that stage, the first phase of solving the problem of more than one senator wishing to speak lies with the Speaker. The rulemakers said:

> When two or more senators rise to speak, the Speaker shall call upon the senator who in the Speaker's opinion first rose;

It seems to me that the question of whether there is a motion before the Senate or not is not determinative of whether Rule 26 applies, because it only applies when there is a motion before the Senate and when more than one senator wants to speak to it.

Incidentally, the facts are all within the rules up to now, with the Speaker recognizing Senator MacEachen at the time that Senator Waters was on his feet, and Senator Lawson has made the appropriate motion under Rule 26.

Just to refer to that last occasion, and to be sure that the Speaker realizes or feels that this is an appropriate application of Rule 26, at that time he said to me on a couple of occasions, "Yes, but Beauchesne's says—". Now, we argue that there is no need to refer to Beauchesne's because the provisions of Rule 26 are so clear. He says, "Beauchesne's says—". Let us pass for the moment that Beauchesne is not applicable; even if it were, it indicates—and he cited citation 302, Paragraph (2), page 99:

> (2) A motion that a Member "be now heard" must be moved before the Member recognized has begun speaking.

Of course, in this case and in the previous case, the Speaker wanted to apply that rule to the circumstances that existed between Senator Waters and Senator Murray. The Speaker wanted to apply the rule on that occasion because neither Senator MacEachen nor Senator Waters had said anything, and he had recognized Senator MacEachen, which gave rise to the motion by Senator Olson. Honourable senators, I can find no objection to the regularity of Senator Lawson's motion. It seems that all the circumstances, even including the rather remote provision of Beauchesne's at page 99, are fully satisfied. I guess that is why the Speaker did put the motion in this case.

So leaving aside the question of regularity, which seems to be clearly established, the question we now have to assess is where we stand as far as order is concerned. I am not quite clear what Senator Kelly had proposed but I will try to find some word to describe it. Let us say it was an idea.

Senator Olson: Not a very good one but it was an idea.

Senator Frith: Let us see how far we can take it from there. I think we can assume that everybody on the other side who supports the government thought it was a good idea and we thought it was a bad idea. We heard the word "ruling". A ruling is made on a—

An Hon. Senator: Point of order.

Senator Frith: Yes, exactly, it could be on a point of order. That is right.

Senator Barootes: Are you just treading water or have you something to say?

Senator Frith: No, no, no.

Senator Simard: Let us hear the question.

Senator Frith: Let us hear the man. I did not hear you. I am sorry, did you ask a question? I did not hear your question, Senator Barootes.

Senator Barootes: I made the remark that I did not know whether you were just treading water or intending to say something.

Senator Frith: That, of course, will be a matter of opinion and the only way to find out is to keep listening.

Some Hon. Senators: Quiet, quiet, quiet.

Senator Frith: So all we have then is the idea, a point of order raised immediately after prayers, before the doors were opened and before there was a Debates reporter seated. That is when the point of order was raised. What was the point of order? It could not be that the doors had not been opened quickly enough. We have to look at the state of proceedings at the time. What I am trying to do now is to find out when we determine who will be heard when the Senate makes that decision under Rule 26. What exactly is it that they are going to be heard on? So far, it is an idea presented as a point of order somewhere shortly after somebody said amen, or may not have said amen, at the end of prayers, before the doors were opened, before the Speaker had said, "let the doors be opened" and before there was anybody in the house to take notes of the proceedings. Honourable senators, it is a long, hard job to research and find precedents for that sort of point of order.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: I certainly have not been able to find any case in which a point of order was raised after prayers, before the Speaker had said, "let the doors be opened" and once the doors having been opened, that someone was here to take the notes of our proceedings and provide a record.

There was nothing said that indicated there had been a breach of order at that point in the day's proceedings. I think at some point it was described as a general question of the Senate doing its business. That point was raised when objection was taken to the fact that the point of order was being raised on C-62, the GST. The reason that was raised was to say that it must be out of time. Senator Kelly, if your point of order is that you say there has been a breach of order at that point in the proceedings, namely right after prayers but before the doors are open, and before there is a reporter taking notes, could it have been that the doors were not open fast enough or that the reporter did not begin taking notes quickly enough? It could not be because that all happened after the point of order was raised.

Senator Kelly did me the dubious honour—and I will explain that adjective in a moment—of saying I was his mentor. I say "dubious" because, liking Senator Kelly as I do, I hesitate to say anything negative. Obviously I find his mentor did not teach him very well about points of order. If I am still his mentor, his timing on his point of order would get an X.

Senator Simard: Do not let that go to your head.

Senator Frith: It is hard, Senator Simard. I know that you are a man of such strong moral fibre and stiff mental discipline.

An Hon. Senator: Absolutely.

Senator Frith: You are of such celebrated humility that if a man of Senator Kelly's qualities called you his mentor, you would not let it go to your head. Someone with the kind of easily encouraged—

Senator Simard: You are very modest, yourself.

Senator Frith: —ego like mine, I found it did go to my head a little bit. I thank you for the caution.

Senator Simard: I made my point.

Senator Frith: I will try to emulate what you would do in similar circumstances and not let this go to my head.

Senator Barootes: Have you forgotten your point?

Senator Frith: When the question was raised as to—pardon? I did not hear you?

Senator Cools: It was Senator Foghorn who was saying something.

Senator Frith: I am sorry, I did not hear it.

• (1420)

Then the question was raised, "Senator Kelly, why are you bringing up a point of order on the GST at this stage?" He said, "I'm not bringing it up on the GST. I am just bringing it up on the general need of the Senate to get on with its business." That is what I understood.

Senator Olson: That is what he said.

Senator Frith: It is not really about the GST or Bill C-62; it is about getting on with business.

I am sure everyone remembers that he said, "I have here a letter." The signature sheet was separate from the letter. It is similar to a petition, and I suppose I could read all the names. The signatures are in alphabetical order. The list begins with the names of Senator Atkins, Senator Balfour, Senator Barootes, and Senator Beaudoin, going from left to right.

[Senator Frith.]

We were told that this point of order was not raised on the GST and Bill C-62, but was regarding the general orderliness of the Senate getting on with its business. I take it that the general ability of the Senate to get on with its business was blocked at the moment prayers were completed, because that is when the point of order was raised.

A point of order is raised at the time there has been a breach of order. You cannot anticipate a breach of order and you cannot raise a point of order after the breach of order has gone by and there has been an intermediate proceeding. Senator Kelly must have thought that the general ability of the Senate to do its work was breached yesterday before the doors were opened and before anyone came in. Perhaps the objection was that we had prayers before we got to the GST, because that was the only breach of order that could have happened. The only event that took place up to the time that the point of order was raised was prayers. In accordance with the understanding that everyone has as to when a point of order should be raised, it must be that the saying of prayers in some way breached the powers and duty of the Senate to do its business.

Was this letter, which was to explain the point of order, referring to the general powers of the Senate? Was it not related to Bill C-62? If it related to Bill C-62, it should have been raised when we got to Bill C-62. The first paragraph of the letter states:

> The events of the past two months in the Senate, and the need for the Senate to resolve the question now before it cause us to write in order that you may know our wishes concerning the conduct of matters in the Senate surrounding Bill C-62.

The first paragraph mentions Bill C-62.

The second paragraph starts with the words "This bill." It is not talking about the general situation in the Senate or the general duties of the Senate, but it says, "This bill." The second paragraph deals with everything that was done in the Senate with regard to Bill C-62. Then it says that it is now time for the Senate to exercise its right to vote on the question. It does not say its right to vote on other questions, but the question now before it.

The next paragraph states:

> The rights to speak and to delay are not absolute. The right to delay ends where the right to vote begins. The right to dispose of a question in parliament is as essential as the right to speak.

I assume it is still talking about Bill C-62, but we will get to these general things in due course.

On the top of page 2, the next paragraph says:

> As Senators we have the right and duty to vote on this matter.

The antecedent of "this matter" can only be Bill C-62. It goes on to say:

> The present protracted proceedings prevent us from doing this. We recognize that it is not the Speaker's ultimate responsibility to decide . . . The Senate itself must decide > this issue. We believe it is your duty to provide the Senate with the opportunity to decide.

It is still talking about Bill C-62.

This is not a motion, but is still only an idea. When the Senate decides whether Senator Waters or Senator MacEachen will speak to this idea, some senators—and I hope to be one of them—will address the basis on which it could possibly be said that it is the duty of the Speaker of the Senate to decide when a vote is to take place. The words "opportunity to decide" can only mean that. When the pipeline debate was taking place, one might have argued that Speaker Beaudoin, as Speaker of the House of Commons, had such a duty. However, not many did argue that he had such a duty. Of course, the fact is that he tried to do something just like that. He decided himself when he was going to put something to the House—not a motion—but he was going to present something to the House for decision. That ruined his career and life because it was such an outrageous thing to do. The suggestion here is even more outrageous than it was then.

The next paragraph states:

> We wish you to know that we would like the Senate to dispose of all questions related to Bill C-62 . . .

This letter is the basis for someone saying, "I'm not talking about Bill C-62. I'm talking about the whole business of the Senate," and how that order was breached yesterday at the end of prayers. The letter goes on to say:

> This will provide all Senators with sufficient advance notice of the vote and there need be no further deferral of the division.

Then it describes how the division bells should ring. Everything is written out for the Speaker in order for him to do something that he has no authority whatever to do. When someone speaks to this motion, I am sure they will point out that the second paragraph on page 2 is clearly against the provisions of rule P-3(a). That rule was unanimously adopted after consideration and agreement by representatives of the leadership on both sides. That decision was made by the Senate.

Senator Murray: Are you trying to anticipate Senator MacEachen's speech? That is almost lèse-majesté.

Senator Frith: Really?

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Frith: What does that mean? Does that mean treason? I hope I get the benefit of parliamentary immunity.

Someone will, no doubt, speak to that aspect of the matter. This letter is signed by approximately half of the senators, all government supporters. They are saying, "We want the Senate to decide." Nobody is being kidded that what it should be is "for Senate" and then put an asterisk so it would read "Senate", and down at the bottom put "read the Tory caucus." Honourable senators, this is the Senate of Canada, it is not a meeting of the Conservative caucus.

Senator Doyle: It is not a meeting of the Liberal caucus either.

Senator Frith: Exactly, it is not a meeting of the Liberal caucus either. You are quite right, Senator Doyle, and well said, sir. It is not a meeting of either caucus. That is a very good point. I see Senator Doyle is paying attention. I guess Senator Barootes has left in a huff, whatever a "huff" is.

Senator MacEachen: A huff and a puff.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have difficulty in finding anything irregular about Senator Lawson's motion but I think we are faced with the question of who should be heard on that motion. When the Senate, under the rules, makes its decision as to whom should be heard, Senator Waters or Senator MacEachen, it will be elucidating and edifying to find out exactly what Senator Kelly's motion is and to hear about the various ways in which I would like to dignify it by saying that it is out of order or irregular. In fact, I think the better word to describe it is "outrageous" because, as something framed or something one can put into the context of the rules, I think it simply does not exist.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, as seconder of the motion that Senator Waters be now heard, I should give the chamber an explanation as to why I seconded that motion. I am sure a number of you noticed I was a little surprised that I did that. It was because another seconder did not seem to be coming forward.

Senator Doody: Senator Waters wants to speak.

Senator Olson: As I understand it, we have a motion before the Senate. Are we to have no respect for anything in the rule book? I happen to have some respect for Rule 29, Rule 26 and all of the other rules.

I do not want to get sidetracked because what I started out to say apparently needs to be said to this group of 53 senators who signed this letter saying that they are now going to change the rules. They are saying, "We are not going to follow the traditional pattern that has been developed over centuries, if you go back to the Mother of Parliaments." They are saying, "We are now going to write the Speaker a letter and tell the Speaker that we have had enough. All of those on the other side have not spoken but we have had enough . . ."

Senator Simard: That is right.

Senator Olson: ". . . so at 5:45 p.m. tomorrow we want to move."

Senator Barootes: Six hours each, is that not enough?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is a right way to do things.

An Hon. Senator: Your way.

Senator Olson: No, not my way, but by the rules. If you do not like the rules there is a way to change them. That is not something new. Surely I need not again quote Rule 44 of the rule book which tells you exactly how to change a rule if there is a need for a rule to be changed. However, just in case some of you were not here yesterday when it was quoted to you once, twice or, I think, three times, it says:

> Two days' notice shall be given of any of the following motions:
> (a) to make a new rule or to repeal or amend an existing rule;

If you want to create a new rule—a rule which does not now exist in our book of rules—that is how you do it: You wait until the Speaker calls "Notices of Motions," and if you had done that on Monday, December 10, we would have reached that motion today. But you did not do that. Maybe it is not kind to say so, but you have tried every other way, so why don't you try to do it the right way once?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: You have tried everything else in the book to frustrate the right of senators and the right of Canadians to expect their senators to say what is on their minds in this chamber.

Senator Simard: You have had three months to do that.

Senator Barootes: Six hours each.

Senator Olson: That is what Canadians want us to do.

I remember the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker who could rise to situations like this. He used to say, about some of my colleagues, that if they went across a pasture where there were ten cow pies they would step in every one. That is exactly what is happening here. Every time you move you do the wrong thing because you think you can outsmart everybody.

Senator Barootes: And you do not have the humour of Diefenbaker, so forget it.

Senator Olson: I had lots of fun with whom you called "Old John". I did not agree with the politics of John Diefenbaker but he was a good friend of mine. I used to see him on the opposition side week after week.

I would point something out to Senator Simard in case he did not notice. When I was speaking in the House of Commons, John Diefenbaker stayed there the whole time because he had some respect for what I had to say about western Canada. At that time the Liberals did not have many members from western Canada and he was glad that someone who knew something about what was going on out there would get up and represent the region. Not very many of you are respecting the rights of senators from various regions to get up and say what their people are telling them to say.

I suppose honourable senators opposite have noticed that we have read a few petitions but I have hundreds of letters in my office too and perhaps I should read a few of them to you some time before this debate is over, because whatever links you might have had to western Canada you have lost them, because no one on the opposite side is defending the rights and views of people living in western Canada.

Honourable senators, let us get back to the debate before us today. I seconded this motion because I think that all members on both sides of this house have a right to speak. When someone tries to circumvent all the rules or write new rules without bothering to go by traditional practices, it is too bad. I know Senator Kelly rather well and I respect him. He is a nice man, but he had better learn—and the sooner the better—that in this place we expect you to go by the rules as long as they are there. He read a section out of Beauchesne's the other day when he proposed changing the rules, and, I am sorry I have to say this, it was the most ridiculous argument I have ever heard. It was absolutely contrary to the argument he was trying to make. In this letter he says that he wants us to know that you are going to force, without a motion and without a notice of motion, the Senate to do this. He is saying, "We want the Speaker to decide tomorrow afternoon that that's it. It's over. We have heard enough. It's stupid. It's over." He then says that he did not even want to put forward a motion. The Leader of the Opposition then got up and asked him if he wanted to do it right. He even went further than that. He said, "I take it you are giving notice of a motion to change some of the rules." Senator Kelly says, "No, I'm not. I want it right now. No waiting. We want the Speaker to accept this letter and do it. No motion, no debate, no nothing." From now on there is going to be a regime here where a letter is written to the Speaker and no notices of motion or debate are needed to change the rules. Honourable senators, can you think of anything more disgraceful than that?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Olson: I can't. That is the most utterly disgraceful disregard for the rules that I have ever heard. Senator Kelly did it nicely. I am not complaining about that. His voice was soft and appealing and he smiled. However, do honourable senators realize how serious this is. Effectively, this is a coup d'état, a take-over of the running of the government and the Parliament of this country without even a debate. What is Parliament here for? It is for debate. Senator Kelly could at least have done us the courtesy of reading the rest of what was in Beauchesne's.

As far as Rule 44 is concerned, we do not need to refer to the authorities; it is not complicated. The language is completely clear in those two and a half lines which state:

> (1) Two days' notice shall be given of any of the following motions:
> (a) to make a new rule . . .

Senators opposite wanted a new rule, a way of intercepting the debate when someone wants it, Senator Charbonneau in this case, but Senator Kelly wants it applied to Senate rules forever.

Senator Barootes: How much notice for a point of order? None.

Senator Olson: Not only does he want it applied to Bill C-62, but he wants it applied to everything. As soon as he has had enough, he goes around to a few of his colleagues, has them sign a little letter, and that is the end of debate. That is a great way to run Parliament. That is what he said, because I asked him and Senator MacEachen asked him if he was giving notice that he would like to make a rule change. He said, "No, I am not giving notice. I have heard enough already and it's over on Thursday afternoon at 5:45, and you just tell the rest of the senators."

I have not had a chance to speak on Bill C-62. Senator Kelly does not want to hear from me. I am the representative of southern Alberta, from where I have received hundreds of letters and thousands of names on petitions, and I have not said a word yet, but Senator Kelly has decided he has heard enough and does not need to hear from the people of southern Alberta. That is what he said. Is that what you believe, too, Senator David?

Senator David: I do.

Senator Olson: That is how much respect you have for democracy and the right of Parliament to speak. I suggest you read the introduction to Beauchesne's, Fifth Edition, which states:

PRINCIPLES OF PARLIAMENTARY LAW

. . . To protect a minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority . . .

I think Senator Waters has the right to make a little speech on that.

Senator Barootes: Sit down and let him make it. He cannot speak because some of your people want to speak for 18 hours and that precludes everybody else.

Senator Molson: It just happens that we have a motion that Senator Waters shall be heard.

Senator Barootes: Let him speak.

Senator Olson: I am going to be in trouble with my own caucus. The Speaker recognized my leader and I seconded a motion that Senator Waters be heard.

Senator Austin: And he was elected.

Senator Olson: My friend, Senator Austin, reminds me why I was strongly motivated: Senator Waters was elected. Senators opposite claim they are in favour of an elected Senate. Sometimes senators on this side do. Not all of us all of the time, but some of us do some of the time. There were 264,000 Albertans who voted for Senator Waters.

Senator Barootes: How many voted for you to be in the Senate?

Senator Olson: Lots. Senator Barootes, I was elected five times.

Senator Barootes: As a senator?

Senator Olson: No, but by the people I represent now. They still write to me and say, "Senator Olson, I am so glad you are still there. When we write to all our Conservative members in the other house we do not even get a reply, but you stand up for us." I write back and say, "I will continue to do that." That is why I am so disturbed about Senator Kelly's notion. I know he is ashamed of himself now, but he should have thought about that on Monday.

Senator Molgat: He's not a bad fellow.

Senator Olson: No, he is a good fellow. I like him. I like drinking coffee with him and all kinds of things, there is no problem there. He is only a little misguided by someone a little west of where we are, who keeps sending orders over here, "Get that bill passed. Never mind parliamentary procedure, democracy, all the traditions of the minority's right to be heard, just set all that aside." Senator Kelly, did not even bother giving us notice that he was going to move it. We ask if we should take it as notice now, and the answer is that he cannot wait for that, he wants it right now.

I see many senators present who have not yet spoken. Only 11 of us have spoken, yet we have 51 all together on this side. Senators opposite should get the message that the people in this country do not like Bill C-62. Have you not yet got that message? You are going to bulldoze it through anyway and now you are not even going to listen to the people who are here for a parliamentary purpose in a parliamentary democracy to give their views.

I do not particularly care what you want to do, Senator David. If you have a bunch of people in Montreal who want you to do this type of bulldozing and set Parliament aside, that is up to you. I do not think you will get elected on that platform.

Senator David: You have been doing this for three months. We have listened to enough.

Senator Olson: I know lots of bills that were held up for longer than three months in the House of Commons, and they needed to be held up, too.

Senator Steuart: There were some of ours.

Senator Olson: We even introduced one or two that should have been held up for a while, perhaps even longer.

Senator Murray: Was that the National Energy Policy? Mr. Chrétien says it was a terrible mistake.

Senator Olson: Do senators remember that the bells rang for 17 days one time on an energy bill? I am sure senators opposite remember that, because apparently the Conservatives at that time thought that they had a responsibility to get the message into that chamber that what was going on should be challenged. That is all we are doing.

I remember another great Tory from Winnipeg, Gordon Churchill. He was a great fellow, but I disagreed with him most of the time.

Some new rules were being discussed about allocation of time, and just in case senators opposite do not know I should set down some of my credentials for that particular debate. I was chairman of a subcommittee for 16 months because the government of the day under the Right Honourable Lester Pearson believed that we were not getting on with the business as quickly as some people thought we should. We set up a committee and the Prime Minister asked me, because I was a Social Creditor at that time—

Senator Murray: A pretty tame one, as it turned out.

• (1450)

[English]

Senator Olson: Tame one! He asked me because he thought he should have someone other than a representative of either of the major parties, to see if we could get this thing done in a non-partisan way; which I proceeded to do.

Never mind, I only mentioned it in case you think that I have not been through the rules.

In any event, Churchill's objection was, "We came in with a report". He said, "There are certain things we should do." At that time almost all the bills that came into Parliament had a major debate on second reading. The bill was then referred to either one of the standing committees or—and it was a very common practice in those days, that was in the mid-sixties—to take the bill to a Committee of the Whole, so that the whole chamber was involved. However, what some of them wanted, particularly the government of the day, was to have a time limit on how long it could remain in second reading. Churchill got up and said this—I will paraphrase it. I could get the exact quote, if you like— What he said is, "We cannot agree to that." You understand that they were in the opposition at the time. "We never know in advance how contentious a bill is going to be. The main purpose of Parliament, or at least one of its main purposes, is to hold up the debate between the introduction of a bill and its passage through the final stages long enough so that the public can mobilize their opinion."

The other thing he said was, "You never know until you start a debate who in the chamber is an expert on the subject". We had just had a demonstration of some backbencher who had not previously demonstrated an expertise on a certain subject—I can find it if you like—it changed the course of the entire debate because of his expertise. That is what happens.

Our responsibility is to hold things up here long enough so that the public opinion can be mobilized and conveyed to the government.

There is really not much democracy left in the House of Commons, because they use closure and time allocation, and all that stuff, so often that the minorities over there really cannot do what we used to do in the days of Honourable John Diefenbaker and Gordon Churchill.

Senator Murray: Those were the good old days. The golden years.

Senator Olson: They were the good old days when Parliament stood for something.

Senator Steuart: Just think, this will be the golden years 20 years from now.

Senator Olson: What has happened to Bill C-62 is that it got rammed and jammed through every stage in the other house, at every stage they used closure or a form of closure—there are three or four types of closure they can use—until it got here.

[Senator Olson.]

There are people, at least in my part of Alberta, Southern Alberta, who are saying that the Senate is the only hope. They know that there is no democracy left in the House of Commons. The House of Commons has democracy one day every four or five years; that is on election day. In between elections they run a dictatorship. That is not going to happen in this chamber as long as I have one breath left to stop it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: Seriously, this coup d'etat with which this government is trying to take over the rules and the running of this chamber, without any respect for the rules, or for the traditions, or the procedures that have culminated in this little book that you have disgraced so badly, just has to stop. You can do things properly if you try. I do not know who it is over there—Senator Barootes is generally a patient man, it cannot be him—who is ramming stuff through here? You could have done things properly. You could have given us notice on Monday—two days ago—that you needed a change in the rules; but you did not. You could have given notice to us six months ago. You could have given notice to us three weeks ago.

Senator Steuart: And you would really like to give it to us now.

Senator Simard: Senator Frith said, "Majority rules, the majority must prevail, committee members and Senate members make the rules."

Senator Olson: There were two or three members there. One of them was Senator—

Senator Simard: That caused you to change your mind.

Senator Olson: Senator Simard and Senator Ottenheimer spent the whole seven hours in committee arguing whether or not they had a point of order. Then they get sore at us because we raise a point of order here once in a while.

I remember the chairman of the committee over there put those motions every time he was asked. Of course you did not win. You violated the rules. You violated the Constitution by stacking the Senate, but at least as long as that stands, you have a majority. Now you do not even know how to use that. You mess it up by disregarding the rules that are here. It is absolutely amazing. I sometimes sit at home talking to my wife and I cannot concentrate because I think that what is going on in the Senate cannot be happening in Canada. There are places where they do things like that; they have a duty talk, they do other things, and then after a while they get out the rifles and machine guns too. I hope you do not have that in mind.

In the meantime, the minority has a right to speak in Parliament and every single member on this side has a right to speak. And the Independents. That is what we are talking about now.

Senator Steuart: There are senators sitting there waiting.

Senator Olson: We hope you are not proceeding to the next step, because you can look around the world and you can look through history, and that is the next step. As I say, I certainly hope that you do not have that in mind.

An Hon. Senator: What?

Senator Olson: A coup d'etat where you get out heavier weapons. You should be ashamed and hang your heads now for what you have tried to do to this chamber. You locked us out when the rules were that the whips should enter the chamber. Instead, you locked the doors to have a vote all by yourselves. Now you say, "Well, the debate has gone on for a little while". Senator Kelly says, "I am tired of it." I received a fancy little letter about it in which Senator Kelly indicates:

> —concerning the conduct of matters in the Senate surrounding Bill C-62.

Before two minutes had gone by, he denied that it applied to Bill C-62. I have never seen a senator do so many "somersaults", "flip-flops", whatever it is. Three times he denied that he was talking about Bill C-62. It indicates in the first paragraph that it is about Bill C-62 and in the second paragraph it says this:

> Since September 25, 1990, the attention of the Senate has been given almost exclusively to Bill C-62.

Is that not what Parliament is about?

On the next page, page 2, Senator Kelly, addressing the Speaker, says:

• (1500)

> . . . we would like the Senate to dispose of all questions related to Bill C-62 at 5:45 p.m. on Thursday, December 13, 1990 . . .

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

An Hon. Senator: What arrogance.

Senator Olson: Is that not nice? Then in the little discussion which followed, he denied that it was Bill C-62 with which he was concerned, but we have to have a new rule in this place for when people become tired of hearing the vigorous expression of views. Then in the last paragraph, he says:

> We believe that this matter requires your urgent attention and that the time has come for the Senate to decide whether or not it wishes to set a date for the final vote on Bill C-62.

I would like to ask a simple question. How does the Senate decide, when there is no motion before it? Ask yourself. Senator Kelly, you will be forgiven as it probably never crossed your mind, but you do require a motion before the Senate can decide anything. When we ask you if you are giving notice of motion, you say no, you are not giving notice of motion; it will take too long or something. I think you might have been a little afraid there might be a debate on it or something.

Senator Perrault: Perish the thought.

Senator Olson: Perish that thought. Anyway, I tell you there is going to be a debate and you can be sure of that when we get to it. It is likely to be a couple of weeks of debate before we get to that.

This is ridiculous. You should get up and say to the senators here, "Dear friends, I am sorry I acted hastily; I want to withdraw my letter. I realize it was the wrong thing to do. It was wrong even to think that the Speaker could accommodate—"

Senator Frith: He is making notes.

Senator Olson: Do you want to withdraw it?

An Hon. Senator: Dictate the suggestion.

Senator Perrault: Just dictate it to him, slowly.

Senator Olson: That is with what we are faced.

Senator Frith: How would you word that withdrawal, senator? You might tell him he has to have leave.

Senator Olson: You have to have leave.

Senator Frith: It is not a motion.

Senator Olson: We do not have a motion.

Senator Frith: It is an idea; it is a thought.

Senator Olson: Do you want to withdraw the idea completely? It seems to have been a while so I want to remind you of the one section from Beauchesne's which Senator Kelly read to us. All the rules are there, it says:

> To protect a minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority; . . .

That is what it says right at the top under "Principles of Parliamentary Law".

There is a second admonition in that law. It says:

> . . . to secure the transaction of public business in an orderly manner; . . .

Orderly manner means that you follow the rules.

Senator Frith: Exactly.

Senator Olson: If you try to bulldoze, you will be met by a force equal to that kind of bulldoze tactic. We know that if you want to start counting noses or heads or whatever you want to call them, that you have more over there, however illegally you have them. You are not going to bulldoze us. Surely you should have received that message before now. I just cannot understand the kind of rationalization behind your thinking that you can continue to bulldoze this place.

Here is the following one which says:

> . . . to enable every Member to express his opinions within limits necessary to preserve decorum . . .

Is that no longer important for every member to have a chance at expressing his opinions?

I want to tell you about southern Alberta where there are lots of people who have looked at Bill C-62. You should not have been surprised that it would take time to pass Bill C-62. I do not know if you are interested in polls or not. Apparently you are not. You are down to 14 per cent across the country; 7 per cent in Alberta support the Tory party, according to the latest polls. Do you know why? It is because you have stopped listening.

I have recently made two speeches in this chamber. I am sad and sorry to see what is happening in this chamber because whenever the government does not care what the public thinks, it is a dangerous government. You think that you can bulldoze the GST through and that the public will forget about it before the next election. Maybe you have convinced the people out there that you do not give a damn what they think. You should know that it is not your Canada; it is theirs. It is theirs as much as it is yours. You do not have the right to do that to them. The Speaker has absolutely no authority to do what Senator Kelly asks him to do. We will be arguing that for a long time.

An Hon. Senator: We could vote.

Senator Olson: In any event, you do not have any moral, legal or other right to do what you are trying to do to Canada's parliament.

An Hon. Senator: Or Canada's people.

Senator Olson: They resent it. I will bring hundreds of letters that say, until the debate came along, they were not sure what this Senate really did for them, but in no uncertain terms they now understand. If you think that you will emasculate this place so it has no capability whatever to slow down the government when it is passing legislation that 85 per cent of the population does not want, then you are wrong. On democratic principles, you are wrong; on moral principles, you are wrong; on legal principles, you are wrong. I predict that you will not get away with it, either.

I have heard the Honourable Michael Wilson and the Honourable Prime Minister say, "If you don't like it, you know what you can do at the next election." Canadians do not like it and they do not want to wait until the next election.

This business is changing the entire tax structure in Canada, which collects between $18 and $20 billion a year. It is repealing all those laws under the manufacturers' or excise taxes and setting in place a new regime that is costing hundreds of millions of dollars not only to the government but to industry and every person that conducts a transaction of a good or service. This is no small undertaking. I expect that it will probably not be until 1993 when you finally get it streamlined. You say, "We will implement the tax in 1991 and, if we lose the election in 1992, you can throw it out." Is that any way to run a country? Is that the complete disregard that you have for the views of Canadians, the people who own this country? You do not own it; you are only trustees operating a certain factor of it that is here, which is also our job. The sooner you understand it is our job and that we do not intend to renege on the people for whom we express opinions, the sooner you will get along a little better than you have up until now. It is ridiculous. The people I speak for do not want a coup d'état. They do not want Parliament taken over by someone writing a letter, no matter how many people sign it on his behalf. That is not the way.

• (1510)

You know how to change the rules in this house if you do not like them the way they are. You have the numbers. Why don't you try the rules once?

There are many people on the opposite side of this house whom I have much respect for. I do not think they thought for two minutes before they signed that letter. At least you could have had the decency to use the words "notwithstanding rule such and such," as we do when we ask for unanimous consent. Under section 45 there are a few rules that we have to set aside. We do that when we adjourn every week. Senator Kelly did not have the decency to say, "Notwithstanding rule 44(1), I wish to advise you, Mr. Speaker, that we have heard all we need to hear and we are ready to decide." He did not say that.

He said, "This is not a Notice of Motion." He said, "No. Right now I want the Speaker to decree that tomorrow afternoon we are going to put an end to the people having a right to speak in this place." It has been said here and in the other place that delay is a legitimate tactic of the opposition.

A few moments ago I explained that the reason for some of those rules is so public opinion can mobilize itself. We used to hold up bills in committee of the House of Commons until we heard from people who knew about the subject matter that was under discussion. There was no good reason for it except that we wanted to know what the people thought.

I was Minister of Agriculture for a few years. Marketing legislation was some of the most controversial legislation drafted. My colleagues and I got much abuse for it, but everyone who is in that business now knows the value of it.

On several occasions, when bills had gone through second reading in the House of Commons and had been referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture, I would be called as a witness and a particular official of whatever department was under consideration would also be called. Then they would discuss what other witnesses to call. There are many people in the private sector who are experts on whatever the government is doing. Many times we said, "No, we'll wait two or three weeks until people who are going to be affected by this legislation can convey their views to the committee." That is a legitimate reason also—straight delay, while the people have a chance to consider what the government is trying to do. I thought I was in a hurry once or twice. Believe me, I learned that you do not hurry too much, even if it is good legislation, because you can get into serious problems.

Senator Murray has a guilty look on his face for being in too much of a hurry all the time.

Senator Murray: I am enjoying your speech.

Senator Gigantès: That is not the only thing he is guilty of.

Senator Doody: Is Senator Olson speaking on behalf of Senator Waters' right to be heard?

Senator Olson: Yes, I am. I am trying to persuade you to support that motion.

Senator Doody: I support it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: I am sure I saw a dozen senators indicate that they are ready to support the motion. However, I do not know about my own colleagues. After all, if they vote for my motion, we will hear Senator Waters instead of Senator MacEachen, and they may not want that.

Senator Frith: We want to hear more. Keep talking.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, section 44 is clear on how to change the rules. It will be a sad day, quite frankly, if we get to the point where we have allocations of time. Many people—especially members of the Social Credit Party—have asked me the difference between a Tory and a Grit. There is a difference—one is in and one is out. The Tories are always in a hurry. They cannot wait.

Democracy is not like a sports car; it is like a battleship—it takes more time to turn it. Of all the people on the other side to bring forth a motion to have a streamlined way of making new rules, I was shocked—almost horrified—when I heard it was Senator Kelly. This is the end of democracy.

I am sure he had no malicious intent when he moved his motion, but if the Speaker can do this once, then it becomes a precedent. He admitted that afterwards. We asked him if he wanted to give notice and he said, "No, I want a new regime based on what's in this letter. As soon as I have heard enough and get a few of my colleagues to sign the letter, that's the end of the debate." I was shocked.

Senator David: I must remind you, my friend, that this is after 320 hours of debate.

Senator Olson: I want to remind you that when Bill C-62 came out last spring, which is longer than 320 hours ago, we were told that there would be no amendments. The Tories, using closure at every turn in the other place, have produced this bill. They have said that there will be no amendments. I heard both the Honourable Otto Jelinek and the Honourable Michael Wilson say it. I believe they even said that the Senate has no right to make any amendments, did they not?

Senator Simard: This is a $1-million circus.

Senator Olson: The $1-million circus involved all the flunkies from Senator Murray's and Mr. Wilson's office who lapped around after us like a bunch of terriers. That is where you spent the $1 million. We took a count of them one day in Halifax and we found that there were six of them and I imagine the government paid for their rooms, their transportation and all their other expenses.

Senator Poitras: And yours.

Senator Olson: I hope Senator Simard will not bring that up again. I finally understood where the figure of $1 million came from. The committee's budget was $475,000 and we did not exceed it.

Senator Simard: —It—

Some Hon. Senators: Sit down! Sit down!

Senator Simard: It exceeded its budget.

Senator Olson: The statement that the committee exceeded its budget is simply not true. I know where the other half million dollars came from.

Senator Perrault: The advertising campaign.

Senator Olson: I realize now that Senator Murray's office and the Honourable Michael Wilson's office had a pretty big bill to pay for sending everyone around. They also sent all that equipment around and I do not if they hired a special airplane to do that. That is probably where the other half million dollars came from because it is said the committee cost $1 million. You guys spent the other half million dollars.

Senator Simard: A half million dollars for the Liberals and a half million dollars for the Conservatives.

Senator Olson: I remember sitting in the hotel in Halifax one day and noticing six or eight flunkies all lined up at the bank of telephones calling Ottawa.

Senator Simard: Mr. Speaker, make a ruling.

Senator Olson: We now know where the $1 million came from. You spent the other half yourselves. However, are you going to list it as expenses or are you just going to bury it in the minister's travel expenses? Shame on you for that too.

We have had a debate about services available to the committee being paid out of the public purse. We have made it clear that those services are available to members from both sides. Honourable senators will remember that I asked why I could not have a flunkey to dig material out of Michael Wilson's speech but one was never offered to help me. I had to do that all by myself and I am proud to say that we did a pretty good job.

Senator Simard: Oh yes?

Senator Olson: When we got back to Ottawa and analyzed the evidence we realized that it was a job well done. The people finally had a chance to say what they thought about Bill C-62. I demand my right to have my say in this chamber too. I have an undigested speech under my desk which will take me perhaps three or four hours to read. I could try to shorten it, but if I put forward all of the arguments the people in southern Alberta want me to put forward it would be substantially longer than three or four hours. I just happen to have a few notes here.

Senator Simard: Give it to us now.

Senator Olson: I do not want to give it to you now. What I am trying to do now is to persuade you that members in this house have a right to speak and that there is no justification for Senator Kelly to say, "That's enough!" The people of southern Alberta, especially those living in the Medicine Hat area, have not yet been heard from. You have heard a few words from the senator from Lethbridge but the one from Medicine Hat has not yet been heard.

Senator Steuart: Or the one from Prince Albert.

Senator Simard: How about a couple of petitions?

Senator Stanbury: We have thousands of them.

Senator Olson: You can laugh about this, but I can tell you there are people who will have some very serious doubts about this place if their views are not placed before the house when the debate is taking place. It is ridiculous.

In case anyone has forgotten, honourable senators, what we are now talking about is whether anyone has a right to speak to this point of order. There is no such rule. There is no precedent that was not defeated. Senators on this side are pretty bright too. We looked to see if there was a precedent for the Speaker doing what Senator Kelly asks and we found none.

However, there was an attempt in 1881 in the British Parliament when some Irish members were carrying on a filibuster but even that is a terrible precedent.

Are we going to reduce Canada's Parliament to that? I am not arguing that we might want to change the rules in order to have a time limitation, but that is not the thrust of my argument today. If Senator Kelly will take the time he will see that, under Rule 19, it says "notices of motions." He can give notice of a motion and then wait for two days. What we are faced with here today, Senator Kelly leaping up before Prayers on a point of order, that is not a notice of motion.

Senator Steuart: It is praying.

Senator Olson: He got up at the outset and said "On a point of order, I have had enough." He then read this letter which asks the Speaker to intervene in the debate and at 5:45 p.m. on Thursday to take a vote. He says, "It's over because I and my colleagues have had enough." Where is the precedent for that? Is this a new kind of democracy? I hope not.

Honourable senators, you may think you can get away with this within the four walls of this chamber, but the people out there are not going to stand for it. Please do not escalate it again and say that you are going to have a coup d'etat and take over. You can take over the government and that is, in fact, what you have been doing. You now have rules in the House of Commons with respect to closure and limitation of time. There is no democracy left down there. It used to sicken me as I watched them do that. If you talk too long, or what the government considers to be too long, in the House of Commons or after eight or ten have spoken out of about 120 who want to speak, then the Honourable Harvie Andre will come in and impose a limitation of time order saying that the debate can only go on so long during second reading. When that hour arrives, bang, it's over and he says, "I don't give a damn whether you have had a chance to speak or not! It's over."

It goes off to the committee and the same type of motion is moved over there. The committee is not quite so handy, so sometimes it takes a little longer. However, fellow senators, the consequences are the same.

Senator David: You did the same at the banking committee on September 24. You gave us a few hours to study a 318 page report. Therefore, you moved closure there. Half an hour after we started the committee there was a motion of closure, so you did exactly the same.

[Senator Stanbury.]

Senator Frith: And you did a filibuster when it came in here. Let's not call each other names. You filibustered that report for days.

Senator Olson: Senator David has either got a very vivid imagination or a poor memory. That is not what happened at all. Senator Ottenheimer raised one question of privilege after the other, supported by Senator Simard and others. They caused a lot of noise so the chairman could hardly keep order. That is what happened. However, I will leave it to Senator Buckwold to explain the inaccuracy of that comment about what happened in the committee. I also sat there for the whole seven and a half hours. For those honourable senators who do not know, the committee sat all summer from the middle of July, and Senator Simard, Senator David, Senator Poitras and others said we had to have this bill ready for the first day that Parliament sits. We knew that was on September 25, so we did not cave in right away and say we will have it ready because—

Senator Poitras: Tell the whole story.

Senator Olson: —it is a pretty big bill and there were many amendments. I know that the chairman and some of the staff on the committee worked their fingers to the bone trying to get it ready and analyze the evidence for September 25th. They really tried hard, and that's the thanks the chairman gets. I phoned him quite often and asked for an analysis of all the evidence, because I did not have the transcripts. I was interested in what people said, and I will mention one or two outstanding cases of which we need to be reminded. Senator Simard, remember when we were in Halifax and a group came from the South Shore Trade and Labour Congress. They had done some research and study of the bill. The Minister of Finance claimed it was a substitute tax. However, that group's study of the bill indicated that that was not so; it was a massive transfer of the tax burden from one group of Canadians to the other and those in the extremities of Canada would be the victims. They then went on to prove their case, and it really impressed me. I thought that we had to take this seriously. Is it just a substitute tax and everyone will pay the same, with perhaps slight modifications as to whether 13.5 per cent is paid on an automobile at the manufacturer's level, or 7 per cent at the retail level? The government claimed that the price was going to go down. I do not know whether or not the price will go down. What I do know is that the farther one lives from central Canada, the more tax would be paid. I know some senators told me not to bring that up again when I told them that Albertans would pay 15 per cent or 20 per cent more—

Senator Perrault: Which they are, and those in B.C. will pay even more.

Senator Olson: —than people who live in the Montreal-Toronto corridor, or in what is called the "Golden Triangle". However, it is true.

Senator Simard: Are you discussing Senator Lawson's right to speak?

Senator Olson: Senator Lawson moved a motion and I seconded the motion. He made a speech, Senator Frith made a speech, and now I am making a little speech because I am pretty interested in whether or not the senators opposite who signed this letter are going to respect everyone's right to be heard.

Senator Doody: We want to hear Senator Waters.

Senator Olson: You want to hear Senator Waters? I am sure he is ready.

Senator Doody: Or Senator MacEachen.

Senator Olson: I am sure he is ready, and he is going to have a word or two to say about Senator Kelly's motion.

Senator Doody: Why do you not let him speak?

Senator Olson: I could finish my speech later, if senators wish me to. However, if I sit down, I will not finish saying all the things I have to say and that would be sad, because I am pretty sure senators opposite would not be sufficiently edified to understand what the rights of people are in this country.

Senator Doody: Is that fair to Senator Waters?

Senator Olson: You have been around the influence of Senator Murray and his boss, the Honourable Harvie Andre, from the other place. I have seen him lurking around here once in a while giving some instructions.

Senator Doody: Come on, get on with this.

Senator Olson: I saw him in the reading room a few days ago giving Senator Murray the real word: "Get that thing passed, get that thing passed."

Senator MacEachen: Who was doing that?

Senator Olson: That was the Honourable Harvie Andre from the other place. I imagine that they sit up there in the cabinet room and say, "Listen, Murray, we've done everything you asked, now get that bill finished." Senator Murray says, "Yes, all right. I'll see if I can get Senator Simard to help me," and away we go.

Senator Hatfield: You have no credibility.

Senator Olson: You are a great help, sometimes. We are not going to lie down and play dead just because you are trying to wreck Parliament.

I am sorry that it was Senator Kelly who was tagged to do this, because that is not his nature. I know that he is sorry himself right now that he asked for such a ridiculous performance to take place.

Senator Simard: Amen!

Senator Olson: Amen, there is no rule. The other argument that was used was that we have to do a balance. Who decides what is a balance, or do we follow the rules that are written in this little red book? I have never been on the rules committee, but I have always been in the Senate when changes in the rules were passed, and it is a decision of the house that we are going to abide by the rules, not of Senator Kelly, Senator Simard, or Senator David who says, "We have had enough." If you have had enough, Senator David, go outside the door. You do not need to listen. However, you are not going to sit in here and trample my right to be heard, I can tell you that.

Senator David: It is interesting what you say.

Senator Olson: Senator Ottenheimer has stated that we have an unprecedented situation that requires unprecedented action. Who decides what is unprecedented action and when it is appropriate to do it and, if so, what is the unprecedented action that is appropriate? I would think that senators should decide, using the little book, which states: "two days' notice", and then we have a debate. I do not know if it was the two days' notice that bothered Senator Kelly so much that he had to back away from his own suggestion. Senator Frith calls it "an idea." I call it a suggestion, and I would not dignify it beyond that.

There must be a motion to change the rules. If it is done any other way it is a coup. I do not say this lightly, but you can escalate this a little bit at a time until it gets dangerous, because Canadians will not have their Parliament destroyed by a bunch of senators who are in a hurry.

Senator Simard: Even the press has gone home. They are tired of listening to you.

• (1540)

Senator Olson: I am not talking to the press. I am talking to the people who are going to vote on this thing whether or not Senator Waters wants to be heard.

Senator Beaulieu: If you sit down.

Senator Olson: I do not need to sit down because there is lots of time. You are now in such a hurry you cannot even hear me. Is that not something? Wait until I get to Bill C-62. If you are going to cut the debate off tomorrow at 5:45, I will never get a chance to say anything at all on Bill C-62 at third reading. There are not that many, but there are about 300,000 or 400,000 people out there in the general area that I more or less represent who have not been heard yet. You have no respect for that.

I can see on the faces of some of the senators opposite that they are not yet going to vote for this motion. They are just tolerating me because—

Senator Bonnell: They like you.

Senator Olson: Senator Bonnell says they like me. I am not that naive. I do not think they like what I am saying either.

Senator Beaulieu: When you say something, yes.

Senator Olson: I do not think they like their consciences as to what they are doing to Parliament. Do you think so? Did you ever do this in the Legislature of New Brunswick; just trample over everybody's rules and rights?

I notice you stopped shaking your head that way. You are shaking it the other way now. I agree. I know you had Senator Simard in there for a while too. I suppose he has tried this a few times. You have probably saved the people from him.

We need a motion if you want to change the rules. If you do not want to change the rules, then every member on this side, and on that side, has a right to speak on Bill C-62. You have already partly violated the rules by moving the previous question.

Senator Simard: Eight months you have had.

Senator Perrault: It is not for you to decide.

Senator Olson: It is not for you to decide whether it was three years.

Senator Simard: We had one hour, you had three months.

Senator Perrault: Why do you not make a speech? Take ten hours if you want.

Senator Olson: Why do you not get up and say what you think about Bill C-62? One of the arguments that I was trying to make here a few minutes ago was that, when we gave in to the Tories and said, "Okay, you want the bill ready for presentation to Parliament, to the Senate, on September 25", we acquiesced. We said, "Okay, we will do it", and we did. Senator Buckwold and his staff, and other people, worked hard to do that analysis. They barely got it ready. Do you remember that it was so fresh that they did not even—

Senator Nurgitz: And you forced us on in one day. The first thing you did in your committee. Tell it straight.

Some Hon. Senators: You are wrong.

Senator Perrault: That is not true.

Senator Nurgitz: You cannot read the report. I remember you.

Senator Olson: I know that Senator Nurgitz and every other Tory senator that was on there had equal access to every single one of the transcripts, as did anybody else, but they did not bother because they were already told what to do.

Senator Nurgitz: We could not read the report, there was no time to read the report. Senator Frith said, "It is the will of the majority. Vote today." That is what he said.

Senator Frith: And that was upheld by your Speaker. Did you notice that? You keep forgetting that. And that you dead-ended that by filibustering.

Senator Olson: That was a disgraceful performance on your part.

Senator Nurgitz: You make me ill.

Senator Olson: I hope you get over it fairly soon.

Senator Simard: That was Senator Charbonneau's business. You voted that day.

Senator Olson: Anyway, we agreed that we would—I would like to finish my speech so that some of the others can get on.

Senator Simard: Plain garbage.

Senator Perrault: You can take your ten hours following him.

Senator Simard: We have had enough of that nonsense.

Senator Olson: As I said, honourable senators, they insisted—Senator Simard was one of them—"You have to get that ready so we can get it into Parliament to send it on the first day". I said, "Okay". I phoned up Senator Buckwold and I said, "Senator Buckwold"—I talked to him while we were on the trip—"they want this ready for that date." And Senator Buckwold said, "That is a big job". I said, "I know it is a big job". But we got it ready and—

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Simard: Who is "we"?

Senator Olson: Senator Buckwold. The committee. You were on the committee. It was the committee.

Senator Simard: Like hell, the committee. Senator Buckwold did it. And Senator Frith.

Senator Olson: Then what happened was—

Senator Simard: "Axe the tax", he said. "Axe the tax".

Senator Perrault: A very objective report.

Senator Buckwold: Not axe the tax, but tax the axe.

Senator Perrault: You are trying to axe the Senate now.

Senator Simard: We know who had a knife that day.

Senator Olson: All the senators opposite, they complain now because we had it ready. They complained because they had to read a bunch of it. They had access to all the transcript, if they wanted to read it. All it was was 292 pages—

Senator Simard: Wrong again.

Senator Olson: Two hundred and ninety-one, then.

Senator Simard: Wrong again.

Senator Olson: It was an analysis of the evidence. From there on there were four options.

Senator Perrault: A first rate report.

Senator Simard: Whose analysis?

Senator Olson: The staff's analysis.

Senator Simard: They did the analysis.

Senator Olson: They did the analysis. You could have read that. I chose not to read it because I knew what was in there. It was in a more convenient form. What I was interested in was the operative part of the report, and that was: 1) accept it without amendment. That was there—

Senator Simard: He has spoken a few times on that already.

Senator Olson: —2) Make some amendments. 3) Recommend a delay. 4) Argue that it is so badly flawed that we should reject the whole thing.

I was in that committee meeting, and they decided that the chairman—I wonder if Senator Simard wishes to make a speech? Or does he just want to talk all the time?

Senator Simard: You said that last year.

Senator Olson: Did he make speeches all the time in the legislature without getting up? He always did that? He never stops at all.

Senator Steuart: Senator Simard, we will not be able to hear Senator Olson.

Senator Simard: You will not have to. He is not contributing anything.

Senator Olson: That is the problem. They want to hear me, not you. I think I will have to wait until they become quiet.

Then Senator Ottenheimer jumps up and makes a motion, "Question of privilege. I have not had time to read this." If he had been along on the committee, he would not need to read it. He would know what is in it.

Then the chairman explained to him what was in the four options at the end. Of course there were a few little extra words in there to explain what it was to be, but what I said was, in essence, what was involved.

We then continued for another seven hours with Senator Ottenheimer leading the parade with one question of privilege after another, followed by Senator David. You talk about disrupting the deliberations of a committee; that is the most disgraceful performance I have ever seen. They would not even let the chairman move motions.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul David: Senator Olson, I must add that I received the French version of this report, which was 318 pages long, between noon and 12:30. Quite logically, it was absolutely impossible to read such a document through; we did not have enough time to read it carefully, to study its various alternatives, since there were many, nor to study the four options you were talking about.

There is a thing that you have not mentioned: we had been summoned for September 19. For undoubtedly very good reasons, although they were never explained to us, that meeting of the 19th, for which I had specially come to Ottawa, was cancelled at the last minute.

If the meeting, to which we've been summoned, had taken place, we would have had at least a week to discuss this report. In that case, too, you did not give us enough time and you distorted the facts. What was unacceptable is that you demanded that we make a decision about such an important and momentous document, that had required four weeks of work and had been condensed by the parliamentary researchers. One hour after it was received, for a question of privilege or whatever, you decided that a decision had to be reached by 7:00 p.m.

To my mind, you have done what was necessary to put an end to all debate. Around 6:00 p.m., you decided that the only remaining alternative was to reject the bill.

• (1550)

[English]

Senator Olson: I have heard that argument before and it is no more valid now than it was at other times. You do not convey the true picture of what happened in the committee. We all went in there and we all had the report. The committee meeting was called at 1:30, I believe, but by that time I had my report for half an hour or possibly longer. When we went into the meeting, we had not started and Senator Ottenheimer was on his feet with a question of privilege saying he had not had long enough to read it. We were in an impossible position because we had acquiesced to a great pressure play to have it ready for presentation to the Senate the next morning.

Senator Cools: Absolutely.

Senator Olson: If we had taken Senator Ottenheimer, Senator David, Senator Poitras and others' rule that we postpone consideration until, I believe, October 2nd, how would we have been ready for September 25th? Senator Poitras understood and said that was a problem. We wanted to keep our word that it was ready. In spite of all of that, senators do not need to kid anybody about what was in the report.

I remember in Halifax, Senator Poitras said he wanted more briefs. The next morning we brought our stuff and gave him five pounds of briefs. He did not read them. Who do you think you are kidding that you needed to read all the evidence over again? There is nothing wrong with your memories. You knew what was in the analysis of the evidence. You did not know altogether what was in the four recommendations. You know that was not the reason at all. The real reason was that you had already gotten word from on high that 8 more senators were to be appointed and you had to delay things until they were in the Chamber. Let us quit the act. I know and you know that is what happened. You keep bringing it up and I know in the committee the chairman tried over and over and over again to get some order. There was no order at all. Senator Carney was there contributing to the confusion as much as anybody else. She was not even a senator when we took the evidence, so what was she doing? She could have done it but instead of that she came to the meeting and raised hell. That is all. Shame on her is what I say.

Senator Carney: Shame on you.

Senator Olson: Senator Ottenheimer was on his feet on a question of privilege again and again and again. Senator Kelly was right there and saw him. In fact, I think he might have helped him find the right places to raise questions of privilege. After writing this letter with the suggestion made here, I do not think anybody should take his advice any more about parliamentary procedure. Senator Ottenheimer was perhaps a little desperate. They had their orders to get the thing stopped and not let them be ready to present the next day. Of course that is what you did. So we sat there for 7 and a half hours, amid bedlam and chaos; the Tory senators acted in complete disregard for any decorum. Then we returned to the chamber. Do you remember that? Do you remember that time on October 4th when they cited section 15? The Speaker has to keep decorum in this chamber. That was almost comical after what we had witnessed in the committee on September 24th. Do you think we have such short memories that we cannot even remember that much? Here is another plot being hatched.

Senator Steuart: Senator Kelly, do not listen this time.

Senator Olson: I want to say there has to be a motion if you want to change the rules; and the motion is debatable. I should read a little more from Beauchesne's Fifth Edition. On page 5, it says:

WRITTEN RULES

> Citation 7. Standing, Sessional and Special Orders are the rules and regulations which the House has agreed on for the governance of its own proceedings.

Does anything need to be more clear? Even the authorities who have written five editions will state flatly what is in this book is there for the governance of the proceedings in this chamber. It is right there and you need not refer to any other authorities. All you need to do is understand elementary English.

Senator Steuart: Senator, I wonder, is that in both plain English and plain French?

Senator Olson: Yes. I do not happen to have the French copy with me, but I am sure if you look under citation 7 you will find it is exactly the same in French as in English. I do not remember exactly, but I believe there are 114 rules until we had the provisional rules or what are commonly known as the P rules. Citation 8 says:

> A Standing Order has a continuing effect until changed or repealed.

So when did they get changed or repealed? When did Standing Order Number 27 get repealed, being an order that gives every member the right to speak on every motion here. I do not think it is repealed and it is there and it is still in effect. I can tell you I will demand and insist in every way possible to ensure I have my right to be heard on Bill C-62. I do not care whether the Globe and Mail supports that or not. I will insist on it. Most of the time the Globe and Mail editorials on how to run the country are as what is said about Lord Salisbury, "They are usually wrong, and when they are right it is for the wrong reason." You understand that, so it has this continuing effect until it is changed or repealed. That simply has not happened.

There are other sessional orders. We have rules P1, P2, P3, called provisional rules. It is a special order having an effect for only the remainder of the session in which it is passed. That is exactly what we have done with the so-called P rules in this chamber and they are only effective until the end of this session. Not this parliament; just this session. It says:

> All rules are passed by the House by a simple majority and are altered, added to, or removed in the same way.

We have to have a motion. That is our problem with Senator Kelly's suggestion. We do not have a motion. We have nothing with which to deal, and he has just said to the Speaker, "Stop the Debate at 5:45 tomorrow and call the vote."

● (1600)

That is a violation of the Speaker's function in this place. Our rules take precedence over every authority that has ever been written. Erskine-May, Beauchesne's and Bourinot have been written for clarification only. Do not expect Beauchesne's or anyone else to supersede what is written in our own rule book.

We are going to ensure that we have a chance to speak under rule 27. I do not know when my turn will come, but I want this debate to continue until I have had a turn.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Bonnell: You want to be heard.

Senator Olson: Even when I get a chance to speak I cannot make any amendments, and I do have some amendments to make.

I travelled around Alberta and asked the people whether or not they wanted any changes. They said, "Senator Olson, the first choice would be to have the bill defeated. But if that can't be done, now that there are eight illegal senators, could you get a couple of things changed?" For example, I went to an auctioneers' meeting. In southern Alberta an auction is a traditional way of selling used equipment. People at the meeting said to me, "Senator Olson, you're our only hope. It's gone through the House of Commons." Even when it went through the House of Commons, most Alberta members of Parliament did not object. However, there were two members of Parliament who did object. Mr. Kindy from Calgary did object.

Senator Lewis: What happened to him?

Senator Olson: He was booted out of the Tory caucus. Mr. Kilgour from Edmonton was kicked out also because he voted against the GST.

Those members of Parliament were listening carefully to the people they represent.

Senator Steuart: They thought Parliament was supposed to be democratic.

Senator Olson: They thought that when every district elected a member of Parliament, those members would express the views of the people who elected them.

Senator Steuart: No!

Senator Olson: Is that not what Parliament is for?

Senator Steuart: It used to be.

Senator Olson: I thought it still was. They voted against that bill because 90 per cent of their people told them they did not want the bill passed. They were booted out of the Tory caucus. I can tell you that that has cost every single Tory in Alberta their seat in the next election. Perhaps you do not believe that, but I know what they are doing out there. These are the only two P.C. members in Canada who stood up for the people they represent.

Senator Balfour: What happened to your seat?

Senator Olson: There was no GST around at that time. If you want personal assassination, I will tell you what happened. It was the capital punishment debate that cost me my seat. That is not a very pleasant thing to remember, but that is what happened. The issue of capital punishment was hot in 1972. The Tories who were in opposition spoke out of both sides of their mouths. They said that we should have capital punishment and that this government had commuted every sentence since coming to office. They forgot one thing. Under Prime Minister Diefenbaker that is what happened also. The Conservatives did not have to answer for it, but, because I was part of the government, I did. When you belong to a government you accept the collegiality.

I hope you do not ask that question again, but that is the reason. However, I was not talking about that. I was talking about why Mr. Kindy and Mr. Kilgour lost their status in the Tory caucus. It was over Bill C-62, which is the bill that we have under consideration. At least the capital punishment debate—and also the abortion debate—was a matter of conscience; this is not. They were ordered to vote for it or else. There is no room for dissension in the Tory caucus.

Senator Balfour: Do you do it any differently?

Senator Olson: Oh yes. There were many people in our caucus who did not vote for every bill the government brought forward.

Senator Balfour: Who are they?

Senator Olson: Even today I moved a motion against my leader so we could hear Senator Waters. There is a different concept of democracy.

We cannot let this idea—it is not a motion—pass because then it will become a precedent. It will destroy Parliament.

Senator Stewart: Will you accept the word "notion" rather than "idea"?

Senator Olson: Yes, the word "notion" is better than "idea".

On December 11 Senator Kelly sent a notice to the Speaker saying that he had heard enough debate. He said, "Tomorrow afternoon I want to vote on this. Never mind that we have rules, that we have not changed the rules, and that the Speaker has no authority to make that decision. Never mind that, just interrupt the debate."

We cannot let that happen. The resistence will escalate until it does not happen. You can put any interpretation you want on that, but I am not going to sit quietly while you carry out a coup d'etat of our Parliament.

Citation 9 of Beauchesne's says that all rules are passed by the house by a simple majority and are altered, added to, or removed the same way.

• (1610)

That is what our rules say. They completely ignored that even when they were reminded that the Senate has agreed upon a proper procedure to change the rules. Senator Kelly said he would not give notice. He said he wants the Speaker to interrupt the debate at 5:45 p.m. on Thursday, with no debate. They have already wrecked Parliament by moving the previous question. In all the years that I have been in the Senate the previous question has never been moved. We never moved the previous question in order to ride roughshod or to bulldoze the rights of the minority, or of the opposition, to be heard.

Senator Doyle: Oh, oh!

Senator Olson: Beauchesne's then says:

> By custom, changes in the Standing Orders are generally made after study and a recommendation by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

In this place it is called the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. Senator Kelly was not prepared to refer his notion to the committee. When he was asked, he said that he would not even give us notice.

The situation is so bad, and what they are trying to do is so disgraceful that if members opposite think we have been a little creative up until now to try to get our message across to you and to the people about Bill C-62, if you try to do this, I can tell you that you ain't seen nothing yet!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: If this is the way senators opposite intend to treat this institution, which the country relies on to make sure that there is a certain amount of respect for democracy and for the rights of people, we are just getting started.

Honourable senators, what sends me up the wall and what sends my people up the wall is the statement we hear from the Minister of Finance from time to time when he stands up solemnly and says, "We know it's not popular, but it's right." He says, "We are not running a popularity contest. We are going to have this and that policy, including Bill C-62 because it's right, even though it isn't popular."

Senator Gigantès: It's right wing.

Senator Doody: If Senator Olson does not want Senator Waters to speak, will he let Senator MacEachen speak? He does not seem to want anyone to speak except Senator Olson, yet the debate is on the right of another senator to speak. Could he explain that to the house?

Senator Frith: I think you should explain that to the house, but take your time.

Senator Olson: I think I should explain to Senator Doody. He will remember that little story I told about the person stepping in everything in the cow pasture. That is Diefenbaker's story and I thought it was a good one because, although there may be more dignified ways of saying it, that phrase tells a great story. Most people in Canada understand it. Now you are in a hurry again. You cannot wait and listen to me explain why I seconded the motion.

Senator Frith: Explain it again.

Senator Bonnell: He was probably out, so you should tell him over again.

Senator Olson: I think I am going to quit while I am ahead. I did get some indication just a while ago, but if the honourable senator has not changed his mind then I had better try again. A while ago I made a suggestion that perhaps senators opposite would be willing to vote in favour of the motion, and I am sure I saw 15 or so senators opposite beginning to slap their desks which I took as an indication—and perhaps I am naive although I hope I am not—that they had accepted my argument. However, if it was an indication, as Senator Doody says it was, that I should sit down, then I suppose I had better spend a little more time trying to persuade senators opposite.

Senator Steuart: Go slowly.

Senator Olson: A lot of senators on this side are still saying they will vote for Senator MacEachen, so I should keep going for quite a while. Perhaps Senator Simard might move a motion or make a good speech supporting the motion.

Senator Simard: I know what I am going to do in a few minutes.

Senator Olson: I know what you are going to do too. You have a bad habit of putting your foot in your mouth every time you open it. It is called "hoof and mouth disease." On the prairies that is dangerous.

Senator Simard: I rise on a point of order. I do not know how Senator Olson, who claims to be the seconder of a motion that Senator Waters be heard—if he is serious—can prevent the mover of the motion to speak. Is it the wish of Senator Waters or of Senator Lawson that they be heard now? If it is, would you tell your seconder to shut up? This is the most ridiculous situation any Parliament has ever witnessed. This is all coming from Senator Olson who, yesterday, was preaching about the right of senators to speak. Why does he not let the mover of the motion speak if it is not filibustering once again? Senator Olson says he is in favour of democracy. He is, in my opinion, rather in favour of Liberal crassness. He should let the Independent senator speak. Two months ago the Liberals negotiated a deal which allowed eight amendment motions to be debated. They worked out a nice deal for the Liberals but they deprived the Independents in that deal.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no!

Senator Simard: If Senator Olson is so much in favour of supporting the right of senators to speak, would he now let the mover of the motion speak? That is all I have to say to you for the time being. It is Liberal hypocrisy.

Senator Olson: You must understand that the mover, Senator Lawson, has already given a few explanatory remarks as to why he moved the motion.

Senator Simard: Yesterday Senator MacEachen was reported in the paper as saying that he was going to entertain us: He was going to make a speech at 2 o'clock. What is he waiting for? Has he lost control over his own troops? Perhaps Senator Olson is still the leader.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Simard, you can do better than that.

Senator Simard: Is this another Liberal broken promise? Why is Senator MacEachen silent all of a sudden? It is his game and he is leading a bunch of warriors on his side defending democracy. Do not talk about democracy here. I am on my feet.

Would you answer those questions? Will the real leader stand up? Has there been a change and is Senator Olson now the leader? Has Senator Fairbairn lost her rank? I thought she was third in line?

Senator Frith: I would notice that Senator Simard has told the Speaker that he has to sit down because he is on his feet.

Senator Simard: Better still, why not let the Independents speak?

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we have just had another demonstration of the regard which Senator Simard and his colleagues have for the rules. The Speaker was on his feet and Senator Simard said, "I am on my feet." Why do they ask the Speaker to break all the rules?

Senator Simard: Why do you not sit down too?

Senator Olson: I happen to have the floor right now. I think Senator Simard has asked a question I should answer. Rule 27 of the Rules of the Senate says:

> A senator may speak to any question before the Senate, a question of privilege, or upon a point of order, or upon a motion or an inquiry, or in making a mere interrogation . . .

I guess that is what you are doing.

• (1620)

The rule continues:

> . . . but not otherwise except with the consent of a majority of the Senate which shall be given or withheld without debate.

When you rise and make these little interrogations, you should seek the unanimous consent of the house to interrupt the senator who has the floor, otherwise you are out of order.

When talking about Senator Waters, you say, "Why don't you let him speak?"

Senator Bonnell: Senator Lawson.

Senator Olson: Senator Lawson has made his speech. He is now admonishing me to let Senator Waters speak so we can get on with the motion. A while ago I thought I had the Tories convinced to support the motion, but now I am not so sure. I will have to continue a while yet, because I know I am convincing if I take enough time.

Rule 28 states:

> A senator shall not speak more than once to any question or other matter before the Senate . . .

Therefore, as soon as I sit down, it's over. I do not get a chance to speak again on the same motion.

Senator Barootes: That is the only blessing in that book.

Senator Olson: That is why, Senator Simard, I have to complete my remarks on this motion before I sit down, because I am not like you. I will not jump up like a jack-in-the-box in the middle of everybody else's speech. I will rise, make my speech and finish it in line with Rule 28, and I think you should read that carefully.

Senator Simard: That is the only rule you have observed in the last three months. You have broken every other rule.

Senator Olson: Be sure you read it slowly so that you understand it. It is pretty clear that Senator Simard has not read any of the rules. If he has read any of them, he has not understood them. Neither has Senator Kelly. I cannot believe that Senator Kelly was unaware of what was in Rule 44(1). I cannot believe that he did not know that he had to give notice of a motion to change the rules. He wants to bring in closure without calling it closure. Closure is not something that Parliaments take lightly. They do it down the hall in the House of Commons. With this government, there have been more closure and time allocation motions moved in the House of Commons since 1984 than in all previous Canadian history.

Senator Simard: Just stay in this house for a while.

Senator Olson: They have done a few things. They have borrowed more money than all previous governments in Canadian history. One can never receive the right figures from the government, but $165 to $180 billion was the national debt when the government took office, and now, six years later, it is $360 billion or $380 billion. They have borrowed more money than all previous governments in history, including governments during two world wars, the Korean War, and any other conflicts we were involved in.

Senator Steuart: And the Depression.

Senator Olson: And the Depression. That is what the government has done, so we really get precedents from this government. Now it keeps sending word over here to Senator Murray and Senator Kelly, and I do not think they bother with Senator Simard, but they keep telling them to do something to get the debate stopped and get it over with. They want to get out of here. I would like to know where you have to go and what you have to attend to that is more important than attending to the legitimate wishes of the Canadian people? Do you want to go off on a holiday somewhere? I have heard that is what they want to do, close up so they can adjourn or prorogue, or whatever they are going to do in the House of Commons, so that a bunch of senators and backbench members can go off on some holiday. I have heard that and I do not know if it is true, but I suspect that it is true.

I wish to conclude.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no!

Senator Simard: Promises, promises.

Senator Olson: I wish to say a couple of other things.

Senator Barootes: You were going to conclude, you said.

Senator Olson: You always say that when you get to the beginning of the last chapter.

The other day Senator Murray and I were having a little discussion during Question Period. By the way, I missed Question Period. I wanted to ask about the GATT negotiations that have collapsed in Brussels.

Senator Simard: What does that have to do with the motion?

Senator Olson: I am trying to give you a little background, which is permitted, so that you will know what I am talking about. Sometimes it is called a preamble, but it is a little bit of background. I will not give a full, detailed explanation. I never do that. I will just give enough so that you can identify the background you will have to dredge up in your own memory.

Senator Murray came in with some suggestions about what ought to happen when we have had two flagrant violations of the rules already. I think I said that I heard the voice, and the voice I heard was the voice of Esau, but I thought I saw the hand of Job. He said that that was not right, that it was the hand of Jacob. It takes a little while, but after you have been around here for a while you can tell who's voice it is. When I am sitting in my office, I can tell just about every voice in this chamber. I have been around here long enough to know that I saw the hand of somebody else.

An Hon. Senator: Who?

Senator Olson: We used to call him Senator Flynn. I see him around here. Every once in a while I see him out in the back room. I see him out in front. I see him many places. What is going on here is just exactly the way he would do things. I understand he is getting $1500 a day for that, which is a pretty healthy pay for that type of advice that will wreck Parliament.

Senator Frith: That is better than Legal Aid.

Senator Olson: That is scandalous, if it is true. As soon as I get a chance to ask a question—

Senator Barootes: If it is true.

Senator Frith: Are you denying it?

Senator Olson: I said, if it is true. That is what I have heard. All you need to do to disprove it is tell me how much he is getting. How much is he getting?

Senator Barootes: He is worth his weight in gold.

Senator Olson: As far as I know, it is $1500 a day to give advice to wreck Parliament.

Senator Steuart: Who is paying him?

Senator Olson: Who is paying it? We know that the taxpayers of Canada are paying him.

Senator Barootes: We will take it off your 153 bucks.

Senator Olson: I think you are going to try and take all of it. The only comfort I get is that you will not get yours either.

Let me conclude—

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Olson: You do not want me to conclude, but I am going to anyway. As I said at the beginning, try using the rules and abiding by the rules. You have tried everything else and it fails every time. Every member has a right to speak. Rule 27 of the rule book states that. That is clear. By moving the previous question you have already cut us off, so we cannot move any more amendments. That is over. All we have left to do is to make a speech admonishing the government to do something. I do not know when it will happen, it may be a week, a month, or a couple of months, but eventually we will get to the end of the debate. It will be quite a while, I can tell you that, unless you are going to bulldoze a little more. Go ahead. There is a record kept of this in the minds of the electors. Thank goodness for that. I hope this is not escalated to the point where you are going to take over so that you really do not even need to have that any more. However, there has to be a motion, Senator Kelly, and preceding the motion there needs to be a notice of motion. Senators opposite can look at Rule 19 and find exactly where the authority is to put the notice of motion. I have not dealt with this yet, so I am sorry I said "in conclusion." The Speaker has not the authority to comply with your notion, none whatever. There is no rule in our book, absolutely not even a suggestion of a rule anywhere in our book, that says that the Speaker can interfere or intervene, or whatever the right word is, and say, "I have heard enough". That is what Senator Kelly says. He is asking the Speaker to be a partner in the criminal act of destroying the Parliament. That is what it is. It is a crime. It is a violation of the rules. I feel violated too. That is what it is. It is a terrible, terrible thing to do to Parliament. I do not pull any punches about it. I am not going to stand by and see Parliament violated like that. You do not have any right to even make that suggestion to the Speaker to try to usurp authority that he does not have.

You did not even have the decency to give a notice of motion. You refused because you did not want to have a debate. What is Parliament about? It is about debating, where the minority can come into this chamber and express the views of the people of that part of Canada where they come from. Canada does not start some place here at the Golden Triangle and end there. There is a place called "Western Canada", and within that there is a place called "Alberta", with a few Canadians who want the rights of their Parliament respected. They are sick and tired of the kind of violations that the Tories have been trying to do to it.

I will wind up now, but—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Olson: —there is absolutely no uncertainty about it. You try and get away with this, and the people of Canada are not going to accept it now or ever. The more often you try to violate the rules, because you are in a bit of a hurry, the longer it will take you to get anything through.

We told you at the outset that we were trying to defeat Bill C-62. That comes as no surprise. We told you that we wished to amend it. The report that came from the committee was to defeat it. The bill was so badly flawed that it could not be fixed without scores of amendments.

Even Senator David, all the senators that were along on the committee admitted, in the various places where we heard evidence, that there were severe injustices. In fact, right in Regina there were two or three cases drawn to our attention where the provisions of the bill were absolutely unjust. Even the Tory senators on the committee admitted that, "Yes, we have to fix that."

When we arrived in Whitehorse, there was another case. For example, the way the government was going to apply the goods and services tax to the outfitters up there. You may not think that is a big deal down here, and it is not; however, up there it is the largest part of their economy, outfitters to go on hunting and fishing trips. That is the tourism that is there. They explained very, very carefully how it was to be applied to them and how unjust it was. I heard Tory senators there agree. I will not go over the details now, unless you wish, because I remember them very, very vividly. For example, the application of that 7 per cent tax on the visiting clientele from the United States where everybody has to keep all the bookkeeping that is necessary to calculate the tax, collect the tax, and remit it to the federal government, and then, if that person goes to the trouble of applying for a rebate—and they can under the bill—they can apply for a rebate and get all their money back. What in the name of common sense do you want such a law for? To have those people go to all that trouble to calculate the tax so that they can remit it, and then as soon as their clients get back to the border, or into the United States, they can apply and get all of their money back. The government has gone to the expense, the person has gone to the expense, both the outfitter and his customer, and nobody winds up with a dollar. Is there any sense in that?

When we returned here, "Not one amendment". Nothing. That is what we were told. That is what hurts.

The opposition did not have the right, did not earn the right, to govern the country. We accept that. We understand that. We certainly do have the right, in fact an absolute, unequivocal obligation to point out weaknesses in legislation. A government that has any "smarts", if you want to call it that, or "intelligence", recognizes that and makes those adjustments. Not this government.

Did you notice in advance that no matter how much you study it—they did not even want us to go and study this. They did not want us to go and look at it. They gave us all the excuses about the deficit and the rest of it, but when the bill started out, "Oh no, it is revenue neutral. It is not going to do anything for the deficit." That is what the Minister of Finance said. I believe they are still carrying on that facade over there, to some extent. Then they said, "It is a substitute tax. We are not going to collect any more tax, we are just going to do it at this level, rather than that level, where the manufacturers' tax is now". We have a few intelligent people in Canada who are intelligent enough to do the research. They brought to us case after case where it was not a substitute tax, collecting the same amount of money from the same people. It is a massive transfer of the tax burden from one group of Canadians to another, to the poor people. You are not quite as poor as I am, but you know what I mean. It is easy for you to say. They can figure it out.

I have to admit that I had not done all the research on how serious this would be. I tell you, the Trade and Labour Council on the south shore of Nova Scotia did. They did the calculation on how much more of the so-called "$18 billion" that they were going to pay as a result of this bill, and the repeal of the other taxes—they just pointed out that Nova Scotia, by and large, was going to pay between 15 and 20 per cent more tax than the people in central Canada on the same package of goods.

Senator Steuart: Shocking.

Senator Olson: The most—

Senator Steuart: Senator Doody, rise up in horror.

Senator Olson: That is the facade that has been presented to us. This Bill C-62 does not stand up under investigation.

First of all, everything they claim for it is wrong. It is not revenue neutral. Even at 7 per cent it is not revenue neutral. That is the first thing insofar as overall revenue is concerned. It is not a transfer from one form of tax to another form of tax. It is actually transferring the tax burden to a different group of people. I tell you it goes with the great so-called free trade, because all those multinational corporations will win. In every way you want to add up this tax, the government has been dishonest with the Canadian people. It is sad because the fact of the matter is you will still be the government for the next 2 or 3 years, whether Canadian people like it not. Unfortunately the mandate lasts for 5 years in this country.

An Hon. Senator: How did they make out in the recent elections?

Senator Olson: I hope someone else can comment about that. I understood that they went down around 10 per cent. They did not run a candidate in Beausejour. I heard they received about 10 per cent in York North.

Some Hon. Senators: 8 per cent, 8 per cent.

Senator Olson: That is 20 per cent under 10 per cent. You are down to one digit. I will tell you something else. We have not yet had a test, but you are down to less than that in Alberta. It was 7 per cent by the last poll. You kicked out two members so you only have 22 members left from Alberta. That is sad.

Senator Bonnell: Nice fellows out there, too; Mazankowski.

Senator Olson: A lot of good people out there. What you are really doing and what makes me very angry is you are destroying parliament and parliament's function.

Senator Comeau: You have said that several times.

Senator Olson: I know I have said it. Do you believe it? I have to keep making these arguments from different angles until you are persuaded. If you get up on your feet and say you believe you are destroying parliament and had better not do this, and then Senator Kelly gets up and says he is sorry he did not realize how badly he was damaging parliament, that would help quite a lot. I do not think he will do it. It does not look like it. So we are defending the institution of parliament in Canada.

Senator Stewart: About two weeks ago, Senator MacEachen made an interesting intervention in which he raised questions about the revenue productivity of the proposed goods and service tax. That speech challenged in a tentative way the arguments put forward by many speakers; among them Senator Kelly, Senator—

An Hon. Senator: What is his name?

Senator Stewart: What is his name? It escapes me. The man who sits on this side but always votes for the government—Senator Everett, that's it. Yes, the arguments of Kelly, Everett, Poitras and Senator Castonguay. I know that Senator Kelly has a speech in which he will seek to answer the questions raised by Senator MacEachen. Nevertheless, Senator Murray has told Senator Kelly to sit down. He says, "Where do you think you are? Do you think you are in Parliament? Do you not realize that this is a club? Do you not realize that this is Club Patronage, where you drink tea and read books? You do not talk. This is not Parliament." Do you not realize, Senator Olson, that Senator Kelly is just waiting for Senator Waters and Senator MacEachen to speak so that he can get up and deal with Senator MacEachen's questions. That is why he is waiting here so patiently this afternoon. Do you not realize that?

Senator Olson: Maybe. My problem is that I cannot accommodate him in that respect because if I do not make my full speech now I will never make it. They do not let you rise twice here. I think Senator Kelly wishes to make a speech like that, also. He could act like Senator Simard who says everything that crosses his mind the minute it happens. Senator Kelly has not been doing that so we do not know what he thinks. The problem is that if I am to wait for him, my opportunity will not be available to explain how deeply I feel about this attempted violation of Parliament. I have to conclude now and, as I said a few minutes ago, I would conclude but points are raised where I have to make further explanations.

The rules in our book are not written in complicated or ambiguous language. I remember Senator Molson for years was Chairman of the Committee on the rules, and Senator Molgat was a very important member of that committee. They do not write these rules in ambiguous language. They are clear and simple and in words for which there is only one meaning. We do not need these references to the so-called authorities. That is what is so disturbing. It is a complete head-on confrontation with the rules. It makes me sad to think that you would even try, because surely you understand what is written in Rules 44, 27 and 26.

Do you remember the fight we had here the other day over Rule 26? There is nothing ambiguous or unclear about the wording. Senator Kelly, if you think the Senate needs a rule regarding limitation of time for debate and closure and that sort of thing, then do it right. Bring in a notice of motion. You need only wait two days. You could even ask for unanimous consent, and we might give it to you. I doubt it, though, now that we know your intentions. You have to ask the senators, and there is no way of asking them except by way of motion. Do not ask the Speaker to do something for which he has no authority. For heaven's sakes, do not ask the Senate to give the Speaker the authority, either. We do not need the Speaker in here with the authority to decide he has heard enough and the debate is over. I have not yet had a chance to speak on Bill C-62.

Senator Bonnell: We are waiting to hear from you.

Senator Olson: There are 40 more of my colleagues who have not yet had a chance to speak on third reading.

Senator Barootes: You are not allowing them the chance.

An Hon. Senator: Ask Senator Gigantès about that.

Senator Olson: Ask other people about that. That is such an assinine comment, it hardly deserves—

Senator Barootes: Ask Senator Hébert how much time he allowed his friends.

Senator Olson: Senator Barootes, do you not understand what a filibuster is?

Senator Barootes: I am learning.

Senator Olson: You want me to explain it to you? A filibuster is when you take a little time until the senators or members opposite receive the message from Canadians.

Senator Bonnell: Until the people in Canada have an opportunity to understand the Bill.

Senator Olson: People have the right to mobilize their thoughts and carry that message. There is a whole lot more coming. There are demonstrations which will be escalated to a higher level until the Government understands that 90 per cent of the people in this country, who will be hurt by Bill C-62, want to be heard in Parliament. They do not want the debate cut-off at every stage as it was in the House of Commons. When the bill arrived in the Senate, they said, "Thank God for the Senate." Then you try to destroy this institution, too. You should know that ordinary people have the right to be wrong. That goes with democracy, too.

An Hon. Senator: They have the right to be heard.

• (1650)

Senator Olson: There are not great financiers and rich people in this country who are going to tell the others what is good for them. People want to be heard in the halls of Parliament.

Mr. Wilson has said, "I know it's not popular, but it's right." He says that about his monetary policy also. There are so many bankruptcies because of the debt service charges on innocent people—especially in the agriculture sector—who have no way of escaping. They do not believe it is the right policy for Canada or for them. Are we going to have a few rich people telling us what is good for us? We have had that once or twice before. I am sad when I think about the remedies that have been taken in other countries, when a few rich people take over and decide what is good for everyone else.

Senator Murray: Who is it you want to speak?

Senator Olson: I want Senator Waters to speak. We know you now have the numbers. Remember that illegal act you pulled; you swamped the Senate.

Senator Murray: There have been three court decisions against you on that point, Senator Olson.

Senator Olson: I do not care if there is another ten, I do not happen to agree with it.

[Senator Bonnell.]

Senator Everett: And you are wondering about the rich people taking over.

Senator Barootes: This is where you are supposed to show righteous indignation.

Senator Olson: Section 33 of the BNA Act says that the Senate shall decide. It does not say that the courts shall decide. You bring in eight senators in order to swamp the Senate, and then you are judge and jury all by your own self. Take the eight out and then the Senate can decide. We have no problem with that.

Senator Everett: What is the Senate deciding?

Senator Olson: Read section 33 of the BNA Act.

Senator Everett: Are you saying that the Senate decides on appointments?

Senator Olson: Yes. The Senate decides if they are qualified. On page 9 of the BNA Act, section 33 says:

> If any Question arises respecting the Qualification of a Senator or a Vacancy in the Senate the same shall be heard and determined by the Senate.

Senator Everett: Read the section on the qualifications now.

Senator Olson: Why do you want me to read that? There are many qualifications. I am telling you that the Senate decides. The Tories brought in eight senators. We say, "Are we going to have a vote without it being swamped, or are you going to bring in the swampers to decide whether or not they are qualified?"

Senator Everett: Read the section on qualifications.

Senator Olson: I did not look at that section. There is something about $4,000 and being a Canadian citizen.

Senator Everett: When you interpret a law, you interpret the other sections.

Senator Olson: I did not interpret the law. I read the law to you. You can interpret it any way you like.

Senator Steuart: Are you saying that the courts are always right?

Senator Everett: If the Supreme Court made a decision, I would abide by it.

Senator Olson: When did the Supreme Court make a decision on this?

Senator Everett: You said you did not care which court made a decision, you would not agree with it.

Senator Olson: I said that I agree with section 33 of the BNA Act, but not with a bunch of swampers.

Senator Murray: What about section 26?

Senator Olson: Section 26 of what?

Senator Murray: Section 26 of the Constitution Act of 1867, as we call it now.

Senator Frith: The Ontario Court of Appeal wants to take a look at that. They granted leave to appeal. You have been crowing over the fact that there was no doubt. There is obviously a doubt. He would not have given leave to appeal if he did not think there was a good, sound reason to doubt. You can be sure of that, sir. Take it from me.

Senator Murray: All right.

Senator Frith: I articled to him. He was my chief when I was a law student and he knows his business.

Senator Murray: I know.

Senator Olson: Parliament—and the Senate is part of Parliament—ought to have the confidence of the people. The people who are occupying the treasury benches in the other place are down to 15 per cent in the polls. In my province they are down to 7 per cent.

We respect the law, whether or not we agree with it. The law says that the mandate is for five years. Now we have to stumble along with this government and all this mess.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I have been the recipient of a fair amount of instruction this afternoon.

Senator Olson: No, just good advice.

Senator Kelly: It comes from friends and I know it is well meant. However, I cannot see that anything has changed and I have not been persuaded.

Senator Olson: I want to ask if this is a question. If it is not a question, you do not have a right to interrupt me. You have made your speech on a point of order.

Senator Kelly: I want the Speaker to give me a ruling on my point of order.

Senator Olson: If you have a question, ask it. If you do not have a question, stay in your seat and respect the right of other senators to speak.

Senator Kelly: Senator Olson did not sit down when I stood up.

Senator Olson: Then you went into a tirade. If you want to change the rules, Senator Kelly, do not come forward with some notion in a letter and try and confer on the Speaker authority that he does not have. That will not wash. Whatever it takes to stop that kind of abuse of Parliament is going to be done by the people on this side. Make no mistake about that.

I will tell Senator Murray that when he is giving little jobs to various senators, for Heaven's sake, follow the rules. They are here and are written in simple language. Section 44 says that you cannot do it that way. It says you have to give notice and then you have a debate.

Until this government and the Leader of the Government got in, I had never seen the need for closure. It was never been attempted in all the years I have been here. I want to ensure that the government does not destroy this institution.

In conclusion, let us have a Notice of Motion; let us have a properly drafted motion. I do not agree with this practice, but I will make sure that you get someone to help you draft it. You have Senator Flynn for $1,500 a day. Surely he should be able enough to draft something because he used to be good at it. Your letter says:

> We believe that this matter requires your urgent attention and that the time has come for the Senate to decide whether or not it wishes to set a date for the final vote on Bill C-62.

For Heaven's sake, where in this rule book does the Speaker or the Senate itself have a right to decide to set a date for the termination of a debate? It is simply not there and you know it is not there. Why do you try to run roughshod over the rules? What I am trying to explain very slowly and carefully is that, under Rule 19 you must give notice of a motion and then you wait for two days.

• (1700)

Senator Bonnell: Is that two sitting days?

Senator Olson: Since we began these long sessions it could be four or five days, but perhaps they could move the motion and admonish their colleagues to let the calendar be the guide. If that notice of motion had been made on Monday we would have been dealing with it now. The comical part of the letter is that it is dated December 10, so Senator Kelly knew he was going to introduce this motion then.

Honourable senators, it is quite clear that the Speaker has no authority to do what Senator Kelly is asking him to do. He has no right to take over the rules in this place. He has done it a couple of times and I can tell you right now that problems will arise out of that before this is over. If it is going to happen again there will be even more serious problems.

As Beauchesne's says, once the motion is debated then it is usually sent to a committee so that other people can also have an opportunity to speak to it. However, if they do not want it to go to committee, I suppose the matter can be dealt with right here. Surely honourable senators opposite do not expect the matter to be decided without a debate. Do they not think we should have a debate on what kind of closure we want to impose? There are several kinds of closure. I was in the other place when closure was introduced. I voted against it every time, but it was done. The motion could be to set aside certain hours during which every question that is required will be put to dispose of the whole matter. That is one way of doing it. The other way of doing it is to stipulate that there will be two days' debate. There are probably more creative and innovative ways of introducing closure, but Senator Kelly does not suggest any. He simply says that the Speaker should stop the debate and call a vote.

We on this side know we have to deal with the "swamp" senators and we know we are going to be swamped with that fact. However, one thing I have admired—and I do not think it will last much longer—is the fact that they are all here all the time. I think that is terrific. I admire that discipline but I think it will be fairly shortlived and I think that is one of the reasons both Senator Kelly and Senator Murray are now using bulldozing tactics.

Honourable senators, I do not think we need closure in this place.

Senator Doody: You are wrong.

Senator Olson: We are here as one of the checks and balances in the system. That is our job. When something is rammed through the House of Commons and its committees and it then comes to this place in that ram-bang shape, it is good that we have a place of checks and balances. I do not think you should try to do that to this place.

Some people think you have to have the goods and services tax for this, that or the other reason. I can tell you that 85 per cent to 90 per cent of the people do not want it and I think that is a good enough reason not to have it. People do not have to have what some big shot thinks is good for them.

To respect the right of Parliament to debate a bill and to propose amendments is a serious matter. If you ram Bill C-62 through this place illegally, it will be challenged. Thousands of people are going to say, "To hell with it." An illegal law does not have to be complied with.

Honourable senators opposite may not think that people are thinking so profoundly but I guarantee that they are. People in my own community have said that they are not going to try to carry on under what now appear to be the rules and regulations to enforce Bill C-62, the goods and services tax. I have heard people say, "I will close up first."

Senator Bonnell: What about the municipalities?

Senator Olson: I was going to explain that until I was so rudely interrupted by someone.

I talked to a group of auctioneers in Calgary who told me that they did not know what to do. They told me that they get consignments of trucks, graders and all kinds of used equipment. They told me that confidentiality was a factor in their business. An auctioneer would check to make sure that there was not a lien against a particular piece of equipment and then he would sell it at auction. Whoever purchased the equipment would have no right to ask where the equipment came from. That was the nature of the confidentiality. All sorts of serious consequences can flow from someone selling off their equipment.

Now, if a purchaser wants to collect a rebate, he has to give a complete history of the equipment.

Senator Bonnell: Is there no more confidentiality?

Senator Olson: No, the auctioneer is obliged to tell the purchaser where the equipment came from.

At one particular seminar all sorts of circumstances were raised and the senior officer from the Department of Revenue of Alberta was asked how they would handle various situations. I can certainly explain as many of those situations as honourable senators wish to hear about because there were all kinds of them. The response from the officer was that they simply did not know how they would handle many situations. The auctioneers then received a registered letter from the City of Calgary which sells a lot of its heavy equipment through auctioneers. In the letter they offered the opinion that the auctioneers need not collect the 7-per-cent tax on what was consigned to them by the City.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Bonnell: Why is that the case?

Senator Olson: We know that municipalities are exempt from paying tax on a service that they themselves provide such as snow removal or garbage collection. If the municipality supplies that service it is exempt. I do not think it is zero-rated but I believe it is exempt. However, if the city contracts that work out to someone else, then it is subject to the tax. They then interpreted that to mean that all their equipment was tax free when they sold it at auction. The auctioneers do not know what to do. They do not know what rules and regulations they have to comply with. The Department of National Revenue does not know either. The auctioneers asked the senior officer about various circumstances that arise as a matter of common practice and the officer simply said, "We don't know." There is nothing new about that. Senior bureaucrats in both the Department of Finance and the Department of Justice simply sometimes do not know what is going on in the real world. They do not know what happens at an auction sale and they do not know what happens in a whole lot of other circumstances. We simply get a message from the government saying, "No amendments." They say that they are going to include all of these things and that they are going to ram it through the Senate after having rammed it through the House of Commons. They say they are not going to accept one single amendment. Of course, they have demonstrated that to us.

Senator Corbin: Even if it is good.

Senator Olson: Yes. If they do at some time get to the stage of administering this bill, I am sure they will introduce amendments in 1991, 1992 and in 1993 to deal with every single one of the amendments we have already moved.

Senator Steuart: And they will take the credit for it.

Senator Olson: Why don't they do it now? Why do you not have some respect for Parliament's right to make sensible amendments? Not one of the eight amendments that were moved was accepted, even at the committee meetings I attended across the country and where the Tories agreed it was a sensible thing to do. I know that Senator Lucier will remember that some of the rules that would be applied to outfitters in the North was unjust and nonsensical. Senator MacDonald, for one, would, if he were here, admit that he agreed it was stupid. That is the right word because they just simply did not know how outfitters function.

Senator Steuart: Is that his word?

Senator Olson: He said it was wrong. I am not going to quote him. Other senators also said that. However, they can all speak for themselves and I hope they do so one of these days. They were so anxious to get to the stage of debating Bill C-62 but, when we get to that stage, they are all silent. They know very well that the bill is not perfect, but they say, "We are going to have it. Pass it with all its imperfection and we will fix it up afterwards." How stupid can you get? That is stupid, pass a bad law first and trust us, we will fix it afterwards. Apparently that is the philosophy of this government.

• (1710)

I have a definition of bad. I did not know it was such a handy word. It is a very simple word with three letters, and it means: "defective, deficient, erroneous, fallacious, faulty, incorrect, inferior, imperfect and inadequate." That is only the first category of definitions. The second category is: "damaging, dangerous, deleterious, detrimental, harmful, hurtful, injurious, ruinous, and unhealthy." That is what "bad" means. This is a bad bill and it fits every single one of those definitions.

There is another category of definitions which reads: "disastrous, distressing, grave, harsh, painful, serious, severe and terrible."

An Hon. Senator: Dumb?

Senator Olson: I did not see "dumb," but perhaps dumb should be included. It is just a bad bill and it fits all of the definitions.

There is another group of synonyms that mean the same thing as bad: "adverse, discouraging, distressed, gloomy, grim, melancholy, troubled, troubling, unfortunate and unpleasant."

On that note, I want to say that Bill C-62 fits all those definitions and close to 90 per cent of the Canadian people do not want it passed through Parliament, which government supporters in the Senate are attempting to do now.

I hope senators opposite will reconsider what they are attempting to do.

Senator Stewart: Senator Olson, I understand there are other senators who wish to speak, so I will not ask my question now. Thank you for your willingness to deal with a question.

Senator Olson: I will conclude by expressing the hope that Senator Kelly will reconsider. After what I think are fairly persuasive arguments, I am sure that he does not want to do this to Parliament. He is too nice a guy to sponsor that kind of notion, and I am sure he will probably reach the stage where he will repent and withdraw the motion.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I believe it is rather fortuitous that I am following the outstanding remarks of Senator Olson who concluded his comments on the proposition that has been made by Senator Kelly at what point debate will be cut off, the guillotine will fall, closure will be used, and tomorrow at 5:45 a bill that is supposed to be perfect, a bill that was unamendable, will become law.

Senator MacEachen: They hope.

Senator Buckwold: They hope.

Senator MacEachen: We don't.

Senator Buckwold: For several weeks the committee heard representations and came back with a report. We made amendments. There were eight amendments moved by the official opposition and two excellent amendments by Independent senators. No matter how worthwhile, no matter how outstanding, no matter how necessary, these amendments were rejected without any consideration at all. There was not a good word said about one of those amendments by the people who sit on the other side. The only thing that was ever expressed was that the legislation is good legislation, that the government has prepared this legislation, that it is ready to go, the Minister of National Revenue is ready to start collecting the tax, and that the people have a tax that is workable, unamendable and the government would not accept any amendments that were proposed.

We were told early in the committee not to bother with amendments. People ask, why did we not bring in amendments? The answer was relatively simple. We know that the government did not want amendments that would send this bill back to the House of Commons before the legislation was finalized.

I now find that there is a very good reason for the closure proposed—I consider illegally—by Senator Kelly, a very good reason. I want all senators to listen to this, because I think you will find it rather interesting.

As this bill is presently worded, it is in fact unworkable. It is unworkable in the opinion of those in the Department of Finance who have to have amendments available before the end of the year, at least on a Ways and Means motion.

Senator Stanbury: This year?

Senator Buckwold: This year. There have to be amendments to improve the legislation to the point that it will in fact be legal, acceptable and workable.

For that reason, it is important that the bill be through the Senate, by whatever means, fair or foul, by shutting up the opposition, taking away the right of Independent senators, taking away the right of those of us who want to speak on this very important piece of legislation and ramming it through as a perfect piece of legislation knowing full well that it is unworkable and that amendments are needed. I can tell honourable senators that those amendments are prepared. I have the amendments in my hand.

Senator Frith: Prepared by whom?

Senator Buckwold: By the Department of Finance in a draft release. This document has come into my—Senator Doody, I think you might find this of some interest because it is a very, very, I think one of the most important—not because of myself, but because of the contents of this information—some of the most important information that we have had for a long time.

• (1720)

The Department of Finance has prepared a draft release.

Senator Frith: Any date?

Senator Buckwold: No date. For immediate release, presumably as soon as this legislation is passed by the Senate, before the first of the year.

Senator van Roggen: Thursday night.

Senator Buckwold: Thursday night.

Senator Doody: Are you in favour of Senator van Roggen speaking or Senator MacEachen?

Senator Buckwold: I will come to that in due course, because I think it is very, very important, when we talk about closure, when in fact we have a document here, which I think will be a bit startling even to you, Senator Doody—

Senator Corbin: It will give new life to the debate.

Senator Buckwold: —admitting that there is a good deal wrong with this legislation that needs change. I will read you the amendments. Do not ask how this document got into my hands, but it is certainly from very reliable sources.

When Senator Doody has the temerity to say, "What are you talking about? Are you in favour of Senator MacEachen or Senator Waters?" I am in favour of good legislation. That is what I am in favour of. What we have in front of us is not finalized legislation, it is not workable legislation, and the government recognizes it.

Senator Frith: And admits it.

Senator Buckwold: And admits it. The government now prepares amendments that will be tabled under ways and means motions before the end of the year in order to correct some anomalies that make this bill, in the eyes of the department, unworkable. With your permission, let me read the document.

> Draft release
> Immediate release Ottawa,

Senator Frith: No date?

Senator Buckwold: No date. I quote:

> CHANGES ANNOUNCED TO STREAMLINE OPERATION OF GST

Now, the first is just a little press release, so it does not give you the details which I will get into in due course.

> The Honourable Michael Wilson, Minister of Finance, today announced his intention to introduce—

No date. That will be waiting until we are through.

> —to introduce a number of technical modifications to the Goods and Services Tax (GST).

Now, when you read the changes and you listen to me carefully, those of you who know this legislation, you will find that in many cases the changes are much more than technical. They are modifications of some significant principles in the bill, principles that have been touched on by witnesses who have come to the committee, amendments that have been made that are not directly on this, but affecting the proposal that I will read, unacceptable, of course, to the government senators, with absolutely no consideration.

> The Honourable Michael Wilson, Minister of Finance, today announced his intention to introduce a number of technical modifications to the Goods and Services Tax (GST).
> The Minister said "the basic objective of these further refinements is to streamline the operation of the GST. In most cases the proposed modifications are the product of detailed consultations with industry sectors and will be put in place to facilitate the start-up of the new system on January 1, 1991."

That is a very important sentence, "to facilitate the start-up"; an admission that without this it would be very difficult for them to start up, in spite of all the things that we have heard.

Senator Frith: This is something that he is going to have said.

Senator Barootes: It was announced weeks and weeks ago that it would be done. By the Prime Minister and the Minister.

Senator Frith: To the Tory caucus.

Senator Barootes: No, to the public.

Senator Buckwold: The first item:

> Responding to taxi industry concerns—

Senator Barootes: We do not need to hear it, it was announced in advance.

Senator Frith: The taxi industry? It is the word. There is no twist. Listen.

Senator Buckwold:

> —the Minister announced that effective January 1—

In other words, effective January 1. So this has to be changed after we have passed the bill. In other words it is a fait accompli. I am afraid that Mr. Wilson is going to get a real shock.

> —effective January 1, all regulated taxi fares will be taxable under the GST. Taxi and limousine operators with revenues of less than $30,000 annually will be eligible for a special transitional credit of up to $300.

Let me make it clear; up to this point taxis had the choice of either charging or not charging if they had gross receipts of less than $30,000.

> After consultation with the tourism industry, the Minister—

That is the taxi deal. We'll get into the details. We have a lot of time. The first amendment that will be brought in affects taxis. As I read the taxi amendment, you will find that taxis have to charge the tax, whether they want to or not. They have to charge the tax. A complete change from what was originally proposed.

Now they move into the tourism industry, and I am again quoting from the Minister of Finance's press release:

> After consultation with the tourism industry, the Minister announced changes to simplify administration of the tourist rebate program. The minimum rebate claim threshold will be reduced to $7.

You are aware that the present threshold is $20. They are now bringing it down to $7.

> In addition, a more streamlined system will be adopted for the assignment of rebates on short-term accommodation provided in package tours sold to non-residents.

A point that was made to our committee by several tour operators, and mentioned, of course, many times in our debate.

Finally, in the press release, before I get into the details:

> The Minister also announced a number of other technical changes effective January 1. Backgrounders on these changes—and on the GST treatment of taxis—are attached.
> A Ways and Means Motion to give effect to the above changes was introduced—

Senator Frith: "Was".

Senator Buckwold:

> —was introduced today in the House of Commons.

When I think of the closure that the government was attempting to put on this chamber in an anticipatory—the audacity of the Minister, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and his colleagues, knowing—at least the Leader must have known, the cabinet must have known—what was coming, and using, in my opinion, the absolute hypocrisy in introducing what they did, in shutting off free expression in this chamber, knowing full well that it was being done because there was a ways and means motion required before January 1. Unbelievable. It is shocking. It is just an indication of the kind of dishonesty that has accompanied the whole presentation of Bill C-62 from the very beginning. From the very first day we have heard untruths, misleading statements and all kinds of propaganda not substantiated by the facts. Honourable gentlemen and ladies across the way know that.

• (1730)

Why did they do it to the taxi-cab industry?

> The Canadian taxicab industry operates under a number of different ownership and management structures. Most cab drivers are independent operators who rent their taxicabs from an owner. Some cabs are owned and operated by the same person while some companies hire employees to operate a fleet of taxicabs.

You might also keep in mind that taxicab drivers are not a bad group to have on your side. Any of you who have ridden in a taxi lately will know what I am talking about. I am sure you have had a bellyfull. They are not bad pressure as a friendly group because they certainly let you know what they think.

> The taxi industry is regulated at either the municipal or provincial level. In almost every jurisdiction, cab fares are regulated so that each taxi operator - regardless of the owner-operator relationship - charges the same fare for each cab ride.
> The Canadian Taxicab Association is a national organization representing the interests of the taxi industry, including taxi owners and drivers. The Federation of Canadian Municipalities also has a strong interest in the regulation of the taxi and limousine industry on behalf of their membership.
> THE GST AND TAXICABS
> Under Bill C-62, the legislation to enact the Goods and Services Tax, taxi fares are subject to the GST. However, the legislation also provides that businesses with annual revenues of less than $30,000 may choose not to register for the GST.

Quite frankly, many drivers told me they were not going to register.

> In doing so, these businesses would not charge GST on sales and would not be entitled to recover the GST paid on business purchases.
> Pointing to unique factors in their industry, representatives of the taxicab industry have asked the government to modify the operation of the GST so that every taxi fare is taxable, regardless of the revenue level of the operator. They identified a number of problems that could result under a two-tier pricing system, such as:
> —Disruption at taxi lines where consumers may seek the non-registered driver;
> —Cab companies would be continually requested to send non-registered drivers;
> —Regulators may be reluctant to include the GST in the meter if some drivers are not required to register. Tax inclusive pricing would make the GST easier for drivers to administer and less confusing for consumers;
> —Some companies may hire only part-time drivers;
> —Companies which operate with employee drivers would not have the same options as companies with independent drivers;
> —-A taxi company would have to charge GST to a corporate account even when GST was not charged by the driver.

These are all objections that were given to our committee. We heard them as we went along. The government absolutely refused to recognize them, but now they have prepared an amendment to cover that.

Senator Barootes: It is not an amendment.

Senator Stanbury: It is certainly not an anomaly.

Senator Corbin: Probably just another idea.

Senator Buckwold: I will not get into a shouting match with my colleague from Saskatchewan until we are finished.

Senator Barootes: Exactly as promised.

Senator Frith: He knows he is in the soup.

Senator Buckwold: Quite frankly, I am not sure whether Senator Barootes really understands this bill. Certainly when he says, "Why an amendment?", it is an obvious indication of his absolute ignorance of the legislation.

Senator Frith: It is a complete reworking of the bill.

Senator Buckwold: You can recognize that from any of his comments and questions.

> The Department of Finance has consulted extensively with the Canadian Taxicab Association (CTA). In a letter to the Minister of Finance, the CTA requested the elimination of the small supplier threshold for taxicabs, "effectively making all taxi rides taxable". They also noted that because drivers are eligible to choose the Quick Method of accounting, the change would not create a hardship for independent operators.

The Federation of Canadian Municipalities, in a press release dated November 27, 1990, urged municipalities to include the GST in the meter. Further, FCM stated, "that the small trader provision should not apply to the taxi industry in order to ensure that the application of GST to taxi fares be equitable, consistent and simple".

Many jurisdictions have plans to include the GST in meter fares. Since the legislation already requires that all tax collected under the GST must be remitted to the government, eliminating the small supplier threshold for these jurisdictions would have minimal consequences.

As I said in my own comments, that is a very significant change. Now this is a little pat on the back which the Government gives itself. It says:

THE GOVERNMENT RESPONDS TO INDUSTRY CONCERNS

This is a strange time to respond.

The Government of Canada, recognizing the highly competitive and regulated nature of this industry, has decided that all taxi fares will be taxable under the GST.

As such, all taxi and limousine operators operating under a structure of regulated fares will be required to register and collect GST on all fares (excluding tips), regardless of the revenue level of the operator.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senator, may I rise on a point of order, please.

Senator Frith: It has been a long time; you must be getting itchy.

Senator Kelly: I am trying to discover how this fits. What are we supposed to be discussing? I want to remind this chamber that I do have a point of order before it and I believe I am entitled to a ruling from the Speaker at some time. We are not on any point that seems to be—

Senator Frith: You are not necessarily entitled to a ruling at all. However, listen and you will find out. We are glad you are paying attention.

Senator Buckwold: I answered the question earlier in that, to me, the very fact that the closure bill that you have proposed—

Senator Frith: The "idea", the "idea."

Senator Buckwold: Not the Bill. The notion, the idea, the thought or so-called brainwave. I think it is very important that senators and the Canadian public be made aware that this chamber is being cut off from further debate, consideration and action. What we already know is that the government proposes amendments, some of which have been discussed here in this chamber, and you are preventing further discussion on any number of aspects of this bill that are not acceptable to the Canadian people. Surely there is a very close relationship to what I am talking about and the proposal or thought that you have put forward.

[Senator Buckwold.]

An Hon. Senator: The legislation is flawed.

Senator Buckwold: I will continue.

Senator Gigantès: There was too much noise and I did not hear you.

Senator Buckwold: I will continue:

As such, all taxi and limousine operators operating under a structure of regulated fares will be required to register and collect GST on all fares (excluding tips), regardless of the revenue level of the operator. Voluntary tips received by taxi drivers will not be subject to the GST.

While the Government of Canada cannot require regulatory bodies to include GST in taxi fares, it acknowledges that this practice will contribute to a more consistent application of the GST in the marketplace and would be a simpler system for drivers to administer.

In addition, the GST transitional credit - currently available only to registrants with annual revenues in excess of $30,000 - will be made available to all taxi drivers operating in the first quarter of 1991. While operators with annual revenues over $30,000 will use the normal rules, other drivers will be able to apply a special $300 credit to their GST otherwise payable for returns covering 1991. For example, a driver with a first quarter remittance of $400 can use the entire credit and would remit only $100. If a driver has a remittance of $200, the credit can be applied to reduce the remittance to nil and the remaining unclaimed credit of $100 can be applied against subsequent remittances covering revenue earned during 1991. That means a driver cannot use the credit to generate a refund. To be eligible for this special credit, drivers must be registered before April 30, 1991.

While all taxi operators will now be required to register, they do not have to include other business revenues in their filings, provided combined revenues are less than $30,000. Therefore, a driver with taxi revenues of $15,000 and revenue of $10,000 from another trade, can still qualify for small supplier status for revenues earned as a tradesperson.

The government also recognizes that since all taxi fares will be taxable, the requirements for drivers to include GST registration numbers on individual receipts above $30—

That was required previously. They had to give a receipt with a GST registration number. I shall continue:

—would not be necessary. While drivers are still encouraged to disclose registration numbers, input tax credits will still be allowed to their customers if they are not provided.

By registering, taxi operators will be able to recover all GST paid—on vehicle rental, gasoline, repairs etc.—since GST paid is deducted against GST collected.

That is why they can do that. It goes on to say:

> Taxi operators will also be able to choose Quick Method accounting. Under this method, GST is charged to customers but there is no need to keep track of GST paid on operating expenses. The remittance can be determined by multiplying GST-inclusive revenues by 5%. In addition, all businesses with annual revenues of less than $500,000, can file one GST return for the year with quarterly instalments.

Let me now get into some other amendments. I know honourable senators across the way are not particularly interested, but these are interesting amendments to those who are knowledgeable about the bill. It says:

> BACKGROUNDER
> TECHNICAL CHANGES
> Residental Exemptions: Part I of Schedule V of the Act will be amended—

Senator Baootes is not here to hear the word "amended,"

> —to:
> - extend the exemption now provided for residential condominium fees to similar fees charged by housing cooperative corporations;—

That is a fairly significant change. It goes on to say:

> - clarify that where, as part of an agreement to supply exempt long-term residential accommodation, the lessor also supplies a minimum of ten meals per week for a pre-determined amount per rental period to the tenant in the place of residence, the supply of these meals will be exempt.

I have given you two amendments. Now I will give you the third:

> Real Property Leases: Clause 12(2) will be amended to clarify that, subject to Division IX of Part IX of the Act, GST applies to real property lease payments due after 1990 and not to such payments due before 1991.

That is an anomaly in the bill that made it almost unworkable. That is a very important amendment for those people who are affected by certain condominium payments that were being made before 1991 on which tax, under the present legislation, could have been charged.

Another amendment deals with imports and exports. Again, this was an item that was drawn to the attention of the committee. It says:

> Import/Exports: The legislation will be amended to codify current Customs practice with respect to the application of sales tax to Canadian goods returned. Containers described in a container bank authorized by Revenue Canada—Customs will be allowed tax-free importation. Other goods that are classified under headings 98.13 and 98.14 will not be relieved from GST under those headings if, prior to importation, they were supplied
> - outside Canada by way of sale,
> - outside Canada by way of lease, licence or similar arrangement,
> - in Canada in circumstances to which Part V of Schedule VI (zero-rated exports) applies, or
> - in Canada to a recipient who claimed, or was entitled to claim, a rebate for tax paid on those goods under subsection 252(1).
> and the goods are being imported for the first time after that supply.

These amendments are important in order to make that legislation workable. It goes on to say:

> Section 252 will be amended to provide for a rebate of the tax paid by an unregistered non-resident in respect of property or services supplied to the non-resident for use or consumption solely and directly in the production of goods for export. The non-resident will be able to assign the right to the rebate to the supplier of the property or service, effectively allowing the non-resident to purchase the property or service free of tax. There will be no requirement that such property or services be exported in order to qualify for this rebate. For the purposes of this rule, "goods for export" will include zero-rated export supplies, supplies made outside Canada, and goods supplied in Canada in circumstances to which section 179 (drop-shipments to a domestic destination on behalf of an unregistered non-resident) would apply. Also, "goods for export" will include intangible personal property embodied on a physical medium (for example a motion picture film or master recording tape) where the physical medium embodying the intangible property and all copies thereof are produced for export.

Again, I know this is very complicated for honourable senators, but it is an indication of the complexity of this legislation. It would be wise to be informed in this regard. It goes on to say:

> Transition: For transportation services commencing after 1990, the legislation will be amended to clarify that tax applies to consideration that becomes due or is paid without coming due after August 1990. The 50 per cent pro-rating rule for passenger transportation services will be repealed: subject, therefore, to the special rules for transportation passes set out in subsection 342(3), passenger transportation services commencing before January 1991 will not be subject to GST.
> An amendment will be made to clarify that, with respect to instalment payments deemed to fall due on December 31, 1990 . . .

This is a very important amendment, and I pass this on to Senator Doody because, quite frankly, it involes having this bill passed immediately and these amendments put into place. The amendment says:

> An amendment will be made to clarify that, with respect to instalment payments deemed to fall due on December 31, 1990 by virtue of paragraph 118(5)(b), FST becomes payable on those instalments on that date.

Relevant provisions in the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act and the Customs Tariff will be amended to limit the claiming of refunds and drawbacks for FST, Telecommunication Services Tax and Telecommunication Programming Services Tax on transactions straddling the start-up date. Refunds or drawbacks of FST under these Acts will be availalbe only where the event giving rise to the refund or drawback occurs before 1991. These limitations on drawbacks and refunds will not apply to refunds for tax paid in error or bad debts under sections 68, 68.15 and 68.21 of the Excise Tax Act, for which adjustments will continue to be available to licensees in respect of pre-1991 sales.

● (1750)

Insurance, Warranties and Damage Claims: Subsection 123(1) will be amended to revise several definitions in the area of insurance and warranties. Paragraph (j) of the definition of a financial service will be amended to remove the licensing requirement for marine claims adjustment services. The definition of an insurance policy will be amended to exclude contracts for the service, maintenance or warranty of tangible personal property. The definition of a segregated fund will be extended to include properties held in respect of insurance policies other than life, such as annuities. Section 182 will be amended to exclude from its application: late payment penalties to which section 161 applies; amounts payable to a carrier by a shipper for delays in loading or unloading cargo (demurrage charges); penalties charged by one railway company to another for failure to return rolling stock on time (per diem charges); and damage, penalty or compensation payments made by a supplier to a recipient—this would include such things as non-performance penalties (e.g. failure to meet construction deadlines or quality standards), payments in settlement of warranty claims, and freight damages.

Honourable senators, that is a very significant change.

The next section, I think, is of interest to large business directors. Perhaps Senator Eyton may be interested in this amendment. He may have written it. It states:

Closely Related Corporations: Amendments will be made to the rules affecting closely related corporations. Subparagraph 128(1)(a)(vi), which defines two corporations as closely related when a group of five or fewer persons owns 90% or more of both corporations, will be deleted. In addition, the Act will be amended to ensure that where the use of a capital property, acquired before 1991, changes as a result of a corporation filing an election under subsection 150(1) that is effective before April 1, 1991, subsection 206(4) will not apply to that property.

I am not suggesting that anyone try to understand all of this, but it is a very important amendment. I can see a smile on Senator Eyton's face, perhaps indicating that he feels it was almost worthwhile form him to have to sit here during these long hours of tedium in order to have that change effected. I think it will please the large business community very well. It then continues as follows:

[Senator Buckwold.]

Tourist Rebates: Two changes will be made to the design of the tourist rebate program. First, the $20 minimum rebate claim threshold will be reduced to $7.

That is a very significant change. It continues:

Second, the assignment of the rebate for short-term accommodation provided in package tours—

—a matter that was raised before our committee on several occasions—

—sold to non-residents will be replaced with a much more streamlined system. The revised system will ensure that all short-term accommodation sold outside Canada to non-resident visitors to Canada will be effectively tax-free, without the complication of signed assignments or separate rebate claims being filed by those visitors. Additional details on these changes [have been/will be?] announced by the Minister of State (Small Business and Tourism).

Senator Corbin: Who is that?

Senator Buckwold: I think that is Mr. Hockin.

Senator Corbin: Is he not the fellow who said that implementation should be delayed?

Senator Buckwold: Yes, and that is one of the reasons why it all comes together.

Another change deals with lottery tickets. It states:

Lottery Tickets: The Act will be amended to provide a simplified treatment of sales of lottery tickets. Under this treatment, lottery corporations will remit tax on the full sale price of tickets. In turn, retailers and wholesalers of lottery tickets will not be required to remit GST their sales of tickets nor will they claim input tax credits on their purchases of tickets. In addition, transactions between provincial lottery corporations and retailers/wholesalers relating to lottery ticket sales will be ignored for GST purposes. These will include:

- payment from provincial lottery corporations to retailers/wholesalers:
  - encashment fees
  —reimbursements for prizes paid by retailers to consumers
  —promotional bonus payments
  —sellers' prizes (i.e. for vendors of winning tickets)
  —commissions on sales of tickets —payments from retailers/wholesalers to provincial lottery corporations:
  —administration fees
  —payments for damages to lottery corporation property.

With respect to the calculation of the net tax remittance by the Provincial Lottery Corporation, the tax it remits on the wholesaler/retailer's margins will not form part of the formula for calculating the "enhanced input tax credit" as set out in paragraph 188(5)(a)(i).

Senator Marsden: Is there anything on books or on reading materials?

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, in answer to Senator Marsden's question, there is nothing on books yet, but obviously that is coming.

• (1800)

Honourable senators, as I conclude the statement that I have made here today, I express my absolute shock, and I think that is all I can say. It is not politically inspired; it is shock that a government that ostensibly had a perfect piece of legislation, a so-called seamless web of legislation, "our way or no way" legislation, has abused the Senate by having Senator Kelly submit his idea that we have closure of debate. The government itself quite openly acknowledges in this secret document, which has not yet been released, that it is waiting for this bill to get through the Senate and then, bingo! bring in a Ways and Means Motion immediately. Why? In order to be able to implement that tax. I do not have any legal grounds, but I will go so far as to say that unless these amendments are made the government is in real trouble, over and above all the other headaches it will have in implementing this tax.

So the plot unfolds. The scenario is becoming more and more apparent as we see the so-called plot of the government. Why did it bring in closure? In order to get the amendments through that are necessary for this so-called perfect bill. That is all the more reason for us to reject in a very real and positive way the submission of Senator Kelly and his request.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Senator Buckwold, would you permit a question? In light of the document you have just read, would you comment on two particular issues which were discussed quite extensively before the committee.

As you will recall, there was an extensive discussion at our hearings in Moncton where the tourist industry in the Atlantic region objected strenuously to the impact the GST would have on that industry. I specifically remember that it was Moncton, because Senator Robertson dug out departmental memos from the government indicating that the GST would have no impact on the tourist industry. I think you will recall at the Moncton hearings there was quite a heated exchange between Senator Robertson and the witnesses and some senators on our side who were supporting the position the witnesses were taking.

In light of the department's previous statements, as quoted extensively by Senator Robertson at the hearings in Moncton, do you think those statements are consistent with page nine of the document which you read a few minutes ago, which talks about changing the minimum rebate claim, simplifying the process and, in effect, "ensuring that all short-term accommodations sold outside Canada to non-resident visitors to Canada will effectively be tax free"?

First, can you explain why the government is now accepting all of the comments and criticisms that were made with respect to this particular issue as outlined in the amendment? These are the same criticisms Senator Robertson called categorically untrue.

The second observation I would like you to comment on relates to page four of the document, where it states explicitly that taxi operators will be able to recover all GST paid on gasoline and repairs. I am particularly interested in repairs. I presume the argument, as this document makes it, is essentially that a taxi is the vehicle by which a taxi operator earns his living. Would you care to comment why that logic should not also apply to repairs made to boats used by fishermen, since a boat used by a fisherman is, as a taxi is to a taxi operator, the vehicle used to earn income? If repairs to taxis are to be free from the GST, why should exactly the same logic not be applied to repairs to fishing boats or indeed repairs to farm equipment such as tractors and combines?

I raise those two specific issues because, as you will recall, they were raised during our hearings this summer. This summer, we were repeatedly told by government members that the GST would never be changed with respect to those areas and that in fact it had no impact on those areas. Would you care to comment on whether my recollection of the hearings is correct? If so, why is the government proceeding this way, or proposing to proceed this way if, in fact, it ever gets the bill. In particular, as someone from the east coast, why will a taxi operator not pay GST on repairs to a taxi, and why then should a fisherman pay the GST on repairs to his fishing boat?

Senator Buckwold: Senator Kirby, I wish I had the answer to your question as to why the fisherman is not treated in the same manner. I would gather the government justifies the difference on the basis that one is part of the food industry, with the complications that are involved in that. Far be it from me to try and read the minds of the Minister of Finance and some of his officials.

Insofar as the tourism rebate is concerned, that was asked for by tour operators and others involved in the tourist industry. Certainly, it will help a little. As you will recall, it is a long way from meeting the problems that have been created by the GST and Bill C-62 for that very important industry for Canada.

As far as your question concerning the taxi, I presume the answer is that once the GST is paid, by law under this new change you are required to charge the GST and, as such, you are entitled to a rebate under the system, the input tax credit or the output tax credit for what is paid out and, therefore, it averages itself out. They are treated as any other business.

Again, the whole bill is so complicated that some of the answers become very fuzzy, as you can gather from the way in which I have responded to you.

Honourable senators, in speaking to Senator Kelly's request or notion, I thought it was my duty to be aware of what is going on with respect to the amendments, based on this bill being passed by the Senate before the end of the year.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it being 6 o'clock I shall leave the Chair to return at 8 o'clock.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended.

At 8 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

THE SENATE

POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, concerning the point of order raised by Senator Kelly yesterday—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Hold it.

Senator Olson: Order!

The Hon. the Speaker: —I wish to make the following statement: This is not an issue for me to finally decide.

Some Hon. Senators: Order.

Senator Cools: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is, however, a matter which a majority of voices in the Senate can decide, like any other question.

An Hon. Senator: Order.

The Hon. the Speaker: This is clearly provided for in Section 36 of the Constitution Act of 1867—

An Hon. Senator: Order!

The Hon. the Speaker: —and rule 49(5) of the Senate.

An Hon. Senator: Sit down.

Senator MacEachen: You sit down.

An Hon. Senator: Sit down.

The Hon. the Speaker: I suggest that nobody can dispute that fact. The dilemma I face is that, should I rule that I cannot put the question and an appeal—

Senator Molgat: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: —to my ruling is requested—

Senator Molgat: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: —then, the Senate could—

Senator Molgat: No!

The Hon. the Speaker: —the Senate could overrule my decision not to put the question. Obviously, I would have to put the question.

Senator Molgat: Mr. Speaker, you are completely against all the rules of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: On the other hand, if I decide to rule that the Bill be disposed of—

Senator Molgat: You are completely out of order!

The Hon. the Speaker: —and the decision is appealed—

An Hon. Senator: Where are your rules of office?

The Hon. the Speaker:

[Senator Buckwold.]

—whether the Senate decides to sustain or overrule that decision, the Senate itself will have made a final decision in the matter.

Senator Molgat: You are completely out of order.

The Hon. the Speaker:

Therefore, in order to give the Senate a clear and definitive opportunity to decide—

Senator Molgat: You are corrupt.

Senator Olson: That is wrong.

An Hon. Senator: This is Heffnerism.

The Hon. the Speaker:

—which is its undoubted right, I rule, that not later than 5:45 p.m., on Thursday December 13, 1990—

Senator Molgat: You are corrupt, Mr. Speaker, totally corrupt.

The Hon. the Speaker:

—I will put every question necessary to dispose of Bill C-62 at the third reading stage forthwith and successively without any further debate or deferral of divisions.

Since it is for the Senate to decide this matter, it can do so by either sustaining or rejecting my ruling in the usual way.

Senator Molgat: Sick, sick, sick.

The Hon. the Speaker: Shall the Speaker's ruling be sustained?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: All those against the ruling?

Senator Molgat: Sit down.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators,

The Hon. the Speaker: The yeas have it.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Senator MacEachen: I have a question of privilege.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I rise on a personal question of privilege.

Senator Cools: There is a question of privilege.

The Hon. the Speaker: I said, "Call in the senators."

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I have a question of personal privilege.

The Hon. the Speaker: I said, "Call in the senators."

Senator Stanbury: The Speaker has given a ruling which is a nullity. There was no proper—

An Hon. Senator: Call in the senators.

Senator Stanbury: —listening to orders and the alleged ruling was without foundation.

Senator Olson: You had better keep out of it. This is a party matter.

Senator Stanbury: —contrary to the practices of the Senate of Canada. My point of personal privilege—

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Don't let them scare you.

The Hon. the Speaker: I said, "Call in the senators."

An Hon. Senator: Sit down.

Senator Olson: You don't have any right to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker: I have the right to do so.

Senator Olson: You do not.

The Hon. the Speaker: I was asked for a ruling.

Senator Stanbury: —as a member of long standing of the Senate of Canada, in Ottawa—the privilege of the Senate as a whole—

The Hon. the Speaker: Are the bells ringing?

Senator Stanbury: My point of personal privilege affects not only my privileges as a member of long standing in the Senate of Ottawa but affects the Senate as whole.

The Hon. the Speaker: Are the bells ringing? Is it a 30-minute bell?

Senator Phillips: Suspend.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of personal privilege—

Senator Phillips: Suspend. You have your motion.

Senator Stanbury: The Speaker has given a ruling which is a nullity.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Petten: Continue. You are allowed.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators—

Senator Stanbury: The alleged ruling was without foundation according to the rules and practices of the Senate of Canada.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, pursuant to rule P-3(c), I request the vote be deferred.

At 8.20 p.m. the Speaker left the Chair and the sitting of the Senate was suspended until tomorrow at 8:15 a.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 11, 1990

[Editor's Note: Continuation of proceedings from Issue No. 116B.]

The sitting of the Senate was resumed at 8:45 a.m., Thursday, December 13, 1990, the Speaker in the Chair.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable Senators, I rise on a question of privilege, which—

An Hon. Senator: Sit down!

Senator Haidasz: —supersedes all other orders—

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Not when there is a division.

Some Hon. Senators: Order, order!

THE SENATE

POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING SUSTAINED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, last evening the Chair's ruling was appealed. Those in favour of the Speaker's ruling please rise.

Speaker's ruling sustained on the following division.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I abstain because I refuse to participate in this adjudication.

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

Senator MacEachen: You will not stop me—

Senator Petten: He has every right to explain his reason.

Hon. H.A. Olson: I abstain because this is being conducted by a bunch of criminals who are committing a criminal act against Parliament.

Hon. David A. Croll: I abstain on the grounds that the vote is illegal and corrupt and I will not participate.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I abstain because this is a corrupt event led my a corrupt Speaker and a corrupt government.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I abstain because this is a corrupt and illegal vote and I can only participate in such a vote by abstaining, and so protest this corrupt and illegal vote conducted by a corrupt Speaker who himself just voted in favour of it.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: This is a day of parliamentary infamy, and this is an illegal vote by government supporters who know that it is illegal. I will not support any process designed by a totally discredited government that would legitimize this procedural goonery and violation of the office of the Speaker.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: I do believe that this vote is corrupt, and I abstain.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I abstain in this vote. I refuse categorically to adjudicate on the corrupt ruling made by the Speaker of this house yesterday. It is contempt of Parliament.

[Translation]

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I abstain in disgust, because I refuse to have anaything to do with the crushing of the parliamentary system, as perpetrated by senator Charbonneau on the orders of senator Murray.

Hon. Len Marchand:

(Editor's Note: The honourable senator commented in Okanagan).

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Honourable senators, I abstain from voting because I want no part in a corrupt decision made by a Speaker himself corrupted by senator Murray.

[English]

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: I abstain because this is a corrupt ruling and an illegal vote.

Hon. Day Hays: I abstain because I refuse to adjudicate on a corrupt ruling.

[Translation]

Hon. Thomas H. Lefebvre: Honourable senators. I abstain because this is an illegal act and I want no part in it.

• (0810)

[English]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: I abstain because a man by the name of Guy Charbonneau has corrupted this Senate. He has been corrupted by Lowell Murray and by the Prime Minister of this country and his ruling is illegal and contrary to the rules of this house.

[Translation]

He is a traitor! It is an odious vote!

Senator Simard: You are a rascal, Senator Molgat, an uncouth individual!

Senator Molgat: I am telling the truth!

[English]

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: I abstain because this action is a nullity and extra of parliamentary. It is outside the bounds of our Parliament. I refuse to adjudicate or participate in an arbitrary action that is corrupt.

Hon. Joan Neiman: I abstain because I refuse to participate in this illegal charade.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I abstain because I do not really think there should be a vote at all. There was no motion or appeal asked for by the Senate.

Hon. William J. Petten: I abstain because I refuse to take part in this illegal vote.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: I abstain with revulsion at this corrupt action.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: I abstain in this vote because it is the only method I have for showing my disgust for this corrupt procedure by a corrupt Speaker in this Senate chamber.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: I abstain from participating in an illegal vote on a corrupt ruling by a corrupt Speaker.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: I abstain because I cannot support a ruling by a corrupt Speaker carried out by a corrupt government that is carrying on a parliamentary form of diarrhea that I cannot accept.

Hon. George van Roggen: I abstain because I refuse to give any legitimacy whatsoever to an illegal ruling of a corrupt Speaker.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, I abstain from voting because I refuse to participate in an illegal vote.

Hon. Willie Adams: I abstain because we have been corrupted by the Speaker, Senator Murray, the eight new Senators and Brian Mulroney. They are ruining everything in Canada with GST.

(Editor's Note: The honourable senator commented in Inuktitut).

Hon. Charlie Watt:

(Editor's Note: The honourable senator commented in Inuktitut).

Hon. Colin Kenny: I abstain because this is a corrupt ruling by a corrupt Speaker.

Hon. Michael Kirby: I abstain because this vote is illegal and to vote on this motion would be to sustain an illegal action-an action which was set in place by the Speaker, who left me with the impression two weeks ago in his office that he was going to ensure that the final vote on C-62 took place regardless of whether that objective was achieved legally or illegally, within the rules or outside the rules. That vote was—

The Hon. the Speaker: I didn't say that!

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Kirby: He told me that two weeks ago.

The Hon. the Speaker: I didn't say that!

Hon. Michael Kirby: That is, verbatim, what you said.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I refuse to participate in this prostitution of Parliament by unconscionable beings, men and women devoid of all honour and without shame!

[English]

Honourable colleagues, I refuse to participate in this prostitution of Parliament by unconscionable beings, men and women devoid of all honour and without shame.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I abstain from this illegal vote, and I will not be a part of directions from corrupt speakers that are bastardizing this whole institution.

Hon. Keith Davey: I abstain because this is a corrupt and illegal farce.

Hon. D.G. Steuart: I abstain because this is an act by a corrupt Speaker. It is a shameful act by those people over there, and I think it is a disgrace to Parliament.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: I abstain because I regard the vote as a nullity, and it is being carried out under the auspices of a Mulroney pawn.

Hon. Peter Bosa: I abstain because I do not want to legitimize or legalize a vote that is corrupt.

Hon. Paul Lucier: I abstain because I refuse to take part in a corrupt vote which denies every Canadian living in Northern Canada their right to be heard in this Parliament. You will all regret it. Whether or not there is revenge is not important, but every night when you go to bed you will know that Northern Canada never had a chance to speak on third reading. Not one of the northern senators was permitted to speak on third reading.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: This is going to be good!

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I refrain from expressing my deepest disgust and contempt for the Speaker of the Senate and all those who corrupted him.

[English]

Hon. Anne C. Cools: I abstain. This is a corrupt ruling by a corrupt Speaker.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: This procedure demeans Canada. I did not come to the Senate to participate in a demeaning act that would make our country less than it is. It is a corrupt procedure instituted by a corrupt Speaker under the direction of a corrupt leader in the Senate who, for the rest of his life, will have to live with his actions.

[Translation]

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I abstain, since I do not want to be tainted by the corruption of Charbonneau, Lowell Murray and their accomplices.

[English]

Hon. John B. Stewart: I abstain because I do not wish to lend the colour of legitimacy to an act of thuggery.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: The Speaker's ruling is corrupt and this is an illegal vote. I abstain.

Hon. Charles Turner: I abstain. The Speaker is corrupt and he has no integrity. If this were a union hall, he would wind up, Chair and all, out in the lot or on the front lawn.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Yesterday I presented a motion that was seconded by Senator Waters that would allow independent Senators to speak. That motion was acceptable under the rules, and it was my right. During the supper adjournment I had a discussion with Senator MacEachen to indicate his willingness to stand aside for Senator Waters if I would withdraw the motion about Senator Water's right to speak. Accommodation had been reached for Senator Waters to speak, and we so advised the deputy leader. By his ruling, the Speaker has prevented that event from taking place and Senator Waters from having his right to speak.

You, Mr. Speaker, I am saddened to say, not only have a responsibility but a duty to protect the rights of independent senators to speak in this chamber. I am saddened to say that you have failed in that duty of allowing us our right to speak. If I am prevented from exercising my legal right to speak, how in the name of God can I vote? So I abstain.

Hon. Stan Waters: I abstain for the reasons expressed by Senator Lawson. The Speaker has let both of us down. You have said to us that you will look after the independents. Neither of us had an opportunity to speak in this debate. It is a denial of our democratic right and a travesty of Parliament against those people who have been left out by the ruling. I abstain.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. The Speaker has given a ruling that is a nullity. There was no proper point of order and the alleged ruling was without foundation under the rules and procedures of the Senate of Canada.

My point of personal privilege affects not only my privileges as a member of long standing of the Senate of Canada, but the privileges of the Senate as a whole and of each individual senator sitting anywhere in this chamber. The government bulldozer must be stopped before it destroys not only the Senate but the Parliament of Canada.

MOTION OF CENSURE

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: As a result, I find it necessary, sadly, to move, pursuant to Rule 33 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada as follows:

Whereas Speaker Guy Charbonneau, on September 27, 1990, left the Chair and ordered the doors locked although a sitting of the Senate was still in progress; and

Whereas Speaker Guy Charbonneau, on October 4, 1990, broke the rules of the Senate by arrogating to himself the right to set the time for division in direct contravention of the Rules of the Senate, which provide that a vote will be taken only on the consent of the Whips; and

Whereas the aforesaid violation of the Rules of the Senate was deliberate, as stated by Senator Charbonneau in a letter sent by him that day to four senators, with copies to six others; and

Whereas Speaker Charbonneau aggravated his offence by not informing other senators of his intention to conduct the division on the question then before the Senate at 5.30 p.m. on October 4, 1990; and

Whereas Speaker Charbonneau ordered the doors of the Senate chamber locked before the hour specified by himself in the aforesaid letter; and

• (0820)

Whereas by conducting the division on October 4, 1990 before the time specified in the aforesaid letter, Senator Guy Charbonneau—even assuming that he had the right to set the time of divisions—which assumption is false—violated section 17 of the Constitution Act, 1867, in that he supplanted the Senate of Canada by a clandestine assembly; and

Whereas Speaker Charbonneau collaborated with Government supporters to deprive other senators of their rights as senators, as suggested by the statement of Senator P. Michael Pitfield on October 9, 1990; and

Whereas Speaker Charbonneau on October 30, 1990, interrupted a senator, a senator then presenting a petition, and gave the floor to another senator who, having presented two petitions—one from three members of Senator Murray's staff—moved—"that the Orders of the Day be read now"; and

Whereas Speaker Charbonneau, on October 30, 1990, ruled that the motion—that the Orders of the Day be read now—which is defined by Beauchesne as a dilatory motion, can be used to set aside Rule 19 of the Senate; and

Whereas Speaker Charbonneau persisted in attempting to originate a new proceeding—by attempting to allow Senator Lowell Murray to move "that the original question be now put" at an hour when, under Rule 12, a sitting of the Senate is suspended; and

Whereas Speaker Charbonneau persisted in attempting to allow Senator Murray to move "that the original motion be now put" at a time when, because the Orders of the Day had not been reached, that motion could not be received by the Speaker; and

Whereas Speaker Charbonneau conspired with supporters of the Government to deprive the Senate of its right, under Rule 26, to decide whether or not to hear an independent senator, Senator Stan Waters, who had given notice of his wish to be heard.

And whereas he then acted as the negotiator on behalf of the Government with the two Independent Senators to come to the terms of an agreement under which Senator Waters and Senator Lawson would be allowed to propose amendments.

And whereas Senator Guy Charbonneau has now made a ruling contrary to the Rules and practices of the Senate curtailing the debate on the motion to move the original question on the Third Reading of Bill C-62.

And whereas Speaker Charbonneau has just now conducted an illegal vote of this assembly;

I move, seconded by the Honourable Joyce Fairbairn, pursuant to rule 33 of the Rules of the Senate,

THAT, the privileges of Honourable Senators having been consistently abused by the Speaker, the Senate do advise the Prime Minister that Senator Guy Charbonneau is unfit to continue to be the Speaker of the Senate.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Moved by the honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the honourable Senator Fairbairn, pursuant to rule 33 of the Rules of the Senate, that, the privileges of honourable senators having been consistently abused by the Speaker, the Senate do advise the Prime Minister that Senator Guy Charbonneau is unfit to continue to be the Speaker of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, it is with great sadness that I move this motion, even though the necessity for it is born of personal shock and frustration at the loss of my personal privilege after 23 years in the Senate, and a sense of shame that honourable senators have allowed our institution to be so badly abused. My complaint concerning the behaviour of Senator Guy Charbonneau is that he allowed himself to become the tool of a vindictive and dictatorial Prime Minister. Mr. Mulroney has no more regard for the preservation of the integrity of his friends and servants than he has for the democratic constitutional institutions of our country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Stanbury: The Honourable Guy Charbonneau came to this chamber in 1979 with a fine reputation as a soldier and businessman. He perpetuated that reputation throughout his service as Speaker of the Senate after his appointment to that post by the Prime Minister in 1984. It is only within the last few months that he has allowed his warm friendship and blind loyalty to Prime Minister Mulroney to cause him to abuse his honoured position as Speaker of this chamber.

His abuse of the rights and privileges of honourable senators has brought the Senate to an impasse and to the brink of chaos and collapse, as we have seen this morning. Unhappily, his blind loyalty to the Prime Minister was exacerbated by his lack of knowledge and understanding of the history and tradition of the Senate and his lack of knowledge of, and respect for, the Rules of the Senate.

In an effort to avoid this final impasse, Senators Fairbairn, Lefebvre, Kirby and I visited the Speaker in his chambers after his offensive behaviour of November 22 and before the present debate began. Our purpose was to ascertain whether he intended to attempt any other manoeuvre, such as this one, to cut off debate on Senator Murray's improperly accepted motion on the previous question. In the course of our discussion, Senator Charbonneau expressed surprise that we should be upset by his previous breaches of the rules and his attempts to make new rules by precedent.

Senator Frith: Incredible!

Senator Stanbury: He expressed complete contempt for the present rules and said that the whole book should be thrown out.

Senator Frith: He's already done that!

Senator Stanbury: He said that, after this experience was over, we would have to write new rules. He also advised us that, before these events began in September, he had little knowledge of the rules but had learned a lot since. He offered the comment that he had not read Beauchesne and did not really know much about it until someone had referred him to a passage in it after he had refused Senator Molgat's motion—

Senator Haidasz: What dereliction of duty!

Senator Stanbury: —under Rule 26, asking him to recognize Senator Waters. Senator Charbonneau told us of his personal, strong, partisan support for the GST and made no apologies for voting with the government on all of the amendments, although other Speakers have not voted since 1943. He also talked about how long the debate would go on in relationship to the need of the government to get the cheques out. We made it clear that getting the cheques out and the length of debate were not his concern as Speaker.

On being pressed by us as to whether he recognized the right of each speaker to speak once on the previous question motion, and to speak at length to make use of delay as a legitimate tactic of the opposition, he said he was aware of the rule that each senator could speak once and he knew of no rule which could limit the time of debate. Yet here we are; he is willing to entertain, and has entertained, a supposed point of order of Senator Kelly, which was clearly out of order, and has now conducted an illegal vote on that matter.

Honourable senators, it would not be fair to recite the perceived sins committed by the Speaker without taking some time to review the history and powers of the institution of the Speaker of the Senate. The Speaker is invested with no more authority than any other member of the Senate. We are all equal in this chamber. Not one of us, including the Speaker, has any more rights or privileges than the others. The Speaker does not have the responsibility, the duty, the authority or even the legitimacy to break the rules of this place for any reason, nor to make new rules. Where the Speaker does have authority generally in preserving order and decorum as outlined in Rules 15 and 16, it is vested in him by the Senate at large. Moreover, even under the most liberal definitions, it is clear that order and decorum are not now in jeopardy in this place—at least, they were not before these activities. Therefore, the one area where the Speaker could be seen as having some incarnation of authority is wholly unacceptable in the current situation.

Furthermore, it would be wrong for honourable senators to attribute powers and responsibilities to the Speaker of the Senate which currently are enjoyed by the Speaker of the other place. I realize that there are many new senators here who perhaps are unfamiliar with the role of the Speaker in this chamber, and may be somewhat more familiar with the position and duties of speakers in the House of Commons or in provincial legislatures. Therefore, I feel it necessary to contrast the two.

Robert A. MacKay wrote in The Unreformed Senate of Canada, at page 65:

> The differences between the two speakerships are of historic origin; both offices are modelled on those of the British Parliament. The Lord Chancellor, a member of the Cabinet, presides over the Lords, where he represents the Crown rather than the dignity and authority of the House of Lords. He is not addressed by members when they rise to speak; instead, remarks are addressed to the members of the House. These customs are followed meticulously at Ottawa. Thus, the Speaker of the Senate is in reality but a chairman or presiding senator, not the spokesman of the House in dealing with the Crown as the Speaker of the Commons is historically, nor yet a president who sits above the party struggles.

Professor F.A. Kuntz has written in The Modern Senate of Canada, at page 168:

> The Senate contrives to run its debates without the need of a presiding officer in the traditional sense . . . More important—

And I hope you will listen to this:

> More important still is the lack of any provision for closure, with the result that there is no formal restriction on the right of any Senator to speak at any length in any debate. In the case of difference between Senators the matter will be discussed by the House, with the Speaker > having no more authority than any other Senator. The fact is that the Speaker is not supposed to intervene, even if a rule is broken, unless a member calls his attention to the breach.

Let me read that again.

> More important still is the lack of any provision for closure, with the result that there is no formal restriction on the right of any Senator to speak at any length in any debate.

Speaker after Speaker has bemoaned his or her lack of authority. He or she rules at the discretion of honourable senators.

Let us now see in what respects Senator Charbonneau has violated the rights and privileges of honourable senators and, indeed, has brought the parliamentary institution of which we have all been proud, the Senate of Canada, into disrepute.

First, on September 27, 1990, the Senate was in session, and the bells were ringing to summon the senators to a vote. Without the consent of the Senate, the Speaker left the Chair, ordered the bells turned off and the doors locked. There was no precedent for such behaviour, and no excuse has been offered for his improper behaviour, except a vague reference to Rule 15 and to his responsibility for order and decorum.

Second, on October 4, 1990, the Senate was in session. The bells were ringing to summon the senators for a vote. The Rules of the Senate clearly prescribe the procedure to be followed leading to a vote.

Rules 49 and 50, of course, were not followed this morning, and they certainly were not followed on October 4, 1990. The procedure to be followed leading to a vote is prescribed in rules 49 and 50 and in the Forms and Proceedings concerning voting at page 70 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada. Section 49 states:

> When a question is put to a vote, the Speaker shall ask for the "yeas" and the "nays"—

That was not done last night.

> —and shall thereupon decide whether the question has carried.
> (2) In the absence of a request for a standing vote, the decision of the Speaker is final.
> (3) Upon the request of two senators before the Senate takes up other business, the Speaker shall call for a standing vote, at which time the "yeas" shall first rise in their places, then the "nays", then the abstentions.

Of course, that did not happen last night, either.

> (4) A senator is not entitled to vote on any question in which the senator has a pecuniary interest not available to the general public. The vote of any senator so interested shall be disallowed.
> (5) Questions arising in the Senate shall be decided by a majority of voices. The Speaker shall in all cases have a vote. When the voices are equal the decision shall be deemed to be in the negative.

[Senator Stanbury.]

Section 50 states:

> (1) A senator shall not vote on any question unless the senator is within the Bar of the Senate when the question is put.
> (2) Without leave of the Senate a senator shall not speak to a question after the order has been given to call in the members to vote thereon.
> (3) With leave of the Senate, the vote of a senator may, for special reasons assigned by the senator be withdrawn or changed by the senator immediately after the announcement of the division.

Then, at page 70, under the heading "Voting", it is stated:

> At the conclusion of a debate, the Speaker puts the question.

Where was the debate?

> If there is uncertainty of agreement, the Speaker asks for the "yeas" and the "nays" and then expresses his opinion as to the result.

That was not done last night.

> If two or more senators express their disagreement by rising,—

That was not done last night.

> —the Speaker calls for a standing vote.

That was not done last night.

> The division bells are rung, and when the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Speaker that they are ready to proceed to the vote, the Speaker should say: "Let the doors of the Chamber be locked". The doors will then be locked by the pages and the Speaker will call for the vote.

While the bells were ringing, the Speaker sent out to four senators only, with copies to only six others, a letter which reads:

> Dear Senators:
> In light of the failure of the mechanisms established by the political parties within the Senate—

What mechanisms is he talking about? These are rules we are talking about.

> —to assemble senators for a division within a reasonable time, I will be stopping the division bells and will proceed to put the question now before the Senate at 5:30 this day.

As if he had any authority to stop the ringing of the bells or to put the question at a particular time.

The letter goes on to state:

> I have taken this decision after much reflection to protect the rights of individual senators to perform their duties.

I am not sure that Senator Waters or Senator Lawson believed that that step was taken in order to protect their rights and privileges, nor was it taken to protect the rights and privileges of the people on this side. There was a certain phalanx of people on that side whose rights and privileges were being protected by a partisan Speaker.

The letter stated that he would call the vote at 5:30 p.m. The record clearly shows that he ordered the doors locked at 5:25 p.m., with no consent from the Liberal Whip and no opposition members in the chamber.

The reason for calling the vote at 5:30 p.m. was clearly spurious. The bells had rung for only one hour and forty minutes before he sent out the letter at 5:05 p.m. The notice was clearly an attempt to ensure that what did happen would happen. In other words, the time was so short that it was clear that all senators could not possibly be notified in time. At least half of the opposition senators were not notified in time to be present, and even if they had appeared at the time stated in the notice for the vote, they would have found that the doors had been locked a full five minutes ahead of time.

The fact that the Speaker had turned off the bells and locked the Senate doors on September 27th, a week before, lead to more confusion. Those senators who had received no notice but heard the bells stop assumed that the Speaker had followed the precedent of the previous week, and closed down the Senate.

An independent senator, Senator Pitfield, has made it clear that there was no lack of notice to the Progressive Conservative senators. They all knew well in advance that the Speaker would call a vote, and at what time he would call it, but even Senator Pitfield, an independent, was given no effective notice.

As Senator Murray is fond of saying in other circumstances, any reasonable man would be forced to conclude that there was collaboration, and indeed conspiracy, to break the Rules of the Senate between the Honourable the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Speaker, an offence so heinous that even that one parliamentary crime would have been sufficient to support this motion. But there is more.

Thirdly, on October 30, 1990 Senator Charbonneau again collaborated with the Government Leader in what had to be one of the more awkward and sadly humorous moves that we have yet witnessed. While the Senate was engaged in the Presentation of Petitions item on the Order Paper, Senator Charbonneau, by obvious pre-arrangement, interrupted a senator already reading genuine petitions from among the hundreds of thousands of Canadian citizens angered by the goods and services tax and furious with the government for imposing it. The Speaker then awarded the floor to Senator Doody, the Government House Leader, who used a counterfeit petition signed by three members of Senator Murray's staff to get the floor in order to insert a motion "That the Orders of the Day be read now". The motion passed after appeal among expressions, and well-earned expressions, of derision and disgust.

But the gimmick could not even have been tried had it not been for the compliance of the Speaker. He quite improperly ruled that a motion, clearly defined by Beauchesne as a dilatory motion, could be used to set aside Rule 19 of the Senate, which reads:

> At each daily sitting of the Senate, the Speaker shall call for, in the following order:
> (a) presentation of petitions;
> (b) reading of petitions;
> (c) reports of committees;
> (d) notices of inquiries;
> (e) notices of motions;
> (f) question period;
> (g) orders of the day;
> (h) inquiries;
> (i) motions.

Senator Frith: This is after he had said that he had read the rules and knew all about them.

Senator Stanbury: Yes, this is after he said he had read the rules and knew them now.

Fourthly: now comes another blockbuster. On November 21st, Senator Waters, the one elected senator elected by the people of Alberta, carrying a heavy responsibility to represent his constituents and his party, the Reform Party, advised the Speaker that at the end of the Debate and vote on the eight Liberal amendments to Bill C-62, he would be on his feet to move a further amendment.

On November 22, in the course of presenting petitions from his constituents in the province of Alberta praying senators to defeat this terrible Bill C-62, Senator Waters, on two occasions, made it clear that he would be on his feet after the vote on the eighth Liberal amendment to propose an amendment to Bill C-62. He specifically requested the Speaker, on both occasions, to recognize that he had the floor after the vote.

Instead of recognizing Senator Waters, as he was morally obliged to do, Senator Charbonneau recognized Senator Murray, the Government Leader.

Senator Murray had barely stood and uttered "Honourable senators," when Senator Frith called "6 o'clock," and it was at that time well past six o'clock. At that point the rules require that the Speaker leave the Chair and the chamber. Senator Charbonneau did neither.

Senator Molgat moved under Rule 26 that Senator Waters be heard. That Rule reads as follows:

> When two or more senators rise to speak, the Speaker shall call upon the senator who in the Speaker's opinion first rose; but a motion may be made that any senator who has risen "be now heard" or "do now speak".

So that if the Speaker insisted on ignoring the proper procedure upon reaching six o'clock, he was obliged to accept Senator Molgat's motion under Rule 26 to let Senator Waters be heard; but the Speaker insisted that Senator Murray's motion, which hadn't even yet been articulated by Senator Murray, was on the floor—this is what somebody pointed out to him from Beauchesne, something that has to do with the House of Commons, and this is when he learned about Beauchesne—was on the floor and therefore he could not accept Senator Molgat's motion.

Not only was Senator Murray's motion not on the floor, but if it had been it would have been out of order because the Speaker had not yet called for Orders of the Day as provided in Rule P3.

After protest from independent and Liberal senators, the Speaker acted as negotiator on behalf of the Government with Senator Waters and Senator Lawson. After many hours, he reached an agreement with them. That agreement, quite improperly, imposed terms upon Senator Waters and Senator Lawson in return for the opportunity of proposing one amendment each to Bill C-62. They already had the unfettered right as senators to propose as many amendments as they might wish, to try to improve this ugly bill. That right continues up to the point where the Government successfully moves the previous question—which the Government had not as yet accomplished.

Senator Beaudoin has the habit of saying that his interpretation of a constitutional point is "crystal clear." However, even Senator Beaudoin will have to agree that the series of events that I have just recounted, and the action of Senator Charbonneau are "crystal clear" evidence of collusion and conspiracy between the Speaker and the Government to break, ignore and evade various rules of the Senate. The illegal purpose of the conspirators was clearly to reach the debate on the previous question before the independent senators had had an opportunity to propose amendments. Their fallback position was exactly what they accomplished—that is, to impose conditions on independent senators which they had no right to impose, and those conditions were negotiated on behalf of the Government by the Speaker.

Fifthly, and now Senator Charbonneau's fifth breach of faith with his senate colleagues: Senator Charbonneau knows, that the Senate rules were only revised in March 1988 with the unanimous consent of all senators—independents, liberals and progressive conservatives—and with the important participation of Senator Flynn, who is far and away the best parliamentarian the Government side of the Senate has been able to produce.

Senator Charbonneau knows that the rules provide, under Rules 27 and 28, for each Senator to have the right to speak on each motion. He knows that there is no rule which restricts the length of speeches in the Senate. He knows that there is a long tradition and practice of lengthy and comprehensive speeches in the Senate. He knows there is a rule which provides a method of changing the rules legally, if the competence had been available on the Government side.

Senator Charbonneau also knows that, as a partisan appointee, appointed by the Prime Minister and permitted to speak in partisan debate and vote in partisan votes, his only claim to credibility and objectivity is his even-handed application of the rules of the Senate. He knows that the principle task of any Speaker of any legislative body is the protection of the rights of the minority and of the individual members of that body. He knows today what we know, and that is that he has allowed his office to be prostituted before the blandishments of a close friend, the needs of a desperate government and his own partisan desire to see a piece of legislation, even a bad piece of legislation, passed into law. Knowing all of that, he has made a ruling which is a nullity.

● (0850)

There is no proper point of order and the alleged ruling was without foundation in the rules and practices of the Senate of Canada. That ruling attempted to invoke closure in the Senate of Canada and now, by an illegal vote and illegal procedure, he has apparently obtained a vote which does exactly that.

Can you imagine what an eruption all of this would have caused in the country if it had happened in the House of Commons? Can you imagine the press reports? This is just the Senate, which has earned a reputation for not taking strong stands on behalf of the people of Canada. However, the Senate is important, especially so in circumstances where a failed government jams a bad bill through the House of Commons and the Senate becomes the only refuge of a worried and unhappy people. Let us look at what happened when a similar situation hit the House of Commons. It may be of some comfort to the honourable senators opposite that they are not members of the first government in Canadian history to become so desperate and so arrogant as to make a Speaker the victim of its determination.

In June of 1956, the government of Mr. Saint-Laurent became just as excited over the difficulty it was having in getting the pipeline bill through the House of Commons as the government of Mr. Mulroney has become over its difficulty with the GST. Mr. George Drew, the Leader of the Progressive Conservative opposition, had the sad duty then that I have today. He was moving what is essentially a motion of censure of the Speaker of the House of Commons in circumstances much less damaging than those that are here present today, and I would like to quote from his remarks, to be found at page 4648 of the House of Commons debates on that day. He said:

> The government cannot divorce itself from the tragic downfall of the Speaker on this occasion. He is the victim. He is a casualty of the government's overbearing conduct during this debate. We had done what we could do to prevent the government proceeding on the arrogant course which has produced this sorrowfull result. That was our only recourse; that in fact was our only right. It was the duty of the Speaker to protect our rights just as it was his duty to protect the rights of the government.
> Whatever may be said of the ugly things that happened last week,— and we might say again over the last two months.

> —I think it can be said with certainty that every hon. member is equally sorry that they ever happened. No hon. member of this house will want to see a repetition of the turmoil into which this house was thrown last Friday. Let it be admitted immediately that we all share some responsibility for that turmoil. We all took part in it. We can have no happy recollection at any time of that sad event. May I point out, however, that, confronted as we were with a rigid denial by the Speaker of our fundamental rights to be heard in regard to these issues, we had no course open to us but to register our anger in the way we did.

He went on to say:

Were we quietly to submit in the face of this course that savoured in every way the dreadful dictatorships that have grown up in Europe in these past few years? It was Junius who said that the subject who is truly loyal will neither advise nor submit to arbitrary measures. The subject who is loyal will neither submit nor advise. We were not prepared to submit to as arbitrary measures as ever denied to the sitting members of a legislative body the rights to which they were entitled by tradition, by the rules and by all the declared purposes of this parliament.

I invite honourable senators to examine that debate at that time and see how little the Speaker did deserve this kind of retribution as compared to what our Speaker has done to us. Mr. Drew continues:

For all that happened here last Friday the Prime Minister must accept the responsibility. Most of us have little but sorrow in our hearts for the plight of the Speaker who was the victim of the government's action.

The Prime Minister could have prevented the dreadful scenes we witnessed here—

And for "the Prime Minister" I would put the name of Senator Murray, although the Prime Minister is the grey eminence behind all of these things.

The Prime Minister could have prevented the dreadful scenes we witnessed here if he had asserted his authority along the lines of our parliamentary traditions. The Prime Minister saw where all this was heading.

The Prime Minister saw what was happening in the House and he should have foreseen, as could be foreseen, what the consequences of that erosion must certainly be. I am not seeking for a moment to leave the impression that the opposition did not contribute to the disturbance, as did all the members on the other side. I repeat again, however, that we used the only weapons that we had as free men and women to bring to the attention of this house and to the attention of the people of Canada the disgraceful denial of our rights which had taken place.

We had no choice but to assert our rights as we did. We had no choice, moreover, but to bring this matter to a head by the motion which is now before us.

Here we had no power of self-defence. We have none but to declare what we believe to be the rights of the people of Canada and their representatives here in this house. We shall not be subservient to false interpretation of the rules. We shall not be subservient to anything that savours of dictatorship here in this house. We shall not be subservient to the will of the majority expressed by the Speaker, as it has been in this case, in a manner which no longer seeks to define the right of the majority but establishes for the time being mob rule.

He made one further comment:

A partisan vote on the motion now before us will not relieve the unhappy situation in which we now find ourselves. Never before has this house been faced with so serious a situation. Never before were members of this house conscious as they now are that something good, decent, precious and valuable has been destroyed. There is only one way this situation can be relieved. I appeal with all the earnestness I possess to the Prime Minister as head of the government to follow the only course which will restore the dignity, honour and traditions of parliament.

To let this motion go to a vote that divides the house denies the very basis upon which the Speaker occupies the chair.

Then Mr. M. J. Coldwell, the Leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, CCF, made the following sad comment:

I do not think that any of us like the position in which we find ourselves. We do not like the breaches in those personal friendships that have been established over the years in this house. Some of us do not like the feeling that we have perhaps lost respect for one another. In this connection I should like to feel that we could go back to the position in which we found ourselves three weeks ago and wipe the slate clean, but that cannot be done. We must face up to this situation. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker—as the Leader of the Opposition has said—that no matter what we may do or say for the balance of this parliament, the Speaker has not the confidence of the entire house, which is something which is so necessary to conducting the business of this House.

● (0900)

It is hard for me to confess that a government led by my own party could have fallen prey to the same temptations of power to which the Mulroney government has fallen, but obviously it did, and it paid the ultimate price at the hands of the electorate in 1957 and 1958. However, there are two or three years left before the present government has to pay that price. Senators are not the chamber of confidence in the Parliament of Canada. If we were, the only proper result would be the dissolution of Parliament and a consequent election.

In our situation, in which the Speaker is named by the Governor General on the sole recommendation of the Prime Minister, we have no alternative but to advise the Prime Minister that we have lost confidence in his appointee, that the Senate cannot function without a respected Speaker and that the government leader should adjourn the senate pending the replacement by the Prime Minister of the present Speaker by a senator in whose character and judgment we can have faith, and whose integrity and objectivity we can respect.

There has been some suggestion that the government, through the Speaker, would justify this type of action with a precedent from outside this house. I say to my honourable colleagues that any search for a precedent must necessarily start in the history of this very chamber, and only if there is nothing applicable here should other legislatures be looked at. The rules, the description of the rules, the conventions and traditions of the Senate of Canada are the first and preeminent authority. It is my belief that these guarantee the right of all senators to speak until they are satisfied that they have concluded their remarks.

There has, however, been some indication that the government, through the Speaker, would attempt to put forward the so-called Brand case as a precedent for a decision in this place. I should point out that the Speaker did not even have the courtesy to explain the authority upon which he thought he was making his ruling yesterday.

Senator Corbin: He is ignorant, that is why.

Senator Stanbury: The British House of Commons Speaker, Henry Bouverie William Brand, presided over a session of the House of Commons in 1882 that witnessed members of a tiny Irish Nationalists Party using "tactics of systemic obstruction" to frustrate the success of Parliament. Brand defined the obstruction as the "abuse of the privilege of the freedom of debate for the purpose of defeating the will of Parliament". The distinction he drew was between "legitimate opposition, no matter how stubborn, and wilful obstruction". In the case stated, Brand chose to cut off debate and call a vote prior to the completion of the speeches by some members. This is the only precedent anybody has been able to find that would give any legitimacy whatever to the Speaker's ruling.

Honourable Senators who have spent time in this chamber over the last weeks will know that the speeches given here have been extremely closely focused on the question of the bill before us and not on obstructionism. We are here trying to put our case for the defeat of this extremely poor bill. In lieu of outright defeat we had proposed a series of very good amendments touching on the areas of Bill C-62 that are in critical need of change, and the government has admitted that they are in critical need of change. In fact, the changes have to be made before the end of this year. We are concerned with the substance of the bill, and, according to the fundamental rules of this chamber, I and every one of my colleagues are entitled to speak to this bill and to put our arguments forward. It would be a mistake to see our actions as obstructionist because we genuinely hope to convince some of you across the floor to vote to defeat this bill when the time comes.

It is conceivable that with only a very few votes this bill could be defeated. Therefore, the exercise is by no means perfunctory or without purpose and legitimacy. You have no indication that there would be an ongoing systemic obstruction occurring in this chamber similar to the case described. In the Brand case, although there was some discussion as to how this particular obstruction should be ended, there was wide support, not only from the governing party and the official opposition, but among the public, so the applicability of that case to this situation would be absurd.

First, the House of Commons and the Senate are fundamentally different institutions. As it is arguable as to whether closure or time allocation are appropriate in the House of Commons, it is beside the point here in the Senate today. The rules are quite clear. It is my privilege as a senator to address any piece of legislation that comes before this chamber and to air all my arguments, regardless of the time it takes to do so. Moreover, in the Brand case the action was with the acceptance of the official opposition. I need not remind honourable senators that we constitute the great majority of the opposition in this place and that we are no small fraction of a minority. Our numbers in this chamber warrant respect. Our support outside the chamber cannot be ignored. We are legitimately representing the concerns of the vast majority of Canadian people and we do not want this bill to pass through Parliament.

The House of Commons, for their own reasons, has brought in rules of closure and time allocation. These rules do not exist in this place and they are, in fact, in direct contravention of the rules that are in place and that have hitherto been respected and obeyed. The government is able to cut off a debate at every opportunity in the House of Commons, but it has no right to do so here. The rules are crystal clear in this regard and there are no precedents that would justify action to the contrary. Let me repeat, there are no precedents that would justify action to the contrary.

Rule 30 specifies that it is the duty of the Speaker to ensure that every senator wishing to speak has the opportunity to do so before the final reply. Why in the world has the Speaker made no attempt to follow Rule 30? In addition, convention has dictated that senators do not have a time limit of any kind and, indeed, there is no instance where senators have been prevented from speaking as long as they deemed necessary. Thus there are no means, de jure or defacto, at the disposal of the government or the Speaker to limit debate here in any way. There are no means through law or convention to deny my rights and privileges as a member of the Senate to speak until I have thought fit to conclude my argument and made my case, and I personally have not yet spoken in the debate on Bill C-62.

In conclusion, honourable senators, there has been a deliberate circumvention of the rules and the accepted practices in this place. The Speaker cannot have it both ways. He cannot take on the role of a judicial and arbitrary figure and still conduct himself as a servant of the government and bend to their every whim. Convention over the last 30 or 40 years has dictated that the Speaker does not act as an active partisan, relinquishing his right to vote or speak in the Senate. The Speaker cannot exercise his influence based on the respect of other senators while acting as an unabashed instrument of the government. Therefore, much to my personal regret, I suggest that it is in the interests of each member of the Senate of Canada and the institution of the Senate of Canada that Senator Charbonneau cease to act as its Speaker. That is the only way our rights and privileges may be restored.

I would remind those on the other side that at some time in the future it may be important that their rights and privileges be respected by a future Speaker in this house. I would only add that I do not believe that a vote on this motion, decided by a partisan government majority in this chamber, can in any way resolve the difficulties into which the government and the Speaker have led us.

Some Hon Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, this is my first official speech in this Chambre and . . .

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, as seconder of the motion—

[Translation]

Senator Grimard: Honourable senator, I have the floor. The Speaker recognized me, and I intend to speak!

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Senator Fairbairn rose before you did!

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: —it is with a sense of sadness—

[Translation]

Senator Grimard: Honourable senators, this is my first speech in this Chamber and I intend to speak for several minutes . . .

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: —it is with a sense of sadness and deep depression—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, surely the seconder of the motion should have an opportunity to speak. She was on her feet. Are we going to have to go through Rule 26 again?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable Senators, it is with a sense of sadness and depression that I second the motion moved by Senator Stanbury that:

> The privileges of Honourable Senators having been constantly abused by the Speaker of the Senate, the Senate do advise the Prime Minister that Senator Guy Charbonneau is unfit to continue to be the Speaker of the Senate.

I suggest to honourable senators that no legislation, however important to a government's agenda, is worth the destruction of the fundamental rights of our system—

Senator Austin: Absolutely right.

Senator Fairbairn: —not the GST, not the clawback, not unemployment insurance, not the abortion legislation. As I was preparing for this debate after the tumultuous events of last night, I was seeking to find a definition of democracy that might guide us at this point in the debate. Having read a number of flowery attempts, I ended up with one simple sentence from the late Adlai Stevenson, who said in 1956:

> If I were to attempt to put my political philosophy tonight into a single phrase, it would be this: Trust the people.

I suggest, honourable senators, that the people of Canada have been mercilessly abused by the events that have taken place in this house as recently as last evening.

The fact that this motion is deemed necessary is truly a defeat for each of us, for the government and for Parliament. More importantly, it is a defeat for the people of Canada that the democratic process in this country and in this chamber has plummeted to such depths as to necessitate a call for the removal of the symbol of order and protection in the Senate. That is what the Speaker in the Senate is, a symbol of fairness, honour and political morality in a partisan house of a democratic Parliament. The use of those qualities to bring equilibrium to this place is his only strength, because he is a symbol without power, neither to order or direct our business, nor to interpret or enforce our rules. That is a job for senators themselves, and that has been the tradition and heritage of this chamber.

The present incumbent, Senator Guy Charbonneau, has taken that power unto himself at the risk of totally destabilizing the rule of law in this chamber. Last night he pushed the rule of law over the edge; and today this chamber, subdued though it may be at the moment, internally lies in shambles. Until these past several weeks, Guy Charbonneau has been viewed by all of us with a wide degree of respect and friendship. Until last night I would have thought he would have not willingly come to the brink of parliamentary chaos. I would have thought that only inhuman pressure had forced him to abandon our procedures and traditions—pressure from the Leader of the Government in the Senate, pressure from the cabinet, particularly the Minister of Finance, Michael Wilson, the Government House Leader, Harvie Andre, in the House of Commons, and the Minister of National Revenue, Otto Jelinek, but, most pointedly, pressure from the man who put him in the chair, Brian Mulroney. I must now conclude that Guy Charbonneau has done what he wanted to do out of perversion of a normally honourable quality, the quality of loyalty. He has brought this house to an historic low from which it may never recover, other than perhaps through the election of its members.

Senator Simard: Don't be ridiculous!

Senator Fairbairn: He has brought us to this historic low point—

Senator Stanbury: Look who is talking about being ridiculous!

Senator Fairbairn: —through a perversion of loyalty—

Senator Simard: You were being ridiculous a while ago.

Senator Fairbairn: —to his old friend Mr. Mulroney, loyalty to the Conservative Party, of which he has been a member for so many years, and loyalty to the business community from which he comes. His loyalty has not extended to this chamber—the loyalty he was asked to undertake as the symbol of fairness to each member of the Senate. His loyalty, most sadly, does not extend to the people of Canada who have held out such strong hope that their majority views, held unceasingly since this piece of legislation, Bill C-62, has been before the people of this country, would have a fair hearing in the Senate, their parliamentary court of last appeal. They are the ones who have been so arrogantly rejected. They have dared to tell their government for more than a year that its legislation, leading to massive tax conversion from business to individuals, is badly drafted, unfairly targeted and oppressively directed, at a time when the country is faced with overwhelming economic pressures. It is designed to dig too deeply into the wrong pockets and to penalize the wrong sectors.

The existence of flaws within this bill could not have been demonstrated more dramatically than they were yesterday by Senator Buckwold when he read a draft press release and background information on so-called technical changes, which came to him not out of thin air but from within the Department of Finance, with the suggestion that these were not merely technical changes but were absolutely essential to having this tax operate at all.

The people of Canada want fair taxation, and they have told their government to look for alternatives, to make changes, to compromise. As I have said before in this house, there is no weakness in compromise. In government, compromise and sensitivity are signs of strength.

The people of Canada have not been heard. They have been patronized, at the least, and ignored with disdain. In their frustration, they have turned away from their government massively, in a vast way which has spread across this country and through the north. They have turned away, as well, from the House of Commons because the people whom they elected to that house were not prepared or, perhaps more specifically, were not allowed to represent their views.

They turned to this chamber, the Senate of Canada, because they felt that here they would at least get a fair hearing and that the collective wisdom of this place would have some effect on an implacable government.

Honourable senators, they were wrong, very wrong. In spite of all our efforts at public hearings, at debate, at amendment; in spite of the millions of names that have come in on petitions and, finally, in spite of a last-ditch filibuster, the views of the Canadian people have been met here by a wall of government silence, even with contempt.

Honourable senators, it is no secret that the Senate has been a convenient target for periodic and scathing criticism for most of its life. Despite this, the Canadian Senate has been singularly effective over many decades in examining national issues and making insightful legislative suggestions and amendments. There is a fundamental reason for this. Even with the size and the experience of the current bureaucracy and the work of the House of Commons, legislation does not necessarily emerge in a perfect form. By investigating national issues and legislative ideas at an early stage, the Senate has worked to instill excellence rather than patching up afterward.

The Senate's history of reports and investigations have made a tremendous contribution to the public life of this country. We have produced reports on poverty, reports on aging, reports on children at risk, reports on the media, and Senator Sparrow's magnificent report which has been hailed around the world entitled: "Soil at Risk".

We do not amend bills frivolously in this place. Indeed, of some 300 bills which have been passed in the Senate since 1984, only 19 have had any amendment.

Most of those appointed to this place, regardless of the reasons, have come here with a willingness to work, with a spirit of goodwill, and with a mutual respect. Once here, they have come quickly to understand what this place does well and how they can best contribute. There has been one condition upon which this good work has depended, and that is that the Speaker would maintain at all times full respect for the rights of each individual member to be heard, along with the strict observance of the rules of this place.

Honourable senators, we depend on the Speaker to ensure those rights, to protect them, and certainly not to interfere with those rights. In sum, we expect him to remain scrupulously impartial and to remember the tradition of his post. We have depended upon the Speaker to maintain this impartiality even when we have been under intense pressure from the House of Commons. The bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, presented this year, is a good example. This was a tremendously unpopular bill, guaranteed to force thousands of Canadians in areas of high unemployment away from training, away from work, and into the welfare track from which it is so difficult to escape. Subsequently, that is exactly what has happened.

We tried to address these concerns with a series of amendments which were, for a long period, treated with utter scorn by the Prime Minister, by the Minister of Finance and by the Government House Leader in the Commons, who refused to consider them in good faith and refused to even contemplate a conference to negotiate a parliamentary solution.

In retrospect, it seems clear that the Executive used that unemployment insurance bill to attempt to beat down the Senate in preparation for a smoother sailing for the GST. More significant, they also used Senate reaction to this highly-destructive and punitive bill as an excuse to bring in an archaic and never-before-used constitutional provision to stack this chamber so that the GST could be forced through. Will the eight extra senators stay around indefinitely if this bill goes through today, or will they vote and then leave? Who knows? But that is why they are here.

This action makes it even more crucial that the good faith and honourable behaviour of the Speaker be maintained. Without these conditions, this institution and its long tradition of careful examination, both of issues and of new legislation, is in serious jeopardy. We cannot carry on in the way in which we have been.

Throughout the Debate on Bill C-62, we have had to watch the Speaker constantly. Since October 4th, when we were locked out of a vote, we have not been able to put our trust in him for a minute. Even under the most strident pressure he has not upheld our rights, or recognized senators according to the rules. We have had to guard and fight for our rights in a manner totally inappropriate to this place, and to the decorum traditionally observed here, and none of us are proud of that. We have had to do it because the Speaker has chosen absolutely to ignore the purpose of this place, and the fact that it is an integral part of Parliament.

The Parliament of Canada has two houses, not one. The Senate cannot be muffled and manhandled simply because the Prime Minister and his house leader in the other place find this place to be an inconvenience; nor can a Speaker with any knowledge or respect for this place act as this Speaker has acted.

Neither the Executive nor the Commons have the right to coerce or co-opt the members of this house, including the Speaker. By rule, if the Speaker wants to speak to the debate he must leave the chair. By extension, if he wishes to act in a partisan manner, or feels that party loyalty is interfering with his ability to remain impartial—and that is understandable—surely, then, he is bound by tradition and honour also to leave the chair.

By convention and by virtue of the rules, closure is not imposed in this House. We have no rules of closure or time allocations. Perhaps in the future we will, but we have no such rules in this place now.

Bills leave here once consensus has been reached that they are fit law for the Canadian people: and the GST is fraught with serious flaws which were partially addressed, but only partially, through 10 major amendments moved in this House, eight of them by senators on this side, one of them by an independent and the other by Senator Stan Waters of the Reform Party of Canada. All of these amendments were rejected, and rejected with the tight party discipline which is characteristic of the Commons, not the kind of consideration that is hoped to be a tradition here, particularly in times of strain.

This is not a fit bill, this GST. In poll after poll over the year, Canadians have told us it is not a fit bill, and that they do not trust this Government to spend wisely the revenues raised by this massive new tax. Let us take a look at those polls for a minute. Gallup has shown the opposition to be overwhelmingly rock-solid and rising. Despite the drop in the rate of the proposed tax from 9 to 7 per cent announced last December, 72 per cent of Canadians opposed the GST in September of 1989, compared to 74 in January of this year and 76 per cent in October.

In the October poll, only 16 per cent actually favoured the tax. The October poll revealed also that the tax is unpopular.

Senator Simard: Government by poll.

Senator Fairbairn: Government by the people is what we are looking for, Senator Simard.

The October poll revealed that the tax is unpopular even among declared followers of the Conservative Party with 48 per cent opposed and only 40 in favour. Six Decima polls commissioned by the Department of Finance between September 1989 and June 1990 were so unfavourable that the department withheld five of them for four months and still refuses to release the sixth. In the five released polls, 71 per cent of Canadians who were aware of the tax had a negative impression, and 78 per cent were worried that the Government might waste a lot of the money it would collect. Sixty-nine per cent thought the tax would raise the cost of living too much, and 73 per cent thought it would be too hard on the poor.

A Toronto Star, CTV poll last February showed 79 per cent of Canadians opposed to the tax, despite the lowered rate. This poll found that active opposition to the tax was intense, with fully one-third of those opposed, amounting to one-quarter of all Canadians, intending to take actions ranging from signing or circulating petitions, to writing their MPs, to demonstrating against the GST.

Public opposition to this tax is so strong that 60 to 68 per cent of Canadians in polls by Gallup and the Globe and Mail—CBC, said that the Senate should overrule the Elected Commons and block the bill. Both Gallup and the Globe-CBC polls show that 2 or 3 times as many Canadians want the Senate to block the bill as believed that this chamber should respect the will of the Commons.

We are well into a recession and we may very well be close to a tax revolt; closer than we know. Yet this Government, like the Titanic, ignores all the signals and steams on, bent on serious damage to both democratic process and economic recovery.

At this point the Senate is a house whose tradition and honour have been savaged by a Prime Minister determined to impose his will, and determined in the process to destroy the parliamentary body that would insist on democratic process.

Honourable colleagues what can we do? How can we restore respect for this place, so that we can return with good faith to our proper work? Many government senators know the GST is the wrong tax for Canadians at this time. They have heard the message from experts, and they have heard the message from ordinary people. But the almighty ego, the childish and petty stubbornness of one man so dominates the governing party that all its representatives cower in his shadow and turn away from the citizens who gave him the power to serve them. And it is power that Brian Mulroney craves for himself and power for its own sake. He has neither the ability nor the depth to use it to enhance the lives of Canadians, or enhance the survival of this country.

Bit by bit, that which held Canada together is being torn away by a man without vision or honour. And what of those who follow him? The Leader of the Government here in the Senate, Senator Murray has had a long and distinguished career as a militant in the Conservative Party, something to be proud of, until he too was entrapped by the bizarre appeal of his Leader. He has been a willing pupil. He has shown disdain for this house and those who work in it throughout his leadership.

His performance as a lead Minister during the Meech Lake constitutional debate showed his own total lack of willingness to listen or even to try to understand the forces that were gathering all across this nation; forces that needed to be heard and represented and understood. Instead, they were relegated to the sidelines, outside of a secret process that so antagonized Canadians that the original purpose, to secure accommodation of fundamental concerns for Quebec, became lost in the national anger at exclusion from the process.

● (0940)

The true measure of the Leader of the Government emerged in the final days of panic as the seamless web of the Meech Lake Accord quickly unravelled under the glare of democratic process in the Manitoba legislature. The Premier of Manitoba did not attempt to curtail debate there. He had committed himself to full public participation in a final decision. What did the Leader of the Government in the Senate do? He demanded that the Premier of Manitoba bend the legislative rules in his chamber to force an end to opposition in the province. What utter gall! He unloaded the wrath of his own constitutional mismanagement on the native people personified by Elijah Harper, whose quiet "no" cut through all of the manipulation and the rolling of the dice that Mr. Mulroney and Senator Murray had tried to use to bring Canadian discontent to heel. It is little wonder that in this house we now feel that same heel grinding relentlessly on the efforts of this chamber to give Canadians a voice and some influence in the decision making of an increasingly dictatorial government.

This time it is a massive tax that has been steadfastly rejected by over three-quarters of Canadians for over a year. Canadians have proven to be tough customers on this tax. They have fought against the January 1st deadline and those of us on this side, along with Senator Waters and Senator Lawson, have fought with them. We have carried the hope that our system of government and parliament, with all its vaunted opportunities for public involvement, would break down the terminal stubbornness of the Prime Minister.

We hoped that in this House we could use our rules to take the issue right to the wall, which in other jurisdictions forces negotiation and compromise. We thought that at the very least we could rely on the open rules of freedom of debate and equality of opportunity which have been the rights of each senator under the traditions of this house. What we did not truly anticipate was a Speaker who would resolve himself into nothing but a tool for the Prime Minister, who would throw aside every vestige of impartiality in an effort to respond to the compulsion of the Prime Minister to get his way, to get the GST through unchanged.

In moving this motion of censure, Senator Stanbury outlined very carefully the actions of Mr. Charbonneau which have been compounded one upon the other in this debate, resulting in the virtual destruction of the Senate as a viable place of parliamentary business. I would like to repeat again the full list of reasons behind this motion of censure, and I will quote from Senator Stanbury's own remarks when he moved, pursuant to Rule 33 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada, as follows:

[Senator Simard.]

Whereas Speaker Guy Charbonneau on September 27, 1990, left the Chair and ordered the doors locked although a sitting of the Senate was still in progress; and

Whereas Speaker Guy Charbonneau, on October 4, 1990, broke the Rules of the Senate by arrogating to himself the right to set the time for division in direct contravention of the Rules of the Senate which provide that a vote will be taken only on the consent of the Whips; and

Whereas the aforesaid violation of the Rules of the Senate was deliberate, as stated by Senator Carbonneau in a letter sent by him that day to four senators, with copies to six others; and

Whereas Speaker Charbonneau aggravated his offence by not informing other senators of his intention to conduct the division on the question then before the Senate at 5:30 p.m. on October 4, 1990; and

Whereas Speaker Charbonneau ordered the doors of the Senate chamber locked before the hour specified by himself in the aforesaid letter; and

Whereas by conducting the division on October 4, 1990, before the time specified in the aforesaid letter, Senator Guy Charbonneau—even assuming that he had the right to set the time of divisions, which assumption is false—violated section 17 of the Constitution Act, 1867, in that he supplanted the Senate of Canada by a clandestine assembly; and

Whereas Speaker Charbonneau collaborated with government supporters to deprive other senators of their rights as senators, as suggested by the statement of Senator P. Michael Pitfield on October 9, 1990 . . . ; and

Whereas Speaker Charbonneau, on October 30, 1990, interrupted a senator, a senator then presenting a petition and gave the floor to another senator who, having presented two petitions—one from three members of Senator Murray's staff—moved "that the Orders of the Day be read now";—

Which was treated in the humorous fashion in which, I presume, it was intended.

—and

Whereas Speaker Charbonneau, on October 30, 1990, ruled that the motion "that the Orders of the Day be read now", which is defined by Beauchesne as a dilatory motion, can be used to set aside Rule 19 of the Senate; and

Whereas Speaker Charbonneau persisted in attempting to originate a new proceeding—by attempting to allow Senator Lowell Murray to move "that the original question be now put"—at an hour when, under Rule 12, a sitting of the Senate is suspended; and

Whereas Speaker Charbonneau persisted in attempting to allow Senator Murray to move "that the original motion be now put" at a time when, because the Orders of the Day had not been reached, that motion could not be received by the Speaker; and

Whereas Speaker Charbonneau conspired with supporters of the government to deprive the Senate of its right, under Rule 26, to decide whether or not to hear an independent senator, Senator Stan Waters, who had given notice of his wish to be heard.

Oddly enough, Speaker Charbonneau permitted Rule 26 to operate yesterday when no one from the government side was involved.

And whereas he then acted as the negotiator on behalf of the government with the two independent senators to come to the terms of an agreement under which Senator Waters and Senator Lawson would be allowed to propose amendments.

And whereas Senator Guy Charbonneau has now said that he is prepared to make a ruling contrary to the Rules and Practices of the Senate curtailing the debate on the motion to move the original question on the third reading of Bill C-62.

Senator Stanbury moved, seconded by myself, that the Senate advise the Prime Minister that Senator Guy Charbonneau is unfit to continue to be the Speaker of the Senate.

● (0950)

These actions are a matter of public record, as are our rules, which were revised in March 1988 and accepted unanimously. They were accepted even by former Senator Jacques Flynn, a veteran parliamentarian.

Senator Stanbury: He practically wrote them.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Flynn has been assured a dark place in our history, as the figure who has guided Senator Charbonneau through these malicious decisions, including the October 4 lockout.

Senator Lucier: He is on Murray's payroll.

Senator Fairbairn: It was because of our anxiety over the trend of Senator Charbonneau's activities in the Chair that four of us on this side of the house went to see him on November 22-Senators Stanbury, Kirby, Lefebvre and myself. We wanted to tell him of our personal concerns that the final debate on Bill C-62 be conducted fairly and fully under the rules so that each Senator would have a full opportunity to make a contribution. The first thing that became clear to us in our meeting was that Senator Charbonneau had concluded that, although there was a Senate rule book, it was really not worth the paper it was written on. He viewed the rules with utter contempt and expressed the wish that they be completely overhauled as soon as the current controversy was over.

Senator Buckwold: He should be overhauled!

Senator Fairbairn: Clearly, his view was that they should become more restrictive, perhaps along the lines of the rules in the House of Commons, particularly as they relate to time allocation or time limitation on speeches, or to whether debate should be curtailed. He admitted that he was not a student of the rules but that he had learned a lot while he was in the Chair. Indeed, he offered the admission that he really did not know much about what was contained in Beauchesne until he was handed a passage to justify his refusal to accept Senator Molgat's motion under Senate Rule 26, to give Senator Waters the right to be heard for the purpose of moving an amendment a couple of weeks ago. Armed with this shaky expertise, the Speaker argued that Rule 26 had suddenly become unclear and could only be interpreted through procedural glasses normally used over on the House of Commons side where there does exist closure and time allocation.

Speaker Charbonneau conceded to us that each senator had the right to speak in the debate we had been conducting for the past several days, and that there was nothing in our rules to indicate that we did not have unlimited time. However, he fretted over the extent to which that time might prevent the government from getting out the cheques to low income families as a first compensation for a GST that they do not want.

Senator Charbonneau wants the GST. He made that very clear to us. He made no apologies whatever for voting repeatedly with the government to defeat amendments to the GST, even though Senate Speakers have refrained from voting since 1943. Clearly, he saw no conflict whatsoever between his personal views and actions on the legislation and his role of impartiality as Speaker, a fact that I found deeply discouraging to hear.

Perhaps we should not be surprised. Indeed, let me refer honourable senators to an article written by Senator Charbonneau in 1985 and reprinted in the Canadian Parliamentary Review in the winter of 1985-86. In that article, he said, in part:

Upon taking my seat in the Senate, because of my experience and knowledge of certain specific areas, it was natural for me to become a spokesman for business groups, small and medium-sized businesses, financial institutions and industry . . .

He has stuck with that view to the very end. With regard to the GST, he is indeed maintaining his role as a spokesman for business and industry with considerable vigour.

Senator Frith: But not small business.

Senator Fairbairn: Not for small business but certainly for big business, financial institutions and industry. When pressed, Senator Charbonneau told us that he personally would not want to intervene to deny senators their rights to make speeches of whatever length they chose, but he added—and it was a big "but"—that he would of course have to consider arguments or suggestions made by others who might have ideas on how to bring this debate under some kind of time control. Clearly, he was anticipating that such arguments would be raised by the government. I sought assurances that he would be prepared to hear arguments on any such occasion, should it occur, from both sides of the house. I think I am correct in reporting that he conceded that that would be the case.

Well, it was not the case at all. It was not the case last night. He refused to hear arguments from anyone. It was a monumental setup by the government and the Speaker to create a deadline and then to force a vote. For cosmetic purposes, neither Senator Murray nor Senator Charbonneau had any credibility to undertake this venture themselves. So they went to one of the finest gentleman on the government side, Senator Kelly, and dragged him into the scheme as the front man. It was not the first time that Senator Kelly had been hauled in to lend respectability to dubious and manipulative activity by the government. After the Speaker had followed the lead of Senator Murray in trying to prevent Senator Waters and Senator Lawson from moving amendments, this house was lead into another crisis atmosphere.

Perhaps it was because of his chairmanship of the Special Committee on Terrorism and Public Safety that Senator Kelly seemed like a natural soul to negotiate with Senator Waters and Senator Lawson. It could not have been a pleasant experience for him because, through the intervention of other parties, those negotiations smacked of double dealing throughout, and Senator Kelly's own successful efforts were at one point undercut by his own leader.

At any rate, Senator Kelly was picked to get to his feet and read out a letter on a point of order last Tuesday afternoon. It was a letter to Speaker Charbonneau signed by 53 Conservative senators, urging the Speaker to agree with them that the time had come for a vote on Bill C-62 and that it was his job to provide the Senate with an opportunity to decide that there had been sufficient debate on the subject. They then went on in the letter to dictate when the vote should be held and how long the bells should ring—at 5:45 this afternoon, after a maximum 30-minute division bell.

Senator Kelly gamely tried to explain to us that the government senators were not really giving the Speaker marching orders; they were trying to give the Senate an opportunity to make a decision. That letter flew in the face of all of our rules. In fact, it was trying to bring in amendments to the rules by the back door, while at the same time totally undermining any whiff of impartiality that might have been retained by the Speaker. This was at a time when only 11 of our members had had an opportunity to speak. Neither Senator Waters nor Senator Lawson had had that opportunity. Yes, I had a lengthy opportunity; and, yes, it was a filibuster, but there is nothing wrong with a filibuster.

Senator Cools: Senator Kelly said so!

Senator Fairbairn: Everyone knew this debate would end with a filibuster. That is a legitimate parliamentary procedure that has been used in many other jurisdictions, including often in the United States Congress. The purpose of a filibuster is to take debate on a contentious or publicly abhorrent piece of legislation to the wall with the hope that then there would be a compromise or negotiation to change that legislation and make it more compatible with the desires of the people of that country and those who represent them.

There was every opportunity for the government, over the past few months, to use the rules to change the rules; but, instead of doing the job in an open and up-front manner, it tried to slither and slide through the mire that has been generated by the GST tactics on the part of the government and put a nice guy like Senator Kelly up to shed a gloss of credibility on a thoroughly tawdry action.

Honourable Senators, the Speaker played his role in what can only be described as a cowardly fashion last night. He came into the house at 8 o'clock. He knew Senator Waters would be on his feet to argue Senator Kelly's point of order—where it should be argued, on the floor of the Senate and not through the mail. Senator Waters had told him he would be doing so, and he also knew Senator MacEachen would follow Senator Waters. In fact, Mr. Charbonneau could barely get through his convoluted and incomprehensible ruling, ignoring any contribution from opposition or independent senators. In the ensuing expression of outrage, he hurried from the chair to the safety of his chambers, his salon, and left democratic rights and freedoms lying on the floor of the Senate.

The Prime Minister was triumphant in the extension of his control over this chamber. The government leader was pleased to have been able to help, and Mr. Charbonneau will enter the history books for inflicting irreparable damage on our system.

Senator Lucier: So did Al Capone!

Senator Fairbairn: The atmosphere in this chamber has been severely poisoned. What happened last night created a feeling of revulsion for many of us who have never witnessed anything like it. It caused others to remember another time in 1956 when a Liberal government used a Speaker, René Beaudoin, to savage the rights of the members of the House of Commons in order to force passage of a bill to secure financing for a pipeline. That pipeline debate represented, until now, the darkest days of our parliamentary history and culminated in an attempt to censure the Speaker. It also produced some of the most memorable speeches in defence of parliamentary rights and freedoms. The Speaker actually turned back the clock in order to nullify a decision he had made which advanced the cause of the opposition.

The late Right Honourable John Diefenbaker described it as "Sorry days for the Canadian Parliament when a majority adopts 'brutalitarian' tactics in order to deny this Parliament freedom of speech". The great leader of the CCF party, M.J. Coldwell, movingly spoke about the tragedy of being driven to censure the Speaker and how his early unease about the partisanship of the Speaker had turned to anger.

But by far the most eloquent and unwavering in his condemnation of Prime Minister Saint-Laurent, C.D. Howe and Speaker Beaudoin was the late George Drew. Mr. Drew made a considerable contribution to the public life of this country as a soldier, a premier of Ontario and the federal leader of the Progressive Conservative Party and the Official Opposition in Parliament. The pipeline debate almost ruined his health, it ended his political career, and he honourably finished his public service as High Commissioner to the United Kingdom.

George Drew was a dear friend of mine, and reading his words in recent days caused me to reflect how none of his dignity, honour and conviction are found in the current leadership of the Conservative Party. George Drew's speech, on moving the censure of Speaker Beaudoin 34 years ago, could be echoed today with a mere change of names. Although Senator Stanbury read from this speech, I, too, would like to include some of Mr. Drew's remarks at this point. In moving, as Leader of the Opposition, a motion for censure against Speaker Beaudoin, he observed:

> Our rights are important only to the extent that those rights represent the rights of the people themselves. If the traditional rights of the members of this house are debased, limited or arbitrarily curtailed in any way, it is not our rights that are of concern. What is vitally important is that in that curtailment of rights there is a limitation of the rights of the people themselves . . . I repeat again, that system was not designed for the advantage or convenience of the members of parliament. It was designed for the protection of the freedom of the people of Canada.

> What has happened here is something which goes to the very roots of our free institutions. It is something which could affect, and gravely affect, the rights, the freedom and the happiness of Canadians not only for generations but for centuries to come.

One passage of Mr. Drew's speech has particular relevance to what happened here last night. It states:

> One of the most serious aspects of this strange course was that when I attempted, as did many other hon. members, to be heard in regard to this matter on a point of order the Speaker refused to hear a word from any member in regard to this completely strange device which had been employed or which was then under consideration. At the moment the Speaker called the vote without permitting any point of order to be raised or any discussion whatever on the proceedings which were taking place, at that moment confidence in the Speaker disappeared in the minds of many members of this house.

Senator Stanbury: History is repeated.

Senator Fairbairn: Mr. Drew further stated:

> When the Speaker declares in his oath that he is the servant of the house he is declaring that he is not merely the servant of the majority but that he is the servant of all members. That is the bedrock upon which respect for our parliamentary system rests.

Mr. Drew stated that the damage that was done could not be undone. He further stated:

> The government cannot divorce itself from the tragic downfall of the Speaker on this occasion. He is the victim. He is a casualty of the government's overbearing conduct during this debate. We had done what we could do to prevent the government proceeding on the arrogant course which has produced this sorrowful result. That was our only recourse; that in fact was our only right. It was the duty of the Speaker to protect our rights just as it was his duty to protect the rights of the government . . .
> We had no choice but to assert our rights as we did. We had no choice, moreover, but to bring this matter to a head by the motion that is now before us.

That was the motion of censure.

Mr. Drew goes on to state:

> It is not necessary to enlarge upon the facts . . .
> Here we had no power of self-defence. We have none but to declare what we believe to be the rights of the people of Canada and their representatives here in this house. We shall not be subservient to false interpretation of the rules. We shall not be subservient to anything that savours of dictatorship here in this house. We shall not be subservient to the will of the majority expressed by the Speaker, as it has been in this case, in a manner which no longer seeks to define the right of the majority but establishes for the time being mob rule.

It is remarkable how those words, uttered back in 1956, require almost no change to eloquently express the situation in which we find ourselves today.

Senator Stanbury: History repeated, but much worse.

Senator Fairbairn: An election followed the pipeline debate a year later. The Liberal government was discredited, and John Diefenbaker won what at that time was the greatest majority in Canadian history.

Speaker Beaudoin was a broken man, his personal life destroyed, and his political contribution reduced to nothing more than an ugly memory. He died, living out of a suitcase and tending bar in Las Vegas.

That will not happen to Senator Charbonneau.

Senator van Roggen: His suitcase is full of other things.

Senator Fairbairn: In contrast, Speaker Charbonneau will, no doubt, move on to the diplomatic and social challenges of whatever suitable favour the Prime Minister chooses to bestow upon him in gratitude for a job well done in bringing the Senate to its knees.

An Hon. Senator: He has been bought and paid for.

Senator Fairbairn: But history and the people of Canada will judge him more harshly. The inherent wrongs of the goods and services tax and the repugnant manner in which it was forced on the people of this country will hang like an albatross around the neck of the Conservative Party for years to come.

It is not the role of any of us in this place, regardless of the sources of our appointments, to do the bidding of the Prime Minister of the day. By doing so, this Speaker has set up a chain reaction which has robbed this chamber of its rightful role.

A motion has been made to censure Mr. Charbonneau because he no longer has the confidence of this chamber. I can see no future in the viable operation of this house under the current Speaker. Should this motion of censure come to a vote, the slight government majority may ensure a numerical victory. But that will surely be a defeat in every other sense.

To restore our confidence and the confidence of Canadians, who have been following the actions of this house for the last two months, we must have a Speaker who will honour the rules, who understands that, although he has been appointed by the Prime Minister, he owes his first loyalty to the Senate, not to the Executive. Accordingly, he must understand and honour the history and intent of this chamber as the second house of the Parliament of Canada.

Without his resignation, I do not see how confidence can be restored, nor do I see how this house can resume its proper role of legislative review and regional representation. Reason will return to this chamber only if the Speaker has the courage to take the right way out and resign or, failing that, if the Prime Minister has the courage to remove him. Only then can we try to pick up the pieces he has left in the battle over the GST.

I conclude, honourable senators, by reading the commission issued under the Great Seal of Canada, appointing Guy Charbonneau as Speaker of the Senate.

TO
THE HONOURABLE GUY CHARBONNEAU, A MEMBER OF THE SENATE,

GREETING:

KNOW YOU that, reposing special trust and confidence in your loyalty, integrity and ability, We have constituted and appointed, and We do hereby constitute and appoint you, Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate.

That is what Speaker Charbonneau was sworn to do, and those are powerful words. He has broken faith with both the substance and the spirit of those words.

I implore him, on the strength of his own conscience, to take the initiative to leave the Chair and to allow this chamber to heal itself.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

● (1020)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am pleased to follow the address made by Senator Fairbairn, because she raised a number of items, which I want to deal with briefly, and of course to support the motion which has been moved by Senator Stanbury censuring the conduct of Senator Charbonneau.

No one takes any pleasure in these events today. We have resisted making this move, even though there had been a series of provocations. However, the most recent provocation was so flagrant and so gross that no alternative was left to us.

In the Canadian House of Commons there has been only one motion of censure against the Speaker. It occurred in 1956 in the midst of the acrimonious and highly charged pipeline debate. The Government of Canada had decided to setup a crown corporation to build a gas pipeline from the Ontario-Manitoba border to the Kapuskasing, Ontario, and to empower the company to lease the lines to the Trans-Canada Pipeline.

As I recollect, the company which was to build the pipeline faced a deadline for financing, and therefore the Government of Canada attempted to put the bill before the House and get it through the House before the deadline, which was June 7th, I believe.

How reminiscent that is of this particular incident we are dealing with today, in that the Government believes there is a deadline of Thursday, December 13th.

It is true that the Government got the bill through and the pipeline was built, but the process by which it was done left a wreckage that was strewn over the political landscape for years after. Mr. Speaker Beaudoin who had a most promising career, indeed he was mooted to be the first permanent speaker of the Canadian House of Commons, was destroyed. The motion of censure was opposed by government supporters, and I was one of those who listened to Mr. Saint-Laurent make a brilliant defence of Mr. Beaudoin, because he felt it his duty. Nevertheless, nothing could rehabilitate Mr. Speaker Beaudoin from the act he had performed on what is now known as Black Friday. I was in the House of Commons at that time, as was Senator Croll.

The principal personalities on the government side, in addition to Mr. Saint-Laurent, were Mr. C.D. Howe, Mr. Walter Harris, Mr. Jack Pickersgill, and quite a number of others, but they were at the centre of the procedural battle. On the other side of course were Mr. Drew, Mr. Fleming, Mr. Fulton, Mr. Churchill, and in the C.C.F. Party Mr. Coldwell and Mr. Knowles; so it was an array of quite formidable personalities in the House.

What did Mr. Beaudoin do on that occasion? He came into the House at 11 o'clock on the Friday morning that is called Black Friday, and stood up and said, first of all, that he intended to rule out of order the motion which had been put the previous night at 9 o'clock, which he had helped to draft and which he had put before the House, and upon which Mr. Drew had begun to speak. He then said: "I rule that out of order."

That was inconceivable. I will read Mr. Drew's speech, his words of indignation that the Speaker took it upon himself to remove, by edict, a motion in the possession of the House, upon which debate had commenced. He did that.

The second thing he did was to say that the had made another error, that he wanted to correct another matter. At 5:15 on the previous day, Thursday, when the Committee of the Whole reported, he said, his only duty should have been to put that report forthwith to the House, but he had not done so. He had allowed dilatory motions and points of order, but he now wished to correct his mistake. He then decreed that the House go back to 5:15 the previous day, Thursday He put that proposition before the House, and asked that it be accepted or rejected. Well, that is when hell broke loose.

If you read Mr. Drew and Mr. Coldwell and the others, they explain why hell broke loose, and how the provocation was so intense that they had no alternative. It is interesting that Mr. Beaudoin said that the House is master of its rules, and that he had the duty and the responsibility to put a proposition before the House.

Yesterday, there were clear resonances of that two-element philosophy. We witnessed Senator Kelly build upon one element of the discredited Beaudoin principles and Senator Ottenheimer build on the other, to construct the vehicle by which they presented to the Speaker the proposal that lead him down the same dangerous path which Mr. Speaker Beaudoin travelled.

Mr. Drew, I think, made the point so perfectly when in his speech about what Mr. Beaudoin did, which will be found at page 4646 of Hansard, June 4th, 1956, he said, "The Speaker could not have done that; the Speaker cannot present a motion," that is the simple dictum.

● (1030)

> The Speaker could not have done that; the Speaker cannot present a motion. Whether or not the motion would have been in order, the government might have presented a motion and it might have been debated. It certainly should have been debated if decisions made the night before were to be reversed.

That is the clear statement of Mr. Drew on that occasion. He went on, as Senator Fairbairn indicated, to explain why his conduct and the conduct of others was so necessary and so justified. He said:

> Were we quietly to submit in the face of this course that savoured in every way of the dreadful dictatorships that have grown up in Europe in these past few years? It was Junius who said that the subject who is truly loyal will neither advise nor submit to arbitrary measures... We were not prepared to submit to as arbitrary measures as ever denied to the sitting members of a legislative body the rights to which they were entitled by tradition, by the rules and by all the declared purposes of this parliament.

And I say amen to that, because yesterday we were denied the rights to which we are entitled by tradition, by the rules and by all the declared purposes of the parliament. We have been the victims of arbitrary measures. That is what caused the disorder in the Canadian House of Commons and that is why members on this side are outraged that not only did this occur last night, but that it was built upon the discredited foundations established by Mr. Beaudoin.

It is a disgrace that we ought to have re-enacted the very scenes and the very principles that Mr. Beaudoin used to justify his conduct. "The House is master of its rules", so said Senator Ottenheimer. "You have a duty to put something before the House", said Senator Kelly. Speaker Beaudoin said, "I have a duty to put something before the House. The authorities say so". Well, it was denounced by the Leader of the Conservative Party, by the Leader of the C.C.F. Party, and privately by the Prime Minister and all the ministers, because, even though Mr. Saint-Laurent was doing his duty in defending the Speaker, privately he was horrified at what happened. If honourable senators want to get a very good report of the events of that day, they should read Mr. Pickersgill's account contained in My Years With Louis Saint-Laurent. He refers to these words of Mr. Beaudoin:

> Now, the house is master of its own rules and it is my right to submit a matter to the house. I intend at the moment to submit to the house that in my view, the house should revert to the position where it was yesterday when I was brought back to the chair to receive the chairman's report at 5:15.

"It is my duty", said Speaker Charbonneau, "to decide . . .", contrary to the rules of debate and the provisional rules, ". . . that the debate will terminate tomorrow at quarter to six. The votes will be called. There will be no deferred divisions. It is my duty to do that". That is a page from Beaudoin.

Well, Mr. Beaudoin finished himself off with that, and Speaker Charbonneau finished himself off last night.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, when Mr. Beaudoin put that motion in the House of Commons, even though, in my view, it was to serve his own ego, it was interpreted to assist the government. Mr. Pickersgill writes in his book: "I confess I was shocked by this proposal which, in my experience, was unprecedented."—namely, taking upon himself the right to put a proposition before the House and then to say "vote for it or against it". That is what Mr. Beaudoin did and that is what Speaker Charbonneau did last night, with no authority to do so, infringing all the rules. Mr. Pickersgill, described by the Prime Minister of Canada, the present one, as the greatest Liberal of all time, went on to say: "Saint-Laurent seemed to me to be almost horrified."

No wonder they were horrified. No wonder. We are horrified at what happened last night. Mr. Speaker has not right, by edict, to change the rules of the Senate. He has no right to change Rule 27, which is still in effect, but which he repealed last night by his decision. Rule 27 provides, as I understand it, the right to honourable senators to speak in this chamber. Rule 27 states:

> A senator may speak to any question before the Senate, a question of privilege, or upon a point of order, or upon a motion or an inquiry, or in making a mere interrogation,—

A senator may speak to any question, and I have outlined that. That is the right of a senator. Prior to this particular motion for the previous question, which, in itself, is a motion limiting debate because once it is moved it is not possible to make any further amendment or to prolong the debate, we wanted to make other amendments, but by negotiation finally we ended up agreeing to two amendments for the independent members. However, all other members who wanted to move amendments were foreclosed by that restrictive motion. It was a debate limitation in itself. We then believed that that motion having been moved, that we would have an opportunity, each of us, to speak on that motion. However, only 11 of our members spoke on that motion. All the others, 40 ideally—one or two are ill and would not be here—but all of the others, plus the Independents, were prepared to speak on that motion.

● (1040)

I have prepared myself to address matters of consequence on the GST. I know of other members who had prepared to speak. Under what authority did Mr. Speaker decide to accommodate the members on that side of the house and to ignore the members of this side? He removed all our rights.

I think in that connection I should read one or two quotations from Mr. John Diefenbaker, who said:

> Freedom is maintained by successive Speakers who have it in their hands and their power to sustain the rights of members in all parts of the House and to assure that the arc of the covenant for Speakers is that all members have equal rights and that at no time shall there be a deviation, however beneficial that might be to the government of the day, or however detrimental or prejudicial to the wishes of the government of the day any order made by Mr. Speaker may be . . . .To that end, rules have to be interpreted fairly.

I have talked about Rule 26.

> . . . for when the interpretation of the laws of parliament is altered or changed in order to meet the demand of the majority or has the appearance of being so altered, then the rights of parliament are violated and tyranny is substituted for justice.

Tyranny prevailed last night. Tyranny was in that Chair last night. Justice was denied. Justice was denied to the two Independents in that corner, and the 40 members on this side, but total accommodation was given to the 53 members who signed the letter.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator MacEachen: Total accommodation.

If the Speaker had come in with a judgment that had attempted to reconcile the concerns of members opposite and the members on this side, and attempted to conciliate and adjudicate the concerns on each side, then it would have been worthy of respect and consideration. The Speaker's ruling was a rewriting of the proposal made by Senator Kelly. The ruling was almost word for word a rewriting of Senator Kelly's proposal.

Honourable senators, governments in the past have been faced with filibusters. Some governments have taken steps to change the rules, and others have not taken steps. We all know that it was the Conservative Party which filibustered endlessly on the reciprocity bill. The filibuster was so prolonged that Sir Wilfred Laurier was forced to go to the electorate on reciprocity. I have never heard any member opposite get up and say, "Well we made a great mistake in filibustering reciprocity to the point where Sir Wilfred Laurier had to call an election." That is what happened. It may be interesting to recall the reality that existed at that time in the Canadian House of Commons.

An article that was written Dr. Eugene Forsey reads as follows:

> 'Til 1913 it was possible for an opposition in the House of Commons to force a government to go to the people in a general election. Every member could speak as long as he liked, and in committee, as long as he liked and as often as he liked, on every clause. This meant that if the great new issue of public policy arose to which there was strong and widespread objection across the country, we were not like the Americans, stuck with a particular administration for a solid four years. This was one of the marked superiorities of our Constitution over theirs.
> There were no time limits on speeches. There were no closures. There was no time allocation.
> This meant that an opposition in the Commons could, by obstruction, preserve the right of the people to decide on a question of prime importance.

The Conservative opposition in 1911 exercised it on reciprocity. As I have said, they forced Sir Wilfred Laurier to go to the election on the question of reciprocity.

Dr. Forsey goes on to say:

> It is a power that the opposition in the House of Commons has now lost. The last vestige disappeared with the adoption of the new rule that prohibits the interminable bell-ringing the Conservatives used so effectively against the Trudeau government, forcing it to divide a huge ominous bill into its component parts.

Senator Stollery: Instituted by Harvie Andre.

Senator MacEachen: A filibuster which resulted in flexibility on the part of the government. This government knows not the word of "flexibility", of "compromise", or "patience". Now, therefore, if there is a great new issue of public policy on which the electors have not been consulted, only the Senate can protect their right to be consulted. Why is it that the Senate has that power? We do not have a closure rule, and we do not have a time allocation rule. We had that rule imposed by edict, by a coup d'etat, last night.

Senator Stollery: In the midst of a debate.

Senator MacEachen: When Robert Borden came into office he brought in the naval bill. It was a bill to provide, I think, $65 million to the British government for the purchase of several dreadnaughts for the British Navy. The bill was not entirely popular, certainly not in the Province of Quebec, and was having a hard time in the House of Commons. In fact, the bill was introduced on December 5, 1912, and the second reading debate ended three months later on February 28. Mr. Borden, understanding that his bill was in trouble, decided to change the rules and he did it up front.

● (1050)

Senator Cools: He filed a closure.

Senator MacEachen: He did it up front. He introduced a closure motion. He moved the closure motion himself.

Senator Cools: That is right.

Senator MacEachen: When Sir Wilfrid Laurier rose to speak as Leader of the Opposition, the Speaker recognized Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and one of the Conservative members of the House moved what is now described in the Senate as Rule 26, that another member be heard. It went to a vote and Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not permitted to speak. He was not permitted to speak and that next member got up and moved the previous question. So the closure motion was introduced by Borden; his minister then got up and moved the previous question. It is rather draconian but at least they changed the rule in the Commons through what I call due process. That due process could have been followed in the Senate. Any time.

Senator Cools: Any day.

Senator MacEachen: Bring in a motion, have it debated and have it decided. That is what Mr. Borden did.

Senator Stanbury: They could have done it three months ago.

Senator MacEachen: Mind you, it took some time but when Mr. Borden got his disclosure rule, it was then applied to the naval bill in order to help out the British. So the complaint here is why was due process not followed if the rules were to be changed? Why were they changed by the Chair acting through an abuse of authority.

I will mention 1969, when it was decided that a system of time allocation ought to be introduced in the House of Commons. A motion was put down by Donald Macdonald to establish time allocation on future bills. It was resisted by all opposition parties. Then a committee report was brought in. The committee report was put before the House, which was similar in content to the Macdonald motion. That was debated and debated and debated and finally adopted under closure. It was all up front.

Last night we lost the due process that has been followed on the only two occasions when debate limitation was introduced in the Canadian House of Commons: in 1969, by a Liberal Trudeau government; and in 1913 by Robert Borden. Never, never, never did any government in the House of Commons ever entertain the notion that debate could be curtailed through a point of order by the Speaker. Never. It is without precedent in our history. You know I am even more alarmed because the letter signed by Senator Murray and Conservative senators repudiates the provisional rules which we all accepted.

Senator Stollery: I would not want to make an agreement with him; the welcher.

Senator MacEachen: Maybe I should read what was said by Senator Murray on that occasion when we brought in our provisional rules and our house order.

> With regard to the rules that the Leader of the Opposition has referred to and the motion he has placed before us, I do note that the provisional rules that we have agreed upon are to be with us until the prorogation of the present session.

Yesterday was not the prorogation of the present session.

Senator Murray said:

> We will all have an opportunity to work with them and see whether or not they stand the test of time in parliamentary practice . . .
> As Senator MacEachen has pointed out in a statement that is fair and accurate as to implications of the rule changes—a statement which I endorse—the ruling of Mr. Speaker last October 4 is put behind us. We no longer need any precedent of that kind because we have brought into this place a practice that exists in almost all parliamentary assemblies that any of us know of. We have imposed limitations on bell ringing. There are provisions, the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, for the deferral of certain votes. There are provisions that protect the right of the minority to employ the legitimate parliamentary tactic of delay, . . .

But those have been removed in the letter that has been signed by Senator Murray and, unhappily, by Senator Roblin. I would be delighted to be told I am wrong and that the provisional rules still apply with respect to the taking of the vote. But the letter of the Conservative senators and the Speaker's almost verbatim repetition of that letter revises and changes the provisional rules.

When the four of us gathered for that negotiation, there were two companion documents. One was a legislative timetable which was to the great interest and benefit of the government. The other were the provisional rules which were to the benefit of both of us. They both were negotiated together and one would not have been accepted without the other. Now the government has reaped all the benefits of the house order on legislation.

Senator Murray said:

> Let me say that, in terms of the legislative timetable, the government has achieved its objective. This agreement restores order to the Senate and it allows important government legislation to proceed, and to proceed to a vote. We break the logjam that had existed here in some cases for a year. Bill C-28 will be voted on tonight, . . . Bill C-21 will be voted on Monday next . . . Bill C-62 will be voted at the report stage a week from today . . . Then there is bill C-44, the Hibernia legislation. That will have its final vote on Monday, October 29.

We meticulously respected that commitment to advance the legislation of the government and we had expected that the provisional rules would be meticulously respected by the government, by Senator Murray and by Senator Roblin. They gave us their word; they signed and initialled the document which I have here, and yesterday they repudiated themselves.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame, shame!

Senator MacEachen: I, for one, do not know how long I will continue as Leader of the Opposition but I can never again do business with either of those men because of the untrustworthy withdrawal of their word through the revision of the provisional rules. We found that their word and their signature are worthless. It is no wonder we are angry.

• (1100)

We delivered on the legislative program, and when it came to the key moment on the debate on the GST, we were stabbed in the back. That is what happened, and you tell us to be calm and reasonable and settle down. We have a deep grievance.

Honourable senators opposite, you thought that all your problems were solved when you brought in eight new senators.

Senator Lefebvre: They are just starting.

Senator MacEachen: Prior to that you had a minority over there, and on this side was a majority which, until the GST, had passed government legislation quite responsibly. The legislation dealt with by this house in the past six years was put on the record by Senator Stewart, and it is quite impressive. Now you have a majority on that side, and on this side you have a humiliated and embittered minority opposition. You have created that situation. If you thought you were on easy street because you got a majority, you have another think coming. Think again.

Even though we are a minority, in this debate we have out performed you in spirit, in speeches, in dedication and in commitment. We out performed you.

Some Hon. Senators: Here, here.

Senator MacEachen: And when you found that you were trounced, you had to go again to seek relief from another authority. You had to get the Speaker to join your team—

Senator Cools: That's treason!

Senator MacEachen: —to score the goals for you that you could not score in a fair fight between the government and the opposition. It is impossible for any team to win when the referee joins the other team. Now you must ask yourselves, what about tomorrow, what about next week, what about next month? Do you think you are going to get your bills easily? Do you think you are gong to have a cakewalk? Think again, ladies and gentlemen. Think again, Senator Charbonneau. You are not going to have an easy time because what we did in the GST was done in a spirit of calm understanding of the defects flowing from that bill. What will be done in the future will be fueled by a realization that we can't trust the word of the Leader of the Government, of—

Senator Perrault: A total fraud!

Senator MacEachen: —Senator Roblin, nor can we trust the objectivity or impartiality of the Speaker. That is what will fuel the confrontation.

I want to say to Senator Charbonneau that I was deeply disappointed, very deeply disappointed. I noticed that Senator Charbonneau had voted consistently with the government. That gives the signal to anyone that impartiality and objectivity have taken a holiday. Of course he was entitled to vote. His vote was unnecessary but he seemed to take pleasure in lining up—

Senator Stanbury: He loves the GST!

Senator MacEachen: —with his Tory colleagues. I was disappointed in that. I was disappointed that since October 4 that Senator Molgat was never permitted to sit in the Chair.

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator Cools: And he is the Deputy Speaker.

Senator MacEachen: He was never permitted, never asked once. Before that he had been asked frequently by the Speaker to sit in the Chair, but never since. Isn't that right, senator?

Senator Molgat: Yes.

Senator MacEachen: Why is that? Because he was a Liberal.

At one time we in the House of Commons selected a Conservative Deputy Speaker in the person of Robert McCleave from Halifax, who later became a judge. As a Conservative Deputy Speaker under a Liberal government, he had all the authority and benefits and he was not punished by the Speaker when there was a conflict between the two sides of the house.

Speaking for myself, I thought I was entitled to have spoken on the point of order raised by Senator Kelly. I was appalled that I was denied that privilege, not only personally but as Leader of the Opposition the views of this group had not been expressed.

Senator Barootes: You broke your word when you did not speak yesterday. You said that you would, and you did not.

Senator MacEachen: I had indicated, when the point of order was raised, I wanted to speak. Last evening at 8 o'clock I told Senator Doody that I thought it was pointless to continue the debate as to whom ought to speak, Senator Waters or myself, and that I would allow Senator Waters to go ahead and I would speak after him. I conveyed that information to Senator Doody, and I have been told—and perhaps Senator Doody can explain this—that he conveyed that information to Mr. Greene who conveyed it to the Speaker. I rose to my feet, the Speaker cut me off and proceeded to conduct his coup d'etat. I am horrified. I am insulted. I don't think mutual respect can continue on that basis. I went up to ask the Speaker why he had not listened to me. I was speaking for 51 senators, and he was accommodating with his ruling 53 or 54 senators. Maybe we would have been entitled to have our views heard on that matter. I walked up and at that point Senator Doyle had taken his place on the dais next to the Speaker—

Senator Perrault: What a laugh!

Senator MacEachen: —as if he were a Swiss guard to a Borgia Pope.

Senator Doyle: I am not Swiss.

Senator MacEachen: I walked away. I walked away because I was and am offended deeply that the Office of the Speaker has been corrupted and that Senator Charbonneau behaved in a most corrupt manner last night in denying us the right to speak, in removing from us the right of all senators to speak on this motion, by calling a vote when he has no authority and in accepting to put a motion and follow into infamy the only other Canadian Speaker who ever did such a thing. I hope, Senator Charbonneau, that you will find it possible to leave soon—the sooner the better as far as I am concerned.

• (1110)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, in another few months I will have been in this chamber a quarter of a century.

Senator Hébert: We don't want to hear that.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Everett: I have watched the ebb and flow of power during that time and the spirit of cooperation that has existed over many, many years in this chamber do its duty and see that legislation moves forward after proper review by a chamber of appointed people. There is no question that, since September 25, the rules, procedures and everything about the debate has been abused in this house.

Senator Buckwold: And supported by you!

Senator Everett: The question is: Who is responsible for this abuse? Is it all of us? Is it one side or is it the other side?

The role of the Senate is clear. It is essentially to review legislation from the other place. The Senate has the right to amend that legislation and even to reject the legislation. With respect to money bills, which I will define as budgetary measures and global spending estimates, such as the Main Estimates and the Supplementary Estimates, the Senate still has that right, but it is a right that has to be exercised with great care and great caution.

Senator Buckwold: You said that before.

Senator Everett: I have said it before and I expect I will say it again because it is true. It is a fact. It is the duty of this body to do just that.

Senator Olson: That is your opinion. It is not a fact. Your opinion is not a fact.

Senator Everett: It is a fact. I will give opinion at some point during this speech, but that is a fact.

Senator Olson: It is not a fact.

Senator Everett: What occurred over the years—and I have criticized the government in the past—is that ministers in the other place have stated that the Senate does not have that right or power, but in fact it does. So when legislation comes here, we have every right to review it, deal with it, amend it and even to reject it. That right should be respected by the other place. That is an important issue.

Since 1984, starting with the borrowing bill, we have seen a partisanship change in the operation of this chamber. Prior to that there was a sense of cooperation and obligation. In 1984, when a Conservative government took over in the other place and an overwhelming majority of Liberals existed here, the consideration of legislation became a partisan matter. I personally think that was regrettable, but it is a fact of life.

Senator Cools: Stop the rubbish! He should speak no more.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Everett: Yes.

Senator Stewart: I thank the honourable senator for permitting me to ask him a question at this point. We have heard, particularly from the Speaker of the House of Commons, that the position of the present government would be far better off if the terms of the Parliament Act, 1911, as amended in 1949, were in effect in Canada, regulating the legislative relationship between the two houses. Will the honourable senator tell us which bill would have passed the Parliament of Canada faster in the last six years under the terms of the Parliament Act of 1911, as amended in 1949?

The senator is alleging that there has been a slowdown in government legislation. I challenge him to show that the Senate of Canada has acted more slowly in the last six years than it would have under the terms of the Parliament Act, 1949, or even much slower than it would have acted under the terms of the Hon. John Crosbie's draconian proposal to limit the consitutional powers of the Senate. Will he be specific?

Senator Everett: I don't think there is any need to be specific—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Everett: —because I am not making that allegation. I am not saying that it is any faster or any slower. I am saying it is a fact of life that partisanship has been introduced to a high degree—

Senator Stanbury: By whom?

Senator Everett: —in the relationships between this chamber and the other chamber, a fact that did not exist before.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: That is your opinion!

Senator Everett: That is my opinion. I am giving you that opinion. It has occured and the government did not react well to it, which has created a conflict between the two chambers that I personally regret.

Senator Buckwold: What conflict?

Senator Everett: An enormous conflict. Look at the bills. There has been a conflict between the two sides.

Senator Olson: They told us before the bill got here that there would be no amendments, no matter what. That is what they said—no amendments.

Senator Everett: Well, that's what the government can say. There is no question about that. They can say there will be no amendments. I am not sure they did. That is your statement.

Senator Olson: I heard it a few times.

Senator Everett: Perhaps it is true. Perhaps that is what the government said. But we gave the bill second reading in this chamber. It went to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, and I believe there were some three to four months of hearings. Amendments could have been proposed by that committee at that time. Do not forget you are dealing with a major budgetary bill of the government. You would want to avoid rejecting it as much as you possibly could. The correct stance for this body under those circumstances was not to reject the bill, it was rather to try to amend it to make the bill work a lot better.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Everett: In that regard, I believe that the Banking Committee failed.

Senator Simard: The Chairman!

Senator Everett: It could have defined the amendments that would have made the bill work. They could have brought them to this chamber. It is true they might well have been rejected—

Senator Stanbury: They said they would reject them.

Senator Everett: —had they been passed in this chamber, but that does not matter. You have an obligation as a body to do something. You have a committee that has public hearings, in which it is told over and over again that—

Senator Stanbury: That it is a lousy bill!

Senator Everett: —aspects of the bill should be amended. Read the committee report and you will find item after item, "This is what is wrong with this item; this is what is wrong with that item." There was every opportunity to amend that bill, and when you get to the report it just says, "Reject the bill."

• (1120)

Now, I don't believe that that is the role of this Senate. When we came back here in September and the government had a numerical advantage and was involved in some delaying tactics, I might say, I was opposed to those delaying tactics because I did not feel that a body of Parliament has a right to delay unduly the consideration of legislation, and when the government was trying to do it, I was opposed to it.

Then the government made the eight appointments to the Senate.

Senator Olson: That is why they delayed.

Senator Everett: That may be so, but they did make the eight appointments.

Senator Cools: Why did they make the eight appointments? Senator Everett, you have stood and spoken and many members of the press have believed that somehow you were one of us. It has caused many of us great discomfort. However, personally, we have been magnanimous. It is very easy for me to be magnanimous. I say to you, Senator Everett: Tell the truth.

Senator Everett: Give me a demonstration of some of your magnanimity.

The government made the appointments, and it had every right, in my judgment, to do that. The courts have confirmed it so far, and it is my judgment that if the Supreme Court were to hear the matter, it would indeed endorse the fact that the appointments were properly made.

Senator Davey: You don't know that.

[Senator Everett.]

Senator Everett: I don't know that. I am saying that it is my judgment that that is exactly what will happen.

Senator Davey: Your judgment is not always correct.

Senator Everett: Perhaps not. So far, the courts have dealt with the matter and, where they have dealt with the matter, the judgment has been that the appointments were properly made. I suspect that the same thing will happen as it goes forward in the court system.

The fact of the matter is, though, that, even if they were to find that there was a flaw in the appointments, which I do not believe they will find, the work of this body is still legitimate and the passing of acts within the body remains legitimate. I do not see anything wrong with the appointments.

What has buttressed the opposition here is a concept that it is backed by public will.

Senator Cools: And by the rule of law.

Senator Everett: I will come to the rule of law. They say that if 60 per cent or 65 per cent of the public is against the GST—

Senator Grafstein: You have not listened to the speeches. That was not the reaction.

Senator Everett: I am sorry, that is my reaction.

Senator Grafstein: You have not been here to listen to the speeches, honourable senator.

Senator Everett: I am saying to you that the background of the opposition to this bill has been the public will.

Senator Grafstein: What about the role of a regional senator? Has that not been reiterated here numerous times? It is not just the public will; it is the role of the regions. Have we been sitting in the same house?

Senator Everett: I am saying that it has been backed by the public will. But that is not the function of the Senate.

The function of the Senate is that each of us determine in our own way whether legislation is sound and whether it should go forward. It is not our function to react to the public will. That is why we are appointed. We are protected. We make our own decisions. It is the other place which reacts to the public will.

I don't find it much of an argument to say that because the public wants this, it should happen. The GST is an essential part of the budgetary requirements of the government. It is required to reduce the deficit.

Honourable senators will recall that when Senator Lawson proposed his amendment to use the excess revenues to reduce the public debt, I received a letter from the Minister of Finance in which he stated clearly that the excess revenues would be used to reduce the deficit and, more important, that they would not be used to increase program spending, and that program spending would be controlled.

This legislation makes good fiscal sense.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Everett: I support it because it is necessary. If that puts me on the wrong side of the public, so be it. I am protected so that I can do that and so that I can make the decision on that basis. Others are protected here. If we want to react to the public, then, for goodness' sake, as I and many other senators have suggested for some considerable time, make the body elected. Make us responsible to the public. Make us react to the public will. Our function is to deal with legislation in a proper and responsible manner. Hopefully, it can be in conformity with what the public wants, but that is not the essential element. The essential element is that we do our job.

I have heard here that we should bring forward a motion to change the rules. There is a good reason that we do not have a set of rules in this house as they have in the other place. It is based on the fact that this house operates on reasonableness, that there is a give and take, that there is an attempt to improve legislation and to see that it goes forward. Some people are saying that maybe later we will change the rules and that we will have a form of closure or time allocation. Frankly, I hope that we do not. I hope that we get back to the position where we can deal with matters on a reasonable basis and let legislation go forward. I am not of the opinion that there should be a motion to change the rules. I don't believe there is any reason for it at all.

As we went through this process, all the way through I stated in speech after speech that there should not be undue delay by procedural motions, by allowing the bells to ring, by points of privilege, that we should get on with the business of the legislation because when you got to the report of the committee or when you got to third reading or when you got to the motion for the previous question, there was an unlimited right to filibuster. And I said, "Let's get to that and let the filibuster take place," and eventually we did.

The filibuster started and it was a raving success. I think there were eleven senators who spoke, and they took up to two weeks of time. It looked like Senator Gigantès might never stop speaking, he might be speaking in April. He was going to go on and on. I think Senator Murray will confirm this. I don't know that I spoke to him directly but I spoke to Senator Roblin and several senators on the other side, and I also spoke to Senator Frith. I said that as far as I am concerned if there is not undue delay by virtue of procedural motions then I will vote against any attempt to interfere with the filibuster.

The filibuster went forward. Astonishingly, with all the success that they had on their hands, Senator Gigantès got up and adjourned his own debate, for twenty-six hours. Now to me that is an undue use of a procedural right in the Senate, and if you think about it, suppose that had been accepted, suppose that had occurred and it had been let go by, when Senator Gigantès could speak for another 12 hours and adjourn his motion for 26 hours, and the next day someone else could speak and delay, and someone else could speak. The matter would never have come to a vote at all, and that is what is important.

Senator Davey: Let me ask you: how much of Senator Gigantès' speech did you hear?

Senator Everett: Absolutely none.

Senator Davey: How can you comment on it if you didn't hear it?

Senator Everett: I say he was successfully filibustering, and he was. He was doing a great job of filibustering. I said I was supporting his right to filibuster. I did not comment on his speech. I said that he then, incredibly in my mind, he introduced a motion to adjourn his own debate. At one time, I have to tell you, honourable senators, you could not do that in this house. When you got up to speak you finished your speech and somebody else adjourned the debate. I am not sure it is part of the rules. I guess it has become part of the procedure.

Senator Sparrow: Are you suggesting that the honourable senators was breaking some rule, that he was not in his right to adjourn the debate? There was not a criticism over there of his right to do that. Now you are taking away his right as well to do that. He was not breaking any rules. No one ever suggested that, but you are trying to tell us he was breaking the rules.

Senator Everett: I am giving you the view of one person, I am not saying that what I am saying is right or wrong. I am saying this is the position that, as an independent, I took, and I took it from the beginning. I said there should be no undue delay by bell ringing, by procedural motions, by cockamammy motions of privilege, there should be no undue delay. We should move forward with the legislation. The reason we should do it is that there is an unlimited right to filibuster, and I said time and again that if we move to the filibuster and the filibuster proceeds without being interfered with, again by undue use of motions or points of order, or points of privilege, or adjourning debates, then I would support the opposition if the government tried to interfere. But the fact of the matter is that Senator Gigantès adjourned his own debate and delayed the whole process for 26 hours.

Now that in itself may not have been the worst thing in the world, but the fact of the matter is that had that been allowed to have been established as a precedent, then you would make a joke of a filibuster. A filibuster is the right to get up and speak unlimitedly, and what is working against you is physical exhaustion. Are you going to say at any time "I am feeling a little tired" or "I would like to go to the washroom, so I will adjourn my own debate and I will be back in a little while"? The debate is adjourned, it goes to a vote; it takes place at 5:45 p.m. under the provisional rules and so you have delayed 24 hours or thereabouts. Well, there would be no way of ever stopping anything.

Senator Steuart: Senator Everett could I ask you a question.

Senator Everett: Just in a moment. It would go on and on, and the result would be that you would totally frustrate the work of this body and the work of Parliament and nothing at all would be done, and that, honourable senators, is absolutely wrong. Question?

Senator Steuart: Yes, you say somebody moved to adjourn the debate. That is a motion. Couldn't the motion be defeated? I have sat through more legislative procedures than you have. Any motion can be moved and defeated and it would be finished. So you are wrong. You can defeat it at any time.

Senator Everett: Not at all. On a motion to adjourn a senator's own debate, under the provisional rules it has to wait until 5:45 p.m. the next day and then it comes up for a vote. If it is defeated then the senator did not adjourn and he goes right on and there is no way of controlling the thing. If you defeat it, the senator just carries right on. If you don't defeat it, the debate is adjourned and the senator says, "I am ready to speak again" and he gets up and carries on.

You cannot use that to slow the process down. I may be wrong. I am not a parliamentary expert, but it would seem to me that you could go on forever, and Parliament could do no further work as long as that issue was kept before it and it was continually adjourned. That is why you lost my vote.

Senator Steuart: Oh God! You were against us from day one.

Senator Everett: I will tell you exactly what I said. I said that if the Government brought in a motion to interfere with the filibuster, and the filibuster had been properly conducted, I would vote against that motion. If that motion went through and we went on to a final vote on the GST, I said I would vote for the GST because I think it is right for Canada. That is what I said, and that is my privilege. But this is what is crucial: what you people are up to is really an unwarranted delay, the abuse of the rules in this place. Don't think that I would turn my back on my former colleagues and take the abuse that I have had to take without considering it. I am not saying I am right, but I would not go through that process unless I felt fairly strongly about it. The reason I feel strongly about it is the abuse of the process. There may have been some mistakes made by you, Mr. Speaker, most especially in that first vote, you should have given a longer time for everybody to participate.

Senator Gigantès: You participated.

Senator Everett: I participated, that's right.

Senator Grafstein: You didn't object.

Senator Everett: I didn't object.

Senator Grafstein: You didn't object to our rights.

Senator Everett: I didn't object, but, by the same token I had to listen to you people tell me that you lost your right to vote when your Whip was out there turning your people away at the door.

Senator Steuart: That's a lie.

Senator Everett: That isn't a lie.

Senator Steuart: They turned me away and I carried on. And I told you the lie and you admitted you were lied to, you told me, after I blew up at you, that you were lied to. You said they offered to bring us in and we wouldn't come in. And when I calmed down and you calmed down, you said, "I believe you" and I said, "Then let's see you get up and deny it and say you were lied to, and withdraw your support for that terrible motion you stood up and supported", and you have never done it.

• (1140)

Senator Everett: Just a minute. I am sorry, but I don't understand.

Senator Steuart: You don't understand what?

Senator Everett: I don't understand what you are talking about.

Senator Steuart: Well, let me tell you again.

Senator Everett: All right, okay.

Senator Steuart: I looked in at that door. Our Whips stood out and two or three of us showed up, that is all, because they had sent a note up; we did not know the vote was taking place. I heard the bell ring, then I heard the bell stop. I came down here. There were two or three of us there. The whip said to me, "Don't go in". I said, "Get out of my way. I want to know what is going on". The door was locked. I looked in. It wasn't even the time that they had said, as I found out afterwards. There you were, the only man on this side, voting with them. I blew up. I said things to you I regretted, however; so did Senator Sparrow.

After we had dinner and you said, "I was told that you people would not come in, that you were notified and refused to come in". We explained to you very calmly that that was not right. I said to you, "Do you believe us?" You said, "Yes". I said, "I hope you will get up and withdraw your vote and say you were misinformed or lied to", and I don't know whether you said you would or not, but you never did, and you have been making excuses for your conduct ever since.

Senator Everett: Come on, I don't necessarily agree. If I recall, if we are going to talk about having dinner that night, you had had a fair snootful, as I remember.

Senator Steuart: Oh, thank you very much!

Senator Everett: Well, come on, we are playing a game, eh? It is all right for you to come after me, but I cannot come back?

Senator Steuart: You can come right back all you want. Tell us some more of your fabrications.

Senator Everett: In any event, I was told that the bells were going to ring for the weekend, right? They were going to ring for the weekend, and certain senators were on their way home.

Senator Murray: And they were.

Senator Everett: And when I heard that, that is why I came down here. I got the notice from the Speaker. I heard that before I got the notice, incidentally. I want to make that very clear. I got the notice from the Speaker. The bells stopped ringing. I ran out of my office—I had been on the phone. I walked down here. The door was locked. I walked around the Speaker's corridor and into here and I pushed my way into the Senate. That is how I got in.

Senator Corbin: And you voted for them.

Senator Everett: Yes, and I did vote, because I felt that this kind of delay was unjustified, where you had let the bells ring for one weekend, from Thursday to the following Tuesday. And when I was informed—and I had the evidence of my eyes of people getting into cars and going to the airport, obviously this meant—

Senator Murray: They were going to do it again.

Senator Everett: —that the bill was going to be delayed again for a whole weekend. That is why I came into this chamber, forced my way in, and voted. And I would do so again, because, if you think you can delay Parliament forever, so be it.

Senator Sparrow: Would you tell me why you had to force your way into the Senate? Why would you have to force your way into the Senate? We couldn't get in through the doors, but why would you have to force your way into the Senate? Against whom? Who was holding you out?

Senator Everett: Because you weren't coming in.

Senator Sparrow: Who was holding you out? What do you mean "forced your way"?

Senator Everett: The Whip couldn't tell me not to come in; he is not my Whip. I came to the door and they said, "Senator, the doors are locked". I said, "Open the door".

Senator Sparrow: Who locked the door?

Senator Everett: I don't know.

Senator Sparrow: The Speaker did, and you forced your way in. Sure, you got in. That is what we are talking about; we had to force our way into the Senate.

Senator Everett: Let me tell you that the door was not locked.

Senator Sparrow: Well, you said you had to force your way in.

Senator Everett: I had to tell the doorman to open the door. He said, "I am sorry, we can't let you in". I said, "Open the door", and he opened it and I came in.

Senator Sparrow: Somebody told him not to let you in. Somebody did.

Senator Grafstein: Could I ask another question, because I asked the honourable senator this before and I think it is relevant. The facts are relevant. A number of people can witness an accident and see different things from their own perspective. However, there is one clear and uncontroversial piece of evidence that was presented to me by the senator from Alberta, which is to your knowledge. He did not receive the Speaker's letter in his office until after that vote was taken. He was not able to participate in that vote and you subsequently discovered that.

You knew that Senator Waters did not receive the letter from the Speaker until after the vote. Yet you did not stand afterwards and say, "By the way, I think it was inappropriate that an independent senator should have received a notification after the vote, thereby being deprived of notice and not being able to participate". I think we have spent hours in this place, not just defending the right of each individual senator to speak and participate, but giving inordinate time, I think, to the rights of independent Liberal senators and independent senators to speak and participate.

All of us have sat here and listened while the rules were dealt with for that purpose. But we know on this factual situation that one independent senator did not receive a notice until after the event. He is here in the chamber and I assume he is not denying those facts. That strikes me as being very material to your pseudo-position that you are here to defend each individual senator as well as the rights of this place. Can you explain that?

Senator Everett: I am not sure I said I was here to defend the right of each individual senator. It is true that Senator Waters said he did not get the notice; but then I did.

Senator van Roggen: How long before the vote did you get your notice? Five minutes?

Senator Everett: Why don't you let me answer one question? That night, as you recall, you people let the television cameras in here; you let strangers occupy the seats, you brutalized the Speaker, you yelled, you screamed. Don't you think that that had an effect on me? I sat here and listened to that circus. As far as trying to reply to it, I got up—I don't think you remember how hard it was to speak. This is a calm, cool, reasoned discussion we are having now compared to what happened to me that particular night.

I did what I thought was right. I thought what you people were doing was delaying the work of Parliament. I think you have exacerbated the situation since then. The abuse of Parliament is on this side of the house and not on the other side of the house.

Senator Everett: For that reason I am opposed to what you are doing. I think you have made a dreadful mistake, and what you did to that filibuster—I mean, let us look at some of these statements. Senator Kirby this morning on CTV said, "We are going to delay it forever until it is defeated", if I quote him correctly, and I hope I do.

Senator Olson said it would be delayed forever. He even went on to say that, if the Supreme Court decided that the appointments were legal, he would not care what the Supreme Court decided. That has been the approach on this side of the house, not that there is some resolution to come to, not that some time we will deal with this matter, not that we are going to stay with the filibuster and we will stay with it and stay with it, and if that goes over to January 15, so be it. I told the government and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition that I would support that.

The vowed intent of you people is to delay this legislation forever. You are never going to let it go to a vote. I am not talking about my guess or my opinion, I am talking about your statements, and believe you me, I think there have been abuses on both sides.

Senator Buckwold: Will you take a question?

Senator Everett: But what caused me to take the attitude that I took, and I took it advisedly—I will live with it and I will suffer through it—is that the fact of the matter is that you are the people that have been abusing Parliament, and if this were allowed to continue, Parliament would be a bloody joke.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: I have a question.

Senator Everett: Is there a question?

Senator Buckwold: I would like to ask a question although it has been suggested I should not. The question is this, Bill C-62 was tabled last April by Senator Kelly. I, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, responded as the second speaker. The third speaker was Senator Everett. That night, Senator Everett got up and made one of the strongest speeches in support of the GST legislation—I am sure honourable snators will remember—indicating his position at that time, way back in April, saying that he was a supporter of the GST, that he accepted the philosophy of the bill, and that he was ready to support it—and he was critical of me.

• (1150)

My question to you then is: Throw away all of the flimflam. Throw away all of the rhetoric that you have given us about your "holier than thou" attitude. Tell us the real truth; namely, that this is your way to get passed a bill which you have expressed your support for, and the rest is all commentary.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: I guess the shoe, if it fits me, fits you even better. The attitude on this side has been that you are against the GST. You think you have public support against the GST and you do not care particularly what tactics you use to get the GST through. I am in favour of the GST. What I am appalled at are the tactics that you—I have sat here from time to time listening, listening—

Senator Hébert: You are on the wrong side.

Senator Everett: Perhaps I should move to the other side.

Senator Hébert: Why don't you go to the other side?

Senator Corbin: Would you like to move now?

Senator Cogger: Speak from your own chair, senator.

Senator Everett: I will deal with that.

The fact is that you, and this side, have used your desire to defeat the GST to abuse the work of Parliament in a manner that I think is unacceptable. Do not accuse me of doing that, because if you can accuse me I can accuse you even more so. This has been an abuse of Parliament. Yes, I keep hearing how sad you all are, what a terrible day, what a black day this is, and so on and so forth. If you do not think that some of the things that have gone on in this chamber, organized by this side, have been an abuse of Parliament, then—

Hon. Keith Davey: Will you listen to my question, Senator Everett?

You have been talking very well, and very interestingly, and you talked a few minutes ago about knowing a great deal about the abuses on the other side. Would you care to indicate some of these abuses on the other side to which you take such great offence?

Senator Everett: I think they have been more than catalogued by speakers on this side. I do not need to catalog them. I am saying that I have listened to the catalog of abuses on the other side, and I am saying that there is an egregious abuse on this—

Senator Davey: Indicate some of these abuses. You say that you know them all so well: What are they?

Senator Everett: Did you listen to Senator MacEachen's speech? It was a superb speech. No question about it. I thought Senator Stanbury's speech was a very interesting speech on that subject. Also Senator Fairbairn. They all catalogued the abuses. Nobody seems to have talked about the abuse of the parliamentary process that has taken place here. And that was—

Senator Robichaud: By the Conservatives, and the Speaker.

Senator Everett: It is not my job. It is the way I feel, and I want you to know how I feel, and I want to put on the record that I feel that way. Do not tell me that the abuse is all over there and that there is no abuse over here. There has been abuse here, and—

Senator Robichaud: We have a right to speak on third reading.

Senator Everett: —that abuse has offended me.

You are absolutely right, yes, you have the right to speak. And I defended that right to speak with the Leader of the Government and the Deputy Leader of the Government. I told them you had a right.

An Hon. Senator: When?

Senator Everett: And you guys blew it.

Senator Robichaud: Why do you not defend it now?

Senator Steuart: When we lost you.

Senator Everett: No, not when you lost me. You used a procedural motion to delay, delay, delay—forever. I think you are wrong in tht . In any event, if I have been invited to move to the other side of this chamber, then I shall do so. Thank you, honourable senators.

Senator Hébert: That is great.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators—

Senator Murray: Is this a question?

Senator Steuart: No, it is a speech. I will only say a few words. I will deal with the situation between myself and Senator Everett. I feel badly, as does everybody on this side, about what has happened. I will not deal with that. It has been dealt with by Senator MacEachen and others in a much better way than I could have done. But I want to make my position very clear.

When I came to this chamber, I met Doug Everett, Senator Everett, and I respected him. When he decided—he was appointed by a Liberal, he was appointed as a Liberal, he was as a Liberal collector. I was a Liberal collector, sometimes called "a bag man" and so was he. Senator Everett was rewarded for that and so was I. I always carried that very honourably. I collected money. Actually, I never put it in a bag; I just gave it to the party. He did the same thing and he was rewarded by being appointed to the Senate as a very young man.

Senator Everett decided, in the fullness of time—he did a great job, he was an excellent senator—that he would sit as an Independent. We respected that. He voted and spoke very strongly in favour of the free trade deal. I was against the free trade deal and so were almost all of our colleagues, and possibly all of them. We never even asked him to leave our caucus. He himself chose to leave our caucus. We never asked him to leave this side of the house—

An Hon. Senator: Yes, you did.

Senator Steuart: We did not then. Senator Everett spoke in favour of the GST. That was his right. I have always respected his right, or anybody else's right, to vote. I have voted against the government when my party was in office; not often, but I have. People on this side have done that, and maybe people on that side. I respect that. I respected Senator Everett's right to vote for the GST and to speak in favour of it.

When that terrible day, October 4, happened, and I saw him in here, I admit I became very angry—much angrier than I should have. I said things that I have since apologized to various people for, and I was sorry. I was not sorry for being angry; I was sorry for some of the things I had said.

I did talk to Senator Everett later, and to Senator Sparrow. If I was in this condition or that, in a private talk, that is my business. I still talk to him. He told me after, "I respect that you and Senator Sparrow sat down and discussed it, because we had a very fine discussion, and I am sure I originated it, and I said many things then that I maybe should not have said."

However, we did point out to him—we asked Senator Everett why he came and voted with the government when we were not even in the house? It was outrageous. He told me then, and he told Senator Sparrow, and I hope he is not going to say that Senator Sparrow does not remember, because I remember and Senator Sparrow remembers. Senator Everett told us then that he had been informed that we had refused to go into the house. It was a fact that our Whip was out there, and when we came down to the chamber he said to one of us, "Do not go in". There were hardly any of us there to start with, because most senators had left. The bells were ringing. The weekend before we had left; that was the rule; nobody could stop us; that was the rule. I came in and I looked in the chamber and I saw that the door was locked. But I saw Senator Everett, the only senator on this side. I just blew up.

Later on, when we explained, he said, "I was under the impression that you people—I was told that you people had refused to come in." I said to him then, "You believe us now that we did not refuse to come in but that we were not informed at the right time and we did not know the bells were going to quit. My recollection very clearly is that he said, "yes." I said then, "I expect you will raise a point of order in this house and say you were misinformed on this vote? He never did that and ever since then, as far as I am concerned, Senator Everett, you have been justifying that position.

I do not recall and I would like you to dig up for me all those wonderful statements you made that you respected our right to filibuster. You warned the government that if they dared to interfere with our right to filibuster, the great Senator Everett would come down from on high and lay down on us ten commandments that they could not do it. Oh, he says to us, but if you dare to amend your own motion or make that filibuster last too long or not do it properly, in his opinion, then he would change his mind. That is why he said today "You lost my vote."

I am convinced all he has been trying to do ever since is justify why he was on that side. He never had to justify it, as far as I was concerned.

I want to say, Senator Everett, that you did not lose my respect or friendship when you voted against the government. In fact, maybe I had more respect for you because you had the guts to stand up for what you believed. What you did when you voted with the government, and what you did again this morning when you voted for something that you know broke the rules and that had never before happened—why did you do it? I guess it was for the respect of your big business friends or your Tory friends. You have their respect; they applaud you every time you stand up. You lost our respect and, in the long run, I think you have lost your own self-respect and I feel sorry for you.

Some Hon. Senators: Nonsense, nonsense.

Senator Lefebvre: Does the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate wish to speak?

Senator Murray: Yes, he wishes to speak.

Senator Lefebvre: You have my place.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, first of all with regard to the exchange between the Honourable Senator Everett and Senator Steuart, let me say that it is a fact that Senator Everett told me, a good two weeks ago, I think, that he would not support the government in any initiative to end what he regarded as a legitimate filibuster. He told me that personally, and Senator Roblin has told me of at least one or more conversations he had with Senator Everett in which Senator Everett made the same statement. Senator Everett, of course, confirmed as he had done in this house at the time of second reading, that he supported the principle of the GST and would support Bill C-62 on third reading; but he was opposed to any effort by the government to use its majority or to put together a majority with the purpose of ending what he regarded as a legitimate filibuster. I regret that the Leader of the Opposition is not in his place at this moment.

Senator Frith: He should be back soon.

Senator Murray: I want to deal with some of the matters that he raised in the course of his speech this morning. Senator MacEachen ended his speech by complaining that his right to speak last night had been taken away from him, and he dealt with the events of Tuesday and Wednesday, following Senator Kelly's point of order. I want briefly to review those events myself because they put things in quite a different light than that which Senator MacEachen seeks to cast on them.

It was on Tuesday afternoon that Senator Kelly raised his point of order. His point of order focused on the impasse in this house concerning Bill C-62. He did so as part of a larger problem that the house and Parliament faces. The filibuster within a filibuster, the systematic obstruction that we had known, as Senator Kelly pointed out, created a roadblock to the effective discharge of the business of the Senate and of the country. When he had done that, the Leader of the Opposition rose to insist that the point of order was riased at the wrong time.

Senator Kelly said this was not just about Bill C-62; it was about the business of the Senate in general. Senator MacEachen insisted this was the wrong time for Senator Kelly to do this. It should be discussed later, Senator MacEachen told us. We want time to consider it, he told us. We will discuss it when Bill C-62 is called, Senator MacEachen told us. In any case, we had several hours of discussion on Senator Kelly's point of order. Several hours of discussion ensued in which various honourable senators opposite took part. On Tuesday night at eight o'clock, when we returned with Bill C-62 before us, all of us on this side naturally expected that Senator MacEachen was going to address himself to Senator Kelly's point of order. Imagine our astonishment then—and I gave voice to it in a brief unscheduled intervention at the time—when Senator Frith invoked the right to move the weekly overnight adjournment. We were disappointed and surprised. And, as I say, I expressed my astonishment. At that point, Senator MacEachen rose to give notice that he would speak at two o'clock the next day on Senator Kelly's point of order and the fundamental issues it raised. Through the night, he and his colleagues weaved the web in which they eventually became entangled.

Senator Cools: A seamless web, was it?

Senator Murray: They weaved the web in which they became entangled. The next day, at two o'clock, it was obvious that a deal had been done. The deal was that Senator Lawson would rise in his place and move that Senator Waters be now heard while Senator MacEachen pretended to want to speak.

If you need any more evidence of that, Senator Lawson's motion was seconded by none other than Senator Olson, a frontbench Liberal who must surely be privy to the strategy of their caucus.

I still do not understand what all this was about because Senator Olson then proceeded to speak for three hours in the afternoon, not addressing himself to the question of whether Senator Waters should now be heard but addressing himself, rather, to Senator Kelly's point of order; addressing himself, rather, to the GST and to Bill C-62 and to every other issue that might be considered relevant to do in his three hour marathon. The debate went on.

• (1210)

Senator Frith preceded Senator Olson. Senator Buckwold followed Senator Olson. Frankly, if I may say so in parentheses, I do not understand why a motion that Senator so and so be now heard is a debatable. I do not think it makes sense that it be debatable. I think in the case of such a motion a vote should be held. That seems to be the logical course to me.

In any case, they presumed to debate Senator Lawson's motion. They never did address his motion. They addressed the GST and Senator Kelly's point of order. At any time, in my view—and I expressed my view en passant to Senator Waters—during the afternoon either Senator Waters or Senator MacEachen could have taken part in that debate. Under the quise of the motion that Senator Waters be now heard, the debate was really about Senator Kelly's point of order. Clearly what we had going here on Wednesday afternoon was a sequel to the initiative of Senator Gigantes to adjourn his own filibuster, and a filibuster within a filibuster. It was systematic obstruction.

Senator Frith: Of course it was. We never said it was anything else. That is what a filibuster is.

Senator Murray: So Senator MacEachean became tangled in a web, the web of deception that they had woven the night before in the collusion that they had arrived at with Senator Lawson, that he would move a motion while Senator MacEachen pretended to want the floor. I must say that it was quite well done. They played their parts, both of them, quite admirably.

Honourable Senators, I believe that this review of the events of Tuesday and Wednesday give the lie to Senator MacEachen's assertion that, in any sense, he was denied the right to speak on Senator Kelly's motion.

Senator Cools: Senator Kelly never introduced a motion!

Senator Murray: On Senator Kelly's point of order. I thank the honourable senator for that correction.

In the same vein the Leader of the Opposition complains that 40 or so Liberal and independent senators were prevented from speaking, and he blames us. We never got a chance to speak on my motion that the question be now put. A number of our senators wanted to speak, but they, like 40 Liberals and the independents, could not speak in the face of a filibuster by 11 senators, some of them speaking for 18 hours at a time.

Senator Cools: Bravo!

Senator Murray: That is what prevented you, and you, and Senator Haidasz and others—

Senator Thériault: You prevented me!

Senator Murray: —from taking part in the debate on my motion.

Honourable senators, let me come to the main burden of Senator MacEachen's speech this morning. I begin by saying that the initiative that Senator Kelly took the other day was taken, as you know, on behalf of 53 Conservative senators. With respect, I say that the role of the Speaker was, as our tradition would have it, relatively minor. What the Speaker did—and I will come back to this point later—at our request, was to provide the Senate with an opportunity to decide the question.

Some Hon. Senators: Here, here.

Senator Murray: Let the record show—

Senator Thériault: Under what rule?

Senator Murray: I will come to that Senator Thériault. Let the record show that the responsibility for that initiative was ours, the Conservative senators'. We accept the responsibility, and we will live with it on the record.

Some Hon. Senators: Here, here.

Senator Frith: That is certainly true.

Senator Murray: I listened very carefully to what the honourable the Leader of the Opposition had to say this morning at considerable length. At no time in the course of a speech that lasted almost an hour did he suggest that there was a solution, that there was a way out of this unprecedented crisis in which the Senate and, therefore, Parliament has found itself. As a matter of fact, in his entire speech he never once even acknowledged that we have been and are facing a crisis in this chamber, and an unprecedented one. To hear him speak, it was almost as if nothing could be more normal than a major tax measure, passed by the House of Commons and central to the government's economic policy, should be hung up for eight months in the Senate and its implementation date threatened by a filibuster and then by filibusters within the filibuster, all adding up to systematic obstruction. That is the situation in which the Senate and Parliament found itself.

The fact of the matter is that at various points we were under the threat of intimidation and mob rule, and to emerge from those threats of intimidation and mob rule we negotiated provisional rules, rules regarding legislation and so forth. The fact of the matter is, as Senator MacEachen knows, that every attempt in the last little while to discuss an end to this debate by agreement was rejected by the leadership opposite, and several such attempts were made. I can tell the house that one was made as recently as Monday of this week.

The situation in which the Senate and Parliament found itself was not normal. Far from it. It is contrary to all Canadian parliamentary practice and tradition, and honourable senators opposite know that.

This morning the Leader of the Opposition tried to lend his vast experience and considerable prestige as a parliamentarian to the proposition that all of this has just been normal parliamentary combat. However, not even the weight of Senator MacEachen's eloquence and conviction can rescue that proposition, because reasonable people know that it is untenable. What honourable senators opposite are asserting, sometimes implicitly and sometimes, as Senator Everett pointed out earlier, explicitly, is that the Opposition's right—and it is a right—to delay and to filibuster is unfettered and unlimited. That is the proposition we are left to grapple with in this house: that their right to filibuster and delay is unfettered by rules. Thus, over the past few months, we have had this flagrant abuse of the rules regarding privilege, for example.

• (1230)

We all know how questions of privilege are supposed to be raised in parliamentary assemblies. An honourable member rises, states his or her question of privilege, and, if it concerns only that member, it is probably dealt with immediately. If it concerns the privileges of the house as a whole, commentary is invited from members on both sides. It is decided whether or not a prima facie case is made.

Senator Frith: That is wrong, according to our Rule 33.

Senator Murray: Then remedy is brought through a motion as the case may be.

Senator Frith: Oh, that is different.

Senator Murray: But we have had, hour upon hour, day in, day out, night in and night out, a multiplicity of spurious questions of privilege without ever a motion having been moved.

Senator Frith: That is not true! That is false!

Senator Murray: Look back at the record, senator.

Senator Frith: You look back at the record, because motions were moved. I did not mean to interrupt you, but tell the truth.

Senator Murray: Also, there has been a flagrant abuse of the rules regarding petitions. We know how petitions are supposed to be presented. They have been presented before in this house. A member gets up, states that he or she has a petition from a certain number of people on a certain subject and desires to lay it before the house. That is it. Yet, hour after hour, day in and day out, night in and night out, we have had honourable senators standing up and flagrantly abusing the rules of practice regarding petitions, making lengthy speeches about nothing, and wasting time and obstructing. That is what we have had.

In the absence of precise rules in the Senate—and we find ourselves in a new adversarial situation—and in the absence of an effective way to enforce the rules of the Senate, honourable senators opposite have conducted themselves in a way that would never be tolerated in any other legislative assembly. That is a fact, and they know it.

Senator Frith: It is not a fact! It has been done!

Senator Murray: During the past two weeks we have had read into the record the entire texts of books. We have had the verbatim transcripts of the hearings of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee of last summer read into the record at considerable expense, even though the documents had already been published and were before the house. They have been reread into the Hansard record. We have had the verbatim transcripts of debates from the British Columbia Legislature read into our record. And then came this famous technique of 10- and 20-minute speeches in the guise of questions. Honourable senators know that that would never be allowed in any other legislative assembly in the world.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Who says so? Where does it say that? Have you looked at them all?

Senator Murray: Show me a legislature in Canada or anywhere else where that has occurred.

People have said to me, especially the new honourable senators on this side and those who have had experience in other legislatures, that surely these people should be called to order for what they are doing. Sadly, I have had to tell them not to raise a point of order, because if they raise a point of order, honourable senators opposite will filibuster it forever. If the Speaker should rule against the opposition, they will not appeal—as is their right under our rules—they will storm the chair, as they have done three times.

Senator Cools: We never stormed the chair!

Senator Murray: They were waving their little red books, paralysing the work of the Senate and of Parliament, and intimidating the Chair. So for more than two months we have lived in this chamber with the threat—or the reality, which is as bad as a threat—of intimidation and mob rule.

Honourable senators, the opposition is asserting is not only that their right to delay and filibuster is unfettered by the rules, but that it is unlimited in duration; in other words, the right to delay is a right to obstruct indefinitely. That is their position. They assert that they are within their rights, as an opposition, to prevent a matter from coming to a vote and to prevent senators forever and ever, as Senator Kirby confirmed this morning on his weekly panel, from exercising their right to vote. What else are we to make of the record of the past eight months with Bill C-62 and, in particular, with the record since September 25? It is a record of time wasting, delay and obstruction which is there for all to judge.

Senator Simard: At great cost!

Senator Murray: They no longer have a Liberal majority in the Senate; we do have a Conservative majority in the Senate. They feared they might lose the vote on Bill C-62, so they were determined to prevent the vote from taking place. After eight months, they were determined to prevent Parliament from deciding in time to implement the tax for its January 1 startup date. In other words, they were determined to create the maximum inconvenience, confusion and chaos in the country and hope that the government would take the blame. How undemocratic! How unparliamentary! How irresponsible!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: What rot!

Senator Murray: Because we are coming to the final hours of this debate, I want to open a set of parentheses to discuss briefly the consequences of creating this kind of uncertainty and confusion in the country, as the Liberal senators have been trying to do. I have a statement that was made as long ago as November 5 by Mr. Alasdair McKichan of the Retail Council of Canada, whose members will be on the front lines collecting this tax. He refers to a telegram that he and other industry organizations sent to Senator MacEachen and Mr. Chretien concerning these matters. Mr. McKichan said in his speech:

> I would suggest that it is important that the senators keep hearing from our industry and others that at this point their actions are destructive, they are hurting an already fragile economy, they are causing hardships to thousands upon thousands of businesses, and ultimately, of course, to the employees of these businesses.

Later he says:

> Uncertainty as to the bill's passage induced by the Senate behaviour has caused hundreds of thousands of businesses to procrastinate both in registering and preparing themselves for the operation of the tax.

Then he goes on to explain in detail some of the implications. He says:

> Every day that passes these firms are being hurt. It is weeks since they should have come to the appropriate conclusions about their inventory levels, the way they will adjust their inventory prices, their marking strategy, have learned the new prices their suppliers will quote them, how they deal with their blended merchandise in inventory, their repricing program, and so on.
> Now these firms will have to scramble. Many of them will not fully understand the implications of their decisions, and as a result they will reduce their profitability, some of them probably to a fatal extent.

● (1300)

> It has been argued that because of the delay at this stage it would be desirable for the department to postpone the implementation by a month or two. In my view this is not a realistic option. The great bulk of business has geared itself for the January 1st date and it would be hideously expensive to unwind the preparations which have been made.
> There are warehouses and container loads by the thousand already marked with the post-GST prices. There are advertisements and flyers composed, catalogues printed, all assuming that January 1st, 1991 is the operative date. Employees have been trained, staff has been scheduled for the massive repricing operation. Computer programs have been established and installed. There are literally hun> dreds of millions of dollars of investment, all geared to the January 1 date.

> Two years ago when we were consulted on the GST, we told Michael Wilson that once the clock had started ticking there could be no deviation from the course. The trade needed a clear year, and it needed absolute certainty that the program would go ahead basically as outlined. That advice still stands.
> I think it is terribly important that the senators understand the same message. The senators may feel they are gaining political points by their quixotic behaviour. In reality they are wounding Canadian business, they are threatening the employment prospects of many and ultimately they are contributing to a lower GDP and a lower standard of living for all of us in 1991.

Those are the words of the President of the Retail Council of Canada as long ago as November 5.

A few days before that, on October 26, a group of organizations, ranging from the Automotive Parts Manufacturers of Canada, the Canadian Advanced Technology Association, the Canadian Exporters' Association, Le Conseil du Patronat du Québec, the Grocery Products Manufacturers, the Information Technology Association of Canada and others made the same point, saying that the defeat of the goods and services tax or its delay will cause enormous problems for business, small and large, across Canada, problems that we can hardly afford.

Senator Thériault: That gives you 8 per cent in North York. That is what it does.

Senator Murray: They ended, honourable senators, by saying that their second point has to do with the fundamentals of parliamentary democracy. They said:

> Some of the associations who are signatories to this letter do not approve, as you know, of every facet of each bill in question.

Here they are talking about Bill C-62 and several others. They go on to say:

> We are unanimous, however, in our view that the Senate is not justified in frustrating the will of the elected House of Commons.
> Moreover, it is not in the national interest to have the central institutions of the Government of Canada paralysed by the bitter and highly destructive partisanship that Canadians are now witnessing.

Senator Stollery: You ain't seen nothing yet.

Senator Murray: Senator Stollery says, "You ain't seen nothing yet," and I am glad to have that on the record for future reference. They go on to say:

> We therefore strongly urge you and your colleagues in Opposition to take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that the legislation in question passes through the Senate, and to leave final judgment on the Government to where that power ultimately and legitimately resides-in the electoral will of the people of Canada.

When he was speaking earlier, Senator Everett referred to some of the explicit comments that had been made by members of the Liberal opposition in which they indicated very, very strongly their determination to prevent this matter from ever coming to a vote.

I should like to place a couple of those statements on the record now, in addition to the one that I just referred to and that is as fresh as this morning's Canada AM from our colleague, Senator Kirby.

As long ago as October 13, Senator Jacques Hébert, in the Toronto Star said:

> It's a fight to the finish against the GST . . . ..if it takes all the weekends until July, I don't know and I don't care.

That is Senator Hébert, one of the leading tacticians and strategists of the Liberal opposition.

Senator MacEachen himself, on October 19, said:

> Petitions are eternal . . . ..Our objective is to kill the GST.

Senator MacEachen and I know something about the meaning of eternity, having studied at the same school. This is just one of many indications that their intention is to prevent the bill from ever coming to a vote.

Senator Thériault: Of course.

Senator Murray: Listen to their words. Listen to Senator Frith, as he is quoted in the Western Report of November 12.

Senator Stollery: I wonder what the Reform Party supporters are going to think about this.

Senator Murray:

> Mr. Frith says he won't disclose the Liberals' most devious procedural plans.

Senator Frith: "Devious" was his word, not mine.

Senator Murray:

> "We're into a war-metaphor mode," he says. "George Bush isn't telling Saddam Hussein his plans, either."

Senator Frith: He got it right. I will stand by that.

Senator Murray: George Bush, Saddam Hussein, Royce Frith: there they are.

Leaving aside the distressing signs of incipient megalomania, how irresponsible can you get. Listen to this, and this is not between quotes, although I will come to the quote in a moment:

> The Liberals' tactics are being master-minded by a triumvirate that includes Liberal Senate leader Allan MacEachen, former finance minister and acknowledged master of parliamentary procedure; Mr. Frith, a long-time Ontario Liberal; and Alberta's Joyce Fairbairn, a former journalist and legislative assistant to former prime minister Pierre Trudeau. The Liberals say if they can delay passage of the GST until after January 1, the tax can't be implemented until 1992. They argue that would be uncomfortably close to the next election, forcing the Tories to drop or radically modify the GST. Says Mr.

Frith: "Our entire strategy depends on delay. We're going to give them a good dose of anarchy."

Senator Frith: I will speak to that.

Senator Murray: Eight months after the bill has been sent to the Senate, the Senate is still not permitted to decide, and Senator Frith, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, advertises that his goal is to give the Senate a good dose of anarchy.

Senator Frith: That was out of context. I will speak to that. That is what I said, but not in that way.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame, shame!

Senator Frith: Just wait for it. You will hear more about that.

Senator Murray: George Bush, Saddam Hussein, Royce Frith. Here is the war-metaphor mode again, this time on the 30th of November in an interview he gave to Radio Canada on the evening of the unfortunate incident in which Senator Hastings became ill, after his contribution to the debate. Senator Frith said:

[Translation]

It is like war, you can devise tactics and strategies, but in the end you have to come to the battlefield. Then, you learn.

• (1310)

[English]

Honourable senators when they start playing war games in Parliament, you know that Parliament has a problem, and a responsible majority in this place must find a way out of that.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: The letter that Conservative senators signed and sent to the Speaker, and that was placed on the record on Tuesday by our colleague Senator Kelly, is completely consistent with parliamentary and democratic practice and tradition. We asked only that the Senate have an opportunity to decide, eight months after Bill C-62 arrived here, whether a day and a time should be fixed to have a vote.

Senator Frith: Once you got a majority.

Senator Murray: What could be more democratic than that? What could be more in keeping with parliamentary tradition?

Senator Thériault: Shame! Shame!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, this is a parliamentary crisis.

Senator Thériault: You caused it.

Senator Murray: It is an unprecedented situation and to resolve it we have had to create another precedent.

Senator Frith: A dose of anarchy. Your own dose of anarchy.

Senator Murray: The Senate lacks the large and comprehensive body of rules that the House of Commons and other legislatures have.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Stollery: It is because you have not read the books.

Senator Murray: Senator Everett has pointed this out—

Senator Thériault: How would he know?

Senator Murray: —and so has Senator Fairbairn in her speech. The rules in the House of Commons and other legislatures—

Senator Frith: If you like it better over there, why don't you go over there?

Senator Murray: —try to anticipate almost every conceivable eventuality and to cover it with a rule. Our rules do not do that. They are quite general. We do not have a fixed calender of sittings and recesses. We do not have restrictions or schedules for routine proceedings. We do not have a fixed time for the beginning and the end of Question Period, as I well know. We do not have restrictions on the content of oral questions. We do not have time limits on questions. We do not have the time limits on speeches. We do not have restrictions on the amendments that can be moved at the report stage. We do not have restrictions on the debatability of a large number of motions. We do not have limitations on the length of time of the Throne Speech debate. We do not have a time allocation procedure. We do not have a closure rule. We have no such rules because we have never needed them. We have muddled through until 1984 without them. We muddled through until 1984 when this Senate began to become a far more adversarial, far more confrontational, far more partisan chamber than it had ever been since 1867.

An Hon. Senator: Since you became leader.

Senator Murray: No, I became leader in 1986.

In any case, Senator Everett argues that we still should not have such rules and, if I understood Senator Fairbairn's speech well this morning, she argues that we should not have such rules.

Senator Fairbairn: I beg your pardon?

Senator Murray: Senator Fairbairn quoted—I thought with some disapproval—the statement she said the Speaker had made during the course of a private meeting to the effect that we needed changes in the rules to make them, as she put it "more restrictive." Senator Everett also says we do not need and do not have rules of the kind I have just mentioned that exist in the House of Commons and in many other legislative assemblies.

If we are to continue to be, as we have been gradually becoming since 1984, an extension of the House of Commons, adversarial, confrontational and partisan, we are going to need such rules.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: That is a debate we can have at a later time but I think we are going to need such rules.

Senator Stollery: I guess we will use the same rules after the next election.

Senator Murray: Over the years, the Senate created procedures and precedents to deal with situations as they arose. That is what we have done over the years. I need look no further back than to the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce of September 24 when just that happened.

In previous debates, I have referred to what happened at the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce of September 24, but today I have the benefit of having in my hands the Minutes of the Proceedings of that meeting and I want to share something of those Minutes of the Proceedings with you because this is quite relevant to the discussion we are having today about having new procedures and creating precedents to get the Senate out of unprecedented situations.

On Monday, September 24, 1990, the committee met at 1:30 in the afternoon. A couple of hours earlier, honourable senators had been given a draft report, several hundred pages in length, which no senator in the opposition had ever laid eyes on before. The report was on the GST. Here is what the Minutes of Proceedings tell us happened after it lists the names of those present and the fact that the committee proceeded to meet in camera. It states:

> The Honourable Senator Frith moved that the Report on Bill C-62 . . . be presented in the Senate on Tuesday, September 25, 1990;

That was the next day. It goes on:

> —that, in order to allow sufficient time for production of the above-mentioned Report, a final decision be reached by 7 o'clock p.m. this day;

Senator Barootes: No filibuster allowed there.

Senator Murray: It goes on:

> —that the Committee proceed to consider the four alternatives as presented in the draft report, and that to this end the Chairman allot time and present each alternative in turn for division."

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Senator: How is that for a precedent?

Senator Phillips: Who was the chairman?

Senator Murray: Then our friend Senator Simard got up humbly—

Senator Petten: Humbly?

Senator Murray: —to suggest that perhaps they could give the committee a week to consider this report of several hundred pages. The Honourable Senator Simard moved that the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word "Tuesday" and substituting the following therefore: "October 2, 1990."

We have Senator Frith's motion on the floor that the report be presented tomorrow; that the discussion be ended by 7 o'clock; that the Chairman allot time for the consideration of each point; and present each alternative. We then have Senator Simard's amendment asking for a week. After debate, the Honourable Senator Frith moved that the question be now put. Then, of course, it gets better. Then Senator Doody on a question of privilege and Senator Ottenheimer on a point of order said that this motion that the question be now put was debatable. "Oh no, it's not," said Senator Frith, "No, sir."

Senator Frith: Not in committee, it is not.

Senator Murray: On a question of privilege being raised by the Honourable Senator Doody and on a point of order being raised by the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer and debate arising thereon, the Chairman heard arguments and put the question. That is Senator Buckwold.

• (1320)

The Committee divided and, the names being called, they were taken down.

The motion, that is, Senator Frith's closure motion that the question be now put, on which he allowed no debate, was therefore resolved in the affirmative.

Then Senator Simard's amendment was put and it was defeated.

Senator Barootes: So much for the rights of the minority.

Senator Frith: All in accordance with the rules; the rules of your own Speaker.

Senator Murray: Then we came to the report of the Committee, and the Honourable Senator Frith moved:

> . . . that the draft report be adopted as the Report of the Committee with Alternative Four [declining to proceed further with the Bill] as the final chapter and that Alternative Four be amended as follows:

Then there is some text which I do not think is relevant here. So Senator Frith is now moving that that report be adopted.

> After debate, the Honourable Senator Frith moved that the question be now put.

Senator Frith: All regular.

Senator Murray:

> On a Point of Order being raised by the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer—

Senator Barootes: Not debatable.

Senator Frith: Not in committee. All ratified by your own Speaker.

Senator Murray: —and Senator Ottenheimer, having stated that this motion that the question be now put is debatable, was told, "No, it is not".

> On a Point of Order being raised by the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer, and debate arising thereon, the Chairman heard arguments and put the question.

That is what happened.

> The Committee divided and the names being called, they were taken down as follows: The motion was resolved in the affirmative.
> At 7:45 p.m. the Committee adjourned to the call of the Chair.

How is that for a precedent?

Let us just review what happened at that meeting on September 24th. Senator Frith came in and there was a 300-page report in front of honourable senators. Time allocation on the report, closure on the time allocation motion, and cut-off of debate on the closure motion. He did it twice in the same afternoon, and there is not a rule in the Senate or anywhere else that let him do it, and his defence on every occasion when it was protested was, "It is the will of the majority."

Senator Frith: All in accordance with the rules. Your own Speaker ratified it.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, what is relevant here is that there is no rule to let him do that. He did it because, in his judgment and that of the majority of senators on that Committee, that was the way to deal with the particular situation that had arisen. The majority ruled.

Honourable senators, nothing so drastic, nothing so Draconian, nothing so peremptory or high-handed was done today. Senator Kelly's initiative asked senators to decide whether, indeed, the entire business of the Senate had been effectively blocked by the filibuster and the obstruction on Bill C-62. The answer was yes. Senator Kelly's initiative asked whether the debate on Bill C-62 had truly covered every possible argument. Goodness knows, the answer to that question was in the affirmative. Senator Kelly and the other senators asked whether the Senate should have the opportunity to decide where we go from here. The answer to that question was also in the affirmative.

As I said at the outset, Speaker Charbonneau played the role that he should play in the Senate. It is the only role that Liberal Senators and others have ever agreed that he should play; it is the role of letting the Senate decide, and that is what he did. The Senate has decided and taken responsibility for that decision.

I need go no further than to Senator Kelly's mentor, Senator Frith, and the statement he made over one year ago on June 28, 1989 to be found in the Senate Hansard at page 416. It was on a motion for reconsideration of the decision to close CFB Summerside. On a point of order, the Speaker's ruling had been negatived, and Senator Frith stated:

> Honourable senators, I am sure there are precedents for the vote having that result, but, in any event, I do not know how there could be any other interpretation. As I understand the principle, it is that the Senate decides that it is not necessarily bound by the rulings of the Speaker, that it reserves the right to overturn rulings and therefore retains the right to decide what is or is not in order by a majority vote. That is what has taken place. It is always the case, especially with the hotly fought questions, that a minority is not pleased with the result of the majority's vote, and I might feel the same way. That is the way the Senate works at the present time. It retains the right to decide finally, if it wishes, questions of order by a majority vote.

[Senator Murray.]

Honourable senators, let me place on the record once more, as I have done a couple of months ago, the statement of Senator Stewart of Antigonish-Guysborough. Professor Stewart, as he was then and is now, wrote a celebrated article for the Toronto Star at the time of the famous bell-ringing episode in which he stated that the Speaker should have taken the initiative to end that episode. He made a statement which should ring in all our ears: "If Speakers never dealt with procedural situations except on the basis of exact precedents, there would be no precedents."

That was stated by Senator Stewart.

Some Hon. Senators: Again, again!

Senator Murray: By popular demand, I will place that one sentence on the record again. This was said by Senator Stewart of Antigonish-Guysborough: "If Speakers never dealt with procedural situations except on the basis of exact precedents, there would be no precedents."

Senator Stewart: Senator Murray, I appreciate you quoting what I wrote back in 1982. Why do you take what I wrote so seriously? Why do you attribute so much authority to me?

Senator Murray: This will be as embarrassing for him as it is for me. As a matter of fact, he asked this question before, although not in quite those words. He asked that question a couple of months ago, and he knows the answer. I have to say again that he is an eminent authority. He was a member of the House of Commons for a number of years, having won two elections to that body.

Senator Stewart: Three.

Senator Murray: I beg your pardon, 1962, 1963 and 1965. He is the author of a book on parliament and parliamentary procedure. He is the author of a book, perhaps not relevant to our immediate discussion, on the political philosophy of David Hume. He is regarded as an eminent scholar. I can say, and I have heard this said for many years, that he is an extremely popular and respected professor at St. Francis Xavier University. What more can I say about his qualifications?

• (1330)

Honourable senators, I do not want us to dignify by any comment of ours some of the more unjust and indeed, slanderous, comments that have been made about the person of the Honourable Guy Charbonneau, both inside and outside this house. Those of us who have known him personally for some time, and my acquaintance and friendship with him goes back almost 30 years, know him to be a fine gentleman, a dedicated Canadian, who has in this situation, in a situation that has never before faced the Senate or any Speaker of the Senate, in all of our history, since September, conducted himself with almost heroic patience and forebearance—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: —in the face of horrendous personal provocation, in terms of some of the decisions he has made, I agree with the Winnipeg Free Press that they should build a statue to him on Parliament Hill.

Let me state again, in defence of the Chair and of the Speaker, that it was at our request—open, above board, in a letter, public, 53 Conservative senators signed it—that it was at our request that he gave the Senate the opportunity to decide. I say that it was, and Senator Kelly said that it was, his duty to do so. He could do no less.

Honourable senators, we on this side, we Conservative senators, accept the responsibility for our action, and for his.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Senator Lefebvre: Honourable senators, I will be brief, as usual. I simply wanted to corroborate a number of facts set out by my colleagues, senator Joyce Fairbairn and the honorable Richard Stanbury, regarding the meeting of the four Liberal senators with the Speaker, Guy Charbonneau.

Indeed, senators Stanbury, Kirby, Fairbairn and myself have requested, after consulting each other, a meeting with the honorable Charbonneau at his office. We had no mandate from anyone, neither our caucus, nor our leader. We were acting entirely on our own initiative. We are four experienced parliamentarians with, I think, some credibility among our colleagues on both sides of this House.

I decided to join the group as a parliamentarian with 25 years of experience who is deeply distressed by what has been going on for some time now in the Senate following the tabling of Bill C-62 on the GST.

During all those years in the Parliament of Canada, either here or in the other place, I have gone through rough times, as many others, after the government of the day announced certain policies. Policy announcements are always followed, as we know, by the Opposition parties taking a stand. That is how our system works. Certainly, there were stormy episodes, uproar, shouting and bells ringing for 15 consecutive days or more. But I have never seen anything quite like this, with decisions made against to our own rules and any parliamentary tradition.

Before this government came to power, such crises were always followed by talks and negociations between representatives from both sides. We would come to an agreement, after each side watered down their wine and moved back a little from their initial position.

Of course, nobody was totally happy. Neither side had won it all, but at least the government would accept some changes. And the Opposition would accept that, within a given period of time, the government had the right to move ahead with its bill with the solemn commitment to include a number of amendments, especially those from the official Opposition.

Based on this experience and in an effort to prevent as much as possible more stormy episodes in the Senate, I wanted to discuss with the Speaker and my three colleagues. The meeting went fine, socially speaking. Senator Charbonneau was friendly and polite. Nevertheless, I got out of this informal meeting with the distinct impression that nothing encouraging would come out of it.

As was mentioned by senator Stanbury, Senator Charbonneau recognized that at the beginning of his mandate as Speaker of the Senate and even until recently, he had not studied the rules of the Senate in any detail. However, things had now changed and he no longer had to master the rule book. He also recognized that we had the right to speak, that there was no rule preventing the debate from going on and a senator from speaking.

But he also added that the government might have plans in order to find a way to put an end to the debate and to have a vote since they were anxious to mail the GST credit cheques to eligible Canadians.

He explained to us that if Tory Senators made such a request, he would listen carefully to the arguments on the subject and then make a decision.

[English]

Honourable senators, it was quite evident that Senator Charbonneau was, and is, under tremendous pressure from his political masters, and has given us all on this side of the chamber the impression that he has given in to their demands, and has therefore lost his right to preside over our deliberations in this Senate. It is a sad day in the history of Canada's Parliament. Historians will no doubt be commenting on the disgraceful acts perpetrated in this chamber by the supporters of the Mulroney government. Yes, the present Speaker must go. He could save some dignity, perhaps, if he resigned forthwith on his own.

[Translation]

In conclusion, honourable senators, I am very happy about the battle fought by my colleagues of the Liberal Party against the GST. Even today, my office is getting dozens of long distance calls from Canadians congratulating us, the Liberals, and condemning the Mulroney government and its supporters. I am proud of the team work we did for Canadians. Tory senators will bear full responsibility for this GST legislation and for the abominable way they have chosen to get Bill C-62 passed. Shame on them! Canadians will not forget.

The Tories have broken all the rules, all the traditions, all the principles of our parliamentary tradition. I am convinced, dear colleagues, that very shortly they will pay for that as they should. Thank you.

Senator Grimard: I consider this intervention as my first, even though I spoke for a few mintues a couple of weeks ago to make a suggestion to the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, Honourable Frith.

I spoke only a few minutes, but I believe my advice was good since he seemed to have folllowed it to the letter.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: That is right.

Senator Grimard: Indeed, after all the other votes, contrary to what he used to do before my intervention, Senator Frith stopped doing his calculations, deducting the vote of the eight senators plus the vote of the Speaker and saying that the result would have been such and such.

So, I am quite pleased to have been able, after two and a half months in the Senate, to make a suggestion to a distinguished parliamentarian like Senator Frith, who has been here 13 years.

It is not without some emotion that I take the floor, even though I have been arguing in various judicial and administrative tribunals in the province and the country for 41 years. I have some experience, but speaking in this chamber for the first time, after two and a half months, is a bit disturbing.

First of all, I would like to say to all the honourable senators that I intend to respect every one of them but that, in return, I also want respect. I can tell you that this morning, when we voted and were heckled by senators from the other side, who called us "vendus", "traitor", "frog" or "gangster", not just me, but also my colleagues, I was deeply saddened. This is not what I expected from this chamber, as I have the distinct impression that this is not parliamentary language.

I would also, since this is my first intervention, like to pay tribute to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Murray, and to his assistant, Senator Doody, for the magnificent work they have done these last two months and a half, that is since my arrival in the Senate, despite extremely difficult conditions.

Broadminded as I am—and I ask you to show me the same courtesy and excuse me if, at times, I make mistakes or forget things—, I would also like to salute a great parliamentarian in the person of the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, Senator MacEachen.

I want finally to pay tribute to another experienced parliamentarian, an experrt in matters of parliamentary procedure, his assistant, Senator Frith.

This being said, I want to come to the heart of the matter and tell you that, this morning, I listened intently to the interesting and profound speech made by Senator MacEachen. I was however a little surprised to hear this great parliamentarian say that the debates, of which I will speak later, had all been provoked by the appointment of eight new senators.

Senator MacEachen, I didn't know that these appointments had caused so much excitement. Come to think of it, it is not so much the fact that eight new senators were appointed, but the arrival of these new senators brought to an end the supremacy you held in the Senate for half a century that infuriated you. I can understand your frustration in this regard.

I listened to your arguments concerning the former Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Beaudoin. However, I would have liked for you to tell us that what he wanted to do was to change a decision he had himself rendered. As for the Speaker of the Senate, Senator Guy Charbonneau, it was not his wish to change a decision, but, as Senator Murray put it so well a few moments ago, it is at our request that he did so, at the request of the 53 Conservative senators who asked him to reach a decision and submit it to this House. That is the difference between Speaker Beaudoin's decision and that of Senator Charbonneau.

[Senator Grimard.]

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

• (1345)

I know that you have a lot to think about, but still, you made a mistake, Senator MacEachen. I regret that Senator Molgat is not here, because you have stated that Senator Molgat had never occupied the Chair since September 24, 1990 and, to confirm what you said, you turned to Senator Molgat and asked: "Am I correct". He nodded his agreement.

It may be that one of you or both have forgotten, but I have in hand a copy of the Debates of the Senate, of Wednesday, October 24, 1990, where we can read "The Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, Speaker pro tempore".

So your statement is incorrect, but I can understand that. Listen, we can all make mistakes. Nevertheless, you must admit that, contrary to what you said, Senator Molgat did have the opportunity to chair this debate, on October 24.

I wanted (it is in a way the purpose of my remarks) to convey to you the frustration I have felt since I came to the Senate on September 27. First of all, in one of your speeches, Hon. Senator MacEachen, you stated that we had come to the Senate through the backdoor. I do not know how my colleagues came in, but as far as I am concerned, the only door I knew was the front door. Nobody had told me to use another entrance.

When I arrived here, I thought that my seven colleagues and I would be received with full honour, with the privilege of signing in the presence of our peers, with our love ones watching from the gallery. I thought that, like each and everyone of you, I could come in the Senate through the front door.

Unfortunately, Liberal senators, when you heard that we were coming, you deemed necessary, in your wisdom, to vacate the premises not to return. Because of that, my colleagues and I took our oath of office on the sly, without having our loved ones and relatives in attendance to share in what I considered as was the crowning achievement of a great career.

So it can be said that the first time I came to the Senate, I entered through the backdoor! I suppose you must be proud to haved been so rude and impolite with us.

A few days later, I had an opportunity to see that Liberal senators do not hesitate to disregard the rules of the Senate which they claim now are so important. I saw them trample upon Rule 15 which states that when the Speaker rises, all other senators must remain seated or resume their seats. I saw you behave like this on several occasions, although you seem now so anxious to enforce the rules contained in the little red book.

On many occasions, I saw you break Rule 16(a) which states that when the Senate is sitting, senators should not pass between the Chair and the Table. On several occasions, I saw you behave as though these provisions were not part of the Rules of the Senate.

I heard, during the entire night of Thursday, October 4, the one I call "the night of the long knifes", the liberal senators insulting Speaker Charbonneau. Thus, at page 2345 of the Debates of Thursday, October 4, Senator Haidasz was comparing Senator Charbonneau to Hitler.

A little later, the talkative Senator Steuart (Prince Albert-Duck Lake), speaking to Senator Barootes, ended his tirade with the following:

> You are a despicable little bugger!

Senator Simard: Which Senator Steuart?

Senator Grimard: . . . Senator Barootes. I may not be pronouncing his name right, but give me a few years and, I will be able to do better.

Senator Simard: That's fine with me.

Senator Grimard: And then, in the absence of senator MacEachen, I had to listen to what I call the cacophonous orchestra of the Liberal senators, who slammed their desktops from 9.30 in the morning till 4.30 in the afternoon.

Maybe those same honourable senators who are always so anxious to follow the rules could tell me what rule allowed them to hold such a concert in the Senate? It can't be rule 27 which gives the right to speak to every member of the Senate.

While some of them were busy slamming their desktops, we also saw what we considered serious people with bells, whistles, pipes . . .

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Kazoos.

Senator Grimard: . . . among other things. I even saw with my own eyes the honourable senator Davey distributing those things I took out of a brown paper bag. I thought he was the rainmaker as people call him. On that day, I found out he was really . . .

Senator Simard: The toy maker.

Senator Grimard: . . . a toy maker, but mostly a noise maker.

Since we came back, senators have spent hundreds and hundreds of hours in this house reading petitions, unnecessarily extending Senate hours, but also taxing our staff and wasting taxpayers' money. I saw some senators gloating about their speeches 12, 15, and 18 hours long.

Let's go back to rule 27 which I was referring to earlier and on which you base your opposition to the Speaker's ruling. The rule says a senator may speak to any question before the Senate. Now don't you think there is a difference between the rule and the spirit of the rule?

Do you think that those who drafted rule 27 intended to give any senator the right to speak, on any issue, for 15 for 20 hours? Do you not feel that there is a difference between the rule itself and the spirit in which it was adopted?

The Speaker of the Senate, Senator Charbonneau, was justified, I feel, in taking these decisions. I would simply like to quote some newspaper reports. There are hundreds on the manner in which you conducted yourselves.

I have here an editorial by Jean-V. Dufresne published in the Journal de Montréal on October 18, 1990. You will notice that this article was written two months ago. So without knowing what happened during the past two months, Jean-V. Dufresne wrote the following:

> I am particularly thinking of our infamous senators in Ottawa who, under a less tolerant regime, would have simply deserved to be charged with political destablilization.
> Morally, Jean Chrétien and his bunch of old fossils from the high chamber are the successors of the FLQ. Attempted usurpation of authority . . . , blackmail, erosion of parliamentary foundations, misappropriation of public funds.

This is what an editorialist thought of you.

On October 27, Claude Masson wrote a long article in La Presse of which I will read an excerpt:

> By acting in an unreasonable, inconceivable, inappropriate, extremist, irreverent and anti-democratic manner . . .

I think I have to repeat that because this is what an editorialist thought of you on October 27. I dare not think of what he would say now, after almost two additional months of useless debate. So I am quoting again:

> By acting in an unreasonable, inconceivable, inappropriate, extremist, irreverent and anti-democratic manner . . . , the Liberals have irreparably damaged this parliamentary institution.

Of course, he meant the Senate.

If, on October 27, at the very beginning of the filibuster, conscientious editorialists wrote what I just read, don't you think that it was time to put an end to the fury? That is why we, Conservative senators, have asked the Speaker of the Senate to take the necessary steps to stop the abuse.

Today, because decisions have been made, decisions which are reasonable, reasoned, fair and justified under the circumstances, a non-confidence motion has been put forward requesting that the Speaker of the Senate be dismissed from his duties. Why? Because he stopped an intolerable and unjustified abuse, because he put an end, once and for all, to the fury. I am absolutely sure, honourable Liberal senators, that if we had television cameras here like they have in the House of Commons, you would not have had the kind of behaviour that I described a while ago. You would have been ashamed! And Canadians too, if they had seen you, would have been ashamed of you!

An Hon. Senator: Especially of Senator Simard.

Senator Grimard: If you want to say something to Senator Simard, you know as well as I do that he is quite capable to fend for himself.

To conclude my remarks, I must tell you that I came to the Senate without any parliamentary background but only with the life experience of a decent man at 65 years of age.

I thought that my work as a senator would be to change and improve bills sent to us from the House of Commons. I thought that the Senate needed people with experience in all areas so that we could study bills and, based on our experience, say that this bill or that bill needs a little more of this or a little less of that and so on. What a disappointment!

I was quite disappointed when I realized that you, my friends opposite, had only one goal in mind, to wreck this bill instead of improving it. You were ready to use any means in order to destroy this bill on which we had two months of useless debate. I am disappointed. I hope that after we vote tonight, we can see the light at the end of the tunnel, despite remarks by Senator MacEachen that the appointment of eight senators would not solve the problem. I hope that, after the heat of battle, minds will calm down. Tonight will be the nicest day in my life. It will be the end of two and a half months my colleagues and I had to spend almost uselessly in this chamber. Tonight, I will vote in favour of this bill and I will be able to say to myself tonight: Senator Grimard, this is the most beautiful day in your life because you were part of an important achievement. Time will tell that our government was right in putting this bill forward. Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. John B. Stewart: The Honourable Senator Grimard, who has just taken his seat, attributed certain words to me in the course of his address which I did not utter. He may have done that inadvertently. If he did I hope that at an appropriate time he will rise and make a correction.

Senator Grimard has said that he has found this place disappointing. I must say to him that he says that because he came to this house at a moment of hot battle. Obviously he is quite unfamiliar with what had taken place during the previous six years. He does not realize that the discussion which has taken place here in the past few weeks has not been simply on Bill C-62 but has been a debate, a disagreement, a controversy, over the proper role of the Senate.

On November 29, in some remarks I made, honourable senators, I attempted to review that controversy. I hope that during the Christmas recess—to which Senator Grimard looks forward so eagerly—he will have an opportunity to peruse my remarks and perhaps go back to the Senate documents to ascertain whether or not my partisanship has led me to exaggerate. If he decides that I have exaggerated, I will be more than happy to consider his corrections.

I am sorry that Senator Everett has left once again because I do not think he would have said what he said here today if he had had accurate information. This afternoon Senator Everett told us that he is a senator—

Senator Frith: He is now here.

Senator Stewart: I am glad to see Senator Everett returning to the chamber.

Senator Everett told us today that he is a senator of long experience. The unfortunate thing about his experience is that it comes from a period during which one party was in power in government and had a laarge majority in the Senate. That experience produced a kind of lethargy in this place which led many people of all political parties—the Liberal party, the Progressive Conservative party, and the New Democratic Party—to conclude that the Senate is simply a bunch of lazy old folk who do nothing worthwhile.

The exception to that was the work of Senate committees om pre-studying bills. When scholars looked at the work of the committees pre-studying bills, they came to the conclusion that certain senators, and Senator Everett's name is mentioned in the academic literature, were participating in this Senate as a lobby from within. Professor Colin Campbell's book entitled, A Lobby From Within, is very harsh on lobbyists from within. Why? Because, he says, they constitute business lobby. He says that they very often use their privileged position as fundraisers for the two major political parties to gain special access. They lobbyied from premises paid for by the people of Canada.

Senator Everett states that, things have changed for the worse since 1984. His experience is limited. He does not know that there was a period of strong adversarial relationship in the Senate after 1896; that there was a period of strong adversarial relationship after 1911.

Earlier today Senator MacEachen told us about how the closure standing order was added to the rules of the House of Commons. That rule was added in the course of debate on the Tory government's naval bill. In the middle of the committee stage on the naval bill, the Borden government, duly elected in 1911, decided that this five-line bill was not going to make it through the House of Commons. It had been under debate for weeks. The prime minister of the day gave notice that he proposed a change in the rules of the House of Commons. He moved his motion for a change in the rules of the House of Commons. His motion was debated and eventually the rule was adopted. Using the new closure rule, the naval bill, to provide some $35 million to the British government for the construction of three dreadnoughts, passed the House of Commons. That bill, which was clearly very important to the government of the day, indeed so important that it found it necessary to add a closure rule to the rules of the House of Commons, came to the Senate. What happened? The Liberal senators defeated the bill; it never became law.

What has happened here since 1984 may be without precedent in Senator Everett's senatorial experience, but it is not entirely unprecedented in the history of this country.

In the 1920s a pension bill was turned down in the Senate. We also have what happened after 1935, and also certain episodes after 1958.

I hope that Senator Everett will read the record of the remarks I made on November 29, and if he does, he will see that I admit, indeed I insist, that the relations between the government and the Senate have been unusually hostile since 1984. Why? One of the explanations has been that this government had paid very little attention to certain constitutional principles deeply rooted in history. That was demonstrated in the case of a bill which Senator Everett mentioned earlier today, namely, the borrowing authority bill, in the winter of 1985. It was demonstrated again in the spring of 1989 when the government used special warrants to draw billions of dollars, without specific parliamentary authorization, from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Some of us, perhaps out of an old-fashioned respect for some of the principles of the Constitution, were deeply offended by that kind of attitude displayed by the Mulroney government.

Another cause of an unusually intense adversarial relationship was the insistence by the government that every bill which came to the Senate late in June, where a Senate committee had not pre-studied the bill, must be rubber-stamped and passed immediately. For example, that happened with regard to the gating bill. It happened with regard to several other bills, which I mentioned in my speech, and I do not want to repeat that speech. Why? What was the trouble? Well, the real explanation that was given was, "You are depriving us of our summer holidays." If Senator Everett will look up the records of the bills that I mentioned on December 5—which is actually part of the extended sitting of November 29—and check the facts against the Journals of the Senate, he will see that the bills were not held up. In fact, they moved forward to become law rapidly, but they did run over into July. Bills C-18 and C-19, dealing with transportation matters, ran into August. There was a great outcry because senators were deprived of the opportunity to go to places such as Chester, Ingonish and, in my own case, Bayfield. That was the real cause of the uproar.

Then, of course, there were what I have called the "terrorist tactics" of the government. Senator Everett will remember that when the borrowing authority bill was before the Senate we said there was no problem with Part 1, that the government could have it right away. However, we did not wish to give approval to Part 2, which related to the forthcoming fiscal year, the fiscal year which was still two months away, until such time as we had seen the spending estimates. We were prepared to pass Part 1, and we saw no reason why Part 2 would not carry as soon as the spending estimates had been tabled, assuming there was nothing extraordinary in them. We did not expect anything extraordinary. What was the attitude of the government? "This is a money bill, and the government cannot even consider a reasonable proposal from the Senate with regard to a money bill." The fact that the bill was held up by the Senate, the Prime Minister said, would cost Canadian taxpayers $15 million, $16 million, $17 million—they kept changing the figures. The fact that it was going to cost the taxpayers money was serious, but the government argued that this was a small price to pay to put the Senate in its place.

I invite Senator Everett to do two things: first, to read a little history back beyond the period of his own advent as a senator. Second, I invite him to put my speech by his bedside.

Senator Barootes: In place of the Bible, I guess.

Senator Stewart: I was going to suggest, Senator Barootes, that he might find some of it interesting, but I suppose it would soon put him asleep. I also recommend it to you for that purpose, if indeed you are not sound asleep already.

• (1420)

In the course of Senator Everett's remarks, I put a question to him. We have heard, honourable senators, a great deal about the long delays inflicted upon the Mulroney government by the Liberal-dominated Senate. We have heard the Speaker of the House of Commons say that the Parliament Act of 1911, as amended in 1949, is just what we need over here in Canada.

Well, in preparing the remarks I made on November 29, I went through the legislative record and I applied the test of the Parliament Act to the legislative record of the last six years. The conclusion, honourable senators, is that we are pikers. Simply pikers! Compare our performance on money bills and on other bills with what we could have done under that greatly desired Parliament Act, and we are shown to be pure pikers in almost every instance. We went over the limit was six days in the case of the borrowing authority bill. We would have had 30 days under the Parliament Act, and we took 35 or 36. It did not make any difference insofar as Part 2 was concerned, because that Part was not needed for at least six weeks.

That is why I invited Senator Everett earlier today to check the facts. He has an impression that the Senate has been delaying the legislative program of the Mulroney government. That is a common impression. But I asked him to check the record against what has been commended to us as a reasonable standard.

I think Senator Everett wishes to raise a question.

Senator Everett: Just a point of correction. I think if you look at the record you will see that I did agree with you that there had not been undue delay so far as I knew. We will see what the record produces when it comes out. I will not interfere with the "blues" at all, but I think I did agree with you, senator, in that regard.

Senator Stewart: Yes, I think I remember something along those lines in the reply. My problem is that the reply seems inconsistent with your argument that there had been fiecely partisan combat in the Senate since 1984. As you say, we can check the record. It may be that both of us will have to make something of a modification.

Senator Everett: It will have been inconsistent, and the record will show that. But I did not argue with the undoubted scholarship you bring to the matter. When you said that there had not been undue delay, I meant to agree with you, but to say that there had been a great deal of partisanship in the relationships between the two parties in the handling of legislation.

Senator Stewart: I thank the honourable senator for making that statement.

I want to come to the situation that we now have in the Senate. I remember being told as a small boy that if one is incompetent in making a living, one option is to become a bank robber. It is one of the things one can do.

It was put to me another way—Senator Barootes, did I hear a confession?

Senator Barootes: If you are incompetent in other matters, you can always become a senator, it seems to me. That is my qualification, anyway.

Senator Thériault: You don't even have to become a senator, just a friend of a Tory senator.

Senator Stewart: The other way I heard the point made was: Thuggery is the last refuge of the incompetent. What we heard in here this afternoon from Senator Murray has been a confession of incompetence. Senator Murray talked about his need for eight new senators. "Just give me those eight new senators and all will be well." The eight new senators arrived. Then we were told that there was a great Parliamentary crisis. Things were not running smoothly. There was a crisis. That kind of language from Senator Murray really was not surprising. If one goes back over the record of the last five or six years, one will find that again and again Murray says, "If you amend—".

It is interesting to notice, Senator Everett, how he has backed off from his original position. The first position was, "If the Senate amends any government bill which has passed the House of Commons there will be a agreat constitutional crisis. And we quail before a constitutional crisis." Then he backed off to the position, "If the Senate amends a bill which has come into the House of Commons with a Royal Recommendation, then certainly there will be a serious constitutional crisis." Of course, Senator Murray quails at the thought of a constitutional crisis.

It goes on and on. Next, "If the Senate amends a bill which came to the House of Commons with a Royal Recommendation by decreasing the amount of an appropriation clause in such a bill, then there is going to be a constitutional crisis." Senator Murray has backed off step by step by step from his original position. Always we were told that if we exercise what he says are our constitutional powers under the Constitution Act, there will be a constitutional crisis. And, of course, Senator Murray quails when he thinks of a constitutional crisis.

After the eight senators were appointed, constitutional crises were to have been a thing of the past. But now he comes here and confesses that even with his eight brand new wonderful senators there is a "parliamentary crisis." That was the language he used earlier today. He described, in heartbreaking language, how over the last few weeks he has pleaded piteously for some accommodation. "I have now got my eight senators, I am going to put those Liberals in their place." Then the next week and the following week, "Please, won't you tell us when you are going to rescue us from our parliamentary plight? Please, even now that I have my eight new senators, will you not help me get my bill through?"

Senator Murray does not realize that by deciding to have those eight new senators, he signalled to the Liberals that the day of the Liberal-dominated Senate was over, that he was going to pit might against might, and he was going to put them in their place. Having once taken that stand, there is no basis for him to come pleading for an accommodation. That era is over. Yet we hear today his confession of incompetence. Even with his eight new senators he has not been able to do that which was set before him.

When I spoke on November 29, I pointed out that if ever a bill had been mismanaged by a government it is Bill C-62. I said that it had been mismanaged right from the very beginning in the Senate. Of course, when the incompetent get in trouble they resort to thuggery.

• (1430)

Honourable senators, what we have seen here in the last few hours comes as no surprise. It was all played out before, back in June. On June 19 Senator Murray went to Winnipeg to give the provincials an harangue on how things are done in Ottawa. "I find it incredible that one MLA can tie up a legislature in knots indefinitely." That is what he said. He had advice for the Manitoba provincials. First, suspend the rules of the legislature. Second, ram the Accord through by skimping—

Senator Stollery: Forget about the law.

Senator Stewart: —or skipping entirely the hearings required by law. If honourable senators wish to verify that, they have only to look at the Toronto Star of June 20, 1990.

There is nothing new now. Senator Murray has not changed his spots. He decides when he is going to roll the dice. He does not leave himself enough time. Then, when he gets in trouble he says to break the rules. When that does not work, he says, "Oh, it was all someone else's fault. Not my fault; someone else's fault."

Earlier today, Senator Murray was kind enough to quote something which I wrote back in 1982 concerning what I have called the Tory "bellabuster".

Senator Stollery: You mean the filibuster started by Senator Doyle in his editorial in the Globe and Mail.

Senator Stewart: I have no hesitation in speaking on closure. I said here before that there is a time for decision in the parliamentary process. There is no question about that. But there are at least two other things which are important in the parliamentary process, namely, rules and debate. Then decision.

If you review what has gone on in the Senate of Canada since last September, you will see that from the very beginning it was signalled in a very important way that the rules were going to be swept aside by Senator Charbonneau. When you add up the number of hours of genuine debate on Bill C-62 since the beginning of October, you will be astonished at how few there were.

Senator Barootes: Three hundred and fifty hours. That is all.

Senator Stewart: Much of the time that Senator Barootes says was taken up in debate was spent in fending off assaults by the Chair upon the rights of honourable senators.

Senator Cools: You are right, absolutely right.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Barootes: His sound was virtually mute.

Senator Stewart: I know Senator Doyle is always very careful on these things but I tell him that he will find, if he looks at the record, that he has been misled. Perhaps understandably he has formed an impression; yet I think if you look at the record you will find that much of the time was expended fending off attacks on the rules of the house.

Senator Barootes: Blowing whistles and kazoos, reading petitions and banging your desks.

Senator Stollery: Was he misled in 1982?

Senator Stewart: Senator Barootes, you do not remember?

Senator Barootes: I do not.

Senator Stewart: No, you do not remember. Why?

Senator Barootes: God, I guess I am older than I thought.

Senator Cools: No, you are just asleep.

Senator Stewart: Noise was made here on October 5 in order to prevent Senator Murray from moving a motion which was clearly out of order and which Liberal senators knew, on the basis of Charbonneau's previous performance, would be accepted by Senator Charbonneau.

Senator Barootes: Moving a motion that you did not want to hear.

Senator Stewart: It was out of order, Senator Barootes. What you intended to do on October 5, that is what you are doing now. You could not bring it off then because you were incompetent.

Senator Barootes: We will see, at 5.30 today, who fails.

Senator Stollery: We will see all next year. We will see all next year.

Senator Cools: We will see in the next election.

Senator Stewart: I am sorry Senator Doyle, I did not hear your comment. I am sorry, I still do not hear you.

Senator Doyle: I was replying to Senator Stollery who was suggesting that all next year we would be paying for what we did today.

Senator Barootes: More threats of intimidation.

Senator Stewart: No, no. As I understand it, Senator Murray has said the relationship in the Senate is hereafter going to be based, not on right, but on might. He said, "I have brought in my eight brand new senators; now I am going to put those Liberals in their place."

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Cools: He said that at every chance.

Senator Stewart: That was the implication of the appointments.

Senator Barootes: Senator MacEachen said that and you said that. We did not say it.

Some Hon. Senators: Order, order, order!

Senator Stewart: He told us in the Senate on December 5 that, notwithstanding our confirmed opposition to pre-study, there is going to be pre-study in the Senate and that he has the votes to force pre-study on the Senate. If that is not might, I do not know what is. That is the breakdown of comity as between the two sides.

Senator Barootes: That is the Buckwold-Frith project on majority rule. Look at what he did in his committee; it was exactly that.

Senator Stewart: All right. Then you are accepting that it is going to be a relation of might. I understand that.

Senator Barootes: No.

Senator Stewart: That is what you will have to face from now on. That is how you want to run this place.

Senator Barootes: Morality and right.

Senator Stewart: Those are the rules of the game that you want. We understand. We understand. We will be as moderate as we can against the threat of might.

Senator Stollery: Until the next election.

Senator Stewart: Yesterday we had a most curious presentation from Senator Kelly.

Senator Fairbairn: Poor Senator Kelly.

Senator Stewart: Poor Senator Kelly was used as a cat's paw by Senator Murray. He got up, allegedly on a point of order, and he proposed either one of two things—I don't know which. Either an ad hoc closure on the previous question. Who ever heard of that? The previous question is a form of closure. But it is not strong enough for Senator Kelly. He wants closure superimposed upon closure.

An Hon. Senator: Like taxes, one on top of the other.

Senator Stewart: That is what he wants. Having had the previous question moved, he was not prepared to see that procedure played out to its inevitable conclusion. No. He wanted closure upon closure. Cascading closure. Alternatively, what he sought was the assertion of a general principle. This implies that he wanted a new general closure rule.

Now, there is no reason why the government should not have sought a general closure rule. It could have given the appropriate two days' notice under our rule 44(a), then make the motion, after that, move the previous question on the debate. This is what was done in the House of Commons in 1913: notice; then move a motion; debate; then have the vote. Thus you have got a rule of law, not only with regard to Bill C-62 but to other bills.

Senator Kelly wanted ad hoc closure on Bill C-62, but he wanted to raise his so-called point of order when Bill C-62 was not under debate. Thus we got an act of thuggery, an act by which he attempted to get ad hoc closure on Bill C-62 by pretending he was dealing with a general principle. That is how we got into the situation in which the Senate now finds itself. Senator Kelly makes a loud noise, the Speaker echoes that noise, and then all the Tory senators echo the echo. One would think one were in the Swiss Alps, from Kelly to Charbonneau, from Charbonneau to Kelly and company. That is procedural incest.

It has been said that what has gone on in the Senate in the last few hours is unprecedented, and that is true. I should like to put before honourable senators some of the history of closure in order that they will appreciate how horrendous is the constitutional tragedy they are inflicting upon the Parliament of Canada. In 1881 the British House of Commons was confronted with a group of Irish nationalists. For months—indeed, for years—those nationalists had engaged in systematic obstruction of all business. They were out to demonstrate to the people of England that they could not live with the Irish. They were out to demonstrate that Home Rule was the solution for the Irish problem.

At a certain point the Speaker of the House of Commons, Speaker Brand, had conversations with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition. They agreed that he should put the question on the motion then before the House. There is no parallel whatsoever between that situation in 1881 and the situation which prevails now in the Senate of Canada. There has not been systematic obstruction. Rather, there is one bill which is in severe contention. There has been no agreement between the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate that the Speaker will intervene.

It is very instructive to see what happened after 1881. The Speaker's move to impose closure on the Irish nationalists was rejected within weeks by the Prime Minister, by Prime Minister Gladstone. He realized that this was not the way to proceed. He realized that muzzling the Irish nationalists in the House of Commons was profoundly counter-productive. From that moment on, the Liberal Party of Great Britain decided to promote Home Rule for Ireland. Home rule for Ireland would have been achieved had it not been for the British Tory Party. They defeated home rule for Ireland in 1886 and then they turned back Home Rule for Ireland immediately before World War I.

Senator Stollery: Sir Edward Carson was shot dead on his own doorstep.

Senator Stewart: When the time came in 1887 to put a closure rule into the rule book of the British House of Commons, they did not follow the pattern of 1881. They saw that it would never work. They used an entirely different approach.

The approach that has been proposed by Senator Kelly, seconded by Speaker Charbonneau and then subscribed to by all the Conservative senators, is the approach which was rejected in a much more moderate form by the British after 1881. It is simply unworkable.

Then we come to 1913, the situation to which I referred earlier. The Conservative's naval bill, the bill to give $35 million to the British to build dreadnaughts, was held up at the committee stage in the House of Commons. What happened then? As I said earlier, the Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, gave notice of a motion. On April 9, 1913, he moved that a closure rule be added to the Standing Orders of the House of Commons. After he had taken his seat, both a Conservative minister and Sir Wilfrid Laurier attempted to get the floor. Whom did the Conservative Speaker recognize? Who do you suspect? He recognized the Liberal. What a civilized place the House of Commons was then as compared with the Senate of Canada in 1990.

At that point a motion was made that a minister from New Brunswick, Mr. Hazen, be heard. There was a vote and the Conservatives carried the vote. The Tory minister moved the previous question.

Senator Stollery: Lowell Murray would not like that.

Senator Stewart: It was a way of silencing Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but it was in accordance with the rules of the House.

Senator Stollery: Lowell Murray has just said that he does not agree with that.

Senator Stewart: No, it is not draconian enough.

Senator Stollery: He said it here a few minutes ago.

Senator Stewart: Then when they came to debate Sir Robert Borden's motion for a closure rule, the man who was most prominent on the Conservative side in recommending addition of the closure rule was none other than Arthur Meighen. What did he say on April 10, 1913? His very first sentence was:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not remember that I have ever risen in this House with greater satisfaction than I do tonight.

He is rising in support of a motion to bring in a closure rule. He is rejoicing the fact that he is rising to put on the rule book of the House of Commons a closure rule. He goes on to say:

> Not that I feel in the slightest degree more competent than any other member of this House to discuss the issue now before the Chair, but because of the fact that we are now engaged in the discussion of a reform that has been continuously in my mind and with increasing force since the first month I entered this House.

I recommend Arthur Meighen's speech on that occasion to all his Conservative descendants.

● (1450)

In defending Sir Robert's proposal for a closure rule, Meighen said that there were only two ways to go: either the House of Commons have a closure rule comparable to that imposed by Brand back in 1881, a Speaker's closure; or the house could have a rule in which the government takes its responsibilities. This is what he said at column 7524:

> Following the great legislative bodies of the world, we must place the responsibility for choosing the time when closure shall be applied either on the Speaker or on the Government; under any rational rule of constitutional government it cannot be placed anywhere else. In England, for several years, the responsibility for the application of closure was placed on the Speaker. The result was that between 1882 and 1887 the closure was very seldom > acted upon, because the Speaker was diffident about taking the initiative himself. Closure was in effect a failure.

He is referring to the Brand style of closure, a type of closure somewhat like what we are seeing here today. Then he went on to ask: Why was it a failure? If, he siad, the House of Commons had brought in a rule for closure which gave any considerable degree of discretion to the Speaker it would not have worked:

> As a consequence, it would have been open to honourable gentlemen opposite to complain if the responsibility for bringing closure into effect had been lifted from the shoulders of the Government and placed upon those of the Speaker. They would have cried: The Speaker is elected by the majority, he is the creature of the majority, and consequently he is prone to follow the will of the majority. But, instead of that, under the rule introduced, the Government takes the manly position of accepting responsibility and abiding by it.

Arthur Meighen would have none of this nonsense about a Speaker's closure.

Of course, that is what we are experiencing in the Senate of Canada in 1990. Do Tories never learn? Have they forgotten history?

I now want to turn to 1969. Senator Doyle is a great authority on allocation-of-time rules. Senator Doyle has written editorials on the subject. In December of 1968, he denounced the allocation of time. Why? Because it is closure.

Senator Lucier: Who said that?

Senator Stewart: Senator Doyle.

Senator Lucier: Not our Senator Doyle.

Senator Stewart: Yes, but you have to remember that a great transfiguration takes place when a Tory becomes a senator. Senator Buchanan, for example, was opposed to the GST. He attacked it savagely from one end of Nova Scotia to the other, but now, when he is a senator, he says that the GST is just about the greatest—

Senator Lucier: Not only when he became a senator; it was when he became a Tory.

Senator Stewart: I have never thought of him as a Liberal, senator. A great transformation takes place. Senator Doyle, of course, underwent a similar transfiguration. I do not know whether it was Saul on the road to Damascus or whether it was Paul going the other way—I guess it was Paul going away from Damascus—because his views are not as good now as they were when he was with the Globe and Mail.

What was the situation in June and July of 1969? The situation was that the House of Commons was making extensive changes in its legislative process. They intended to activate the report stage so that amendments to bills could be proposed at that point. In addition to that, the House of Commons was concerned with the fact that amendments proposed in committees were very often not treated thoroughly. All the time available often was used up on the first two or three amendments in committee or at the report stage. All parties agreed that some form of allocation of time was highly desirable.

There were some in the Progressive Conservative party, led by Mr. Erik Nielsen, who objected to the proposed rule. Mr. Diefenbaker objected. The result was that there was opposition in the House of Commons to what the government proposed.

What did the government do? It withdrew its own motion and, instead, moved for the addition of a proposal made by a committee. Even that was opposed. Eventually, the government decided that the debate on adopting the new allocation of time rules had gone on long enough. This was a simple little motion. Notice had been given on June 26 and closure was moved on July 24, a month later. Now we hear Conservatives complaining that a major bill, Bill C-62, has taken too long on the legislative ways.

Closure is dear to the hearts of the Tories. They put the closure rule into the rule book of the House of Commons back in 1913. They are the ones who have used it again and again over the years. Up to 1984, closure in the House of Commons had been used some 20 times, mainly by Tories. In the six years since 1984 it has been used 17 times. It was used 20 times between 1913 and 1984, and 17 times in the six years from 1984 to 1990.

Senator Stollery: Did Senator Doyle have anything to say about that?

Senator Stewart: Not yet, but I am sure he will want to write a letter to the editor denouncing this flagrant use of closure by the Tories.

In 1969, the allocation of time rule was added to the rule book of the House of Commons. It was used 40 times by the Trudeau Liberals from 1969 to 1984. In six years the Conservatives have used it 26 times. They love closure. Why? Because they do not like debate. That is the point.

Senator Fairbairn: They like to have their own way.

Senator Stewart: They do not like debate.

Senator Stollery: They do not like minorities.

Senator Stewart: My old professorial background is hard to suppress.

Senator Stollery: We don't hold that against you.

Senator Stewart: Senator Murray referred to my professional career earlier today. Now to lend credibility to what he said, let me say that long, long ago a philosopher, Aristotle, compared forms of government. He said that there was only one really practicable form of genuine government. That form was what he called "polity." It is from the word "polity", based on polis that we get our word "politics".

What was the nature of politics? That kind of government, polity, implied that the members participated as equals in debate. They discussed matters. They shook matters down. Gradually, they changed each other's views until a true political position was achieved. Against that, Aristotle set tyranny.

● (1500)

Very often we assume that the laws made by a tyrant are always bad. That, of course, is not true. Tyrants sometimes make good laws. But according to Aristotle, regardless of how competent the tyrant is, regardless of how good the tyrant's laws are, that form of rule is not genuine government. Debate is necessary to develop an understanding, if not consensus, between and among the members of the body politic.

I have said here before that I think Senator Murray has a good deal of the tyrant in him. He is extraordinarily confident in his own judgment. He listens with great impatience to those who proffer advice to him. His is essentially the mandarin mind. The mandarin mind is always impatient of debate. The mandarin mind is always impatient of those dull people on the other side who do not get it right the first time. The mandarin mind always produces seamless webs. The mandarin mind always produces the bill that does not need amendments; amendments would flaw the bill. That is why we have had so little genuine debate on Bill C-62.

On May 1, 2 and 3 there were two speeches from the Conservative side. The second one was approximately 17 minutes. The first one, Senator Kelly's, was longer. When Senator Kelly moved the third reading, he simply rose and stated: "Honourable senators, I move third reading of this bill."

Two weeks ago yesterday, Senator MacEachen made what I thought was an important speech. It was important because it challenged some of the presuppositions on the basis of which many senators, including Senator Everett, intend to vote for this bill, the presuppositions that this bill will produce new revenue which will permit the annual deficits to be cut back. There will be no new programs, of course, thus there will be an impact upon the debt. Senator MacEachen took the government's own figures and challenged those presuppositions. He stated that he may be quite wrong—

An Hon. Senator: Senator Hatfield wants to say something.

Senator Stewart: If Senator Hatfield wishes to speak either for or against the GST, it would be very good to hear from him. Coming from the part of Canada from which he hails, he will have interesting things to say.

Senator MacEachen told us that it is conceivable that his analysis of the financial situation is inaccurate. He invited Senator Kelly to rise in his place, presumably after having had consultation with the department of Finance, and deal with the financial consequences of the bill for 1991-1992 and 1992-1993 and beyond. Has Senator Kelly risen in his place? No. He has only risen to propose closure upon the previous debate. I do not blame Senator Kelly for that. We know who put the gag in his mouth. He was told, "Keep quiet. Where do you think you are? Do you think this is parliament? This is a club. This is Club Patronage. Look here, Kelly, if you do not keep quiet, none of us will get away to Florida by the end of the week. Think how disastrous that would be."

Honourable senators, today we heard from Senator Murray a confession of incompetence. He has told us that even with his eight, brand new, keen, hard-working senators, he has had to come to the Liberal minority and ask for arrangements to facilitate the enactment of Bill C-62. He came in here this afternoon grieving and comlaining piteously that we have not facilitated his legislation. At that, after he armed himself with eight new senators! What an incredible performance. Having demonstrated his incompetence again and again, having brought back to our minds what happened to the Meech Lake accord, he has resort to thuggery. He resorts to the same technique that he recommended to the provincials out there in Winnipeg: "Ram it through, steamroll a member of the legislature, forget your rules, forget the laws, but get results." It is exactly that old Meech Lake mentality we are seeing in the Senate today. Remember the results of the Meech Lake ploy, of the Meech Lake discord. Did he accept responsibility? No. Just as here today, he sought to shift the blame to someone else. Get on television and try to shift the responsibility to someone else. It is a great thing to have that kind of mentality. You can foul it all up by reason of incompetence and bad judgment, yet it is all somebody else's fault! You will never suffer from mental disorders when you can unload the results of your own incompetence on scapegoats.

That is how we come to this act of thuggery which is being inflicted upon the Senate today. Those who cannot perform, who cannot make a living in the world, turn to robbing banks. Those who cannot govern in a parliamentary way resort to thuggery.

Hon. Stan Waters: Honourable senators, I am constantly referred to as an independent, but I represent the Reform Party, as Senator Murray constantly reminds me.

I want to speak to Senator Stanbury's motion to censure the Speaker—that is essentially his motion. I want to spend most of my time commenting on Senator Kelly's infamous letter. I am only sorry Senator Kelly is not present, because I yield to no one in my admiration of Senator Kelly. I fully appreciate his commitment to fairness and democracy. I am very disappointed he got himself sucked into the role of promoting that letter.

Indeed, it was Senator Kelly who helped myself and Senator Lawson when we were fighting our early battles for the independents. He was representing the Conservative side of the house. We very much appreciated his intervention and it was very helpful to us. I learned to appreciate his sense of integrity and his honour, and the attitude he has towards duty.

● (1510)

In his letter, dated the 10th of December, he raises some very serious problems for me, particularly as a Reform Party representative in the Senate and particularly as a man who came here in a slightly different way. Despite Senator Carney's intervention a few weeks ago, I did come here in a different way. I was selected by voters in a province. Then I fell into the other way of going through the Prime Minister and appointment by the Governor General. In that campaign in Alberta, we were very much exposed, in 1989, to the antagonism, the anger, the hatred of the GST. So I was inoculated early. I did my homework early on the GST. I fought part of my campaign on that subject, as all six candidates did.

I am still, I guess, a new and rather idealistic senator. I think senators should always retain a little idealism in this upper chamber, and certainly the past few weeks have been very difficult for all of us who profess to have an idealistic bent in the Senate.

Senator Kelly, in his letter, said that it was a current and frustrating situation that he faced, that it was unprecedented and therefore required unprecedented action. In other words, actions outside the rules. He was quite honest to admit that. But I can put it more crudely: any means to achieve an end.

The motion that he put forward in his letter was unmistakably a request to the Speaker to impose a form of closure. It was, in fact, a flagrant demand for closure. Is this not intemperate extremism? Is there something magic about devoting 320 hours in debate? Or for that matter, 500? And at that time all debate ceases? This point has come up several times. Senator Everett raised it, and Senator Steuart tried to put it to rest, but the facts of the matter, since 1984, are these: Until this summer's Parliamentary recess, 286 government bills have been passed by the Senate since the Tories came into power—286 bills since they came into power in 1984. Of those, 267 were passed without amendment by the Liberal majority in the Senate. Another 19 were passed with amendment, including those where the House of Commons accepted some, or all, of the Senate amendments. Only two bills have been delayed because the Conservatives refused to meet in a traditional Commons-Senate conference to resolve difficulties. Not one bill has been rejected by the Senate. Why then is this so unprecedented that you have one bill generating so much debate? Why does this require an unprecedented change in the rules? It seems massive overreaction, and the phrase I have used, which I will come back to in a quote from the House of Lords, is "intemperate; intemperate extremism".

Senator Olson, a couple of days ago in his eloquent dissertation, spent much time discussing Senate rules and the rules of law. I have become more and more aware of the fact that Senate rules are very flexible. There are not many of them, because we insist upon the good judgment of senators. It is based on 124 years of history in which intelligent, moderate, rational men and women debate in an atmosphere of reason. You are going to lose all that if you are not careful on both sides of this house, if you start imposing all sorts of inflexible, intemperate rules. You should be very careful before you move down that slippery slope.

You get the impression that, unless we have stricter rules, tougher rules, rules more like the House of Commons, that we will, in fact, be constantly drifting into anarchy. That is an overuse of that word. The long debate, even if some of it was frustrating for all of us, was after all only 320 hours. That is not a long time on an important bill—not when you put it in the terms of the record of the Senate which I read out earlier, the number of bills that the Senate has handled since 1984.

I think the major role of the minority in the Senate in opposition is the final constitutional barrier to an aggressive majority in the other place. That is a very important role to play.

Senator Kelly had his letter signed by 53 senators. I don't know which senator was missing in that, but in any event that was only 47 per cent of the number of senators in this house. Such a letter was only meant to circumvent the rules. Why? Why are we trying to circumvent the rules? What is this unprecedented situation that has arisen? In the 124 years of existence of the Senate we have had thousands of bills passed, some with ease, and some with difficulty. It is the role of this upper chamber to process legislation, to examine bill carefully, to pass bill when they are in good condition and when they are sound, well-conceived and well-prepared, and it is its role to argue when they are not.

Here we have a particularly difficult, badly written bill, which is highly unpopular. It does not seem to me that because one bill is being delayed that is adequate reason to change the rules of over 100 years—to circumvent one bill which is frustrating the majority.

Let me read an extract from a recent book by Lord Carrington, a former Leader of the House of Lords from 1963 to 1964. His book is entitled Reflect on Things Past. He had a distinguished World War II military career and was a member of every Conservative administration from 1951 to 1979, from Winston Churchill's, which was formed in 1951, to Margaret Thatcher's in 1979. He is a real renaissance man, having held office in the Ministry of Defence, the Ministry of Agriculture, as Defence Secretary, as Energy Minister and Foreign Secretary, as well as having handled the Rhodesians-Zimbabwe independence negotiations. In addition he has been chairman of the Conservative Party and Secretary General of NATO, where I first met him.

I have a quotation from Lord Carrington's book, a quotation which is very brief but quite germane to our discussion today, because it relates to his own experience in the House of Lords, and the House of Lords was the genesis of our own Canadian Senate. I am quoting from a chapter about his own concerns when he was leader of the Lords and about some of the problems he was having and reflecting on some of the great strengths that he perceived were in the Lords that he did not want to see changed. He said:

> The House of Lords, however, was and is more than a revising Chamber for legislation. It provides a forum where great issues can be discussed and opinions, even unpopular or minority opinions, can be advanced. It enables particular anomalies or injustices to be ventilated. It is a place of public debate.

And he goes on to say:

> In my early years in the House we had formidable debates and men of great achievements and distinction. We had a number who had served in the wartime Coalition Cabinet. We had—and this has tended to be a feature of the House of Lords and one of its justifications—we had experts on every conceivable subject.

He makes that distinction of particular members, the self-discipline shown by the Lords collectively, and the fact that few have spoken for personal gesture or effect, but purely if they had something significant to say. If I may digress for a moment to my own impression of the Senate, it is that senators can certainly string a tremendous number of words together to express a few thoughts and that applies to both sides of the house. I am quoting now:

● (1520)

> —all this made the House of Lords I joined a very worthwhile and instructive assembly. Of course one cannot make too much of the merits of objective and dispassionate debate. Who reads these debates afterwards? What is their outcome in terms of action? Perfectly fair question, . . . and I did not think that a debating society tout simple justifies a House of Parliament. But I believe we should be poorer if there were no place where public men can give a minority cause an airing from time to time.

The last portion of my quotation reads:

> Occasions of that kind were infrequent but they were precious. The House not only had a part to play but could on occasion play it with something not far from objectivity. There was a further, a constitutional function for the Lords which I came to appreciate as I took more and more part in its affairs and thought more about it.

This is very germane to our debates over the last few weeks.

> A second Chamber—provided that it was differently constituted to the Commons—represented the final constitutional barrier to an extreme majority in the House of Commons . . . It was a pretty fragile barrier.

He is quoting the House of Lords, saying:

> We have no written constitution. We have no supreme court. Parliament has sovereign authority. The Upper House can impose an absolute veto on a vote by the House of Commons only to prolong its own life. Other measures of a revolutionary kind might be delayed, and might need to be preceded by Acts abolishing the second Chamber itself, but they would ultimately prevail if the Commons so willed. The House of Lords . . . was supposed to represent a mechanism against extremism.

I quoted that before. It says:

> The need for this in 1945 was sometimes exaggerated, but it can never be entirely absent.

I thought these remarks were germane to our discussion today about the role of the Senate and why it is important that we do not over-react because of the difficulties faced with one bill over a period of 124 years and, more recently out of 286 bills that have gone through.

This letter which was signed by the 53 senators, and I do not know who was the one who missed signing it.

An Hon. Senator: It was the Speaker.

Senator Waters: The Speaker? That is interesting. It is the only thing he has not signed. By this letter, which was signed by the 53 Conservative senators, they are inviting or really directing the Speaker to close off this debate. Most of us speaking to this subject have mentioned that only 11 Liberal senators have spoken in the debate on the question. I have not spoken on the debate in question, nor has Senator Lawson, and I do not know about the other independents.

Of course, Senator Kelly is absolutely right when he states, and I quote: "The right to dispose of a question in Parliament is as essential as the right to speak." Dead right. Yet I have not had that right to speak. Nor have the majority of the senators who wish to speak to that motion. That is a very important point to remember. Surely Senator Kelly, and I am sorry he is not here, would agree that, just because the process is taking longer than anyone expected and is creating great disruptions to all of us in our "public and private lives," that legitimate delay does not constitute a reason to ride roughshod over Senate rules and force closure on debate. It is exactly the wrong reason.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Waters: He is setting a very dangerous and undemocratic parliamentary precedent which I believe we shall live to regret. In fact, it would be a major defeat for parliamentary democracy in the upper chamber. I urge Senator Kelly and all the honourable senators who signed that letter to withdraw this dangerous document which would so fundamentally weaken the rights of all senators and erode the traditional constitutional role of the Senate. I close with my usual admonition: more than ever the Senate must be reformed.

Senator Doyle: I would like to respond briefly to Senator Waters. I join the government Whip with the question as to how they must be reacting out there in the great wide-open Canadian to the Reform Liberal candidate who has been sent here by the Prime Minister.

I listened carefully to Senator Waters' fears about the damage that might be done to this institution if we pass the motions that are to be decided this afternoon and if we bring this debate to an end after only 320 hours. I might say they were 320 hours devoted to, among other things, Sir John A. Macdonald's drinking habits, the formation of the New Democratic Party or to any subject you wish to name including the names and origins of Ontario towns. That is what we have talked about for hours, often without mentioning the bill that is supposed to be under study.

If you felt the urgent need to at least get something in yourself, sir, where were you yesterday when we were urging you to get on your feet and speak and to say what you believe, as a Reform Party person in this place?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Doyle: You sat and listened to Olson's record played over long play for the umpteenth time in this debate. You listened to Olson again and again.

Senator Waters: Would the honourable senator take a question?

Senator Doyle: I will when I finish, sir.

Senator Waters: Thank you. Would you be seated.

Senator Murray: When he is finished, he said.

Senator Waters: Oh, I did not hear that. When he is finished. Thank you.

Senator Doyle: I would like to continue. I am not going to be long; certainly not as long as Senator Olson. I did have a word or two that I wanted to pass along to my dear friend Senator Stewart who is not here at the moment. I regret that, but then perhaps it is just as well. I have always been slightly intimidated in the presence of professors. Oh, he is here. I was saying, Senator Stewart, that I was perhaps pleased that you were not with us because I feel slightly intimidated in the presence of ranking professors, or any kind of professors.

At any rate, I noted that you were concerned about the public perception of senators and particularly that perception which was held, shall we say, pre-MacEachen. That perception was of the senators as old fuddy-duddies. I do not think you used the word fuddy-duddy, but I believe that is what you intended to say. I thought that yes, things have changed, as you said, as a result of several new approaches in this chamber. So I looked in this morning's paper for some symbol of that change and I read a quote attributed to a man named Harold Chmara, who is director of planning at the Hudson's Bay Co. The writer of the article, Alan Freeman, says:

> And if there's a delay, Mr. Chmara will lay much of the blame on Liberal senators.

He quotes Mr. Chmara as a taxpayer and says:

> I didn't elect these 90-year-old croaks to screw around with anything.

So much for our improved image in the public eye.

• (1530)

Senator Adams: Would you permit a question, Senator Doyle?

Senator Doyle: I am collecting questions.

Senator Gigantès: Why are you attacking Senator Croll and Senator Macdonald, and Senator Molson who is absent? They are the only ones near 90.

Senator Doyle: You did not ask me how I felt. Very often I feel well past 90 years of age. I feel Senator Croll, my own good friend, is very much my junior. I feel that way in particular when I have reached the fifteenth hour of a Senator Gigantès' speech. I feel 80 years of age at hour two.

Senator Stewart spoke of the confession of incompetence that we had heard from the government leader. I do not know that I would agree with that description. I suppose it depends on what you want from the government leader. If you want a resolution of a situation which is contributing to the dislocation of the economy of this country, then I suppose you would fear what Senator Murray says and you would fear even more what he does. What he has done is move us towards a resolution of a situation that is injuring the economy.

I note that only 11 senators are said to have spoken. Yet, almost every senator on that side has spoken for 10, 15, 20 or 25 minutes on so-called questions. "Will you take a question?" is the new slogan of the assembly on the other side of this chamber. What have you not spoken very much about? That is really what you were going to do if you succeeded in talking out this bill.

You said that you are going to raise Trevor Eyton's taxes and you are going to charge all people like him a little more. You say that you are going to save perhaps two hundred and some million dollars on the rpgram to introduce the goods and services tax. You will save a penny here, save a penny there, and you will have enough. You will have enough to do what?

I received a letter the other day from someone from North York asking me to oppose the goods and services tax. He sent along a copy of a petition. I represent North York in this chamber. The good councillors in North York suggested that if we cut back on government programs, we will find enough money to replace the amount we might have collected from a goods and services tax.

Senator Lucier: Is that the area where the Conservatives got the 8 per cent vote in the bi-election?

Senator Doyle: Yes, part of that riding is in North York. That is very interesting. We do not quarrel with that. We do not claim any popularity for this tax. You are the people who are taking the popular position. I am just questioning the responsibility of the position you are taking.

The councillors suggested that we take something out of government programs to pay for that tax and replace it. Well, what programs? I thought we might cut a bit off unemployment insurance; we might cut a bit off veterans' pensions; we might cut a bit off old age pensions. I wrote all those things down on a piece of paper and I asked the tax department how much we could net if we eliminated them. If we eliminated them we would get something less than $30 million which would not begin to pay the cost of our deficit and the cost of payments on the national debt.

The goods and services tax is not going to help that this year, but the Prime Minister has pledged that after we have paid what we have lost from the federal sales tax, money will be directly diverted to payment of the debt. You people over there, having accumulated that debt, do not talk about that. That is irresponsible.

Senator Gigantès: I did say, for four hours, exactly what we would do about the tax and debt. But you did not listen. All you listen to is yourselves.

Senator Doyle: I did listen and I did not hear an answer. I should like to come back to what has happened here in the last few days. I should like to come back to the Speaker and his presentation to us last night.

The Speaker took his chair and said, "Honourable senators, concerning the point of order by Senator Kelly . . ." Those were the last words we heard directly. We heard thunder; we heard crashing of desks; we heard shouts; we heard threats. We did not hear another word he had to say. How did you people know what he was going to say? Why were you so angry about it before you knew what he was going to say?

Someone here this afternoon—was it Senator MacEachen?—said, "Why didn't you tell me about it? We would have discussed a compromise." What was the compromise? How did you know about the secret message the Speaker had? You all knew, particularly Senator Molgat. Senator Molgat was practically out of his chair because he knew what the Speaker was going to say.

Senator Molgat: Yes, and for good reason, I was sickened by the absolutely obnoxious, odious decision of this Speaker. He had no right to even make a decision.

Senator Doyle: You did not know whether he was going to make one.

Senator Molgat: He announced he was going to make one.

Senator Doyle: No, he did not. You stopped him by your shouting.

Senator Molgat: He had no right to make a statement. He did not even hear from the other side of the house.

Senator Doyle: Go ahead. You have the floor.

Senator Grafstein: If Senator Doyle wishes to conclude his remarks, I would appreciate hearing his concluding remarks because I intend to make some remarks as well. I do not want him to stop on my account.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Are you finished, Senator Doyle?

Senator Doyle: No, I am not. I am waiting for Senator Molgat to finish.

Senator Molgat: He had no right to make a statement.

● (1540)

Senator Doyle: I have heard many things here in the last six weeks but I have never before heard that the senator who was presiding had no right to open his mouth.

Senator Molgat: When he is asked to make a statement.

Senator Doyle: I have never once asked the Speaker to make a statement. The Speaker makes his own.

Senator Molgat: That is wrong.

Senator Doyle: What was the terrible thing he had to say? I have the text of it here. He said:

> . . . should I rule that I cannot put the question and an appeal to my ruling is requested, then, the Senate could overrule my decision not to put the question. Obviously, I would have to put the question.

Then he turned around and asked: What would happen if I ruled opposite? In effect, he said: I can neither do it this way nor do it that way, so take your knife and slice the baby in two and have it your way. That is what he said. He said, "You decide. Do not let me decide. Do not make me rule."

Senator Fairbairn: Who are the "you" in your statement?

Senator Doyle: The fact is that I stand in awe of Speaker Charbonneau's courage.

Just let me read one other thing to you briefly which is a statement made in this chamber on October 4, two and half months ago. This statement was made by Senator Frith. It is your day, Senator Frith. Everyone is quoting you. He said:

[Senator Doyle.]

> Honourable senators, the proposition I put to my colleagues and ask them to support is that until Senator Charbonneau resigns and is replaced by a Speaker who is prepared to reinstate the rule book and respect it, we will do everything to stop business being done in this place. When he has resigned and been replaced . . . , we will get back to business. Until then, we will do everything to stop any business being done under his regime.

Honourable senators, that was two and half months ago. For two and half months we have been going against that.

Senator Frith: We did pretty well.

Senator Doyle: Will it be two and half months more, and two and half months more, and two and half months more? Who else did we blame during that period? Well, we blamed the English Queen. Senator MacEachen blamed the Roman Popes and the Swiss Guard. We have blamed just about everyone we could blame except ourselves. To that extent I stand with Senator Waters who says that we should stop and think what we are doing. When he said that he was not, at that point, suggesting we reverse what we are doing at this time. He was talking about the way we are performing in this chamber and the need to use caution. What is caution when the Leader of the Opposition can stand on his feet and say "No matter how this is resolved, you will pay. I threaten you that, for a year to come, every time you want a bill passed you will have to consider our position".

Senator Cools: That is because you have interfered with the composition of the constitution of the Senate.

Senator Doyle: That will be our lot. If that is to be our lot, my God, we should tremble. About threats.

Senator Gigantès and Senator Fairbairn, as well as others who have worked for newspapers, will remember the threat of advertisers. It was that if reporters spoke the truth advertisers would take their advertising away.

Senator Cools: That is what you did to us here.

Senator Doyle: In the war years a lot of people were threatened by Lord Haw-haw that if they dared to fly airplanes over the continent they would be captured and put into the most dreadful prisons.

Senator Cools: Senator Doyle, you can do a lot better than this. You are not doing very well.

Senator Doyle: This is the first time since Haw-haw that I have faced that kind of threat.

Senator Waters: Thank you, Senator Doyle. I always place you in the category of a superior gentlemen in this chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Senator Cools: He scrambles for scraps of support.

Senator Waters: I would like to ask you why you were attacking me for not interrupting one of western Canada's most distinguished parliamentarians, Senator Olson, in the midst of a two-and-half-hour or three-hour seconding of a motion to have my right to speak. Why would that be objectionable to you, sir?

Senator Doyle: I had heard that speech several times before under different guises. It had almost nothing to do with you, Senator Waters. I say that knowing I am going to injure your pride. In truth, he did not give you ten words. He went on about everything from troubles in the farm belt to troubles with our own belt.

Senator Waters: Senator Doyle, I would just like to complete my question. I had very little control over the text of the speech used by Senator Olson, any more than you did, sir.

Senator Gigantès: I have a point of personal privilege.

Senator Doyle: I have to respond to the question by Senator Waters.

Senator Gigantès: A point of privilege comes before that.

I would like to protest the fact that the Tories have systematically misled the media by using a slogan. They ask a question: "What is your alternative?" We give the alternative and then they say "But you have no alternative". What you mean is we do not have an alternative the Tories would like. That is perfectly true. A Liberal alternative you would not like and because you would not like it, you say it is not an alternative, and, in consequence, you mislead the press. Because the press is owned by Tories largely they have produced that slogan that you have adopted as one of your lies.

An Hon. Senator: That is an insult to the press and you know it.

Senator MacDonald: Senator Gigantès, you promised me an answer with regard to that alternative on Tuesday. When I asked you on Friday you said, "Be patient. You will have the alternative on Tuesday." Then we adjourned.

Senator Gigantès: I will give it to you now.

Senator Doyle: I would remind Senator Gigantès that I did speak about an alternative that had been proffered from my own constituency. I know that he had an answer in his speech. He had an answer for almost everything.

Senator Barootes: Do not speak while "Mr. Know-It-All" is standing.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, I would like to address the question of privilege raised by Senator Stanbury at the outset. Let me say that I agree with the comments of Senator Waters, save for his conclusion which is that the Senate should be abolished, because I think he made a very appropriate and articulate defence of the Senate as a last resort against an arbitrary majority.

Senator Waters: I have never recommended abolishing the Senate. I have recommended reforming the Senate.

Senator Grafstein: I stand corrected, honourable senators.

● (1550)

In any event, honourable senators, like Senator Stanbury's and others', my privileges were breached in two fundamental ways. First, the prevention of my ability to speak as a senator for Metropolitan Toronto, not only representing the province but the groups and the regions within that province. Second, there is a breach of Parliament when there is a wilful disobedience or a wilful evasion of the rules.

At this late hour, honourable senators, I will not refer you to specific citations, but May, Bourinot and Beauchesne's indicate that each member of the Senate or the other place have privileges. One of the pre-eminent privileges is the right to speak; and one of the other pre-eminent privileges is the right to speak in accordance with the rules of the House. Therefore, on both those fundamental grounds I reluctantly support the point of privilege raised by Senator Stanbury against the Speaker.

If I could, I wish to talk about the right to speak. I have waited throughout this debate. I have been present most of the time and listened to most of the debate. As Senator Doyle indicated, I have participated on petitions. In presenting those petitions, I sought not only to give the locations but also indicate the importance of those towns and regions within the province of Ontario. I thought that I was doing that in an appropriate way as a senator, representing the province of Ontario and the region of Metropolitan Toronto. I have behind me the requirement that, if I disagree with the sector or the region that I represent, I am still obliged here to put that case forward. Therefore, when Senator Everett stated earlier today that he speaks for himself, according to the constitution he does not speak for himself. All of us have read those debates and all of us are familiar with the debates. Clearly, we are here not only in our own capacity, not only armed against removal because we have tenure, but we are here under custom, convention and practice to represent our regions.

I have mentioned to senators from Quebec that I have no quarrel with senators opposite from Quebec who have chosen not to participate in this debate, or who have chosen to support the GST. Their Government, if not the population that they represent, are clearly on side. Like Senator Waters' province, which is dead-set against the GST, I represent a province that is dead-set against the GST. Once again, let me go through the groups that are against it. The City of Toronto is against it. The Metropolitan Government of Toronto is against it. The Borough of North York is against it. In the last election, all three parties campaigned against the GST. The newly-elected premier of the province has come out against the GST. Every group, save for some manufacturing groups in the province of Ontario, is opposed the GST.

I refrained from speaking on the amendments in the expectation that I would be able to articulate the positions put forward by the various groups and hope to prove the test that I set for myself. The test was that I had to satisfy myself beyond a reasonable doubt that the GST in its current form was not satisfactory and did not commend itself to me or to this chamber. That was a task I set for myself, and I have sat here lo these many days and hours seeking to prepare myself for that event and now I have been prevented from doing so.

I agree with Senator Waters, who put it very well, that many of us on this side have been prevented by the actions of the Speaker—and I say the actions of the Speaker, not the actions of those opposite—from being able to speak for my region. Therefore, my privileges have been fundamentally breached.

Honourable senators, the word "parliament" comes from the word "parler" which means to speak. It is not only the right to speak, but the right to be able to listen to what other people say and hopefully to reach a compromise. That is why those experts who are more knowledgeable than I about the rules and principles of Parliament have stated so eloquently today that we are here not only to speak and not only to vote, as Senator Kelly and 53 senators have stated, but we are here to listen and hopefully to compromise. Without compromise there is no role for Parliament.

In my view, Parliament is based on three principles: the right to speak; the right to compromise by listening to what others say; and the right to protect minorities. Those are essentially the principles that bind and promote this House. Honourable senators, we have breached those fundamental principles by breaching the rules.

More important, honourable senators, we have neglected to examine the symbols that give concrete basis to what we do. What are the symbols? The throne, the Queen, the coat of arms, and the most important symbol, is the mace on the table.

During the last several weeks and days I have had an opportunity to examine the history of this place and it is quite interesting. Based on the best information available, it is believed that the mace was fabricated in 1791. It is the oldest mace and the oldest symbol of Parliament that we have. It is not clear, but some believe that it came from England from Her Majesty in the Hanoverian Georges. Others believe that it might have been a replica. However, it is clear it is an ancient symbol and perhaps the oldest symbol in the land. The mace sits on that table representing two elements. First, it is to protect the monarchy, and that is why it is a mace. Second, it is here as a symbol of the monarchy whereby the monarchy has transferred the privileges and powers to this place. We, honourable senators, have watched the symbolism, we participate in the symbolism, but in the last weeks and months we have paid no heed to the symbolism. I say this not only to the Speaker, but to everyone present in this room, save for the Pages.

The mace is placed in a particular way which is different to the way it is placed in the House of Commons. It is pointed towards the Throne. Those of you who have been in the other place will recall that when the mace is brought in it is placed on the table pointed towards the Government's side. To my mind, honourable senators, that differentiates us from the other place. We are here as individual senators. We are not here to promote necessarily the Government's business. In my view, that is why the Speaker should not be called "The Speaker." Senator Molson put this in historical perspective very well. He said it is wrong to call the Speaker of the Senate "The Speaker." He is only here as the President. The french text states that the Speaker is called "the President". I think that is a more appropriate term because he is here to preside and he presides from time to time because we leave a seat for him. Why do we leave a seat for him? So he can attend to business, if he chooses to sit, talk, speak and listen as a senator. Otherwise he takes off his partisan, parochial or regional powers and sits in the chair. He sits in the chair to represent all of us as a co-ordinator, only being brought into the debate when we properly call upon him.

Here, regretfully, the Speaker has misinterpreted his role and in the process has undermined the constitutional basis of this place. I say that, because without the symbolism we have failure to obey the law. How do we suggest that people should obey the law in this country?

Governments have a monopoly of lawful power. Only the government can be violent and can imprison people. Individuals cannot. So that power is reposed in government and people respect the threat of that power by obeying the law; hence the symbolism. Therefore, if we do not have respect for the symbols, how can we expect citizens to have respect for the laws that we pass in this place? How can we can expect that? What we do, by disobeying the fundamental foundations of this place, is invite—we do invite—the public to disobey the laws. That, to my mind, senators, is why we have to be very careful in our comments and in our actions in this place.

There is another symbol, honourable senators, that will give you the difference; that will make you the comparison. We have our symbol of the mace handed down from the Georges through the Houses of Lower Canada to the Senate here. There is another symbol that is well known to senators who study history and that is a symbol that was started in the Roman senate and was then used during the 1930s in Italy. That is the fasces.

Now, honourable senators, our choice in this country is to follow the traditions and rules of the mace, not the fasces. Honourable senators, the element and the difference between the two is simple: it is compromise. The rules, the right to speak, and the right to listen are based on compromise. We have not had, since the beginning of this debate, one inch of compromise—even when honourable senators opposite, honourable Independent senators, have said that this bill is terrible, it is shoddy, it is inexact, it is inappropriate. Senator Everett has told us over and over again: "It is a bad bill in many, many ways, but I will support it." However, he did in fact support one amendment. Senator Molson said it was a bad bill, but gave us a reason why he could not clean it up. So we have a majority of senators, clearly, who believe that this bill in its present form is not a good bill.

If there is no compromise, why should the public accept this law? They do not expect us, as honourable Senator Simard has suggested, to get on with the business of the Parliament and the house simply for efficient purposes. We are here to get the public to accept what we do. So, instead, we have the most recent indication from the most populous riding in Canada, North York, that they are against the bill, North York is a riding representing 160,000 plus people. It is bigger than, I believe, Prince Edward Island. If at the doors you ask members opposite in the other place, which I did, four or five members, "What are you getting at the doors?" "Why is it that the Tories went from 30-odd per cent to less than 10 per cent, just a little bit more than the GST?" "What were the issues at the door?" The answer is that the issue at the door is—and this it is not meant as a partisan comment—that they do not like Mr. Mulroney. I will leave that aside. I said, "Why? What is the rationale for it? Go beyond that. Why is it that they were so patriotically opposed to the Conservative Party when it has always had a hard-core support in that riding of 20-plus per cent?" The reason was clear. They do not trust the government and they hate the GST. They do not like the way it is being rammed through.

Do your polling after the event. Go back into that riding. If I am wrong I will stand up in my place and withdraw what I have said. But this is what I get. You know that. Members opposite know that. Every senator from Ontario knows that.

Senator Murray: It is not your job; that is the job of the elected people down the road.

Senator Grafstein: No. I have explained, Senator Murray, that my job here is to represent the viewpoints of the region and the sector, and if I disagree with them, to give a rational reason why I disagree and do so based on my conscience. My first responsibility is to represent the views of the region. That is why I have said I have no quarrel with members opposite from the Province of Quebec.

Honourable senators, we have a situation—I want to bring it back to the point of privilege—where the Speaker in principle, based on the symbolism of the mace, based on the throne, sits above us on the throne. That symbolism represents and protects all of our rights, not just the rights of the majority, or a clique within the majority, but all of our rights. Our rights certainly have been breached. Even Senator Everett has said today, in this chamber, that he agrees with Senator Stanbury that there have been abuses of the rules by the Speaker. I asked him that, and he said that. So we have in front of us a clear record of abuses, and unfortunately the Speaker decided that he would not stay independent. He would not do what Senator Grosart advised so long ago. He said that he has to exercise self-discipline and intervene rarely and rise above partisanship. But we do not have that now. That is why at this late date I rise to speak to this point of privilege.

There is one element that has not been mentioned before that bothered me a great deal, senators, and I am sorry that the Speaker is not in his place, because I hope that he will take his place, his seat on the side opposite, and give us an explanation. That is, when he chose to participate in a law suit brought by senators on this side—by the way, I would have absolutely no objection if senators opposite had chosen, as a group, or individually, to intervene in the lawsuit respecting the qualification of certain senators and the consequences of those eight senators. Senators on this side chose to proceed in the courts. I begged the Leader of the Government in the Senate, "Please let us have a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. Do not require either citizens or senators to take this matter to the courts. Please have a reference." The power would have been yours because you could have determined the references. You could have defined what the reference should be and taken it to the Supreme Court and we could have removed that uncertainty by this time. It could have been brought in in early October, we could have been finished with it by now, and then the cloud that still hangs over this house, with cases yet to come, would have been removed, if, as Senator Beaudoin said, it was clear-cut.

The counsel for the government has said in that lawsuit that the issues raised were "complex, serious, of importance and of great constitutional purport". Those were the words that counsel for the Government of Canada used in those lawsuits. I say that, honourable senators, because this is where the Speaker now plays a role that I think is unheralded and certainly it must be offensive to all sides, and that is that the Speaker of the Senate chose to intervene in that lawsuit. What right did the Speaker have to intervene in that lawsuit? I cannot understand it. He asked to be made an intervenor to the lawsuit brought by certain senators. As I said, honourable senators, had senators opposite chosen to do that, or had he said, "I will step down from the Chair and try to argue an opposite view", I would have had no quarrel with that. But to intervene? To have the president, the Speaker of the Senate, intervene in this matter, I think, is inappropriate. That, combined with the other breaches that I have mentioned, seems to commend to me, very reluctantly, this motion of censure.

Honourable senators, I want to deal, if I can, with Senator Kelly's letter of December 10 and give it another caste; that is, when I read it I noticed that it was signed by all the senators opposite, save for the Speaker, and it seemed to me not to be a statement, not to be a point of order, but seemed to me to be a petition. By the way, I have no quarrel with that. If senators opposite wish to petition this place, that will be appropriate. But it was done in the guise of a point of order, rather than either a notice of motion or a petition. Had it been a petition, it would have been improperly constructed. I will just give you a very brief quote from May.

I notice that we are commended as senators to provide and present petitions. The one place where we are prevented from presenting petitions is when we are petitioning on behalf of ourselves. This is the thirteenth edition of the book by Sir Erskine May. It is very interesting and at page 615 he says:

> A peer or member may petition the House to which he belongs but, if a member desires to have a petition from himself presented to the House, he should entrust it to some other member, as he will not be permitted to present it for himself.

If this is a petition, it was breaching a fundamental rule of petitioning. So wherever you look at the Kelly letter, it appears not to be founded on any rule, practice or procedure but is based on the foundation that the Speaker comes along and makes not a ruling, as he suggested, but a statement.

I want to read to Senator Kelly the second last paragraph of the Speaker's statement, and he says:

> Therefore, in order to give the Senate a clear and definitive opportunity to decide, which is its undoubted right, I rule that not later than 5.45 p.m., on Thursday, December 13, 1990, I will put every question necessary to dispose of Bill C-62 at the third reading stage forthwith and successively without any further debate or deferral of divisions.

That clearly is a ruling, not a statement. The problem—

Senator Corbin: Look at the Table. The calendar says December 11.

Senator Grafstein: I will come to that in a moment. He was making a ruling here clearly without allowing members on this side or independent members to deal with the ruling. It appears that the order, so-called, by Senator Kelly, is illusory and a nullity. It appears that the Speaker then projected a so-called ruling without following the practice or the procedures of the rules. Finally, senators—and this to my mind is the most hurtful aspect because nobody can walk away from this place without responsibility—this is the Speaker's letter which we received this morning. It is to all honourable senators, and it is dated December 12, from the Honourable Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate, signed by him on the Speaker of the Senate's stationery. I will read the two paragraphs which say:

> My ruling was subsequently appealed and a recorded division was requested. Pursuant to Provisional rule 3(c), the twelve-hour deferral of the division was requested.

Honourable senators, this morning when I was confronted with this letter I asked who had appealed. Nobody had appealed. I asked who requested a recorded division. Nobody had requested a recorded division. Therefore, this statement by the Speaker is illusory. It is not based on fact. Senators opposite cannot turn their eyes away and say, "Oh, that this cup should pass by my lips," or "Please keep my hands out of this."

We were here last night and we saw a fictional statement put before us without the great Senator Everett objecting. I asked him, "Will you stand up and object to this letter?" "No," he said. I did not quarrel with him but I wondered why that eminent, brilliant, independent senator with so much experience would not say that this was a piece of fiction placed on the Table of the Senate. Oh, he stood and he strolled off to the other side without a word. Without a word.

Honourable senators, I stood in my place this morning saying that I could not participate in this vote because it is a nullity. I said to myself this morning, "Is there any other way that I can participate without tainting myself with this vote?" So the choices for me were very simple. Should I stay out? That would not have have been satisfactory. Should I stay here and be silent? That would not be satisfactory. I was worried whether, by abstaining in the vote, I would or would not be tainting myself and giving some legitimacy to the vote. So I adopted what was open to me: a brief statement to say that this was a nullity. Therefore, I could not participate in the adjudication because it was a vote. A vote requires an order, a rule, a decision, all according to constitutional practice. Then a vote. None of those pre-conditions took place so, therefore, honourable senators, it is a nullity.

[Senator Grafstein.]

So tonight, honourable senators, each of us who are going to vote will say I cleanse myself by the Senate majority. That is the heart of both Senator Murray and Senator Charbonneau's argument. The Constitution says that according to section 36, I assume, that the majority of the Senate rules. Honourable senators, you cannot cleanse yourself by hiding behind the Constitution on this issue. You cannot do that.

Honourable senators, I conclude by saying this. All of us are students and witnesses to parts of the twentieth century. If the twentieth century has taught us anything, there are two lessons. One lesson is that if you do not protect the minority, then ultimately your rights will be eroded. Lesson number two of the twentieth century is that you cannot hide behind somebody else. Each citizen has personal responsibility. You cannot hide behind a majority. You cannot hide behind the government. You cannot hide behind the leader. You cannot hide behind the Speaker. Each senator, each citizen, has personal responsibility. To my mind, that is the great lesson of the twentieth century. There is no place to hide. We are all culpable and responsible here.

When senators opposite say, "I have done my duty. I will tell my children I was proud of what I did today and in the past few weeks," I query that. I will have difficulty dealing with that.

There is a great book that was written by Elias Canetti called Crowds and Power, which I referred to before. It is probably the greatest book on political philosophy that I have read. Canetti, who won the Nobel Prize for this book among others, said that individuals become different animals when they move in crowds. They take on the coloration of a crowd. They take on the coloration of a group. They somehow leave their own personal responsibilities behind and they move with the crowd. It takes tremendous personal power not to be drawn into the magnet of the crowd.

Honourable senators, I am afraid that all of us have been pulled into crowds, but clearly that is not good. What we have done here cannot come to good but can only break our hearts.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I wish to—Senator Simard: Am I recognized? Thank you.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: I should like to indicate quite clearly that, as I see it, the question of privilege raised by Senator Stanbury is rather specious and faithfully reflects the despair felt by our colleagues opposite.

But first I should like to pay an unconditional and unequivocal tribute. I want to say how I feel when reference is made to the work done by Senator Charbonneau, and how, in my opinion, we have come to appreciate his patience, his quest for impartiality, and his respect for parliamentary rules, provisional or otherwise. In short, how he has remained faithful to his love for democracy.

Not only did he fight outside in other countries precisely to promote democracy, preserve Canada or make it even prouder and more united, but in the last three month I imagine that, like us, he went through extraordinarily trying times. He did all that for democracy, out of respect for order and, to the extent possible, to respect the spirit of parliamentary rules and traditions.

Senator Charbonneau, again I want to say that you can count on our support, our admiration as well as our respect and our friendship at the end of the difficult times you experienced along with us.

• (1620)

[English]

Earlier today we witnessed a speech from the Leader of the Opposition. We all know that at one time he was a great parliamentarian.

Senator Lucier: He still is.

Senator Simard: I would say he still is an expert because he knows the rules of the House of Commons and, no doubt, the rules and procedures of other parliaments better than anyone else. We have to give him credit for that and show our respect. He has worked hard to attain this degree of knowledge when it comes to procedure.

However, I believe the speech he gave today was one of the worst speeches we have ever heard him give. I will tell you why I thought it was not a good speech. The man was angry. I do not believe you can deliver a good speech if you are angry. Being the leader of his party, he has to assume the responsibility and, no doubt, that responsibility dawns on him now as it did yesterday and last night.

He is a politician of another generation facing a younger leader sitting on our side. Our leader has relatively short experience, but his knowledge of Canadians has made him a great and exceptional leader. I am talking about Senator Murray. I have known Senator Murray for a long time. I did not think he was such a patient individual. Obviously, Senator Murray, you have learned that from Richard Hatfield and others. You know the Liberals better than anyone else in this house. You have fought them in Nova Scotia; you have fought them at the federal level in your previous life; you have been fighting them in this place; and you have fought them throughout the Meech Lake episode.

You people on the other side of this chamber would like to think that because the Liberal Party of Canada killed Meech Lake, somehow by a stroke of the pen . . .

[Translation]

. . . through mental gymnastics, Lowell Murray could be blamed. No, you are wrong.

So Lowell Murray, thank you for the direction you gave us, for your leadership. Some could say that you have already surpassed the master who sits in front of you, the ex-master.

[English]

There is always a danger of under-estimating your opponents. We in politics know that. Well, Senator Murray, the Liberal senators have under-rated you. In the same vein, I am sure that the Liberals senators will agree that their leader is probably the most over-rated politician in this house.

I did not know what Senator MacEachen was about to say, but at the end of his speech, after alluding to threats, I thought he was announcing his retirement from politics. I thought that was going to be his Christmas gift to this house because he was sad and angry. I thought perhaps the new leader of the Liberal Party had given him a signal that either he would be successful in stopping the GST or he would be gone.

[Translation]

That would not surprise me at all. In fact, today's La Presse titles on page 3 or 4 that the new leader of the Liberal Party found that the Liberal senators had fought a "sensational" battle in the last three months. Look for it in La Presse!

That is how the Liberal Leader, Mr. Chrétien, describes the dirty job our friends opposite have been doing for three months. Naturally, Mr. Chrétien is a man of the past as is demonstrated in another article published in L'Acadie nouvelle of December 5. That article states that the New Brunswick government saw fit to help the Liberal candidate in Beauséjour in view of the elections of last Monday, December 10.

So, when we say that Mr. Chrétien is a man of the past, it is quite true. Since he had to resort to methods of the past, with the full support of Mr. McKenna and others.

• (1630)

[English]

Senator Stanbury: That is for sure. He sure does.

[Translation]

In the midst of an electoral campaign, at the federal level, to get the leader ot the national party elected, the provincial government of New Brunswick felt compelled to help him by announcing a $1 million grant for a $8 million project dating back to 1982, a project developed by the inhabitants of Cap-Pelé.

You can see, dear colleagues, the despair, the lack of confidence that the Liberals, the Liberal government of New Brunswick were showing when they felt compelled, in order to save Mr. Chrétien from a potential defeat, to tell him: Well, we will spend $1 million to buy some lands. Doesn't that remind you, Senator Bolduc, of the old campaigns in Kamouraska, in Montmagny and elsewhere, when the Liberal governments of the time—and even the Unionists—were desperate?

Mr. Chrétien is the new candidate, the new leader of the Liberal Party who had to rely on some friendly government to get by. Of course, I do not know if they will have to wait till the snow milts to proceed with a land survey or to stake lots of pieces of land. They have one million but at the same time, the article says that the municipality will need 1.9 million of federal money. That means, I suppose, that the federal will be good, that it will come across . . .

All that to say, Senator Corbin, that you have done lots of campaigning, darned good election campaigning, I should say! But you have not always had to do that in the old days. And the same goes for me! Because you and I used to build between elections and not the day before. But it seems as if we have gone back to the good old practices. Our new old leader . . .

In the old days, it would take sometimes three or four elections for the federal Liberal Party to get a project going, maybe a little less in the Madawaska area. It is like the train station in Rivière-du-Loup. During four campaigns; it was Jean-François Pouliot at the time, they promised that this community would have a station. And they did the same thing with the Gross-Cacouna harbour.

In any case, let us return to the GST for a moment. All that to say that Senator MacEachen received Mr. Chrétien's official support and grtitude for what Mr. Chrétien qualified as "sensationnal" efforts made by his Liberal friends.

Therefore, Senator Charbonneau, not only have you got our confidence, but I know that the Prime Minister trusts you and that he will continue to do so.

However, this afternoon's debate, gave us the opportunity to hear speeches that were prepared back in October. Because speeches delivered by Senator Stanbury . . .

[English]

Senator Fairbairn's speech, I am sure, was prepared in October or early November.

Senator Fairbairn: No, last night.

Senator Simard: Those were speeches that they would have delivered in a normal debate. They did not have a chance to deliver those speeches.

Senator Buckwold: Wrong again.

Senator Simard: Today was the day of last hope for whoever delivered their speeches. I must say that they were pretty good but they would have been so much more useful had they been delivered earlier.

Perhaps we could have deleted the famous draft of possible amendments that Senator Buckwold talked about, dealing with taxis and other areas. Senator Kirby alluded to that yesterday when he said that, if the Department of Finance could do that in respect of taxis, then perhaps they could do it for the fishermen. As I have said so many times, you people have once again scored in your own net. By stalling, you missed an opportunity in October or November to have a rational debate.

Senator Fairbairn tells us what we have suspected or even known for a long time—that a government led by Mr. Chrétien or by herself would govern by poll. We know that. Senators opposite keep quoting the polls and if they find that something is unpopular then they say the government should not proceed with it, that we should wait until it becomes fashionable.

It has been pointed out to me that in today's Globe and Mail it says that a poll indicated that 70 per cent of Canadians would accept a forced Senate vote on the tax. If you people opposite are so fond of governing by poll, remember that 70 per cent of Canadians will accept a forced vote on the GST. Put your minds to rest and let us get on with the business of this house.

[Senator Stanbury.]

We heard the sanctimonious statement of Senator MacEachen who was obviously angry. He has tried to find events that have taken place in the other house in years gone by, whether that was at the time of Speaker Beaudoin or others, that he can relate to this situation. We know Senator Frith's view on this matter. It is that things are decided in this house by a majority. He was certainly very good at that on September 24.

What we have witnessed here in the last three months has no parallel. There is no basis for comparison with anything that might have happened in the House of Commons, the House of Lords or in any other place at any other time. Is Senator MacEachen responsible for members opposite storming the Chair? I remember Senator MacEachen standing in front of Senator Murray's desk and making threats. Senator Murray and I could not figure out what he had to say.

Senator Stanbury: He does not want to hear what anybody has to say.

Senator Simard: I did not expect that from Senator MacEachen.

Senator MacEachen: You made a mistake, Senator.

Senator Simard: No, I did not. You came over here.

Senator MacEachen: No, you have it all mixed up. I will explain something.

Senator Simard: Tell us what you had to say. I will take your word for it. It was very clear to me what was on your mind that day. Threats.

Senator Frith: You have come to a wrong conclusion.

Senator Simard: I said earlier that we had heard some October speeches. I cannot blame senators opposite for delivering those speeches now because the Liberal senators knew that, despite their bravado, this legislation would pass.

Senator Lefebvre: What has that got to do with it?

Senator Simard: Despite the court action, despite the threats and despite all the political gimmicks, Senator MacEachen and his colleagues knew it would pass. I have no better proof of that than what Senator Kirby is reported as having said. He said that, at the risk of making a partisan comment, which he would hate to do in this chamber, he could not resist making the observation that "Many of us on this side of the house would look forward to the daily press stories which will occur day after day when this tax is in effect."

There is another statement almost cautioning and almost threatening the press to reflect exactly what was taking place, and yet telling us that the legislation will be implemented on January 1.

• (1640)

Senator MacEachen, I must say it was a good effort, but you have to assume responsibility for the actions of some of your members.

Senator MacEachen: I always take responsibility, unlike you and your leader who put the responsibility on others.

Senator Simard: Thank you. That is fine.

This morning Senator Olson told one of the table officers that he was a criminal. Is this the type of respect senators opposite have for people and for house rules? It is bad enough for me and all of my colleagues to have had to listen to Senator Sparrow calling me a thug, my neighbour a crook, someone else a liar, and concluding by calling Senator Everett a crook or a thug. That is bad enough, but please leave the staff alone. My colleagues will remember that, during the session, senators opposite told the press and us how the staff needed to relax, needed a rest and obviously needed more pay. We know what this exercise has cost in the last two or three months. One of the members of the Senate calling a table officer a criminal is shocking.

This debate has at least permitted us to know our friends. I will sit down in a few minutes—

Senator Buckwold: That will be good.

Senator Simard: Senator MacEachen is quoted in today's paper as stating that in order to get the bill through, all the traditions and customs and rules of parliament have been thrown overboard. "The Speaker has behaved as a true gangster, nothing short, in his conduct", says Senator MacEachen.

I was standing next to Senator MacEachen when he made that statement in the entrance to the Senate yesterday. Is this the product of a great parliamentarian? I say no. I say that this is the statement of an angry man, a desperate individual who is obviously on his way out. Senator MacEachen went on to state that Senator Charbonneau will never be forgiven for what he has done tonight.

Senator MacEachen, your party and yourself will not be forgiven or forgotten for the actions of your members during the last three or four months.

Senator MacEachen: We hope not.

Senator Simard: This is not you finest hour.

As a member of the Senate Banking Committee, I have to finish with Senator Buckwold.

Senator Buckwold: I was wondering when you would come to me.

Senator MacEachen: Why don't you say something about the anniversary?

Senator Simard: Which anniversary?

Senator MacEachen: December 13th.

Senator Simard: You want me to talk about that? I will. I will deal with Senator Buckwold first, and I will come back to that. If I should forget, remind me again.

Senator Buckwold, yesterday you complained, and Senator Kirby echoed your statement or your feelings, that it was awful that the Minister of Finance should be working on amendments to improve the GST or make it more acceptable.

Senator Buckwold: Amendments that had to be done before December 31st. Come on, tell the facts.

Senator Simard: You and others have been pleading and sending letters to the Department of Finance all summer and most of this fall on exactly what you are complaining about today. You and I and other members asked the Department of Finance to look at the testimony of witnesses and the possible unfairness that Bill C-62 contained. You have the nerve now to criticize and say that it is too late. I say to you, sir, it is never too late to correct a mistake. Michael Wilson should be congratulated.

Senator Buckwold: Why won't you accept any amendments?

Senator Simard: Would you be displeased, shocked or flabbergasted if the Minister of Finance should announce tomorrow that the tax on books will be reduced? You cannot have it both ways. Last week you were pleading for amendments. What hypocrisy!

Senator Buckwold: When the argument is weak, keep yelling.

Senator Simard: You are out of arguments. I hope that the Minister of Finance and his department will continue to work with people in the health sector for technical changes, or people in other industries, or people who trade in auto parts, because we heard that there were problems there. Senator Castonguay has indicated that he would like to see changes in the insurance sector. I hope you can join us once your partisanship has evaporated and when you come back to normal and support us and Senator Castonguay in pleading for those changes.

Senator Buckwold, you cannot argue for amendments and then knock the minister for getting ready to announce amendments.

Senator Buckwold: Amendments to make the bill workable; that is what they are. There are a million other amendments that are needed, but these are required to make the bill workable and, without them, they are in trouble. That is why you fellows are ramming this bill through tonight; so there is time for a Ways and Means Motion.

Senator Simard: You say that we are ramming it through tonight. It has been three months. You should have assumed your responsibility instead of listening to the enforcer, Senator Frith. He and you should have listened to people and discussed and debated the amendments with us.

This debate has allowed us to determine and assess, if not visualize and sometimes appreciate, the new partnership of Lawson, MacEachen and Waters. I am looking forward to returning in February or March and discussing the Estimates and other legislation. Senator Lawson, I am talking about you. I am trying to predict the future here. Listen!

• (1650)

I am referring to when Senator Waters got up and suggested that all the social programs be cut by 15 per cent. I wonder what Senator Lawson will do to his former ally, what he will tell him? Will you agree with Senator Waters when he advocates a 15 per cent cut on the social programs, grants by the government for these programs? Will you agree with Senator Waters or will you be asking 15 per cent, yourself, as an increase? I suggest that will be the end of the partnership then.

Of course you will not be here, Senator David Steuart. We will miss you.

Senator Steuart: I will miss you, too. You are giving me a headache.

Senator Simard: We will miss you. And I would hope that before you leave, though, you tell Senator Charbonneau how you appreciated him and how he served this house very well in a very distinct fashion, under terrible pressure in adversity. I know that you will want to tell him that because this is exactly what Senator Charbonneau has put up with in the last several months.

[Translation]

Senator MacEachen is not here to listen to this but I remind honourable senators of the anniversary of December 12 or 13, 1979. That was the day the Clark government was defeated in the House of Commons. I remember that day, how they had managed to get into the House all the sick, all the handicapped, all the people who had not been seen there for months, how the Liberal Party resorted to that method in an attempt to defeat the government.

They did defeat the Clark government that had promised to slap a 15-odd cents tax on a gallon of gas. They were going to do better! And they did just that! I think they increased the tax on a gallon of gas by something like 60-odd cents.

[English]

Eleven years ago, your party, Senator Sparrow, defeated my party in the House of Commons. You should not be celebrating this anniversary today. You should be ashamed. Every time you talk about this anniversary, you remind Canadians how the Liberal government cannot be trusted, because having promised Canadians not to allow a raise in the price of gas, of 15 or 12 cents or 32 cents, or whatever, you more than doubled, if not tripled, that tax. You should be the last to talk about it, because every time you do, as I said, you remind Canadians that Liberals cannot be trusted.

[Translation]

I am pleased to take part in this debate. I wish the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce had done a better job. I am concerned about the scope of a number of provisions in Bill C-62. I am even more afraid of the interpretation officials may give to certain clauses. But this bill, as many others, I suppose, will have to stand the test of time. If changes must be made, if blatant inequities come to the surface, I am sure my hon. colleagues, including Senator Robertson, will bring them to the attention of the government who will correct them.

I feel I have done a good job. It has been said over and over again that this legislation is unpopular. It will remain so for awhile. Yet, I feel it is useful and necesary. I wish it had been debated in a quieter more and positive atmosphere. This way, we might have had a better bill.

[Senator Simard.]

I think that time will prove us right. It is the right bill for the 1990s. Thank you.

[English]

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul Lucier: I rise to support this motion of Senator Stanbury's that said that Senator Charbonneau is unfit to be the Speaker of the Senate. I think that it is even more significant that a person Senator Stanbury's stature should be the one making this motion. He is one of the most gentle, understanding senators in this chamber. That one of the least vindictive senators in this chamber should feel compelled to put forward this kind of motion, I think adds extra significance.

Concerning Senator Simard's comments, some time ago—earlier today, in fact, Senator Grafstein, in discussing another situation, said that two different people can look at an accident and see two different things in exactly the same accident. I can only tell Senator Simard that he and I are looking at the accident that sits in Senator Lowell Murray's chair, and we see him from an entirely different point of view. I can assure you of that. You see him as your hero, and I can tell you that he is not my hero, nor is he the hero of the North. Or of the country.

It is a kind of sad day today, and not only because the Speaker allowed himself to be corrupted by Senator Murray, Prime Minister Mulroney, Mr. Wilson and Mr. Andre. We have known Senator Murray's methods, we have known his mentality. We know his morals from way back during the Meech Lake debate, that seamless web that was presented to us which enshrined into the Constitution of Canada that Northerners were second-class citizens. We know that he tried to push that through and we also know, as was stated here by different senators today, that when Elijah Harper, an Aboriginal member of the Legislature of Manitoba, stood in his place and obeyed our rules—our rules as non-Aboriginals—he was an Aboriginal and he was obeying our rules of how a legislature should be run, and how people should govern themselves. We set the rules, brought him in, and said, "You have to live by these rules". And when he chose those rules to defend the rights of his people, his people who were 100 per cent opposed to the Meech Lake Accord, Senator Murray got on national TV and did not instruct, because he could not, but tried to force the Premier and the opposition leaders in the Manitoba Legislature, tried to convince them, that what they should do is throw out the rule book and get rid of this Elijah Harper. I mean, after all, he was being a pest. He was supporting the views of his people. You cannot have that in the legislature. You cannot have a man standing there representing the views of his people. You have to do something about that.

So we know the Mulroney-Murray mentality on that. So it does not surprise us a great deal that the Speaker allowed himself to be corrupted by them. I think what did surprise us somewhat is that there are some decent people on the other side who allowed themselves to be sucked into this process. They are the ones who are going to hang their heads in shame.

I do not expect Senator Murray, Prime Minister Mulroney, or the rest of them to hang their heads in shame. They were just doing what they have always done.

• (1700)

It is a pity when you take a look at what has taken place in this chamber. Senator Murray has brought in Senator Jacques Flynn, a former and very respected colleague, and put him on the payroll. Some people say it is for $1,500 a day; I don't care if it is $15 a day. He has the right to bring Senator Flynn in and he also has the right to pay him whatever he thinks he should pay him. It would be interesting, when the figures come out, to see just how much he is paying him, but that is beside the point. The point is that he was using Senator Flynn as a go-between for himself and the Speaker of the Senate. He was using Senator Flynn to corrupt the Speaker. Senator Flynn has been seen going in and out of the Speaker's chambers. That has to be a real classy act!

An Hon. Senator: Freedom of movement.

Senator Corbin: Then going back to Murray's office.

Senator Lucier: Exactly. I asked a question of Senator Murray some time ago in this chamber. I asked him whether there had been any discussion with the Speaker to try to involve him in the shenanigans that were going to take place. We knew they were going to do something and I asked had there been or would there be any discussions involving Senator Murray or anyone representing him and the Speaker. He answered very clearly and the answer was no. He lied. That was a lie because obviously there was someone speaking with Mr. Charbonneau from Senator Murray's office.

You senators opposite have always lived by a set of rules. From the time you are born, from the time you are three years old and you learn to understand, you learn that there are rules. Whatever you do, there are some basic rules which you have to follow or you get into trouble and you cannot play the games. If it is amateur sports or professional sports, if it is political life or whatever, you have to follow a basic set of rules. They do not have to be very complicated, but there are always some rules. Even if there is not a referee, there have to be some rules under which you play. If one side does not follow the rules, it becomes very difficult.

Quite frankly, very often the rules are not very good. That happens in the NHL. They change the rules every year. But they do not make changes during the game. They make changes between seasons.

What has happened here? This idea of going into a session of Parliament, a session of the Senate of Canada, with the Senate pasing laws for Canadians to follow and saying to them, "While we are making the laws that we want you to follow, we will break all the laws of our own chamber." Doesn't that make a lot of sense? We are breaking the laws of Parliament so that we can pass a law which Canadians do not want. That is really putting in place an intelligent process.

Senator Haidasz: Two wrongs do not make a right.

Senator Lucier: Exactly. Senator Everett, who has been a good friend of mine for some 15 years since I entered this chamber, has really disappointed me in the last little while. I wish he were here to hear what I have to say, because, first of all, I want to say that I respect his right to support the GST. If Senator Everett wants to support the GST, let him do that. I do not understand why he does it, because the northern part of his province is going to be very seriously damaged by this GST; but if he chooses to do so, that is his perogative.

Senator Haidasz: He is a millionaire and has nothing to worry about.

Senator Lucier: What I cannot figure out and what I cannot understand is that he condones the Speaker joining the Conservative caucus and using the Speaker's Chair to pass government legislation. If I ever expected anyone to object to such a move, I would have expected Senator Everett to object to that process.

As I say, I understand him if he wants to support legislation or not support it but I certainly do not understand him supporting a process in which the Speaker, who is the referee, joins one of the teams.

Honourable senators, I listened carefully to Senator Everett today and his explanation seems to be that the Speaker can only become part of one of the teams if it looks like they are going to lose. The Speaker should be impartial and he should just rule with an iron hand right down the middle, independently, so long as the teams are equal. If one team is losing, then the referee has a right to join that team. There are no longer six players on that side; there are now seven. That seems to be his logic. I wish he was here to hear what I am saying, because I would appreciate hearing his defence.

An Hon. Senator: He is listening.

Senator Lucier: During his remarks today Senator Murray was agreeing with, I believe, an editorial from a Winnipeg newspaper. He was suggesting that there should be a statue for Speaker Charbonneau. Just take a look at the implications of this.

Supposedly you have an independent, unbiased, fair Speaker. One of the teams is saying this guy helped us pass our bill so we should erect a statue to him.

Senator Hastings: Riding a horse.

Senator Lucier: Can you imagine Punch Imlach suggesting, during a hockey game, that the referee should be honoured for the way he is refereeing a game? Wouldn't that be great? I tell you, that would be a winner.

Honourable senators, I know the hour is getting late. There are others who want to speak, but I want to speak for a few minutes on the treatment that the north is receiving with this particular ruling and on this letter, notion or whatever you call it, that has been put forth by Senator Kelly.

Senator Bonnell: The letter was not signed; it was two blank sheets of paper which were signed.

Senator Lucier: It is really too bad that Senator Kelly was the one to do this. Everybody has been very quick today to forgive Senator Kelly for his actions because he is such a decent person. Senator Kelly, I can tell you I am not that quick to forgive you. I think that you have been a very distinguished person before you came to the Senate and you are a very distinguished person now. You knew better. You should never have been conned into this. You knew better. I cannot forgive you as easily as the others do. I am very sorry to say that, because no one in here has ever respected you more than I have.

As far as I and Senator Adams and Senator Watt are concerned, I really think that you have imposed on us a very serious breach of Parliament. You have taken away our right to speak on third reading of a piece of legislation, after other people had a right and had been accepted to have a right to speak on third reading. We are the only three who speak on behalf of northern Canada and you denied us that right, as you did Senator Lawson and Senator Waters. However, they are very capable of speaking for themselves; I do not need to speak for them.

You may not know, Senator Kelly, but until 1975 there were no senators from the Yukon and there were no senators from the Northwest Territories. A special amendment to the Constitution of Canada was passed so that we could be here. We have a very special responsibility when we come here; it is not only to pass laws. We can pass a law in two minutes. We are here to put the views and bring forward the protests of the people of northern Canada who disagree with the laws; not the ones who agree. You have denied northern Canada that right. Senator Kelly, I can only tell you there was a report put out which I was intending to use in my remarks and which I wished to table for some of its input. It was a report on concerns regarding the implications of recent tax measures for the economies of the north.

• (1710)

It is a very important report. It was put out by Ernst & Young, and it was prepared for northern ministers of the provinces and territories. I will not read from the report because I do not have time. However, I would like to quote a few statements that were made by the Minister of Northern Development, Shelly Martel, when this report was tabled in the legislature of Ontario. She said:

> The report states that the Goods and Services Tax will reduce the purchasing power of northern consumers and add to the cost of northern manufactured goods and tourism services.
> Northern manufacturers will face special challenges because transportation costs will be taxed under the GST. This will lead to an increased incentive to manufature goods close to the market, and will put northern businesses at a disadvantage.
> The GST will also reduce demand for the northern tourism industry, by raising the cost of visiting that part of our country. Northern tourism is heavily dependent on transportation and the tax will make travel more costly.
> Municipalities, universities, hospitals and schools in the North will also bear higher overall costs under the GST. Rebates for these institutions are based on a single national calculation which will not be sufficient to compensate for the additional costs associated with a northern location.

[Senator Bonnell.]

Honourable senators, I would like you to pay attention to this next statement. When I read a sentence like this, I wish that I had said it myself. It is something that should be burned into the memory of every senator in this chamber on both sides. The statement is this:

> "The GST is a tax on distance and weather," added Martel. "The more remote the region and the colder the temperatures, the higher the GST tax on transportation and heating."

Honourable senators, there are other things I could read and say, but there is nothing that will say it better than that statement: The GST is a tax on distance and weather. The more remote the region and the colder the temperatures, the higher the GST tax on transportation and heating. Honourable senators on the other side, when you stand to vote today, you should perhaps hold your heads down a little because you have inflicted a very serious and unforgivable penalty on the people of northern Canada. You have done it, not inadvertently, but with full knowledge of what you were doing; you have done it deliberately. You will pay for it in the long run; if not in any other way, your conscience will have to bear the results of your actions tonight when you stand to vote for this piece of garbage.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: My stable mate, Senator Waters, concluded his remarks by saying that the Senate should be reformed. I refer to him as my stable mate because, in spite of Senator Simard's remarks about the partnership, during this fight we have had over the GST and the rights of independents to speak, Senator Waters has proven that he is a horse for the long haul.

We know that Senator Waters' party is for reform and the Triple E; others want to abolish the Senate and others want a suspensive veto. The Rhinoceros Party want the Triple A Senate. If you have not heard of that, it is arthritic, alcoholic and abolished. We have different views from the various extremes as to what to do. There are other ideas also, such as instead of winning $1 million in LotoCanada you will win a Senate seat. That will not work because there are no vacant seats.

One thing that is clear with all these different proposals is that there is a need for reform, a change in the Speaker of this chamber. We must have a neutral and impartial Speaker.

What I am about to say might be somewhat harsh. A long time ago someone asked the definition of an honest politician. The answer was this: That is one who, when he is bought and paid for, stays bought and paid for. That is a harsh comment to make, but I should like to say to the government that this is a classic example of getting value received for what you paid for. It saddens me to say that.

What troubles me even more is Senator Kelly's petition. As I understand this precedent, we are now going to rule by petition. On this occasion it is closure on this vote because of 320 hours. What is to stop the same 53 senators from petitioning on the abortion bill that perhaps on that occasion only the women should speak because they are the ones affected? Or perhaps only the men should speak on another occasion because they are the only ones affected.

Senator Waters said 320 hours was the amount that Senator Kelly had deemed to be enough on this occasion. On the next occasion, if we rule by petition, what is it going to be—200 hours, 20 hours, 12 hours? Who is going to decide that? Obviously that will be decided by the petitioners.

This system can only work if you own and operate the Speaker and he agrees to implement your demands. That, to me, is so wrong. In this late hour I do not want to spend too much time talking about the GST, but the other point that is so wrong about the GST—and I simply cannot understand the attitude of the government—is that in 1987 there were 117,000 corporations that made $25 billion in profits and did not pay 5 cents in tax. You have the same knowledge that I have about that.

In the name of conscience, with that information, how do you propose to pass a bill that is going to punish and penalize ordinary Canadians—the poor, the seniors, the working people. I am not talking about working people represented by trade unions who have recovery powers to recover the GST. I am talking about working people with no recovery powers. How in the name of conscience can you sit there and ram this through, knowing that billions of dollars flow to these corporations? It cannot simply be because you owe them and they support you. Surely there must be some conscience that says, "What about the ordinary Canadians?"

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lawson: As to the violation of the rules, as a labour representative, if any trade union in Canada violated the rules as often as they have been violated here, with the most recent one last evening and the vote this morning, that trade union would be in trusteeship or in court under the provincial or federal labour laws. Under Canadian labour laws you could not get away with it. It astounds me that you can get away with it here.

I should like to tell you one other story. I suffered an injury. I am not talking about the injury we have all suffered by the decision of the Speaker, by the petition and by the vote. I hit myself on the thumb with a metal object. I would like to tell you it was while using a hammer to build a house for the homeless, but I was playing hooky and it was a golf club. A recognizable face appeared on my thumb.

I asked Senator Waters if he recognized that face. He thought it was the face of God. I said, "I don't want to say anything. I don't want to encourage religious fanatics to come and worship at the shrine of my thumb. I do not want to ask the government to do something religious, and, if I did, this heartless government would probably take a collection and charge GST on it. The only change on this face in the last month is that this morning I saw some tears. I do not know whether they are tears for the loss of democracy in this chamber or for innocent Canadians who are going to be hurt by this and who cannot be helped.

• (1720)

A final point I want to make about this little injury as it keeps moving up the thumb is that in the next few weeks this injury will be healed and this face will disappear, perhaps to watch someone else. It is the healing in this chamber that concerns me. In days gone by we conducted ourselves in an honourable fashion under the rules and I see no way that that healing process can commence until we change the Speaker. For that reason I support Senator Stanbury's motion.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I thought that, as the dean of parliamentarians on the Hill, I would have something to say that should be of interest. I have had some responsibility for keeping this institution alive.

Honourable senators, 36 years ago, when I came here, this was a different institution. We only had about four conservatives, and sometimes we had six. What government was in and what government was out did not cause us any trouble. In those days, no matter what side you sat on, if a bill which was difficult to understand came to this place, then Senator John Connelly would take a great interest in the bill and look after its passage. Others like him have also passed along.

It was not until 1984 that we got into this situation. We then faced an attitude that was hard for us to accept.

We must not lose sight of one thing: Today Senator Stanbury gave a monumental indictment of the Speaker. He took 25 minutes to do it and he did it beautifully.

The Speaker cannot say, "I cannot accept that". It is not for him to say. The country will heed it and the government must heed it and do something about it. They cannot ignore it.

Honourable senators facing two more years of living with boxing gloves on all the time and using them is just unacceptable. We cannot do it. No matter what happens here, you, over there, are the losers, because you have to see the legislation through day after day when it comes from the government. We have some people over here who recognize legislation for its value. I would particularly mention Senator MacEachen because he has a knack for doing that. Unless we take off the boxing gloves and get down to business, the remainder of this regime will be even worse than it is now. We cannot do anything about that.

In the end, honourable senators, the Senate will lose.

Here we were trying to build up the Senate. We were building it up in the estimation of the public—then we got into this rigamarole. It was the only thing we could do. Today I heard one speaker say, "I am not interested in what the people are interested in. I am interested in what I think I should do." I heard that view expressed today.

You need us more than we need you. We are available. We want to see this country run well through these hard times. We want to get in behind the government and help it in any way we can. The Leader of the Government had better get his speech ready for making peace with Senator MacEachen in order that we may make some progress. One of the real troubles we have had in this house is that the government would not talk to us. None of them would talk to us but when they did they were insulting. That was unacceptable.

Honourable senators, I am not talking about the issue before us as such, but I can tell you that there are some new men over there with particular ability and a lot of brains and common sense. I say to you: Make your peace quickly, otherwise you will be in this position until a year or two or whenever the government decides to go to the country.

I cannot say more than that to you at the present time, honourable senators. Do not lose sight of the fact that the charges made and documented by the senator will be of interest to people across the country. Civil libertarians in particular will live that document morning, noon and night. You cannot get rid of it unless you do something about it, and I would urge you to do it quickly. That is all I have to say.

Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in about 10 minutes history is going to be made. Certainly, parliamentary history will be made. I know it is tempting at a time like this to overdramatize, but I think that we should remember that, when history is being made and one participates in that history, one does not get the sense of it as it is happening. Things that eventually become landmarks in the history of a nation and in the history of its parliament at the time do not perhaps seem trivial but are easily trivialized.

● (1730)

I would like to say a word about the rule of law. All my life I have found that the rule of law is a very difficult thing to get anyone interested in, unless they happen to be the victim of a breach of the rule of law. It is very difficult to work up a deep, emotional feeling about a breach of the rule of law in any context in which I myself am not involved. It is always an abstraction until then, or it is discussed in a very abstract way, but of course it has no abstract importance. Its importance is in its application.

It is not, as some dismiss it as, the rule of lawyers. The rule of law is not the rule of lawyers. The rule of law is the opposite to what Thomas Hobbs called the state of nature where life is nasty, brutish and short. It always expresses itself in some individual moment in history like what is happening right now and will happen in approximately 14 minutes.

It is always justified on the proposition that is the essence of every speech that has been made today against Senator Stanbury's motion. It is a very simple proposition. If you listened, as I listened to every speech that was made on the opposite side, it was the following. The end justifies the means. It is always that way. It was that way with Idi Amin. It was that way with Hitler, Mussolini, and with every situation. Let me make it clear. I am not suggesting that anyone here in this assembly or in this nation is as evil as Mussolini, Hitler or Idi Amin were. I am saying that the principle is the same principle; that it is always said that way. When the rule of law is broken in a large way or a small way, it is always said, "We had no choice. What could we do? There was abuse."

The rule of law is always inconvenient for somebody. At this very moment all over this planet, the rule of law is inconvenient for somebody. There is somebody right now in South Africa, or in South America, or in Iraq for whom the rule of law is inconvenient and who will say, "I know I should follow the rules. I know I should obey the law, but what can I do?" It is often General So and So who says, "Disorder has come into our land; I must take over and I will hold elections eventually. I know I am breaking the law by doing this. I am taking over. I am not following the constitution, but I have no choice because it is inconvenient and because the means I am going to use are justified by the end."

The very first time it happened here was on October 4. On October 4 in this chamber a vote took place with the opposition locked out, totally against the rules, totally against tradition, and against the rules and traditions of every parliamentary system in the world which operates on the basis of a vote. It is an astonishing thing, honourable senators, to experience that. It really takes your breath away and you really do not know what to do. It is a bit like the feeling of opening your door at home and finding you have been burglarized and you do not know exactly how to respond to it. You are frustrated and annoyed. What has happened, of course, is that the rule of law has been ripped away right from you; not out there in the abstract but right from you. It is the same as getting mugged.

Senator Barootes: And was your behaviour that evening at 8 o'clock the rule of law? Was that the rule of law? That was anarchy. You broke every rule.

Senator Frith: Senator Barootes, if you are going to keep yapping like that we are going to have to have someone follow you around with a poop scoop!

Senator Barootes has pointed out that our reaction to that breach of the rule of law was outrageous. I take responsibility for it. I was the acting leader at the time and I took the responsibility of, as Senator Barootes says, breaking the rules and coming in here and saying that there are no rules left here. I will tell you why. The Speaker's was a lawless act and a short but stiff jolt of anarchy is the best thing to wake up a lawbreaker, and it did. It makes the lawbreaker experience what life is like without laws and rules.

As we have used the metaphor before, when the referee picks up the ball and starts to run with ball for the opposite team, it is against the rules. It is against the rules to tackle the referee. But if you do not do something about it then, it becomes too late.

I want to say something about the press. The press is part of the media, the day-to-day historians. They do not have the luxury that historians have of doing years and years of research. They have deadlines and have to write their stories or file their reports, in whatever form, often within a matter of minutes and usually never any longer than a matter of hours. I want to say two things about the press. Because of the fact I was in this position, I had to deal with the press. I do not want to make invidious comparisons. I am not even going to look up. I know it may be bad form to do this. I made a list this morning, thinking back, about the reporters. I dealt with all of these people. I had to say to myself this morning that, on balance, they reported what was going on while this history was in the making in a very conscientious way and, I believe, in a balanced way.

● (1740)

And the ones I dealt with who got on my list—and I admit that it might be bad form to do it, but I will do it because I will never get a chance again—were Susan Delacourt, Helen Branswell, Alvin Cader, Johnathan Ferguson, Keith Boag, Julie Van Dusen, the two Newsworld people I dealt with, one in Halifax, and Don Newman, and Alan Freeman of the Globe and Mail. Given that fact, I do not think that the press will understand, any more than any of us would understand, why we are taking this so seriously, unless they can picture, from their point of view, the closure of the press and the muzzling of the media because someone accused them of abusing their rights. We have been accused of abusing our rights. We have abused our rights in here from a certain point of view.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: I believe that in every case we did so when either in response to a provocation by an abuse on the other side, or in the attainment of an objective that of course was contrary to the objectives of the government.

I think I acknowledge it. I do not hear anyone over there acknowledging ever having done anything wrong in all of this. I have never heard the Speaker, in all this time, despite all of these accusations, admit that he had done anything wrong. Of course it is possible that you have never done anything wrong, that your behaviour was absolutely perfect throughout. To listen to you, you would certainly think so. And that the Speaker's was.

Senator Bonnell: The people will judge.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we are about to approach an illegal and corrupt vote. It is going down in history as the second only in the history of the Canadian Parliament. It has been botched up to the last. We received a notice that we were going to have a vote, for example, on the 13th of December, and the Parliamentary day is sill the 11th of December. Again, the crowd that could not shoot straight. We are going to another example of a totally botched illegality. I hope that no judge—because of the fact that included in all this mess is the appointment of the eight senators, which has been challenged, and for which leave to appeal has been granted—that no judge of the Supreme Court will participate in the Royal Assent. We will see. I would hope that he or she would not.

Honourable senators, it is going to happen in a moment. It will be Beaudoin and Charbonneau. The two people, Charbonneau, and Beaudoin themselves, will be forgotten years from now. What they tried to do will never be forgotten. You will be here seeing it happen—here we go—in a moment. Then we understand that the Speaker is going to be appointed to some other position, perhaps as an ambassador. I do not know. It is going to be ironic to have him called, in my opinion, "Excellency", but it has gone past that personal point—and we have all been personal about this. It has gone past that. It is the historical event that we are all participating in. I am glad, I must say, that I am going to be associated with people, with senators, who are voting against what is about to happen. That moment has come when this outrage is finally going to spin its way to an end, when, as is going to happen right now, this illegal, corrupt vote is going take place, presided over by that disgraced Speaker.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: By order of the Senate, I must interrupt this debate to put the question on Senator Murray's motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked.

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION FOR THIRD READING—ADOPTION ON DIVISION

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that the original question be now put. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favor of the motion please say "Yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators against the motion please say "Nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I declare the motion carried.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): for the last time, honourable senators, this vote, without the eight illegitimate senators, would have been defeated by that four margin. It is another illegitimate win over there.

Senator Murray: You keep losing in the courts.

Senator Stollery: Murray actually thinks he won something.

Senator Sparrow: They don't know what they are doing.

Senator Frith: They have gotten so used to the fact that they do their votes all by themselves.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we will now have the vote on third reading. It is moved by the honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the honourable—

Senator Frith: What is the question? Have you learned anything?

The Hon. the Speaker: —seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, that Bill C-62 be now read the third time.

Will all those in favor please rise.

Senator Frith: You locked us out the last time. Unfortunately for you we are here this time.

Some Hon. Senators: Go home, go home.

The Hon. the Speaker: The question is on the third reading.

Senator Frith: That is not the question. You have not put the motion.

Senator Sparrow: Let us get somebody in the chair who knows what he is doing.

Senator Frith: He has not put the question.

An Hon. Senator: Yes he has.

Senator Frith: No he has not.

Senator Lawson: Mr. Speaker, once again for those of us who are seated further back than members of the House of Commons, will you please speak loud enough so we can hear what we are voting on?

Senator Olson: Even I didn't hear and I am right here.

An Hon. Senator: We are not supposed to know.

Senator Frith: What is the question?

Some Hon. Senators: Resign, resign, resign, resign.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those opposed to the motion please rise.

Senator Frith: Do you know what the question is? Tell us if you do. He has not put it yet.

An Hon. Senator: What is the question.

Senator Frith: Anyway, whatever the question is, if he put it, I am against it.

An Hon. Senator: What a mess.

Senator Olson: I don't know what the question is, but whatever it is I am opposed to it.

Senator Frith: Let's wait for Jacques Flynn to come in and tell you what to do, Mr. Speaker. What is the question? Sorry for the inconvenience of being in here to participate on the vote rather than being locked out, as you would no doubt prefer.

An Hon. Senator: Do your job.

An Hon. Senator: I want to know what I am voting for.

Senator Phillips: You have not known for the last 50 years.

Senator Davey: I am voting against this bill because it is a tragic day for the Tories and an even sadder day for the people of Canada.

Bill passed on the following division:

ABSTENTIONS

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

Nil

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame, shame, shame, resign.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Without the eight senators, the GST would be dead. Without those illegitimate senators, it would be dead, dead. It is alive by eight illegitimate senators. Otherwise the GST is dead.

Senator Barootes: Liberal rule is dead in the Senate.

An Hon. Senator: It stinks.

Senator Frith: An illegal message.

Some Hon. Senators: Resign, resign.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is now past 6 o'clock. I shall leave the Chair, to return at 8 o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

At 8 p.m., December 13, 1990, the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, when the sitting was suspended at 6 o'clock, under Rule 12, I was speaking on Senator Stanbury's motion. I intend to continue with the third point I was making, and then adjourn the debate.

Honourable senators will remember that I attempted to make the point that when the rule of law is broken we tend not to consider that, on a contemporaneous basis, as seriously as we ought to. We usually think that when there is a breach of the rule of law we will see neon lights flashing, and because of that it will be ingrained in our memories; but that rarely happens. In my opinion, that is what took place respecting the three main events over the past little while, those which took place on October 4, November 22 and December 13.

The media, as we all do, lack perspective at these times because they are trying to record events as they take place. I hope the day never comes when the media view things as we do—that of a tyrant abusing his or her position and, to complete the analogy, running to Parliament and saying, "Don't let that tyrant get away with muzzling us." In that case, the response Parliament could give to the media would be what the media now gives us, "This is just a little squabble between the Conservatives and the Liberals. This is not a serious breach of the rule of law simply because the Liberals are complaining and the Conservatives are not."

We, as parliamentarians, should keep a watch on whether the government is muzzling the press. And if it ever happens I hope we won't say it is just a little squabble between the government and the media and because we are not affected by that breach of the rule of law, brush off that breach of the rule of law. That brings me to my third point.

Some honourable senators think that the Speaker, Senator Charbonneau, is a hero because he made certain decisions—

Senator Simard: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Across the way Senator Simard is thumping on his desk, and because of that I can only assume that he is one of those who consider Senator Charbonneau to be a hero.

Senator Fairbairn: But he is only clapping with one hand!

Senator Frith: I only raise this to establish the fact that there is a record of what took place in the Senate over the past while. History will decide whether what took place was right or wrong. That is the good news. I say that because, in many cases when the rule of law is broken, it is usually broken by those in the military, or by revolutionaries, who take control, usurp authority unto themselves, and then try to rewrite history because there is no record. This is a small point, but some day someone will look at this record and then decide whether what has happened was proper. They will also see that Senator Simard and others believed Senator Charbonneau to be a hero.

Senator Di Nino: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Well, let's get all of the names of those senators who think Senator Charbonneau is a hero. I say that so those who will be reading the record of these proceedings in the future will know who it was who thought Senator Charbonneau was a hero because he broke the rule of law. I suppose, in that regard, that all other usurpers of authority have their supporters.

Senator Molgat: That was Senator Di Nino, Senator Carney's friend.

Senator Frith: Yes, and his hero may turn out to be a villain and someone else's villain may turn out to be a hero. That is what I want to make clear.

We already know that the deed has taken place and the historical plot is under way, but there is a record of these debates and that record will be there for the future, unlike what would happen if there were a military takeover in the dead of the night with no record of the facts; however, we do have a record in this place.

Whatever Hall of Fame or Hall of Infamy Senator Charbonneau is going to be elected to, we now know he will be in the company of one—and only one—former Speaker in the history of Canada, Speaker Beaudoin. Speaker Beaudoin will have Certificate No. 1 and Speaker Charbonneau Certificate No. 2. The record will live long after the individual personalities have disappeared. But the names, Speaker Beaudoin and Speaker Charbonneau, will be recorded and linked forever. Each, it may be said, had promising careers.

Senator Simard: Then I nominate you for the Hall of Infamy.

• (2010)

Senator Frith: I like the sort of informal Academy Award nominations I am getting here.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Barootes: Let's see your right profile.

Senator Frith: It was interesting that we had a sort of maiden speech this afternoon from one of the infamous eight. Senator Grimard, during his further attempt to purge his position as a doubtfully qualified senator—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: You do not expect me to change my position on that. I have never been anything but quite up front about that.

Senator Barootes: So now you are an acting Supreme Court judge, are you?

Senator Bolduc: That is not only a lack of good faith, it is a lack of good taste.

Senator Frith: Let us just have a look at that.

Senator Olson: I may not be a lawyer but I know a lot about common sense. Shame on you!

Senator Frith: I know that Senator Bolduc—and I say this quite sincerely—is a very intelligent and accomplished man. I guess he either misunderstands what my position is, or I misunderstand him—or perhaps he is not as intelligent as I thought. However, if I understand him correctly, he knows that I have consistently challenged the legality of the appointment of those eight. A judge—the same judge—has disagreed twice with me. The Court of Appeal has granted leave to appeal, and it does not grant leave to appeal unless it thinks there is a reasonable case to be made. Senator Bolduc is not a lawyer, but I know he is listening and he is open-minded and knows that it is important to the political life of this country as to whether they are legitimate appointments. I think it is legitimate to question them. I am sure Senator Bolduc would be the last one to say that I have no right to raise a constitutional question.

Is he saying that it is always in bad taste to raise constitutional questions? I cannot believe that of him. In fact, even if he acknowledges that that is what he is saying, I do not believe it because he knows that we share a number of views on some important Canadian subjects and I cannot believe that he thinks that it would be in bad taste. It would be in bad taste if I had not said, as I have said consistently, that there is nothing personal in this and that it is purely political and constitutional. However, in fairness to Senator Bolduc, I did word my comment about Senator Grimard in a somewhat personal way and I withdraw that. That would not be good taste if it had that spin on it because I want to maintain the point that I have made that there is nothing personal in this. It is political and constitutional, and I do not think it is in bad taste to raise those points.

Senator Lefebvre: Absolutely not!

Senator Frith: The point Senator Grimard was making is relevant to the point I was in the course of making before there was this diversion, and the point he made, as I understand it, was that there was a distinction between the Beaudoin case and the Charbonneau case. Now, Senator MacEachen, I thought very clearly, explained how the foundation for embarking on the Beaudoin path was clearly established by Senator Kelly and Senator Ottenheimer. Both of the conditions to getting on the path that led to the self destruction of Speaker Beaudoin were clearly laid down by Senators Kelly and Ottenheimer. Then Senator Grimard said, "Ah, but there is a distinction." I was not listening to the translation; I was listening to him in French, and I am quite sure that what he said was that the distinction, in the case of Senator Charbonneau, was that the government asked him to do it, and that made all the difference in the world. Suddenly, it was okay. It was okay because the government asked him to do it.

Senator Stanbury: Told him! Ordered him!

Senator Frith: That is an interesting distinction.

Senator Simard: Members of the Senate asked him, not the government.

Senator Olson: The Leader.

Senator Frith: The majority in the Senate asked him to do it.

Senator Barootes: The government side in the Senate.

Senator Frith: Whatever way you want to put it, the government supporters asked him to do it.

Senator Stanbury: That makes it legitimate?

Senator Olson: So you're all corrupt!

Senator Frith: If the government supporters in the House of Commons in 1956 had asked Speaker Beaudoin to do it, it would have been fine! Well, history did not judge it that way, and history will not judge Senator Charbonneau's name that way either.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: So it is up to history now. We have a difference of opinion. I firmly believe that the names Charbonneau and Beaudoin will be linked in Canadian parliamentary history forever. I hope that they are never joined by another name.

Senator Simard: That's your opinion.

Senator Frith: Yes, that's my opinion, precisely. I will say it as often as you like. It is my opinion. It is not Senator Simard's opinion. I have already said that, and the MA students will be able to find out what Senator Simard's judgment was at the time, trying to predict history. Perhaps some thesis will be done and it will be entitled "The Simard Theory", and it will be about the one or two people who thought that what was done by a Speaker taking authority three times to do something he had no authority to do made him a hero. We will see.

Now, a couple of footnotes to history, and they concern Senator Murray. Senator Murray also considers Senator Charbonneau a hero for what he did. We, of course, consider him a villain. As I say, it is now up to history.

Senator Gigantès: An incompetent villain!

Senator Frith: A couple of names that will appear as footnotes to history will be Senator Murray, for thinking he is a hero, and Senator Flynn.

Senator Simard: And Frith!

Senator Frith: All of us, for that matter, but I think a larger footnote than any of us will be Senator Murray, for his role.

Senator Stanbury: As the lead corrupter.

Senator Frith: Senator Murray, who, of course, was the main engineer, because he was under all of the pressure from his cabinet colleagues to get this done, having promised for a period of months to do it by a fixed date.

Senator Olson: They will call him "the hit man".

Senator Frith: Perhaps Senator Murray might merit more than a footnote.

Senator Cools: He will get a chapter.

Senator Frith: Because anyone who writes this story for history will have to write how the Senate coped with the breach of law. If I may make another slight parenthetical comment here, I am using the word "law" because the rules of the Senate are made pursuant to sections 4 and 5 of the Parliament of Canada Act, in which the power is given to Parliament to pass rules which are given the force of law, specifically in section 5. Any exercise of those powers is given the force of law and is a part of the general public law of Canada and is to be taken judicial notice of without further proof. So, senator—

• (2020)

Senator Simard: When are you taking your show to Broadway?

Senator Frith: You may take it whenever you like.

Senator Barootes: Do you mind if we wait until we hear of the Frith memoirs when you retire?

Senator Frith: There's the poop scoop again—the little barking dog.

All right, back to Senator Murray. This is why I think Senator Murray will get a little more than a footnote. Let us remember that the vote has been recorded, the deed has been done, the positions have been taken. All of these things will be there for the history students forever. All of your names will be there as supporting this bill. History will decide on this. All of our names will be there as opposing it. But there is an added thing for Senator Murray—he will make a slightly bigger mark.

He will have a bigger footnote, because whatever was done must include the steps that the Senate took to deal with these corrupt seizers of power, and I am speaking of steps by way of a house order and provisional rules. We all know how those provisional rules came about. We know about the house order.

The purpose of the house order was to give the government a large package of important legislation, and it got every comma of it. The government had it all locked up. Then we turned to the provisional rules, which is our part. We know about their part—they got their part. And how did the provisional rules come about? I can give direct evidence on that, because they came about as a result of negotiations in my office among Senators Roblin, Murray, Frith and MacEachen. Senator Doody was not there. Senator Doody did not initial anything. This is Senator Murray I am talking about.

We negotiated, we talked, we conferred, we went through drafts. I had in here earlier a file so that I could see the initialled copies of the number of drafts we went through. We finally agreed.

[Senator Stanbury.]

Senator Barootes: Those drafts, were they Molson's or Labatt's?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Frith: Speaking of performances, there is a sharp wit, by George! You were just asking for entertainment, Senator Simard—there is your entertainer. There is the stand up, or sit down, comic.

Senator Barootes: There's the prophet from Perth!

Senator Hastings: Now, that's good!

Senator Frith: It's nice to have fun after dinner at 8:30 in the evening—

Senator MacEachen: That depends on what you had for dinner.

Senator Frith: I am enjoying it, but I must say that I would like to take this a little more seriously for the moment. I think it is very serious that the leadership agreed on a set of provisional rules. Those provisional rules were to last until prorogation. In direct breach of those rules, the two people who initialled them, the two leaders, Senator Murray and Roblin, then asked the Speaker to break those rules and to make an order in breach of them. Those were the rules that they had agreed upon, initialled, tabled, made a speech about—those were the rules they asked to be broken. They had agreed that the rules were perfectly accurate, that they represented entirely the agreement. They said: "Trust us. They will be put into the rules; they will be printed; they are now a part of the rule book." These are Senators Murray and Roblin talking. They said: "We agreed on them. They are part of the rules."

Then they wrote a letter to the Speaker saying: "Break those rules"—not just the rules of the Senate. "Don't just do something you have never had authority to do since 1867, but break a rule that we have just agreed upon." Would you not think that the Speaker would at least—and maybe he did—say: "Lowell"—

Senator MacEachen: Or Jacques.

Senator Frith: Or Jacques, yes. He would say to Jacques: "Is Lowell seriously asking me—I mean, haven't I done enough?—not only to take powers I do not have but, in the course of doing so, to break a rule you and we all agreed on just a few weeks ago? He is asking too much. I don't mind coming in to seize power that I don't have—I mean, I have got used to that." It is the first crime that hurts. After that, burglary or any other crime is a little easier. "But surely Lowell can't be serious in sending you to me, Jacques, asking me not only to seize powers that I do not have but also to do it by breaking a rule that Lowell just agreed to. Jacques, go back and tell him this is too much."

Do you think the Speaker might have done that? Do you think he might have done that?

Senator Molgat: At $1,500 a day?

Senator Frith: That is right, and just walking from the Speaker's to the government leader's is probably worth $75.80.

That is an interesting thing, because what they were really doing with Jacques Flynn was paying him, they tell me, $1,500 per day—and I do not begrudge him that—but what it all came down to, if you look at it, is that we have said consistently from the beginning that the only way they could get their way is to break the rules. We have been saying that since September.

Senator Simard: And you have been wrong since September!

Senator Frith: And indeed, that is what happened. So how come you need a high priced lawyer to come in at the taxpayers' expense and tell you the only way you can get your way is to break the law? They pay a lawyer $1,500 a day to tell you to break the law? You can do that yourself, for free. That must have been it, because that is what they did. They never did anything else but that.

But we will see. Perhaps Senator Charbonneau will stand up and say: "Yes, honourable senators, that is exactly what happened. I told Jacques to go back and tell Lowell, 'I will not go that far. After all, I am trying to protect Lowell. He is the one who initialled the rules and he is asking me to do something that means that he can never be trusted again when he initials an agreement.'"

At any rate, if Senator Charbonneau said to Jacques Flynn: "Go and tell Lowell to think again," Lowell sent word back through Jacques to Senator Charbonneau and said: "No, you think again. You do as you are told."

Senator Lucier: "You want your appointment, do it."

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I will take only a moment.

Yesterday I noticed that at the console was a faithful employee of the Senate who was abused. She was shouted at, she was bullied, and I think we all owe her an apology.

This Quebec woman who is a faithful employee of the Senate was abused yesterday!

I think we should ask for her forgiveness.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to await the arrival of the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there has to be a motion.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Senate adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 2:25 p.m.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, speaking to the motion, I want to put a statement on record.

Yesterday, when reaffirming that Bill C-62 had not been adopted by due process and, therefore, regardless of its substance, is a bad bill to which Royal Assent ought not to be given, I said that I hoped no judge of the Supreme Court would appear as the Governor General's Deputy to participate in Royal Assent. I regret that the letters refer to a Deputy of the Governor General. That is unsatisfactory for the reasons I mentioned yesterday.

It is also unsatisfactory because the Governor General ought not to grant Royal Assent to this so-called "bill," but should refer it for consideration pursuant to section 55 of the Constitution Act, which reads as follows:

● (1410)

> Where a Bill passed by the Houses of Parliament is presented to the Governor General for the Queen's Assent, he shall declare, according to his Discretion, but subject to the Provisions of this Act and to Her Majesty's Instructions, either that he assents thereto in the Queen's Name, or that he withholds the Queen's Assent, or that he reserves the Bill for the Signification of the Queen's Pleasure.

It would therefore be appropriate for the Senate to order that a message be sent to the Governor General's Secretary asking that the Governor General do not send a deputy to give Royal Assent but consider either withholding Royal Assent or reserving the bill for the signification of the Queen's pleasure. Given the manifest defects in the legislative process to this point, and until the motion of censure against Speaker Charbonneau has been dealt with by the Senate, an independent Governor General could not do otherwise.

If the Speaker refuses to send such a message to the Secretary to the Governor General, and the procedure set out in the motion is implemented, we on this side will not be participating in Royal Assent to a bill which we regard as invalid.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Well, honourable senators, I heard what the Honourable the Deputy Leader of the Opposition had to say about this matter yesterday, and particularly what he had to say about the role of the Deputy of the Governor General in this matter. I have, of course, taken counsel on the matter and I am assured by our legal advisors that Senator Frith's position is nonsence, constitutional and legal nonsense.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to advise the members of this chamber that I am a Privy Councillor. I was sworn into that office and took the oath on July 6, 1968. At that time I took oath and said that I would give advice to Her Majesty and Her Majesty's representatives on all seasonable occasions. So I can tell you that, whatever you do today in discouraging any representative of Her Majesty to give Royal Assent to this bill, if one comes in here, I am going to advise him, as I am duty-bound and obliged to do, that what he is being asked to give assent to is an illegal act.

Senator Cools: Absolutely.

Senator Olson: I am not going to ask him to permanently deny assent to this bill. I am going to ask him to temporarily withhold Royal Assent for this bill until the remedies that are already under way are completed—and there are several. First, the Ontario Court of Appeal has set aside two days next month for an appeal against two rulings confirming the validity of eight of the senators who voted for this bill. Those two days are January 21 and January 22. Secondly, there is a motion before this, the upper house of Canada's Parliament, to deal with the illegalities that have been perpetrated on this place by people who apparently have no respect for law and order, and I intend to advise the representative of Her Majesty that that is an action that is not yet completed either. Therefore, it would seem that we should at least ask the representative to withhold Royal Assent to this illegal action by this house until the remedies have had time to work. There will be quite a lot of that.

There is another thing. I tell you that I have been denied my right to speak on Bill C-62.

Senator Murray: Really!

Senator Olson: I spoke on Senator Kelly's motion only. If you want to get into an argument, we will keep this going the rest of the day. I am only going to be a couple of more minutes, but I will tell you that people of Alberta who expect me to carry their views into the upper House of the Parliament of Canada have been denied that right.

Let me point out for the record that the Leader of the Government in the Senate is sitting across the way making funny faces while I am discussing the rights of the citizens of Alberta.

Senator Comeau: There are elected representatives from Alberta.

Senator Olson: I was elected five times to the Parliament of Canada, and I have been in the Senate for some time since. I should also tell you that every single one of the members of this upper house of the Canadian Parliament from Northern Canada has been denied. You heard Senator Lucier tell you that. They are the people who will be more affected than any other citizen of this country, and they have been denied, every one of them. Senator Lucier, Senator Watt and Senator Adams were denied their right to speak on third reading of this bill, and yet it is going to create a profound change in their lives. It is unfortunate, but those are the facts.

The Ontario Court of Appeal can decide on this, as Senator Frith carefully pointed out last evening.

Senator Murray: The score is three zip against you in court battles.

Senator Olson: They have completely forgotten that what we are here for is to represent the views of the people of Canada. I don't know how you are going to respond to his, Mr. Speaker, but what is going on here is unprecedented. I am telling you that what I am going to do as a Privy Councillor is unprecedented too. Do you know why? It is unprecedented that the senior people across the way from the government have told us that when you have an unprecedented situation to deal with you have to take unprecedented action, and that is what we will have to do.

Mr. Speaker, you have an obligation to advise the Deputy of the Governor General, on behalf of this house, that what he is being asked to do today is illegal because the legislation was passed in an illegal way and therefore he should not give consent. If you don't, I am going to tell him myself when he comes in here.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the sneaky statement he made a few minutes ago when, on the authority of unnamed advisors, he said that what Senator Frith had said earlier was nonsense.

The leader is hiding behind unnamed advisors. Who are those unnamed advisors? Did they advise the Leader of the Government that section 55 of the Constitution Act, 1867 has been repealed , that it is one of those sections of the Constitution which are no longer operative? What is he telling us, other than using pejorative language? What did his statement mean?

• (1420)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the honourable senator knows that if he is seeking to have legal opinions provided by the—

Senator Stewart: By the advisors whom you mentioned.

Senator Murray: —advisors tabled in this house, that that is not done in this house or in any other house.

Senator Frith: That is what makes his sneaky position so available.

Senator Stewart: You are being sneaky.

Senator Frith: He will say anything he wants without any sense of responsibility at all.

Senator Stewart: No one would believe you on the basis of your own credibility.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators—

Senator Stollery: The access to information provisions should give us the figures.

Senator Olson: Who is telling us what to do with legislation? Tell us!

Senator Forrestall: He will tell you what to do.

Senator Frith: If he will tell us, we will listen.

Senator Stollery: Who let him in the door? He is not a senator. He doesn't meet the qualifications.

Senator Gigantès: He is sloppy and lowly. That is what he is.

Senator Forrestall: When they do things that are improper, I will advise them not to do it, okay?

Senator Gigantès: Is that your kind of foul language?

An Hon. Senator: Order! Order!

Senator Stollery: First you have to be qualified to sit there.

An Hon. Senator: Order!

Senator Gigantès: And sober!

Senator Murray: I just wanted to wait until these interesting remarks were recorded for posterity in Hansard.

Honourable senators, we had some advance notice of the opinion—if that is what it is—that was placed on the record today by Senator Frith. He gave us some advance notice yesterday, I think it was. As I indicated, I naturally took counsel on these matters, particularly as they affect the role of the Deputy to the Governor General. While I admit that the language the honourable senator finds pejorative is my own and, a quick summary of the advice on which we are acting is that what Senator Frith has put forward is constitutional and legal nonsense. That's all.

Senator Olson: No, it is not. No, it is not.

Senator Murray: Well, these are matters that he or they may wish to argue at another time in another place.

Senator Olson: The Senate is supposed to deal with these things?

Senator MacEachen: We are here now.

Senator Murray: If Senator Olson wishes to create a disturbance or otherwise make a spectacle of himself—

Senator Olson: I want to defend the rights of Parliament.

Senator Murray: —and other honourable senators want to do the same thing while Mr. Justice Sopinka is here acting as a Deputy—

Senator MacEachen: He is accustomed to a courtroom. He knows how to handle himself.

Senator Murray: —to His Excellency the Governor General, then, of course, there is not much I can do to stop them, but my duty now is—

Senator MacEachen: You might get the Speaker to suspend the session.

Senator Olson: You should let him know that we are not ready.

Senator MacEachen: Hasn't Jacques advised you what to do?

Senator Murray: My duty is to go and accompany the Hon. John Sopinka, Mr. Justice Sopinka, the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, into this chamber so that Royal Assent may take place.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Just a moment. The motion has not passed. There we go. There go the rules. Are you going to take off?

An Hon. Senator: The motion to adjourn has not been passed.

Senator Gigantès: What has Sopinka done to deserve you?

Senator Simard: You can leave at any time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I don't understand that the Governor General or the Deputy of the Governor General invades the Senate. They come here as a result of an invitation. The Senate receives them on the basis of a motion adopted by the Senate.

I understand that Senator Murray has now decided to use the word "nonsense" to describe the provisions of section 55 of the Constitution. I find it quite unbelievable—and I mean that not in its modern use but in its literal use, difficult to believe—that he took advice to that effect. Of course, we do not know who these grey people are who gave him the advice. But if they were from the Department of Justice, I will say that I know people in that department and I would be very surprised if any of them told him that anything based on section 55 of the Constitution is nonsense. I would be very surprised, indeed.

Of course, that was useful. It is always useful for members of the government, when confronted by any constitutional or legal point, to say: "You are wrong. I have been told you are wrong but I am not going to tell you either who told me you are wrong or why they said you are wrong." So it is a very cheap shot that Senator Murray has just taken.

Senator Simard: You would know all about cheap shots.

Senator Frith: We are not going to take cheap shots back at him. That is simply an obvious and cheap shot for him to take now.

Let us come back to discuss the Senate. The Senate now has a motion before it that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 2:25 p.m. That motion has not been passed. Let it be noted that Senator Murray has walked out, saying: "I have no choice." The Leader of the Government has arrogantly stated, "I have no choice but to go out and act as if the Senate had passed this motion."

Senator Olson: It has not passed it.

Senator Frith: It is too bad that he did not manage to get his colleagues together to sign a letter asking the Speaker to allow him to go and act generally as if a motion had been passed. That would be typical, now that we see how this government works in collusion with the Speaker.

Senator Barootes: Now, that really is nonsense, isn't it?

Senator Frith: But he did not think of that. Therefore, he just got up, walked out and said, "I am not going to bother to get the Speaker to rule on this. I have decided that I am going to behave as if a motion had been passed"—a motion that is still under debate and has not been passed.

Honourable senators, at least we find the same modus operandi, the same arrogance, the same stance: "I, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, decide what takes place in the Senate. It is no longer done on the basis of motions. It is done through votes, in the absence of the Opposition, if necessary. It is done any way I want it to be done, and I know for sure that the Speaker is not going to call me to order for doing it." So there he goes, turns his back on the Speaker, walks out with his nose in the air and says, "That is what I am going to do."

Meanwhile, he has no authority from the Senate to behave in that way. He may have the only authority he ever seems to think he needs, and that is his own pig-headed wilfulness.

Senator Cools: Absolutely!

Senator Olson: Nobody has any right to come in here past the bar without an invitation from the Senate, and we have not passed a motion giving an invitation to the Governor General or anybody else to come in here, and we are not going to for a while, to perpetuate an illegal act? The motion was to invite the Governor General's representative into this chamber and we are not inviting him.

Senator Barootes: And who but your dear friends invited the press, the media, the television, the NDP and Liberals in here on a Thursday night? You did, you did and you did, Senator Molgat. You marched them past the bar and had them standing here sneering with you.

Senator Hastings: Where's the valium? Give him a valium.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I came in here today thinking that we would have before us the regular order of business. I did not have any reason to suspect that we would be asked to forego the usual order of business. I guess the government does its thing then it sends everybody else on his or her way. I came in here with a petition in my hand. It is a petition that I have been asked to present by the Hon. Maurice A. Dionne, M.P. for the riding of Miramichi in New Brunswick. He asked me to present the petition because it is addressed to the Senate of Canada. It is signed by 34 people who "object to the new universal 7 per cent federal goods and services tax adopted by the Conservative government—

• (1430)

Senator Doody: Order! On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there is a motion—

Senator Corbin: —because it will create unjust and inhuman difficulties to Canadians. The implementation of this tax will constitute an unprecedented assault on the income of Canadians, not only by forcing them to pay higher taxes but also by confronting them with a rise in inflation, interest rates and unemployment." Four of the petitioners are called—

Senator Doody: On a point of order—

Senator Corbin: —Lawrie Murray, Ralph Murray—I have other Murrays here—Donald Murray and Wilma Murray, and the rest of the petitioners are from Lower Neguac and Tabusintac.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I would invite his Honour to put the motion.

Senator Frith: The debate is not finished.

Senator Doody: The honourable gentleman is reading a petition.

Senator Corbin: "This is the Canadians' last blast before this infamous bill goes through this house." I place this petition on the table. Canadians will be heard!

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I also have a petition with 300 names on it. I am not going to read it today—

Senator Doody: Presentation of petitions has not been called. This is another violation of the rules of this house. Senator Olson, you should know better.

[Senator Frith.]

The Hon. The Speaker: We have a motion on the floor. Why don't you listen to me, Senator Olson, instead of talking about petitions? We have a motion on the floor, let us discuss the motion.

Senator Olson: Close the bars so they don't get in here.

Senator MacEachen: May I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government, what is the purpose of the adjournment motion that is now before the Senate? Is it just to adjourn for a few minutes so that we will all be ready for when the representative of the Governor General comes in, or is this motion a motion that gives authority to permit any person to cross the bar? The point raised by Senator Olson requires some clarification. Is it possible for any person, including the distinguished Justice Sopinka, to enter the Senate floor and walk in without authority? I would like to have those points clarified before we proceed further.

Senator Doody: The message read from Government House is quite clear. The representative of the Governor General will be present at the time mentioned to give Royal Assent to various measures that have passed both Houses of parliament.

The adjournment that has been requested is simply to give time for The Honourable The Deputy of His Excellency and his party to arrive here in this chamber and to give the Royal Assent, as required by the Constitution.

Senator MacEachen: I do not think the Deputy Leader has answered my question. Is it his contention that the representative of the Governor General can burst in here at any time, even in the middle of a speech, and seek to give Royal Assent, or is there some concurrence required by members of the Senate? My question is, whether there is some consent required by the Senate, and if it is so then that is an important matter. If it is not so, why would it not be possible for the Secretary of the Governor General to advise that the representative was coming at a time that would be convenient to the Senate when we had completed the routine proceedings and when we had completed the regular business of the Senate? Why has 2.30 been selected? Has it been selected by His Excellency or by Mr. Justice Sopinka? Does the Senate have anything to say about it? I am asking all these questions because the situation is quite unprecedented.

Senator Doody: The custom in this place has been that the time is established by consultation in conversation among the government leader, the deputy leader of the opposition, and the deputy leader—

Senator Olson: The rest of us want to be involved now.

Senator Doody: —of the other place. I made an attempt this morning to contact Senator Frith. I left a message for him and he was obviously too busy with other things to return my call. I did not have an opportunity to discuss this matter with him, but the time-honoured tradition in this place has been that a time is set. The deputy is advised and invited, and the representative of the government arrives. The time is established in this place and the ceremony then takes place. That had been taking place long before I came here, I suspect, and certainly during the 11 years that I have been here. This is the first time, to my knowledge, that it has ever been questioned. The fact that there was no consultation is certainly not my fault.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, would Senator Doody consider inviting the Leader of the Government in the Senate to return to his seat so that he can deal with the question raised by Senator MacEachen? Clearly, this is a matter of great constitutional significance.

Senator Barootes: It is nonsense.

Senator Olson: It is not nonsense.

Senator Frith: The urologist suddenly knows all about the Constitution!

Senator Stollery: You made your mistake yesterday; now you will have to start living with it.

Senator Barootes: You would filibuster your own grandmother's funeral.

An Hon. Senator: That is a good idea.

Senator Steuart: We did that last week.

Senator Stewart: There is a serious constitutional question as to the relationship between the three parts of the Parliament.

Senator Barootes: Here we go. Another history lesson.

Senator Stewart: Senator MacEachen has asked a serious question, namely, who sets the time for Royal Assents? At whose convenience is the time appointed? I am sure that if Senator Murray were here, he would be able to tell us what those reliable advisers told him on these matters. Would Senator Doody ask the Leader of the Government, who is responsible for leading the government in this place, to return to this place and do his duty?

Senator Stollery: Honourable senators, I should like—

Senator Doody: The honourable senator knows precisely—may I answer my honourable friend?

Senator Stollery: Honourable senators, as—

Senator Doody: Is Senator Stollery interested in answers or in delay?

Senator Olson: He can speak once.

Senator Stollery: I am interested in having my point of view heard, something that I have been unable to do—

Senator Doody: Before I reply to your colleague?

Senator Stollery: —for the last several months.

Senator Doody: Well, speak to Senator Gigantès. He monopolized the time; it was not I. It was the honourable gentleman over there who took up 20-some hours with his mindless babble.

Senator Gigantès: There was lots of time left.

Senator Olson: Those are lame excuses.

Senator Doody: The Honourable Senator Stewart knows exactly what the procedure is in this place. He knows precisely how the standards have been set. He knows it far better than anyone else in this chamber. The idea of sending for the Leader of the Government to come here and to delay further and to make more noise is just another way of delaying the proceedings and trying to embarrass the Governor General and his representative.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, we have been told that the prevailing situation is quite unprecedented. It is in these unprecedented circumstances that these difficult questions arise. It is highly desirable that the Leader of the Government assume his responsibility and tell the Senate what has been discovered as to the correct constitutional conduct in this situation.

Senator Stollery: Honourable senators, I should like to bring to your attention the words of Arthur Meighen, a former Prime Minister of Canada, as quoted in the Dalhousie Review, Volume 33, in the spring of 1953:

> The sphere of discretion left to a Governor-General under our constitution and under our practice is a limited sphere indeed, but it is a sphere of dignity and great responsibility . . . residing in the Governor-General in the Dominions, there is a responsibility as great as falls to any estate of the realm or to any House of Parliament . . .

● (1440)

> Within the sphere of that discretion the plain duty of the Governor-General is not to weaken responsible government, not to undermine the rights of parliament, . . . it is to make sure that responsible government is maintained, that the rights of parliament are respected, that the still higher rights of the people are held sacred. It is his duty to make sure that parliament is not stifled by government, but that every government is held responsible to parliament, and every parliament held responsible to the people.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: The Deputy Leader of the Government suggested that he attempted to telephone the Deputy Leader of the Opposition to make a deal with him. He wanted to find out if Senator Frith would accept some rules as far as this afternoon was concerned, but Senator Frith could not be reached.

Yesterday, I heard very clearly the leader on this side of the house make a definite statement. He said that there would be no deals because the leadership on the other side of the house could not be trusted. Why, indeed, would they attempt to make a special arrangement or deal today on this very issue when, just a day ago, it was stated that the leadership on the other side could not be trusted to make any arrangement because they would not follow it through?

I am tired of being lied to, and I am tired of the deceitful actions of the other side. I do not see any reason why you would expect the leadership on this side to make a deal with you today.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I would like to answer the following question put by the Leader of the Opposition: Under whose authority may the Deputy Governor General enter this Chamber?

The Speaker has just read a message. He received a message from the Governor General that the Governor General's deputy will be here in a few minutes. The motion to adjourn is simply a request that this Chamber suspend its proceedings until such time as His Excellency's deputy arrives.

Senator Frith: Who decides?

Senator Beaudoin: The Canadian government advises the Governor General that a bill is ready for royal assent. You referred to Section 55. I have it right here. I also have a quote from a great constitutional expert, Maurice Olivier, who says on page 79 of his book: "Actes de l'Amérique du Nord Britannique et Statuts connexes 1867-1962", and I quote note 27 at the bottom of the page:

> It would be against constitutional practice for Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom to advise Her Canadian Majesty against the views of the government of the Dominion."

This constitutional practice was established in 1929-30.

Senator Frith: That is not the point. Is it up to the Senate to decide, by means of a motion, how it wants to run its business? You say it is up to the government to decide.

Senator Beaudoin: You know perfectly well, Senator Frith, that the Crown may enter only one of our two Chambers: the Senate.

Senator Frith: As a result of our decision.

Senator Beaudoin: No, you know perfectly well that when a bill is adopted on third reading in both Chambers, the Canadian government decides when royal assent is to take place.

You know perfectly well that when a message comes from the Governor General, announcing that he or his deputy will be here at such and such a time, all we can do is adjourn our proceedings until the Crown's deputy arrives.

● (1450)

[English]

Senator Olson: No.

[Translation]

Senator Beaudoin: Let me finish, Senator Olson, I have the same rights you do in this Chamber.

[English]

I have the same rights that you have.

Senator Olson: Tell that to Senator Barootes! He interrupts me every time I speak!

[Translation]

Senator Beaudoin: We too have the right to speak. I would like to answer the Leader of the Opposition. He asks under what authority the deputy of the Governor General can come here today. It is a message of the Governor General. The Governor General is part of the executive branch and of the Canadian government.

[Senator Sparrow.]

Senator Frith: So are we.

Senator Beaudoin: The Governor General represents the Queen of Canada. Section 55, which concerns the royal sanction of bills, was the object of a constitutional convention in 1929-30 which states that Her Majesty the Queen of England should no longer intervene in Canadian affairs. I believe this section should be applied to the present situation.

As for the Leader of the Opposition's question, the adjournment does not pertain to the right of this House to authorize the Governor General to come here, when notice has been given, it pertains only to the suspension of proceedings until the arrival of the Supreme Court judge.

[English]

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Beaudoin. I did not hear exactly what Senator Beaudoin said but I believe he said that there was a constitutional—

Senator Beaudoin: How can you believe if you did not hear?

Senator Stewart: I am asking for clarification.

Senator Gigantès: He is checking with you, like a good student.

Senator Stewart: I am asking for clarification, great sir. If I recall correctly, the honourable senator said that a conference was held in 1929 applying the principles of the Imperial Conference of 1926 and that as a result of that conference, it was agreed that the Queen would not intervene in Canadian affairs. My question is: Does that apply in the case of Section 26? If not, why not?

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I want to continue my questioning of the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. I appreciate what Senator Beaudoin has said, but he is not able to speak for the government in this house. The person now authorized to do that is Senator Doody. I understand Senator Doody to have said that it has been the custom, when Royal Assent is to be arranged, to consult with both sides of the house to arrange the time for the Royal Assent to take place. That I understand. It is simply a matter of convenience for all concerned, so that everyone will know when the ceremony is to take place.

However, there is a more fundamental question that is quite apart from the convenience. Is it right, without the consent of the Senate, for the representative of the Governor General to walk in and say, as of right, "I am here to give Royal Assent to bills", and that we would then have to acquiesce and have no authority to say yes or no: Is that the case, or do we have something to say about the matter? I do not know the answer but I want to know the answer.

Senator Hatfield: Do you expect us to believe that?

Senator MacEachen: I do not know the answer.

Senator Hatfield: You don't know the answer!

Senator Frith: And you have been here for so long that you probably do!

Senator MacEachen: Presumably Senator Doody is contemplating.

Senator Doody: I am waiting to rise.

Senator MacEachen: I do not know whether Senator Beaudoin has moved over to tell the government what I should have known but do not know, and they do not know.

Senator Frith: Senator Hatfield knows; ask him!

Senator MacEachen: Senator Hatfield knows, but I would like the representative of the government to tell me whether it is the right of the Governor General to knock on the door, walk in and say, "I want to give Royal Assent to bills", without any consent from the Senate. That is all I want to know, yes or no.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my understanding of the situation is that this is the Queen's chamber. We are called here by the Queen, and I feel that we cannot at any time deny the Queen's representative the right to come and inform us of various activities. We are called here by the Queen to advise the Queen, and if the Queen sends the Governor General or his representative to our chamber, we have no course of action but to admit him.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if that is the tradition, it would be interesting to know how the parallel tradition of putting the motion grew up. As long as I have been here, and as far as I know forever, Royal Assent was always done by motion. If we have no right to do anything but admit the Queen's representative, who represents one-third of the Parliament of Canada, if we have no independence in the matter at all, I wonder how the custom grew up of having a motion. Both assertions cannot be true. We do not need a motion if we have no choice in the matter, as Senator Doody has said.

Senator Doody: Is it the intention of the Opposition to deny the Governor General's representative access to the chamber? The government has set the time for the Royal Assent and has asked the representative of the Governor General to be here. I attempted to inform my honourable friend opposite. I was not trying to make a deal, as Senator Sparrow has suggested. It is a courtesy and a matter of convenience, as Senator MacEachen has said, and I will continue to attempt to inform honourable senators opposite in the future.

In the meantime, the representative of His Excellency is waiting to come in and perform the service which he is expected to perform in this chamber. If it is the intention of honourable senators opposite to deny him that right and refuse admission to the Governor General's representative, then they should say so. There is a motion before the chamber and I suggest that we put that motion.

Senator Olson: So you are stopping debate again by decree!

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I appreciate the answer given by Senator Doody. It is the view of the government that the representative of His Excellency has an unqualified right to enter the Senate chamber and to give Royal Assent, even though everybody in the Senate chamber may not want to receive that representative. It is an unqualified right, and that is the view that is taken. I shall not contest that view. I simply wanted to get the view of the government. In that event, this motion does not do anything except adjourn the Senate. Why adjourn the Senate? We are here. Let him come in.

• (1500)

Senator Doody: Is it the wish of honourable senators opposite that the Deputy of the Governor General now come in?

Senator MacEachen: I have no wish one way or the other.

Senator Doody: Make up your mind.

Senator MacEachen: I am saying that, if it is his right he can decided whether or not to come in, but we do not have to adjourn the Senate and reassemble. We are here.

Senator Doody: This is the custom that has been followed in this place for a long time. I would refer honourable senators to page 69 of the Rules of the Senate which honourable senators admire from time to time when it is convenient. There it is set out very clearly. Please let us stop the nonsense and let the representative of the Governor General come in.

Senator MacEachen: Would you please read the rule to us so that we will understand?

Senator Doody: It says:

> Generally, the Administrative Secretary to His Excellency informs the Speaker of the Senate that the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General will proceed to the Senate Chamber—-

It does not say that he "may" proceed or "upon invitation" will proceed. It says:

> ". . . the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General will proceed to the Senate Chamber at a certain time and date for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills or proroging Parliament, or both."

It goes on to say:

> After His Excellency the Governor General, or his Deputy, is seated on the Throne, the members of the House of Commons are summoned.

It is quite clear that the Governor General or his representative will come to the Senate when the message is sent.

Senator MacEachen: All right. The Senate is in session when he comes. We are in session now, so let him come. Why adjourn? We are ready to receive him.

Senator Doody: I do not see any problem. If that is the only problem, then we will send for him now.

Senator Stewart: I have one more question of Senator Doody.

The words of section 55 of the Constitution Act were read earlier as follows:

> Where a Bill passed by the Houses of the Parliament is presented to the Governor General for the Queen's Assent, he shall declare, according to his Discretion, but subject to the Provisions of this Act and to Her Majesty's Instructions, either that he assents thereto in the Queen's Name, or that he withholds the Queen's Assent, or that he reserves the Bill for the Signification of the Queen's Pleasure.

Presumably the decision of the Governor General to give assent to a bill is made either on his own discretion or by advice. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate or his deputy inform the Senate whether or not an instrument of advice has passed the Cabinet advising the Governor General to give assent to Bill C-62?

Senator Doody: I can only assume that it has, Senator.

We can keep up this charade all afternoon. If that is what you want, say so. We can tell the man to go home. Stop jerking around the Constitution of Canada, the people of Canada and the Government of Canada.

I know that you find this very amusing and entertaining because you think you are embarrassing the government. What you are embarrassing is the institution of the government, the Parliament of Canada and the people of Canada, and we will not put up with it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: I do not find this amusing at all. I think we have clarified the position. We now understand that the government says the Senate must at all times accept the representative of the Governor General or the Governor General whenever they arrive, and that there is no role for the Senate in that at all. I find that hard to agree with, but there it is. We understand the position. The government is running this show.

The Hon. the Speaker: Gentlemen Usher of the Black Rod, will you please go and fetch the Deputy of the Governor General.

Senator Olson: I want to say one thing. All we have to substantiate this procedure is the word of one Deputy Leader of the Government.

Some Hon. Senators: Sit down!

Senator Olson: Is the Senate not to have anything to say about this? The Deputy Leader says that he can come now, but I think we need to refer to the rule book.

Senator Doody: The case is already closed.

Senator Olson: We want the mace back here. The Senate is in session.

Senator Doody: Make up your mind.

Senator Olson: There is a motion to adjourn.

Senator Frith: Did you not say that you do not need the motion?

Senator Doody: I do not care.

[Senator Stewart.]

Senator Olson: Put the mace back on the table.

Senator Sparrow: There is a motion to adjourn and we do not have the mace on the table. What did we do with the motion to adjourn?

The Hon. the Speaker: Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, you will proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that house that it is the desire of the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General that they attend immediately in the Senate Chamber.

The Senate having been informed that the House of Commons had adjourned, the Honourable the Deputy of his Excellency the Governor General retired.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a few more petitions objecting to the passage of Bill C-62. I do not intend to read the names, although they come from that part of Canada where their representatives have had no opportunity to express their views in this chamber because of the illegal actions that have been taking place here for the past few weeks and days. In any event, I do not intend to go on and on. I have three petitions with 27 names on each, and one with 23 names. The petitioners pray and call upon the government to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present 299 signed petitions of Canadians who oppose the GST, all residents of the Province of Ontario.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have here a series of petitions which were sent to me by Mr. Robert Nault, the MP for Kenora-Rainy River. They are mainly from his constituency. They are from various towns such as Pikangikum, North Spirit Lake, Dryden, Sioux Lookout, Kenora, Pickle Lake and Atikokan. I will not read all the names but I would like to table these on behalf of the residents of that region. There are some 450 names on this list.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. A point of order must me raised at the first opportunity.

Earlier this day Senator Beaudoin told us that the Parliament of Canada could be made up of the Governor General, the Senate, and the House of Commons. I have his treatise on the Constitution of Canada published in the blue collection of the University of Ottawa civil law branch of the law faculty.

On page 94, in the chapter entitled «The Composition of the Parliament of Canada», it reads as follows:

> . . . consisting of the Queen, an Upper House styled the Senate, and the House of Commons, according to section 17 of the Constitutional Act of 1867.

Honourable senators, I raised this point on an earlier occasion and sought the reference in the Debates of the Senate but, the index not being available, I could not find that reference. At one time I rose in the Senate to say that the Parliament of Canada is made up of the Governor General, the Senate, and the House of Commons. I was contradicted by Senator Roblin who argued that Parliament consists of the Queen herself, not the Queen of Canada or the Governor General, but Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, the Senate, and the House of Commons.

I think it is important to set the record straight, in accordance with Senator Roblin's teachings.

Senator Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I would simply say to Senator Corbin that quite obviously Parliament is made up of three elements—the Commons, the Senate, and the Queen. All I said was that the Queen of Canada is represented here by the Governor General of Canada.

Of course the Governor General of Canada represents the Queen of Canada who happens to be a member of the Canadian Parliament. That is all I said.

We are not going to start arguing about something like that now, are we!

Senator Corbin: That is what I was about to suggest, Senator Beaudoin. On this point of order or question of privilege, I would urge you to talk it over with your colleague Senator Roblin. If ever you should agree, tell me what your conclusion is. Thank you, honourable senators.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Thomas H. Lefebvre: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition, signed by 61 residents of the Lac Saint-Jean area, who call on the Senate to defeat the bill on the goods and services tax.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present another petition, signed by 35 residents of the Beauce area, in Quebec, who call on the Senate to defeat the bill on the goods and services tax.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a third petition, this one signed by 60 residents of Saint-André, Quebec, who call on the Senate to defeat the bill on the goods and services tax.

Honourable senators, I have a fourth petition to present, this one signed par 100 residents of St-Eugène, Quebec, who call on the Senate to defeat the bill on the goods and services tax.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present yet another petition, signed by 60 residents of Ste-Monique, Quebec, who call on the Senate to defeat the bill on the goods and services tax.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present another petition, signed by 48 residents of the de Nantes area, in Quebec, who call on the Senate to defeat the bill on the goods and services tax.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present another petition, signed by 180 residents of Girardville, Quebec, who call on the Senate to defeat the bill on the goods and services tax.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SEVENTY-FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the seventy-first report of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

I discussed this matter with Senator Doody earlier, and it was agreed that this matter should go forward today because the first item affects all personnel of the Senate who are not members of bargaining units. I think this will be good news for them before Christmas.

Friday, December 14, 1990

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

SEVENTY-FIRST REPORT

Your Committee recommends:

1. Salary Adjustment—Unrepresented Employees; that the pay scale of unrepresented employees be increased by 1.3% retroactive to April 1, 1990 and a further increase of 5.4% effective April 1, 1991.

2. Newspaper and Periodical Subscriptions: That further to the policy on newspaper and periodical subscriptions adopted by the Senate on September 30, 1988, it be amended so that any subscriptions taken out by a Senator will be reimbursed upon receipt of the voucher.

3. Reorganization of the Senate Debates Branch: That the Senate Debates Branch be reorganized so as to include the implementation of the computer-assisted transcription (CAT System).

Respectfully submitted,

ROMÉO LEBLANC
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator LeBlanc, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

NATIONAL FINANCE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO UNDERTAKE STUDY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Monday next, December 17, 1990, I will move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1991, (Sessional Paper No. 342-913).

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to make some comments on this, and—

Senator Doody: I am only giving notice. This will not be moved until Monday. There has to be a day's notice. I am not asking for leave.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Doody could advise whether or not the Leader of the Government will be returning so that we can ask him questions.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question with any accuracy. I will take as notice any questions honourable senators might have in the absence of the leader. Whether the leader intends returning for Question Period or not, I am not in a position to say at this moment.

AGRICULTURE

GATT NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: In that case, I should like the deputy leader to take as notice a question I have respecting the GATT discussions, and particularly the effect of those discussions on western Canadian agriculture. Possibly the deputy leader could ask for a statement in that regard.

I am sure the deputy leader is aware that this is of great consequence to our regions.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will make an inquiry on behalf of the honourable senator.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin moved that Bill C-92, an Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act, be read the second time.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is clear. Its adoption would demonstrate that Parliament agrees to an amendment which the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories adopted recenty to extend the delay provided under the Official Languages Act for the translation and bilingual printing and publishing of its territorial laws. Under this legislation, all acts which the Territories may have adopted before January 1, 1990, which are not printed and published in both French and English by December 31, 1990, would be null and void. Unable to meet this deadline, the Northwest Territories have amended their linguistic legislation by extending the deadline until April 1, 1992. In order for this amendment to take effect, however, Section 45.1 of the Northwest Territories requires the concurrence of the Canadian Parliament. Such is the principle of Bill C-92.

Since January 1, 1990, the government of the Territories have introduced and adopted both in French and English all its new legislation. Consequently, the legislative process has been bilingual for nearly a year. Moreover, under the new provisions adopted in April 1990, the Commissioner in Council may translate all legislation in one of the six native languages now recognized as official in the Territories.

The problem the government of the Territories is now faced with is not the adoption of new legislation, but rather the translation, printing and publishing of previously adopted legislation. These pieces of legislation have now reached the stage of final review, but their updating in both languages cannot be carried out as long as their printing is not completed and their implementing regulations are not revised in such a way as to make them consistent with the new numbering and other changes. Because of the extent of these technical changes, the Territories would be unable to meet the deadline of January 1, 1990. Experts in the Secretary of State Translation Bureau, who have provided assistance to the Territories, have confirmed that the problems are real and pressing. Thanks to this fifteen-months extension, the Territories will be able to make sure that their previously adopted legislation are printed and published both in French and in English in due time.

Honourable senators, I wish to emphasize that nothing in this amendment to the Northwest Territories Act nor in the Parliament's concurrence will affect the implementation as of January 1, 1991, of the provisions of the Territories Official Languages Act to serve the public both in French and in English. Members of the public will be able to communicate with the Territories government and legislative institutions and receive services in their own language, from the head office of these institutons which will have to meet a significant demand in this language or when the vocation of the office will justify that communications and services are provides in both these languages. Services to the public will also be available in the official native languages effective January 1, 1993.

Honourable senators, perhaps I may recall that the Northwest Territories passed their Official Languages Act in 1984 and that services in French were funded by the federal government under an agreement signed that same year with the territorial government. Furthermore, nearly $16 million went to the Northwest Territories under an agreement for the preservation and enhancement of aboriginal languages. The secretary of State and the Northwest Territories Minister of Culture and Communications recently announced that an agreement had been reached on funding for French services for the current financial year.

Federal and territorial officials are now considering the possibility of signing a multi-year agreement on funding for French and aboriginal languages. The territorial government has made a commitment to comply with its linguistic obligations under its Official Languages Act. The Northwest Territories Minister of Culture and Communications, who is responsible for this legislation, and the Northwest Territories Minister of Justice, who was responsible for drafting the amendment, have both given firm assurances to that effect.

Bill C-92 will support the Northwest Territories in their efforts to protect the validity of their laws, until such time as all their laws have been printed and published in French and English. This bill illustrates the on-going co-operation between Parliament and the federal government to ensure that services will be available in French and in English, on the agreed date. This bill will also pave the way for future co-operation with the territories and the provinces to encourage greater recognition for and the availability to the public of, services in French and in English, in areas where official language minorities are alive and well. Bill C-92 is a satisfactory response to the need for the territories to meet their obligations without compromising the primacy of law and without challenging the corpus of territorial legislation.

This is an exceptional measure, limited both in scope and duration, which allows for the constraints of translating and printing statutes, without abrogating the principle of access to laws in French and in English and the requirement that services shall be available in both languages by early next year.

Honourable senators, I ask that Bill C-92 be read a second time and I recommend its speedy passage by this House.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

BANK ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes moved the second reading of Bill C-90, to amend the Bank Act (extension).

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before us is here because it has been the object of a rapid approval process in the other place. Tabled on October 25, in less than a few weeks it has made its way to the Senate for our consideration. I am pleased with the parliamentary professionalism and cooperation that has been displayed thus far, and venture to express my belief that this chamber will perform in an equal or superior manner.

Bill C-90, An Act to Extend the Bank Act, is a straightforward bill that seeks extension without substantive modification of the present Bank Act. As senators know, the Bank Act expires on March 31, 1991. Bill C-90 would extend that existing act to April 1, 1992. This extension will allow the government the time to get on with the reform of financial institutions legislation, including a revised Bank Act, as was announced last September 27.

The government has spent considerable time consulting on its proposals with the financial institutions and their associations. It has integrated these views with its continuing analysis of the needs of an evolving and dynamic market, both nationally and internationally. The process has led to a firm, pragmatic policy decision that has now been put forward in Parliament.

The exercise in re-regulation represents a balancing of individual, national, international, federal-provincial, commercial and prudential concerns that will, as a package, serve the public interest well and permit our financial institutions to get on with the job.

Cooperation between federal and provincial authorities is the most responsible way to ensure the stability and growth of our national and regional financial institutions. This would reduce the possibility of regulatory and supervisory duplication. The goal of consulting is to avoid, in practical terms and to the degree possible, the multiple regulations of federal and other institutions operating in several jurisdictions. This approach could be designed to have institutions regulated as much as possible by their jurisdiction of incorporation.

The reformation of the financial institutions legislation is complex and requires extra time to complete. Therefore, honourable senators, we are asking for this extra year of extension of the Bank Act in order to bring this new legislation into readiness.

Honourable senators, this is a very routine and innocuous bill, but if it is the wish of the Senate to follow recent custom, we would be prepared to refer it to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have been involved in extensions to the Bank Act several times. As the Honourable Senator Barootes knows, there is a requirement that this bill come back before Parliament every ten years, I believe. If it is not either extended or revised at that time with a new ten-year date put on it, then of course the banks no longer have a charter or the right to operate. We certainly do not want to hold this bill up for that reason.

I have to say this, though, that we need to have a somewhat better idea of what the government has in mind for the revision of the Bank Act than we have had to date. I know that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has had this proposition respecting financial institutions before it for some time. I do not want to go into all of the details, because they are large and complex. But I will say this, that the Bank of Canada is not involved in this particular bill, but there is, of course, a liaison between that bank and the chartered banks.

One such connection is that the Bank of Canada sets the so-called bank rate every week. The chartered banks are then expected to adjust their interest rates accordingly. Recently they have not been doing that in quite the same way as they did in the past.

The central Bank of Canada would set the rate up by a certain amount and the banks would usually follow within a day or two. That was always done on a Thursday, but by at least the following Monday, the chartered banks would usually have followed by making a rate change either up or down in accordance with the change in the rate of the Bank of Canada.

It is interesting to note that some of the changes that took place on the way up simply were not followed by the chartered banks. The reason for that is very simple. They could not lend money to Canadians at those ridiculous rates. Senators must understand that these banks are not obliged to move their prime rates and other rates up or down along with changes to the bank rate made by the Bank of Canada. As I said, however, the tradition has been that they usually do. A number of them, particularly some institutions which might be called near banks—organizations like Canada Trust, for example—were lending money to Canadians below the prime rate. This occurred many times in 1988 and 1989, and at various other times, which was unusual. Usually prime is the lowest rate that can be obtained even by the preferred customers.

What we need to examine, therefore, is whether or not the banking institutions, the chartered banks, which are involved here, are really performing for the benefit of the Canadian people as well as they ought to. I suggest that the people from the part of Canada that I represent believe there is a very serious problem right now. They are being bled white by interest rates and debt service charges. You get to the point where you wonder whether we need some new rules in the Bank Act, or perhaps a different attitude in administering the Bank Act. It is an enormous privilege or right that is granted by statutory authority for these people to be in the banking business. Unfortunately, Alberta has had some very bad cases in which banks were chartered and the rules regarding financial administration and security of loans were unsatisfactory. When there was a drop in the economy generally, but particularly in real estate values, those banks went broke. However, I do not want to relive that history now. I understand that Senator Barootes is to be the pilot of Bill C-90, which is an extension of the bank charters for one year beyond when they would otherwise expire. I am not sure of the date, but I believe it is in March sometime.

I would like to have a clear understanding of the new rules, and what the new attitude will be when dealing with Canadians in the future. It is tragically sad to see people caught in debt service charges because of the way the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks have been acting in the last few years. Many people will say that they should not have borrowed so much money, and that we have to slow down the economy. The economy cannot be slowed down much more in the farming sector than to reduce the gross price of their product by 50 per cent. In fact, it is more than that.

For example, in 1975 wheat was worth between $5 and $6 a bushel at the farm gate. Depending on quality and grade, it could be as high as $6.50 a bushel. Today, the price is $3 or less. In 1975 dollars, it was between $5 and $6 and in 1990 dollars, it is down to a little more than 50 per cent of what it was then. Because of the change in the value of the Canadian dollar, the costs of production for farmers and everyone else has gone up by approximately 300 per cent in that same period.

Therefore, Senator Barootes, I hope that you will come before this chamber and be prepared to tell us in advance what you are going to do. I do not intend to oppose the extra year needed to rewrite the Bank Act. However, I would ask you to explain without using a lot of financial gobbledegook that no one but financiers understand, and to express the government's intentions in the type of language that the people in this country understand. These are the people who are being driven off their farms and out of their businesses because of debt service charges that are way beyond reason. That is what I would like you to bring before us.

A number of times in the banking committee, I have asked why matters have been handled in this fashion and I have never received a satisfactory answer from John Crow, the Governor of the Bank. The only answer he gives is that we are attempting to reduce inflation to zero. I do not claim to be a great economist, but I have been around and watched the economy for long enough to know that, if reducing inflation to zero requires the distress that we have witnessed in the farm community during the past four or five years, it ain't worth it. It is a disaster for the grain farmers in western Canada particularly, but also for farmers in other parts of Canada. For example, in Ontario and in the Maritimes, the farm sector is having a very difficult time.

Today, I was hoping that we might have an opportunity to ask the minister a few questions about what will happen now that the GAT negotiations have collapsed. That is the talk in every village and every coffee shop. In western Canada, a publicity campaign has been going on that, "We are going to fix this after the Uruguay Round is negotiated." Everything was dependent on what happened to those negotiations that collapsed in Brussels last week. Now they have no hope at all.

The Minister of Agriculture returned to Canada and said that the government would provide a few dollars, something like 1.2 billion. Is that all? There is also supposed to be a safety net for which we have never seen details. Every time they bring it up, we have another conference to talk about it some more. There is some kind of a "growing together" plan. That is not good enough any more.

The reason I am making this speech here and now is because debt service charges are the killer, make no mistake about that. There are many other farmers and small business people who are also in difficulty, as well as those who were not prudent enough in their financial affairs to have paid off their debts as far as possible prior to the collapse.

It was in 1984 and 1985 that the collapse of international prices first occurred. There was also a drought. I cannot blame senators opposite for the drought, although it seems as though every time the Tories get in, we have a drought. It happened in the 1930s when the Tories got in for five years and it took the country a long time to get over that. However, I did not come here today to try and blame that on senators opposite. I just want you to understand that every week there are dozens of people who are driven off their farms. The federal government has always assumed some responsibility to assist in that situation, and at the moment we do not know what that assistance is.

Senator Barootes will also know that the drought is not over. There were some areas that had a good crop. There is a tear-drop shaped area about 150 miles into Alberta around Empress or Medicine Hat which extends a long way into Saskatchewan where there was no crop this year for the seventh year in succession. That is unprecedented. That means that the federal government should get on with the job of finding some unprecedented solutions to that kind of problem.

Surely this government does not intend to let that whole area of Canada go to waste. It would be sad if you did not come forward with some solution. It is not something we have to have a few more meetings about. Of course we have to do it intelligently, but why, in the name of common sense, do we have to wait month after month for an announcement to be made?

I do not want to be partisan because this matter is so important, but when there was a problem in 1985 and 1986 the government took some of the programs that were already on the books and, I admit, added some money to them. However, as soon as that money was exhausted, we did not hear any more about it. Now we no longer hear a thing about the Western Grain Stabilization Fund. The Crop Insurance program has been changed so that it is prohibitive for farmers to participate.

It is unfortunate what this government are doing, but you can change. If you do not know what is going on and do not have people here who have the guts to stand up and describe the hardships that are going on out there, then surely you should go and find out. This is the plea I am making today. I hope Senator Barootes will understand that we will be spending a lot of time on this issue until a solution is arrived at, because what appears to be the government's response to this disaster that is taking place, both in international grain markets and because of the drought, is completely inadequate to deal with the situation.

The government has said that something like $39 billion goes every year for interest charges, and that is correct. The phoney bookkeeping the government started to do in relation to separating the debt service charges from program spending is not acceptable to anyone. In any event, the government can make all the excuses it likes. The people are still suffering and they expect the federal government to participate actively and soon in some relief measures that will give those people some relief.

This sort of situation has happened before. It happened in 1935, and the people kicked the government out and elected a new one which did not solve everything overnight, but at least it tried. In my province a new Social Credit government was elected, which was such a good government that it lasted for 36 years. One of the first things that they did was to declare a moratorium on debt against a farmer's home, so that banks no longer could come along and run people off their land. I hope you do that now. Some of that legislation is still on the books of the provinces, but the federal government is not providing the leadership that is necessary.

Honourable senators, I have been around a bit. I was Minister of Agriculture for a few years and I was Minister of Economic Development when a lot of other things occurred. As a minister, there are some things that you cannot do, but you have to get into a thinking mode where you are more concerned about the poor and the small people who are hurting and not so concerned about what is occurring within the banks and on Bay Street. I am sure that Senator Barootes will do that. I do not know him that well, but I know him as a senator in this place. I know that he has some sympathy. All I am doing today is giving some background on what we need to do if we are to perform our responsibilities as the representatives of the Canadian people in this chamber.

We will have to continue this discussion at another time. Therefore, I should now like to adjourn the debate.

On motion of Senator Olson, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will shortly be asking for all remaining orders to stand, if no one has any objections to that. But before I do that, I would like to discuss briefly the coming business in the Senate for the next several weeks.

As honourable senators nostalgically remember, we used to have a substantial break at Christmas time. We would like to see that happen again this year, particularly concerning the workload that all of us on both sides have experienced over the past few months. But there is quite a backlog of legislation that we should like to deal with before we finalize our sitting before Christmas.

First, I would like to propose that the Supplementary Estimates B, which I gave notice of motion on today, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance so that they could report it back some time next week. That will enable the Senate to dispose of Bill C-94, the appropriations bill, before the end of the week. That is the supplementary supply bill, and I am told that it will be needed before the middle of January. That is the absolutely outside date, as they would like to have it before Christmas. I suppose that we would, too, because if the bill were passed before Christmas, we would not have to come back early in January to deal with it.

In addition, the House of Commons has recently sent us a number of bills, on some of which we started second reading today; others we started second reading on Tuesday. There are quite a few bills that await second reading and reference to committee. It would be my hope that we could have these bills referred to the various Senate committees by the end of next week.

To ensure that committees have sufficient time to consider these bills, I propose that when the Senate rises, that it not sit again until Monday, January 21, 1991. That would allow the committees time to work on some of these bills before the entire chamber returns.

The proviso under which these arrangements of a return date of January 21 would be made would be that the legislation that was before these committees be reported back to the Senate on or around January 21, 1991. I hope that the Senate will then give second reading to the bills that are now before it, and that we will then be able to dispose of all stages of three bills before we rise on Friday, December 21. That would involve Bills C-92, C-94 and C-90, namely, the Northwest Territories language translation bill that was introduced here today; the bank extension bill, which was introduced here today; and the appropriations bill which will be introduced on Tuesday.

If these arrangements, or something reasonably close to these arrangements, are acceptable to the Senate—I almost said "worked out"; that sounds like I am dealing and I am not allowed to deal—then the Senate will not have to return earlier. However, if the Senate cannot set some sort of arrangement as I have just described, we will have to return on January 3 to deal with the unfinished business. I am not asking for any decision of the Senate now. I am simply putting that before senators as a proposition for them to consider.

Having said that, I ask that all remaining orders, inquiries and motions stand.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this is quite a legislative mouthful.

Senator Doody: Yes.

Senator MacEachen: We would have to examine a number of these items before we could reach any conclusions. The Leader of the Government should be forewarned that it will be difficult for us to give any commitment to pass the supply bill in all its stages by the end of next week. That, on the surface, appears to be impossible. But we will take another look at it.

Senator Doody: Thank you. Honourable senators, I ask that all remaining orders, inquiries and motions stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, December 17, 1990, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, December 17, 1990

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before Presentation of Petitions, I want to make a short statement on a matter of privilege. I understand that the Leader of the Government in the Senate has a very low opinion of my competence in constitutional law.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I was not expressing a personal opinion at all, definitely not.

Senator Frith: It was not a personal opinion, then, to call me an ignoramus; it was an impersonal opinion. Be that as it may, I prefer not to deal with it at all, but I do not want to leave the record that way. He is certainly entitled to his opinion.

I studied constitutional law with the late Bora Laskin. I am glad to say that neither in my marks nor in any of my discussions with him did he ever call me an ignoramus on the subject. I discussed constitutional law with him over the years and he never made any such suggestion. I argued cases before him in the Supreme Court of Canada and he never questioned my competence on the subject of constitutional law.

I just wanted to put that on the record and say that I am very grateful that, if I have to choose the person who thinks I am an ignoramus on matters of constitutional law, it is not Professor and eventually Chief Justice of Canada, Bora Laskin, but rather it is someone who, I suppose, thinks he is a competing authority on constitutional law, the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Stanbury: An authority on everything! A tin pot dictator!

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS RELATING TO BILL C-62

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a number of petitions relating to Bill C-62, which is not yet a law!

I will present them as a whole. There are 38,355 altogether. I have here, for instance, 322 petitions from Saskatchewan. Allow me to read only the note at the top of the petition:

[English]

> The undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

[Translation]

As I was saying, there are 322 from Saskatchewan and another 9,042 from Alberta.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: They all say the same thing?

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Hébert: The same thing, yes.

I have another 3,608 petitions from Montreal. I have 3,192 from Ontario, and here are 51 more from Saskatchewan. Then, I have 44 from Nova Scotia, 45 from British Columbia and 50 from Newfoundland.

I also have 1,980 from Val d'Or, in the province of Quebec, 315 from Ottawa and 7,348 from Toronto.

Here are 10,076 more petitions from Quebec; 50 from the High North, in particular; 50 from Manitoba and 1,232 from New Brunswick.

● (1410)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have petitions I should like to table today respecting the goods and services tax. These petitions come from the University of Lethbridge. That university has consistently produced many petitions over the past few months.

The petitions are from students, staff and others at that university. These people come from Lethbridge, Taber, Magrath, High Prairie, Red Deer, Stettler, Medicine Hat, Stirling, Cold Lake, Picture Butte, Calgary and Hillspring. There are approximately 204 petitions.

THE SENATE

CANCELLATION OF INTERVIEW—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I, too, rise on a matter of personal privilege.

It was reported on CBC's Newsworld—which report, incidentally, I did not see—that it had been arranged that Senator Frith and I would discuss the future of the Senate and how it would operate considering the temper and the acrimony which had arisen during the debate on Bill C-62, on a television program that was to be broadcast last Friday.

After that performance, and prior to the alleged Royal Assent last week, I said to Senator Frith, in the presence of Senator MacEachen and, I believe, Senator Olson, that I wanted to be, and I quote, "spared the ignominy of participating in any forum with him."

It has come to my attention that, in some way, someone had related my objection to appearing on that program as having something to do with an abuse of the Queen. I made no such remark in this chamber or outside of this chamber to anyone. I want to make that clear. My remarks to Senator Frith were as I have expressed them today.

It is too bad that a program on which we were to have discussed not recrimination, but the future of the Senate and how we would relate to one another, how the committees would operate, how the business of the house would be conducted, was terminated for the reasons I have just given.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It was not terminated; you just did not appear.

Senator MacDonald: "Termination" referred to the interview.

Senator Frith: And the planned subject was discussed on the program.

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON SYNFUELS PROJECT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, December 18, 1990, I will move, pursuant to Rules 45(1)(e) and 67(1)(o):

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources be empowered to examine and report upon the Synfuels Project.

NATIONAL FINANCE

LEAVE DENIED FOR MOTION TO MOVE ORDER TO TOP OF ORDERS OF THE DAY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on Friday last I gave notice of a motion to refer to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance the Supplementary Estimates (B). That resulted in the motion appearing as the last item on the Order Paper. In order for the committee to have possession of these estimates, I would ask the permission of the Senate to move that motion to the top of the Orders of the Day so we may make the necessary reference.

Tomorrow, I will be introducing the Appropriations Bill covering the Supplementary Estimates (B), having given notice of such on Friday. It has been customary in this place that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance examine the Estimates and report prior to the supply bill being passed here in this chamber. In order to follow that established procedure, I ask leave to have the motion moved to the top of the Orders of the Day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No!

The Hon. the Speaker: Leave is not granted?

Senator Frith: It is not granted.

QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL FINANCE

COLLECTION OF TAX ON ALCOHOL AT MANITOBA-U.S. BORDER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It refers to a situation that has arisen in Manitoba. Many people have been purchasing alcoholic beverages across the border because of the substantial difference in price. Many Manitobans who have been crossing the border have been prepared to pay the duty, allowing them to bring the alcoholic beverages into Manitoba, because the price still ends up being much lower.

Because of this situation, the Manitoba government had planned to increase the provincial tax on imported alcohols for all amounts over 9 litres, and it intended to impose that tax a week ago Sunday. However, it has run into difficulties with the federal finance department. The news report I have states that the finance department officials informed the provincial treasurer of Manitoba, Mr. Manness, that Canada Customs would not be collecting the tax. My understanding is that the reason they will not be collecting the tax is that Manitoba has refused to make an agreement with the federal government on the matter of the GST.

● (1420)

How can the federal government tie in the fact that Manitoba has not agreed on GST questions with the desire of Manitoba to impose this extra tax because of a particular problem it has with regard to this import?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, this is the first I have heard of this matter. Perhaps the honourable senator will grant me some time to look into it and report back.

Senator Molgat: I will be happy to make a copy of the news report. It contains some other items that relate to the question. Apparently, part of the problem is that Manitoba insists upon visibility as far as the GST is concerned, while the federal government is apparently refusing to agree with Manitoba because it does not want the GST to be visible. This is the inference in the statement.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, one of the points we have put forward as an advantage of the GST is that it is a visible tax to be collected at the retail level from consumers. There must be something very much amiss in the report, some misunderstanding somewhere. In any case, I will try to get to the bottom of the matter and report back immediately.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have several delayed answers to questions, and I ask that they be printed as part of today's proceedings.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PRESENT DEFICIT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 7, 1990, by the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat regarding Unemployment Insurance—Present Deficit.

(The answer follows:)

When the Labour Force Development Strategy was announced in April 1989, the Minister of Employment and Immigration forecast that at the end of 1982 the cumulative deficit in the UI Account would be $3 billion.

Current projections indicate that the cumulative deficit in the UI Account could exceed $4 billion by the end of 1992.

This deficit will be funded by the Consolidated Revenue Fund as stated by the Minister of Finance in The Budget Speech of April 27, 1989:

"The Government will continue as it did in the early 1980s to finance any deficits in the unemployment insurance account in difficult times when it may not be appropriate to allow premiums to rise."

EXTERNAL RELATIONS

RECOGNITION OF TIBETAN GOVERNMENT IN EXILE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate on November 8, 1990, by the Honourable Jerahmiel S. Grafstein, regarding External Relations—Recognition of Tibetan Government in Exile—Government Policy.

(The answer follows:)

Does Canada recognize Chinese sovereignty over Tibet?

In 1970, when Canada established diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China, we recognized the Government of the PRC as the sole legitimate Government of China. Although Canada takes no position with regard to specific Chinese territorial claims, neither does it challenge them. In effect, it considers Tibet to be a part of China, bearing in mind China's current and long-standing control of the region.

Why does Canada not recognize the Tibetan "Government-in-Exile"?

Canada recognized the Government of the PRC as the sole legitimate Government of China in 1970, and does not challenge its position that Tibet is part of China. Moreover, Canada now recognizes only states, not Governments, and does not recognize a state of Tibet.

FISHERIES

LABOUR STANDARDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 13, 1990, by the Honourable Jean-Maurice Simard regarding Fisheries—Labour Standards—Government Position.

[Senator Doody.]

(The answer follows:)

The inquiry by Senator Jean-Maurice Simard raises two issues:

First, for individuals not yet in receipt of UI benefits, the fact that working less than a full week may reduce their benefit rate once they make a UI claim; and,

Second, for individuals in receipt of UI benefits, the fact that their benefits are reduced due to earnings during their claim.

One proposal which would address the first issue is the use of a claimant's best insured weeks to establish their benefit rate, rather than their last 20 weeks, as is done currently. This proposal has been seriously considered and evaluated by the Government. Ultimately it was rejected on several grounds, among them its effect on UI program costs. It has been estimated that this proposal, if implemented across Canada, could cost more than $500 million annually.

Also, it is interesting to note that such a provision has been in effect for self-employed fishermen since 1983. Experience to date shows that it has had little, if any, positive impact on the work behaviour of self-employed fishermen in Atlantic Canada.

With regard to the second issue, that of individuals who work while on claim, there is a provision in the current program which encourages claimants to earn up to 25% of their weekly benefit rate without penalty. For example, a claimant with a benefit rate of $280 per week could earn up to $70 during the week with no adverse effect on his benefits. Earnings above this amount are deducted dollar for dollar. This provision is intended to give claimants the incentive to work while on claim to allow them to maintain their skills and contacts in the labour market.

The earnings limit has been set at 25% to balance the twin program objectives of adequacy of benefits and providing an incentive to work within the UI program. Setting the limit too high would, for many claimants make the combination of UI benefits and part-time work earnings preferable to full-time work. That would be clearly at odds with the fundamental purpose of Unemployment Insurance.

Finally, it is also important to remember that UI claimants must be available and looking for work while on claim. If a greater amount of work were allowed, it might seriously impede a claimant's job search.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

BACKLOG OF REFUGEES—POSSIBILITY OF AMNESTY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 14, 1990, by the Honourable Peter Bosa regarding Employment and Immigration—Backlog of Refugees—Possibility of Amnesty—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

In 1987, this Government responded to wide-scale abuse of Canada's previous refugee determination system with Bill C-55, An Act to Amend the Immigration Act.

Unfortunately, Liberal Senators opposite chose to obstruct the passage of Bill C-55, and from May to December, 1988, while they delayed implementation of Bill C-55, the backlog of refugee claims almost doubled, thereby compounding the costs, both human and financial, and the time required to deal with the backlog.

When the Backlog Clearance Program was announced on December 28, 1988, there were some 85,000 unresolved refugee claims. It was made clear that all claimants would be treated fairly, humanely, and on the basis of the merits of their individual claims to Convention refugee status. The backlog clearance process examines the merits of each claim. Humanitarian and compassionate factors which may be involved in an individual case are also examined. Persons whose claims are determined to have a credible basis may apply for permanent residence.

The option of an amnesty was rejected at the outset of the program, and it still is; the House of Commons' Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration supported this decision. An amnesty would be unfair to potential immigrants, and their relatives in Canada, who have followed the lawful process for immigration.

To streamline processing of backlog claimants, paper screening of claims has been introduced. This process screens documentation submitted by the claimant for both credible basis and for humanitarian and compassionate (H & C) grounds; this could eliminate 20,000 panel hearings and H & C interviews. This was one of the initiatives suggested by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration in its report on the Backlog Clearance Program.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration is sympathetic to the families of refugee claimants in the backlog who are separated from one another. In order to reduce waiting times as much as possible, she has established procedures to expedite the processing of dependants of backlog claimants as soon as the claimant receives a positive decision. She has also seen to it that special procedures are in place to bring to Canada, on an urgent basis, dependants of backlog claimants who are outside of Canada and who are facing life-threatening situations or who are abused or abandoned children.

Backlog claimants have had permission to work since January 12, 1989, and they may also attend school. Claimants who know that their claims are unfounded may choose to leave voluntarily with letters of introduction to visa officials abroad; their Canadian experience will be favourably considered during a guaranteed interview with a visa officer.

The estimated total of cases in Quebec is 25,537. As of October 26, 1990, 12,771 of these cases (over 59%) had been opened, 7,603 of which had also been decided. As of October 26, 1990, 6,940 cases were provisionally approved for landing, while 663 had been rejected, had opted for voluntary departure or had disappeared. Nationally, 54% the total 85,000 cases had been opened and 31% decided.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

CREATION OF NEWS THROUGH POLLING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 14, 1990, by the Honourable Keith Davey and the Honourable Lowell Murray regarding CBC—Creation of News Through Polling—Conflict of Interest.

(The answer follows:)

1. The poll created news. Should a Government Agency, the CBC in particular, be in the business of creating news?

—Opinion polls do not create news. They report the results of interviews with various people on matters of public interest. Interviews have always been a standard form of news reporting - polling attempts to choose those interviewed to represent the general population.

2. Is it the Globe and Mail or the CBC that has a conflict of interest in this matter?

—Neither. Polling is now a standard tool for most journalistic organizations. For example, the Toronto Star and CTV have participated in joint polls; CBS and the New York Times regularly do polls together. CBC's practices in this respect are no different from other journalistic organizations.

3. Who represented CBC in determining the questions of the poll? Who represented CBC in the actual presentation of the poll? Who represented CBC in analyzing results of the poll?

Senior journalists from CBC's News Service participated with Globe journalists and an Advisory Board of distinguished academics (including Dr. George Perlin of Queen's University, Dr. Richard Johnson of U.B.C. and Dr. Sylvia Bashavkin of the University of Toronto) in determining the poll questions and analyzing the answers. The poll was checked and approved by CBC's Research Department.

4. In view of assurances we have that CBC is a cash-starved agency, how much money did CBC spend and/or contribute for this poll?

—The costs involved are part of the overall costs of programming produced to present the poll results. It has not been customary for Parliament to require the Corporation to provide details of its internal management and administration such as the costs involved in individual program projects. The background to this custom was explained in detail in the reply to Senator Norrie's oral question of December 16, 1978, which states:

Parliament has not, as a matter of custom since the Corporation's creation in 1936, required CBC to supply, in answering Parliamentary questions, certain details of its internal management and administration. Parliament has had two reasons for following this custom: first, the independence of the CBC as a Crown Corporation, established for the purpose of producing and broadcasting, independently of political or commercial interference, programs for a national program service; and secondly, the competitive nature of many of CBC's activities. The appropriateness of the CBC providing certain categories of information has been considered on many occasions by various Parliamentary Committees and when the CBC has suggested that such information should not be made a matter of public record, its views have been accepted by them. The names of employees and their functions in relation to specific programs, their salaries or expenses, the costs of individual programs, or business arrangements are examples of details which it has not been customary to require the CBC to supply. It is open to Parliament and its appropriate Committees to discuss the policies in and the CBC have followed in this regard.

VANIER CUP

UNIVERSITY FOOTBALL CHAMPIONSHIP—TWENTY-SIXTH ANNUAL COLLEGE BOWL—RADIO COVERAGE BY CBC—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 14, 1990, by the Honourable Keith Davey regarding Vanier Cup—University Football Championship—twenty-Sixth Annual College Bowl—Radio Coverage by CBC—Government Policy.

(The answer follows:)

1. Why did CBc radio not broadcast the November 24, 1990 Vanier Cup Match?

For some years, CBC Radio carried live coverage of the Vanier Cup. A number of reasons compelled CBC Radio to change that practice this year.

First, CBC Radio no longer carries live play-by-play coverage of sporting events on a regular basis. Television has assumed this function and, because television is a visual medium, performs it more satisfactorily. As a general rule now, CBC Radio only covers, on an exceptional basis, sporting events which are not being televised.

Second, this year's Vanier Cup match was broadcast live on TSN, the cable sports channel which is part of the basic cable service. Over 70% of Canadians now have cable in their homes; a substantial percentage of those without cable have access to it nearby; many other Canadians in remote areas receive TSN through their personal or community satellite dish receivers. The audience, therefore, for a radio broadcast would be minimal.

Third, CBC Radio's usual audience for its regularly scheduled programming at that time—programming that would be disrupted for three to four hours by game coverage—is considerably larger than the most generous estimates of the likely radio audience for the football game.

Fourth, although there would be no charge to CBC for broadcast rights to the game, there would be substantial costs to the Corporation for the necessary overtime and transmission charges.

Given these factors, CBC's officers judged that it was not possible to justify disrupting the regular schedule and listeners, and undertaking the required additional expenses, for the comparatively small number of those interested in having the game on radio.

As Senator Davey noted in his remarks in the Senate, Standard Broadcasting of Toronto assembled a temporary network of private radio stations in various Canadian communities which broadcast this year's Vanier Cup match.

CANADIAN COMMITMENTS—PURSUANCE OF SANCTIONS—FREEZING OF IRAQI ASSETS IN CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 14, 1990, by the Honourable Jerahmiel S. Grafstein regarding External Relations—Canadian Commitments—Pursuance of Sanctions—Freezing of Iraqi Assets in Canada—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

Through the United Nations Iraq Regulations, the Government prohibited all payments to persons in Iraq or Kuwait. Also, the assets of the Government of Iraq and Kuwait, of their agencies and bodies controlled by Iraq or Kuwait were frozen.

The Regulations provide for the issuance of certificates by the SSEA to provide relief from the Regulations in instances in which it is determined that transactions were not intended to be prohibited by Security Council resolution 661 or that they were for the purpose of assisting the legitimate Government of Kuwait. A number of certificates have been issued permitting the completion of certain transactions. Furthermore, three general certificates have been issued permitting the completion of certain categories of financial transactions.

In order to assist financial institutions in Canada in determining which entities are controlled by Iraq or Kuwait (the assets of which entities are frozen) a Statement of Guidance has been issued providing a list of entities controlled by Iraq or Kuwait and a list of entities not controlled by Iraq or Kuwait. In addition, certain commercial enterprises controlled by the Government of Kuwait have been permitted, through company-specific certificates, to conduct business or to make investments.

ADVANCED GRAIN PAYMENTS—NUMBER OF APPLICATIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 15, 1990, by the Honourable E. W. Barootes regarding Agriculture—Advanced Grain Payments—Number of Applications.

(The answer follows:)

As of November 30, 1990 approximately $1.2 billion had been advanced to 52,744 grain producers under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. This is the most money ever advanced under this program and the largest number of participants since the late 1960s. Under the Advance Payments for Crops Act $58 million had been advanced to all crops, the number of producers involved is not yet known. Under both programs the Federal Government is paying the interest on the first $50,000 of advances for each producer by virtue of the Cash Flow Enhancement Program.

COST OF ADVERTISING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 15, 1990, by the Honourable Azellus Denis regarding GST—Cost of Advertising— Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, the reform of the Canadian sales tax system is a major fiscal initiative. It requires the cooperation and participation of the business community and the Canadian public. To ensure a smooth transition from the outmoded and damaging FST to the modern and efficient GST, the Government must actively inform businesses about how the GST will operate. Moreover, the Government has an obligation and a responsibility to explain to Canadians the need for sales tax reform as well as its impact on the Canadian economy and their everyday lives.

The importance of public understanding is a key lesson learned from other countries where similar tax systems have been introduced. Where business people and consumers have been well informed, implementation has gone smoothly.

Therefore, Honourable Senators, our advertising has been aimed at the business community to ensure that they will be ready to collect the tax on January 1, 1991, and at consumers to ensure that they understand the tax.

The results of this advertising are clearly visible: more than 400,000 people have called the Department of Finance's toll-free information line over the past year and the toll-free information line of the GST consumer information office is currently receiving up to 10,000 calls from consumers each day. In response to this public demand and to fulfil its responsibilities, the Government has also distributed over 8.5 million copies of numerous publications, including 2 million small business booklets, 4.5 million information brochures for small business and 1.8 million information brochures for the general public.

Honourable senators, the Government's advertising is effective.

Furthermore, honourable senators, I reject the Honourable Member's assertion that by not advertising the Canadian public might better understand the GST.

Making Canadians aware of the availability of information is the best way of informing them about the GST. This information, which Canadians want and need, must be easily accessible.

That is why we invested this money in our information programs on the GST.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

COMPARATIVE AGGREGATE MEASURES OF SUPPORT—URUGUAY ROUND—PROGRESS OF DISCUSSIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 15, 1990 and November 27, 1990, by the Honourable H.A. Olson regarding General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade—Comparative Aggregate Measures of Support; and General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade—Uruguay Round—Progress of Discussions.

(The answer follows:)

The Uruguay Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations, which have been a central element of Canadian trade policy over the past four years, continues to be stalled over the issue of agricultural subsidies, with the European Community as yet unwilling to demonstrate the flexibility necessary to meet the most basic negotiating objectives of the United States and the Cairns Group of agricultural exporting nations, which includes Canada. All other areas of the Uruguay Round negotiations would likely be affected by a failure to achieve at least some meaningful progress in agriculture.

Successful resolution of the impasse in agriculture is extremely important to Canadian grain exporters. By addressing the issues of improved access for agricultural products, better disciplines over internal support and, above all, the elimination of export subsidies, we will help to remove distortions which have seriously depressed demand for Canadian grains.

We are striving for a fair and balanced result which will ensure that subsidy disciplines have an equal impact on all signators to an agreement, regardless of the mechanism by which subsidies might be administered. Canada will not agree to disciplines which might unfairly penalize Canadian exporters in relation to exporters from other countries. This is true of transportation subsidies as it is of other forms of government support.

POSSIBLE DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 20, 1990, by the Honourable Sidney L. Buckwold regarding GST—Possible Delay in Implementation—Request for Details.

(The answer follows:)

Minister John Hockin was quoted accurately, albeit in the case of some media reports, not completely.

What was incorrect in this story was the interpretation of Mr. Hockin's remarks by the young reporter in question.

Mr. Hockin did not say that the GST would be delayed as was reported, but rather he said, "it's hard to tell whether we might have to slip a few months . . . but I'm confident that we'll have the GST in place January One."

ENERGY MINES AND RESOURCES

ENERGY CONSERVATION—DISTRIBUTION OF BROCHURES

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 20, 1990, by the Honourable Emyard G. Corbin regarding Energy, Mines and Resources—Energy Conservation— Distribution of Brochures.

(The answer follows:)

The package of energy efficiency-related public information to which my colleague refers were sent to all MPs and Senators in response to a request for samples of these publications made during a briefing given by Minister Epp to the Conservative and Liberal caucuses. That presentation described the existing situation in the Persian Gulf, its effects on the Canadian oil industry and product prices, and the voluntary demand restraint responses being undertaken by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

All Canadians are affected by the crisis in the Gulf. Should war break out, Canadians will be asked to share the responsibility for increased demand restraint and energy conservation. Canadians are very concerned about the rising cost of oil-based products and genuinely interested in cutting their demand for these products and in saving money on energy use.

[Senator Doody.]

Senator Corbin has expressed concern over the cost of producing the materials we all recently received and questioned why recycled paper was not used more extensively. I would like to more specifically address those questions.

The Honourable Senator is correct. The letter which accompanied the package of literature on energy conservation was printed on ministerial letterhead. This letterhead is not recycled stock. It is, however, one and the same stock that he and all other members of the Senate and the House of Commons use for official correspondence.

As for why four bags of information (2 English, 2 French) were sent, that was so that one package in each official language could be used by staff members on the Hill while, in the case of Members of the House of Commons, the other packages could be used by their constituency office to respond to questions from the public.

As the Honourable Senator has suggested, the brochure "Your Fall Home Green Up" is printed on only one side to facilitate its use by local community newspapers in putting together an energy supplement. In fact, if it were not printed this way publishers couldn't use the material. This is a popular publication which has been produced by Energy, Mines and Resources since the early '80s. This is also explained in detail in the letter signed by Minister Epp which accompanied the information package.

As for the other publications, it should be noted that many were produced several years ago—in a couple of cases as far back as the early '70s. As required and appropriate, wherever possible using recycled paper and the most cost-effective printing available, they have been updated and reprinted to respond to continuing requests from the general public.

In general, it is more expensive (between 5 and 10 per cent) to use recycled paper in printing brochures such as these than to use regular paper. And that is only for regular recycled paper. Higher quality grades of recycled paper are even more expensive and are, at times, difficult to obtain in Canada. The plastic bags used in the distribution of the information packages are reusable.

Energy, Mines and Resources continually strives to design and produce its publications in the most cost-effective manner possible. Wherever and whenever possible and appropriate, the Department uses recycled paper in the final production of its publications.

TIMETABLE FOR PREPARATION OF REGULATIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 6, 1990 by the Honourable Lowell Murray and November 20, 1990 by the Honourable H.A. Olson regarding Timetable for Preparation of Regulations.

(The answer follows:)

First, with regard to your inquiry about the release of Regulations relating to Bill C-62, I am pleased to tell you that virtually all of these regulations were released publicly by the first of November.

This includes regulations on : FST inventory rebates, Financial services, non-taxable importations, the new housing rebate, joint ventures, rebates to charities and NPO's, and streamlined accounting, to name just a few.

In most cases, these regulations further outline details of policies which were already enunciated.

As a result, businesses have had adequate time to review the regulations and prepare for implementation of the GST on January 1, 1991.

Second, with regard to your comments on the treatment of auctioneers under the GST, I will tell you that Bill C-62 offers auctioneers flexibility in how to apply the GST, recognizing that arrangements and circumstances vary from one auctioneer to another.

Essentially, the GST will apply to auctioneers in either of the following ways:

In some cases, auctioneers will be treated as agents acting on behalf of a principal—in these circumstances, they would simply charge GST on the commission that they charge the vendor.

In other cases, auctioneers can structure their affairs so that they are treated as buying and reselling the goods—in these circumstances, the auctioneer will charge tax to the purchaser, and receive an input tax credit on the net proceeds paid to the original vendor.

It is important to note that the net effect of the GST is identical regardless of which method the auctioneer chooses to use—in both cases, only the auctioneer's commission or margin is taxed. This flexibility allows auctioneers to use the method that is easiest for them, based on how they structure their arrangements with vendors.

In recent weeks, officials from the Department of Finance have been in touch with the Alberta Auctioneers Association and are working with them to prepare material to communicate the operation of the GST for auctioneers under all circumstances.

In addition, a Senior Finance Official will be going to the Canadian Auctioneers Association National meeting on December 13 in Montreal to listen to their concerns and to advise them on the details of how the GST operates for auctioneers.

And, Revenue Canada officials have also scheduled additional meetings to work with auctioneers on a one-on-one basis to ensure they understand how the tax will apply to them.

COST OF GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 20, 1990 by the Honourable Thomas H. Lefebvre regarding Goods and Services Tax—Cost of Government Advertising Campaign.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable Senators, I would like to respond to Senator Lefebvre's questions regarding certain costs associated with preparing and planning for the GST.

The costs in question have been incurred by two Government Departments—the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue—as well as the Independent Government Agency, the Consumer Information office.

As I stated in the response to Senator Denis's earlier question regarding the cost of advertising in relation to the GST, the Department of Finance has spent or committed $18 million to date on advertising and related communications activities.

Of that $18 million, a total of $10 million was spent on the production of advertisements and the purchase of print advertising space and air time on radio and television. The remainder was spent on the production and distribution of publications and public opinion research.

Senator Lefebvre also inquired about the cost of hiring persons to answer telephones as a result of GST advertising. The Department of Finance established a toll-free information line on August 8, 1989 to provide Canadians with a direct and quick method of acquiring accurate information about the goods and services tax. Over 400,000 Canadians have used this service.

For the period of August 8, 1989 to October 31, 1990, the Department spent approximately $1 million to hire persons to answer calls on its toll-free information line and to respond to correspondence.

The Department of Finance has not committed any further funds for advertising.

The budget of the GST Consumer Information office for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991 is $19.5 million. Of that, $7.4 million is budgeted for advertising; $6.1 million is budgeted for the production and distribution of publications; and, $2.5 million is budgeted for the staffing of phone lines.

Revenue Canada has also expended funds on planning and preparing for the GST.

As stated in the response to Senator Denis, Customs and Excise has an advertising budget for the fiscal year 1990/91 of $8.9 million of which they have spent $4.1 million. As well, in the fiscal year 1989/90, Customs and Excise spent $300,000 on advertising.

Revenue Canada operates toll-free information lines as part of an enquiries program designed to provide technical assistance to help business prepare for the GST. Monies spent on salaries and wages associated with the program total $5.6 million as of October 31, 1990. This includes all persons involved in the operation of the enquiries program, including those answering the phones.

Revenue Canada taxation will be responsible for administering the GST credit. They have had the responsibility of informing Canadians about this essential part of the GST.

To that end, Taxation has spent, as of September 30, 1990, $2.8 million on advertising. No funds have been committed for future advertising campaigns.

Taxation also operates toll-free information lines as a part of a public enquiries program. This program was expanded to accommodate enquiries relating to the GST credit. As of September 30, 1990, a total of $2.065 million has been spent on hiring staff for the division of the enquiries program that relates to the GST. This includes all staff and not just those answering the telephones.

In response to Senator Lefebvre's final question, the total amount budgeted by the Federal Government for GST related advertising is $29.4 million.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL TRADE ORGANIZATION—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 22, 1990, by the Honourable Jack Austin regarding International Trade—Proposed International Trade Organization—Request for Progress Report.

(The answer follows:)

The Canadian initiative calling for the establishment of a World Trade Organization in the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations is part of an overall package, which includes meaningful agricultural trade reform, market access liberalization, improved trade rules, agreements on trade-in-services and trade-related intellectual property and stronger dispute settlement procedures. If there is a successful overall result in the substantive areas in the Round, the prospects for a WTO or similar organizational structure are good. There is an emerging consensus among countries participating in the Round on the desirability of a strengthened institutional structure for the GATT system to implement and administer all the new agreements in a coherent manner.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN SUBSIDIES—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate on November 27, 1990, by the Honourable H.A. Olson regarding Agriculture—Grain Subsidies—Discussions Between Federal Government and Provinces—Request for Information.

(The answer follows:)

The recently announced agreement between the Federal Government and the Province of Quebec will result in a federal contribution of $15.7 million of assistance to grain producers in that province. Combined with provincial contribution payments to Quebec producers will total more than $30 million for 1990. This agreement with Quebec was negotiated within the context of the Special Income Assistance Program (SIAP) which was announced by the Minister of Agriculture on March 29, 1990. Under this program Agreements have already been reached with eight other provinces to deliver assistance to grain and oilseed producers. For Alberta the Agreement was signed on June 28, 1990. Under this Agreement the Federal Government is contributing $89.2 million of assistance and the Province of Alberta $11 million of assistance to Alberta grain and oilseed producers. For Saskatchewan the Agreement was signed on July 16, 1990. The Federal Government contributed $238.3 million and the Government of Saskatchewan $39.1 million for direct payments to grains and oilseeds producers in that province. For all of Canada the Federal Government is contributing $450 million of assistance to grain and oilseed producers.

Further, on October 13, 1990 the Minister of Agriculture announced the Cash Flow Enhancement Program (CFEP). Under this program the Federal Government is paying the interest on the first $50,000 of cash advanced against farm-held grain under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act (PGAPA) and the Advance Payments for Crops Act (APCA). It is anticipated that $1.4 billion will be advanced under PGAPA and APCA at a cost of $95 million to the Federal Government.

Finally, the Federal and Provincial Ministers of Agriculture agreed at their recent meeting in Winnipeg to implement for the 1991-92 crop year, a transitional form of the Guaranteed Revenue Insurance Program (GRIP) proposed by the Grain and Oilseed Safety Net Committee. They also agreed to implement for the 1990 tax year the Net Income Stabilization Account: these programs will provide major support for grain and oilseed producers. Participation in these programs will be voluntary.

THE ENVIRONMENT

OIL POLLUTION IN THE GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE—SOURCE OF POLLUTION—DEATH OF SEABIRDS ON PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND BEACHES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 27, 1990, by the Honourable Lorne M. Bonnell regarding Environment—Oil Pollution in the Gulf of St. Lawrence—Source of Pollution—Death of Seabirds on Prince Edward Island Beaches—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

The Canadian Coast Guard is currently attempting to identify the source of the oil found on the northern beaches of Prince Edward Island. Samples taken from the beaches will be analyzed and compared with oil samples taken from the 'Irving Whale' and from the oil spilled from the vessel Rio Orinoco, which ran aground on October 16, 1990, on the south shore of Anticosti Island.

ENVIRONMENT

CONDITION OF SUNKEN VESSEL IRVING WHALE—PROVISION OF MOST RECENT STUDY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is response to a question raised in the Senate on November 27, 1990, by the Honourable Lorne Bonnell regarding Environment—Condition of Sunken Vessel Irving Whale-Provision of Most Recent Study—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

In the fall of 1989 and in August 1990, diving surveys of the barge Irving Whale confirmed that the barge was in good structural condition and that only a very low seepage of oil, estimated at 3 barrels per week, was escaping form the vessel's cargo tank vents. A vibrant ecosystem has developed around the vessel, thus suggesting that local pollution levels are minimal. Drill testing of the vessel's cargo tanks indicated that at least 3,100 tons of the original 4,200 ton oil cargo remain within the barge—much of the lost balance of oil having occurred at the time of the barge's sinking.

A decision on whether or not to salvage the Irving Whale and its remaining cargo will be made following a careful analysis of the latest available technology, and the risks and benefits of such salvage action.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

RELEASE OF DANGEROUS OFFENDERS—MANDATORY SUPERVISION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 29, 1990, by the Honourable Earl A. Hastings regarding National Parole Board—Release of Dangerous Offenders—Mandatory Supervision—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

This Government is well aware that the National Parole Board is making decisions daily with the goal of affording the maximum and enduring protection to the community. Occasionally, this goal can only be reached by detaining potentially violent offenders who have demonstrated during the first two-thirds of their sentence no willingness or interest in changing their behaviour.

The direct answer to the first question is yes, the Government is indeed aware that offenders are being released when their court sentences have expired. The National Parole Board never "releases . . . men who, the Board is satisfied, if released will commit a serious offence involving harm or death to another person." Rather, when no other reasonable option is available, the Board detains such offenders until the end of their sentence when by law they are free to return to society. Further, the Government is very much aware of the results of the 1986 legislation.

Consistent with projections made before the legislation was introduced, offenders referred for detention consideration represent only five per cent of all potential mandatory supervision releases. Forty per cent of all referrals were for offenders serving sentences for sexual assault: 24 per cent for other assaults: 13 per cent for attempted murder or manslaughter: and 24 per cent for robbery.

For every ten referrals made to the Board between 26 July 1986 and 30 June 1989, five resulted in a decision to detain, two in a decision to impose a residency condition, and three in a decision to release on mandatory supervision.

In response to the supplementary question, both long and short term protection of society are the primary goals of the decisions made by the National Parole Board. Both the Board and the Correctional Service of Canada are constrained by the court-imposed sentence. Protection, and measures to ensure protection, in reality, can only be pursued during the length of the sentence.

This does not mean that once a sentence is expired the criminal justice system ceases to care. On the contrary, the Ministry of the Solicitor General attaches great importance to applying all possible efforts to address problems. Both the National Parole Board and the Correctional Service of Canada recognize the need for programs and treatment opportunities for detained offenders. Detention without proper treatment will only increase the offender's resentment and anger. In fact, after the original detention order, the Board eventually deemed circumstances to have changed sufficiently to permit restricted conditional release in 42 cases. Twenty-eight offenders were released with residency orders to half-way houses and 14 were permitted one chance on mandatory supervision. This means that if they breached their conditions of release, they would have to return to prison and not be eligible for release on mandatory supervision again before the end of their sentence. The Board certainly recognizes the efficacy of conditional release and strives to grant release whenever the risk can be managed sufficiently in a community setting.

Ultimately, the most enduring protection for society is change. Offenders whose behaviour and attitudes change from anger to understanding, from criminal behaviour to a law-abiding life-style offer the best possible protection.

GRAIN

EFFECT OF UNITED STATES POLICIES ON CANADIAN PRODUCERS

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

DELAY OF NEGOTIATIONS—EFFECT ON AGRICULTURAL SUBSIDIES

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have responses to questions raised in the Senate on November 22 and 29, 1990, by the Honourable H.A. Olson regarding Grain—Effect of United States Policies on Canadian Producers— and regarding General Agreement On Tariffs And Trade—Delay of Negotiations—Effect on Agricultural Subsidies.

The MTN negotiations in Brussels broke off following the collapse of agricultural talks. The European Community failed to demonstrate sufficient flexibility, particularly on the issue of export subsidies. In response to your specific question of November 29, the United States has maintained a strong and consistent stance in favour of major reform of trade in agriculture throughout the entire negotiating process.

Since there has been progress in other areas, the Director General of the GATT, Mr. Dunkel, has been asked by Ministers to consult informally over the next few weeks to see if further negotiations would lead to a successful outcome. We expect that all parties will wish to reconsider their positions and expectations carefully, especially the United States and the European Community.

We are naturally very disappointed to learn of the suspension of the Uruguay Round. We had great hopes for the Round and have worked at it intensively during the past four years. Canada will, of course, make every effort over the next several weeks to assist GATT Director Dunkel in finding a basis for a positive conclusion to these negotiations. Collectively and as individual nations we have too much at stake to let all the progress of the past four years in services, trade rules (subsidies, countervail, safeguards and anti-dumping), lowered tariff and non-tariff barriers, dispute settlement mechanisms and trade-related intellectual property—simply slip away from us. With respect to your question of November 22, we continue to seek a positive outcome in all areas of the MTN, including an outcome in agriculture that would eliminate or mitigate practices which currently do so much harm to Canadian grain exports.

As the Minister of International Trade has indicated in Brussels, Canada remains fully committed to continued trade liberalization including effective implementation of the FTA and other hemispheric and Asian trade initiatives. This is fundamental to our long-term growth and competitiveness.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

IRAQI ARMAMENTS—NUCLEAR CAPABILITY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 29, 1990, by the Honourable Jerahmiel S. Grafstein regarding Persian Gulf Crisis—Iraqi Armaments—Nuclear Capability.

(The answer follows:)

There have been many reports in the media leading to speculation on the evolving Iraqi nuclear-weapon capability.

Currently, there is no evidence to suggest that Iraq possesses nuclear weapons.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

NATURE OF ALLIED MILITARY COMMAND STRUCTURE—ROLE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 29, 1990, by the Honourable Jerahmiel S. Grafstein regarding Persian Gulf Crisis—Nature of Allied Military Command Structure—Role of Canadian Government.

(The answer follows:)

Canadian ships and aircraft have been dispatched to the Persian Gulf to contribute to international efforts ensuring the strict implementation of the United Nations economic sanctions against Iraq, and to deter further Iraqi aggression.

From the beginning of the Gulf crisis, the Government has been engaged in a continuing series of bilateral and multilateral consultations on the appropriate international responses to Iraq's unprovoked invasion of Kuwait on August 2nd. The principal forum for these discussions has been the United Nations.

On September 9th and 10th, a Naval Conference was convened in Bahrain to discuss mutual co-operation and support among the countries which had committed naval forces to the Gulf. Canada, along with the naval representatives from other nations deploying ships to the region, participated in the meetings. As a result of these consultations, it was decided that Canada could make the most meaningful contribution within the central region of the Persian Gulf.

As a member of the multi-national effort, Canada is conducting its operations in close communication and cooperation with its allies in the region. At the same time, Canada maintains independent national command and control of our ships and aircraft through modern communications systems as they patrol their area of responsibility in the Persian Gulf. To ensure maximum coordination of the efforts of Canadian vessels and aircraft, Canada has established a joint-headquarters in Bahrain.

Canadian Forces deployed to the Gulf are, and will remain, under Canadian command and control. The Chief of Defence Staff, in consultation with the Minister of National Defence, has authorized appropriate and specific national Rules of Engagement and Levels of Force guidelines within the framework of Canadian government policy. These guidelines deal exclusively with self defence and the enforcement of United Nations sanctions. They are detailed rules and instructions guiding the degree of autonomy that the Air and Naval Task Group Commanders, commanding officers, and aircraft commanders have in responding to a developing situation. They are commensurate with Canada's area of operations and the assessed threat in the region. Rules of Engagement tell the commanders what they can and cannot do in fulfilling their mission. Levels of Force guidelines provide amplification so that the commanders are aware of the exact lines of their authority within the Rules of Engagement.

An essential basic premise in the Rules of Engagement is the right of self defence. A commander has the inherent right to employ such force as may be necessary to protect his command and the lives of his crew. No instruction or fule has been put in place which can be construed as limiting any of the commanding officers in the exercise of his initiative and judgement when immediate action is required for self defence.

It would be inappropriate to expand further on the exact Rules of Engagement and Levels of Force that have been approved for Canadian operations in the Gulf region. Further elaboration could jeopardize the ability of the men and women of the Canadian Forces in the region to successfully complete their assigned task. Protecting sensitive operational information is both prudent and sound, given the level of tension in the Gulf.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

CANADIAN FORCES—ADEQUACY OF MEDICAL RESOURCES—REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 29, 1990, by the Honourable Jerahmiel S. Grafstein regarding Persian Gulf Crisis—Canadian Forces—Adequacy of Medical Resources—Report of Auditor General—Government Response.

(The answer follows:)

The Auditor General's observations with respect to the inadequate level of medical services available in case of war must be viewed in their proper context. If one thinks of the unthinkable—all out nuclear war—then it is correct to observe that the medical facilities are inadequate. In fact, it would be unrealistic to maintain the medical infrastructure necessary to cope with such an eventuality.

Currently, the medical facilities available in the Canadian Forces represent a balance between what is needed for peacetime, and what may be needed in case of conflict.

In planning and executing operations, the Canadian Forces develop medical plans that are flexible and are adjusted to the changing circumstances.

The medical facilities available to Canadian service men and women in the Gulf area is sufficient given the level of forces that Canada has deployed.

Canada has deployed medical personnel with all our units in the Gulf area and we have entered into bilateral arrangements with other forces deployed in the area. As well, Canada has deployed two complete surgical teams to operate from the U.S. hospital ship Mercy.

CONSTRUCTION OF NEW BRUNSWICK SECTION—CONCLUSION OF GOVERNMENT STUDY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 29, 1990, by the Honourable Eymard G. Corbin regarding Trans-Canada Highway—Construction of New Brunswick Section—Conclusion of Government Study.

(The answer follows:)

PROPOSED CAVENDISH PLANT IN NEW BRUNSWICK—PROVISION OF FUNDS BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 22, 1990, by the Honourable Eymard G. Corbin regarding Agriculture—Proposed Cavendish Plant in New Brunswick—Provision of Funds by Federal Government.

(The answer follows:)

No formal decision has yet been taken by the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency with respect to assistance for the proposed Cavendish Farms potato plant at Grand Falls. Any assistance by way of an Investment Tax Credit would be automatically available to the company upon completion of its investment in the proposed facility. Assistance with respect to the water treatment facility will be considered once ACOA has received an application from the local facility on a fee for service basis. The other assistance proposed for the plant will be from the Provincial Government.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—ORDER STANDS

On the Order: Resuming the Debate on the Motion for second reading of Bill C-92, An Act to Amend the Northwest Territories Act—(Senator Molgat).

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Stand.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Could Honourable Senator Molgat give us some indication of when he would be prepared to proceed with this bill?

Senator Molgat: I was hoping to have the Debates of the Senate so I could read exactly what Senator Beaudoin had to say. I enquired this morning when we might have the Debates and I could not get the answer. Once I have read Senator Beaudoin's comments, I will be prepared to proceed.

CANADIAN HERITAGE LANGUAGES INSTITUTE BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson moved the second reading of Bill C-37, to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute.

She said: Honourable senators, I would like to voice my support for Bill C-37, to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute, and to urge all honourable senators to do the same.

This bill now has the support of the three major parties in the other place. They are in full agreement as to its importance to Canada both at home and as a player on the international scene.

As Canadians, we have become more and more aware of the importance of safeguarding the rich linguistic heritage we are fortunate to have in our midst. The languages of our various communities are a vital legacy. They enrich the character of this country and strengthen our role and position in the modern world. They contribute to our national identity and are a vital resource in our global future.

Today, in all regions of this country, people are working to preserve our linguistic heritage. They are doing so in a quiet way, sometimes with little recognition. Although their efforts are of immeasurable value to this nation, they often work without the benefit of those professional resources that are available to other educators. These people—parents and volunteers—are struggling in the dark, so to speak, isolated from the work being done in other communities, without adequate materials and tools to effectively promote the use of heritage languages in their communities.

[Senator Doody.]

Experts, community organizations, and others working in the field have concluded that this situation must change if Canada is to rise to the challenges and opportunities of the future both at home and abroad.

They recognize that the vision of Canada as a truly multicultural society, an enlightened nation and a model for others is an imperfect and flawed vision unless heritage language learning and its promotion are brought within the scope of mainstream education.

Therefore they have called for the creation of a professional institute. Not, honourable senators, a remote inaccessible establishment, but an institute founded on cooperation and partnership. It will be a practical-oriented organization devoted not only to enhancing teaching skills, but promoting understanding of the benefits of heritage language training for all Canadians.

This is an important fact, honourable senators. Many Canadians are not yet aware of the role heritage languages play in strengthening and enriching our society.

More than 60 heritage languages are being taught to tens of thousands of students in Canada today. However, the efforts of instructors, usually parents and volunteers, are being seriously undermined by outdated and inadequate text books and educational materials.

The institute will change that. It will give language teachers the tools they need to raise heritage language training to a professional level. It will undertake the preparation and dissemination of new and appropriate materials with a distinctly Canadian orientation so that as students are learning their ancestral languages, they will also be learning Canadian values and realities.

Communities want their children to have such materials. They want their children to maintain ancestral ties, yet at the same time to participate fully in Canadian life.

As well as strengthening our linguistic heritage, the institute will seek to play a leadership role on the international scene. Already, other countries are looking closely at Canada because of our position as a leading multicultural nation. The institute will draw interest from other countries seeking progressive and innovative ways to foster the preservation of their heritage languages.

I should like, honourable senators, to outline briefly the mandate of the institute as envisaged by those experts who work in the heritage language field. This facility will not serve the needs of just a few communities; it will reach out to all communities and regions, involving many segments of Canadian society, community groups, educational institutions, corporations and various levels of government.

● (1430)

The institute will act as a clearing house, seeking to correct the uneven access to teaching resources and assist in the development of standards. It will play a vital role in improving the quality of heritage language instruction by developing more effective training methods and courses.

The government's financial support for the institute will amount to $6.5 million over five years, with a part of this support directed to an endowment fund. As a charitable foundation, the institute will raise further funds from the private sector, from community sources and from other levels of government, thereby ensuring their ongoing interest and support in its endeavours.

In summary, the Canadian Heritage Language Institute will promote and develop the field of heritage language learning in Canada. It will undertake public education, develop and disseminate Canadian-oriented learning materials, assist in the development of programs to improve standards of heritage language instruction and carry out research activities of importance to heritage language learning in general.

The institute will be located in Edmonton and will work closely with organizations, individuals and groups from across the country. It will consult with community-based organizations, educational institutions and the provincial and territorial governments to ensure that all who are concerned with heritage language learning benefit from the activities of the institute.

The institute will be managed by a board of directors appointed by the Govenor in Council on the recommendation of the minister, following extensive consultation with appropriate governments, institutions, organizations and individuals. It will be a charitable foundation which can receive financial support from the private sector and community sources, as well as from provincial and territorial governments.

The Canadian Heritage Languages Institute will present an annual report of its activities to the minister for tabling in Parliament, which will include financial statements and an auditor's report. It will be evaluated by the minister in consultation with the board, following the fourth anniversary of the passage of the Canadian Heritage Language Institute bill.

I wish to conclude, honourable senators, by reiterating that the Canadian Heritage Language Institute will be a source of pride for all Canadians. It will serve to enhance our sense of belonging to both the community and the country. It will promote cultural understanding and awareness, and encourage peoples of all backgrounds to contribute their full potential to Canada's economic and social growth in the wide range of languages that bring our world partners ever closer.

In summary, I urge all honourable senators to give their support to this bill. Our fellow Canadians from all cultural backgrounds are anxiously awaiting its passage; it is long overdue.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I know that the bill will go to a committee at some point, but I wish to ask the honourable senator two questions. First, is there any definition of "heritage languages"? Does the term include all languages spoken, for example, in Canada at the present time? Second, will the institute be empowered to support the maintenance or promotion of languages in Canada, for example, the language of the Micmacs in Nova Scotia? Would that be a heritage language? Would the institute be empowered to assist—through financial support or technical assistance—in ways to maintain and strengthen that language?

Senator Robertson: Thank you, honourable senator, for those questions. The definition of "heritage languages" has been under discussion. It has been difficult to pinpoint. In the bill itself there is not a specific definition. It is generally assumed to be all heritage languages, but not specifically the two official languages.

I am sure that in the committee we will be concentrating more on this matter, since it has already been discussed.

Relative to the honourable senator's latter question, some 53 native languages are included in this bill, although I think it is generally recognized that about three of those languages will live.

As the honourable senator is no doubt aware, three studies have been commissioned to look closely at our native languages in terms of where we will go with them and how they will be integrated. There is a provision for an additional sum of money in this bill to help specifically with our aboriginal heritage languages.

The question which is now under study by these three groups is whether or not there will be a special heritage languages centre for aboriginal people. That decision has not yet been made.

Senator MacEachen: Since it will be a matter which undoubtedly will be raised, the honourable senator may know that at the present time in Nova Scotia, particularly in the Island of Cape Breton, there are a number of active groups promoting the maintenance of the Gaelic language in Cape Breton. I could go into some detail in that regard. However, I hope that that language will be included as one of the heritage languages to be supported.

Senator Robertson: Honourable senator, all ancestral languages are included. The Gaelic language will have the opportunity to be served by this institute.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES BILL

On the order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, for the second reading of the Bill S-18, An Act to further the aspirations of the aboriginal peoples of Canada. (Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this particular bill has been on the Order Paper for a long while. I have been meaning to ask the Table, through the Speaker, to check it for its admissibility in this place. It seems to me, and I stand to be corrected, that there are financial implications in the bill which I think may be beyond the authority of the Senate to inaugurate. I would appreciate it if we could have an opinion from the Table on this matter.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in effect what Senator Doody is doing is raising a point of order as to whether or not this bill is in order.I think there should be some debate on the matter. It is possible, although I suppose in light of what has been happening recently around here, not probable that both the Table and the Chair might be interested in the views of some senators on the subject of whether or not the bill is in order; or they might just wish to decide on their own without any intervention by senators as to whether it is or is not in order.

If what Senator Doody is doing is raising a point of order, then I suppose he can adjourn the debate on that point of order. However, I think some senators on this side might like the opportunity to address the point of order. I would think that they would not want to do so until Senator Doody outlines in some detail why he thinks the bill is out of order.

Senator Doody: Honourable Senators, that is certainly agreeable. I have no problem with that. It is a bit of a departure from our usual course. Nevertheless, I will be only too happy to take the adjournment of the debate on the point of order I have raised.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND (PROTECTION OF THE UNBORN CHILD)—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Guay, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill S-7, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (protection of the unborn child).—(Honourable Senator Guay, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as you know, Senator Guay has retired. Therefore, in to keep this item on the order paper, I will ask that it stand in my name.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands in name of Senator Frith.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SEVENTY-FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Seventy-First Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (employees salaries; newspaper subscriptions; Debates Branch), presented in the Senate on 14th December, 1990.-(Honourable Senator LeBlanc, P.C. (Beauséjour)).

[Senator Doody.]

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I move that this report be adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE ESTIMATES, 1990-91

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of December 14, 1990, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1991 (Sessional Paper No. 342-913).

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I indicated on Friday that I wanted to make some comments on this particular motion. Senator Doody indicated in his work plan on Friday that he would like to have the supply bill that is based upon these Estimates passed by the end of this week. That means the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will be obligated to complete its study of the Supplementary Estimates and then report. The supply bill would then be called for second reading and be put through all its stages. I understand that is the practice we have followed in the past.

• (1450)

Honourable senators, that is a tall order for the Senate at this time, particularly in view of the fact that these Supplementary Estimates were tabled in the House of Commons on September 23 and then tabled in the Senate on November 27, a full twenty days ago. At any time since November 27 it was open to the government to move that those Supplementary Estimates go to committee for examination. We understand the government had other priorities and that it stayed compulsively with Bill C-62 and avoided bringing forward any other business, including the reference of the Supplementary Estimates to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Today, the government will have to accept the results of its priorities—that it really is a tall order, as I have stated, to have the committee examine and report, and to ask the Senate to pass the bill all in several days. This is so in light of the fact that the sums called for are not small or routine, and particularly because the sums are attached to major policy questions which deserve examination.

For example, there is a considerable sum of money involved in support of the operations of the Canadian Forces in the Persia. Gulf. We have been interested in that major question because it is apparent that, unless something very significant occurs between now and early 1991, war is likely to break out in the Persian Gulf. It is unclear to what extent Canada will be involved and whether Canadian ground forces will be committed to the pursuit of any such war.

I must admit that some weeks ago we did have a very short debate in the Senate on the Persian Gulf. On that occasion, I think everyone who spoke sounded a note of caution to the government about its policy in that regard. Since that time I have raised the possibility of having a further discussion, in light of the resolution passed at the United Nations which is interpreted to empower that organization to apply force in the Persian Gulf situation. That certainly deserves some attention in the Senate especially now when public opinion, even in the United States, is deeply divided about American policy, and because of the significant testimony given before congressional committees of the United States concerning sanctions, and the belief, supported by eminent authorities, that sanctions ought to be given a chance to work before the United States commits itself to force in the resolution of the impasse in the Persian Gulf.

I ask honourable senators whether it is appropriate to pass over this question without asking some very important questions in committee about the direction of Canadian policy. Are we committed only—and will we continue to be committed only—to the enforcement of sanctions which, hitherto, has been our main duty; or will we be gradually drawn into the commitment of ground forces in the Persian Gulf?

Testimony given by the Director of the Central Intelligence Agency indicate that sanctions have been extremely effective in cutting off supplies to Iraq and that their main disability is the time factor. However, it will take much longer for sanctions to have their desired effects—in fact, until some several months into 1991. One wonders whether Canada ought not to be advising the American government to hold off and observe the impact of sanctions before a crucial decision is taken.

I do not intend to go into the matter further, but I believe it is a matter that we ought to examine in committee and on which we should hear some evidence as to the intentions of the government.

The press release issued by the Department of National Defence in connection with the tabling of the Supplementary Estimates is quite ambiguous with respect to what is intended. It says that the Canadian government's decision to deploy Canadian Forces to the Persian Gulf, together with its responses to Quebec's request for assistance at Oka and Chateauguay, have imposed dramatic, unforseen pressures on the national defence budget. It says that additional funds are therefore required to continue supporting Canadian Forces operations in the Gulf in their current role, and to maintain an acceptable level of general military preparedness for our forces in Canada. It also says that supporting CF operations in the Persian Gulf is currently our highest priority.

When one asks what the future holds, one is not given much in the way of guidance or information. The press release concludes with a paragraph called "Future Presence in the Gulf", and it says that Canada's future presence in the Gulf will depend on how events unfold over time, and that much of the preparatory work for any ongoing commitments which Canada may have in the next fiscal year must be carried out well in advance of actual operations.

Honourable senators, I wonder what the preparatory work is and what are the actual operations contemplated. I would certainly like the committee and the Senate to focus upon this matter and to find out where we are going. It may also be of passing interest to inquire in the committee of the activities at Oka and Châteauguay, and what the implications are, not only financially but socially and politically, as a result of the participation of Canadian forces in those activities.

● (1500)

It will be of some interest to honourable senators to know that of the total of, I think, $4.8 billion in additional funds required in these Estimates, an additional $2.5 billion is required to finance the interest costs on the national debt. Honourable senators will recall that, in the budget of 1990, the Minister of Finance announced that the deficit would total $28 billion. Indeed, the budget itself was built around that stable figure of $28 billion. We all remember the circumstances at the time, and Mr. Wilson brought in a budget with a projected deficit of $28 billion. It was fairly reasonable at the time to be skeptical, and economic analysts were totally skeptical as to the validity of that figure, particularly in view of the possibility of increased interest rates. However, the government held fast to the figure, despite steadily soaring interest rates, until finally, in September, the Minister of Finance announced a revised figure of $30.5 billion. Is that a valid figure at this particular time? What are the prospects for the future budgetary situation?

Honourable senators, I will not go much further in underlining the importance of the committee study. We do know that $257 million is requested to prepare and plan for the administration and introduction of the goods and services tax, for such things as advertising. It has been suggested that that figure is as unstable as the deficit figure projected by the Minister of Finance. A series of program cuts are proposed.

In addition to the request for additional funds in excess of $4 billion, the government is proposing, as an economy measure and parallel to the increased costs of the Gulf operation, to reduce program costs of various departments in excess of $300 million. When the President of the Treasury Board announced the Supplementary Estimates, no details were given with respect to where the reductions in program costs would be achieved. We do know that, for example, ACOA, the development agency for the Atlantic Provinces, will be affected. We also know that the Western Diversification Fund will be affected, along with a variety of other government services, but no detail has been given. These are some of the items that are involved.

Honourable senators, perhaps it is worth recalling, for the benefit of honourable senators who were not here at the time, that in 1989 a supply bill calling for supplementary spending was introduced in the House of Commons and allowed to languish there. The House of Commons and the Senate were adjourned, and the government, first of all, exhausted its contingency fund and then financed its operations by special warrants. We took a dim view of that. We said it was a wrong policy, but we were assured by the government that their legal advisors had told them that it was a perfectly legal operation. So, one wonders why we cannot adjourn now and finance all of this by contingency fund and special warrants. It was done in 1989. We were sent packing at that time, and the government financed its operations by that method.

Has there been a conversion in the government's point of view, or is this merely a way of saying to the members of the opposition, "You have to pass this by such and such a date or we will bring the Senate back on a certain day"? I remind the government, and senators opposite, that they had an alternative in 1989 to finance these operations. I think it would be a disgrace if they did, but we have witnessed a number of disgraces, and we witnessed one in 1989, when the operations were financed by special warrants.

Honourable senators, with these very preliminary remarks, I have no difficulty whatsoever in supporting the reference of these supplementaries to the committee. They ought to have been sent several weeks ago, but better late than never. Don't find fault with us if we cannot accommodate you in a few days after you have allowed these Supplementary Estimates to languish when they could have been sent to the committee virtually three weeks ago.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition has told us that he and his colleagues have a number of matters that they wish to raise in the course of consideration of these Supplementary Estimates, matters upon which they wish to question and presumably comment. He has referred in particular to Canada's role, and the role of Canadian troops, in the Gulf crisis; to the situations at Châteauguay and Oka last summer; to the cost of servicing the national debt; and to the cost of implementing the GST. He has also referred to $300 million in reductions in program expenditures announced earlier by the government.

The best way that the Senate can expedite consideration of those matters, of course, is by passing Senator Doody's motion, and the way that the government can expedite consideration is to produce the appropriate witness or witnesses on behalf of the government so that the committee considering the Supplementary Estimates can get on with its work.

• (1510)

Therefore, I invite honourable senators opposite to let us know, through the chairman of that committee, Senator Leblanc, the matters they wish to take up and in what order, so that we can produce the appropriate witness or witnesses on behalf of the government.

We do this in the hope that honourable senators opposite will be able to see their way clear, after consideration of these supplementary estimates, to report back before Christmas and let us have the supply bill, as is usually done.

[Senator MacEachen.]

If they cannot do so, then Senator MacEachen has correctly identified the alternatives that the government faces. There is the matter of invoking the provisions respecting Governor General's Warrants. There is also the possibility, the high probability, of having the Senate come back after the holiday to deal with the Estimates and with the supply bill, or some combination of both of those alternatives.

The only other point I wish to make is that, in considering what the situation should be after Christmas, it is not simply a question of passing the supply bill and one or two other bills that the government wanted passed this week. It ais also a matter of moving a number of bills now before the Senate, or that are expected to come before the Senate very shortly, to committees, so that the committees can do their work during the first few weeks of January. It would be our intention to allow that to happen and thus bring the Senate back rather later in January, if we have then succeeded before the holidays in referring a number of these bills to committees.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would clarify a point. Perhaps I did not hear the leader correctly, but as I understood what he said, he regards it as an available option to the government to run down the contingency fund, Vote 5 of the Treasury Board, and then, assuming that Parliament has not made a specific appropriation as requested in Supplementary Estimates (B), to have resort to Governor General's Warrants in the situation where Parliament is not available to deal with the request.

Is the leader saying that the deadline before the government will have resort to this alternative approach is January 3? When will the government shift off the course it is proposing this afternoon and resort to the course of action which it found acceptable, legal and constitutional in 1988-89?

Senator Murray: We have not placed a deadline before the Senate. Senator Doody indicated the other day the circumstances in which the government would propose an early return of the Senate versus a later return of the Senate after the Christmas holidays.

I have not worked out the date, and I must say that my colleagues have not given me a date on which it would be acceptable to use Governor General's Warrants. My recollection is that one may not use them within a certain number of days of a sitting—-

Senator Stewart: Two weeks.

Senator Murray: —of Parliament. So if the Senate were to adjourn on Friday next, December 21, then two weeks from then would be January 4. That would be the day on which it would be in order to use Governor General's Warrants.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, may I suggest—

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Doody, should I not put the question?

Senator Doody: Yes, Your Honour. You are absolutely correct.

The Hon. the Speaker: Then it is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Sylvain:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1991. (Sessional Paper No. 342-913).

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT DURING PLEASURE—ON DIVISION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I suggest that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure to await the arrival of the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General at approximately 3.25 p.m.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as I stated before, a suggestion is a euphemistic way of describing a motion, and if there is such a motion, I speak to that motion as I did on Friday. I will not repeat what I then said. My submission to the Senate today is exactly as it was on Friday last.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): And our opposition is the same.

Let me again refer to one question raised by Senator MacEachen and a number of others on Friday last; that is whether, when we receive a letter from Rideau Hall advising us that the Deputy of His Excellency is coming to the Senate for the purposes of giving Royal Assent to certain bills, it is necessary for us to issue an invitation, as it were, or to grant leave to the representative of the Crown to come to the Senate.

The government states that that is not necessary and that this is the Crown's chamber and that the representative of the Crown, the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, does not need an invitation to come to the Senate.

Further, in my experience here, what we have done in the past is not to move a motion to invite the Deputy of His Excellency into the chamber. The only motion has been one of convenience to honourable senators; that is, to adjourn, sometimes to the call of the bell, to await the arrival of the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General.

In any case, I shall go in a minute or two to greet him, as I have done in the past, and as my predecessors have done in the past, and the Black Rod will conduct us in here at approximately 3.30 p.m.

Senator Frith: On a point of order on the motion, I understand the position, and I am glad that the government has made its position clear. Apart from the form, whether or not it is a question of an invitation, the substance of the matter is whether or not the Deputy of the Governor General arrives here as a result of a motion that we will adjourn in order to have the deputy or the Governor General appear. That is the essence of the question, and that is the essence of the difference between the government and the opposition—at least the essence of the difference between Senator Murray's position and my position. Perhaps when we have a chance to do some research, we may be able to bring it again before the Senate, not on a point of order but in the form of an inquiry or, if necessary, on a point of order.

• (1520)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, in answer to Senator Frith, I must say that we have started doing some research going back to 1867, and I will have something to say about that later.

Senator Frith: I will be glad to hear what you have to say.

The Hon. the Speaker: The Deputy to the Governor General having arrived, is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adjourn during pleasure to await his arrival in this chamber?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: For the reasons said, on division.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable John Sopinka, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

> An Act to amend the statute law in relation to war veterans (Bill C-87, Chapter 43, 1990)
> An Act to apply federal laws and provincial laws to offshore areas and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof (Bill C-39, Chapter 44, 1990)
> An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act (Bill C-62, Chapter 45, 1990)
> An Act respecting the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons (Bill S-14, Chapter 46, 1990)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

• (1540)

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a brief point of order for the record regarding the motion to adjourn.

On several occasions—and let me pick last Friday as an example—when the Deputy Leader of the Government has moved, as he did not have to do today, that all remaining orders stand, I have pointed out that that is a motion and should be made and put to the Senate for debate and agreement. The motion to adjourn should then be put.

I checked the blues of last Friday. They do not reflect that, although I thought I did make the point. I have not checked the Minutes of the Proceedings, but I ask that the Minutes of the Proceedings and the Debates—but particularly the Minutes of the Proceedings—reflect the fact that the motion to stand remaining orders and the motion to adjourn are two separate motions.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 18, 1990

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON AMENDING FORMULAE—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that a message has been received from the House of Commons which reads as follows:

ORDERED,—That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consult broadly with Canadians and inquire into and report upon the process for amending the Constitution of Canada, including, where appropriate, proposals for amending one or more of the amending formulae, with particular reference to:

(i) the role of the Canadian public in the process;

(ii) the effectiveness of the existing process and formulae for securing constitutional amendments; and

(iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including those set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada";

That twelve Members of the House of Commons and five Members of the Senate be the Members of the Special Joint Committee: such Members on the part of the House of Commons to be designated upon report of the Striking Committee no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion, which report shall be deemed concurred in upon presentation;

That the Committee have the power to appoint from among its Members such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the Committee have the power, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the Committee, or a sub-committee, have power to travel, and hold public hearings, within Canada;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings or of proceedings of its sub-committees, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons;

That the parties represented on the Committee be granted allocations for expert assistance with the Committee work in proportion to the representation of the said parties in the House of Commons;

That the Committee be empowered to retain the service of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed available by the Joint Chairmen;

That the Committee submit its report not later than July 1, 1991, provided that, if the House of Commons is not sitting, the report will be deemed submitted on the day such report is deposited with the Clerk of the House of Commons and with the Clerk of the Senate;

That changes in membership of the Committee be effective immediately after notification thereof, signed by the Member acting as Chief Whip of any recognized party, has been filed with the Clerk of the Committee;

That the quorum of the Committee be nine Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken so long as both Houses are represented, and the Joint Chairmen are authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six Members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, five Members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

ATTEST

Robert Marleau
The Clerk of the House of Commons

Honourable senators, when shall this message be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Murray, message placed on Orders of the Day for consideration on Friday, December 21, 1990.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have a number of petitions to present on behalf of 2,633 Alberta residents. The first reads:

[English]

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by residents of communities of Alberta who ask the Senate to reject the goods and services tax bill. These people live in such communities as Warner, Calgary, Milk River, Edmonton—

Senator Simard: Why not just table them?

Senator Hébert: Why don't you be silent and obey your leader?

In any case, there is a total of 2,633 people who signed these petitions. These people were not listened to by the government.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF FRENCH-SPEAKING PARLIAMENTARIANS

TABLING OF ELEVENTH ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Saurel): With leave of the Senate, honourable senators, I have the honour to table in both official languages the Eleventh Report of activities of the International Association of French-Speaking Parliamentarians, Canadian Section.

OFFICIAL REPORT

CORRECTION

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, before Question Period, I should like to advise the Senate that yesterday, during the course of an exchange with Senator Stewart of Antigonish-Guysborough on the subject of Governor General's warrants, I misstated the relevant provision of the Financial Administration Act. I should like to correct the record now.

I do not have yesterday's Hansard, but I believe I stated yesterday that the Governor General's warrants could not be used for 14 days following the adjournment of Parliament. I went on to calculate that, assuming an adjournment of the Senate on December 21, the warrants could not be used until January 4, 1991. That was incorrect. The 14-day provision relates to the return of Parliament; in other words, Governor General's warrants cannot be used by the government 14 days prior to the return of either house. I will simply read the relevant section, section 30(5) of the Financial Administration Act, which states:

> For the purposes of this section, Parliament shall be deemed to be not in session when it is under adjournment sine die or to a day more than two weeks after the day the Governor in Council made the order directing the preparation of the special warrant.

I wrote to Senator Stewart regarding this matter this morning and advised him of this and also that I would be attempting to correct the record this afternoon.

QUESTION PERIOD

AGRICULTURE

COLLAPSE OF GATT NEGOTIATIONS—EFFECT ON WESTERN GRAIN PRODUCERS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, for a number of days I have been wanting to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate what the government intends to do regarding the complete collapse of the international grain market and the consequent disaster that has fallen on the grain producers of western Canada.

I know I received some kind of written reply to a question I put forth on November 29, when it appeared that the GATT discussions were going to collapse. The reply I received deals with the government's response as of November 22 and November 29. However, honourable senators, now that those discussions have collapsed, and in spite of the fact that Director General Dunkel has called for a resumption of meetings—without specifying them, he has suggested that there might be some meetings in January, the basis of which we are not clear on—I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could tell us what hope the grain producers in western Canada have now that these talks have collapsed.

STATEMENT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION TABLED

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I can do no more than to table, which I am prepared to do, a statement by the Canadian delegation at the conclusion of the Brussels session of the Uruguay Round trade negotiations. I would also repeat what has been stated by a spokesman for the government; namely, that we were very disappointed to learn of the suspension of the MTN talks in Brussels. We had great hopes for the Uruguay Round. We have worked at it intensively for over four years. While there was important progress in many areas, the failure to overcome differences with respect to agriculture, particularly given the lack of flexibility on the part of the European community, caused the breakdown. Officials will now attempt to determine whether there is a basis for further meaningful negotiations during January and February. Mr. Crosbie remains hopeful on this point, as he indicated in media interviews today. Canada remains fully committed to continued trade liberalization, including effective implementation of the Free Trade Agreement with the United States and other hemispheric and Asian trade initiatives. This is fundamental to our long-term growth and competitiveness.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, that is some kind of reply, but it is no answer. I asked what these producers can now look forward to and who is to blame. The grain producers in the United States and in the European Community are looking at returns from several sources, including the treasury, of prices that are at least double and, in many cases, 300 or 400 per cent more than Canadian producers can look forward to.

So far we have had indications from the Deputy Prime Minister that he is going to attend another meeting or two, but there is nothing solid. In view of the other problems, such as the monetary policy that is bleeding farmers white and taking everything they have through no fault of their own, can the minister not give us some hope as to what these people can look forward to? Can they not have some support from the Government of Canada with respect to this disastrous problem?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is obvious to the honourable senator, as it is to me and everyone else, that what we need first is an agreement under the GATT which will end some of these subsidy wars that are creating such havoc in agricultural markets. We are continuing to work toward that end, and there is nothing more I can say on that point.

The senator is also aware, because I have referred to it on several occasions in this house, of discussions between the federal government and the provinces relating to both short-term arrangements and the longer-term safety net for farmers, which have made good progress. There was a meeting in November and another in December at both the official and ministerial levels. I have no further information to offer on those meetings at the moment, but I shall ask Mr. Mazankowski whether there is something further I can bring into the house over the next day or two.

Senator Olson: I take it that what the Government Leader has just said is that the farmers in this country will have to wait until the subsidy wars are over before his government intends to take any action. I hope that that is modified somewhat by the Minister of Agriculture when he finally comes forward and says something about what will happen.

We have heard about a lot of fluff, which might be taken for discussion, but no action. Some of these producers are reaching the stage where they cannot live on fluff any longer. A lot of them are being run off their farms on to the road allowance, if senators know what I mean. In town we say that you are run out of your house on to the street. In rural areas, you are run off on to the road allowance.

This is no academic matter. I am talking about the real facts of life out there. Can the minister now give us some indication of what the Prime Minister meant two or three years ago, when he declared that the government would not abandon the farmers to this international subsidy war? Is that all the hope the minister is ready to give to the grain producers of western Canada? Is he only prepared to say that we will probably have to fluff around a little more until the subsidy war is over? Surely he has something more positive to say than that.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I have indicated, I will ask Mr. Mazankowski whether he has anything further to report on this matter. If so, I will bring it forward during oral Question Period before the holidays.

Meanwhile, if the honourable senator wishes to engage in debate, I suggest that he take advantage of an early opportunity to do so. It should not, however, be done in the course of oral Question Period.

Senator Olson: I would be happy to take advantage of a debate if I were sure that the minister would be here to answer the questions. By my recollection, I have placed three or four motions on the order paper dealing with farm policies, disasters in western Canada and various other related matters. The minister was just not here when those subjects were brought up and we did not get any answers. We did not even get the decency of a reply to our questions.

Honourable senators, I am not the one being hurt. I receive a little pay from being a senator and I can get along, but I know a lot of people who cannot. They would like to know a little more positively what is going to happen. Could some arrangements be made to have the Minister of Agriculture appear in this chamber so that we can put those questions to him? Apparently none of the Conservative members from Alberta want to ask him questions on the floor of the other place.

Producers are getting tired of this situation. They are not only getting tired of it, they cannot stand it any more. Surely there is more hope than what we have heard thus far. Surely the minister could do more than just complain that we are having a debate at the wrong time. We will have a debate. Will the minister appear later on when some of those orders will be debated—at some time, I hope, before the Senate adjourns—so that we can get down to the substance of this problem?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if Senator Olson wishes to speak to one of those inquiries, I will undertake to examine what he has to say and either personally, or through a colleague, bring in a statement in the debate on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

GRAIN SALES LOSSES—MAINTENANCE OF INITIAL PRICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, press reports released in the last two or three days state, in effect, that the Canadian Wheat Board has lost, or is in the process of losing, between $700 million and $900 million on the grain sales for the current crop year. Could the minister ask his cabinet colleagues to give a commitment that they are at least intend to maintain the initial price where it is, notwithstanding that it is half of what it was 12 years ago in terms of 1977 or 1975 dollars?

● (1420)

We are talking about 1990 dollars. In 1975 dollars, grain rpoducers received between $5 and $6 a bushel. Now they are getting somewhere around $3 or a little less for the same quality in 1990 dollars.

Can the Minister find out whether or not the farmers can at least have the comfort of knowing that the government will not reduce the price still further.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will obtain what information is available at this time on that question.

Senator Olson: This is ridiculous, honourable senators. The Minister acts as if he does not go to cabinet meetings. Surely this has been discussed in cabinet. To come here and say, "Well, I don't know about this and I don't know about that", isn't quite good enough.

I used to go to cabinet meetings, and when there was a great tragedy in the country for one sector or another, we discussed those things. For the minister to come here now and say that he does not know anything about it is incredible. I cannot believe that he does not know what the government's attitude towards this problem will be. Surely he can tell us now.

I have been through this exercise before. We raise these important questions with the government leader, and then that is the last we hear from him for days about these problems. The only thing that changes is that it gets worse the next time. Is the minister telling me that he does not know what is going on, or is he saying that the cabinet does not discuss these things?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I cheerfully confess that I am not in a position to reply in detail to every one of my colleagues on all the programs and policies in the respective departments. I try to give such information that I can be reasonably confident is current and accurate. However, I think the course of prudence on my part is to take questions such as those put today by Senator Olson as notice, and to obtain the information and bring in a written reply.

I have also indicated that, if he wishes to take part in one of the Notices of Inquiries that he has already put down, I undertake, on behalf of the government, to listen to what he has to say or to read it in Hansard and to come back here and address the issues that he raises in the course of the debate. More than that, I cannot do. There is only one member of the cabinet sitting in this chamber, and he cannot be expected to answer in detail for each of his colleagues.

Senator Olson: Finally—I should never say that, but I do once in a while. One is never really sure, Senator Roblin, whether the government leader might say something that prompts another supplementary question. I am not sure about that at the moment.

In any event, I think the Minister should give an undertaking. The calendar on the desk indicates that it is December 18th and we may not be sitting next week. Perhaps we will; I am not sure.

There are some people out there who would like to know what the government's attitude is now. Can the Minister give us an undertaking that he will come back with some positive replies and answers to the questions I have asked today? Will he come back with that tomorrow?

I do not know whether the government leader has to go to a cabinet meeting this afternoon. I will raise a number of questions this afternoon or before we adjourn today. I would like him to give us an undertaking that he will come here with some information that is positive, and will give some hope to the people whose plea I am making on the floor of the chamber today.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Honourable Senator Olson knows that I cannot undertake to bring in a reply to a particular question on a particular day.

Senator Olson: I used to do it all the time.

Senator Murray: My honourable friend used to do it all the time. That is not to say that he was able to honour those undertakings for reasons that he knows as well as I do.

I should tell the honourable senator that I will be here tomorrow. I will not be here on Thursday afternoon, but I will be here on Friday. I will do my best to obtain answers to the questions that he has asked.

Meanwhile, I think I should place on the record of the house something of what the government's record has been in dealing with questions asked by honourable senators. Going into today's sitting there were 24 outstanding questions that remained to be answered by way of delayed replies. Since September 25, the government has brought in 92 delayed answers to questions. Anyone who has sat here for any length of time will appreciate what an outstanding record that has been and what a sharp constrast it is with the situation—

Senator Olson: You have lots of staff. That is not a great record.

Senator Murray: —we faced when the honourable senator was Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Olson: When the "honourable senator" that you are talking about was Leader of the Government in the Senate we kept track, too. We anticipated the questions that the opposition would ask 90 per cent of the time and had the answers in front of us. That is the record of the "honourable senator" whom you talk about. I kept track of it.

What we have now is somewhat better than what we had a few minutes ago. The Leader of the Government has given an undertaking to come into the chamber with some replies. For that I am grateful. I will report that to the people who are vitally interested in this matter.

THE SENATE

PROCESS AND PROGRESS OF LEGISLATION—VALIDITY OF DELAYS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Prime Minister, the Honourable Harvie Andre and the Honourable Otto Jelinek, on more than one occasion, have stated publicly that the Senate has no constitutional, legal or moral right to delay, amend, or defeat legislation passed by the duly elected House of Commons. I want to know if this is the official government interpretation of the Constitution and if it is the interpretation of the Leader of the Government in this chamber.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the Prime Minister, Mr. Andre and all ministers are well aware of the provisions of the Constitution concerning the Senate. With the exception of amendments to the Constitution and the question of originating money bills here, the powers of the Senate are virtually equal to those of the House of Commons.

The question that arises always in these cases—and we have debated it on numerous occasions in the past couple of years—is whether in 1990 it makes sense and is appropriate for an appointed body to exercise to the full the powers that were accorded to it in the Constitution of 1867. The question is whether honourable senators opposite want a ninteenth century or a twentieth century Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It could have been amended in 1982. You know our present Constitution was amended.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: There are ninteenth century senators on the other side.

Senator Murray: As I indicated, I thought that a useful compromise was made some years ago when the so-called Hayden formula was adopted providing for pre-study of bills, with the opportunity to make improvements, changes and amendments in those bills even before they left the House of Commons; that is to say, without the polarization and confrontation that is involved in amending those bills after they arrive here. However, that is a subject for debate.

I want to assure the honourable senator that we are all aware of what the Constitution provides, but there are also conventions to be observed. One of the conventions that had been observed until recently is that the Senate found ways other than confrontation to play a useful role in the legislative process.

● (1430)

Senator Sparrow: Honourable senators, I would like the Leader of the Government to try, if he possibly can, to answer the question which I just asked. It is whether the Senate has the constitutional, legal or moral right to delay, amend or defeat legislation. The Prime Minister and the other ministers I mentioned have been telling Canadians that we do not have that right. I am asking the Leader of the Government in the Senate today if he believes, and so, whether he will inform this house—or at least inform me—that he believes that we have those rights. Without talking about making sense, creating delays or about anything that went on previously, I ask the question because it is important. If this house has a duty to perform, then it is within those constitutional bounds. Please answer my question.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Senate's moral rights are, of course, always a matter of judgment, opinion and debate. The Senate's legal and constitutional rights are spelled out in the Constitution Acts of 1867 and 1982 when the amending process was agreed to.

The honourable senator purports to quote from statements made by the Prime Minister and other ministers to the effect that the Senate, he says, has no constitutional, legal or moral right to do certain things. I would like to see those statements.

Senator Sparrow: I wonder if you could try to answer the question. Do you believe, as Leader of the Government in this place, that the Senate has a constitutional or legal right to delay, amend or defeat legislation? That is the question I am asking. Do you say that, yes, it has that right; or do you say, no, it does not have that right?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have just said what the Constitution Acts of 1867 and 1982 provide—

Senator Sparrow: That is not my question.

Senator Murray: I am bound by the Constitution, as is the honourable senator.

Senator Sparrow: I am asking you what your opinion is. Do you believe that the Senate has a constitutional right? I am frustrated, and you can see it. On television and in the print media the Prime Minister and Harvie Andre have been quoted as telling Canadians that we do not have the constitutional, legal or moral right. Are you defending that position? If we do not have that right, then what in the hell are we doing here?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is misstating the position of the government on that matter. We cannot take a position which is contrary to the Constitution.

I stated in reply to the honourable senator a few moments ago that the Constitution Acts of 1867 and 1982 provide that the Senate has constitutional powers virtually equal to those of the House of Commons, except in respect of originating money bills and amending the Constitution, with respect to which we have only a suspensive veto.

Senator Sparrow: Honourable senators, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate make it clear somewhere or other that it is improper and basically lying to the Canadian people when the statement is made that we do not have the constitutional right to amend or defeat legislation?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am unaware that such a statement has ever been made by the Prime Minister or by Mr. Andre.

Senator Sparrow: Bring some more lies to us any time you like; we are getting used to it.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

DETERMINATION OF INITIAL AND FINAL PRICES—PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ASSISTANCE—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I have two questions to ask of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. They relate to what my friend from Alberta, Senator Olson, referred to when he asked a question concerning the prices set for grains in this country by the Canadian Wheat Board. I ask the minister to tell us, or to find out for us whether this is something which is decided in cabinet, or if it is something which is decided entirely by the Wheat Board itself.

I got the impression that the honourable senator felt the cabinet should be discussing the initial and final prices to be paid for grains to producers in the west. However, I thought it was the duty and responsibility of the Wheat Board itself to make that determination. I should like to know who makes that determination.

The second area that was of concern to the senator, and to all of us, is provision for alleviation of the short-term fiscal problems which some producers, particularly in western Canada, are facing today. What short-term arrangements may be made to assist them?

Senator Olson's question and his comments left me with the impression that your answer is that the producers in western Canada must stand still and wait and see; that, I believe, was the term he used. I would like to know whether or not that is correct. I was informed—and perhaps you can confirm this—that the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act has been supplying some $1.2 billion of assistance to grain producers in western Canada.

Senator Olson: You cancelled that a couple of years ago.

Senator Barootes: The first $50,000 is interest-free, and the remainder will bear interest. This amount pertains to 52,744 grain producers. I believe the same conditions apply to a lesser extent to the Advance Payments for Crops Act, which pertains to eastern farmers.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate confirm whether or not those are actual facts and if that is the short-term alleviation that may be available to our producers in the west?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, there has been an agreement between the federal government and the provinces in the last little while on some short-term measures. It is for the purpose of obtaining further details on this and related matters that I have taken Senator Olson's questions as notice. I have also undertaken to participate, or have a colleague participate, on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture in the debate on any inquiry that Senator Olson puts down on this matter.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The honourable senator asked who makes the decision as to the amount of the initial payment.

Senator Barootes: The payment for grains to producers.

Senator Sparrow: I would like to have the answer to that question as well.

Senator Barootes: My question was this: Does the cabinet determine that or does the Wheat Board determine that?

Senator Sparrow: Yes, indeed, that was the question. The Honourable Charles Mayer, on behalf of the government, announced the initial price. I would be interested in that answer.

[Senator Barootes.]

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS AND GRAIN—
REINSTATEMENT OF INTEREST-FREE PROVISIONS IN ACTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Daniel Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a further supplementary question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

This MATTER was discussed as hypothetical at the time, but is no longer hypothetical. Under the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, the interest-free provisions were removed by Bill C-36. They have now been reinstated on an ad hoc basis, as described by Senator Barootes. Those payments are welcomed and much needed for prairie grain producers. Will they be treated differently in terms of our trade relationship with the United States and under the GATT than they would have been treated if the legislation had never been passed, and the interest-free loans were a matter of right?

• (1440)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will seek to obtain a statement on that matter.

OFFICIAL REPORT

CORRECTION

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to make a very serious correction to Hansard.

Last Friday, December 14, 1990, at the bottom left-hand column on page 4864, I said:

> Is the Senate not to have anything to say about this? The Deputy Leader says that he can come now, but I think we need to refer to the rule book.

The Debates of the Senate then continues as follows:

> Senator Doody: The case is already closed.
> Senator Olson: We want the Mace back here. The Senate is in session.

There was no motion passed by the Senate to adjourn. Senator Doody is then reported as having said:

> Senator Doody: Make up your mind.
>
> Senator Frith: Did you not say that you do not need the motion?
>
> Senator Doody: I do not care.

Then, at the top of the next column it reads as follows:

> Senator Olson: Put the Mace back on the table.

No one was authorized to take the Mace off the table. There was no motion to adjourn, but I saw someone come and take the Mace off the table. He had no business to do it and I told him so. The record then goes on as follows:

> Senator Sparrow: There is a motion to adjourn and we do not have the Mace on the table. What did we do with the motion to adjourn?

That was a perfectly legitimate, logical question to put at that moment. Then the Honourable the Speaker said:

> Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, you will proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that house that it is the desire of the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General that they attend immediately in the Senate Chamber.

That is all it says up to that point. It then goes on as follows:

> The Senate having been informed that the House of Commons had adjourned, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General retired.

Honourable senators, that is not what the "blues", which I have here, say. Right after the Speaker directs the Black Rod to proceed to the Commons, the "blues" read as follows:

> Senator Olson: Your Honour, I wish to advise you that I am a Member of the Queen's Privy Council of Canada. I took the oath and was sworn in to that office on July 6, 1968.—

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Dispense.

Senator Olson:

> —My name is H. A. Olson. At that time I took an oath that I would give advice to her Majesty the Queen of Canada upon all seasonable occasions.

Honourable senators, that is not in Hansard. I went on to say:

> Today we have a situation where we believe that Her Majesty or her representatives have not been given all the advice that is necessary to deal with the situation that is before us today.
> For example, Bill C-62 was allegedly passed, but it was not; it was dealt with illegally in the upper chamber of the Parliament of Canada. There is no question in the minds of about 50 per cent—

I think I should have said "49 per cent"— > —of the members of this chamber that that is the case. Law and order were set aside and the Speaker, in collusion with the government, bulldozed Bill C-62 through this chamber.

Honourable senators, that is what I said but that is not in Hansard. It is not where the people can read it. I went on to say—and I have to get this recorded properly:

● (1450)

> We do not ask you to permanently stop this important tax bill, but we ask you to withhold Royal Assent on this bill, or to refuse Royal Assent until the remedial actions that we have already initiated are dealt with. There are several.

Senator Barootes: Rave on!

Senator Olson:

> One of them is, of course, the fact that there are eight senators in this chamber whose qualifications, and the fact that they could be appointed over and above the 104, are in question. That matter has been referred and an appeal has been accepted by the Ontario Court of Appeal. They have set aside two days next month for an appeal against the rulings. Those dates are January 21 and January 22, 1991.
> The second thing that we have initiated is a motion that is still before this chamber to censure the perpetrator of this illegal action, namely Senator Charbonneau, who was acting in the position of Speaker. We have not yet completed the consideration of that motion.
> Therefore we believe that you should withhold Royal Assent until we have completed dealing with these remedial actions that are now only partially underway.
>
> I should advise you also, as one of the Queen's Privy Councillors of Canada, that I was present in this chamber when members of this upper house of Canada's Parliament were denied their right to speak; their ancient and undoubted right to come before this chamber of Canada and give their views. I, for example, have been denied my right to speak on third reading. All of the members from northern Canada have been denied their right to speak on third reading of this bill. Although this bill would have a profound effect on the lives of northerners, their representatives here have not even had an opportunity to speak.
> Therefore, I suggest to you that you withhold Royal Assent until the Court of Appeal of Ontario, and perhaps even the Supreme Court of Canada, can discover whether or not Section 26 of the Constitution of Canada was complied with. That should at least be completed. We have our remedies; we are not asking you to provide a remedy for these illegal situations. They have already been initiated but they have not yet been completed.
> Therefore, I have to say to you that I believe that you should withhold Royal Assent on Bill C-62, which deals with a major change in the taxation of Canadians. I realize, of course, that it is an unprecedented action, but we have been advised by the government supporters that, when you have an unprecedented situation, you need to take unprecedented action to deal with it.
> Therefore, I suggest that you refuse, for now—not permanently, but temporarily—Royal Assent to this bill until we have completed the remedies that I have just described to you.

Now, honourable senators, all that has been left out of Hansard for Friday, December 14. It then goes on from there to say:

> The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Honourable senators, who has the right to decide that things should be taken out? First of all, we have to find out who it is who believes they have the authority to take the Mace off the table before the Senate is adjourned. I do not know who has that authority. Who has the right to strip out a whole page of Hansard? I do not think anybody has that right, but that is what they did.

The reporters were here and recorded my remarks exactly as they were delivered. Why have they been taken out? Who has the right to decide what goes into Hansard and what does not go into Hansard? Nobody. Nobody has that right.

Therefore, honourable senators, I request or demand, whichever is the right word, that Debates of the Senate for Friday, December 14, be reprinted and that everything I said on that day be reinstated in that volume. It was a "fix" by somebody, and I think it is despicable. I thought we had seen the absolute new low in corruption last week, but now, when they even try to fix the record, it gets worse. It gets worse day by day. Who is guiding this? Surely, the house leader ought to have picked that up right away, because he had a few things to say in there. Senator Murray made a little speech right on the floor of the chamber at that time about the House of Commons being adjourned.

Above everything else, honourable senators, surely we have a right to have an accurate record and it is not. There are things missing from it. How did they get left out? We have it all recorded here in the "blues". The reporters took it all down very faithfully. Somebody out in the back there, or in the front, or somewhere, decided that they would strip that page out. Why? It happened. It is a fact.

I will tell you something else: The missing part had better be reinstated and the whole of the Volume reprinted. Perhaps it would be a good idea to do things honestly and in an upright fashion, for once. If it is not fixed, I intend to bring it up every day for the next ten years!

Senator Doyle: Oh, no!

Senator Olson: I am here until October 6 in the year 2000. It is just preposterous and outrageous that some people here think they can fix Hansard, so that it does not even record what was said. I want it fixed. I have that right.

Senator Buckwold: Find out who did it.

Senator Olson: We will find out who did it eventually, but those who did it should hang their heads in shame. They have no right to interfere with the Hansard, the record of this place. Who authorized that my remarks be stripped out of Hansard?

In any event, I do not want to turn this into a debate or a speech today, but everyone in this place knows that it is wrong to do things like that. Therefore, I will wait until tomorrow to find out who was in charge of doing this. It is so preposterous. I do not know anyone who has the right to take one word out of Hansard, let alone a whole page. It is unprecedented. Perhaps these guys opposite have become so completely immune to obeying the law that they think they can just thumb nuff their noses in the face of law and order, because this is the worst I have ever heard.

I do not know whether the Speaker thinks he has the authority to fix Hansard. He is supposed to be one of the senior officers around here. I will have more to say about that when the motion of Senator Stanbury comes up, but this is a new low and I want this action fixed, repaired, or remedied. I tell you, I am just not going to stand for it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Do you have no comment, Senator Murray?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have no comment because I have no information on the matter. Period.

Senator Frith: Well, that's a comment.

Senator Olson: I will give you the information. Here are the "blues". I am not going to give them to you; you can obtain a copy. Here is the Hansard that does not have the remarks in it.

Senator Murray: Your seat is over there, Senator.

Senator Olson: Here is the Hansard where they are not printed, and here are the "blues" where they are!

Senator Murray: Your seat is over there. Pray resume your seat there.

Senator Olson: Don't say you do not have any information, because you have access to the right information.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is not the Leader of the Government or, to the best of my knowledge, anyone on this side who is in charge of the reporters and the editing and production of Hansard. I received the document at the same time the honourable senator did. I had not noticed that his intervention, at an inappropriate time, was omitted from Hansard. I am not at all sure that it is appropriate that it be carried by Hansard since it was delivered during what was expected to be the Royal Assent ceremony.

Senator Olson: There was no adjournment of the Senate.

Senator Murray: I beg the honourable senator's pardon, but the Deputy to the Governor General was here and the Black Rod had been sent to the House of Commons to invite the members of the House of Commons to come here, or to acquaint them that the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was here waiting for them, and that is not a time when debate proceeds or honourable senators make speeches.

• (1500)

Senator Olson: I know that for evil to prevail it only takes good men to do nothing. If we do nothing, you will get away with this kind of garbage day after day. We know you will continue to violate the rules and continue committing unlawful acts, yet you stand there and say we are being mischievous or something, because we are asking you to stick to the rules.

I can tell you that I do not intend to stand by and do nothing about the outrageous things you have done, and I know that my colleagues feel the same way.

CANADIAN HERITAGE LANGUAGES INSTITUTE BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Robertson, seconded by the Honourable Senator

MacDonald (Halifax), for the second reading of the Bill C-37, An Act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute.—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I am going to ask that this matter stand today. Yesterday's Hansard is not available, so I have not had the benefit of reading the speech given by the Honourable Senator Robertson. I, therefore, beg to stand this matter for another day.

Order Stands.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon.Nathan Nurgitz moved the second reading of Bill C-79, to amend the Parliament of Canada Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-79 has been discussed by the leadership on both sides of the house. I will simply highlight a few of the features of the bill, the most significant being that this bill brings about amendments to the organization and structure of what is known in the House of Commons as the Board of Internal Economy. These amendments are essentially housekeeping in nature.

The bill also brings about amendments that allow the board to make bylaws governing the use of and accounting for funds, goods, services and premises provided by Parliament. The bill brings about amendments which grant the board "exclusive authority" to determine the propriety of use by members of money, goods, services and premises made available for carrying out their parliamentary functions, and to issue opinions to members of the House of Commons on these matters. An amendment was added in committee that requires the board members to take an oath of fidelity and secrecy. When I address the bill as it affects the Senate, that is something which I hope to remember to point out, as we did not ask for it and therefore it is not provided for in this bill.

Another amendment requires a judge, rather than a justice of the peace, to hear requests for the issuance of a criminal process against a parliamentarian. This is a higher level of judicial consideration for the obtaining of search warrants, intrusive devices and things of that nature.

The special committee of the House of Commons adopted a provision that permits a peace officer investigating a parliamentarian to seek an opinion from the board at his or her discretion. If an opinion is received, it must be given to the judge, who must then consider that opinion in deciding whether to issue process.

Some senators and some members of the House of Commons were concerned that police forces do not understand the parliamentary rules governing MPs' and senators' budgets, and consequently do not always appreciate the difference between administrative and criminal issues regarding house or Senate budgets.

The significant provisions of Bill C-79 that affect the Senate are as follows: There is now in legislation the recognition of the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration established by the Senate under its rules, along with some statutory authority, and let me mention at the outset that in the interpretation of "Board of Internal Economy", it means the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. That is the committee chaired by our colleague, Senator LeBlanc.

That committee will have the power to make bylaws governing the use of and accounting for funds, goods, services and premises provided by Parliament. It will also grant to the committee "exclusive authority" to determine the propriety of use by senators of money, goods, services and premises. It also has the authority to provide opinions to senators on matters.

If a senator is in doubt as to the propriety of what he is doing, he can refer the matter to the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration for an opinion. That opinion, in the event of subsequent proceedings, would go before a judge. If someone laid an information against a senator for theft, and there was an opinion from the committee saying what the senator did was perfectly within that senator's rights, the judge would see that opinion.

An amendment was made in the House of Commons which requires a judge, rather than a justice of the peace, to hear requests for the issuance of a criminal process against a senator. That is a higher level of judicial hearing. It is not so much a matter of a law for the rich and a law for the poor, a law for everyone and another law for parliamentarians, but really a matter of a little special care because of reputations and things of that nature.

A peace officer can seek the opinion of our committee as to whether, in the opinion of that committee, a wrong has been committed. That opinion, if obtained by a peace officer, must be given to the judge when he is considering whether to issue process.

Like the Members of the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons, members of the Senate committee are not liable; that is, there is immunity.

Honourable senators will be pleased to know this because only three weeks ago, solicitors for Southam News issued a Statement of Claim against our committee and named all 12 members, including someone by the name of Robert Wood. I am sure they meant Senator Dalia Wood. In any event, I point out that the new legislation, if passed, gives immunity to anyone sitting on the committee.

The bill only deals with funds, goods, services and premises provided to senators to carry out their duties. This is quite different from theft from the Library of Parliament or fraud committed against the Parliamentary Restaurant. The bill simply deals with our own staff, the various budgets we have—the discretionary budgets and research budgets.

Upon receiving a complaint, a police force may verify with the committee whether the allegation appears to contravene our rules. The bylaws and opinions of the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons and the Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration should assist the RCMP or any other police force in assessing whether to proceed further, and on what basis. In fact, other jurisdictions go a lot further than any of the propositions raised in Bill C-79. I want to be clear on that. I think this is much less than is provided for in other jurisdictions. The Library of Parliament has done a comparative study of many other jurisdictions, and I will cite some of its examples.

● (1510)

In the United Kingdom the police do not attempt to execute searches without proper persmission. If the Speaker of the house of Commons deemed it advisable to permit one, the matter would be referred to that house, or, in the case of the House of Lords, to the House of Lords for consideration first. In Switzerland, authorization of the two chambers of the federal assembly is necessary in order to commence any kind of proceedings against a legislator. In Sweden, charges cannot be laid against a member for actions as a member without the consent of their Parliament. Procedures require a prosecutor to submit a written request to the Speaker, who will submit it to the chamber for a vote before proceedings can be taken. In Denmark, no legislator can be charged or imprisoned without the consent of their Parliament. In France, during a session of Parliament, no member may be charged or arrested in criminal matters without the authorization of the house of which that person is a member. In France, Greece, Germany and Belgium the consent of the Speaker is required to conduct searches.

Honourable senators, Bill C-79 in no way intends to establish rules for the Canadian Parliament similar to the other jurisdictions I mentioned. They are far more modest. The ability of our internal economy committee to issue bylaws on the use of members' funds and services and the requirement of police forces to solicit information based on those by-laws as part of the preliminary investigation before initiating court processes is meant only to help police confirm probable cause and to determine the merits of the allegation in terms of the breach of the rules of the respective house.

Honourable senators, I am sure most parliamentarians do not want to hide behind special laws, nor do we want to protect those who might want to break those laws. However, in this day and age of intense media scrutiny and the implied guilt that goes along with something as simple as a search warrant or even a police investigation, we are only aiming to protect reputations from unfair attacks. Members of both the House of Commons and this chamber have felt that media coverage of many events, including the coverage of the movement of this bill through the two houses, has not been fair, which demonstrates the ease with which either an MP's or a senator's reputation or motive could be questioned.

This bill arrives in the Senate chamber after considerable review and debate in the other place. It was studied and concluded in the absence of political partisanship. It has had a considerable amount of public discussion, and it is my sincere hope that the same responsible review can be conducted in this chamber. For the record, I would like to read one quotation from the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who said, in the committee of the other house:

[Senator Nurgitz .]

> . . . as the commissioner of the RCMP, I am absolutely delighted with all the work that has been done, with all of the attempts towards self-regulation, with all of the attempts to clarify the privileges and the disbursements which members of Parliament have entitlement. I think all of that will go a long way to clarifying the issues of concern.

In conclusion, honourable senators, in a day of high levels of public cynicism toward elected and appointed officials, I think it is important to pursue initiatives that can open the system, give guidance to parliamentarians and increase the level of understanding and appreciation of the duties and responsibilities we all have.

I might mention that the two opposition parties in the House of Commons agreed to speedy passage of this bill. It only had about an hour and a half of debate both at the reporting and third reading stages in the other house. It is my intention—and Senator LeBlanc and other senators may speak to this—that the matter would be referred to either the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs or Senator LeBlanc's Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. In any event, I pass this on for your consideration. Thank you.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if I may ask the honourable senator a question. As an observation before I ask my question, I think it would be highly desirable for the Senate to give this bill careful scrutiny to remove any public impression that members of parliament or senators are creating special privileges for themselves. Although I attempted to listen as carefully as possible, I am not clear in my own mind about the protections or clarifications that will exist with respect to a senator or member of the House of Commons yet which are not available to an ordinary citizen of this country. Are there any, and, if so, what are they and what is the justification for them?

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I would like to review the matter and outline the differences. One that comes to mind is which level of court would hear an application, for example, for a search warrant or any other kind of criminal process. This bill requires that it not be heard by a justice of the peace. It is a higher level court process. If I can justify that, a more serious crime must be tried at a higher level court. One might consider that to be something that the ordinary citizen does not receive.

The ordinary citizen, Senator MacEachen, would not have an opportunity to go to someone and ask "Is what I am doing wrong?" There is no safeguard on this, but if an honourable senator were to undertake a project of some kind using Senate funds—we have a discretionary budget for various matters—he or she could go to the Internal Economy committee and obtain an opinion. It is well within his or her purview to do that. I do not know where a citizen can go somewhere to determine whether their actions tomorrow or the next day ought to be free of criminal prosecution.

Those are two matters that come to mind, but I would like to think about the matter again. I think it is a matter that the committee will have to consider, because we ought not to be looking toward establishing ourselves as either elitist or special.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the honourable senator. I will read his remarks, and we will have a chance to follow up on these matters in committee and on third reading.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have had a quick look at the bill, and I have some questions that revolve around the responsibilities of the Rules and Procedures Committee of this place. It seems to me that the responsibility may straddle the Internal Economy Committee and the Rules Committee. Clearly, if it is a financial question it is the responsibility of Internal Economy; on the other hand, if it is a question of rules and procedures, then it will fall under the other committee. For example, some time ago there was a request by the RCMP for a warrant in this place. The matter was referred to the Rules Committee, which is presently conducting a study in this regard. I wanted to point out that straddling of responsibilities.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I do not intend to impede the progress of this legislation. The Internal Economy Committee had extensive consultations with respect to the bill when it was being worked on before the summer break.

However, since there are some modifications, I think it would be useful if I took the adjournment so that we could consult ina non-partisan way and come back after we have done so.

On motion of Senator LeBlanc, debate adjourned.

BROADCASTING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Norman K. Atkins moved the second reading of Bill C-40, respecting broadcasting and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunication.

He said: Honourable senators, it is a pleasure for me to have the opportunity to propose second reading of Bill C-40, the new Broadcasting Act.

Canada needs a new Broadcasting Act and its consideration in this chamber is long overdue. I say that because the current Bill C-40 is the result of a lengthy process of public consultation and policy development that has been going on for at least five years.

This legislation was born out of the process of public participation that began with the establishment of the Task Force on Broadcasting Policy, under the co-chairmanship of Gerald Kaplan and Florian Sauvageau in May of 1985. After more than a year of broad public consultation, study and research, the task force submitted its report and recommendations to the government in September of 1986. The recommendations of the task force were then studied in the House of Commons Standing Committee on Communications and Culture. That committee also held extensive hearings and produced a number of reports which substantially support the recommendations of the task force.

After the submission of the standing committee's report, new broadcasting legislation was introduced for the first time in the House of Commons in June of 1988 as Bill C-136. That bill received third reading in the House of Commons on September 28, 1988. It was introduced and given first and second reading in the Senate, after which it was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transportation and Communications on September 30, 1988, where it died with the dissolution of Parliament. Senators will recall that the election was called the next day, October 1, 1988.

On October 12, 1989, the Honourable Marcel Masse reintroduced the legislation as Bill C-40 in the House of Commons. It received third reading in the other place on December 5, 1990. It is therefore only after an exhaustive process of public participation and parliamentary debate over a period of more than five years that this important legislation has come before the Senate.

Honourable senators, the bill we have before us is, in principle, fundamentally consistent with the recommendations of both the Kaplan-Sauvageau task force and the standing committee. In those cases where the standing committee's recommendations differ from those of the task force, the legislation reflects the committee's views. Now, although there are some lengthy technical changes that have been incorporated into the current legislation that were not included in the original Bill C-136, the bill that is now before the Senate as Bill C-40 is substantially the same legislation that was before the Senate on September 30, 1988 as Bill C-136.

The investment in time and effort that has been made in the development of this legislation over a period of more than five years, involving literally thousands of Canadians—from those directly involved in the broadcasting industry to special interest groups that are concerned about broadcasting to the many individual Canadians who took the time and trouble to make their views known to the task force, the standing committee and to their representatives in Parliament—is evidence of how fundamentally important broadcasting policy is to our country. It is certainly clear after more than five years that new broadcasting legislation is needed and is, indeed, long overdue. It is now incumbent upon us to respond to the clear need for it and to do so expeditiously, so that Canadians may finally begin to experience the benefits that will flow from the legislative reform in which so much time, effort and resources have been spent.

Honourable senators will see that the legislation is divided into three parts. Part I sets out the legal definition and establishes the broadcasting policy for Canada. The policy outlines in general terms the roles and responsibilities of private and public broadcasters and includes the CBC's mandate. Part II sets out the CRCT's mandate as the independent regulator of the broadcasting system. Part III continues the CBC as the national public broadcaster, establishes its corporate structure and sets out the objectives and powers of the corporation.

In broad terms the legislation is designed to respond to virtually unanimous conclusions that emerged as a result of the extensive process of public participation and policy development that I described a few moments ago. Those conclusions were that the 1968 Broadcasting Act is badly outdated and that the choice of Canadian programming and Canadian broadcast media is inadequate.

The new Broadcasting Act responds to and addresses both of those conclusions. It recognizes and permits the CRCT to regulate those new broadcasting technologies that were not even contemplated when the existing legislation was enacted in 1968. It incorporates concerns for human rights and for the need for better representation of women and minorities that were not addressed in the earlier legislation.

In addition, the new legislation is designed to protect and strengthen cultural sovereignty by ensuring that a broader range of better Canadian programming choices is available to all Canadians. Both of these objectives are important, but the second is of particular concern because it is the programming that directly affects and influences individual Canadians. It is the content of what Canadians see and hear on their broadcast media that is at the heart of all broadcasting policy. To quote the 1965 report of the Fowler Commission: "The only thing that really matters in broadcasting is program content; all the rest is housekeeping".

Broadcasting policies, broadcasting laws and technology do not often concern the vast radio and television audience. Programming, on the other hand, competes for our attention daily. Its presence is pervasive and because of its unique ability to provide shared experiences simultaneously to a large number of people in many different locations, its social and cultural impact is enormous. In a democratic society, a diversity of information sources is an important right of every individual. This concept is reaffirmed in the policy section of Bill C-40, which states clearly that a range of broadcasting services in English and in French shall be extended to all Canadians.

Most Canadians already enjoy a wider range of broadcast services than is available anywhere else in the world, but the great majority of their programming is of foreign, primarily American, origin. Diversity means choice. Bill C-40 recognizes that Canadian programming must form a vital and significant part of programming mix. Accordingly, without limiting the availability of other programs, this bill includes measures that will ensure that Canadians have the opportunity, among all of the viewing options available to them, to choose top quality, competitive Canadian programs.

Bill C-40 addresses these important objectives in several ways. First, it recognises the enormous contribution of public broadcasting to the creation and exhibition of all forms of Canadian programming. I re-affirms the role of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as the primary instrument of broadcasting and cultural policy in Canada. The CBC's mandate is refocused to emphasize that its programming should be predominantly and distinctively Canadian, reflecting Canada and its regions to national and regional audiences. For the first time, the CBC journalistic, creative and programming independence are written into law.

In addition, this legislation responds to a recommendation first made by the Caplan-Sauvageau task force and subsequently endorsed by a standing committee of the House of Commons that the phrase "national unity" be removed from the mandate of the CBC. Bill C-40 removes the obligation to ". . . contribute to the development of national unity . . ." from the legislative mandate of the corporation and replaces it with an obligation to ". . . contribute to shared national consciousness and identity . . ." As I indicated, this is a change that originated with the recommendations of the task force report which recommended that: "The provisions that the national broadcasting service be predominantly Canadian in content and character, and that the service provide for a continuing expression of Canadian identity, should be left intact in new legislation. The provision that the national service contribute to the development of national unity should be rescinded and replaced by a more socially oriented provision, for example, that the service contribute to the development of national consciousness."

That recommendation was endorsed by the all-party standing committee of the House of Commons in its sixth report which said:". . . there must be no suggestion in the Act that the CBC has any obligation to serve as a propagandist, even for a cause as legitimate as national unity.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Did you say it was adopted by an all-party committee?

Senator Atkins: Yes, it was.

Senator Frith: Unanimously?

Senator Atkins: Yes. What happened, Honourable Senator Frith, was that it was raised at second reading; that is when the whole national unity argument came forward.

It may also be worth noting that the former Chair of the CRTC, and now Chair of the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future, Mr. Keith Spicer, the President of the CBC, Mr. Gérard Veilleux, and the Chairman designate of the CBC, Mr. Patrick Watson, all expressed a preference for the new wording in their evidence before the standing committee.

No one could disagree with the proposition that the CBC, as a national institution, should be a unifying force in the country. However, a legislative mandate for the CBC which is capable of being misunderstood, or worse, of being perversely interpreted, is clearly unacceptable.

Canadian unity cannot exist without a sense of shared national consciousness and identity. The new wording of the CBC's mandate will encourage it to foster Canadian unity through the development of a shared sense of national consciousness and identity but without evoking the spectre of programming bias that is suggested by the use of the phrase "national unity".

The CBC should be expected to help build this country in the best way a public broadcaster can: by reporting as accurately, honestly and objectively as it can and by helping Canadians in all regions share in our diverse culture and heritage. That is the mandate that this legislation gives to the CBC.

The mandate of the CBC, as contained in this bill, calls upon the corporation to continue to lead in providing authentically Canadian programming choices in both official languages. But the bill also recognizes that the responsibility for Canadian programs is not the CBC's alone, and this leads to the second point.

The bill makes it clear that private broadcasters are also expected to contribute significantly to the creation and presentation of Canadian programs. This is an important change. It recognizes the contribution that the private sector has made and must continue to make in the fulfilment of national broadcasting policy.

To this end, the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission is provided with a broader range of regulatory instruments to exercise its supervision of private broadcasters—to make it both more flexible and more effective. It is given a new, less intrusive, but perhaps more meaningful way of implementing programming objectives by way of performance incentives.

The bill also recognizes the unique contribution which cable and other distribution services are making to Canadian broadcasting. In defining a role for these services, the bill acknowledges that they can and should, where appropriate, contribute to Canadian programming. For this reason, the bill provides the CRTC with the power to mediate disputes between broadcasters and cable distributors so that conflicts can be resolved in the public interest.

Thirdly, the bill provides for the creation of alternative programming services so as to ensure that the broadcasting system can offer the kinds of programs Canadians have said they want but which would otherwise not be available because of their non-commercial nature and the high cost of television production.

Turning now to the matter of technology, as I noted earlier, the Broadcasting Act urgently needs updating to ensure that it encompasses all forms of broadcasting, and to ensure that the CRTC has the jurisdiction to regulate the broadcasting of programs to the public, regardless of the technology that may be used for transmission of the programs. To achieve that end, the wording of the bill has been made technology-neutral. What does this mean?

The current Broadcasting Act ties the definition of broadcasting to a particular technology: "over-the-air transmission". Yet we all know that today, the vast majority of Canadians receive broadcast programs by cable and satellite. Some of these programming services are not even directly available over-the-air, and some are available only in return for payment.

To render the legislation technology-neutral Bill C-40 re-casts the legal definitions in the Act so that they speak to the transmission of programs to the public, without regard to the technology that may be used. It specifically provides for the exclusion from licensing of those activities that are not essential to the achievement of the broadcasting policy set out in clause 3 of the bill.

This technology-neutral approach will permit broadcasters to use whatever technologies they may wish, including technologies other than over-the-air transmission, for the delivery of programming. At the same time, it will allow others to use traditional broadcasting technologies, for non-broadcasting purposes, without being caught up in broadcasting regulation.

A technology-neutral Broadcasting Act will foster continued technological development. It will encourage broadcasters to make use of the most effective means of transmission available. And it will facilitate the introduction of new delivery systems such as high definition television, digital transmission and pay-per-view services.

With respect to human rights issues: since the current Broadcasting Act was passed in 1968, many changes have occurred in Canadian society. The passage of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the further implementation of bilingualism and multiculturalism policies have created a new awareness of the need to ensure that broadcasting legislation and the broadcasting system reflect the Canadian social reality. These important issues were highlighted both by the report of the Caplan-Sauvageau Task Force on Broadcasting Policy and by the Standing Committee of the House of Commons.

Bill C-40 responds to those important concerns by including specific provisions in the broadcasting policy statement recognizing the great diversity of Canadian society and the need for the broadcasting system to reflect that diversity.

● (1540)

The bill acknowledges that English and French language broadcasting operate under different conditions and have different requirements. It requires the CRTC to regulate the broadcasting system in a manner that recognizes those different requirements.

The bill also includes, for the first time, specific provisions for programming that reflect Canada's aboriginal cultures and for programming that is accessible by disabled persons.

Other aspects of the current Broadcasting Act which need updating relate to the operation and accountability of the CBC and CRTC. These two agencies, the national broadcaster and the regulator, are central to the implementation of broadcasing policy and their relationship to the government and to Parliament must be clear and unambiguous. The bill changes the operations of these two organizations in several ways.

With respect to the CRTC, the bill gives the Governor in Council the power to issue policy directions to the CRTC. It also changes the commission's structure and decision-making to make it a more open and regionally-sensitive body.

The power to issue broad policy directions to the CRTC will clearly establish the government's role in setting general guidelines for the broadcasting system on broad policy matters. This power has been a matter of some controversy, yet it has been recommended time and time again as a legitimate and appropriate government prerogative since the late 1970s.

In addition, it is important to recognize that the power to issue policy directives is not an unfettered power. The legislation limits this power in several important ways and provides for an open public process to prevent its use for any inappropriate purpose.

First, directions may only be issued in respect of broad policy and regulatory objectives. They cannot be issue in respect of a particular licensing application, nor can they have retroactive effect. Furthermore, the minister must consult with the CRTC before issuing an order and then publish the order in The Canada Gazette and table the order in Parliament, where it would stand referred to a committee for 40 days before coming into effect. Thereafter, the minister must again consult with the commission before formally issuing the direction.

At the same time, the government has retained a limited power to review CRTC decisions. It must be clearly understood that this power is quite different and is complementary to the power to issue policy directions. Without this power of review, CRTC decisions would, in some respects, be effectively beyond appeal.

The power to review CRTC decisions exists, without any limitation, under section 23 of the current act. Bill C-40, on the other hand, limits the review power to cases where a CRTC decision departs from the fulfilment of the policy objectives.

Senator Frith: What policy objectives?

Senator Atkins: Those are the ones that are stated.

Senator Frith: Who makes the policy objectives?

Senator Atkins: They would be made either through the CRTC or through government general policy.

Senator Frith: Only if they depart from their own policy? How could that be?

Senator Atkins: There can only be an appeal if they depart from the policies of the CRTC and the government objectives.

Senator Frith: The government objectives. So the government controls the commission.

Senator Atkins: The limited powers provide a necessary opportunity for the public, and the government of the day, to question CRTC decisions on matters of policy and law without being put to the expense and delay that is involved in court action. But Bill C-40 will also change the commission in other ways.

The bill restructures the commission, bringing more openness, accessibility and greater regional sensitivity to its public hearing process. The CRTC decision-making will be decentralized so that panels of commissioners appointed to public hearings across Canada will no longer only hear the matters before them, but will also make the decisions on those matters.

[Senator Atkins.]

Under the existing legislation, where public hearings are required on licensing or other matters, the chair may designate a minimum of two of the ninteen commissioners to hear the evidence. However, present legislation provides that in those cases the actual decisions are still made either by the nine member executive committee, in consultation with the members who heard the evidence, or by the full commission. In short, commissioners who have not heard any of the evidence are entitled to make the decisions. This so-called "collegial" approach to decision-making is contrary to one of the fundamental principles of procedural fairness and natural justice—the doctrine that only those who have heard the evidence on a matter are equipped to pass judgment on its merits—the principle of, "they who hear, decide." The CRTC's practice of collegial decision-making was the subject of critical comment in the sixth report of the Standing Committee of the House of Commons, which recommended as follows:

> Decisions on applications should be made by the Commissioners who hear the applications. As a result, the Broadcasting Act should eliminate those provisions requiring that decisions concerning the issuance, amendment and renewal of licences be made by all full-time members only, in consultation with part-time (non voting) members.

Bill C-40 incorporates that recommendation. However, because the commission's broadcasting mandate requires that its decisions reflect national policies and objectives, the bill requires that panels of commissioners shall consult with the full commission to ensure consistent interpretation of broadcasting policy and regulations.

This combination of decentralized decision-making, with mandatory consultation, provides for an appropriate balance between, on the one hand, a more open, accessible and efficient regulatory process, and on the other hand, consistent interpretation of policies by panels of commissioners operating all across Canada.

In the same spirit, the establishment of regional offices of the CRTC, provided for in this legislation, will foster a greater sense that all Canadians have access to the commission and that the commission is aware of regional issues and concerns.

As to the CBC's operations and administration, Bill C-40 brings three important changes. It restructures the CBC's senior management by separating the quite different functions of president and chief executive officer from those of the chairman of the board of directors. This is common in most large private-sector corporations and is equally appropriate for the CBC.

Honourable senators will be aware of the fact that one of Canada's most distinguished broadcasters, Mr. Patrick Watson, was designated more than a year ago for appointment to the new post of chairman of the corporation. The passage of this legislation will permit this appointment to proceed, and will enable him to fully assume this important responsibility on behalf of public broadcasting in Canada, for which he is so eminently well qualified.

Consistent with the bill's recognition that French and English language broadcasting operate under different conditions and may have different requirements, the bill establishes standing committees of the CBC's board of directors to deal with matters related to French and English language broadcasting.

The legislation stipulates that the committees both be headed up by the chairman and president of the CBC, and that the board itself will determine the nature of their functions and the scope of their activities. It is important to recognize that these committees will function only as committees of the board and that their recommendations will be subject to the approval of the full board of the corporation.

● (1550)

Apart from these requirements, however, the legislation does not stipulate how these committees shall be constituted, nor from what regions or language groups their memberships must be drawn. In choosing their members, therefore, the board is free to make both committees as broadly representative of both official languages and of all regions as it deems appropriate, thereby fulfilling the purposes of the legislation while at the same time using these committees as a means of building new bridges of understanding, cooperation and mutual support between the French and English language networks and services.

In addition, the bill clarifies the nature of the CBC's accountability to Parliament by bringing under the Broadcasting Act measures previously found in other legislation. To balance these measures, the bill stipulates for the first time as a matter of law the CBC's journalistic, creative and programming independence.

Honourable senators, the broadcasting system operates in a rapidly changing environment and legislation plays an important role in regulating that environment. When legislation is out of date the result can mean lost opportunities and even financial losses. Without question, this bill will strengthen the Canadian broadcasting system and the presence of Canadian programming within that system in many ways.

Clause 3 of the bill states that radio frequencies are public property, but it goes on to state that, whatever the method of transmission, broadcasting provides a public service "essential to the maintenance and enhancement of national identity and cultural sovereignty".

It further states that the Canadian broadcasting system should "serve to safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada."

At a time when broadcast technologies are bypassing national borders and program production costs are escalating enormously, a trend has emerged toward programming for global audiences. Too often the result of this trend is programming which is specific to nowhere and which is devoid of identifiable cultural values. The challenge for the Canadian broadcasting system will continue to be to provide programs which speak to Canadians as a people, which communicate our shared values and identities and which reflect Canadian society in all its rich diversity and regional distinctiveness.

To respond effectively to this challenge, Bill C-40 calls upon all elements of the broadcasting system to contribute to the fulfilment of Canadian broadcasting policy. The bill clarifies the roles of all the players in the broadcasting system, both private and public, and states clearly their responsibilities toward the creation and exhibition of Canadian programming.

Honourable senators, it is now time that this important legislation be considered by the Senate to provide us with a broadcasting law that will better serve the needs of all Canadians.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Davey, debate adjourned.

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I wish now to rise on a question of privilege. Over the past several days we have witnessed many breaches of privilege of senators. I believe that the privilege of every member of this House is paramount.

The chairman of the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has planned a meeting of his committee when the house adjourns, and since s he is eager to get on with the work of that committee, I would like to dispose of my question of privilege as quickly as possible.

Honourable senators will please turn to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, specifically to item number 16 of the Orders of the Day, which is one of the topics of my speech, and to item number 3 under Motions—

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Will the honourable senator permit a question at this point?

Senator Haidasz: Yes.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, there is a motion on the Order Paper in Senator Haidasz' name which deals with a direction to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Is this the—

Senator Haidasz: That is one of the topics of my question of privilege. Since the chairman of the committee wants to begin the meeting of the committee as soon as possible, I do not want to wait until we get down to that item—

Senator Doody: The honourable senator cannot bootleg his motion in under a question of privilege. His motion will have to be dealt with under the heading of "Motions". The honourable senator has already tried to do that. He has a question of privilege on the Order Paper today which was called yesterday.

Senator Haidasz: I will then continue with my question of privilege.

Senator Doody: That order was stood, as was the Honourable Senator Haidasz' motion which was called yesterday. He is now trying to bootleg his motion in under a second question of privilege.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I continue with my question of privilege. As I mentioned, it has to do with the items on the Order Paper, but, in particular, with the way in which I was treated. I consider that my privilege was breached.

As honourable senators will note from what I have said and from what is on the record, this item has sat since adjournment of the debate by Senator Neiman on November 29, some three weeks. The matter it deals with is an issue of privilege that affects all defence of privilege in the Senate pursuant to Rule 33. In order to freshen our memories, I wish to read into the record Rule 33 which states:

> When a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate, of any committee thereof, or of any senator, has arisen, a motion calling upon the Senate to take action thereon may be moved without notice and, until decided, shall, unless the debate be adjourned, suspend the consideration of other motions and of the Orders of the Day.

That the matter raised is prima facie in the field of privilege can hardly be contested. Therefore, the adjournment itself and the duration of the adjournment on such a motion of appeal to the Senate on a profound question of privilege itself impugns privilege. I seek the remedy of abridging this adjournment, making room for other debate, or putting the motion contained in this item to a vote. It is not closure that I seek but, rather, an abridgement of adjournment. I claim that failure to do so continues to offend the privileges of all honourable senators.

The violation of privilege here is the inadequate and delayed application of provisions for privileged questions under Senate Rule 33. Privilege violation requires that all members of the Senate give it attention and timely decision with whatever remedy is appropriate.

All parliaments in free democracies are founded essentially on such privileges. That is why every member of a legislative body must support the timely resolution of questions of privilege. The offended privilege of one affects the collective privileges of all members. Without a solid defence of the rights and privileges of legislators, the entire edifice of Parliament is soon in ruins. Without the stable shoreline of accountability to Parliament, a ruler, a despot, a potentate, even a prime minister or his cabinet can pass whatever laws they demand without regard to whether they are just or whether they will imperil national security. Germany learned that lesson a half century ago.

● (1600)

There is evidence that the government may prorogue very soon; so soon that these pressing questions bearing on the very foundation of Parliament in Canada are threatened by neglect. In addition, the committee whose proceedings occasioned the original motion to instruct, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, resumes deliberations in a scheduled meeting today after this chamber rises. Therefore, I cannot stress too much the importance of turning our definitive attention to the issue of privilege to instruct a committee.

On November 29 privilege failed once again to be accorded the immediate and sustained attention it deserves. Our Senate Rule 33, standing along with Rule 2 in defence of privilege, was neutralized by the adjournment of debate on the very motion that rule provides for. Similar motions for appeal to the Senate on questions of privilege raised by other members are being suspended, deferred or even improperly adjourned. Indeed, it is clearer every week that privilege, in general, with its attendant Rule 33, is either misunderstood or misapplied.

Our latest example is the mistaken belief of certain senators that the right to vote may legitimately pre-empt the right to debate. We had an example of that last week. It should be eminently clear that each of us has a first right to speak on any legislative matter before us. It is that which is the foundation of Parliament as we know it.

Bourinot, as early as 1916, starts off his Chapter X by reaffirming the inalienable right of a member to partake in debate. The enactment of legislation follows upon the debate process, including an adequate committee process. Voting does not push it, as the cart the horse. Voting begins only where debate leaves off; otherwise, this is not a Parliament. In a free democracy, a Prime Minister should not get away with saying, simply, "Read my lips."

For my part, I wish to focus on the one recourse by which this house normally follows "order and decorum", to quote Rule 15, in order to settle matters of privilege in a dignified and timely manner. That one recourse is provided for in Rule 33, as I said. I shall offer a most compelling argument that Rule 33 means that a motion to appeal to the Senate, as a body, for recourse in a prima facie case of privilege is always receivable, that it supports the presumption that a prima facie case exists, and that it provides for its immediate attention in order to settle mainly one question.

The question to be settled, if the pertinent motion carries, is simply whether the prima facie case is borne out in fact; that is, it is a bona fide case of privilege. Such a determination should be the stated aim of the motion in the first place. Should a bona fide question of privilege be decided in the affirmative, an acceptable remedy is, of course, immediately incumbent on the house. That should go without saying. In short, the motion of appeal to the Senate does not seek a remedy as its primary goal; its first objective is to settle that privilege is the question.

In the debate on the motion for appeal itself, it is only to be decided whether the house accepts the presumed prima facie case as presented and whether it accepts the proposed manner of deciding it. This is akin to the stage where a justice of the peace hears preliminary circumstantial evidence from a plaintiff and decides whether or not to lay an information.

I will argue that debate on this motion of appeal to the Senate is not adjournable since nothing else of business can take place until it is generally agreed or not that the question prima facie relates to privilege. The basis of argument is that the putative breach in privilege is more dangerous to the nature and functioning of Parliament than any other issue, including order, decorum or national security.

Lastly, I shall argue that the most suitable form of appeal to be moved under this rule, especially if the first attempts are not successful at obtaining due consideration, let alone remedy by a shorter course, is to resolve into a Committee of the Whole to consider orders and customs of the Senate and privileges of Parliament.

Honourable senators, a matter of privilege is manifestly of first order significance since it directly affects the validity of the entire parliamentary process and raises the question of just how free is a democracy. If privilege is ignored or run roughshod out the door, the pith and substance of our Confederation and our constitutional law is entirely called into question. Moreover, the strength and freedom of our country, as we sing it in our national anthem, is undermined.

Privilege is of so unique a character that, without its proper understanding and its proper defence, the entire structure of Parliament comes crashing down. Privilege is unique in that all authorities agree on the precedence questions of privilege must have.

Questions of breach of privilege must necessarily gain attention over all other parliamentary business, including, as I said before, issues of national peril, because when left in abeyance, these questions undermine the very nature of Parliament and legislative authority. One obvious reason is that open disregard of Parliament and its privileges assuredly places the nation in peril. Under such conditions, very bad laws may be passed, having seditious effects throughout the whoof and fabric of the whole country, sowing the seeds of civil strife and even war.

The Mother of Parliament is the model upon which Canada was founded in 1867. Based on that model, it is for this upper house, acting as the highest court in the Confederation, to settle questions and doubts of parliamentary privilege. The House of Lords does that. Section 33 of the BNA Act, a section never amended, is one of the guarantees of this role of the Senate. At the Opening of each session of the Canadian Parliament, the Senate Committee of the Whole is named with the mandate "to consider Orders and Customs of the Senate and Privileges of Parliament." These words are not empty; that is one mandate that is real.

An evident breach of privilege requires of this house a continual hue and cry. In an hour of need such as this, history would read our failure to raise a hue and cry as tacit acquiescence to our own dissolution. Permission for the demise of this genuine parliamentary body would mean gross dereliction of duty as statesmen and women in a free and democratic society. True legislators cannot sit or stand idly by with the whole foundation of Canadian Confederation bound up in, or made hostage to, the wiles of a particular government.

Even filibustering legislation is not a proper answer to unparliamentary manoeuvres of a government. After all, a filibuster is a legitimate answer to disagreeable legislation legitimately debated and voted. But without proper and timely restoration of broken privilege, the votes and passage of all of the legislation before us, whether or not it is disagreeably flawed, is not legitimate. There is no order present, in truth, because there is no real Parliament here until the prima facie cases, at least, of broken privilege are settled. Privilege, honourable senators, cannot lightly be surrendered. It is a crime to neglect it. It is contempt of Parliament to breach privilege.

In the other house, down through the centuries of Parliament, many misguided questions turned out to be fatuous or, in any event, not of privilege. This may have threatened the preeminent regard which privilege should always be accorded. Precisely to defend the centrality of privilege in the powers of Parliament, the practice was established—when there was doubt—of deferring to the Speaker for a ruling as to whether a putative breach was prima facie. Whereas representatives of the Commons could not necessarily be relied upon to understand the Parliamentary process, the Speaker, at least, was invariably a learned man, very experienced with these matters, and generally sober-minded.

That history has led to the practice in the House of Commons, cited at paragraph 84(1) of Beauchesne, fifth edition. In that house, the very receivability of a question on a putative breach of privilege automatically requires the determinate ruling of the Speaker as to whether the matters adduced pertain to privilege. The Speaker's practice has generally been to acknowledge many such questions, since privilege can never be taken lightly.

Moreover, there remains a principle, though rarely needed, of course, that the Speaker's ruling on a prima facie breach of privilege may be appealed to the whole house.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: On a point of order, I would like to ask Senator Haidasz—and perhaps Senator Frith could confirm it—whether this speech is part of the work-to-rule strategy of the opposition.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I am not part of this.

Senator Simard: Is this what is termed "work-to-rule?"

Senator Haidasz: Not at all; it is, rather, my own question of privilege.

Senator Doody: This is the second one. You have one on the order paper.

Senator Haidasz: Under Rule 33 I have a right to speak to it.

Bourinot tells us that this can happen under a substantive motion of the house. Maingot refers to it on page 222-223 of his treatise on Parliamentary Privilege, and remarks on page 230 that repeated efforts can be made to raise a question of privilege.

Senator Frith: "Honi soit qui mal y pense".

Senator Haidasz: With regard to the special role of the Speaker, the situation in the upper house has always been essentially different. Historically, the Lord Chancellor, or the Speaker in the Senate, has always been one among peers. Every senator is entitled, "Honourable", to denote something of his or her equal footing in privilege vis-a-vis all members, including the Speaker. British Peers are also always titled, and not necessarily because they are landholders with a pedigree.

There remains in the upper house of Parliament, in its unadulterated form, the principle of presumption of competence, and of innocence, as it were. Nowhere is this more clearly, or centrally, visible than in the presumptive receivability of any claim that privilege has been broken. A Speaker's ruling on the matter is never required. His opinion may be requested, but that opinion is neither a ruling nor a precedent.

A senator is entitled "Honourable". That term expresses a central reality; namely, that any complaint by a senator as regards his or her privilege is to be presumed serious, and founded in fact. To presume otherwise is to dishonour him, and again to break a privilege, even where he was mistakenly offended in the first place. In this house, the Speaker's opinion that an issue does not appear to be prima facie a breach of order is always subject to an appeal to the Senate. How much more so is a breach of privilege, and of honour?

Senator Charbonneau had an opinion on October 4, as recorded in the Debates of the Senate at page 2342, regarding the receivability of Senator Frith's motion to appeal to the Senate as a body. This was one "honourable" opinion, and nothing more. It is not the least binding on anyone else other than the holder of that opinion until he is persuaded otherwise. Settlement of the question, whether the claims of Senators Frith and Stewart, and now numerous others, are in fact pertinent to privilege, certainly does not rest with the "Honourable" Senator Charbonneau. It rests with the appeal to the Senate, which was why Senator Frith reminded us of Rule 33 On October 4, when he registered that appeal.

Even the lesser goods of order and decorum, which our Rule 15 upholds, are "subject to an appeal to the Senate", as Senator Charbonneau himself quoted. Well, we all agree that order and decorum are certainly goods; but they are far lesser goods than privilege itself. Parliament, even disordered parliament, is founded on privilege.

Historically, the whole of Parliament and the common good are anchored in the principles of common law. A first principle of this foundation is that sometimes it is necessary to raise what I mentioned earlier, a "hue and cry", at least upon the evidence of a felony. Overt and wanton breaches of privilege are indeed "felonious", as the term was invented to describe disreputable public acts by a peer, in abuse of his own privilege. Equally felonious is the abuse of another peer's privilege. Felony was a serious accusation to make, so it was important to know, first of all, if one had standing as a Peer who could thus be capable of abuse of his own privilege. In other words, he could not abuse what he did not have.

For this reason, among others, it is necessary to know in clear terms who is a peer; that is, in Canada, who is a legitimate senator? Because, if one does not know with certitude, then the press might either insult the privilege that does in fact belong to an appointee, or one may be accorded privilege that does not belong to one—which is an abuse of the privileges of those who accord it. Both of these ills can have very destructive, even seditious, effects. As I speak these words, for the good of all, I risk breaking the privileges of eight senators, but that is a risk to my own honour, which must be protected by appealing to the whole Senate.

One of the responsibilities of legislature, as mentioned by the Supreme Court in the 1989 Daigle case, for example, is that we perform a "normative task" in defining the terms of enacted legislation and in clarifying the legislative will behind it. These "norms", required by justice, are not established when the legislative will in this house has questionable legitimacy.

The express will of this assembly, as presently constituted, has already negatived amendments to major flaws, and may yet enact certain immoral principles of bad law. Are those laws to stand, against contest, when courts are reminded of the doubtful makeup of the upper house which enacted them?

Surely, the "norms" required by the highest justices in Canada, to interpret the laws we pass, ought not to be made relative merely to the opinion of one judge or another whether this house is or is not validly constituted. Norms are based on solid ground, or they are nothing. To build a law on quicksand, or even what appears to be quicksand, is actually to encourage duplicity and fraudulence in the populace to suit the law to their own ends.

Citizens seek only the security of our Confederation against piratage and usurious debt incurred on the international accounts, a debt that is out of control through mismanagement and through craven currying of international financial credit. The resistance of citizens to being saddled with the credit-debt, which it is the responsibility of their government to shelter them from, may seem self-centred, but it is a passive resistance, and an effective one. However, arrest them for it, and the harvest of thorns will reveal what sort of seeds are sown by laws foisted by a despotic authority. It was wisely to avoid civil wars that Parliament was invented in the first place. The adage of civility has to be, "Let's talk."

I do not say, honourable senators, that bad laws cannot pass when the legitimacy of the legislative will is beyond question. The collective prudence of this or the other house can always be questioned. Former section 251 of the Criminal Code is a case in point. Nineteen years after its enactment, during which time only one conviction stuck, that section was found by the courts to be too uneven to be constitutional. The abortion law based on Bill C150 in 1968 and 1969 paved the erosive way to abortion on demand, a demoralization of Canadian youth, and a devastating population implosion whose economic effects have brought us to an unmanageable deficit and public debt. The loss of a continental war could not have hurt us so badly. That was the end result of parliamentary imprudence.

We may expect that sooner or later these lessons will be learned, and hopefully, the errors will be rectified. However, it does not take a very long stretch of logic to see how the abuse of a parliamentary system, like the abuses orchestrated in Germany in the latter 1930s by a will that did not shrink from the illegitimate use of extraordinary powers, can lead to the complete sedition of a free democracy.

For our part, in this house, we have evidence from not one but numerous senators that there are at least prima facie cases of privilege begging for settlement. Just read the Orders of the Day! Before even that, we have several allegations of privilege which it is our duty to assess for any prima facie claim on our attention. It is necessary to turn, therefore, to Rule 33 for guidance in the appeal to the Senate as a body, for settlement, pursuant to section 33 of the BNA Act, and the tradition of parliament. This is most appropriately done through the convocation of a Committee of the Whole. Debate, at least, on such motions for appeal under Rule 33 must take pre-eminence.

As senators, and members of the highest Bar in Canada, having all the privileges attendant thereto, we have lately exhibited a deeply disturbing complacency about privilege, whenever we failed at the very least to use our best judgment as a body as to whether there are prima facie cases of privilege that need deciding. This complicity, in its dereliction and its apparent intent, is shameful. It is like submitting to Royal Assent the ditty, "I fire an arrow into the air, and where it lands I do not care".

Honourable senators, it is this complacency I must disown, and I must call all of the senators on both sides of the house, including the people described as the putative appointees, to rouse themselves from their slumber and bring what authority we have, as the highest Bar in the land, to bear upon settling our contested privileges.

In the final analysis, it is not for the Supreme Court of Canada to determine a matter of fundamental privilege, or even the legitimacy of appointments, since the courts have the function only of interpreting and thereupon enforcing the laws enacted by this legislature. When the court is unable to render a reliable interpretation of some legislative matter, it refrains from expressing a binding judgment, and invites Parliament to specify the norms required.

Again, in the Daigle case of 1989, the Supreme Court of Canada clarified the legal question of whether or not the child before birth is to be understood as properly belonging to, or included under, the term "everyone" as used in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in section 7. They described the final recourse of Parliament to be, in this matter, a "normative task".

Furthermore, as I have mentioned in the recent past in this chamber, Parliament's proper legislative power is understood to be plenary. It is over-riding. It may invoke the "notwithstanding" provision to enact laws even outside of the commonly interpreted scope of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. That power is very great, and of course very dangerous if unjustly applied.

• (1630)

But Parliament's check and balance against its own plenary powers are invested finally in the debates, deliberations, and Royal Assent of this very house. It follows that the Canadian legislature does not take its final authority, or even its final norms from the courts, including the Supreme Court of Canada.

It is equally true that the BNA Act, which was in any case not framed in its entirety by the Canadian legislature, can admit of no final interpretations by the Supreme Court of Canada. That responsibility devolves to the upper house itself. Section 33 of the BNA act makes that clear enough on its own, as it reads:

> If any Question arises respecting the Qualification of a Senator or a Vacancy in the Senate the same shall be heard and determined by the Senate.

This very house made a clarifying decision in 1877—on March 19, to be exact—a date easy to recall for many of us, as it is the Feast Day of the Patron Saint of Canada, Saint Joseph. In that decision, section 26 could not be applied as it was this fall without offense to privilege, to honour, and to legitimate, consensual authority.

That is the very reason that questions of privilege in the Senate are ultimately to be settled by the Senate, as Section 33 states it. This is the best guarantee of fairness, truth, and authority built on more than shifting sand. In the Senate rule book, we have an appropriately numbered rule to provide for this necessity. Corresponding to the BNA Act, Section 33, the Senate Rule 33 states:

> "When a matter . . . concerning the privileges of the Senate . . . has arisen, a motion calling upon the Senate to take action thereon may be moved without notice and, until decided, shall . . . suspend the consideration of other motions and of Orders of the Day."

Honourable Senators, in this excerpt from our rule book, I have purposely left out the stated caveat that debate may be adjourned. That is because the phrasing of this caveat is rather ambiguous, and requires thoughtful study. The key to understanding its intent most clearly is to focus on the clause "until decided, shall suspend the consideration of other motions". What is to be so pre-eminent that "until decided" it may not be pre-empted by anything else is, of course, the question of privilege itself. It should be noted that among the actions which Rule 33 requires to be suspended until a question of privilege is settled is simply "other motions". Motions to adjourn are such "other motions". They are suspended, with some qualification.

For clarity, it must be remembered that the motion to take some action in respect of a privilege question is not a motion to effect the desired remedy, even if the desired remedy is conditionally mentioned in the motion. In the first instance, a motion is put to raise a prima facie case of privilege, and to have this question of privilege decided in an appropriate manner, such as by resolving into a Committee of the Whole to consider "Orders and Customs of the Senate and Privileges of Parliament".

The motion is in fact an "appeal to the Senate" to accept a prima facie point of privilege. It is based on the BNA Act, and parliamentary practice. It also comports with Rule 15 for "Order and decorum".

Such a motion, because it pertains to all-important privilege, and because it is moveable without notice, according to Rule 46 (i), could arguably be moved without a seconder. Seconders usually require some notice, and in any case the possibility exists that a particular senator's privilege has been shamefully offended by all other members who have an interest in not seconding his motion for consideration. It would be an unparliamentary injustice to prevent him from moving to present his case for a hearing.

The point is, it is a receivable motion, because even if the Speaker does not recognize the grounds for a prima facie case, the motion itself is the very "appeal to the Senate" which always pre-empts the opinion of one senator, including the Speaker, and refers judgment to the whole House. It presents a matter of privilege, for which there is at least the unadulterated presumption of truth, whose burden of disproof is thus upon the Senate.

Such a motion is, nonetheless, a debatable motion; and of course it is subject to rejection in a vote or a division. But even its rejection at one point does not prevent its being raised as a receivable motion again after a short time. Again, this is made clear by Joseph Maingot on page 230 of his Treatise on Privilege.

For that reason alone, it behooves the Senate to make effective use of its capacities in the Committee of the Whole on "privileges" to settle once and for all whether a recurring matter is privilege at all, and if so what its remedy should be. If it comes out that the matter is not of privilege, then the appellant would hardly be so daring as to raise it again in a motion. If he did, debate would soon put the matter to rest, as it then had a precedent to draw upon, namely, the pertinent accepted finding of the Committee of the Whole.

Honourable Senators, on Thursday afternoon, November 29, after just such a motion had been put by myself on a pressing and very important question of privilege — a motion to have the matter of privilege settled by its proper means, a Committee of the Whole—Senator Neiman made the honest assumption that debate on such motion, like any other, may be adjourned, which it should not, except for pleasure. Allow me, honourable senators, to argue this point.

The adjournment of debate, by Senator Neiman's motion, or by Senator Doody's motion of November 7, was not by "leave-taking" from the rules. It was by a voice-vote, which, of course, I did not "Yea". In the latest case, however, the aegis of Rule 33 should more clearly have been understood, as I went so far as to mention the rule to back up my motion. Perhaps in that case some of us wondered whether we were already undertaking to present arguments to the case itself on whether, in fact, the prima facie question were borne out.

[Senator Haidasz.]

Senator Neiman began to present arguments against the merits of my claim from privilege to instruct our committees as the need arises. With all respect, she was not contesting that the raised question is prima facie a question of privilege. Therefore, barring any other supportable objections, such as to the proposed manner of proceeding, this motion should already have carried. As it stands, it has yet to be voted upon.

• (1640)

In this particular example, the premature debating of the merits of the case may have been encouraged by my own substantial words to introduce the prima facie case and the pertinent motion. Unfortunately, I felt obliged to say all that I did to present the prima facie case without doubts to honourable senators in light of the short shrift that privilege claims had been receiving in this house. In presenting the prima facie case, I was adducing much of the evidence for the substantive trial of privilege in order to get the attention which such a matter deserves.

In any event, a motion to adjourn the debate is a motion which Rule 33 is supposed to suspend until the question is decided. If it were not so, Rule 33 would be superfluous.

My argument here is that Rule 33 makes no sense at all unless it has more authority than merely stating the obvious procedure on a motion. Why should it say that other business of the house is suspended until the appellant's privilege question is decided if debate can be adjourned even before the house determines that the question of privilege does not exist? If the presumption is for its existence, how can the decision whether to accord a given question its bearing on privilege be delayed?

Honourable senators, let us pay careful attention to these distinctions. When a senator appeals to the body of the Senate that a privilege has been transgressed, unless substantial and proven objections are raised against it, it is to be presumed that there exists a prima facie case. The motion to be heard ought, therefore, at least to be put, unless it contains other objectionable conditions. Barring these, the motion would be expected to carry.

After carriage of the motion of appeal, it remains then, and only then, to decide the case of privilege in a manner appropriately set out or implied in the motion; that is, it remains to take the appropriate action as a house, which in many cases will be to immediately discuss the merits of the case and decide whether the prima facie is in fact a bona fide case of privilege. Our Rule 33 clearly implies that this action should be undertaken immediately, or absolutely as soon as possible, and again with qualified adjournment.

This trial, as it were, is the place at which the merits for or against the already presumptive prima facie case are argued and decided. A most appropriate court for the purposes would be a Committee of the Whole called "Privileges". Such a committee format has the advantage of permitting senators to speak and reply more than once to the merits. It records a report and returns it to the Senate chamber, in which its recommendations are decided. This is the goal, then, of the provisions of Rule 33.

The proceedings in such a committee could produce a detailed study of the authorities and comprise a significant entry in the Minutes of Proceedings. Its findings would, therefore, constitute a body of reliable precedent which is always helpful in determining future prima facie questions.

Indeed, this action, analogous to a trial of privilege, is substantially the whole action provided for by Rule 33. "Until the question is decided", whether the prima facie case is in fact a bona fide case, all other business of the house is suspended. That makes eminent jurisprudent sense as well since, until evidence to the contrary is established, an honourable senator is presumed to have a case. The justice required of a timely remedy to his or her complaint, therefore, prevents the conduct of anything that belongs to the "Routine of Business" as it is named in Part II of the Senate Rules, for example.

But, to repeat, it also means that the actual appeal to the Senate, the motion to take action to settle the case's validity, is not simply adjournable.

Properly speaking, Rule 33, with the appeal to the Senate on privilege, is a special escape provision from the "Routine of Business", as required by a prima facie case of privilege. Debate on such a motion may indeed conclude with the failure of the motion to carry, but the overriding obligation to defend one's own and all others' privileges require that one not adjourn the debate on this motion. Such is not a debate like any other belonging to the "Routine of Business". Privilege itself gives it special status, as acknowledged in the words of Rule 33.

In the process of debate on the motion of appeal to the Senate, it is true that other senators may attempt to establish by proofs that there is no prima facie case; but they should avoid prejudicing the case by rebutting anticipated merits or arguments of the case of privilege. Until it is convincingly established that there is not a prima facie case, it is the prerogative of the appellant to see the debate continue until at least the question is put on his motion to proceed.

Thus, with but slight qualification, debate at this stage could not be adjourned without offending a putative privilege. The putative breach of privilege is presumed prima facie until proven otherwise. That is what shows "honour" to honourable senators.

It may be asked what, then, can possibly be a legitimate interpretation in the light of privilege of the additional words in Rule 33, "unless the debate be adjourned"?

Senator Doody: How long does the honourable senator intend to keep this up? Would he care to tell us?

Senator Haidasz: Not much longer.

Senator Doody: Thank you.

Senator Haidasz: This brings us to the one qualification. Unless an adjournment were necessitated for pleasure regarding the clock, the settlement of the first step of accepting or rejecting as a body, the raised question of privilege as prima facie ought not to be adjourned.

Consider, in the first place, honourable senators, what this rule would amount to if it made no allowances for adjournment for pleasure. It is true that reasonable persons will forego sleep and food in the event of a national emergency. Privilege is of paramount importance for Parliament, even in the face of national perils. Its acceptance in the house as prima facie should suspend all further business, unless the appellant agrees otherwise, including sleep and other usual comforts. But one man's stamina or insomnolence ought not to overbear another's. Therefore, adjournment of a very limited kind would support good order and decorum.

• (1650)

Honourable senators, my main point is that the prima facie acceptability of a question of privilege is not deflectable. If adjournment is moved without demonstrating the existence of real contest to that prima facie acceptability, except to observe the clock, it should be considered in contempt of privilege.

Without this interpretation, Rule 33 is immaterial and of no effect to defend Parliament's first cornerstone, privilege. We have an example of that effect. On October 4, Senator Frith's and Senator Stewart's claims of privilege—on behalf of us all, no less—were deflected only by handcuffing Rule 33. It is instructive to review what authority the Speaker at that time used.

Beauchesne, an authority primarily focusing on the procedure in the House of Commons, in its fifth edition, citation 84 at page 25, is quoted:

> Once the claim of a breach of privilege has been made, it is the duty of the Speaker to decide if a prima facie case can be established . . .

But this authority is pertinent only in the House of Commons, where it befalls the Speaker to make such rulings. Opinions of that senator who occupies the Chair in this house have no pre-eminence over the role to be played by the opinions of all other senators, which is why in this house we address one another collectively, rather than addressing the Chair.

Nonetheless, at that time Senator Charbonneau took up an interpretation of our Rule 15 on "preserving order and decorum", which he said was not prevailing at the time, to force the straightjacket of Beauchesne's citation 84 upon this house, the Senate. As a result, order and decorum certainly did not prevail.

The justification given was that:

> Otherwise you would have to accept that the moving of a motion under Rule 33 would not be subject to any point of order and remain in the absolute discretion of any member even if the motion was futile and not based on a prima facie case.

However, it is precisely because of the pre-eminence of parliamentary privilege that such appeals may be made, even where the honourable senators making them believe them to be of substance when the rest of the house does not.

Here we give honourable senators the benefit of the doubt, when their recognized persons stand up and raise questions of privilege. I must emphasize here that the recognition of the senator's person is a first requirement for our constitution as a legislative body, for once that is established by valid appointment, it is all that is required that a member stand to hold the floor and speak.

When a senator's person is recognized, there is a presumption of "honour". Rejecting that presumption, especially where it bears upon a member's raised questions of privilege, is like suggesting that the defendant of an unjust accusation ought not to be heard in court—where his innocence will be presumed—unless what he is defending is more than trivial. Those accused of resisting a thief by disturbing the peace would thereby be denied trial, since the charge is minor. The claims of the innocent, the travesty they suffer and the dignity they defend would be deemed too trivial to defend against wrong. That is what happens when a senator's claim on privilege is presumed "uninteresting" or "not pressing".

Senator Doody: Has the honourable senator finished?

Senator Haidasz: If I may, I will add a quote taken from Joseph Maingot's classic, Parliamentary Privilege in Canada. He reminds us, at page 162, of the following:

> As regards the Senate, s. 33 of the British North America Act provides "If any question arises respecting the qualification . . . the same shall be heard and determined by the Senate".

This house was never constituted to be a bastion of partisan allegiances, outmoded or as fresh as a fad, since its members do not have to fear loss of cabinet posts or even constituency seats. It is difficult to understand, therefore, even with the temporary party agenda still embraced by its more recent appointees, even perhaps with profound loyalties to the government that placed them here, how one side of this house might not recognize its parliamentary duty to settle questions of privilege which are bound to affect them just as surely as they now affect others.

Honourable senators, I must return to my earlier remarks that, without the interpretation I have been adducing for Rule 33 in support of the principle that privilege is pre-eminent, it becomes a voided rule. To void such a rule requires far more than the edicts of a senator occupying a seat. In fact, it requires the report of a committee on rules and orders and much debate.

Again I say that Rule 33, we would like to maintain, is inviolable, as it specifically defends privilege. If it is not void, then my interpretation is that it carries weight. I beseech honourable senators, therefore, to hear me out patiently.

Senator Doody: What?

Senator Haidasz: The motion under debate—

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. The honourable senator has been on his feet for an hour and a half or longer, and he has yet to raise a question of privilege. He is raising a point of order. He is upset because the last time he tried to raise a question of privilege, it was adjourned in someone else's name.

If the honourable senator wants to object to that, he can ask that a vote be proceeded with. But this is just spurious and wasteful of the time and privileges of the Senate. I ask the honourable gentleman to take his seat.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, as I mentioned at the outset, I rose on a question of privilege—

Senator Doody: There is no privilege.

Senator Haidasz: Well, that is not for you to decide right now. You have to hear me out—

Senator Doody: Then let us decide it.

Senator Haidasz: We have to go into Committee of the Whole—

Senator Doody: Does the honourable senator really think that he will get any sympathy from the members of this chamber for what he is trying to do? Everyone knows that he is trying to move a motion under the guise of a question of privilege which is not a question of privilege. It is a question of order. Will he please sit down and let us get on with the business of the day?

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I therefore conclude. I must repeat, though, what I said at the outset. I am very concerned about the evidence, occasioned by the reception of a motion to adjourn debate on appeals of broken privilege to the Senate, that this house has not properly understood or applied in recent months. This is supported by Rule 33, Senator Doody. This is, for me, the earliest opportunity to raise this matter, as I am again the object of privilege broken by misapplication of Rule 33, as I was on November 29.

MOTION TO RESOLVE SENATE INTO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE NEGATIVED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: The adjournment of debate on an appeal on privilege on November 29 last was taken against Rule 33 and therefore against the privilege of all senators to be guaranteed a timely treatment of their own questions of privilege. Therefore, honourable senators, I move, and I know that it does not have to be seconded, pursuant to Rule 33—

Senator Doody: It does have to be seconded.

Senator Haidasz: It does not.

Senator Doody: It is a motion.

Senator Haidasz: This does not have to be settled by you now.

Senator Doody: Well, it will not be received.

Senator Haidasz: I move that:

This House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole so as to settle, by a report to the Senate in Chamber, whether

(a) it is a matter of privilege, as I have described it, to settle the truth of a question of privilege, upon invoking Rule 33 and moving to convoke a Committee of the Whole, as I did do on November 29 at 15:40 hours, with merits to be presented to such a committee, when there is evidence that the question of privilege had been raised on occasion previously without receiving due or timely consideration before the House;

• (1700)

and whether

(b) such a motion strictly requires no notice, nor a seconder;

and whether

(c) debate on such motion is mandatory, or else the principle acceded, as I have described the necessity;

and whether

(d) debate on the motion, because of privilege putatively in breach, does not admit of adjournment, expect for pleasure;

and whether

(e) Rule 33 entails that proceedings and debate in the Committee of the Whole, if convoked pursuant to such a motion of appeal, may not be adjourned except for pleasure, or if taken by "leave of the house", or if moved or seconded by the appellant(s), provided the putative privilege affects only the appellant(s) themselves, and not the general privilege of the Senate; and if the affirmative is found on any of these principles, that the remedy of allowing the use of Rule 33 in the manner I have described it, or suitably qualified by the Committee, be recommended by the report of the same Committee of the Whole, forthwith.

Honourable senators, I will end my remarks on my Question of Privilege this afternoon. In view of the fact that the chairman of the Senate Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee wants to proceed with matters affecting Bill C-43, I remind honourable senators that on October 25 I moved the following motion:

That an obligatory instruction be given by this House to the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to give particular study to the individual flaws of Bill C-43 as identified, for instance in my speech on June 26; and

That the Committee give full study and call expert witnesses to address all issues that are cognate to the Bill including the legal, constitutional, ethical, sociological, and scientific implications of this Bill, and to consider appropriate amendments to Bill C-43.

I thank honourable senators for their patience.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this motion is not receivable under Rule 24 which states:

A motion made in the Senate, but not seconded, shall not be debated or put from the Chair.

The whole exercise has been wasted. The time of the Senate has been wasted, the honourable gentleman's time has been wasted, and the patience of his colleagues here has been sorely tested.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, if, according to Senator Doody it is an absolute rule that my motion has to be seconded, Senator Buckwold is the seconder.

Senator Doody: Great! And you don't want to sit tomorrow night.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Haidasz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Buckwold that this house do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole.

Senator Doody: Dispense.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Those in favour?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Those opposed?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

MEETING OF COMMITTEE CANCELLED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I pointed out to Senator Haidasz at 3.15 this afternoon that the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee was quite prepared to sit at that time. I had a motion prepared to seek the approval of the Senate for sitting, so we could get on with determining the witnesses Senator Haidasz would like. He refused the offer and, instead, chose to do what we have heard here today.

I wish to advise honourable senators that the committee will not sit because of the delay.

INTERNATIONAL SALE OF GOODS CONTRACTS CONVENTIONS ACT

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Donald H. Oliver moved second reading of Bill C-81, to implement the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods.

He said: Honourable senators, this is the first opportunity I have had to rise in this place to make some remarks. I had intended to say a great many things about my view and impression of this chamber. In view of the hour, and in view of my knowledge that there are others who also wish to speak before the hour of 6 o'clock, I would like to reserve my comments and remarks for some other time and move directly to Bill C-81, about which I would like to make a few remarks. I will also summarize those remarks and not go into them in the detail that I had originally intended. I would be pleased to meet with anyone wishing to have the benefit of the more detailed remarks on Bill C-81 at any time and at their convenience to go into the matter in more detail.

Honourable senators, basically Bill C-81 permits the government to implement, for federal agencies, an international treaty which will simplify international sales transactions for both exporters and importers. The convention came into force on January 1, 1988 and the convention was adopted under the auspices of the United Nations in Vienna in the year 1980. Already there are a number of countries or states that are trading partners of Canada that have become party to the convention, namely, the United States, France, Italy, Germany and China.

The convention governs the formation of contracts for the sale and the rights of the seller and the buyer arising from such a contract. It applies to contracts of sale of goods between parties who have their place of business in different states. These states are contracting states, or when the rules of private international law lead to the application of the law of a contracting state.

By offering this uniform regime, this United Nations Convention responds to the needs inherent in the increase of transactions of international sale of goods by bringing greater certainty with respect to the laws applicable to the formation of the contract of sale and to the rights of the seller and the buyer, and thereby facilitates trade between nationals of different states and fosters a more equitable rapport between the parties to a contract.

Considering the increase in international sales of goods and the legal disparities between the states in this field, the convention is a welcome factor of unification.

There are a great number of organizations that support this agreement. In particular, the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, and the Canadian Exporters Association all support Canada's accession to the convention. In addition, experts of civil law and common law have judged the convention compatible with Canadian law.

Canadians deal with companies or individuals abroad, including states where the commercial law is very different from ours, if not sometimes incompatible. The choice of applicable law may become a difficult item of negotiation, especially when the other party wants to impose its own domestic law. The convention offers the possibility, by this new regime, of a neutral legal regime acceptable to both parties.

The federal implementing act, Bill C-81, will allow all federal entities, even those situated in provinces that have not implemented the convention, to benefit from its provisions.

[Senator Oliver .]

Moreover, it ensures that federal entities are governed by a uniform regime for the international sale of goods. Already in Canada, eight provinces and one territory have adopted the legislation to implement the convention. Those provinces are Ontario, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Alberta, British Columbia, Newfoundland and the Northwest Territories. The others are considering implementation.

• (1710)

In short, the adoption of a bill for the implementation of the Convention on contracts for the international sale of goods would allow federal entities—that is, departments, departmental corporations and agent crown corporations—to benefit from the advantages of the Convention if they so wish. This will benefit a great number of transactions since the Convention applies to states with whom we have most commercial trade. I commend, therefore, this bill to this house.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Would Senator Oliver deal with a couple of short questions? Did I understand Senator Oliver to say that the province of Quebec has not agreed to the Convention? There would then be one other province. What province would that be?

The second question is: Would the effect of this proposed statute be to alter indirectly rights which persons would have under the ordinary law prevailing in provincial jurisdictions?

Senator Oliver: The answer to the first question, honourable senators, is that there are two provinces and one territory that have not yet signed—Saskatchewan, Quebec and the Yukon. They support the Convention, and have indicated that they will implement it as well.

The answer to question number two is that there is a provision in Bill C-81 for those jurisdictions or those parties who do not wish to use the new regime to contract or opt out. So that the laws of a particular province or state can prevail, if that is the wish of the two contracting parties.

Senator Stewart: When you say "two contracting parties" do you mean private persons?

Senator Oliver: I mean the buyer and the seller.

Senator Stewart: Yes; I understand.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Does the absence of support from the province of Quebec have anything to do with the fact that they have a different system—that is, they have the civil code as distinguished from the common law system?

Senator Oliver: I do not think it does, because legal scholars both in civil law and common law have passed upon this legislation and have indicated that there is no reason in civil law why they should not support it. In fact, my information is that Quebec agrees with the Convention and will be passing the appropriate legislation in due course.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1990-91

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-94, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1991.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before you today, Appropriation Bill No. 3, 1990-91, provides for the release of the whole of Supplementary Estimates (B) for 1990-91, amounting to $1.857 billion. The total spending authority identified in Supplementary Estimates (B) is just under $4.8 billion. The difference, representing statutory items, includes an item of $2.9 billion to cover the increase in public debt charge, which is practically the entire difference.

Supplementary Estimates (B) includes major voted items of, first, $350 million to National Defence—mostly to support Canadian troops in the Persian Gulf.

Second, $257 million to prepare and plan for the goods and services tax.

Third, $116 million to develop the Mobile Servicing System as part of Canada's contribution to the Space Station.

Fourth, $114 million to Agriculture Canada, primarily to provide assistance to farmers hard hit by depressed commodity prices.

Fifth, $108 million to enable the government to distribute $2.4 billion in GST credits to some eight million lower and modest income Canadians, and to provide information to consumers.

Sixth, $104 million to Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation for loan losses associated with the Assisted Rental Program portfolios and for 1990-91 interest charges arising from delays in loans coming under repayment by clients.

Honourable senators, Supplementary Estimates (B) were tabled in the Senate on November 27, 1990, and referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance yesterday. This bill is in the standard form and the list of Supplementary Estimates (B) forms a schedule to the bill.

I understand, honourable senators, that every effort will be made to provide information and witnesses to the committee whenever that committee requests them. I ask that the committee deal with this matter as expeditiously as possible.

There is one other thing. I have with me—and this may be of interest to senators—the Estimates tabled to date for 1990-91 and the supply to date for 1990-91. I would ask that they be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and that they form part of the permanent records of this house.

(For text of document see Appendix, p. 4920.)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, concerning the point made by the Deputy Leader of the Government, I understand what he has said. Is it his intention to stand the bill until the committee reports on it, or to send it to committee after it is examined in connection with the Supplementary Estimates, which, as he has indicated, are the schedule of the bill. The previous practice has been to deal with the bill when the committee has reported on the Supplementary Estimates. Is that the intention?

Senator Doody: That had been my supposition. I assumed that it would be handled as we have handled it previously. The Estimates are in the committee and the committee will examine the Estimates and report back. If the Senate then finds it agreeable, the committee report will be accepted and the Supply bill will go forward after that.

Senator Frith: We should then adjourn the debate and leave it on the order paper until they report.

Senator Doody: We have done that before, as well.

Senator MacEachen: Then I will cooperate and adjourn the debate.

The Hon the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

FISHERIES ACT
CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gérald J. Comeau moved second reading of Bill C-74, to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, I welcome the opportunity to offer a few comments on second reading of Bill C-74, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act. This bill is an important government initiative. The bill not only stands on its own with its measures to conserve Canada's fisheries resource but also supports and complements the government's long-term strategy for the fisheries and the environment. It is part of the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program and the government's Green Plan.

When passed, this legislation will make significant changes to the legal and enforcement regime needed for the proper management and control of Canada's valuable fisheries and fish habitat.

The government is acutely aware of the importance of setting out adequate structures that will help keep the fisheries resource healthy and viable.

[Translation]

Senator Comeau: In its present form, the fisheries legislation is general in scope. Its purpose is to regulate the use of Canadian fish stocks by commercial, sport and native fishermen as well as protect fish habitat and prevent the pollution of such.

The legislation was originally adopted in 1868 and was modified and revised at least 41 times since. The result is a mosaic of clauses, some containing outdated or redundant provisions. More importantly, the legislation is not severe enough for offences dealing with fishery management and habitat protection. The provisions on regulatory enforcement are anemic, and the entire legislation is severely lacking regarding the statistical data collection and management powers. Moreover, the present legislation is inadequate as far as several of the constraints put on use by the modern management of fisheries and habitats are concerned.

The changes contained in Bill C-74 reflect the determination of the government to preserve the health and vitality of the Canadian fish industry. What is proposed in this bill is not so much a complete overhaul of the Fisheries Act as a means of better preserving the fish stocks by addressing a number of pressing problems.

● (1720)

[English]

Bill C-74 proposes an increase in penalties for fisheries and habitat violations. It proposes tightened provisions for gathering statistics on fisheries. It strengthens management and enforcement processes. Bill C-74 also provides for clarification and refinement of regulation-making powers and the repeal of outdated or redundant provisions.

Approval of Bill C-74 will support and complement the government's long-term strategy for the fisheries—a strategy aimed at conservation and longer-term stock rebuilding by focusing on increased deterrence, effective enforcement and responsive management.

When passed, the provisions included in Bill C-74 will allow the courts to better match the punishment to the offence, taking into account all the circumstances.

Bill C-74 also proposes measures to enhance the quality of the statistical information that supports all fisheries management.

For a natural resource such as the Canadian fishery, management requires more complete knowledge of what is happening to the resource, the size of the fish stock, trends in the populations of the fish stock, and, of course, the impact of fishing on the fish stock population.

[Translation]

The changes contained in Bill C-74 will provide the strong legislative base needed to obtain the data used to estimate fish stocks and to devise good mechanisms for regulatory control.

Moreover, these changes clarify the regulatory-making powers concerning fishery management, particularly as they relate to observers, local closures and minimum size of catches.

[English]

Before Bill C-74 was drafted, extensive consultation took place with representatives of the industry, the provinces, and with individuals across the country to devise the best possible legislation.

Officials from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans carried out briefings with industry advisory groups. Both the Atlantic Regional Council and the Pacific Regional Council support the overall thrust of the amendments, and much of their advice has been incorporated into Bill C-74.

[Senator Comeau.]

During these consultations, the message was repeated that something be done so that penalties for fishing violations are something more than "just a cost of doing business". In other words, penalties that will be a real deterrence for those who continuously commit fishing violations should be introduced.

The second message delivered by fishermen and the industry is that Parliament must send a message to the courts that fishing violations are serious and that they can have lasting effects on the resource.

What is proposed in Bill C-74 for general domestic fishing offenses is an increase of the maximum penalty from the current low level of $5,000 to $100,000 on summary conviction, with an option to proceed by indictment and with a maximum fine on indictment of $500,000. For second and subsequent offenses there would also be the provision for one year's imprisonment on summary conviction and two years on indictment.

As to fish habitat and pollution prevention offenses, there is a proposed penalty regime of $300,000 on summary conviction for alteration of fish habitat, and up to $1 million on indictment. In addition, there are imprisonment options of six months imprisonment on summary conviction or three years on indictment, again for second and subsequent offenses.

Another important aspect of fish habitat management is the need to secure from developers plans and specifications of their works or undertakings. Failure to provide such information currently brings a fine of up to $5,000 on summary conviction or $10,000 for second and subsequent offenses under the current act. The penalties for this offence under the proposals in Bill C-74 would be up to $200,000 on summary conviction, with an imprisonment option for second and subsequent offenses.

[Translation]

For all offences relating to fishery and habitat management, the Bill gives the courts power to impose new orders, forcing the offender, for example, to do community work, to publish the facts, or to assume clean-up costs.

Courts can also impose suspended sentences. These mean that if the person does not abide by the probation order, he or she will have to serve the original sentence.

Holders of fishing licences must be held responsible for any offence committed while exercising the privileges granted by the license. Accordingly, the holder of a fishing licence will now be responsible for any offence committed on board of a boat covered by the licence.

[English]

These are examples of the tough, new provisions included in Bill C-74. A renewable resource needs careful attention and judicious management. Through these amendments to the Fisheries Act, the government is taking the steps that count to enshrine in law the basic principles of conservation and habitat protection.

While efforts must continue in the area of policy and practice, it is of paramount importance to have laws that reinforce and complement our efforts to conserve and manage the resource.

Conservation and the need to deter illegal fishing and over-fishing involve difficult choices in the short term, but we have an overriding commitment to resource management and to sustaining the economic benefits of a well-managed fishery.

This bill received all party support in the other place. I hope that honourable senators will consider this bill expeditiously so that its provisions can become law when the 1991 fishing season starts on January 1.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Would the honourable senator deal with a question? I noticed that in his remarks Senator Comeau concentrated on the new higher penalties which are to be available to the courts. He said that these higher penalties are necessary in order to enable the Minister of Fisheries to manage the resources as well as to protect the marine environment. Would it be correct to conclude from the emphasis of his remarks that the powers of the Minister of Fisheries with regard to the management of resources and the protection of the marine environment remain virtually unchanged, but that the regulations made under these powers will hereafter be backed up by what the honourable senator regards as far more adequate penalties?

Senator Comeau: There are no major changes to the powers which the minister previously held. A great deal of consultation has been undertaken with regard to the proposed amendments. It is proposed that the penalties be increased quite substantially in order to send a message to the courts so that those involved in the fishing industry, especially those who benefit the most from it, that is, the fisherman, will be assured that fishing violations will be stopped. However, it is also a strong message from Parliament to the courts that our fish stocks and our habitat must be protected.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, for the second reading of the Bill C-92, An Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act.—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I regret I was unable to proceed with the debate yesterday, but I did not have the Debates of the Senate. I have them now, I read them and I also read the debates in the other place. I am quite prepared to proceed with this bill.

There is some urgency indeed because if we do not pass this bill now some legislation concerning the Northwest Territories that have not yet been translated will remain inoperative. For the benefit of Northwest Territories residents, I think it is essential that we do so now.

But one or two questions remain to be answered. It has been suggested that there has been an extension. I must confess that I did not find anything factual in that respect. I hope that in committee the sponsor of the bill will be able to indicate whether such is the case or not.

The other question raised has to do with funding for translating the bill. I hope the federal government will continue to provide strong financial support to the Northwest Territories to complete that work. I think it is essential that the federal government participate and maintain the agreement which had been made before concerning the translation. I believe the agreement is due to expire soon. So we would have to make sure that the federal government will provide full financial support and agree to the proposed 15-month extension so that the translation work be completed.

So I would ask the sponsor of the bill to give us the assurance in committee that there will be no problem on the financial side.

There is another point I would like to raise in this respect and that is the desire of the Northwest Territories to promote their aboriginal languages. I believe that here again, we should ask the federal government to provide for a long-term agreement. Their situation is unique, because of the number of aboriginal languages. I am told, for instance, that three languages are commonly used in their legislative assembly. Everything is translated into three languages. Considering that here we occasionally have problems with two languages, I think it is impressive that they, in those remote regions, can accommodate four. All bills, it seems, are translated and the proceedings may be either in English, French or Inuktituk. They have simultaneous translation.

In addition, the Northwest Territories often use five other languages: North and South Slavey, Dogrib, Chipewyan and Kutchin. A member may decide to use one of those languages during a debate, and he may ask for a translation, not necessarily of the bills but of any text arising from the bill, and local people who need information and want a summary of a bill can ask to have it translated in those languages. Here again, I think it is important for the federal government to support these efforts by the Government of the Northwest Territories to make the public better informed. As you know, the population is spread over an immense territory. It is therefore essential for people to have access to government decisions in their own language.

I want to ask Senator Beaudoin whether he could look into this—I am especially thinking of the funding aspect—and give us the assurance that the federal government will continue to support the translation work being done.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if Senator Beaudoin speaks now, this will have the effect of ending the debate on second reading.

Hon. Gérald Beaudoin: Honourable senators, to Senator Molgat's next question, I reply that I did ask the officials concerned if there had already been an extension. I was told that there has never been an extension. It would be the first.

On the second point raised by Senator Molgat, honourable senators, I can tell you that the officials of both governments are currently looking into the possibility of coming to an agreement on the financing of French and Native languages. Both gave firm assurances concerning this. I do hope, as you certainly do, that the financing will prove adequate for future legislation.

Third, on the issue of Native languages, if I understood correctly the gist of the text which was brought to our attention, financing is assured for the French, English and Native languages. That is all I can say for the time being. I may deal again with this later on the third reading. That is all I have to say for now.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, would it be possible to ask the minister or an official of the Department to appear before the committee which will be dealing with this bill and to be in a position to provide this information about financing. I suggest that this question has major significance for the Government of the Northwest Territories, and since the previous agreement is about to expire, it would be advisable to have this aspect made clear to them.

Senator Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I will certainly pass on this request to the proper departmental officials.

Would it be in order to move a motion for this bill to be referred to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs?

Motion agreed to and Bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Beaudoin, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

BANK ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Barootes, seconded by the Honourable Senator Comeau, for the second reading of the Bill C-90, An Act to amend the Bank Act (extension).—(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.).

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have completed my remarks on this order. Therefore, it can go to the next stage, which I presume is referral to committee.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Olson for his interjection. However, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, I should like to make a few comments on the bill. I should like to compliment Senator Barootes for his usual reasoned and restrained presentation of the government's thinking on Bill C-90.

[Senator G.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You had to spoil it with that adjective. Take out the word "usual".

• (1740)

Senator Buckwold: I refer to his comment that this is a very routine and innocuous bill.

Senator Frith: Famous last words.

Senator Buckwold: It may be routine and innocuous but, although it will obviously be referred to committee, I think it is worthy of a few comments from those of us interested in financial institutions.

I would remind honourable senators that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce spent several months in a detailed study of financial institutions, during which ministers appeared as witnesses along with representatives of the major financial institutions—the "four pillars" that we refer to in the financial field. Over and above presenting their own personal point of view, all of those representatives had the same message, which was that it was important for the government to get the legislation that had been promised onto the order paper and to proceed with their program.

What we see in Bill C-90 is another delay. This simple or innocuous bill says that the Bank Act will not expire as the present legislation would demand on March 31, 1991, but that it will be extended for another year. If by any chance the Bank Act expired in 1991, as I have indicated earlier, it would cause a chaotic situation, although I am sure the government would soon have some means of carrying on with financial institutions. I think all members of this institution should be aware that there are broad implications in this whole question of the regulation of financial institutions. I would even recommend that the committee report, which was well received by all parts of the industry, be re-read. Part of the report indicates the importance of letting all the institutions know where they stand.

The legislation introduced by Senator Barootes means that amendments to the Bank Act are to be postponed for at least another year. It is important that legislators and the industry itself should have an overall picture of what is happening to the financial industry. Banks should know; trust companies should know; insurance companies should know; stockbrokers should know—the four pillars of the financial community—how they fit in. I think all of us would agree that that is necessary.

Since 1985 when it issued the Green Paper, the government has emphasized the importance of having that legislation coordinated and of bringing in an overall policy for financial institutions. Time after time, the Minister of Finance has indicated that legislation is ready to go. Insurance companies are waiting with bated breath for the legislation. Trust and loan companies are anxiously wanting to know where they fit in. That also applies to stockbrokers. Last, but probably most important, banks have to know their relationship to other financial institutions. They want to know who will own them; and they want to know what the ownership requirements will be. They also want to know about ministerial responsibility, provincial regulations and about harmonization with the provinces. They want to know about all the major aspects of trying to develop a policy for financial institutions that is in the best interests of the country economically, and of the depositors who are involved with these financial institutions.

Honourable senators, without delaying the chamber too long, I feel it is important to put on the record that it is essential to have that kind of coordinated approach to financial institutions. There are 3,000 financial institutions in this country which represent over $1 trillion worth of assets. In the interests of those people who entrust their life savings to financial institutions, it is important that we have that kind of an approach.

In suggesting that this legislation go to committee, it is important to recognize that witnesses from the Department of Finance should be able to answer the questions that will be asked by the committee as to when we will be able to tie in the uniformity and coordination of the regulations.

The industry has told me that, until there is that overall picture, the situation will be difficult for them. I have talked to members of the financial community who feel that an umbrella type of legislation should be available so that each of the so-called "four pillars" would know how they fit into the financial scene in this country.

Although, as Senator Barootes says, the bill is routine and innocuous—and in itself, I suppose, it might be looked at in that way—I think the overall implications are very serious. What is also important is the fact that it is another delay which gives the government another year to fulfil their promise of 1985, contained in the Green Paper, that they would have financial policy that would fit into the financial requirements of the banking and financial community as it approaches the next century.

I note that Senator Barootes said that the government would be prepared to refer the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I would hope that he would follow his own direction and so move.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that, if the Honourable Senator Barootes speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Barootes: —I would thank Senator Olson and Senator Buckwold for their remarks. Obviously their concerns can be best answered in committee by hearing from the appropriate witnesses.

I would, therefore, move second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Barootes, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

OFFICIAL REPORT

CORRECTION

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, yesterday I rose on a serious question of privilege because a large part of the proceedings of this House were left out of Hansard. I intend to pursue this matter until I get an answer. I want to know who was responsible for that.

When reading over the "blues" of yesterday's proceedings, I noticed that I said I would bring this matter up for the next ten years if I did not get an answer. I was exaggerating a little, but I intend to bring the matter up until I do receive a satisfactory answer. I want to know who it is in this chamber who believes they have the right to strike out a whole page of Hansard.

The Deputy Leader of the Government knows that when a senator does not know to whom to direct a question, the question lands in his lap. Therefore, I should like him to investigate this matter and get an answer for me.

I can also tell you that I have one or two other plans in mind in case this one fails.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will certainly undertake to make the inquiries on behalf of Senator Olson. I will check with the Table and with those who are responsible for printing to see if I can trace the origins of the dastardly deed.

Hon. Romeo LeBlanc: Honourable Senators, some of the points made by Senator Olson I too was trying to make in the other official language as a proud Privy Councillor. Obviously I will be interested in the explanation that will be provided. However, I was interrupted—and I make no reproach to the Leader of the Government for it—when he announced that the other place had adjourned. However, I think it is important to know why the remarks of Senator Olson and myself suddenly evaporated into thin air.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I found a petition that I had not tabled earlier against the GST from people in the Kingston area. There are approximately 25 names on each of the four sheets, totalling, therefore, approximately 100 names.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a series of petitions signed by 4,884 residents of Montreal. I will simply read the text of the petition, which is very brief.

To the honourable Senate of Canada:

The undersigned citizens of the Dominion of Canada now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right to present a grievance common to your petitioners, in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefor provide a remedy.

They humbly sheweth

That the new universal federal 7 per cent goods and services tax approved by the Conservative Government, will create serious and undue hardship for Canadians; that introducing this tax constitutes an unprecedented attack on the incomes of Canadians that are already far too low, not only because it obliges them to pay higher taxes but also because of the resulting increase in the cost of living due to the inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment that will be a consequence of the new tax.

Therefore, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to reject this new goods and services tax.

As in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray.

This petition was signed by 4,884 residents of Montreal, petition the government will obviously never consider.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senator, what is the date on this petition?

Senator Hébert: Just a minute. The petition is dated November 20, 1990.

[English]

Hon. Stan Waters: Honourable Senators, I also have a petition to present; it is from about 300 good citizens of Alberta who all oppose the GST. The opposition continues unabated. The petitions are dated over the last two months. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present 97 petitions signed by 1,997 residents of London, Ontario, southwestern Ontario and parts of British Columbia who are opposed to the goods and services tax. They think it is a bad tax and are opposing it.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have approximately 1,600 names on petitions which I would like to table. These petitions humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I too have some petitions I would like to table. They come from a variety of places in western Canada. I have 150 names from Rosetown, Saskatchewan; Fiske, Saskatchewan; Calgary, Alberta; Biggar, Saskatchewan; Wardlow, Alberta; Sylvan Lake, Alberta; Edmonton, Alberta; Swift Current, Saskatchewan; Saskatoon, Saskatchewan; Calgary, Alberta; Ladysmith, British Columbia; Claresholm, Alberta; Kindersley, Saskatchewan; Flaxcombe, Saskatchewan; Grande Prairie, Alberta; and a number from Kelowna, British Columbia. They all express their opposition to the GST.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit at three thirty o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL REVENUE

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX CREDIT—PAYMENT OF FEDERAL SALES TAX BEFORE THIRD READING OF BILL C-62—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have in my hand a photocopy of a cheque from the Department of National Revenue, together with an explanation of the changes. The letter is to a taxpayer and it states:

Based on the information you have provided, we will be able to determine if you are entitled to receive the proposed goods and services tax credit (GSTC). The Government of Canada is proposing to introduce this new credit to help offset all or part of its proposed goods and services tax for low and modest income families. The GSTC will be sent to qualifying taxpayers four times a year.

We have allowed you a federal sales tax credit of $169.35, based on the information available.

Your refund includes $4.28 of refund interest.

On the other side is the breakdown of how they arrived at that amount. Of course, it lists the person's income, which was a modest $5,200 and a number of other things. Under an item entitled, "Federal Sales Tax Credit", there is the amount of $169.35, and there is a photocopy of the cheque for $169.35.

My problem with this letter is that the cheque is dated December 11. At that time, the corresponding bill had not had third reading, and it certainly had not had Royal Assent and proclamation. Although the cheque is dated December 11, it was received by the recipient of the goods and services tax credit on December 13, two days after it was dated, and also the day before third reading in this chamber.

Senators opposite may take this matter lightly, but this is an unlawful procedure.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): They are not interested in the law; it's just a joke, look at them laughing.

Senator Olson: I want to tell you something else. Do not say, "That is the way things were always done," because it is not the way things were always done. I had the responsibility of being the Minister of Agriculture for approximately four and a half years or so.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: You have told us that many times before.

Senator Olson: I also had the responsibility of being the Minister of Economic Development for approximately four years. I want to tell you what happens.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Did you say that was your problem? What is your question?

Senator Olson: Wait one minute; I will get to it. This is a breach of the law of Canada. There is no authority that I can find. That is why I did not bring the matter up yesterday, because I did some research on this question to find out when the Parliament of Canada had amended the Excise Tax Act in such a way that it would authorize the Minister of National Revenue to issue refunds under the Excise Tax Act.

Senator Barootes: How did you get such confidential information?

Senator Olson: You surely do not mean that the amending of the laws in this country is now confidential?

Senator Barootes: You acquired a person's income tax return and information concerning his income. That is confidential.

Senator Olson: You should be quiet, because this is serious. I have been through this before, honourable senators, a number of times. When I was in the government and someone wanted to have a payment made out of the Public Treasury, the first thing I did was find out whether or not the government had authority to make such a payment. I told the senior officials in the departments which it was my honour to run, "Go and find out whether or not we have authority to make this payment. If we do not, the first thing we will do is go to Parliament for an amendment that will give the government the authority to make such a payment." But that was not done in this case.

Honourable senators, this is so serious that I cannot understand the levity over there. My question to the minister is: Will you look into this matter and find out how many more cheques the department has sent out? I have only one here, but I know of a dozen more people who have received this payment, what is called "a tax credit to offset the proposed goods and services tax." That is the explanation given in the letter that came from the Department of National Revenue.

This raises a lot of questions. If the government does not intend to obey the law, how can they expect anyone else to do so? One thing that is absolutely fundamental is that the government does not have the authority to spend one nickel out of the Treasury unless it is authorized by Parliament.

Senator Simard: What are you going to do about this? What are you going to do?

Senator Olson: That is the most outrageous question. "What are you going to do about it?" On the other side they say, "We do what we damn well please. Never mind what the law is."

Senator Simard: Talk, talk, talk.

Senator Olson: I can see that the minister is not smiling quite as widely as he usually does, because you have done an unlawful act. You had no right to send money to this taxpayer or to anyone else until it was authorized by Parliament. On December 11, 1990, it was not authorized by Parliament. If you do not think that is serious, then why in Heaven's name do you expect the people of Canada to obey the law when the government does not? It is absolutely frustrating to see the government act in this fashion.

I should like to ask the minister if he is aware that the GST credit was paid out to a lot of Canadians long before the bill was passed and authorized by the Parliament of Canada. I should also like to ask him whether or not the act has been proclaimed yet. I know that you had some trouble on Friday with respect to Royal Assent. I was not here on Monday because I had other important public business to attend to. However, if the act has not been proclaimed, it is not the law of this land. A proclamation is required and, in addition, the government is required to publish the regulations to enforce the law when it is proclaimed. At least that used to be the law in Canada. I do not think you have done that.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I think you are wrong about that.

Senator Olson: One thing that is absolutely certain is that you had not done it by December 11 when this cheque was mailed out. I will give my honourable friend a copy of it. When I copied the cheque, I put a piece of paper over it so you could not identify the Canadian taxpayer. I would not want any discriminatory action to be taken against this taxpayer in southern Alberta. I hope you do not follow that kind of rotten route, but I would not put it past you.

I hope the minister has some explanation as to why this government can pass out taxpayers' money before authority is given by Parliament. After you answer that question, I would like to ask you a few questions concerning the Minister of Finance's announcement that saying he has some amendments to the GST when it was passed only the day before yesterday.

I do not want to ask the Leader of the Government to give an answer off the top of his head or wherever it will come from, but this is an extremely serious matter. I hope the honourable minister will look into it and at least apologize to the Canadian people. How does the government expect other people to obey the law when they act in this fashion?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have listened carefully to what the Honourable Senator Olson has stated. I am reading very quickly through the documents he has been kind enough to send to me across the floor.

These documents relate to the personal income tax return of a taxpayer for the previous taxation year.

Senator Frith: It has to relate to income in order to determine if he is entitled to a credit.

Senator Murray: It is for the taxation year 1989.

Senator Olson: But there is a tax credit of $169.

Senator Murray: I know that. I am coming to that. There is a statement that says that on the basis of this taxpayer's 1989 return, the government will be able to—note the future tense—determine if he is entitled to receive the proposed—note the adjective—goods and services tax credit. It goes on to say that the Government of Canada is proposing to introduce this new credit to help offset all or part of its proposed—note the adjective—goods and services tax for low- and modest-income families. The GSTC will be sent to qualifying taxpayers four times a year.

Senator Olson: Read the next part.

Senator Murray: I am reading the next sentence. It says:

> We have allowed you a federal sales tax credit . . .

That is the old tax, Senator Olson. That is not the new GST. The letter continues:

● (1420)

> We have allowed you a federal sales tax credit of $169.35, based on the information available.

Sure enough, there is a form here on the 1989 Notice of Assessment, and one of the categories is "federal sales tax credit". I do not have the taxpayer's return, of course, but it appears on the Notice of Assessment that he or she has been allowed a credit of $169.35. That is a credit in relation to the old tax, not the new tax.

Senator Barootes: A simple apology will do!

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, how anyone can read these documents and come up with such a convoluted answer is completely beyond me. It says right here, and the leader read it—

An Hon. Senator: What is the date?

Senator Olson: December 11.

Senator Simard: That is the only thing you have right!

Senator Olson: It says, "We have allowed you a federal sales tax credit of $169.35, based on the information available." The information available is very simple. It says in the preceding paragraph that the Government of Canada believes that this individual is entitled to that credit because of the goods and services tax.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the document makes a clear distinction. In the first paragraph it refers to the "proposed goods and services tax credit" and, indeed, to this taxpayer's entitlement to the goods and services tax credit, which is based on the information in his or her 1989 return.

Senator Olson: That's not what it says.

Senator Murray: It then deals with a federal sales tax credit. It is the federal sales tax that is being replaced by the GST, and taxpayers, up until now, have been entitled to a credit. The category is right there in the Notice of Assessment, federal sales tax credit. I am quite confident that the honourable senator is quite mistaken in his interpretation. However, I shall have my interpretation and his looked at by the Department of National Revenue, and I shall bring in a reply tomorrow or the next day.

Meanwhile, I can only say that I hope the honourable senator engages a competent chartered accountant to do his own tax return.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is the most preposterous attempt at escaping that I have ever heard, and the honourable senator knows that very well. These two pieces of paper came in the same envelope along with a cheque.

An Hon. Senator: A what?

Senator Olson: A cheque. That is one of those things that looks like a cheque, feels like a cheque and cashes like a cheque.

I want to tell the minister one other thing: This particular taxpayer is a senior citizen who has no claim on any excise tax. Let us get technical here; it is not a sales tax that we are talking about, but an excise tax. That is what the Minister of Finance is talking about in his notice of a Ways and Means Motion that was issued today. In that notice he indicates that it is expedient to amend the Excise Tax Act and other legislation respecting implementation of the goods and services tax. So let us not kid ourselves about the terminology. The explanation is completely clear, that that $169 credit is because of the proposed GST, and it is clear that it was issued before we had given authorization to make payments on the proposed GST.

● (1430)

PAYMENTS OF FEDERAL SALES TAX CREDITS—DATE OF AUTHORIZATION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a general question dealing with the same matter but not, of course, related to the set of facts mentioned by Senator Olson.

Would the Leader of the Government tell us when authorization was obtained by any department to begin issuing bills or cheques to those eligible for the sales tax credit? I do not mean authorization by Parliament but subsequent authorization by warrant, or whatever type of document is required.

Could he tell us also when any department first issued bills, cheques or tax credits based on Bill C-62? These are simply factual questions; I do not expect the minister to have the answers in hand today.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I shall make inquiries, honourable senators.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

AVAILABILITY OF TABLED DOCUMENT

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, my question is for the Deputy Leader of the Government. He tabled a document further to the GST as sent in by the government. Could details of what is contained in that paper be given to us? I am not sure whether this is a Ways and Means Motion along the lines I exposed last week or something else. Is it a long document? Could it be read?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I do not have it here with me. I do know, however, that it has been tabled and I will try to get it from the Table. However, I am sure the Table will make it available to you, senator, because all documents are available to every member of the house once tabled.

Senator Buckwold: I am quite prepared to accept that, if members will be given a copy as soon as possible. I am most interested in seeing what changes the government is proposing to the Ways and Means Motion, which was sneered at by people on the other side when it was first announced.

Senator Doody: It is being done now, senator.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT ON EMPLOYMENT IN CANADA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us what the government proposes to do to find jobs for the 226,000 Canadians who have lost their jobs because of the Free Trade Agreement?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I think the honourable senator is mistaken in attributing these job losses to free trade. I think it is fair to say that the vast majority of those job losses would be an outcome of the slowdown in economic activity, indeed, the recession, in which the country now finds itself.

Senator Bonnell: The Canadian Labour Congress has indicated that it believes that is the number of jobs lost due to the Free Trade Agreement. The minister says that that is not the case. I am prepared to accept that the figure may be just 200,000.

[Senator Stewart.]

What is the policy of the government with regard to finding employment for all of those unemployed people?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think the honourable senator also neglects to mention the tens of thousands of jobs which have been created in this country in the past five or six years. Employment has risen in record proportions. While jobs have been lost in the normal course and in the course of the present recession in which the country finds itself, a great number of jobs have been created all across the country during the past six years. In fact, during the past six years, many, many more jobs have been created than have been lost in the current recession.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, that may all be true because I have no statistics to question that information' but I do know that approximately 70 per cent of the people of Prince Edward Island are unemployed.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): They are probably mistaken. They are not really unemployed. Is the government telling them that they really are not?

Senator Bonnell: Maybe the government intends to hire all of these people as tax police for the GST; I heard that suggestion. I understand they are putting in $87 million worth of computers in Hull. Maybe they can all move to Hull, before Quebec separates, and get jobs there. What is being done for the 17 or 18 per cent of Islanders who are unemployed? What kind of jobs will be provided for them besides the 400 GST jobs coming to Summerside? What is the government doing to help the people of Prince Edward Island find employment?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I just had the opportunity to review the statistics that I was referring to in a more general way a few moments ago. The fact of the matter is that, within the past two years, employment—employment!—has grown by 200,000 in this country. So, although unemployment has increased, there has been a very considerable increase in employment and job creation in this country.

Now, if the honourable senator wants to consider the situation in Atlantic Canada, again, the fact of the matter is that, since this government took office, the Atlantic Canada unemployment rate has fallen by 3.8 percentage points, from 16.8 per cent to 13 per cent, still far too high but—

Hon. William J. Petten: I want to ask the Minister where, which province in Atlantic Canada?

Senator Murray: I am talking about Atlantic Canada in general.

Senator Corbin: That is not a province.

Senator Murray: No. I do not have the province-by-province statistics. They are published by region, and I am giving the honourable senator the latest figures that I have for the region from which he comes.

Senator Bonnell: I can give you the latest figures by province. In Newfoundland, the unemployment rate is over 18 per cent, close to 20 per cent. In Prince Edward Island, it is between 17 and 18 per cent. So, take those two provinces. I think New Brunswick did have a slight drop in unemployment in the last month, and perhaps Nova Scotia had a drop as well, maybe because they sent them all off to the Gulf. However, what is the government doing for Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, those two parts of Atlantic Canada that are regionally poor, that need employment so that the people can have some income to support their wives and families? What is the Government of Canada doing to help, besides cutting back on shared-cost programs such as education, health and welfare?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will be very glad to bring in what I hope will be a brief and concise but persuasive report from the minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, because I think he would want to inform the honourable senator of the considerable private-sector investments that have been made possible through the incentive programs of ACOA in Prince Edward Island and in the other Atlantic Canada provinces. Further to that, I think he would want to inform the honourable senator of the investment of federal funds in economic development agreements with all of those Atlantic Provinces, and the stimulus that these are providing for investment and job creation in that region.

Senator Petten: Did I understand the Minister to say he would bring in that information, broken down by provinces?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I can certainly bring in that information from ACOA on the basis of each province, yes.

Senator Petten: Thank you.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Is the Leader of the Government indicating that the greater employment in this country is good news for the unemployed people? Are those people who have lost their jobs supposed to be really happy that there have been 200,000 jobs created? I think that is a problem that we are facing in this country—and I am not making a speech, I might add. Of course, we have far more employed people now than we had 20 years ago, but what of the unemployed?

INCREASE IN BANKRUPTCIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: I want to digress just for a minute to ask another question. I noticed in the paper today that bankruptcies in the Ottawa area have soared 82 per cent this month over the previous year. The statistics indicate that, for the Ottawa area, the total number of bankruptcies filed to date is 49,423, which is an increase of 82 per cent.

• (1440)

Those people who have gone bankrupt are probably not accounted for on the unemployment rolls because families are affected by bankruptcies, not just individuals.

The Minister of Finance dismissed the surge in bankruptcies as a "natural phenomenon". Would the Leader of the Government explain to me what a natural phenomenon is as it relates to bankruptcies increasing by 82 per cent?

Mr. Wilson also said that, despite government figures suggesting the opposite, the situation is not as bad as it was during the 1981-82 recession. It seems to me that is another outright lie to the people of this country. In any event, what difference does it make whether it was worse in 1981-82? What difference does that make to those people today who are going bankrupt or who are unemployed? How can the government justify making comparisons to the 1981-82 recession when we now have children eight or nine years of age living at or below the poverty level?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, Senator Sparrow contests the accuracy of the statement that the bankruptcy situation is not as bad today as it was during the 1981-82 recession.

Senator Olson: That is what everybody else is saying!

Senator Murray: As a matter of fact, Senator Sparrow has said that it is a lie to state that the 1981-82 situation was worse. Well, we shall see. I will be happy to bring the relevant statistics to the Senate in due course.

His second question was really related to his first when he talked about bankruptcies being a natural phenomenon. The economy is not static. Firms go out of business, but new firms are created every day.

Again, if the honourable senator will examine the facts—and I will assist him by bringing some of those facts to the Senate in statistical form—he will see that the number of new firms that have opened in Canada over the past two years—including new firms created in the past year or so through taking advantage of the new possibilities opened up by the Free Trade Agreement—is far, far higher than the number of firms that have gone out of business or that have gone bankrupt in this country.

Senator Sparrow: The Leader of the Government said that I said today's situation is not worse than the situation in 1981-82. I did not mean to say that. I simply asked what difference it would make if the situation were better or worse now than it was in 1981-82. Is the government comparing everything to the bad times of 1981-82? We are in a serious recession now.

I am not suggesting for one minute that the situation is not better today than it was in 1981-82, but what has that to do with the fact that people are going bankrupt and have to live below the poverty line? What consolation is it to the thousands of bankrupt businesses and individuals that new businesses have started up? If the leader is telling us that the economy is growing because of these new businesses, that is wrong. We have seen a decline in business activity over the past three quarters. These new businesses that have come on-stream have not increased the economic activity of this country.

Why is the leader saying that those who have gone bankrupt or those who are unemployed because of business bankruptcies should not worry because there are new businesses that have started up? The government is saying, "You people who have gone bankrupt or who are unemployed, suffer and enjoy it."

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think the only way to settle this argument is to bring in the latest figures on new job creation and new business creation in this country, as opposed to the number of bankruptcies that the honourable senator is referring to. He says that the creation of new businesses is cold comfort for those owners and employees of firms that have gone out of business. Again, I remind him that the economy is not static.

Senator Olson: It is not very good, either!

Senator Murray: There are definitely fewer blacksmiths in the country today than there used to be, but there are many new occupations that have created wealth in the country.

Senator Sparrow: Why, then, is the economic input-output going down?

Senator Murray: It is not.

Senator Sparrow: It has gone down in the last three quarters.

Would the Leader of the Government be prepared to tell the Canadian people that the government is sad and sorry about the number of bankruptcies? Will the government say, "Yes, we are sympathetic with those who have gone bankrupt; we are sympathetic with those who have become unemployed. We would like to do something about that"? That is not the situation. There appears to be no sympathy for those who have become unemployed or who have gone bankrupt. The government says that it is happy with the creation of new businesses, but "to hell with the people who have gone broke."

Senator Murray: We are doing far better than that. We are following a policy, and have been since 1984, of creating confidence in Canada's economy.

Senator Frith: Come on!

Senator Olson: What a load! It is incredible that you would say that.

Senator Murray: That policy has created unprecedented levels of investment and job creation in this country. Further, we are following a policy which we are confident will bring interest rates down. There is a major contribution we can make to the stability and prosperity of this country.

Senator Sparrow: The Minister of Finance stated not long ago that the government made the recession in order to slow down the economy. Is the leader now saying that is not the case?

MIGRATION OF CANADIAN MANUFACTURING FIRMS—EFFECT ON INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I noted that the Leader of the Government, in answering Senator Sparrow's questions a moment ago, stated that he thinks this government is creating confidence in the economy. Those were his words. He also stated that there is unprecedented investment in this country. In an earlier answer he made a comparison between openings of new businesses and closings of others.

[Senator Sparrow.]

I wonder if the leader will attempt to get us some harder data on those assertions, in the context of the statement made by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association yesterday, I believe—

Senator Molgat: And the Chamber of Commerce.

Senator Frith: Yes, the Chamber of Commerce. They said that the net is not positive as far as the manufacturing industry is concerned and that, in fact, according to the statement as I heard it, manufacturing firms are leaving—not closing down, but simply leaving—Canada for good.

The CMA and the Chamber of Commerce said that they expect in a downturn of the economy there will be some change in manufacturing output, but they did not expect that the manufacturing industry would be as seriously damaged by this government's policy as it has. It made direct reference to this government's policy, as did the president of the Small Business Association.

When giving us the figures to establish that unprecedented confidence in the economy has been created by this government, and that unprecedented investment has been the result of this government's policy, could the minister tell us how that compares with what the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Chamber of Commerce seem to think is the exact opposite?

● (1450)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the CMA and other business bodies are of the view, which is understandable, that something must be done to bring interest rates down faster than they are falling now—as if the solution to that was entirely political. Second, they think that we should have fought harder and done more to decrease the deficit. There are broader considerations there which we have had to bear in mind at all times. I think we have done a good job with the deficit. Nevertheless, that is the difference in perspective between the government, on the one hand, and these organizations or their spokesmen on the other.

I have statistics here relating to investment in Canada over the past few years. Among the major OECD nations, our rate of economic growth between 1984 and 1989 was second only to that of Japan. I see that business investment in new machinery and equipment has climbed by 65 per cent in real terms since the 1984 election, and that business spending on construction machinery and equipment is expected to climb by 10 per cent this year. Statistics Canada, in an October survey, found that Canada's larger companies plan to increase their level of capital spending by 13 per cent next year, and so it goes.

I will also endeavour to obtain some up-to-date figures not only on job creation but on the creation of new firms in this country, on the one hand, and bankruptcies, which was referred to by Senator Sparrow, on the other. I think the statistics will show that the entire picture remains a positive one for the Canadian economy.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it would be a good idea if the Leader could find a way to circulate these figures as widely as possible for the comfort of the unemployed and also for the comfort of the Manufacturers' Association and the manufacturing industry, which, in spite of what he describes as unprecedented investment and confidence in the economy, are apparently leaving the country in unprecedented numbers.

UNEMPLOYMENT—LOSS OF JOBS TO UNITED STATES AND MEXICO—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable Senators, I have a supplementary question. When the Leader of the Government provides the answer to that previous question, will he also put forward government policies to correct the problems of unemployment and people leaving this country for either Mexico or the United States to build their factories? Why are all of these bankruptcies, both corporate and personal, occurring? What does the government intend to do to assist those people? Don't give us a bunch of numbers. Tell us what you are going to do about it.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I have already undertaken to bring in, for the benefit of Senator Bonnell, information on the activity of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency in Prince Edward Island, and its activity in providing assistance to private sector investment and its cooperative efforts with the government of Prince Edward Island in the field of economic development. I regret if the honourable senator does not feel he is sufficiently well informed on those matters. We will try to rectify that.

Senator Bonnell: I know about ACOA, but ACOA does not do everything. It helps out certain new industries, but what do you intend to do for those who are going bankrupt, and about the poverty in Prince Edward Island? What is the government going to do about that?

BANK OF CANADA

MONETARY POLICY—DIFFERENCE BETWEEN CANADIAN AND U.S. INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to address another question to the Leader of the Government on a subject in which he has taken a deep and abiding interest, that is, the bank rate. I will provide a small preamble so that Senator Kelly will not get after me.

The Federal Reserve Board in the United States announced last night that it was cutting the key interest rate, that is, the discount rate, down to 6.5 per cent. In Canada that amount is now 12.01 per cent. So the two rates are almost 600 basis points apart. There was a time when the two were coming closer together, but now they will continue to go further apart. I want to know what the government intends to do to bring those interest rates down.

The reason that the Federal Reserve Board gives for decreasing its rate by 50 basis points in one week is that it acted, and I quote, "against the background of weakness in the economy, constraints on credit and slow growth in the monetary aggregates", in other words, the money supply. I was wondering if the government could provide us with some hope that, since the United States has lowered its rates, that Canada will too, or are you afraid that there will not be enough people to put up all the money you need to borrow? I would hope that the minister could give some hope to those people who would like to see interest rates go down. They have wanted for months to see them come down, and I grant him that they have come down a little, but there are countries in the western world that believe they should be coming down much faster than that has been happening in Canada.

I know that the minister agrees with that policy because, at 2 o'clock every Thursday afternoon, he advocated that interest rates should be brought down. I hope he will use his skill and knowledge to help those who are fighting these debt service charges now.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I never disagreed with the honourable senator when, from this side of the house, he pointed to the international conditions that were affecting Canadian interest rates. I also pointed out at the time, which I maintain here today, that some of the wrong-headed policies of the Canadian government, including the National Energy Policy—

Senator Olson: Did you say "wrong-headed"?

Senator Murray: Wrong-headed.

Senator Olson: Of the present government?

Senator Murray: Of the government of 1981-82, including the National Energy Policy, had exerted upward pressure on interest rates. That was documented in the annual report of the Governor of the Bank of Canada at the time.

All I can say to the honourable senator's question today, as I said earlier, is that the trend line is definitely downward as far as interest rates are concerned. That is also the case for the inflation rate. The inflationary pressures seem to be abating.

Senator Olson: What about the GST?

Senator Murray: Obviously there will be a temporary blip in inflation as a result of the implementation of the GST; and, while there are problems on the horizon, such as oil prices as a result of the crisis in the Gulf, the underlying trends are downward, leading us to a realistic expectation that interest rates will continue to decline. We shall see tomorrow, and on subsequent Thursdays, what the extent of that decline will be.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the minister knows very well that the monetary policy in this country is the responsibility of the government. It is announced every Thursday by the Governor of the Bank of Canada. I understand that. I think the law was changed in 1961 or 1962 after the Coyne affair, making the Minister of Finance responsible for monetary policy. I am asking him if we can expect interest rates to start coming down at a reasonably rapid rate, instead of squeaking down 6, 8 or 10 points a week, when they have gone down 50 basis points in one week in the United States?

• (1500)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am in no position to speculate on that.

Senator Olson: Tell us what is the government's policy, that is all I am asking.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the government is confident that, as inflationary pressures abate so, too, will interest rates go down.

Senator Olson: What a lousy answer.

NATIONAL REVENUE

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX CREDIT—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, when we were talking about the GST, there seemed to be a sense of scandal from the government when it stated that we were delaying the credit to those people who were entitled to it. The credit is for those who earn from zero to $30,000. If I understand correctly, the maximum is $380 for a couple or for a family.

A taxi driver told me that he was supposed to receive $95 for three months. I assume the credit is divided into three. Therefore, it is $100 for his wife and himself and he will receive one third of the credit he qualifies for in one year.

What is the big scandal about delaying a three month payment of $50 to a wife and $50 to a husband? Those who earn $29,000 a year, which is the maximum that can be earned to qualify for a credit, will receive $100 a year or $200 a year. Will we know how many hundreds or millions of people will receive almost nothing for three months, because of those credits which are so precious, according to the government?

If the husband earned $25,000 a year, I would like to know how much the couple would receive for three months.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I think I can obtain for the honourable senator the average amount of the credit for taxpayers in certain income categories. I think I can do that, and I will be glad to bring that information in.

Meanwhile, I may say in answer to inquiries that have been made earlier, more than 5 million GST credit cheques have now been printed and turned over to Canada Post for distribution to recipients following the granting of Royal Assent on Monday. Mr. Jelinek, the Minister of National Revenue, has stated that all cheques will be in the mail by Friday, December 21, and the payment of the GST credit will be completed as promised prior to the introduction of the GST on January 1, 1991.

Senator Denis: What is the average amount of money that each family will receive for a three month advance on the credit that family is entitled to for the whole year? If I understand correctly, those credits are paid three times a year.

Senator Murray: Four.

Senator Denis: Four times a year? That is worse. The most a family could receive is $380. If we say it is $400, that means $200 each for a year. For those who earn only $5,000 a year it could be a little more. However, those who earn $20,000, $25,000 or more are entitled to a credit. How many millions of those whose credit was delayed will receive $100 or less?

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I can obtain that information and I shall do so. I do not understand why the honourable senator is opposed to paying this credit in quarterly instalments. I doubt very much that the recipients—

Senator Perrault: It's just flimflam.

Senator Murray: —of the credits—which does not include Senator Perrault—would agree with your position on that matter, Senator Denis.

Senator Denis: Those Canadians who will receive a credit every three months will not get a fortune.

Senator Murray: No.

Senator Denis: A taxi driver told me that he will receive $95 for three months. Is that enough when compared to the 7 per cent that will be paid on all the goods and services he will consume in a year? It's chickenfeed.

Senator Murray: It may be chickenfeed to the honourable senator, and even to his taxi driver, or to Senator Perrault. However, there is a good deal of interest being shown in the GST tax credits. The appropriate comparison is between the amount of money that that taxpayer is likely to pay through the GST and the amount of the present federal sales tax that is hidden in the price of goods that taxpayer buys. All those things have been calculated and I will bring forward as much information as there is on that subject. I am sure the honourable senator will be favourably impressed.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX CREDIT—SYSTEM OF DELIVERY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: My name was mentioned by the Leader of the Government in the Senate and I am flattered by the attention.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Because you were interjecting from your seat.

Senator Perrault: I want to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he can cite one expert source in Canada which will verify his contention that somehow this is manna from heaven for the disadvantaged in this country. All of the churches told us in testimony, and unfortunately the leader did not attend any of the meetings, that we cannot compensate the less advantaged people in society for the amount of money we will tax out of them as a result of the GST. This is unconscionable flimflam, that is all it is. It's part of a marketing plan or a merchandising plan.

The United Church of Canada and the Roman Catholic Church told us that there is no way we can properly deliver those credits to the people who really need them. Of course, they do not know anything about this area at all. Only the Leader of the Government is privy to this knowledge.

I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to name one source in Canada which will approve this flawed system of delivery of credits to the people of this country. We have heard quite enough of this unctuous response on the part of the Leader of the Government.

Senator Murray: Well, honourable senators, I do defer to the churches when it comes to manna from heaven. However, with regard to the goods and services tax credit, let me say that the appropriate comparison is between what the taxpayer is now paying, albeit hidden in the price of many goods through the federal sales tax, and what that taxpayer will be paying on the goods and services tax, less the tax credit. If he took the trouble to study the figures, my honourable friend would find that taxpayers at the lower end of the income scale are better off under the goods and services tax with the credit than they were when paying the existing federal sales tax on the price of many products that they now buy. I can bring those calculations in, and I will do so.

If the honourable senator is looking for expertise on the matter, I will bring in the testimony of various people, whom I am sure he will respect, who believe that the goods and services tax credit is indeed the way to go in terms of alleviating the burden of those taxes on lower income people.

• (1510)

Senator Perrault: Yes, in theory, it may be the way to go, but we have been reminded on a continuing basis by those who testified before our committee that it is impossible to develop an efficient delivery system. There are some people, for example who will suffer real disadvantages because they are unable to spell, and in this year in which we are attempting to gain more literacy in this country. There are some who are not even able to do basic paperwork. There are many people who will not receive cheques because they are members of a mobile group, people in transit or people who are wandering throughout society, trying to find economic advantage. These are the people who will not receive any benefits at all.

I urge the Leader of the Government to read the testimony which was given before the committee. Those who testified said that, in net terms, these are the people who will suffer because these credits are really an illusion.

Earlier, the leader said that we are not in a recession at all. In effect, he was saying that jobs are being created all over the country. Is this part of the spin-doctor technique of the Conservative Party to try to convince us that black is white? I think we need the research material which the leader said he has available. Will he please table it in the house?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we are in a recession. I have not denied that we are.

In order to balance the assertions that are coming from the other side of the chamber, I felt it appropriate to place on the record something of the achievements in the Canadian economy in the past five or six years so far as investment, economic growth and job creation are concerned. The facts are there. If the honourable senator wishes to deny them, then that is his problem.

The fact of the matter is that we have had almost unprecedented prosperity over the past five or six years. It was inevitable that there should be a slow-down. We are now in a recession. The responsibility of the government now is to turn its attention to recovery from this economic recession as quickly and effectively as possible. What that involves, among other things, is getting the rate of inflation and, therefore, interest rates down so that we can spur economic recovery.

Senator Perrault: I do not want to get into a debate here. I will put the subject on the order paper so that we can have a proper discussion on it.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT ON EMPLOYMENT IN CANADA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: When the Canadian Labour Congress tells us that it can identify over 105 companies that have left Canada so far to go to Mexico or the United States, and that we have lost over 200,000 jobs since the free trade deal came into effect, I earnestly urge the Leader of the Government to bring forward the facts and figures regarding the companies that have established themselves there during that period of time so that we can get a balanced view of things.

On occasion the Leader of the Government will rise in his place and say, "I have the names of two companies that have opened as a result of the free trade deal". Does that match the over 200 that the CLC alleges have left this country never to come back again?

The Leader of the Government has said that there has been a great deal of job creation. However, labour makes the point that there has been a vast increase in jobs created in the service sector. Is it wrong? Often, these are very low-paying jobs paying around $5 or $6, while the jobs we have lost ran at about $16 or $17 per hour.

Will the Leader of the Government lay it out before us and say, "These are the new jobs that have been created since the free trade deal came into being. This is the average salary being paid. This is the number of women who have found employment, and this is the number of men"? Let us see exactly what has been happening since the trade deal came into effect. We would like some reassurance that, at the end of the tunnel, there will be a bit of a rainbow instead of a disaster.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): On two occasions recently I have placed on the record the names of a number of companies that have located here or expanded here precisely in anticipation of the opportunities being created by the Free Trade Agreement. I did not pretend that the list was exhaustive or complete. The list was read into the record by way of illustration.

The second point I wish to make to the honourable senator is that the Free Trade Agreement is to be phased in over a ten-year period. The objective of the Free Trade Agreement is to obtain secure access to Canada's largest market for our products and to make our economy more competitive and successful. We have every confidence that those objectives will be achieved over time, which is why we have allowed for a ten-year phase-in of the Free Trade Agreement.

NATIONAL REVENUE

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX CREDIT—DELAY OF CHEQUES

Hon. Azellus Denis: In terms of the delay of credit cheques, something which the government says is scandalous, will the Leader of the Government tell us tomorrow when the first credit cheque is to be sent to a family of two earning $15,000 per year? I would like to be able to tell the people how long their cheques will be delayed because of what occurred in the Senate.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the delay was one of several weeks. As I recall, it had been the intention to send those cheques out at the end of November. In the event, they will all be out by this Friday, December 21.

I will endeavour to obtain information concerning a family of two earning an income of $15,000 per year. I will bring that information into the house as soon as I can. Unfortunately, I will not be here for Question Period tomorrow. However, I will be here on Friday.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, on the same subject, during the discussion of one of the amendments on the GST bill I presented the Leader of the Government with a breakdown of the credits which will be sent to people earning less than $30,000. The Leader of the Government and others have stated that those people will be better off under the GST. The figures I gave to the Leader of the Government were supplied by the Department of Finance. They show that a person earning $28,050 will receive a $5 rebate over the course of one year. That works out to $1.25 per quarter. The leader has indicated to us today that those people will be better off under the GST. For the life of me, I cannot understand how a person earning that amount of money and receiving a rebate of $5 per year can be better off under the GST.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, let me bring the entire table in so that the honourable senator can examine it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): But is it your own conviction that they are better off?

Senator Murray: My statement today was that the people at the lower end of the income scale are better off, the appropriate comparison being payment of GST minus the tax credit, versus payment of the federal sales tax—

Senator Frith: What do you mean by lower end of the scale?

Senator Murray: The lower end of the income scale.

Senator Frith: What is that, precisely?

Senator Murray: Let me bring the table in and we shall see. Senator Sparrow says there is an anomaly for people earning about $28,000, that if the tax credit is so small they could not possibly be better off. Let me bring the table in so that we can discuss it.

[Senator Murray.]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

HOSPITALS—CLOSURE OF WARDS—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, we have in this country a hospital crisis. I am not blaming the federal government for the state of affairs here, but I know that in the province of British Columbia wards are being literally closed down because hospitals are running such huge deficits. One of our leading hospitals has a $7 million annual deficit. I know that this will be of interest to Dr. Keon, and I presume he knows the situation that exists in British Columbia and in other provinces as well.

It seems so tragic that in a life-and-death service of the kind offered by our hospitals and our medical profession—and I believe we are served well by our medical profession— a situation should actually exist where, in some provinces, some of our leading hospitals have closed down entire wards. Is it a shortage of doctors, nurses, or just a lack of funding? If it is a lack of funding, is the federal government in consultation with the provinces to see whether there is any way in which the situation can be alleviated?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I must confess that I am unaware of the particular situation in British Columbia to which the honourable senator has referred. I shall ask my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, whether he has anything to report on the matter. I do not have the figures, but I think the honourable senator will find that the Government of Canada contributes very considerable amounts to British Columbia—

Senator Perrault: No question.

Senator Murray: —through the hospital and health plans and that these amounts have been increasing at a fairly rapid rate, certainly faster than our program expenditures in this government.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have several delayed answers to questions, and I ask that they be printed as part of today's proceedings.

NEW BRUNSWICK

PROPOSED LAKE GEORGE PROJECT—ENVIRONMENTAL PROTEST—REQUEST FOR STATUS REPORT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on October 19, 1990, by the Honourable L. Norbert Thériault, regarding New Brunswick—Proposed Lake George Project—Environmental Protest—Request for Status Report.

(The answer follows:)

Environment Canada has reviewed the environmental aspects of this project and is satisfied that the equipment proposed for the control of air emissions from the intended facility is appropriate. As well, with no liquid effluent from the process, no water quality problems would be expected. In addition, with good operating practices in conjunction with the controls, no significant environmental or health impact would be imposed in the area around the intended plant site.

NATIVE AFFAIRS

OKA CRISIS—ROYAL COMMISSION OF INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate on November 6, 1990, by the Honourable Len Marchand, regarding Native Affairs—Oka Crisis—Royal Commission of Inquiry—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

The Government remains committed to addressing the land issue at Kanesatake.

Prior to last summer, the Government was involved in negotiations with the community of Kanesatake and the Municipality of Oka. Although the events of the summer of 1990 placed these negotiations on hold, the Government proceeded to purchase the land in question—97 acres including the Indian cemetery.

Since the peaceful conclusion of the standoff on September 26, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development met with community leaders on several occasions, urging them to propose a negotiation team representative of the divergent interests within the community. The Minister also met with the Honourable Christos Sirros, his Quebec counterpart, on November 2 to arrive at an agreement with respect to the composition of our negotiating team. The Federal Negotiator, Mr. Bernard Roy, has been meeting with team members in order to initiate discussions at the earliest possible moment.

The first formal meeting of the bargaining teams representing the Federal Government, the Government of Quebec (and the municipalities of the village and parish of Oka), and that of the Kanesatake Mohawk coalition took place on Thursday, December 6, 1990.

The purpose of this meeting was to agree on process. That having been accomplished, the substantive negotiations will begin in earnest. It is anticipated that the parties will meet two days each week, commencing the first week in January. I also emphasize that whatever agreement is drafted during these talks, its acceptance must be, and will be, subject to ratification by the entire community of Kanesatake.

With regard to the question of an inquiry, on October 22, 1990 the House of Commons unanimously agreed "that the subject matter of the events at Kanesatake and Kahnawake during the summer of 1990 be referred to the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs". The Standing Committee has begun the preparatory work for this study.

ENERGY

CANCELLATION OF SCOTIA SYNFUELS PROJECT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate November 20, 1990, by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen and the Honourable Finlay MacDonald regarding Energy—Cancellation of Scotia Synfuels Project—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

On November 20, 1990, the Honourable Senator asked several questions concerning the proposed Scotia Synfuels project in Cape Breton. The Honourable Senator asked if I could throw any light on the decision conveyed to Mr. Gillespie concerning his proposal. The decision conveyed to Mr. Gillespie was very simple. After extensive analysis by two separate Government Departments, it was concluded that the project as presented is fundamentally uneconomic. Even if the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credits were made available to this project, a similar amount of federal assistance would be required in order to financially strengthen the project to a level where private sector interests would also be attached to invest their own money in the venture. The Government has worked with Mr. Gillespie for a very long time with the hope of bringing this project to fruition. However, in spite of our best efforts, it was concluded that it would not be in the best interests of Canadian taxpayers to risk hundreds of millions of dollars, when the private sector was not willing to share this risk, for the creation of 136 direct jobs in Cape Breton.

This decision was not taken lightly, and it was certainly not taken at the bureaucratic level. This was a decision taken by the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. The Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources also reviewed the project and support the decision taken.

Mr. Gillespie asked for Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit assistance on June 2, 1988. Between 1988, and November 1990, officials of Industry, Science and Technology Canada and Energy, Mines and Resources worked closely with Mr. Gillespie and his representatives in an effort to fully develop the project. The technology surrounding the project and the potential of using Cape Breton coal were such that every effort was given to the project proponent to demonstrate the economic merits of the project. A process lasting for 2 1/2 years.

Mr. Gillespie has met on many occasions with senior officials within the appropriate Government Departments and the results of those meetings were faithfully passed on to the appropriate Minister. The basic concerns expressed concerning the project's economics and of the lack of private sector participation were well known by Mr. Gillespie. Solutions to these concerns were not produced for officials and it therefore seems unlikely that they would be produced for Ministers.

The Minister responsible for Industry, Science and Technology welcomes a meeting with Mr. Gillespie, provided officials are given the documentation he suggests would shed new light on the issue.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ARMS REDUCTION AGREEMENT—LIMITATION AND DESTRUCTION OF SURPLUS ARMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 20, 1990, by the Honourable Jerahmiel S. Grafstein regarding External Affairs—Arms Reduction Agreement—Limitation and Destruction of Surplus Arms-Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

Canada fully supported the requirement to destroy surplus arms under the terms of the Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe (CFE), signed on November 19. Canada and the other signatories placed maximum limits on their holdings of certain types of conventional military equipment, and agreed to destroy any holdings of equipment above those ceilings which were present in the zone of application of the Treaty on November 19. Treaty limited equipment include combat aircraft, attack helicopters, tanks, armoured personnel carriers, and artillery. The CFE zone of application comprises continental Europe, including USSR territory west of the Ural Mountains. The Treaty permits on-site verification of the destruction of each piece of treaty limited equipment.

Supplementary Question

If the Honourable Senator, in speaking of surplus equipment, is referring to types of treaty limited equipment for which a signatory's holdings on November 19, within the zone of application, exceed that signatory's maximum entitlement, then it would be a breach of the Treaty for signatories not to destroy this surplus.

[Senator Doody.]

THE CONSTITUTION

APPOINTMENT OF EIGHT SENATORS—EFFECT ON COMPOSITION OF REPRESENTATION IN HOUSE OF COMMONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 22, 1990, by the Honourable Jerahmiel S. Grafstein regarding the Constitution—Appointment of Eight Senators—Effect on Composition of Representation in House of Commons—Government Action.

(The answer follows:)

There has never been any real uncertainty surrounding the validity of the appointment of senators. Three court judgments have confirmed there is no uncertainty as to these appointments. Therefore, the government sees no need whatsoever to undertake a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada on this point.

Similarly, there is absolutely no merit or basis for the opposition's view that there is now uncertainty regarding whether Parliament is properly constituted for purposes of being able to pass legislation or for any other purpose. Therefore, there is no need to refer any question on this to the Supreme Court either.

As a result of the valid Senate appointments, there is, however, real uncertainty as to whether New Brunswick is entitled to an extra member in the House of Commons. This question may be one which should be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada and that option remains available. However, there is no urgency involved and in the meantime the government is proceeding to obtain the view of the New Brunswick Court of Appeal.

It is the understanding of the federal government the constitutional requirement for proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons is not absolute. Since section 51A of the Constitution Act, 1867 operates "Notwithstanding anything in this Act" it would appear that the additional member can be added without upsetting the constitutional rule in section 52 regarding proportional representation.

LAPRADE FUND

REQUEST FOR UPDATE ON UNANSWERED QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked on November 29, 1990 by the Honourable B. Alasdair Graham respecting the Laprade Fund.

(The answer follows:)

A number of years ago, the federal government made a commitment to build a heavy water plant in the Trois-Rivières region. In 1978, owing to a reduction in market demand, the construction of the plant was shelved. A Special development fund, called the Laprade Fund, was estabied under the Conservative government in 1979 from the resulting $200 million in savings in order to offset the loss of existing and potential jobs in the region.

The original purpose of this fund was to finance capital projects in the energy sector. For a number of reasons, however, including the scarcity of viable projects in this sector, the fund was used primarily to support community and municipal infrastructure projects. From 1980 to 1984, the Liberal government issued $112.7 million in grants under this fund. From 1984 to May 1987, when the Special Program for the Laprade Region was officially launched, no grants were issued under the fund.

The present budget envelope of the Special Program for the Laprade Region is $91.44 million.

When the new program was set up in 1987, the fund had a balance of $87.3 million. In 1989, Treasury Board authorized an increase in the program envelope to $91.44 million.

The budget of $87.3 million represented the unexpended balance of the Laprade Fund as at 1984.

The funds available under the Special Program for the Laprade Region have all been committed. ISTC will have financed 163 industrial and tourism projects and 10 industrial development funds in the Laprade Region under this assistance program.

The Special Program for the Laprade Region is directed exclusively at the so-called "Laprade Region", which comprises the federal ridings of Saint-Maurice, Trois-Rivières, Berthier-Maskinongé-Lanaudière, Richelieu, Champlain, Drummond, Lotbinière, and Richmond-Wolfe as well as portions of Frontenac and Portneuf counties. The areas affected by the loss of existing and potential jobs owing to the decision not to build the Laprade plant, namely Trois-Rivières and its surroundings, served as a basis for setting the territorial boundaries for the application of the program.

In general, the program criteria include, among others, the creation of permanent jobs, the incentive value of assistance, commercial viability and the net economic benefits for the region and for Canada. Projects had to focus on industrial, manufacturing, processing or tourism activities. Infrastructure projets were also eligible. The Special Program for the Laprade Region was designed specifically to supplement the financial assistance provided under regular federal and provincial programs, to facilitate the implementation of projects whose scope, degree of risk or exceptional character went beyond the limits of regular departmental programs, or to provide financial support for projects not associated with other established programs.

It was not until October 1986 that the department was asked to set up a new program framework for the balance of the Laprade Fund. Unlike the approach prior to September 1984, which focused primarily on community and municipal infrastructure projects, the new program developed by ISTC was designed to encourage the establishment of new businesses and activities in order to have a structuring effect on the regional economy and to enhance the vitality and increase the productivity of the various existing industries.

Prior to 1986, ISTC was not involved in the administration of the Laprade Fund. We believe that the Fund was administered directly by the Treasury Board.

The terms and conditions of the Program allowed the ministers, at their discretion, to broaden the scope of the program in order to make eligible other sectors, activities or types of projects, or to increase the level of assistance beyond the maximum set for specific projects when warranted by special conditions.

The ministers responsible for the Laprade Fund had an immediate knowledge of the regions and their economic situation. They also had been briefed on each of the projects for which they subsequently requested an increase in contributions. These decisions by the ministers were based on the socioeconomic spinoffs of projects, their importance to the region and their driving effects. In communicating their decisions to the department, the ministers also transmitted the arguments justifying their decisions.

TRANSPORT

AVIATION SAFETY—STATEMENT EMANATING FROM DRYDEN INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 29, 1990, by the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat regarding Transport—Aviation Safety—Statement Emanating from Dryden Inquiry—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

It would be inappropriate for the government to comment directly on a matter currently being addressed by an inquiry.

While the overall numbers of person-years in the Aviation Group has slightly decreased, the vital areas such as air carrier inspection and technical inspection have not been affected by this reduction. In fact strength in these areas has been increased since economic regulatory reform.

The civil aviation system in Canada continues to operate with a safety record which is among the best in the world.

COPYRIGHT ACT

IMPLEMENTATION OF SECOND PHASE—EDUCATION EXEMPTIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask Senator Doody if he knows when the answer to my question concerning copyright will be coming. I have a stack of letters awaiting that reply. If it is coming very soon, I would like to know.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall make an inquiry and try to find out for the honourable senator.

BROADCASTING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Atkins, seconded by the Honourable Senator Castonguay, for the second reading of the Bill C-40, An Act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunication.—(Honourable Senator Davey).

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I want to begin by congratulating my friend, Senator Atkins, for his excellent examination of Bill C-40. He is right; it has taken five years to come this close to fruition. Yesterday the senator graciously provided me with a copy of his speech, for which I am most grateful.

I am, of course, far less enthusiastic about this broadcasting bill than is Senator Atkins. I must confess that I found it passing strange that Senator Atkins did not once mention the CBC cuts, but perhaps that is because the bill predates those cuts. I must confess at once my commitment to public broadcasting in general and to the CBC in particular. I would like to quote something that was written 20 years ago, almost to the day, in the Senate committee report on mass media. We said:

> The CBC is a national communications medium in a country that has no national newspaper. It is the only truly national broadcasting enterprise in Canada, offering service to all but a tiny minority of Canadians in both official languages. It has striven to develop Canadian talent, to reveal Canadians to one another, to strengthen the fabric of Canadian society—and for all these things we can only be grateful to the CBC as an entity quite unlike any other in the world.

Just a little further along in the same report, we said:

> One thing that stays firmly in our minds as a result of our explorations of Canada's mass media is that the CBC is so fundamentally a part of Canada's communications that it could not be removed or substantially weakened without a very wide ring of repercussions through the rest of the media, and through our society.

Of course, that is exactly what has happened—$108 million in cuts and 1,100 jobs lost in the heart of a deepening recession. I am sure that we all have at hand the document which is entitled, "CBC announces restructuring and expenditure reductions." It is worth reading if you have not read it. Rather than go into great detail about the cuts, I thought I would refer honourable senators to the best story that I have seen on the matter, and it was put out by The Canadian Press the other day. I shall not quote it at length, but allow me to give honourable senators a feeling of what it is about. It reads, in part:

> About 5,000 emotionally charged demonstrators marched through the streets of Windsor, Ont., on Sunday to protest the closure of the city's CBC station.
>
> 'This is Windsor, and we're sick of getting shoved around,' shouted Mayor John Millson over the din of the crowd.
> Elsewhere this weekend, more than 5,000 people rallied in Rimouski, Que., to protest the closure of its CBC station, while about 500 protesters gathered in sub-zero temperatures in St. John's, Nfld.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): If there is anywhere that they need a Canadian voice, it is in Windsor.

Senator Davey: Exactly. Later on it says in the article:

> 'Local issues deserve local coverage' and 'No news is NOT good news', read the placards of chanting Windsor demonstrators . . .
>
> The Rimouski demonstration featured performances by Quebec singers and attacks of the Conservative government . . .
> Radio-Canada stations in Rimouski, Matane and Sept-Iles, all in the eastern part of the province, were closed . . .
> In network cuts, Newfoundland lost local service in Corner Brook and Goose Bay, along with the locally produced program, Land and Sea.
> Some protesters in St. John's described the cuts as 'cultural genocide.'

I hope that, honourable senators, gives you some flavour of the stories. These are horror stories and they are all about us. What is the next awful thing that will happen to the CBC? Will we see the demise, for example, of CBC News World, which has been a remarkable success? It is Canada's first all-news network and has an annual budget of a tiny $20 million, and it has produced 24 hours of news each day since it began in July, including 100 hours per week of original programming. It has turned out 450 hours of live event coverage and more than 100 live special reports on any number of events. It convinced cable companies, including Quebec cable companies, serving almost 6 million householders across the country, to use News World. So it is a great success, with a budget of only $20 million. Let us hope to heaven that it is not destroyed in the process.

● (1530)

Let us also hope that CBC Radio is not destroyed in the process. CBC Radio is, I think, generally recognized as state of the art, non-commercial broadcasting, and yet it is already being hacked away. The CBC is an institution in a country, honourable senators—and I have said this so many times—which has too few national institutions. What has just happened to the CBC makes me feel sick and disgusted. I think it is an absolutely immoral situation.

My lifelong love affair with the corporation is not without travail, and I would like to talk about two cases in point. The first is Mike Duffy writing in the Ottawa Sun on December 11. He says here:

> Memo to Rick Salutin and other trendy lefties:
> This will come as a shock, but neither Brian Mulroney nor members of the PC caucus buy your theory published in Conrad Black's Saturday Night that the CBC and the Globe and Mail are in a right-wing conspiracy with the Mulroney government. Tories here believe Knowlton Nash is a dangerous radical, the G & M's Geoff Simpson is proof there is no shirt too young to stuff, and what they say about Mrs. Frum is unprintable. The only one in Ottawa I've met who buys your line is Liberal Sen. Keith Davey who should know better.

Well, Duffy, not for the first time, is wrong on both counts. First of all, I never had any discussion of this matter, ever, with Mike Duffy, and yet there is a reference to me speaking to him about this. That is simply not the case. Secondly, the fact is that many Canadians—and I am one of them—believe that, at the time of the Meech Lake Accord, there was, in fact, an unholy alliance, an unspoken unholy alliance, between the Progressive Conservative Party, the Globe and Mail and the CBC. Mike Duffy might not believe it, but he kids himself—and you kid yourselves if you do not know that a great many Canadians all over this country believe it. It is a widely-held opinion and it remains. Never mind Rick Salutin.

Let me refer to an article by the managing editor of Equinox magazine, Andrew Nikiforuk.

Senator Frith: What do you mean, "never mind Rick Salutin"? Do you not mean "in addition"?

Senator Davey: Yes, I do. I could read something from Roy MacGregor. I have lots of stuff to read, but this is one you probably have not seen.

Senator Barootes: Read George Bain in Maclean's.

Senator Davey: I do not often read George Bain. I do not often read Maclean's, but I will certainly take a look at it. George Bain is probably being critical of the corporation, right?

Senator Atkins: No.

Senator Davey: No? Then I am wrong. I thought he would be. In any event, let me quote this. It is interesting stuff.

> No matter how experienced CBC's political reporting crews may be or how many times they interviewed Clyde Wells, the fact remains that the television network effectively served as a propaganda arm of the government during the Meech Lake debate.

Senator Simard: They did not.

Senator Davey: Well, that is your opinion. You probably will not like the rest of the column. It goes on:

> As Roy MacGregor, a columnist with The (Ottawa) Citizen and journalist of rare integrity, noted several times during the Meech debate, the CBC became the Prime Minister's best friend by employing politically charged words and displaying Meech-like body language—"the emphasis, shifts, discomfort, the facial expressions that plead desperately for the passage of the Meech Lake accord."
> The CBC also surrendered the most important tools of the trade: tough questions and clear thoughts.

I could go on with the rest of the article, but I will not take your time to read it. It is all there.

There is another example of the Globe and Mail and the CBC rallying around the flag, and I refer to a public opinion poll done by the Globe and Mail and CBC News on October 9, 1990. I have talked about this before in Question Period and I will have something more to say about it. Here were the numbers: Liberals, 37 per cent; NDP, 34 per cent; PC, 16 per cent. I should like you to listen to the artistic way in which Hugh Winsor of the Globe and Mail told the story of the poll:

> Deeply unhappy with government policies in general and disillusioned with today's politicians, the Canadian people have focused their anger on the Conservative government of Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, which continues its steady slide in public esteem, according to the latest Globe and Mail-CBC News poll.
> The drop in support reflects renewed and deep concerns about economic issues, but also comes at a time of historically high cynicism and dissatisfaction with politicians in general, especially those currently in office, and a decline in respect for national institutions.
> Although Canadians across the country are disenchanted with the federal government, it is least unpopular in Quebec, where there is still some appreciation for Mr. Mulroney's leadership.

Let us look at the numbers in Quebec. What were they? Liberals were at 32 per cent; the NDP at 26 per cent; and the Conservatives at 24 per cent.

Still dealing with this poll, I should like to quote one of the most esteemed journalists in the Press Gallery, and I refer to Roy MacGregor. In referring to this particular poll, he said:

> It should be the CBC's business, however, when the impression given off by the editorial line of its newspaper partner is very much that the national malaise was reflecting back on Mulroney, not that the prime minister was himself the malaise.
> An editorial even ridiculed the temptation "to pin the blame for all this on Mr. Mulroney." In the Globe's opinion, "the impression is less of a people unhappy with a particular government than of a people that would be unhappy with any government that asked it to make rational, tough decisions."

> This, of course, is the prime minister's own line: he is merely a lightning rod for dissension that doesn't know where else to go.
> This is one version of reality; another might like to talk about truth and integrity.
> Still, it is part and parcel of the CBC-Globe poll, and for the public broadcaster to be linked with such private bias merely to cut the cost of polling in half is not—in the opinion of one taxpayer, anyway—worth the price.

As a result of that poll, I asked some questions of our friends opposite, and I should like to review some of the answers that I received. The first question was:

> The poll created news. Should a Government Agency, the CBC in particular, be in the business of creating news?

I received back this absolutely incredible answer from Senator Murray:

> Opinion polls do not create news.

Right. I have been involved with polling over the years and it has been my experience that opinion polls always create news. I cannot believe the response that I got saying that opinion polls do not create news.

Senator LeBlanc: He did not believe it either. He obviously answered the wrong question.

Senator Davey: The next question was:

> Is it the Globe and Mail or the CBC that has a conflict of interest in this matter?

The answer that I received back said:

> Neither. Polling is now a standard tool for most journalistic organizations. For example, the Toronto Star and CTV have participated in joint polls;

The answer goes on, talking about CBS and the New York Times. It does not occur to these people that the Star, CTV, CBS and the New York Times are all private enterprises. They are not government agencies like the CBC. So I think this was quite an inaccurate answer.

The next question was:

> Who represented CBC in determining the questions of the poll?

The answer I received here was:

> Senior journalists from CBC's News Service participated with Globe journalists . . .

Honourable senators, that is not terribly informative. The next question was:

> In view of assurances we have that CBC is a cash-starved agency, how much money did CBC spend and/or contribute for this poll?

● (1540)

The answer to that was:

> The costs involved are part of the overall costs of programming produced to present the poll results.

[Senator Davey.]

That causes me to ask what the CBC's priorities are. We are taking away $108 million but apparently will continue to subsidize these kinds of polls. I find that most unsatisfactory.

The other day Marcel Masse said, when commenting on the cuts, that:

> —only a Communist government could have saved the CBC from the massive cuts announced this month.

The cuts will total $108 million for the CBC, but listen to this, and I am referring to an article headed "Computing Devices steeped in defence":

> The company contracted to build a $1-billion communications system for the Department of National Defence—

That contract was announced just weeks before the announcement respecting the $108 million in cuts for the CBC.

The article goes on to state:

> Established in Canada in 1948, Computing Devices is a subsidiary of Control Data Canada Ltd., which in turn is fully owned by U.S. computer-maker Control Data Corp.

Well, one would almost expect that. We can spend $1 billion on a communications system for the Department of National Defence, yet we cannot afford $108 million for the CBC. It makes one wonder.

I have other concerns I will raise when this bill is referred to committee, as I am sure it will be. I hope Senator MacDonald will agree with that.

There is to be a split board of directors, a French board and an English board. That is something Senator Hays and others will want to discuss. We will also talk in total futility about the CBC's perennial request for a five-year budget, and we will also ask what is wrong with the national unity clause, which has always prevailed.

Honourable senators, the national unity clause is to be replaced by "shared national consciousness". What on earth does that mean? That sounds like something Gerry Kaplan thought up, or something Lucien Bouchard thought up.

Senator LeBlanc: Or Keith Spicer or Jack Webster.

Senator Davey: In any event, that does not sound Canadian, and when this bill is referred to the committee, I am sure we will want to talk about that in detail.

The President of the CBC is, as honourable senators know, Gérard Veilleux. Mr. Veilleux is a brilliant career public servant. He is worthy of our respect. Patrick Watson is waiting for the passage of the bill to take up the position of chairman.

I must confess that Patrick Watson is a very good friend of mine. He is, in my judgment, very special and certainly is worth waiting for.

In notes on the professional biography of Patrick Watson, it states:

> By the mid-1970's, it had become almost commonplace for columnists and critics to refer to Patrick Watson as "the best television interviewer in the business," (The Toronto Star). "Peerless—there is no better man at this > job anywhere," said the Toronto Globe and Mail. "A winning professional host," The New York Post. "Soft-spoken, stubbornly intent on clarity, quick to spot contradictions, Watson can be a charmingly devastating interviewer": The New York Times. "Polished, articulate," said TIME. "Simply the best anchorman in New York," The National Observer.

That biography goes on and on. I personally believe that Patrick Watson is a treasure.

A late, great friend of mine, Judy LaMarsh, was ahead of us when, as Secretary of State, she suggested to the government of Mr. Pearson that Patrick Watson would make an ideal President of the CBC. Mr. Pearson did not buy that, but Watson is now much older and much wiser. I honestly believe that Patrick Watson can do a great deal to help rebuild the CBC.

Because of these cuts, the big winner will be the private broadcaster. I have worried about private broadcasters all of my life. I can quote from the Senate committee report entitled Mass Media Volume 1, and this quote still stands up 20 years later. That reads as follows:

> For many years, the Canadian Association of Broadcasters has been the voice of private broadcasting in Canada, and we were particularly interested in what this organization had to contribute to our study of broadcasting and its place in the fabric of Canada's mass media. With reluctance, we were driven to conclude that the private broadcasters, no matter how sophisticated their individual thought, seem by group interaction to achieve a level perhaps best described as neanderthal.

Obviously, there are exceptions. I am sure my colleague, Senator MacDonald, is one of the exceptions. Let us be clear; he knows more about broadcasting than the rest of us put together. I also think of Allan Waters, a most enlightened broadcaster, but by and large, the mentality of the CAB, when officials of that organization appeared before the committee 20 years ago, was to circle their wagons in front of the Peace Tower. I suggest that is still the mentality that prevails today.

Not much has changed, except now there are scores of millionaire owners. I wonder why I ever left the business in the first place when I look at the number of millionaire owners.

I should like to quote from a recent issue of Marketing, and particularly from an article which refers to the TV members of the $10 million club. According to the CRTC, there are 17 privately-owned TV stations in Canada that took in more than $10 million in advertising revenues for the year ended August 31, 1988. On top was CFCF TV Montreal, with $17 million; CHAN, Vancouver, $17 million; CFTO, $17 million; Hamilton's TV station, $13.5 million; City Television, $13 million. The list goes on.

In a sense, I suppose that is what private enterprise is all about. However, I am reminded of Kevin Phillips' book, which I am sure some of you will be reading, or should be reading. That book is entitled Reagan's America. He says that the 1980s were a capitalist's blowout. He says that the rich got richer while literally everybody else paid the price. He said that "cleaning up will be the task of the 90s".

• (1550)

That task, as it relates to broadcasting, will not be easy. Jeffrey Simpson has written about this on several occasions. On this particular occasion, he states the situation rather well. He says:

> In all its years of regulating private broadcasting, the CRTC has never revoked a television licence. Nor has it considered competing bids for licences at the time of renewal. The private broadcasters have merrily assumed that they could endure periodic slaps on the wrist while making the minimum commitment to Canadian programming.

None of which concerns me as much as the attitude that so many private broadcasters have toward their audience.

First, there is a consistent gravitation toward the lowest common denominator programming; and, worst of all, most of this lowest common denominator programming comes from the good old United States of America. That should worry the CRTC. In fact, I sensed from some of the things that Senator Atkins talked about yesterday that perhaps it does worry the CRTC.

This government has a penchant for everything American—everything from the Gulf war to the National Football League and from free trade to Open Skies. This government tends to regard with great respect everything American. I would like to do something which I am sure is most unsenatorial. I may not even be allowed to do it. I would like to quote myself from Hansard. First I would like to quote Mark Starowicz, who is a CBC journalist. This is one of the most moving quotes on broadcasting I have ever heard. He says:

> Throughout the high Arctic, and in hundreds of remote communities in the north, it is now common to tune into Detroit's Channel 2 each night to have the Eyewitness News Team unfold the list of mayhem, arson and drug violence that comprises television news in one of America's most-violent cities. Some 1,000 remote Canadian communities, one million viewers are served by a Canadian company which distributes a package of Canadian and American stations by satellite to local cable operations. In this way, northern residents can watch any of four Detroit stations and catch a feature explaining how to sterilize a needle to avoid AIDS, and how to get on the waiting list for a Crack clinic; after a Budweiser commercial, the rush-hour traffic report paints a picture of choked freeways and A-weather warns that an inch of snow is expected to create even more chaos. In this way, an evening of TV viewing in the North begins without anyone finding the matter incongruous anymore.

The next quotation is my own.

> Here are some facts which most of you should know: The average Canadian spends 24 hours a week watching television. Canadian children—yours and my grandchildren—by age 12 have spent 12,000 hours watching televi> sion. That is more time than they spend in school. Only 28 per cent of what is available on Canadian TV is Canadian. Ninety-eight per cent of all Canadian television drama is American.

Think of it! Ninety-eight per cent!

> What really goes on? For openers, our kids, who I think matter most, in fact, know more about American history than they do about Canadian history. The sad thing is that all of this is happening because some of us were fair and allowed it to happen. The American program became the name of the game.

Could it get any worse? Yes, it could get worse, honourable senators. In the current issue of Marketing the private broadcasters, god help us, are now saying that they intend to change their priorities and, believe it or not, they intend to become more marketing oriented. As someone who is interested in the media, when you talk to newspapermen and you ask them to describe what they are trying to do, they talk about their community. But when you talk to a broadcaster, he always talks about his market.

Senator Frith: And there is more commercial time available—at least permitted—on Canadian television than there is on American television.

Senator Davey: Correct.

Senator Frith: The regulator permits more here than in the United States.

Senator Davey: Then that has changed the policy in the United States. I intended to talk about this, and I did not. President Reagan appointed a young man named Fowler to be head of the radio-television commission in the United States.

Senator Frith: The FTC.

Senator Davey: I am embarrassed to say that Fowler is a Canadian, and his policy was no regulation of stations, programs or anything. There was a rape of children's programs. It is a scandalous situation. That matter may have been addressed in the United States and it may have turned around.

Senator Frith: It may be more recent, then.

Senator Davey: All of which allows me to say a word about the great cable rip-off. Never, honourable senators, has so much money been made by an industry that contributed so little. There cannot be any doubt about that. The June 25, 1990 issue of Marketing headlined a cable story entitled "Cable Told: Fight 'greedy parasite' image". That is not perception, that is reality. I often thought that a fundamental mistake made by our friend Jack Pickersgill, when cable was in its infancy, was not to nationalize cable. Had we nationalized cable, we would not have these cutbacks in the CBC. It would be in great shape.

It is possible to have some sympathy for the cable industry.

> Canadian cable television companies expect to learn this week—possibly as early as today—the outcome of their appeal to the federal cabinet of a ruling that, collectively, will cost them about $50-million a year in copyright payments.
> Although they were expressing some optimism about the impending decision yesterday, it was also clear that they think it will be something of a miracle if the cabinet does, in fact, reduce the copyright tab or change the ruling in some other way.
> The biggest obstacle . . . has been the free-trade agreement with the United States. "There is a perception (in cabinet) that the U.S. would retaliate on the trade front if the copyright decision were changed".

I would have liked to have talked about community access in cable, but I have taken up too much of your time. I would like to say a few more things.

Senator Atkins provided a first class analysis of how the CRTC would now be structured, and I must say most of it is a progressive set of ideas—a more flexible aboriginal broadcasting policy, recognition of the great diversity of Canadian society and a need for their broadcasting system to reflect that diversity, more and better cable programming, and broadcasting contributing more to Canadian programming. I hope Senator Atkins will forgive me if I quote something he said yesterday. He said it so well:

> To render the legislation technology-neutral Bill C-40 re-casts the legal definitions in the Act so that they speak to the transmission of programs to the public, without regard to the technology that may be used. It specifically provides for the exclusion from licensing of those activities that are not essential to the achievement of the broadcasting policy set out in clause 3 of the bill.
> This technology-neutral approach will permit broadcasters to use whatever technologies they may wish, including technologies other than over-the-air transmission, for the delivery of programming. At the same time, it will allow others to use traditional broadcasting technologies for non-broadcasting purposes, without being caught up in broadcasting regulation.
> A technology-neutral Broadcasting Act will foster continued technological development. It will encourage broadcasters to make use of the most effective means of transmission available. And it will facilitate the introduction of new delivery systems such as high definition television, digital transmission and pay-per-view services.

● (1600)

In all of these things we have to be mindful of our great neighbours to the south who are poised, I am sure, to take a more aggressive position on our broadcasting.

Honourable senators, the CRTC has acquired new leadership. Keith Spicer is gone on gossamer wings to save us all from Satan's power, and I do not think any of us should hold our breath. Here comes the newcomer, David Colville, aged 45, with an extensive background in communications and government. Before coming to the CRTC, he spent 12 years as senior policy adviser on communications to the Nova Scotia government and appeared before the CRTC on many issues.

He also spent six years working in the telecommunications industry for Maritime Telegraph and Telephone Co. Ltd. of Halifax and with Bell Canada.

I recall a much earlier Broadcasting Act when I was the new boy in the Senate. The late Allister Grosart advanced the case, and he and I came to the same conclusion that, in those days, it was a requirement for anyone who was appointed to any broadcasting agency, or having anything to do with the broadcasting industry, not to have been involved in any way in broadcasting. That struck me as being nonsensical, and it struck Allister Grosart as being nonsensical. Of course, today we have appointments such as Mr. Colville, who clearly knows his way around. Yesterday, he introduced a new FM radio policy which would boost Canadian content. That is good. However, it will allow more advertising, and that is not good. Yesterday, the industry was delighted. Today things have changed, and an article in the Globe and Mail states:

> FM programmers concerned about Canadian-content quotas
> The increase in the minimum amount of Canadian content, to 30 per cent from 20 per cent for most popular music stations, has some programmers worried about meeting that quota with quality product.

Some things never change.

Honourable senators, do you remember when Pierre Juneau was the first person to introduce additional Canadian music content? It was a great move forward, but broadcasters by the score said that it would not work, that it cannot happen and that it was impossible. Of course, it did work and it was successful. However, it is interesting to see the same type of people bringing the same arguments forward.

I hesitate to conclude my comments on this bill on a sour note. Honourable senators should know that under Bill C-40 the Cabinet will not only be able to continue to review decisions by the CRTC, but will have the power of issuing policy guidelines to the CRTC. It is true there are several alleged safeguards in the legislation. This is the stuff that appalled André Bureau, it appalled Pierre Juneau, and it appalls all of us. We really worry about Canada's broadcasting future being left in the hands of the Canadian who could not shoot straight. Do we really want Otto and Lowell and Mike and the boys being responsible for what will be done in the area of broadcasting in Canada? I am sure it is of concern to my friends on this side, and I hope it is something that we will look over.

Finally, I refer to what I regard as an oversight in Bill C-40. I wish to quote Bernard Ostry, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of TV-Ontario, who has urged parliamentary support for a pan-Canadian educational television network in response to increasing demands on Canada's educational system. I will not read the long press release, but it is something that I think would be very much in the interest of this country. Public television in Canada, and certainly TV-Ontario, which is what I watch most often, is an excellent service. Expanding those services into an educational television network, particularly since technically it would not be a particular problem, is something the CRTC should look at and consider most seriously.

I had not intended to speak at such length. Honourable senators, let us be clear that it is about time we updated our broadcasting act, and maybe this is it. However, I have serious misgivings about much of this act, and I am literally devastated by what has happened at the CBC.

In any event, I hope this bill will go to committee where it can be examined in some detail.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I wish to echo something Senator Davey said in closing. I support the principle of this bill, which I understand to be an updating of the Broadcast Act. If there is any area in which technology and other developments have changed at a very fast rate, it certainly is in broadcasting and telecommunications generally. Therefore, right away there is a clear justification for attempting to keep pace with technological developments in the Broadcast Act.

There have also been certain political developments and political attitudes towards the role of the regulator and how arm's length a regulator should be. This is generally on the subject of regulations, not only in broadcasting. How responsive must regulators be to political realities, as governments must be responsive to political realities? I agree that all those facts, developments and questions justify a regular revision to the Broadcast Act, or any legislation dealing with broadcasting and telecommunications.

However, I have a number of particular reservations. Generally, a number of interested people I know in the industry have said to me that this is not a very good act; that is has a lot of weaknesses, but that it is better than nothing. I hope when the witnesses appear before the committee in support of the legislation they will convince us that it is better than nothing, because it is not always so that any something is better than nothing.

Because we support the principle of this bill, I agree with Senator Davey that we should give it second reading and that it should then go to committee where we can deal with the questions he raised which concern me, and which were raised in the House of Commons and elsewhere.

Hon. Daniel Hays: Honourable senators, I have a few brief comments because I have a special interest in Bill C-40. Following on the very good explanation on the thrust of the bill by Senator Atkins and the comments by Senator Davey, I would like to highlight some points of concern, and perhaps either Senator Davey or Senator Atkins will comment on them at this second reading stage. My concerns involve the controversial items of this legislation. As I understand it, there will be a change in the mandate of the CBC. This legislation will soften the role of the company to promote national unity. I am particularly interested in any comment that either Senator Atkins as the sponsor or Senator Davey as the spokesman for our side can make as to their feelings on whether or not the CBC has been hampered in any way by that mandate, particularly as it applies to the kind of comments I hear from both the English and the French networks.

• (1610)

The other controversial item that was explained by Senator Atkins, but which I would like to put to Senator Davey for comment, deals with the division of the board into two groups, French and English and the wisdom of such a move. In fact, he spoke highly of the chairman to be when this legislation becomes law, assuming that it is passed. I understand that the chairman to be, Mr. Patrick Watson, is very unhappy with that provision. I wonder whether that unhappiness is shared by Senator Davey. As it now stands, the CBC board meets as one, and it reflects the French and English languages of Canada.

For purposes of clarification, honourable senators, I am speaking at the second reading stage. I do not intend to speak long, but I raise these questions which may or may not be commented upon further by speakers who have preceded me.

The other thing that I think we should look at carefully in the context of Bill C-40 is: What does the current chairman and president have in mind for the CBC, in light of the recently- announced cuts in regional broadcast centres, including the elimination of some regional broadcast centres? I think that question should be asked in the context of what was done by their predecessors. I am thinking in particular of Pierre Juneau, who made many policy speeches in which he outlined what he thought the corporation should do, as did his predecessor, Al Johnston. To my knowledge Al Johnston's speeches were under the rubric of touchstone, and each of them premised a future of the CBC on funding five-year commitments. They would plan around those five-year funding commitments. Each of these gentlemen had ambitious programs for the CBC in ways in which they thought they could improve the service and its role of bringing us together through a common broadcast system.

The changes to the CRTC should also receive close attention. In fact, I believe this point was commented upon in a very thorough way by Senator Atkins. I did not hear Senator Davey say anything on that point, and perhaps he could elaborate at this stage on those proposed changes to the CRTC. I would appreciate it. Whether or not these questions are commented upon by speakers who have preceded me, I raise them as matters that we should all be concerned about, and that should prompt us all to take a special interest in Bill C-40.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I do not want to speak very long about this bill, either. I have been trying to find at the beginning of the bill where it outlines the objectives of the CBC. The bill begins with:

> Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

and then it goes on to give the short title, which is the Broadcasting Act. The bill goes into Part I, which is the general part, which deals first with the interpretation, and nowhere does it indicate the corporations objectives. At one time it was written in the act that the objective was to promote unity in Canada. Perhaps this government is now looking at things in such a way that that is no longer an objective of the Broadcast Act, particularly that portion of the act that deals with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

In Part III on page 25 it says under "Interpretation":

> This Part shall be interpreted and applied so as to protect and enhance the freedom of expression and the journalistic, creative and programming independence enjoyed by the Corporation in the pursuit of its objects and in the exercise of its powers.

Perhaps Senator Atkins can tell us where that part of the act is? Perhaps he could explain to us whether or not he believes that what is contained in Bill C-40 will deliver better national unity than we have seen over the past few years.

I remember that when I first came to Parliament in 1957, the budget of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was about $10 million. Of course, that was when television was just beginning. It was not everywhere, but there were quite a few stations around. Now the budget for the corporation is approaching $1 billion. If you add the commercial revenue, it is well over $1 billion, and that means that the budget is 110 times what it was when the corporation began.

If you consider that the objective of the corporation is to promote national unity, you have to consider the results. Does anyone believe that there is more national unity in Canada today than there was 34 years ago? I do not believe so. I know that at that time there were some problems involving the Official Languages Act, Bilingualism, the B and B Commission and with a number of other things. Today we spend $1 billion per year, a hundred times more than the budget of the corporation when it began, and apparently the unity of the country is less strong or more fragile, whichever term you like, after all the expenditures since it began.

It is not very popular to get up in this place and mention such things, but if we are to spend that much of the taxpayers' money, we should at least be able to look at the consequences or the results and say, "Well, I guess they are doing a pretty good job." Certainly they are not doing a good job in Quebec. Today, there is a larger percentage today of people in that province who want to separate from Canada than there has ever been in the past. I am not blaming the CBC for all of it because I think the actions of this government have made a major contribution to that situation as well. However, it does prove to me that the CBC has not been successful. Goodness knows, it has sure used up enough money. There is no other department that comes anywhere near having 100 times as much money now, regardless of all the inflationary factors, as it had in the late 1950s.

• (1620)

Senator Simard: What are you suggesting?

Senator Olson: I am suggesting that we get some results for our money; that is all. Is that a good objective? When I looked at this, I thought maybe the government was feeling sorry that it was a failure and that many of the great agencies like the CBC, or crown corporations in government, were really failing in getting the results that the people of Canada expect. Just look around the country. I will tell you something about western Canada. They do not feel terribly united today, either. We know the Reform Party is the fastest growing political party in Canada, and the reason is very simple. Westerners have come to believe, for whatever reason, that they are not getting a fair deal in Confederation. I ask myself, if the CBC was so successful over these past 30 or 40 years, how did that happen?

So, these are the results that we expect. I am sure that Senator Atkins is prepared to explain to us, in great detail, what the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation intends to do with this new Broadcasting Act, especially phase 3, and tell us how that will promote unity in Canada far better than has happened before. I do not know. Perhaps he is not prepared to do that. If he is not, then I will have to take an interest in this bill, although this is really not my field.

Senator Simard: You must be supportive of the bill, then.

Senator Olson: Why do I have to be supportive of the bill?

Senator Simard: The way you are talking now.

Senator Olson: I would like to see some results. I will tell you, there is not another organization in Canada that could have 100-fold inflation in that space of time and then, looking at the consequences, find out that it has been a total failure. I want to be careful about this, because I am not blaming the CBC completely for the disunity in the country. The government today bears the responsibility for most of that. However, if our money was to be well spent, surely they should have made some contribution to having a higher level of unity in the country.

The unfortunate thing is that Canadians, looking at this situation from every part of the country, believe that exactly the opposite is true. This country is less unified than it has been at any time in the past 35 years; there is no question in my mind about that. All of the polls show that. If you talk to the people in western Canada, you will discover that they believe that. Apparently, 60 per cent of the people in Quebec believe that. So, what are we getting for all this money? A billion dollars is a pretty healthy amount of money.

Senator Barootes: Do you think they should have reduced it by more than $108 million, then?

Senator Olson: I think they should have cleaned up their act. I do not care if it takes a little or a lot of money. This government seems to believe that the only way to clean up the act so that we can get some unity in this country is by reducing the money to the agencies that are supposed to be promoting unity. Well, maybe that is one way. That does not seem to help, though. Some of you may have got the notion that I am against this bill.

Senator Barootes: We do not know. Tell us what you would do. You just seem to want to talk.

Senator Olson: Look, a silly part of what you are doing here is that every time I get up to make a speech, somebody says, "Well, what would you do?" The people of Canada do not really care what my policy is. They want to know what the government's policy is. If you do not care, why do you keep asking? You do not seem to know, either.

As I said a few moments ago, there might be some people who think I may be against this bill, but I will not know whether I am for it or against it until I have had an explanation of what it is intended to do. I am sorry, but the speech that was made by Senator Atkins yesterday did not persuade me that we would have an important improvement in the unity of this country as a consequence of passing this bill. All I am asking, honourable senators, is that you try to persuade us with some real, down-to-earth common sense and not just say things like, "We are going to give them great freedom of expression." They have had freedom of expression until they pretty nearly ripped this country apart. I am not necessarily talking about the CBC, but certainly this government. We need to improve that. I hope that Senator Atkins will seriously try to tell us—after all, he is piloting the bill through this chamber—what it is in the bill that will be a useful service for Canadians who want this country to be strong and unified into the future.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak at length, and I apologize to Senator Atkins, whose speech I missed because I was involved in something else. However, I would not want to be thought of as having approved wholly of this piece of legislation if I do not object to it going to committee. I think it needs improvement and I suspect it is only in committee, by hearing witnesses, that we will be able to suggest some changes.

I might say that I have serious misgivings about the splitting of the board of directors of the CBC into French and English components. I think that there are very few places in this country where people who share common interests, such as public broadcasting, can, in fact, come together. Personally, I am forever grateful that, at a time in my life when I was trying to learn something about broadcasting, my next door neighbour in the office was James N. Minifie and, on the other side of the corridor was Knowlton Nash. I certainly think I would have missed a lot if I had not worked with those gentlemen, as I worked with Morley Safer in London.

This idea of having groups of directors of a corporation who very quickly become captive of the vested interests of the head of broadcasting in Montreal or Toronto worries me a great deal because there is already too much of a tendency in that area. I think that, if there is one thing we must regret in the reductions that the CBC has suffered in the last while, it is, in fact, that we will increase the dependency on Montreal and Toronto as broadcasting centres, and we will be losing the very important training ground that is provided by local stations such as Matane, Rimouski, Moncton, Windsor and so on. If you look at the list of distinguished graduates of these small stations, you will find that what you have is a group of journalists who learned a great deal because they had to do a great variety of things in broadcasting. However, that is an area on which I would want to ask questions in committee.

I have not had occasion to check very carefully as to what was meant by the greater sensitivity to regional aspirations. I hope very much that the bureaucracy is not hiding the idea of regional panels and covering them with some generally-acceptable varnish or vernacular which consists of being more sensitive to native or aboriginal peoples, and so on. If, in fact, what we are talking about is a breakdown of the CRTC into regional panels, physically and geographically, then I again have very serious misgivings about the disappearance of a plateau of understanding and of common policy which an organization like the CRTC should represent, and we will want to have more questions answered about that when we get to committee stage.

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the honourable Senator Atkins speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, from the comments that have been made by a number of senators in this place today, it is clear that there will be many questions facing the Standing Committee on Transportation and Communication. Frankly, I look forward to that opportunity because I think, from some of the comments that I have heard from some of the senators, that there is some misunderstanding of some of the clauses and of the composition of the bill.

• (1630)

First of all, I should like to say that I did not read the article that Mike Duffy wrote in which he referred to my friend, Senator Davey, but I am certainly glad to hear someone else is the victim of journalistic licence, as I have been over a number of years.

Senator Davey talked about the CBC 20 years ago, and the expansion that has taken place during those 20 years. Clearly, there has been a tremendous expansion of the CBC over the past 20 years. In that regard, Senator LeBlanc talked about Atlantic Canada and regional interests. As a former New Brunswicker, I can remember that we used to argue that the CBC should have a base station in New Brunswick. The only thing we were able to get was an affiliated station out of Saint John. All regional coverage came from Halifax. That is the way it remains, although they have developed, to some degree, broader services out of Fredericton, but not a main TV station.

Senator Olson talked about the $1 billion that is being spent on the CBC on an annual basis.

It is also quite true that I did not mention the cuts to the CBC. I did not mention them, quite frankly, because I do not think the cuts have anything to do with Bill C-40. The bill would not have changed one comma from the time it was first tabled in the other place until it came before the Senate, regardless of what cuts were announced. That matter is a matter of fiscal responsibility and the budgeting of the CBC is something that is independent of the CBC and dealt with by Parliament through the budgetary process. There is no question that the CBC is facing a difficult fiscal challenge.

I want to make it clear that I am a strong supporter of the CBC, and always have been. I believe that the kind of services that have been developed over the years are in the interests of this country. Much has come about as a result of the services that have been provided by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The fact of the matter is that, in the circumstances in which we are living in 1990, the government has placed a demand on the management of CBC to make these cuts. The cost of production has escalated by an incredible amount. Inflation has taken over to the point where the CBC, if no restraint were put on spending, would not only run into trouble this year, but in years to come.

It is also correct to say that advertising sales are down. One can argue that that is because they do not have a good sales staff, or that could simply be because of the circumstances in which we find ourselves. I think one would find that the private stations are facing the same difficulty with regard to sales as well.

There are other factors that have forced the CBC into making the kinds of cuts it has announced. Again, I say those cuts did not have any influence on the development of the bill that we now have before us.

If it has taken five years to get the bill to this stage, one can appreciate the number of questions and arguments and the philosophy that relates to the development, not only of the bill, but the manner in which the CBC operates.

One can talk about the proposal in Bill C-40 respecting the changes in the executive of the CBC. These changes were announced well over a year ago. They have decided to have a chairman, as well as a president and chief executive officer.

Respecting the subcommittees of the CBC, one should understand that on each subcommittee, the English committee and the French committee, the chairman and the president will be represented. It does not mean that on the French committee there will only be francophones and that on the English committee there will only be anglophones. There will be a mix. I think the argument can be made that this integration will be helpful to the board, because ultimately the final decisions made regarding policy will be made by the overall board, and any decisions or recommendations that come from the subcommittees will then have to be dealt with at the board level.

By the way, another thing honourable senators should keep in mind is that while the government is not providing the funding the CBC wants in order to prevent these cuts, the government is still giving the CBC more money than it gave last year. It simply has not given it enough to cover the costs of inflation and operations that would be required to sustain the level of operation that the CBC has been used to.

Senator Davey mentioned Meech Lake and the bias he perceived the CBC had in favour of the government's position on that issue. There are many in the country who do not feel that way. I have heard this point made before, but again, in my experience in politics over the years I have found that when we thought we were mistreated by the media, those on the other side thought exactly the same.

Senator Davey: It was always us!

Senator Atkins: We always thought we were the ones being hard done by.

I suspect that if you were to analyze media coverage of any political event, you would find that coverage more balanced than originally thought.

Senator Davey referred to the Globe and Mail. I would defer to my colleague, the former Editor-in-Chief of the Globe and Mail, to defend the editorial position of that newspaper. In terms of the general news coverage, I am not sure that Senator Davey is right. I have to say that Jeffrey Simpson admitted he was in favour of the Meech Lake Accord, and that his bias was shown on the Editorial Page. Turning to the front page is a matter of judgment.

• (1640)

Getting back to the CBC, someone talked about their fiscal responsibility—

Senator Frith: You are probably the only person who reads the editorials and then turns to the front page.

Senator Atkins: I admit that I do not always read the front page, but I have a lot of respect for Jeffrey Simpson. When I can read him, I do.

Getting back to the CBC and its fiscal planning, as I understand it, the CBC has been working on a five-year plan; but what is incorporated in this bill is the responsibility for the CBC, on an annual basis, to put forward not only a general plan but a fiscal plan for the operations of the corporation. I think that will make it more responsive to its requirements with respect to the resources needed to operate its services.

We talked about public broadcasting versus private. I have long been on the periphery of the broadcasting business, having being involved in politics, as have Senator Davey, Senator Frith and others here. I have always marvelled at how private sector stations can do such a good job with a lot less money. While I have a lot of sympathy for the CBC and the requirements it needs to operate its organization, it seems to me that while Senator Davey and others may say that the quality of programming is not as good in the private sector, in Atlantic Canada I think ATV does a better job than the other network covering the news in that region. From my point of view, having watched both stations, regardless of the fact that I room with one of the previous owners of one of the stations in Atlantic Canada, I feel that they have done a better job overall than the CBC, and with a lot less money.

Of course many people have said, as did Senator Davey, that the private sector is now enjoying tremendous profits while the CBC is operating at a tremendous deficit. I think if you ask most of the television station operators today, Senator Davey, they are not doing that well at this moment in time, although one cannot argue that they have not done well during the period since their licences were originally granted to them. The other factor is capital appreciation, which has been substantial.

I know of a private station in Hamilton that has had difficulty in a tough market in recent times. The owners are trying to sell that station because of certain circumstances that were decided through the CRTC, and the fact of the matter is that they are having a hard time selling it. So there are many circumstances that relate to the fiscal success of any operation, including those in the private sector.

The CBC, in its cuts, did protect the national network and the regional networks. It zeroed in on local broadcasting, which affected a number of stations in Atlantic Canada and Ontario. That is unfortunate because I believe that the more media outlets in this country, the better the opportunity for Canadians to receive Canadian content, whether you are talking about public affairs broadcasting, news or whatever else is going on. It seems to me that while the stations have been closed to the extent that they will not be producing local television, we can only hope that the CBC, in rearranging its process of delivering its services, will give priority on a regional basis which will acknowledge that these stations provided a service at the local level.

Senator Olson raised the question of national unity, and I got a feeling from his comments that not only will we be taling about Bill C-40, but that we will be throwing everything but the kitchen sink into the discussion. When this bill goes to committee we will get into some interesting discussions on the question of the mandate of the CBC and the fact that this bill removes the obligation to contribute to the development of national unity.

Senator Olson: That has been removed?

Senator Atkins: That clause has been removed. It has been replaced with this obligation clause: "contribute to the shared national consensus and identity".

Senator Olson: What does that mean?

Senator Atkins: I think it broadens the mandate, but I do not think it takes away from the responsibility of public broadcasting to provide a responsible service to Canadians. Clearly, the CBC should be expected to help build this country as best a broadcaster can—by reporting as accurately, honestly and objectively as it can and by helping Canadians in all regions share in our diverse culture and heritage. That is the mandate that this legislation, by my interpretation, gives to the CBC.

As I mentioned yesterday when Senator Frith raised the question, throughout the preparation of this bill and Bill C-136 this issue did not arise until the committee had reported unanimously and the bill was returned to the house for second reading.

Senator Frith: Just this year?

Senator Atkins: Just this year.

Senator Frith: The cabinet control I asked about or the national unity?

Senator Atkins: The national unity. So I know it is a matter of concern, and I think there will be the opportunity, when this bill goes to committee, to have a constructive discussion on it. We will have the opportunity to have a number of witnesses appear before the committee, who, as you say, can broaden our insight as to the evolution of the reasons for the replacement of those two clauses.

Senator Hastings referred to the CRTC and the decision-making process. As I interpret the bill, the idea is that there would be a regional office in which there would be someone representative of the CRTC. But when the CRTC is dealing with an issue, the chairman has the authority to appoint a panel which will include two people from the region and one additional person as a non-full-time employee. It is called "they who hear, decide". The idea behind that is that whoever appears before the CRTC on this panel can hear the presentation and can then consult with the full CRTC board, but they ultimately make the decision. So you reap the benefit both ways. You cover regional concerns and interests, which can be coordinated through the national policy of the CRTC so there are no conflicts. This will be a more effective way to address the concerns and interests of the regions while making solid decisions of behalf of the CRTC.

Again, this is an area where I assume there will be further discussion. Quite honestly, when I examined the concept, it made a lot of sense to me and I think it is a move in the right direction.

● (1650)

Senator Davey mentioned his concern with regard to programming. Bill C-40 concentrates on the programming side. He also referred to children's programs. I would remind him that his classmate, Judy LaMarsh, headed up a commission in Ontario on violence. In the present context, all Canadians have to be concerned about what we are seeing on television and when we are seeing it. That commission's report goes back to the mid-1970s. It seems to me there is a time when we should re-examine those types of issues. With all the new opportunities for delivering programming in this country, there are a number of sources that are taking a great deal of liberty with what they are putting over the air.

The Broadcast Act was originally passed in 1968. Now, there is satellite delivery and cable. When I was reading the bill, Senator Davey, it occurred to me that now when you run a campaign and your leader is in Vancouver and you want to hold a big event in Ottawa, it can be delivered by satellite without violating any regulations that are set out by the CRTC. That amendment will benefit people who are responsible for campaign responsibilities. I am using that only as an example. There are many other examples that could be used.

Senator Hays mentioned the CRTC and the way in which it responded to what are called "policy guidelines" that come down from Cabinet to the CRTC. I know there is a lot of suspicion and concern that this is bringing undue governmental influence on the CRTC, its policies and its directions. In fact, what is built into this bill are certain mechanisms that prevent that from happening. It makes it possible to raise any red flags or concerns if the public or politicians seem to think that there is undue pressure on the CRTC to do something that would be a violation of principles, or whatever. The mechanism is that these policy directives or guidelines have to be referred to the appropriate standing committee of the House of Commons and have to be posted in the Canada Gazette. After 40 days, then the Governor in Council still has to go back to the CRTC. Therefore, there are safeguards built in.

[Senator Atkins.]

As I mentioned to Senator Frith yesterday, I wish to remind honourable senators that this is not a new idea. These amandments have been talked about and debated going back to the mid 1970s when Madam Sauvé was the Minister of Communications. I am told that, on more than one occasion, she attempted to bring forth amendments that would allow for this type of policy amendment to be made between the Governor in Council and the CRTC. I know that can be placed in a very partisan debate. Whenever one talks about broadcasting and licensing, one is bound to get into a situation where there is a perception or a perceived notion that the government is influencing either a policy on the CRTC, or that it wants a different situation out of the CRTC with regard to licensing.

With regard to licensing, the Governor in Council still does not have the influence to make any direct changes in a CRTC decision. The only thing that the Governor in Council can do is request that the CRTC re-examine its decision or, at the most, change the criteria in which they made that decision and then review it under those new conditions.

I know there has always been some concern that there could be a direct influence on the CRTC to give a licence that would benefit someone it preferred. However, in this act, I think that would be somewhat difficult to achieve. Certainly, it could not be achieved without one heck of a lot of public debate.

Senator Davey mentioned educational television. I agree with him. On the one hand, just by being updated, I hope this bill provides opportunities to allow a number of things to take place that would be more difficult to implement under the old act. The whole notion of educational television in this country seems to make a lot of sense to me. I would argue that it should be done not only under public broadcasting. I am not so sure that the private sector does not have some responsibility in providing some of this programming in the future.

Honourable senators, I realize that this is not a simple bill. As I said, any bill that takes five years to come through this system to second reading in this chamber bears many implications that will have to be addressed in committee. The bill is a sound bill and when it gets to committee there are a lot of clauses and sections in the bill that will be more fully understoo$%$%d. At that point, honourable senators will have an opportunity to raise their concerns and, I hope, get the appropriate answers to justify the composition of Bill C-40.

● (1700)

Senator LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I notice that Senator Atkins carefully avoided getting into the discussion of whether or not the CBC should be in the newsgathering business, something which I always thought was one of its responsibilities. In fact, it has joined with the Globe and Mail in news fabricating by the use of polls. I therefore ask the question: Will the honourable senator prevail on those with whom he is in contact to make sure that when we get to committee, the evasive answer that was provided to Senator Murray on the cost of these poll operations will be clearly fleshed out, and will he make sure that we get the information? The mythology has grown that the corporation is at arms' length, but in reality it is out of reach. So I hope that before we begin committee hearings that information will be provided. Will Senator Atkins undertake to do so?

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, I shall certainly use whatever influence I have to get the information that senators wishes to have with regard to these kinds of inquiries. I think such matters are important to the discussion.

Senator LeBlanc: Thank you.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Atkins referred to a place in the bill where they have dropped the part about the CBC being responsible for promoting national unity. While he was speaking, I have had a chance to find several places in the bill where it talks about "freedom of expression and journalistic, creative and programming independence" and so on. It indicates in paragraph 3(1)(b) that the Canadian Broadcasting system should be "a public service essential to the maintenance and enhancement of national identity and cultural sovereignty." However, that does not apply simply to the CBC, but to the whole broadcasting system.

Senator Atkins: I would agree with you.

Senator Olson: Yes. In three or four other places that I could find, we have the same comment. I do not know why they had to beat it to death. Subclause 46(5) on page 31 reads:

> The Corporation shall, in the pursuit of its objects and in the exercise of its powers, enjoy freedom of expression and journalistic, creative and programming independence.

In another place, on page 25—

Senator Doody: Question.

Senator Olson: —subclause 35(2) reads:

> This Part shall be interpreted and applied so as to protect and enhance the freedom of expression and the journalistic, creative and programming independence . . .

That phrase is in the bill in at least four places that I have found in the past 15 minutes, but there is nothing about the corporation having the responsibility to promote national unity, except for what the honourable senator has said. I cannot find what he said in the bill, and perhaps he can tell me where to find it.

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, the honourable senator is referring to the specific bill. I did not take my quotation from the bill. That was my interpretation of what that clause means.

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, Senator Atkins, in his final comments on second reading, was frank in acknowledging that the sums allocated to the CBC have been less than the rise in inflation or in constant dollars, reflect a declining amount. Whether or not the CBC bargains collectively or independently with its workers, the reality is that it is not possible for it to maintain a service with less money or with a declining constant dollar amount. I also have in my mind an image of the president of the corporation, Mr. Veilleux, who when pressed became very angry recently before a committee. In fact, I think it is fair to say that he lost his temper with the members of the committee—

Senator Stewart: That is not the first time either.

Senator Hays: —on the matter of the corporation being responsible for the closure of some regional stations.

Strictly speaking, this matter does not relate to Bill C-40, but the honourable senator has commented on it, and I think it was fair for him to do so. Would the honourable senator comment further and acknowledge that the recent closures and the necessary restructuring of the corporation will not be a matter internal to the corporation but a matter forced or imposed upon it by the allocation of government monies? While those monies may have exceeded the amount of the previous years, in constant dollars they are becoming less and less.

I should add that one must acknowledge, and I hope the honourable senator will, that much of what CBC Radio Canada does is non-commerical.

Senator Doody: Question.

Senator Roblin: Ask your question.

Senator Hays: It is a difficult matter, and I would ask honourable senators to be patient, because I want to be very clear in what I am saying. It is a matter of great political concern. I come from the city of Calgary, and the closure of the CBC regional office there was important enough to bring out thousands of people at the request of the Mayor of Calgary. So I think a few minutes in this chamber to put a proper question on a point that Senator Atkins has raised at second reading debate is not unreasonable.

So to continue: The non-revenue generating services of the CBC involve radio, services to remote areas and so on. Is it not clear from the course of events that the declining or the lesser presence of the CBC is not something internal to the corporation but rather something that comes from the outside; namely, the declining allocation of government revenue to operate the service?

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, I would be less than honest if I did not say yes. However, I think there are other considerations. We are in a difficult economic environment right now, but that may change.

Senator Olson: Wilson has admitted that to us.

Senator Atkins: That may mean that the capital funding that goes to the CBC may buy more in a year's time. They may be looking for other ways in which they can generate some revenue to trade off for some of the losses that they are experiencing in advertising sales at the moment. As I mentioned in my earlier comments, the CBC will have the responsibility under this bill to present an annual proposal. I see that provision as having pluses and minuses. It will depend on how they define their objectives, on how they are prepared to address the challenges they face on a fiscal basis and on how they convince the government in better times to put more money into the corporation.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Atkins, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transportation and Communications.

INTERNATIONAL SALE OF GOODS CONTRACTS CONVENTION BILL

SECOND READING

On the order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Oliver, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kinsella, for the second reading of the Bill C-81, An Act to implement the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have not had an opportunity to study this bill closely, nor to study the speech made by Senator Oliver yesterday, but he has given me some of the briefing material that he used in that speech. The background to the bill is in what is technically called private international law, or the subject of conflict of laws, which all lawyers study; it being, I suppose, when you think about it, an obvious problem. If you have a contract entered into between parties that are in different countries and a dispute arises as to the contract, what law is to apply? We actually sometimes used to put clauses into the contract to say what law would apply in that event.

The subject in this particular case, the question of conflict of laws, of course, applies to estates and contracts and can apply in torts and many other branches of the law, but the branch we are concerned with here is the sale of goods. The growth of international trade and business has, of course, resulted in an increase in problems between countries relating to the question of conflict of laws. Many Canadian law firms have offices in more than one country. So the problem is the problem of choice of law, as it is called in that field.

The scheme in this case is to have a convention that would apply certain rules to the interpretation of contracts where conflict arises, with specific reference to sale of goods. The scheme is not to invoke the convention, a scheme that sometimes applies, for example, with respect to arbitration. One can put a clause in a contract that invokes the role of the Arbitration Act in the settlement of disputes under the contract. In this case, it applies, but gives the parties an opportunity to opt out, if they wish.

The questions that I have, from not having done a careful study but from having had the benefit of the material that Senator Oliver gave me—and I thank him for that—are several, and I am sure there are others that can be settled in committee. I am not exactly clear as to what is meant by "the parties". I take it from the press release, and the other material that I have seen, that it does not necessarily apply to private parties but applies to governments when they are involved in such contracts, and may apply to certain other parties. The question of "parties" is a term of art in the sense that the word "party" has a specific meaning in the context of "parties to a contract".

There is also the question of the application of Section 92(13) of the Constitution, which assigns legislative jurisdiction to the provinces over the subjects of property and civil rights. That obviously, of course, would be taken into account, and has been taken into account, and I think the operation of this legislation is to make Canada a party to the international convention. There are already 26 countries that are party to the convention, but in our federal state, we, of course, have to involve the provinces also and they would have to implement the legislation so that it could apply in their legislative and legal jurisdictions. According to my count, from the material Senator Oliver gave me, almost all of the provinces have enacted the necessary implementing legislation to apply the convention as soon as it comes into force in Canada. The exceptions are the Province of Quebec and the Yukon Territory.

Clearly, the principle of this bill deserves support and I personally will be interested to hear the explanations given, just out of professional curiosity, as to how it will actually apply and in what specific situations it will be helpful.

I therefore support adoption of this bill at second reading and expect that Senator Oliver will move, when it receives second reading, that it be referred to committee. The only question then remaining is, which committee? One could refer it, on its title, to Foreign Affairs, to Banking Trade and Commerce, or to Legal and Constitutional Affairs. It seems to me, from the material I have read, that its essence, its pith and substance, as the constitutional lawyers say, is probably closest to Legal and Constitutional Affairs because the bill is dealing really with the question of the sale of goods, which is a legal question and, in the international sense, is not dealing with what is called public international law but private international law. Both the sale of goods and conflict of laws are subjects that every lawyer has to study; they are strictly legal questions. If some other committee would prefer to take it—such as Banking, Trade and Commerce—because of the load in Legal and Constitutional Affairs, we would have no objection, but I really think the appropriate committee is Legal and Constitutional Affairs. We will not fight or filibuster any suggestion to the contrary, however.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Oliver, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

CANADIAN RACE RELATIONS FOUNDATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella moved the second reading of Bill C-63, to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation.

He said: Honourable senators, mindful of the hour, I rise to make a few comments on Bill C-63. It seems somewhat propitious that, during this season, which many Canadians mark by special reflection on the importance of peace and goodwill, honourable senators have before them a bill to establish a national race relations foundation. This honourable chamber, no less than the other place, rejects racism and all forms of racial discrimination. Both individually and collectively, we are unequivocal in opposing racism as an ugly and dangerous form of behaviour which has no place in Canadian society.

● (1720)

Over the years many honourable senators have been in the forefront of the struggle to eliminate racial discrimination in Canada. With the indulgence of honourable senators, I wish to take this opportunity to salute the Honourable Louis-J. Robichaud, under whom I was privileged to work and serve in New Brunswick when Senator Robichaud, then premier, and some of his colleagues—and some of those are here in this chamber, such as Senator Thériault and others—enacted and gave support to our then provincial anti-racial discrimination legislation.

The codification of human rights acts across Canada, including the Human Rights Code of New Brunswick, was enacted under the government of then premier, now Senator, Hatfield. It was also my honour to serve with Premier Hatfield then—Senator Hatfield now—and many of his colleagues, who are also sitting in this chamber. I also want to salute the pioneering work that the Honourable Senator Haidasz has done over the years, particularly when he was serving as the minister responsible for multiculturalism.

Honourable senators, two years ago, Parliament unanimously passed Bill C-93, which was the world's first Multiculturalism Act. The bill before us today, an act to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, is situated, by the preambular paragraphs of the bill, within the context of the Canadian Multiculturalism Act and also in relation to the United Nations Convention on the elimination of all forms of racial discrimination, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and also the Japanese Canadian Redress Agreement.

This bill before us today is part of the promise and of the hope reflected in the Canadian Multiculturalism Act. It also forms part of another significant initiative, the Japanese Canadian Redress Agreement, which recognizes the injustices of the past and points to the need to prevent their re-occurrence. The National Association of Japanese Canadians was instrumental in negotiations that led to the Japanese Canadian Redress and the announcement of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation.

Honourable senators, race relations in this country have been of increasing importance and concern to all Canadians. The Race Relations Foundation will help Canadians to address one of the major issues we face today: The elimination of all forms of discrimination in Canadian society.

[Translation]

Multiculturalism dates back to before Confederation, with the aboriginal people. Since the earliest days, generation after generation of people from all over the world have wanted Canadian citizenship over any other one. Those people, who are part of our past and present, have striven to help build this country.

[English]

Today, and every day, we must never forget that we are all citizens of the first nation in the world to enshrine the multicultural character of its society in law. Both as a philosophy and as a program, multiculturalism is recognized as a positive and progressive force in our nation-building efforts. In such a society there is no room for racism and discrimination. It behooves us to respond to the call to action against racism and racial discrimination, and to show vision, leadership and commitment.

Our challenge to fight discrimination must be met with measures to promote institutional change, public awareness and education. It calls for political will at all levels of government and, above all, the support of ordinary Canadian women and men who must be supported with information, knowledge and education programs.

Honourable senators, the Canadian Race Relations Foundation is an essential element in this process of change. The support of all parties in the other place and the cooperation, support and goodwill shown towards this bill in legislative committee are clear indications that this initiative is welcomed by all.

The foundation will achieve its vital mandate through development, sharing, application of knowledge and expertise in order to contribute to the elimination of all forms of racial discrimination in Canada. It will serve community groups, policy makers, business and labour organizations, researchers, private and public institutions and the general public in the most balanced and effective way possible.

Honourable senators, it will be unique in meeting a rapidly growing need for reliable and credible research, education, resources and statistics, and will act as a clearing house for much needed information.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the Foundation will directly respond to two concerns, the concept of racism and its practice. Some of the most experienced people of this country will undertake research to uncover the actual extent of this problem and help uproot the false premises and the myths that underlie racism.

The Foundation will not work in an ivory tower. On the contrary, its research will generate concrete interpretations within easy reach of all groups concerned with racism.

[English]

By working in partnership with the best resources on race relations available in Canada, the foundation will promote a healthy, harmonious and model society. It will keep pace with social change, providing the information, resources and support required by groups and organizations working in the field of race relations.

The independence and unique makeup and mandate of the foundation give it a capacity for the development of knowledge and sharing of ideas, which no existing program or organization can offer in this area. It will be independent from the government and, therefore, will be able to advise the government and others from an informed and neutral perspective.

The foundation will meet the growing need for information and knowledge and promote networking and cooperation, which will increase the effectiveness of community organizations. Nevertheless, it will not replace or compete with community organizations and special interest groups in their advocacy role on behalf of their constituencies.

• (1730)

Honourable senators, the mandate of the foundation ensures that research and related efforts are directed against all racism and racial discrimination, including discrimination against our first citizens—Canada's native community.

The timely legislation now before us obliges the foundation to provide facilities and access to its services throughout Canada. The foundation will take all necessary measures to provide access to its services in every region, either on its own or in collaboration with existing organizations and institutions.

The bill before us is clear about the purpose of the foundation. It is to promote throughout Canada the development, sharing and application of knowledge and expertise in order to contribute to the elimination of racism and all forms of racial discrimination in our society.

The foundation will be incorporated federally as a charitable organization and will start its work with a solid funding base. The federal government is establishing an endowment fund of $24 million, half of which is contributed in the name of the Japanese Canadian community in commemoration of the injustices suffered by Japanese Canadians during and after the Second World War.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, we Canadians have never been indifferent, willing to accept inequities, polarization and unhealthy divisions within our communities. We know that the social cost of any injustice toward minorities is very high.

With a lot of courage and self-confidence we have chosen wisely to correct the injustices of the past and to move forward. The Canadian Race Relations Foundation will be a major milestone on the road to the future.

In this continuum, the Foundation is also concerned with the present. There could be no better time to reaffirm our multicultural nature. There could be no better time to reject the arbitrary divisions within mankind and to concentrate on a fundamental truth.

[English]

Honourable senators, in a publication entitled "Human Rights in Canada: A Focus on Racism" by Dr. Daniel Hill, the former Ombudsman of Ontario, I find him quoting a former Premier of Ontario, at page 42, where he states:

> People of good will and serious intent must break the silence. They must do so in action as well as word.
> Human rights and human dignity in Canada as elsewhere in the world have not been and are not likely to be realized by lofty rhetoric even when enshrined in a constitution. They are achieved by those relentless forces of social change and by our timely response to them. It is a question of giving substance to words by taking positive, constructive action.

Honourable senators, I submit that the creation of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation is a positive, constructive step, and invite you to support this bill.

On motion of Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN POLAR COMMISSION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. James F. Kelleher moved the second reading of Bill C-72, to establish the Canadian Polar Commission.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak in support of Bill C-72, an act to establish the Canadian Polar Commission.

Much has happened during the past year in the community of circumpolar nations on a variety of fronts.

The mixed commission established under the agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on cooperation in the arctic and the North, held its first meeting in Ottawa, November 19-22, 1990.

The cooperative agreement which launched this mixed commission was signed by Prime Minister Mulroney and Soviet Prime Minister Ryzhkov in Moscow on November 20, 1989. While in Leningrad on November 23, 1989, the Prime Minister announced the government's intention to create a Canadian Polar Commission.

Additionally, Canada has been a significant facilitator for the establishment of the International Arctic Science Committee, with participation from the eight Arctic nations.

Acting on these initiatives clearly demonstrates this government's commitment to promote and disseminate knowledge in and about the polar regions.

Two reports "Canada and Polar Science" and "The Shield of Achilles" recommended the creation of a Canadian Polar Commission.

The decision to create a Canadian Polar Commission was the result of extensive consultations and discussions with the territorial governments, aboriginal people, private enterprise, research institutes and universities.

The commission will monitor the state of polar knowledge, including traditional and aboriginal knowledge, in Canada and elsewhere.

It will promote development of such knowledge by cooperating with various organizations in the determination of scientific and other priorities.

The commission will also encourage Canadian organizations, institutions and associations, both private and public, to support the development and dissemination of such knowledge in respect of the polar regions. It will provide information about polar research to Canadians and Canadian organizations, institutions and associations, as well as a comprehensive Canadian polar information system managed by the commission.

Increased access to polar knowledge will enhance Canada's international profile as a circumpolar nation by fostering international cooperation.

Cooperation can address issues such as resource development, legal and jurisdictional questions, security concerns, and global environmental problems.

The commission will also provide support for the publication of studies on polar subjects, as well as recognize achievements and contributions in polar matters.

It will initiate, sponsor and support conferences, seminars and meetings.

● (1740)

The commission is not intended to be a funding body for basic scientific research. The two reports I mentioned before strongly recommended against this since Canada already has such institutions.

The commission will receive core funding of approximately $1 million annually from the government. It may also enter into contracts with government departments, industry, territorial governments and universities to undertake studies on matters relating to the Arctic.

The commission's legislative mandate will be primarily that of an advisory body. It will provide such advice to the Canadian government at a senior level. It may recommend steps to be taken by the federal government to improve the relevance and effectiveness of Canadian polar research. The commission will report on these matters to Parliament through the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The activities of the commission shall be managed by a board of directors consisting of up to 12 members, including a chairperson and two vice-chairpersons, to be appointed by the Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Persons appointed to the board of directors must have knowledge that will assist the commission in the furtherance of its purpose, and membership will include northerners and will reflect the ethnic, linguistic and regional diversities of Canada's polar regions. The commission must quickly become a respected source of advice and assistance for all Canadians and Canadian institutions interested in polar research.

The board shall establish such offices in Canada as the board considers necessary for the furtherance of the commission's purpose. It was recommended that the location of the commission's offices be determined in light of the commission's mandate and responsibilities.

One of the commission's main tasks is to promote polar knowledge within federal ministries, national granting councils and other national bodies, and to act as a source of advice to the federal government. The commission needs an office in the national capital region to pursue its mandate effectively. Moreover, the commission will establish at least one other office at a place north of 60 degrees north latitude to facilitate contact between the commission and Canada's diverse polar research community. It will also ensure that the commission's presence in the north is an effective presence, a presence which seeks, and is available for, input from northerners. The commission will hold at least half of its board meetings at a place north of 60 degrees north latitude.

Prompt consideration and passage of Bill C-72 is one very useful contribution we can make to enhancing Canada's role as a leader among circumpolar nations.

Honourable senators, I am advised that during its passage in the House of Commons this bill received support from all parties. Amendments were made during the committee stage, and it received unanimous support at third reading.

Senator Frith: That can be a red flag around here.

Senator MacEachen: That is often not a mark of excellence.

Senator Frith: It awakens our interest in a negative way.

Senator Kelleher: I am sorry I have waved such a red flag during my maiden speech.

Senator Frith: I did not mean it to be provocative, just informative.

Senator Kelleher: I would never suggest, Senator Frith, that you are anything but a delightful person.

Senator Frith: You have not been here long enough, I am afraid.

Senator Kelleher: With that statesmanlike gesture, I shall rest my case.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Watt, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that all remaining orders, motions and inquiries stand.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I wish to table petitions against the GST, what else!

First of all, I have a number of petitions with the names of 1,755 Ontario residents. They are dated December 15, 1990.

Since Senator Tremblay is always concerned about the age of our petitions, this one is dated December 15, 1990. In other words, it is quite recent.

I have other petitions signed by 278 residents of Alberta who, of course, are against the GST. That is as many people as those who sided with the government.

Finally, I have a petition signed by 1,708 residents of the Province of Quebec who are also against the GST.

[English]

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have received some petitions which I would like to table. They are from citizens of the province of Ontario, who humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. There are about 1,700 names on the 72 sheets of paper comprising the petitions.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have some petitions which I have received from citizens of the provinces of Ontario and New Brunswick. I am afraid I have not counted the number of names, but there are several hundred. They, too, call upon the Senate to defeat the goods and services tax.

OFFICIAL REPORT

CORRECTION

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, yesterday I raised a question of privilege because a page or two had been stripped out of the Hansard for December 14. At that time I asked the Deputy Leader of the Government to look into this matter with a view to rectifying the situation. As yet, he has not reported to me.

I would advise the deputy leader that this situation must be corrected before the official Hansard is printed—that is, the bound text. The copies we receive on our desks every day are more or less drafts.

I would like the deputy leader to know that I am not particularly interested in identifying somebody whom we could reprimand or crucify, but the problem has to be corrected, and it cannot be corrected until we have an admission that a mistake has been made, and a commitment that the deleted material will be included when the official bound editions of the Hansard are printed. I am not saying that we can allow anybody to modify Hansard on some whim or another. I just want it clearly understood that I want that situation corrected. I want what the reporters took down put back into the Hansard.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I undertook yesterday to make an inquiry on behalf of Senator Olson. I have done that. I have asked the Table to prepare a report for us. Of course, Senator Olson could have done that for himself. He has as much right as I do to ask the Table for such a report. Nevertheless, out of courtesy, the request was made of me and I passed it along. I am sure the reply will be forthcoming shortly.

Senator Olson: I hope so. Thank you.

SEASON'S GREETINGS

Hon. Sidney M. Buckwold: Honourable senators, before we get to Reports of Committees, I should like to extend my warmest greetings to all my colleagues on this festive season. I wish all of you a good New Year. I do so in my capacity as the most popular member of this chamber—at least on one side.

BANK ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FOURTEENTH REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

THURSDAY, December 20, 1990

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

FOURTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-90, An Act to amend the Bank Act (extension), has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, December 18, 1990, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

SIDNEY L. BUCKWOLD
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Poitras, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

PENITENTIARIES

ACCESS OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT—TWENTY-NINTH REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

THURSDAY, December 20, 1990

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

TWENTY-NINTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Hastings calling the attention of the Senate to the erosion of the long standing right of access of Members of parliament to federal penitentiaries and the final loss of that right in 1987, in obedience with the Order of Reference of Tuesday, January 23, 1990, considered the inquiry and now reports back.

Your Committee heard from the Commissioner of the Correctional Service of Canada and received independent legal counsel. Counsel advised that the most appropriate course was to confer the right of access to penitentiaries for Parliamentarians by an amendment to the Penitentiaries Act, and your Committee concurs in this advice.

[Senator Buckwold.]

Senator Hastings introduced Bill S-19, "An Act to amend the Penitentiary Act to reinstate visitation privileges of Members of Parliament," on November 14, 1990, and your Committee is supportive of his action.

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

• (1410)

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I am inclined to say at the next sitting, as would be normal, but I assume it would please Senator Hastings to have this report adopted now, with the Senate's consent. The report speaks for itself. It needs no other consideration.

A reference was made to the committee. We are reporting back on that reference. The conclusion reached on the reference is that the committee is supportive of Senator Hastings' actions in introducing Bill S-19. One could consider the matter concluded.

Senator Frith: Then, with leave, move the adoption of the report.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with leave I move the adoption of the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRTIETH REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the thirtieth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs respecting Bill C-92, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

THURSDAY, December 20, 1990

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

THIRTIETH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-92, an Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act, has in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, December 18, 1990, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Beaudoin, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, regarding tomorrow's sitting, I will be moving that the Senate meet at 9 o'clock in the morning rather than at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Certain senators have indicated that it would be much more convenient for them to catch flights if they could get out of here early in the day.

If honourable senators agree, I will move that the Senate meet at 9 o'clock in the morning and sit until approximately 12 noon. If these two bills are given third reading, we will then have Royal Assent.

If that is agreeable, I will move the motion. If it is not, we will meet at 2 o'clock. Therefore, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Friday, December 21, 1990 at 9 o'clock in the forenoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to adjourn the debate on this motion until later today so that I can have an opportunity to consult with my colleagues. After I have done that I will ask that the matter be brought forward.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perraull, that further debate on this motion be adjourned until later this day.

Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Murray will not be present in the chamber for Question Period. I will be pleased to take as notice any questions honourable senators wish to ask.

SEASON'S GREETINGS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I noticed that Senator Murray was not here today. I know he has other cabinet responsibilities to attend to from time to time. I am probably the senator who has asked the most questions during the past year, so I would like to take the opportunity to wish my colleagues on both sides of the house a happy holiday season.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

OFFICIAL REPORT

CORRECTION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to take this opportunity to correct an error in the Hansard of Tuesday, December 18 on page 4915. When I introduced the Appropriation Bill No. 3, I told the Senate that the difference between the voted amount and the statutory amount consisted of $2.9 billion to cover the increased public debt. I learned this morning in committee that the amount is actually $2.5 billion. The other $400 million is for various other statutory items that are scattered throughout the Estimates.

CANADIAN RACE RELATIONS FOUNDATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kinsella, seconded by the Honourable Senator Castonguay, for the second reading of the Bill C-63, An Act to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, Canadians have always been proud of the high esteem in which their country is held around the world. There are many reasons for this extraordinary reputation Canada enjoys.

About ten years ago, I had summed them up in this way. You will see that a great many things have changed over the past ten years and that our reputation has been tarnished a bit. In short, here is what I was able to write in a book published in 1980.

> First of all, contrary to most Western nations, we have no colonial past to be blamed for, nor any ambition for power or conquest; we could have built the bomb but we refused; we are more the victims of the multinationals than their partners; we follow old democratic traditions and we respect human rights; we are not really racist; we get along as well as can be expected as Canadians of various ethnic origins; without being as friendly as we > could, we have nevertheless opened our borders to a great many immigrants and refugees, and our financial contribution to international development, alth gh inadequate, is certainly not insignificant.

Well, if we were to look at everyone of these points, we would realize that a great many things have changed over the past ten years. What about our "old democratic traditions" when the most basic rules of this House have been trampled upon since the infamous date of October 4?

I wrote then that we were getting along as well as could be expected as Canadians of various ethnic origins. I could write that in 1980, it is not quite true today.

I said in 1980 that we had opened our borders to vast numbers of immigrants and refugees. This is still true as far as immigrants are concerned but our attitude to refugees in recent years has become very much like the selfish attitudes of other rich countries.

As for our financial contribution to international development, it has dropped steadily over the years.

What I find most surprising is that in 1980, I was able to write that we were not particularly racist.

In ten years that has changed. Instances of racism have become so common that the media no longer bother to report them. And yet, immigrants, refugees and even Canadians who belong to visible minorities can tell you about their experiences in this beautiful country that for a long time was an oasis of social tolerance. Racism can sometimes be subtle when it is suspicious, or it may be the obvious contempt expressed in discrimination. It is becoming increasingly widespread, not only in big cities like Toronto and Montreal but even in small communities with ethnic minorities.

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, enshrined in the Canadian Constitution, prohibits racial discrimination as well as discrimination on the basis of colour and national or ethnic origin. If Bill C-63 offers a way to reinforce this principle, we should support this bill, in the hope that the Canadian Race Relations Foundation is established as soon as possible.

Let us hope this foundation will not be just a façade, one more meaningless initiative to soothe the conscience of governments.

There are already many volunteer agencies that fight racial discrimination, especially in our large cities. The Canadian Race Relations Foundation should not remain aloof from these organizations but work with them, in close co-operation.

We also believe that the 22 members of the board provided under the bill should be men and women with a keen awareness of racial discrimination, representing each of the 10 provinces and the Northwest Territories and Yukon. It is unfortunate that at the legislative committee stage, the government refused to accept an amendment that would have guaranteed this representation. Perhaps our own committee could consider doing so.

At least, the 22 members of the board of the foundation should not be chosen on the basis of political allegiance, as has so often been the case since 1984.

• (1420)

[English]

Honourable senators, the mandate of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation is a very large one. The foundation will not be able to do everything at once, thus the importance of having a very representative team that will set up the priorities and goals. If this foundation is to have credibility it must, from the start, create links with the grassroots: those who live with racism in their everyday lives and those who try to eliminate it. These are the crucial partners the foundation must have if it is to live up to its mandate. The Canadian people will be watching very closely and will be expecting results, and so will senators on this side.

Our country cannot afford another facade organization. What we need is a solid base: an organization that listens, promotes and circulates information: one that takes race relations seriously.

We all have a major role to play if we seriously want racism to be eradicated. The new foundation should be there to help us better understand the fears so many have when confronted with something new. It must be there to help us find solutions for the problems of today, and it must also be there to prevent problems for tomorrow.

Canada needs to face the growing issue of intolerance and racism. When the economy is going downhill, as it obviously is now, people somehow need to find a scapegoat. It is sad to say that it is often the person who does not talk or look like us who gets the backlash. It is not fair but when panic takes over, tolerance and compassion are hard to sell. We only have to look at what has been happening in this country in the last year between anglophones and francophones, between native people and white Canadians, and the recent shameful events involving anti-semitism or hatred toward coloured people.

[Translation]

Canada cannot survive, much less prosper, without the massive contribution of immigrants and refugees. These men and women, who hope to become citizens of our country—sometimes one wonders why—will come mostly from the Third World. They will enrich us by the ways in which they are different, by their traditions and their culture. However, if this vital operation is to be successful, we must open our hearts and minds to these differences, and that is why we are counting so much on the initiatives to be taken by this new foundation.

[English]

The new Canadian Race Relations Foundation will be established in Toronto, a city that has already major problems to solve. As Desmond Morton wrote in the Ottawa Citizen of October 31:

> . . . the multicultural myth has become a secular religion. The faith is bumping into reality.
> Toronto's black community feels pain. As the recession deepens, blacks feel their "last hired, first fired" status.

They remember youngsters gunned down by the police. They take little comfort from a few representatives in symbolic positions. Academic freedom is a front-parlor theory to people who don't find many professors in their mirror.

Piling up policies for racial tolerance and employment equity makes little difference to people who figure they will never be accepted and, with a deepening recession, have the evidence to prove it.

We have a problem.

Because of such a touchy situation we will have to play a watchdog role and see to it that the foundation does not concentrate its efforts on the city in which it will be established.

We will also have to make sure that whoever forms the group, or wherever it is situated in Canada, all must be able to receive help from the foundation in trying to solve race relations problems anywhere in our own country. That is why the Liberal opposition in the other place wanted the executive board to represent all of Canada.

[Translation]

In a word, honourable senators, we need new ways to stop the wave of racism that is spreading across our country. Let us educate upcoming generations while there is still time, so that they will grow up in a society that is not torn by racial tension as is unfortunately the case in so many other countries.

Establishing a Canadian Race Relations Foundation is one way. Let us hope it will help us build for the future of our country, a future that promises to be uncertain and difficult. Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Kinsella speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading.

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, I shall be very brief. I concur in the expression of the important points raised by my honourable colleague, Senator Hébert. I trust that, upon approval of the motion for second reading, the bill will be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kinsella, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

CANADIAN POLAR COMMISSION BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelleher, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Muir, for the second reading of Bill C-72, An Act to establish the Canadian Polar Commission and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof.—(Honourable Senator Watt).

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I do not know if this bill will be passed this week or not. Senator Frith adjourned the debate in the name of Senator Watt yesterday. Could this order stand in his name until after the new year? Senator Watt would like to know what is going to be done with the bill.

• (1430)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Will Senator Watt be back tomorrow?

Senator Adams: No, he will not be back until after the new year.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate Senator Adams' intervention. Naturally we would like to deal with the bill as quickly as we can. However, if there is some assurance that it will be dealt with shortly after we come back after Christmas, that will be fine.

Order stands.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax) for the second reading of the Bill C-79, An Act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act.—(Honourable Senator LeBlanc, P.C. (Beauséjour)).

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, in moving second reading, Senator Nurgitz told us that Bill C-79 "arrives in the Senate chamber after considerable review and debate in the other place." That is almost an understatement.

In fact, your Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration had been monitoring with interest the proceedings of the Special Committee of the House of Commons. From the moment that Bill C-79 was made public, it was apparent that those parts of it applicable to the Senate would need amendment to reflect the Senate way of doing things. May I remind honourable senators that we are not an administrative clone of the House of Commons.

As it stands before you, the bill contains an independent grant of statutory power to the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration that is not explicitly expressed to be subject to the direction and control of the Senate itself. Even as chairman of what would become a powerful body of this house, I would not recommend such a state of affairs to the Senate. I believe that this will require an amendment.

More importantly, many members of your committee and many other senators have been aware for quite some time of a need for legislation that codifies and modernizes the internal administration of this institution. Your committee, therefore, commissioned the drafting of proposed amendments to Bill C-79 that would reflect these needs. I call these the "Senate amendments".

Amongst other things, the Senate amendments would expressly subject the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration to the direction and control of the Senate in the exercise of its new statutory powers. They would allow the committee to sit and act as an intersessional authority. As senators know, this can sometimes cause a hesitation in making decisions during periods of long breaks. They would also codify the right that the Senate shares with the other place to prepare its Estimates, transmit them to the government and have them tabled with the government Estimates.

It is important to note that the Senate amendments do not ask for powers for the Senate over and above those enjoyed by the other place. They simply ask for the same powers, reformulated where necessary to reflect our way of doing things.

The possible Senate amendments were made available to several members of the other place in the course of the passage of Bill C-79 through the committee and through the house itself. For whatever reason, the house did not incorporate these amendments, although some members of the committee have said that these amendments should be done by us to ensure that everything is in order.

● (1440)

In any event, the amendments can be moved when the bill is sent to committee. That, of course, brings me to the question of which Senate committee is best suited to consider Bill C-79. Three committees have competing claims to the closest connection to the subject matter of this bill. As was indicated by Senator Nurgitz yesterday, as the bill now stands, its criminal law content invites a reference to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Yesterday, Senator Molgat reminded us that the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders also has an interest in the bill. However, as I have pointed out, the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has been actively involved with this bill for almost six months and that committee will have to administer the elements contained in the bill if it is enacted. Furthermore, the Senate amendments referred to, such as those establishing an intersessional authority and codifying the right to prepare estimates, all relate to matters within the jurisdiction of the internal economy committee.

Honourable senators, for those reasons I would suggest that honourable senators consider a reference to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration but, as you see, I have no imperialistic ambitions in this matter.

There is no doubt that Bill C-79 responds to needs, needs that were especially felt in the other place. However, we have needs too, a number of which can be met by adjustments to this bill.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, at the outset I would say that I agree with Senator LeBlanc that the Senate is not an administrative clone of the House of Commons and that we should make some amendments to the Parliament of Canada Act so that that fact becomes apparent to some members of the House of Commons who seem to think that we have very few rights. The most outstanding example of that is what we have seen here in the last few days—an attempt to bring the views of real Canadians to the attention of the Parliament of Canada as they relate to Bill C-62.

I am also aware that there are some Senate amendments in Bill C-79, none of which are particularly and specifically related to the comments I want to make today. However, I do think some other Senate reforms are absolutely vital. There has been a lot of talk about reforming the Senate in one way or another but I think the most important reform would be to make the Senate relevant to real Canadians. At the present time, I do not think it is. I think we have substantially improved that image over the last four months but I think we have a ways to go yet. I believe we have to understand, far better than we have to date, that this upper chamber in the Parliament of Canada must start listening to the real people in the real world and to act accordingly when debating provisions so that that is manifest in this chamber. I am talking about reforms that can be made by senators themselves, individually if they will.

Honourable senators, we already have two federal commissions studying the Constitution and there are at least three provincial ones. They may not all be in existence at the present time but there have been announcements by some premiers in various provinces to the effect that they are going to set up some constitutional commissions to deal with changing the structures by which we govern ourselves; namely, the Constitution, the power that provincial governments have, the power that the federal government has and various other things. I am not arguing that these commissions are unimportant but I can tell you that we must not try to carry on as if we are members of some exclusive "gentlemen's" club. I hope that is not offensive to the ladies or the females who are here. Perhaps I should say is like some "gentlemen's club including a few ladies" and let it go at that. Unfortunately, that is the image most Canadians have of the Senate.

I remember a speech made by Senator Molson, who I wish were here today. During that speech he pleaded with the Senate that we should not have all this controversy but that we should get back to the way we used to do things. Not me. I think the greatest disservice we could do to the Canadian people is to say that we are going to get back to this "high-class gentlemen's club" image.

Honourable senators, we must understand that we need to be relevant and that means senators should go forth from this place and talk to the people they "represent". I know that some members opposite resent that word too. I am referring to the people who expect us to carry their real problems into the upper chamber of the Parliament of Canada. I hope that we can raise that image.

Many senators do not understand, and certainly in the Parliament of Canada you never hear about it, but there is a depression in my part of Canada. It is not a recession; it is a severe depression that is just as bad as the depression we had in the 1930s. Yet, elected members from that part of Canada never say a word; not a peep in the House of Commons. The Senate has a very important job to do and I do not care how boring, irritating or frustrating I am in pursuing that objective, I am going to do it because I believe I have an obligation to do it. If the people in the other place are going to abdicate their responsibilities to make known to the Parliament of Canada the severe conditions that exist in their part of Canada, then we in the Senate have an obligation to do it. I hope that senators on both sides of this chamber recognize that this is a Senate reform that ought to be made now.

Honourable senators, I stand here day after day and I know that I annoy some of my colleagues on the other side because I ask questions. I am always asking what the government intends to do about a monetary policy that is severely hurting the people in my part of Canada through no fault of their own. They did not borrow more money and they did not meet the conditions that the Governor of the Bank of Canada talks about, for lowering interest rates, while he continues stripping them of all the monetary resources they have through the high interest rates. No one on the other side has said a word about that and not one of the so-called "elected representatives" in the other house is saying a word. That is what hurts.

The suggestion, of course, is always that we should have an elected Senate. Honourable senators already know my view about that. If there is not a change in the attitude of senators and if they do not start doing their jobs, then I do not think it will make much difference, especially if senators behave in the same way as those people in the House of Commons. I believe that if senators were elected they would carry the views of the people to the floor and try to meet the concerns being expressed. There is this party discipline that they talk about in the House of Commons, where you cannot criticize the government or the Prime Minister; otherwise you get kicked out of the P.C. caucus. That is what happened earlier this year to two members from Alberta. I think it should change.

If you do not think there is a depression going on in this country, why don't you come out and see? For a recession to be technically described as such apparently requires a decline in the overall output for two quarters. I can tell you that, in the part of Alberta I come from, and all over Saskatchewan and most of Manitoba, it is in fact, a depression. That is where there are four quarters of economic decline. We have had that situation for a very long time. It seems to me that, at least during Question Period, there should be a few more senators participating in trying to find out what the government's plans are to deal with it. We have not seen that happen. I know, when I ask the Leader of the Government questions from time to time, that I will not get a perfect solution. In most cases, I do not even get an answer. Sometimes I get a reply, but only because I insist that we at least have some mutterings out of him. I used to sit there in his position and I know that you do not have a perfect solution to every problem that comes up. There are a few of us on this side that ask questions but unfortunately there are not enough in this chamber taking part from both sides. We all ought to have some concern about the people out there who are going through the most severe economic and social conditions that they have seen, perhaps, at any time.

I tell you, there are all kinds of places that I know of in southeastern Alberta and Saskatchewan that are worse off than they were in the 1930s, and the reason is simple: They have set up their lifestyles and their economic activities in such a way that they have to have some cash flow, and that has just dried up. I intend to make another speech later on today, if we ever get to that order, but that is what has happened. Moreover, it is not only in Saskatchewan and Alberta that we are having these problems. The welfare rolls in Canada have never been so full. Provincial governments are saying they cannot afford it.

What do people do when they run out of welfare payments? They go to the food banks. We know that in places like Toronto, Calgary, Edmonton and Regina the food banks cannot keep up. Why? Well, it is because the recession or the depression is deeper and more severe than it has ever been. That is why. I ask myself: What do you do after you have tried welfare and you cannot get any more there and after you have gone to the food banks and they say, "Sorry, we do not have any more food"? You go to the soup kitchen. Are we going to keep letting this situation deteriorate until the soup kitchens get overwhelmed by applicants so that even they cannot contend with the problem?

Honourable senators, I hope that this Senate is going to recognize that it has a responsibility. When you ask questions in this place, as I said a minute ago, it is not just simply because you think the government is going to come up with a response. It also carries the message to the government of this country that there are some difficulties in various places.

I know something else, too. I know that the people out there, whether they get perfect answers all the time, want to know that somebody here at least recognizes that they have some problems and is willing to do something about them, or at least to try. The government can do as much or as little as it likes, but I can guarantee you that there are lots of people who do not believe that the government cares any more. We have to carry this message to the government day after day, week after week, and month after month because people get some comfort at least from knowing that there is somebody who can articulate their problems to the government and to the Parliament of Canada.

I plead with you because it is not being done. Sometimes we spend 30 minutes, sometimes 40 or 50 or 60 minutes, trying to describe, at least in one of the houses of the Parliament of Canada, how bad it is out there, and the government goes on as if it is not so. The minister gets up here sometimes and parrots the words of the Minister of Finance: "Well, you know, we have to fight inflation so we are going to keep the interest rates up. We had to cool off the economy so we adopted a monetary policy that cooled it off." They certainly cooled it off all right, but I do not want to get in to those arguments at this particular time.

The point I am trying to make on Bill C-79 is that there are some reforms to the Senate that ought to be made. We have to change our attitude and it should be done now. Every senator on both sides of this chamber should assume their responsibility to the people of Canada to carry those messages in here so that the government members are aware of them. From the answers that we get, I really do not believe they know. What is worse—and I probably should not say this—is that, if they do know, they do not care, or at least they are not prepared to take any remedial action. Are we going to let Canadians starve, be actually, physically short of food when there are enormous quantities of it all over this country? We are not short of wheat. We have no shortage of soybean or canola seeds.

Senator Buckwold: Or milk or chicken.

Senator Olson: We have all sorts of ingredients to make sure that people all over this country have an adequate diet. Surely, we can do that for other things, too, to complete the requirement about food, clothing and shelter.

I was only ten years old during the problems back in the 1930s, but I remember very clearly what happened when we went through that severe depression. We had another one in 1981 and 1982 as well, but there were enough reserves around so that we could handle it. Now the government says they do not have any more. Their monetary policy is one of the main reasons why they do not have any more. The budget is being soaked up to the tune of $39 billion every year just for interest charges alone. That is what is happening.

Honourable senators, I said I was only going to be a few minutes, but I hope that, when we are considering the Parliament of Canada Act, we will quit talking about these "ivory tower" wonderful things that you are going to do about Senate reform. The first thing we can do is be relevant. Let us be relevant to the people's needs, recognize what is going on in the country and at least indicate that we understand it. Then we can start to work on the problems. Unfortunately, at the present time, there is not enough going on in this chamber to indicate that we even understand, or believe, recognize or have even heard of the depression that is occurring in certain parts of this country.

I talked about the farmers on the prairies. I think there are some fishing villages on the east coast that are just as badly off. At least they have one advantage that will carry them for a little while, and that is that they are under the Unemployment Insurance Commission, which farmers, of course, are not. However, it is not going to be long until that has expired for many of them. There are people in the cities—hundreds, thousands of people—being laid off every day. You can hardly pick up a paper without reading of people being laid off, whether it is Air Canada laying off 2,900 or Imperial Oil laying off 4,000 people across this country or somebody else. So, we are into it. We are into a depression. Honourable senators, I think it is time we started talking about what these people need. The solutions will not be easy, but in the name of common sense, we should at least indicate to people that we know what is happening out there.

• (1500)

I hope that honourable senators will agree that we need to make this place more relevant. I am not sure we need any amendments to Bill C-79 to do that, although that bill relates to amendments to the Parliament of Canada Act. I think a change of attitude is required and that individual senators must take on the responsibility of being relevant and listening to the people of Canada.

In closing, let me say that we should not set in place rules that will make it difficult for senators to do their job. Senators need to leave Ottawa and go out and talk to the people. They should go into their homes, if invited; they should talk to the people in the coffee shops. I do that.

It is said that grown men are not supposed to cry, but that is what I feel like doing when I hear about people being run off their land because they cannot afford to make their mortgage payments. Honourable senators may think I am being over dramatic, and perhaps I am, but I want to get honourable senators' attention.

When I say we should not make it difficult for senators to do their job, I am referring to amendments that will penalize senators if they are not in the chamber each and every day compared to those who are. To do the greatest service to the greatest number of Canadians, we need to go out and talk to them. Then we will see what is really taking place in the country.

So, honourable senators, I do not think we should change the rules and make it a penalty if a senator is trying to do his job. We need to be relevant. I hope some honourable senators will change their attitude so that this can come about.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if nobody else wishes to speak at this time I should like to adjourn the debate. There are a number of amendments that have been suggested. I think our caucus would like a chance to discuss them before proceeding further.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to make an instalment-type statement on the motion to adjourn. I do not want to spring this on the Deputy Leader of the Government, but I wonder if he could tell us where we stand respecting the menu he laid out for us last week, particularly with regard to the three bills that he wanted passed before the Christmas adjournment. As I understand it, two of those bills are ready, and the third, the appropriations bill, has been referred to committee, the committee has held a meeting on that legislation and has developed a plan for the future respecting that legislation. However, as I understand it, the report of the committee on that legislation will not be before the Senate tomorrow.

I also believe that all other legislation the deputy leader wanted referred to committee has been referred, or is on the path to referral. Therefore, I should like the deputy leader to tell us, before we deal with the adjournment motion, what his plans are. Could the leader tell us today what the plans for the adjournment will be?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, does the work plan of the National Finance Committee envisage that committee reporting back before the middle of January?

Senator Frith: I noted that the plan is for the committee to meet again on January 7, I believe, or at least during the week of January 7. That is the tentative arrangement, subject to arranging for witnesses. As I understand it, if witnesses are available, it plans to complete its hearings on the legislation by the end of that week. That means the committee's report could be tabled in the Senate during the week of January 14.

Senator Doody: That sounds reasonable. Let me see if I can make the necessary connections. Can I presume that will include third reading?

Senator Frith: Third reading debate could start when the committee report is dealt with.

We are not unmindful of the fact that January 15 is a Tuesday. That date was mentioned in the committee, and also by the deputy leader. My understanding is that the report on the bill will be ready and that we can deal with the legislation during the week of January 14. If we sit on January 14, I suppose that is when the report will be tabled.

Honourable senators, as I said, I want to give Senator Doody a chance to look at where we stand so that he can evaluate the situation respecting the Christmas adjournment. When he can give us some news on that, we can dispose of this motion.

On motion of Senator Frith debate adjourned.

FISHERIES ACT
CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Comeau, seconded by the Honourable Senator Teed, for the second reading of the Bill C-74, An Act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof.—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I adjourned the motion for second reading in the expectation that after I had read the speech by Senator Comeau and other material, including the speech given by the minister in the House of Commons, which I have done, I might have something useful to add.

I find I have not reached that objective; therefore, I think it would serve the interest of all by allowing this bill to go to committee.

Hon. Gérald J. Comeau: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Comeau speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Comeau:— I would be pleased to refer this bill to committee so that any questions senators have can be answered.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Comeau, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries.

YUKON PLACER MINING ACT
YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella moved the second reading of Bill C-68, to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act and the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and to make provision for the application of certain orders.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to speak briefly to Bill C-68, which is of major importance to the people and the economy of the Yukon. Basically, the bill reflects the needs of the Yukon of the 1990s, with the rising aspirations of its peoples, the increasing importance of its natural resources and the growing awareness of the environment and its unique vulnerability.

Fundamentally, honourable senators, Bill C-68 confirms the authority the government always felt it had. The bill establishes through the Yukon Quartz Mining Act the authority to withdraw from mineral disposition Crown lands in the Yukon Territory for public purposes. It also makes some minor changes to the withdrawal provisions contained in the Yukon Placer Mining Act in order to ensure that the government's intention is not in doubt. The bill goes on to provide for its application retroactive to February 13 of this year, which was the date on which the minister responsible for Northern Affairs announced the government's intention to bring this legislation forward in the other place to take effect on February 13, 1990.

Bill C-68 conclusively establishes the government's right to manage Crown lands in the Yukon Territory for the benefit of all Canadians. Responsible management of public lands in the Yukon is of critical importance to the prosperity of the people who live there now and those who will live there in the coming century.

In June of this year, honourable senators, the Minister of State for Indian and Northern Affairs spoke in the other place about the land claims of the native people and the importance of the government's clear authority to manage lands in response to those claims. I would like to outline the importance of this authority to the territory's leading industry, namely, mining. Many may not realize the full importance of the Yukon mining industry. Frankly, honourable senators, I did not realize, until studying the briefing documents on this bill, that mining in the Yukon is a major industry now and will be into the 1990s and beyond. The estimated value of mineral production in the Yukon in 1989, honourable senators, was $540 million, which is an increase of $48 million over the previous year. That is a remarkable achievement for a region of this size.

Two hard rock mines and approximately 220 placer mining operations produced lead, zinc, silver and gold in 1989. Mining companies and prospectors explored more than 60 properties looking for further deposits of these minerals as well as nickel, copper, platinum and other minerals. With the record established by the mining companies and continued growth, we can look forward to mining playing a leading role in the economy of the Yukon in the future.

Placer gold operations have produced more than 12 million troy ounces of gold since the first records were kept over 100 years ago. Today most of the placer mining operations are small, family enterprises. However, last year this industry produced more gold than at any time since 1917. Because mining is the leading industry in the territory, stability and certainty are necessary for continued investment and growth. It is essential that the mining industry knows which areas are open for exploration and staking.

On February 12 of this year, the day before the minister's statement, the Federal Court struck down certain aspects of the government's authority to manage Yukon lands. This impinges on the government's programs to set aside land for future use; for example, the designation of lands selected for the settlement of Indian land claims. The negotiations for land claims are central to the future of the territory. In the 1990s and into the 21st century the Yukon's natural resources must continue to contribute to the economy and provide benefits for its people. As the economic base of the territory broadens to encompass mining, tourism, the fur industry, fishing, small manufacturing and transportation, the government must be able to carry out its responsibilities regarding the use of land. Those responsibilities include allocating lands for public use, such as rights of way, air strips and public facilities.

The Yukon Quartz Mining Act and the Yukon Placer Mining Act must unequivocally recognize the authority of the government to allocate lands for public purposes and to decide in the public interest whether lands are available for the disposition of mining rights. These amendments should have little effect on the exploration and staking activities of the mining industry. The practices followed before the court ruling will effectively continue. Those who wish to stake mining claims will, as they have in the past, simply contact the mining recorder's office to determine the status of the lands they are prospecting. The mining recorder's office maintains comprehensive information on the rights available.

Honourable senators, this bill is part of the government's program to ensure that, in the 1990s, public policy fosters the aspirations, prosperity and unique way of life for the people of the Yukon. I believe this bill contributes to that and the amendments are necessary, particularly in light of the court decision to which I referred.

Honourable senators, this bill deserves the support of this chamber, and I invite you to consider the same. Thank you, honourable senators.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the essence of this bill, or at least an important element of it, is the question of land claims. For that reason I consulted my colleague Senator Adams, who represents the adjoining or neighbouring territory of the Northwest Territories in our chamber. He feels that little can be added to the debate at second reading; therefore, he has authorized me to suggest that the bill go to the committee on aboriginal peoples for consideration. It may be that it will need to be looked at by another committee, but he seems to feel that the essential element is land claims and that that committee would be well equipped to deal with that aspect. Of course he also suggested we support the bill at second reading, subject to it being referred to that committee. Therefore, we wait for that motion before it goes to third reading.

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: If the honourable senator speaks now, he will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Kinsella: Thank you, honourable senators. I concur with the honourable Senator Frith. I think the matter arose as a result of a stake that was claimed on lands that were part of lands under consideration as part of comprehensive native land claims in the Yukon. I think the committee Senator Frith indicated is the appropriate committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

On motion of Senator Kinsella, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples.

AN ACT TO PROVIDE FOR APPOINTMENT OF A PORT WARDEN FOR THE HARBOUR OF QUEBEC AN ACT TO AMEND AND CONSOLIDATE THE ACTS RELATING TO THE OFFICE OF PORT WARDEN FOR THE HARBOUR OF MONTREAL

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Michel Cogger moved second reading of Bill C-82, to amend an Act to provide for the appointment of a Port Warden for the Harbour of Quebec, and to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the office of Port Warden for the Harbour of Montreal, and to validate certain fees and charges established pursuant thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to offer a few words of explanation about Bill C-82. I realize everyone is very anxious to hear about the wardens for the Harbour of Quebec and the Harbour of Montreal. At this point in time, I will let honourable senators know about those two gentlemen, who are fine people.

One reason I am particularly delighted to support this bill is that it is the result of a recommendation of the committee on Scrutiny of Regulations, which I have the honour to co-chair with a Liberal member from the other place. For those of you who are not too familiar with the workings of our fine committee, Senator Rizzuto, Senator Bolduc, Senator Beaudoin and Senator David are members of this very exciting committee. It normally meets at 8:30 in the morning and offers breakfast, coffee and muffins. That is the way we get a quorum.

It is indeed delightful to know that when we get together, pay attention to regulations and make recommendations to the government, such recommendations are not always lost in the bureaucratic machinery, but periodically result in some legislation, as indeed is the case with Bill C-82.

[Translation]

The goal of the bill is to increase the efficiency of the administration of the port wardens by the Board of Trade of Montreal and la Chambre de Commerce de Québec. It will also remove archaic features of the legislation, which date back to 1882 for the port of Montreal and 1871 for the port of Quebec.

I should point out that the port wardens at the port of Montreal and the port of Quebec are unique in Canada. Their individual legislation and responsibilities which link them to the Board of Trade of Montreal and la Chambre de Commerce de Québec, pre-date Confederation. The port wardens fulfil an important role. Their duties include inspecting all cargoes of grain, mineral concentrates and timber stored on deck. They also ensure that a ship meets the necessary safety requirements and is loaded in accordance with Canadian safety regulations.

The Board of Trade of Montreal and la Chambre de Commerce de Québec are empowered under their respective legislations of 1881 and 1871 to establish tariffs of fees for these services.

The legislation requires that the tariffs of fees cover the costs of the port wardens' offices and that the moneys collected may only be used for the purposes of these offices. These tariffs of fees currently require approval by the Governor in Council before coming into force.

In addition, in recent years some of these fees have remained in force for quite some time.

However, in today's fast-moving maritime commercial world and with rapidly fluctuating costs, the Board of Trade and la Chambre de Commerce now find it necessary to adjust the tariffs of fees, often at short notice, in order to meet the costs of the port wardens' offices for providing their services to the shipping industry.

Forecasting ship demands, and hence forecasting the revenues necessary to cover the costs of the port wardens' services is difficult. Recognizing the longer time-frame required for government approvals, it is the government's intention to remove from the legislation the requirement for Governor in Council approval.

Safeguards for government and the shipping industry to ensure the high level of service at appropriate costs will be maintained.

The primary objective of the bill, therefore, is to provide the Board of Trade and la Chambre de Commerce with the authority to approve tariffs of fees and put these into effect.

We are confident that greater efficiency will be achieved in the administration of the offices of the port wardens at Montreal and Quebec and continued excellent service to the shipping industry will be assured.

The federal government will retain its over-all responsibility for appointing the port wardens, and auditing the financial management of their offices.

The shipping industry and the Canadian Coast Guard will continue to have representation on technical committees of the Board of Trade and Chambre de Commerce responsible for the duties of the port wardens, and recommending tariffs of fees. Users will be consulted and informed of tariffs of fees changes by the Board of Trade and la Chambre de Commerce through the process of pre-publication in the Canada Gazette and local newspapers.

[English]

Honourable senators, the second objective of this bill is essentially a housekeeping amendment. It will remove archaic features of the original legislation that fixed payments and charges for services of the port wardens in the legislation itself. These charges were appropriate many years ago, but are no longer valid in meeting the present day costs of doing business. For instance, the legislation required the payment of one-quarter of a cent per head of livestock, and even a fee not exceeding two cents per barrel on all ashes shipped from the port.

These housekeeping amendments will also validate tariffs of fees and charges fixed in later years which could not conform to these archaic provisions.

The overall results of these amendments will be to make the operations of the port wardens more effective and responsive to modern-day shipping at the local level, while maintaining the government's responsibility for the safety of commercial navigation.

● (1530)

Honourable senators, I hope you will find that this bill can receive timely approval. I invite your kind consideration of the same.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to adjourn the debate until tomorrow in order to have a look at the record. I suppose that the bill will be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications before the Christmas break, whenever that may be.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN HERITAGE LANGUAGES INSTITUTE BILL

On the order:

> Resuming debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Robertson, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the second reading of the Bill C-37, An Act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute.—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I was planning to speak on Bill C-37 yesterday, but we decided to adjourn at 6 o'clock.

Today, I find myself almost at the bottom of the list of speakers again. It may be my own doing, because I moved the adjournment of this debate Monday after Senator Robertson's speech.

I moved the adjournment specifically so I could read her speech before making mine, as well as do some research on the background of this bill.

Over the past few days, I perused or gave a cursory look at the various speeches made at the other place by the minister, the parliamentary secretary and the many members who took part in the debate. There is a lot of debate on this bill which does not seem controversial at first.

Senator Robertson was stating the contrary in this House on Monday when she said, and I quote:

> This bill now has the support of the three major parties in the other place. They are in full agreement as to its importance to Canada both at home and as a player on the international scene.

She said the three major parties agreed on the substance of the bill. I think she might have been mistaken because the fact is there is a lot of disagreement on this issue.

I think it is fair to say that everybody recognizes the importance of this bill. I went throught speeches and testimonies quickly and came to the conclusion that both Opposition parties support the bill but would have liked substantial amendments to make it more credible and better adjusted to real facts.

The background of this bill is quite revealing. Government supporters, including Senator Robertson who sponsored the bill in the Senate, were unable to give any information on considerations and decisions behind the bill as it now stands. My investigation on this subject was quite interesting.

The rationale of a bill should always be questioned. Why it is needed now? Is it urgent? Is there a demand for this kind of bill? We could very well do without it and life would go on as usual.

I noticed during this quick investigation . . . I confess once again that I had to make it fast because we are caught in the usual rush of the end of the session since this government cannot properly manage the business of Parliament.

I noticed that not only the sponsor of the bill but the minister himself did not give the total picture, far from it, and did not explain the background of the bill or its eventual modus operandi, and both of them chose to ignore the hot issues and controversial aspects of the bill in their presentations.

Obviously, everything is not perfect in this upper chamber, but candour and frankness could improve the situation.

The principle of the bill as such is not questioned, but there are indeed deficiencies in the bill that should be looked after. More on this later. To me, the most serious shortcoming—I am the first one to mention it—seems to be that there is no legal requirement that the languages of work and communication within the proposed agency be English and French.

Given the fact that this institute is set up as some kind of corporation under an act of the federal government, it seems to me that it would be normal that it should conform to the Official Languages Act.

However, nothing in the bill says it should. This is contrary to normal practices. In the past, when such a corporation was set up, the bill usually said that the requirements of the Official Languages Act would apply.

One could argue in this case that the subject being the creation of a Canadian Heritage Languages Institute, there is no need to specify that French and English are the languages of operation.

Let's look again! This bill establishes a national institute, not a regional one for an area were English predominates. It is a national institute which would be expected to serve all areas of the country.

For this reason, although nothing would prevent future employees of this institute to talk in whatever heritage language they wish, the Canadian public should at least be assured that if it wishes to communicate in Engish or in French, it will receive an answer in the same language. This is the spirit of the Official Languages Act. But, there is no such guarantee in the bill. We might end up with a babel of tongues.

When you look a bit further back into the origin of this Bill, you understand the reason of this absence of reference to the Official Languages Act. At first, when the Secretary of State asked two well-known Western Canadian professors to look into the possibility of setting up an heritage language institute, they carried out their investigation mostly in the Prairies and British Columbia. It was only by accident that they learned what was being done in Ontario.

It was also by accident (a less significant one) that they found out what was being done in the area of heritage languages in the Province of Quebec, more specifically at Laval University. There may be other locations, but I am not personally aware of them.

In their report, the two professors, Henry Kreisel and Michael Bates, suggested to set up an organization not with three heads but with three feet.

They would have established an institute in Western Canada to meet the heritage language needs in the Prairies and British Columbia. They would have recognized the institute which was already operating quite well in Ontario, and finally they would have recognized what was being done in Quebec.

But the report by these two professors was turned down by the department. That is the reason why we are dealing today with a bill to set up a single institute with its head office in Edmonton.

● (1540)

The funding of the Institute has been planned along the line of these two gentlemen's original proposal. Some $6 million earmarked for the next five years will be given out in instalments of $1,300,000 a year. That is enough to support a regional institute in Edmonton to serve the Western provinces. But this is quite inadequate to meet the needs of the Institute, or rather a nation wide institute to serve ten provinces and two territories. This approach has been criticized repeatedly in the House of Commons and during the detailed study of the bill by the legislative committee. This should be emphasized. There was no consensus on this bill to adequately provide for the heritage language institute.

Once again, the Atlantic provinces seem to have been treated like a poor relation of after thought. If some House of Commons legislative committee members had not been so insistent about it, the committee would have been satisfied with hearing as witnesses one or two umbrella organizations which apparently were to testify on behalf of the many organizations which promote heritage languages throughout Canada. The government recognized its mistake. It sent for a great many more witnesses that it had planned at the start.

I find this mean on the part of the government. When introducing bills in this major democratic institution that is the House of Commons the Government makes every effort to limit the number of witnesses. Only seldom are the recommendations and suggestions of the Opposition Parties accepted.

Is it any wonder, when the Senate deals with such a bill, that it is anxious to carry out as wide a public consultation as possible? Normally we would not have to do this if the House of Commons had done the job right. Nowadays, it is more the exception than the rule. Again today, we are under pressure because the session is coming to an end. Over the past couple of days, we have had to proceed to the second reading of more than 12 bills and their referral to committees.

In the House of Commons they did not exactly rush these bills through. In fact, Bill C-37 is the second bill on the same question. This is the government's second attempt to get a bill through Parliament to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute. So far, they have spent more than two years and three months on both bills. Monday, they came and told us to hurry up because they wanted this bill to get royal assent very soon. Hurry up and send it to committee, and don't call too many witnesses. We want it for royal assent before Parliament is prorogued, because we want to start a new session in March! It took the House of Commons two years and three months to consider the bill, first in its preliminary or initial form, as Bill C-152, and today they want us to consider Bill C-37.

I don't go for this kind of pressure. However, I did spend some extra time during the last few days doing some more research. I must admit it was far from exhaustive. I just did not have time to sit down and consider everything that has been said and proposed so far. I do not even have the report of the two learned professors. I think that is where I should have begun. The report is not available to honourable senators. Maybe we will have it at the committee stage.

Be that as it may, I do not want to spend the whole afternoon on this bill. We have been told to hurry up, but I suggest we are entitled to ask why. This is the same government that, in the 1990 budget, cut funding to schools teaching heritage languages. There is a considerable number of community and volunteer schools throughout the country that until now had been relying on funds allocated by the Secretary of State—in excess of $4 million a year. In his budget the Minister of Finance said he would reduce funding. So here they are now intent on setting up the heritage languages institute while at the same time they undermine all the community efforts that have been made for years to provide heritage languages courses. It simply does not make sense. They cut them right off and then tell them: We will give you a new centre, a new institute for heritage languages in Edmonton.

This brings me to the third point made by the people who considered this bill seriously. While we basically agree, if not on the need for such an institute, at least on the idea of establishing it, the problem remains, as almost every speaker pointed out, that it will not be sufficiently funded. The proposed $1.3 million for the next five years were originally intended as funding for a strictly regional centre. Now we made it into a national centre. The centre should be getting twice or three times as much, according to the critics who thoroughly analyzed the question.

I would also want to raise another point: In the text of the initial legislation, Bill C-652, there was no mention of native people as potential users of the Institute or aboriginal languages.

In a first amendment made while Bill C-652 was in committee, Indians and Inuit were included. However they were not consulted at that time. So they came back and said: We do not want to be part of the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute. We want our own Aboriginal Languages Foundation. This is why the new version of Bill C-37 does not make any reference to aboriginal languages. Yet the minister says that although not specifically mentioned, they are included. So the government is acting as though nothing had happened.

Since then, a member of Parliament introduced her own private member bill to establish an Aboriginal Languages Foundation. I do not know why the government always wants to keep the aboriginal people of this country under its protection. It seems to me they are strong and smart enough to make their own decisions and do not need the constant supervision of the federal government. However, it is doing it once again.

We find that disgusting. The spokespersons for aboriginal organizations were unanimous in refusing to be part of the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute. It seems to me that is clear. Even so, the minister keeps saying they are included.

Those are aspects of the bill the committee will consider. It will have to consider them seriously. I hope it will not hesitate to summon all witnesses needed to collect as wide a range of opinions as possible.

In the House of Commons, if I may say so, at the risk of insulting its members, the work was half done. It now behooves the Senate to hear all those who may wish to appear, all the people of this country who have something to contribute to improve the bill.

Finally, I want to say that personally I support the idea. Like others I say that more resources than those the government is proposing now have to be found for the Institute. Otherwise the Institute will only struggle along. Anything that struggles declines after a while. If the government is serious, it will give the Institute a good, solid start. Thank you, honourable senators.

• (1550)

[English]

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, I took note of a number of the points raised by the honourable senator who just spoke. I think the reference to the definition of "heritage language" in the interpretation section makes it clear that the institute will, indeed, be dealing with all heritage languages that are languages which contribute to the linguistic heritage of Canada, including, obviously, our Aboriginal languages. This is critically important.

I do not think the bill addresses an institute that does the hands-on teaching. This, of course, is occurring all across Canada whether in schools, universities or community colleges. The institute will, rather, provide the kind of linguistic research and overview of promoting heritage languages that I do not think we would envisage being done by the volunteers who provide the many hundreds of thousands of hours of heritage-language training across the land. Rather, it would supplement the work of those volunteers.

I think the honourable senator has raised some questions which, hopefully, we will have a chance to delve into when the bill goes to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Senator Corbin: Can the honourable senator tell me how one can justify cutting $4.1 million of funding to heritage language schools across the country this year and then proposing the setting up of an institute? How can that be justified in the current context? Are you not defeating your own long-term purposes by doing that?

Senator Kinsella: In my view, we are dealing with two radically different issues. I understand the financial support for the heritage language programs across the country, was working out at something like $22 per student.

Senator Corbin: It was $30.

Senator Kinsella: I think many provincial governments have assumed their rightful responsibility in teaching some of our heritage languages. I see that as being a terribly important development because, in my view, our heritage languages ought not to be marginalized. As a country wiht the richness of language resources that we have, we ought not to be marginalizing our heritage languages but, rather, promoting the integration of these languages, including the Aboriginal languages, in our various teaching institutes.

This has been occurring and there has been significant progress in some provinces. I would agree that, in the province the honourable senator opposite and I come from, heritage language promotion is less well advanced, and most courses in heritage language are those held on Saturday mornings.

However, the institute is not about hands-on teaching but, rather, it will provide the over-arching framework of body to promote the idea of heritage languages and to provide assistance where it can. I think they are two very different programs.

Senator Corbin: The honourable senator obviously did not get the gist of my question.

I understand perfectly well what he is saying. He is saying that we need an institute to do research and to promote the teaching of heritage languages and so on. I read in some of the material that research has been going on for the last 40 years with respect to the teaching of heritage languages, but that that 40 years of research is all lying on the shelves. That research covers all sorts of new approaches and new theories, yet not one has been gelled into a practical, pragmatic approach to the actual act of teaching itself. Presumably, the institute will consider those fine studies that have been done, boil them down and, hopefully, come up with teaching methods which will be implemented in the field.

• (1600)

It is fine to have an institute but you have ruined the classes and dispersed the students. That is the effect of that cut of $4 million from the budget of Secretary of State for teaching heritage languages. There have been numerous complaints. I have read a comment from one of the members in the other place indicating that, with the exception of the GST, he has had more correspondence on that matter than on any other matter that has come across his desk in recent months. People are not happy. Every group involved in these programs that was given the opportunity to appear before the House of Commons committee complained to that effect, and they give very little credibility to the institute that is being proposed, in light of what has been done to their programs. All I am saying is that they are pretty angry.

On motion of Senator Adams for Senator Watt, debate adjourned.

SECOND READING—POINT OF ORDER—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, for the second reading of Bill S-18, An Act to further the aspirations of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada,
>
> And on the Point of Order concerning the admissibility of the Bill.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to say a word on the question that I raised here a few days ago regarding the receivability of the bill. Honourable senators are aware that Rule 62 of the Senate provides as follows:

> The Senate shall not proceed upon a bill appropriating public money that has not within the knowledge of the Senate been recommended by the Queen's representative.

There are various authorities to support that rule, but I will not quote them here. It seems to me, as I look through the bill, that it contains at least two clauses that direct the minister to spend money. Clause 8(2) asks the minister to establish, find funding for and implement programs aimed at removal of disparity. Such direction goes beyond establishing procedures for the expenditure of monies. It directs the minister and his department to impose a new duty on the existing ministry and, therefore, I think, infringes on the Crown's initiative.

Clause 8(3) directs that the minister establish and put in place certain programs to allow aboriginal peoples to develop their economies. Such direction imposes new duties on the department that may cause a new charge upon the Consolidated Revenue Fund. This clause, as well, appears to infringe on the financial initiative. There may be one or two others that should be examined.

That is not to say that this bill is not a noble bill, one that aims in the right direction, or that these clauses are, of themselves, not good. The question is purely a technical one as to whether or not the Senate has the right to initiate such a bill. So I put that down for the consideration of my colleagues. They may want to speak on it at some time.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Duff Roblin moved the second reading of Bill C-54, to amend the Criminal Code (joinder of counts).

He said: Honourable senators, the bill, as anyone can see, is relatively short, and it will not take me long to present the relevant features to the house. It affects two sections in the Criminal Code. One is section 230(d), which has been considered by the Supreme Court of Canada, and in a decision rendered last year, I believe, in the case of R. v. Vaillancourt, it was considered that this clause breached the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Constitution, and was therefore null and void.

While I am not learned in the law, as everyone here knows, I will be bold enough to try to explain to you what section 230(d) provides. It is a clause in the Criminal Code which deals with an instance where a person causes the death of another while committing or attempting to commit some other crime. I could give the house a list of the details of the other crimes, such as kidnapping, sexual assault, hostage taking, robbery, breaking and entering, and so on, but the principle is that, if a person causes the death of another while committing one of these listed serious crimes, it is considered to be murder if the person used a weapon or had a weapon upon him at the time he attempted to commit the offence, whether or not he meant to cause the death or whether or not he knew that death was likely to be caused. This clause was considered by the Supreme Court, as I have mentioned, and it was declared to be unconstitutional.

In the verdict which was rendered on December 30, 1987, where eight justices heard the case, Mr. Justice Lamer, who spoke for the court, ruled that the presumption of innocence in section 11(d) of the Charter is offended when the accused may be convicted of murder despite the existence of a reasonable doubt on an essential element of the offence, namely the mens rea, that is to say, the guilty mind.

Speaking for the majority of the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Lamer held that the accused cannot be found guilty of murder in the absence of proof beyond a reasonable doubt of intention to kill, or at least objective foreseeability, which is a legal phrase which must explain itself, I am afraid, of the risk of death.

Accordingly, the court ruled that section 230(d) was unconstitutional because it offended against section 11(d) of the Charter of Rights, which I looked up the other day and which reads as follows:

> Any person charged with an offence has the right . . . to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal.

So, as a result of this finding of the court, this bill has been written to strike this clause from the Criminal Code.

The second part of the bill deals with a somewhat similar matter, having to do with murder, but not entirely on the same grounds, so to speak. The second part of the bill has to do with section 589. The way the section is worded at the present time prohibits the joinder of any other count to a count of murder. This prohibition of joinder is an exception to the general rule which obtains in all non-murder cases; that is, all offenses arising out of the same transaction or incident are tied together, thereby reducing delays and making the fact-finding process of the trial fairer and more effective.

As a result of the decision of the Supreme Court that I referred to about the unconstitutionality of section 230(d), the question of charges of murder and joinder were considered by the Criminal Law Section of the Uniform Law Conference of Canada and by the Law Reform Commission of Canada and by the Federal-Provincial Working Group on Homicide, and they recommended that section 589 be amended so as to remove the prohibition on joinder of any other count to a count of murder.

So, if you look at the bill, you will see that the new section 589(a) purports to remove the prohibition of joinder in respect of murder cases.

On the same general theme, the Federal-Provincial Working Group on Homicide also recommended that the Criminal Code be further amended to permit joinder of other charges, whether they occurred as part of the same criminal transaction or not, if the accused consents. The reason for that is that it would make the conduct of the trial more efficient, and would also result in economies in the administration of justice.

The key clause, of course, in this subsection is "if the accused consents". So it is not a derogation from his rights; it can only be applied if the accused has given agreement to the joinder. That is contained in the new section 589(b).

● (1610)

Honourable senators, that is an amateur explanation of a rather technical legal situation. It seems to me that this is a bill we should accept without any problem because it brings the law into conformity with the judgment of the Supreme Court, and also provides for the efficient conduct of trials and the administration of justice.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, may I ask a question? Does that mean that if someone sequestered a third person, and that third person died in the hands of the person who sequestered him, the person who sequestered him is no longer responsible for the death of the person sequestered and, in fact, not guilty of murdering that person?

Senator Roblin: I am not sure I caught your words. Did you say "sequestered"?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, unlawful incarceration.

Senator Roblin: I do not know how that particular situation would apply to this bill. This bill simply says that, if death occurred as a result of somebody's action, joinder with another crime is permitted. So if someone detained someone illegally, that person could be charged on that count, and if the detained person died, my interpretation is that the two counts could be joined, which is not permitted at the present time.

[Senator Roblin]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am tempted to give an answer to Senator Gigantès' question.

Senator Roblin: My feelings would not be hurt if the honourable senator did that. My friend is more learned in the law than I.

Senator Frith: I think an answer was contained in Senator Roblin's presentation. As he pointed out, the bill has a two-fold purpose, the first being to respond to the Vaillancourt decision where one of the counts of constructive murder was struck down beause it violated section 7 and section 11(d) of the Charter. Constructive murder is the centre of Senator Gigantès' question.

In my opinion, this relates to the expression of the general proposition in law that a person is presumed to attend the natural consequence of an act. A natural consequence of robbing a bank with a gun is that someone will be hurt or killed. So an accused cannot say, in defence, that simply because someone got killed during a robbery, there was no guilty intent, no mens rea. An accused cannot say that he is not guilty of murder because he did not intend someone to be killed. That is what is meant by constructive murder.

The second purpose of the bill, as explained by Senator Roblin, is to make it possible to join other counts in an indictment for murder if those offences arose out of the same circumstances as those upon which the charge of murder is based, or if the accused consented to the joining of the counts, as Senator Roblin has explained.

The first purpose is clearly stated and clearly accomplished by the bill. It is instructive to review section 230 of the Criminal Code, which is the constructive murder section. It provides that someone who does not actually commit the crime of murder can still be convicted of murder through some association with the crime. The part which is being deleted is subsection (d), which provides that a person is subject to being convicted of murder if the accused used a weapon on his or her person while committing or attempting to commit the offence, or while fleeing the scene and death ensued as a consequence thereof.

I believe the bill should be looked at by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs because, as honourable senators can imagine, there is another side to the story, or other dimensions to the propositions that have been outlined by some members of the legal profession. They should have an opportunity to present those views to the committee.

There has been a great deal of study undertaken on this question, and this bill is an honest and laudable attempt to solve the problem. The only complaint by those who argue for improvement of the bill is that while Bill C-54 disposes of subsection (d), it does nothing to get rid of subsections (a), (b) and (c) which deal with the same issue of constructive murder from different perspectives, specifically where death results from the committing of bodily harm without a weapon, but facilitates the offence or the subsequent escape. These other subsections are all now being challenged in the Supreme Court of Canada and may well have to be dealt with in very short order.

The Law Reform Commission and Chief Justice Lamer have each stated that it is now totally inappropriate to treat an unintentional killer as though he was an intentional killer demonstrating mens rea.

The second purpose is intended to increase the efficiency of the system by allowing the joining of other offences to the charge of murder. The appearance of cases of failure to complete prosecutions, failure to complete the delivery of justice as a result of the non-joinder rule, was the rationale for this clause of the bill. There had been a feeling that the courts, the system, the taxpayer and the accused would all be better off if the courts were permitted to try murder and other counts together. I think Senator Roblin demonstrated that in his statement in support of the bill.

Those who disagree say that the reverse would ultimately take place. I am not coming down necessarily on the side of those who do disagree, but I can see something in their argument. I think the committee should look at that argument. It is that the amendment would only increase the work of the courts and the cost of the courts by causing counsel for every accused to move for severance or separation of the charges on every occasion. They fear that the joining of charges would prejudice the accused on one or another of the counts.

The Law Reform Commission has suggested that any crime triable by a jury should be joined with the consent of the accused. It has been argued that when one marries this section to other sections of the Criminal Code, the change places the onus on the accused to persuade the court that there should be no joinder. In an already difficult situation, that adds to the burden placed on someone accused of murder, counsel and the presiding judge. It is suggested in this case that the trial judge would always have to be on the alert to sever the counts in the course of the trial so that prejudice does not occur. The failure of the judge to do so could, of course, become grounds for an appeal.

So the concern is that this attempt to improve the efficiency of the courts could, instead, succeed in adding to the complexity of the trial to ensure fairness, thereby increasing costs and causing delays.

● (1620)

There is another concern expressed by the Law Reform Commission about the number of specific crimes that are subject to joinder. In its recommendation, it limited the number of offenses which could be joined to: manslaughter, attempted murder and criminal negligence causing death. Bill C-54 makes no distinction between these offenses and other offenses that may be tried before a jury.

As I say, it is a short bill. Its supporters are certainly acting for a worthy and laudable purpose, but I think the doubts raised make it essential that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have an opportunity to see whether the bill adequately fulfils those purposes. It is our function to ensure that the legislation before us matches its intent, which means making sure that the changes are sufficient but also free of unnecessary negative consequences.

Again, honourable senators, the purpose of the bill was fully and properly put forward by Senator Roblin, in spite of his modesty with respect to how learned he is in the law. I have not come to the conclusion that the reservations, as I have expressed them, are necessarily worthy of support to the extent of amending the bill, but I am convinced that they are worthy of the support of any motion to refer this bill to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs so that those who have these concerns—these are obviously people who practise criminal law on a regular basis—are heard by the committee. Then if there is an improvement to be made, we can make it.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Roblin speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Roblin: I have not much to say, honourable senators. I agree with my friend that the bill should go to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. That is our regular procedure and I think it should be followed in this case.

Regarding the objections some people have raised with respect to section 230(a), (b) and (c), perhaps they are correct, but it is premature at the moment because the matter is under advisement by the Supreme Court, and we should wait for the decision before we attempt to amend the law. It may be that they will have placed these three subparagraphs in the same category as subsection (d) and our course will be clear in that we will have to make more changes. But I imagine that the draftsmen of the bill thought they should wait for the ruling of the Supreme Court before pronouncing on this matter.

With respect to the other considerations raised by the criminal bar, they may well have force. In spite of the fact that this particular bill has received some consideration by three or four non-government legal bodies, it may be that there is still room for differences of opinion. There usually is when it comes to legal matters. So I agree with my friend that it would be a fine idea to put this bill to the committee in order to enable those who wish to bring certain points to our notice to have the opportunity to do so, and to give those who have drafted the bill the opportunity to explain to us why they think it is a good bill the way it is. I would be glad to have the house approve this legislation for second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Roblin, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

MOTION OF CENSURE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn:

That the privileges of Honourable Senators having been constantly abuse by the Speaker of the Senate, the Senate do advise the Prime Minister that Senator Guy Charbonneau is unfit to continue to be the Speaker of the Senate.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That order stands in my name, but I have checked with the Senate Debates, and I do not wish to add anything at the moment. If someone else wishes to speak, I will yield to them.

Hon. Dan Hays: I speak to this motion to elaborate on and explain why I stood in my place to abstain from voting on the morning of December 13 and gave as my reason that I refused to adjudicate on a corrupt ruling, which necessarily implies impropriety on the part of Speaker Charbonneau.

I should state at this point that my comments about him are confined to how he has carried out his responsibilities as a holder of high office, namely, the Speaker of the Senate, and not to him personally. In fact, I believe him to be a decent and good man.

When accepting the office of Speaker, no matter how one comes to that office, a senator becomes obliged to act in a fair, just and even-handed way; to become well versed in the rules and traditions of Parliament and the Senate, and to adhere to them and preserve them to the best of his or her ability. I rely on Senator Stanbury's speech describing in detail events surrounding Bill C-62.

However, for the purposes of my comments, they are described in brief as follows: On October 4, the vote was taken in the absence of the opposition without adequate or, to me, proper notice. On November 22, the Speaker refused to recognize Senator Waters of the Reform Party, even though Senator Waters had given notice of his intention to move an amendment, and was standing before the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who was the only person the Speaker was prepared to recognize and who intended to move the previous question at that point. Finally, on December 12, the Speaker ruled a vote to be taken on what amounted to a motion by Senator Kelly, introduced in the form of a letter signed by all government senators, and thereby improperly took from opposition senators the right, as set out in the Rules of the Senate of Canada, to speak to Bill C-62 and to the disguised motion of Senator Kelly in the case of those senators who had not yet spoken.

The last of these described events was followed by Senator Stanbury's motion of censure; however, they must be considered in the context of the government's stated intention, including public statements by the Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson, and the Minister of National Revenue, Mr. Jelinek, as being a means of preventing delay on the part of the opposition senators.

Any one of the events described might be considered an error on the part of the Speaker. However, when taken together and in the context of public statements of the government, they lead me to conclude that the Speaker sided with the government in an improper way to limit rights to delay the passage of legislation as permitted and within the provisions of the Rules of the Senate of Canada.

The only proper way for Bill C-62 to have come to a vote was in accordance with the rules, which provide that any senator may speak to a motion and not be bound by a time limit or pursuant to a motion limiting debate—in effect establishing a form of closure. The results are certain in that either of those routes would have led to a vote on Bill C-62. Undoubtedly, in the course of a filibuster, such as the one carried out on Bill C-62, many points of order may be raised with respect to the conduct of the filibuster. However on the matter of Bill C-62 coming to a vote or on a motion to limit debate on Bill C-62, I am of the view that the Rules of the Senate of Canada are clear and that the method introduced by the Speaker, at the invitation of government senators, to bring the matter to a vote was an inelegant way of circumventing the Rules of the Senate. It was the Speaker's duty to prevent that from happening. When government senators found the front door firmly closed, Speaker Charbonneau, who is responsible for security of the house, opened the back door by treating what was, in effet, a motion put by Senator Kelly as a request for a ruling.

We have a rich body of literature that deals with the choice the Speaker had to make between serving a partisan purpose and fulfilling the obligations of high office, in this case to ensure adherence to the rules and traditions of the Senate of Canada. The Speaker's support of Bill C-62 and belief that it is good for Canada, his party or whatever, should not have had any bearing or anything to do with decisions he was called upon to make in his capacity of Speaker.

I will quote a few lines from T. S. Eliot's Murder in the Cathedral which I believe are appropriate. You will recall that Henry appointed his friend, Thomas Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, only to find him wanting in that he would not cooperate in certain matters important to the king. I quote from a character named Tempter speaking to Thomas:

Real Power

Is purchased at price of a certain submission.

Your spiritual power is earthly perdition. Power is present, for him who will wield.

Further on Thomas, in response to the Tempter, states:

● (1630)

Now is my way clear, now is the meaning plain:

Temptation shall not come in this kind again.

The last temptation is the greatest treason:

To do the right deed for the wrong reason.

I could speak at length as to why the Speaker might be motivated to allow something to happen which ought not to have happened, but that has been well covered in speeches that have preceded mine. However, I would be happy to address questions should any senators feel elaboration is required on my part.

I would like to touch on something else, and that is the legality or illegality, or regularity or irregularity, of what occurred. I asked for some research to be done by the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament, and I would like to share what I have discovered. In challenging a matter such as the ruling the Speaker made as to whether or not it was proper, the general rule would be summarized as followed. Procedural rules and standing orders are primarily designed for internal purposes. They govern the operations in a legislative chamber, setting out what can and cannot be done, and in what manner. They are binding on members and govern their relations with each other.

When a member feels aggrieved that the rules of the house are not being applied as he or she would wish, there does not appear to be an appeal to the courts. If standing orders are breached, the place to raise the point of order is in the House of commons or Senate, nor is a ruling of the Speaker reviewable outside.

I looked a little further into this and I found that the principle is well summarized by Lord Reid in the case of British Railways Board v Pickin. Lord Reid is quoting from another judgment, and if honourable senators wish details, I would be happy to provide them. I believe this summarizes the position as stated by the House of Lords in 1974, and I am not aware of any cases that are more recent than that, which would be more helpful. Lord Reid states:

> . . . all that a court of justice can look to is the parliamentary roll; they see that an act has passed both Houses of Parliament, and that it has received the royal assent, and no court of justice can inquire into the manner in which it was introduced into parliament, what was done previously to its being introduced, or what passed in parliament during the various stages of its progress through both Houses of Parliament. I therefore trust that no such inquiry will hereafter be entered into in Scotland, and that due effect will be given to every act of Parliament, both private as well as public, upon the just construction which appears to arise upon it.

The case arose out of a challenge to a private bill, not a public bill, over what might seem a trifling matter of railway closure. I will not get into the facts. It seems to be the most recent pronouncement on this subject that I have found in the courts.

A lower court judge, well known to many, Lord Denning, Master of the Rolls, held a different view. Bear in mind that this is a lower court and the judgment from which I hae just quoted overturned this judgment. It is the same case, and I can explain the facts if honourable senators wish, but I do not think they help very much. Lord Denning stated:

> As I have said in the course of the argument, suppose the court were satisfied that this private Act was improperly obtained, it might well be the duty of the court to report that finding to Parliament, so that Parliament itself could take cognisance of it. Parliament could put the matter right, if it thought fit, by passing another Act. In my opinion it is the function of the court to see that the procedure of Parliament itself is not abused and that undue advantage is not taken of it. In so doing the court is not trespassing on the jurisdiction of Parliament itself. It is acting in aid of Parliament, and, I might add, in aid of justice. If it is proved that Parliament was misled, the court can, and should, draw it to the attention of Parliament.

A judicial challenge to what happened in the Senate, assuming it is accepted that it is improper, would be an uphill fight. The best authority at this point would indicate that it would not succeed. However, there are some indications that it would. I do not think this is necessarily the law of Canada that I have quoted in the House of Lords' decision, but it may well be that a Canadian court would be sympathetic to Lord Denning's reasoning. In that case, it was a private bill. In our case, we are dealing with a public bill which is of great importance. I believe that a court might well be led to conclude that a public bill of the nature of Bill C-62 should be passed with the observance of all parliamentary rules.

Another argument that could be made is that the National Assembly Act of the Province of Quebec makes the position with respect to appealing something that has happened within Parliament to the courts a matter of law. In section 9 of the National Assembly Act it states:

> The rules of procedure of the Assembly are established by the Assembly, and it alone has authority to see that they are observed.

I know of no such prohibition in the law of Canada that would prevent an action from being taken. The fact that Quebec has seen fit to pass a law to prevent such an action from being taken makes it arguable that such an action could be taken.

The point of this is: Is there recourse to the judiciary? The judiciary and Parliament have properly stayed out of one another's domain, thus the sub judice rule. If there is no recourse, then I submit that that brings all the more to the fore the importance of the Speaker fulfilling his high office in a way that leaves no question as to his impartiality and as to the rightness of the decision that he makes. I do not believe that took place here in respect of Bill C-62.

The only other matter I wish to put on the record has to do with statements by some senators, and I will simply refer to a statement made by Senator Murray. I will try and be as accurate as I can, but I am not sure whether this statement was made in the chamber or on a news program. In any event, the gist of Senator Murray's statement was that the Senate does not represent the people, it represents itself or, put another way, senators do not represent the people, they represent themselves. It seemed that this was part of his thinking and the thinking of some others that, somehow or other, this had something to do with Bill C-62 and the opposition's attempts to delay its passage. I submit, as I did in the main part of my remarks, that the opposition could not prevent its passage because it would come to a vote and the majority would have carried the vote, and we know what the majority did. Somehow it had something to do with what the opposition were attempting to do by delaying its passage.

On behalf of myself, and I am sure I speak for other senators in opposition, these efforts were not made for any other reason than to represent a strong view on the part of the Canadian people, which we were carrying to the floor of the Senate, and doing everything that we could—for partisan and for other purposes—to try to make the government listen to what we thought the people of Canada were saying. That is a position I would like on the record.

For all those reasons, I intend to vote with Senator Stanbury on his motion of censure.

I see there are some senators who may have questions and I would be most pleased to deal with them.

Senator Molgat: Senator Hays, you referred to a section in the Quebec law specifying that there is no other recourse. Can you tell us when that section was passed and when it became part of the statutes?

• (1640)

Senator Hastings: I am sorry, Senator Molgat, I cannot. I can simply confirm that the National Assembly Act of the Province of Quebec so provides.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

THE HONOURABLE J. MICHAEL FORRESTALL

PROPERTY QUALIFICATIONS FOR MEMBERSHIP IN SENATE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten:
> That the question of Senator Forrestall's property qualification and the qualification, therefore, of Senators Ross, Lavoie-Roux, Berntson, Grimard, Johnson, Keon and Meighen be referred to the Committee appointed to consider the Orders and Customs of the Senate and Privileges of Parliament; and
> That, notwithstanding any other rule, provisional rule or order of the Senate, the Committee meet in this Chamber within the twenty-four hours following the adoption of this motion.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Forrestall.

Hon. John Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I have had some considerable time to review the comments of my friend Senator Frith. Briefly, before the end of this year, I want to put on the record a reiteration of the position that I hold with respect to this question raised in the press with respect to my qualifications from a property point of view to sit here in the Senate.

[Senator Hays.]

On October 24, I indicated to this chamber that I had sought expert legal advice, both prior and immediately after, my taking the affirmation. I did that both here in Ottawa and in Halifax. I indicated to the Senate at that time that I could assure honourable senators that, at the time I took my oath, I did meet the property qualifications which are required—indeed, demanded—by the Constitution.

Questions have been raised by Senator Frith about one piece of property which I hold along with my sisters and brother. As I have indicated, I remain satisfied, on the basis of the advice of expert counsel, that there is no doubt that that property alone meets the constitutional requirements, as I stated in the Senate on October 24. This opinion confirms the opinion as I understood Senator Frith to offer in his observations on that date. In essence, it seemed to me that he answered his own question. At that time he said:

> The specific question still remains—and I am sure it could be easily answered. Reading that information, any lawyer would ask: Does that mean that the property was given by will, a life interest to two persons with a gift over, a remainder gift, to Senator Forrestall and his relatives? If it were left at that, then on some interpretation that would mean that the title had vested.

Senator Frith quoted from the last will and testament as well, which extract is to be found at page 3265 of the Debates of the Senate for October 26, 1990. From this it is obvious that I needed only to survive the testator and not my parents to have a vested interest in this property.

I want honourable senators to know that, in fact, I hold other property in Nova Scotia which property indeed meets the requirements set forth in the Constitution. I held that property at the time of my summons to the Senate.

Honourable senators will understand that I am not required to make public disclosure, since they themselves are not required to make similar disclosures. Therefore, I have no intention of going any further with this matter now or in the future.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

DEBATE AND PROCESS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the debate and process concerning the Meech Lake Accord.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I will yield the floor to Senator Olson who wishes to say a few words.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to give you a short explanation. Since the Meech Lake Accord more or less died—or at least was accused of dying—on June 23 last, perhaps at this stage we could just rise to say that the inquiry has been debated and let it fall off the order paper. Unfortunately, an analysis of the position advanced within the last 10 to 14 days by the Prime Minister of Canada leads one to conclude that everyone else killed the Meech Lake Accord.

Since June 23, the Prime Minister and Senator Murray have taken every opportunity to explain that nothing they did contributed to the demise of the Accord. They point their fingers at everyone else but the government.

Senator Comeau: What about Mr. Trudeau?

Senator Olson: I have something in my hand which states that Mr. Mulroney has alleged that, among other things, the patriation of the Constitution in 1982 and the failure to ratify the Meech Lake Accord have led directly to the fracturing of the country along linguistic and regional lines. He then went on to blame this fracturing on the Liberal Party, particularly on our leader Jean Chrétien. This requires me to make a fairly long speech since there is a great deal to explain about all this. I really do not want to make a speech today, just before Christmas.

While I was prepared to say that we could drop it from the order paper, because of the attitude of the Prime Minister and Senator Murray I ask honourable senators that my inquiry remain on the order paper because I intend to make my speech as soon as we can get around to it. It is a somewhat critical speech about some people and I do not want to give it just before Christmas. Perhaps we could let the inquiry stand for now.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am content to have the inquiry stand in Senator Olson's name and not in my name. I have nothing to say about it.

On motion of Senator Olson, debate adjourned.

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON SYNFUELS PROJECT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition) rose, pursuant to notice of Monday, December 17, 1990:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources be empowered to examine and report upon the Synfuels Project.

He said: Honourable senators, this motion is not a complicated one. It seeks the empowerment of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources to examine and report upon the Synfuels Project.

I do not intend to go into the matter extensively, but I wish to make a few points that may support my suggestion that the committee examine this matter.

I should like to begin by referring to a response given this week by Senator Doody to a question raised in the Senate on November 20, 1990 by myself and the Honourable Finlay MacDonald regarding energy, and the cancellation of the Synfuels Project. The answer to the question does not add any new information except to reiterate once more that the decision not to grant the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit to the project sponsors was a decision taken at the ministerial level, and that the project had been examined over a period of time and failed to meet the test. That might be regarded as new information, but the answer does repeat information which we previously had and which has been disputed, certainly, by Mr. Gillespie and by others who are in favour of this project. The answer states:

> After extensive analysis by two separate Government Departments, it was concluded that the project as presented is fundamentally uneconomic. Even if the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credits were made available to this project, a similar amount of federal assistance would be required in order to financially strengthen the project to a level where private sector interests would also be attached to invest their own money in the venture.

That is a reiteration of information which we had had previously, and which, if one is to take into account the information provided by Mr. Gillespie, is misleading.

I should like to make a few comments to back that up. Before doing so, I should like to point out that the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit was proposed by the government as a result of the closure of the two heavy water plants in Cape Breton, one at Point Tupper and the other at Glace Bay. The closures, which were announced in the first budget of the Minister of Finance, removed from two communities these important sources of employment and income. I did not agree with the closures. I believe they were unjustified, but I will not go into that.

The government came forward with the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit, which was intended to provide incentives for entrepreneurs to replace the jobs that were lost. The fact of the matter is that in the intervening years no project of the magnitude required to replace these jobs in either of the communities has ever been launched or established or put in place. It appeared to me and many others that the Synfuels Project was a natural candidate for the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit.

It is suggested in the response that the assistance to be provided by the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit was inadequate in itself. That is the case. However, in the application Mr. Gillespie applied for assistance under another newly introduced program, namely, the Atlantic Enterprise Program. Under that program he sought assistance in the form of loan insurance and the regular interest rate subsidy which is provided under that program. So it was a package of assistance that was required.

The answers from the departments invariably failed to take into account those other parts of the package which, if they had been put in place, along with the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit, would have attracted the necessary private financing.

Another matter that is raised is that the project had not been able to secure private financing. I should like to read from a letter which Mr. Gillespie wrote to me in response to my inquiry to him about some of the answers that had been given in the House of Commons. He says:

> The main rationale for the negative decision on our application for federal assistance was that the project "would not be economically viable without substantially more federal support than is possible through the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit Program". To imply that we had said the project was viable with only Investment Tax Credit assistance is quite false. Our submission for the Investment Tax Credit approval in September 1989 was coupled with a request for assistance under the other federal incentive programs for Atlantic Canada, the much publicized Atlantic Enterprise Program.

Let us be clear that it was not only the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit, but it was also the other two programs or aspects of programs provided under the Atlantic Enterprise Program. Of course, that is a major clarification, and it leaves one then to contest the assertion that private financing was not available.

Mr. Gillespie assures me in this letter that the financial advisors had advised that they could put the financing together, provided that the financial markets and the outlook for oil prices remained reasonably stable on the down side and provided that they and their clients knew that the incentives were for real.

Wood Gundy was the financial advisor and told the Synfuels promoters that if the incentives and the government programs available in the Atlantic provinces were put in place, they could secure the private financing. That is the assertion on the other side. It was also said in the Senate by Senator Murray that it would be quite improper for the government to undertake tax liabilities for the Synfuels project. We all know that the tax liabilities would not become a reality unless the project itself were in operation and earning income so that, at a certain point, the government would lose a tax revenue which it would earn in the absence of the Cape Breton tax credit.

Honourable senators, I will not go into all the details, but Mr. Gillespie argues that, over the lifetime of the project if it were in operation, the total taxes paid over a 15-year period would be estimated to be $600 million and that the Cape Breton tax credit, if applied, would reduce that revenue to the government by $200 million, in parallel with the collection by the government of $400 million in taxes.

A suggestion is also made that the technology of the program is unsound, that its economics are unsound, and that we have had this ping-pong match between government bureaucrats and those who are supporting the Synfuels project. Because of the importance of the project to the economy, I think it is time to get some definitive answers and that those of us in the Senate who are interested in the project should hear from the minister and other government witnesses and from Petro-Canada which, at a certain point, had been directly involved in the establishment of the soundness of the technology. We should also hear from the promoters and their supporters. We can then decide whether it is a matter that should be dropped because it is a non-starter, or whether it is a project that requires further political will in order to bring it on stream.

We know that Senator Buchanan has been a strong promoter of this project. As premier of Nova Scotia, he was present with myself, when I was in government, when this project was in its infancy and when a press conference was held. He has followed the situation ever since. He believes in it firmly. I am quite sure Senator Macdonald, Senator Muir, Senator Graham and myself would all like to get to the bottom of this. I think last week there was a rally in Cape Breton in support of the Synfuels project. All I am asking is that the Senate be given an opportunity to do a fact-finding examination of the pros and cons and to bring those who are involved before the committee.

The suggestion that we look at this matter in committee was raised by myself some time ago. At that time Senator Macdonald said the suggestion to refer this matter to committee to obtain further information was an excellent one. Senator Murray himself said that he hoped there would be an opportunity to question, in detail, the responsible ministers and officials. He said that should be possible in one of the standing committees. Honourable senators, I do not think that will happen unless the Senate asks the committee to do it. My motion seeks the authority of the Senate to ask the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources to examine this project. I would hope that the Senate would give its approval so that the matter can be examined in early January.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we on this side have no difficulty with this matter if it is the wish of the Senate that the matter go to committee.

I would just remind honourable senators that a piece of government legislation will shortly be going to the same committee. I am referring to the Petro-Canada bill, and I would hope this study will not interfere with that bill being handled in committee as the committee sees fit. With that proviso, I see no problem.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we now come to the adjournment motion. I have tried to determine where we stand on that matter at the present time. Earlier, I suggested that we sit tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock rather than at 2 o'clock. We could then sit for perhaps three hours until around 12 o'clock. It was suggested by Senator Frith that he would prefer to sit for a while to determine when the adjournment motion would bring us back.

I have subsequently learned, through various channels, that there is a disposition of many senators to adjourn until January 14. During an earlier discussion with Senator Frith, he indicated that the work plan of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance involved that committee sitting to study the Estimates on January 7 and throughout that week. That committee would then plan on reporting the Estimates back to the Senate on January 14.

Honourable senators, the only problem, if there is one, with that scenario is that we would like to have an assurance that the bill could be dealt with and receive Royal Assent on January 15, because that seems to be the magic day on which various government departments will be in difficulty if the money is not forthcoming. We would like some undertaking that the bill will be dealt with and put through its final stages on January 15. If that can be done, then everyone would be pleased to go along with the suggestion that we adjourn tomorrow until January 14.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I can certainly put on the record, in as clear terms as possible, that there is no disposition on this side to delay the appropriation bill. Certainly, there is no disposition to filibuster it; there is no disposition to even delay it; but I cannot accept a closure by January 15. That is all I can say. We have no intention of doing anything other than to give the bill due and full attention, but no undue attention in the sense in which I have just used the term; that is, in terms of delay.

Honourable senators, having had some experience on that side ourselves, we know that the dates given by the departments can be somewhat elastic and that the sky does not fall if they do not get their bill on that date. However, we must take them seriously to the point that when they talk about January 15, they are not saying that February 15 would do just as well. We do understand that.

Subject to the fact that it is our intention to deal with the bill duly and without undue delay, we have no difficulty with the proposal. However, I cannot give an absolute undertaking that we accept an informal closure for that particular date, January 15. Certainly, we can foresee that the bill may have to have more study or more debate that week, but we have no intention of giving it anything but due attention, and with no undue delay.

• (1710)

Senator Doody: I appreciate what the honourable senator has said, and I think that that assurance should be satisfactory. I appreciate the fact that he does not want to accept a complete closure, a cut-off date, and I can understand that. I do take some comfort from the fact that the message from the Treasury Board officials this morning in the committee indicated that January 15 was their suggested date, and I do not think it meant that all government departments would be out of business on that date. It is certain, however, that a number of them that would be in bad shape by that time.

Therefore, with the understanding that we will work towards the target that Senator Frith and I have discussed, and with the certainty that, if the sky does fall, it will fall on me, I will undertake to move the adjournment motion tomorrow for January 14, and we will adjourn this afternoon until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the adjournment to tomorrow is moved, can the honourable deputy leader tell us what government orders will be called tomorrow morning? What will we have to deal with?

Senator Doody: Senator MacEachen's question raises hope in my mind that, somewhere along the line, there will come a day when government orders can be called. We will just start at the top of the Order Paper again and deal with those bills that need second reading, including the Petrocan bill, which will start second reading tomorrow. It would be our fervent hope that it can receive second reading tomorrow and be referred to a committee. It would certainly make life a great deal more pleasant for me if that bill were in committee before we adjourned for the Christmas break. However, we will determine that tomorrow.

As to all of the other bills awaiting second reading, we will try to deal with them tomorrow. If it happens that we do not manage to have all of them referred to committee, then so be it, but we should do our best to deal with the bills on the Order Paper.

Senator Olson: No more are coming from the Commons?

Senator Doody: The Commons have gone home.

Senator MacEachen: Will we be proceeding with the motion on the joint committee tomorrow?

Senator Doody: Yes. It is Senator Murray's intention to speak to that tomorrow. As the Speaker read today, the names of the House of Commons members have been announced and it is the hope of the government that the Senate would do its half of that project so that the committee can start its work in January.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just one more rag-tag end. If it develops, as it seems it will, that we will adjourn until January 14, then we know that, between the adjournment and January 14, at least one committee is expected to sit. So we know that the senators on the National Finance Committee should not salivate over the 14th, since they will be expected, I take it, to return for the 7th. In case they are anxiously wondering who are in that group for the 7th, as it stands now it will be Senators Berntson, Bolduc, Castonguay, Comeau, Simard, Bonnell, Cools, LeBlanc, Marsden, Sparrow, Stewart, Stollery and either Senator Doody or Murray, and either Frith or MacEachen.

We also know, because of discussions that took place today in National Finance, that Senator Marsden proposes to have her committee, Social Affairs, Science and Technology, meet on January 8. Let me just check on who has to be here for that committee, because then the rest of us can perhaps heave a sigh of relief and know we are all right until January 14. The senators who have to be here for January 8 would be Senators David, Lavoie-Roux, Marshall, Robertson, Spivak, Austin, Bonnell, Gigantès, Hébert, Kirby, Marsden and Thériault. You may notice that there are some overlaps there, so those two committees will have to work out their sitting times. Of course, I should not forget the additional Murray/Doody and MacEachen/Frith.

I rose to make that situation clear, but also to ask whether there are any other committees that will be sitting.

Senator MacEachen: Senator Fairbairn tells us that Legal and Constitutional Affairs will also be sitting.

Senator Frith: Should I read out the names of the senators involved in taht committee, too? They might as well be on the record. We have some duplication here again. Senators Beaudoin, Castonguay—who has been mentioned previously—Doyle, Hatfield, Nurgitz, Cools, Fairbairn, Haidasz, Hastings, Lewis, Neiman and Stanbury are on that committee.

Senator Doody: You might as well cover the senators on the Aboriginal Affairs Committee, too.

Senator Frith: That is why I am asking. I think I will stop there.

Senator Doody: I have not spoken to the chairman. I will leave that.

Senator Frith: I will stop there because my real purpose in rising was to say that, overnight, perhaps Senator Doody would consider what other committees he is counting on to meet during the period between January 7 and 14. Then we can find out which senators we can wish a "bon voyage" to until the 14th.

Senator Doody: I think that is a splendid idea. We will send these various committee chairmen and members a Christmas card with the date on it. In any event, we will look at that matter this evening for tomorrow morning. In the meantime, honourable senators, if nobody else wished to make a contribution, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Senator Frith: Until tomorrow at 9 o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 9 a.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable Senators, I would like to call the Senate's attention to Order No. 19. It is the consideration of the message from the House of Commons concerning the establishment of the Special Joint Committee. Senator Murray intends to speak to that matter this morning, and I would appreciate it if we could have et permission to bring it forward now as he has a cabinet meeting at 10 o'clock. It is important to proceed with this order, if possible.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON AMENDING FORMULAE—
DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 19:

On the Order:

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Message from the House of Commons concerning the establishment of a Special Joint Committee on the Process for amending the Constitution of Canada—(Senator Murray P.C.)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

THAT the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consult broadly with Canadians and inquire into and report upon the process for amending the Constitution of Canada, including, where appropriate, proposals for amending one or more of the amending formulae, with particular reference to:

(i) the role of the Canadian public in the process;

(ii) the effectiveness of the existing process and formulae for securing constitutional amendments; and

(iii alternatives to the current process and formulae, including those set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada";

[Translation]

That twelve Members of the House of Commons and five Members of the Senate be the Members of the Special Joint Committee, such Members on the part of the Senate to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion;

That the Committee have the power to appoint from among its Members such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee, or a sub-committee, have power to travel, and hold public hearings, within Canada;

[English]

That the Committee have the power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings or of proceedings of its sub-committees, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons;

That the parties represented on the Committee be granted allocations for expert assistance with the Committee work in proportion to the representation of the said parties in the House of Commons;

That the Committee be empowered to retain the service of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Joint Chairmen;

[Translation]

That the Committee submit its report not later than July 1, 1991, provided that, if the Senate is not then sitting, the report will be deemed submitted on the day such report is deposited with the Clerk of the House of Commons and with the Clerk of the Senate;

That changes in membership of the Committee for Members of the House of Commons be effective immediately after notification thereof, signed by the Member acting as Chief Whip of any recognized party, has been filed with the Clerk of the Committee;

That the quorum of the Committee be nine Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken so long as both Houses are represented, and the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six Members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

THAT the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consult broadly with Canadians and inquire into and report upon the process for amending the Constitution of Canada, including, where appropriate, proposals for amending one or more of the amending formulae, with particular reference to:

(i) the role of the Canadian public in the process;

(ii) the effectiveness of the existing process and formulae for securing constitutional amendments; and

(iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including those set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada";

That twelve Members of the House of Commons and five Members of the Senate be the Members of the Special Joint Committee, such Members on the part of the Senate to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion;

[Senator Murray.]

That the Committee have the power to appoint from among its Members such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee, or a sub-committee, have power to travel, and hold public hearings, within Canada;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings or of proceedings of its sub-committees, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons;

That the parties represented on the Committee be granted allocations for expert assistance with the Committee work in proportion to the representation of the said parties in the House of Commons;

That the Committee be empowered to retain the service of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Joint Chairmen;

That the Committee submit its report not later than July 1, 1991, provided that, if the Senate is not then sitting, the report will be deemed submitted on the day such report is deposited with the Clerk of the House of Commons and with the Clerk of the Senate;

That changes in membership of the Committee for Members of the House of Commons be effective immediately after notification thereof, signed by the Member acting as Chief whip of any recognized party, has been filed with the Clerk of the Committee;

That the quorum of the Committee be nine Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken so long as both Houses are represented, and the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six Members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Murray: With the permission of the honourable senators, I would like to present the discussion paper entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada", which was produced by the government to stimulate discussion on that matter of national interest.

[English]

Honourable senators, two distinct challenges face Canadians as we take up the opportunity to modernize our Constitution to bring Canada, united, into the 21st Century. One involves substance: what we must do. The other, process: how to go about doing it. These two challenges go hand in hand. There is no point trying to design a new, revitalized and more flexible Constitution if we do not have a way to achieve it.

[Translation]

It is clear to all Canadians—to those who favour radical reform and to those who would like to see less dramatic changes in our Constitution—that despite our differences, we all want constitutional change to take place in an orderly and civilized manner.

That is why this Committee's work will be so important.

[English]

The debate over the Meech Lake Accord produced a broad consensus that we need a better way of going about amending our Constitution. Canadians clearly want to be part of the process which produces constitutional change. The current formulae make no formal provision for public participation. Furthermore, certain legal technicalities of the 1982 amending formulae make it difficult to secure amendments.

[Translation]

Many Quebecers now feel it will be impossible to introduce the changes Quebec needs to safeguard its cultural and linguistic identity within the Canadian federalist system, because it takes 11 to conduct constitutional negotiations, and some changes require unanimity or allow for a three-year ratification period.

Furthermore, Quebec's political leaders refuse to return to this negotiating table.

For the sake of Quebecers who want to be part of a Canada where they feel welcome and truly secure, and for the sake of Canadians who want to have their say in constitutional change, we must find a better way to make the changes that we all agree are necessary.

● (0910)

[English]

As parliamentarians, we are part of the constitutional amendment process. If the process is not working, and it is not, we must consult with Canadians to find better ways to go about changing our Constitution and to work in concert to achieve this end.

Some have criticized the joint committee's mandate as too narrow. They say it must be broadened to include the full range of substantive constitutional issues before us—from the distribution of powers to the reform of institutions. As Prime Minister Mulroney has noted, such a discussion of substantive issues must and will occur, and Parliament will have a role to play in this. But the timing of efforts to secure a new, more flexible and modernized institution will be a critical factor in our success.

[Translation]

Although there is currently a broad consensus throughout the country on the fact that we must find a better, more effective way to change our Constitution, the same unanimity does not exist on the nature of these changes.

In fact, the debate on Meech Lake revealed some very profound differences regarding the substance of constitutional reform.

That is why we created the Citizens Forum, chaired by Mr. Keith Spicer, to identify the fundamental values and aspirations that should guide the process of constitutional reform.

[English]

As I have said many times in replying to questions from honourable senators about the Citizens' Forum, there is no way we can agree on structural, substantive constitutional reform proposals unless consensus can be built on some of the fundamental questions of our national existence. The special joint committee will provide us with recommendations based on broad consultations with Canadians on a better way to go about changing our Constitution and, in particular, of involving the public in the process.

The special joint committee and the Citizens' Forum are complementary. They will both allow Canadians to contribute to Canada's future constitutional development, and both will report on July 1.

The government will be monitoring what Canadians have to say in their presentations to the Citizens' Forum and to the special joint committee. We will also be monitoring, and are monitoring, the various provincial constitutional commissions. We will do everything necessary to ensure we are prepared to take a leading role in discussions on substantive constitutional reform when they begin.

Another criticism that has been levelled at the proposed parliamentary committee is that it will be one more in the array of federal and provincial constitutional commissions and committees now launched, and so will merely add to the confusion of Canadians. While the confusion is understandable, we cannot avoid the fact that two issues face us, one involving our shared values and the other the process we employ to change our Constitution. Both must be addressed in a national context, and not just in various provincial commissions.

Parliamentarians can play an essential role by discussing with Canadians the issues we face and by encouraging Canadians to participate in the important national debate that lies ahead of us. The questions before us are not necessarily new. Many of them go back to the time of Confederation, and have been constant themes throughout Canada's history.

[Translation]

These fundamental questions include the following:

> Can Quebec, as the only province with a French-speaking majority, find sufficient guarantees for its cultural and linguistic identity within the Canadian federal system?
> What changes could be made to alleviate the feelings of alienation of the western provinces?

How can the promises made to aboriginal people over the years be translated into concrete measures?

The debate also touches on other aspects, such as how to respond to the needs of less populated regions and linguistic minorities.

Although some of these questions are not new, it is clear that a response to those questions will have to break new ground.

[English]

When the Prime Minister announced the creation of the Citizens' Forum on November 1, he said that he was prepared to consider both far-reaching and unprecedented reforms to our system of government, and institutions to ensure an economically and fiscally sound Canada with a modern Constitution supported by all Canadians and adapted to today's realities. He elaborated on that theme in quite a well-reported speech given at Buckingham last weekend.

On December 2, the finance minister said that it is essential that the legitimate and reasonable aspirations of Canadians never again be held hostage to an inadequate and inflexible procedure. That is why the work of this committee will be so important.

[Translation]

We must convince Canadians that it is possible to make changes and at the same time maintain the unity of Canada.

We cannot throw in the towel and give free rein to those who would dismantle the country and reject our history and common traditions simply because we are unable to find a better way to amend our Constitution.

With a view to initiating public debate on a better process and on the quest for fresh and innovative solutions, the government released the discussion paper to which I alluded a moment earlier.

It outlines the historical background to an amendment process endorsed by all Canadians, and provides a detailed summary of of the formulas that were brought forth in 1982.

As well it features a review of attempts made over the past eight years to amend the Constitution and an analysis of ensuing problems.

Finally, against this backdrop, there is a rundown of certain reform formulas.

[English]

This document which I tabled a few minutes ago amending the Constitution of Canada is a discussion paper, not a statement of policy. It has been published solely to stimulate creative and productive debate on the constitutional amendment process. It does not commit the government to any particular course or limit the range of options the government is prepared to consider. The paper examines some of the key issues surrounding our amending process which surfaced during the Meech Lake debate. In particular, it looks at the issues of public participation in the amending process and the efficacy of the various formulae in securing amendments. It then examines options for reforming the various formulae and ways to go about doing this by intergovernmental agreement or by formal amendment by replacing existing provisions or by merely supplementing them.

The paper examines, for example, the referendum and constituent assembly models as options for ensuring meaningful public participation in the reform process.

[Translation]

Following this introduction, the document examines the implications of these various options including:

Who would decide the question to be answered in a referendum?

Would a simple majority representing 51 per cent of the votes be enough, or would a weighted majority be required to protect regional interests?

Who would choose the delegates to a constituent assembly, and again, how would a majority be made up in such an assembly?

[English]

The paper does not purport to exhaust the catalogue of possible ways to go about changing our Constitution. It is quite possible that the ideas set out in the paper may give rise to others, and that Canadians may ultimately develop a consensus on a process that is not discussed in the paper. If so, the paper will have served its purpose.

As the Prime Minister said last August, "Canadians in general want a more open, more transparent and broader process for amending the Constitution. We absolutely must avoid a recurrence of what happened last June, when the Constitution we wanted fell victim to the Constitution we have." Honourable senators, it is critical that Canadians understand the relevance of the work of this parliamentary committee on the amending process, its relevance to current events in Quebec and to Canada's future.

• (0920)

For over 50 years, governments sought unanimous agreement on an amending formula that would combine elements of flexibility and protection. Unanimous agreement constantly eluded first ministers. Finally, in 1981, first ministers agreed to act without unanimous consent, more specifically without the consent of Quebec.

Hon. H. A. Olson: That just is not true. Of course, go ahead, play it out. Do not try to kid us.

Senator Murray: It is a fact. The honourable senator is interrupting.

Senator Olson: I was at the meeting.

Senator Murray: Let us examine what I said. I said that, in 1981, first ministers agreed to act without unanimous consent, more specifically—

Senator Olson: It is the "more specifically" that is wrong.

Senator Murray: —without the consent of Quebec. I said, ". . . more specifically without the consent of Quebec . . ."

Senator Olson: Quebec decided that.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, ten first ministers decided to act without the consent of Quebec. That is a historical fact.

Senator Olson: I know what you are trying to do, and you will not get away with it.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator's interruption today is of a piece with his intervention the other day on the question of the federal sales tax and, later today, I will be confirming the correction I made then.

Senator Olson: You are not kidding anybody with the federal sales tax, either. Do not try to kid me. I wasn't born yesterday.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is wrong on that point, and I am going to prove him wrong again today.

Senator Olson: Talk about political propaganda. That is all we get.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, let me take up the narrative I was placing on the record. For over 50 years governments sought unanimous agreement on an amending formula that would combine elements of flexibility and protection.

Senator Olson: That is garbage.

Senator Murray: Unanimous agreement constantly eluded first ministers. Finally, in 1981, first ministers agreed to act without unanimous consent, more specifically, without the consent of Quebec.

Senator Olson: We asked for unanimous consent. We did not get it.

Senator Murray: Failing it, they decided to act without it. And the Supreme Court later upheld that unanimous provincial consent was not required, and that Quebec did not have a veto in law or in practice.

But the Constitution Act, 1982—achieved without unanimous consent—requires unanimity to change certain parts of the Constitution, including the amending formula itself. So we now have an anomaly. Quebec could not veto the agreement to bring the patriation debate to an end, but each and every province could exercise a constitutional veto over the Meech Lake Accord under the terms of the Constitution Act, 1982.

More important, those who now argue the cause of a revitalized, restructured federalism in Quebec are taunted with our very recent history which demonstrates that Quebec's aspirations, while supported by a majority of the provinces, can be scuppered by the governments of one or two provinces representing less than 7 per cent of the population.

Quebec federalists are challenged to show that the future holds out any better prospect. They and we must respond to that challenge. That is the purpose of the joint committee as proposed in my motion this morning.

Yet, we all know that to change the unanimity requirement would require unanimous consent, so we are faced with a seemingly vicious circle and constitutional gridlock is the apparent result. However, we cannot let the constitutional amending process we have inherited threaten the continuance of the country.

[Translation]

We cannot afford to lose Canada because we are unable to address the problems that threaten its existence.

[English]

Senator Frith: I am sorry, senator, could you just reread the sentence with the word "inherited" in it?

Senator Murray: We cannot let the constitutional amending process we have inherited threaten the continuance of the country.

[Translation]

It is important to note that the mandate of the parliamentary committee does not prevent it in any way from examining alternatives to the existing formulas or new ways to amend them.

Extraordinary circumstances call for extraordinary solutions. Canadians have already demonstrated that they could be very creative when they built this country contrary to all expectations.

Honourable senators, let us accept that invitation to join our colleagues from the House of Commons in trying to find better and innovative ways so that our constitutional amending process serve the interests of Canadians by making Canada a united and revitalized country as we move into the 21st century.

[English]

Honourable senators, in conclusion, I wish to confirm, with great pleasure, the statement made by the Prime Minister the other day to the effect that, when this motion passes and when the committee meets, Conservative senators and Members of Parliament on that committee will be proposing as joint chairmen the names of our distinguished colleague, Senator Gérald Beaudoin and Mr. James Edwards, M.P., from the House of Commons.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as the Leader of the Government has told us, we have before us a message from the other place inviting us to join in a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, asking that we inquire and report upon the process of amending the Constitution of Canada. That is not a routine matter. It is not an ordinary committee of inquiry. We are dealing with the most fundamental document in our care, the Canadian Constitution, and that is why we should treat the message with all the seriousness it deserves. Although, as we know, there is little time left to us today or later in this year to deal with the matter, it should not go, along with the last leaf of our 1990 calendar, without at least some consideration.

Let us be candid about it. The message from the other place is not coming to us as the crowning of a success story. On the contrary, it is born out of a tragic constitutional failure, one that will live down in our history as a moment of frustration, anger and anguish so great as to threaten the unity of our country. That was not the intention of those who conceived, negotiated and concluded the Meech Lake agreement, but they failed because of the short-sightedness of their own management. With all their good intentions, they brought upon Canada our current constitutional debacle.

For those who are familiar with the Atlantic shores, the tragedy of the foundering ship has the same recurring features. The captain of our constitutional ship, the Prime Minister himself, is awash in the flotsam. But do not fear for him; he will not join the Meech Lake Accord, now serenely lying on the bottom. He will take good care of himself. His greatest strength in that respect will be his short memory. For example, he will no doubt forget that, as he put it, he found it unacceptable that some provinces should have a veto and others not, a defect which, in his view, would be corrected by the Meech Lake Accord. The Prime Minister stuck to the rule of unanimity. Why should the government want to have the amending process revisited?

• (0930)

Honourable senators on both sides of the house will remember the debate on the Meech Lake Accord in which I participated on April 18, 1988. We on this side welcomed the objectives inherent in the Meech Lake Accord of achieving Quebec's assent to the Constitution. If I may be permitted to read one paragraph of that statement of April 18, 1988, it reads as follows:

> All along, we, on this side, have fully supported the objective of achieving Quebec's assent to the Constitution. Quebec is now willing to accept it and anxious again to take its full part in the constitutional process. We welcome this move, because it is of great significance to our future.

I went on at considerable length at that time to explain why we on this side thought that the Meech Lake Accord had some dangerous weaknesses. I concluded by saying, "We do not intend to strike down the accord. We are not proposing to vote against it; we are suggesting ways of improving it in order to benefit all Canadians."

We warned at that time, for example, that a disturbing situation was developing in New Brunswick. We also warned that the new law affecting the rights of the French-speaking minority in the province of Saskatchewan was sending political shock waves through Canada. We had a clear judgment on the Meech Lake Accord, with our paramount objectives being Quebec's assent to the Constitution. The Meech Lake Accord, which was the instrument for achieving that objective, had to be given every chance of success.

We looked for weaknesses for the purposes of correcting them, thereby enhancing the accord's chances of successfully completing the ratification process. We introduced several amendments to that end, and in so doing we fully reflected the position of the Liberal Party.

I should remind honourable senators that a special committee of the Senate travelled throughout the north and held extensive hearings and brought back a report containing the concerns and outlining the aspirations of the northern people. That report contained certain amendments in order to reflect more fully the northern people's place in the Canadian nation.

It will also be remembered that even though the proposed amendments were turned down by the government, the Meech Lake Accord cleared this house, in which the Liberal Party had a clear majority. The Meech Lake Accord also passed through the other place in similar circumstances with the support of the Liberal Party because our overriding preoccupation was Quebec's assent to the Constitution. In fact, notwithstanding the attitude of the government, which rejected every single amendment proposed by the Official Opposition in the Senate and in the House of Commons, the members of the Liberal Opposition still voted for the Meech Lake Accord unamended, even though it caused considerable strain within the ranks of the party itself, which had never reconciled itself to some of the provisions of the accord. The Leader of the Liberal Party at that time, Mr. Turner, staked his political future on that, because he stood 100 per cent behind the unamended Meech Lake Accord.

However, there was one point over which we strongly disagreed with the government, and particularly with one of the leading authors of the accord, the government leader in this house. We were told that the accord was a seamless web; it could not be touched or changed in any respect. It was the epitome of so much negotiating skill that nothing could surpass it. I do not believe that this rigid view of the accord can only be explained by the pride of authorship. The "seamless web" view, theory or stance was part of the negotiation process itself. It was a means of putting pressure on the process of ratification, which is the opposite of what we regarded as the proper way of managing a delicate constitutional change.

We were concerned, and said so, at the secrecy which surrounded the negotiations leading up to the accord. We saw danger in the obvious government failure to build a large consensus in Canada through a process of public consultation and discussion. Indeed, certain premiers themselves recognized that the majority of the people of Canada were opposed to the Meech Lake Accord; but, nevertheless, having become aware of that fact, they made no move to change their position and to seek some way of enlarging the consensus by making some changes to that accord. Then, of course, we had the seamless web. Canadians were allowed to marvel at the beauty of the fabric but not permitted to touch it, which was, as was to be expected, an exercise in frustration.

We were also concerned at the rigidity of the position of the government—not only the government of Canada, but other governments as well. We believe that progress in our federation is made up of give and take; a patient process of conciliation born out of the recognition of mutual interests. This process was ruled out by the refusal to entertain any viewpoint beyond its own, as recorded in the Meech Lake Accord.

We know, as the clouds gathered over Meech Lake, that the government had another round at searching for the guilty. Who else could it be but Jean Chrétien, who had just announced his candidacy for the leadership of the Liberal Party. There was no doubt in the government's mind—and it was clearly stated—that he must be plotting with Frank McKenna, Sharon Carstairs and Clyde Wells to undo the Meech Lake Accord. I respect personal opinion, even narrow, partisan opinion, but there must be some room for the truth. The truth of the matter is that, wherever he went, Mr. Chrétien expressed support for the five conditions formulated by Quebec for assenting to the Constitution, including the most delicate condition relating to a veto. The truth is that Mr. Chrètien pointed out the same flaws in the Meech Lake Accord that the Liberal Party in this house and in the House of Commons had attempted to remedy. He was convinced that the seamless web was bound for the dustbin of history unless it was submitted to the process of conciliation and negotiation. However untouchable in its perfection, the Meech Lake Accord was worthless if its rejection aborted Quebec's return to the Constitution.

The calling of the Charest Committee was evidence that at long last the government recognized the validity of those views and the need to improve and enlarge the seamless web. The creation of the Charest Committee had no other purpose, or gave no other signal, but that at that point there had been a realization that changes should be put in place or acknowledged. Of course, the Charest Committee did its investigation and a consensus developed within the committee as to what might be considered. The committee's conclusions were general, but it highlighted for first ministers those areas that were sensitive and required further attention.

The Charest Committee report was fully discussed in our national caucus; and, after long discussions, it was accepted. I held the personal view that the report of the committee ought to be put before the House of Commons and the Senate for adoption because it represented a consensus that had never been reached among the parties to that point.

That was certainly a ray of hope shining through the clouds; however, that was the time chosen by the Prime Minister's most trusted friend and colleague, his closest advisor on Quebec, to leave the cabinet; and in my opinion the Charest report never got off the ground because of that political development in the resignation of Mr. Bouchard.

But the Prime Minister remained extremely confident that his negotiating skills would bring success where his cabinet colleagues had failed him. He ignored the warnings from the Manitoba premier that a good deal of time would be required to clear the Meech Lake Accord through his legislature. He trusted his persuasive skills to win over Newfoundland while snubbing the premier of the province. He felt he had the strength to stand up to the pressure of brinkmanship and to drive all the premiers to the edge, but not over it. He knew how to do it. He would roll the dice. And he did, but the Meech Lake Accord, like a castle of cards, crashed over the brink. "God knows I tried", cried the Prime Minister, but he did not improve his credit by attempting to shift the responsibility, or hang the albatross around other people's necks.

A seamless web, a political desertion, a rolling of the dice—that is how the Prime Minister put at risk and managed the country's future. That albatross should stay around his neck because that is where it belongs.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: So much for the irretrievable past. In this time of crisis we must marshall this country's resources to give it the chance to remain united. We must not underestimate the gravity of this situation nor the weakness of the Federal Government, which should be the first and foremost to fight for Canada.

The initiative is now in the hands of Quebec, which is still emotionally shocked by the Meech Lake tragedy. It is in the hands of the other provinces, which, each in its own way, are s organizing to come to grips with fundamental issues of national unity or disunity. The commission on the political and constitutional future of Quebec, set up by the government of Quebec, has been holding hearings for several weeks. It is already clear that a consensus is emerging in favour of significant change in how we manage our country. The Quebec government has also made it clear that the future of Quebec should be decided by the people of Quebec.

It is to be deplored that the Government of Canada has not thought it fit to be represented on the Belanger-Campeau Commission by a person of stature; a distinguished and nationally respected Canadian who is able to speak authoritatively on o matters of concern to the commission. The removal and replacement in mid-stream of the Conservative representative, for whatever reason, will not help. Neither will the refusal of the Prime Minister to appear before this commission or to send one of his senior colleagues. Either the government does not perceive the importance of what is going on in Quebec—and I refuse to believe that—or it is ignoring it or is so insecure that it is unable to contemplate putting itself in such a risky situation as appearing before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission.

• (0950)

My colleagues will be aware that recently the Leader of the Opposition appeared before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission. He spoke up for Canada and for the kind of change which our country must go through in order to meet the challenges of the 1990s.

The message before us invites us to participate in a committee on the process of amending the Constitution. It is a joint committee made up of 12 members of the House of Commons and five senators. I notice that, in 1981, the joint committee was made up of 15 House of Commons members and ten senators. In the meantime, the Senate has increased, but is certainly losing ground proportionately in the process of representation in Constitution making.

This proposal for a joint committee comes in the wake of the Citizens' Forum, for which Mr. Spicer is endeavouring to generate some attention. Both moves come as a belated recognition by the government that Canadians have something to say in the process of constitutional change, and that the constitutional amendment formulae, including that of unanimity promoted by the Prime Minister, leaves something to be desired. Those were points we made at the appropriate time during the Meech Lake debate. They were good and timely points then; they remain valid today.

We on this side regret that the government has adopted a fragmented and narrow-gauged approach to the re-examination of constitutional issues which include possible transfer of powers and responsibilities, as is well illustrated in the current Quebec debate. We nonetheless intend to extend our cooperation and to work for the success of the amending process review. It seems to us, however, that there is room for clarifying certain issues in the terms of reference of the committee, particularly the Quebec veto. For that reason, we want to make an amendment which we hope will give recognition to Quebec's concerns, and particularly its interest in acquiring the right of veto.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting the fourth paragraph thereof and substituting the following therefor:
> iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including an amending formula based on regional representation, as proposed in the 1971 Victoria Charter; and a formula based on seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population, with a clause added stipulating that Quebec must be one of the seven provinces; and the alternatives set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada".

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, until 9:05 this morning, I was unaware that time was to be sought to move on this motion today, so I have had to scramble around quite a bit to get ready for what is about to happen. I am speaking now on the amendment. I will have to wait until that is moved and dealt with, but I intend to move another amendment and I want to explain why.

The government seems determined to constantly try to rewrite history. I am not in favour of that. Because of all the sensitivities that the constitutional problems have created in this country, I am not going to sit back and let that happen.

I have another motion or an inquiry that deals with the failure of Meech Lake. however, that is not urgent the day before the Christmas recess and we will address that matter on another day.

Honourable senators, if you look at the motion moved by Honourable Senator Murray, you will note that there are 12 members of the House of Commons and five members of the Senate. This is a complete reversal since it used to be that more than one-third of the members of a committee would be from the Senate. For this committee it has changed to 12 to 5. The last time it was 15 to 10, in spite of the fact that there are now 112 senators, minus one or two, vis-à-vis approximately 95 the last time.

What is more important is that, from the performance of the government and its so-called discipline over the past few years, I suppose there will be eight or nine members of the Conservative party of the 12 members from the House of Commons called for in this motion. If that is the case, there will be no independent thought at all, and that disturbs me. If those members do express any independence of thought, apart from what comes down from on high, they will be kicked out like Mr. Kindy and Mr. Kilgour. We have to try to do something to remedy that situation so that this committee, if it is to have any validity at all, will at least have some balance.

• (1010)

I have already said that I will not go into this matter very far today. However, the process is flawed. One of the main reasons it is flawed is because of the comments the Prime Minister made when he launched this idea. In effect, he is trying again to rewrite history. He has never stopped trying to create photo opportunities and that type of thing. Surely, he has learned that this is no way to try to amend the Constitution of Canada.

There are people in my part of the country who are disappointed with what has been going on. They want to see to it that it does not happen again.

Without further ado, but in the hope that it will put some balance at least in the activities of the committee, I want to indicate now that I entend to move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hays, that the motion be amended by adding the following words before the last paragraph:

> That any senator may attend and participate in any meeting, but may not vote unless he or she is a member of the committee.

I understand that there is already an amendment before the house and, of course, my motion is not an amendment to that amendment. Therefore, I suppose that we will have to wait until the amendment moved by Senator MacEachen is dealt with before I can formally move my motion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I propose to adjourn the debate. However, before I do so, I would like to say this. As we all know, the House of Commons has adjourned until February 18 and will therefore not be available to receive any message which we send it. Its order for adjournment provides that it can be recalled for special circumstances, and also for the sole purpose of Royal Assent.

Before I move to adjourn the debate, I wish first to thank my colleague and leader, Senator MacEachen, for so articulately and succinctly pulling together the events that led to this situation, particularly—

Senator Murray: A bit of historical revisionism.

Senator Frith: —in the framework of Meech Lake. Rather than being involved in what Senator Murray has just called historical revisionism, as Senator MacEachen said in his speech there is the need to leave some room for truth in all the revisionism that has been visited upon us by the Prime Minister. That truch is precisely what the honourable senator outlined for us and for posterity.

The other point I wish to make is a technical one. Because I will be adjourning the debate, rather than having the need to propose an amendment, the government and the Senate generally will be given the opportunity to examine the suggestion I have,one which I think will meet with unanimous support. I hope that it is just a technical oversight.

On page 2 in the sixth paragraph, changes in the membership of the committee are dealt with.

Senator Murray: I noted that as I was reading it.

Senator Frith: Rather than getting into a lot of rewording of the motion the easiest way to handle this is simply to take out the words "for members of the House of Commons". We have our own system for making changes to committee membership, as I am sure does the House of Commons. Our rule 66(4) covers that procedure for us.

Senator Doody: I think they need a joint reference to be able to make a change. They have a different system for changing membership than we do.

Senator Frith: I am not suggesting that we take that pargraph out. I am suggesting that we take out the words "for members of the House of Commons" and that it would then read: "That changes in membership of the Committee be effective immediately after notification thereof, signed by the Member acting as Chief Whip of any recognized party, has been filed with the Clerk of the Committee". That would solve the matter for them, as well as for us.

With those comments, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I would like to add a comment to the discussion of Senator Olson's proposed amendment before the debate is adjourned. He named me as his seconder. I have not had much chance to discuss the amendment with him, nor even to look at it carefully. However, I would like to add to what he said.

One reason for providing for any senator, or, perhaps if it is useful, some limited number of senators, to attend and participate in the meetings is that it would allow independent senators an opportunity to participate. As I understand it, they would not be part of the committee. There would be just government senators and official opposition senators. We have independent senators such as Senators Everett, Lawson, Pitfield, Waters and others who may well be interested in participating in the process. An amendment to that effect, or some variation of it, would be useful to give them that opportunity. It may well be that because of physical problems we cannot have an open end on the number of non-voting senators who might be allowed to participate, but I think it is a good idea that they have that opportunity.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition with 400 names. I am going to read the whereas because they deal with a particular point of the GST legislation.

[English]

> WHEREAS the Government of Canada has seen fit, since Confederation and without hiatus, to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books and newspapers and, now proposes to include them in the GST
>
> WHEREAS uninhibited dissemination of the printed word as a cornerstone of democracy, culture, education, and a literate and productive society will be negatively affected by the GST application
> Wherefore the undersigned, your Petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in tax free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.
>
> AND as in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray.

[Translation]

This petition was signed by 400 British Columbia residents.

I have here a petition signed by 245 Manitoba residents who complain about the same negative impact of the legislation.

I have also a petition with 68 names of Saskatchewan residents.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: What is the date on this petition, Senator Hébert?

Senator Hébert: I am going to tell you that, Senator Tremblay. The petition is dated September 12, 1990; at the time, it was still a bill.

From Ontario, I have a series of 2,202 names. I wish simply indicate to you where they are from: Noëlville, Ontario, 14 residents; New Liskeard, Ontario, 66 residents; Haileybury area, Ontario, 66 residents; Elk Lake area, Ontario, 89 residents; Sault Ste-Marie, Ontario, 78 residents; Thorne area, Ontario, 44 residents; Kapuskasing, Ontario, 42 residents; Toronto, 194 residents; Campbridge, 7 residents; Wahnapitae area, 88 residents; Hammer area, 131 residents; Azilda area, 186 residents; Lefebvre, 19 residents; Windsor, Ontario, 47 residents; London, Ontario, 524 residents; Ottawa, 50 residents; Windsor, Ontario, 250 residents; Kirkland Lake, Ontario, 33 residents; Lansdowne, Ontario, 132 residents; and Port Colbourne, Ontario, 110 residents.

Finally, I have the names of 127 New Brunswick residents who opposed what was in the bill. The petition is dated December 4, 1990. I am saying that for the benefit of Senator Arthur Tremblay who always wishes to know the date of the petitions. The last one from New Brunswick is dated December 4, 1990. Thank you, Honourable Senators.

• (1010)

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I too would like to table petitions from all across the country, which were sent to us protesting the goods and services tax.

I have here 416 names from various areas in British Columbia. I have 1,136 names from various places in Saskatchewan. Also from Saskatchewan, I have 2,582 names. I have 2,516 names from various communities in Ontario and another 1,371 names from communities in Manitoba, Alberta, New Brunswick, Quebec, British Columbia, Ontario and Nova Scotia.

Hon. Daniel Hays: Honourable senators, I have a number of petitions that I would like to table. They are all in a common form. One petition says that the petitioners humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. The other petition is in the same form with a longer preamble, but it is to the same effect. It is a petition to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. Approximately 85 per cent of the petitions are from Nova Scotia and 15 per cent are from Alberta. The total number of names is 3,989.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I missed one group of petitions that I have from my own province. There are approximately 400 names from the Province of Alberta.

THE OTTAWA SENATORS

NEW NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE FRANCHISE—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I give notice that when the Senate resumes sitting early next year, I will call the attention of the Senate to one particular aspect of a piece of news that was otherwise most welcome.

Like all parliamentarians, I am delighted that the city of Ottawa was granted a National Hockey League franchise.

However, I was sorry to see that promoters and supporters—I know because I have already agreed to buy a season ticket—did not feel it was necessary to give the team a French name or at least a bilingual name.

I agree that many years ago, the Senators were called just that. Times have changed, however. This was well before the Official Languages Act was passed. It was well before our National capital adopted its new mandate. In fact, I am surprised that Mayor Durrell did not register some surprise when he accepted his new job.

Like many of my fellow citizens, I look forward to giving my enthusiastic support to the Senators, on their way to the Stanley Cup.

[Senator Hébert.]

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a), I move, seconded by Senator Atkins:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to sit at 3:30 o'clock in the afternoon of Monday, 14th January, 1991, even though the Senate may then be sitting and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the mover of the motion and chairman of the committee if he had discussed this matter with the deputy chairman, Senator Davey, or anyone else on this side?

Senator MacDonald: Yes, Senator Frith. I have discussed this matter with most members of the steering committee. Indeed, it was Senator Davey's wish that the committee start its hearings on that date because he would not be available before then.

Senator Stewart indicated that he had no objections to that date. The purpose of the motion is to have some degree of certainty to offer to busy and important witnesses.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I raise this question because no one had spoken to me about it. I am quite satisfied to grant leave, knowing that it has been discussed. It was not meant as a reproach.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, it is true that Senator MacDonald spoke with me about that date. However, I do not recall any discussion about the committee meeting while the Senate itself was sitting. This is not a point on which I take a McElman position; yet I do think we ought to remember that it is probable that the business before the Senate that afternoon will be the supply bill. It is likely that some of us may want to be in the chamber for the debate on that legislation.

Broadcasting is not one of my specialties. I am on the committee because of transportation. I do not want to be an obstacle, but I do not want the record to suggest that I agreed that the committee should meet at that particular hour. However, I have no objection if other members of the committee go ahead.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Stewart what he meant when he spoke of the "McElman position".

• (1020)

Senator Stewart: I thought we all understood that. I will get the page reference where Senator McElman shot me down when I sought permission for the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs to meet at an hour when the Senate might be sitting.

Senator Doody: The wound still hurts.

Senator Corbin: I will be seeing Senator McElman during the recess and I will apprize him of your views and concerns, Senator Stewart. I am sure he will be delighted to hear that his spirit still reigns in this place.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday, January 14, 1991 at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

AGRICULTURE

WITHDRAWAL OF FORD MOTOR COMPANY FROM FARM EQUIPMENT PRODUCTION—AVAILABILITY OF PARTS AND SERVICE

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I intended to pass on Question Period today, but I must comment on the fact that two significant events took place overnight.

Senator Kelly: Oh, oh.

Senator Olson: Senator Kelly groans, but I want him to know that the government should have notice of these two significant events. I note that Senator Murray did have to attend a cabinet meeting 26 minutes ago, but I hope the Deputy Leader will take this information to him so that by the time we next meet we could be told what the effect of these events will be on Canadians who have a profound interest in what is happening.

The first significant event is that, yesterday, the Ford Motor Company announced that it was quitting the farm equipment business. It stated that it was merging its farm equipment units with the Fiat Company, then selling its stake to Fiat and getting out of the business. The reason I must give notice of this is that thousands of farmers across Canada own Ford Motor farm equipment as well as the equipment of subsidiaries like the Versatile Company in Winnipeg, which the Ford Motor Company bought only a few months ago. I would like to know what the government intends to do to enforce the rule that these companies are obliged to supply parts for 20 years after they cease making certain equipment.

The other significant matter is that, yesterday, the European Community announced that it plans an overhaul of the farming atmosphere next year. I have a statement here that says the European Community plans an overhaul of farming next year that could improve the atmosphere that stalled world trade talks. Honourable senators, this is fairly important because there was complete despair in the grain sector of western Canada when the GATT negotiations in Brussels collapsed about ten days ago. The announcement made by the officials of the EC yesterday indicates that, for example, beef has become a major problem for the EC. Stocks jumped to 625,000 tonnes in November. In November of last year the stocks were about 25 per cent of that, namely, 135 tonnes. Stocks of butter have boomed to 232,000 tonnes from 24,000 tonnes a year ago; and there is a mountain of milk powder at 337,000 tonnes from 5,000 tonnes a year ago.

All of this, of course, has a profound effect on the international crisis that Canadian farmers have to face day by day. To date there has not been sufficient action, in my opinion, by the government to defend our farming community against the kind of production that is resulting from the subsidies that are being paid in Europe.

I, therefore, hope that the Deputy Leader of the Government will take notice of these questions and try to provide us with some reasonably responsible and effective way of dealing with this matter when we meet next.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will try to obtain the information for the senator.

FISHERIES

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY—OVERFISHING OFFSHORE NOVA SCOTIA AND NEWFOUNDLAND—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I had a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am of the opinion that, when the Senate is sitting, a cabinet minister should be present. It certainly would not happen in the other place that the government would not be represented. We have only one minister who is in a position to deal with our questions. It seems to me that, when the Senate is sitting, the government ought to be represented in this chamber by a minister.

I am sure that Senator Doody will immediately see the importance of my question. It relates to the intention of the European Community to fish, in the forthcoming year, in the waters off Nova Scotia and Newfoundland to an extent which shows no concern for the present or future viability of the fishing stocks.

Honourable senators, I want to know what the Government of Canada is doing to bring the European Community to its senses with regard to this very important matter. As we all know, these fishing stocks are in bad shape. Is this international madness to continue? What is the government doing to try to bring some sense into the heads of these Europeans?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will attempt to get a statement from the minister responsible, but I should also like to put on the record the fact that, in my opinion, Senator Murray's presence here during Question Period has been pretty consistent. He may have missed two, three or four Question Periods during the past session which, I think, is quite remarkable. The situation in the other place, of course, is quite different because there are many ministers there. In this chamber, however, Senator Murray has to do the whole chore by himself.

Senator Olson: We should have a few more ministers.

Senator Doody: I will volunteer.

Senator Stewart: That is why it is desirable that arrangements be made immediately for additional ministerial representation in this house. Senator Doody is my nominee.

Senator Frith: We would not vote against that.

Senator Doody: I know I am in trouble now.

Senator Frith: I think we have just administered the kiss of death.

Senator Doody: I will be over there shortly.

• (1030)

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a number of delayed answers, 16 in fact, which brings me down to 12 outstanding for this year out of a total of 127.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You can't expect us to applaud if even your colleagues don't applaud.

Senator Doody: They don't applaud because they are not impressed.

Senator Simard: Order!

Senator Doody: I ask that these delayed answers be printed as part of today's proceedings.

COPYRIGHT ACT

IMPLEMENTATION OF SECOND PHASE—EDUCATION EXEMPTIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 6, 1990, by the Honourable Lorna Marsden, regarding Copyright Act—Implementation of Second Phase—Education Exemptions—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

As the Senator knows, the Department of Communications established a consultative committee on educational uses of copyright materials in July 1987. The Committee's discussions led to a compromise regarding some very specific provisions that would allow creators to exercise their rights and at the same time give educational institutions access to the works they need to fulfil their daily tasks.

I understand that, generally speaking, these provisions will be used as a basis for drafting the next set of amendments to the Copyright Act.

There has recently been much discussion that a continuing revision process of the Copyright Act may be more pragmatic in light of the ever-developing technology available to creators and users of copyright materials. As such, the next set of copyright revision will most likely not be the final one. As long as changes are necessary, the Copyright laws of this country will continue to evolve.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

MEMBERS APPOINTED TO COUNCIL OF GST CONSUMER INFORMATION OFFICE—REMUNERATION AND EXPENSES—PAYMENT FOR ACTIVITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 22, 1990, by the Honourable Keith Davey regarding Goods and Services Tax—Members appointed to the Council of the GST Consumer Information Office—Remuneration and Expenses—Payment for Activity—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

1. How many members are on the Executive Committee of the GST Consumer Information Office?

—There are four members on the Executive Committee of the GST Consumer Information Office. Nickolas Murray is the Chairperson, Louise Fecteau and Brian Felesky are the Vice-Chairpersons and John Hoyles is the Executive Director.

2. How many members are on the Council overseeing the GST Consumer Information Office?

—In addition to the four members of the Executive Committee who were appointed in June of 1990, there are ten other members of the Council of the GST Consumer Information Office, made up of people with consumer, business and labour backgrounds, who were appointed in November, 1990.

3. Are the new members paid for their activity and what are their travel expenses?

—The Council members, who meet on average once per month, are entitled to remuneration for meetings attended as may be fixed by the Governor-in-Council.

Travel expenses are covered under Treasury Board guidelines.

4. Is the GST Consumer Information Office an independent organization?

—The Office was established under section 6 of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs Act and will act at arm's length from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The Council will oversee the direction and evaluate the effectiveness of the Office.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COLLECTION OF TAX ON ALCOHOL AT MANITOBA-U.S. BORDER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on December 17, 1990, by the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, regarding National Finance—Collection of Tax on Alcohol at Manitoba-U.S. Border—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

Officials in the Department of National Revenue have been working with the province of Manitoba to extend the assistance provided with the collection of their fees on personal importations of liquor.

Unfortunately, some unresolved issues between the Federal Government and the province have required that the planned implementation date be delayed.

The Minister of National Revenue understands that officials of both Governments have been meeting this week and he is confident that the matter can be resolved quickly in a mutually satisfactory manner.

AGRICULTURE

COLLAPSE OF GATT NEGOTIATIONS—EFFECT ON WESTERN GRAIN PRODUCERS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on December 18, 1990, by the Honourable H. A. Olson regarding Agriculture—Collapse of GATT Negotiations—Effect on Western Grain Producers.

(The answer follows:)

The Federal Government has lived up to the Prime Minister's commitment made several years ago not to abandon the farmers to the international subsidy war. Since 1981 Federal and Provincial assistance to farmers has averaged $2.4 billion a year. During 1990 a $500 million special assistance program and the cash flow enhancement program (expected to cost $95 million) have been announced.

No one disputes the fact that Canadian producers are seriously affected by the low world prices. Because Canada, like Australia and Argentina, depends on exports for a larger proportion of its total revenue than the U.S.A. and the EC, it is hit harder by the low prices. The U.S.A. and the EC have aggravated the situation by their excessive use of export subsidies and each maintains that the other is their primary target in this trade dispute. The major casualties, however, are producers in countries like Canada, Australia and Argentina.

The Canadian Government can only help to alleviate the worst effects of the trade dispute on Canadian producers; it cannot solve the underlying problem by itself.

It will be difficult for Canada to continue to support its producers to the same extent as can much larger economies such as the EC and the U.S.A. Since Canada cannot win a protracted trade war, we must aggressively pursue an international agreement to reform the international grain trading system even as we continue to provide assistance to our own producers. The Government is working towards this goal through the GATT Multilateral Trade Negotiations.

Canada is committed to substantial progressive reductions in trade-distorting subsidies in all countries as well as to new rules which apply equally to all participants and which will establish a fair, market-oriented agricultural trading system. Such reform cannot come soon enough. While it was disappointing that an agreement was not reached in Brussels, we will continue to press all countries to reach agreement early in the new years. In fact, GATT Director General, Arthur Dunkel has already scheduled a meeting of the GATT Trade Negotiating Committee in Geneva starting January 15, 1991. Canada, as well as other countries including the U.S.A., has pressed the EC to make substantive and meaningful changes to its harmful policies. The reason the talks were adjourned in Brussels was because the other countries considered that the EC was not making sufficient concessions to successfully conclude the negotiations. Perhaps with so many countries opposing its position, the EC now realizes that it must significantly alter its position such that when the negotiations resume in January they will be successfully concluded.

Safety nets are going to be a major vehicle of long-term support for agriculture in Canada. On November 14-15, 1990 federal and provincial ministers of agriculture met in Winnipeg and agreed in principle to implement the following as proposed by the Grain and Oilseed Safety Net Committee:

The Net Income Stabilization Account (NISA) in 1990 taxation year;

1991-92 transitional Gross Revenue Insurance Plan (GRIP) with crop insurance and revenue insurance delivered as separate programs but as close to GRIP as possible;

To the concept of GRIP to be operations in 1992-93.

Total payment under these programs if implemented by all provinces for 1991-92 was estimated to be about $2.7 billion.

The ministers also recognized that while these long-run programs should be the main support for agriculture that in the interim farmers are facing immediate problems. For this reason at the same meeting ministers agreed to launch the third line of defence process to examine conditions within the grains and oilseeds sector and bring forward recommendations to federal/provincial ministers of agriculture at a February meeting.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

GRAIN SALES LOSSES—MAINTENANCE OF INITIAL PRICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate on December 18, 1990, by the Honourable H.A. Olson, regarding Canadian Wheat Board—Grain Sales Losses—Maintenance of Initial Prices—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

The Canadian Wheat Board initial payments for 1990/91 were set by the Government before spring seeding and announced on May 1, 1990. Initial payments are guaranteed by the Federal Government and are effective for deliveries by producers during the crop year August 1, 1990 to July 31, 1991.

If revenue from sales is sufficient to justify increases to initial payments, initial payments can be increased during the crop year as was recently announced for designated barley effective December 24, 1990. However, the initial payment is the minimum guaranteed price to producers for the crop year.

Any surplus revenue from sales of grain at the end of the crop year is distributed to producers as a final payment. If the sales revenue is insufficient to cover the initial payments plus Canadian Wheat Board marketing and administration costs, the Federal Government is required to cover the deficit.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

DETERMINATION OF INITIAL AND FINAL PRICES—PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ASSISTANCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on December 18, 1990, by the Honourable E.W. Barootes regarding Canadian Wheat Board—Determination of Initial and Final Prices—Prairie Grain Advance Payments Assistance—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

[Senator Doody.]

Initial payments for Canadian Wheat Board (CWB) grains are established by the Government taking into consideration information provided by the CWB as well as other available market information regarding estimates of market returns for the crop year. The decision on the level of initial payments is made by Ministers. The 1990/91 initial payments for wheat, durum, barley and designated barley were announced by the Government on May 1, 1990.

The initial payments are minimum guaranteed prices to producers for deliveries during the crop year. Any surplus revenue from the sales of grain is distributed to producers as a final payment. If the sales revenue is insufficient to cover the initial payment plus the CWB marketing and administrative costs, the Federal Government is required to cover the deficit.

By virtue of the Cash Flow Enhancement Program announced by the Minister of Agriculture on October 13, 1990, the Federal Government is paying the interest on the first $50,000 advanced under both the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act (PGAPA) and the Advance Payments for Crops Act (APCA). As of December 13, 1990 $1.3 billion had been advanced to 57,700 producers under the PGAPA, while $83.3 million had been advanced to 12,500 producers under the APCA.

This program, along with the $500 million in direct assistance provided under the Special Income Assistance Program (SIAP), will provide the needed support for grain and oilseed producers until the institution of the new safety net regime in the spring of 1991.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

DETERMINATION OF INITIAL AND FINAL PRICES—PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ASSISTANCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on December 18, 1990, by the Honourable H. O. Sparrow regarding the Canadian Wheat Board—Determination of Initial and Final Prices—Prairie Grain Advance Payments Assistance—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

Initial payments for Canadian Wheat Board grains are established by the Government taking into consideration the best available estimates of expected market returns for the crop year. The decision on the level of initial payments is made by Ministers.

AGRICULTURE

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS AND GRAIN—REINSTATEMENT OF INTEREST-FREE PROVISIONS IN ACTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on December 18, 1990, by the Honourable Daniel Hays regarding Agriculture—Advance Payments for Crops and Grain—Reinstatement of Interest-Free Provisions in Acts—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

Provisions for interest-free advances under the Advance Payments for Crops Act were reinstated for a one-year period, crop year 1990/91. Should any agreement result from the MTN and should it involve any commitments to reduce support, it is unlikely that such commitments would be effective prior to the 1991/92 crop year. Therefore, these interest-free advances will not be dealt with at all by the GATT. The Canada/United States Trade Agreement has a provision that requires the measurement of levels of support in both countries. Interest-free advances under the Advance Payments for Crops Act would be included in the calculations whether or not any change had been made to the program.

NATIONAL REVENUE

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX CREDIT—PAYMENT OF FEDERAL SALES TAX BEFORE THIRD READING OF BILL C-62—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on December 19, 1990 by the Honourable H. A. Olson regarding National Revenue—Goods and Services Tax Credit—Payment of Federal Sales Tax Before Third Reading of Bill C-62—Government Position. I think I will take a moment and read this one aloud:

The interpretation of the documents by Senator Murray is correct. The notice received from Revenue Canada is a Notice of Assessment for the 1989 taxation year, which includes an assessment to allow the Federal Sales Tax Credit.

Hon. H. A. Olson: The letter says it is for the GST. It is a funny way to interpret it.

NATIONAL REVENUE

PAYMENTS OF FEDERAL SALES TAX CREDITS—DATE OF AUTHORIZATION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on December 19, 1990, by the Honourable John B. Stewart regarding National Revenue—Payments of Federal Sales Tax Credits—Date of authorization.

(The answer follows:)

Authority was provided to Revenue Canada to begin paying the GSTC, pursuant to Section 33 of the Financial Administration Act, following Royal Assent to Bill C-62 on December 17, 1990. The first GSTC cheques were released to Canada Post at various regions throughout the country at 7:00 a.m. on December 18, 1990.

NATIONAL REVENUE

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX CREDIT—REQUEST FOR DETAILS—DELAY OF CHEQUES

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to questions raised in the Senate on December 19, 1990, by the Honourable Azellus Denis regarding National Revenue—Goods and Services Tax Credit—Request for Details—Delay of Cheques

(The answer follows:)

A couple with a net family income of $25,000 will receive a GSTC of $86.94 in December 1990 and a GSTC cheque of $86.94 in April 1991. Their GSTC of $380 is reduced by 5% of income in excess of the threshold of $24,355. The GSTC for the first half of 1991 is one-half of the balance, which is payable one-half this month and one-half April 1991.

A family of two with a net family income of $15,000 will receive two GSTC cheques of $95, one in December 1990 and one in April 1991. (This is 1/2 of $380 divided between two payments).

GSTC

Basic Adult—$190

Child—$100

Single Adult—$100

(Income in excess of $6,190)

Single Parent—$190

(For 1 dependent child)

Credit reduced by 5% for every $100 of family income over $24,355.

NATIONAL REVENUE

DELAY OF CHEQUES

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on December 19, 1990, by the Honourable H. O. Sparrow regarding National Revenue—Delay of Cheques.

(The answer follows):

The Federal Government is committed to assuring people earning under $30,000 a year will indeed be better off with the implementation at the GST as indicated by the attached document.

BANK ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras moved the third reading of Bill C-90, to amend the Bank Act (Extension).

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

[Translation]

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Gérald Beaudoin: I move that Bill C-92, an Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act, be read a third time.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

[English]

AN ACT TO PROVIDE FOR APPOINTMENT OF A PORT WARDEN FOR THE HARBOUR OF QUEBEC AN ACT TO AMEND AND CONSOLIDATE THE ACTS RELATING TO THE OFFICE OF PORT WARDEN FOR THE HARBOUR OF MONTREAL

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cogger, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hatfield, for the second reading of the Bill C-82, An Act to amend An Act to provide for the appointment of a Port Warden for the Harbour of Quebec and An Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the Office of Port Warden for the Harbour of Montreal, and to validate certain fees and charges established pursuant thereto.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have not had an opportunity to study the remarks made by Senator Cogger in introducing this bill at second reading, but I can see no reason for it not to go to committee, especially since it would be, I take it, the Transport and Communications Committee and we know that that committee plans to sit on January 14.

The concept or principle of providing for the appointment of a Port Warden for the Harbour of Quebec and to amend and consolidate the acts relating to the office of Port Warden for the Harbour of Montreal and to validate certain fees and charges established pursuant thereto does not raise a principle to which I feel I can object. Therefore, on principle, we support the bill and it should receive second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Senator Doody.]

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

CANADIAN HERITAGE LANGUAGES INSTITUTE BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Robertson, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the second reading of the Bill C-37, An Act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute.—(Honourable Senator Adams).

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I did not get a chance to speak on the bill yesterday, but I spoke to the mover yesterday and this morning, and I agree that the bill should be given second reading and sent to committee. I understand that the committee will be sitting some time after the new year.

However, I would like to say a few words on the bill. I agree with the dismay expressed by Senator Corbin yesterday that, while this bill was in the House of Commons for over two years, we have only received it recently and the government is trying to pressure us to pass the bill quickly. I would especially like to say a few words about our languages. The Inuit people and Native Indians in our community have had their own languages for a long time but they have not been recognized as part of Canadian culture. Our communities are continuing to use these languages. We even have written languages. We have two main types of written languages. We use letters and syllabics which were devised over 100 years ago in the Anglican Church Mission. We still retain them. In some other parts of the Territories, in Labrador and over in the MacKenzie delta, people use Roman letters.

As honourable senators know, the Territorial Government was moved from Ottawa to Yellowknife in 1966. Since then we see that the local politicians better represent the interests of the people in our communities.

● (1040)

There are approximately seven different languages spoken in the Northwest Territories. That means there is a great deal of translation required. In the Legislative Assembly at Yellowknife, Inuktitut is spoken, as well as French and English. We have many different cultures in the Northwest Territories, for example, the Dene, the Dogribs and the Slavey.

In the Mackenzie Delta area there are five different languages spoken. There are different languages spoken in the Eastern Arctic and the Western Arctic, and there are different dialects.

As I mentioned a moment ago, our language consists of syllabics. Even though people speak the same dialect, not all can read the syllabics. There is a difference in that regard between the Eastern Arctic and the Central Arctic, as well as in the Mackenzie Delta.

We think that we should be able to retain our heritage and different languages. Some of the local politicians only read syllabics, so there has to be translation of official documents. The translators usually come from Yellowknife. That means they have to travel far and wide.

There is now what is known as Arctic College. That came about because the Northwestern Territorial government took over responsibility for education; 20 years ago that was the responsibility of Ottawa.

In 1982, when the new Constitution was signed, there was a great debate here in Ottawa respecting who should have responsibility for the north. We had witnesses appear in the Senate chamber to deal with that issue, but this goes back to 1950 when the government stepped into the north and decided to set up an educational system. At that time we were not allowed to use our own languages in the schools. As I mentioned earlier, in 1966 legislation was introduced that put this responsibility into the hands of the Government of the Northwest Territories. Then the local politicians decided that there should be some instruction of the various languages of the north in the schools. It was decided that syllabics should be taught in the schools. It was decided that students should be taught in their own language up to grade five.

Right now, some of the communities are losing their language and culture, especially so in the past few years. The people do not use their own languages in the communities, and this is causing some people to lose their language. In the Western Arctic there is more English used than any of the other languages.

I mentioned earlier Arctic College. That is an institution that will assist us in maintaining our heritage, although a great number of the students drop out before completing their education. In the homes, most of the people speak their mother tongue. Bill C-37 will assist us in retaining our heritage and languages.

● (1050)

However, because we kept our language and culture for so many years, it will cost the government more to do what it wants to in this bill. Everything was not done according to government regulation. Teaching in our communities was not as strict for us because our people spent most of the time living off the land according to our culture.

We find that the system does not work the same way in English down south. We are going to have to learn everything about English because if you want to get a job with a government department, you have to have at least a Grade 12 education. But most kids usually drop out between grades 6 and 7. After trying to find a job, most of our people have had to go back to school through an adult education program in order to get their Grade 12.

We should give the committee a chance to study the bill to see if any of the clauses need to be changed. In the meantime, I accept the bill the way it is right now. I think it can go to third reading. Thank you very much, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kinsella, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the second reading of Bill C-84, respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada.

He said: Honourable colleagues, it is my pleasure indeed to introduce Bill C-84, a bill to authorize the privatization of Petro-Canada.

As some of you may know, I was co-chairman with John Thomson, the then Member of Parliament from Calgary South of the Progressive Conservative Crown Corporations Task Force. The task force reported to Brian Mulroney as Leader of the Opposition prior to the 1984 election. We looked at the control, direction and accountability of existing Crown corporations. We also identified privatization candidates and recommended a process for their orderly transfer to the private sector. I have therefore been keenly interested in and have closely watched the unfolding of this government's privatization program.

Petro-Canada is a special act Crown corporation, meaning that it was incorporated by an act of Parliament rather than by articles and memorandum under the Canada Business Corporations Act, or provincial companies legislation. As many of you know, Petro-Canada, the special act corporation, has become, over time, a holding company and very much a shell. The operating company, Petro-Canada Inc., was incorporated under the CBCA and is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Petro-Canada.

Petro-Canada Inc. is where all the action is, if I can use that term, and is the de facto holding company for all the operating entities of Petro-Canada. Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation is the other wholly-owned subsidiary of Petro-Canada, the special act corporation, which will continue on under this bill as a stand-alone Crown corporation.

The first part of Bill C-84, actually clause 4, initiates a bit of a corporate name shuffle, which I will try to describe, honourable senators. I had to make a flow chart for myself in order to understand it. Petro-Canada Inc. becomes Petro-Canada; the current Petro-Canada becomes Petro-Canada Limited. The shares of the new Petro-Canada, the old Petro-Canada Inc., are to be transferred to a minister to be designated by the Governor in Council and are to be offered for sale to the public. The bill then authorizes the Governor in Council to dissolve Petro-Canada Limited pursuant to clause 14, and the existing Petro-Canada Act would be repealed. To continue certain legal obligations of the government entered into through the Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation, PCIAC will continue on its own to carry out its international assistance functions.

The old Petro-Canada Inc. is being privatized rather than the old Petro-Canada, because Petro-Canada Inc. is already the de facto operating entity; Petro-Canada Inc. has already been incorporated under the Canada Business Corporations Act; and Petro-Canada Inc. is already legal for life, meaning, by virtue of its past financial performance, it is eligible for investment by insurance companies and other institutions. This status greatly facilitates floating a share offering.

The new Petro-Canada will be enjoined under Bill C-84 to have its articles contain certain provisions or limitations relating to the ownership and transfer of its shares, prohibitions against disposition of Petro-Canada's upstream or downstream assets, continued location of the head office in Calgary and so on. These provisions are set out in clause 9 of the bill.

In process terms, at least as I understand it, it is the government's intention, after the passage of this bill, to have the Board of Directors of Petro-Canada select lead underwriters to put together a syndicate to sell Petro-Canada's shares. About 15 per cent of the shares will be offered in the first tranche and subsequent tranches will follow thereafter. The price of the shares and the timing of the first and subsequent tranches will be a function of market circumstances at the time and, of course, the judgment of the underwriters. Again, as I understand it, net proceeds from the first tranche of the offering will go to Petro-Canada. Net proceeds from subsequent tranches will be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund and, thus, will assist in meeting the government's cash requirements.

I earlier mentioned the Crown Corporations Task Force of which I was the co-chairman. It will not surprise you to know that the task force recommended the privatization of Petro-Canada at that time. The reasons for that recommendation apply today as they did in 1984 and are, therefore, instructive in our current circumstances and in light of the very thorough report on Petro-Canada by the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

● (1100)

Honourable senators, if you will allow me, I will review the task force's reasons for recommending the privatization of Petro-Canada.

Let us look first at Petro-Canada's mandate as defined by the Petro-Canada Act, 1974 and as was later amplified by government policy. Petro-Canada's mandate consisted of five essential elements.

First, as an instrument of public policy to achieve or act as a catalyst in the achievement of government policies and objectives in the oil and gas sector, which was mainly accelerating the pace of frontier oil and gas development.

[Senator Kelly]

Second, to be a "window" on the oil industry on behalf of the Government of Canada.

Third, to act as an agent of the Government of Canada when required to enter into state-to-state transactions involving the sale or purchase of oil or gas.

Fourth, to increase Canadianization—Canadian ownership and control—in the oil and gas sector.

There are those who feel that this mandate, or elements of this mandate, remain unfulfilled. That Petro-Canada must remain government owned because the fulfilment of its mandate, the continuation of Petro-Canada as an instrument of public policy, is important to the future of Canada, in particular to Canada's future energy security.

This, as I understand it, is the essential reason for any opposition to Petro-Canada's privatization.

I would like to look at the elements of Petro-Canada's mandate in the context of the proposed privatization.

First, Petro-Canada as an instrument of public policy: Petro-Canada was mandated to push the pace of oil and gas exploration and development especially in frontier areas where costs were high, risks were substantial and the prospects of immediate returns were not great. As the Senate energy committee pointed out, a Crown corporation that does not rely on private or internally-generated capital can afford to apply a lower discount rate to its exploration and development projects than private sector petroleum companies historically have.

Petro-Canada has pursued its exploration mandate in the high Arctic, in the Northwest Territories, in the Scotian shelf, and in the Grand Banks. In doing so it has contributed significantly to Canada's energy security.

To continue its participation in these projects, to continue to be aggressive in the frontier areas, Petro-Canada needs capital, capital that is not forthcoming from the government because of the deficit and the government's wider fiscal policy objectives. Therefore, that capital can only come from private investors through privatization and the ability to expand Petro-Canada's equity base.

I am told that Petro-Canada's capital requirements over the next five years, to meet its exploration and development objectives, is some $2.5 billion, an enormous sum of money that represents about 2 per cent of the Government of Canada's total annual operating budget.

Some have argued that Petro-Canada should remain a Crown corporation and raise the capital it needs through debt. There are those who suggest that Petro-Canada could take on the same leverage of debt to equity or debt to assets as Ontario Hydro or Hydro-Quebec.

Petro-Canada management and the government have followed a more conservative approach.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Senator Kelly, what type of approach did you say?

Senator Kelly: A small "C" conservative approach.

Petro-Canada management and the government have followed a more conservative approach. Ontario Hydro and Hydro-Quebec are regulated, monopolistic, public utilities and, as such, can sustain a high level of debt. Petro-Canada—and the oil industry generally—cannot, given the competition in the industry and the volatility of world prices that have characterized the industry over the past two decades. This volatility appears to be the way for at least the foreseeable future.

In addition, some of my colleagues here, particulary Senators Pitfield, Kirby, MacEachen and Kenny, will recall events in the second half of the 1970s where certain Crown corporations were required to finance themselves through ever-greater dollops of debt. Corporations such as Air Canada and Canadian National soon found that such levels of debt were unsustainable and they were forced to come to government for successive recapitalizations. The financial management of Petro-Canada has benefited from this experience and has become more prudent, as a consequence.

In any event, since 1984 Petro-Canada has been directed by its sole shareholder, the Government of Canada, to operate in a completely commercial manner. It is arguable, therefore, that Petro-Canada ceased to be an instrument of public policy some six years ago and privatization is, accordingly, the logical next step. I do not recall any incidents or complaints over that period suggesting that this commercial approach was undermining Canada's energy position or energy policies. I certainly do not recall any discussion in this place on the matter.

Senator Frith: Senator Kelly, would you repeat that sentence?

Senator Kelly: I do not recall any incidents or complaints over that period suggesting that this commercial approach was undermining Canada's energy position or energy policies. I certainly do not recall any discussion in this place on the matter.

Senator Frith: What is that policy?

Senator Kelly: Self-sufficiency, protection against sudden shocks, a window on the industry, and all the various things that were in included in the original mandate.

Senator Frith: The good old NEP?

Senator Kelly: Yes.

Hon. H.A. Olson: They will bring it all back, but it will have a new name.

Senator Frith: The NEP has a new friend in Senator Kelly.

Senator Kelly: We believe it is possible under the privatization process, with just as much confidence as the people who designed the NEP expressed at the time of the NEP.

The Senate energy committee itself noted that virtually all participants in the government's energy options process, which took place in 1987-1988, felt that market forces should be allowed to allocate resources and determine prices for energy.

There are those who argue that, particularly in these perilous times, with the real possibility of a blow-up in the Middle East, we need Petro-Canada as a government-controlled, policy instrument, to control prices and ensure security of supply. I would like to return to the security of supply argument later in my remarks, but for now I would like to focus on the price control issue.

I would point out that Petro-Canada has never been used by either a Liberal or Conservative government to control or lead prices. During the past 14 years, I think we would all agree, there were a number of scares and crises, initiated by OPEC in the early mid-1970s and then the Iran-Iraq war, that we weathered without intervention by Petro-Canada. I suggest that the privatization of Petro-Canada will not detract from our ability to meet such challenges and crises in the future.

Incidentally, if a Middle East conflict does erupt, the parts of Canada worst hit will be Quebec and the Maritimes because of their reliance on imported oil. There is not one thing that Petro-Canada, as a Crown corporation or as a privatized company, can do to help out should this occur, because Quebec and the Maritimes' reliance on imported oil is a function of the supply infrastructure, not the market or the retail structure.

The Senate energy committee proposes that Petro-Canada be retained to set up and administer an oil stockpile, along the lines of the strategic petroleum reserve in the United States, for times of supply interruption or scarcity. As I am sure honourable senators know, the strategic petroleum reserve was set up in 1975 in response to the OPEC oil crisis. The reserve is owned and operated by the U.S. federal government and consists of a mix of crude appropriate to United States refineries and the market across the United States.

I would point out that Canada is still a net exporter of oil and gas, thereby reducing our need for such a reserve. In addition, the privatization of Petro-Canada need not forestall, in any way, the setting up of such a reserve, if one becomes required.

I should also emphasize that some of Petro-Canada's public policy objectives will stay in force: its head office must remain in Calgary, for example; non-resident ownership cannot exceed 25 per cent; the corporation will have to provide services in both or either official language where demand requires; no individual shareholder may own more than 10 per cent of the public available shares; the corporation may not sell all or substantially all of its upstream or downstream operations; and so on.

In any event, it is a mistake to believe that because Petro-Canada is privatized the government will lose its policy or fiscal levers in the oil and gas sector. I would point out that this place, not too long ago, passed legislation to effect the federal government's agreement with the Hibernia Consortium that includes a contribution of up to $1.04 billion, and loan guarantees up to a maximum of $1.66 billion.

• (1110)

Hibernia is expected to reach full production of some 110 billion barrels per day in 1996 and, thus, will contribute to Canada's energy security. Similarly, the federal government has agreed to provide up to $45.5 million to the OSLO consortium toward costs in the engineering and feasibility of that project.

To paraphrase something we used to say on the farm, "You don't have to own the cow if you can get the milk some other way." I like that expression. In other words, if we live in town we do not each have to have a cow in the backyard; we can get the milk some other way.

Hon. Dan Hays: May I interrupt the honourable senator to ask a brief question? I am not sure but I think he indicated that federal support for OSLO was still in place. I do not think that that is the case.

Senator Kelly: My understanding is that the government had agreed to provide up to $45.5 million to the OSLO consortium toward costs in the engineering and feasibility phase of the project.

Senator Olson: They snatched back all that was not spent.

Senator Kelly: I would like to deal with the part of the mandate which referred to Petro-Canada as a window on the oil and gas industry. In the early 1970s federal policy-makers apparently reached the conclusion that they were not getting enough, timely or accurate information from the private and largely foreign-owned companies in the oil and gas sector. Hence, Petro-Canada was set up to be the government's "window." Quite frankly, I never understood this rationale. My reading of the defence in the Energy Committee's report has not really helped.

[Senator Kelly.]

At the time Petro-Canada was set up, and as the report of the Energy Committee notes, we had in place the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the National Energy Board. Both had the clear mandate to be the government's window on the oil and gas sector.

As I recall, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources was set up in the late 1960s around the nucleus of the old Department of Mines to break the government's historic reliance on the oil companies for policy making for the oil and gas sector. The government wanted its own source of objective advice and information. As such, EMR was intended to be a "window".

Furthermore, as a regulatory body, the National Energy Board had both the legal authority and the practical power to be an effective "window". Allow me, for example, to quote from subsections 26(1) and 26(2) of the National Energy Board Act. Subsection 26(1) states:

> The board shall study and keep under review matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction relating to the exploration for, production, recovery, manufacture, processing, transmission, transportation, distribution, sale, purchase, exchange and disposal of energy and sources of energy in and outside Canada, shall report thereon from time to time to the minister and shall recommend to the minister such measures within the jurisdiction of Parliament as it considers necessary or advisable in the public interest for the control, supervision, conservation, use, marketing and development of energy and sources of energy.

Subsection 26(2) states:

> The board shall, with respect to energy matters and sources of energy,
>
> (a) Provide the minister with such advice as the minister may request, including advice relating to the export pricing of oil and gas;
>
> (b) Prepare such studies and reports as the minister may request; and
> (c) Recommend to the minister the making of such arrangements as it considers desirable for cooperation with governmental or other agencies in or outside Canada.

Unlike some of you here I was not privy to the government's internal deliberations and considerations at the time. Obviously, there was a view that neither the department nor the board was providing an effective "window".

If that was the case, I would have thought that the first line of attack would have been to shake up or enhance the powers of either the department or the energy board. Instead, in typical bureaucratic fashion, we created, at considerable cost, a brand new Crown corporation to be an operating company in the industry. In short, referring back to my previous analogy, we bought the cow.

Now, of course, the situation is even more extreme. In addition to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the National Energy Board we also have the Petroleum Monitoring Agency and the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration, known as COGLA, each in their own sphere having the mandate and powers to be effective "windows" on the industry.

There is another matter that has always concerned me about Petro-Canada's role as a "window" on the industry for the government's policy makers.

Senator Doody: A window with many panes.

Senator Kelly: I must comment on the interjection of Senator Doody who referred to the window with many panes.

The Senate Energy Committee report crystallized this concern for me by referring, at page 12, to Petro-Canada having unquestionably an insider's view of the workings of the petroleum industry. I would add Petro-Canada as a Crown corporation also had an insider's view—at least a privileged view—of government and the government regulatory and policy-making process.

To me, this raised the potential, or the possible perception, of a conflict of interest in having a Crown corporation operating in the private sector, often in partnership with private-sector firms and competing with private-sector firms, while being at the same time a principal source of information for and advice to the government. This was particularly the case when the Deputy Ministers of Finance and Energy, Mines and Resources served on the Petro-Canada Board of Directors.

In addition, as a Crown corporation constituted as an agent of Her Majesty in right of Canada, Petro-Canada has a number of privileges and immunities that its private sector competitors or partners do not have. These special privileges and immunities gave Petro-Canada a special status, a status not shared by the other companies with which Petro-Canada competes or does business.

As a consequence, I think it is fair to say that Petro-Canada is a hybrid caught betwixt and between—never comfortably part of—the oil and gas sector and, except for its very early days, never comfortably a part of government.

Privatization corrects that anomaly and, I am sure, will position Petro-Canada to be a more effective presence in Canada's oil and gas sector.

With respect to state-to-state trading, which again was part of the original mandate, Petro-Canada was set up to effect state-to-state trading in oil and gas. At the time Petro-Canada was set up there were a number of foreign national oil companies that were government owned and which had a monopoly within their countries. It was thought that such state-owned enterprises would deal only with, or prefer to deal only with, other state-owned enterprises. Accordingly, Petro-Canada was set up with the mandate to engage in state-to-state trading which, based on that premise, made good sense.

As the Energy Committee's report notes, since it was set up some 14 years ago, Petro-Canada has been called upon to effect one and one only state-to-state deal, that with the Mexican National Oil Company, Pemex, in 1979, where Petro-Canada negotiated and managed the transaction.

In any event, the privatization of Petro-Canada will not mean that we cannot effect state-to-state oil deals in the future if we have to. We have had in this country since the late 1940s, and it remains very active today, a federal Crown corporation called the Canadian Commercial Corporation which has the legal powers, the mandate and the expertise to negotiate and manage state-to-state deals whenever and wherever required.

On the subject of Canadianization, when Petro-Canada was established, the oil and gas sector was dominated by foreign companies. Canadian ownership was at 21 per cent. Now the figures are 44 per cent ownership and 35 per cent control. I think it is fair to say that, next to the policies and programs entrenched in the National Energy Program, Petro-Canada has been one of the largest single factors in that increase, but not without considerable cost to the federal treasury.

Given the current structure of the oil and gas sector, particularly in the downstream, Petro-Canada could go no further in Canadianization without having major adverse competition impacts. The privatization of Petro-Canada will not have a major, adverse impact on Canadian ownership and control in the oil and gas sector. Assuming that the maximum number of shares available to foreign purchasers—25 per cent—is taken up, Canadian ownership will be decreased by only 1.6 per cent, and our largest Canadian-controlled integrated oil company would continue to be 75 per cent Canadian owned.

It always seemed to me that Petro-Canada management and the previous government put Petro-Canada on the irreversible road to privatization when it moved so aggressively into the downstream with the acquisition of the downstream assets of Atlantic Ritchfield, Pacific Petroleums, Petrofina Canada and, later, Gulf Canada. Although authorized as part of its broad legislative mandate, I recall the then Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Donald Macdonald during parliamentary review of the Petro-Canada Act saying that the government had no intention of having Petro-Canada become anything other than an upstream oil company.

• (1120)

In any case, downstream operations had, and have, nothing to do with energy security. What moving into the downstream did was create a revolution of rising expectations among Canadians that somehow prices would be lower, service better and washrooms cleaner than at other stations because "we owned it". Of course, the prices were not lower, the service was not necessarily better or the washrooms cleaner. Petro-Canada franchisees had complaints; other station owners or operators complained because of "unfair competition" and so on.

These complaints fell, more often than not, at the feet of government because Petro-Canada was and is a Crown corporation. No government, in my opinion, needs that kind of exposure—the risks far outweigh the benefits. Hence, my belief that Petro-Canada's move into downstream operations, which started long before 1984, began, of necessity, to distance Petro-Canada from government, the inevitable result of which was privatization.

In addition, the aggressive acquisition of downstream assets required the commitment of enormous capital by the corporation and even more so by government. That capital did not result in the discovery or development of one new drop of oil. What it did do, I suspect, in both fiscal and philosophical terms, was to exhaust the government's will, even its ability, to fund Petro-Canada further, even for its important upstream operations in Hibernia, Terra Nova and Oslo.

The rationalization and operation of the downstream operations, again as pointed out by the Senate energy committee, has also been a significant drag on Petro-Canada's financial performance.

Furthermore, Canada now has only 16 integrated oil companies, down from 21 when Petro-Canada was created, a decrease of nearly 25 per cent. This increased concentration of market power is not helpful to competition.

Although Petro-Canada's actions were not the only factor, or not the largest single factor, I wonder if we would have this extent of concentration in the downstream today if it had not been for Petro-Canada's acquisitiveness, bankrolled by the Government of Canada, and for Petro-Canada's willingness and ability to pay a premium for these assets.

I am pleased that the Senate energy committee agrees with my assessment that the federal government "erred in allowing Petro-Canada to become such a dominant part of the downstream . . .". I support the recommendation that further study needs to be undertaken on the effect on competition of continued rationalization in the downstream and suspect that this is something the competition bureau will be monitoring closely.

Finally, I wish to emphasize to all members of this chamber that this government's privatization program, in general, and the privatization of Petro-Canada, in particular, are not the manifestation of some ideological, knee-jerk, reactionary abhorrence of public ownership. Crown corporations have been set up by governments of all political stripes and have been closed down or privatized by governments of all political stripes.

The Crown Corporations Task Force set out in its report, and I think most of us recognize, that the unique history and nature of Canada requires an unusually high level of government involvement through regional and other incentives, regulation and government ownership. Government ownership has played a major role in the development of this country, in its defence during wartime and in the expansion of our technological and other horizons.

But we must recognize that the public enterprise sector has to be flexible. Times change and the need for certain Crown corporations disappears. These corporations must give way to new corporations or to new or different fiscal or policy objectives. Otherwise, the sector and government generally become stultified and unable to respond to ever-changing circumstances and requirements.

I am convinced that Petro-Canada falls into that category. The continuance of Petro-Canada as a Crown corporation will not enhance its ability to achieve the objectives that most of us share, nor will the privatization of Petro-Canada negatively affect the government's ability to achieve those objectives through other policy and financial levers.

Accordingly, and in closing my remarks, I recommend this bill to your attention, and very much support its quick passage by this chamber.

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, I would like to speak on second reading. However, the Deputy Leader of the Government has advised that we expect to receive a representative of the Governor General at 11:30. It is now 11:30, and with everyone's agreement, I will make my remarks following Royal Assent.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Hays, do you wish to adjourn the debate until later this day?

Senator Hays: I so move.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Hays, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

• (1130)

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Peter deC. Cory, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Speaker pro tempore of the Senate said:

Honourable members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

> I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to cause Letters Patent to be issued under his Sign Manual and Signet constituting the Honourable Peter deC. Cory, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, his Deputy, to do in His Excellency's name all acts on his part necessary to be done during His Excellency's pleasure.

The Commission was read by the Clerk of the Senate.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

> An Act to amend the Bank Act (extension) (Bill C-90, Chapter 47, 1990)
> An Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act (Bill C-92, Chapter 48, 1990)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

• (1140)

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to continue with the motion before the Senate?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PETRO-CANADA PUBLIC PARTICIPATION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed the debate, adjourned earlier this day, on the motion for second reading of Bill C-84, to authorize the privatization of Petro-Canada—(Senator Hays)

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I compliment Senator Kelly for giving us a thorough speech describing what is proposed in Bill C-84. I do not intend to be long in responding to his speech, in part because he has covered the subject matter in terms of the four corners of the bill very well, and because he also expanded his comments into some areas that will be the main thrust of my comments, and that relates to what is happening outside of Bill C-84. The point I want to dwell on is what is the energy policy context within which this government is proceeding with its privatization initiative.

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, as Senator Kelly noted in his remarks, made a report to the Senate, and that report has been adopted by the Senate. One of the recommendations Senator Kelly did not refer to is the first recommendation. I am referring to the report of the committee that criticized the federal government for contemplating such an important initiative as privatizing Petro-Canada without having put forth any comprehensive statement of Canada's energy policy.

The committee argued that the merits of privatizing Canada's national oil company should be considered pragmatic in the context of an encompassing energy policy, and that the decision not simply be made for ideological reasons. The report invites the government to respond to the "Energy Options" paper, and one could also invite the government to factor in recent events respecting the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq.

Senator Kelly has said that Bill C-84 is not a major ideological reaction. I think that is right. It is rather a well-thought-through, plodding ideological reaction.

Interestingly enough, Senator Kelly's remarks, and the remarks of the Minister of State for Privatization and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicates that very seldom do they stray beyond the borders of Canada when referring to Bill C-84.

One point I should like to make is that energy, in its various forms, are commodities, and thus the market is important and, therefore, should be the main determinant of where it is produced and in what quantities and what its price is, but in the case of energy, it is not a commodity like other commodities; it is a commodity that has special and strategic value, particularly for a country like Canada. Failure to take into account Canadian needs and a strategy for Canada that looks beyond the next few years is a failure to meet our needs. I refer in this regard to the Senate Energy Committee report on Petro-Canada which talks about the United States in great detail and the crisis the United States is now facing in energy, and about other countries that have national oil companies, and how they are used to develop strategies.

Honourable senators, I will not dwell on this point, but if you look at the management of national affairs by a country such as Japan, or even Korea, or European countries collectively in the European Community or individually, honourable senators will see that they handle their affairs in a much better way than Canada handles its affairs. I think the great tragedy of our time is that we do not seem to be able to come to grips with the need to look ahead.

One of the important advantages Canada has over other countries is that it has a rich energy resource. It has oil and gas in adequate amounts to serve our needs for the long term. We have taken some initiatives in that regard, in particular the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement.

When honourable senators look at all of those initiatives together, they cry out for Canada to say something about where it wants to be in terms of energy supply and where that energy is produced and how it is distributed sometime into the future.

When the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources appeared before the House of Commons committee on Bill C-84, he tried to give some background on that. I do not intend to quote at length, but he said, in part:

> The government has explicitly rejected a strongly interventionist approach. Instead, current policy emphasizes primary reliance upon the operation of competitive markets for decisions regarding energy supply, demand, pricing and trade.

The minister went on to say:

> While the government has a strong preference for the use of market-oriented approaches, it is not indifferent to the outcome of market forces . . . to assure security of supply;

Later the minister stated:

> The government has deregulated the energy sector. We have allowed energy prices to be set by market forces. We have negotiated secure access to U.S. markets . . . while ensuring continuing opportunities for Canadians to participate in the oil industry.

Then later the minister stated:

> For some, Canadians only have secure supply of oil when we develop massive reserves and then lock these reserves in for future generations.

The minister said that Canada should not hoard or not produce the product until needed, but rather allow world dynamics to play a role and ensure that we have a healthy oil and gas sector.

I can agree with the minister and yet, at the same time, say that Canada must have some idea of where it is going in energy terms.

I would quote the minister again when he again appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources on Friday, October 26, 1990, when that committee was considering Bill C-44, in answer to a question from Senator Kenny respecting the proposition that all production from Hibernia would be exported, he stated:

> Let's take a look at our reality on that point. We produce about 1.5 million barrels a day of oil in Canada. We export approximately . . . 650,000 barrels a day. Too much of it, in my mind, in terms of combinations, too much of it is heavy versus light.

And for those honourable senators who may not be familiar with this subject, Canada produces various weights of oil. Canada produces a large amount of heavy oil, yet we have never utilized that oil within the country. That is exported to the United States. There are refineries in the Chicago area that can process it, and that has been the traditional destination of that production. That is what the minister was talking about, and that is one of Canada's problems.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It is harder to get it out of the ground, though, is it not?

Senator Hays: Yes. Bitumen is in solid form.

The minister went on to state:

> We import about 525,000 barrels now. Where are those barrels coming from? Three hundred and fifty thousand (350,000) of those barrels come from the North Sea; 250,000 out of the U.K.; 100,000 out of Norway.

Then the minister went on to state:

> —obviously we have lost the 16,000 barrels from Iraq, but that was rather insignificant even though we were dropping it in Halifax on a monthly basis.
> What has happened, sir, is this. From the rest of the world, we want 550,000 barrels every 24 hours—-

Then the minister went on, emphasizing the fact that we are relying on the market, and stated:

> I cannot mandate that, but what I can and must remain very conscious of is that your National Minister of Energy every day has to put into place 550,000 barrels of oil which are non-Canadian source.

• (1150)

I cannot think of a more eloquent way than that to emphasize how dependent we are on imported oil. Strangely enough, he is able to dismiss, in that same section of the Report of Proceedings the need to direct 110,000 barrels of Hibernia production into the Canadian market to displace imports. Of course the reason relates to the nature or quality of the oil and its suitability for Canadian refineries.

I have already commented that I think Hibernia was an incomplete negotiation in that it did not ensure that the bulk of the oil produced was to be used to displace imports or to ensure that we had greater access to American oil, particularly from the north slope where we can only take 50,000 barrels. Part of that negotiation should have included greater access to U.S. oil or some other way of exempting that 110,000 barrels from the restrictive provisions of Article 904 of the Free Trade Agreement.

I believe we must look at where we are in terms of PetroCanada being removed, and I believe we all agree that this is something that can best be done in the Energy Committee, to which this bill must be referred. We could have been referring to the Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Agency, or part of the National Energy Board. Where are we when we take one of these elements of policy delivery out of the range of policy options that Canada has to pursue some reasonable strategy to look after our needs into the future? I have quoted at length from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and I do not think we have an answer to that question at this point in time.

I would like to comment on what one of the answers might be—and what I suspect it is. The Government of Canada, including the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, have bought into the idea that we should have a North American or continental energy policy. If that is the case, they should say so. It continues to creep into the language of speeches I hear both from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and from political representatives of the Government of Alberta. I am concerned about that. We live in a world where the United States and Canada are inextricably bound together. Part of that binding involves energy trade, but Canada has the option of retaining a preferred position on energy if it manages its affairs in the correct way. If it does nothing, as is the case right now, we will, within a short period of time, be in a situation where we are operating on a continental basis. That is what the dynamics of trade in energy will mandate.

If that is the case, the government should say so, accept responsibility for it and say what it would do in that context. If it sees security of supply as a North American or continental issue, we should have a coherent policy in that respect. We should be trying to involve ourselves in what the United States is now doing in trying to develop a national energy strategy.

As the report we tabled in June so dramatically points out, the Americans are now in a situation where they are dependent to the extent of 50 per cent on imported oil. This has been an important element in their decision making and ties their hands in an unacceptable way on what they do in the Gulf at this time; and it is also evident, from what I have read and I believe you are able to determine that from reading the report, that they will not be able to do anything about it before they are 60 per cent dependent. They have a strategic petroleum reserve, as Senator Kelly observed.

The House of Commons Energy Committee, when it was chaired by the member from Calgary South, Barbara Sparrow, recommended that Canada have one of those reserves, interestingly enough. We have not done that, and I think there is a general misunderstanding of how dependent we are on imported oil.

If the Government of Canada's position is that we are on a North American footing, say so. It should try to cooperate with the U.S. in developing a policy; and, most important, if we are to be plowing money into the development of our heavy oil reserves, the U.S. should be participating in those costs.

I do not believe Canada should take that route. I believe Canada should be prepared to intervene and provide incentives to ensure that we retain a high degree of self-sufficiency in oil. In 1988 we were supplying 70 per cent of our own requirement from the western Canadian sedimentary basin. We have a healthy level of exports, primarily of heavy oil, and we could continue to see healthy exploration and development in the western sedimentary basin and a high degree of Canadian self-sufficiency. Beyond 70 per cent does not make sense because of the transportation realities; but, if you look at it today, we are now down to 65 per cent. We are now seriously talking about reversing the Sarnia-Montreal pipeline, which is as good evidence as you will ever find that if we do nothing, the market dynamic will see us as dependent on foreign oil as the United States while the government and many others say we have a net surplus of oil. I think those words are capable of leading us into a false sense of security.

I could talk about other things, but in winding up this part of what I wanted to say, what is the policy environment? Most important, what is this government's position on a North American or continental energy policy, contrasted with a policy which sees us with as healthy an energy trade with the U.S. as we have traditionally had, but looking after Canadian interests on a priority basis to ensure levels of self-sufficiency? That would give us comfort in a short supply situation, which the United States has now and which we would not have on a North American or pooled energy trade basis.

With respect to the other things that have happened, the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement Implementation Act and other acts have seen some agencies—and I should mention the National Energy Board—gutted in terms of its ability as an independent agency to do anything about ensuring a long-term, secure supply for Canada. That now rests with the federal cabinet under amendments to the National Energy Board Act. If I read it correctly, the Petroleum Monitoring Agency is reporting on fewer items. To the extent that the NEB issues reports, along with Statistics Canada, they confirm what I am saying about the market trend in Canada and the difficulty we could reasonably expect to have in the future.

No one denies that in this decade, the 1990s, we will cease becoming an exporter; we will become a net importer. No one denies that if we wish to do anything about that, some incentive in the price ranges we now have for oil will have to be provided to make up for that decline.

What role might Petro-Canada play? It is easy to list the things that were in the minds of those who introduced Petro-Canada and to dismiss them, but that is static thinking. The corporation could be disposed of in a more advantageous way to the Treasurer, if that were the right thing to do. If we want to maximize our return on this venture, why do we have restrictions on Canadian ownership? If our objective is to generate the most dollars—and it should be—we should not have those restrictions.

Do we really care about the level of Canadian ownership? If so, why? No one has answered that question very well. However, to go halfway, which I think satisfies an ideological longing within the Conservative party, is not a good idea. Honourable senators, what you should do is say what you really want to say and do what you really want to do. If you want to drive in the most dollars, this is not the way to do it and it does not serve Canadian interests in the best way.

● (1200)

Would there be other alternatives in Petro-Canada in terms of the downstream? That was talked about in the report, as well as the rationalization and elimination of competition. When competition is compared in the purchase of feed stock or in the distribution of refined product, there are many fewer people competing in that area than there are in the United States. I have seen reports from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources which attribute that lack of competition to the fact that we do not have as good a working market as the United States. Both the sitting government and the previous government have done things to see rationalization of refining, which Senator Kelly correctly complained about, and adverse effects on competition in both purchase of crude feed stock and distribution of refined product.

I do not think that has been thoroughly explored. The time to do that is not after Petro-Canada is sold, but before. If it is done before and action is called for which involves a different way of taking Petro-Canada out of the inventory of Government of Canada assets, then it will be too late.

The other thing that bothers me is that Petro-Canada has a capital requirement, Canada cannot afford to meet it, and there is no other way to resolve that problem than to privatize it. What is proposed is to privatize Petro-Canada and to give it the money that is generated by the sale of something that Canada now owns, namely the first 15 per cent tranche of shares. Whether Canada sold Air Canada and put the money into Petro-Canada, or sold Petro-Canada and put the money into Petro-Canada, the money is coming from the same pocket, and that is from the people of Canada. Therefore, it is a circular argument and does not make any sense to me. We, Canada, will be giving Petro-Canada the capital that it needs, as much as if we had taken it out of the general revenue. The only way is that we have somehow got it tied into Petro-Canada, so we sell some of Petro-Canada and give it the money. That does not make much sense to me.

Other means of addressing Petro-Canada's requirement, such as spinning off assets or other means of generating capital, have not been fully explored. In any event, I am defeating myself there because even those things are not worth pursuing unless we have set for ourselves some objective as to where we want to be in the future in terms of self-reliance. When we have set that objective, then and only then can we determine the best means of achieving the objective. Until we have set the objective, tinkering around with the NEB, with disposition of Petro-Canada, with changing reporting procedures and so on really does not make much sense. It is a classic case of, if you do not know where you are going that is probably where you will end up. I do not think Canada knows where it is going today on energy policy.

Although I have spoken at length on the things that I think are important, undoubtedly there are many other things that could be touched upon. I believe it is important that this legislation be referred to the Standing Committee on Energy and Natural Resources so that we will all have an opportunity to participate by inviting witnesses to come before the committee and asking them questions and deliberating together on what we should do or what disposition there should be of Bill C-84.

Within the options with which I feel comfortable, I do not agree with the bill and, accordingly, when it passes, I will be insisting that it pass on division. I have no problem with the bill going to committee at the earliest possible date. As a member of that committee I will do what I can to see we have an early meeting of the steering committee, before we resume sitting in January, and that a work schedule is set for the committee so that we can do the things I think should be done.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I know there a number of senators present who want to pass Bill C-84 through second reading today and send it to the Senate committee on energy. I do not intend to delay that matter beyond today. However, I wish to participate in this debate because Senator Kelly, the pilot of this bill, made what I thought was one of the most unusual speeches I have heard for a long time.

From his vantage point he probably has a recollection of the history of Petro-Canada, when it was introduced and what it has done since then, that is somewhat different than mine. My vantage point is not from when Petro-Canada was organized but later on from the position of being in the cabinet and at cabinet meetings dealing with energy policy, particularly gas and oil policy. It is unfortunate that we constantly see the government attempting to rewrite history. However, I am not accusing Senator Kelly of that; perhaps he does not know any better.

Senator Kelly talked about partial privatization. Honourable senators, we had that experience with the CDC and it does not work. It is not fair to the people who put up money for some of the shares of what was, or still is, a Crown corporation and then have it said that it will be used as an instrument of government policy. Whether or not one has consideration for profit, if people are asked to buy shares in a company, the government has an obligation to realize that profit is the motive. I do not think there is any argument about that. We never argued about it. When CDC was partially privatized, instructions went out to run it as if it were a private corporation and that the interest of the shareholders was paramount.

Senator Kelly stated today that we will be selling 25 per cent of Petro-Canada, but that it will still be government controlled. That is not fair. What is more, that is not the way it turns out. I hope he will correct that, because surely he knows that 25 per cent of Petro-Canada cannot be sold off, which I suppose is equivalent to approximately $2 billion worth, and then expect those shareholders to allow it to remain an instrument of government policy.

What was so unusual about Senator Kelly's speech was that he went on to say that Petro-Canada had ceased to be an instrument of government policy six years ago. Why, Senator Kelly, do you want it to be government controlled now, if it has ceased to be, and will not be, an instrument of government policy in the future? Those types of arguments do not hang together.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Those are the people who gave us the National Energy Program. You should talk about that.

Senator Olson: You claim you do not have a national energy policy.

Senator Simard: Why don't you go back to Alberta and tell them about the energy policy that was great for western Canada.

Senator Olson: I do all the time. I know that there are far more people in Alberta today—

• (1210)

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Adjourn the debate.

Senator Olson: I cannot. Does Senator Simard wish to adjourn it? If they want to do that, then it is up to them.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Simard: I am just trying to shut you up and to stop you from saying such nonsense before Christmas.

Senator Olson: There are far more people in Alberta today who understand what happened beyond the type of propaganda that Senator Kelly is trying to perpetuate.

I honestly and sincerely believe that we need a Petro-Canada to be an instrument of government policy. A great many people know, while some do not, that Canada is one of the most blessed countries in the world when it comes to hydrocarbons. We have 900 billion barrels of oil in the tar sands in Alberta. It costs a little bit more to process oil out of those tar sands than it does to run some of the cheaper operations such as those in the Middle East. We cannot compete with those operations directly, unless some political barriers are put between the oil getting out of the ground and being bought here. A well similar to one drilled in the Middle East would cost between $250,000 and $350,000 here. I am referring to a well which will produce several thousand barrels per day of light, sweet crude. The oil needs to be shipped here from the Middle East. We cannot compete with that. Thus, we have a choice to make. Are we to do anything to make ourselves self-sufficient based on Canadian resources? Or are we to remain at the mercy of political whim in the Middle East in particular, but also in other places such as Venezuela and wherever else cheap oil is produced?

It has already been demonstrated that we want some independence in this country through the large contribution that was made to the development of Hibernia. The oil coming out of that field will be some of the most expensive in the world. However, I will not object to it because I know that it has some economic value to the people in the eastern part of Canada, in particular Newfoundland. However, let us not kid ourselves about the cost of that oil compared to what is available on the international market.

We know where the tar sands are. We know something about the cost of extracting oil from them. I think we need to understand that this is something for Canada to continue to develop so that we can have some security of supply.

The production of oil in Alberta from the so-called conventional fields is going down at a rate of about 100,000 barrels per day per year. Well over 1 million barrels per day are being produced now, but the stock is declining. We need a company in Canada which is big enough and strong enough financially to engage in that type of activity. It will take probably a minimum of $3 billion or $4 billion and about six years' lead time to put in a tar sands processing plant before the oil can come on stream. Perhaps if we were in a real hurry, we could do it a little bit faster.

Yet, if Petro-Canada is about to be privatized, who will attempt to develop the tar sands? I do not know who will do it. I think it is pretty clear that there are about two or three oil companies left in Canada which have the financial strength to take on an obligation such as that. There is Exxon. Perhaps Shell Oil has enough in terms of resources. Maybe the Irvings have, but I do not know. I am not sure they want to invest $3 billion or $4 billion in that type of project.

I know if the Government of Canada does not take the responsibility through a corporation such as Petro-Canada to do this type of thing then I do not believe anyone else will. As big and powerful as Exxon is, it is not about to invest $4 billion or $5 billion of its money in tar sand processing plants unless it is given a guarantee that, after it spends all that money and waits for five or six years for the oil to come on stream, it will receive a return high enough to justify the initial investment. If a company is looking after the interests of its shareholders, then that is what it is expected to do.

I do not want to keep the house long this afternoon. However, Senator Kelly talked about the window that Petro-Canada provided to the oil and gas industry as if it were some kind of farce. I was here when it happened. I am not sure what happened prior to 1980, but I know what happened after the National Energy Program was announced in the fall of 1980. Even at that time, which was five or six years after Petro-Canada was set up, there was near-complete ignorance of how the real world looked in the so-called oil patch. We modified the National Energy Program to a great extent as a result of predictions that were made during the period in which the policy was brought out. Those predictions were that the cost of oil would rise to $70 or $80 a barrel, something it never did; it got about halfway there, but it never went as high as $80. At that time, the international market started to back off again. So all these things that the Conservatives, and in particular Premier Lougheed, accused the federal government of doing we never did.

One example of that is the throughput tax which was to escalate at 15 per cent per thousand cubic feet until it reached 75 per cent. That never happened.

Talking about this window, I remember going to Calgary and asking senior presidents of several oil companies, including the Canadian Petroleum Association, if they would help us with the window that we needed so that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in Ottawa would know what was going on in the oil patch. That was done because there were a great many things in the policy which did not work. One of them was with respect to the Canadian ownership requirement which was completely changed inside of two months.

I never heard anyone here or in Alberta acknowledge that that was a fact. The reason for that is simple. They did not know how to go about it. Yet, we set up what was called the Alberta Technical Advisory Committee in Alberta to advise the government on a weekly, if not a daily, basis with regard to what some of the requirements of the National Energy Program would be. We asked the government to modify them enough so that the regulations could become reasonably practical. Those are the facts of what happened. Those are not the myths that are being carried on today, 11 years later. They talk as if the $70 per barrel that was predicted actually happened, but it never did.

• (1220)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): You could speak again on this at third reading.

Senator Olson: We know what happened at the third reading stage of Bill C-62. I expect the same thing would happen on this bill.

I will not continue much longer unless I am provoked. However, I will not leave the record with the kind of inaccurate recollection of history that Senator Kelly related when he introduced this bill. Those things cannot go unchallenged, as far as I am concerned.

I ask this: Why do we want to privatize Petro-Canada? Does it have to be an enterprise that is commercially expanding all the time? I do not think so. Is it to satisfy the president, Mr. Hopper? He is complaining that he needs $500 million to carry on certain activities. If they are so important, why does the government not give him permission to borrow it? I am not sure that he needs to do that, in any event. If you want the private sector to do it, let them do it.

Hibernia, the Beaufort Sea and the tar sands plants in Alberta will not be able to function without government help. At OSLO the government put up only a small percentage of the money, but when the federal government backed out, all other oil companies backed out also.

Let's call a spade a spade. Senator Kelly asks why one company should have preferential treatment by the government. If you look at the history of Alberta, the companies that have put up the risk capital in the first place have always had preferential treatment. When the Government of Alberta set up the gathering system for natural gas in Alberta, they set up the Alberta Gas Transmission Company. They were given preferential treatment, with much government money going into the development of that facility.

Today there is a company called the Alberta Energy Company that was given preferential treatment, including the exclusive rights to the Suffield Military Station. At the time they were given the exclusive rights to that station, there was estimated to be at least $4 billion worth of gas under it. Everyone who knows anything about the industry knew it was there; they knew exactly where to find it, and they knew the costs. But they gave it all to the Alberta Energy Company. I do not disagree with that. By the way, it is right beside my ranch. The government kept a large part of the shares and the rest of the shares were sold to Albertans. Why shouldn't they have special treatment?

I should like to ask this: What is the alternative? What will happen if we do not have Petro-Canada as an instrument of government policy? The energy policy in this country will be run almost entirely by Exxon. They will dictate the energy policy in this country if the government abdicates its responsibility to do so. There are a few other companies such as Irving in the Maritimes, but they are not in the same league as Exxon to do these multi-billion dollar projects that will be needed in Canada.

Senator Kelly said that there are only 16 integrated oil companies left in Canada. There may be 16 integrated companies that have both upstream and downstream capability, but I suggest that there are not more than three or four companies that have the size and strength needed to carry out some of the projects that are obvious to anyone who wants to look at Canada's oil and gas requirements in the future. I hope the government will reconsider this bill.

You cannot have a partial privatization of Petro-Canada. If we sell the company, there will be no corporation as knowledgable and deeply involved in the industry that has the capability to be the instrument of government policy in developing Canada's resources—resources that we know we have. I am not advocating another filibuster at the present time, but I hope we can persuade the government to get off this tack, because we need Petro-Canada. If the executive officers who are running Petro-Canada at the present time do not understand that, change them. There are many capable people in this country besides those who keep crying for $500 million more to expand a company that perhaps does not need to be expanded in the commercial sense.

Senator Simard is indicating that he agrees that there is a lot of sense in what I am saying. I am happy about that.

Senator Simard: No, please. Do you want to be here until New Year's Day?

Senator Olson: If he is agreeing, he is demonstrating good sense. I hope honourable senators on both sides of the house will thoroughly examine what will happen if we try to partially privatize Petro-Canada. I am convinced that it will not work. We need this company in order to continue developing the resources that are known to exist in this country.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Kelly speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I should like to say how much I appreciate the interventions from Senator Hays and Senator Olson. I hope that Senator Olson will read the Debates of the Senate carefully, because I think some of the things he felt I said I did not, in fact, say. On the other hand, I enjoyed his intervention. I am sure we will have time to talk about those things further. Therefore, I move second reading of Bill C-84.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kelly, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

[Senator Olson.]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if all senators agree, I move that all remaining orders, motions and inquiries stand.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1230)

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, before I move the adjournment motion for January 14, I want to put on the record the committee schedule for the coming weeks. By my count, we have 11 bills plus the Supplementary Estimates (B) in committee.

Before the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, we have three bills: the multiculturalism bill; the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute Bill; and the bill to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, which has been before the committee since June 7. I understand that committee will be meeting during the week of January 7.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has three bills before it. Bill C-69 has been there for some time. The government would like to have that bill as soon as possible, since it has a $1 billion impact on the fiscal plan and it would be in the interests of everyone if we got that bill moving.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Is that the bill that is before the British Columbia courts?

Senator Doody: Yes, but there is an amendment planned either at the committee stage or at third reading, to try to resolve that problem. I am sure it will be dealt with in the committee hearings.

The Estimates, of course, are also before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Bill C-34, to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development, has been in that committee for quite some time.

Honourable senators, there are two bills before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs: Bill C-43, the abortion bill; and Bill C-81, to implement the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods.

The Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples is dealing with Bill C-68, the Yukon mining bill.

Before the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries we have Bill C-74, which was given second reading yesterday.

As you all know, honourable senators, Bill C-84, the Petro-Canada bill, has just been referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

Further, the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications now has two bills before it: the Port Wardens bill, which was given second reading this morning, and Bill C-40, the broadcasting bill, which Senator MacDonald referred to earlier today.

Honourable senators, that is a very full work schedule. The committee members who will be meeting during the week of January 7 will constitute a fairly large section of the Senate itself. If anyone thinks that the Senate is having two weeks off, they are mistaken. It will only be a very select few who will have that.

Senator Frith: Should we go through and find out who are our escapees until January 14?

Senator Doody: The Citizen will probably publish that. I notice, honourable senators, that the Citizen still reports that the Senate sits on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays. It is what I would call "investigative journalism."

Senator Frith: Is it the expectation that all these committees will be meeting during the week of January 7?

Senator Doody: It is my hope that they will, but obviously some of these bills are not as pressing as others. I will be consulting with the chairmen and deputy chairmen of the various committees to see what we can schedule and how many of these bills can be handled.

Senator Frith: Should we take it then that, if one is a member of a committee, one should plan on being here?

Senator Doody: Yes, with the exception of those on the restaurant committee, but even that is a moot point at this time.

Honourable senators, I want to take this opportunity to extend greetings to my colleagues on both sides of this chamber and to wish them well for the coming year. I rather hope that the next year, 1991, will be somewhat more serene—if I can understate the case—than the last few months have been.

I would also like to extend our thanks and good wishes to the staff, who have served us so well under the most difficult conditions. I am referring to the pages, the people at the Table, the Hansard staff, the messengers and the security people, all of whom have worked inhuman hours under terrible conditions but have remained loyal, faithful and true. We thank them and wish them all the very best and look forward to seeing them after Christmas.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think it would be risky for me to say anything more than that I second and support Senator Doody's comments.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, before I put the final question on the adjournment, I, too, should like to add my best wishes to all senators and staff and to note that a number of the pages will be leaving us. They were on temporary staff because of the circumstances and they will not be returning when we come back on January 14. On behalf of the Senate I wish to extend to them our very sincere thanks for coming in to help us.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish you all a Merry Christmas and a happy, prosperous, healthy and peaceful 1991.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, January 14, 1991, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, January 14, 1991

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, during the adjournment period I received a number of petitions against the goods and services tax which I would now like to present to the Senate.

The first petition contains about 25 signatures and is from the area around Toronto and Brampton, in Ontario.

I have a second petition from the Ottawa-Hull area, also on the same subject.

My third petition is from St-Sylvestre, Quebec, and also concerns the GST. It contains about 25 signatures.

The fourth petition, on the same subject, is from the Ottawa area.

I have a fifth petition on the same subject.

In each case, the petition starts as follows:

> WHEREAS the new universal 7 per cent tax on goods and services adopted by the Conservative government will create serious, unfair and undue hardship for Canadians;
>
> WHEREAS this tax constitutes an unprecedented attack on the already meager incomes of Canadians, . . .

In concluding, it says:

> THEREFORE, we humbly pray and call upon senators and members of the House of Commons, who truly represent the people, to do everything in their power to block the new goods and services tax, and we demand an immediate election.

Those are the concluding remarks of each petition.

I have here a sixth petition from the area around Montreal, Longueuil and St-Hubert, in Quebec.

The seventh petition is from Rivière des Prairies, Quebec, in the Montreal area.

My eighth petition is also from Rivière des Prairies, Quebec, still on the same subject.

Here is a ninth petition, again from Rivière des Prairies and from Dorval, Quebec.

So far, from Rivière des Prairies alone, we have about 150 or 200 signatures.

I have three more here, also from Rivière des Prairies. Including the Montreal area, we have about 200 or 300 signatures.

This makes a total of 14 petitions, each containing from 20 to 25 signatures, which means about 280 to 300 names altogether.

Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have four petitions with approximately 23 to 25 names on each asking that the Senate do everything in its power to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. Of course, it is well known that that has already passed, but these petitions arrived after the last opportunity to present them to the Senate. Therefore, I would like to table these petitions today.

Senator C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Senator Olson, I missed what you said. I wonder if you could repeat it.

Senator Olson: I stated that I had received and wished to present four more petitions with approximately 23 to 25 names on each one, asking that the Senate stop or prevent the introduction of the bill on the GST, but it well known that has already passed, however illegally that happened. These petitions came to my office after the last opportunity I had to present them to the Senate and I felt that Senator Doody particularly, but all senators, would like to know who these people are and that they are just as opposed now as they ever were to this tax.

[Translation]

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present three petitions containing a total of 87 signatures, all from residents of New Brunswick.

These are petitions I was unable to present before this tax came into effect. When I spoke to some of these people, they told me they were even more opposed to the tax today than they were before it came into effect.

FISHERIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SIXTH REPORT OF FISHERIES COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries, presented the following report:

Monday, January 14, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries has the honour to present its

SIXTH REPORT

Your Committee to which was referred the Bill C-74, An Act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof, has in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, December 20, 1990, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

BRENDA M. ROBERTSON
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Robertson, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

DEPRESSION IN WESTERN CANADA—CONTINGENCY PLANS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I know that there are a number of extremely important matters occupying the time of the government these days, such as the crisis in the Gulf and a number of other matters. However, so that I can report to a number of Canadians in western Canada, I should like to ask the minister whether or not the government is developing any contingency plans to deal with the depression which now exists. The Minister will know that the government has only of late begun to use what it refers to as the "R" word—"R" standing for recession. Broadly defined, a recession means two consecutive quarters of negative growth. However, the part of Canada about which I am speaking, which covers a large part of Alberta and almost all of the province of Saskatchewan, qualifies and has qualified as a depression area for many quarters. Apparently a depression is defined as four consecutive quarters of negative growth. We have had that and more, particularly in the agriculture sector, for perhaps up to 10 or 12 quarters. Is the government preparing any contingency plans to deal with this very serious situation?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have no announcement to make today on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I was not talking only about the Minister of Agriculture who has a primary responsibility for some of this. From what I have read he has come forward with some programs which are of no value at all to those farmers who are in immediate need of some help.

Since we adjourned for our recess on December 21 I have spent some time looking at some other parts of the economy in western Canada. I have found that there are thousands of people who are now unemployed and who are reaching the stage at which their unemployment insurance benefits are almost over. For proof of this we have but to look to the so-called food banks and the line-ups at the welfare offices in various places. These are the Canadians about whom I am talking, as well as the situation concerning a very large part of the agricultural community.

I am not asking my questions facetiously. These people want to know whether any plans are being developed. What they particularly want to know is whether or not the government is aware that these are the economic conditions which prevail today. If so, is the government now preparing some plans to deal with situations in which Canadians are living at levels completely below anything that we as a Parliament should tolerate?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if there are announcements to be made in the area of economic policy, or indeed social policy, in particular concerning any changes to be made to any of the present programs or policies of the government in the areas to which the honourable senator is referring, then they would be made by the responsible ministers at the appropriate time and not by me in the course of the oral question period of the Senate.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the minister seems to be reluctant to understand or to comprehend the question. I am trying to put it in very simple terms so that even he can understand, no matter what he is trying to duck. I did not ask him if he is ready to make any announcements; I asked him if there were any contingency plans under way to deal with this very serious situation. Are such plans being considered by the government?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that in itself would be an announcement. I tell the honourable senator that the economic situation in the country and the impact of fiscal and monetary policy on the economy is under constant review by the government. I remind him that interest rates, for example—an area that used to be of some concern to him—

Senator Olson: And still is.

Senator Murray: —and still is, I am glad to note—have fallen by 200 bases points in the last little while. Inflation continues to abate. That being the case, we can, with some confidence, expect that the conditions are being established not only for a recovery but for a resurgence of stable economic growth and prosperity in this country.

Senator Olson: I take it that it would be with the concurrence of the Leader of the Government that I report to these people who are interested that the government, to date at least, is not sufficiently aware of the seriousness of the desperate situation that people find themselves in when they are unable to obtain the bare necessities of life? I take it that the government is unwilling to acknowledge that it is even working on a solution to this situation?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the policies followed by this government since 1984 have resulted in a period of sustained prosperity unmatched in the recent history of the country. That is a fact.

From time to time the honourable senator rises in this chamber and refers to particular indices of economic conditions in the country. For example, he has talked about business bankruptcies.

Senator Olson: That is a fairly important subject.

Senator Murray: I take these matters seriously, especially when the honourable senator places on the record statistics purporting to deal with these matters. I have examined some of the statistics that he placed on the record at various times before Christmas, and found that I was quite right in asking him to put these matters into their proper context. While indeed the bankruptcy rate is higher now than it has been in the last couple of years, the fact of the matter is that within the past three or four years half a million new business establishments have been created in Canada.

The entirely negative interpretation that the honourable senator places on many of these statistics turns out to be rather unwarranted when seen in the context of the overall performance of the economy.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like the minister to know that I regard this situation as serious. There are many Canadians who are suffering considerably. I shall bring this subject up every day until the government at least acknowledges that the situation exists. If you are going to solve a problem, the first thing you have to do is acknowledge that a problem exists. Apparently, according to the minister's replies, this government is unaware of what the real world looks like out there. I hope that attitude will change.

To help the minister put things into their proper context, if one does not have enough money to buy food or make payments on one's house, then one is in a pretty desperate situation. If the government is not going to do anything about that situation in this country—we brag about having such a great standard of living, yet there are desperately poor people in this country—then the rest does not matter. That is what governing is all about. I hope that the minister gets the message before too long.

● (1420)

Senator Murray: Again, unemployment has risen, and the honourable senator would concentrate on that statistic. Of course, it merits the attention of those people responsible for public policy. However, the honourable senator should not neglect to point out at the same time that employment has grown in the last little while by about 200,000 jobs. So it is important, the honourable senator must know, to place these matters in their proper perspective, lest politicians talk the country into a worse recession than we are in now.

Senator Thériault: As you did in 1980-81!

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what the Leader has just said may be nice rhetoric, and it may be a bit of an excuse that the minister and his colleagues intend to use. However, I am surprised that he forgot one other thing—that there may have been another time back in history when unemployment was at these levels. I can tell him one thing: There has never been a time in my memory, and I have been here quite a while, when unemployment levels were this high and opportunities to obtain the basic needs of life—food, clothing and shelter—were less available to those people who need them desperately. That is what I am talking about.

Is the government going to do anything about it, or is it going to let people line up at the food banks and wait for not hours but days and yet still insufficient supplies are coming in from the people who volunteer them to help these people get along for a day or a week.

That is what is going on in the real world right now. It is not like it has been in the past 40 or 50 years. This government must take up its responsibility and take that fact into account when it begins considering government policy or, as the honourable senator has pointed out, public policy. All I am asking is whether you are taking these matters into account. If so far you have not done that, which is what you have indicated, it is a completely clear indication that you do not know what is going on out there in the real world, or you do not care.

QUEBEC

CONSTITUTIONAL CHANGE—POSSIBILITY OF REFERENDUM—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable Senators, I would like to ask Senator Murray a question that is directly within his area of ministerial responsibility. It has to do with the question of a referendum being held in the province of Quebec. Can the minister tell us whether it is the policy of Premier Bourassa's government, clearly and unconditionally, not to have any form of referendum in Quebec prior to the next election in that province?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not, of course, announce policy on behalf of the Government of Quebec.

Senator Olson: Or anyone else!

Senator Murray: I do not know that the Government of Quebec has taken the position that the honourable senator seems to attribute to it.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I am not asking Senator Murray to announce policy for the province of Quebec, but to tell us what its announced policy is. Senator Murray will know that the Prime Minister has stated categorically that there would be no referendum held in the province of Quebec as a result of any report which might be brought down from the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, even though that commission might recommend such a referendum. A member of the National Assembly, Mr. Jacques Parizeau, is driving very hard for the holding of such a referendum, as is Mr. Lucien Bouchard, a member of the House of Commons. I am wondering whether Premier Bourassa or his minister, the Honourable Gil Rèmillard, has said anything with respect to the question of a referendum to do with constitutional change in the province of Quebec.

Senator Murray: The short answer to the honourable senator's question is, no. The government of Quebec appointed the BélangerCampeau Commission and it is, I assume, awaiting the report of that commission. To the best of my knowledge no statement has been made by Premier Bourassa or anyone on his behalf either including or excluding the possibility of a referendum at any time at all.

Further to that, I must say that the statement attributed by Senator Austin to Prime Minister Mulroney was never made. The Prime Minister has not, as Senator Austin put it, stated that no referendum would be held in Quebec. We have no way of knowing that.

Senator Austin: I would go along with Senator Murray's statement about the position of the province of Quebec, because my research has not shown any commitment by that province towards any position regarding a referendum. Premier Bourassa has kept his position quite open and flexible; but early in this year the Prime Minister said there would be no referendum. I will bring the relevant material with me to the next Question Period.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

COMMITMENT AND DEPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN TROOPS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I see by the Globe and Mail that Canada could be sending 5,000 troops to Iraq. I would note that tomorrow, January 15, is the deadline set by the United Nations for Iraq to retreat from Kuwait. I understand that tomorrow there is to be a debate in the other place concerning this particular issue, but I would suggest that that is almost too late because a war could be in progress by 12 o'clock midnight.

As we know, Secretary of State Baker has briefed the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Could the Leader of the Government advise us whether, if America declares war on Iraq in the near future, Canada would be prepared to send ground troops to the Persian Gulf?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my friend began his question by saying, "I see by the Globe and Mail that Canada is going to send 5,000 troops to the gulf area." The honourable senator would, indeed, be better advised to rely on the statements of the Minister of National Defence to the effect that Canada does not intend to deploy ground troops in the Persian Gulf. As for tomorrow's debate in the House of Commons, I would also remind the honourable senator that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will tonight have as witnesses the Right Honourable, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Clark, and the Minister and Associate Minister of National Finance, Mr. McKnight and Miss Collins. So honourable senators will have an opportunity to discuss these matters in further detail with those ministers.

Senator Bonnell: That was a very nice speech but it was not an answer to my question. The honourable gentleman beat around the bush but he did not answer my question.

If the Americans should declare war against Iraq, is Canada prepared to send ground troops to Iraq?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, any question that begins with "if" is a hypothetical question and is not admitted in the oral Question Period.

I have already quoted the response of the Minister of National Defence, Mr. McKnight, as having said that Canada does not intend to deploy ground troops in the Persian Gulf. That is our position.

• (1430)

Senator Bonnell: The Leader of the Government is now telling me the position is that we are not sending ground troops, if that is the position. I know what the minister is quoted as saying, but every time a minister is quoted as saying something in the press, the Leader of the Government tells us that it is a press report and that what the minister actually said was something different. The minister who speaks for this government is here in the Senate today. Why can he not answer the question? If what the press says Mr. McKnight said is the truth, then stand up and say it—do not be afraid to support the government in which he is a minister—or else stand up and lie.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have quoted what the Minister of National Defence has said.

Senator Bonnell: I want to know what you say, not what the minister is quoted by the press as having said. I want to know what you say here in the Senate.

Senator Murray: I am speaking on behalf of the government, including the Minister of National Defence. Perhaps it will assist if I can simply put it in different words. I tell the honourable senator that the government is giving, and has given, no consideration to sending ground troops to the Persian Gulf. I trust that will suffice.

DEPLOYMENT OF MEDICAL UNIT

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Has the government given any consideration to sending a medical unit to the Gulf in case hostilities break out?

POSSIBLE CHANGE IN ROLE OF CANADIAN FORCES

Hon. John B. Stewart: Does the government have plans to change the role of Canadian forces in the Gulf?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, of course we are considering, in cooperation with and on the advice of the Canadian military, the role that Canada is now playing and the role that it might play under a variety of other scenarios, but no change has been decided upon in the role that was assigned to Canadian forces at the time of their deployment to that area.

Senator Stewart: My understanding is that the role of the Canadian forces now is to participate in the enforcement of the UN embargo. What other roles has the government considered?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, yes, it is correct to say that the role of the forces now in the area is to participate in the enforcement of the UN embargo. That includes, more specifically, air cover for our ships and for the ships of other members of the coalition in the southern Gulf area, and protection also for allied assets in Saudi Arabia. I do not think it would be appropriate for me, in the course of the oral Question Period, to try to discuss the various other scenarios that have been envisaged or the possible roles that Canada might play in the event of those scenarios coming to pass.

These are matters that my friend may wish to explore further, if he can, with Mr. Clark and Mr. McKnight when they appear before the Senate finance committee tonight. It is a matter which, I am sure, will be debated in the other place tomorrow when the responsible ministers, including the Prime Minister, take part in the debate.

TIMING OF RECALL OF PARLIAMENT TO DEBATE GULF CRISIS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Does the honourable minister think that the government has been fair with the Canadian people, by calling Parliament together only on the eve of the deadline, without giving any thought for the debate? Why did the government not recall Parliament two weeks ago to discuss this important matter?

We know that the government is preparing for war, because in newspaper articles we read that the casualties are to be treated at a military hospital in Halifax.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, it would be very lax, imprudent and irresponsible for the government and the military not to make contingency arrangements in the event of hostilities breaking out. This the military command has done.

The honourable senator reproaches the government for not having recalled Parliament earlier. I remind the honourable senator that our military commitment in the Persian Gulf since August arises out of our membership in the United Nations and our commitment to the United Nations Charter.

I further remind the honourable senator that on two occasions—I believe on October 23 and November 29—the House of Commons passed resolutions of support for the United Nations policy in the Persian Gulf. One of those resolutions, that of October 23, was supported by Her Majesty's loyal Opposition. Respecting the second, as I recall events, only supporters of the government voted for that resolution; but the honourable senator cannot infer from that that members of Parliament did not have ample opportunity to discuss and vote on the question of support that Canada has given to the United Nations resolution concerning the Persian Gulf.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I understand the House of Commons gave its support for sanctions and, after the deadline, other measures, but the House of Commons never supported action committing Canadian troops to participate in a war. It is one thing to support sanctions and another to commit Canadian troops to a war in the Middle East. As far as I know, Parliament has not had an opportunity to debate whether Canada should go to war.

I also ask the leader to tell us what Secretary Baker told Mr. Clark in his briefing yesterday and what he told the government today regarding the likelihood of war taking place some time after midnight tomorrow.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not have the texts of the various UN resolutions in front of me.

Senator Bonnell: I am not asking about the UN resolutions; I am asking what Secretary Baker has told Mr. Clark and other members of the government.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is not asking about the resolutions, but I think I should tell him something about them because they are relevant to the points he has made. At least one UN resolution, if not several, authorizes the use of all possible measures to get Iraq out of Kuwait, to enforce sanctions and to repel further aggression.

The honourable senator is wrong to say that the House of Commons did not have an opportunity to discuss the possible use of force and the involvement of all necessary measures. But the House of Commons had plenty of opportunity to discuss, and did discuss, the involvement of Canadian troops and their possible involvement in the application of force to that situation. Indeed, in voting against the last resolution passed by the House of Commons on November 29, the Honourable Herb Grey and other spokesmen for Her Majesty's loyal Opposition explicitly made the point that the resolution, in their view, seemed to authorize the use of force by the coalition and by Canadian troops in particular.

● (1440)

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, may I ask what is the purpose of having the House of Commons brought back at this time? The Leader of the Government has told us that the resolutions adopted earlier by the House of Commons support the use of force in certain circumstances. Presumably those circumstances are either present or imminent. What is the point of having the House of Commons return to resolve, according to what the Leader of the Government has said, what that house already has resolved?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the situation in the gulf has manifestly and seriously deteriorated in recent weeks, indeed in recent days. The point in bringing back the House of Commons is to enable the government to have the benefit of the views of the members of that house on the Gulf situation, Canada's response to that situation, as well as on the action we should take to support our commitment to the United Nations and its resolutions. It seems clear to me that this is a situation in which Parliament will want to be heard and in which the government will have the opportunity to report to the elected representatives.

Senator Stewart: Earlier today the Leader of the Government in the Senate told us that the role of the Canadian forces in the Gulf area had not changed. He now tells us that conditions in the Gulf have deteriorated. I should like to ask him for what the government is now seeking the support of the House of Commons in the present circumstances?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not think I should try to anticipate what the Prime Minister or other colleagues may wish to tell the House of Commons tomorrow, or, indeed, what the ministers may wish to tell the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance tonight or the House of Commons committee tomorrow evening.

CANADIAN POLICY—REQUEST FOR DISCLOSURE OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government could make available to members of the Senate the information Mr. Clark gave to Mr. Baker before he went to Iraq last week and perhaps to the Secretary General of the United Nations with respect to Canada's ideas to avert war. Apparently Mr. Clark made some recommendations. Could those recommendations, which apparently were not listened to by Iraq, be tabled in the Senate so that we may understand what Canada's position was at that time, as given to the Secretary General of the United Nations?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the Prime Minister wrote a letter to Secretary General Perez de Cuellar of the United Nations suggesting the elements of a possible peaceful solution to the crisis in the Gulf. That letter has not been made public. I do not know whether it can be or will be immediately made public, but this is an area on which senators may wish to question Mr. Clark tonight when he appears before the committee. He would be in a position, I think, to outline the four elements of the letter that Prime Minister Mulroney sent to Mr. Perez de Cuellar.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, Mr. Clark can appear before the committee but he is not here in this house now. Senator Murray, however, is here representing the government and he can say whether the letter can or cannot be tabled. He can table the letter along with a response from the Secretary General, Mr. de Cuellar. He can also find out for us what reply the Secretary General brought back for Mr. Clark after meeting with representatives of Iraq, a response besides the statement that it is all in God's hands. Did the Secretary General provide any further detail, in response to the Prime Minister's letter, as to exactly what the situation is over there, or should all of us in this country be issued gas masks?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, first, to state what is obvious, this is a very grave and sensitive area of discussion. Surely the honourable senator would not expect me to improvise in discussing these matters. I do not have the letter that Prime Minister Mulroney sent to Mr. Perez de Cuellar. There were, as I have indicated, four elements to it. These also form the subject matter of consultations between Canada, as represented by Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Clark, and the leaders of various other nations. The Secretary General of the United Nations welcomed the letter and I think generally subscribed to the elements in it. Further than that I cannot go at the moment.

Mr. Perez de Cuellar is reporting this very afternoon to the Security Council in New York. He has already stated publicly that the word "withdrawal" was never used by Saddam Hussein in their discussions. If I may interpret his words, he has made it clear that the time for talk and diplomacy is over.

Senator Bonnell: Can the minister assure this house that, if in the near future America should attack Kuwait or Iraq, Canada will not become involved unless the United Nations declares war against Kuwait or Iraq? Should the Americans proceed on their own, can we be assured that we will not necessarily be involved in a war unless the UN declares war?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Senator Bonnell seems to forget that the war began on August 2, when Iraq invaded the sovereign state of Kuwait. It has maintained an army of occupation in that country and, indeed, has purported to annex Kuwait as a province of Iraq. That is when the war started.

What happened subsequently, and what may happen from here on in, has to do with the United Nations, with the capacity of the members of the United Nations acting collectively to repel aggression by one state against another.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I ask the minister whether he can assure us that we will not act alone as a country unless the United Nations acts. Can he assure us that we will somehow or other fall in with the United Nations? Should Israel, for example, or America attack Kuwait, can we as Canadians be assured that we will not follow suit unless the United Nations does so?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we are there in conformity with 12 United Nations resolutions. The actions we have taken so far and the actions that we will take in the future are in conformity with those resolutions.

Senator Bonnell: In other words, then, the minister is telling us that we will not be involved in a war unless the United Nations declares war, after which we might become involved.

Senator Murray: I refer the honourable senator to the 12 resolutions that have already been passed by the United Nations Security Council and to the presence in the Gulf region of a coalition of more than 20 nations who are there to deter further aggression, who are there in support of all of those resolutions, including the most recent one, which set a deadline of January 15 for the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait.

Senator Bonnell: I agree with what the minister has said, but those resolutions had to do with sanctions and with the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait. I know of no resolution before the United Nations that states that we will declare war on January 15 or January 17. As I said, those resolutions had to do with withdrawal or sanctions.

I am trying to get the minister to assure this house that Canada will not be involved in a war unless the United Nations declares war, through another resolution or by some other means.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there are 1,860 Canadian military personnel now serving in the Gulf area. As I indicated earlier in response to a question put by Senator Stewart, they are there to provide, among other things, air cover for ships in the central and southern Gulf and to protect allied assets in Saudi Arabia.

There is a war on. The war was launched on August 2 when Iraq invaded Kuwait. What does the honourable senator think would happen if Canadian forces there, on the sea or in the air, were required to protect the assets of the coalition? There would be firing and, I presume, there would be casualties on one side or the other or both. Honourable senators, there is a military presence in the Gulf and it is there in the event of hostilities breaking out.

The honourable senator talks about going to war. The war started on August 2 when Iraq invaded Kuwait. The resolution of the United Nations called upon Iraq to get out of Kuwait by January 15.

From the day on which the United Nations was founded in 1945, it has been central to the concept of that assembly that the world community, acting together, would be in a position to deter aggression and, in the final analysis or in the final resort, to deter aggression by the use of force if necessary. That is the prospect now before us as a result of the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and the refusal of Iraq to respect the resolutions of the United Nations.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, three or four times the Leader of the Government in the Senate has told us that a condition of war has prevailed since August 2, 1990. That is the answer the Leader of the Government in the Senate gives to Senator Bonnell's questions.

● (1450)

The question that is begging to be asked is this: Is the Leader of the Government saying that Canada has been at war since August 2, 1990? If not, is some form of action that could be described as war-like action now contemplated by the government?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, our military presence in the Persian Gulf, like our presence in Korea 40 years ago,arises out of our responsibilities under the United Nations Charter to which Canada subscribes.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Stewart: Why do you not answer the question? You can make that general statement, but it does not answer the question. You have told us four times that war prevails. Is Canada at war with Iraq?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Canada is in the Gulf in a defensive position to provide cover for our ships and the ships of allied nations and to provide cover for allied assets in Saudi Arabia. If fired upon—

Senator Stewart: I think we had better direct our questions to a minister who knows some answers.

Senator Murray: In my reply to his very first question, I invited the honourable senator to address questions tonight to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance when the Ministers of External Affairs and National Defence are present, and he may do that. He does not like the answers that are being given, of course, but that is his problem.

Senator Frith: Should we ask him whether he agrees with you that we are at war with Iraq?

Senator Murray: I have not said that we are at war with Iraq, but that a state of war existed from August 2 when Iraq invaded Kuwait, and the United Nations responded to that. Canada, acting upon its responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations is, together with a number of other nations, present in a military role in the Gulf.

Senator Frith: You know better than that. Of course it is not a state of war.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has told us many times before that our ships and planes are in the Gulf to keep the embargo going and the sanctions against Iraq, that they were not there in any offensive role at all. He is now saying that we are in a state of war, that war was declared on August 2, that any time now we could have injured people returning home and be in an offensive role and involved in a war. We are not going to be there to protect the embargo and the sanctions, but we are going to change.

The Prime Minister tells us that there will be no change in the role of Canadian forces without Parliament being recalled and parliamentarians being given the opportunity to discuss it. Now the minister tells us that it is going to change, that we are going to have injured troops going to Halifax to be patched up, and all the injured people will be coming home because somehow or other these ships and planes will have a different role and that we are at war; is that right?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator should read what I have said. I have not said that the role has changed. I have said that the war started on August 2 when Iraq invaded Kuwait.

Senator Frith: What war? Who are the combatants?

Senator Bonnell: Is that the war between Canadian troops and some other country? If so, who are the two combatants? Our troops against whom? Whom are we fighting against in this war?

Senator Murray: Once again, for the third time, Canadian forces are there with the military forces of a number of other countries in conformity with their responsibilities under the United Nations Charter and in response to a series of 12 resolutions passed by the United Nations Security Council.

Senator Bonnell: All that I agree with. I know about the United Nations resolutions. What I want to know is, if we are likely to be going to war sometime after tomorrow night at 12 o'clock—according to you we are at war now—are our troops going to be playing a different role than peace-keeping and looking after the sanctions of supplies going to Iraq? Are we going to get into an offensive role?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that is a matter that I am sure senators can discuss with the two ministers tonight and which will be debated in the next few days in the House of Commons.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to raise a point of order. That is about the fourth time today that the Leader of the Government in the Senate has dismissed a question from Senator Bonnell on the basis that he can ask that question in a committee or somewhere else. The members of this house have the right to direct questions to the minister and they at least can expect a reply. If the minister does not have the letter with him, or he does not have the authority to make it public, that is one thing. He could at least acknowledge that he heard the question and say that he would attempt to get the letter and authorization to give it, but simply to disregard Parliament and suggest Senator Bonnell can go somewhere else and get his answers is a contemptuous way to act and I hope that the minister will not try it anymore.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): That is not a point of order. What I indicated is that it would not be appropriate for me to speculate on the future role of Canadian forces in the Gulf, under the present circumstances. This is a matter that the responsible ministers, and especially the Prime Minister, will want to address in the course of debate on this matter.

Senator Olson: However, you told Senator Bonnell that he can go to the committee and receive an answer. He may not be a member of that committee. I do not know if he is or not, but I do know that he has a right to ask the question and he also has the right to a decent reply, which should be that the minister would attempt to obtain the information that would be required for a reply and indeed an answer to the question. That is the point. I think this contempt for Parliament and simply dismissing things from the floor of this chamber is wrong and the minister should advise this chamber that he is not going to do that any more.

EFFECT OF ECONOMIC SANCTIONS—EXTENSION OF PERIOD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government about sanctions. It seems to me from what I have read in the last number of days that economic sanctions against Iraq are working extremely well. Is the Government of Canada doing everything that it can to extend that period of sanctions to prevent the actual shooting war from happening?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The purpose of the sanctions was to apply such economic pressure on Iraq that Saddam Hussein would withdraw his troops from Kuwait. The sanctions, according to one definition, may be working but they are not working so as to have the desired effect. It is very clear that they are not having the desired effect. All one has to do is examine what Saddam Hussein has said. He has made Kuwait the 13th province of Iraq, he says, and there the matter rests.

Senator Davey: You then are saying to me that the sanctions have failed? Is that the position you are taking.

Senator Murray: The sanctions have failed to produce the desired result.

Senator Davey: Surely we could take more time. We are talking about a shooting war, about a war in which Americans and presumably Canadians will be killed. Surely someone somewhere is prepared to state that we have to give the sanctions more time? I share your concern about Hussein. He is a terrible man. But are we not prepared to wait just a little longer? Why must we act now?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, since the honourable senator is a faithful reader of the Toronto Star, he will want to read Richard Gwyn on that subject in yesterday's edition of that paper.

Senator Davey: I did not read Richard Gwyn. I do not always read Richard Gwyn. I sometimes agree with what he says. Was he saying that we should take action right away and blow up the world?

Senator Murray: The point he made, and which others are making, is that sanctions are not apt to have the desired effect of forcing Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait.

Senator Davey: For the record, then, has the Government of Canada written off sanctions?

Senator Murray: The Government of Canada accepts the fact that sanctions have not had the desired effect, which is to produce the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait. It is clear from everything that Saddam Hussein has said that he has no intention of withdrawing from Kuwait.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, if sanctions have not had the desired effect, and if the Canadian forces are in the Persian Gulf to enforce sanctions, when will the Canadian forces be withdrawn from the Gulf?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am now glad to know that the Liberal Party has hit upon a policy of its own, which is that the Canadian forces should be withdrawn from the Gulf.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): He did not say that. He was asking his question as a corollary to what you said.

Senator Murray: That should make for a very interesting debate. The honourable senator can put forward his position tonight. I take it that it is now his position and that of his party that the Canadian forces should be withdrawn from the Persian Gulf.

Senator Stewart: No. I am trying to see how two propositions stated by the Leader of the Government in the Senate go together. He has told us that the Canadian forces in the Gulf have a certain role, namely, to enforce sanctions.

Senator Murray: More than that.

Senator Bonnell: What other role?

Senator Stewart: And, more important, to enforce the embargoes.

Senator Murray: Yes, to enforce the embargoes, which are there in conformity with 12 United Nations resolutions. As I have indicated, the Canadian forces have a responsibility to protect Canadian shipping and Canadian ships and ships of other members of the coalition in the central and southern Gulf, as well as to protect allied assets in Saudi Arabia and to participate in the defence of Saudi Arabia.

Senator Stewart: The Canadian ships to which the minister refers are the ships which are there for the purpose of enforcing the embargo. The minister is now telling us that the economic sanctions, in the opinion of the government, have not worked.

Senator Murray: They have not produced the desired effect—that is to say, the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait. That is my statement. It is obvious.

Senator Stewart: So the sanctions role act of this war drama—the war drama which began on August 2, to go back to what Senator Murray said earlier—is over, and we now move into a new act. Yet the Leader of the Government in the Senate will not tell us what role Canada will play in this new act.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, what the honourable senator refers to as the new act is that there is a deadline of midnight tomorrow night for the withdrawal of Iraqi troops from Kuwait. Diplomatic and other efforts to have Iraq conform to the United Nations resolution in this respect have so far failed. In the event the deadline passes, what action the allied countries will take and what Canada's role will be is a matter that will be discussed. This is why Parliament has been recalled.

Senator Frith: The allied forces will decide but Parliament is coming back to talk about a UN resolution?

Senator Murray: Yes.

[Senator Stewart.]

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, is the minister suggesting that "allies" means United Nations? In other words, the United Nations will have to attack some time after tomorrow midnight Eastern Standard Time, or is it Iraqi time? After that, Canada will jump in to support the United Nations. Is that what the Minister is trying to tell us?

Senator Murray: If Iraq has not withdrawn from Kuwait, or given the signal that it is withdrawing from Kuwait by midnight tomorrow, we will be in a situation in which the deadline in the United Nations resolution has not been respected. The United Nations itself—and Mr. Perez de Cuellar is reporting to the Security Council this afternoon—and those countries which are allied in a military sense in the Gulf now will have a series of decisions to take.

Senator Bonnell: The resolution of the United Nations did not state that we will be going to war on January 15 or 16. That could be left for up to six months, and sometime after that we could take this extra force, which does not necessarily mean war. The United Nations never said that it would go to war after January 15. I am trying to ensure that Canada does not get involved in a war because Israel, America or some other country which the minister calls an ally starts a war and we have to come in to finish it for them.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not think there is anything I can usefully add to what I have already said with regard to the situation. The United Nations resolution imposed a deadline of January 15 on Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait. All I have said is that the United Nations—and Secretary General Perez de Cuellar is reporting to it this afternoon—and the countries which are allied in the military presence in the Gulf will have a decision to make after January 15 as to what they should do if the deadline in the resolution has not been respected.

As I told the honourable senator earlier, from the very foundation of the United Nations it was always contemplated that if necessary the world community would have recourse to force in order to carry out these resolutions.

Senator Bonnell: What you are telling us now is that the Secretary General and the United Nations will have a decision to make after midnight, January 15 as to whether or not force is to be used. The United Nations must make that decision. It will not be made by Israel, America or some other country. The United Nations will make the decision and we will then see what happens. Is that what you are telling us?

Senator Murray: The United Nations has already passed 12 resolutions. Whether it will pass a thirteenth, I do not know. I do not know that there is another draft resolution circulating.

Senator Bonnell: Are you telling me, then, that a thirteenth resolution is necessary before we can go to war?

Senator Murray: I am not telling the honourable senator that a thirteenth resolsution is necessary before force would be used, no.

Senator Bonnell: Are you telling me that the United Nations must make a decision before we go to war?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the United Nations has made its decision. It set January 15 as the deadline for the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait. Those countries which are allied in the Gulf and which have a military presence there in support of the United Nations resolutions will have a decision to make.

Senator Bonnell: You are now saying that the countries have a decision to make. Can the United States, Israel, or some other country make the decision to go to war and we will then have to follow; or does the United Nations have to make the decision to go to war before we become involved? What I want to know is who makes that decision.

Senator Murray: From the beginning, Canada has made its own decisions with regard to the deployment of Canadian troops and as to their role. That will continue to be the case.

Senator Bonnell: In other words, we are going to continue to have sanctions and not get into an offensive role, which is the decision Canada made.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, from the beginning Canada has made its own decisions with regard to deployment of Canadian forces and their role in the Gulf, and we will continue to make our own decisions in that respect.

Senator Bonnell: That is not a very good answer, given the situation.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, three months ago I placed three questions on the Order Paper dealing with terrorism and public safety, oil spills and energy conservation respectively. I have had no answers to them. I have risen twice in the chamber to ask when I shall receive a reply and I have not yet received an answer. At the risk of sounding repetitive, is there some reason for the delay? If so, what is the reason for not answering questions 56, 57 and 58 on the Order Paper, and when can I expect answers to them?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, there is always some difficulty with answering questions relating to the areas with which my honourable friend is dealing. I have not gone into the matter in detail, but I have inquired whether there are reasons why these questions, or some of them, cannot be answered. If they cannot be answered, I have encouraged the appropriate authorities to say so and to answer those questions that can be answered. However, I shall make a further inquiry.

Senator Kenny: Thank you.

THE ENVIRONMENT

STORAGE AND DESTRUCTION OF TOXIC RUBBLE—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, in the same vein, at the end of last October I asked the Leader of the Government when we could expect a transportable incinerator to be used to clean up the toxic rubble from St-Basile-le-Grand. That question was a repeat of one I had asked the previous April. Since then I have not received a reply. When can we expect this incinerator to be operational, and when will the toxic rubble be cleaned up? Why is the government taking so long to answer these questions?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall make another inquiry on behalf of the honourable senator. I have no idea at this point what the answer will be, but I shall ask again.

ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION TABLED

HERITAGE RAILWAY STATIONS PROTECTION ACT—DESIGNATION OF STATIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 60 on the Order Paper—by Senator Marshall.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, January 15, 1991

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

ABORTION

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-43

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable Senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 7,741 women from across Canada, which petition was signed during the First World Summit: Woman and the Many Dimensions of Power, opposing Bill C-43 and petitioning the Senate to reject the legislation and acknowledges a woman's right to choose.

THE ESTIMATES, 1990-1991

SEVENTEENTH REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the seventeenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Supplementary Estimates (B) for the fiscal year 1990-1991.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this House.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix p. 5033.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, I move that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

YUKON PLACER MINING ACT
YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST REPORT OF ABORIGINAL PEOPLES COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Len Marchand, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples, presented the following report:

Tuesday, January 15, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples has the honour to present its

FIRST REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-68, An Act to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act and the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and to make provision for the application of certain orders, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, December 20, 1990, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

LEN MARCHAND
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senators, when shall the bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Marchand, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY VETERANS' HEALTH CARE REGULATIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable Senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, January 22, 1991, I will move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marsden:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the Veterans Health Care Regulations (SOR/90-594, dated August 28, 1990) and on all other matters concerning veterans affairs which may arise from time to time.

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rizzuto:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources have power to sit on Thursday, January 17, at 4:00 o'clock in the afternoon, in order to hear the Chairman of Petro-Canada in relation to Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the National Petroleum Company of Canada, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Senate met yesterday and is meeting again today because it adjourned on December 21 to yesterday's date. Had we not adjourned to January 14, but to February 18 as the other place did, perhaps we would have been called back anyway, although there has been no motion put before the Senate by the government to parallel the one now before the House of Commons. I am not making any suggestions; I am simply saying that we are back under other auspices than the House of Commons, namely, because the Senate was not called back but itself adjourned to January 14.

There are a number of bills before the Senate, as well as before committees. Since many senators attended committee meetings last week, and because it was originally intended that the Senate resume earlier than the House of Commons in the New Year, can the Acting Leader of the Government and the House Leader, Senator Doody, tell us what plans he has for the Senate? By that I mean what plans the government has for the Senate for the rest of this week and thereafter.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not in a position to read the shopping list at this point. The Conservative caucus meets on Wednesday mornings at 9 o'clock. At that time I will be reviewing the program with my colleagues and hopefully will be in a position to report to the Senate at 2 o'clock tomorrow on what the schedule will be for the Senate in the near future.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should report that Senator Murray will not be here for Question Period today because he is detained on cabinet business.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

CANADIAN POSITION—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, because I do not see Senator Murray in his place, I assume cabinet is probably—

Senator Bonnell: In trouble!

Senator Olson: —preoccupied with matters of extreme international concern, namely, the Gulf crisis and related matters.

However, I wonder if the Deputy Leader of the Government could bring us up to date on what is likely to happen in the Gulf and what Canada's position will be later this day inasmuch as this is the day of determination for what is contained in UN Resolution 678. I ask that so that Canadians may know, and, more specifically, senators may know, what the status of Canada will be with respect to this crisis.

• (1410)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have no further information to pass on to honourable senators. As Senator Olson is aware, last night a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance met and heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Defence and the Associate Minister of Defence. I would suggest that the information that was gathered by senators at that time would be the most current information there is. Certainly it is the most current information that I have.

Senator Olson: A few minutes ago I was listening to the television proceedings from the other place. The Prime Minister was updating that House of Parliament with respect to the current situation and what the situation is likely to be at a later hour or date. I was hoping, therefore, that there would be some information passed on to this chamber.

Senator Doody: If I am given any information from the government source, I shall certainly pass it along to honourable senators.

STRIKING OF MEDAL FOR CANADIAN FORCES IN GULF CONFLICT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. I suspect he will not have the answer today, but I should like him to inform the Leader of the Government and possibly supply the answer tomorrow.

In the near future there could be an outbreak of hostilities in the Gulf. We do not know if that will take place under the flag of the United Nations, under the flag of a single country or under that of a coalition. Canadian troops are now in the Gulf: seamen, soldiers and airmen. These Canadian men and women are prepared to lay down their lives—in this case I am not sure exactly what for, but they are upholding the resolutions of the United Nations. Will the government and the Department of National Defence have a medal struck for these men and women who are prepared to fight in the Gulf on behalf of the United Nations?

After the Korean war, the Korean conflict or Korean peacekeeping—whatever it was—I understand that the best Canada did for the veterans was to present a little pin to them. After 25 or 30 years, that pin was presented by the Minister of Veterans Affairs to indicate that the veterans were there. The United Nations presented a medal, but the Canadian Department of National Defence presented only a pin given by the Department of Veterans Affairs. There was no medal at that time for the Canadian men and women who were prepared to lay down their lives for this country.

Will a medal be struck for those people who are prepared to fight for freedom for the United Nations or for a coalition?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I shall make an inquiry, senator.

THREAT OF IRAQI TERRORISM—PROVISION OF SECURITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I have another question for the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. Again, he may not know the answer, but he generally knows most answers.

Senator Olson: He knows more than he says.

Senator Bonnell: He does not always tell us all he knows, but he does tell us what he knows.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): So far I like it.

Senator Bonnell: There is another problem that could take place in the near future. There is the possibility of a conflict breaking out after 12 midnight tonight or tomorrow or next week or next month. As of today at midnight there is a great possibility, according to what we hear from Iraq, that there will be terrorist acts taking place all over the world. Countries such as Canada, who are prepared to tell Iraq to get out of Kuwait, could be acted upon by terrorists at our Parliament Buildings, our water supplies, our atomic energy plants, our airports and at many crucial places in this country. What steps, if any, are being taken by the Government of Canada to protect the Parliament Buildings? What steps are being taken to provide extra security at our airports and at our National Defence Headquarters? What is being done to protect the water supplies in our country? Is anything being prepared in case of terrorism in this country?

Senator Doody: I will make inquiries on behalf of the senator.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: You will make inquiries of whom?

Senator Doody: I will make inquiries of the appropriate department.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have half a dozen more questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but I will ask them tomorrow.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION
HEALTH AND WELFARE

HOSPITALS—CLOSURE OF WARDS—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on December 19, 1990, by the Honourable Raymond J. Perrault, regarding Hospitals—Closure of Wards—Request for Information. I ask that it be printed as part of today's proceedings.

(The answer follows:)

The provision of hospital services is a matter of provincial jurisdiction. That being said, there is regular consultation on health care matters among the provinces and the federal government at federal-provincial meetings.

The federal government contributes substantially to the cost of health care in British Columbia. In 1990-91, the total federal contribution to British Columbia for health was $1.7 billion.

The federal contribution to health care costs in British Columbia has increased every year since 1977.

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before we leave Question Period, it should be noted that we would have hoped, on a day like today, that Senator Murray could have been here to answer questions. Debate is proceeding in the other place. Senator Bonnell, and perhaps others, has a number of questions that he wanted to put. I think it reasonable of the Senate to expect the government to be in a position to answer questions every day; but certainly, on a day like today, January 15, 1991, we would have thought that someone from the government would have been here and able to answer questions.

We understand that this is a day when the Government Leader's other ministerial responsibilities are also pressing, but an important part of those responsibilities, certainly from our point of view, is his responsibility to speak for the government in this place. We are left on this important day without anyone here able to answer questions on the government's position. It is beyond exaggeration to say how important today is to the country and, therefore, to its Senate.

FISHERIES ACT
CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Gérald J. Comeau moved the third reading of Bill C-74, to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES BILL

SECOND READING—POINT OF ORDER—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, for the second reading of the Bill S-18, An Act to further the aspirations of the aboriginal peoples of Canada,

And on the Point of Order concerning the admissibility of the Bill.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to speak on Senator Doody's point of order, and I am simply waiting for more research. I intend to do so when I have received that information.

Order stands.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Norman K. Atkins moved the second reading of Bill C-260, to amend the Canada Pension Plan (spousal agreement).

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to Bill C-260, a private member's bill that was introduced in the House of Commons by the honourable member for Burlington, Mr. Bill Kempling. The bill proposes an amendment to the Canada Pension Plan provisions governing the division of unadjusted pensionable earnings, known as credit splitting, between spouses on marriage breakdown.

Honourable senators may or may not know that there is a long and uneasy history behind the current credit-splitting provisions. I should like to touch briefly upon some of the key developments in the evolution of these provisions so that both the intent of and the implications associated with Bill C-260 are well understood.

The introduction of credit splitting under the Canada Pension Plan in 1978 was designed to ensure that, on marriage breakdown, each spouse would retain a fair share of Canada Pension Plan protection towards which they both contributed during the marriage. Prior to that, the spouse who had not worked outside of the home ceased to be entitled to any Canada Pension Plan benefits in respect of the contributor when the marriage ended in divorce or legal annulment. It was also Parliament's intent that the right to apply for and receive a division of pension credits should not be affected by the terms of a spousal agreement. Indeed, at the time, the department was saying publicly that the Minister of National Health and Welfare was not bound by the provisions of agreements between spouses or former spouses.

In 1983 the Pension Appeals Board handed down what is known as the Preece decision. The ruling stated that a clause in a separation agreement or court order which indicated that the spouses had waived their respective rights of further claim to each other's property was significant evidence to indicate that the spouses had already agreed not to divide Canada Pension Plan credits. While this was in direct contradiction to the objective of the legislation and to the official information provided to the public, the Pension Appeals Board is currently the final level of appeal under the Canada Pension Plan, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare has no choice but to abide by decisions of the board.

In an effort to restore the original intent, the Canada Pension Plan was amended in 1986 to include a specific provision in the legislation stipulating that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not bound by the terms of property waivers in spousal agreements signed after the date the amending legislation was tabled, which was June 4, 1986.

Ideally, it would have been desirable to make the application of this provision retroactive to the August 1983 date of the Preece decision, and that, in essence, is what Bill C-260 proposes to do. In reality, however, there were too many unanswered legal and administrative questions associated with unlimited retroactivity, and accordingly a decision was made to act immediately and to err on the side of caution rather than to do nothing until these questions could be resolved.

Despite this limited approach, it was also recognized that, prior to the Pension Appeal Board's decision being made public, many individuals signed spousal agreements containing waivers on the basis of the government's advice. While the advice was given in good faith, we have a moral responsibility toward those individuals. Accordingly, the Honourable Perrin Beatty, shortly after he became minister in 1988, took the decision to use a remedial provision in the Canada Pension Plan to provide credits to those individuals whose applications were denied because they signed spousal agreements based on advice or information from the department that such agreements had no effect on their right to a division of Canada Pension Plan credits. Under this provision, the non-applicant spouse's credits are not affected in any way. Once again, however, this provision has only limited application; it cannot help anyone who might have been adversely affected by the Pension Appeals Board decisions.

Bill C-260 proposes to provide the Minister of National Health and Welfare with the discretion to apply similar remedy in the case of any or all individuals who signed spousal agreements prior to June 4, 1986. This amendment has the effect of making some very minor, albeit important, adjustments and is intended to preserve the effect of the bill as originally drafted, but to avoid certain situations that legal advice indicated might otherwise occur. For example, it avoids possible claims by people who signed an agreement but were ineligible for other reasons, such as failure to apply within the time limit. It also ensures that persons who explicitly and deliberately agreed not to divide the credits, as was their right according to the Preece decision, do not receive the same relief that this bill would provide to those who lost their rights inadvertently. It also means that the individuals concerned will not have to request that the minister take remedial action, as required by subsection 66(4), of the Canada Pension Plan. This will greatly simplify the process for them. In all other respects, the amendment maintains the new power that Bill C-260 proposes to give to the minister. It will also allow the minister to help many very deserving people, numbering potentially in the thousands. Virtually all of these people are women who have been denied something that should have been their right.

Honourable senators, I hope that this house will give its support to Bill C-260, a bill amending the Canada Pension Plan provisions governing the division of unadjusted pensionable earnings, known as credit splitting, between spouses on marriage breakdown.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with a couple of interruptions I listened to what Senator Atkins had to say. I did not know anything about the bill until I listened to his intervention. I have a question for him that perhaps he or someone can answer tomorrow or today, if possible. What is the government's position on this bill? My impression is that it creates a remedy for an undesirable and unsatisfactory situation. One way it does that is to give the minister certain discretionary powers to remedy injustices. It may well be that the minister is embarassed to give himself these powers and therefore wanted a private member to bring in the bill so that his natural modesty would enable him to say that a private member has asked him to do this, and that he was not asking to have this power himself. That seems to me improbable.

So my question is: Why is this not a government bill? It not being a government bill, what is the government's position with respect to it? In particular, what is the minister's position, because he is the one who will be given the main powers under the amendment?

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, I am not really sure why it was a private member's bill. I know that it went through the whole process in the House of Commons, was referred to the committee on two occasions and received unanimous support. I am sorry that you were unaware of this until now. I gave a copy of my address to Senator Marsden. Obviously we are proposing to send it to committee. At that time the private member is more than prepared to meet with the committee, as, I am sure, is the minister.

● (1430)

Senator Frith: Senator Marsden had not mentioned that she received a copy of your notes, and, on her and our behalf, I thank you for that courtesy. We will no doubt adjourn the debate in Senator Marsden's name. If she agrees that the bill should be referred to a committee, and both the private member—I believe it is Mr. Kempling—and the minister are prepared to appear, obviously someone will be in a position to answer my question. So I will adjourn the debate on second reading of this bill in the name of Senator Marsden.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Marsden, debate adjourned.

WORKERS MOURNING DAY BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

[Senator Atkins]

Second reading of the Bill C-223, An Act respecting a Day of Mourning for Persons Killed or Injured in the Workplace.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this order should stand in the name of Senator Spivak.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands in name of Senator Spivak.

CANADIAN POLAR COMMISSION BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelleher, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Muir, for the second reading of the Bill C-72, An Act to establish the Canadian Polar Commission and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof.—(Honourable Senator Watt).

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators, I remember when the idea for a polar commission first emerged in 1980. It was to give Canada a focal point when dealing with northern issues on the international scene. It was to provide Canada with a forum by which northerners and northern institutions could come together on northern issues.

I have recently touched base with Inuit organizations on Bill C-72. I have been told that a great deal of consultation took place on the formation of this bill. It seems that people are generally satisfied with the overall thrust of the proposed legislation and that they are anxious to see it become law.

Organizations such as the Inuit Circumpolar Conference, which is an international organization, are looking forward to working with the polar commission as soon as it is set up and running. Many northerners will view the establishment of the commission as a concrete step by the government in recognizing the importance of addressing polar issues nationally and internationally.

Having said this, I have a few minor concerns with the wording in Bill C-72. The bill states that the polar commission will be managed by a board of 12 people who have knowledge of or experience with the north. This criterion is not enough. A majority of the commission's board must consist of northerners, not so-called "northern experts" from the south. If the commission is to succeed, it will be important for the government to appoint northerners to a majority of the 12 positions on the commission's board. I would also urge that the government ensure that the commission's board always include at least one northerner each from northern Quebec and Labrador.

There is also the question of the location of the Polar Commission's southern office somewhere in the National Capital Region. I hope the commission's office will not be located at 10 Wellington Street, which houses the office of the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs. The commission must maintain an arm's-length relationship with the government if it is to fulfil its role. I stress that the Polar Commission must not become a captive of the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs. This would defeat the very purpose of setting up such a body.

Finally, I have to ask myself why Bill C-72 states that the commission's northern office and northern board meetings must take place north of the 60th parallel. North of the 60th parallel includes all of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, but it does not include much of northern Quebec or Labrador.

North-of-60 is a bad definition of Canada's north, and it is one to which I strongly object. I hope this shortcoming can be corrected in the not too distant future.

Honourable senators, I have two possible amendments to correct the North-of-60 problem in Bill C-72. The first would be to delete subsection 14(2), replacing it with:

> (2) At least one office of the Commission shall be at a place in the Northwest Territories, the Yukon Territory, Labrador, or that part of Quebec that is north of 55 degrees north latitude.

The second possible amendment would be to delete subsection 15(2), replacing it with:

> At least half of the Board's meetings in each year shall be held at places in the Northwest Territories, the Yukon Territory, Labrador, or that part of Quebec that is north of 55 degrees north latitude.

Nevertheless, honourable senators, I recommend the quick passage of Bill C-72 at this time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I understand that Senator Watt is suggesting some amendments rather than proposing them as amendments to the bill at this stage. I take it that the Chairman of the committee to which this bill is referred will be able to consider the possibility of such amendments being placed before the committee. Indeed, Senator Watt may wish to make them himself at the committee and the committee can then decide whether or not to report the bill with his proposed amendments.

With that understanding I support the position of Senator Watt that the bill should now receive second reading and be referred to the appropriate committee.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): The witnesses could comment on the proposed amendments at that time.

Senator Frith: Exactly.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kelleher, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples.

CENTENNIAL FLAME RESEARCH AWARD BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Nancy E. Teed moved the second reading of Bill C-258, respecting the establishment of the Centennial Flame Research Award to publicize the contributions to Canadian public life of persons with disabilities.

She said: Honourable senators, it is a pleasure for me to move second reading of this bill, which was introduced in the other place by the honourable Patrick Boyer, the Member of Parliament for Etobicoke-Lakeshore.

The purpose of the bill is to ensure that the money thrown in the fountain surrounding the Centennial Flame on Parliament Hill in Ottawa will be used to help disabled persons in public life. Honourable senators, this award will not necessarily be limited to one person, but any person who would receive this award, which will be given on an annual basis, would be chosen by the Parliamentary Committee on the Status of Disabled Persons.

It is our intention that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology and, at the appropriate time, I will make that motion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I can see no reason why this bill should not immediately be referred to committee, since none of my colleagues have displayed an interest in intervening at the second reading debate. I assume the sponsor of the bill, Senator Teed, is in a position to guarantee, or at least to assure us, that appropriate witnesses will be called to explain the bill and its objectives and that interested members of the public will be asked to appear before the committee.

It seems to me, therefore, that further debate at this stage in the Senate will serve no useful objective, because we need more information. Any questions can be raised in committee or, eventually, at third reading.

For that reason I do not object to this bill receiving second reading now in the context of Senator Teed's assurance that she will be moving, after second reading, that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Teed, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

PENITENTIARY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Earl A. Hastings moved the second reading of Bill S-19, to amend the Penitentiary Act to reinstate the statutory visitation privileges of Members of Parliament.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of Bill S-19 is to amend the Penitentiary Act to reinstate—and I emphasize the word "reinstate"—the statutory visitation privileges of Members of Parliament.

This bill, honourable senators, had its origins in this chamber by way of an inquiry which I placed before honourable senators on October 31, 1989. At that time I gave a very comprehensive history of the right of visitation of parliamentary members to Her Majesty's penitentiaries which was created in 1834 by the Acts of Assembly granted to members of the council and others. It is the right to visit Her Majesty's penitentiaries at pleasure. That right continued to exist in the Penitentiary Act from 1867 until 1961 when it was dropped from the legislation. At that time an assurance was given that the right of visitation would be protected by way of regulation. Honourable senators, that never occurred. From 1961 until 1967 there was no right of visitation to Her Majesty's penitentiaries.

From 1967 to 1980 a grant was made by the commissioner, through his directors, that members of Parliament could visit penitentiaries; but, of course, certain conditions were placed on this and, specifically, gone were the words "at pleasure."

When the warden deemed it appropriate, a member of Parliament could visit a penitentiary. From 1980 to 1987 another caveat was put on the visit of a member of Parliament, which was under normal circumstances. From that time, under that directive—I am referring now to commissioner's directives—the warden could say who could visit and when, and could restrict or control any movement within the institution by members of Parliament.

As a result of that inquiry the matter was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. The committee carried on an extensive examination of the right and what had transpired since 1961, and held three or four meetings. One of the witnesses called was the Commissioner of Correctional Services Canada. In one particular instance committee members asked for an opinion from Mr. C. G. Eglington, a noted counsel and constitutional expert in Canada, who gave the committee certain observations. Where he is trying to delineate between legislation, regulations and commissioner's directives, he found that by way of a directive—and I quote from his opinion:

> it would clearly be unwise to rest a right to anything on a Directive which may be changed at will, is not regarded by the Commissioner as law binding him, and which is not subject to any Parliamentary scrutiny.

From 1961 to 1987 that parliamentary right rested on a commissioner's directive under circumstances I have just quoted, which could be changed at will. It is not regarded by the commissioner as law binding him and is not subject to parliamentary scrunity. Indeed, the commissioner changed it three or four times during those periods, as I indicated earlier on, adding thereto restrictions and additions at his will. Indeed, on January 1, 1987, he withdrew the right completely and it was not carried in any directive between 1987 and 1989, when it was quickly reimposed as a result of the inquiry I made in this chamber. He says that directives are weak on which to rest the right, where it is found now.

Continuing with his opinion, he stated:

> This carries one back to the Regulations. These clearly are law, will bind the Commissioner and are theoretically subject to parliamentary scrutiny and control. Regulations are, nonetheless, as Senator Roebuck—

—a distinguished senator of this house—

> —noted long ago solely within the power of the Government. What the Government grants it may withdraw. The implication is that a secure right must rest on legislation. Such a basis is, moreover, consonant with the history of the matter—

That is, it is consonant with the history of this right to visit a penitentiary. He goes on to say:

> —and, it may well be thought, with the importance and dignity of the matter. There is a seemliness about a statutory provision in this instance altogether lacking in an amendment to the Regulations. For what is involved, at bottom, is an assertion of a right to be enjoyed against the Crown by Members of Parliament. Those Members should be involved in its creation, and not be the recipients of a grant from the Governor in Council.

His final opinion was:

> . . . I am of the opinion that a Bill to amend the Penitentiary Act by the insertion of a right of access like unto that historically accorded to Members of Parliament would not be a Bill to which section 53 of the Constitution Acts 1867-1982 applies.

As a result of the committee hearings the committee reported to honourable senators in its twenty-ninth report. The essence of its report is:

> Your Committee heard from the Commissioner of the Correctional Service of Canada and received independent legal counsel.

I have just quoted that. The report goes on to say:

> Counsel advised that the most appropriate course was to confer the right of access to penitentiaries for Parliamentarians by an amendment to the Penitentiaries Act, and your Committee concurs in this advice.
> Senator Hastings introduced Bill S-19, "An Act to amend the Penitentiary Act to reinstate visitation privileges of Members of Parliament," on November 14, 1990, and your Committee is supportive of his action.

That was the twenty-ninth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and was signed by Nathan Nurgitz, the chairman of the committee.

As a result, Honourable Senator, Bill S-19 reinstates that right of visitation statutorily into the Canadian Penitentiaries Act. The inquiry was referred to and studied by the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee. If honourable senators adopt Bill S-19 at second reading, it will be my intention to refer the bill back to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for final approval.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, in responding to Senator Hastings, there is not much more that can be said other than was mentioned in the twenty-ninth report of the committee. To observe the pattern that we have for all bills, it should go back to committee. I am sure that the committee will give it a reasonably quick look. It already has some reasonably good knowledge of the serious matters involved. I see no reason why that bill should not now more forward. If Senator Hastings is prepared to have the matter referred at this point to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, I see nothing wrong with that.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Hastings speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Hastings: I have nothing to add, honourable senators, except that I will comply with the suggestion that was just made by the chairman of the committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Hastings, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON AMENDING FORMULAE— DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consult broadly with Canadians and inquire into and report upon the process for amending the Constitution of Canada, including, where appropriate, proposals for amending one or more of the amending formulae, with particular reference to:

(i) the role of the Canadian public in the process;

(ii) the effectiveness of the existing process and formulae for securing constitutional amendments; and

(iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including those set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada";

That twelve Members of the House of Commons and five Members of the Senate be the Members of the Special Joint Committee, such Members on the part of the Senate to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion;

That the Committee have the power to appoint from among its Members such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee, or a sub-committee, have power to travel, and hold public hearings, within Canada;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings or of proceedings of its sub-committees, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons;

That the parties represented on the Committee be granted allocations for expert assistance with the Committee work in proportion to the representation of the said parties in the House of Commons;

That the Committee be empowered to retain the service of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Joint Chairmen;

That the Committee submit its report not later than July 1, 1991, provided that, if the Senate is not then sitting, the report will be deemed submitted on the day such report is deposited with the Clerk of the House of Commons and with the Clerk of the Senate;

That changes in membership of the Committee for Members of the House of Commons be effective immediately after notification thereof, signed by the Member acting as Chief Whip of any recognized party, has been filed with the Clerk of the Committee;

That the quorum of the Committee be nine Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken so long as both Houses are represented, and the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six Members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly,

And on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that the motion be amended by deleting the fourth paragraph thereof and substituting the following therefor:

iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including an amending formula based on regional representation, as proposed in the 1971 Victoria Charter; and a formula based on seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population, with a clause added stipulating that Quebec must be one of the seven provinces; and the alternatives set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I mentioned, or hinted, yesterday that I am going to support Senator MacEachen's amendment, which honourable senators might remember only adds the Victoria Formula to the "alternatives" to be considered by the committee. That is the essence of it. I am waiting to hear whether the government supports the amendment, and, if so, I can see no reason for not proceeding to passage of the resolution.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, may I ask a question respecting the proposed amendment? Is it the intention that the Victoria Formula be looked at inter alia? Is it the intention to give special attention to that over and above other models, or am I mistaken?

Senator Frith: No, I think Senator Kinsella is quite right; and, to reassure him, let us have a look at what it says on page iii of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for today.

We see on that page the following:

> That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consult broadly with Canadians and inquire into and report upon the process for amending the Constitution of Canada, including, where appropriate, proposals for amending one or more of the amending formulae, with particular reference to:
>
> (i) the role of the Canadian public in the process;
>
> (ii) the effectiveness of the existing process and formulae for securing constitutional amendments; and
>
> (iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including those set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada";

That is a document which we all have.

Then, on page iv, it states:

> And on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that the motion be amended by deleting the fourth paragraph thereof and substituting the following therefor:

I think that should read the third paragraph. That is a misprint in the Minutes or a misprint in the motion.

It then goes on to state:

> iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae—

Which is the same wording:

> —including an amending formula based on regional representation, as proposed in the 1971 Victoria Charter; and a formula based on seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population, with a clause added stipulating that Quebec must be one of the seven provinces;

That is the added part. Then I go back to the original, which states:

> and the alternatives set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada";

It seems to me that Senator Kinsella is quite right. What it does is take the original paragraph (iii), which says that attention should be given to "alternatives to the current process and formulae". It then inserts the two other subjects to be looked at by the committee, and then adds the government paper. So it adds two other possibilities for consideration by the committee, but does not delete anything from the original motion.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, as Senator Frith has said, it is really paragraph (iii) rather than paragraph (iv) which should be deleted. I can see that.

I am wondering whether paragraphs (i) and (ii) are deleted, or whether they remain. It seems to me that paragraph (iii) is being substituted.

Senator Frith: I think it can only mean that paragraphs (i) and (ii) remain, because, on any count, paragraph (iv), if you are not using the small Roman Numerals but using the actual paragraphs, would be the one that deals with the committee having power to appoint, and so forth. So I think it is quite clear that it is referring to paragraph (iii), and when you see the wording is maintained from paragraph (iii) except for the insert, then I think it is quite clear that paragraphs (i) and (ii) remain.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérald Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I would like to speak to the motion as proposed.

Senator Frith: Do you wish to speak to the amendment?

Senator Beaudoin: On the main motion and the amendment.

[English]

A motion for the establishment of a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons is now before us, with a mandate to consult Canadians broadly, inquire into and report upon the process for amending the Constitution of Canada, including, where appropriate, proposals for amending one or more of the amending formulae, with particular reference to:

> (i) the role of the Canadian public in the process;
>
> (ii) the effectiveness of the existing process and formulae for securing constitutional amendments; and
>
> (iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including those set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada";

The Honourable Leader of the Opposition, on December 21, 1990, proposed an amendment to (iii) of the motion, which relates to the Victoria Formula of amendment, the regional veto formula of 1971, and alternatively a veto for Quebec to be included in the "seven provinces formula of amendment" stipulated in Section 38 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

The Honourable Senator Olson has proposed as a sub-amendment that each senator be authorized to participate in the debate before the parliamentary committee without the right to vote.

[Translation]

The resolution was adopted by the House of Commons on December 13, without amendment.

I am fully aware of the significance and merits of the two amending formulas proposed for consideration by the Leader of the Opposition, Senator MacEachen.

I myself have had an opportunity to consider and write about the history of our amending formula in the Canadian Constitution, and in fact, I have written a whole chapter on the subject. Today, our interest is again focussed on this topic, and I think it would be useful to take a few minutes—it won't take long—quickly to put the problem into its historical perspective. In 1867, the thirty-three Fathers of Confederation did not feel it was necessary to enshrine an amending formula in the Canadian Constitution. However, our constitution, like all other constitutions, had to be amended at some point. In fact, it was amended more than 20 times. As long as Canada remained a colony, from 1867 to 1931, both federal Houses would make an address to the British Parliament to amend the 1867 legislation—in other words, the British North America Act, our Constitution, now known as the Constitution Act of 1867, and in French: La Loi constitutionnelle de 1867—acting at the request of Canadians.

This situation, which was already peculiar to Canada, became a real anachronism as soon as Canada obtained its independence. In 1926, the Balfour Report recognized that the United Kingdom and the Dominions, including Canada, were equal in status and freely associated, united by common allegiance to the Queen—to the King at the time. In 1931, under the Statute of Westminster, the British Parliament recognized our political autonomy.

• (1500)

[English]

The British jurists in 1931 were quite ready to enshrine a formula of amendment in the Canadian Constitution. However, Canadians were not ready. In 1927, and again in 1930-31, Canadians tried unsuccessfully to agree on a formula of amendment. Then the British Parliament, by section 7 of the Statute of Westminster of 1931, preserved the status quo in that particular domain of constitutional amendment. Thereafter, the Canadians in 1935, 1949-50, 1960, 1964-65, 1968-71, 1976, 1978, 1979 and 1980 tried again, but without success. Finally, in 1981, the federal government and nine provincial authorities agreed on a formula of amendment which is now enshrined in sections 38 to 50 of the Constitution Act of 1982.

Since the patriation of the Constitution in 1982, the Canadian Constitution has been amended twice: In 1983, at a federal-provincial conference on aboriginal matters, on the basis of the general formula—seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the Canadian population—and again in 1987, in accordance with the bilateral formula of section 43 of the Constitution Act of 1982 involving the federal and Newfoundland authorities with respect to section 93 of the B.N.A. Act, now the Constitution Act of 1867. That amendment is termed the Constitution Amendment, 1987 Newfoundland Act.

Then came the Meech Lake Accord, accepted by the Prime Minister and ten premiers at Meech Lake on April 30, 1987, and important amendments, again by the 11, on June 3, 1987, at the Langevin Block. The House of Commons and eight legislatures ratified the accord within a little more than a year. However, one province—Newfoundland and Labrador—rescinded the ratification thereafter.

Senator Frith: You might mention what the Senate did while you are recounting this important series of events.

Senator Beaudoin: The Senate proposed some modifications. The question came to the House of Commons and, according to section 47 of the Constitution Act of 1982, the House of Commons may agree or disagree and has the final word.

Senator Frith: After the lapse of a certain period.

Senator Beaudoin: You are quite right, after the lapse of six months.

Senator Frith: The other place then repassed it.

Senator Beaudoin: The House of Commons repassed or adopted again the original proposition.

After the famous June, 1990 week—from 3 to 9—the Province of New Brunswick ratified the accord, but Manitoba and Newfoundland did not. So the Meech Lake Accord failed as a constitutional amendment.

The whole debate on the Meech Lake Accord has taught us that the amending formula contains some lacunae. That is a matter of debate, of course, but I think we may say that.

[Translation]

The three year ratification period seems too long. For amendments requiring unanimous consent, section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982, sets no time limit. Jurists are divided: some are of the opinion that the three year period applies; others maintain there is no time limit. For some people, the debate between the ten premiers and the prime minister was not transparent enough. Others claim that the 1982 formula is too cumbersome and demanding and others yet have suggested that the Canadian people should be more involved.

The motion before us, which provides for the appointment of a joint parliamentary committee to inquire into and report, is intended to answer to such criticism. It also looks into alternatives to the current amending formula.

Can our amending formula be improved? Of course!

The 1982 formula, which was a compromise solution—every constitution results from compromise—is not my favorite. It is set out in sections 36 to 50 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Therefore, I think it is a good idea to appoint a parliamentary committee to examine the question. Of course, it will not be easy to find a suitable formula, but it sure is worth trying, in my opinion.

• (1510)

[English]

I now turn my attention to the proposed amendments. I wish to be well understood. The Victoria Formula, which proposed "the four regional veto" was popular in 1970-71 and may very well be popular in many parts of Canada. Quebec has rejected the Victoria Charter, not because of the formula of amendment itself but, rather, because Quebec wanted, in June 1971, a paramountcy or priority in the field of social security. I did some research on that point and constitutional experts, jurists and political scientists agreed generally on that point. That formula has its own merit; there is absolutely no doubt about that. I have written many pages in its favour.

The second part of the amendment, the formula of a veto for Quebec to be included in the general formula of amendment of 1982—that is, seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population—is also a formula that has its own merit.

Senator Frith: With Quebec being one of the seven provinces.

Senator Beaudoin: With Quebec being one of the seven provinces. In other words, Quebec would have a veto, in that sense, built in to the general formula of amendment, which is an interesting proposition. There is no doubt about that.

The Special Joint Committee will surely consider these two formulae. But there are other formulae that could be considered, like the Australian formula of amendment based on a referendum, or the Pepin-Robarts formula of 1979. The Pepin-Robarts formula was inspired by the Australian formula of amendment, but was adapted to the Canadian situation, in the opinion of the commissioners of the Pepin-Robarts Commission.

What we proposed at that time was that an amendment may be made to the Constitution of Canada by a resolution adopted by a majority of the House of Commons and what we called the renovated Senate, or the second chamber, ratified by a referendum in Canada, but a referendum having a majority in the Atlantic provinces, in Quebec, in Ontario and in the western provinces. In other words, the Victoria Formula was based on four regional vetoes, the Pepin-Robarts amendment was based on a four region veto through a referendum, and the other amendment was through parliamentary resolution.

The Pepin-Robarts report of January 15, 1979, has outlined the reasons and motives in favour of such a formula of amendment. As honourable senators may see right now, in those three cases there is a regional veto, Quebec being one of the regions. In the second part of the amendment there is no regional veto but a veto for Quebec in the general formula of amendment.

Senator Frith: By "general formula of amendment", you mean the 1982 formula?

Senator Beaudoin: That is right, the 1982 formula, the basic one, as you quite rightly say.

[Senator Beaudoin.]

The mandate of the Special Joint Committee is not exhaustive, the way I read it. Any formula may be considered. The parliamentary committee is not restricted to the formulae outlined in the discussion paper entitled: "Amending the Constitution of Canada".

[Translation]

While we recognize, and I say so clearly, the merit of the two proposals from the opposition, I suggest that we move as quickly as possible to the creation of the parliamentary committee which would report by July 1st, 1991. I believe it is important that this committee be established as fast as possible, since the Bélanger-Campeau Commission will report on March 28, 1991, that is to say in a little over two months from now, and since the Quebec Liberal Party, now in power, will adopt a policy on the constitutional future of Quebec some time in March. So, the committee would have five months and a half.

• (1520)

[English]

I do not think that we should, at this stage of our discussion, give preference to two formulae of amendment over all the others. Is it not prejudging what the Special Joint Committee is going to recommend after a few months of inquiry and study? No doubt—and I repeat—those two formulae are of great interest. Perhaps they will be selected; I do not know. However, some others are also of great interest. Some innovative formulae may even be devised. Why not wait for the final report of the committee?

[Translation]

Certain nationalist circles in Quebec did wonder about the appropriateness or relevance of a Senate and House of Commons parliamentary commission on the amending formula. Personally I think this parliamentary commission will be very useful. First we have to get ourselves out of the current constitutional deadlock. The amendment formula has to be one of the main elements. Whatever the conclusions of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission, whatever the findings of the Quebec Liberal Party convention, the geography and the major lines of political power will always be there. Therefore it will be useful—and I conclude on this note—and even essential that the various elements which make up Canada, our country, resume the debate. Were we to opt for renewed federalism, we will be very thankful to have an amending formula geared to the needs of these times in the history of Canada. If ever Quebec were to favour a form of confederal rather than federal government, the six-month debate on the amending formula will still have been useful because negotiations will then be more properly oriented and directed.

[English]

Honourable senators, the Senate in past years has made a valuable contribution in the field of constitutional revision. Some Senate reports are quoted in academic circles, in courts and in government proceedings. Many Senate reports, or reports of joint committees of the Senate and the House of Commons have been written which may still be consulted with great benefit. We may again, I am sure, make a valuable and innovative contribution.

The mandate of the committee is large. It includes also a study of referenda and constituent assemblies. I suggest, very simply, that we get on with our study.

[Translation]

In conclusion, honourable senators, I would say that if we do have a few pearls of wisdom, why not show them off?

Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Beaudoin a question. I believe I understand the thrust of his argument, which is that, while there is merit in the two formulae suggested by the amendment, why pick them when there are other meritorious suggestions and proposals? If that is so, then why pick the paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada"? Would not the inevitable conclusion to his logic be that paragraph (iii) should end after the word "formulae"? In other words, it should read, "alternatives to the current process and formulae." In fact what it does is go on and say, "including", not "limited to" but "including those set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled: 'Amending the Constitution of Canada' ". So, in its present or original form, the proposal does, in fact, pick certain proposals suggested in a certain paper, and all that we are saying in our amendment is that we would like to put in a couple of others that would be included but not to the exclusion of any others.

Did I understand your logic correctly?

Senator Beaudoin: Yes, in the sense that, if I accurately read the paper entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada," I do not think that the government says there that we have to consider one formula and another and another.

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Beaudoin: I take it that the work of the committee is to consider any formula of amendment; and, I repeat, because I want to be very clear, senator Frith, that the amendment is proposing two very interesting proposals. There is no doubt about that. Of course, the Victoria amending formula was very popular in Canada in 1970 and 1971 and perhaps for ten years after that. It may still be popular.

Senator Frith: I understand that.

Senator Beaudoin: There are other formulae, such as the veto for Quebec, and I am certainly not going to speak against a veto for Quebec!

Senator Frith: I did not want to get into the merits of the two.

Senator Beaudoin: I think that focusing attention on two formulae is to prejudge the work of the committee, which may propose one of them or perhaps some other formula of amendment. My argument is very simple. I think that, if we now focus the whole debate on two formulae of amendment that have great merit, we prejudge the work of the committee, which may come up with another solution in six months, or may end up proposing one of those alternatives. I think we should move right now on the establishment of that committee and there will still be time after that to debate which proposal is best. In other words, my argument is based on the question of prejudgment. Suppose the committee finds a better formula of amendment. Why do we not consider the whole question right away?

Senator Frith: I think that the position taken by Senator Beaudoin, as he said, is very simple; but so is ours. The present proposal—that is, the original proposal—makes a suggestion. It goes beyond merely giving general alternatives and, to use his verb, focuses on particular ones. As an example, I take it that the word "including" means alternatives to the current process and formula and, instead of the word "including", you might just as well use the words "for example, those set out in the discussion paper." We are not suggesting that all the attention be focused on our two either; they are simply examples. The government has given an example and we are giving a couple of examples, but they are only examples, because it is the word "including". I think we are much closer than the discussion would indicate. In any event, we will want to hear Senator MacEachen on his amendment, and I believe Senator Stanbury is going to adjourn the debate.

On motion of Senator Stanbury, debated adjourned.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn:
> That the privileges of Honourable Senators having been constantly abused by the Speaker of the Senate, the Senate do advise the Prime Minister that Senator Guy Charbonneau is unfit to continue to be the Speaker of the Senate.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Petten is not here today, and I would like to make a few comments on this motion. I do so with regret. I also want to advise honourable senators that my comments will be short, perhaps mercifully short under the circumstances, and, in some respects, somewhat painful for me.

The egregious harm that was done to this place cannot, in my view, simply pass. There has to be some repair done for a number of reasons. Perhaps the most important is that if the activities, the so-called decisions of the Speaker, and the consequence of those decisions, are allowed to stand, they will be used, or could be used, as precedents for subsequent action. In my view, they simply cannot be allowed to stand.

I am not going to repeat it, but I agree with the analysis that was presented to this chamber by the mover, the Honourable Senator Stanbury. I see no great purpose in going over it, since it is well known to every senator who was present.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Are you going to supply the repairs?

Senator Olson: No, but I am going to point out—

Senator Simard: You should be the one, and a few other people on your side. The repairs should be on your side.

Senator Olson: I think that comment should be given the same seriousness that most comments from Senator Simard deserve. Unfortunately, that is the level at which he has decided his reputation will be in this chamber.

Senator Simard: We know the level you reached a few months ago.

Senator Olson: I hope Senator Simard will contain himself and make his own comments at some point, because I do not want my perfectly legitimate speech contaminated with his vicious and venomous remarks. They are not appropriate to the position.

I said that egregious harm has been done to Parliament, to this upper chamber of the Parliament of Canada, by some of the decisions and the consequent action taken in this chamber.

Honourable senators, I understand that the Leader of the Government, as well as his leader, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, and more particularly the Minister of Finance, were becoming a little impatient with Parliament, especially with this chamber, and wanted Bill C-62 passed. That I can understand. I can even understand if they wanted to amend the rules of this chamber to bring in time limitation, or the guillotine, or the many other ways of limiting debate. As I said, I can understand that, but there is a way of doing it properly. If the government wanted to do that, it could have brought in a motion or an indication that a committee of this house should take under advisement a motion or a suggestion that time allocation provision be put in our rules. However, that was not done. The government did what I think was an unfortunate and vicious thing! It usurped the integrity of the Speaker to do it, which was a despicable thing to do.

The motion itself states that "the Senate do advise the Prime Minister that Senator Guy Charbonneau is unfit to continue to be the Speaker of the Senate", because of the things that he did. I support that, regretfully. While I do not know Senator Charbonneau well, I think he is a decent human being; but I have nothing but contempt for what the Prime Minister asked him to do and what he did to this place, and the way they went about imposing time allocation or closure, or whatever one wants to call it, on the Senate. As I have said, there is a way of doing it properly, if that is what the government wanted done. I would have vigorously opposed it, as I am sure other senators might have done, but if the government had done it within the rule of law we would have had to accept it. However, the government did not, unfortunately.

As I said at the outset, I will be brief. There are a few more comments that have to be made. I hope that the Senate will repair this damage. I hope that no government leader, or any Senator supporting the government, will ever bring up these nefarious actions as a proper precedent for doing things in the future. I am sure most honourable senators will agree.

• (1540)

Another thing that occurred, that I hope will be healed—although I am not sure that it will be—is the animosity between senators on both sides who took strong positions respecting the illegal acts that took place in this chamber. I have heard some senators state that they hope the Senate will get back to the way it was before that acrimonious debate took place.

Honourable senators, I hope the Senate never goes back to the way it was. I hope that things like civility among members from both sides can be re-established; but I also believe that, prior to the debate, for the most part the Senate was irrelevant to the vast majority of the Canadian people. They did not know much about what goes on here and they did not care, notwithstanding the fact that it is the upper chamber of the houses of Parliament, that it is an important chamber, and that we do indeed spend a lot of time working on the legislative structure of Canada.

We do a lot of good work. I am not here today to make a speech about that, or to throw bouquets to this side, the other side or to anyone else. I think that if there were not a place like the Senate, that could authoritatively provide the so-called sober second thought, one would have to invent something or some body to do that job. I do not have any problem understanding that, but the vast majority of Canadian people do not understand that this job needs to be done on a continuing basis.

I hope, as I have said, that the Senate will never go back to the mode we had prior to the Goods and Services Bill, because, as I have said, it was irrelevant to most Canadians. They did not know what we were doing and they probably did not care. The Senate is no longer a gentlemen's club because there are many competent women present in the chamber today, and I do not know whether they belong to gentlemen's clubs. To be a member of some kind of an elitist club is not appropriate activity for the Senate. It needs to be visible. Perhaps it needs to have its profile raised, but there are always conflicting views about that. Some people have said that Parliament is something like your stomach: it operates best when one is unaware it is there.

I hope we are able to demonstrate weekly or monthly that we are here and understand what is going on in the real world. I do not want to get into that, because I will spend some time in the next few weeks trying to persuade the Senate that Canada is in a recession, which the government does not seem to realize. It does not seem to realize what is going on in the real world in Canada at the moment.

I understand we have other problems at the moment with respect to Canada's support for the United Nations. I can tell honourable senators that those who are suffering as a result of the recession in the part of Canada I come from is such that governing Canada and all its intricacies does not matter if we do not solve that problem. Therefore, we need to direct our attention to that situation and do something about it. It is almost as if we have not learned anything in the past 60 years. What is happening in Canada today is very much what happened in the first half of the 1930s, unfortunately for exactly the same reasons. If we do not do something about it, we will experience exactly the same consequences. Almost a whole generation of people will miss having the benefit of a country, government and Parliament that cares about what happens to people who fall out of the economic structure. That will be a speech for another day.

In the meantime, I want to say that I will support this motion, not because I have any particular ill-feeling toward Senator Charbonneau, but, as I have said, I have nothing but contempt for what he did and what he allowed himself to get into. I am sure that it is proper that we direct that message to the Prime Minister, because I am also convinced that the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister, Senator Murray, who is the Leader of the Government in this chamber, and the Honourable Mr. Harvie Andre, the Government Leader in the other place, either individually or as a group talked Senator Charbonneau into carrying out the illegal acts that I believe he was engaged in. Therefore, he is, as the resolution states, unfit to continue as Speaker of the Senate. I hope that will be corrected, and that as soon as possible we will repair the damage that has been done to the process in this house.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Kirby, debate adjourned.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Donald (Cape Breton):
> That it be taken up in the Committee of the Whole, named "Privileges", whether it is a matter of privilege for a Senator to move, as I have already done, to instruct a Standing Committee as in Motion No. 3 on the Order Paper, to wit: in order to oblige a committee to uphold its parliamentary duty, and furthermore, whether it is a matter of privilege, to abridge the pending Orders of the Day in order to bring such a motion to timely and full debate—(Honourable Senator Neiman).

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I should like to adjourn this matter in the expectation that Senator Nurgitz may wish to speak to it at some future time. Perhaps the honourable senator might like to take the adjournment to some time next week.

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

FIFTEENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fifteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, entitled: "Accessibility to Hospital Services—Is there a Crisis," presented in the Senate on June 13, 1990.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, as you will see, the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology dealing with the question of access to short-term care beds or acute-care beds was presented in the Senate on June 13 last. I hope that all honourable senators have had a chance to review this report for which the inspiration was our colleague Senator David.

There has been quite a response to this report. There have been many inquiries with regard to it. It has been very widely distributed. I do not intend to speak now about the content of the report. However, I wish to draw to the attention of honourable senators that on Thursday, March 7, Senator David and myself will be participating in a tele-conference through the Northern Network with hospital administrators from across the country who are debating this report. Unless any senator wishes to speak, and I have checked with Senator David who does not wish to do so, I move that this report be adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (amendment to Rule 67(1)(o)), presented in the Senate on June 12, 1990.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, this matter has now been before the Senate for some time. Because of the intervening events in the months of September, October and November we did not proceed to it.

The report of the committee was tabled on June 12 and deals with Rule 67(1)(o). Honourable senators will find it on page 30 of the rule book.

This matter came about as a result of requests from a number of organizations asking that the Senate have a committee specifically on environmental affairs. There was considerable discussion in the committee on the matter. The conclusion was that we simply did not have enough senators to man the large number of committees that we already have. Important as is the question of environmental affairs, it was not considered feasible, at this point at least, to add another committee.

The recommendation was that since environmental affairs is not specifically mentioned under the responsibility of the present Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, the name of the committee should be changed. The Rules Committee discussed the matter and proposed that the committee should be called the Standing Senate Committee on Environmental Affairs, Energy and Natural Resources.

However, prior to moving in this direction, it was felt that we should discuss the matter with members of the present Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, and that was done. The suggestion was brought back to us that the committee be called the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, Environmental Affairs and Natural Resources. This met with the agreement of the Rules Committee. Therefore, the report was submitted in that way, and such is the effect of this proposal. If accepted by the Senate, we will simply add to the name of the present committee the words "environmental affairs".

Honourable senators, I move that this report be adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

MEECH LAKE CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD AND CANADIAN CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Beaudoin calling the attention of the Senate to the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.—(Honourable Senator Macquarrie).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, my brevity will not cause any problems with you, I am sure. This is a very important measure.

I first spoke about the Meech Lake Accord when it was presented by Senator Murray many months ago. I was very enthusiastic about it then, and I still am. However, there is very little point in making a retroactive remark on this matter at this time. Thus, that is my speachette, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform honourable senators that if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry (farm financing), presented in the Senate on December 20, 1989. (Honourable Senator Fairbairn).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Fairbairn tells me that as far as she is concerned, this order can be withdrawn or can be considered debated.

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if no other senator wishes to speak, this order is considered debated.

VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER MULRONEY TO MEXICO AND THE COMMONWEALTH CARIBBEAN

INQUIRY WITHDRAWN

Hon. Heath Macquarrie rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, March 22, 1990:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the visit of Prime Minister Mulroney to Mexico and the Commonwealth Caribbean and, more particularly, to the public announcements and agreements made and signed during said visit.

He said: Honourable senators, I know that this will be another wrench for my colleagues. However, I would ask leave to have this matter withdrawn not because of diminution of my interest but because of time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable Senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES, 1990-91

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) — SEVENTEENTH REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE

TUESDAY, January 15, 1991

The Standing Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

SEVENTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991, were referred, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Monday, December 17, 1990, submits its report as follows:

Supplementary Estimates (B), totalling $4.759 billion, are the second supplementary estimates for the 1990-91 fiscal year. They increase the estimates tabled to date from $148.514 billion at the time of Supplementary Estimates (A) to $153.273 billion. $1.856 billion (39 per cent) of these supplementary estimates is to be voted by Parliament, while the remaining $2.902 billion (61 per cent) is statutory expenditures that have been included in the estimates for information only.

The attached background information supplied by Treasury Board Secretariat includes: a listing of all voted items greater than $5 million; a summary of the expenditure framework and estimates for 1990-91; a statement of 1990-91 supply to date; and a list of $1 votes that authorize the transfer of funds from one vote to another and the payment of grants, plus miscellaneous items.

When Supplementary Estimates (A) were tabled, projected budgetary expenditures were $147.8 billion. However, in September 1990 the Minister of Finance announced a revision of the fiscal framework to accommodate an expected increase in the interest cost of servicing the public debt. This revision is reflected in the latest projected budgetary expenditures of $150.3 billion. The projected increase of $2.5 billion corresponds exactly to a new statutory appropriation of $2.5 billion for the Department of Finance to cover interest and other charges on the public debt (See Supplementary Estimates (B), 1990-91, p. 53). Including these supplementary estimates, the budgetary portion of total estimates now amounts to $152.9 billion. However, as shown in Treasury Board's summary, expenditure reductions totalling $2.7 billion are anticipated before the end of the current fiscal year. These include write-offs of $0.5 billion, lapses of $1.2 billion and $1.0 billion in legislated changes, the last consisting of the proposed reductions in statutory expenditures under Bill C-69, which is currently before the National Finance Committee. These reductions would result in total budgetary estimates of $150.2 billion. While this appears to leave only $100 million for additional expenditures for the remainder of 1990-91, an additional $350 million is being made available through reductions in previously approved spending levels in most departments and agencies.

In summary, projected budgetary expenditures of $150.3 billion consist of current budgetary estimates of $152.9 billion, less $2.7 billion for Bill C-69 reductions, lapses and write-offs, less a further $350 million for the latest reductions, plus $450 million in expected additional expenditures between now and March 31, 1991.

$100 million of the $350 million in 1990-91 spending reductions is to be obtained by deferring grants and contributions in the departments of Agriculture, Environment, Transport and the Atlantic Canada opportunities Agency. The remaining $250 million consists of cutbacks to government operations that are being made across departments and agencies. These are based generally on the relative size of departments' salaries, capital and other operating costs, exclusive of statutory expenditures. The expenditure reductions have been imposed to ensure that the new expenditure ceiling of $150.3 billion in not exceeded. Specifically, they are designed to offset the $350 million appropriation requested for the Department of National Defence to cover a portion of the unanticipated expenditures associated with Canadian Forces operations in the Persian Gulf and at Oka and Chateauguay, Quebec.

The decision to implement these cutbacks was made after Supplementary Estimates (B) had been prepared. Information about the impact of the reductions on particular program areas has not been provided: many departments are apparently still deciding on specific cuts and will inform Treasury Board of these at a later date. Attempts are being made to minimize any adverse impacts on health and safety. In the meantime, the funds will be frozen by Treasury Board and the reductions will appear in the final supplementary estimates for the 1990-91 fiscal year for those departments that are requesting additional appropriations at that time. A detailed list of the required reductions by department and agency is attached.

The $2.9 billion of statutory expenditures in these supplementary estimates is accounted for by four items: Agriculture, Agri-Food Program, $212.4 million for contributions to the provinces under the Crop Insurance Act; Agriculture, Grains and Oilseeds Program, a $10 million reduction in payments under the Western Grain Stabilization Act; Farm Credit Corporation, a $200 million payment under the Farm Credit Act; and Finance, $2.5 billion for increased interest payments on the public debt. In addition, as indicated in the footnotes to the departmental sections of the supplementary estimates, frequent use was made of the Treasury Board Contingencies Vote 5 to provide temporary funding for expenditures that Parliament is now being asked to approve. If the estimates are approved, the Vote will be restored to the level of $775 million that was authorized in the Main Estimates. However, in their testimony before the Committee, Treasury Board officials were unable to indicate precisely what further amounts would be provided from this Vote during the remainder of the 1990-91 fiscal year.

Because of their size and complexity, several meetings of the Committee were held to examine these supplementary estimates. The Minister of National Defence, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and officials of Treasury Board Secretariat, Statistics Canada, the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council and the Departments of National Defence, External Affairs, National Revenue - Customs and Excise, Finance and Industry, Science and Technology appeared as witnesses.

The Minister of National Defence provided a set of fact sheets on the $350 million of supplementary estimates requested for his department, which are attached to this report. These give details of the department's operating costs in four categories: operations in Oka and Chateauguay; Persian Gulf operations to the end of March, 1991; preparations for commitments in the Gulf beyond March, 1991; and maintenance of general military preparedness. As well, $121 million in capital expenditures is being requested for upgrading ships and aircraft for Gulf operations and advancing planned acquisitions. The operating costs total $861 million, of which $229 million is incremental costs that are being requested in these estimates. Committee members had some difficulty with the notion of total costs as applied to the Oka/Chateauguay and Gulf operations. They felt that the department's presentation inflated the true (incremental) costs of these operations, since the majority of the total costs would have been incurred in any event. Department officials were also unable to provide to the Committee any estimates of the additional costs that might be incurred because of an outbreak of hostilities in the Persian Gulf after January 15, 1991 and a consequent escalation of the Canadian Forces commitment in that region. However, the Minister assured the Committee that the additional funds requested in these supplementary estimates would be adequate to support any foreseeable Canadian operations in the Gulf, up to the end of the 1990-91 fiscal year.

Proposed expenditures for preparation and planning in connection with the Goods and Services Tax, including payment of the GST credit, appear in the supplementary estimates of several department: Consumer and Corporate Affairs, $19.5 million; Finance, $14.3 million; National Revenue, Customs and Excise, $203.0 million; National Revenue, Taxation, $67.3 million; Public Works, $40.0 million; and Supply and Services, $21.7 million; for a total of $365.8 million. As well, Customs and Excise and Taxation are requesting 1,151 and 627 additional person-years respectively. These amounts are in addition to substantial costs and PYs that were granted in supplementary estimates for the 1989-90 fiscal year. Officials were unable to provide the Committee with any estimates of the compliance costs to the private sector of implementing and operating the GST.

Committee members expressed concern about the impact of the cutbacks on the operations of departments and agencies. In the case of Statistics Canada, the Chief Statistician testified before the Committee that the required reduction of $4.5 million in the budget of his agency would have an impact on programs, since staff reductions of 30 per cent over the past decade had already been absorbed through productivity increases. He expected that the effect on the 1991 Census would be minimal. As well, the integrity of the system of national accounts should not be compromised; current statistics such as the unemployment rate and the Consumer Price Index are of great importance to policy makers and the public; and other statistics are collected pursuant to agreements with the provinces in such areas as health and education. The collection of statistics on research and development in science and technology is an area that could be affected by the cutbacks but no decision has yet been made. The Committee urges the government to ensure that Statistics Canada is not required to suspend its provision of statistics that are widely used by researchers, policy makers and international agencies.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC
Chairman

LIST OF ONE DOLLAR VOTES INCLUDED IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) 1990-91

The 11 One Dollar Votes included in these Estimates are listed in Appendix I by ministry and agency along with the page number where each vote may be located in the Estimates.

These One Dollar Votes are grouped below into categories according to their prime purpose. The votes are also identified in Appendix I, according to these categories. The category for each vote has been designated by an "X". In those instances where a vote falls into more than one category, the prime category is designated by an "X" and other categories by an "*".

A. Three votes which authorize the transfer of funds from one vote to another. (An explanation of the new requirement and the source of funds is provided in Supplementary Estimates.)

B. Five votes which authorize the payment of grants. (An explanation of the new requirement and the source of funds is provided in Supplementary Estimates.)

C. Three miscellaneous votes. (Additional explanations are provided in Appendix II.)

- One vote which increases the aggregate amount that may be paid pursuant to Section 12(1) of the Farm Credit Corporation Act;
- One vote which provides a guarantee to the Mortgage Insurance Company of Canada - Finance; and
- One vote which authorizes the Canada Post Corporation to borrow money from other than the Crown.

Farm Credit Corporation

Vote 50b — Pursuant to Section 12(1) of the Farm Credit Act to increase from $825,000,000 to $1,025,000,000 the aggregate amount that may be paid to the Corporation under this section ...

Explanation — The contributed capital of Canada in the Farm Credit Corporation is approximately $818 million, of an authorized aggregate amount of $825 million. The proposed increase in authorized aggregate amount of contributed capital to $1,025 million is to permit the conversion of a further $200 million of debt, owed by the Corporation to the Consolidated Revenue Fund, into contributed capital. The government announced a recovery plan for the Corporation in July 1988, including its intention to carry out the above conversion. The authorized capital of the Farm Credit Corporation was increased by $600 million in the 1989-90 Main Estimates to permit the initial conversion envisaged in the 1988 Recovery Plan. An increase in authorized capital for the Farm Credit Corporation through an Appropriation Act is explicitly provided for in Section 12(1) of the Farm Credit Act.

APPENDIX II

Additional Explanation

Category C - Miscellaneous $1.00 Votes:

Finance
Vote 12b

Pursuant to Section 29 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize the Minister on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Canada to guarantee not more than 90 percent of the net claims of holders of mortgages estimated not to exceed $350,000,000, in respect of mortgages insured by the Mortgage Insurance Company of Canada having a gross aggregate value not exceeding $50,000,000,000, in the event of the insolvency or liquidation of the Mortgage Insurance Company of Canada; and, to repeal Finance Vote 18c, Appropriation Act No. 4, 1989-90.

Explanation

In July 1988, the Bank for International Settlements introduced new Capital Adequacy Guidelines for banks dealing internationally. Prior to these new rules, assets of banks insured by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and by the Mortgage Insurance Company of Canada were treated identically but under the new rules, a bank with a mortgage insured by MICC must be backed by $4,000 of capital for every $100,000 of assets while no capital reserve is needed for assets insured by CMHC because it is a government agency. This puts MICC at a competitive disadvantage with CMHC. The $1.00 item, therefore, provides a guarantee to MICC which restores the competitive equilibrium.

The guarantee to MICC includes obligations by the company to pay funds into a sinking fund, to be administered by the federal government, at a rate which would cover a large portion of the government's exposure to make good on the guarantee in the event of MICC failure. MICC must also pay a premium to the federal government for taking a portion of the risk; this premium would go directly to the CRF.

The vote wording contained in Vote 18c of Supplementary Estimates (C), 1989-90 is not consistent with the proper method of formatting a guarantee by means of an Appropriation Act. The guarantee in Vote 18c is not provided to the Mortgage Insurance Company of Canada but to the holders of the mortgages, and the wording does not indicate the total amount of the mortgages guaranteed. Accordingly, the former vote wording must be repealed and replaced with the currently proposed wording.

APPENDIX II

Additional Explanation

Category C - Miscellaneous $1.00 Votes:

Canada Post Corporation

Vote 102b — In accordance with section 28 of the Canada Post Corporation Act and section 101 and 127(3) of the Financial Administration Act, to authorize the Canada Post Corporation to borrow otherwise than from the Crown up to $155,500,000 in fiscal years 1990-91 and 1991-92 in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the Minister of Finance.

Explanation — Parliamentary approval is required for Canada Post to borrow in external capital markets. General authority is already contained in the Canada Post Corporation Act and specific authority is being sought through this Supplementary Estimate. The amounts to be borrowed are consistent with the corporate plans and amended corporate plans approved by the Governor in Council, summaries of which are tabled in Parliament. Multi-year approval is sought because the first Supplementary Estimates are normally not approved until the fall and Canada Post needs access to funds at the start of the fiscal year.

TOTAL CAPITAL EXPENDITURES	121	121
TOTAL SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES		350

Total Cost. (a) Operating Expenditures: this is the total cost of Canadian Forces involvement in the operations including: salaries for established military and civilian personnel; salaries for incremental staffs and reserves; civilian overtime, allowances and rations; full equipment operating costs including fuel, maintenance, and contracted repair and overhaul; purchases and rental of materiel, services and facilities; and depreciation of major equipment. (b) Capital Expenditures: this is the cost of capital expenditures which will be incurred over and above DND's current Capital Budget.

Funding Provided in Supplementary Estimates. This is the additional cost to the government in the current fiscal year of conducting operations. For operating expenditures, it reflects the total costs of operations, as described above, less the costs that would have been incurred on exercises, training or other planned activities had the operations not taken place. For capital expenditures, it reflects the cost of capital acquisitions not provided for in DND's current capital budget.

Deployment (1)	3	1
Cost of Operations to 31 Oct 90 (2)	77	14
Return to Base (3)	3	1
TOTAL	83	16(4)

Notes

1. The cost to prepare and move approximately 4,000 Regular and Reserve Force personnel from their home bases to the areas of operation.

2. The cost of operations includes pay and allowances; operating costs of all vehicles and other equipment; rental of equipment; rations; and like expenses.

3. The cost to return 4,000 Regular and Reserve Force personnel from the areas of operations to the home bases.

4. The cost of $83 million less salaries for established personnel and major equipment depreciation of $62 million, result in $21 million in remaining costs for the operation. Of this, $3 million was absorbed internally as a result of not proceeding with normal planned activities in the current fiscal year and $2 million falls due in 1991-92. Accordingly, the additional funding required this year is $16 million.

NET OPERATING EXPENDITURE TO 31 MAR 91	646	81(7)

Notes

1. This represents the costs to prepare the forces for operations in the Gulf: the ships and associated helicopters; the CF 18 aircraft and associated crews; and supporting aircraft, vehicles, equipment and personnel.

2. The cost to move the units to their applicable areas of operation.

3. This represents the cost of operations in the Gulf including pay and allowances; operating costs of all ships, aircraft vehicles and other equipment; rental of equipment and facilities; rations and quarters; and misc expenditures.

4. The costs to replace equipment and spares issued from existing inventories to ships and aircraft deployed to the Gulf.

5. The cost of rotating three ships' crews by charter aircraft.

6. The cost of upgrading the equipment on ships and aircraft which were deployed in the Gulf.

7. Generally speaking, the flying hours for the CF-18s and Sea Kings in the Gulf and the ship-days for the three naval vessels have been provided by reducing planned activities elsewhere throughout the Canadian Forces. This $81 million reflects the cost of operations in the Gulf which could not be absorbed within the existing Defence budget.

POVERTY LINE UPDATE, 1989, TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, with leave, I wish to table a document entitled "Poverty Line Update", 1989, with an estimate for 1990, which is the 19th annual proverty line issued by the Senate of Canada.

I would ask that this document be printed in the Debates of the Senate of this day, as if it had been read, and that it be printed as an appendix in Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and that it form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

* Base year 1978—amounts vary with degree of urbanization.

THE SENATE COMMITTEE POVERTY LINES ARE BASED ON A FORMULA WHICH IS UPDATED ANNUALLY ON THE BASIS OF A MEASURE OF DISPOSABLE PERSONAL INCOME IN CANADA AND CHANGES IN THE DISTRIBUTION OF FAMILIES OF VARIOUS SIZES.

THE SENATE POVERTY LEVEL IS APPROXIMATELY 50% OF AVERAGE CANADIAN FAMILY INCOME ADJUSTED TO FAMILY SIZE, MAKING PROVISION FOR INFLATION AND GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT. FOR FAMILIES OF SIZES 2, 3 AND 4, THE POVERTY LINES ARE ALMOST EXACTLY HALF OF THE AVERAGE INCOME FOR FAMILIES OF THOSE SIZES.

STATISTICS CANADA: Poverty Level Lines are based on changing consumption patterns which now indicate that families who spend 62% or more of their income on food, clothing and shelter (as opposed to the 70% criterion used at an earlier date) are in straitened circumstances. These limits are also differentiated by size of area of residence.

Among two-parent, one-earner families, the proportion with low income in 1989 (18.2%) was up from the 1980 rate (15.8%) Statistics Canada says. Those families with two-earners had almost the same rate (5.2% versus 5.3%).

"Two-parent, one-earner families had an average income of $42,171 compared to $53,697 for two-earner families," the agency said in a report on family incomes.

Average income across the country for all types of families was $50,083 last year, 3.3 per cent higher than in 1988 on an inflation adjusted basis.

Since 1984, when the upward trend began, real income had increased 11.5%, Statistics Canada said.

According to the Senate Committee Poverty Lines about 20.5% of the Canadian population (or about 5,417,000 people) was below the 1989 poverty lines. This represents a slight decrease over 1988. Statistics Canada showed a total of 12.2% below their lines, also a decrease from 1988.

Statistics Canada figures for 1989 show that the lowest 20% of families and unattached individuals (lowest income quintile) received only 6.5% of family income. This represents no change from 1988 or 1987.

CANADIAN STATISTICAL REVIEW, JUNE 1984—The Senate Committee Poverty Lines. The Special Senate Committee on Poverty, chaired by Senator David A. Croll, developed poverty lines based on income levels which reflected "items of basic need". These lines are differentiated by family size and adjusted each year by an escalator based on living standards as reflected by the amount of disposable personal income available in Canada in any given year. The annual escalator is designed to adjust for real as well as nominal changes in income and for change in average family size over time. The resulting poverty levels are close to half of the average income for families of sizes 2, 3 and 4 in 1981. Senator Croll releases periodically an update of the Senate Committee poverty lines.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions that are still coming in about the GST. I received two today. These petitions are still coming in although the bill has been adopted, and I use the term "adopted" because we still do not accept the legality of the passage of this bill.

In any case, the petition contains 21 signatures of residents of Laval, St-Lin, Mascouche, St-Jérôme and other communities. After the preamble, this petition on the GST reas as follows:

> Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon senators and members of the House of Commons, as true representatives of the people, to do everything in their power to oppose the new goods and services tax, and we demand that an election be held immediately.

At this point, something else has been added. I will quote it because I am not sure this text appears in the other petitions.

> Canadian producers are doing their share by flooding the markets with goods, but they cannot produce money. The government should therefore establish a national credit board to create the money we need as a result of this new abundance.

I have another petition with one signature. I think it comes from the same area. No, excuse me, it is from St-Léonard in New Brunswick.

POVERTY IN CANADA

POVERTY LINE UPDATE, 1989—TRIBUTE TO HONOURABLE DAVID A. CROLL

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to a remarkable event which happened here just a moment ago. Senator Croll just presented, for the nineteenth consecutive year, a document concerning poverty in Canada and the poverty line. I do not know of anyone in Canada who has ever achieved a record like that. It is a remarkable achievement and I congratulate him.

I would have congratulated him immediately after he had finished speaking, but I was preempted by my colleague across the way.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

UNITED NATIONS

LETTER FROM PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA TABLED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: The Deputy Leader of the Government has just tabled a document from the Prime Minister to the United Nations. Is that the document that was delivered by the Secretary of State?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is my understanding. The honourable senator can certainly get a copy of that letter from the Table.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Would Senator Doody be good enough to tell us the date of that letter?

Senator Doody: The letter is dated January 9, 1991, and is addressed to the Secretary General. Copies will be made available. If senators would like copies to be printed and distributed, I am sure the Table would be pleased to do so.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I certainly feel that every senator should have a copy, so that if we wish to ask questions we will be able to refer to the letter.

Senator Doody: It is being done now.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have the privilege to present a petition sent to me dated January 5, 1991, from 25 residents of various places in Alberta, in which the petitioners ask the Government of Canada to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax-free status for the printed word by proposing an amendment to Bill C-62 to include retention of the zero rate on reading material.

I also have the privilege of presenting a further petition dated December 31, 1990, which is also from a group of residents in Alberta petitioning for the same consideration, namely, the removal of the goods and services tax on reading material.

ABORTION

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-43

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions respecting Bill C-43. One petition contains 17 names from the British Columbia Women's Liberal Commission, and the other contains 120 names of residents of Kingston, Ontario. All of these names represent Canadians who are opposed to the passage of Bill C-43.

I also have a petition containing several thousand names from Canadians from coast to coast opposing the passage of Bill C-43 and the recriminalization of abortion. I apologize for not having counted the names, but they do come from all across the country.

DEPARTMENT OF MULTICULTURALISM AND CITIZENSHIP BILL

NINETEENTH REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Lorna Marsden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology presented the following report:

Wednesday, January 16, 1991

The Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to present its

NINETEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-18, An Act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, in obedience to the Order of Reference of June 7, 1990, examined the said Bill, received testimony from witnesses and now reports the same without amendment but with the following commentary.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, shall I dispense?

Senator Marsden: No. I think we should hear the commentary.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No. The Chairman wants it read.

A Clerk at the Table:

Based on an investigation of Bill C-18, your Committee is of the view that there are two major unresolved issues in the proposed legislation: definition of the term multiculturalism and inadequate enforcement mechanisms.

Issues:

1. Definition of Multiculturalism

Bill C-18 (clause 5) speaks to the concept of our multicultural heritage without explaining the term multiculturalism. The Minister and officials from the Secretary of State of Canada referred members to The Canadian Multiculturalism Act (Bill C-93) for a definition of multiculturalism. The Canadian Multiculturalism Act implies a meaning in, for example section 3, where it is described as a reflection of Canadian society's cultural and racial diversity and as a fundamental characteristic of our heritage and identity. There is, however, no definition of the term multiculturalism in section 3 nor in the Act's preamble.

[Senator Marsden.]

Witnesses stated that a working definition of the concept of multiculturalism is necessary to ensure that the new department is not seen as a ghetto. As the legislation now reads it is not clear whether it will apply to all cultures or to the non-aboriginal, non-French and non-British segments of the Canadian population. This lacuna suggests that the legislation is open to the interpretation that it is for some, and not for Canadians of all ethnic origins.

—Your Committee is of the view that the failure to define multiculturalism in the legislation must be addressed and recommends amendment to The Canadian Multiculturalism Act.

In addition, some Committee members noted that a clear definition of multiculturalism will be required for the mandatory program evaluation. In accordance with the Treasury Board Policy Circular 1977-47, "Evaluation of Programs by Departments and Agencies" all departments and agencies,"... will periodically review their programs to evaluate their effectiveness in meeting their objectives ..." The Multiculturalism and Citizenship Department is scheduled for a three-year program evaluation plan (1990-91, 1991-92, 1992-93). The evaluation will be best accomplished with an operational definition of multiculturalism. Jean Fournier, Under Secretary of State, in a letter dated January 11, 1991 to Senator Lorna Marsden, Chair, stated the following:

—Once work on these evaluation frameworks is completed, we would be pleased to meet with the Committee and would welcome its comments and suggestions.

The Committee is pleased with this assurance and intends to report to the Senate when the matter has been dealt with.

2. Adequate Enforcement Mechanisms

Some witnesses were concerned about the absence of sufficient enforcement measures in the proposed legislation and so, recommended the establishment of an Office of the Commissioner of Multiculturalism to monitor, investigate and report to Parliament on the execution of policies.

Other witnesses commented on the failure to include a provision to confirm that the federal public service behave in accordance with the policy of multiculturalism. Officials of the Secretary of State of Canada referred to Bill C-18 as a mechanism of state intervention to help implement multiculturalism throughout all levels of the federal government. While the commitment to the development of government-wide multicultural policies and ensuring that all departments and personnel adhere is statutorily described in The Canadian Multiculturalism Act in section 3(2), Bill C-18 does not refer to this section or offer any other comfort.

—Your Committee requests that the annual report on the operations of the new Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship prepared at the end of each fiscal year, in accordance with clause 6 of Bill C-18, be referred to this Committee and, as well, the annual estimates of the Department and all related matters. The Committee expresses a special interest in this important and developing area because Bill C-18 creates a new department whose formative years are crucial to its success. Also, witnesses voiced anxieties about the proposed Department's capacity to fulfil its objectives, and in particular its cross-government commitment to the policy of multiculturalism. By referring the annual report and the estimates to the Committee, the Department's activities can be monitored in order to determine if programs are being implemented.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit at three-thirty o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wonder if I may take a moment of the Senate's time to respond to a question asked by Senator Frith yesterday with regard to the program and menu of the Senate for the remainder of this week and perhaps into next week.

As honourable senators know, the only bill presently before us for second reading is Bill C-79, which is the Parliament of Canada Act. We can deal with that in committee at any time. I have no intention of holding it up. There is the question of which committee we will send it to. The Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee, the Rules committee and the Internal Economy committee all have interest in it, and perhaps the three chairmen of those committees could decide which committee they would like it to be referred to. It is of interest to the Senate in various respects and it deserves further study. That is Bill C-79.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Which committees did you suggest it be referred to?

Senator Doody: The Internal Economy committee, the Rules committee and the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee all have interest in it—indeed, we all have, but those are the proper committees it could be sent to.

Also before us for second reading is Bill C-94, the supply bill, and I am sure all senators will agree that that is the most pressing matter now before us. It should be dealt with as quickly as possible. We would like the bill to receive Royal Assent as soon as possible, preferably tomorrow. If it is given Royal Assent tomorrow, we will try to adjourn tomorrow afternoon until Tuesday of the following week. I want to bring you up to date on where other bills are in committee and what we feel should happen to them.

The motion dealing with the proposed joint committee must be dealt with. The amendments have been proposed. I assume that will happen early next week, but perhaps Senator Frith can speak to that when he gets a chance. In committee at the present time we have a number of bills in addition to Bill C-43, the abortion bill.

Senator Frith: Do you have any comment on Bill C-43?

Senator Doody: I will get to that in a moment. I want to tell you which bills we have and where they are. Bill C-81, the trade bill, is also before the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee. Bill C-63 and Bill C-37, to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation and the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute are both before the Social Affairs committee. I understand the committee is meeting tomorrow to deal with those bills, which is fine. Bills C-69 and C-34, the restraint of government expenditures bill and the bill to establish the Canadian Centre for Management and Development, are before the National Finance committee. I will return to Bill C-69 in a moment, if I may. Bill C-72, to establish the Canadian Polar Commission, is before the Aboriginal Peoples committee, and I understand the committee is meeting tomorrow to consider the bill. The Transport and Communications committee has before it Bill C-40, the Broadcasting Act, and Bill C-82, the Quebec Harbour bill; and the Energy committee has before it Bill C-84, the Petro-Canada privatization bill.

[Senator Doody.]

Honourable senators, I think that Bills C-63, C-37 and C-72 will be back tomorrow or, if not tomorrow, soon thereafter. I am told that there is little chance of our receiving any more Commons bills this week, since that house will continue its debate on the Gulf crisis today and perhaps tomorrow. There are two or three bills that they intend to deal with in the immediate future, but not this week.

To return to the bills that are of concern, obviously the supply bill is one of them, as is Bill C-69, to enable restraint of government expenditures. That is a bill about which the government is quite concerned, in that it has been in committee for a long while and will have a big impact upon the financial plans of the country. We would be most grateful if the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance could find a way to deal with it expeditiously. I know that the minister is appearing before the committee tonight to give his views on the bill and to answer questions. I would suggest that an action plan for further meetings be arranged at that time or shortly thereafter. I believe that 18, 19 or more groups have expressed an interest in appearing before the committee. Perhaps one or two days could be dedicated to their appearances as, indeed, has been done in the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on the abortion bill. I believe that that committee has managed to hear 30 or 40 sets of witnesses over the last few days due to a fairly judicious allocation of time.

Bill C-40, the Broadcasting Act, another important bill, is before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications and is moving along fairly well. I understand that some more hearings have yet to take place. Like the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee, the Transport and Communications committee will be meeting on Monday and perhaps on Friday, although I am not sure about that. In any event, they have their plans well in hand.

Bill C-84, respecting the privatization of Petro-Canada, is another major bill. It is presently before the Energy committee. I know that some hearings have been held, while others have been planned. I would ask the committee to see what it can do to move that bill along.

With that understanding, which is not a very demanding one, and on the premise that we will give Royal Assent to the supply bill, I would suggest that we adjourn tomorrow afternoon, on completion of our business, to return at two o'clock on Tuesday. If we cannot manage to give Royal Assent to the supply bill tomorrow, perhaps we can come back at ten o'clock Friday morning to give it Royal Assent, adjourning until Tuesday at two o'clock. That does not provide much information for honourable senators regarding the following week because I do not have much information to give.

What will happen the following week will depend on how we deal with the remaining business, as well as the debate on the composition and establishment of the joint committee on the constitutional matter. That is where we stand at present, honourable senators. I can see no reason, if the Senate can go through its rather modest menu, why we should not be able to have a reasonable break after the next week or so. That, of course, depends on how we move along with what we have left here.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Doody for his detailed report as to the government's position on the various pieces of legislation before the Senate, as he promised to do yesterday. I have no comment, negative or positive, about his evaluation. It seemed to me to be a reasonable evaluation of the status of the legislation and its prospects. I cannot be any more precise than that.

I noted that Senator Doody mentioned that he did not anticipate any legislation from the other place because it would be busy with its debate on the Gulf crisis. I take it that we on this side will not be busy with the government's proposals for the Gulf activity, and its dealing with the Gulf crisis, because I did not hear him mention any resolution or other initiative indicating that the government is interested in the Senate's views on the crisis and government policy about it, as apparently it is only interested in those of the House of Commons. I am not making any promises and neither was he, except one with reference to our sitting this week and next. However, I do repeat that his evaluation of the status of legislation and its prospects seems generally to be the same as mine.

• (1430)

Senator Doody: For the sake of those of our colleagues who have travel plans for the weekend, I wonder if we can be more definite as to whether or not the supply bill can receive Royal Assent on Thursday afternoon rather than Friday morning. If it is to be Friday morning or Friday afternoon, let us say that. It makes no difference to me as I will be here anyway. However, there are senators on both sides of the house who would like to know. I keep getting telephone calls asking when we are going to break. I used to be able to say that I would telephone Senator Frith and have a chat about it. However, that was in the halycon days, the balmy days, before the cone of silence descended on this place. I do not know if Senator Frith wishes to be more forthcoming in regard to the supply bill, or if he wishes to give us any indication about his thoughts on the debate on the joint committee.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am going to resist the temptation for the moment to make any comments on the "cone of silence", as Senator Doody described the present regime and, of course, resist the very severe temptation to comment on the infamy that led to it. As to the information honourable senators would want as to their plans for the rest of this week, the only item that really figures is the report from the National Finance committee on the supply bill, the appropriations bill. We want to make an intervention on that bill. I think we will be able to do that tomorrow. If I am correct in that, we should be able to deal with it tomorrow. That is the situation, subject to something I am unaware of. There are, as we know, some very serious policy considerations included in that bill and in the report.

QUESTION PERIOD

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

STRIKING OF MEDAL FOR CANADIAN FORCES IN GULF CONFLICT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I wonder whether the deputy leader has spoken to the Leader of the Government in the Senate to get the answers to the questions I asked yesterday about the Persian Gulf crisis. He is the only cabinet member we have in the Senate, but he did not stay here at the time of the crisis when we were reaching the deadline about whether we were going to war. No, the leader left us and went somewhere else, and it could not have been to a cabinet meeting, because most of the cabinet members were already in the other place at two o'clock. Our leader simply disappeared. Perhaps he was scared to answer questions. I am sure that the deputy leader would have given him those questions that I asked yesterday so that he would have the opportunity to answer them today, and, rather than repeat the questions, I will ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to answer them.

Apparently the deputy leader did not get to the leader, because he is now rooting through the books. I can repeat the questions for him, if he has not received them..

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, one of the questions was about whether a medal would be struck for the men and women who are prepared to fight in the Persian Gulf on behalf of the United Nations. That is a matter to which no consideration has been given up to the present, honourable senators.

Senator Bonnell: If no consideration has been given by the government on behalf of those boys and girls who are prepared to lay down their lives for this country, and lay down their lives to uphold the United Nations, will the government give consideration to having a medal struck for those brave men and women who are in the Gulf at this time anticipating at any moment that they might have to go to war under a coalition. We do not know who will be the head of the coalition.

We do not know who will be the Chief of Staff of the coalition, but we know that our boys and girls are there prepared to fight for the consideration and the strike of a metal.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will accept the honourable senator's question as a representation and remind him simply that Canada's efforts throughout have been with a view to preventing war.

THREAT OF IRAQI TERRORISM—PROVISION OF SECURITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: The other question that I asked yesterday, when the government leader was absent, was: Is any special security being taken to protect Parliamentarians, our Parliament Buildings, our water supplies, our atomic energy plants, our airports, and other things in case of a terrorist attack by the Iraqis? Saddam Hussein has promised there will be world-wide terrorism, and Canada, if it is to participate in the Gulf war, could be a target. What precautions, if any, has the government taken to protect these locations by means of vital security in this country?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, with regard to the Parliament Buildings, these matters are arranged between the RCMP, the Gentlemen Usher of the Black Rod and the Sergeant-at-Arms.

With regard to the broader question of potential terrorism, it is the reality of the world we live in that we are all vulnerable to terrorist acts-more vulnerable at some times and in some places than at others. The federal government does have counter terrorist programs and structures in respect of many of the installations to which the honourable senator refers. There is the closest cooperation between the security forces, the RCMP, provincial police forces and municipal police forces. I do not think the honourable senator would expect me to place on the record in any detail what special steps are being taken in the present circumstances, except to assure him that all prudent steps have been taken and that all the forces concerned are ready to increase security as and when needed.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, as we all know, we do not know "when and as" they will be needed, because these things happen when we do not expect it. What I want to know is: Has the government taken any extra precautions and asked for better precautions for our atomic energy plants, water supplies, airports and the Parliament Buildings? Have instructions gone out to the people who, you say, are watching those installations, to give special consideration to these installations at this particular time in our history?

Senator Murray: Everything that can be done is being done.

DEPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES—IDENTITY OF CHIEF OF STAFF—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, the deadline is now past. So far there has not been an attack on Iraq by any nation that we know of at this time. If some nation should attack Iraq—and under the United Nations resolutions it has the power to do so as of twelve midnight last night—and we should get into a war, since the Canadian government has decided that our Canadian troops will participate in that war, who will be the Chief of Staff to look after the troops against Iraq?

● (1440)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, there are a number of hypotheses in the question asked by the honourable senator. I do not think I can usefully add anything to the replies that were given the other night in his presence at the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance by the Minister of National Defence and the Chief of Defence Staff, General de Chastelain, concerning Canadian national command and control and tactical command.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, that was before January 15. Surely to goodness, if there is going to be any kind of attack at all, we cannot have the Canadian forces with Canadian Command saying it is going to do this, or the American forces with American Command saying it is going to do something else, and the Egyptian forces with Egyptian Command saying it is going to do something else. Is there to be no Chief of Staff to look after the whole coalition so that things can be worked out in a cooperative manner; or is everyone going to get in the road of the other fellow and perhaps shoot down their own planes?

Senator Murray: The situation was described in some detail the other night by General de Chastelain, drawing on his own experience as a Canadian commander with Canadian forces attached to NATO and in various operations.

Canadian forces remain under Canadian command and control subject to the rules of engagement given to those forces by the Canadian government.

It is not unusual—in fact it is quite usual—that for tactical purposes Canaidan military forces would come under the control of one or other of the allied nations, or that troops of other countries would come under Canadian tactical command. I thought that all this was outlined in some detail the other night in answer to a question put to General de Chastelain not by the Honourable Senator Bonnell but by one of his colleagues.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I do not think we received answers to those questions at all. They talked about what was going on at the present time, how NATO works and how NATO command worked in the past. That was not in time of war.

If we are prepared to send our troops to battle in a war in which men, women, and the little children of Iraq and Kuwait, can be killed, then surely to goodness we must be prepared enough to know how we are going to co-ordinate our efforts in that war and have someone designated as Chief of Staff to be in charge of the whole operation. In this way we would know that the whole thing would go smoothly and that we were there to win the war quickly and then get out. If we still do not know who is going to be the Chief of Staff of all the troops, then I do not think we should be thinking about war at all. We should be thinking about organizing ourselves much better than we have done so far.

Senator Murray: Let me give the honourable senator a very recent illustration. An announcement was made today by Mr. McKnight, the Minister of National Defence, that we are going to deploy a Canadian field hospital from CFB Petawawa to Saudi Arabia. That field hospital, with approximately 550 members, is a medical treatment facility capable of providing medical and surgical care for 100 patients. Mr. McKnight's announcement goes on to state:

> It will be a national entity flying the Canadian flag and will be under command of Canadian Forces Middle East, with tactical control being delegated to the Commander UK Forces Middle East.

Senator Bonnell: I certainly hope that the medical unit will be under Canadian command, but I hope that it will look after soldiers, whether they are under British, American or any allied troop command. I would hope that it would look after not only Canadians but troops of the coalition and perhaps even injured Kuwaiti children. Surely we can look after other people besides Canadians. So I would suspect it would be under Canadian command, but still under the Chief of Staff of the whole allied coalition.

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators, that was not the statement made by Mr. McKnight. The statement made by Mr. McKnight was that the operation would be under Canadian command and control and fly the Canadian flag, but that it would be under the tactical command of the United Kingdom commander in the Middle East. I have no doubt that there are other operations involving a number of forces of a number of nations in respect of which Canada would have tactical command, while those forces remain under the ultimate control and command of their national military.

OPERATIONAL CAPABILITY OF CF-18s—POSSIBLE CHANGE IN ROLE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I understand that we have some CF-18s in the Gulf which can only fight air to air, but not air to ground. Has any decision been made by the Government of Canada to put air-to-ground missiles on those CF-18s

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): No, honourable senators.

Senator Bonnell: Did you say that that would not happen, Mr. Minister?

Senator Murray: I answered the question that was asked, honourable senator, which was whether a decision had been made with respect to equipping those aircraft for an air-to-ground role. The answer is that no such decision has been made.

Senator Bonnell: Is it under consideration, Mr. Minister?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am not going to discuss in detail the various scenarios that are being considered by the government. Mr. Clark was asked the same question, I believe, last night and has not excluded that possibility. However, his statement is that no such decision has been made.

APPLICATION OF NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT—NECESSITY TO INVOLVE BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT—DEFENSIVE ROLE OF CANADIAN FORCES—POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF AREA OF OPERATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I am troubled by whether or not the government intends to do what seems to be the right thing with respect to Parliament in dealing with this emergency. I have read parts of the National Defence Act which, of course, gives the Governor in Council the statutory authority to deploy Canadian forces or any component of them beyond Canada by reason of an emergency for the defence of Canada or in consequence of any act undertaken by Canada under the United Nations' Charter.

I have read also Chapter 22, Part VI, which deals with emergencies. It talks about parliamentary supervision in an emergency. Section 58 says, in part, that subject to subsection 4, a motion for confirmation of a declaration of emergency signed by a minister of the crown, together with an explanation of the reasons for issuing a declaration of emergency, shall be laid before each house of Parliament, as the case may be, on the first sitting day after Parliament has been summoned. Of course, that means that if Parliament is not in session it shall be summoned within a specified number of days. To my knowledge, the government has not laid before this chamber of Parliament a declaration of the emergency and the reasons for it. Does the minister intend to do so?

• (1450)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the relevant declaration is Order in Council PC 1990-1995 of September 15, 1990, and that order placed the Canadian forces on active service, those Canadian forces who are part of or serve in the immediate support of the multinational military effort in and around the Arabian Peninsula. I would be glad to table that Order in Council, if it has not already been done.

Senator Olson: I thank the honourable senator, but I think it was distributed at some time. However, the formality of taking Parliament through the required procedures to perform its function under Canadian law, I should think, would require the minister to table it in the Senate and to initiate debate. Of course, there are other sections of the law that deal with what would happen in the event that the outcome of either house of Parliament was negative. I do not think the outcome will be negative, nor do I wish to imply that, but I do not believe we have had an opportunity to debate the matter. The minister kept saying that Senator Macquarrie introduced an inquiry that, in his view, achieved essentially the same thing.

What I am concerned about now is that since midnight last night, and perhaps even a few hours before that, the role of the Canadian forces could change. The ships and the CF-18 fighter planes have been in the Gulf enforcing an embargo, but now we face the possibility of getting involved, as the Chief of Defence Staff told us the night before last, in a combative role to defend the coalition forces that are there, whether they be at sea or on the ground. This, I think the minister will agree, is a significant escalation of the role of Canadian forces. What has happened from September 15, 1990 to date has not been put before this house of Parliament. In fact, even the provisions of Order in Council PC 1190-1995 have not been placed by the government before this house for debate.

One might think that I am nitpicking, but I am not. There is a good reason for the precision that the government must follow in relation to Parliament when we are faced with this kind of emergency. I wonder if the government is going to do anything about that situation?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am virtually certain that the Order in Council to which I referred was indeed tabled some time ago by my friend, the Deputy Leader of the Government, but I will confirm it. In any case, I can table it again.

Senator Olson: It was tabled and I accept that.

Senator Murray: I do not think that the point the honourable senator is making is nitpicking at all, but he seems to be confusing two issues here. The first is the defensive role of Canadian forces sent to the Gulf area to help enforce and support the United Nations resolutions. The air forces that are there are there to defend our ships and the ships of others and allied assets in Saudi Arabia. The honourable senator has said that they would be in what he calls a combative role if those assets were attacked. Of course they would be; that is why they are there. No further authorization is needed to do so.

The second issue, however, has to do with whether the area of operation of Canadian forces, which now includes, as I said, the central and southern Gulf and Saudi Arabia, would be extended in the event that hostilities break out. That is clearly a possibility. I believe that that possibility was expressed implicitly in the statement the Prime Minister made yesterday when he said, "If, however, Saddam Hussein continues to reject the will of the United Nations, Canada will join with the United Nations in expelling him from Kuwait by force."

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not have any quarrel or disagreement with what the minister has said. I know that the Governor in Council has the authority to make the decision they have made, and I am not arguing with that authority. I am concerned about whether or not the government will do what I think it should do, at least, and perhaps is required to do, depending on your interpretation of the National Defence Act, which is to put these things before Parliament for debate. That has not been done. I would argue that it has probably not even been done in the House of Commons according to what the law requires, but they can fight that battle themselves. The government has simply asked the House of Commons to endorse what it has done in support of the United Nations; but I do not want to get into that issue.

There has been no Governor in Council order, signed by a minister, outlining the reasons for its actions and explaining the reasons for issuing the declaration. That has never been placed before this house of Parliament for debate, and I think that the government has an obligation to do that. Does it not believe that Parliament should consider these things? If the government intends to take a hard, narrow legal interpretation, perhaps it does not have to do as I have suggested. That is fine, and I cannot argue with it, but I would like to know whether or not that is the government's position.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Parliament is in session. The House of Commons is now debating the third resolution relating to the Gulf that has been placed before it in the past few months relating to Canadian policy and presence in the Gulf. A resolution was voted on, I believe, on October 23. There was another one in November and there is now this third resolution before Parliament. The Canadian forces in the Gulf are fulfilling a certain role there. That role has been defined by the government and by the military and everyone knows what it is. If there is any change in that role and the area of activity is to be extended, then, of course, I have no doubt Parliament will debate that.

• (1500)

However, now that the honourable senator has given me the opportunity for the second time, I should state for the record that parliamentary involvement is really a political issue rather than a legal one. In the past, Parliament has been asked to ratify the Governor in Council's decisions with regard to a commitment to war, although there is no legal requirement to do so. For example, in the Second World War, forces were put on active service on September 1, 1939, the day Germany invaded Poland. Parliament was called back on September 7 and on September 9 there was a vote on the address and reply to the Speech from the Throne. That would be the general authorization of Canadian policy and activity there, and the actual declaration came the next day by Order-in-Council.

We have had some discussion here—and there was in the committee the other night—about the Korean war. It should be pointed out that Parliament was in session when North Korea invaded South Korea in the last week of June, 1950. There was a discussion in Parliament because the Estimates were then before the House of Commons, but there was no parliamentary motion to approve any action by Canada. As a matter of fact, on the very day that Parliament adjourned for the summer—that would have been June 30—the government of the day decided to send three ships to the western Pacific where they would be ready if assistance was required. The decision to make the three ships available to the United Nations command, to send an RCAF squadron, and to raise a brigade of the special forces for the Korean war was taken while Parliament was not in session during the month of July. The House of Commons came back on August 29 when there was a Speech from the Throne. At that point it could be said that the vote on that Speech from the Throne included approval of the government's actions.

The action that Parliament has taken in the past has not been nearly so specific or so focused as the honourable senator would imply. Indeed, I would argue that what the House of Commons, at any rate, has been and is being asked to do in the case of the Gulf crisis, which has already involved two resolutions with a third now before the House of Commons, is considerably more than was done in the past.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can remember most of that history even back to September, 1939. It is not that I disagree with all of that; the point I am trying to make is that there is a requirement contained in Chapter 22, Part VI of the Statutes of Canada.

Senator Murray: What is the act?

Senator Olson: It is Chapter 22, Part VI of the National Defence Act. In Part VI there is a consideration of a declaration of emergency, which, I understand, the Governor in Council had the statutory authority to do. I am not arguing with that. However, there is also an obligation to bring the matter before both houses of Parliament, and that has not been done. This statute says that the declaration, along with the reasons for issuing the declaration, shall be laid before Parliament. Then subsection 58(4) says that when Parliament or a house of Parliament is summoned to sit in accordance with subsection (2) and (3), the motion, explanation and report described, shall be laid before each house of Parliament or the house of Parliament, as the case may be, on the first sitting day Parliament is summoned. Parliament is already sitting and I am not arguing about that. Why does the Leader of the Government in the Senate not put before Parliament this declaration of the reasons of the government? I have a great deal of respect for Senator Macquarrie, but that is not a satisfactory substitute for the government's bringing its Order in Council here and having a minister of the Crown give the reasons for its actions. That has not yet been done.

Senator Murray: The short answer to the question, honourable senators, is that the actions taken by Canada with respect to the Gulf crisis were not taken under Chapter 22, Part VI of the National Defence Act; they were taken under paragraph 31(1)(b) of the National Defence Act and the relevant Order in Council has already been tabled in this house and referred to by me earlier.

Although I do not have the act in front of me, I suspect that the declaration of emergency to which the honourable senator is referring in Chapter 22, Part VI, relates to domestic emergencies.

Senator Olson: I will have to accept that as the answer, but I think the government has to obey all of the laws and all of the statutes of Canada. It cannot pick out one and say that it complied with a particular part, namely, section 31 and ignored the rest.

Senator Murray: Is the honourable senator suggesting that we should declare a domestic emergency? That has not been done. The government has not taken that action.

Senator Olson: The Leader of the Government is simply going to stick to a narrow, legal interpretation and is not going to bring Parliament into his confidence and have a debate on what is an emergency situation not only for Canada but the whole world.

Senator Murray: There is a debate taking place in the House of Commons. It was not my intention to bring in a resolution to the Senate for two reasons: First, there was a debate in November; and, second, honourable senators took advantage of the opportunity of having the Supplementary Estimates before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to have the appropriate ministers, Mr. Clark and Mr. McKnight and the Assistant Deputy Minister, Ms. Collins, before them. There is an opportunity now in the debate on the Estimates or on the supply bill for honourable senators to express their views on this matter. Again, I have a suspicion that that is the purpose of the intervention to which Senator Frith referred earlier.

Senator Olson: Is the government going to participate in this debate so that we can hear the reasons for what it did?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I want to wait to hear what honourable senators have to say first. I believe someone on the other side intends to speak, if not on the Estimates then on the supply bill, tomorrow, and I suspect, although I have not been told, that it will be on this issue. If there are matters that I believe should be addressed, I will undertake to address them as best I can.

Senator Olson: You mean that what you have done does not need an explanation in Parliament. That is strange.

REQUEST FOR TABLING IN SENATE OF STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Surely he acknowledges the fact that the country is now convulsed about the issue of peace and war. It is in the forefront of the mind of every Canadian today. While I do not believe that much weight should be given to opinion polls, surely we can all see that, as an element of the status of public opinion at this particular moment in time, there appears to be some division in the country about the position taken by the government.

The Prime Minister said the other day that in his view the government's policy is based on a moral responsibility. If that is the case, then surely there is a coequal moral responsibility to put forward the rationale for the government's action in this place so that honourable senators on this side could react, either in support of the government's rationale, or with additional ideas as suggested by the Minister of External Affairs yesterday in the other place, or in opposition to the position taken by the government. I think it is important that senators have the opportunity to listen, if only briefly, to the government's position in this place so that we might have a coherent debate on this issue. I share my colleague's opinion that the appropriate way to deal with this, notwithstanding the previous precedents, would be to have a brief statement by the government in this place. It could be a repetition or a precis of the Prime Minister's statement. It would then give senators on the government side an opportunity to support the position and those on this side an opportunity to support or to oppose or to provide alternate ideas.

I appreciated that the Leader of the Government in the Senate chose to allow us to have a debate using the resolution by Senator Macquarrie on the Gulf crisis, but time has moved quickly, and my concern, which is shared, I think, by Senators Olson and Bonnell, is that within 48 hours or sooner we may be placed in the catastrophic position of war because of the speed of modern murder technology. I think it would be appropriate for us to have an opportunity, in the calm moments that are allowed us in the interlude, to consider this matter.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Well, honourable senators, there is a debate going on in the House of Commons, as the honourable senator knows. I thought the Prime Minister, Mr. Clark, Mr. McKnight and others set forward very cogently the position of the government on these matters, as they have done from the beginning, since August. On the other side, Mr. Chrétien made clear the position of his party to the effect that Canadian forces should be withdrawn immediately in the event of hostilities breaking out, and Ms. McLaughlin, for the New Democrats, took a similar position.

I will take under serious consideration the honourable senator's suggestion that I should somehow take the initiative with a statement, and Senator Olson's suggestion that I should reply to any statement that is made from the other side in the debate on the supply bill tomorrow.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Who suggested you should make a statement?

Hon. H. A. Olson: I think he should.

Senator Frith: I am not arguing. I just wanted to know who it was.

Senator Murray: Senator Olson and Senator Grafstein seem to think that it would be more authoritative to have a Minister of the Crown speak on these matters than to have a supporter of the government do so.

Senator Olson: Does anybody else speak for the government?

Senator Murray: It very frequently happens that honourable senators on this side speak for the government. I do not get up and pilot every bill through the Senate. I pilot very few of them through. Honourable senators on this side stand with a brief from the government. Senator Olson knows how it works.

Senator Olson: That is not the same thing.

Senator Murray: In any case, I will take under serious consideration the suggestions made by Senator Grafstein and Senator Olson.

I will mention in passing that, in his absence the day before yesterday, I spent the better part of an hour and a half answering questions from honourable senators on this matter, and those answers were, if I may modestly say so, confirmed and elaborated upon at the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance by the ministers and officials most directly concerned from the Departments of External Affairs and National Defence.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

SCHEDULED RESUMPTION OF MEETINGS—PROGRESS REPORT

Hon. H. A. Olson: I wonder if I might have an answer to another brief question? Yesterday there was an indication that the GATT discussions respecting agricultural subsidies would be resumed in Brussels or Geneva. Can the minister tell us whether that meeting was reconvened, and if there is anything positive to report from it?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am under the impression that the meeting to which the honourable senator refers did not take place, but I do not have a statement from Mr. Crosbie on that matter at this time.

Senator Olson: Is there any indication that it was postponed for a few days, or is it not going to take place at all? Could the government leader find that out for us?

Senator Murray: I will have to inquire, honourable senators.

AGRICULTURE

PLANS FOR "OUTLOOK" CONFERENCE

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, about a year ago the Department of Agriculture hosted or sponsored a conference on the program "Growing Together" which gathered farm leaders and groups representing commodity sectors and the provinces together to start the "Growing Together" process, which is still ongoing. That conference caused the cancellation of the traditional "Outlook" conference that always occurred in December of the year. This December did not see an "Outlook" conference. I gather there was some thought that if the GATT negotiations were concluded in December it would be appropriate to hold the conference later.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Is there any plan to hold an "Outlook"-type conference, either as part of "Growing Together" or otherwise?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall have to ask Mr. Mazankowski and will report back.

NEW AGRICULTURAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCEMENT

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. The Department of Agriculture released on January 14 some income projections under the title "Farm Income and Commodities Outlook Projections" for 1991. This, by the way, was traditionally presented at the "Outlook" conference and discussed at that time.

In this press release there is accompanying statistical detail which shows that Canadian farm income will fall, according to the projection, by 54.5 per cent in 1991 over 1990. It, in fact, fell by 11 per cent in 1990 from 1989 levels. I suppose the most dramatic figure is from Saskatchewan, and these statistics show that there is an anticipated decline in income in Saskatchewan of 131 per cent. In other words, they would have negative income of $303 million in Saskatchewan. I acknowledge that these will change throughout the year as events change, but I think they highlight the very serious situation which others in this chamber, particularly Senator

Olson, have spent a lot of time discussing. In this context, I wonder if the government leader can advise when we might hear a final announcement from the Minister of Agriculture on extraordinary assistance to the agricultural sector? He has announced two programs, NISA and GRIP, but the minister is also talking about extraordinary assistance, and I would like to ask the minister if he can advise when we might have an announcement on that?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I can only tell the honourable senator that what are called third-line-of-defence measures are still being discussed by the federal government with regard to the grain industry in particular. I should also point out that the estimates to which the honourable senator refers, including the estimate of the decrease in farm incomes, are developed on a quarterly basis and were calculated prior to the announcement of two new safety net programs, the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan and the Net Income Stabilization Account program. These payments will add some $3 billion to incomes in 1991-92.

THE ENVIRONMENT

RAFFERTY-ALAMEDA DAMS PROJECT—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and relates to the Rafferty-Alameda Dams.

It may be that my specific question of some time ago was answered and that in the very busy period of the fall I missed it. I had asked whether or not the government was going to get back the several million dollars it had advanced to Saskatchewan for not building the dam, in view of the fact that they were proceeding to build the dam. If that question has not been answered, I would appreciate receiving one.

Secondly, could the leader give us an update on the present situation? Is Saskatchewan proceeding with the finalization of the Rafferty Dam and with the construction of the Alameda Dam, and what is the government's position vis-à-vis the Province of Manitoba, which is the downstream province in this regard? Are its interests being protected?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do recall the first question asked by Senator Molgat on October 26 regarding the reimbursement of government funds. I am still awaiting a reply from the Minister of the Environment. I received some information, but it seemed to be insufficient and I sent it back for further details.

I do not have an up-to-date report on the Rafferty-Alameda situation in my notes, but I will obtain one and report back to the Senate.

YUKON PLACER MINING ACT
YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Mira Spivak moved the third reading of the Bill C-68, to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act and the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and to make provision for the application of certain orders.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Atkins, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cogger, for the second reading of the Bill C-260, An Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (spousal agreement).—(Honourable Senator Marsden).

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Atkins gave the Senate a full and clear presentation of the issues in this bill, a record of which appears in the Debates of the Senate, and which I recommend to all honourable senators. The honourable senator explained why the bill is both necessary and helpful.

The issue of family property law has undergone rapid change in every province since the reform of the Divorce Act. It is now a complicated situation, but it appears that this will improve. The splitting of CPP credits on marriage breakdown is a crucial matter to thousands of Canadians, particularly to women for whom divorce is often a financial disaster, especially for those who are retired.

Bill C-260 goes a long way to ward addressing the problems that arose in 1983 in the Preece decision and which have bedeviled the area since, despite an earlier amendment to the bill.

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology stands ready to hear Mr. Kempling, the sponsor of the bill in the other place, and other witnesses next week.

Unless there is an objection, the committee is prepared to have this bill referred to it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Does Senator Marsden know whether representatives from LEAF will appear before the committee?

Senator Marsden: The steering committee has not met to determine who the witnesses will be, but I have asked the clerk to contact LEAF representatives. Certainly LEAF was one of the organizations to which Mr. Kempling gave credit, and LEAF took the Preece case; so I assume they will appear before the committee.

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Atkins speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, I have nothing further to add, other than to say that I will be moving that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Atkins, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, for the second reading of the Bill S-18, An Act to further the aspirations of the aboriginal peoples of Canada,
>
> And on the Point of Order concerning the admissibility of the Bill.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I still have not received the added research that I requested. As soon as I get it, I will proceed.

Order stands.

WORKERS MOURNING DAY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Mira Spivak moved the second reading of Bill C-223, an Act respecting a Day of Morning for Persons Killed or Injured in the Workplace.

She said: Honourable senators, Bill C-223, an Act respecting a Day of Mourning for Persons Killed or Injured in the Workplace, was introduced as a private member's bill by the honourable member from Churchill, Manitoba, Mr. Rod Murphy, and received the support of all parties.

[Translation]

This bill would make April 28 a day of mourning for persons killed, disabled or injured in the workplace during the preceeding year.

[English]

Clause 2 of the bill explains that if passed into law, April 28 will not be a legal holiday but a day of remembrance.

April 28 is the labour movement's national day of mourning, because it was on that day in 1914 that the first worker safety legislation was introduced into Ontario.

● (1530)

The intention of dedicating this day into law, even though the day has been honoured annually in the House of Commons and at ceremonies across the country, is to send a much stronger signal to all Canadians that safety at workplaces and continued improvements in health and safety legislation are fundamental precepts of this country. This official recognition by Parliament will help to raise awareness of health and safety issues.

The bill will also be an excellent educational mechanism for drawing attention to the staggering number of accidents, often fatal, in the workplace.

Mr. Rod Murphy, in his remarks to the House of Commons, gave the following statistics: In 1987, more than one million people were injured in the workplace. Of these, almost 700,000 suffered debilitating injuries and 887 were reported as fatalities. These figures have remained constant over the last decade. The Public Service Alliance estimates that between 6,000 to 10,000 Canadian workers die each year as a result of occupational cancer. Many of these deaths are not reported as job related, yet the probable cause of death is exposure to unsafe materials in the workplace.

Each year Canada's economy loses 16 million work days due to workplace accidents, injuries and deaths, which is five times the time of production lost due to strikes and lockouts. Mr. Bob Corbett informed the house that in 1988 preliminary figures indicate that more than 800 people died on the job in Canada and 20 million person days were lost because of work accidents, occupational injuries or illness. He indicated that the direct and indirect costs of work accidents amounted to approximately $22 billion in 1988.

I share the view of the house representatives that education and prevention are the weapons to battle such appalling statistics. I join with Mr. Murphy and other representatives in the idea that Parliament should be at the forefront of addressing the issue of health and safety in the workplace as a concern to all citizens in Canada.

I hope that this symbolic gesture will assist the efforts to rectify the problems of unsafe working environments. I urge senators to vote for this bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I may, I would ask Senator Spivak why the bill is necessary to achieve the worthy objective that she has outlined. If I understand her correctly, the purpose of the bill is to establish a day of mourning for persons killed or injured in the workplace, but the bill does not propose an official holiday. It is an important gesture, as I believe she described it, and I agree with her; but can she tell me why it is necessary to introduce a bill if its objective is simply to establish a day of mourning, which will not be an official holiday? Perhaps that can be examined in committee, if she would prefer that.

Senator Spivak: As I gather from the remarks of the people in the House of Commons, this day has been observed for five years through a moment of silence. It was felt that giving it official recognition would have more impact in terms of the awareness of the issues of workplace safety. The labour movement has also had a great deal of influence in this debate. It has continuously attempted to gain more recognition for this day and has campaigned across the country in provinces, territories and municipalities to have it recognized unofficially.

I suppose the culminating step is to have Parliament recognize this day officially. I also presume that the need for a bill has to do with the precedent set by other days that are recognized as memorial days but are not observed as holidays. That is the best explanation I can give at this time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I fully support the objectives of the bill. I think Senator Spivak has given all the information that she could be expected to give at second reading. I support the principle of the bill, which is what is before us at second reading. It would seem that, under Rule 67(m)(4), "social and labour matters", the bill should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. If it receives second reading, as I believe it should, and if Senator Spivak moves that the bill be referred to that committee, we will support that too.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Spivak, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON AMENDING FORMULAE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consult broadly with Canadians and inquire into and report upon the process for amending the Constitution of Canada, including, where appropriate, proposals for amending one or more of the amending formulae, with particular reference to:

(i) the role of the Canadian public in the process;

(ii) the effectiveness of the existing process and formulae for securing constitutional amendments; and

(iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including those set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada";

That twelve Members of the House of Commons and five Members of the Senate be the Members of the Special Joint Committee, such Members on the part of the Senate to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion;

That the Committee have the power to appoint from among its Members such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee, or a sub-committee, have power to travel, and hold public hearings, within Canada;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings or of proceedings of its sub-committees, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons;

That the parties represented on the Committee be granted allocations for expert assistance with the Committee work in proportion to the representation of the said parties in the House of Commons;

That the Committee be empowered to retain the service of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Joint Chairmen;

That the Committee submit its report not later than July 1, 1991, provided that, if the Senate is not then sitting, the report will be deemed submitted on the day such report is deposited with the Clerk of the House of Commons and with the Clerk of the Senate;

That changes in membership of the Committee for Members of the House of Commons be effective immediately after notification thereof, signed by the Member acting as Chief Whip of any recognized party, has been filed with the Clerk of the Committee;

That the quorum of the Committee be nine Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken so long as both Houses are represented, and the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six Members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly,

And on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that the motion be amended by deleting the fourth paragraph thereof and substituting the following therefor:

iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including an amending formula based on regional representation, as proposed in the 1971 Victoria Charter; and a formula based on seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population, with a clause added stipulating that Quebec must be one of the seven provinces; and the alternatives set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled

"Amending the Constitution of Canada".—(Honourable Senator Stanbury).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I intend to stand this order. Senator Doody raised some questions about it and I want to make it clear that we have no interest in delaying the matter. I thought that the exchange between Senator Beaudoin and myself yesterday did not show a particularly clear-cut difference of opinion. I think we understood each other.

Therefore, again I say that I think we can proceed if the government can accept what seems to me to be an innocuous addition of the two examples. I think that is all they are and that is all the government paper is, namely, an example of the alternatives or options to be considered. I suppose that, strictly speaking, there can be only two alternatives.

Senator Macquarrie: Precisely; only two.

Senator Frith: As I say, if the government can accept them, then I think we can proceed. I just want it to be clear, because of what Senator Doody said, that our objective in moving these amendments is quite sincere; in other words, that there is no hidden reason for doing so. We are not attempting to delay this matter.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, with regard to the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition on this matter, our view is that it is not necessary to add those specific formulae, that it is undesirable for Parliament in so doing to indicate or to suggest a preference for one or other of the various formulae that are already mentioned in the discussion paper presented by the government. The Victoria Formula and the Quebec-specific veto, which is what Senator MacEachen is talking about, are both mentioned in the discussion paper that was tabled on the day I presented the resolution; so I do not think it is necessary. The mandate of the committee is sufficiently broad.

Secondly, I think it might be misleading to indicate that Parliament has a preference for one or other of the formulae.

● (1540)

Thirdly, we should like to proceed with the creation of the committee and have the joint committee begin with its work plan. This would not be possible were we to amend the resolution and send it back to the House of Commons. For all these reasons I would ask the house not to support the amendment proposed by Senator MacEachen.

I had intended to speak to the matter perhaps at a later date. Someone indicated to me that Senator MacEachen intended to speak on the matter. If not, I can make my speech later, or we can have a vote on the proposed amendments.

Senator Frith: That is fine, honourable senators. The position of the government is now clear because the Leader of the Government has put it on the record. We can consult colleagues and decide how to proceed from here.

Order stands.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn:
> That the privileges of Honourable Senators having been constantly abused by the Speaker of the Senate, the Senate do advise the Prime Minister that Senator Guy Charbonneau is unfit to continue to be the Speaker of the Senate.—(Honourable Senator Kirby).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday I said that Senator Kirby had asked me to adjourn this motion in his name. He had, and I did. But he is unable to be here today and has communicated to us, through our acting whip, Senator Bosa, that he would yield to Senator Gigantès.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to place this issue in a larger context, because it is part of a larger context and an important one for this nation.

The world is facing some major changes that have been going on for some time now but are accelerating. They surely affect Canada and the governments of Canada. One of these changes is the instantaneity of financial movement, making it impossible for governments to control capital as much as they could before. This should be seen in conjunction with changes and acceleration in transportation and the possibility, therefore, to develop industrial processes in countries where advantage can be taken of low wages. This leads to losses of jobs in established industrialized countries and a difficulty for governments in established industrialized countries to resort to old techniques in job creation because capital is mobile and prefers other methods of dealing with problems, one of those methods being moving off shore.

We have also within the country the coming to fruition of the Quebec independence movement. This may appear a long distance from what we are talking about, but it is not. The consequence of all this is that we will need, as a nation and as a Parliament, a high degree of collaboration. Let us take the Québec issue. We have in power right now at the federal level a coalition. It is called the Progressive Consecutive Party. But it is in effect a coalition between Anglophone Tories and a group of Quebecers who say quite openly that they place the interests of Quebec first. They do not mention where they place the interests of Canada necessarily. Some of them do; some do not.

The way the Meech Lake debate was handled by this government is seen by non-Québecois Canadians, and increasingly by Québecois Canadians, as a reason for mistrusting this particular coalition. In the next two and one-half years we will be facing possibly radical proposals about the restructuring of this country—radical proposals coming from Québec. Non-Québecois Canadians will not trust this Prime Minister. I am not sure whom they will trust. They will need a federal government that they can trust. That federal government will have to be something other than what it is now—not in party terms, but some entity in which the people of Canada can have confidence; some entity that will display great collaboration as between existing parties. I am talking of the period over the next two to two and one half years before the next election, a crucial period for the future of the country.

What we need is the capacity to collaborate. But collaborate to what end? I am suggesting that, whether Québec wants to separate or whether Québec wants to stay in Canada, it will be better for Québec—and I am a Québecer—to have as an interlocutor a Canadian federal government which is trusted by non-Québecois Canadians to speak for it. Québec does not face such an interlocutor now. Non-Québecois Canadians see the present ruling caucus in the House of Commons as containing a Trojan horse and, therefore, as not constituting a proper spokesman for the interests of non-Québecois Canadians. Therefore, the Quebecoise are facing a vacuum when it comes to an interlocutor.

The economic aspects to which I referred earlier aggravate the situation because we hear people before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission—for example, people like the Québec Chamber of Commerce—saying, "What use is it to stay in Canada if the economic policies of the government are such that they are ruining us?" Those economic policies could be called a sort of counter- revolution by people who hold large amounts of money, can move it instantaneously out of countries and are not prepared to contemplate solutions that include a fairly large role for government.

In consequence, we will need a government in Canada, or government policy in Canada, that will try to cure internal ills, economic ills, and also be an interlocutor for Québec. The internal ills that have to be cured will have to satisfy the various regions of the country by curing them, for example, by reducing unemployment. The Economic Council says that that is the only way to deal with the deficit, because countries that have full employment policies do not have deficits. We must also have a policy that reemphasizes equal standards for certain services throughout the country, whichever way the services are administered—in other words, an added credibility to what the word "Canadian" means in terms of what privileges and services we are entitled to from one ocean to the other and to the third ocean. We are going to need great collaboration. This degree of collaboration implies inevitably a trust. There is no way that such a collaboration will be possible if the various parties involved have to operate in a circumstance in which persons appointed to be referees have played not the role of a referee but the role of a player for one side against the other. That Senator Guy Charbonneau did so is well established in the speech by Senator Stanbury.

It started with his breaking a long tradition about when a vote is to take place. His next act was to say to this side of the house and to the independents that the vote would take place at 17.30, and to the Tories that it would take place at 17.25. Then he continued breaking rules. Senators Charbonneau, Murray and Roblin—but, in particular, Senators Murray and Charbonneau—broke rules that they had signed only a few days before. After Senator Murray declared from his seat that, in the circumsstances, he accepted delay as a legitimate practice by the Opposition, he moved to deny this delay to the Opposition. During all this, Senator Charbonneau played the role of someone who picks up the ball and scores for one of the two sides. For the sake of the nation, in the next two and a half years, when we are going to require a high degree of collaboration, we cannot live with Senator Charbonneau in the Speaker's Chair. It is not possible to play a game with a referee who has demonstrated that he belongs to one team and not the other; it is just not possible. We have to be able to collaborate, and we cannot collaborate under those circumstances.

We are one of the two houses of Parliament. We may not survive the separation of Quebec. If some new ways are found to change the Constitution of Canada, this type of Senate may disappear and be replaced by another. However, in the meanwhile, and in the next two and a half years of this Parliament, whether or not we like it, or the Prime Minister likes it, or the press likes it, the Senate is going to have to play a role. There are people on both sides of this house who have the talent, the imagination, the experience, and the recognized decency to contribute to the restructuring of the country if they can collaborate. However, they will not be able to collaborate in an atmosphere which is, of need, adversarial—that is the way British parliamentary institutions are set up—when the referee is no longer a referee but is blatantly a member of one side and has shown himself not incapable but unwilling to be impartial and objective.

This is for the sake of the country and for future collaborations, especially at this juncture when we have to do something about the movement of capital offshore. If we do not, the people will. They will not peacefully accept the loss of their jobs beyond a certain point. We must not forget that 70 per cent of our economy is domestic. These people are facing a loss of their livelihoods and their standard of living, and they will fight for it. We do not need that kind of fight at a time when a key part of Canada wants to separate. If it becomes impossible for any solution other than the separation of Quebec, surely we want it done in an atmosphere that is not messy and nasty. We want it to be civilized and to minimize the cost on all sides, not disrupting the existing economic, commercial, cultural, political and even personal relationships. As I have told you, I have married into a separatist family.

We will have to work together. Occasionally, of course, we work against one another. When you have a democracy you have to have more than one party. If you have more than one party, you have two opinions. If issues are important and serious, you have to be partisan and fight. However, when it comes to unity of the country and the two and a half year period during which the fate of Canada is going to be decided, when the country will need an interlocutor for Quebec, and when the country will need a government it trusts, every component of trust becomes extremely important.

This chamber has a role to play. It cannot be abolished in the next two and a half years. It will take longer than that. Therefore, it will be the place where things can be blocked or passed, where good ideas can come to fruition or be destroyed. In this chamber, we cannot afford to have Guy Charbonneau in the Speaker's Chair.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, before the debate is adjourned, I want to ask Senator Gigantès if he would entertain a question.

Senator Gigantès: Of course, Senator David.

Senator David: I have trouble understanding the connection between your objections to the Speaker of this Chamber and the implications of the independence movement in Quebec. You mentioned at least a dozen times that this country's unity was threatened by the movement in Quebec. You said the Conservative caucus was threatened by its Quebec elements.

I realize that some of those Quebec elements have now formed the Bloc Québécois.

I can assure you that many Quebecers in the Quebec caucus support the concept of a Canadian entity and renewed federalism and are prepared to remain Canadians.

When referring to movements in society that require a certain unity, why did you focus on Quebec and fail to mention the extraordinary political developments that gave the New Democrats a victory in Ontario, or the rising fortunes of a movement called the Reform Party in Western Canada? I find it hard to understand the connection you made between the Speaker of this Assembly and Canadian unity.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I am glad Senator David asked me this question.

I made this connection to illustrate how Canadians who are Francophones and not Quebecers perceive the Conservative caucus. They don't believe in the Conservative caucus, and I certainly don't. This is not new.

I was anxious to take this opportunity to talk about Canada's interests. I am sure you will agree, Senator David that in the next two and a half years, it will be in Canada's interests to have people at the top whom Canadians can trust, more than they now trust the Prime Minister or even the Liberal Party. I have no objections to criticism of our party in that respect.

I say that we must start rebuilding trust, wherever we can do so. In this Chamber, the process of building an atmosphere of trust that will enhance national co-operation and creativity is hampered by the presence in the Speaker's chair of someone who, as far as we are concerned, has been guilty of flagrant partisanship inappropriate for someone in his position. That is the point I wanted to make, honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Bosa, for Senator Kirby, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES, 1990-91

SEVENTEENTH REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Seventeenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Supplementary Estimates (B) 1990-91), presented in the Senate on 15th January, 1991.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, I move that this report be adopted.

Honourable senators, although the report is quite complete and accurately represents the contents of the Supplementary Estimates (B), I would like to stress a few points.

Five meetings of the Committee were held to examine these supplementary estimates. The Minister of National Defence, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and officials of Treasury Board Secretariat, Statistics Canada, the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council and the Departments of National Defence, External Affairs, National Revenue Customs and Excise, Finance and Industry, Science and Technology appeared as witnesses.

The Minister of National Defence provided a set of fact sheets on the $350 million of supplementary estimates requested for his department, which are attached to this report. These give details of the department's operating costs in four categories: operations in Oka and Chateauguay (which took place in Quebec in July and August, 1990); Persian Gulf operations to the end of March, 1991; preparations for commitments in the Gulf beyond March, 1991; and maintenance of general military preparedness.

Proposed expenditures for preparation and planning in connection with the Goods and Services Tax, including payment of the GST credit, appear in the supplementary estimates of several departments: Consumer and Corporate Affairs, $19.5 million; Finance, $14.3 million; National Revenue, Customs and Excise, $203.0 million; National Revenue, Taxation, $67.3 million; Public Works, $40.0 million; and Supply and Services, $21.7 million; for a total of $365.8 million. As well, Customs and Excise and Taxation are requesting 1,151 and 627 additional person-years respectively.

For all other considerations and information, honourable senators, I may refer you to the report. Thank you, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report concurred in.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have the honour to present three petitions I received yesterday and today. The wording is the same as in previous petitions.

On the first petition, practically all names and addresses are from La Doré. This is again a petition for to the usual reasons.

I am impressed by the interest shown by senators opposite for the views of the Canadian people. I say this with some irony, because considering the noise in the Chamber, one must conclude that the views of these people from Montreal, La Doré and New Brunswick do not seem to interest a number of my colleagues, especially those on the other side of this Chamber.

The first petition I have the honour to present, honourable senators, is from La Doré. The prayer reads as follows:

> . . . we humbly pray and call upon senators and members of the House of Commons, as true representatives of the people, to do everything in their power to oppose the new goods and services tax, and we demand an election immediately.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Are you ready for an election?

Senator Frith: Yes, including one for the Senate.

Senator Simard: Is Mr. Turner your leader?

Senator Frith: My leader is Jean Chrétien. Any more questions?

In any case, these Canadians who asked me to express their views on the goods and services tax can read, if they care to, that senators on the other side are not interested in their petitions on the GST but in Mr. Turner.

The second petition contains about 20 names of people who live mostly in Montreal.

The third petition is from New Brunswick. Senator Corbin is not here today, but I see that many of these petitioners are from Aroostook, New Brunswick, a community mentioned on the Senate's agenda in connection with an inquiry by Senator Corbin about the closing of the post office in Aroostook.

Those were the three petitions concerning the GST I received yesterday and today. Thank you, honourable senators.

Senator Simard: Does that mean, honourable senators, that Senator Hébert has been relieved of his duties and that you have now taken his place?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I can assure you that the petitions I presented this week were sent directly to me. I received them at my office this week. According to my information, these petitions were addressed to me.

CANADIAN POLAR COMMISSION BILL

SECOND REPORT OF ABORIGINAL PEOPLES COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Len Marchand, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples, presented the following report:

Thursday, January 17, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples has the honour to present its

SECOND REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-72, An Act to establish the Canadian Polar Commission and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, January 15, 1991, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment, but with the following recommendations:

That there be adequate representation of Northerners on the Board of Directors of the Commission.

That at least one office of the Commission shall be at a place in the Northwest Territories, the Yukon Territory, Labrador, or that part of Quebec that is north of 55 degrees north latitude.

That at least half of the Board's meetings in each year shall be held at places in the Northwest Territories, the Yukon Territory, Labrador, or that part of Quebec that is north of 55 degrees north latitude.

Respectfully submitted,

LEN MARCHAND
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a):

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have the power to sit at three-thirty o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday next, January 22, 1991, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

STATUS OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, pursuant to Rule 20(1)(c), I have a question for the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Can the Chairman inform us when Bill C-43, the abortion bill, and Bill C-81 will be reported to this chamber?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, Bill C-81 has not yet been considered by the committee because of an excessive amount of business, but I expect there will be an opportunity next week to consider that bill and, if acceptable, to report on it.

With respect to the abortion matter, I should like to thank Senator Oliver for his question. The committee has been meeting all week every morning and evening. We will meet again at 6:30 p.m. this evening and will sit until approximately 10 p.m. We are concluding with two constitutional experts. We shall meet again tomorrow morning at 8:30 a.m. to hear the Minister of Justice and will continue until 1 p.m. in the afternoon. On Monday we will hear a series of witnesses all through the afternoon, several of whom have been requested by Senator Haidasz. We have held off having those witnesses until Monday so that Senator Haidasz could be here. The witnesses are those who were recommended by Senator Haidasz and were known to him with respect to this issue. The committee thought it only fair that he should be in attendance.

Hopefully the committee will again sit Monday evening to give consideration to how it will report. The steering committee met today—that is, Senator Neiman, Senator Stanbury and myself—and has already asked our researcher to commence putting together a summary of the issues raised by the various witnesses, and to continue doing so as we hear more witnesses, so that we can be in some state of readiness for next week.

That being the case, I am hopeful, honourable senators, that sometime next week—certainly by mid next week—we will be in a position to bring forward our report to the Senate. Unlike many other bills, that will then bring onto the Senate floor what I expect to be a considerable amount of debate, for a whole wide range of reasons, on consideration of Bill C-43.

I trust that answers Senator Oliver's question.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

SCHEDULED RESUMPTION OF MEETINGS—PROGRESS REPORT

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, three questions were asked yesterday to which I have brief replies, although I do not have copies of them to circulate at this time.

Senator Olson asked a question about the discussions at the GATT on agricultural subsidies. The Director General of the GATT, Mr. Dunkel, met with trade negotiators the day before yesterday in Geneva. He reported on the bilateral consultations he had been having and informed them that he would continue such consultations as a basis for reengaging in negotiations. Mr. Dunkel remains "consciously optimistic." More specifically, the director general is working at "building a platform for agriculture." No date has been set for the next TNC meetings. Canada is also working behind the scenes carrying out our own consultations.

AGRICULTURE

PLANS FOR "OUTLOOK" CONFERENCE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Senator Hays asked a question yesterday about the "Agricultural Outlook"

Conference and whether there were plans to hold that type of conference in 1991. The answer is that there are no plans in the immediate future to hold such a conference. "Agricultural Outlook" information will continue to be disseminated by Agriculture Canada at regular, principally quarterly, intervals in the usual way.

[Later]

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I rise, first, to thank Senator Murray for promptly obtaining an answer to my question with respect to the "Agricultural Outlook" Conference. He said that there are no plans to hold one in the future. In light of the fact that that conference and the conference of a year ago on the "Growing Together" process will not be held in the future, the question that comes to my mind is: Is there anything that the government has in mind to substitute for that process in terms of feedback? I understand Senator Murray's comment to the effect that the research papers, the "Outlook" forecasts and so on, will be ongoing and that Agriculture Canada will continue to disseminate that information.

However, there was another aspect to that process, that being that it provided an opportunity for commodity groups and others to give some feedback to the government. I appreciate that a number of committees have been struck as a result of the "Growing Together" process and are involved and are making reports, but they are very selective because the government controls who will be involved and from whom they will get feedback. From my point of view, I think the government has been quite enlightened in the selection of those people. However, those committees do not substitute completely for the benefits of the "Growing Together" event, which was more open and gave a full opportunity to people to ask questions of the minister and his officials; it was a gathering of people who I think had good synergies for agriculture in the sense that they all got together and asked one another questions as well.

I wonder if you would comment, now or later, on what the government plans to do to substitute for that aspect of the "Agricultural Outlook" Conferences that will be gone, if no further conferences are to be held?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I appreciate the points made by Senator Hays, and I shall ask Mr. Mazankowski to comment.

THE ENVIRONMENT

RAFFERTY-ALAMEDA DAMS PROJECT—GOVERNMENT'S INTENTION TO PROCEED—STATUS REPORT—REIMBURSEMENT OF GOVERNMENT FUNDS

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Senator Molgat asked two questions about the Rafferty-Alameda Dams Project yesterday. The first one was: Is the government going ahead with construction? The answer is yes. Two court decisions support their right to continue. However, major construction has come to a halt because of weather conditions. The hauling of earth will not resume until the spring thaw.

[Senator Murray.]

The second question was: Is the federal government going to ask the Saskatchewan government for its money back? The answer is that this is still under review at the ministerial level. The decision depends on an appeal to the Court of Queens Bench in Saskatchewan that is coming up in February. The court's previous decision denied the federal government an injunction to halt further construction of the dam.

BALTIC STATES

STATUS OF REFUGEES FROM LATVIA AND LITHUANIA

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable Senators, yesterday afternoon the parliamentary association concerned with the Baltic peoples held a useful briefing in which the rapidly-changing situation in Latvia and Lithuania was discussed. Could the Leader of the Government tell us whether the government has taken any concrete measures with respect to aid and to agreements with the U.S.S.R. in light of the recent activities in the Baltic States, or any other agreements with regard to refugees or the protection of citizens of those countries who may be here on a temporary basis?

• (1420)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I cannot reply specifically to the last two items raised by the honourable senator. However, I can repeat that the Prime Minister has written to President Gorbachev on this issue and that Mr. Clark has indicated that we are discussing the situation in the Baltic States with our NATO allies as well as in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and at the UN.

The honourable senator will be aware that the United Nations does not recognize the Baltic States as being fully independent, so there is no possibility of this being considered as a state-to-state matter. Canada will be making, and perhaps has already made, a statement on the Baltic States at the CFCE Valletta meeting on the peaceful settlement of disputes. The Valletta meeting opened the day before yesterday and we are actively seeking ways of involving the Baltic States in the CFCE process.

Canada will be examining possible responses with our NATO allies later this week. We are reviewing our offers of technical assistance and the new $150 million line of credit for the purchase of foodstuffs in light of those discussions and continuing developments in the Baltic States.

Senator Marsden: I appreciate the fact that Canada is doing whatever it can to bring pressure on the U.S.S.R., but anyone who lived through the period of the invasions of Hungary and Czechoslovakia, and other countries that were occupied by the Soviet army, will know that some needs are more urgent than others.

Would the Leader of the Government bring to us as soon as possible a description of anything that might be done?

After a briefing by officials yesterday, our understanding is that refugees from those countries would be considered in the normal line of refugees, and we all know that that is a very long queue in Canada. If it is required, and I am not sure that it will be, can something special be done? There must be a great many people whose lives are in jeopardy or who fear that their lives are in jeopardy at the present time, particularly in Lithuania, and now, I understand, in Latvia as well.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will have to make inquiries about the potential refugee problem to which the honourable senator refers. I can tell her that we are continuing to facilitate shipments of medical supplies to Lithuania and to other Baltic States.

DEPARTMENT OF MULTICULTURALISM AND CITIZENSHIP BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Senator Spivak, moved third reading of Bill C-18, to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have an intervention at the third reading stage of this bill. It is along the same lines as the intervention I made formerly on the same subject.

Honourable senators, this bill expresses the government's policy, and thus, if it is passed, the country's policy, on the subject of multiculturalism.

The committee's report, which is found in yesterday's Debates of the Senate at page 5068, expresses some of my reservations about this bill. The report says:

> Based on an investigation of Bill C-18, your Committee is of the view that there are two major unresolved issues in the proposed legislation: definition of the term multiculturalism and inadequate enforcement mechanisms.

My concern is about the first issue, the definition of "multiculturalism". The report continues:

> Bill C-18 (clause 5) speaks to the concept of our multicultural heritage without explaining the term multiculturalism. The Minister and officials from the Secretary of State of Canada referred members to The Canadian Multiculturalism Act (Bill C-93) for a definition of multiculturalism. The Canadian Multiculturalism Act implies a meaning in, for example section 3, where it is described as a reflection of Canadian society's cultural and racial diversity and as a fundamental characteristic of our heritage and identity. There is, however, no definition of the term multiculturalism in section 3 nor in the Act's preamble.

Honourable senators, I find the concept of multiculturalism, especially when legislated, embarrassing and wrong. I find it embarrassing because it suggests that, in the minds of many Canadians, I belong to a culture that is not "ethnic." In our usage, the expression "ethnic"—which, if I understand the real meaning of the word, means race or racism—has come to mean, in the minds, as I say, of many Canadians, groups other than those coming from the United Kingdom. When we hear the word "ethnics" or the word "ethnic", we do not think of those of British origin.

Senator Doody: What about the Irish?

Senator Frith: We do not even think of those of Irish origin. We could, but we don't. Perhaps Senator Doody does. I am saying that in the minds of most Canadians the word "ethnic", as it is used in Canadian society, means other than of British origin.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Or French.

Senator Frith: Or French, exactly. I find that embarrassing.

Hon. Len Marchand: It means other than Aboriginals.

Senator Frith: You see? It means other than Aboriginals. When many Canadians are thinking about "ethnic minorities", they would include Aboriginals in that term.

Senator Marchand: We are not ethnic.

Senator Frith: Of course you are not, any more than anyone else is. That is my whole point.

Senator Marchand: You all came over after we were here.

Senator Frith: No, you are not quite right. I did not come over when you were here, senator. Your ancestors were here before my ancestors.

Senator Marchand: Right.

Senator Frith: That is a digression, but it points out that these policies on multiculturalism are based on this concept of there being a majority that comes from Britain or France, a sort of double majority, and then a group of others who are called "ethnics", often with the idea also of some chronological distinction, that they came after some others. There is the distinction that they came after others, and then there is also the use of the hyphen to indicate ethnic origin.

• (1430)

I think we should at least note that it is a myth. That majority-minority situation does not exist in Canada. I think that is wrong, and I am not being partisan about this, because this government did not invent the concept—

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Pierre Trudeau did.

Senator Frith: No, he did not. I am not being partisan, but I know that Senator Doyle cannot resist that temptation. I am talking about this as a Canadian concept.

I can see that my speech is generating a great deal of interest. I am glad to see that. I see that some are even joking about the subject.

Senator Marchand: This is a serious matter!

Senator Frith: I think it is a serious matter, but if some senators find it amusing, so be it. We all sometimes get excited because we feel a matter is serious, other times because we feel it is amusing—and that is often a sign of embarrassment.

At the time the bill was before the House of Commons, Mr. Nunziata wrote an article for the Toronto Star. I want to read a couple of paragraphs from that article. The second paragraph states:

While the policy—

That is the multiculturalism policy:

> —was ostensibly intended to integrate immigrants into Canadian society, by officially encouraging them to transplant their previous cultures in Canada, we have marginalized and ghettoized not only them, but also their native-born Canadian children. There are several reasons why Canada's multiculturalism policy is no longer appropriate.

I want to break there and say that in favour of this policy, even in contemporaneous terms, can be said something that my colleague, Senator Bosa, the former President of the Canadian Multiculturalism Council, has said to me. He said that in its best light this policy is an attempt to make all of us feel Canadian, none more Canadian than others, no matter what time they arrived, no matter what their cultural origin. From that point of view, I encourage this sort of policy.

The reason I am saying anything negative about it is that I do not believe Canadians have embraced this concept that we are all part of the multicultural mosaic, and thus all equal. That is why I want to underline the fact that I feel that there is an important dimension to this kind of legislation and that to talk of multiculturalism and multiculturalism departments can perpetuate the myth rather than destroy it.

Mr. Nunziata went on to state:

> Some accept multiculturalism only as a means to enliven the cultural landscape through the support of quaint ethnic folklore. One of the basic tenets of the policy, "that we are all ethnics and thus all equal," holds little currency with the average Canadian.
> To most Canadians, multiculturalism means that if you have origins other than French or English, you are an ethnic, an immigrant—you are multicultural. While we are all equal under the law, many members of the English and French "charter groups" are prone to regard themselves as a bit more equal, based on history and genealogy.

If I may put in a parenthesis here, not only members of the English and French charter groups are prone to regard themselves as more equal, based on history and genealogy, but many non-members of those charter groups unwittingly have the same attitude, because they are misled by its perpetuation by this sort of legislation. To carry on:

> The "we-were-here-first" mentality still predominates the thinking of many "non-ethnic" Canadians. Instead of undercutting the concept of the second-class citizenship, multiculturalism encourages it by preventing the full integration of all ethnic groups into mainstream Canadian society.

In my opinion, integration can only take place because of attitudes. It does not take place because of legislation, departments or enforcement mechanisms; it takes place because of an attitude. The integration happens when we all have an integrating attitude. My objection to this kind of legislation is that it puts off that change of attitude and thereby perpetuates, as I said, a most undesirable myth.

For that reason, if there had been—and I do not expect there will be—a standing vote on this bill, I would have abstained.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

MESSAGE TO HOUSE OF COMMONS RE BILL C-18—MOTION TO APPEND COMMENTARY OF NINETEENTH REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I wish to move:

> That the message to be sent to the House of Commons acquainting that house that the Senate has passed the Bill C-18, An Act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, contain the commentary appearing in the nineteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology dated Wednesday, January 16, 1991.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I could not hear the substance of the motion. Was it that all the commentary of the committee with respect to this bill be attached to the message to be sent to the House of Commons, or just some part of it?

Senator Molgat: My intention was that the comments that appear in the report, and which appear in the Minutes of Proceedings today, beginning at the top of page 2120 and finishing on 2121, be sent to the House of Commons as part of the message acquainting that House that the Senate has passed Bill C-18. In this way the House will be acquainted with the concerns that were presented to the committee and which the committee felt useful to present to this chamber. The other place will then know what concerns were expressed and will have the background for our acceptance of the bill.

● (1440)

Senator Roblin: My concern is that I do not have in front of me the actual text to which my friend is referring, nor does the Senate.

Senator Frith: It is in the Debates of the Senate for yesterday.

Senator Roblin: Just the same, I am always uneasy when I am asked to vote for something which I do not see in writing in front of me.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in speaking to the motion, another good reason for this to be included is that, as I recall, there were some undertakings by the government, after some evaluation by it, to this inviting the committee to make some submissions as to definitions. And the report of the committee was unanimous.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have now turned up page 2120 of the Minutes of the Proceedings. Could my friend indicate to me what paragraphs on that page he is including in his motion?

Senator Molgat: My intention would be that the whole of the report be added. This is not a new procedure. It is one that we have followed on many occasions in the past. I agree that if there were differences of opinion on the matter then perhaps it should be debated. However, in this case, I understand that the committee was unanimous. When Senator Marsden presented her report, it included all of this material. It was available to all senators and was printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings.

I simply request that the whole of the report be sent. The House of Commons will then benefit all the more from the work done by the committee.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, may I point out to Senator Roblin that this is one of the reasons why yesterday I asked that the whole report be read. It was so that everyone would be aware that this unanimous report from our committee had come forward with the commentary. I must say that I am grateful for Senator Molgat's motion.

Senator Roblin: Now that my friend has given me the reference, I am able to satisfy myself as to what he intends to do.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Duff Roblin moved the third reading of Bill C-54, to amend the Criminal Code (joinder of counts).

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PENITENTIARY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Earl A. Hastings moved the third reading of Bill S-19, to amend the Penitentiary Act to reinstate the statutory visitation privileges of Members of Parliament.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, now that Bill C-19 has been passed, I would like to note that this is an example of what I consider, at least occasionally, a valuable exercise on either side of the house. It is what I suppose could be called "Lone Rangerism".

Senator Hastings advanced the cause, got it before a committee by an inquiry, and had the committee encourage the preparation of a bill. Senator Hastings prepared the bill, the bill was brought forward and debated, and sent to the committee. The committee reported it and it is now being sent forward just like any other legislation. That is something that we should all be encouraged to do from time to time when we feel associated with a worthy cause.

Senator Olson: May I have an explanation of "Lone Rangerism"?

Senator Frith: I would rather leave it that way.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, for the second reading of the Bill S-18, An Act to further the aspirations of the aboriginal peoples of Canada,
>
> And on the Point of Order concerning the admissibility of the Bill.—(Honourable Senator Frith)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I still have not received that additional research. I am ready to proceed as soon as I receive it.

I will also be ready to finish my intervention on the copyright act very soon.

Order stands.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1990-91

SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips, for the second reading of the Bill C-94, An Act for Granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1991.—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance moved the adoption of the Seventeenth Report, which was accepted by the Senate. In that report it is stated that the Minister of National Defence provided a set of fact sheets on the $350 million of Supplementary Estimates required for his department, which are attached to this report.

Later on it is stated that department officials were also unable to provide to the committee any estimates of the additional costs that might be incurred because of an outbreak of hostilities in the Persian Gulf after January 15, 1991, and the consequent escalation of the Canadian forces commitment in that region. However, the minister assured the committee that the additional funds requested in the Supplementary Estimates would be adequate to support any foreseeable Canadian operations in the Gulf up to the end of the 1990-91 fiscal year.

Honourable senators, the bill before us, namely Bill C-94, is the legislative action which gives effect to the provision of these additional funds. The bill certainly provides an opportunity to make some comments on the situation which now exists in the Persian Gulf, and also to make some reference to comments which have been made in testimony by the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs in explanation and defense of Canadian policy in the Persian Gulf.

● (1450)

Honourable senators, over the last few months the Persian Gulf crisis has given rise to a spectacular exercise in brinkmanship. Today, the second day after the fateful deadline of January 15 set by the United Nations Security Council for the possible use of force against Iraq, Canada is at war. Let us pause for a moment and reflect on what we are in for. Let us try to put in perspective the excitement provoked by news of a successful first strike.

There is no question that, even if the war is short, as I hope it will be, it will be a bloody and highly-destructive war. Well over one million people and arms have been deployed in the area. They have at hand the greatest concentration of sophisticated weapons poised for action since the Korean War. It was easy to set the time for an offensive to drive the Iraqi armed forces out of Kuwait. It may not be so easy to put an end to this war. Saddam Hussein has displayed a remarkable degree of stubbornness. Students of history know that many great armies have become mired or bogged down in the dessert sands in that part of the world. The Middle East, however regrettably, has a long tradition of violence. Violence has a way of kindling conflicts left unresolved. By the time violence has run its course, an immense amount of physical and moral destruction will be left in its wake. The economies of Western countries will have been damaged at a most unwanted time; the political mess in the Middle East will be greater, not less; Iraq will have been cut down to size; but few, if any, other underlying issues will have been resolved. The long-term position of Western countries in the area may be far worse than it is now.

Canada, of course, will not have been immune from casualties, and hundreds of millions of dollars will have produced little more than rubble. Canadians will ask, "Why did we waste these enormous resources? Why did we lose these Canadian lives in the parched sands of Arabia? Why, in the name of God, did we get into this mess in the first place?" These will be legitimate questions, but they should better be asked now before new, irretrievable moves are taken—before the full damage is done.

When I spoke on this crisis in the Senate on November 20, 1990, I analyzed the long-term objectives of Western countries and their management of this crisis. My view was that these objectives would not best be served by the early outbreak of hostilities. I said—and honourable senators will remember that this was before Security Council 678 Resolution was passed:

> The United States . . . is engaged in marshalling Security Council members to get a resolution to take offensive action in the Persian Gulf. Make no mistake about it, that is what is happening. I believe it is premature.

[Senator MacEachen.]

I added:

> So far, the United Nations and the allied countries opposing Iraq have made the right moves . . . because the resolve of all countries concerned with aggression has been focused on means of countering it diplomatically and by military deployment without recourse to offensive action.

I wish to note that Senator Roblin, speaking from the other side of this house, added weight to these comments. His observations are well worth quoting on this point. He said:

> I am one who says that, yes, we have not yet given sanctions the full opportunity to do their stuff. We must do that. There is no reason to pay any attention to those impatient people who want to see military action taken tomorrow—not at all. I would resist that. I want to see sanctions given full force and effect and time to show what they can do.

He went on to say:

> I do not like these unconditional surrender policies that have been popular in the world . . . .We must never put ourselves in the position where there is no alternative but to go ahead and to indulge in military action.

Those were, one might say, words with a good deal of wisdom. If Canadians ever ask, "Why did we get into this war?" the answer will be, "Because that kind of wisdom was ignored."

Let us look carefully at what happened in the Security Council last November. The Security Council, having set the right policy in response to Iraq's aggression—that is, to condemn it, to order withdrawal and to enforce an embargo against Iraq, in full keeping with Article 41 of the UN Charter—changed that policy before it had run its course and before any considered judgment could be made about it. The Security Council, with Resolution 678, chose to issue what everyone has recognized to be an ultimatum to Saddam Hussein—everyone except the Prime Minister, who chose to call it "a pause of good will."

What I was so concerned about last November was this very change of course by the Security Council, and this concern proved to be well-founded. When the Security Council decided on an embargo against Iraq, it did so under the authority of Article 41 of the UN Charter, which provides for measures short of the use of force. When the Security Council passed Resolution 678, which gives UN members licence to use force against Iraq after January 15, it did so with reference to Chapter VII of the Charter. But this resolution did not mention under which article of the Charter the Security Council was exercising authority. This, honourable senators can rest assured, was not an oversight but a manifestation of what the Germans call "realpolitik". Let me explain.

Article 42 of the Charter provides that before resorting to force the Security Council must decide that Article 41 measures are inadequate.

• (1500)

The Security Council did not carry out any examination of the effect of the measures taken under Article 41—that is, the embargo—before adopting Resolution 678. The reason is simple. The embargo was a middle-term measure and was not expected to have a serious impact on Iraq for at least six months. I will provide later some evidence taken from the United States that the official view in that country was that the sanctions would take a year to work.

Moreover, Article 42, under which the Security Council is authorized to use force, is part of a set of articles—Articles 42 to 50—which regulate the use of force by the United Nations. Action under Article 42 triggers actions under the following articles which the Security Council has shown no intention of taking.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs was asked last Monday, when he appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to explain under which article of the UN Charter Resolution 678 was adopted. He replied:

> We have been acting in respect of the Charter of the United Nations in the resolutions that we have adopted to this point and the Charter in its entirety, Articles 41, 42 and the other articles.

Well, that is not an acceptable answer, nor was it an acceptable answer when the Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned, and I quote, "the Security Council in Resolution 678 acting under Chapter VII in its entirety . . ." Read the articles of the Charter and analyze these unfounded comments following your examination of these articles.

We know that the Security Council never decided that the embargo had proved to be inadequate under the terms of Article 42 of the Charter. We know that UN members have not been asked to make forces available to the United Nations under Article 43 of the UN Charter. We know that plans for the use of force have not been made by the Security Council in accordance with Article 46 of the UN Charter. We know that a UN command and staff committee have not been set up under Article 47 of the Charter.

In brief, the Security Council did not take any action under the key Charter provisions regulating the use of force. This leave Article 51 of Chapter VII as the only article which could have provided authority for Resolution 678. This article provides that, until such time as necessary measures have been taken by the Security Council for the maintenance of peace and security, UN members keep their right to individual and collective defence; and the interpretation of Article 51 would certainly be stretched to the limit by a claim that it provides authority for Resolution 678.

Honourable senators, these are not fine legal points. The articles of Chapter VII are the essence of the United Nations security system and regulate the use of force. They have clearly been set aside by those countries which supported Resolution 678. The Security Council did not ask UN members to make forces available under Article 43 of the Charter. What the Security Council did with Resolution 678 was to authorize UN members to use force after January 15 to drive Iraq out of Kuwait. There is more than a fine line between requesting UN members to provide forces to the UN to put under the authority of a UN command and authorizing UN members to use force after a deadline, according to their own judgment, on their own time and in the light of their own national interests. Yet the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have unequivocally stated that if there is a war in the Persian Gulf it will be in support of the United Nations.

Mr. Clark stated before the National Finance committee of this house that the fundamental principle at issue here is the defence and construction of a durable structure of international order. If this order is to be built on the use of force outside the main provisions of the UN Charter regulating the use of force, there is every reason to be concerned.

We were told last night that the United States decided to launch an attack and then informed the Secretary General of the United Nations. The United Nations did not launch the attack. The United States made the decision and notified the United Nations and members of the multinational force. That is the situation with respect to the United Nations.

I think we should look at the justification given by the ministers of the Government of Canada for supporting the January 15 ultimatum and getting ready for war.

The first reason was, I believe, well summarized by the Minister of National Defence before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on December 20, 1990. Mr. McKnight stated:

> I suggest that if they (the sanctions) had worked properly and we had been able to bring about a change in Saddam Hussein's mind and have him remove himself from Kuwait—

This is an additional objective, as I understand it, to the original objectives of the United Nations, > —then the sanctions would have been appropriate. We have not been able to do that.

The Minister of National Defence clearly stated his judgment that the sanctions had not worked properly. He used an early change in Saddam Hussein's mind as the criterion for judging the appropriateness of the UN embargo policy. I totally disagree—and I believe most others would also disagree—that that is the criterion of the success of an embargo policy. In my view, the proper criterion for judging the effectiveness of an embargo is its impact on the economy of the country concerned.

No one ever expected that the full impact of the UN embargo would be felt before six to eight to twelve months. Indeed, on December 10 last year, the Secretary of State for External Affairs produced for the Standing Committee on External Affairs of the other place some background notes showing that the embargo was already having an effect on the industrial and manufacturing sector and the petroleum sector of Iraq.

The United States Armed Forces Committee heard testimony on the effect of the embargo from important witnesses, including the former Secretary of Defense, James Schlesinger, which I would like to quote. I quote these excerpts from Mr. Schlesinger's testimony not only because of the authority of Mr. Schlesinger as a witness, as a former Secretary of Energy, a former Secretary of Defence and still an important strategic thinker in the United States, but also because his analysis is basically factual. If honourable senators wish to follow the matter up, they can read the testimony given on the same day by General David Jones, for example, the former Chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff, with respect to the efficacy of these sanctions. In fact, I would recommend to any honourable senator the reading of the full analysis by Mr. Schlesinger before that committee, because it places the decisions which were so simplistically defended by Canadian ministers in a much more complicated context.

● (1510)

I will now read a number of paragraphs from Mr. Schlesinger's testimony. Mr. Schlesinger says:

> Let me turn now to the alternative strategies available to the United States and its allies. The first, of course, is to allow the weight of the economic sanctions imposed in August gradually to wear down the capacity and the will of Iraq to sustain its present position. The embargo, backed up by a naval blockade, is the most successful ever achieved aside from time of war. Early on, it was officially estimated that it would require a year for the sanctions to work. It appears to be working more rapidly than anticipated. In three months time civilian production in Iraq is estimated to have declined by some 40 per cent; oil exports are essentially nil; and export earnings have dropped correspondingly. The hord of hard currency necessary to sustain smuggling is dwindling away. The economic pressure can only grow worse.
> While Iraq's military posture does not appear to have been seriously affected as yet, as the months go by, that, too, will be seriously weakened. Lack of spare parts will force Iraq to begin to cannibalize its military equipment. Military industry, as yet significantly unaffected, will follow the downward path of civilian industry. In short, the burden on both Iraq's economy and her military strength will steadily increase.

He then goes on to say:

> One should note that since the original estimate was that the sanctions route would require a year, it seems rather illogical to express impatience with them because they will not have produced the hoped-for results in six months' time. In this connection, one should also note the frequently expressed view that Saddam Hussein must not be, quote, "rewarded" for his aggression, but instead must be punished. As an expression of emotion, it is understandable. But it must not be allowed to obscure our sense of reality.

[Senator MacEachen.]

> Saddam Hussein is being punished and punished severely. He has forfeited $20 billion of foreign exchange earnings a year, indeed $30 billion at the current oil price. Iraq's credit is totally destroyed, and the remnants of its hard currency reserves dwindling. When Saddam looks across the border at Saudi Arabia or the UAE, they are prospering because of his actions from which he himself has derived no benefit. He is likely to be consumed by envy. His own economy is rapidly becoming a basketcase. Moreover, the position of preponderance that he had earlier achieved in OPEC is now gone. He is diplomatically isolated.
>
> His military position will slowly be degraded. His pawns in Lebanon have been wiped out by his chief Ba'athist rival, Assad, who has immensely strengthened his own position. He has been forced to accept an embarrassing peace with Iran, and that nation's position relative to Iraq is slowly being improved. Sympathic nations, such as Jordan and Yemen, have been harshly treated, and neither they nor he have had any recourse.
> On the benefits side stands only the looting of Kuwait. In brief, Saddam Hussein staked Iraq's position on a role of the dice and lost. Only if he has a deeply masochistic streak, can he regard himself as rewarded. To allow our own political rhetoric to obscure the severe punishment that has already been meted out, or to suggest that our current policy is in some way unsuccessful, and that Saddam's position is now or is potentially enviable, strikes me as misconceived.

When the Minister of Defence appeared before the finance committee a couple of weeks later he was unable to put on the record any significant information that would contest this formidable array of economic and military results and the severe punishment that has been meted out. There is no doubt that, as Mr. Schlesinger concluded his testimony by advising the committee, the sanctions would have their full effect. So much on sanctions.

I believe that sanctions was the preferred route. They have not been followed for reasons that I will explain later. In fact, the President of the United States made it clear last night. He could not wait, he said. He could not wait for reasons that some of you will have understood—reasons that become equally as clear from the testimony as the question of sanctions becomes clear from Mr. Schlesinger's testimony.

The Minister of Defence must have recognized himself the foolishness of his statement on the embargo, because he tried to correct it by saying:

> I did not say that sanctions do not work. The difference between the Senator—

He was referring to me here. He goes to say:

> —and I is that he suggests to wait. Shall we wait until people are murdered on the street in Kuwait?

I believe—and the committee also recognized it—that that was a rather last resort, unacceptable comment. Can we wait? Shall we wait until people are murdered on the street of Kuwait? The Minister of National Defence reiterated what we had heard from Washington the previous day—that is, that because of human rights abuses perpetrated by the Iraqi armed forces in Kuwait, "offensive action is necessary and urgent."

The Minister of Defence evoked the defense of human rights in Kuwait and the second reason for Resolution No. 678. I presume that all of us share—at least I do—in the minister's revulsion for the murdering that goes on in Kuwait at the hands of the Iraqis, but how many more innocent victims will be lying on the streets not only in Kuwait City but also in many other cities of the Middle East once the war rages on? We should have strong human rights policies, but is it not somewhat paradoxical that war, with its ultimate denial of the right to life, should become the preferred instrument of an alleged human rights policy?

● (1520)

Is the motivation of countries such as Afghanistan and Syria, which will fight shoulder to shoulder with Canada, the protection of human rights? The irony of that situation did not escape the committee either when Minister McKnight cited the objective of human rights in Kuwait as the purpose of Resolution 678 and, at the same, time heralded the presence of Afghanistan as a member of the multinational coalition. If what was stated by Minister McKnight—and I do not think it can be—is the government's justification for offensive action, I find it disingenuous, to say the least.

The third reason given for offensive action is support for the United Nations Security System and a UN post-cold-war order. I believe the condemnation of Iraqi aggression and the demand that it pull out of Kuwait were the right moves and fully in keeping with the UN Charter. I believe the embargo and the military deployment to enforce it were the right decisions and, here again, in keeping with the UN Charter. The Canadian contribution to the enforcement of the embargo or the implementation of the embargo would have continued to receive our full support. Those decisions that I have recited added to the credibility and the strength of the United Nations.

However, I strongly reject the view that Security Council Resolution 678 and the license it gave to individual UN members to use force as early as January 15 has the same effect. It does the opposite. It is putting at risk the credibility of the United Nations, for reasons I shall be dealing with in a moment, in what everyone agrees is the vital test of its ability to maintain peace. Let us simply note at this point that the key provisions of the Charter for regulating the use of force have been ignored.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has invoked a last justification for supporting the early use of support under Resolution 678. How could Canada, he said, fail to support it when the leading and permanent members of the Security Council all joined behind it in a remarkable display of unanimity? How could Canada fail to go along with the United Kingdom, the United States, China and Russia? Well, Canada is not any of those countries; Canada is a different country. Did it not occur to Mr. Clark that possibly the political judgment of any or all of these countries might not be right? They have made mistakes in the past. Canada did not support the invasion of Tibet; nor did it support the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan. It did not support the Anglo-French expedition in Suez, and it did not support the United States military involvement in Vietnam.

The fact that these countries may find it right or expedient to use force now in the Persian Gulf should not sway our judgment even if they are right. We should make up our own minds independently and in our own way.

May I reinforce the comment I made about Canada and the United States? In the testimony given before the United States Armed Services Committee, there is a preliminary fact sheet which says that the Congressional Research Service has identified some 215 instances from 1798 through 1989 in which the United States' military forces have been used abroad in hostilities or potential hostilities to protect U.S. interests or citizens. It says 215 times. That is somewhat of an illustration of the different history that Canada has had in comparison with the United States.

As we have possibly passed the moment of truth, Canadians deserve to be told the truth of what happened during these fateful days before we moved to war. Honourable senators will remember that I put the question bluntly when speaking before this house on November 20 of last year: For whom and for what is time running out? Time was not running out on sanctions, because they were becoming more and more effective, and if the time had been allotted they would have achieved their goal.

Why was the timetable changed at the United Nations without observing the Charter and explaining to the world the reasons for the change in course? As long as the embargo was in place time was running out for Saddam Hussein, but why was the timetable changed? We know from the President's statement last night. He decided that time was running out for the United States and that the timetable had to be accelerated. In that connection it is interesting to refer to the testimony that was given before the same United States Defence Committee by General David Jones, a recent former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. His testimony as a whole is worth reading, but he talked about the size and direction for force deployments in the Persian Gulf by the United States government. He said, in part:

> In this area, I must confess to a nagging concern about the means and ends. By calling for an offensive military option and increasing the projected Desert Shield force levels, the President has clearly decided to send a strong message to Saddam Hussein about the seriousness of the U.S. resolve. This high-risk tactic might succeed in forcing an acceptable political resolution to the crisis, or if combat is unavoidable, will give us the forces needed to prevail alongside our coalition partners. If so, I will applaud the President's nerve and foresight.

> My main concern with this latest scheduled reinforcement isn't that we might choose to fight but rather that the deployment might cause us to fight, perhaps prematurely and perhaps unnecessarily. I would stress that this is a risk, not a certainty, but one that ought to be taken seriously.

How interesting that he should say that this scheduled reinforcement might cause us to fight unnecessarily and prematurely. General Jones goes on to talk about how well-equipped, how motivated and how well led the American forces are. He says that they are an extraordinary group of Americans, that the country should be proud of them and seek to minimize the problems and the risks that accompany their growing numbers. He then states:

● (1530)

> With a limited US rotation base, the force of that size can't be—readily be exchanged, can't easily be sustained, and can't be withdrawn without political liability. Thus, the risk is that the problems inherent in maintaining the offensive military option could create irresistible pressures to initiate combat irrespective of the progress of the UN sanctions.

Honourable senators, in my view that is precisely what happened.

We know from President Bush's statement last night that Washington came to the view that time was running out for the United States and that the timetable had to be accelerated. His reasons were that public opinion support for his stand in the Persian Gulf had started to decline; the momentum of the military buildup could not be sustained, and massive armed forces left inactive in the desert with the coming of the summer; the standing of the United States in the world; and the personal credibility of the President, whose international skills are greatly praised, would not suffer humiliation in the hands of the local dictator.

Washington was concerned that the cohesion of the coalition would be threatened by inaction and by the passage of time. There was also concern that a consensus in the Security Council was so close to miraculous that the opportunity to get a UN cover for United States action should not be lost before the consensus dissolved.

You may remember, honourable senators, that last November I described a simultaneous operation of two security systems in the Persian Gulf area, the first based on UN resolutions underpinning the embargo and its enforcement, and the second consisting of United States forces deployed to protect Saudi Arabia and to put pressure on Saddam Hussein. I said that each had a well-defined and important role to play and that they should be supported. But, with an offensive use of force, this distinction becomes meaningless. All troops in the area are at war under United States leadership, given the size of the USA military deployment. The United Nations has nothing to say about it. Washington surely came to the conclusion that the activation of the UN Charter provisions for the use of force was an uncertain and cumbersome process taxing beyond reason the Security Council consensus, and that the United States had to be free to strike Iraq in its own time. In these circumstances, the options before other members of the Security Council were either to accept that the United States, presumably seconded by the United Kingdom, would act on its own, or to work out some form of UN cover that would at least keep the United States action within a United Nations framework, however fragile.

Honourable senators, that is why Resolution 678 ignores the Charter provisions relating to the use of force. That is why this resolution refers only to Chapter 7 of the Charter which generally concerns aggression. That is why senior diplomats in the corridors of the Security Council have recognized that Resolution 678 lacks legal legitimacy but has political legitimacy. That is "Realpolitik." That is also the reason why the Canadian government supported that resolution. It did not want to fail to support the United States. Yet, it knew that Canadian public opinion would not let it plunge into a local war with the United States without UN cover.

That is precisely what Resolution 678 is—a cover. Hostilities did break out in the Persian Gulf, but that does not change the situation vis-a-vis the United Nations. The war will not be a war fought under the United Nations Charter Security System but a war fought by a small group of countries under Security Council licence.

Some may think it does not matter. I think it does. Our way of managing the Persian Gulf crisis will be an important landmark in developing a new global security system. What we are witnessing now is war, undoubtedly for a worthy cause—a cause that cried out for correction—but waged by a small group of countries with a colonialist past. The timing of offensive actions against Iraq is the result of an evaluation made in Washington. Let us take it for what it is and not pretend this is the result of the considered judgment by the UN membership. Perhaps this is the best that could be achieved in New York. But, if the Charter provision on the use of force cannot be made to work, even in the post-cold-war era, this should be acknowledged, and we should work for a better system. But it is dangerous for the United Nations to have to rely on the judgment of a superpower and that of its immediate supporters. They may be right today; they may be wrong tomorrow.

I am not here condemning what the United States does. It is entitled to do what it wishes. It is a superpower; it has superpower responsibilities. I do not question the ability of the United States to make decisions which it thinks are in its own interests and to carry out those decisions. I have applauded their condemnation of Iraq, their support of the embargo, and their protection of Saudi Arabia. I believe they have dangerously strained the UN security system by promoting Resolution 678 and that great damage could flow, including for the United Nations, from this premature attack on Iraq. But my main purpose is to establish the background against which Canadian policy should be judged.

Canada has no tradition of violence, not like the congressional record showed with respect to the United States. We are not a militaristic nation. We are respected as Canadians in the world because, in situations of international crisis, we have worked for peace by exercising leadership in the achievement of negotiated settlements; and we have made contributions in the form of peacekeeping operations to the enforcement of these settlements.

All nations in this world are concerned with peace and global security, but each nation has its own contribution to make according to its skills, its strength, its tradition and its credibility with other nations.

● (1540)

Canada is a leader in peacekeeping and the negotiated settlement of international disputes. We have played that role very successfully and it is an essential role in the world. Our international credibility is not based on our use of force but on our constant efforts to replace force by the rule of law. In my view, that is what the peaceful order for the world is all about.

Our support for the condemnation of Iraq, for the UN embargo and for our participation in the diplomatic isolation of Iraq is fully in keeping with that tradition. That was the right course to take; but I must say that I find no evidence that the government took any bold initiatives toward a negotiated settlement when it had ample time to do so. Canada was on the Security Council and had a unique opportunity to propose new areas for negotiation, a framework for negotiation—in brief, a peaceful alternative to the use of force. It had a unique opportunity to join with and lead those countries which were so anxious to develop that alternative.

The Prime Minister solemnly declared in the other place yesterday that this peaceful approach was part of Canadian policy and that no efforts were spared to pursue it; but we have no meaningful evidence of that. The evidence is that Canada supported a premature ultimatum to Saddam Hussein, justified it by echoing American reasons, and joined in the use of force in circumstances that may well be to the long-term detriment of the United Nations, and at a time when economic sanctions had not been given an opportunity to work. It may be that, at a certain point, the use of force could be justified for attaining the objectives that had been set originally, and at that point we would support the use of force; but why should we now support the use of force when an alternative which was available had not been given an opportunity to work?

In choosing that course, the Canadian government does not seem to have understood its consequences. The first of these is that, because of the deployment of our forces in a war zone, Canada is at war. While operational command will remain in Canadian hands, strategic direction will come from the Saudis and the Americans. This much we learned from the Canadian Chief of the Defence Staff. Whatever the specific battlefield role of our forces, they will be integrated into a multinational force embarked on offensive action against Iraq.

The second consequence is that Canada being at war with Iraq, even though the Secretary of State for External Affairs is fuzzying it by saying there shall be no declaration against Iraq, Canadian territory will be open to retaliation. Why should the Iraqi government regard Canadian territory as immune when Canada is engaged in acts of war against Iraq?

The third consequence is that the Canadian government, by its action, has removed itself from any leadership role in the return to the future negotiation of a settlement of Middle East issues. Our military contribution to the coalition is so marginal that it will hardly get us more than a small place in this exercise. Our credibility in the Middle East, however, was entirely based on our long-standing policy of non-engagement and neutrality. There should be no mistake about it, the military intervention of Canada in the Persian Gulf conflict, in the circumstances I described, marks the end of an era in Canadian foreign policy.

The fourth consequence of the government actions relates to the impact of war on the Canadian economy and public finances. We already know the effect of the threat of war on the price of oil. More is to come now with most untimely inflationary results. We also know, from Supplementary Estimates before this house, that the enforcement of the embargo called for a $350 million increase in appropriations to National Defence in the current fiscal year.

Well, honourable senators, what the government should have done was to resist Resolution 678 and keep its policy of support for the UN embargo on the rails. It should have called for respect of the UN Charter provisions governing the use of force. It should have argued that, in accordance with Article 42 of the Charter, the Security Council should make a considered assessment of the embargo's effects before authorizing the use of force. It should have supported those Europeans who have argued for patience and negotiation. It should have come out with a peace plan of its own. It should have made clear that it would not participate in offensive action now because our support for the United Nations takes another form, peaceful negotiations, which are and will be necessary.

These are the steps that a government led by Mr. Chrétien would have taken. With a Liberal government, Canada would not be at war today, and because of the major role we would have played in the last few months to achieve a peaceful solution in the Persian Gulf, our credibility in the United Nations would be enhanced. Indeed, Canada would be looked upon as one of the few countries still able to talk peace in the Middle East.

I want to conclude very soon, honourable senators, and I would like to summarize the situation as I see it, and the direction that Canadian policy should now take. First, it should be clear that, as we opposed war yesterday, we are still opposing war today because it was premature and other ways of achieving our objectives were not given enough time to work.

Second, while we do not support the government's decision to go to war, we cannot fail to support our forces which discharge military duties set by the government. They need that support, physical and moral, if only to defend themselves and to ensure their security. Mr. Chrétien wanted to make very clear that there should be no mistake about our readiness in this house to support the passage today of the required funds that have been requested by the government in order to furnish the necessary resources to our forces in the Persian Gulf. The reality is that had we been in government we would have made a different decision. The reality is that the Canadian forces are there with a mission entrusted to them by the Government of Canada and they cannot be short-changed.

Third, we are in the second day of war, but we should already start working to put an end to it and to restore a peaceful negotiating process. This calls for an early cease-fire and the withdrawal of Iraqi troops from Kuwait, even if it has not already been achieved by force. It calls for security arrangements for Kuwait and a process for settling outstanding disputes between Iraq and Kuwait. It calls for a Middle East conference to build up a Middle East security system and make progress for an Arab-Israeli settlement. It calls for the lifting of the UN embargo, inasmuch as the peace process has been successfully launched. It calls for humanitarian and economic aid.

Putting together arrangements and carrying out negotiations is the way out of a war. Although these arrangements would all be interrelated, they could be worked out separately in two phases.

The first, and most urgent, designed to de-escalate the conflict, would include measures of withdrawal by Iraq, the temporary renunciation of the use of force, a decision on a process for initiating multilateral negotiations, and humanitarian aid. Substantive, longer-term issues could be tackled in a second phase.

● (1550)

Honourable senators, turning once more to the lessons of history, I believe we have learned that a number of disastrous wars have been fought in the past as a result of miscalculations or narrow judgments. I cannot help feeling that if Canadians fight and lose their lives in the coming weeks, this will be one of those wars. Saddam Hussein's judgmental errors are plain for anyone to see, but, looking at the sequence of events that led to the present situation, I am not satisfied that Canada, as a leading country of the United Nations and of the Western world, has been independent of judgment, far-sighted and wise.

I know we have legitimately gone to war in the past, and the time may well have come to go to war in the Persian Gulf, but not now, not in the present circumstances, because the ways of searching for peace with a just settlement were not exhausted, because Canada had not yet pulled its weight behind that search, because what appears to be a successful policy of embargo had not been allowed to run its course, and because the cost of this premature war may turn out to be prohibitive for the Middle East, for the United Nations, for the West and for Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, yesterday, during the course of Question Period, under questioning by Senator Olson and Senator Grafstein, I undertook to address myself to some of the issues that would be raised during the course of this debate this afternoon. I shall try to do so as briefly and concisely as I can.

First of all, let me say at the outset that I do not disagree with the sombre and realistic analysis with which the Leader of the Opposition began his speech this afternoon, his analysis of the risks that we are running, in this and in any war; nor do I disagree with his reading—although there are no facts in the future, as we all know—of the potential impact of the war, economically and politically, even if the war is won quickly.

The underlying causes of instability in the Middle East will be there after the war, as they were prior to August 2. It is more than possible that some of those causes may even have been aggravated by the war, but not so much as would have been the case if Saddam Hussein were not stopped. What will have happened, in terms of the stability in the Gulf region and in the Middle East, and therefore in the world, is that a major threat will have been removed.

To end this war, to end Iraqi occupation of Kuwait, and to remove the threat that that poses to world peace, will be a step forward for collective security and for the United Nations.

Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition said that a Liberal government in office today would not be at war. It is clear, however, from the support which the Liberal Party gave to the first 11 resolutions passed by the United Nations, and to the policy and actions of the Government of Canada with regard to the Gulf from August until late November, that the Liberal Party does not disagree and does not oppose the sending of Canadian armed forces personnel to enforce sanctions and to join with other nations in trying to deter further aggression.

We are, therefore, left with the astounding policy pronounced by Mr. Chrétien that those forces must pack it in and go home if fighting were to break out.

That is the policy of Mr. Chrétien, of the Liberal Party. There was an even more astonishing statement made by Mr. Chrétien in the debate in the House of Commons the other day, a statement which he made twice, once in English and once in French, a statement of which there were echoes today in the speech given by Senator MacEachen.

Mr. Chrétien said, at page 16995 of the Debates of the House of Commons of January 15, that:

> Canada has taken the position since 1956 that we shall not be involved in war if it is not under the flag of the UN.

What does he think we have been doing in NATO, into which a previous Liberal government brought us in the late 1940s, or in NORAD, our alliance with the United States? NATO and NORAD and other military alliances to which Canada has belonged are part of the collective security.

When the Honourable Senator MacEachen said today that the action that Canada took, starting last November, and continuing last night, represents the end of an era in Canadian foreign policy, I ask what era he is talking about.

Our support for, and membership in, the United Nations over the years is not in any way inconsistent with—is perfectly consistent with—the efforts that we have made in collective security in such alliances as NATO and NORAD.

I think a more accurate interpretation of the situation, a more accurate reading of the situation, was given last night by the Right Honourable John Turner in the House of Commons, when he said:

> The whole history and tradition and commitment of the party to which I have belonged for 35 years has been in support of the United Nations. Our people were there at the beginning, upholding the principle of collective security and supporting the resolutions and actions of the United Nations.
>
> This is a crucial test for that international organization. This is a crucial test for the United Nations, and Canada must support it. This is a crucial test for collective security, and Canada must support it.

• (1600)

Those are the words of the former leader of the Liberal Party.

Honourable senators, Iraq invaded Kuwait on August 2. At the United Nations there ensued a series of resolutions, 11 of them, in most of which Canada played a prominent role in drafting and cosponsoring. Those resolutions condemned the invasion of Kuwait, demanded the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait, condemned the annexation of Kuwait, imposed sanctions, authorized member states to use military force to enforce sanctions, and so on. Throughout those 11 resolutions, as I have stated, the Liberal Party supported the actions and the policy of the government, our support for the United Nations resolutions and for the actions we were taking in the Gulf.

The political leadership of the country divided in late November essentially on a question of United Nations Security Council Resolution 678. We had a preview of the position of the Liberal Party during the debate in this house on November 20 when Senator MacEachen stated at page 3875 of the Debates of the Senate for November 20:

> . . . Canada should make it clear that it will not consider offensive military action in the Gulf without a Security Council resolution directing such action. It should also make it clear that it will oppose such a resolution being passed at this time.

On November 29 the UN Security Council passed Resolution 678. That resolution imposed a timeframe or deadline of January 15 for the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait. It authorized member states to use all necessary means to enforce that and previous and subsequent resolutions of the United Nations Security Council on this matter. Earlier that day the House of Commons voted on a government resolution of support, and the house divided, the Liberal Party voting against it.

So the roots of the disagreement we have today lie in the opposition of the Liberal Party to United Nations Security Council Resolution 678 and the government's support, indeed our cosponsorship, of it. The roots of our disagreement lie in the opposition of the Liberal Party to the imposition of a deadline by the United Nations and to the authorization by the United Nations Security Council effectively of the use of force to enforce that and previous resolutions.

The first question that arises is whether imposing a deadline was wise and justified. Remember that this was the end of November. Remember that the occupation had begun on August 2. Remember that 11 resolutions had been passed by the United Nations Security Council calling on Iraq to withdraw. Remember that between August and the end of November Iraq was digging in in Kuwait, adding more men and material, and consolidating its hold on Iraq. Half the population of Kuwait has fled the country. The invader, the occupant, Iraq, has committed unspeakable atrocities, which were detailed by Amnesty International among others. Remember that Iraq was taking advantage of the opportunity to dig in and had time to build up its own capacity for chemical, biological and nuclear warfare. Remember that every attempt over that period to persuade Iraq to enter into negotiations had failed. We come to the end of November, and what is the United Nations to do if it is to have a shred of credibility left?

Almost unanimously—I believe the Chinese abstained—the United Nations Security Council imposed a deadline. The United Nations Security Council had first called on Iraq in the first week of August to get out of Kuwait. At the end of November they imposed a deadline, but it was not tomorrow, the next day or next week; it was a 47-day "pause for peace" to give Saddam Hussein an opportunity to reflect on implications of his refusal to obey and respect the Security Council resolutions.

There was a general perception that the Iraqi regime did not take seriously the will of the international community to enforce sanctions. Everything Saddam Hussein said or did provided further evidence that Iraq was to stay in Kuwait, to permanently take hold of that country. So the members of the international community felt that it was absolutely necessary to give a firm signal to Saddam Hussein. Forty-seven days seemed to everyone to be ample time for the Government of Iraq to undertake a withdrawal from Kuwait. But Iraq's every effort since the beginning of the crisis had been to attempt to draw out the process as long as possible while it consolidated its hold on Kuwait and while it attempted to foster divisions within the forces arrayed against him.

Nothing could be more reasonable than that in late November, almost four months after the invasion and occupation of Kuwait, the United Nations Security Council should set a deadline by which it expected Saddam Hussein should respect the previous 11 resolutions and withdraw from that country.

• (1610)

The question of sanctions comes up. First, I should state for the record that the United Nations Security Council, and certainly the Sanctions Committee of the Council, has, I am informed, neither the mandate nor the capacity to evaluate the impact of the sanctions on Iraq. The United Nations Security Council committee was to monitor the compliance of member states with the sanctions. It had neither the mandate nor the capacity, so I am informed, to evaluate the impact of those sanctions on Iraq. That evaluation was delegated to the member states of the UN.

As Vice-Chairman within the Sanctions Committee of the Security Council, Canada states that the assessment of sanctions had been constant and scrupulous, and that member states concluded that while sanctions are affecting the Iraqi economy, they offered no promise of compelling Saddam Hussein to quit Kuwait.

The report, which I should place on the record, which has been provided to me by our Department of External Affairs, states that we have noted no diminution of Iraq's military capabilities as a result of sanctions. Iraq continued to give top priority to the military for food, petroleum, spare parts and personnel. Industries producing goods for the military had not experienced, and were not likely to experience, significant slowdowns soon.

While shortages and inconveniences were being created for the civilian population, virtually all foodstuffs continued to be available on the open market, albeit at higher prices. Foodstuffs and strategic imports such as chemical additives, lubricants, water purification chemicals and spare parts are reaching Iraq undetected. They were needed in relatively small volumes and could be transported by air, over land by truck or pack animal, or by small boats capable of eluding naval interdiction.

Senator MacEachen says that the imposition of a deadline by the United Nations Security Council, the actions that have been taken by the international coalition—a raid against Iraq—represent a spectacular display of brinkmanship, as he puts it. Honourable senators, as I have indicated, Iraq has increased continuously its forces and reinforced and hardened its entrenched military positions in Kuwait since the invasion. The longer it was able to do so, the more difficult it would have become to dislodge Iraq from Kuwait. How formidable would we have the Iraqi entrenchments become?

Honourable senators say, "Wait for the sanctions," but Iraq was increasing its capacity to strike offensively from Kuwait at targets in Saudi Arabia and elsewhere. How strong do we want the Iraqi arsenal in Kuwait to be? We are informed that Iraq has constructed a pipeline that would allow it to drop thousands of barrels of oil a day into the Gulf as a means of environmental warfare. How many such pipelines could we allow?

Time was allowing Iraq to develop its chemical and biological weapons, or even a nuclear arsenal, and to improve its capability to deliver such weapons. How long could we afford to give for massively destructive weapons to be developed?

In spite of the decline in living standards suffered since sanctions were imposed, there were no public demonstrations of discontent, nor evidence that the Iraqi regime would respond to pressure from the public to change its policy. Even if it could be done, would we wish to starve the people in Kuwait and Iraq in the small hope of—

[Senator Murray.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Are you still reading from the same report?

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Frith: Will you be tabling that report, senator?

Senator Murray: I called it a report. It is the answer to some questions which I put to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the notes he has provided for me on the subject.

Senator Frith: Do you object to tabling the report?

Senator Murray: I have just read virtually word for word the notes that have been provided to me by my colleague on that particular subject; that is to say, the effect of sanctions on Iraq and the slim prospects—the non-existent prospects—of those sanctions producing the desired result, which is the withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait.

Senator MacEachen: They are bureaucrats you are quoting. Give us someone with the authority of General Jones or Mr. Schlesinger. You are quoting anonymous bureaucrats.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator talks about anonymous bureaucrats. I have made the statement that the assessment by the member states of the United Nations of the impact of sanctions had been scrupulous and close and they had—

Senator Frith: The member states of the United Nations?

Senator MacEachen: The member states of the United Nations never made any determination.

Senator Murray: The member states of the United Nations Security Council to whom was delegated the responsibility of assessing the effectiveness of the sanctions—

Senator MacEachen: That is not in accordance with the Charter.

Senator Murray: —had come to the conclusion that the sanctions would not have the desired effect.

Senator Frith: They made no such decision.

Senator Murray: They certainly did make the decision.

Senator Frith: Under Article 42 they did not. They simply did not. That is where they are supposed to make it, and they did not do it.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator raises Article 42 again, as he did the other night in the Standing Committee.

Senator Frith: That is where they make the assessment.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have already pointed out that the Sanctions Committee of the United Nations Security Council was not given any mandate to evaluate the impact of sanctions on Iraq. That duty was delegated to the member states, as indeed they did not invoke Article 42. They delegated to member states the authority to take all necessary measures, including recourse to force. What does the honourable senator call it when they authorized member states to take all necessary measures, including, as Senator MacEachen and Mr. Chrétien agreed, the use of force to enforce the resolution?

Senator Frith: They are taking that as individual state action. It is not a United Nations action. That is all we are saying. That is a fact.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, let me again place on the record, because Senator MacEachen referred to it, that the resolutions of the United Nations refer to Chapter VII of the Charter as a whole and not simply to Articles 41 and 42.

• (1620)

Senator Frith: That's crazy; it is a sottise.

Senator Murray: It is not.

Senator Frith: It is like charging someone under the Criminal Code and not telling them which section they are charged under. When they ask what section they are charged under, you tell them the whole Criminal Code. The whole of Chapter VII—ridiculous!

Senator Murray: I am coming exactly to that point. Chapter VII provides an array of options to the—

Senator Frith: It is not options; it is stages of proceedings.

Senator Murray: That is not the case.

Senator Frith: You take Article 41 and if that does not work, you go to Article 42. They did not make a decision under Article 42 that Article 41 had not worked. If you would only accept that and then say all the other things, I would understand your position. I do not know why you keep saying it. It is just wrong.

Senator Murray: The framework of the Charter realized that no two situations are exactly the same and the Charter wisely leaves decisions on actual measures or procedures to the Security Council. There is no fixed sequence and no requirement that the Security Council follow specific steps.

Senator Frith: Why do you not read it? Article 41 states that if they decide that Article 41 has not worked then they work under Article 42.

Senator Murray: They may.

Senator Frith: Of course, but they may, if they make the decision, and they did not make the decision.

Senator Murray: Read the resolution, honourable senator.

Senator Frith: I have read the resolution and it refers to the Charter. You read the Charter; that is the problem. I have read them both. You obviously have not read the Charter.

Senator Murray: Chapter VII provides for action under a UN commandment or—

Senator Frith: Yes; Articles 42 on do authorize that, but not Article 41.

Senator Murray: How far beyond Article 42 have you read?

Senator Frith: I have read right up to Article 49 and 50 and then 51. Articles 42 to 50 deal with armed force and they require a decision under Article 42, which was not made.

Senator Murray: In reading from Article 42 to 49 you would not have missed Article 48.

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Murray: Article 48 provides for the delegation of that action to UN members.

Senator Frith: What action?

Senator Murray: Action under a UN command. My statement, which I began to make before I was interrupted by the honourable senator, is that Chapter VII provides, in Article 42 and later, for action under a UN command or—

Senator Frith: Armed force action, yes.

Senator Murray: —under Article 48 the delegation of that action to UN members. Our position and the position of the member states of the Security Council is that Resolution 678 has delegated enforcement of UN resolutions to members who are co-operating with Kuwait.

Senator Frith: That is fine. That is your position. I think it is wrong, but at least that is your position.

Senator Murray: Thank you, senator.

There is not a UN command because there are no UN forces. Our forces are under Canadian command in a coalition led by the one country, the United States, which has the best chance of enforcing the resolutions. I referred to Resolution 678, which states that the Security Council authorizes member states co-operating with the Government of Kuwait to take all necessary measures, et cetera.

Senator Frith: But, senator, the action under Article 48 only arises once the decision has been made under Article 42.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Article 48 states: styleonti6;4

> 1. The action required to carry out the decisions of the Security Council . . . shall be taken by all the Members of the United Nations or by some of them, as the Security Council may determine.

Senator Frith: And they did it under Article 41.

Senator Murray: Resolution 678 authorized member states that were co-operating—not required or called upon—but authorized.

Senator Frith: "Authorized" is authorized on the basis of a decision. Article 48 states a decision and the decision has to be made under Article 41 for an embargo, which we did and which the government supported, and we supported; but it then has to make a decision under Article 42 before it delegates.

Senator Murray: No, it is not required to do so.

Senator Frith: I see Mr. Justice Murray of the International Court has made that decision.

Senator Murray: I thank the honourable senator for this promotion; but it delegated to member states, it authorized member states, to take all necessary measures, and we are agreed that those necessary measures did not exclude and, in fact, include the recourse to enforce the resolutions of the UN Security Council.

Senator MacEachen stated that Canada had not made dramatic diplomatic efforts to solve this crisis. Honourable senators, no country has been more active than Canada in trying to achieve a peaceful settlement of this dispute, of this crisis. Our Canadian diplomatic efforts were taken bilaterally, yes, with the United States, but with each of the G-7 countries in the Third World, with our colleagues in the Commonwealth and La Francophonie, who we thought, and had reason to believe, in some cases might have some influence in persuading Saddam Hussein to withdraw from Kuwait, and with the UN Secretary-General, as evidenced in a letter that was sent by the Prime Minister just before Mr. Perez de Cuellar went to meet Saddam Hussein in Baghdad. Our diplomatic efforts, those of the Prime Minister and Mr. Clark especially, have been tireless and they went on until the very last minute.

Honourable senators, at some point the decision had to be made as to whether the United Nations was going to be respected, whether the principle of collective security was going to be upheld. Twelve resolutions have been passed by the Security Council, virtually unanimously. The permanent five, Britain, France, the Soviet Union, the United States and China voted for all of the resolutions, except for Resolution 678 on which China abstained.

The invasion of Kuwait has proven to be a test case for the United Nations in the post-cold-war era. There is a new international order under which aggression between members of the international community can be regulated by the United Nations. The question is whether collective security will be effective or whether we will trade the cold war for a series of brutal actions by regional powers against their weaker neighbours. The security and rights of small countries everywhere are at stake. If the UN fails in this crisis, it is unlikely that it could ever again play an effective role in response to aggression. If it succeeds, there is a real prospect for a collective security in the future.

● (1630)

I leave honourable senators with a couple of sentences from the speech made by Mr. Turner last night in the House of Commons. He said:

> Even if the case for sanctions could be made, and it is a strong case, the issue today is not sanctions. The issue today is whether the United Nations resolutions will be obeyed. It was the United Nations that decided the date. It was the United Nations that decided not to wait for sanctions and it was the United Nations that imposed its own deadline.
> . . . the issue before us, before the House and before the world, is whose will is going to prevail: the ambitious will of Saddam Hussein who would hold, at the very least, the Arab world under his thumb, or the collective will of the world expressed as uniquely as it can be expressed within the forum of the United Nations with a rare singleness of purpose never in my lifetime seen by an international body.

[Senator Murray.]

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words about what we, as an Opposition, are facing. The role of an Opposition in a situation where a country finds itself at war is a bitter but essential one. In history, whenever an Opposition has not played this role vigorously, to the annoyance, of course, of the government, it has cost.

Because there was not sufficient opposition to the way World War I was conducted, the troops in that great conflict were entrusted to idiot generals, sanguinary butchers such as Butcher Haig—people who were incapable of thinking flexibly, of showing any tactical skill, who thought war was like having rams in rut, butting heads against one another. Haig even said that the victor is that country which still has one soldier standing when the other country does not.

In World War II, because of the stubbornness of the unconditional surrender doctrine, Germans who might have made peace a little earlier, perhaps by overthrowing Hitler and thereby making peace ahead of the invasion of eastern Europe by the Soviet Union, were rendered powerless. There were people then in British Parliament—among them Aneurin Bevan, whom Mr. Churchill respected—who did say these things. However, not enough people supported them.

One of the best ways of supporting one's troops in those circumstances in World War I would have been to ensure that, instead of Butcher Haig, either Allenby or Wavell had commanded the British troops and that there had been equivalent French military talent instead of the trench warfare merchants.

Whenever the Opposition has not played its bitter role in a time of conflict, the troops of that country have been ill-served. We Canadians, with the smallest of our participation, cannot control the course of events. However, we have a duty to talk beyond military victory and what can happen afterwards.

I am about as anti-Moslem as anyone in this Parliament—probably the most anti-Moslem member of this Parliament. I am telling you that openly. A militant, fanatical Moslem is someone who turns my stomach. I feel towards them the way I felt towards the Christians of the 14th Century. These are people who say that dying in war leads you to heaven. That is a wrong doctrine. These people deserve, if you like, a lesson.

However, whom do we want instead? We want moderate Moslems. In order for the moderates to take over from the fanatics, we have to give the moderates the possibility of hope. Crushing Hussein is one thing, but crushing Iraq and not working for peace while we are at war is a mistake. Canada should be pushing for that at all times.

I personally believe that sanctions would have worked. But we are now at war and we have to do the best we can for our troops. We must also think that the outcome of this war, if possible, should bring to power in Moslem countries the moderates rather than the religious fanatics. When we corner people, the fanatics generally get the upper hand. In a war, the Opposition has the duty to keep asking the government, if necessary, to do things differently from the way it is doing it. If the Opposition does not do that, it is failing the troops in the field and it is failing the nation.

I cannot speak to the whole Opposition, but, to the extent of my ability, I say that the best way to serve our troops is to make sure that the war ends quickly and that the war ends in such a way that might permit moderates to take over from the fanatics in as many Moslem countries as possible.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few comments on Bill C-94, because there are some provisions in that bill for the Department of Agriculture under Vote 30b in the amount of $85 million to the Grains and Oilseeds Program and another $25,000 as a payment in accordance with the Western Grain Stabilization Act.

I am making these comments now because I do not see any other opportunity to do so. Earlier, the minister replied to a question that I asked yesterday. My question was this: What happened to the meetings that were scheduled under the GATT to take place in Brussels on January 15? I was not here when he gave the answer, but I have found out since that the meetings have been postponed and they have not been rescheduled to any specific date. I understand the reason is because the Director General is not satisfied, at the moment, at any rate, that there would be any useful purpose in holding a meeting, because the various participating countries—most particularly those of the European Community and the United States—have not indicated that they have come sufficiently closer together in the agriculture sectors to attain any success at such a meeting.

• (1640)

Senator Murray: Mr. Dunkel declares himself as cautiously optimistic.

Senator Olson: But he is not yet optimistic enough to set down a date as to when they can at least hold discussions. That is my understanding, at any rate.

That is why I want to raise the matter now. Many people in Canada are of the opinion that, unless there is an agreement reached reasonably soon so that the international grain market can improve, there is only one way they are going to survive, and that is for the Government of Canada to raise its support for the agricultural community to a level somewhere near the subsidies paid by the United States and the countries of the EEC. We obviously do not expect to get up to the level that the European countries are paying, but that is not necessary. On the other hand, the level to which the prices have deteriorated is ridiculous.

The Canadian Wheat Board is now offering a price for wheat that is less than half of what it was 15 years ago. It is about $3 per bushel, where 15 years ago it was somewhere between $5 and $6 per bushel. In fact, some grades of wheat cost over $6 per bushel. I remember that in 1975 the final payment for the two top grades of Canadian durum wheat, the kind of wheat used to make macaroni, netted the farmer approximately $6.40 per bushel. Honourable senators, this is a desperate situation.

On top of that, to make matters worse, even though the Canadian Wheat Board has lowered the price by as much as it has, it has lowered the initial payment this year by about 25 per cent, and we are told that the Canadian Wheat Board is going to lose several hundred million dollars even at these reduced initial payments. If honourable senators look at the Canadian farm papers, The Western Producer being one, they will see that it states that if the farmers get a final payment for the 1989 crop, they had better take a picture of it, because that is probably the last one they will get for several years. That is sad, indeed, when they are only paid something less than $3 per bushel, or whatever that works out to per tonne. There is apparently no prospect at all for a final payment. I repeat that it is a pretty sad situation.

The Canadian Wheat Board is going to lose as much as $750 million to $900 million on this year's wheat pool. Some farmers are so frustrated that they do not know quite what to do. Anyone who is not familiar with this situation should realize that a number of grain producers in western Canada are simply not going to seed a crop in the spring of 1991 unless something changes. One of those changes may be an agreement under the GATT, towards which they have been working for two or three years, so that there can at least be some prospect of an international grain market that will return enough money to pay at least for the cost of production plus something for these grain producers to live on. But at the present prices, it is simply running at a loss—the farmers are not breaking even, even discounting capital costs. They are not breaking even on operating costs. Even if they own their land and allocate nothing to capital costs—no debt service charges, for instance—just taking operating costs into consideration, present prices are such that the farmers would only lose money. That is why many of them are not going to seed a crop this year.

I ask the minister whether he could try to obtain some information on this. I do not expect him to have it today. Could he find out, first from the Minister of Trade, who I suppose is the leading minister in the GATT talks which have been postponed or have collapsed, whether there is any hope that they could be revived so that an agreement can be reached? If that completely fails, then what is the government going to do? This, of course, is where the Minister of Agriculture will get into the act.

One of the headlines in this paper, The Western Producer, states, in effect, that the provinces divvy up the costs of the safety net program. I am not going to be particularly critical of that program this afternoon because it will probably have some value three or five years down the road. But, honourable senators, that is not the problem. Some producers need financial help now, in the spring of 1991, to get their crops in, to satisfy their banks, and that sort of thing.

As to the program worked out with the provinces, the federal government will pay some of it, 42 per cent or so; some of the provinces are going to pay some of it, an average of around 25 per cent; and the producers are expected to pay the rest, which amounts to 35 to 38 per cent. The amount varies somewhat, depending on the province involved. Honourable senators, how could anyone expect a farmer to pay 38 per cent on an insurance program through which he may get some returns three to five years from now, provided prices are high enough then, when he does not have enough money to operate today? That is the problem.

Where is the immediate assistance that is needed? And when I say "immediate", I am talking about a three to six month requirement. I notice that in Supplementary Estimates (B) there is an amount of $200 million allocated to the Farm Credit Corporation. That is of some help; I am not denying that. But to sink producers deeper and deeper into debt is not a solution, bearing in mind the circumstances and what led to those circumstances in the international grain market.

Honourable senators, I will not take up any more time this afternoon. I know that we are waiting to give Royal Assent to some bills. However, I hope that the minister will take these suggestions and questions seriously. I hope he will try to obtain some answers so that there can at least be some hope that the Government of Canada will support its grain producers when they are desperately fighting the competition of the Treasury of the United States and the treasuries of the European nations.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I thank my colleague, Senator Olson, for his comments and for suggesting that I might convey his representations to Mr. Crosbie and Mr. Mazankowski. But I will do more than that. I will endeavour to obtain a status report on the GATT negotiations as they affect agriculture and inquire of Mr. Mazankowski whether there is any comment that he wishes to make about short term assistance to the agricultural sector.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

[Senator Olson.]

RIDEAU HALL
THE SECRETARY TO THE GOVERNOR GENERAL AND HERALD CHANCELLOR

17 January, 1991

Mr. Speaker,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Claire L'Heureux-Dubé, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in her capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 17th day of January, 1991, at 5.05 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

Yours sincerely,

Judith A. LaRocque
Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Senate adjourn during pleasure to await the arrival of the Honourable Deputy of the Governor General. I understand that both the judge and the minister are currently in the Senate, and therefore there is no need for us to disburse.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

• (1650)

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Claire L'Heureux-Dubé, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to cause Letters Patent to be issued under his Sign Manual and Signet constituting the Honourable Claire L'Heureux-Dubé, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, his Deputy, to do in His Excellency's name all acts on his part necessary to be done during His Excellency's pleasure.

The Commission was read by the Clerk of the Senate.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Fisheries Act and to amend the Criminal Code in consequence thereof (Bill C-74, Chapter 1, 1991)

An Act to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act and the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and to make provision for the application of certain orders (Bill C-68, Chapter 2, 1991)

An Act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship and to amend certain Acts and relation thereto (Bill C-18, Chapter 3, 1991)

An Act to amend the Criminal Code (joinder of counts) (Bill C-54, Chapter 4, 1991)

The Honourable Andrée Champagne, P.C., Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1991 (Bill C-94, Chapter 5, 1991)

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That, when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, January 22, 1991 at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I move that all remaining Orders, Inquiries and Motions stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 22, 1991, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, January 22, 1991

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker pro tempore in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE MARGARET PATON HYNDMAN

TRIBUTES

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I should like to draw the attention of honourable colleagues to the death last Friday of Margaret Paton Hyndman, who was a distinguished member of the legal community in our country and who was often a witness before Senate committees. Margaret Hyndman died at the age of 89 in Toronto after a long life of distinguished service, both to her profession in law and to the voluntary community of Canada.

Margaret Hyndman was graduate of Listowel High School and of Osgoode Hall Law School. She was active in business and was the first woman director of a number of firms in the business sector.

Margaret Hyndman will be well-known to many senators here, not only because she appeared before the Senate, but because she was one of this country's most distinguished volunteers. She received many honours. In her professional life she was made a King's Counsel—only the second woman ever to have received that honour. She received the Order of Canada in 1973. She has been Woman of the Year and has received many other awards.

Margaret Hyndman made two exceptional contributions to this country, first in paving the way for other women in professional life. I do not think we would have seen a woman appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada—a woman just retired—if Margaret Hyndman, and other women who followed in her footsteps, had not paved the way. We would not have seen the rise of organizations such as the Legal Education Action Committee were it not for Margaret Hyndman; and the same holds true for any number of other contributions which she has made to the legal life of this country. Secondly, her work outside her professional life was so important.

Margaret Hyndman testified in front of the joint committee on the divorce bill on behalf of the Federation of Business Professional Women of Canada. She was one of the women who got the domicile issue raised and removed in the matter of divorce. She made many remarkable contributions. I am sure all honourable senators will want to honour her today and tender their expressions of sympathy to her two sisters.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was very sorry to hear of Margaret Hyndman's death, although she obviously had a very long and successful life. I merely wanted to say that I recall that when I was called to the bar in Ontario, some 42 years ago, Margaret Hyndman was a very well-known and distinguished lawyer.

Honourable senators, there was no question of any tokenism where Margaret Hyndman was concerned. She was a person of great legal ability and outstanding personal character. She was respected throughout the legal profession in Ontario and, indeed, throughout Canada. Margaret Hyndman, and Mrs. Parsons, whom some will remember, were the two well-known women lawyers and members of the Toronto bar when I was a student and newly-minted lawyer. As evidence that we have made some significant improvements in this area, it is now not remarkable to find women in leading roles in all branches of the legal profession in Ontario and, I believe, in Canada. Margaret Hyndman was a true pioneer of this most desirable development.

EUROPEAN BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT ACT

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-88, to provide for the membership for Canada in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, January 24, 1991.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a number of petitions to present with reference to the GST. Last week Senator Simard asked whether I was presenting petitions on behalf of Senator Hébert. I said that I was not. I want to emphasize that these petitions, like the others, are all addressed to me on a printed form, as far as the address is concerned; but the petitions themselves are all signed.

To begin with, I have two from Ontario and Québec, from Rouyn and New Liskeard, for example. This petition is in French and the body of the petition is the same as I mentioned on the petitions that I received earlier—that is, the petition states:

[Translation]

For these reasons we ask the government that senators and members of the Commons, the true representatives of Canadians, do everything they can to repeal the new goods and services tax, and we strongly call for an immediate election.

[English]

I then have another 18 petitions. In each case there are about 20 names on all of these. They too are from Québec and they are all addressed to me for presentation. The address of the first group that I picked at random are from St. Prospère, St. George, Montréal, and Saint-Laurent. There are then more from St. Lawrence and Montréal.

[Translation]

They have all been signed by the petitioners. Here are the names of the 18 petitioners from the region of Montreal.

[English]

I then have a dozen petitions from Ontario in the same form. The English in this case does not have exactly the same wording. I will simply read one petition because they are all the same.

• (1410)

Whereas the new universal 7% Goods and Services Tax adopted by the Conservative government will create serious, unjust and inhuman difficulties to Canadians;

whereas the implementation of this tax will constitute an unprecedented assault on the income of the Canadians, not only by forcing them to pay higher taxes, but also by confronting them with a rise in inflation, interest rates and unemployment;

whereas the methods used by the Government are unworthy of a democratic country. They are rather the work of lawmakers who want to implement a dictatorship, snapping their fingers at the general opposition of the population.

Those remarks are addressed to Parliament and to the government by those signing these 12 further petitions that are addressed to me. All of these petitions are from Ontario. There is a large number from Toronto—Don Mills, Scarborough, North York, Rexdale, Rosedale, which is downtown Toronto, and Willowdale, which is a northern suburb of Toronto. There are more from Scarborough, and there are some from Agincourt, which is a northeastern suburb of Toronto.

I present these petitions on behalf of the petitioners, all originally signed by the petitioners. There are some 500 names to prove that the resentment of the Canadian people against the goods and services tax has not died.

ABORTION BILL

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-43

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have petitions from Canadians who oppose Bill C-43. I have a petition of 86 names, all of them from the province of Quebec, who call on the Senate to defeat Bill C-43. They are mostly from Montreal, but there are some from the Gaspé and other places outside Quebec.

I have a second group of petitions, including 162 names, from coast to coast in Canada. There are signatures from every province in this country, all of them calling on the Senate to defeat Bill C-43.

I have a final group of petitions containing 101 names from Toronto, Ontario, all of them arguing that the majority of Canadians oppose recriminalization and that the House of Commons did not consider public opinion when passing Bill C-43. We are urged to defeat that bill when it comes to the Senate.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ESTABLISHMENT OF STANDING COMMITTEE—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, January 29, I will call the attention of the Senate to the advisability of striking a Standing Senate Committee on National Defence.

QUESTION PERIOD

AGRICULTURE

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE—SCHEDULED RESUMPTION OF MEETINGS—PROGRESS REPORT—CANADIAN SHORT-TERM FINANCIAL REQUIREMENTS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, has the Leader of the Government any replies to the questions I asked him concerning the reconvening of the GATT meetings respecting agricultural policy?

Would he also inquire of the Minister of Agriculture when the government intends to announce a program—and I am not referring to negotiations—dealing with some short-term financial requirements.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have nothing to report today with regard to the second part of the honourable senator's question.

With regard to the GATT negotiations, as they touch on agriculture, I think it is unlikely that there would be a ministerial meeting for some considerable time. My information is that there are informal, intensive discussions and consultations taking place among the parties at this time and that, as and when particular problems arise which require the attention of one or another of the countries at a political level, ministers are engaged. Until this informal process of consultation has run its course, I would not expect a full ministerial meeting to take place, which may not be a few weeks yet.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have seen some press reports out of Brussels indicating that there will be a meeting of the European ministers of agriculture today to take what they call some "first tentative steps towards a radical reform of European Community farming policy."

The particular article goes on to say:

> In a document leaked last week, the EC Agriculture Commissioner, Ray MacSharry, hinted he would like to see big cuts in production quotas and in the price at which surplus production of cereals, meat and dairy produce is bought up by the EC for storage.
>
> But after discussions, the Commission decided not—and I want to underline the word "not"— > —to present ministers with any formal proposal.

The article is a little puzzling. The subject is, of course, of such profound interest.

Senator Murray: I think the distinction being drawn there is between the commissioners of the EC and the ministers who, the honourable senator tells us, will be meeting today.

Senator Olson: I understand that, and I do not have any disagreement on that. I am not asking the minister to justify or not justify what is going on, but apparently the commissioners had some discussions and they believe there should be some significantly higher cuts than the 30 per cent that was offered some time ago to the end of this decade.

Since this is not the minister's responsibility, would he be good enough to volunteer some information as to why they would not even present their proposals to the ministers of agriculture who will, in fact, make the decision?

• (1420)

Senator Murray: For all I know, and the honourable senator knows, the purpose of today's meeting of the agriculture ministers of the community is for the purpose of receiving a report from Mr. MacSharry and his colleagues on the commission. I cannot explain the particular position of the European Community. I can comment to the extent that I think it is clear that the Europeans want to be assured of two things: First, that any accommodations that they might make in the field of agriculture would be part of an overall agreement in which some of their concerns on other trade matters would be made; second, it is their view that, if compromise must be shown on their part, likewise the United States in particular, and other partners must also compromise.

Senator Olson: I understand and accept that, but it is a bit discouraging for some of the producers who were so profoundly affected, because if there was any light at the end of the tunnel of these depressed international grain prices, from what is happening in Brussels today, by the reluctance of the Commission even to make a proposal to the ministers, it looks as though the discussion period will be stretched out substantially and there will not be any solution to this international grain problem—I call it that, although it is a disaster—until there is some discussion and some indication. I wonder if the minister could try to find out, for the sake of the people who are so profoundly affected, if the discussions will be stretched out for a long time, and ascertain what that might mean.

Senator Murray: I do not think the honourable senator expects that even a successful conclusion of the GATT negotiations with regard to agriculture will bring an immediate overnight improvement in the situation that he describes. The successful conclusion of the GATT round in agriculture will rather lay the basis for long-term stability and prosperity in that sector.

One encouraging note, for what it is worth, in the negotiations with regard to agriculture, is that I am told that there is a perception on the part of the United States that the European Community is now showing some flexibility, and, at the same time, there is a perception on the part of the Europeans that the United States is now showing some flexibility. That is one encouraging note that I have heard from inquiries I have made about this matter in the last day or two.

The negotiations are not apt to be stretched out ad infinitum. The deadline about which everyone is concerned is that imposed by the fast-track procedure according to the United States law. The honourable senator will be aware that the final legal text of any agreement would have to be in the hands of the United States Congress by, I think, June 1. It means that by the end of February President Bush would be obliged to advise the Congress that, subject only to a final legal text, there is an agreement. In terms of realistic deadlines, we are looking at a matter of five or six weeks.

Senator Olson: Could the minister indicate whether or not Canada is taking any active part in the promoting of, or the facilitating of, all of the requirements within these few weeks? I say that notwithstanding the fact that the United States and most of the European countries have other things, like the Gulf crisis, on their minds. Will we try to facilitate this so that the fast-track undertaking will not be completely demolished due to missing the timeframe?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, our view is that everything possible should be done to meet the deadline that is now before us as a result of the fast-track procedure in the United States. The alternative is the politically uncertain process of trying to get that deadline extended by the United States Congress. I can only tell the honourable senator that Mr. Crosbie, on behalf of Canada, has been playing a leading role in the multilateral trade negotiations, and that the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Mazankowski, has been extremely active in discussions with his counterparts all over the world. In particular, I happen to know, because he advised me of this yesterday, that he has been in touch with Secretary Yeutter of the United States, and with Mr. MacSharry, an Irish commissioner at the European Parliament, with several of the European ministers and so forth.

We have been very active. While I do not want to raise anyone's hopes or expectations unduly, there is, as Mr. Dunkel reported a while ago, some room for cautious optimism.

Senator Olson: In view of all of that, including the cautious optimism, I think it is clear that the producers in Canada need some short-term financing for the 1991 season. Therefore, I ask the minister to try to get those answers from the responsible ministers, particularly from Mr. Mazankowski, so that the producers will be informed in time to make some plans for the ensuing spring season.

BALTIC STATES

CANADIAN AID TO LITHUANIA AND LATVIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. We know that the recent movement of Soviet troops into Lithuania and Latvia have caused several deaths in those two countries. I should therefore like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether, in addition to the strong words conveyed by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to President Mikhail Gorbachev, the Canadian government intends to send humanitarian aid in the form of medicines and food to the beleaguered people of Lithuania and Latvia. Does the government also intend to suspend any aid to the Soviet Union?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am aware that my colleague, Mr. Clark, made some comments on that matter yesterday in response to questions from the media, but I would want to confirm or verify the text with him before replying to my honourable friend's question. I shall do so tomorrow.

REPLACEMENT OF ECONOMIC AID TO U.S.S.R. BY HUMANITARIAN AID TO PEOPLES OF LITHUANIA AND LATVIA

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: While the Leader of the Government in the Senate is inquiring into that matter, would he kindly bring to the attention of his government the fact that many Canadians are asking the Government of Canada to stop its direct aid to the Kremlin, the Government of the U.S.S.R., and, instead, to send humanitarian aid in the form of food and medicines to the beleaguered peoples of Lithuania and Latvia.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The honourable senator may not be aware that in the past few days, and since the Soviet moves on the Baltic States, Mr. Clark and several of his colleagues from the House of Commons have been meeting with representatives of the Canadian Baltic Associations, and that yes, the minister and members are well aware of the concerns, representations and recommendations of those people.

PERSIAN GULF WAR

RESTORATION OF KUWAITI GOVERNMENT—STATUS OF EXILED OPPOSITION PARTIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a question arising from the letter of the Prime Minister to His Excellency, Mikhail Gorbachev—a letter, incidentally, which I find to be a good, strong representation of Canadian views. I refer in particular to one sentence therein: "Democracy cannot exist without respect for fundamental human rights and freedoms." I agree with that. There has also been talk about restoring the Government of Kuwait.

Is the Leader of the Government aware of the fact that two years ago the Parliament of Kuwait was suspended arbitrarily by the dictatorial forces in control of that country? Is he aware that this week in London the Kuwaiti Opposition parties in exile stated that they have absolutely no confidence in a restoration of their government as it was before this unfortunate incident with Iraq? Is he aware that these Opposition spokesmen have stated that they have no confidence at all that they will have any rights? Is he aware, indeed, that they have warned the world that they believe they will have fewer rights should the former government be restored?

Again I come to the question that I posed a few days ago: Are we going to be concerned, during the period of the restoration of the independence of Kuwait, which we all support, that the democratic political process will be made operative in that country? Are we to be concerned that a restored Kuwait will not be a country exploited by its very wealthy at the expense of its very poor?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, what Senator Perrault refers to as "this unfortunate incident" was the brutal invasion—

Senator Perrault: I am not arguing that.

Senator Murray: —of a weaker neighbour by Iraq, an invasion that has caused half of the population of Kuwait to flee that country, an invasion in which the most unspeakable atrocities have been committed by the invader—and those have been detailed by Amnesty International and others. No one at the United Nations, no one in a responsible position in this country, has pretended that Kuwait was a democracy. It is not. But whether or not it was a democracy, it was a sovereign state and it was supposed to enjoy the same immunity and protection from an invasion by its neighbours as any other sovereign state. As a result of that, as the honourable senator knows, some 12 resolutions have been passed by the United Nations Security Council, most of them unanimously, calling upon Iraq to withdraw its troops from Kuwait.

That is the immediate objective of the action that member states of the United Nations have taken in the Gulf area and which I trust will be supported, however belatedly, by Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in this country.

Senator Perrault: Of course, the Leader of the Government has not answered the essential question at all. He has really engaged in distributing to honourable senators what may be described as "verbal boilerplate"—the standard reply.

No one here is defending the actions of Saddam Hussein or the actions of the Iraqi government. We are utterly opposed to them. Although some of us may have different views with respect to the best way to proceed against that tyranny.

Regrettably, we have been unmindful of other tyrannies in this world—those in Central America, in El Salvador and elsewhere. This week the prosecutor who has been handling the case of the six Jesuit priests who were murdered in that country has thrown up his hands in despair and quit the investigation because he said he could not get any cooperation from the government of that country.

• (1430)

Can we then expect that there will be an initiative at the United Nations by Canadians to impose economic embargoes on El Salvador until they come into line and assure the world that human rights are being protected? There are three million people in Lithuania—twice as many as there are in Kuwait. Large numbers are said to have been killed and wounded. Will we now proceed with some game plan against the Soviet Union to ensure that the rights of those people and their needs are brought to the attention of the world?

I am suggesting that we have been very hypocritical and selective in our policies and attitudes towards the preservation of human rights in this world.

My original question was to the point that if we are to help restore the government of Kuwait and ask some Canadians to die in the process, we should make certain that the fundamental rights of human beings who live in Kuwait are going to be protected and there is a viable opposition—some of whom are said to be languishing in jail at the present time. Yet, all that we had from the Leader of the Government here today is that he condemns the invasion of Kuwait and the loss of that country's sovereignty. So do we. But we should not ask Canadians to sacrifice their lives to restore a feudal monarchy. We want some democracy in Kuwait. Yes, we want something approaching the kind of democracy that we have in this country.

Iraq violates human rights on a massive scale. I am pleased that the house leader for the government tabled the report of Amnesty International—and quite properly so. We should put the spotlight on all violations of human rights. But let us also look at some of our alleged friends and see how meticulous they are in preserving human rights. Let us not be hypocritical and selective. If human rights are being violated in any country in the world, let us have the courage to speak out as Canadians and do what we can to help to alleviate some of those problems.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I trust that Senator Perrault is not trying to suggest that our resolve in the Gulf crisis should be in any sense weakened by our disapproval of a particular form of government in Kuwait. The fact of the matter is that what we are seeking to restore is the independence and sovereignty of Kuwait.

I should also remind Senator Perrault and the Senate that the Iraqi aggressor has also attacked, without provocation, the state of Israel, a state that was not—

Senator Perrault: I am not arguing about that.

Senator Murray: —a party to the conflict and which made it clear that it was not a party to the conflict. The state of Israel was attacked precisely for the purpose of trying to involve Israel in the war and—

Senator Perrault: That is correct.

Senator Murray: —to set off a wider conflict.

I have already mentioned the abuses of human rights by Iraq in Kuwait. The honourable senator must surely have seen in the media within the past twenty-four hours the pictures of prisoners of war being used as human shields and other quite flagrant contraventions of the Geneva Convention.

I do not know how much more evidence Senator Perrault and some of his friends need before they can be persuaded to set partisan politics and short-time partisan advantage aside and support the government of Canada in its support for the United Nations Resolutions and for the multinational effort that is underway to ensure the respect of those resolutions.

Senator Perrault: The person who is trying to politicize this issue is the Leader of the Government in the Senate and his leader, the Right Honourable, the Prime Minister. It is one of the most despicable ploys in the history of Canada. We on this side are not trying to politicize the Gulf War. But we are asking for some basic assurances that we are concerned not only with restoring Kuwaiti sovereignity—which is a most commendable and supportable goal—but also to ensure that our Canadian effort will not be invested in a campaign to reestablish the establishment in that country, which in the past has been careless of human rights.

The accusations of the Kuwaiti Opposition are that the fabulously wealthy Kuwaiti princelings have taken billions of dollars out of that country every year, investing almost all of it abroad. These are accusations of the Kuwaiti Opposition in exile; not charges levelled by the Liberal Party of Canada. We are asking for some assurances that the sacrifices that this government is asking the people of Canada to make will not be in vain, and that together with the ousting of Hussein we are to establish a democratic form of government in Kuwait.

We join totally in the condemnation of the actions of Saddam Hussein. We deplore the attack on Israel, which was an obvious attempt to draw Israel into this fight. But the Leader of the Government does not want to answer my basic question. He is trying to divert the whole thrust of the question that I have posed today. He is trying to divert the whole thrust of it into some sort of mischievous falsehood that somehow the Liberal Party is opposed to the idea of bringing down Saddam Hussein.

I do not have to make any excuses for my party. The Liberal Party of Canada, beginning with King, Saint-Laurent and Mike Pearson, gave outstanding leadership to the entire world in their efforts to bind up the wounds of this world, to resolve conflicts and be an effective force for peace. We do not have to make any excuses to any Conservative government, which today is indulging too much in the philosophy of "me too" instead of attempting some original, creative thinking.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to two questions asked on December 21 by Senator Olson. I also have two answers to questions appearing on the Order Paper of September 26 and October 9 respectively, by Senator Marshall. They are question numbers 54 and 62.

AGRICULTURE

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY ANNOUNCEMENT ON BOOM IN CATTLE STOCKS—EFFECT ON CANADIAN FARMERS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable Senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on December 21, 1990, by the Honourable H. A. Olson regarding European Community Announcement on Boom in Cattle Stocks—Effect on Canadian Farmers.

(The answer follows:)

Canada was disappointed that an agreement to reduce trade-distorting support to agriculture was not reached in Brussels. But the government will continue to press for a comprehensive agreement.

Canada is committed to substantial progressive reduction in trade-distorting support to agriculture in all countries and to effective agricultural trade rules which apply equally to all participants.

In particular, Canada is pressing the European Community (EC) to make substantive and meaningful improvements to its agricultural offer and to show greater flexibility to negotiate without preconditions.

A major reason for adjourning the talks in Brussels was that many countries considered that the EC was not making sufficient concessions to successfully conclude the negotiations.

The EC Commission has since indicated that it is proposing significant changes to its Common Agricultural Policy (CAP). It is hoped that when these changes are finally made they will be significant enough to be of interest to other countries and will improve the atmosphere surrounding the trade talks.

However, as yet there is insufficient detail available as to what the EC has in mind, for Canada or for other countries, to form a judgment as to their usefulness. In any case, the EC must also indicate greater flexibility for the trade negotiations, which cannot wait for the results of their domestic policy discussion.

It is hoped that the ongoing communications by GATT Secretary General Arthur Dunkel will be fruitful and that the negotiations will resume in the near future.

In the meantime, the federal government announced, on January 11, 1991, the details of a new generation of farm safety net programs which will go a long way toward easing the hurt producers are facing because of the international trade war.

These programs will be available to farmers before spring seeding. The new safety net program consists of a Gross Revenue Insurance Plan (GRIP) and a Net Income Stabilization Account (NISA).

The GRIP provides farmers with revenue protection. It builds on conventional crop insurance by offering farmers price support as well as yield protection.

For 1991-92, GRIP will deliver similar benefits across the country, although there will be some differences in program design between provinces and some features of the program will not be available in the first year. The program will be reviewed at the end of the crop year.

Under current market conditions, GRIP could be expected to pay out in the neighbourhood of $2.7 billion for 1991-92.

The NISA program lets farmers set aside money in individual accounts that will be matched by federal and provincial governments. Farmers can withdraw money from NISA accounts when their margin falls below the level of the previous five years, or when taxable income falls below $10,000. Forms and information on NISA will be mailed to producers in March.

For tax year 1990, it is expected that about $175 million will be contributed to NISA by Canadian farmers and matched by federal and provincial governments. The program is likely to trigger withdrawals of about $225 million targeted to farmers most in need.

The government recognizes that a new safety net program is not going to solve all the problems farmers are facing. There is uncertainty surrounding the GATT negotiations, ongoing farm debt problems, continuing low grain prices, input costs, requirements for diversification and the need to improve management skills. We are committed to continuing to work together with farmers and provinces to find ways to address these issues.

WITHDRAWAL OF FORD MOTOR COMPANY FROM FARM EQUIPMENT PRODUCTION—AVAILABILITY OF PARTS AND SERVICE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): This is in response to a question raised in the Senate on December 21, 1990 by the Honourable H.A. Olson regarding the Withdrawal of Ford Motor Company from Farm Equipment Production—Availability of Parts and Service.

(The answer follows:)

The supply of spare parts for farm machinery is a matter of provincial responsibility and the requirements vary in each province. For example, in Saskatchewan, a manufacturer must demonstrate that its distribution facility in the province has sufficient parts available in the province for ten years before being allowed to sell his machinery.

With regard to matters of federal responsibility, discussions are being held with FIAT representatives to ensure that Ford New Holland's commitments will be assumed by FIAT.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marsden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Gigantès, for the third reading of the Bill S-8, An Act to amend the Copyright Act.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to complete my intervention on Bill S-8 today. I spoke some days ago on the subject and my intervention at that time appeared at page 4737 of the Debates of the Senate for Thursday, November 29, 1990. At that time I made it clear why I was opposed to this bill, I hope.

In summary, it is because I believe that it is based on the wrong assumption and because I think that it will do serious damage to the justice that creators have been waiting for for seventy-five years.

● (1440)

Those in support of this bill have said that Bill C-60 "left all teachers, researchers, students, most librarians and private scholars and many others in our country vulnerable to legal suits, costs and damages for carrying out their normal duties." I believe that is wrong. Bill C-60 did not give a bundle of new rights to creators. It gave copyright holders the mechanism—and I underline the word "mechanism"—to enforce existing rights—and I underline the words "existing rights"—rights that have existed since 1924 but rights which no one honoured. The copyright owner could not enforce those rights individually because copying was taking place everywhere—in schools, libraries, offices and homes all across the country.

The rights have always been there. Individual enforcement was impossible, and this created a problem, I admit, on both sides. Without some collective mechanism, the copyright owners could not enforce their rights. Without that same mechanism, users who knew that the copyright existed and wanted to honour those rights could not do so. Bill C-60, therefore, did not suddenly dump a problem on the users. It provided a solution for both sides: The copyright owners who wanted to realize their rights, and the users who wanted to honour those rights.

The basic assumption and justification for Bill S-8 is simply fallacious. The provisions of the bill, flowing from that wrong assumption, are contaminated by it.

As I pointed out earlier, one problem is giving the mechanism—a mechanism that is there for the benefit of both the creators and the users—time to get going. Another problem that still exists is with exemptions. If this is not the achievement of Senator Marsden's bill, it is the objective. I support that objective because clarity of the exemptions will enable the negotiating procedure that was established by Bill C-60 to take place. In the absence of Part II, which is meant to clarify exemptions, the users do not want to negotiate because they are afraid they might get exemptions in due course. They want to know whether or not there will be exemptions before they negotiate at this stage. The creators, similarly, want to know about Part II and about exemptions because the users are saying that they do not want to negotiate until Part II comes along and they know what exemptions there are.

To those senators interested in the subject, I commend two documents. It is with respect to these two documents that I wish to conclude my intervention on this bill.

The first document is a legislative summary prepared by Monique Hébert, of the Law and Government Division, Research Branch, Library of Parliament. It is dated May 1, 1990. Senator Marsden has indicated that she ordered this research. This document is available in the series that the Library of Parliament makes available to all parliamentarians. The researcher who prepared this document has consented that it appear on a list of documents available, which we all receive. This is an excellent study on Bill S-8. It is entitled, "Bill S-8: An Act to Amend the Copyright Act. The subheading is, "A Proposal to Provide the Educational Sector with a Qualified Copyright Exemption.

For background purposes, the first section of this document deals with the need for copyright reform. Senator Marsden and I have had a good deal to say about that.

The second part, Part B, deals with Bill C-60, which I have already referred to, that being what is now called Part I of the copyright reform. The essence of Part I was to permit collectives to negotiate for copyright in order to avoid the need for individuals to track down all users of their created material.

The document goes on to deal with the whole question of collectives. I should like to refer again to something I said in my last intervention. I have mentioned this several times. Honourable senators can see that I think it is important because I am referring to it again. The tendency in some quarters is to suggest that Bill C-60 brought into being for the first time—to the great surprise of many copyright users—the concept of collectives. It did not. It applied it to areas where it had not been previously applied, particularly with regard to written material and video material. Page 3 of the legislative summary says:

> The collective administration of copyright is not a new concept to the law of copyright. Organizations akin to Bill C-60's "licensing bodies" existed prior to the passage of this legislation. Only "performing rights societies" were, however, expressly recognized by statute.

Performing rights societies are, of course, the societies that look after the right to perform, in particular musical, songs, plays and anything dealing with the performing arts. I continue from the document:

> Established decades ago to administer the "performing rights" in relation to musical works (i.e., the rights of writers of music to authorize the performance and broadcasting of their works in public), performing rights societies were regulated by the Act to the extent that they were required to file their schedule of fees with the Copyright Appeal Board. Created by amendments passed in the mid-1930s, this Board was established for the sole purpose of approving the fees which the performing rights societies proposed to charge specific categories of users.
> This rate-regulation function of the Board was retained by Bill C-60. However, the Board was renamed the "Copyright Board," and its jurisdiction was expanded to cover licensing bodies. Although the Board was to continue systematically approving the fee schedules proposed by performing rights societies, it was given a more circumscribed role in relation to licensing bodies. In their case, it could intervene in order to "fix the royalties and their related terms and conditions" only on application of one of the parties (i.e., a licensing body or a user or user group), where the parties had been unable to reach agreement voluntarily on the amount of royalties to be paid.

● (1450)

I would pause here again to say that many of us were surprised by another aspect of Bill C-60 because all of us, all of our lives, have known of the existence of ASCAP in the United States and CAPAC in Canada and other performing rights society. We knew that copyright is observed and respected in the performing arts field. Many assumed that it also existed in these other fields covered by Bill C-60 which are, of course, addressed by Senator Marsden's bill in the particular context of exemptions.

Part C of this document interestingly deals with the reaction to Bill C-60 by the educational sector. Of course, Bill S-8 is part of that reaction. Then follows the tabling of Bill S-8 and a description of the bill with a reference to eligible users. Members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce are certainly very familiar with all of this because the bill was studied at some length by that committee.

The summary then deals with the applicable subject matter; exempted uses; reproduction by eligible users of published copyright material; communication by eligible users of public works by telecommunications to the public; public performance by eligible users of published works; and the availability of a licence. It goes on to deal with a discussion of the bill against that background material both historical and otherwise.

At page 8 under the heading "discussion" it says the following:

> Given the perceived inadequacy of the existing exemptions (described earlier), educational users wanting to use protected material must either obtain the consent of the copyright owners—a possibly demanding and time-consuming exercise, since many copyright owners might have to be reached—or they must transgress the law.

That is, in effect, what I said in November. It goes on to say:

> Bill C-60 did nothing to change this state of affairs, at least directly. Indirectly, however, it came to the assistance of educational and other users. By setting the statutory foundation for licensing bodies, it encouraged their formation.

"Licensing bodies" in this context is another term for the word "collectives." It goes on to state:

> As more and more licensing bodies come into existence, users will ultimately be better off, for they will have a quick and central means of lawful access to copyright material, and will thus be free of the often-frustrating task of having to negotiate copyright clearances on an individual basis.

This next part is important to the part of Senator Marsden's case, that I support. It says:

> The problem remains that, close to two years after the enactment of Bill C-60, licensing bodies have yet to be established to license all categories of works routinely used by the educational sector. The prospects for a collective that would license "audio-visual" works—an increasingly common teaching medium—appear remote at this time. Furthermore, of those licensing bodies that have been established, not all are fully operational.

There is then a continuation of the subject of reprography and their collectives, particularly CANCOPY which is in existence and which is attempting to play the role envisioned by the statute enacted by Bill C-60.

Further on in this document it states:

> Until collectives are established and functioning in every relevant area of copyright activity, educational users will continue to be in a difficult position.

I have been quoting from a document dated May 1, 1990 in which the statement is made that the problem remains close to two years after the enactment of Bill C-60. Honourable senators, not directly on that point but ancillary to it, Senator Marsden tells me that she has made some inquiries and her information is that Part II, which will deal not so much with licensing bodies but with exemptions, is some distance off.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Perhaps I could make a statement because I think clarification is important. It is now published in the press quite widely that Part II will not deal with educational exemptions; that the minister has reneged on his agreement with the educational community.

Senator Frith: Let me turn directly to the question of educational exemptions. If the minister did make such a promise, then he is reneging; but let me say that my position on educational exemptions may or may not be the same as the minister's. My position is based on a group of studies by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs done on the subject of and amendments to the Copyright Act. Senator Marsden's intervention does clarify the position and I thank her for it because it leads me more directly to my conclusion.

Let me make it clear that I was not aware that the minister had promised educational exemptions, but, whether or not he did, I believe the question of educational exemptions is properly and supportably dealt with in one of these studies of the series prepared by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The documents resulting from that series of studies are called the "copyright revision studies." They deal with many aspects of the Copyright Act. The department is certainly to be congratulated for an excellent series of studies on this subject. I doubt if anyone who is interested in copyright would find a segment or a corner of the subject that was not thoroughly dealt with in the studies.

● (1500)

The one I am referring to, which is the one most relevant to where I am in my intervention, is Exemptions Under the Canadian Copyright Act, by Dennis M. Magnusson of the Faculty of Law, Queen's University and Victor Nabhan of the Faculty of Law, Laval University. I am not going to read into the record the whole report, which comprises some 229 pages. I am now referring only to the one on the subject of interventions—I do want to let honourable senators know what is in the document; if they are interested they can look it up—to show the extent of the study that leads to the recommendations which I support.

In the Table of Contents it indicates that there is an introduction, of course. Chapter I(A) is Exemptions for Education, Archives and Libraries in Respect of Performance in Public and Audio-Visual Works Generally. Then there is an education heading, and it goes through the needs of education and problems created by the present Canadian law, such as public performance, reproduction, conversions and dissemination. There is then a section on foreign law and law reform proposals. "Analysis and recommendation" deals with public performance. There is also a section on dissemination of copyright material and one on reproduction of copyrighted material. There is also a section on international conventions. There are also recommendations dealing particularly with education, and archival and library use of audio-visual material. This deals with performance and broadcasting. Then there is reprography and international law.

Honourable senators, someone may be interested in starting research by reading the Senate's record of debate on this question, and perhaps I could have consent simply to put the three pages of the Table of Contents on the record and then honourable senators would know exactly what this document deals with and would understand essentially the basis of my intervention.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of Table of Contents see Appendix "A", p. 5122).

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, turning to the recommendations on the subject of education, which are found at page 26—

Senator Marsden: On the subject of your desire to put the table of contents on the record, I wonder if you would also put on the record whether there is anything that you can draw to the attention of senators from users in any of the communities, people who actually have to deal with this law on a daily basis. Is there a submission from the Canadian Teachers Federation, the Secondary School Teachers Federation, any school boards in this country, or any of the other multiple users?

Senator Frith: No. I perhaps could, but I will not, because I am counting on you to do that.

Senator Marsden: Senator Frith, before you have it appended to the record—and, of course, you can have anything you want appended to the record—I think it should be noted that this is totally biased toward the practice of law, which is an interior world of great interest, but of great distance from the reality of day-to-day life in the schoolroom, on the campus and in many other places.

Senator Frith: I understand that opinion, but it is not mine. It is not unusual in any subject to say that the law is impractical and does not take into account real life. But the law thinks it takes into account real life and this is essentially a matter of legal rights. I do not consider the legal dimension of the question to be academic, and it is certainly not academic to those who hold the "copyrights." A right is a legal concept. I make no apology for the fact that I am dealing with legal rights, and I do it from the perspective of the creator. It is understandable that the user might say, "You, the creator, are citing law that we feel, as users, has no application in the field of day-to-day life," to which the creator says, "My day-to-day life is creating material that I expect to be paid for and I have rights about and I want to enforce them."

Senator Marsden: Please do not misunderstand me. Of course, the law is important, but you said, in wanting to read this intervention into the record, that it dealt with every aspect of copyright that anyone could be interested in, and I am sure that you did not mean—

Senator Frith: No; I think, if you check the record, you will find that is not what I said about this. I complimented Consumer and Corporate Affairs for its copyright revision studies, that this was only one of many studies in that series, and that I doubted that if anyone had any interest in copyright—

Senator Marsden: Law.

Senator Frith: Copyright is a legal concept.

Senator Marsden: Not exclusively, senator.

Senator Frith: Yes, it is exclusively. It is a legal right. It is a legal concept. Anyone can say, "Look, I have to teach some students tomorrow and I can't use this and it is impractical that I can't use this." The answer to that is, "Why can't you use it?" The answer to that is, "Because you will be breaking somebody's rights if you use it," and that is a legal concept. I am talking about copyright. I am talking about the rights of creators and I make no apology for that.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Can you recommend it to your students?

Senator Frith: I recommend this for those who are interested in copyright. I was only wanting to put on the record the Table of Contents in one of the studies in case someone wanted to pursue the question of copyright, which I admit is a legal concept, which is under the subheading of educational exemptions. I accept the narrowing. We are here to talk about the law; that is why I am dealing with copyright as a right in that sense.

Dealing with the recommendations which flowed from this extensive study on the subject of exemptions, it states:

> Education
>
> Performance, broadcasting, diffusion
> 1. An exemption for public performances for educational purposes should be available on the following conditions:
>
> (i) the exemption is to apply to all types of copyright protected works, but in the case of performances by means of an audio and/or video prerecorded form of the work, the exemption shall not apply to performances by means of an infringing copy of the work when the person who caused the performance knew or should have known that the copy was infringing;
> (ii) the exemption is available only for the purposes of nonprofit educational activities;

That exemption has no difficulty with Senator Marsden, as far as I know.

> (iii) the exemption is available only for teaching activities and is not available when the performance is for the purposes of the entertainment or recreation of a significant part of the audience;
> (iv) the performers are to be only students or instructors (this would not apply . . .

And some detail follows. I am only giving some highlights because the detail is in the document.

> (v) the audience can be composed only of teachers, students and others directly connected with the teaching activity;
> (vi) the performances may occur in classrooms or other places in which teaching activities occur;
>
> (vii) the exemption is available for face-to-face teaching activities . . .
>
> 2. There should be no exemptions for the use of copyright protected works in broadcasting or diffusion for educational purposes except:
>
> (i) for broadcasting and diffusion that originates and is received within a single building . . .

That is (i) and (ii) is simultaneous rediffusion.

This is only two pages long, and I will ask for permission of the Senate to have these recommendations appended to today's proceedings. That is why I will not read them through. Senator Marsden and others may deal with them simply by referring to Debates of the Senate.

• (1510)

Then, under "Reproduction", it states:

> 1. There should be no exemption for recording from prerecorded material for educational purposes.
>
> 2. There should be no exemptions for recording for "librarying" or for time-shift purposes from broadcasts or diffusions.
>
> 3. There should be no exemption for original recording of copyrighted works except by teachers and students for the purposes of examinations.
>
> 4. The problems of access by educators to copyright protected material in audio-visual form should be dealt with by means of voluntary negotiations—
> 5. A general fair use exemption should be adopted in Canadian copyright legislation and reproduction in audiovisual form for educational purposes should not be statutorily excluded from such a fair use exemption.

Then, under "Archival and Library use of Audio-Visual Material" it states that a specific exemption should be introduced and specific references are set out under that heading.

Honourable senators, in summary, and using that as an example, I believe that as a general principle there should be only limited and negotiated exemptions for educational purposes. I hope honourable senators will remember that I believe that the fact of granting a carte blanche exemption, or an exemption as provided for in Bill S-8—which, in my opinion, amounts to the same thing because that permits an exemption, in effect, if a reasonable fee cannot be negotiated without defining who decides on the reasonable fee—was settled in performing rights by setting up the Copyright Appeal Board to make that decision. That was done because we could not ask one of the parties to make the decision; and that is the problem with Bill S-8. Bill S-8, in effect, leaves it to either one of the two parties to decide what is reasonable and produces an exemption if one of the parties finds the fee asked for is unreasonable.

That point is made on page 10 of the document I referred to earlier, where it states:

> A more obvious problem with the bill is, of course, knowing when the "terms and conditions" of an available licence would be "reasonable" within the meaning of the bill—the sine qua non for the application of the exemption. The bill does not tell us whether this reasonableness standard would be determined from the users' perspective or from that of the collective. Nor does the bill stipulate how impasses—

Which is an important point:

> —between the parties on this question might be resolved.

I recall Senator Marsden and other supporters of Bill S-8 saying during committee meetings that they could go to the courts. That, in my view, is not a satisfactory solution, bearing in mind how long that could take.

The Copyright Appeal Board and the whole mechanism put in place for performing rights was put there just to avoid that.

The document then goes on to state:

> Under the existing legislation, the intervention of the Copyright Board might be invoked. However, the Board's authority seems to be limited to the financial aspects of a licensing proposal (i.e., the amount of royalties that should be paid and the related terms and conditions). Given the various ways in which protected materials can be used, there is considerable scope for disagreement between the parties.

I must say that if Bill S-8 were bringing forward its suggestions for change and also included an addition to the jurisdiction of the Copyright Appeal Board to settle the question of reasonableness of fees, using as a guide the way that is done with regard to performing rights, and if it were in satisfactory form, I would be inclined to support the bill, because I have nothing against settling the question of educational exemptions with a proper mechanism that protects the creators and, thereby, solves the problem of waiting for exemptions to appear in Part II, which Senator Marsden tells us is not coming.

On the question of the courts, the document goes on to state:

> For disputes involving matters beyond the jurisdiction of the Copyright Board, the only recourse available to the aggrieved party would seem to be to bring the matter before the courts.
>
> There would be, in short, potential for a good deal of litigation on whether licences were or were not obtainable on reasonable terms and conditions, thus derogating from the bill's objective of providing the educational sector with secure access to copyright materials.
>
> Also unclear is who would qualify for the exemption, should a licence not be obtainable on reasonable terms and conditions. The bill refers to "an educational organization recognized as such by a provincial or municipal government." This term might cover public schools, colleges and universities, and possibly private schools that offered accredited programs; however, it is unclear what other entities offering some form of educational program might also quality. Might, for example, a Berlitz-type language school qualify, or a school board offering night courses on furniture reupholstering? It bears noting that the bill does not expressly limit the application of the exemption to non-profit educational establishments. Its only stipulation in this regard is that a given use, be it the photocopying of an article or the performance of a play, should be carried on without motive of gain. The bill does not require that the "user" not be profit-motivated; rather, it is the activity in question that must be carried out "without motive of gain." Consequently, even profit-oriented educational organizations would seem to qualify, provided they were duly recognized as such by government.
> Furthermore, given the bill's reference to "organizations," it is conceivable that professional associations in the educational sector, such as a federation of teachers or an association of school trustees, might also qualify. Much depends on what government recognizes as being an "educational organization." As this standard might vary from province to province, or from municipality to municipality, there could be material variances across the country.

So, honourable senators, I conclude by saying that the problem addressed by Bill S-8 is a continuing problem, but Bill S-8 is not a solution and is unworkable as such.

I encourage the Senate to continue with the initiative launched by Senator Marsden to find a solution to the fact that creators are entitled in educational matters—which is the subject of this bill—to payment for their contribution to the educational system, just as are teachers, just as are the providers of buildings, just as much as are the providers of material, just as much as are janitors, just as much as every aspect of our educational system provides payment for the services and goods it uses.

In my opinion, there is no justification for telling creators: "Well, we want you to subsidize our educational system while we pay everyone else."

I know that Senator Marsden recognizes that problem, or she would not have brought this bill forward. My difficulty is that it does not solve that problem.

• (1520)

Senator Marsden: Senator Frith, may I ask you a question? You insist upon repeating the implication that this bill, and everything that has been said about it, suggests that creators should not be paid; and you know that is not the case. As you know, the bill says they should be paid, but, when there is a dispute over payment, then there should be access to the courts. May I ask you why you have said that you do not think this bill is not the solution because creators would not be paid, when there is nothing in the bill that indicates that? It is one of the fundamentals of the bill that they should be paid.

Senator Frith: I hoped I had made it clear and I am obliged to Senator Marsden for giving me the opportunity to make it very clear. I thought I made it clear that the objective of this bill is to pay creators. The objective of this bill is to solve the problem created by the absence of clarity as to exemptions. My problem is that this bill is not the structure in which to do that because, in my opinion, it would fall down the minute we tried to establish the question of reasonable fee and would allow too big a loophole for having creators not being paid as a result. That is why it is possible and a corollary to what I am saying that an amended form of Bill S-8 is something I might be able to support. I do not think this is going to solve the problem because the result will be that they will not be paid, although I accept the motivation that they should be.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, Senator Frith had asked for the inclusion of the Table of Contents and received the agreement of the Senate. He then asked for the inclusion of recommendations but the Senate made no comment. Is it a specific request and is it the wish of the Senate that it be included?

Senator Frith: Agreed.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of recommendations see Appendix "B", p. 5127).

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES BILL

SECOND READING—SPEAKER'S RULING DEFERRED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Watt, seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, for the second reading of the Bill S-18, An Act to further the aspirations of the aboriginal peoples of Canada.
>
> And on the Point of Order concerning the admissibility of the Bill.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Good news, senators; I intend to speak on this motion too.

Honourable senators, the aspect of Bill S-18 to which I wish to speak is the point of order raised by Senator Doody. The essence of that point of order is that this bill is not properly originated in the Senate.

As I understand it, Senator Doody's position is based principally, if not entirely, on Rule 62 of the Senate and on clauses 8(2) and (3) of the bill entitled "An Act to further the aspiration of the aboriginal peoples of Canada."

Honourable senators, I have discussed some of my views on this subject with parliamentary counsel, and I have received a response to my questions from Mr. James W. Ryan, Q.C., which was furnished to me through our parliamentary counsel, Mr. du Plessis. Therefore, I will be quoting freely and abundantly from those opinions.

As I have said, my comments will refer principally to sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution, which are at the root of these problems, and also to Rule 62 of the Senate and to the act before us, which is the subject of the point of order raised by Senator Doody.

Let us first turn to Rule 62. It reads as follows:

> The Senate shall not proceed upon a bill appropriating public money that has not within the knowledge of the Senate been recommended by the Queen's representative.

Otherwise known as the royal recommendation. The first question I will address is why Rule 62 is needed. I will quote Mr. Ryan's letter to Mr. du Plessis, which says:

> Rule 62 of the Senate . . . is by its wording relevant to section 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867, hereinafter referred to simply as the "Constitution".

Let us turn to section 54, as we so often do when there arises these questions about bills originating in the Senate. I will read both sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution. The heading is Money Votes; Royal Assent. The marginal note is "Appropriation and tax Bills". The section reads:

> Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

Then section 54, with a marginal note "Recommendation of money votes", says:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.

I will now continue quoting the letter of Mr. Ryan to Mr. du Plessis of January 18, 1991.

> Bills that fall within the first category described by Section 53 of the Constitution—

Which I have just read.

> —bills "for appropriating any part of the public revenue" cannot originate otherwise than in the House of Commons. That kind of bill is in the same constitutional position as bills for imposing a tax or impost and are provided for by Section 53 of the Constitution.
> Rule 62—

Which I cited.

> —in referring to a bill "appropriating public money", must have had in contemplation a bill "for appropriating any part of the public revenue, or for imposing any tax or impost", a bill that, by section 53 of the Constitution must originate in the Commons, and, by Section 54 of the Constitution, it is unlawful for the Commons to pass "to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such . . . Bill is proposed".

> Prior to the Constitution Act, 1982, if a bill appropriating any part of the public revenue or any tax or impost was introduced in the Commons and passed by that House without having been recommended to it by the Governor General, it became law upon being passed by the Senate and assented to by the Governor General.

There is a footnote about that which is worth including.

> Non-compliance with section 54 would not have affected the validity of the Bill after it had been passed by the Senate and received Royal Assent. As an Act of Parliament, it would be taken as law.

● (1530)

The citation is The King v. Irwin, 1926 Canadian Exchequer Court 127.

By "English law", we mean that when a statute appears on its face to have been duly passed, the courts must assume that its passage has been proper. That, incidentally, if I may make another parenthetical comment, might be an echo of problems that some might think arise with reference to the GST.

I believe that reference was made to the Irwin case by Senator Hays when he made an intervention on the legality of the tax imposed by the passage of the bill. The adoption of the GST on the strength of English law seems clearly not to look behind the passage of parliamentary proceedings.

> It does not appear, therefore, that Rule 62 of the Senate—referred to and relied upon by Senator Doody,

> —is intended to apply to a bill that has been introduced in the Senate. If it is a bill for appropriating any part of the public revenue, it is disqualified from continuing or proceeding in the Senate as a matter of constitutional law, not as a matter governed by procedural rules of the Senate.

That is, it would be disqualified by the Constitution and there would be no need for Rule 62 to apply, since, of course, Rule 62 would not supersede a provision in the Constitution.

Let us now turn to the bill generally, and I will speak in a moment about subclauses 8(2) and 8(3), which are the ones that I believe Senator Doody found offensive. Before commenting on those two subclauses, I should like to draw to the attention of the Senate several different types of clauses set out in Senator Watt's Bill S-18. Clauses 1 and 2 are simply a citation clause and a purpose clause. Clauses 3, 4, 13 and 14 are interpretative, either of other statutes or of provisions of the bill. Clauses 5 to 12 can be classed as administrative and are therefore open to the claim that they have the effect of imposing a new charge on the public revenue. Subclause 8(2), which refers to funding, is more visible in this regard than the other administrative clauses.

All of the clauses that impose a duty on the executive—that is, the Governor General in Council, the government, the minister and federal institutions—are discussed briefly in an annex, to which I will refer in a moment, in respect of whether or not a new charge is involved, which is the key.

[Senator Frith.]

Let us look, then, at subclause 8(2), which reads:

> The Minister shall take measures
>
> (a) to reduce disparities in economic opportunities between any aboriginal peoples of Canada and other Canadians, and
> (b) to ensure that the aboriginal peoples of Canada benefit from and play an integral role in efforts to promote economic development at local, regional, provincial, national and international levels;

Then it goes on:

> and, in consultation with the aboriginal peoples of Canada, the Minister shall establish, find funding for, and implement such programs as are considered appropriate for those measures.

In my submission, Rule 62 is really irrelevant because it is cited in support of a position based on the Constitution which is, of course, an even stronger foundation and makes Rule 62 superfluous.

Turning to the Constitution, then, subclause 8(2), in my submission, is not an appropriating clause within the meaning of section 53 of the Constitution. It does not appropriate money. What do we mean by "appropriate"? Even when used in the appropriations act, the word "appropriate" must carry its ordinary dictionary connotation, which is to allocate, meaning to allot, apportion, assign, or, more vividly, to grasp, take, seize, snatch—those are dictionary words—something, usually money or property. In this context, however, it is a part of the public revenue. Those are the words used in the Constitution.

To introduce a bill in the Senate for appropriating any part of the public revenue would be unconstitutional under section 53 of the Constitution besides being an infringement of the prerogative of the House of Commons under the parliamentary system adopted from Britain, even if the bill were introduced in the Senate as a government bill. Therefore, I say that subclause 8(2) is not an appropriating clause within the meaning of section 53 of the Constitution because it does not appropriate, in any sense of the word, money. It provides that certain administrative acts— which, it is submitted, the minister now has the ability to do without this bill—must be done as a matter of statutory duty created by the bill. The bill itself does not appropriate the money for the purposes of the bill, nor does it in this case impose a new charge on the public revenue.

The clause does not require the minister to fund the program. "Finding", which is the word used, is not "funding". Remember that the words in the last part of subclause 8(2) are: "and, in consultation with the aboriginal peoples of Canada, the Minister shall establish, find funding for . . ." Again, the clause does not require the minister to fund the programs. Finding is not funding; nor does the clause authorize the funding of the programs or direct where the funds are to be found; nor is the fund taken from any source referred to in the clause.

My submission is that the clause does not, per se, impose a new charge on the public revenues.

As to subclause 8(3), it reads as follows:

> The Minister shall establish programs and put into place policies to ensure that the aboriginal peoples of Canada will acquire such adequate resources as will effectively
> (a) preserve, promote, enhance and develop their economies, cultures and governmental institutions,
> (b) enable them to represent their interests and concerns through representative associations and organizations at the international, national, provincial, regional and local levels,
>
> (c) enable them to participate in any negotiations with governments, and
>
> (d) enable them to participate in a process of constitutional discussions and negotiations directed toward the further constitutional entrenchment of the rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada and the mechanisms to exercise those rights.

● (1540)

You will remember, honourable senators, that the administrative clauses to which we referred earlier were clauses 5 to 12, which could be classed as administrative; but there are also, clauses 8 (2) and 8 (3), on which we are now focusing. Clause 8 (3), like these other "administrative" clauses in the bill, does nothing more than turn into statutory duty an administrative capability that the minister now has and, indeed, exercises already in some instances. It does not or is not intended to invoke a new—and I stress the word "new"—function requiring a "new" charge on the public revenues.

So, honourable senators, the only objection to this bill can be on those clauses referred to, namely, clauses 5 to 12, which are sort of administrative, but, more particularly, on clauses 8 (2) and 8 (3), which appear to be even more administrative.

The result of an examination of clauses 5 to 12—and I do not believe there is any objection to any other clauses—and clauses 8 (2) and 8 (3), which are the specific ones objected to by Senator Doody, makes it clear that there is no clause in the bill that "appropriates" public funds as that term is ordinarily understood and as it was undoubtedly intended to be understood in section 54 of the Constitution Act when that provision was placed in the BNA act in 1867 and remains in its original form in the Constitution Act that governs our country now.

Honourable senators, I would be glad to add, rather than read into the Debates of the Senate, an annex that was furnished to me by Parliamentary counsel. It deals with the individual clauses and may be of some use in case a ruling is necessary by His Honour. Rather than pass it simply to him, it is two pages long and is referred to in the opinion that was furnished to me by Parliamentary counsel. I have already referred to it in my intervention.

May I have leave to include that?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see Appendix "C", p. 5130).

Senator Frith: So, honourable senators, before I conclude I must reiterate that I am basing my position on the Constitution. I can equally base it on rule 62. When I say that there is no offence to sections 53 or 54 in the Constitution a fortiori there is no offence to rule 62, which in this context is simply a reinstatement of what is in the Constitution. Therefore, an examination of the Constitution itself is much more rewarding than simply looking at our Rule 62.

In conclusion, there is no clause in this bill that appropriates public funds as that term is ordinarily understood and as it was undoubtedly intended to be understood in section 54 of the Constitution. For that reason it is a bill that may be introduced in the Senate, since we look at all bills to be introduced in the same way as we look at all law.

In a sense, all law is negative. In a jurisprudential sense you start with the assumption that any member of society can do anything unless there is some law that says he or she cannot. Here, too, we can introduce any bill in the Senate unless the Constitution says we cannot. There is no place in the Constitution, in my submission, that says that we cannot introduce Bill S-8.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Frith for his dissertation. My position is the same. It still seems to be a carriage on the Crown introduced by someone other than a minister of the Crown. I would ask His Honour to take it under advisement, consult with the authorities and bring us back a ruling in his own good time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I know of no other member on our side who wishes to intervene on this specific point of order raised by Senator Doody. Therefore, it seems that this would be an appropriate time to ask the Chair for a ruling.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that, in view of the fact that this point of order was raised when Senator Charbonneau was in the Chair and it is a rather complex matter, it be taken under advisement to be reported at a later date?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND (PROTECTION OF THE UNBORN CHILD)—SECOND READING—SPEAKER'S RULING DEFERRED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Guay, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill S-7, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (protection of the unborn child).—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am prepared to yield on this. This is Senator Haidasz' bill. My interest is essentially in Bill C-43, which is on the same subject. I am in the hands of the Senate on this. I have no specific interest in this bill. I adjourned the debate in the hope that its subject matter would come before us in the guise of Bill C-43.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, earlier this afternoon I spoke to Senator Haidasz. Unfortunately, I did not think to speak to him about this matter. I indicated to him that I wished to raise the question of Order No. 10 on our order paper, which was a matter raised by him by way of a matter of privilege. I informed him that I would be asking that the matter be withdrawn. He quite agreed and, at the same time, indicated that he would be asking that his motion No. 3 under "Motions", which is a motion for direction to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, also be withdrawn in light of the fact that there is every expectation that tomorrow the Senate will be receiving the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs dealing with Bill C-43.

In view of what is a rather self-evident parliamentary rule, namely, that once we proceeded beyond second reading on Bill C-43, Bill S-7 then became rather redundant, I do not—I see that Senator Haidasz is now here. I am reasonably satisfied that the bill could not proceed.

Senator Haidasz, we currently are upon Order No. 5 on the Orders of the Day. Senator Frith is indicating that there is no reason why it should further stand in his name. It concerns Bill S-7. We were wondering whether, in view of the report anticipated tomorrow on Bill C-43, this item could not also be withdrawn.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I am not a prophet, so I cannot foresee what will happen to Bill C-43 sometime this month or next month. Therefore, I would ask honourable senators to allow my bill, S-7 to remain on the Orders of the Day.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): On that point, honourable senators, I do not think it is permissible to allow the bill to remain on the Orders of the Day. As Senator Nurgitz stated, it is a well-accepted parliamentary custom that two bills dealing with the same subject matter cannot proceed at the same time.

I would refer honourable senators to Beauchesne's Sixth Edition on page 198, citation 653.

● (1550)

> There is no rule or custom which restrains the presentation of two or more bills related to the same subject, and containing similar provisions. But if a decision of the House has already been taken on one such bill, for example, if the bill has been given or refused a second reading, the other is not proceeded with if it contains substantially the same provisions. But if a bill is withdrawn, after having made progress, another bill with the same objects may be proceeded with.

This is a clear-cut procedural matter. I do not think it is permissible to proceed with both bills at the same time. I would offer that to honourable senators for consideration and advice.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, when this matter came up in a similar bill in the previous session, Senator Flynn at that time did make a statement, if I am correct, that my bill or the subject matter of my bill could remain on the Orders of the Day.

Senator Doody: I cannot refer to Senator Flynn at this point. I cannot ask his advice or his judgment. I can only cite the rule, and I would ask honourable senators to agree that the order is quite clear. A second bill dealing with the same subject matter cannot be proceeded with if the other bill has passed or been refused second reading.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Perhaps you should refer this to the Speaker of the Senate for his ruling. He always rules in favour of the government.

Senator Doody: Obviously I will do that if I have to, but I would prefer that the Senate deal with it.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to bring to your attention that my bill, Bill S-7, was being debated on second reading on May 29, 1990. That is almost a year ago. No one raised any objections then, nor have any objections been raised since second reading was given to Bill C-43. Why, at this late date, should you change your minds and try to dispose of Bill S-7 in such a manner?

Senator Doody: Senator Haidasz, I did not write the rule. I am simply reading it.

Senator Haidasz: This matter has not been raised since Bill C-43 was given second reading on June 26, 1990, so why try to dispose of my bill now in such a way, when it was allowed to stay on the Orders of the Day since June 26 of last year?

Senator Doody: The reason, at least to me, is quite obvious. Bill C-43, a bill dealing with substantially the same subject, has passed second reading. It has gone to committee and has had exhaustive hearings. Many witnesses have appeared before the committee. The report is now being prepared. It will come to the Senate for consideration tomorrow, the day after, or whenever it is ready—in the immediate future. With that prospect in sight, there seems to be little or no reason to proceed with this bill since we are going to deal with the other bill. I assume that that is what this rule is intended to cover.

I put it to honourable senators that, under the rules, as I have just read, keeping Bill S-7 on the order paper is not in order.

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Is Senator Doody saying that the citation he quoted from the Sixth Edition of Beauchesne's is a rule?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, the rule that is applicable in this case is this particular rule. Rule 1 of the Senate says that if we do not have a rule that covers a particular situation, then we refer to the House of Commons Rules. There is a Beauchesne reference in the House of Commons Rules.

Senator Corbin: I understand that Beauchesne's Sixth Edition has no standing in the House of Commons. I stand to be corrected, but that would be news to me. The Fifth Edition is the one that is being recognized.

Senator Doody: I can find it in the Fifth Edition, if I have to. In any event, honourable senators, that is my request. I would ask the Senate to decide.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to make two points. It is my opinion that Bill S-7 is really not the same as Bill C-43. Bill C-43 virtually allows abortion on demand, whereas my bill, Bill S-7, restricts abortion to a medical procedure allowed if the mother's life is threatened; that is,if a medical procedure has to be performed in order to save the life of the mother without the intention of a direct assault on the body of the preborn child. That interpretation of Bill S-7 was discussed by me not only with members of this house but also with a certain member at the Table. No attempt was made to remove my bill, as I said, since June 26 when second reading was given to Bill C-43.

Furthermore, I should like to support the statement of Senator Corbin. He stated that Beauchesne's Sixth Edition has no standing in Parliament as yet.

Senator Doody: That is simply not so, honourable senators. The same ruling is in the Fifth Edition, if anyone wants to go to the trouble of looking for it.

In any event, I refer the question to His Honour for a ruling at another date, if that is the wish of the Senate.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I very seldom get involved in rules of Parliament. However, I have looked at my colleague's bill, Bill S-7, and at Bill C-43 for a long time. I probably would not support Bill S-7, but that is not the subject matter. I am inclined to agree with Senator Haidasz's argument for two reasons.

I do not think Bill S-7 is the same as Bill C-43. Bill C-43, whether it is adopted or rejected, does not take care of what he wants in his bill. A very important fact is that this bill has been on the order paper since May, 1990. The other bill appeared in June. It would be quite difficult under any parliamentary rule to dispose of this rule the way the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate is suggesting.

Senator Doody: As I have said, honourable senators, I am not going to create a big issue at the moment. I would simply refer it to His Honour and ask that a ruling be brought in.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the matter be taken under advisement and that a ruling be brought in?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

ABORTION

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—ORDER WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton):
> That it be taken up in the Committee of the Whole, named "Privileges", whether it is a matter of privilege for a Senator to move, as I have already done, to instruct a Standing Committee as in Motion Number 3 on the Order Paper, to wit: in order to oblige a committee to uphold its parliamentary duty, and furthermore, whether it is a matter of privilege, to abridge the pending Orders of the Day in order to bring such a motion to timely and full debate.—(Honourable Senator Nurgitz).

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, as I indicated, I have discussed this matter with Senator Haidasz. Those matters before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have, in large measure, been completed. Senator Haidasz is in agreement that this item of privilege be dropped from the order paper, and I so request.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, in closing the debate on item number 10 on the order paper, I wish to state that I believe I have made my point in a long speech last month.

• (1600)

Since I have the opportunity today to speak to my motion No. 3 on the order paper, I would therefore ask the house for unanimous consent to withdraw this motion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Order No. 10 be withdrawn?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order withdrawn.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSIDERATION OF FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—ORDER WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Fourth and Final Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence, entitled: "Canada's Land Forces", tabled in the Senate on 31st October, 1989.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that I have introduced an inquiry to do with the establishment of a Standing Senate Committee on National Defence, I would ask that this order be withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order withdrawn.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

MOTION TO INSTRUCT COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE BILL C-43—MOTION WITHDRAWN

On Motion No. 3:

That an obligatory instruction be given by this House to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to give particular study to the individual flaws of Bill C-43 as identified, for instance in a speech which I delivered in the Senate on June 26; and

That the Committee give full study and call expert witnesses to address all issues that are cognate to the Bill including the legal, constitutional, ethical, sociological, and scientific implications of this Bill and to consider appropriate amendments to Bill C-43.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, on several occasions I have tried to argue that Bill C-43 is a bill of first-class constitutional importance with many implications or ramifications for Canadian society, not only as far as it is a new law dealing with the life of a person, but the effects on our Constitution of Bill C-43 which has ethical, sociological, which also includes demographic, and scientific implications.

In committee we heard from Dr. Nathanson of New York City who used to perform a few thousand abortions per year in his clinic. I believe he used a figure of 60,000 in total. After several years he came to the conclusion that he was doing something wrong. Today, in the free world, he is the greatest proponent of respect for the life of the unborn child. He brought to the attention of the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs the scientific progress that has been made in preserving the life of a fetus. He foresees that, perhaps in a period of five to ten years, a fetus will be able to be taken from its mother's womb and preserved, either to be implanted into another mother's womb or else held in storage for development to maturity. These are very important developments in that field for Canadian society, for society as a whole and for the continuation of the human race.

In the past, such important bills were referred to a Committee of the Whole just as we did with the Meech Lake Accord. The Committee of the Whole heard expert witnesses and, thereafter, the chairman of the committee submitted a report. If it comes to our attention that a first-class bill, such as Bill C-43, has not been adequately studied and all of the implications have not been analyzed by a committee, I think we should reserve to ourselves, as some backup insurance, the consideration of a motion to refer certain aspects of the bill to a Committee of the Whole. We will then have the assurance that we have really studied and do understand all of the important and grave implications of Bill C-43.

Therefore, honourable senators, I would move:

That Bill C-43, if necessary, be further studied by a Committee of the Whole.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I find myself in some difficulty. There was a motion standing in

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Haidasz's name and I cannot accept the new motion at this time without notice.

Is it the wish of Senator Haidasz to proceed with the motion in his name on the order paper?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Senator Haidasz could ask for leave to amend it.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would ask for leave of the Senate that the Senate agree on the motion to refer Bill C-43, if necessary, to a Committee of the Whole for further study.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I was under the impression that Senator Haidasz was rising to ask permission to withdraw that motion, but now I am not quite sure as to the tenor of the speech. Was it in support of the motion on the order paper or was he asking for permission to withdraw?

I gained the impression from Senator Nurgitz earlier that some conversations had been held to the effect that that motion was going to be withdrawn. We now come to a point where the honourable gentleman wants a Committee of the Whole on standby just in case he is not satisfied with the report that was brought in by the committee of which he is a member.

• (1610)

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, if I may, in view of the pending report of the Senate committee with regard to Bill C-43, I will withdraw Motion No. 3 standing in my name. I would also like to move a motion that Bill C-43 be referred to the Committee of the Whole for study of certain aspects of this bill, if found necessary.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, could we do one at a time? First, the honourable senator has to get leave to withdraw the motion standing in his name.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I am asking for leave to withdraw Motion No. 3, which stands in my name.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

ABORTION

LEAVE TO GIVE NOTICE OF MOTION TO REFER BILL C-43 TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE DENIED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I give notice:

That I will move a motion to refer Bill C-43 to the Committee of the Whole, if necessary to study certain aspects of Bill C-43.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Bring the notice in tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Leave is not granted.

VETERANS HEALTH CARE REGULATIONS

DEBATE ADJOURNED

On Motion No. 5:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the Veterans Health Care Regulations (SOR/90-594, August 28, 1990) and on all other matters concerning veterans affairs which may arise from time to time.—(Hon. Senator Marshall, P.C.).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Honourable Senator Marsden, that the motion standing in my name be adopted. Senator Marsden is not here.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Marsden is not here. Honourable Senator Marshall, do you have another seconder?

Senator Marshall: Senator Phillips.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the Veterans Health Care Regulations (SOR/90-594, August 28, 1990) and all other matters concerning veterans affairs which may arise from time to time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have no objections to Senator Marshall's moving this motion and having it seconded by whomever. I take it that we are going to be sitting tomorrow. Since I have not had a chance to consult on this side, let us consider the motion moved. It will then appear on the order paper tomorrow, if everything is in place, as I suspect it is, and Senator Marshall has spoken to Senator Marsden about it. Since it is not necessary that it be dealt with today, can we have it moved and therefore on the Order Paper tomorrow and we will hear by consent Senator Marshall speaking to it, if necessary.

Senator Marshall: I spoke to Senator Marsden and she agreed, but that was my mistake. I should have left it until she was here.

Senator Frith: I take your word completely, but I would like to consult.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, Honourable Senator Marshall to adjourn the debate?

Senator Frith: Technically speaking, if Senator Marshall moves the motion, he is considered as having spoken to it. It is an aspect that we have never enforced here very rigorously, but technically it is so. That is why I am saying that I would consent that he move a motion but that it stand in his name tomorrow and that he be permitted to speak to it tomorrow. I suspect it will not require a very long intervention, because Senator Marsden will probably stand and say that it is fine. I do not want an implication that I do not accept Senator Marshall's word; it is just that I have not had a chance to consult.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Marshall, is it your wish to adjourn the motion?

Senator Marshall: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips, that debate on the motion be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

EXEMPTIONS UNDER THE CANADIAN COPYRIGHT ACT

RECOMMENDATIONS

RECOMMENDATIONS

Education

Performance, broadcasting, diffusion

1. An exemption for public performances for educational purposes should be available on the following conditions:

(i) the exemption is to apply to all types of copyright protected works, but in the case of performances by means of an audio and/or video prerecorded form of the work, the exemption shall not apply to performances by means of an infringing copy of the work when the person who caused the performance knew or should have known that the copy was infringing;

(ii) the exemption is available only for the purposes of nonprofit educational activities;

(iii) the exemption is available only for teaching activities and is not available when the performance is for the purposes of the entertainment or recreation of a significant part of the audience;

(iv) the performers are to be only students or instructors (this would not apply to the original performers in a broadcast, diffusion or recording used to cause a performance provided that the original broadcast, diffusion or recording was not infringing);

(v) the audience can be composed only of teachers, students and others directly connected with the teaching activity;

(vi) the performances may occur in classrooms or other places in which teaching activities occur;

(vii) the exemption is available only for face-to-face teaching activities when the performance originates and is received within one building or similar place, and is not otherwise available for exempting broadcasting or diffusion.

2. There should be no exemptions for the use of copyright protected works in broadcasting or diffusion for educational purposes except:

(i) for broadcasting and diffusion that originates and is received within a single building or similar place (this exemption to be available subject to the same conditions as the recommended exemption for public performances for education in "1," above);

(ii) if simultaneous rediffusion becomes an infringement under revised copyright law, there should be an exemption for simultaneous rediffusion for educational purposes subject to the same conditions as the recommended exemption for public performances for education in "1," above.

Reproduction

1. There should be no exemption for recording from prerecorded material for educational purposes.

2. There should be no exemptions for recording for "librarying" or for time-shift purposes from broadcasts or diffusions.

3. There should be no exemption for original recording of copyrighted works except by teachers and students for the purposes of examinations.

4. The problems of access by educators to copyright protected material in audio-visual form should be dealt with by means of voluntary negotiations, with each side acting collectively where appropriate, to result in blanket licensing for appropriate access to protected works.

5. A general fair use exemption should be adopted in Canadian copyright legislation and reproduction in audio-visual form for educational purposes should not be statutorily excluded from such a fair use exemption.

Archival and Library Use of Audio-Visual Material

1. A specific exemption should be introduced to permit nonprofit libraries and archives to make limited numbers of copies of unpublished, out-of-print or otherwise unavailable material already in their collections for the purposes of preservation of such material.

2. No other specific exemption should be provided for the reproduction of material, e.g., to be supplied to other libraries or archives.

3. The needs of libraries and archives in relation to dealing with unpublished, noncommercial copyright material should be treated under a general fair use exemption.

4. If under a new Canadian statute, a general fair use exemption proves inadequate to ensure reasonable access to unpublished, noncommercial, copyright protected material, consideration should be given to introducing limited, specific exemptions for the purpose.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES BILL

ANNEX TO LEGAL OPINION

---

1. In 1. Clause 5(1), the government must, in good faith, etc., initiate and carry to fruition appropriate policies and measures to effect the legitimate aspirations of aboriginal peoples in those areas and activities specified in the clause.

All of the matters and activities are capable of being initiated and carried out by the government without this legislation under its existing powers. What the clause does then is make this action a duty instead of leaving it to the goodwill and discretion of government. No appropriation of public money is seen as being required that is not already available.

2. In Clause 5(2), the government is being required NOT to do something which it need not do now, if it so chooses. No new charge on public revenue is seen here.

3. In Clause 6(1), the observance of certain aboriginal constitutional rights is being directed in the administration of the Act being proposed by the Bill. No new charge on public revenues is envisaged by this requirement. It would only be the proper way to behave.

4. In Clause 6(2), the Minister is being required to promote an understanding among Canadians of the rights, cultures and historical relationship of the Crown and aboriginal peoples. Something that could be done without legislation or additional expense but is here made an urgent duty; thus it does not involve any new expense to the public revenue.

5. In Clause 7, the Minister is being required to initiate action to entrench rights in the Constitution, to satisfy outstanding land claims, to negotiate appropriate treaties. The duty is to start the activities. The clause does not authorize the satisfaction of land claims or the making of specific treaties; thus it does not involve any new charge on public revenues.

6. In Clause 8(1), the Minister is being directed to do something that can now be done as a matter of discretion, that is, to see that aboriginal peoples are provided with the same public services as other Canadians, such as health services, sewer services, etc. The Minister is not being required to provide those services, merely to see that they are provided by the appropriate public service authorities.

7. In Clause 8(2), the Minister is being required to take measures to reduce disparities in economic opportunities, to ensure that aboriginal peoples benefit from and are involved in the efforts to promote economic development at all levels; and to establish, find funding for, and implement appropriate programs therefor.

   The measures in themselves need involve no expenditure of public revenues and could probably be undertaken now as a matter of exercising ministerial power in areas of the Minister's jurisdiction under other statutes and appropriations.

   The reference to funding is so worded that it does not of itself refer to public funds but rather to the action of "finding funds", which might or might not be public funds, depending on where the Minister finds the funds for the measures mentioned.

8. In Clause 8(3), the Minister is being required to establish programs and put into place policies to enable the aboriginal peoples to acquire the resources needed for the purposes mentioned in the subsequent paragraphs of the clause.

   There is not thought to be any action required under this clause that cannot now be done by the Minister within the general administrative powers the Minister has from other sources. The clause will turn the power into a duty. It does not require additional charges on the public revenue.

9. In Clause 9, the Minister is required to apply programs and policies equitably and consistently. No new charge should be caused by this fair application rule.

10. Clause 10 requires the Minister to review proposals for legislation within government and existing laws that affect aboriginal peoples and to make recommendations thereon to ensure attainment of the objectives of the proposed Bill. Since this activity seems to be one that can be engaged in now without legislation, it does not seem to involve any new charge on public revenue.

11. In Clause 11, the Minister is being directed to participate in negotiations with representatives of aboriginal peoples to certain ends. The Minister may already be doing this from time to time, if it accords with the policy of government. But in this clause a time limit to begin negotiating is set out. The clause itself does not involve any new charge on the public revenues.

12. In Clause 12, federal institutions are being required to so perform their functions that the performance will accord with the legitimate aspirations of aboriginal peoples, if to do so would not conflict with the statutory functions of the institution. This, too, is something that can now be done, if the will were there, and does not impose any new charge on public revenues.

CANADA WINTER GAMES,1991

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—HOST PROVINCE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I would like to bring to the attention of the Senate that, from February 17, 1991, to March 2, 1991, the Canada Winter Games torch will shine brightly in Prince Edward Island.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell: This year, 1991, marks an historic milestone in this great Canadian sporting tradition. With these games every province in the country will have played host to this enduring sporting legacy.

For the first time in the history of Canada an entire province rather than a city will host the event. Communities across Canada's smallest province from Tignish to Souris have pulled together in one of the biggest efforts to make the 1991 games a resounding success. In fact, the Island has been preparing since 1987.

I would like to take this opportunity to invite all senators to use the privileges of their travelling trips to come to Prince Edward Island during that time. We will make you a VIP, a very interesting and important person, and we will extend to you all the privileges of a Prime Minister of Canada in our little province.

A hotel room will be reserved for you in the great CP hotel, which cost the province $30 million and which we sold to CP for $1 million. You will be entitled to a three-day stay there. We will supply you with a car and a chauffeur of your choice to drive to all the events throughout the province. There have been 87 cars prepared and donated by the car dealers of the province so that you will be able to get back and forth to the hotel and the games. There will be free admission. The province will host a meal for you; Canada, as a nation, will host you another meal, and the City of Charlottetown will host you another. You will be looked after superbly in the Garden of the Gulf, the Cradle of Confederation.

An invitation is extended to you all. I know that Senator Phillips, Senator Macquarrie and Senator Rossiter will be there and will try to meet you at the games where you can watch the youth of your province participate and hope they will win. They would love to see their senator sitting in the gallery in the middle of the new arena as a VIP, a very interesting person, on their behalf. We may even let you award them the medals they should win.

We hope to see you all in Charlottetown.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, several years ago I rejoiced with Senator Bonnell and all our colleagues from Prince Edward Island, Premier Ghiz and others, when Prince Edward Island was selected for the 1991 Winter Games. The announcement was made at the time by the minister of the day, Mr. Jelinek, who was then the Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport. I took more than a passing personal interest in the matter because of my responsibilities at the time as Minister of ACOA and the discussions and representations that had been made to the government, not only by the provincial government and Premier Ghiz but by our colleagues in Parliament from that province.

In 1987 I had the pleasure of attending the opening, closing and some of the events of the Winter Games held in Cape Breton. Thousands of volunteers came out to make those games a resounding success. Prince Edward Islanders, therefore, have a hard act to follow, but I am confident that they are more than up to the challenge. All the information we have indicates that the games will be a resounding success.

The federal government is proud and happy to have played a substantial part in the usual way in contributing to the infrastructure, including the arena, to which my honourable friend refers, that will accommodate and play host to these games.

On behalf of the government and all on this side I wish to extend our best wishes to all the islanders for a successful Winter Games and to all competitors for an experience that will be enriching, satisfying and unifying for the country in every way.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-43

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have here thousands of names on petitions urging the Senate to defeat Bill C-43. They come from all across the country. I hope that honourable senators will pay attention to this appeal from the citizens of this country.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have another short petition in the continuing series of petitions that I have been receiving showing that the people of Canada continue to be discontented with the government's GST legislation.

ABORTION

REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the thirty-third report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, respecting its examination of the Bill C-43, respecting abortion.

A Clerk at the Table:

Wednesday, January 23, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

THIRTY-THIRD REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred—

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, the report has been distributed to all senators. I have some comments that I should like to make. Because it is a rather lengthy report, I would ask that the reading of it be dispensed with.

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense!

(For text of report, see Appendix "B", p. 5164).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The honourable senator will have to have leave to make his comments now.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I ask for leave to make some comments with respect to the report I have just presented.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Is the honourable senator going to move third reading?

Senator Nurgitz: No, this is not third reading. I should like to make comments on the report in view of the fact that it is an unusual report and done in an unusual fashion.

At the outset, I should like to indicate that this is not a unanimous report of the committee. Our colleague, Senator Haidasz, disagrees with the report for a variety of reasons. Out of respect for him, I shall let him enunciate his reasons later. All others on the committee were in agreement with the contents of the report.

I should like to pay special tribute to the staff of the Senate, especially during the course of last week. We sat quite late, and were served in the usual kind and pleasant manner by all members of our staff. As well, I should like to thank our clerks—Paul Belisle and, more recently, Tonu Onu—who performed admirably under some trying circumstances. I should like to pay special tribute to Mollie Dunsmuir and Margaret Young, from the Library of Parliament, without whose work neither the work of the committee nor the report that has just been presented would have been possible.

Honourable senators, the committee heard from nearly 40 witnesses, who covered an immense number of issues and points of view. The testimony, almost invariably, was professional and insightful. It proved to me that the reason people disagree on abortion has nothing to do with their lack of thought, analysis, compassion or eloquence. Matters of contention were well canvassed, and if any aspect of the problem was left unexamined, I would suggest that it would take a microscope to find it.

We heard from lawyers, doctors, ethicists; we heard from government ministers, both federal and provincial; we heard from political action groups, labour movements, family planning organizations, and clergymen; we heard from groups as diverse as Alliance for Life and CARAL, the abortion rights group and from Physicians for Choice to Physicians for Life; from REAL Women to the National Action Committee on the Status of Women; from the Unitarian Council and the Plymouth Brethren; from Campaign Quebec Vie to another group from that province who form a coalition on the other side of that issue.

• (1420)

No opinions went uncontradicted except the opinion that abortion is a very difficult and complex issue. I might also say that, contrary to some media reports and other suggestions in and around the Senate, the witnesses—and they themselves would classify themselves as either pro-choice or pro-life—would have been very evenly balanced. I suggest there may be a differential of one on either side.

There were people present who held a view and were allowed to express that view. But they were not called because of their opinion; they were called because of who they were. An example of someone like that would be the Ontario Minister of Health, Ms. Gigantès. She was not called because she holds a particular view on abortion; she was called because she was the Minister of Health. The committee contacted every provincial government in Canada, but the Province of Ontario was the only one to respond. We called trial lawyers, not because they had a view on abortion but because of their legal experience. I mention that in passing so that honourable senators will know the kind of witnesses who were called and from whence they came.

Given this comprehensive and informative testimony, senators might wonder why we have presented a relatively brief report that takes no position on the various issues involved. The reason is inherent in the nature of the abortion issue. As you may be aware, our committee traditionally tries to work by consensus rather than taking an adversarial approach to issues. Normally this has worked out extremely well. Abortion, however, is not a normal issue, as the various witnesses noted and as the report mentions.

The premises held by pro-life and pro-choice advocates appear irreconcilable. As is the case with the public in general, members of this committee also hold divergent views. A unanimous report would have been impossible. In order to reach a single position, members of the committee would have had to bend their own beliefs, and this did not seem fair to ask when the Senate, as a whole, has a free vote on this fundamental issue of conscience. Even a majority recommendation would have been difficult to obtain and would possibly have been unfair to committee members given that Bill C-43 involves deeply-held and complex issues of conscience. It would certainly have involved a serious delay in placing this very important matter before this chamber.

Alternatively, we could have submitted a variety of reports representing all points of view on the committee, but this, I suggest, would have been more confusing than it would have been helpful. Ultimately we decided it would be best to let each member of the committee describe his or her own view of the evidence, and the conclusions to be drawn, in his or her comments to this house. The evidence itself is available in the proceedings of the committee, and I am pleased to report, honourable senators, that by the beginning of next week all of the evidence taken will be available for honourable senators who wish to examine any particular segment of it. I would encourage honourable senators to do that. Should any senators wish guidance as to which witnesses may have dealt with a particular interest of concern to them, I am sure any one of the committee members would be helpful.

Of the 38 individuals and groups who personally appeared before us, I should mention that only four supported passage of the bill. They were the Ministers of Justice and Health and Welfare, the Plymouth Brethren—although they do not support the contents of the bill, they consider it to be a compromise and recommend it—and the Law Reform Commission of Canada. The remainder of the witnesses opposed the bill. They did so on religious, medical, social, legal, constitutional and conceptual grounds. Groups whose views were otherwise diametrically opposed were, in the end, virtually united as to how they saw that this matter should be resolved. That is to say that the extreme view of pro-choice and the extreme view of pro-life, in the end, met in not supporting the bill.

I want to be clear on that. In fact, one was able to say to many witnesses, for example anti-abortion witnesses, "People will support your view for reasons you find reasonably abhorrent," and that was understood. Of course, beyond that, their views, as I say, diverged as to why they got to their position, with a number of groups urging that Bill C-43 be replaced by a stronger bill, one tougher in terms of abortion restriction, and others, of course, insisting that no substitute criminal legislation was necessary.

Honourable senators, rarely have parliamentarians been presented with such a complex, perplexing and divisive issue as that presented by abortion. Arguments relating to ethics and conscience, individual freedom, health and the proper role of the state compete intensely for primacy. Supporters of the pro-life view believe that human life begins at conception and that abortion of the pre-born is murder. They deny that abortion is necessary for women for therapeutic reasons and assert that abortion itself causes psychological distress and illness to the mother. They are very firm in their belief that, in any contest between the wishes of the mother and the right of life of the child, the child's interest should always prevail. The issue of abortion, then, must always be a moral issue, according to them, affecting society as a whole, and can never be a matter of individual choice. In the words of one of the witnesses:

> No quarter can be given to evil.

Honourable senators, if I may be permitted, I would like to mention the words, in one of the briefs, which sum up the pro-life position. The following came from the Campaign Life Coalition:

> Life is a continuum. It is not measured in weeks, inches or pounds. A human being exists and is alive from the moment of conception. Abortion, at any time after conception, kills a developing human being.

Honourable senators, supporters of the pro-choice position view the right of women to decide when and whether they will have a child to be a fundamental human right and essential to women's equality and to women's health. This decision should be a private one for the woman and her doctor to make, free of state coercion. State action to support life may take many other forms, according to them, including family planning, prenatal care and family support, but it should never force women to bear unwanted children. Again, I can best summarize the position of that group with the words of one of the witnesses from the Canadian Abortion Rights Action League, CARAL:

> Just as safe, legal abortion services are basic to women's reproductive health and overall wellbeing, reproductive choice is fundamental to women's social equality. In our society, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms confirms the autonomy, integrity, dignity and equality of women, and [a law] which denies women reproductive choice mandates an inferior status to Canadian women which clashes with the Charter.

Honourable senators, we heard arguments on the criminalization of abortion, following the striking down of the sections of the Criminal Code in the Morgantaler decision. The Minister of Justice pointed out to the committee that it is common to find acts contained in the Criminal Code which, under many circumstances, are not criminal. For example, one drives a motor vehicle, and that is not criminal, but there are ways in which one can drive a motor vehicle that can be criminal. Thus, in this view, Bill C-43 means that abortion would not attract the attention of the criminal law except under certain circumstances, in the same way that driving a car only becomes criminal when performed in certain ways.

Most witnesses, however, on both sides of the debate, saw the principle of criminalization as far more serious. Those in favour of a greater choice felt that it should not be in the Criminal Code, and those who were anti-abortion felt that it should not be treated very much different from the ordinary murder provisions in the Criminal Code.

• (1430)

The Law Reform Commission of Canada supported the minister and supported what we have referred to as "criminalization". Senator Beaudoin has indicated that there was an oversight on his part because he wanted to have included in the report the four cornerstones the Law Reform Commission considers to be essential before anything ought to be placed in the Criminal Code of Canada.

An argument can be made that there are other tests, but the Law Reform Commission tests were found to be quite appropriate by senator Beaudoin. I should mention that that test is not included in the report that is tabled.

The evidence was that, in the view of the officials of the Law Reform Commission, there are four tests which govern when an act should be a crime. One is that the act seriously harms other people; the second is that it in some way so seriously contravenes our fundamental values as to be harmful to society; the third is that the enforcement measures necessary for use in criminal law will not themselves seriously contravene our fundamental values; and the fourth is that the criminal law can make a significant contribution to dealing with the particular problem.

For those reasons, officials from the Law Reform Commission of Canada said that the abortion issue was a valid one to be placed in the Criminal Code of Canada, although there were many other views expressed which did not say that at all.

As I have said, pro-life groups, while opposing Bill C-43, strongly supported the inclusion of abortion in the Criminal Code as a way of combatting a serious social harm. In their view, the stigmatization and punishment inherent in the criminal law are essential to make the statement that we ought to deter abortion. They, of course, advocated stronger criminal sanctions.

On the other hand, I should say that we heard a great deal of evidence from the opponents of criminalization of abortion—

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I thought the chairman of the committee was going to explain the report briefly and not read it. He asked that the reading of the report be dispensed with, but now the honourable senator is reading the report. Rule 78(4) states:

> When a committee reports a bill without amendment, such report shall stand adopted without any motion, and the senator in charge of the bill shall move that it be read a third time on a future day.

The Senate agreed that the honourable senator could make a few comments, but not that he undertake a major speech and take the rest of the afternoon to read the report.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I apologize to my colleague, Senator Bonnell. The members of the committee discussed making the report brief. I am not reading the report. If words appear in the report which I have uttered, then that is a coincidence.

I thought I would start by presenting the report and explaining what went on in committee because the report is somewhat brief.

Senator Bonnell: The point is that the honourable senator is now reading the evidence. This is all set out in the report of the committee.

Senator Nurgitz: It is not set out in the report.

Senator Bonnell: I thought the chairman of the committee told us that the transcripts of the evidence would be available next week, if we wanted to read them. Why do we have to hear this now before the "blues" are even printed? Why does he not quit now, and move the adoption of the report!

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I will not be long. I should mention that the Canadian Medical Association and other health professionals were against criminalization for a variety of reasons.

Senator Barootes: Read slower because he does not hear too fast.

Senator Nurgitz: It is interesting that I have just had two interventions from doctors. They might be interested in what their association said.

Senator Bonnell: We can read. We do not need to hear it again. We are looking for a vote any time tomorrow.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I am prepared to conclude. I regret that I have offended some members.

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Barootes: You have not offended anyone but Senator Bonnell. Go ahead!

Senator Bonnell: When is it going to be considered?

Senator Nurgitz: It is going to be considered when debate is concluded.

Senator Bonnell: This is not a debate!

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I asked for leave to explain—

Senator Bonnell: Briefly! You have been going on now for 20 minutes.

Senator Perrault: Finish your speech!

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I am sorry that I have taken the time of the chamber. You can all read the testimony, and I apologize—

Senator Barootes: You do not need to apologize.

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Perrault: Finish! Carry on!

Senator Hastings: You have to be in Winnipeg tomorrow!

Senator Bonnell: Do you have to leave!

Senator Nurgitz: I am sorry if you have another engagement, Senator Bonnell.

Senator Perrault: Carry on!

Senator Frith: Who is in charge over there!

Senator Simard: They are all confused over there.

Senator Perrault: Who is minding the store?

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I was attempting to explain that the Canadian Medical Association, which will be familiar to our colleague, Senator Bonnell, argued that doctors should not be exposed to criminal prosecution with respect to abortion.

Senator Bonnell: The minister said we would not be prosecuted.

Senator Nurgitz: The effects of criminalization would be a reduction in the number of doctors willing to provide this kind of service, which would have a negative impact on physician-patient relationships, and see the introduction of complicated and time-consuming assessment procedures so that hospitals and physicians could protect themselves from an increase in harassment, which was a big part of their claim, by pro-life activists, encouraged by the stigma that abortion would carry as a result of criminalization.

Honourable senators, the Minister of Justice asserted that a criminal law on abortion was important for two legal reasons. First, the existence of a federal law might make it more difficult for the provinces to enact restrictions on abortion. She called this an "elbowing out" effect, acknowledging that it was a subtle argument. Support for the minister's opinion can be found in the legal opinion of Mr. Bruce Ryder that was tabled with the committee. I would like to mention that there is a contrary opinion from Professor Andrew Petter of the University of Victoria.

Another reason given by the Minister of Justice to the committee for including abortion in the Criminal Code was that the bill set a national standard concerning the circumstances under which an abortion may or may not be performed. The government also used the word "entitlement" to abortion in relation to the bill. Legal experts noted, however, that criminal law takes the form of prohibition, coupled with a penalty. Therefore, as one wrote:

> Given the characteristic of criminal provisions, it is an oxymoron to speak of a criminal law entitlement.

Honourable senators, access was another important factor considered by the committee and it was discussed at length.

• (1440)

I should point out that concerns arose because of the fact that Bill C-43 creates the spectre of criminal prosecution for physicians, their staff and women. Pro-choice groups informed the committee that from their point of view abortion services were already inequitably available and extremely insecure in many parts of Canada. They cited facts, amongst others, that, for example, in Prince Edward Island abortions are not performed. They mentioned that the northern two-thirds of New Brunswick has no service; that women, for instance, in my home province must travel to Winnipeg for abortions, and that services in places like Ontario and Quebec are concentrated just in the main cities of Montreal and Toronto.

They also reminded the committee that one of the reasons the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the former law was because of its effect in restricting women's access to services, thereby endangering their health. The concern of virtually all witnesses, with the obvious exception of the pro-life groups, was that access to abortion services would be further restricted as a result of Bill C-43.

The committee was in the unique position of being able to assess many of these concerns. Normally, predictions as to the effect of the legislation that comes before us for consideration following passage in the House of Commons remain hypothetical. In this case, however, many witnesses indicated that there had already been a decrease in the provision of the service. We heard from the Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists that polling of their membership indicated they were deeply concerned about a deteriorating service.

The Minister of Justice, with respect to access, urged the committee to distinguish between the substantive value of the bill and its possible effects—effects that, in her opinion, arise from fears generated by groups opposed to the bill and a misunderstanding on the part of doctors about how the new law would affect them. The minister reiterated for the committee her pledge that the bill would not be proclaimed until it could be implemented in a way that would not thwart the intentions of Parliament.

With respect to constitutionality there was a considerable amount of debate and discussion, and opinions were given.

Needless to say, the minister expressed her view and that of her department that the bill was constitutional. She also stated that she had no doubt that the bill could pass, that its constitutionality would arise only with respect to whether it could or could not be criminal law. I do not think that was the reason why it was struck down in the Morgantaler decision. One could clearly take from that that it could be criminal law in some form, but the real question really gets down to whether it could pass Charter challenges. I should like to mention that I have some recollection that the minister also stated her view that the Ontario government, as well, has some opinion that the bill would be constitutional.

Honourable senators, I should mention that the Ministers of Health and Welfare and Justice, along with the Law Reform Commission, urged us to approve the bill. They were certainly in a clear minority. The Minister of Justice said before our committee that Bill C-43 provides a middle ground. It recognizes the rights of women who seek abortion, societal interests and protection of the fetus. It achieves this balance by permitting abortions that are in the best interests of women's health by criminalizing certain types of harmful conduct. We did hear the expression of a view clearly opposite to that.

Let me conclude by saying, honourable senators, that all of the witnesses on Bill C-43 gave us much wisdom and many insights. Theirs were heartfelt views and certainly assisted us in acquiring some knowledge and understanding on all sides of this complex issue.

Mr. Joe Maingot has said that law and life are pretty uneasy partners. Rarely is that as true as on the issues we have presented to you in this report. We have attempted to outline for you the testimony of our witnesses as clearly and as fairly as possible. The rest is up to honourable senators.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as chairman of the committee, would Senator Nurgitz be willing to answer a few questions? In expressing my thankfulness that we are to have a copy of the printed record early next week, could the chairman tell us whether that printed record of the committee proceedings will be available on Monday morning? That is my first question.

The second question is: Is the chairman in a position to give any personal recommendation to the chamber on this bill? Understanding the difficulty of arriving at a consensus in the committee, but assuming that each individual member has reached some conclusion on the merits of the bill, I wonder whether the chairman is in a position to tell us whether he, as chairman, on his own authority, would recommend the adoption of the bill, or recommend the rejection of the bill?

The third question is: I am interested in knowing if he could help us, because of his experience on the committee and as chairman, as to what the situation would be if the bill were defeated, referring particulary to his comments that the minister or an advocate of the minister had stated that there would be a national standard provided in the bill outlining the circumstances under which an abortion could be carried out. I am not quite sure whether I understand the nature of the national standard, but perhaps the chairman could help us, as to how the national standard would exist with the passage of the bill, and where it would not exist if the bill were defeated. As part of that question, I would like to know, if the bill were defeated, whether there is in existing practice, or existing law, any protection of the fetus. I understand the minister stated that this bill represented a middle ground on which the rights of women were acknowledged and, at the same time, the societal interest of protection of the fetus was recognized. In the absence of this bill, I wonder whether there is in the law, or in the practice, any protection for the fetus.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, in reply to the Leader of the Opposition, perhaps I might answer the last question first. My understanding is that no law does not mean that there are no standards. There would then be provincial standards. Every provincial government and every college of physicians and surgeons has within each province a set of standards. There would be no national standard. The question is: Is there anything else in the Criminal Code or any other statute that provides protection to the fetus. I think the answer is clearly no, there is no other statute—that is, the Criminal Code does not, and I am not aware of any other statute. I do not pretend to be fully an expert on matters like that. To the extent that this is not the kind of protection for the fetus that some people would like, Bill C-43 would be the only one.

In terms of standards, my understanding is that there would be no other way—and there are other experts on the committee—for the Government of Canada, the federal authority, to legislate standards. The only way it can intervene is through the criminal law power.

There was considerable discussion in committee as to whether, under the Canada Health Act, there can be standards. I am not sure whose testimony it was, but I will find out and ensure that the information is left with you, Senator MacEachen. I would urge you to read it. I am not very satisfied with that kind of response—

Senator Frith: And some of your witnesses were not.

Senator Nurgitz: Again, Senator Frith, it was a two-handed response; there were two constitutional views.

Lastly, with respect to support, the committee members decided as a group that we would not urge our own views on senators. None of the other members has been singled out to indicate their view and I do not know why I particularly should be. I may well find this to be satisfactory. I think I have some time to decide that issue and will. In due course, I will certainly let honourable senators know.

Senator MacEachen: I also asked a question as to when we would receive the printed proceedings.

Senator Nurgitz: I am sorry, it is a very important question. The "blues" are ready now. The completed record will be ready sometime on Monday. I am hesitant about saying it will be ready Monday morning, because I was told Monday. It is receiving priority, Senator MacEachen. We ran into a small problem because we were doing an awful lot of night sittings that an outside agency had assisted in some of the preparation; so there are a few small problems. However, I am informed that we will have it on Monday.

Senator MacEachen: May I just go back to an answer that Senator Nurgitz gave with respect to what the situation would be in the absence of the present law? I understood, when Mr. Turner introduced the amendment, that he argued that what was being done was to put into legislation what had been existing in practice or case law—I am not sure I have the correct words—and that therefore the enactment was a reflection of existing practice in the courts. In the absence of this law, where is that jurisprudence? Has it been extinguished, or would it still be there?

Senator Nurgitz: I am not certain I follow that that would be the case. I am not sure that the 1969 amendment brought in by the then Minister of Justice Turner was following a then existing procedure—that was the establishment of the various committees. I also am not certain that there has not been evidence dealing with the question of when there is federal legislation in existence then those standards are accepted, because there is a federal law dealing with abortion and that in dealing with matters under the Canada Health Act—that is, money matters—there is not an observance of national standards.

● (1450)

I should be careful before I get into that kind of answer.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my recollection—and others can correct me if I am wrong—is that the amendment to the Criminal Code brought in by Justice Minister Turner in 1969 was to replace that restrictive, stringent and, virtual prohibition on abortion that then existed in the Criminal Code. Mr. Turner's point is that abortions were taking place throughout the country in some hospitals, and out of hospitals notwithstanding that law.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, am I correct that it may be that Senator Nurgitz will not be able to be here tomorrow?

Senator Nurgitz: Yes.

Senator Frith: Then I have a couple of questions that I want to ask him.

Senator Bonnell: Would Question Period not be the more appropriate place for that, or would it be now?

Senator Frith: It could be either, but I would prefer that it be right now.

I have two questions arising out of the chairman's intervention. One arises from the first paragraph of the report, to which he referred. I want to refer to part of it. It states that:

> Your Committee has examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment, but with the recommendation that the Senate itself make the decision to pass, amend, or reject it. We do this in recognition of the fact that the Bill is to be subject to a free vote by Senators in accordance with their consciences.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

Is the chairman able to give the committee's guarantee that it will be a free vote? I am able to say that for our side it will be that way, but is he able to say that, except for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, of course, no pressure is being put on any senator? In other words, is it a fact that it will be a free vote and no pressure will be put on any senator by the government to pass this bill?

Senator Nurgitz: That is my understanding.

Senator Frith: In accordance with the rules,perhaps the sponsor of the bill—that is, the Leader of the Government in the Senate—might be able to give us that assurance when he moves third reading.

Senator Murray: I will give it now.

Senator Frith: Yes; please do.

Senator Murray: I am not exerting pressure on honourable senators. I am the only person here who is obliged, by cabinet solidarity, to vote in favour of the bill. I favour the bill in any case, but, as a matter of cabinet solidarity, I would have to vote for it. However, I will try to persuade others in my own caucus and across the way to vote in favour of the bill. I may even speak at third reading in favour of the bill. I shall also try to persuade honourable senators opposite to vote for the bill.

To the extent that there are doubts—and many people have doubts—I will try to persuade my colleagues on this side to resolve them in favour of the bill.

Senator Frith: I take it that it will only be from that point of view and not as a question of party or government support. But, as mentioned in the report—and that is what the Leader of the Government is speaking to—it will be a matter of conscience not a matter of party loyalty or government support.

Senator Murray: That is right, yes.

Senator Frith: As a footnote, I would suggest that there is an alternative available to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, namely, to resign. He would then not be bound by cabinet solidarity.

Senator Murray: That is, if he did not support the bill as he does.

Senator Frith: My other question to Senator Nurgitz is that I noticed in his comments that he frequently referred to the rather widely recognized polarity that is expressed in the terms "pro- choice" and "pro-life". I want to know whether or not the committee is giving its imprimatur to those terms as accurately describing the difference of opinion.

Although the title "pro-life" is a clever one, as someone who would have to be described as being on the side of pro-choice, I resent the implication that I am thereby against life. The Senate could do a service if from here on it used expressions that would be much clearer in describing the two bodies of opinion, which is, from the point of view of the pregnant mother, pro-choice or pro-no choice.

Senator Nurgitz: I quite agree that it is an unfair treatment. I, too, had a different view. I thought it should be pro-abortion and anti-abortion, which is probably a more accurate way to reflect it. But I quite agree with that.

In preparing a list of witnesses one needs to be careful. We only used that term with witnesses where they were the group, or the witness himself or herself, and described themselves that way.

Senator Frith: So the committee is not lining up in favour of that description?

Senator Nurgitz: I agree with that comment.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, in the past I always liked to give my consent when someone asked for leave to give a brief statement or report on something. But in future, when chairmen ask for consent to give some explanatory remarks, I doubt that I will be able to give it if we will then be subject to hearing long speeches.

Senator Barootes: Like your question, or when you ask questions and they go on, and on, and on.

Senator Bonnell: That is right. I understand that those who want to ask questions of the chairman or the Leader of the Government can ask them in Question Period; but if we are to turn this into Question Period, as my friend just did, then that becomes another debate in the middle of a privilege that we gave to honourable senators to make a few comments on the report or to tell us how the committee work has progressed.

Now that we have gone this far I do not see why I cannot make a speech concerning this bill, just as the Leader of the Government has done. But before I do, I should like to ask the committee chairman if he could explain to me, in the same detail as he did concerning the others who gave briefs at the committee hearing, what Father Alphonse de Valk and Doctor Bernard Nathanson had to say, and give us the details of their comment.

Senator Nurgitz: I will not do that, honourable senators. That transcript will be made available. Father de Valk is well known as a church leader and a publisher of what could be called an anti-abortion newspaper. Dr. Bernard Nathanson is a doctor who is well-known in the United States. He has produced a film against abortion. In the U.S. he is the leading anti-abortion medical person. He started out with a career of being the leading abortionist in the country and is now the leading anti-abortionist. He established the largest abortion clinic in the U.S. in the City of New York.

That is enough of an outline. They presented evidence that took approximately one hour. If I had to recite it, frankly, I could not. But it is interesting testimony. I am sure that our colleague, Senator Bonnell, will read all the evidence of all the witnesses anyway.

Senator Bonnell: That shows the unfairness of the chairman of the committee. He went on to tell us what other people had to say, the side they took, the view they took, what they said, and even gave us some quotations from their testimony. But when he is asked about other witnesses, because they had a different viewpoint, he did not want to hear what they had to say. He said, "No. I refuse to do that." When you allow these chairmen the privilege to make a few comments, do you see what happens? They go on and on. When they get to the point of answering a question, they want only to give their points of view.

• (1500)

In order to bring this matter to a close, I would like to say that in the future, when chairmen ask for unanimous consent to make a few remarks, we should impose upon them a time limit of five minutes. If that is not acceptable, then they should not be allowed to make their remarks.

The Hon. The Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. The first point I wish to bring to the attention of all honourable senators is that, unfortunately, Senator Nurgitz—and I know he did not do this intentionally—left out the most important part of the report concerning anti-abortion witnesses. He forgot to state, as appears on page 2, line 16, that the child's interest should always prevail "unless the life of the mother is at risk." I am sure it was an unintentional omission on his part. However, it is a very important fact which must be taken into consideration in the study of and the vote on this bill.

My second point is that Senator Nurgitz has stated that I have dissented from the committee's report. I did so because I believe that the thirty-third report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs does not have the necessary qualities of a committee report. I would rather call it a summary or interim report of the testimony heard by members of the committee.

As a member of the committee, I know that after the last witnesses were heard on Monday there has not taken place a profound or serious study of the bill by the committee members, something which should be done by members of this Senate committee. In support of that statement I would like to quote from the Fifth Edition of Beauchesne's, Citation 763 which states:

> The function of a committee on a bill is to go through the text of the bill clause by clause and, if necessary, word by word, with a view to making such amendments in it as may seem likely to render it more generally acceptable.

Citation 764 states:

> (1) A committee is bound by the decision of the House, given on second reading, in favour of the principle of the bill, and should not, therefore, amend the bill in a manner destructive of this principle.
> (2) The committee may so change the provisions of the bill that when it is reported to the House it is in substance a bill other than that which was referred. A committee may negative every clause and substitute new clauses, if relevant to the bill as read a second time.

(3) The objects (also referred to as the principle or scope) of a bill are stated in its long title, which should cover everything contained in the bill as it was introduced. Amendments, however, are not necessarily limited by the title of the bill.

(4) An amendment which is outside the scope of the bill is out of order and cannot be entertained, unless a special Instruction has been given by the House to the committee.

Furthermore, honourable senators, the report that was tabled by Senator Nurgitz this afternoon does not contain—and I emphasize this—a profound analysis or serious study of the supportability of any of the evidence presented, or even on analysis of one side of the issue of abortion and of the other. Then how are we, as a Senate, to undertake intelligible debate on the possible amendments to Bill C-43 if all of us do not understand its principle or the impact of its objects?

I submit to honourable senators that this report which was just presented is not therefore subject to rule 78(4) of the rules of the Senate since it does not fulfil the requirements of a committee report pursuant to a committee's mandate. Proof of this is the failure of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee to progress to consideration of the bill clause by clause and, if necessary, word by word, with a view to making such amendments in it as may render it more generally acceptable, as set out in Citation 763 of Beauchesne's. Even the four provisions of Citation 764 have not been attended to in this committee.

Honourable senators, I ask, first: What is the understood principle of this bill? Second, there was moreover no serious attempt to debate, let alone negative, any clauses. Third, no amendments were even considered, although I did give notice to the committee that I would propose four amendments at third reading. Fourth, there was my attempt to instruct the committee before its main work; and discussion on this should have begun, but the house failed to do this. Then I had to ask that my motion for instruction, item number 10, on the Order Paper be removed yesterday.

Furthermore, the third item under Motions yesterday was not settled in this house before the lapse of time made it out of order.

The other point I want to raise is that we will not have available to all of us the printed proceedings of all the sittings of the committee until sometime next week.

In the meantime, pursuant therefore to rule 33 of the Senate, in defence of Parliament and privileges of members, I move that the matter of the receivability of this report be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Haidasz rose on a point of order which was followed by a motion not seconded. It is not in order to do that. The committee has sat. It has fulfilled its mandate. The reference is quite clear. It has heard witnesses and testimony and has presented its report. Second reading took place before that time. The subject matter of the bill has been debated in the Senate. The report itself can be debated and looked at. The testimony of the witnesses will be available on Monday for everyone to read. There is absolutely no point in pursuing any further this proposed motion of Senator Haidasz. I suggest that he is completely out of order.

[Senator Haidasz.]

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I ask for a ruling on Senator Doody's statement.

Senator Doody: You have to get your motion seconded.

The Hon. The Acting Speaker: Honourable Senator Haidasz has quoted rule 78(4) which states:

When a committee reports a bill without amendment, such report shall stand adopted without any motion, and the senator in charge of the bill shall move that it be read a third time on a future day.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have stated that rule 78(4) does not apply in this case. I have also made a motion that the receivability of this report be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

• (1510)

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, a motion has to be seconded to be receivable. If the senator has a motion, perhaps we could find a seconder, and we could take it from there.

Senator Haidasz: It is my understanding, honourable senators, that notice is not required of this motion, nor is a seconder.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, it is a rule of the Senate. We dealt with this a couple of weeks ago. I do not know if it is the purpose of the senator to try to obstruct, delay and generally confuse the operations of the chamber. However, if he does not want to follow the rules, that is not for me to decide but for the Senate to decide.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I object to the insinuations of Senator Doody. It is not my purpose nor intention to obstruct, boycott, filibuster or break any rules.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, rule 24 says:

A motion made in the Senate, but not seconded, shall not be debated or put from the Chair.

Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senors, I should like to bring to your attention that I ended my remarks by saying: "Pursuant to rule 33 of the Senate, in defence of Parliament and privileges of all honourable senators, I move that the matter of the receivability of this report be referred to a Committee of the Whole." That motion does not need a seconder.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, as the Acting Speaker has pointed out, rule 24 is quite clear. It says:

A motion made in the Senate, but not seconded, shall not be debated or put from the Chair.

That is quite clear.

Senator Haidasz: It is my opinion, and I received the advice, that a seconder is not required for a motion of privilege.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, on the point of order, the rules are quite clear that when a bill is reported without amendment, it then goes to third reading. It is my duty now to move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Murray, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

QUESTION PERIOD

PERSIAN GULF WAR

PARTICIPATION OF SENATE IN MONITORING EVENTS IN THE GULF

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Does the government intend that the Senate participate with the other place in their monitoring of events in the Gulf and the aspects of war in the Gulf?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): No, honourable senators.

HARASSMENT OF CANADIAN CITIZENS OF MIDDLE EAST DESCENT

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: There are disturbing allegations from Canadians citizens of Middle East descent that their civil rights are being unreasonably prejudiced. Can the government give the Senate assurances that the civil rights of Canadian citizens of Middle East descent will be respected?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the short answer to that question, of course, is yes. Having said that, the honourable senator will be aware that we live in a world where there is a security threat—threats of terrorism—which are more or less serious at different times and different places. It is the duty of the security services—CSIS and the RCMP—to investigate these to the full, as it is the duty of the government to try to ensure that the security of the country is protected at all times.

In that respect, the police and the security services are carrying on their work. There is no harassment of anyone, certainly no harassment of any groups, and no illegal surveillance taking place in this exercise. I can give that undertaking.

So far as Canadian citizens of Middle East origin who are residents of Canada, the government has been in touch with various Arab communities and organizations in this country and with the leadership of the Moslem community. Mr. Clark will be meeting with some of the Imams later on; that meeting is being arranged. The Prime Minister and Mr. Clark have been in touch with leaders of the Jewish community, and Mrs. McDougall and Mr. Weiner have met personally with them.

We are doing everything within our power to ensure that the objectives of the government and the United Nations in this conflict are well understood by all Canadians of all ethnic origins and that the government's support for the United Nations and for the 12 United Nations' resolutions on this matter is understood and accepted by all.

HARASSMENT OF FAMILIES OF CANADIAN FORCES

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: I thank the Leader of the Government for that. There are equally disturbing press reports that members of families of Canadian forces now serving, or about to serve, in the Gulf are being harassed. Could the Leader of the Government advise us whether or not those reports are correct. If so, what steps are being taken to stop these appalling and despicable actions?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have seen the same media reports that my friend has seen on these matters. I can only tell him for the moment that they are being investigated.

PRISONERS OF WAR IN IRAQ—BREACH OF GENEVA CONVENTION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: We all saw on the television in the last few days appalling breaches of the 1949 Geneva Convention when we witnessed the unfortunate parade of allied prisoners of war being questioned on television by Iraqi authorities. Observers have also condemned indiscriminate bombing as being equally in breach of the Geneva Convention.

• (1520)

Would the Leader of the Government, at the earliest opportunity, present to the Senate, with some precision, what breaches of the Geneva Conventions are involved; whether or not Iraq and Canada are co-signers of the various Geneva protocols; and what, if any, steps the government has taken and intends to take with these or any future breaches of the Geneva Protocols?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I shall do so, honourable senators.

CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

HATE LITERATURE LAWS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Is the government examining measures to strengthen Canada's hate literature laws? I raise the question because, as you will recall, on December 13 the Supreme Court of Canada made a decision in reference to the Keegstra case. The following day the Minister of Justice for the province of New Brunswick is reported to have stated that a committee had been established to examine how to strengthen Canada's hate literature laws. Apparently, this committee had been working but had adjourned its deliberations during the appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Honourable senators, I should like to have more information about that committee and whether community organizations who have a special interest in this particular area will be given an opportunity to have some input.

PERSIAN GULF WAR

INCOME TAX EXEMPTION FOR MILITARY PERSONNEL—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

A report on the news wires yesterday from the United States indicates that the President has issued an executive order to the effect that United States troops will be exempt from paying income tax on salary earned while on duty in the Gulf. It is stated that enlisted men and women will get a complete tax exemption and officers will get a partial tax exemption of $500 per month. It is further reported that Canadian troops in the Persian Gulf will not be getting a tax break and that a spokesman for the Department of National Defence, Ms. Nancy Fournier, said, "The situation for Canadian Forces has not changed."

Surely, in view of the fact that Canadian men and women are placing their lives at risk in this theatre of war, the very least the government can do is give them an exemption similar to that enjoyed by American servicemen in that sector. Surely, we are not that hard-pressed for revenue in this country that we cannot extend the same exemption to Canadian men and women serving in the Gulf.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I hesitate to harp back to yesterday's exchange in this place, but the least we can do would be to support the purposes and objectives for which they are there in support of the United Nations. I invite my honourable friend to do that.

Insofar as the income tax situation is concerned, that is under investigation at the moment.

Senator Perrault: Can we take it, then, that the Leader of the Government in the Senate will bring to his cabinet colleagues the unanimous view of honourable senators that they would like some tax exemption to be extended to Canadian men and women serving in the Gulf? I think that is very heartening and very encouraging.

Insofar as the Leader's specious comment preliminary to attempting to answer the question is concerned, I would point out that our party has placed solidly on record its view with respect to the government's original strategy, which we feel was addled and wrong; but now that we are involved in this situation, of course, we fully support the effort of the United Nations.

Senator Murray: I agree that your original position was addled and wrong.

Senator Perrault: No, your position was addled.

ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION TABLED

HEALTH AND WELFARE

NATIONAL HEALTH RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM—RESEARCH AWARDS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 68 on the order paper—by Senator Marshall.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the second reading of the Bill C-79, An Act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will recall that this bill, which was sponsored by Senator Nurgitz and responded to on the other side, was stood in my name. We were trying to determine which committee might most appropriately deal with this matter.

I have had conversations with the three committee chairmen who were concerned, Senator Roméo LeBlanc, Senator Molgat and Senator Nurgitz, and they have determined that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs would be the appropriate committee to which this bill should be referred.

If either Senator LeBlanc or Senator Molgat have any problem with this, they can consult with Senator Nurgitz who, I think, is more familiar with the technical aspects of this bill than any of us.

When the appropriate time comes, I am sure Senator Nurgitz will refer this bill to committee.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Nurgitz speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Nurgitz: —I have nothing further to add to this matter. Discussions have taken place between Senator LeBlanc and with the Deputy Leader. My understanding is that the bill can now move forward.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

VETERANS HEALTH CARE REGULATIONS

MOTION ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the Veterans Health Care Regulations (SOR/90-594, August 28, 1990) and on all other matters concerning veterans affairs which may arise from time to time.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators will recall that yesterday I moved the adoption of this motion. Unfortunately, my colleague, Senator Marsden, was absent as she is today.

I wonder whether she has spoken with Senator Frith on this motion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Yes, she has, and she confirmed that she supports this motion and will be supporting it.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marsden:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine and report upon the Veterans Health Care Regulations (SOR/90-594, August 28, 1990) and on all other matters concerning veterans affairs which may arise from time to time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

• (1530)

THE CONSTITUTION

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON AMENDING FORMULAE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consult broadly with Canadians and inquire into and report upon the process for amending the Constitution of Canada, including, where appropriate, proposals for amending one or more of the amending formulae, with particular reference to:

(i) the role of the Canadian public in the process;

(ii) the effectiveness of the existing process and formulae for securing constitutional amendments; and

(iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including those set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada";

That twelve Members of the House of Commons and five Members of the Senate be the Members of the Special Joint Committee, such Members on the part of the Senate to be designated no later than three sitting days after the adoption of this motion;

That the Committee have the power to appoint from among its Members such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee, or a sub-committee, have power to travel, and hold public hearings, within Canada;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings or of proceedings of its sub-committees, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons;

That the parties represented on the Committee be granted allocations for expert assistance with the Committee work in proportion to the representation of the said parties in the House of Commons;

That the Committee be empowered to retain the service of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Joint Chairmen;

That the Committee submit its report not later than July 1, 1991, provided that, if the Senate is not then sitting, the report will be deemed submitted on the day such report is deposited with the Clerk of the House of Commons and with the Clerk of the Senate;

That changes in membership of the Committee for Members of the House of Commons be effective immediately after notification thereof, signed by the Member acting as Chief Whip of any recognized party, has been filed with the Clerk of the Committee;

That the quorum of the Committee be nine Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken so long as both Houses are represented, and the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six Members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly,

And on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that the motion be amended by deleting the fourth paragraph thereof and substituting the following therefor:

(iii) alternatives to the current process and formulae, including an amending formula based on regional representation, as proposed in the 1971 Victoria Charter; and a formula based on seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population, with a clause added stipulating that Quebec must be one of the seven provinces; and the alternatives set out in the discussion paper prepared by the Government of Canada entitled "Amending the Constitution of Canada".—(Honourable Senator Stanbury).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I ask that this order stand in the name of Senator Watt rather than Senator Stanbury. I have his agreement to that.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, may I ask whether any honourable senator knows when Senator Watt might be ready to speak to this matter and, in general, what the intentions of the Opposition are with regard to this motion? I raise the question simply because, as honourable senators are aware, the House of Commons has now suspended its sitting. Members of that place who would be members of this joint committee are naturally anxious to use the time available to them, before the House of Commons returns, to get organized, to plan hearings, to develop budgets and so on. If we are to have a joint committee, therefore, I know that they would appreciate it if the Senate could act to unite with the House of Commons in establishing it as soon as possible.

So I wonder whether there is any enlightenment that the Leader or Deputy Leader of the Opposition or, indeed, Senator Watt, can shed on this matter?

Senator Frith: Yes, honourable senators, I think I can. The first point is that we are not delaying this motion. The second point is that we were ready to proceed with a vote on our amendments, as I said on the last occasion, because it was then clear that the government was opposed to the amendments and we were ready to proceed. At the end of last week, Senator Watt gave me a memorandum with background to an amendment he wants to propose. As far as I know, he will be the only person speaking on that amendment. Also, as far as I know, he may be here tomorrow, but I will check with the Whip. Therefore, we simply want to give Senator Watt an opportunity to move his amendment; but, as far as I know, he will be the only one speaking on it. In that case, we will be ready to proceed with votes on our amendments—that is, the amendments made by Senator MacEachen, which I seconded, and also Senator Watt's amendment.

Order stands in name of Senator Watt.

THE HONOURABLE J. MICHAEL FORRESTALL

PROPERTY QUALIFICATIONS FOR MEMBERSHIP IN SENATE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.:

Than on any question relating to the qualification of Michael Forrestall or any others appointed pursuant to Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867, the said persons be not entitled to vote thereon.—(Honourable Senator Frith.)

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, if I may, this has been on the order paper for some time. At the risk of pleading ignorance of the rules, I wonder why the sponsor will not debate this particular item, which I think is a very special one. As long as it stands, it casts doubt on the qualifications of one of our colleagues.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It casts doubt on more than one of your colleagues, so a fortiori your argument would be that we should speak to it. My answer is that I wish to do so, but it is really a companion piece to the other motion dealing with the question of qualification. I think that, in the consideration of the qualification of Senator Forrestall, and therefore the others, the Senate, if it agrees to refer that matter to the Committee of the Whole, would be assisted by some court decisions that are presently under consideration. In fact, the Ontario Court of Appeal heard the arguments, I believe, yesterday. That is why I am holding it. I do not believe that the court decisions are going to be necessarily determinative of the whole question, but I think we will want to have them available to us to consider the whole question. That is the reason I am postponing dealing with them. When I deal with them, I agree they should be dealt with together.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES, 1990-91

EIGHTEENTH REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

WEDNESDAY, January 23, 1991

The Standing Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

EIGHTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the expenditures proposed by the Estimates for the fiscal year ending 31 March 1991, with the exception of Privy Council Vote 15 (Official Languages), has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, March 13, 1990, examined the said Estimates and presents its final report as follows:

PREAMBLE

In February 1990, Professor Douglas Hartle of the Department of Economics, University of Toronto sent to the Committee a paper entitled "Increasing Government Accountability: a Proposal that the Senate Assume Responsibility for Program Evaluation."[1] In this paper, Professor Hartle strongly criticizes the system of program evaluation that has been established in federal government departments and agencies in compliance with standards promulgated by the Office of the Comptroller General (OCG). Many so-called evaluations, he states, are in fact nothing more than reports by management consultants to address administrative problems, and would have been undertaken even if the OCG's program evaluation requirements did not exist.[2] Professor Hartle argues further that the Office of the Auditor General, which is responsible for auditing and reporting on the program evaluation activities of departments, "lacks the mandate and . . . the clout necessary to make program evaluation a substantive rather than a pro forma exercise."[3] Evaluations, he continues, "cannot be devoid of value judgements and therefore are inherently political."[4]

Professor Hartle's solution is to have the Senate assume responsibility for retrospective program evaluation on a selective or cyclical basis. The responsibility would be assigned to a Senate committee along with an appropriate budget. The committee would retain expert advisers, formulate questions on particular programs for responsible Ministers and commission evaluations or interpretations of evaluations from outside persons or groups with conflicting interests or values. If this initiative were successful, the Office of the Auditor General, Professor Hartle recommends, should once again confine itself to undertaking traditional audits of the government's financial accounts, while the Office of the Comptroller General should no longer have responsibility for ensuring that departments perform program evaluations.[5] These recommendations, he concludes, "would greatly increase accountability in government at little or no additional expense. Evaluation would be carried out in the adversarial/political context where it belongs."[6]

After reviewing Professor Hartle's paper, the Committee agreed that it would not be feasible for the Senate to assume the responsibility for the evaluation of all government programs that currently rests with the program evaluation units of individual departments and agencies. However, members felt that a more systematic use of program evaluation findings could provide the National Finance Committee with a powerful approach to its reviews of the Estimates and, in particular, could enable it to make concrete proposals for improvements to government programs. This in turn would constitute a credible alternative source of advice for ministers, thereby lessening their reliance on the views of the public servants who manage those programs and of the interest groups that benefit from them.

Accordingly, members decided that the Committee, in the course of its review of the 1990-91 Main Estimates, should study the existing program evaluation system in some detail and examine the potential of program evaluation to improve the accountability of the government to Parliament for its expenditures. A further impetus to this study, in the minds of some members, was provided by reductions in funding for certain programs of the Department of the Secretary of State, which were announced with the Budget of February 20, 1990 and outlined in Part III of the Main Estimates for that department. These included reduced support for women's centres under the Women's Program and for Aboriginal Friendship Centres, native communications and native broadcasting. Members wished to ascertain the extent to which evaluation findings, as opposed to political and other factors, were taken into account when the decisions were taken to scale back these programs.[7] This information would help to illustrate whether the establishment of program evaluation in departments and agencies had contributed significantly to decision-making by senior management.

WITNESSES

The following witnesses appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance during its examination of the 1990-91 Main Estimates:

March 21, 1990	The Honourable Robert R. de Cotret, P.C., President of the Treasury Board, and Mr. Allan Darling, Deputy Secretary, Program Branch.
March 22, 1990	Mr. Ian Clark, Secretary of the Treasury Board, Mr. Allan Darling, Deputy Secretary, Program Branch, and Mr. J. A. Macdonald, Comptroller General of Canada
March 28, 1990	Mr. J. A. Macdonald, Comptroller General, and Mr. Guy Leclerc, Deputy Comptroller General, Program Evaluation Branch
May 3, 1990	Professor Douglas G. Hartle, Department of Economics, University of Toronto
May 10, 1990	Mr. Richard Clippingdale, Assistant Under Secretary of State (Corporate Policy and Public Affairs) and Mr. Kerry Johnston, Director, Program Evaluation Directorate, Department of the Secretary of State
May 17, 1990	Mr. John F. Thomas, Comptroller, and Mr. Robert Bergeron, Director, Program Evaluation Branch, Department of Fisheries and Oceans
May 24, 1990	Mr. Kenneth M. Dye, Auditor General of Canada, and Ms. Maria Barrados, Principal, Audit Operations
June 7, 1990	Mrs. Eleanor Chelimsky, Assistant Comptroller General for Program Evaluation and Methodology, United States General Accounting Office, Washington, D.C.
June 14, 1990	Dr. Kenneth F. Watson, Partner, Rideau Research Associates Ltd., Ottawa, and Mr. John McDermott, President, Canadian Evaluation Society
September 27, 1990	Mr. Barry Carin, Assistant Deputy Minister, Strategic Policy and Planning, and Mr. Ian Midgley, Director General, Program Evaluation Branch, Department of Employment and Immigration
October 4, 1990	Mrs. Mary J. Murphy, Executive Director, Corporate Management and Secretary General, and Mr. Avrim D. Lazar, Director General, Review, Public Service Commission
November 8, 1990	Mr. Guy Leclerc, Deputy Comptroller General, Program Evaluation Branch, and Mr. John Mayne, Director, Evaluation Policy, Office of the Comptroller General

CALL LETTER

Recognizing that it could call only a limited number of witnesses during the time allotted for the study of the Main Estimates, the Committee undertook to obtain a wider range of views on the program evaluation system by authorizing the Chairman to write to the deputy heads of all federal government departments and the major departmental agencies; departmental agencies are covered by the Treasury Board's requirement to evaluate their programs periodically, whereas Crown Corporations are not. The Chairman's letter is reproduced as Annex 1 of this report, which includes a list of the departments and agencies to which it was sent. It requested: a description of the program evaluation function in the department or agency and the resources provided for it in the 1990-91 Estimates; a list of completed evaluation studies, assessments and frameworks; the program evaluation plan covering the next several years; and examples of the use of evaluation findings in decisions to change program resource levels.

All the departments and agencies that were canvassed have now responded to the Committee's request. The responses are voluminous and do not form part of this report. They can be made available, however, to Senators and other interested persons. The Committee has been informed that copies of the responses were also sent to the Office of the Comptroller General, which does not routinely collect the information in this form.

BACKGROUND OF THE EVALUATION SYSTEM[8]

Program evaluation has been an identifiable activity since the 1960s, with much of the early work having been carried out in the United States. There, it was considered to be an area of applied scientific research, and considerable attention was paid to such issues as experimental design and econometric methodology in order to identify and measure the impacts of government interventions on society. Formal evaluations of this type were carried out on an ad hoc basis in Canadian government departments in the 1970s, some of them by the now-defunct Planning Branch of Treasury Board.

Program evaluation in the federal government since that time has developed as an aid to decision-making and management, more specifically as an information base for resource allocation, program improvement and accountability in government. Treasury Board initiated the policy that government departments and agencies should undertake regular evaluations of the full range of government programs in 1977, when it issued its Policy Circular 1977-47, "Evaluation of Programs by Departments and Agencies." This policy circular stated, among other things, that:

> the deputy head of a department or agency is the client of the evaluations and is responsible for establishing the program evaluation function in the organization, for ensuring that objective evaluation studies are carried out and for taking appropriate decisions as a result of the findings;
> all programs should be evaluated on a periodic basis, if possible every three to five years;
>
> departments and agencies should prepare a program evaluation plan; and
> evaluation frameworks should be developed to identify future evaluation requirements for all new as well as existing programs.[9]

The Office of the Comptroller General clarified the distinction between program evaluation and internal audit in a 1979 paper as follows:

> Program evaluation is the periodic, independent and objective review and assessment of a program to determine, in light of present circumstance, the adequacy of its objectives, its design and its results both intended and unintended. Evaluations will call into question the very existence of the program. Matters such as the rationale for the program, its impact on the public, and its cost effectiveness as compared with alternative means of program delivery are reviewed.
> Internal audit is the systematic, independent review and appraisal of all departmental operations, including administrative activities, for purposes of advising management as to the efficiency, economy and effectiveness of the internal management practices and controls.[10]

When the Office of the Comptroller General prepared its Guide on the Program Evaluation Function in 1981, it endeavoured to link program evaluation to the Policy and Expenditure Management System (PEMS) that was being implemented at that time.[11] Departmental program evaluation plans were to be developed in consultation with the Policy Committee secretariats and Treasury Board; a long-term evaluation plan was to be submitted to Treasury Board along with the Multi-Year Operational Plan (MYOP) by March 31st each year; and consequently program evaluation was to become an integral part of the government's expenditure management.

As a necessary step in the development of program evaluation plans, the activities of departments and agencies were to be grouped into program evaluation components, namely groups of activities considered suitable for evaluation purposes. The Estimates program or programs from which the component was funded were to be identified and the relationship between the component and the Estimates program explained. The program evaluation components should then be set in order of their importance for evaluation, taking into account the concerns of the department, its minister and central agencies.[12] Note that there is no mention of Parliament.

The Office of the Comptroller General (OCG) was constituted in 1978 through an amendment to the Financial Administration Act, Chapter 33. The President of the Treasury Board transferred several responsibilities to the new Office, including the implementation of its Policy Circular 1977-47. The Program Evaluation Branch of the Office was "to provide Ministers with information on the status of the program evaluation function in departments and agencies and on the quality of individual program evaluations."[13] Again, there was no requirement to report to Parliament. The specific responsibilities of the Office were to:

> develop and promulgate policy and guidelines on program evaluation;
> develop and maintain a close working relationship with, and advise and assist, departments and agencies; and
> comment upon the program evaluation function in departments and agencies and the resulting evaluation documents and reports.[14]

Clearly, the powers given to the OCG to enforce program evaluation standards were quite limited. In particular, it had no power to withhold program funds from delinquent departments and agencies, although it could advise Treasury Board and other ministers to do so. This limitation is in contrast to Treasury Board's Policy Circular 1977-47, which directed departments and agencies to establish and maintain the program evaluation function and could presumably be enforced through budgetary controls such as the MYOP. Therefore, the effectiveness of the Comptroller General in promoting evaluation would appear to depend, to a considerable extent, upon the credibility of his/her Office with the Treasury Board and upon the continuing interest of the Board in the evaluation activities of departments and agencies. Although some of the evidence presented to the Committee had a bearing on these key issues, the Committee was unable to examine them in depth.[15]

AN ASSESSMENT OF THE EVALUATION SYSTEM

A. The Role of the Comptroller General

In his opening statement before the Committee on March 28, 1990, Mr. J. A. Macdonald, Comptroller General of Canada, emphasized that evaluation, as used by departments and agencies of the federal government, is "a senior management tool for improving the performance of programs, reallocating resources and reporting on departmental performance."[16] It is, he said, > a component of the strategic management of a government department, whereby on a planned basis, the department's programs are systematically reviewed by senior management to determine whether the programs remain relevant to current government priorities, are achieving their intended objectives and are being delivered in the most cost-effective manner.[17]

Although much of the professional literature on program evaluation deals with research methodology, the intent of the Treasury Board policy on evaluation and the role of the Office of the Comptroller General are, in the Comptroller General's opinion, "to institutionalize evaluation as an accepted and practiced component of good management. Thus federal evaluation should be judged primarily on its relevance and utility to government decision-making and accountability."[18]

This view of the role of evaluation is philosophically distinct from that advanced by Professor Douglas Hartle in his brief to the Committee and his subsequent appearance before it. Professor Hartle argues, in effect, that the evaluation system in place in federal government departments and agencies is fatally flawed because of its potential for conflict of interest. In his testimony on May 3, 1990, Professor Hartle stated:

> The Comptroller General relies solely on departments and agencies for the actual work of evaluation. His office is not powerful enough to secure from them substantive evaluations. Has there ever been an unfavourable evaluation made by a department of a policy favoured by the minister; or of a management technique the deputy minister had put in place?[19]

Professor Hartle's question, it must be pointed out, could never be answered with certainty, nor can the complete objectivity of any evaluation process be definitively established. In particular, a program that was terminated ostensibly as a consequence of unfavourable evaluation findings might in fact have been viewed unfavourably and targeted for elimination by senior management prior to the evaluation's taking place. Nonetheless, Professor Hartle's concerns about objectivity and the need for ministers to obtain independent advice from outside their departments struck a sympathetic chord with members of the Committee. These concerns were, however, given short shrift by the Comptroller General in his testimony.[20] In defending the existing system, he stated unequivocally that "program evaluation is a departmentally situated function . . . working for a management team of the department . . . it is deliberately set up to be so"[21] and that "the system that we have designed is an internal system to serve the executive, as opposed to providing competing views for challenge in a political forum."[22]

B. Control Over Evaluation

Members of the Committee were strongly interested in the degree of control exercised by the Office of the Comptroller General over the program evaluation function in departments and agencies. Regarding the extent to which his Office evaluated the evaluators, Mr. Guy Leclerc, the Deputy Comptroller General, Program Evaluation Branch, stated:

> As the motherhouse of evaluation, we are trying to promote the installation of a good evaluation function in each department and agency. Then we monitor what they are doing and make an assessment of the kinds of studies they are doing. We use standards to assess the quality of the studies they have done.[23]

Mr. Macdonald, the Comptroller General, added:

> Let me make it clear that we establish a policy framework which says that departments will systematically review their programs. We do not superintend departments. We do not tell them what to do. We simply ensure that they are in general compliance with the policy.[24]

At the same time, the OCG prepares quality assessments of evaluations in departments and agencies at more or less regular intervals. These are shared with the departments on a confidential basis and the OCG is not prepared to make them available to the Committee.[25]

Regarding the OCG's influence over the choice of programs to evaluate, in particular what it would do if it felt a department had failed to evaluate an important program and how the OCG maintains its clout with departments, Mr. Macdonald stated:

> We report to the President of the Treasury Board who, of course, has the ultimate responsibility for resource allocation . . . [we would] communicate to the department that this is a program that should be looked at . . . we do not have a right of veto . . . departments are free to do what they, in their view, feel is proper. We can influence, we can suggest, we do not control.[26]

Each year the OCG prepares a Government Program Evaluation Plan (GPEP) that is designed to communicate "to program evaluators the priorities of the government . . . departments take that into account in their evaluation activities."[27] A review of the 1989 GPEP confirms that it does not purport to direct departments and agencies to a particular course of action. Critical comments are offered on past evaluations, in particular that the continuing need for the program being evaluated, and major alternatives in delivery, have seldom been examined.[28] GPEP 89 also states that a review of the Treasury Board evaluation policy is underway:

> Among the provisions that are being addressed in the review are the requirement for complete coverage of all programs over a reasonable time period; the requirement for new or revised programs to be accompanied by an evaluation framework; the issues to be covered in an evaluation; the need for follow-up procedures; and the procedures in place for evaluating interdepartmental programs and issues of government-wide concern.[29]

The Committee believes strongly that the requirements stated in the original policy should not be watered down as a consequence of the OCG's inability or unwillingness to enforce them.

GPEP 89 describes a review of 150 evaluation studies completed between 1984 and 1988 to determine how the results of the evaluations were used. This review was also referred to by Mr. Macdonald in his opening statement before the Committee.[30] It indicates that only 17 per cent of the studies led to major program redesign, while over 50 per cent resulted in what might loosely be called improved management (operational improvements to programs and improved understanding and monitoring of program performance). When viewed in conjunction with the OCG's criticism that many evaluations are not addressing major issues and alternatives, this finding causes the Committee considerable concern.

C. Coverage

The Office of the Comptroller General appears ambivalent about the extent to which all government programs are being evaluated over an approximately five-year cycle as the Treasury Board policy and the OCG's Guide on the Program Evaluation require. Mr. Macdonald testified before the Committee that "over the last decade most programs of government have been covered,"[31] while Mr. Leclerc stated "I think it would take probably more than 10 years to cover all of the programs of the government."[32] Furthermore, the OCG seems uncertain about the evaluation status of particular programs. For example, the Director General of Program Evaluation of the Department of Employment and Immigration, testifying before the Committee on September 27, 1990, confirmed that there were no plans to evaluate the government's contributions to the Unemployment Insurance Account or to fishermen's benefits, stating "We have viewed specific expenditures of that sort as not being programs, per se, and therefore of an evaluative nature."[33] However, in his written reply to the Committee's question about the evaluation of statutory programs, the Comptroller General indicates in a table that evaluations of these two programs were underway during the 1990-91 fiscal year.[34]

The Auditor General's Report for 1989 reviewed the Canada Assistance Plan (CAP) of the Department of National Health and Welfare. It found a lack of information on social programs funded by CAP and stated that, since its inception, no program evaluation of CAP had been carried out.[35] However, the Committee understands that an evaluation of CAP is now nearing completion. The Auditor General's 1990 Report is highly critical of the quality and coverage of program evaluation studies in the Department of the Environment. It states that, between 1984 and 1989, only seven program evaluation reports were completed covering less than ten per cent of the Department's activities. No evaluations of the Canadian Parks Service, which has a budget of $387 million and 4,700 person-years, have ever been carried out.[36] Such findings are hard to reconcile with the Comptroller General's apparent confidence that most government programs have been evaluated.

D. Centrally Requested Evaluations
